NATURAL GAS

PROPOSED PIPE LINE FROM ALBERTA TO EASTERN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is it his intention to make a statement to the house with regard to the very important announcements which have appeared in connection with the proposed natural gas pipe line from western Canada to eastern Canada?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I think I can make a brief statement at this time. As hon. members know, it has been anticipated for some time that Alberta would have a surplus of natural gas which could be made available to the eastern part of Canada. Three or four weeks ago Mr. Manning, accompanied by two members of his conservation board, called on the Prime Minister to say that the board had found that there is in fact an exportable surplus at present of three and a half trillion cubic feet of gas. It is anticipated by Mr. Manning that the surplus will grow at the rate of ·75 trillion cubic feet per annum for the next five or ten years.

Mr. Adamson: Trillion?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Trillion. Mr. Manning stated he had received two applications for export of the gas from the province and that the board feels that at the present time neither application satisfies its requirements. Mr. Manning suggested to this government that if the two applications could be combined into a single project the government of Alberta would be prepared to grant an export licence to the single applicant.

This government offered its good offices to that end. I had several interviews with the two groups who have been competing for some time in an effort to place themselves in a position to obtain the licence when it is issued. The two groups had been spending a good deal of money in building up two separate situations. They had been competing for sources of supply of natural gas. They had been competing for customers and competing generally as to their relative positions in the pipe line field. I was able to convince them that the project of bringing gas from Alberta to eastern Canada is sufficiently large to justify their merging their effort. I pointed out that the purpose must be not to combine two separate projects, but to build one project in which both proposals would merge.

After several days of discussion, in which this government was acting as an honest broker, just pointing out the weaknesses in the separate situations and the advantages of merging, the merger was effected. Agreement was reached in every point, so that today we have one organization formed for the purpose of building a natural gas pipe line from Alberta to serve the principal markets in Ontario and Quebec. The public electricity organizations in both Ontario and Quebec are showing a considerable interest in the future of natural gas. Consideration is being given by the Ontario hydroelectric commission and by the Quebec hydro, as well as by the Shawinigan company, to acting as distributors for the gas in their territories, although at the moment nothing has been definitely decided on that feature of the project. I believe that outlines the position as we find it today.

Mr. Drew: I would ask the minister if this will require any new charter on behalf of the new company or any supplementary legislation to make it possible to carry this arrangement into effect.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): In speaking of the eastern provinces, I should have said that the pipe line would also serve Saskatchewan and Manitoba. I should not like them to feel left out. I am afraid I cannot answer the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition definitely. Certainly, there will have to be an amendment to one of the present charters. The company is adopting the name of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, which is the name of one of the present charters. There will need to be amendments affecting the capitalization of the company, and it may in the end prove to be desirable to introduce a new bill of incorporation that will repeal the two existing franchises.

In either event, I sincerely hope hon. members will be disposed to give the necessary legislation priority in the house so that this great project need not be delayed. In the meantime, the merged companies are working under the franchise given Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited.

Mr. Drew: I can assure the minister that the reason for the question was that we might proceed as rapidly as possible to do anything that might be necessary to expedite this important venture. I would point out that we have already indicated our support of the general plan that is involved. Naturally, the sooner any information is before us that would be required for the purpose of subsequent action by parliament, the sooner we can proceed to deal with this question.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I should like to add a word. I understand that the deadline for the introduction of private bills is next Monday. I expect that those interested will introduce legislation before that day. As to the nature of the legislation, I am not too sure.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask a supplementary question? Has any consideration been given to making this project a publicly owned project, a joint project of the provinces concerned and the federal government?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I presume that consideration has been given to it, but it seems to me that this is obviously a project where private initiative is required to build the longest pipe line that has ever been built in the world, and to develop customers in areas that have used gas only to a limited extent. This is a job that requires an organization somewhat outside the organizing ability of government bodies.

Mr. McIvor: I should like to ask a supplementary question about the pipe line. Does this information mean that the greatest obstacle to the all-Canadian pipe line has now been overcome, namely, the people to put up the cash for the line?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I would be optimistic if I thought that obstacle had been overcome, but I think the machinery now organized will be the most effective means for financing the building of the line.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the minister if the government offered any inducement to the two companies in urging them to unite their forces in that project?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The answer, Mr. Speaker, is no. No inducements were asked for and none were offered.

Mr. Applewhaite: May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, arising out of the answers he has already given? Can he inform the house whether the negotiations of settlement to which he has referred will have any effect upon the supply of natural gas for British Columbia, and has he any statement to make on the progress of that proposal?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): One project does not interfere with the other. The gas for British Columbia will originate in the Peace river territory of British Columbia and Alberta. All I can say about the status of the west coast proposal is that the necessary export permits have been given which will make it possible to build a gas pipe line to serve British Columbia. The application to export gas to the United States has been before the federal power commission of the United States for some 17 or 18 months, and I believe the sponsors of the pipe line are hoping for an early decision.

WHEAT

QUESTION AS TO FINAL PAYMENT FOR 1952-53 CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister say what the final payment for the 1952-53 wheat crop will be, and whether a final payment will be made at an early date?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am unable to answer either of those questions, Mr. Speaker. I shall make inquiries, and will hope to be able to make a statement in the not too distant future.

DUMPING

INQUIRY AS TO REGULATIONS UNDER AMENDED ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue? Can the minister say whether any regulations have been passed under Bill No. 29, which was passed just before Christmas, or any instructions issued under the terms of that bill? If so, could any such regulations or instructions be tabled in the house?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): I did not receive notice of the question, but I shall take the inquiry as notice and give an answer as soon as possible.

COMMONWEALTH FINANCE CONFERENCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT—INVITATION TO OTTAWA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Has the Prime Minister any report on the progress of the conference of finance ministers in Sydney? Secondly, is an invitation to be extended at Sydney to hold the next conference in Ottawa?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): We have received no official report on the progress that is being made at the conference in Australia. I saw a report in the newspapers that the Minister of Finance, as had been understood before he left, had said that Canada would be glad to have the next meeting take place in Ottawa.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Supplementary to that, and in view of certain reports that have come to us from Sydney, may I ask if the Canadian Minister of Finance is attending that conference without any restrictions and on the same basis as the others attending it, or if, in fact, he is only attending as an observer? I direct that supplementary question because of reports which have appeared in the press that he is there as an observer.

Mr. St. Laurent: He is attending the meeting of the finance ministers of the commonwealth in the capacity in which he was invited, as one of the finance ministers of the commonwealth, to consider methods of further improving world trade. It may be that ministers representing sterling areas will have to discuss certain aspects of the problem with respect to which our Minister of Finance would be more an observer than a participant. But he is there with the same general objective as all the finance ministers—that is to say, to endeavour to promote a larger measure of world trade.

UNITED NATIONS

RECONVENING OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether or not Canada is supporting the calling of the United Nations assembly, in reply to a circular issued by Madame Pandit, the president of the assembly.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I received only this morning the suggestion from the Indian government that the assembly reconvene on February 9. We are giving consideration to the matter at once.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

BUILDING OF DEFENCE ROAD IN MANITOBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. Has he, or any other minister of the government, any statement to make with regard to a report that a defence road is to be built from a point in southern Manitoba to Churchill, Manitoba?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I have not seen the report but, had I done so, I would say there is nothing in it.

CRIMINAL CODE

JOINT COMMITTEE TO REPORT ON SPECIFIC MATTERS RELATED TO CRIMINAL LAW

The house resumed, from Tuesday, December 15, consideration at the motion of Mr. Garson:

That a joint committee of both houses of parliament be appointed to inquire into and report upon the questions whether the criminal law of Canada relating to (a) capital punishment, (b) corporal punishment or (c) lotteries should be amended in any respect and, if so, in what manner and to what extent:

That 17 members of the House of Commons, to be designated by the house at a later date, be members of the joint committee on the part of this house, and that standing order 65 of the House of Commons be suspended in relation thereto;

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

That the committee have power to appoint, from among its members, such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable or necessary; to call for persons, papers and records; to sit while the house is sitting and to report from time to time;

That the committee have power to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee for the use of the committee and of parliament, and that standing order 64 of the House of Commons be suspended in relation thereto;

And that a message be sent to the Senate requesting that house to unite with this house for the above purpose and to select, if the Senate deems advisable, some of its members to act on the proposed joint committee.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Fulton: Is the Minister of Justice not going to make an explanation of the motion?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, when this motion was moved on December 15 it was supported by me in a short speech, following which the debate was adjourned by another member of the house. This being so, I would be glad to close the debate, if no other member wishes to speak.

Mr. Fulton: I understand this is a motion the minister placed before us at the conclusion of the debate on second reading of a bill to amend the Criminal Code. The motion is to set up a special committee of both houses of parliament to consider certain matters. At that time there was no debate. That was on Tuesday, December 15, as I recall it. The motion which the minister placed before us appears in Hansard of that day at page 958, and the debate was adjourned. There was no debate actually on that day, because at the close of the minister's remarks I asked this:

Mr. Fulton: Will you move the adjournment of the debate?

And then the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) said: "There is no debate." And Hansard records that "On motion of Mr. Bennett the debate was adjourned." Actually there was no opportunity for debate. The minister did not speak. Therefore, if I may state my understanding of the rule, if the minister speaks now he does not close the debate because, apparently, he did not speak when introducing the motion. Therefore I wonder if it is not possible for him to say something at this stage in order to explain what the government has in mind in connection with setting up this committee. I should think he could speak without actually closing the debate. Then further debate might follow the minister's explanatory remarks.

Mr. Garson: Speaking first to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Kamloops, I would remind the hon. member that the motion now before the house arose from a motion which had been made previously for the second reading of Bill No. 7, to consolidate the Criminal Code.

In my rather lengthy remarks in the debate on second reading of the bill respecting the Criminal Code, I dealt at some length with this question of setting up a joint parliamentary committee, and explained the nature of the arrangement between the parties out of which it was proposed that that step should be taken. Then, in carrying out the undertaking which had been given in my remarks on second reading of Bill No. 7, I seized the first opportunity, with the unanimous consent of the house, to move the motion which now appears before hon. members.

After I had done so, no further explanation from myself being required, the hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Bennett) moved the adjournment of the debate. That is the position in which, I submit, the matter now stands. I would be glad to listen to the comments of hon. members concerning this motion and in closing the debate to try to meet the points they raise. But if I were to speak further at the present time I think I could do very little more than repeat what I said in the debate on the second reading of Bill No. 7.

Mr. Fulton: Probably the discussion at this stage on the point of order could be disposed of if we are to take it that the minister does not intend to make any further remarks. If that is his position, then we cannot force him to speak. But I do point out to him that, as reported at page 958 of Hansard, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said, when it was indicated that the minister was going to place a motion before the house:

> Perhaps the house would consent to the minister making his motion so we would have it before us. Then he might immediately move the adjournment of the debate.

To this the minister replied:

> I shall be glad to do that. I move: . . .

And then the minister proceeded to read his motion, following which the discussion to which I have already referred took place. I think I can say, without imputing any improper motives to anyone, that the matter was left in a state of some confusion. The hon. member for Grey North will, of course, speak for himself, as to what was in his mind, but I do believe there was some confusion, and that it was as a result of that confusion that it was generally agreed the hon. member should adjourn the debate. Certainly however it was our understanding that the motion was being moved simply to get the motion for committee on the record, so that hon. members could see it and that at a later date there would be a statement from the minister as to the government's position with respect to it.

However, if the minister says now that he has nothing further to say and that he does not intend to make any statement, that will dispose of it. I think it is quite clear however, under the rules of the house, that there is no reason why the minister should be precluded from speaking now. However, if he does not intend to, all right.

Mr. Garson: I apprehend two things in connection with this matter. I apprehend, first, that on the point of order I would be out of order if I proceeded to take part in the debate at the present time other than to close it. Perhaps I should ask Mr. Speaker to rule upon that point first.

However, I might say, secondly, that if I were to lay before the house my reasons in support of this motion for the setting up of a joint committee of the sort proposed, I could do little more than paraphrase what I said when I spoke at considerable length upon this very point when moving the second reading of Bill No. 7. I do not think any useful purpose would be served by such repetition. I believe the matter was clearly placed before the house at that time. If there are any members who think there are reasons why this motion should not pass, and who would wish to address the house in that regard, then in closing the debate I would be glad to reply to their arguments.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I might add a word on the point of order because, as I understand it, there is no doubt that if the minister were to speak now he would close the debate. The minister moved this motion, and then on motion of the hon. member for Grey North the debate was adjourned. If he spoke now he would be closing the debate, technically. As the minister explained a moment ago, when he moved the second reading of the bill to amend the Criminal Code, he explained this motion and the purpose of it. As he has just said, he has spoken upon it, and as soon as second reading was carried he tried to carry out the undertaking with regard to this second motion. Hon. members will see, if they turn to page 958 of Hansard, the minister said:

> Mr. Speaker, during the course of my remarks on second reading of the bill I stated that the government—

And so on. There he referred to his intention to make this motion. It was apparently expected at that moment that the motion would carry immediately, because of the explanation the minister had made on second reading of an act to amend the Criminal Code. But some members took exception to its immediate adoption and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) suggested that the minister put his motion on Hansard anyway, and that was done. Following that, on the understanding that the minister had made all the remarks he had to make, the hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Bennett) was taken as having adjourned the debate. With the explanation that the minister, if he were now to make a statement, would repeat with respect to it what he has already said on the motion for second reading of an act to amend the Criminal Code, we ought to consider the matter cleared up.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): If the minister does not wish to make a statement, and if we are to proceed on that basis and on the basis that you have just outlined, sir, I want to point out to him, if we are to be taken as continuing a debate which commenced on the evening of December 15, that actually at that time, as Your Honour will recall, it was after ten o'clock, so that except by unanimous consent no further proceedings could be carried on in the house. However, at that time we did not wish to take that technical position and thereby prevent the minister from even laying before the house what his motion would contain.

The device suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and to which Your Honour has already referred, was that the minister would move his motion so that it would be on the record, and then adjourn the debate. I think it should be said that we are now in the position, it is true, where the minister technically—and if he wishes to rely upon that technicality, of course he can do so—cannot speak without being taken as closing the debate. In order to avoid taking advantage on our part of a technicality—it was then after ten o'clock—we said, "All right, go ahead; put your motion so that it will be in Hansard, and then you can adjourn the debate and speak again"; and it is a little unfortunate that, having made that concession on the basis of that understanding, we are now to be placed in the position where the minister is not going to vouchsafe further information to the house on the government's intention with respect to this matter.

In making a motion of this sort to set up a special committee to consider a subject of this importance and of this complexity, it is usual that the government should indicate at some length the procedure which it suggests should be followed in that committee. It is true of course that a committee once constituted is master of its own proceedings within the limits of the rules of the house, and that the government frequently says: "We cannot tell the committee what to do; it is for the committee to decide." Nevertheless a suggestion from the government, and particularly an expression of intention on the part of the responsible minister as to how he thinks the matter should be dealt with and in what respects his department will be prepared to co-operate, what information, what statistical tables and matters of that nature the department intends to prepare or would be willing to prepare to lay before the committee, whether or not it is to be suggested that the committee be invited to hear representations, and if so from what sorts of bodies and how many, is of great help to the committee. It is always helpful if the minister indicates at the time he makes his motion and is speaking in support of that motion just how it is intended to proceed.

Therefore, it is unfortunate that a technicality is in effect being raised at this time to deprive us of the benefit of that information from the government as to how it proposes to proceed in this matter. We have not got it, however, and we cannot force the minister to speak. Therefore I will take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to lay before the house some considerations which I feel should be borne in mind by the committee now to be set up, if this motion passes.

I should like to say at once that in what I have to say on matters of detail with respect to the matters to be referred to the committee I do not wish to be taken as in any way attempting to make a statement of policy with respect to the attitude of the Conservative party or of the official opposition, because it must be realized that in matters of this kind, particularly where matters of such far-reaching importance for the whole welfare and conduct of the nation with respect to its criminal law are concerned, matters which are so controversial, matters in which differences of opinion with respect to the local and national consequences of a certain course of action have no relation to differences of opinion between parties, it would be unwise and indeed impossible to attempt to draw any party lines with respect to them.

It seems to me that the only feasible and constructive approach to problems of this sort will be for each individual member of the house and each individual member of the committee to express his personal conviction, and it is in that spirit that I venture to make these few remarks in connection with the motion now before us.

This motion invites the formation of a committee to consider whether the criminal law of Canada should be amended with respect to (a) capital punishment; (b) corporal punishment; and (c) lotteries; and if so to suggest how it should be altered. It seems to me that in approaching this question we have always to bear in mind that we are dealing here with facts and not with theories. Murder is one of the headings that the committee is to be invited to consider. It deals with a set of facts. Each one of these headings arises out of the circumstances of the subject matter with which the criminal law on that subject is dealing. It is a subject matter which exists in fact and not in theory. In other words, murder is a fact, and hanging is a fact. Unfortunately, people do kill. So that we are not considering the question of capital punishment in an atmosphere of abstract theory but in an atmosphere of unfortunate fact, that in society as we have it today killings, murders, do take place. In the same way, people do commit the crimes which are now punishable by whipping. Corporal punishment being confined in this country to whipping, it is necessary that we carry on a discussion of that branch of the motion both here and in the committee in the light of the unfortunate fact that horrible crimes which at present call for the penalty of whipping are in fact committed.

The same thing can be said of the law with respect to lotteries. People in Canada do in fact carry on and take part in lotteries. I have reference here, and will have throughout the discussion of this branch of our criminal law, not to the question of the law regarding the keeping of gaming houses or institutions of that kind where roulette and fan-tan and games of that sort are played for the profit of the owner, but to the conducting of sweepstakes and lotteries in public and games of chance for charitable purposes.

While the considerations and recommendations to be made on these subjects are matters which the committee will decide for itself, there are I think certain considerations which it might be suggested should be before the committee in the light of which it might approach its decisions on these various branches of the criminal law. I should like to deal with them in series, starting first with the question of capital punishment.

It seems to me that here the committee will have two branches of the law in this regard to consider. First there is the question of whether or not capital punishment should be retained as part of our criminal law, or whether it should be abolished. Second, if the committee should decide to recommend that capital punishment be retained, then they would have to consider whether or not there should be certain modifications of the law of murder in order to restrict the number or types of cases in which the death sentence will be automatically imposed. I should like to deal with these two branches of consideration.

First, then, in connection with the question of whether capital punishment should be retained or abolished. I can only express the hope that the committee when appointed will approach this matter with open minds and not with preconceived notions either one way or the other. Although one hears quite a number of expressions of opinion that capital punishment is an outrage and should be abolished, it seems to me that we have to study the matter somewhat more deeply than that. I would suggest for the consideration of the committee that at a time like the present when the incidence of crimes of violence is not diminishing, when the tendency I might say is not for murders to become more simple but rather to become more horrible, we cannot lightly say that capital punishment should be abolished.

There are other arguments or factors which I think the committee should bear in mind and on which they should ask for evidence and statistics before they reach their conclusions. I think there are quite a number of factors which urge that this is not the time to make that radical change in our criminal law which the abolition of capital punishment would involve. I refer to the atmosphere in which we live in which crimes of violence, murders and killings are certainly not becoming less in number.

Then I think the committee should look at the experience in other countries, particularly those whose legal systems and criminal law are based by and large upon our system of the common law. I have in mind particularly the United States, and the other countries of the commonwealth. Perhaps I might interpolate here to say that most of the statistics which I shall refer to have been compiled by the royal commission on capital punishment which sat recently in the United Kingdom. This royal commission was appointed in 1949 and brought down its report in September, 1953. In my opinion this document is one of the most masterly and comprehensive studies of the whole question of capital punishment that have ever been made.

Not only did they look at the situation and experience in the United Kingdom; they looked at the experience of practically all countries outside the iron curtain on the continent of Europe, of other countries of the commonwealth, and of the United States. In the United States they considered not only the federal jurisdiction but many if not all of the states.

Mr. Knight: In order to keep the record straight, may I ask the hon. member if it is not a fact that that royal commission did not deal with the question of capital punishment as such.

Mr. Fulton: I am coming to that, if the hon. member will just give me a moment. The hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) is perfectly correct in saying that by its terms this royal commission was not invited to consider whether or not capital punishment should be abolished but only to consider the modifications which might be made in the law of the United Kingdom with respect to capital punishment, with respect to murder and with respect to the imposition of the death penalty.

Nevertheless it did make a most comprehensive and detailed investigation, not only of the law relating to murder and capital punishment in the countries which I have mentioned but of the number of murders, the number of executions and also as to whether or not there was an automatic imposition of the death penalty in those countries or whether the imposition of the death penalty was within the discretion of the jury, the court or the judge once a person had been found guilty of murder. As I said, it is one of the most comprehensive and masterly surveys of the whole field which have been made.

Looking then at the experience of other countries as found and reported upon by the royal commission in the United Kingdom, we see that in forty-two of the forty-eight states of the United States capital punishment is retained for first degree murder, although in forty of those forty-two states the jury has some discretion as to the sentence, as to whether death or life imprisonment will follow. They summarize their findings at pages 460-461 and I think it might be convenient for the purposes of this discussion if this summary were put on the record. It reads:

> In three states, the juries are authorized to recommend mercy but the recommendation is not binding.
> In fifteen states, the jury must specify whether the sentence should be death or imprisonment for life and there is no verdict unless the jury reach agreement on both guilt and sentence.

I might say that this deals exclusively with the situation which arises in those states of the United States where a verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree has been brought in. I continue:

> In eight states, the death penalty is automatic unless the jury recommend life imprisonment; thus, if the jury cannot agree, the death sentence is pronounced.
> In two states, a sentence of life imprisonment is automatic unless the jury recommend death; thus, if the jury cannot agree, the sentence is imprisonment for life.
> In nine states and the federal jurisdiction, the jury may qualify their verdict by the words "without capital punishment", though it is not certain whether the jury's decision is binding on the court. It appears that the jury must reach a unanimous decision and there is no verdict unless the jury reach agreement on both guilt and sentence.
> In two states a recommendation by a majority of the jury is sufficient.

That, then, is the situation in the United States where in forty-two of the forty-eight states capital punishment is retained. In all commonwealth countries the death sentence is retained. In Australia generally speaking, in Canada, in Ceylon and New Zealand the death sentence is mandatory following a verdict of guilty of murder.

It is interesting to note, also, that for a period of time they abolished capital punishment in New Zealand but they have recently re-introduced it. The same holds true of the United Kingdom where after a trial period in which it was agreed that no one convicted of murder would be subjected to the death penalty, and where when the time limit for the trial period expired the experiment was not continued, the death sentence is mandatory following a verdict of guilty of murder.

I am sure that the committee, in addition to considering the experience and present practice in other countries, will want to give some consideration to the question of the very nature of punishment itself. Here I think we cannot do better than consider the words used by the British royal commission in their discussion of the question of the nature of the death penalty as a punishment, with respect particularly to its deterrent effect and as to whether it is justified because of that effect. On that question they had this to say, as reported at page 18, where they quoted the words of one of their witnesses, Lord Justice Denning, as follows:

> The punishment inflicted for grave crimes should adequately reflect the revulsion felt by the great majority of citizens for them. It is a mistake to consider the objects of punishment as being deterrent or reformative or preventive and nothing else . . . The ultimate justification of any punishment is not that it is a deterrent, but that it is the emphatic denunciation by the community of a crime; and from this point of view, there are some murders which, in the present state of public opinion, demand the most emphatic denunciation of all, namely the death penalty.

They continue with this statement by the commission itself:

> The Archbishop of Canterbury, while expressing no opinion about the ethics of capital punishment, agreed with Lord Justice Denning's view about the ultimate justification of any punishment. By reserving the death penalty for murder the criminal law stigmatises the gravest crime by the gravest punishment; and it may be argued that by so doing, the law helps to foster in the community a special abhorrence of murder as "the crime of crimes", so that the element of retribution merges into that of deterrence. Whatever weight may be given to this argument, the law cannot ignore the public demand for retribution which heinous crimes undoubtedly provoke; it would be generally agreed that, though reform of the criminal law ought sometimes to give a lead to public opinion, it is dangerous to move too far in advance of it.

Now, with respect to the argument as to whether or not the retention of capital punishment is justified on the basis that it is a deterrent to the crime of murder, the royal commission came to the conclusion, and I think I am summarizing their conclusion fairly and accurately, that the evidence was inconclusive either way. In other words, that one might compile a set of statistics to show that the existence of the death penalty had in certain cases or in certain countries a very great deterrent effect, and on the other hand one can turn to countries in which there is no death penalty in existence and can argue from statistics gathered there that the incidence of murder was no greater there than in countries which retained the death penalty. The royal commission, however, uses this sentence: "We can number its failures. But we cannot number its successes." That is for the very reason that it is obviously impossible to say in how many cases a person tempted to commit murder has been deterred by the fact that he might expose himself to the possibility of the death sentence.

It is pointed out, however, that they feel a good deal of weight has to be given to the opinion of responsible police officers, and I think perhaps the most impressive summary they gave of the police officers' evidence is to be found at page 38, where they say as follows:

The representatives of the chief constables' association and the police federation were strongly opposed to any changes in the existing law.

Then they go on:

. . . they had no doubt that if liability to be convicted of murder and to suffer the death penalty were limited, criminals would take more risks, use more violence and more often carry firearms.

While we of course in this country are not in any sense bound by the opinions or necessarily by the experience of any other country, I would nevertheless suggest that these opinions and similar opinions, which I hope our committee will have an opportunity of hearing from similar organizations in Canada, will carry the greatest weight with the committee when it commences its deliberations.

There is, it seems to me, another reason for caution in considering this first aspect of the matter as to whether or not capital punishment should be abolished. It appears to me that to a very great extent the arguments of those who favour an immediate embarkation on the abolition of capital punishment are met by the fact that we have under our system of law the jury method of trying persons accused of murder. I make no bones about it, nor do I have any hesitation in saying that by and large I have complete confidence in the jury system in producing correct and just verdicts in murder trials.

My conclusion is based on my experience, limited as I immediately confess that experience has been, compared to the experience of some others in this house and many others outside who have had a wide experience in criminal trials. But, based upon my experience—and I have been on different sides in different murder cases—and based upon the reading I have been able to do on the matter, my conclusion is that the jury does not often go wrong.

I think it is an established fact that juries will not convict if they feel a man should not hang, and it does not matter what the judge may say to them. The judge may say to them that there do not seem to him any grounds upon which the jury can bring in a verdict of manslaughter. If the jury do not think the man should hang, they will not convict him of murder; and this is true in the vast majority of cases. Other hon. members may have had a different experience, and of course individual cases differ; but by and large it seems to me that that is the experience of most people and that that fact is the greatest assurance that could be given that the existence of the death penalty does not lead to unjust or unmerciful results.

I was glad to find that my conclusions in this regard were similar to those of the royal commission in the United Kingdom to which I have referred. I think the passages of their report dealing with this tendency of juries to reach merciful verdicts where they feel the circumstances of the case do not warrant conviction, even though technically the crime may be murder, are extremely interesting. They say, and I am reading now from page 8, paragraph 28:

After giving full weight to the consideration that juries rightly demand a very high standard of proof before they are willing to convict on a charge so grave as murder, we formed the impression from the evidence that juries do from time to time return a verdict of manslaughter, and more rarely of guilty but insane, or of acquittal, in cases where there is little ground for reasonable doubt that the accused was in fact guilty of murder. (A typical case, cited by more than one witness, is the murder of an unfaithful wife or her lover by a soldier returning from the war.) We agree with Sir John Anderson that such verdicts are to be attributed to sympathy for the accused in the particular case rather than to disapproval of capital punishment or to any shrinking from responsibility.

They also summarize certain of the evidence presented to them as follows:

Lord Justice Denning, on the other hand, said that "in many cases which are in law plainly murder, juries return verdicts of manslaughter, because they do not think the death sentence is appropriate"; and the Howard League for Penal Reform said that their observations over many years bore out Justice Denning's view.

When you take the conclusion that juries will usually arrive at a proper verdict on all the facts and couple with that the existence in Canada, as in all countries of the British commonwealth which observe the principle that Her Majesty is the head of the commonwealth, of the exercise of the prerogative of mercy, the right of reprieve, then I think that there is room for argument that the principle of capital punishment should not lightly be removed from our criminal law.

While I am not going to trespass upon the work of the committee, I think that in this connection a very short statistical review of the experience in England and in Canada is interesting and illuminating. The table reproduced in this royal commission report shows that so far as the United Kingdom is concerned, in the ten-year period 1940 to 1949 inclusive there were 1,666 murders known to the police. These resulted in 815 arrests for murder. Of the 815 arrested 680 were committed for trial at assizes. Of the 680 tried there were 262 cases where the jury returned a verdict of guilty and the death sentence was imposed. Out of the 262 there were 127 executions.

In other words, within that ten-year period murders were followed by executions in 7·6 per cent of cases. In 38·5 per cent of cases those tried were found guilty. In 18·7 per cent of cases those tried and found guilty were actually executed, and in 15·5 per cent of cases those arrested were actually executed. While statistics in Canada are not available on the same basis, we do have in the report published by the bureau of statistics entitled "Statistics of Criminal and Other Offences for the Year 1950", a summary at page 199 of murder charges, dispositions, commutations and executions from 1900 to 1950. Although the same detail is not available in this table, it shows that in the period of ten years from 1940 to 1949 inclusive there were 479 murder charges laid. Those 479 charges resulted in 196 death sentences as the result of jury verdicts and 104 executions.

Therefore during that ten-year period, in 40·9 per cent of cases those charged were found guilty by the jury, compared with 38·5 per cent in Great Britain, or pretty nearly the same percentage. In 21·7 per cent of cases in Canada those charged were found guilty and actually executed compared with 18·7 per cent in the United Kingdom. Therefore verdicts of guilty in Canada are higher by about 2 per cent of cases than in the United Kingdom and executions in Canada are higher by about 3 per cent of cases.

But the statistic which I think is interesting is that, in that period of ten years, in 21·7 per cent of cases in Canada, or roughly only one-fifth of the cases where a charge of murder was laid which proceeded to trial, was there a finding of guilty and the death sentence actually executed upon the accused person. Therefore I think we should always bear in mind that in this country, and our experience appears to be repeated in the United Kingdom and I should gather from that in other commonwealth countries, it is fair and accurate to say that only in a very limited number of cases is a charge and trial for murder followed by execution, and in a restricted number of cases is the sentence of death followed by execution of that sentence. These are the main considerations that occur to me which should be borne in mind by the committee and all aspects of which should be studied in connection with their consideration of whether or not capital punishment should be abolished in Canada.

Then there is the other branch of that consideration which I mentioned, namely, possible modifications of the law of murder even though the principle of capital punishment may be retained. Again I would say that in approaching the question of whether to modify our law it is desirable to go slowly. After four years of study the royal commission in the United Kingdom reached four main conclusions on this point. It is always difficult to summarize a lengthy report in a few words, but I think I am doing so fairly and accurately when I say that, broadly speaking, the four main recommendations were: First, to eliminate or vary—there were two different recommendations on this subject—the rules in M'Naghten's case having to do with insanity; second, to modify the rule regarding provocation; third, to abolish the doctrine of constructive malice; and fourth, to give discretion to juries in murder trials, in cases where they have brought in a verdict of guilty, to find in addition extenuating circumstances which would mean that the death sentence would not be imposed but that a sentence of imprisonment would automatically follow.

For our purposes I think it might be suggested that it is important for us to consider only the last two recommendations. The subject of insanity is going to be referred to a royal commission and the rule regarding provocation is already the same in Canada as it has been recommended that it be in the United Kingdom. It does not seem to me therefore that the first two recommendations need concern us very much, and even the third recommendation respecting the abolishing of the rule regarding constructive malice does not seem to me to be of much importance to us because the application of the rule of constructive malice in Canada is not by virtue of its being a rule of law, but is restricted to those cases laid down in the Criminal Code. The fact that it is confined to certain offences gives it a more restricted application than it has as a general rule of law in the United Kingdom.

It would seem to me that the most important of their recommendations from our point of view is the one which I have listed as the fourth, namely, that juries be given discretion, after having found a verdict of guilty of murder, to find in addition extenuating circumstances. However, Mr. Speaker, I think it should be pointed out that the British royal commission were concerned with what does concern every one of us here and every person in Canada, that is, cases where there are extenuating circumstances in the environment or background of the accused or where it is felt that the accused did not actually intend to kill, but where, in law, what the accused did was murder. Certainly, I do not suppose there would be a person in this house or in the country who would not agree that in cases of that kind there is room for modification of our law. It is a horrible thing that a person should be hanged merely because, although he does not intend to kill, in law what he has done is murder. That is the situation that concerned the British royal commission. It is a situation that each and every one of us will have in mind when we consider this subject.

It is felt that it is contrary to the principles of our law that a person should pay this penalty for something he did not intend to do. But one has to realize also that the law has been carefully framed so as to make it impossible for people to embark recklessly upon acts which result in the taking of a life. After all, that is the most serious thing a person can do. It is to discourage embarking lightly upon courses of action of that kind that the law has, heretofore at any rate, been careful to lay it down that such a course of action is, technically, murder.

The question is whether that kind of murder, if I might call it that, as distinct from deliberate, cold-blooded, intended murder, should carry with it automatically the death penalty. It was this point that the British commission considered, and which they had in mind when they made their recommendation regarding the discretion given to the jury to bring in this finding of extenuating circumstances. While realizing fully the difficulty that lies in this problem, and the desirability of exploring every method which might result in tempering justice with mercy, I want to reiterate my belief that the greatest safeguard we have may be found, not so much in amendments to the law as in the fact that we follow the jury system. It seems to me it is the greatest safeguard we have in Canada against the possibility of cases, in which there are extenuating circumstances, resulting in the death sentence. As I have said my conclusion, as a result of experience and reading, is that with remarkably few exceptions juries will not convict of murder when there are extenuating circumstances.

In dealing with this problem the British royal commission considered and rejected an idea which however I think should be explored here in spite of what I have said about the safeguard of the jury system. That is the suggestion that there should be a statutory definition of two types of murder, first degree and second degree murder. First degree murder would be the only one to be followed automatically by the imposition of the death sentence. The British royal commission considered that and rejected it. They came up with this recommendation of giving juries a discretion.

It is interesting to note that that recommendation has already been very strongly, and I may say very effectively, criticized in the House of Lords. Members who are interested will find the debate on that point recorded in the House of Lords official report for Wednesday, December 16, 1953. Viscount Simon—unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, one has now to say the late Viscount Simon because according to newspaper reports he died yesterday, one of the most eminent lawyers ever produced in the United Kingdom—introduced into the House of Lords a motion criticizing the particular recommendation of the British royal commission to which I have referred.

Interestingly enough, he was supported in his argument by Earl Jowitt, who had been the lord chancellor in the Labour government until Churchill was re-elected. Lord Jowitt agreed with Lord Simon that the recommendation of the British royal commission was not sound. Their objections were based mainly on the contention that it is not proper to give to the jury a discretion as to sentence. Their argument was that under our system the matter of sentence has always been reserved for the judge, that the jury are the judges of the facts, they are the judges of the question of whether or not the accused is guilty as charged. That is all it is proper to place upon the jury. Once they have exercised that responsibility, then it is not fair to go back and ask them to accept another responsibility by saying, "How shall this man be punished as a result of the verdict you have brought in?"

I was impressed by the objections raised in the House of Lords to this particular recommendation, and I am certain it will be agreed that if the objections are valid they would be as valid here as they are in the United Kingdom. But it seems to me it may not be necessary for us in our consideration, if we do feel it desirable to make some change in the law of murder, to feel driven to adopt such a course as the British royal commission recommended. I put this forward as a suggestion only. It seems to me that one of the reasons for the British royal commission coming to the conclusion it did and making the recommendation it did was that it felt impelled to reject the suggestion of a statutory definition of the different types of murder, as first degree or second degree murder. Having rejected that suggestion, they were left with but one alternative, the recommendation they introduced.

In Canada, I think we are fortunate in that we have established for ourselves a codification of our criminal law. We have had our Criminal Code since the 1890's. The British appear to have almost an abhorrence for codifying their criminal law. Theirs is embodied in a great mass of common law and over 150 separate statutes relating to the criminal law. It seems to me that the objection to making statutory definitions of murder does not apply in this country to the same extent as it does in the United Kingdom; at any rate, we do not have the same objection to it. I think we should not shrink from introducing a statutory definition of different degrees of murder, if that is felt desirable, merely because they did not adopt that course in the United Kingdom. I do not think their objection to it applies here at all. I believe that if we decide that some solution along these lines is desirable, then the creation of different types of murder would be found to be preferable to giving a discretion to the jury.

Mr. Garson: Will the hon. member permit a question? When he refers to types of murder, to what has he reference?

Mr. Fulton: To first and second degree murders.

Mr. Garson: Not to constructive murder?

Mr. Fulton: No. Our code has already established in statutory form that which in the United Kingdom is referred to as constructive malice.

Mr. Fleming: Not political murder.

Mr. Fulton: I shall conclude my remarks on this phase of the matter by saying that it may be there is no need for a change in Canada at all. I have already expressed my confidence in the jury system, and in juries in general. I would also point out that, at least in any case within my knowledge, the jury has always had laid before it most thoroughly by defence counsel any extenuating circumstances. And having before them the knowledge of those extenuating circumstances such as might be calculated to arouse their sympathy, juries, I am sure, will not find accused persons guilty of murder if they do not think those persons should hang.

I cannot think of any defence counsel who would not take every advantage of placing before a jury every extenuating circumstance, or who would fail to place before a jury every suggestion alternative to the idea of murder, or who would fail to place before them anything which might be calculated to arouse their sympathy. Once the jury has gone through the process of arriving at a verdict, and having decided that an accused person is guilty of murder, I cannot conceive their being asked to go back and to consider all over again whether there are any extenuating circumstances.

Had they felt that there were such extenuating circumstances, they would not have found the accused person guilty of murder in the first instance. Perhaps they would have found insanity, or brought in a verdict of manslaughter. I would therefore urge the committee now to be set up, when it is considering this subject, to keep in mind the fact that there is a distinct and strong possibility that the necessity for change in our law concerning murder in Canada is not as urgent as is sometimes suggested.

I can imagine some people saying that I am a typical Conservative or, if you like, perhaps that I am a typical lawyer because I am opposed to change. I would ask hon. members to think of the matter in this way, that what I am suggesting is not so much that there should not be any change in our approach to the idea of capital punishment or the laws regarding murder, but rather my suggestion is that what we now have in our Criminal Code and our use of the jury system give an assurance that changes will be made. We may be assured that as they are made those changes will keep abreast of but will not precede or run counter to current social and sociological thinking in society, because juries are formed of members of society.

Thus a hundred years ago a jury would probably have brought in a verdict of guilty, without any compunction whatsoever, in respect of a crime upon which no jury today would convict. And yet the law of murder has not changed; it is the jury that has changed. A jury in considering the charge and the evidence, and in arriving at its verdict, is going to reflect the current social and sociological, penal and penological thinking of the country. So that to suggest that we should go slow in embarking upon changes in our Criminal Code is not simply to oppose change, but rather is to say—as I am now saying—that we already have embodied in the criminal law and procedure of Canada the assurance that change can take place, that it will take place and that it does take place, and that it takes place at a pace which is in keeping with the progress of thought and the development of ideas on these subjects in society as a whole.

I do not intend to exhaust the patience of the house, and shall mention only briefly the other two subjects the committee will be asked to consider, those of corporal punishment and gambling laws. I have dealt at some length with the subject of capital punishment at this time, because I do not think it requires much argument to convince ourselves that probably it is the most important of the three subjects the committee will be asked to consider.

Murder is very final; so is hanging. No one gets a second chance after he has been hanged. While none of us may ever be the accused in a murder trial, we cannot for that reason refuse to consider the matter in the serious light it deserves. Furthermore, every person in Canada is potentially the object of a murderer's activity, so that the consideration of this matter, especially when there is involved in it the question of punishment and whether capital punishment acts as a deterrent to murder, is of vital concern to every Canadian. It is for these reasons that I have spoken on the subject at such length, and at considerably greater length than I shall deal with the other two subjects.

However, I do wish to say, with respect to corporal punishment, that here again, while it may be that views on the subject are not as definite as those concerning capital punishment, there is reason to make haste slowly. I think that a résumé of the types of offences for which corporal punishment may now be imposed as an additional penalty would indicate some of the reasons why we should not go too fast in seeking to eliminate it.

Referring to the index to the Criminal Code one finds that the penalty of whipping may be imposed—and it need not necessarily be imposed—for the following offences: assault, whether it be indecent assault or assault on the person of the king, or on a wife or other female causing actual bodily harm. Then—armed burglary; carnal knowledge; choking or strangling when incidental to such things as attempting to have carnal knowledge or administering narcotics; incest; administering drugs; procuring; rape; and robbery—that refers to joint, violent, or armed robbery.

Those are the offences for which whipping may be imposed as part of the penalty. And I do suggest that merely to catalogue those offences, each of which has about it some element of horribleness, something about it which is disgusting or particularly reprehensible, does suggest that we should not move too fast in eliminating the possibility of whipping being imposed as part of the penalty.

Incidentally, I think that again we might be somewhat reassured, by looking up the statistics as to the number of occasions upon which whipping has been imposed in the last two years as part of the penalty. I find that in this statistical table issued by the bureau of statistics, to which I have already referred, while in respect of the indictable crimes for which persons were charged and found guilty there is no breakdown of the actual number of types of crimes for which whipping might have been imposed as part of the penalty, nevertheless during 1950, out of a total of 31,385 convictions for indictable offences, in only 40 cases was whipping imposed as a penalty. In 1951 the total was even smaller. Although there were 28,980 convictions for indictable offences in 1951, there were only 35 cases in which whipping was imposed as part of the penalty. Therefore it is obvious that it is a power or a discretion, available in the hands of the judges, that is not always used, and indeed is used very sparingly and only in exceptional cases where it is felt that the whipping, while perhaps it may not—and I suggest this for the consideration of the committee—act as a deterrent to somebody else not to commit the same crime, it will be almost one hundred per cent guaranteed to act as a very powerful deterrent to the person who receives that penalty against a repetition of the same crime.

Then, with respect to the question of the gambling laws and lotteries generally, as I said at the outset, Mr. Speaker, I feel that we are going to be much more concerned in the committee with the situation regarding the holding of lotteries than with the question of whether or not a person should be allowed to keep a common gaming house where roulette, fan-tan, and gambling of that sort takes place to the profit of the owner of the house. I do not suppose there is a person here who would not agree that that sort of thing is undesirable in our civilization; but I do think we have to give a great deal more serious thought to the much more difficult problem of the gambling laws generally, particularly with respect to lotteries.

I am not going to attempt to lay down here even a broad general principle, let alone any refined one, or indicate particularly what I think the committee should find, but I am going to take the liberty to suggest this and this alone as the basis of approach. It seems to me we should decide whether or not in fact gambling is a crime; whether or not in fact the conducting of a lottery and taking part in it, even for purposes of raising funds for charity, is a crime, or whether rather the crime does not lie in the conducting of a dishonest lottery or the raising of money, whatever be the motive, by dishonest methods. It seems to me we have to sort out our thinking on this subject and decide for ourselves, without fear or without being too much influenced by outside pressures, whether or not, as I say, the conduct of lotteries and similar activities properly supervised and honestly conducted is really a crime.

One could be amusing about this. I suppose most members of parliament ride on the trains from time to time. Probably most of them journey to and from their homes on the railways. Therefore, as members of parliament, perhaps we are more intimately brought into contact with the question of the gambling laws in Canada than almost any other section of the community, simply because of the frequency with which we have to travel on railway trains where, as every member knows, there is posted in what is obviously felt by the authority in charge of that railway or steamboat to be the most conspicuous place, a warning to all and sundry of the terrible perils that are attendant upon gambling on that railway car or steamboat. I see the minister nodding his head. I am sure he must have read that warning sign himself.

Mr. Garson: On a point of privilege, I was not nodding my head up and down or sideways.

Mr. Fulton: Well, I doubt whether the minister could have gone home without seeing that little sign. I do not know whether he is less anxious to agree or to disagree with what I am saying. Perhaps the immobility of his head indicates that he is not going to express his opinion one way or the other. I was going to say that it is an extraordinary situation that if, let us say, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and myself happened to be journeying west and we indulged in a little innocent poker game—

Mr. Coldwell: Bridge.

Mr. Fulton: Or bridge—for stakes, however small, we would be liable to be haled by the conductor or other officer in charge of the railway train at the first available opportunity, with or without warning, before an officer of the peace, and there delivered into his custody and charged with an offence against the Criminal Code of Canada. In fact, it would be incumbent upon that railway conductor so to hale us —I think that is the word—before the peace officer and lay a charge.

Mr. Fleming: Is this an actual case?

Mr. Garson: May I ask my hon. friend a question? In what percentage of the cases of the innocent poker or other card games upon trains that he has heard of has a prosecution been launched?

Mr. Fleming: The minister has got the point at last.

Mr. Fulton: I am glad the minister has asked that question. It touches upon the very point I was trying to get over in connection with our approach to the gambling laws. In other words, as the minister is aware, this section is completely disregarded; it is not enforced. People break it and get away with it. I am glad they do, because it would be absurd if it were to be enforced. But is it a healthy state that there should be on the statute books of this country, in the Criminal Code, a section which, as the minister will agree, it is fair to say by his own admission is so absurd that it would produce such folly if not injustice if enforced that it is just simply ignored? As the minister himself knows, a great many of the other provisions of our Criminal Code with respect to gambling, particularly in regard to lotteries, are ignored. Gambling does take place and the Canadian people are taking part in lotteries. That is why I have said, and I am glad to have the minister's interjection to reinforce my point, the time has arrived when we have to make a serious and solemn study of this situation and decide for ourselves whether or not taking part in lotteries is a crime.

While perhaps that is not as important as the question of capital punishment, the time has certainly arrived, in fact it is long since past, when we should not have on our statute books—and in perhaps the most important statute in Canada, the Criminal Code—a provision at which everybody laughs. Everybody knows that that situation should not be allowed to continue because contempt of the law is an undesirable, a harmful and a mischievous thing, and ought not to be permitted to continue longer in Canada.

I do not think there is anything further that I can say in connection with these subjects except that I hope we may hear from the minister before the debate concludes an outline of the method by which the government suggests the committee ought to conduct its deliberations, and an indication of what opportunity will be afforded to interested bodies and organizations throughout Canada to make representations. I know that in the final analysis the committee decides these things. But I do urge upon the minister the fact that the government's desire and intention in the matter would be most helpful both to the committee and to the public who are so intimately concerned with the manner in which this is to be handled.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am keenly interested in this motion introduced by the minister recommending the appointment of a joint committee of this house and of the Senate to consider the important matters of capital punishment, corporal punishment and lotteries. I have been greatly interested in the question of capital and corporal punishment over a long period and I feel very strongly on the matter. My views are somewhat different from those of the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). In the course of all the reading I have done on this matter and all that I have heard I have never yet come across any basic or fundamental argument that convinced me that I was wrong in my contention that capital punishment is a survival of savagery and barbarism and that on no ethical ground can it be defended.

There is no one who will condone a murder; it just could not be done. However, I think we have to recognize that murder takes place under the stress of circumstances; it takes place mainly for reasons of passion and jealousy, through an attempt to escape capture; it is committed by the insane and in some instances it is premeditated. As I say, we do not condone murder because it is an offence against society. It is a criminal act because murder is the taking of life.

We all maintain that human life is sacred, but if it is sacred and its destruction by an individual is a crime, then the fact that two or more people get together and call themselves either a society or a state does not alter the basic fact of the sacredness of human life. Surely it is a principle of social ethics that we should not delegate to someone else the responsibility or duty of taking a human life.

The previous speaker quoted at length from the report of the royal commission in Great Britain and commented on the fact that capital punishment had been reimposed in that country. I think it should be remembered that capital punishment was not actually abolished in Great Britain. There was a period which was sometimes referred to as a truce or a suspension, and that is what actually took place. After the period of the suspension or truce was over capital punishment was reimposed.

In listening to the hon. member for Kamloops I rather got the impression that he was trying to indicate that it had been reimposed, if I can use that term, because of an increase in crime. I take it that he meant in particular an increase in the number of murders during the period of suspension.

Mr. Fulton: I did not say anything like that.

Mr. Winch: To me the hon. member's remarks indicated that it had been done for that purpose. However, the fact remains, if we can take the information which was sent to all members of the House of Commons by the Canadian Friends' service committee under date of December 22, where they quoted from the British Hansard of January 27, 1949, that in Great Britain there were 19 murders in the 7 weeks before the truce; 25 murders in the first 7 weeks of the truce; 17 murders in the last 7 weeks of the truce; and 26 murders in the 6 weeks after the resumption of executions in Great Britain.

This matter of the abolition of capital punishment goes back to 1843. Since that time a great many countries of the world and 6 of the states of the United States have abolished capital punishment. To the best of my knowledge in that period only 3 countries resumed capital punishment. It is very interesting to note the countries that did abolish it, although, as I say, I believe there were 3 countries that resumed the imposition of capital punishment.

New Zealand abolished capital punishment in 1941; Queensland abolished it in 1922; Sweden in 1910; Portugal in 1886; Switzerland in 1943; Italy in 1899; Cuba in 1940; Argentina in 1922; Brazil in 1891; Colombia in 1910; Ecuador in 1895; Peru in 1897; Mexico in 1929; Costa Rica in 1926 and Honduras in 1926 also.

As was also mentioned by the hon. member for Kamloops, 6 of the states of the United States have abolished capital punishment. This action was not taken in recent years as Michigan abolished capital punishment in 1847; Rhode Island in 1852; Maine in 1876; Minnesota in 1911; North Dakota in 1915 and Wisconsin in 1853.

I have not the recent figures but about five years ago I compared the per capita ratio of murder in the 6 states where capital punishment has been abolished with the average of the other states where it is still imposed. Those figures proved conclusively that in the 6 states of the United States where they had abolished capital punishment there was only half the number of murders on a per capita basis as compared with the other states.

I think the evidence is conclusive from some of the greatest legal minds and penologists in the world that capital punishment is not a deterrent to murder. If we followed through with the line of reasoning of the hon. member who spoke a few minutes ago, that society in Canada has placed its stamp of disapproval on certain acts of man by applying capital punishment, then it would appear to be logical reasoning to assume that we could prevent crime or would have a lesser amount of crime if capital punishment was applied to some of the other activities of criminals.

This does not work out in fact. If it did, then the time in the history of Great Britain when there would have been the least crime would be the nineteenth century. In the nineteenth century there were 240 kinds of offences that were punishable by death, and in the reign of Henry VIII I find there was a total of 72,000 people who died either on the gallows or on the block. Now, if there was a deterrent to crime through the medium of capital punishment then we should have seen it in operation during that time. The facts, however, prove the opposite. They prove that instead of being a deterrent it was actually an encouragement. If we took the statements and examined the records of penologists after an execution they would show that there was an increase in crime. I do feel we should take into very serious consideration the findings of men whose names are very well known to us.

[Mr. Winch.]

I do not think there is a greater authority on penology on the North American continent than Mr. Lewis E. Lawes, who was for many years a warden at Sing Sing. In an article he wrote, I think it was about two years ago, this expert on penology, this man, who for a period of over twenty years lived his life amongst the criminal element in the United States, had this to say, and I quote:

> I used to believe strongly in the social necessity of capital punishment. Now, I do not. There is no room for sentimentality in dealing with the subject of capital punishment. I believe death fades into insignificance when compared with life imprisonment. To spend each night in gaol, day after day, year after year, gazing at the bars and longing for freedom, is indeed expiation.

And he further said:

> Executions, like war, brutalize men; the more that take place, the greater the number there is to execute. The man about to die becomes a hero.

I do not want to take up too much of the time of the house in reading quotations but I would like to give just one more and that is from one of the greatest lawyers in North America. His name is Clarence Darrow and he took a very firm stand on the question of capital punishment. He had this to say, and I quote:

> If the full details of executions could be vividly told; if men and women could visualize the horror coming from the fear and dread of this shameful and cruel death; if people could feel the agony of the days of waiting: if they could grasp every detail—all normal human beings would be so shocked to think of their part in the horrible deed as to get rid of the barbarism that inspires the desire to have some unfortunate killed by the state.

Clarence Darrow also had this to say:

> No facts can be produced by anyone to show that the death penalty ever lessened murders.

That being the case, if it does not lessen murders, if it is not a deterrent to crime, then why kill? Why insist on standing by what I might term the Mosaic law? I know there are some who like to follow that law, "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth", but that certainly was not the principle as laid down by Christ himself. Surely we, who boast that we are Christians and civilized, should recognize that it is not our responsibility to take the life of another. It is our responsibility only to see that those who are dangerous to society are incarcerated in such manner that they can no longer be dangerous.

I am absolutely convinced after having been of my own volition in a great many of the prisons in Canada—I was one of the very fortunate ones, for I could get out when I wanted out—that the average person fears life imprisonment and his loss of freedom a great deal more than he fears the loss of his life. I am sorry that the government could not see its way clear to bring in an amendment to the Criminal Code abolishing capital punishment, but as they have not seen their way clear to do so I am very glad that they are going to refer the matter to a committee.

A number of years ago I, along with others, tried to have the death sentence on three Indians changed to life imprisonment. I was told at that time that I did not know what I was talking about. Had I ever seen a man hanged, I was asked. Apparently you have to see a man hanged before you know anything about it. I had not at that time, but about three weeks later I went to see a man hanged, a young man. He had not killed anyone himself but he took part in a bank hold-up and he was condemned to death. That was about eighteen years ago and because of it I still have nightmares.

I have no hesitation whatsoever in saying that in my opinion no judge or member of a jury should be permitted to sit on a case where they may bring in a verdict of death unless they have seen a man put to death, and unless they themselves have seen a man hanged. It is a horrible thing to go into a small room like a disused elevator shaft, such as the one in British Columbia, with about a dozen people standing around waiting for the condemned person to be brought in, and to see the look of fear and the expression, "Well, I have had it". It is horrible to see that foot-long knot behind the condemned man's ear, and to see the executioner's touch on the man's shoulder, "Forward a little bit there, please, that's a good boy". And then the drop. It is horrible to see and to hear that rope whanging back and forth across the sides of the trap and to hear the gurgling noise and the sighs that come up from below.

I think something is wrong with us when we have to resort to that sort of thing in this modern day and age. Yes, we have to protect society, we have to incarcerate those dangerous to society, but I think we should also remember that the majority of homicides take place in a time of passion and under the strain and stress of difficult circumstances. Although we have got to inflict some penalty upon them we should not arrogate to ourselves the right to take the life of another human being.

I sincerely hope that this committee in its studies will obtain information from all over the world, and that they will study the records of those countries which from 1853 have not had capital punishment. I hope they will study on a per capita basis the records of crime in those countries where there is no capital punishment compared with those where they do have it, and I hope they will also take the same opportunity of getting information on corporal punishment.

It was my privilege to be permitted to visit the penitentiary in British Columbia for a couple of days before coming here to the House of Commons and I found there that unless it is ordered by the courts they never use the lash or the paddle. Those in charge of the British Columbia penitentiary inform me that a far greater deterrent to bad conduct on the part of inmates than the paddle or the lash is the bread and water treatment, and confining prisoners to their cells for twenty-four hours a day. I think the same principle would apply in the matter of the committing of crimes.

Therefore I am most certainly opposed to capital punishment and to corporal punishment, and I have a great deal of hope that, when the report of the committee is presented, the minister will amend the Criminal Code again so as to remove this throw-back to savagery and barbarism from the statute books of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I remind the house that if the minister speaks now he will conclude the debate.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, this is one of the occasions upon which I envy hon. members of this house who may be designated by the term "my hon. and learned friend". I admit immediately that I am not in my own field when I take part in this particular discussion; but if any of my hon. friends think that I, through ignorance of the subject, should not take part in this debate may I refer them to the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) who has held up the juror to eulogy before the house and made him out to be practically infallible. I remind the house that in most cases the juror is an amateur like myself so far as legal experience is concerned. Possibly he has never been in a law court in his life; yet collectively at least, if not individually, he is supposed to have some sanity and ability to judge, again collectively, the particular issue before the court.

Capital punishment is of course a controversial subject. Practically all my life I have been trying to make up my mind about it, although I do not claim to have had any extended or morbid interest in the matter. But as a layman I should like to express, inadequately of course in the opinion of my learned friends, one or two of the things about which I have been thinking. There is this matter of the commission in Great Britain. As a matter of fact I became interested in it because of the comments I read in certain newspapers. I would remind my hon. friends that the commission did not receive as great praise in certain quarters, particularly in some of the British newspapers, as it has at the hands of my hon. friend. I should like to quote from this rag —and it is a rag—the Daily Mirror, the issue of September 4, 1953. It is a rag but I would remind hon. members that it is read by more people than any other newspaper in the world. I am not quoting it as an authority, but rather because it gives an opinion which is read by many people. It has this to say with respect to the report of the royal commission on capital punishment:

> It is an evasive mouse of a thing made smaller and thinner and more ill-nourished by the vast amount of labour that has been spent upon it.

Then it goes on to say that for nearly four and a half years the commission conducted its investigations in various countries of the world, and it makes this significant statement:

> They went into it with their hands tied. They came out of it washing them.

The reference to their hands being tied has to do with the fact that the question under consideration was not actually that of capital punishment itself. The London Times of September 24, 1953, has this to say about the matter:

> The report of the royal commission on capital punishment deals with only the secondary aspects of a great subject, for the fundamental question whether the state has the right, or requires, to take human life by process of law, was not referred to the commissioners.

It is true, as stated by the Times, that the reference to the commission was limited. The question is whether the state is to continue to punish the crime of murder by taking the life of the offender. I may be wrong in this statement, but I take it that criminals are not now convicted of murder unless they have consciously endangered life. I submit that the word "consciously" can be variously interpreted. I would ask this question. Are there not many murders committed, as was pointed out by the hon. member who has just spoken, in moments of passion or mental disturbance? I wonder if fear of execution would be a deterrent at all in such cases? I wonder if a man, when he is going to commit murder, sits down and thinks: If I do this, what will I get? Will I get 60 days or will I be hanged?

Perhaps I might point out to my hon. friends as an aside that the word is "hanged" and not "hung". I wonder if a man sits down and thinks about that sort of thing or if he does not simply commit murder in a moment of intemperance, insanity or emotional upset. After that, what happens to him is in the lap of the gods. I submit that people do not usually calculate the consequences when they are about to commit a crime.

The question of the justification of capital punishment is one on which it is indeed difficult to make up one's mind. We are uncertain about other things too. One talks about unity of parties on various things, but I find continually that there are matters upon which so many things may be said on both sides that it is difficult to assess it and arrive at a final conclusion. But after due consideration I have decided that I am on balance opposed to capital punishment. There are various arguments. There is the moral question, which I think has already been raised by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) as to whether or not the state has the moral right to deprive any one of its members of the right to life for any reason.

The judgment I have reached is one to which I have come rather slowly, but let me give some of my reasons for opposing capital punishment. First of all there have been cases where people who have been convicted of murder and hanged have later been proved innocent. I would remind the hon. member for Kamloops, and I am sure he will agree, that although juries are frequently right there are occasions where the jury or even the learned judge may be wrong. I would rather take the chance of a half dozen people being wrongly acquitted. It would be a terrible thing if injustice were done in even one case. It would be far better to forgo the gruesome pleasure of taking social revenge upon someone rather than to do an injustice of that magnitude.

Many persons convicted of murder and condemned to be hanged are later reprieved. I suggest that again there is cruelty and agony in such a situation. The long periods of waiting, the long periods of mental agony, are probably more terrible than the carrying out of the death penalty itself.

Then there is the matter of justice in connection with reprieves. I imagine that mistakes are made there. When one reads about reprieves in the newspapers he finds that many of the people so reprieved are women. I am not going to enter upon any discussion that might arise on that point. Many of the reprieved are young people. They are people, I suppose, between 18 and 21 years of age. We all know that people are not alike. We cannot be equal. When God poured for each of us a little measure of intelligence, he did so with an uneven hand. I am going to ask you, is a man who is 20 ipso facto more emotional or unstable than another man of 22? It is evident, at least to me, that in these reprieves we fit the punishment to the criminal and not to the crime. I think that might be true in those instances. Certainly there is a lack of uniformity, and discrimination may leave room for injustice.

Then I would advance the argument of cruelty in many executions where death has been prolonged. We have had gruesome instances of this sort. I shall not go into them today, but I mean where something goes wrong with the killing machinery, if I might term it that, and we have these horrible cases, demoralizing even to those who read of them.

I want to say another word or two about the Gowers commission, as I think it is sometimes known. It is significant, first of all, that that commission recommended giving the jury the power to declare whether or not there were extenuating circumstances. In other words, as I interpret it the jury was given the discretion of substituting a lesser sentence than the death sentence. Does that not show that in the minds of the people who set up the commission there was some doubt as to the adequacy of this method of capital punishment? The discretion is handed over to the jury, an awful discretion, a weighty responsibility. It is even a heavy responsibility for a judge, who is a man trained in law and who has studied crime all his life, but for an ordinary man called from his labour to know that he has in his own hands the responsibility of whether his neighbour shall live or die is surely a horrible thing.

The member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) has talked about the efficiency of the system of capital punishment in Britain. His figures do not jibe with those submitted by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch). The argument of the hon. member for Kamloops is that capital punishment acts as the best possible deterrent against murder. I want to point out to the hon. member that in Britain it is estimated that of all convicted murderers only half do, in fact, go to the gallows; that for every twelve murders reported, only one killer is executed. The hon. member for Kamloops has pointed out that killings are becoming more frequent in Canada and the United States. Since capital punishment is in existence in Canada and the United States, how can he assert that fact as a logical argument for its continuance?

The infallibility of the jury has been much stressed by the hon. member.

Mr. Fulton: I did not use the word "infallibility".

Mr. Knight: The hon. member is a man of words; perhaps he can suggest a better one.

Mr. Fulton: You suggest it. You are the one who is trying to improve on my speech.

Mr. Knight: By the way, I have never been in a law court in my life, and perhaps that is evident from what I have said already. I would point out that probably the average juryman, like myself, has never been in a court previously. He has to decide whether or not there are extenuating circumstances. He has to decide even upon the issue of sanity, and that must be rather difficult for the average man who has no training whatever in mental disturbances or, for that matter, in psychology. A juryman has to give judgment on matters of character and matters of mentality which might puzzle even judges who have had experience, who have been studying law and crime all their lives.

Even with this inexperience or lack of ability in the jury, I would be prepared to accept their judgment in most things because I am a believer in collective good sense. I am not so sure of the good sense of the individual, but when you get twelve men, good and true or otherwise, I think they nearly always do come to a logical conclusion. The trouble is that this verdict of guilty in murder cases is the sort of thing on which you cannot take a chance. I would be prepared to trust jurymen in spite of their inexperience and their inability in some cases, but here is a case where you have a life at stake, and surely that is the ultimate in importance.

Since the only justification for capital punishment is the protection of society, and since we cannot justify it on the grounds of social revenge, then I maintain that society can be protected equally well by other methods, the most obvious of which is life imprisonment.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): With reference to the special committee to be set up to study capital punishment and lotteries, Mr. Speaker, I have only a very few brief remarks to make, which I hope may help the committee.

First of all I should like to say that I agree with the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) in the thoughts which he so adequately expressed. In addition, I should like to say that I hope the committee will consider, if capital punishment is to be retained, different methods of carrying out the execution. At the moment we have the usual method of hanging for carrying out capital punishment. I hope the committee will seriously consider, if capital punishment is to be retained, whether or not some other method could be used. Alternative suggestions have been made, such as the lethal chamber, the electric chair and so on. I believe that this is an important consideration.

I think further that the committee ought to bear in mind that such punishment for murder might not necessarily be considered as punitive but rather in the nature of a deterrent. Possibly if the method of carrying out the execution were made less barbarous the deterrent factor might not be so strong.

In regard to the matter of whether or not capital punishment ought to be retained, there is a very practical consideration. If the criminal who is convicted of murder is sentenced to life imprisonment, that is the maximum sentence he can receive. There is nothing to deter that criminal who is sentenced to life imprisonment from trying to escape at every opportunity, possibly taking other lives in the process. In other words, such a person is rather analogous to a continual time bomb in the penitentiary, because he can receive no heavier sentence than life imprisonment and there is nothing to deter him from attempting to break out.

I have no doubt many members who will serve on the committee will receive representations from various organizations throughout Canada on the subject of capital punishment, stating whether in their opinion it should or should not remain in our law. Undoubtedly many of these recommendations and suggestions will come from genuinely moral groups holding deep religious convictions, such as the Society of Friends. I have no doubt many hon. members have already seen such representations.

Since section 46 in Bill No. 7, as I read it, would make spying in peacetime a capital offence, representations may very well be made to members of the committee from groups holding somewhat ulterior motives in trying to remove the death sentence. I think this should be borne in mind, because it would certainly facilitate the activities of any spying group. And I hope no one will mistake my meaning and proceed to classify me with a well-known gentleman south of the border. I do feel, however, that this should be borne in mind.

There is one further item I would mention at this time. It seems to me that, in addition to the subjects of capital and corporal punishment, and lotteries, the special committee to be set up might very well take into consideration the additional subject of sex crimes as they are set out in sections 135 to 149 inclusive in Bill No. 7, as well as in sections 659 to 667 in the same bill.

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

I make this suggestion for many reasons. With the exception of sections 659 to 667, which deal with preventive detention, there are no substantial differences on this subject in that bill as compared with the corresponding sections in the present Criminal Code. Having had some experience as a crown attorney for several years, I have found that offences of this nature present difficult problems both to the police and to crown counsel, from the point of view of laying proper charges, and that these offences present even greater difficulties to the magistrates and judges who must deal with the matter from the point of view of sentences to be imposed.

The difficulty in connection with the imposition of sentences arises from the fact that there is a wide diversity of opinion as to just what degree of severity there should be in sentencing in a sex crime. The argument that an accused person has had previously good character and has conducted himself as a good citizen, but that he has suffered some type of mental aberration, is invariably presented in mitigation of these sentences. One may find that one magistrate or judge may inflict a very light sentence upon an accused charged with a crime of this nature, while another magistrate or judge might inflict a more severe penalty. There is this lack of uniformity in sentences throughout the country, a condition which does not encourage respect for law.

It is my feeling that this confusion with regard to the sentences that ought to be imposed on criminals of this kind is due to a confused state of public opinion generally, and that some sort of clarification as to possible minimum as well as maximum penalties should be set out in the proposed new Criminal Code.

From the amount of publicity crimes of this nature have been receiving in the last few years it would appear that such offences may very well be increasing. But even if they are not on the increase, public interest in them most certainly is. While crimes of this nature are all offensive and disagreeable, those involving children are the most offensive of all. I feel that the people of this country are determined that stringent action should be taken against such criminals who attack children, action more stringent than has been taken in the past.

Again, within reason I feel that this matter should be investigated by the special committee to be set up to study the matters which have been mentioned previously. My personal view would be that, like the subject of insanity, this is one that should be dealt with by a royal commission, in view of the psychiatric evidence which ought to be considered. People who are outside the fields of medicine and psychiatry are almost totally unfamiliar with such subjects. However, since no provision of this kind has been made, at least it would be a step in the right direction if sex offences were given consideration by the special committee to be set up.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister a question. What does he consider the chief cause of murder? Is it hunger for gold; is it jealousy, or is it drinking parties? My experience is that the last is the most serious. If the government licenses the liquor business, then how can it condemn a man when, under the influence of liquor, he commits a crime?

Mr. Garson: I shall be glad to answer my hon. friend when I close the debate.

(Translation):

Mr. J. W. Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening with great attention to the speeches delivered this afternoon on the subject now before the house. I was particularly taken by the interesting facts, statistical information and, more generally, by the very able fashion in which the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) expressed himself on this subject.

As for me I have no intention of discussing this matter from a legal point of view, since I am not a lawyer. I simply wish to discuss it in a somewhat logical way.

I see that the hon. Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) finds it funny that there can be one member sitting here for Quebec city who is not a lawyer. A precedent has been set. The working people of my constituency have wished it to be so and they have not requested the minister's permission.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I laughed because my colleague, unintentionally, poked fun at lawyers when he said that, not being a lawyer himself, he felt in a position to discuss the matter in a logical way.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Somewhat logical.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, I know that I am not as fortunate as the minister, not being a university graduate, and that I may have made a slip during my remarks. However, I do intend to continue and I hope that the hon. members who have found my remarks rather funny will now show a little more tact.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: As it is now five o'clock, the house will consider private and public bills.

(Translation):

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Speaker: It is not necessary for the hon. member to do so. When we resume the debate interrupted by the study of private and public bills, we will proceed from where we left off a moment ago.

PRIVATE BILLS

CATHERINE MILLER MARY HARRIS DAWSON COUTTS

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa) moved the second reading of Bill No. 12, for the relief of Catherine Miller Mary Harris Dawson Coutts.

Mr. Speaker: There are several divorce bills on the order paper, running from No. 29 to No. 88. Will they all be taken in one motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is a motion for second reading of these bills agreed to?

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, just before the motion for the second reading of these 60 divorce bills is agreed to, I should like to say a brief word. As Hansard does not have the capacity for recording the emphasis members sometimes try to make, I should like to emphasize that in this brief moment we are called upon to give second readings to 60 divorce bills.

Were it not for one significant fact I would suggest that the house should give consideration to what it is doing, and take these bills one by one and do our job on them more seriously. However, the one significant fact to which I refer is that a special committee has been set up by this House of Commons under Your Honour's chairmanship, which is studying the rules of the house. As the result of a discussion which took place in the house a month or more ago, it has been agreed that in that committee we shall give consideration to the question as to whether or not we can find some other way to handle these divorce applications. My hope is that that committee will grapple with this problem, will realize the fact that no one in this House of Commons likes dealing with divorce in this way and that we shall find some other way to handle this matter.

So long as the matter is under discussion by Your Honour's committee on the rules of the house I will not take any time on these bills here on the floor. But I think I should make it clear that if no alternative method is found for dealing with these bills, some of us will feel later on that we should call upon the House of Commons to take this job seriously and deal with these bills one by one.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE QUORUM OF HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 81, to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1952, with respect to the quorum of the House of Commons.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in rising to say a few words in support of this bill I wish to say at the outset that it is my view there is one thing wrong with it. It proposes that the quorum of the House of Commons should be increased from 20 members, which is the present figure, to 30 members.

What is wrong with this bill of mine—in my own personal estimation—is the figure 30. My view is that that figure should be much higher. Bearing in mind the fact that this house consists of 265 members, and bearing in mind the fact that most bodies that meet and transact business have much higher quorums—indeed in many cases the accepted quorum is at least a bare majority of the membership of the body in question—it does seem to me that we should be proposing a much higher quorum. It seems to me that it ought to be at least 50 members, or perhaps more. But, at any rate, for reasons which are well known to hon. members, I have proposed in this bill the figure of 30.

Lest there be any of the new members who are not aware of the reason for the proposed figure of 30, I would point out that when the British North America Act was passed in 1867 it provided for a quorum for the House of Commons of 20 members. But that quorum of 20 members as enacted in 1867 was in relation to a House of Commons the total membership of which was 181. Therefore, in view of the fact that the membership of the House of Commons today is 265, by a process of simple arithmetic one can determine that to maintain that same proportion calls today for a quorum of 29·2 members. It is on that basis that I suggest our quorum should be not fewer than 30. In other words, in suggesting that the quorum should be increased I go only so far as to suggest that we should retain the same percentage that was established by the fathers of confederation.

Actually I do not mean to suggest that there is any sacredness in the percentage so arrived at by the fathers of confederation when they drafted the British North America Act. For example, I have found it a bit interesting to discover that the statutes that provided for the rules of procedure of the legislative assembly of the province of Canada—the one that was in existence from 1840 to 1867—included in the rules of that body the provision that the quorum was to be 20 members. Indeed, if one takes the trouble to look up the rules of the legislative assembly of the province of Canada, from 1840 to 1867, he will discover that for the most part our rules today, in particular those of our rules that give us a great deal of trouble, are simply rules that were carried forward in the same wording that was used by Upper and Lower Canada in the legislative assembly they had from 1840 to 1867.

Well, that was the simplest thing to do. In fact, when the parliament of Canada first met in 1867 the question arose as to what rules of procedure would be followed. Sir John A. Macdonald simply moved that the rules of the late province of Canada be the rules for the House of Commons until such time as a committee might work out alternative suggestions. On the same day he moved that a committee be appointed to work out rules for this House of Commons, and when that committee did its job it made very few changes in the rules that had been in effect in the legislative assembly of the former province of Canada. Therefore one of the rules that was carried forward was this rule that the quorum be 20 members.

I have tried, but I have had some difficulty in ferreting it out, to ascertain just how many members there were in the legislative assembly of the province of Canada. It looks to me as though there were 130. It is interesting to read the statutes that provided for that legislative assembly and discover how the information one seeks is buried in words. At any rate, provision was made for 65 members from Lower Canada, namely what is now the province of Quebec; and as I understand it the number was equal for the two parts of that province, namely Lower and Upper Canada. Therefore in that period from 1840 to 1867 you had an assembly of 130 members. That figure is subject to correction, but I believe it is correct. Out of that 130 members you had a quorum of 20.

When the parliament of Canada was set up and the House of Commons was established it had a membership of 181. It seems to me that those in that first House of Commons might well have increased that quorum of 20, which applied to 130 members, to a higher figure proportionate to the new membership of 181; but they did not choose to do so, and I think the reason is quite clear. They were starting off with the rules of the new House of Commons in the simplest way they could. They just took over the book that had been in use in the legislative assembly of the late province of Canada. Since 1867 the membership of this house has increased on a number of occasions from the 181 in the first instance until we now have in this present house a membership of 265, but down across those years no change has been made in the quorum of this house.

Mr. Macdonnell: Has any change ever been proposed?

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) anticipates the very next point I am going to make by asking me whether changes have been proposed. The answer is yes, that a change was proposed on at least one occasion. I hold in my hand a copy of the Journals of the House of Commons for 1925. During that session a special committee was established to consider the rules of the house. There is an interesting little story behind the appointment of that committee. It arose out of a private member's motion, in fact a motion made by Mr. William Irvine, who many hon. members of this house will remember as having been here not many years ago. His motion was amended by the then prime minister, Mr. King, and as a result the committee was set up and did an exhaustive job.

It went over all the rules of procedure that then comprised the standing orders of this house and made suggestions for changes in quite a number. Following that report, in the next year, 1926, quite a number of those changes were put into effect. The rules that we operate under today are more or less the rules as put into effect in 1926. Any changes that have been made since have been few in number.

One of the suggestions that committee made in its report back to the House of Commons on Friday, May 29, 1925, related to this very question of the quorum. Let me read a paragraph from the report of that committee, as follows:

> The presence of twenty members forms a quorum of the house under section 48 of the British North America Act which was passed when the Canadian Commons consisted of only 182 members.

I regret having to pause at this point to make a correction in one of the official records of this house. I am sorry to state that they were wrong at that point in 1925. It may have been only a typographical error, but if one will consult the British North America Act he will discover that the membership was 181 rather than 182. Perhaps the confusion arose from the fact that there were 82 members for the province of Ontario. To go on with the recommendation made to the House of Commons by that committee:

> According to the proportion then accepted—

That is the proportion accepted in 1867.

> —the quorum should now be raised to 27 members.

That was the view expressed by the special committee in 1925.

> But this even does not seem to be sufficient.

I could not agree more than I do with the members of that committee in 1925 who suggested that even 27 did not seem to be sufficient. The recommendation continues:

> Your committee being of opinion that a larger quorum will be conducive to better attendance, recommends that the quorum should now consist of thirty members.

In reply to the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) I think I have a good basis for the suggestion made in my bill. The next sentence or two in the recommendation probably makes it clear why nothing was done:

> In order to make this change, it will be necessary to present an address to the parliament of Great Britain requesting that section 48 of the British North America Act be amended so as to substitute the word "thirty" for the word "twenty" therein.

I suggest that that requirement was the main reason nothing was done in regard to that recommendation. The rest of the changes proposed in the report were within the competence of the House of Commons to put into effect, but so far as the quorum of the house was concerned it was obvious that it could be changed only by amending the British North America Act. The only way to amend the British North America Act at that time was by presenting an address to Westminster. Apparently at that time the House of Commons did not feel that the issue was of sufficient importance to warrant the presenting of an address from both houses to the crown requesting such a change.

However, in the meantime we have had the amendment to the British North America Act which was passed in the fall session of 1949, and which gives the parliament of Canada authority to amend the British North America Act in respect of any matter exclusively federal. There are other details in that amendment which I need not recite at this time, but I think it is quite clear that the matter of the quorum of the House of Commons, or for that matter the quorum of the other place, is exclusively federal, so there is no question but that we have the right here in the parliament of Canada to amend section 48 of the British North America Act if we see fit to do so.

There has been only one amendment to the British North America Act since the amendment of 1949 which gave the parliament of Canada that authority. I refer to the amendment respecting the basis of redistribution, which amending bill was put through in 1952 on the motion of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris). We had a most interesting discussion at that time, particularly in the committee on redistribution, as to the form in which any amending bill would be drafted that would seek to give effect to the authority of this parliament to amend the British North America Act. Several courses of action were suggested, but it seemed to be generally agreed that we had the right here in this parliament to amend that statute even though it might be referred to as the statute of another country.

The answer to the question that arises when one puts it that way is that technically speaking it is the crown which enacts legislation. It was the crown which enacted the British North America Act in 1867. It did so on the advice of the Lords and Commons of the United Kingdom at that time. Now when we amend the British North America Act, as we did in 1952 in respect of redistribution, or as we could do in respect to the quorum, it will be the crown which will be enacting that change on the advice of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada. That may be a bit of digression from the main purpose of the bill, but I confess to an interest in the constitutional aspects that arise out of this simple bill.

As I have indicated by referring to the report of the committee in 1925, it was recognized 29 years ago that it was desirable to increase the quorum but apparently nothing was done because of the necessity of presenting an address by both houses to Westminster. That hurdle is now out of the way; we can do it now by a bill dealt with by both houses of this parliament.

I suggest that we should take advantage of that opportunity to make this minor but significant change. Some hon. members will say of course that it is not very much to increase the quorum from 20 to 30. I agree, and I have pointed out already that I would like to see the figure much larger. However, knowing the difficulty that one has in getting anything of great substance through around here I prefer to ask only for the number I have suggested, which simply maintains the same percentage.

These days, and I suppose this has always been the case, parliament is frequently under criticism by the public for a variety of reasons. We get criticized if we let things go through the House of Commons without adequate discussion, and we get criticized if we talk too much. As the hon. member for Kamloops pointed out on a former occasion, members of parliament get criticized if they are down here in Ottawa instead of being home meeting their constituents, and if they are back home meeting their constituents they are criticized for not being here in parliament. That is in the nature of things, and one has no complaint to make about it.

But one of the things we get criticized for is our attendance. I refer to attendance under two headings, on the one hand being here in Ottawa and on the other hand being in this chamber of the House of Commons when legislation is under consideration. It seems to me that the least we can do to show the public that we are taking our jobs seriously would be to increase the quorum and make sure that there are more members here all the time than is the case under the present quorum of 20.

There are those who have argued against this bill on the ground that hon. members have other things to do, that they have committees to attend, that they have correspondence to deal with in their offices and so on. But we know all that, and it applies to everyone; yet there are some of us who are able to be here a great deal of the time. I see no reason why we should not increase the requirement as to the attendance in the house.

With regard to the argument about committees requiring the attendance of members elsewhere, hon. members know very well that even in respect of rooms where committees can meet in this building, accommodation is quite limited, and I am sure I am setting an outside figure when I suggest it is not possible to hold enough committees at the same time to take 100 members out of this chamber at any one time.

An hon. Member: Oh, yes.

Mr. Knowles: Oh, no. I have checked the figures; and even in the fall session of 1951, when we had a great many committees meeting, at no time were over 100 members required in attendance in the committees that were sitting. That was during the session when sometimes committees were sitting so often that we even adjourned the sittings of the house. Even if we make the figure 150 that still leaves 115 other members available for attendance here; and to suggest that as a reason why the quorum could not be 30 is, I believe, evading the issue.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in presenting this bill to the house I strongly urge hon. members to support it. The only criticism, it seems to me, that could be levelled at the bill is that it does not propose a higher figure. If anyone wants to do that I have no objection, but it does seem to me that this at least is a step we should take. Although this bill has been before the house on previous occasions it has not yet received the support of the house, but I present it once again today in the hope that the requirement it contains will meet with the approval of the members of this house.

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am labouring under a disadvantage in entering this debate at this moment. It is always somewhat of a surprise to find out which particular private member's bill is going to be presented; and in addition to that, of course, we have only today resumed our session. My other handicap is that I wish to point out some deficiencies, if I may use that term, in the hon. member's remarks, and I know I am getting tangled up with a person who has already established a reputation for knowledge of the rules of procedure of this house. However, I am going to attempt the task.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) happens to be a resident of the riding which I represent, and every resident of a member's riding is a potential supporter. Nevertheless, I am going to risk the loss of his support in the next election. A year ago when a similar bill was brought before the house I was unfortunately out of the chamber but still in the building, and I missed the debate by about a minute and a half. I made sure I would be present on this occasion.

Mr. Argue: If the quorum had been 30 then you might have been here.

Mr. Churchill: Let me say in advance that I am not much concerned with the proposal for amending the British North America Act. That can be done at any time. I do not think we need any further demonstrations that we are masters of our own destiny. That aspect seems to loom rather large in the opinion of the sponsor of the bill, but I do not think it is of such great importance. I realize, though, that he would like to have the privilege of introducing a bill which would amend the British North America Act and establish a precedent.

The hon. member seems to be concerned with the attendance in the chamber and I propose dealing with that, but before doing so I would like to consider just what is meant by a quorum, and I think the debate may be narrowed down somewhat if we examine a definition. Lest there be some doubt about it, a quorum, according to the Oxford dictionary, means a fixed number of members that must be present to make the proceedings of an assembly or of a society or board valid, and the meaning of the word "valid" given by the same dictionary is "executed with proper formality".

The purpose of a quorum, therefore, is merely to ensure that no business shall be conducted unless there is a certain number of members present. It also serves the purpose of permitting the house to commence its business without any great delay, for it is obvious that when the quorum consists of only 20 the Speaker will be able to call the house to order within a few minutes of the assembly bell. It also means that if there is a falling off in the attendance in the chamber during the transaction of business and there is no quorum in the house, then the house will come to a standstill if someone draws attention to the lack of a quorum and an adjournment will take place, or at least a procedure will be followed to ensure that before the house resumes its business there shall be a quorum present.

But the purpose of a quorum, briefly, is to make certain that any business done in the house shall be conducted according to the rules and shall be valid, and it precludes the conduct of business in the house by perhaps two or three or even a half dozen members. On the other hand, it does not insist that the entire membership shall be present. In any organization or society you have to determine at the outset how many shall be necessary to constitute a valid conduct of business. You either say that everybody must be there, or half the members must be there, or you decide on a certain proportion; and over the years it has been customary in all types of organization to set a rather low figure for a quorum simply to ensure that business will not be conducted without a sufficient number of people present to ensure that everything will be in order. It is not set at a very low figure, nor is it set very high, in order to introduce the element of compulsory attendance which my hon. friend has mentioned.

It is obvious that if a quorum is set at higher than the present figure the house might on occasions be counted out because of lack of attendance, although on many occasions last year I counted the members in this house and my observation was that it was a rare thing for the attendance in this chamber to fall below 45, except at some of those awkward moments around five or six o'clock, or at eight o'clock when we resume.

With an enlarged quorum the whips, whose troubles are many, would be under obligation to pay more attention to the number of members in the house and would be bothered by, I think, an unnecessary obligation to see that the quorum was maintained. When the quorum is left at a low figure there is not much need for that type of attention. If the quorum is set at a high figure a person who wanted to obstruct the business of the house might ask for a count just for that purpose. We all know that members are coming and going all the time, and you might have a count of the house called and find that within the lobbies on either side there were members who could immediately enter the house. You would have obstruction of the business of the house just for the sake of having a count to see where members were. I think there should be little or no occasion ever to count out the House of Commons, and that we should be careful that that should not occur. I believe that keeping the quorum low is an assurance that there will be no counting out of the house.

I did a little research on my own after the fashion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I wanted to find out if this house had ever been counted out in the past. I may not have found all the occasions but I will draw the attention of the house to the three I discovered. It was counted out on the 29th of June, 1917, at the hour of ten minutes to eleven. In those days the house continued until eleven o'clock. There were 18 members present, they were counted and the house was adjourned at five minutes to eleven. It was not a very serious matter, because they were near closing time anyway.

On the 11th of March, 1919, the house was counted out. It was then fifteen minutes after ten o'clock. There were 15 members present. They were counted, and the house was adjourned at eighteen minutes after ten.

Mr. Rowe: What date was that?

Mr. Churchill: The 11th of March, 1919. In the first instance I gave the house was debating a bill. In the second case they were considering the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The third occasion was on the 10th of June, 1938. The house was in committee of supply, and at eight p.m., just after the supper hour, a sufficient number of members were not present. A count was held. There were only 16. The chairman of the committee called in Mr. Speaker, who then had another count made and discovered that the number had reached 17. The house was then adjourned at ten minutes after eight. These are the only three occasions I have found on which the house was counted out because a quorum was not present.

I also had occasion to look at the situation in the United Kingdom. My hon. friend mentioned the fact that years ago our quorum was still only 20 when the house was small in numbers. He said the number of members has increased, and that the quorum has not gone up correspondingly. He mentioned the fact that in 1867 the quorum consisted of 11·5 per cent of the members, but I do not think for one minute that when the fathers of confederation were determining the quorum of the House of Commons in 1867 they decided upon a percentage. They just took what had been the practice in the past, simply an arbitrary figure of 20, and let it go at that. I do not think anyone ever worked it out on a percentage basis until possibly the committee of 1925.

The House of Commons of the United Kingdom has been functioning for many years, and they have a larger membership than we have. I think it is 625 at the present time. Their quorum was set at 40 over 300 years ago. Mr. Ivor Jennings, who has written an excellent work entitled "Parliament", states on page 75:

> By a usage which dates from 1640, and which may be altered by resolution of the house, there is a quorum of forty members.

The quorum is set at that figure, and although they have an easy method of altering it they have not bothered so to do. I think the reason is the very reason I have already given, that the purpose behind the quorum is simply to see that things get started on time without too much trouble and to guarantee to members who are not present that nothing is being done in the chamber except by at least 20 members. In the United Kingdom the House of Commons, with a membership of 625, is satisfied with a quorum of 40.

The question of the quorum of the house at Westminster was raised about a year ago last December when the house was counted out unexpectedly. It was debating a government measure, the iron and steel bill, and it was discovered that there was not a quorum present. The house was counted out and the sitting adjourned. Following the resumption of business the next day Mr. Attlee twitted the government for permitting itself to be counted out on a matter of government business. There had only been four members of the opposition present, but he quite properly said that it was no particular concern of the opposition to maintain a quorum of the house when the government of the day was trying to reverse something the previous government had done. In his opinion the responsibility rested upon the government.

However, he looked back to see whether such an astonishing thing had happened before and was unable to find that their House of Commons had ever been counted out in that manner. They take extra precautions over there. In order to avoid counting out there is an arrangement that during the dinner hour—and I interpolate that their house meets from 2.30 in the afternoon until 10.30 with no adjournment for dinner—from 7.30 to 8.30 in the evening, no count shall be taken. During the course of the day if there is a count-out before four p.m. the house simply stands adjourned until that hour and then resumes business. They do not have to wait until the following day. It is only when the count-out occurs after 8.30 in the evening that the rules provide for adjournment of the house until the following day. I think it is obvious that their quorum is kept at a low figure in order to avoid unnecessary interruption of the business of the house.

I come now to another matter in the presentation of my hon. friend to which I take exception, the idea of compulsory attendance. As I understood him, he thought it would be wiser for us here to have more people sitting in the chamber under the compulsion of a higher quorum than to carry on as we are doing at present. I do not think the question of compulsory attendance, if it ever arises—I hope it will not—should be linked up with the question of a quorum. I believe there are two different things involved. I believe the quorum serves its own purpose, and that the question of compulsory attendance is separate and apart.

My hon. friend has suggested that even when several committees are meeting it should be possible to have more members in the house. It is an extraordinarily difficult task to determine why a member is not in the chamber at the particular time you yourself happen to be present, and I think we simply have to assume that other members are absent from the chamber for the same reasons that would cause me, my hon. friend, or any of us to be absent. There are committee meetings, there is correspondence, there are visitors who come at unexpected moments, and one could never determine at any given moment that a person should be here in the chamber and not elsewhere.

If you were to insert a suggestion of compulsion, then we would lose a little of the small amount of freedom we have. On the ground of compulsory attendance alone I would be inclined to oppose this bill. I think there are ways and means for people to be called to account if their attendance in the House of Commons is not what some think it should be. Surely it has to be left to the members themselves to determine when they shall be in the chamber and when they shall be elsewhere.

Mr. Ivor Jennings, from whom I quoted before, has noticed that over in the United Kingdom they have the same trouble with attendance. I shall just give this short sentence from page 76. He says:

> It is obviously not necessary that members should be in the chamber itself. They must be somewhere near the fount of oratory, but they need not drink. The visitor to the house is, in fact, impressed with the multifarious duties which members find to perform when an ordinary member is speaking in an ordinary debate. The hon. member may be addressing almost empty benches.

Well, that has happened to many of us here in the short experience that some of us have had. Nevertheless we are all well aware that when matters of vital importance to the state are being discussed here in the House of Commons, the place is filled. When matters of somewhat less importance are being discussed, people find it useful to do other things. By and large, the business of the country is carried on and most members are available when needed. We need only recall the occasions when the bell rings for a division, and the scores of people who appear whom we may have thought were not anywhere near this chamber. Consequently I think the idea of compulsory attendance should be entirely removed from this discussion. If the proposal to increase the quorum to 30 is based on the idea of compulsory attendance, it should be defeated on that ground.

I conclude by simply saying that the quorum is set at an arbitrary figure merely to get things going and to ensure that the business shall be conducted in an orderly fashion. There is no hint of compulsory attendance behind it; it is merely a method of having the business of the house conducted in an orderly fashion. I think we should avoid at all times any possibility of a count-out of the house. It would be embarrassing to both sides, and it would be bad for public relations. If we keep the quorum at the low figure it now is, I think we will avoid having a count-out. We can be sure there will be members in the chamber or nearby at all times in case an urgent matter comes up.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Ordinarily I do not take part in a debate of this kind, Mr. Speaker. It is procedural, and there are a lot of technicalities attached to it. In listening to the discussion this afternoon I thought it was rather unfortunate that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) should have had to introduce a motion of this kind. With the increase in the number of members in the house since the establishment of the quorum, those who write the rules should have been automatically influenced to increase the quorum, without any discussion in the house. If the remarks made by the member for Winnipeg North Centre were read outside by the average "Joe" on the street, it would lead him to believe that absenteeism in this house was much greater than that portrayed by the president of Dosco, at a time when he is trying to belittle the efforts of his workers.

I was rather amazed at the opposition of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill). He based his whole opposition to the rule stating the number of members that could constitute a quorum on the principle that it was compulsory attendance. When we set up a committee of this house to examine legislation or bring in recommendations, the first thing we do when that committee sits is to fix its quorum. This makes it necessary for a certain number of members to be present before business can be transacted. No doubt the hon. member who takes that view has voted for that kind of motion in committees many times since being a member of this house.

In listening to his argument one would wonder as to the purpose for which we are elected. Is it not to attend this house and attend to the business of this country? Surely the present quorum expects a small number to be in attendance. I was looking at this book, Beauchesne's second edition—I am rather reluctant to consult this thing because every time I take a look at it I finish up more confused. I read the first edition and thought I knew a little about the matter. I read the second edition and decided I did not know so much. I looked at the third edition, and decided I would not read it.

On this particular subject, standing order No. 5 is very clear and very significant. It says this, and I should like the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre to listen. It deals with the matter of compulsory attendance.

Mr. Churchill: I did not advocate compulsory attendance.

Mr. Gillis: You said you were opposing the motion of your colleague from Winnipeg on the ground that it meant compulsory attendance. The book says you are compelled to be here anyway, and you certainly cannot disagree with the book. Standing order No. 5 reads:

> Every member is bound to attend the service of the house, unless leave of absence has been given him by the house.

A member has no right to be out of this chamber unless Mr. Speaker tells him he can be absent. I do not see why there is any opposition to this bill at all. It is ridiculous for the matter to be here. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that without any more discussion or fanfare we just gracefully accept this motion and say it is a conservative approach to the problem to move that at least 30 members who were elected to attend the people's business in this chamber should be expected to be here when that business is being transacted.

Mr. J. L. MacDougall (Vancouver-Burrard): Like the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill), I did not expect to enter this debate except to suggest to hon. members present that when the question of a count-out comes up I hope we do not get into the position where we shall be involved in a Dempsey-Tunney short count or long count.

The hon. member who has just taken his seat has said that he would utilize standing order No. 5 as it is set out in Beauchesne's second edition. This was most illuminating, because I believe it was the first time I have ever heard that hon. member discuss the rules of the house as they are set out in any of the three Beauchesne editions. I thought he, like myself, was one who never really consulted those publications with any degree of sincerity or study. We realize, of course, that the honour in that respect goes to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

However, be that as it may, it seems to me this is not a problem of compulsory attendance. If we are to be fair to ourselves we must admit that if we did not want to be here we would not be here. First of all we asked the electors to send us and, having been sent here, it is our duty to attend. I have a good deal of fun in my discussions back and forth with members in all parts of the house, particularly those from Ontario and Quebec who, because they are closer to their constituencies—much closer than those of us from the Pacific or Atlantic coasts—have to attend certain functions in their constituencies necessitating their absence from the house.

I am not one who will condemn them for that, because such attendance at those functions is part and parcel of our democratic system. Unfortunately those of us who come from the far Pacific or the Atlantic are in the position that, while we would like on many occasions to be back in our constituencies to attend particular events, because of the 3,000 miles separating us from our constituents we find such attendance at those events impossible.

As a second termer in the house I might say that in the twenty-first parliament I noticed as a freshman that to the best of my knowledge there was no occasion when the count-out was used. I know, as a whip from British Columbia, that when membership in the chamber got low it became my responsibility, and that of others holding similar office without emolument, to see that members were brought here.

I do not consider this situation too seriously because, regardless of our individual opinions in the matter, we must always keep in mind the type of representation meant by a quorum. One could quote from Webster or from other dictionaries in seeking a definition of a quorum. I think, however, that from a practical standpoint the people of Canada generally consider a quorum to be the irreducible minimum of membership present in the house whereby the business can be conducted in a proper manner.

Let us permit it to rest there. In the last parliament, and I expect we will have a similar situation in this one, there has been good representation from Tuesday to Thursday. I am sure that hon. members who are not present on any of those days have always had excellent reasons for their absence. Then we come to the last sitting day of the week, at which time duties call members to the various constituencies which are located reasonably close. They find that they make the return journey over the week end, perhaps extending into the following Monday.

If we were to add an additional ten members to that irreducible minimum by which the business of the country can be transacted, what would it mean? It would mean that those from the far east and the far west would be the ones who at the first and the last of each week would hold the bridge. Since 1867, the year of confederation, we have gotten along very nicely with a quorum of 20 members. It is true that the membership of the house has increased but, as was pointed out by a previous speaker, they have a quorum of only 40 members in the old land, with a membership of 625.

I am expressing only my personal views when I say that the main issue is the business of the house; and if, as has been proven, that business can be conducted on the basis of a quorum of 20 members, I can see no legitimate or valid reason why at this time we should increase the number from 20 to 30.

The electorate of Canada are not particularly concerned whether it is 20 or 30 or, indeed, 130. They are interested in the results accruing from the deliberations of members of the House of Commons in respect to the welfare of the country.

On motion of Mr. MacDougall the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: The hour for private and public bills having expired, at eight o'clock the house will resume the business interrupted at five o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE

JOINT COMMITTEE TO REPORT ON SPECIFIC MATTERS RELATING TO THE CRIMINAL LAW

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Garson:

That a joint committee of both houses of parliament be appointed to inquire into and report upon the questions whether the criminal law of Canada relating to (a) capital punishment, (b) corporal punishment or (c) lotteries should be amended in any respect and, if so, in what manner and to what extent:

That 17 members of the House of Commons, to be designated by the house at a later date, be members of the joint committee on the part of this house, and that standing order 65 of the House of Commons be suspended in relation thereto;

That the committee have power to appoint, from among its members, such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable or necessary; to call for persons, papers and records; to sit while the house is sitting and to report from time to time;

That the committee have power to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee for the use of the committee and of parliament, and that standing order 64 of the House of Commons be suspended in relation thereto;

And that a message be sent to the Senate requesting that house to unite with this house for the above purpose and to select, if the Senate deems advisable, some of its members to act on the proposed joint committee.

(Translation):

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to delay the debate, but, as I stated this afternoon, I would like to give my humble opinion on the matter now before the house.

It is obvious that crime is increasing in Canada as well as in all countries of the world. I shall not attempt to mention all the reasons that lead to crime or to murder.

I shall only say that murders are being committed in the most horrible and even unthinkable way.

As was stated this afternoon during the debate, the murderer kills for motives of vengeance, passion and jealousy. However, one has but to look at the statistics to see that most often theft is the main motive of the crime. The murderer does not usually kill in order to obtain what he needs for his subsistence.

Most of the time, and it is very unfortunate, murderers are young people in their twenties; they are the ones most often accused of murder before our courts.

Those young people want an easy life, without having to work to earn their living; they want to drink, to lead a disorderly life and indulge in immorality. In my opinion, it is not by abolishing capital punishment that we shall succeed in suppressing murder and crime.

However, I believe it is the duty of parents to keep up their efforts and give our young people the necessary advice and especially the example they need, which is indispensable in cases of that kind, so that our young people may take the right path in life and become Canadian citizens worthy of the name.

This afternoon I heard the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) say that he had visited some prisons. I had occasion, a few years ago, to visit the Bordeaux jail. As a matter of fact I once had the opportunity of entering what is called the death cell. Only a few steps away was the trap through which the murderer falls into eternity. Fortunately, when I visited that spot, there was no condemned man inside the cell. Still, I believe that if all young men who are now thinking of embarking on a life of crime, of walking that road which probably will lead them to the scaffold, had the opportunity to see that death cell, to have a look at the gallows on which they will pay for those crimes they are premeditating, fewer of them would feel that they are cut out for a bandit's life.

I feel that now is the time to broadcast a vibrant appeal to the young people of this country, to ask them, not only for the sake of their country's honour but more especially so as not to leave in their family's heart a festering wound, to turn their steps along that road which leads to honour and away from crime and murder.

Educators in our schools, colleges, as well as in our universities, are real apostles in this respect, and I am of the opinion that all our young men should bear in mind the teachings of these educators.

That is why I also believe that parents should continue to look after the education already started in this direction.

There is also another reason which prompted me to rise in this house in order to speak on this matter. In my opinion it is also the duty of the state to analyse the circumstances in which most murders are committed, for, as I was saying a few minutes ago, the motive of the crime is, most of the time, theft. Why does one steal? Because, of course, one has not sufficient means to meet one's obligations—

Mr. Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but after having listened to him for several minutes, I patiently expected that he would link up his remarks with this motion concerning the establishment of a committee to consider three things: capital punishment, corporal punishment and lotteries.

If the hon. member wants to give some reasons why he is in favour of capital punishment or of changes in that punishment in order to check crime, it is perfectly in order for him to do so. However, I believe that during these last few minutes he has wandered somewhat from the question which is now before the house.

Mr. Dufresne: I thank you for your remarks. I take due note of them—

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I hope so.

Mr. Dufresne: I beg your pardon? I take due note of them, but if I wandered about a little I may say that I did like the fellow who wants to go to Montreal. As you know two roads lead there, and I may have taken the longer one, but I will get to the motion just the same.

Mr. Pouliot: You did go to Montreal; you mentioned the cell of those who are sentenced to death in Bordeaux.

Mr. Dufresne: Well, it took me a long time to come back to Ottawa, but here I am at last.

Mr. Speaker, I am entirely in favour of setting up a committee where we will have the opportunity of studying the ways and means of checking the crime wave in order to reduce the number of death sentences. One matter which, I believe, could very well be considered concerns the lack of employment now experienced by thousands of people across Canada and especially in the county which I have the honour of representing. I am of the opinion that the government should also co-operate to bring about the solution of this problem.

As far as lotteries are concerned, the Criminal Code should be amended so as to allow the provinces to organize lotteries, the proceeds of which would be used to give help to hospitals, as well as for relief and, more particularly perhaps, educational purposes.

If my memory serves me right the government of the province of Quebec unanimously adopted—not very long ago—a motion in favour of state lotteries as a means of subsidizing education. Millions of dollars leave this country every year which could be used with advantage right here in Canada and of which our people are being deprived. No one will ever stop our people from gambling. They will never give up the pleasure of betting. In the meantime we are losing millions of dollars to other countries which could otherwise be kept here and be of immense service to education, public welfare and hospitals.

Consequently, I am definitely for the setting up of this committee to ensure that the Criminal Code be amended not to abolish capital punishment but, if possible, to allow for lotteries under provincial sponsorship which would enable us to give our universities, for example, the money they need to meet their obligations and at the same time prevent the federal government from interfering in matters which come under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces.

Mr. Jean-François Pouliot (Temiscouata): I shall be brief; I shall say in a few words what I think of this motion.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, I want to be understood by all my hon. friends. We must consider this matter with an open mind because it is a serious matter. What strikes me is that those ladies and gentlemen who are in favour of the abolition of capital punishment are without any experience in law. They are kindhearted people who consider it wrong to punish a murderer by putting him to death. They have the best intentions in the world, as have those who favour capital punishment. It works both ways.

But they forget that those who have committed murder have not abided by the law and have had no consideration for the neighbour whom they have killed or for the relatives and children of the murdered man. It is a serious matter. Some people seem to be under the impression that if things are left as they are, if there is no change made in the provisions of the Criminal Code with regard to capital punishment, then the members of parliament—I include the members of both houses—will be indicting any man charged with murder and sentencing him to death. That is not the case at all. Far be it from me to think that with the experience I have had as a member of the bar appearing before the bench and the jury box.

What about the jury? The jury is one of the most remarkable and useful institutions in British corpus juris, the right of a man to be judged by his peers. The members of the jury are selected for the panel by the attorney general of the province, or under his authority by the local people.

What happens? A murder is committed, not always in connection with theft as was suggested by the hon. gentleman who just spoke. A murder may be inspired by passion, by love, by vice, in connection with kidnapping and rape and the defilement of children. A murder may be committed for many reasons and for many objectives. Are we to be so tenderhearted that when a man commits murder we will be more indulgent toward him than he has been toward those who have suffered at his hands? Shall we forget that by being indulgent toward a man guilty of murder we encourage the idea in the minds of those who may be inclined toward committing murder?

What about the stories we read in the newspapers glamourizing murderers, showing their pictures, describing the colour of their shirts? That is often the treatment given by the newspapers to the man who has killed another man or woman. The press is hideous in giving yellow details about these men who should be ignored, who should be hanged in secret and seclusion. Instead our press appeals to the morbid feelings of the crowd, which is often more rapacious than the people to be found in the wildest part of Africa.

In what sort of age do we live? Why is it that the first thing read by young people is often the headline of a murder trial, the trial of a man who is unworthy of having been born? What about the women who are shameless enough to pack our courtrooms in order to listen to all the details of a murder? In what age do we live? Capital punishment should remain on the statute books as a protection for society. In the past, Mr. Speaker, death was the penalty for rape but the courts have been rather indulgent—is indulgent the word? The courts have been weak in not applying capital punishment to rape. What is the result?

When other hon. members are through I will go on, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps since the hon. member himself has interrupted his speech I may tell him that I think he is wandering away from the subject. The manner in which the courts deal with the sentences to be given people who have committed different crimes should not, I think, come in at this time. Let us keep our remarks within the ambit of the resolution. I would ask hon. members to keep silent. They may whisper, but they may not speak loudly enough to disturb the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Pouliot: I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker. The matter I was dealing with was capital punishment, and I was explaining to hon. members who do not belong to the legal fraternity as do you and I the role of the jury in the matter of capital punishment. I was also explaining to them that the right of the jury to find a man guilty of murder should remain on the statute books and that the sentence is not given by the jury but by the presiding judge, who has no option. When the jury reaches the verdict that the man before the court is guilty of murder, then it is the duty of the judge to sentence him to be hanged, subject to an appeal to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) who is also the Attorney General of Canada.

But my point, Mr. Speaker, and I want it to be well understood, is that by leaving that provision in the Criminal Code we leave to the jury the right to decide whether or not a man is guilty of murder. In that connection, sir, I cannot but remember what was said to me by no less a criminologist than the late Sir François Lemieux, then chief justice of the superior court of Quebec. He told me that the institution of the jury was the greatest protection and the safest guarantee of freedom of the individual in our country, not only in the province of Quebec but in our country at large, because the Criminal Code applies to each of the provinces of Canada.

That is my point, and when I speak in that way my object is to explain just as clearly as I can to my hon. colleagues that by leaving the Criminal Code as it is, according to the words of a man who knew his business and is remembered as one of the greatest judicial minds of Canada, a man who saved several people from the rope, we are guaranteeing the freedom of the individual in cases of that nature.

Jurymen are chosen from amongst the common people like you and me, sir—I beg your pardon—and they are chosen from all ranks of society. Twelve are chosen, and there is a right to challenge the jury if they are prejudiced. That is another protection. These twelve men are there; they are conscientious, they listen to the grim charge of the crown attorney, then to the plea of the attorney for the defence and then, according to British judicial tradition, there is the charge of the judge who must be impartial, otherwise the verdict is quashed on appeal. That is considerable protection.

My first point in regard to this very serious matter, Mr. Speaker, is that due to the fact that we enjoy the institution of the jury in this country there is no reason at all to change the provision of the Criminal Code concerning capital punishment for murder. I will go further than that. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that capital punishment should be applied to rape, and should be applied to kidnapping and to the defilement of children. We have enough of that. Everyone has in mind the whole story of cases such as that, but I respect you too much, Mr. Speaker, and I respect my colleagues too much to mention those cases in the house. I think every hon. member knows what I am speaking of; and do you not agree, sir, that if capital punishment were applied to rape and to the defilement of children there would be an improvement? In my humble view capital punishment was not enough in some cases about which we have read recently. In the case of the airplane crash that occurred near Quebec not long ago it was not enough.

There is something else, sir, and I will take advantage of this opportunity to speak about it now. I refer to mens rea, the guilty intent that must exist for the matter to be murder. Otherwise, as you know, it is only manslaughter. I take this opportunity to mention en passant the shameful way in which the police, whether federal, provincial or municipal, try to get confessions of guilt by promising people that they will not be so severely punished if they confess, if they declare themselves guilty. I shall have other occasions to speak about this matter.

To summarize, I find that the present dispositions of the Criminal Code do not go far enough, and I suggest that they should be extended to some other crimes which make us think that our civilization is doomed.

With respect to lotteries, I shall be very brief. There are things that I cannot understand. Those who sell the tickets are denied postal rights. Their names are published in the monthly periodical of the Post Office Department, and they cannot receive letters. Letters addressed to them go to the dead letter section. On the other hand, those who buy tickets and win money have their pictures in the newspapers, and they get their money without any trouble. I find this unfair.

Mr. Knowles: Free of income tax, too.

Mr. Pouliot: Presumably so; I do not know because I have never earned anything that way. But I suggest that the matter should be considered from every angle by the special committee. If it is a bad thing to sell the tickets I do not see how those who are fortunate enough to win can keep the money. It is beyond me. If it is legal to take money from a lottery it should also be legal to sell tickets. I have no personal views about the usefulness of lotteries or whether or not they are very much apropos. They may be. I am not discussing that, but I think our Criminal Code should be fair and should be in accordance with the regulations of the Post Office Department.

This shows that with regard to the Criminal Code, as with regard to any matter, one must exercise a little common sense, and I am sure those who will be members of the committee that is about to study these matters will be endowed with a great deal of it.

Mr. Claude Ellis (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a few comments at this time, and I am not going to apologize for not being learned in law because I feel that at times lawyers are very adept at throwing out convenient smokescreens.

I wish to refer to the comments regarding juries. I cannot quite appreciate the view expressed, because my understanding of the law is that the jury finds the accused either guilty or not guilty. It is not for the jury to decide the method of punishment. The jury finds the accused guilty or not guilty, and it is for the judge to impose sentence. Thus I fail to understand the comments by the last speaker about the jury system. I do not think the question of the jury system has anything to do with capital punishment at all. After all, capital punishment is the punishment for a crime.

Mr. Pouliot: If my hon. friend will permit, the role of the jury is to decide whether a man is guilty or not guilty. If it finds him guilty then there has been a murder, and hanging follows. If the jury in all its wisdom says not guilty, it is finished—no murder, no hanging.

Mr. Ellis: Then am I to gather that a jury might feel constrained to find a man not guilty if the jurors were not anxious to see him hanged? That would be the only way the jury could possibly spare a man from the gallows.

Mr. Fulton: Frequently they do.

Mr. Ellis: But my understanding of the law is that if the jury brings in a verdict of guilty the judge has no other recourse than to impose the death sentence. Therefore I quite fail to understand the arguments as to our jury system. What we are concerned with here is the question of punishment, and irrespective of whether or not capital punishment is abolished the same procedures in connection with the apprehension of criminals, their trial and conviction or acquittal will continue. The jury will find the accused either guilty or not guilty. There will be no change whatsoever up to the point where the judge imposes sentence.

When it comes to that stage, I want to suggest in all humility that there are other experts in the country besides lawyers. I suggest that some of our criminologists, penologists, psychologists and psychiatrists—

Mr. Pouliot: Not psychologists; they are no good.

Mr. Ellis: —have much to offer in connection with the important matter of the punishment of those who are found guilty in courts of law. I was rather at a loss to understand all this discussion regarding the jury system. What we are concerned with is the question of punishment, and it seems that there are two basic points of view. There are those who, because of moral or religious reasons, are opposed to capital punishment as a matter of principle. Then there are those who, like the hon. member who just spoke, not only support capital punishment but would extend it. They would turn back the clock, so to speak. We have two very divergent points of view, but I am sure there are many Canadians, and a good many members of the house, who are perhaps unable to come to one or other of these two conclusions.

This afternoon the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) related the long process he went through in formulating his present stand in support of the abolition of capital punishment on balance, I believe he said. I believe there are many Canadians who are wrestling with this question in their consciences, but I feel that the attitude many take is that unless it can be proven conclusively that capital punishment is totally ineffective, the law should remain as it is.

I have done a little reading on this subject and have searched around as much as possible to find evidence one way or the other, and I must say that the preponderance of the evidence I have seen would seem to indicate that capital punishment is not effective. Even if one were not to go that far, but say there is reasonable doubt as to the effectiveness of capital punishment, then I say we ought to err on the side of being humane and civilized in this matter. In other words, the only justifiable reason for maintaining capital punishment would be that the abolition of capital punishment would throw open the doors and leave this country open to a great increase in the number of murders, as some of our people have suggested. I do not believe that anyone in Canada wants to see anyone hanged or executed in any other way. Only a sadist would get any satisfaction out of seeing a man put to death. I suggest there must be very sound reasons for taking a man's life.

The question that must arise in our minds is simply this, whether or not we agree in principle with capital punishment. Would the removal of it bring about a great increase in crime, particularly with respect to homicide? That is the only justification for the retention of capital punishment. We learn from experience. We know that in those countries where capital punishment has been abolished there has been no increase in homicide. As a matter of fact we know that in Denmark the last murderer was executed in 1892; in Holland the last execution took place in 1860; in Norway, in 1876; in Sweden, in 1909, and in Switzerland, in 1924.

In the years that followed the abolition of the death penalty there was no increase in murder in those countries. Wherever we look throughout the world, the abolition of the death penalty has not been followed by an increase in homicide. Why should we, therefore, believe that in Canada the situation would be very different? If the abolition of the death penalty in Sweden, for example, was not followed by an increase in homicide; if in Norway or Switzerland the abolition of the death penalty did not bring about an increase in murders, what reason have we to suggest that this country will be overrun with murderers the day after we abolished the death penalty? We have no logical reason for believing that.

Without wishing to go into the moral or ethical reasons for the death penalty, pro and con, since the subject was dealt with very effectively by my seatmate, the hon. member for Vancouver East, this afternoon I do want to leave this idea with the house. I hope when the committee meet they will take this attitude. We do not like to take human lives; therefore we will not take human lives unless it is absolutely essential. The burden of bringing proof will not be upon those who want the abolition of capital punishment but upon those who want to retain capital punishment, to prove to the members of this house that we cannot do without it.

I believe the evidence indicates that we can do without it. In any case, I maintain that if there is any reasonable doubt in the minds of the members of this house, and if a mistake is to be made to the slightest degree, let us err on the side of humanity and decency.

Mr. G. W. Montgomery (Victoria-Carleton): I do not intend to take up much time on this subject, Mr. Speaker. The matter has been dealt with thoroughly, in so far as I am concerned, by my colleague the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). Having been a member of the special committee which worked on the bill last session, I feel I should like to say a word about that committee. First, I am one hundred per cent in favour of this committee being set up. The speakers who have preceded me have indicated there is a divergence of view across this country about capital punishment. At the last session the committee wisely recommended that a special committee be set up to study these particular subjects. I am very glad that the minister and the government have seen their way clear to appointing this committee. I imagine it will be given the broadest terms of reference.

If the committee at the last session had left the code as it was, I feel there would have been a lot of criticism. If in the limited time available last winter we had undertaken to deal with these subjects, there would have been much criticism. I feel the committee acted wisely in the recommendations that were made. As I said, I have very little to add to what other members have said. I feel all hon. members should approach this subject with an open mind.

I cannot agree entirely with the hon. member who just spoke that we should consider this whole question of whether or not we should abolish capital punishment on the basis of whether it might reduce or increase crime. I look at it from a different standpoint entirely. Of course I am a lawyer. I have had no great experience in criminal practice, but I have had some. I have a lot of faith in the jury system. I believe the jury system ties in with this subject of the criminal law and with every phase of crime, prosecution and punishment. I believe that people who are accused of crime are well safeguarded under our criminal system as it is at the present time. The prosecution takes a very fair stand, and in most cases places before the court all the evidence, not only against the prisoner but anything known to be in favour of the prisoner which might permit him to have a fair trial and which is not placed before the court by him or his solicitor, if he has one.

This afternoon the hon. member for Kamloops struck the nail on the head, if I might be permitted to use that expression, when he said the jury system is the greatest protection for the people of this country. I feel it should be carefully studied. I believe it was a fine thing to have this whole matter considered by a committee.

There is just one point I should like to add which I do not think has been touched upon. It may be that the minister intends to have it included in the study anyway. I have not heard anyone mention that this committee might consider also the method of carrying out the executions. A lot of people do not like capital punishment because they do not like the idea of hanging. It seems a gruesome thing. I presume the terms of reference will give this committee the privilege of studying other ways of carrying out the death sentence, if it remains, and making some recommendations about it.

The next point I should like to mention is that the committee ought to consider whether or not these executions should be carried out within the jurisdiction of the court by which the accused is found guilty. It might be a good idea to have these executions carried out in some central prison. I feel that is another subject which might well be considered.

Mr. Garson: The motion covers both those matters.

Mr. Montgomery: Thank you very much. I think that covers about all I have to say, except one more word about the committee on which I worked last year. As a new member of parliament and a junior member on the committee, it was a good education for me. I enjoyed the work very much, under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown). That was one committee that worked diligently and faithfully. So far as I know everyone did his best to improve the Criminal Code in every way possible, while at the same time protecting and safeguarding the interests of the country.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have only a few remarks to make in this debate. Indeed, I rather think perhaps this is not the proper time to have a debate on the subject at all. What we have been hearing this afternoon and this evening would have been better said after we had the report from the committee that is to be set up to deal with the matter.

If the debate this afternoon and this evening has demonstrated one thing more than another, it is that many of those who have taken part in it are certainly not qualified according to our rules to be members of the committee. That does not hold, however, for the hon. member who last spoke. I would say, with him, that I too was glad to have the privilege of serving on the committee on criminal law last year. It was an education in itself.

What troubles me in regard to capital punishment is that if it is a bad thing for one person to take another person's life, then it is also a bad thing for the state to take a person's life. I do not want to be misunderstood, because certainly I have as little use for a man who commits murder as has any other member in the house. But I think today, in our ideas respecting those who violate our laws, we are getting away from the idea of punishment and directing our thoughts more along the lines of the protection of society and reforming the individual.

I appreciate that that cannot very well be done in the case of a person who commits a murder. He must be put away and, for the protection of society, he must be put away for good. I believe it was the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Ellis) who said that today most people are revolted by the method by which executions are carried out.

I have read some considerable history, and it seems to me that as the human race advances its members become more humane in their dealings with one another. It is really only in that way that one can say the human race does advance. I was interested in what was said by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) when he, as well as others, referred to the protection given by the jury system. I am not sure that the jury system protects anyone. I am, of course, in favour of it; but let us remember this, that in every murder case, or almost every case coming before a jury, the prosecution as well as the defence are chiefly concerned about the calibre of the lawyers representing them. If I had need of a lawyer I would most certainly look for a good one. I believe it was one of our national journals in which appeared recently a story concerning the beginning of the legal career of a prominent member of this House of Commons, which referred to the help given him by the jury in winning his first case. I would like to have a lawyer like that, if it were my misfortune to find myself in a similar circumstance.

The prosecuting attorney tries to impress the jury in one way and the defending lawyer tries to impress it in the other. Sometimes it is the power to influence that is the deciding factor, rather than the evidence in a case. In almost all murder cases the evidence must of necessity be circumstantial. A person who is about to commit a murder does not publicize or advertise it, so that people will come around to see it. He proceeds in a quite different way. The result is that lawyers and juries must make as intelligent guesses as they can as to what has happened and, on the basis of those guesses, bring in a verdict of guilt or innocence, involving hanging or acquittal.

These are some of the reasons I find it hard to accept capital punishment at all. I think we should get away from the idea of punishment and think more in terms of protecting society. In my view the hon. member for Temiscouata was on more dangerous ground when he advocated the extension of capital punishment to the crimes of rape and kidnapping. While I am not an authority or an expert in these matters, like most hon. members in the house I have read the opinions of others who have studied these matters and who are convinced that there would be fewer murders in connection with kidnapping if kidnapping itself was not a crime punishable by death. The same is true in the matter of rape.

How does that apply? If the person injured were going to lay a complaint, her evidence would be convincing. But dead people do not lay complaints and, in order to prevent such a person laying a complaint, murder follows the first crime. That, I believe, is the way the criminal mind works. To make the death penalty apply would not diminish the number of such crimes. I do not believe anyone who commits any of these crimes is ever in an emotional condition to consider the pros and cons of what may happen to him or to her, as the case may be, if he or she does what he or she has in mind. I do not believe anyone can accept that idea.

However, I am glad the Minister of Justice is setting up the committee. Regardless of what it may find, it will be good for the people of Canada to study the matter and to hear what is to be said on both sides of the question. Experts as well as laymen are interested in this matter. We all want to do the best we can for the society in which we live and so advance that society that we can diminish those anti-social acts that call for punishment.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before this debate is closed I do want to say something about the subject that has most actively engaged the attention of hon. members in their comments about this committee. I do not propose to make any remarks about the two very important subjects of corporal punishment and lotteries. They have been adequately covered, particularly by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton); but I do want to speak about the discussion in regard to capital punishment, particularly as it has taken form here this evening.

What has been said by the hon. member for Kamloops and by the other hon. members who have raised certain questions here has not been in opposition to this motion. I recognize that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) has been well aware of that from the time the discussion began. It would not be proper for the members of this house at this time to seek to tie the hands of the committee that they will appoint on the adoption of this motion, if it is adopted, as it would appear that it will be, I should think, unanimously. Nevertheless, the way in which this committee does its work, the way in which it approaches the subject, may very well be guided in some degree at least by the attitude expressed toward the subject matter of its inquiry.

The committee will doubtless hear different views, and the different views which have been expressed here will undoubtedly be expressed again when that committee meets. In the examination of the witnesses and in the calling of evidence undoubtedly different approaches will be suggested by different members of the committee. It may well be, however, that if the members of the committee became convinced that one point of view or another was clearly the point of view of the members of the house, they might in some measure seek to anticipate that point of view. It is with that thought in mind that I wish to make a few remarks in regard to capital punishment.

This is a moral question. It is a question that deals with the right of any human being, individually or collectively in the form of society itself, to deal with any matter that may arise, to deal with any guilt that has been proved, by depriving some other human being of life itself. Capital punishment is a terrible thing. It is not inappropriate that the full horror of capital punishment should be discussed, as it has been discussed here in dramatic terms today. It is appropriate that we should bear in mind exactly what it is that the parliament of Canada is permitting the courts to do after a man or a woman is found guilty of a capital offence.

By all means let us hope that the committee to be appointed by this resolution will consider this subject from the most enlightened and civilized point of view.

But, Mr. Speaker, let us remember that there would be no death penalty if there were no murders. The death penalty is a terrible thing, and so is murder, an act by an individual who has defied the laws of society and not merely deprived some innocent individual of life but perhaps for the long years ahead will have brought tragedy and despair and the denial of the ordinary decencies of life to the wife and the children of one who has been shot down in cold blood by thugs who have armed themselves, perhaps not with the idea of murder but reckless as to what the results will be.

Yes, by all means let us examine this in a most civilized way. It may be that with the advancement of society some better method will be found but, Mr. Speaker, let any approach to this subject have first and foremost in the minds of those considering it the fact that what we are trying to do today is place it within the power of our courts to prevent murder by the example of the punishment that is inflicted. I personally do not believe the statement that the fear of death is not a deterrent. I personally do not believe that some young man, conscious of the fact that death would be the result of his reckless use of weapons, would not think twice of taking that weapon on some adventure that might result in death and in his own punishment for a capital offence. It is contrary to everything we know in human nature to think that anyone looking at that pistol or knife and taking it in his hand would do so without some thought of what the penalty will be if the adventure in which he is about to engage should result in death and a subsequent conviction for murder.

We have had a number of rather dramatic examples in this country of the kind of thing that should be in the minds of the members of the committee—and which I hope will be in the minds of the majority of the members of that committee—in making their recommendations back to this house. Already the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) referred to that almost unbelievable multiple murder when a time bomb was placed in a passenger aircraft flying from the city of Quebec to Sept Iles. An almost unbelievable murder it was. To murder his own wife a man followed a course which meant death to many innocent human beings. Those 21 people who died left behind widows and children who for long years to come will have reason to remember that horror.

Just think of what happened only a few days ago in St. Michael's hospital in Toronto, when a brilliant young girl was murdered in a laboratory of that great hospital. Certainly let us remember that if the man or woman who committed that murder is apprehended the courts will be dealing with a human being; but remember also that the young woman who was murdered was a human being performing a humane task of great advantage and of great importance to many people in that hospital. Think of the bank manager in the province of Quebec who before Christmas was shot down by young men who perhaps did not contemplate murder, but having guns in their hands used those weapons when the bank manager resisted the theft they were trying to carry out.

From one end of this country to the other reports come to us of crimes of violence against decent, simple human beings whose lives are of immense importance to other decent human beings. The purpose of parliament and the purpose of the committee which will make its recommendations to parliament should be to do everything within the judgment of sensible men and women to discourage in every way possible that type of horror which affects such a wide area of our society when it occurs.

I am not laying down any dogmatic opinion in regard to the death penalty, but I do say that if there is going to be a balanced consideration of the humanities, let that consideration rest on the innocent people who are being shot down or knifed or otherwise destroyed. Let us think in terms of how we can best prevent that by example, if that can be done in any way.

There have been strangely conflicting arguments and certain statements which I do not think should pass without notice. I heard, as did other hon. members, the statement that it is a terrible thing to think of people engaging in the gruesome pleasure of taking social revenge. No one is contemplating the gruesome pleasure of social revenge. What we are considering is every sensible step that may be taken to end the gruesome horror of cold-blooded murder.

There have been some conflicting arguments presented. I do not question for one moment the good faith of those advancing the arguments, but I suggest that they be reviewed by those who have put them forward. On the one hand we were told that the thought of life imprisonment was even more terrifying than the death penalty. We had scarcely been told that when all the horrors of the contemplation of the death penalty were pictured to our minds. I think the latter was the correct interpretation.

It is a horrible thing; but to the extent that the death penalty may act as a deterrent, then everyone on this committee and in this house should be most reluctant to change the law as it now stands until he has heard more convincing evidence than has yet been submitted. That may come, and if it does come I have no doubt the committee will listen and give careful consideration to what is said; but I would hope that the very natural instinct of humanity to look with consideration toward any other human being will not be carried to the extent of doing anything that will make it more likely that young men will put weapons in their pockets, carry knives or do those things that have brought so much tragedy to this and other countries.

I am not overlooking one thing that was mentioned by one hon. member here today. I am not overlooking the fact that some murders are committed by those whose condition has been brought about by alcohol. That very fact imposes upon those who are charged with any responsibility in that respect the duty of exercising the greatest caution and the greatest restraint that can be exercised in regard to the abuse of alcohol. The record is clear. I think there are many instances of violence by those crazed with alcohol. With that in mind an attempt should be made to follow a course that will discourage people carrying lethal weapons, and to keep before the minds of those who may be engaged in some other enterprises the dangers of following a course that may carry them to murder itself.

The trend in this country should not be a trend that will throw the doors open wider to crimes of violence of any kind, but rather in this country of ours our first thought should be of those decent citizens who at all times should be protected.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my colleagues the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch), the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight), the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Ellis) and the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis) have expressed views on this question of capital punishment with which I agree. Therefore I shall not take the time of the house to repeat any arguments which they have put forward. However, in view of the way in which this debate has gone I feel constrained to rise and make what I think is an additional argument in support of the abolition of capital punishment.

Before I indicate the additional argument which I wish to make I want to say that I am glad the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) has made the proposal that a joint committee be established to go into this and other questions. I certainly hope that the consideration given to these questions by that committee will be objective. I express that hope despite the trend of the discussion back and forth in the house this afternoon and evening. As I listened, not only to the speeches that have been made but to the volume of applause on one side rather than the other, it has appeared to me that maybe the case is weighted on one side even before the committee meets.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might in the friendliest way possible raise a point of order which I perhaps should have raised at a much earlier stage in the debate. The motion which is before the house at the present time is to set up a committee which, if it is to do its duty effectively, must approach its task in the most objective manner. The sole question is whether that committee will be set up or not set up. I should think that in relation to that subject a debate upon the merits or demerits of capital punishment would be of all debates most calculated to prejudice in advance the efforts of the committee.

In saying this I am in complete agreement with the remarks just made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I wonder if the hon. member, with a concern for order that perhaps not all of us are able to equal, will not be one of the first to deal with the subject which is under discussion, that is whether we shall or shall not set up this committee. If we set up the committee, I think everyone in the house will agree that it will get off to a much better start in its important task if the water has not been muddied by acrimonious debate on the merits or demerits of the subject matter upon which the committee will try to decide and report.

Mr. Knowles: On the point of order which has been raised by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I might have found it easier to go along with him if he had raised it much earlier in the day, in fact if he had raised it during the course of the first speech that went into the substance of the question of capital punishment. I might also have found it easier to go along with him if he had not indicated, when he was anxious to get the debate closed on the motion for second reading of Bill No. 7, that there would be an opportunity to discuss the question of capital punishment on this motion to appoint a committee.

Mr. Garson: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I am not suggesting for a moment that the question of capital punishment should not be discussed, but I think in keeping with the motion in connection with which it is now being discussed it would be more appropriate and helpful if it could be discussed at this stage in as noncommittal a manner as possible.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether this is a point of order on which Your Honour feels compelled to rule.

Mr. Speaker: I think what the minister has in mind is that hon. members in speaking to the substance of various points which are later to be examined by the committee should not oppose the principle, and that not too many members who might later be selected as members of the committee should declare that they are opposed to certain principles and therefore go with blind eyes or very open eyes along the lines they intend to follow and have announced in the house they intend to follow. I think he had in mind citation 529 of Beauchesne's third edition, where it states that a member who is totally opposed to certain particulars of a bill or a motion may be excluded from a committee. His point was perhaps not so much one of order but rather a point of wisdom.

Mr. Knowles: I think there is wisdom in the position that you have taken, Mr. Speaker, with respect to this point of order, and I think also there is much to be said for the contention by the Minister of Justice that the water has been muddied a good deal today. As a matter of fact, although it is a very common expression on the part of members that they did not intend to speak, I did not intend to speak myself until the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) waxed so warm on the other side of the question than that which I take.

I said when I started that I did not intend to repeat any of the arguments put forward already today by my colleagues to whom I have referred, but there is one point that kept coming to my mind as I listened to the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) and the Leader of the Opposition. They and other members say that before we abolish capital punishment we must consider society; we must be concerned with the protection of society, and we must not, if I may quote the hon. member for Temiscouata, be too indulgent with murderers.

I could not agree more. I am not asking for indulgence for murderers; I am not asking that we disregard the rights of society. What I am concerned about, and I can say it very briefly, is what the practice of capital punishment does to society.

I am far more concerned with that than I am with what it does or does not do to the convicted murderer. The hon. member for Temiscouata referred to some of the recent instances of trials for murder and the newspaper publicity that was given to the executions that took place, and he used the word "barbarous" in relation to the way people act at such times. That is what capital punishment does, regardless of what it does to the accused or convicted murderer. It makes society that much more barbarous.

I think there are other ways of dealing with this question and protecting society from further murder by the same individuals. I think there are other ways in which to try to get rid of murder and that is through reforms, through the removal of some of the causes that lead to murder, for even after it has taken place capital punishment does not bring back the life that has been taken. Whatever it may or may not do for the murderer it brutalizes society; it makes us a barbarous group of people, and I think we have moved on to a point where for our own sake we can devise a better way of dealing with this serious question.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, it was the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) who brought me to my feet. I did not intend to speak, but I felt it was time to protest when I heard the hon. member suggest that only those who are members of the legal profession really have an opinion that is worth anything on this question. I would submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that this is not a legal question; it is a statistical and moral question. As far as I am aware the legal profession does not give any particular study to the study of statistics, and I think it would be a very bold member of the legal profession who would suggest that they are entirely the palladium of all moral virtues.

It has been suggested by those who have spoken in this debate that we must bear in mind the suffering and bereavement of the family of a murdered man or woman. That is quite right. We should certainly bear that always in mind. But I am at a loss to understand just how their condition would be improved and how their woes would be relieved by hanging the person who was directly responsible for their tribulations. I think we should face that fact quite plainly, and those who suggest that as an argument for capital punishment should realize they have one motive and one motive only. That is the motive of revenge, because it serves no useful purpose and does no good to the victim of the murderer. What you are seeking to do is to relieve your emotional antagonism toward the murderer by an act of revenge.

It will be said, of course, that when we think of the bereaved family of a murdered person we should think in terms of protecting society so that other families will not meet the same fate. It is all very well for the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) to say that he does not believe the death penalty is not a deterrent to murder. He, of course, is entitled to his belief and his opinion; but there are those of us who prefer to base our opinion upon statistical evidence, and all the statistical evidence available to students tells us without a single exception that there is no correlation whatever between the death penalty and the incidence of homicide.

I would suggest that no case can be made out either for or against capital punishment on the basis of its relationship to the incidence of murder, and I think had my colleague from Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) pursued his remarks with regard to those states of the American union which have abolished the death penalty—you will recall he showed us where the level of incidence of homicide remained unchanged—and had he compared these states with the other states in the union where the death penalty is still imposed we would have found—in fact I saw the same study to which he referred—that the incidence of homicide is dependent entirely on other factors.

These factors largely appear to be the educational and economic status of the various regions. In regions where the educational and economic status is such as to encourage homicide you can have all the death penalties you like and you will not reduce the homicides, and in those regions where the educational and economic level is such as to discourage homicide you will not increase the homicides if you abolish the death penalty.

Like my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I also am more concerned with the effect upon society as a whole of the use of capital punishment than I am with the effect on the convicted person. I do not think I can be alone among the people of Canada—in fact I know very well I am not—when I have a feeling of guilty horror every time I hear of someone condemned to death in our law courts. I am not able to escape that feeling of guilty horror, and I am convinced that there are many thousands, if not hundreds of thousands, of my fellow Canadians who suffer that same feeling of guilty horror that the only way we have yet evolved of dealing with the problem of homicide is to kill the murderer, in spite of the evidence that it does not reduce the incidence of homicide, and the clear evidence in front of our faces that it does nothing whatever to relieve the condition of the family of the murdered person.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, it is not good enough to suggest, as I heard suggested here not long ago, that perhaps in the future, when Canadian society has progressed further than its present point, we may be able to do away with the death penalty. Doing away with the death penalty will be evidence of our advancement and our progress. Its retention will be evidence of our determination to remain back in the dark ages which guard this question of homicide.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mr. Garson: In closing the debate I think the first point I should make is to refer to the occasion for this motion, which was the report of the special committee of the House of Commons of the last parliament on its Bill No. 93, the Criminal Code consolidation bill. On that occasion the committee reported as follows:

> The committee, upon the material before it, was not prepared to recommend a change in the present law respecting the defence of insanity, lotteries and the imposition of punishment by whipping and by sentence of death, but unanimously has come to the conclusion, and so recommends, that the governor general in council give consideration to the appointment of a royal commission, or to the submission to parliament of a proposal to set up a joint parliamentary committee of the Senate and the House of Commons—

—to consider and report upon these matters. Like other members, I was very much impressed by the excellent speeches which have been made during the course of the debate, but it did seem to me that if any stranger had come into our midst during its course he would have been drawn to the almost irresistible conclusion that the resolution before the house was whether or not we should continue capital punishment. What we are seeking to do here, I suggest, is not to prejudge the matter at all but to send it to a committee to get that evidence without which the special House of Commons committee of the last parliament was unwilling to change the present law, because its members did not feel they could take that responsibility until the matter had been more carefully investigated.

For that reason I think the expression of strong views in the present debate is not particularly helpful. Perhaps some of us have preconceived ideas upon this subject; but if we are going to take the trouble of sending this matter to a committee—and I gather from the tenor of the discussion that most hon. members are in favour of doing so—there is not much purpose in our doing so unless we are going to at least preserve a sufficiently open mind that we can consider in a reasonably objective manner the material that comes before the committee and is then reported by the committee to the house.

I dealt with this question of whether a committee should be set up in a previous debate, and I mention this because I was criticized by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) for not doing so in the present debate. My arguments can be found at pages 939, 940, 941 and 942 of Hansard of December 15, 1953. I do not think I can add anything to them at the present time, and therefore I should like to use the time available to me in replying to some of the points raised by those taking part in this debate which I think deserve some explanatory comment.

One of the points which was mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch), if I remember rightly, was as to the fact that in the states of the United States where capital punishment had been abolished the homicide rate was, if I remember him correctly, the order of about half that of the average of those states which retained capital punishment. I do suggest—and in this respect I think I am in complete agreement with the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron)—that when one is using statistics of this sort he must, before he can claim the conclusions from them which were claimed by the hon. member for Vancouver East, be in a position to say that all of the other factors in the states not having capital punishment on the one hand and in those having capital punishment on the other, were equal. Obviously they were not because some of them were agricultural, some of them were industrial, some of them had huge cities with their higher crime rate than rural areas, and some of them were in the north and some in the south.

I think the opinion of the British commission was that conclusions based upon statistical material have to be received with a very great deal of caution indeed.

There is one point we have to keep in mind throughout this whole question. I do not think it can be better expressed than in the very wise words which were once used by a former governor general of this country when he said that to be simple in an unsimple matter is the surest road to confusion. We have in this question of the proper punishment for murder an exceedingly unsimple matter, and when the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Ellis) makes the statement that in all the places in the world where they have abolished capital punishment they have had a favourable homicide rate and fine conditions, I suggest that that is a rather simple argument in an unsimple matter. It also lacks the merit of being accurate, because if he will examine the British report, for example at page 345, he will see there listed ten states of the United States which, having abolished capital punishment, felt by reason of the condition which followed its abolition that it was necessary to restore capital punishment, and they did restore it.

Now, if the hon. member makes his statement apply to the world as a whole he takes in those states; and those states, whether they were right or wrong—

Mr. Ellis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I named certain states. I did not say the entire world. I named the states of Norway and Denmark and I referred to specific states.

Mr. Garson: Hansard will record what the hon. member said, but I distinctly recall him saying there was no place in the world that did not show that when capital punishment was abolished, the homicide rate declined and conditions improved. I am not going to suggest for a moment, here or before the committee or elsewhere, that because these states, having tried out the abolition of capital punishment in some cases for as short a period as two years, restored capital punishment and with one single exception kept it restored, that that in itself is necessarily a strong argument in favour of capital punishment. I suggest this question is far too unsimple to lend itself to rather simple types of argument such as this.

One of the important things we have to bear in mind is this. The Criminal Code as it stands today, in relation to almost every other offence, allows the courts a very wide discretion with regard to the penalty which they may impose. It is true that in both Canada and the United Kingdom the death penalty can be imposed for offences other than murder. One of these is rape although we are proposing to abolish this death penalty for rape in the new Criminal Code consolidation bill. In practice the mandatory sentence of death has been imposed during peacetime only for the crime of murder.

While other offences allow a wide discretion to the court as between minimum and maximum to fit the penalty to the moral obliquity of the offence committed, murder is the only one in which the court has no discretion but to impose the mandatory death sentence. Yet it is true, and it seems to me that this is one of the important branches of the problem that we must consider carefully before the joint committee, that there are few offences in any country which vary so widely as murder in character and in culpability.

I do not want to refer to any facts in Canada, because those are facts which will doubtless come before the committee. I do not want to say anything here tonight that will in any way prejudice the committee's ability to give this matter the most careful and judicious consideration. I have, however, abstracted from the British report these facts: Of 50 cases of murder that occurred in the United Kingdom during the 20 years from 1931 to 1951 the convicted persons were men, women, girls, youths, and some hardly older than children. Some were normal, some neurotic, some epileptic or insane. In each case the mentally abnormal differed in their abnormality. So far as the crime itself was concerned it varied all the way from a crime which called more for pity than censure to other crimes of the most brutal and callous character. They may have occurred in the heat of passion, or they may have occurred with the greatest premeditation.

I think it was my hon. friend the member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) who asked what were the causes of murder. In this study which was prepared by the British commission it showed the following motives "springing from weakness as often as from wickedness": cupidity, revenge, love, jealousy, anger, fear, pity, despair, duty, self-righteousness, political or religious fanaticism. In some cases they were unable to find any intelligible motive at all. I think, therefore, that we have here a matter of very great difficulty indeed. We have to consider in what way and under what circumstances we can, with safety to society and fairness to those upon whom the crime of murder has been committed and their relatives, make this rigid and mandatory death sentence more flexible to fit the crime and the culpability of the individual accused.

When I say that, I would be leaving quite a wrong impression if I did not indicate that there are some modifying factors to the rigidity of this punishment at the present time. There are four important factors. First of all the crown prosecutor of the provincial attorney general's department can consider the facts which have been laid before him, and has discretion to choose between laying a charge of murder or some lesser offence such as manslaughter or criminal negligence.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I listened with great interest to the point of order which the Minister of Justice raised while the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was speaking. I am wondering if the minister does not agree that he is transgressing his own point of order?

Mr. Knowles: Is this a case of hanging Haman on the gallows he built for Mordecai?

Mr. Garson: I would be the first to admit, Mr. Speaker, the validity of the point which Your Honour has raised. I believe however that in this debate the record has been rather heavily loaded with what from my point of view I must regard as erroneous material. It would be in the interest of all concerned that these points should be corrected. Moreover I claim this additional measure of validity for what I am now saying, that this is the question which is to go before the joint committee, and not some of the things that have been said by opposition members.

Mr. Knowles: The resolution does not say that.

Mr. Garson: Yes, it does. If the hon. member will read it he will see that it says the committee is to consider the law relating to these subject matters and to say in what way that law shall be changed.

It is quite true that the judgment of the crown prosecutor in that respect is not necessarily final because the magistrate can commit for murder, even although the offence charged was a lesser offence. In practice, however, the crown prosecutor's judgment usually prevails.

Then the jury not only has the opportunity of exercising its judgment with regard to whether the offence has been committed beyond a reasonable doubt. If it has any doubt at all it can acquit completely. But if the jury have convicted, perhaps reluctantly, they have the power which the hon. member for Regina City left out in his remarks, and a very important power, of making a recommendation for mercy. This is a recommendation which carries a great deal of weight indeed, especially if concurred in by the trial judge. It goes to the Minister of Justice, who takes careful note of it in his recommendation to the governor general in council, as to whether or not capital punishment will be actually inflicted, or commuted to life imprisonment. Then the accused has the right to appeal the conviction registered against him. This appeal can be taken to the provincial appeal court; and if unsuccessful there, if there is one dissenting judge the accused can take a further appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada.

In the great majority of cases—in more than 75 per cent of cases in the last five years—that right of appeal has been exercised. If in all these appeal proceedings the conviction is quashed because of legal irregularity or because there has been a miscarriage of justice, the effect, so far as the accused is concerned, is that he does not undergo capital punishment. While it is true that the appeal judges do not reach their judgments upon the basis of mercy, or anything of that sort—they base their views purely upon legal questions—these judgments if favourable do have the same effect upon the accused as if mercy had been extended to him.

But if the conviction is sustained against the accused, then whether he has any friend and no matter how black his record may be, no matter whether he has a lawyer acting for him, he is not permitted to suffer the supreme penalty of death until his case has come before the whole cabinet and has been considered by it in a regular cabinet meeting, at which it is item No. 1 on the agenda.

When I say that his case is considered I mean that, first, there is before the cabinet a stenographic transcript prepared by the court reporter of the whole trial proceedings, including all the evidence and the judge's charge, as well as trials within the trial. Second, there is also placed before the cabinet the official record of the case, and the judgments of the judges of the court of appeal or of the Supreme Court of Canada, in those cases in which such appeals have been launched. Then, third, there is a complete report by the trial judge of the course of the trial, with his and the jury's recommendation, if any, for mercy, which he is required to submit within 15 days. Fourth, there is also a report from the police, and fifth a report from the warden of the gaol in which the accused has been detained pending execution. Then, whether any applications for commutation have been made or not, this entire case comes before the remissions branch of the Department of Justice and is carefully gone through by its officers, whose report is submitted to the minister who, I can assure you, spends a great deal of time in going through it again before placing it before the cabinet.

So the result is that of all who have been committed in the first place, a very large percentage are either acquitted by the jury or succeed in their appeals, or have their death penalties commuted. In the five-year period from 1946 to 1950 there were 267 murder charges laid in Canada. Of this number 138 were acquitted by the jury. Of those who were convicted, in 39 cases the convictions were set aside by courts of appeal or for reasons of insanity. This leaves 90 as being subject to the death penalty. Of this number the death penalty was commuted in 28 cases and execution was carried out in 62 cases. This was out of a total of 267 who had been charged with murder.

So while a stranger reading the Criminal Code might think there was harshness and rigidity in connection with the death penalty, in actual practice there is a great deal of justice and mercy accorded to accused persons. And it is for this reason that the committee which sat at the time of the last parliament, in considering this matter, felt that without having the matter investigated further in some detail by a committee of parliament, representing both the House of Commons and the Senate, they did not wish to take upon their shoulders the responsibility for changing the present law upon this subject.

Now, concerning the other matters—

Mr. Knowles: Before leaving this matter of capital punishment I wonder if the minister would permit a question—and, in passing, I would say that it would have been helpful if we had had his statement earlier this afternoon. However, I am now concerned about the minister's statement that what this committee will be dealing with will be merely possible changes in the criminal law with respect to capital punishment. Does he imply by that statement that arguments for or against capital punishment itself are not also to be considered by the committee?

Mr. Garson: Oh, no. I do not know whether my hon. friend has in front of him the motion I moved earlier. However, if he will look at page 958 of Hansard for December 15 he will see that, in part, my motion is as follows:

> Resolved, that a joint committee of both houses of parliament be appointed to inquire into and report upon the questions whether the criminal law of Canada relating to (a) capital punishment, (b) corporal punishment or (c) lotteries should be amended in any respect and, if so, in what manner and to what extent:

There is no limitation there.

Mr. Knowles: It includes the possible abolition of capital punishment, if the committee is so inclined?

Mr. Garson: Yes, because it is a question of amending the law. It is not a reference such as that which formed the basis for the inquiry in Great Britain.

Mr. Knowles: That is satisfactory. What the minister said a moment ago left some doubt in our minds. What he now says is clear.

Mr. Garson: I think I should record the fact that the government which set up the inquiry in Great Britain was the Attlee government. Mr. Attlee made it very clear in the House of Commons that the commission did not have the power to recommend against capital punishment. But the committee will have that power in this reference. Not only will it have that power, but it will have the power to cover the point mentioned by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Montgomery), namely the method of capital punishment. It is noteworthy in that connection that the British report was to the effect that if capital punishment was to be retained the present method of hanging was the least unsatisfactory of all methods that might be employed, although they did suggest that lethal injections might be considered.

The other matter raised by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton is covered by this wide reference. So I think upon these grounds, no matter what one's views may be either for or against capital punishment, there are very substantial reasons why it is wise to send the matter to the committee.

Mr. Fulton: What is the government's policy on lotteries?

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, January 13, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

VACANCIES

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received communications from several members notifying me that the following vacancies have occurred in the representation, viz.:

Of Joseph-Celestin Nadon, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Gatineau, by decease.

Of Paul-Emile Cote, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Verdun, consequent upon his acceptance of an office of emolument under the crown.

Accordingly I have issued my warrant to the chief electoral officer to make out new writs of election for the said electoral districts.

(Translation):

THE LATE J. C. NADON

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE MEMBER FOR GATINEAU

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, you have just officially acquainted us with the fact that it is now necessary to elect a new member for the electoral district of Gatineau. A few hours after we had separated to spend Christmas and New Year's day with our families, we heard the sad news of the death of our colleague, Joseph Celestin Nadon, member for Gatineau.

This premature and unexpected death, which took place on December 17 last, has not only deeply affected the members of his family and his electors, but, no doubt, every member of this house who had come to know Mr. Nadon and to appreciate him since his election to this house in 1949.

Mr. Nadon was born at Ste. Famille d'Aumond, on January 11, 1899.

At Maniwaki, where he spent the greatest part of his life, and throughout Gatineau county, he took an active part in numerous social organizations where he always distinguished himself by his activity and devotion. He was elected to the Quebec legislative assembly in 1939 and re-elected in 1944. In October 1949 when a by-election was held he was elected to the House of Commons and re-elected at the last general election.

Mr. Nadon was appreciated by the electors of Gatineau county as well as by all those who knew him for his untiring activity, his good judgment and his great devotion to the welfare of his fellow citizens. He was a hard and conscientious worker whose persevering efforts brought him great success in business; in politics he always showed the same activity and the same steadfastness of purpose, never neglecting a request or sparing his efforts to render all possible services.

My first personal contacts with Mr. Nadon go back to the period when he was mayor of Maniwaki and I was practising law in Quebec city. We spent long months together to straighten out property deeds at Maniwaki. It was land that had been part of an Indian reserve and that had been surrendered to the crown. The surrender had naturally been made with the agreement of the federal government and the latter had issued deeds to the occupants. Now, as a result of a decision of the privy council in a case that will be remembered by several members who invoked its authority, it was decided that when land was abandoned by an Indian band, the right of property passed to the crown in the right of the province where the said lands were located. That caused rather deep anxiety among the land owners of Maniwaki. Through untiring efforts that lasted several months, Mr. Nadon succeeded in obtaining the co-operation of the two governments to settle the matter for those land owners and ensure them that the validity of their deeds could never be contested.

That is only one example of Mr. Nadon's efforts on behalf of his fellow citizens.

I am sure that all hon. members of the house join me in paying tribute to a man who faithfully devoted himself to the welfare of all his fellow citizens and in expressing our sincere and deep sympathy to his wife and children.

(Text):

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I know that every member of the house, Mr. Speaker, will join with the remarks of the Prime Minister in extending to Madame Nadon, and the family of the late member for Gatineau, the sympathy of all those with whom he has been associated since he entered this house in 1949. At that time, when he came here, following the appointment of the present Clerk of the House, he established a wide circle of friends, and to all of us it was a great shock to learn of the sudden and tragic death that removed him from the house. As has been pointed out by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), like so many other members he served his own community well and in many capacities before entering the House of Commons. As mayor, chosen by his own people, he had been closely associated with their lives.

In addition to the very deep sympathy we all express to his family, there is also our sympathy to the community with which he has been so long associated.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my colleagues and I join with the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition in expressing to the late Mr. Nadon's family our sympathy in the loss they have sustained. I noted by the press the day after the house rose for the Christmas adjournment that Mr. Nadon had passed away.

It is always a very sad occasion when we have to record the passing of one of our colleagues in the house. Mr. Nadon came here in 1949 after, as the Prime Minister has said, serving his community as mayor and in many other capacities. While here he enjoyed the friendship of many members in the house. On behalf of those associated with me I extend to the Prime Minister, the government and the Liberal party our sympathy in the loss of one of their colleagues, and to the family our deep sympathy in the loss they have sustained.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say on behalf of the group I represent that we are always very sorry when a fellow member in the house passes. We get to know some members better than others, it is true; but, just the same, we do form here splendid fellowships and do not like to see them broken.

In this instance we understand that Mr. Nadon was a good public servant and well loved by his own people. We therefore extend our sympathy now to his family in their sad bereavement, and to the Prime Minister and the members of the Liberal party our sympathy in their loss of a good follower and supporter in the House of Commons.

MACHINERY AND APPARATUS

EXEMPTIONS OF COMMODITIES FROM EXCISE TAX ACT

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the order of the house of December 7, 1953, on the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) concerning exemptions of machinery and apparatus as provided for in schedule III to the Excise Tax Act, I am now submitting a copy of a general résumé which the Minister of National Revenue authorized the deputy minister to issue on October 20, 1945, seven days after the exemption was provided for in the budget speech.

This most comprehensive list, which embraces approximately twelve pages of foolscap, did not of course attempt to cover all industries. However, it did define items on which requests for decisions had been made in the intervening period of seven days, and provided a general policy for officers of the department and those affected to follow.

Having regard to the large number of items of machinery and apparatus used in the manufacturing and producing industries of Canada, the hon. member will appreciate the great diversity of articles on which information has to be supplied. The department does not keep separately in its files correspondence dealing with specific requests for interpretations; and the amount of time necessary to examine all correspondence dealt with since January 1, 1951, in order to abstract that dealing with this particular question, would require placing a considerable part of the staff of my department on this work, added to which would be the stenographic help necessary in order to make copies of these lists concerned.

On the ground of economy it is hoped the hon. member will accept the information I am tabling as essentially a compliance with his request. I now wish to table this report.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the minister whether the summary which he has now tabled in response to an order of the house of December 7 includes anything that might be called a "copy of any general definition of machinery and apparatus made by the Minister of National Revenue in conformity with the requirements of schedule III to the Excise Tax Act"?

Mr. McCann: It does not include what might be called a general definition, because we find that it is impossible to give a general definition of the many tens of thousands of articles of machinery and apparatus. These have been ad hoc decisions.

QUESTIONS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—COAL PURCHASES

Mr. Brooks:

1. What quantity of coal for use by the Canadian National Railways was purchased and shipped per month in 1952 and to date in 1953, to the following points: Chipman, South Devon, Napudogan, Langley and Edmundston in the province of New Brunswick, and Estcourt, Monk and Armagh, in the province of Quebec?

2. How much was purchased per month for the above periods, (a) from New Brunswick sources; (b) from Nova Scotia; (c) from other sources?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I have a statement I should like to make on this question. It will be noted that the question asks for the quantity of coal for use by the Canadian National Railways purchased and shipped per month in 1952 and to date, in 1953, to eight consuming points in New Brunswick and Quebec.

The management of the Canadian National Railways inform me that only at considerable clerical expense and at great inconvenience to themselves could the information requested be produced. Should this work be undertaken, the management feel that they would be faced with requests for similar information in respect of every other coal-consuming point in the system. The railways point out that this compilation would place a heavy burden upon the staff, and that it could not be done without extra expense being incurred. I hope the hon. member will appreciate the information that the railways have passed on to me, and that under the circumstances he will see fit to drop the question.

Mr. Brooks: The railways have passed on no information to the member, and I would like to have that information. I would be very pleased to discuss the matter further with the minister, but I do not feel like having the question dropped at the present time.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not in a position to answer the question. I can only reiterate the statement I have made, which has been passed on to me, namely, that the answering of the question would entail considerable expense and inconvenience and the collection of a great deal of information.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Speaker, the argument that this information may be asked by many points across Canada does not hold water. It is asked for a particular reason in New Brunswick and Quebec, and I believe only those points are concerned. The people there are anxious to have the information and I, too, wish to have the question answered.

Mr. Chevrier: I am afraid I cannot give any other answer.

Mr. Speaker: Question number two, answered.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Stands?

Mr. Chevrier: The question cannot stand as it is. I am not able to give any further information than I have given. The house well knows that the practice of the Canadian National Railways, one that has been accepted in the house for years, is that if information of this nature is required it may be asked at a sitting of the committee on railways and shipping. That has been the practice for years. The hon. member is a member of that committee, and he can seek from the president of the Canadian National Railways, or from other officers who are there, information other than that which I may not be able to give. But if the question remains on the order paper I shall not be able to answer it, any more than I am at the present time.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Brooks: I must object to having it answered in that way.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has put a question on the order paper. The minister could have answered either verbally, as he did, or in writing. He did answer it verbally, and if he says that is the only way that he can answer it now, the question cannot stand. It must be declared as having been answered. That is the position that one must take.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I submit that this is a case for you to decide as to whether the procedure of the house is being complied with. A question has been asked. There is no suggestion that it is an improper question. The minister has stated that it cannot be answered, and then almost immediately afterwards has stated that it can be answered at another time. If it can be answered at another time, then it can be answered now, unless there is some reason, which has not been presented, why it should not now be answered.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, the reason why it cannot be answered now is quite apparent. The Canadian National Railways is not a department of government. Hon. members are entitled to ask the government for the information it has at its disposal. I do not know whether the house can make an order that would be effective on the Canadian National Railways that they supply that information at this time. There has never been any attempt to reach a definite rule about that; but the practice has been that when hon. members want that kind of information, which is not a part of the government records, they ask for it when the officials of the railway company appear before the committee.

If it is felt that any company which is recognized as a crown corporation should be compelled to answer any question about its affairs that is raised in the house, perhaps that could be dealt with by the committee which has been set up to assist Your Honour in drafting rules; but the present rule is that the questions that are put have to be answered from the information that is in the possession of the government, and we have not got that.

Now, should there be an order that the records of the railway be kept in another fashion or tabulated in another fashion, that is something that can be considered; but in view of the statement that has been made that we have not got the information, the minister who reports to parliament in connection with transport has set out everything that appears on the records of the government.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, since I raised the point as to the way in which this question has been put forward, and that there has been no suggestion that it was an improper question, I should like to follow up what the Prime Minister has said by pointing out that this is not something that affects procedure or accounting or anything of that kind which reasonably might wait until the representatives of the railway are before the committee. This asks for specific information which undoubtedly from the records of the company could be given at the request of the government, which after all is in a position to obtain that information. And I would point out that it is in the nature of information that would be useful to us now for the purpose of such discussion as might follow in the house in relation to this subject. I would suggest that this stand, if only for the purpose of giving consideration to the desirability of drawing some distinction between questions of this nature, which ask for information easily obtainable, and questions in regard to details which will be embraced in subsequent accounts which perhaps might be difficult to obtain separately from those which would be put forward at the time the officials are present in the committee.

Mr. St. Laurent: I think we all realize that the railway officials are anxious to maintain good relations with the members of parliament. They come before parliament every year with their financial budget. They have given that explanation. They will know the manner in which their explanation has been received in the house. Perhaps if Your Honour has no objection to allowing the question to stand it might stand. They will know how their attitude has been received in the house, and we know that they are anxious to maintain good relations with parliament as well as with the public.

Mr. Brooks: I should like to ask the minister a supplementary question. Is it not true that the fuel board has all this information, and that that board is under a department of government?

Mr. Chevrier: Well—

Mr. Speaker: Before the minister answers this question may I say that I think the procedure which is now being followed is most irregular. We are dealing with written questions. There are further supplementary questions which may be asked later, but that will be done when the orders of the day are called. I should like to remind hon. members of citation 307 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, which reads as follows:

> A minister may decline to answer a question without stating the reason for his refusal, and insistence on an answer is out of order, no debate being allowed.

If the minister wishes to have the question regarded as having been answered, although the answer may not be satisfactory to some hon. members, I will have to declare the question answered. If he wishes to have it stand, I will say "stand".

Mr. Chevrier: I feel I must maintain the original position which I took, namely that the question is answered.

Mr. Speaker: Answered.

Mr. Goode:

1. Has the government any knowledge of an order to submit texts of speeches, before delivery, to the police, during the 1953 general election?
2. If so, what were the circumstances?

He said: There has been an exchange of correspondence between the minister and me, and I am fully advised of the position. I thank the minister for his co-operation, and I ask that this question be dropped.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CHILDREN OF WAR DEAD EDUCATION—APPLICANTS

Mr. Balcom:

How many applicants, since July 1, 1953, have been approved for assistance under the new education assistance act for children of deceased veterans; (a) male; (b) female; (c) from each province; (d) from each of the services, and civilians; (e) analysis by occupational goal of students?

Mr. Bennett: Return tabled.

WORLD AFFAIRS STUDIES

Mr. Hansell:

1. Does the government sponsor courses of studies, or lectures in universities, schools, or any other institutions, on world affairs, United Nations Organization or world government?
2. Has any appropriation ever been made to the Banff school of fine arts or any of its activities?

Mr. Pickersgill: Return tabled.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

GAGETOWN TRAINING AREA—HOUSING SCHEME

Mr. Brooks:

For a copy of all correspondence, communications and agreements between any department of the federal government and the city of Fredericton concerning any housing scheme in connection with the Gagetown military training area.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have made inquiries of all the departments which might have information to comply with this motion, and there is none. I would hope therefore that the hon. gentleman would allow the motion to be dropped. If he prefers to have it passed I am quite prepared to have it pass, and I will make a return saying that there is nothing.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Speaker, a return has already been made saying that there is nothing.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

GOVERNMENT COMMUNICATIONS, B.C.—SALE

Mr. Fulton:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and memoranda exchanged between the government, the department or Minister of Transport, or any other official or agent of the government on the one hand, and (a) the British Columbia Telephone Company; (b) the Canadian National Telegraph Company, on the other hand, regarding the sale to the telephone company and the telegraph company respectively of the government telegraph and telephone system in British Columbia and the Yukon.

Mr. Chevrier: I had understood from the hon. gentleman that if he were to receive certain information in answer to questions that he put on the order paper earlier he would be disposed to withdraw this notice of motion. On December 23 I sent the hon. member a letter which I hoped would answer his questions or at least those that we were in a position to answer in the department at that time. I am just wondering if he has had an opportunity to consider that letter.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps I should express regret to the minister for not having discussed this matter with him earlier today, but I did not have an opportunity to do so. I do recall that there was something along the lines of what he has stated to the house, but I was a little surprised to receive answers to my questions in the form of a letter instead of having them answered so that the record might be available either in Votes and Proceedings or in Hansard. It is that point which I should like to consider before following up this matter any further. Therefore, by leave of the house, I wonder if at this stage I might ask that the motion stand.

Mr. Chevrier: That is quite satisfactory.

Mr. Speaker: Motion stands.

FLOOD DAMAGES, MANITOBA—ASSISTANCE TO FARMERS

Mr. Zaplitny:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, memoranda and other communications exchanged between the Department of Agriculture and/or any branch thereof and Mr. W. J. Ward, of Dauphin, Manitoba, from July 1, 1953 to date, referring to prairie farm assistance and/or emergency assistance to farmers who have suffered flood damages in Manitoba.

The Ministry

THE MINISTRY

ANNOUNCEMENT OF APPOINTMENT OF HON. W. ROSS MACDONALD AS SOLICITOR GENERAL

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): We are now passing to what in reality, on a private members' day, constitutes the orders of the day, so I wonder if I might have the unanimous consent of the house to make a short statement about an administrative change in the government.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. St. Laurent: Since my colleague, Hon. Ralph Campney, was appointed associate defence minister he has found that the discharge of his duties as such has left him very little time to assist the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) as Solicitor General. He has asked to be relieved of the responsibilities of the office of Solicitor General. His resignation has been accepted and His Excellency the Governor General has approved the recommendation that Hon. W. Ross Macdonald be appointed Solicitor General and assume the duties of that office in addition to his present duties as member of the government without portfolio and as leader of the government in the Senate. I should like to lay on the table of the house a copy of the appropriate order in council to that effect which was passed yesterday.

BRIDGES

VICTORIA AND JACQUES CARTIER—PROPOSED ABOLITION OF TOLLS

Mr. Hector Dupuis (St. Mary) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of entering into negotiations with the government of the province of Quebec for the purpose of reaching a mutual agreement for the abolition of tolls on the Jacques Cartier and Victoria bridges.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time the subject matter of this motion has been brought before the house. As early as 1946, my hon. friend, the member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Pinard) placed on the order paper a motion along the same lines. He renewed his attempt several times but in spite of all his efforts and his well known talent no progress has been made. I myself have repeatedly asked that we grant the requests of the citizens of the province of Quebec and especially those of the city of Montreal and of the municipalities and towns of the south shore of the St. Lawrence who, for many years, have been calling for the abolition of tolls on the Jacques Cartier and Victoria bridges.

The motion I submit is somewhat different from those which were placed on the order paper in the past. It merely asks the government to consider the advisability of entering into negotiations with the government of the province of Quebec for the purpose of reaching an agreement for the abolition of tolls on these two bridges, and in particular on the Jacques Cartier bridge, the province of Quebec being party to a contract signed by the national harbours board, the province of Quebec and the city of Montreal.

Such an agreement would not establish a precedent since, a few years ago—in 1928, if I am not mistaken—the province of Quebec was authorized, through a separate agreement, to use the Quebec bridge and build on it a vehicular road. At any event, before 1948 the province of Quebec had abolished all bridge tolls. Well, the new contract provided that the province was authorized to build a second vehicular road but that no tolls would be collected. After negotiations between the two governments the Quebec bridge ceased to be a toll bridge.

One might say that it would be difficult to negotiate with the Quebec government when the latter refuses to honour its obligations in connection with the Jacques Cartier bridge.

We know that by virtue of a tripartite contract between the national harbours board, the government of the province of Quebec and the city of Montreal the two latter are supposed to pay part of the deficit resulting from the operating costs of the bridge, interest on the debentures issued at the time the bridge was built, as well as other expenses.

That share was not to exceed the sum of $150,000 per year for each of the two parties. They have acquitted themselves of their obligations until around 1944 when they stopped paying the amounts due. Legal proceedings were brought against the city of Montreal, to recover the money owing, by the national harbours board which won the case. Judgment was passed against the city and it has paid since an amount approximating one million dollars, representing the arrears owing. Will the national harbours board have to proceed in the same way against the province of Quebec for the same purpose? I do not know.

I should like to express the hope, however, that a friendly settlement may be effected out of court. I should think the provincial government would seek to meet its obligations like every other government. To my mind it would be possible to arrive at some generally acceptable understanding through a meeting between the federal and provincial authorities, at which the city of Montreal would be represented. It should be possible to achieve once more the result obtained in the case of the Quebec bridge, as long as every interested party is willing to show the understanding necessary to the solution of this matter, at least in the case of the Jacques Cartier bridge.

Now, as far as Victoria bridge is concerned, I am of the opinion that the federal government alone can do away with the toll charges, since the province of Quebec and the city of Montreal are under no contractual obligation in this regard.

As far as the settlement of this matter is concerned, that is with regard to the abolition of toll charges on the Jacques Cartier bridge, it must be remembered that the city of Montreal alone has paid nearly $3 million to cover the deficit incurred and that the province of Quebec will have disbursed as much once it has paid the million or so dollars still owing according to the terms of the contract I have mentioned.

I would not like to be harsh in my remarks, but I believe it is time to put a stop to this unfair treatment which is being inflicted upon the people of Montreal and of neighbouring municipalities. I do not know of any other place in Canada where people are required to pay toll charges for the use of federal bridges or of those of the Canadian National or again of those of the national harbours board.

As I have already pointed out during previous debates on this matter, the development which has taken place, in the course of the last ten years, along the south shore of the St. Lawrence, has been tremendous. It is sufficient to recall, to mention one place in particular, that the town of Jacques Cartier, which is 5 or 6 miles from Montreal and which, in 1940, had a population of only 700 to 800 has now a population of nearly 35,000. The majority of them are workers who have left Montreal and who have built themselves small houses in this locality.

They work for the most part in Montreal, so that they have to cross over one of the two bridges, which means heavy expenses for them, as they cross over at least twice a day. Those who own cars—perhaps I should say jalopies—give rides to other workers who also have to pay the toll charged the passengers in all vehicles, with the sole exception of those who use a public bus.

I can also add that Longueuil, Montreal South, St. Lambert and other municipalities on the south shore of the St. Lawrence have seen a tremendous increase in population during those years.

One can easily see the burden which these thousands of taxpayers have to carry. They are charged a sort of indirect tax while everywhere else people can cross any bridge without having to pay a cent.

And what about the thousands of Montrealers who use that bridge many times a day? They also have grounds for complaining about such an anomaly which puts upon them charges of which residents of the other communities of the province of Quebec and of all other provinces are exempt.

I know the cost of building the Jacques Cartier bridge was very high, reaching the amount of $18 million, and that there is still a considerable amount outstanding. Yet conditions were the same with regard to the Quebec bridge, on which the toll was abolished.

In 1928, the province of Quebec was authorized by the Canadian National Railways to build a vehicular road on the bridge, on certain conditions. It was also allowed to charge a toll for automobiles and passengers. This toll was put into effect and abolished a few years later, as it was on all other bridges belonging to the province of Quebec. In 1948, the latter was authorized to build another vehicular road; this time the permit stipulated that no toll should be charged. At the time of both agreements, the province of Quebec was to assume the maintenance of both vehicular roads, and establish a sinking fund with regard to these two roads. Although the bridge was the property of the Canadian National Railways, an agreement was signed between the Canadian government—not the Canadian National—and the government of the province of Quebec. As I was saying, it was a matter of paying interest on the amount spent for building this road and of setting up a sinking fund which, if I remember rightly, was not to exceed $400,000.

Should the government accept my point of view and meet with the provincial authorities in order to work out an agreement on the matter of tolls on the Jacques Cartier and Victoria bridges, I believe the contract signed in relation to the Quebec bridge could be used as a basis for discussion. An estimate could perhaps be made of the cost of the vehicular road on the bridge to find out the amount of capital invested for that purpose. It would then be easy to agree on an amount, a reasonable rate of interest and to set up a sinking fund which would eventually reimburse the national harbours board for part of the amount expended for the construction of this bridge.

As far as the Jacques Cartier bridge is concerned, I am sure the situation is different from that of the Victoria bridge. Indeed, I am wondering if the Jacques Cartier bridge would ever have been built if the province had not been willing to assume certain responsibilities together with the city of Montreal. The contract must be respected but consideration must be given to the situation in which the users find themselves.

I deem it advisable to make a thorough study of that contract, and to negotiate a new agreement which would satisfy all the parties interested and more particularly the citizens of the province of Quebec and of Montreal. I am wondering whether the citizens of Montreal should really have to do more than anybody else in the province of Quebec toward meeting the deficit. I repeat that this was admissible in 1930 when it was a matter of building the bridge, but now the operating deficit has been reduced, and, taking into consideration the possibility of such an agreement with the province of Quebec, I believe that the city of Montreal should not be forced, in such a case—no more than Longueuil and adjoining municipalities, Outremont for instance, the mayor of which is here with us—some day or other to make good the deficits created through a tax assessment established by the metropolitan district for the whole island of Montreal. I do not wish to raise that question because I would be out of order; I am simply reminding the house that the city of Montreal should not have to pay anything whatsoever for the upkeep of the bridge or for the maintenance of a sinking fund.

Therefore, in my humble opinion, nothing would prevent us from obtaining, following negotiations in which everybody would show sufficient good will, the same results which were brought about when the problem of the Quebec bridge was taken up. In my humble opinion, the present problem would be even easier to solve.

If I am not mistaken, the initial cost of the bridge has long since been repaid. The hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) shakes his head. Even if it has not been entirely repaid, the city of Montreal has been called upon long enough to give financial help to the Canadian National Railways in so far as the use of that bridge is concerned. Let us not forget that a toll is collected from the users of the Victoria bridge, that obsolete structure which, everybody will admit, is no longer adequate for that part of the city, with its heavy traffic.

Every time I think of it, I am amazed to see that the citizens of Montreal, in particular, and the people of part of the province, in general, are forced to contribute to the income of the Canadian National Railways. Can anyone mention another instance where Canadians have to contribute to the income of that railway and to pay for the use of bridges belonging to that company. If there is such a case, I will deem it my duty to ask for the people concerned the same consideration I am now asking for those whose rights are being encroached upon, for the users of the Victoria bridge.

Why should we pay for the use of that bridge when we can use without charge other bridges belonging to the Canadian National?

Two bridges built by the Grand Trunk railroad, one of the companies that preceded the Canadian National, now belong to the Canadian National; they are located at the eastern end of Montreal island and they have been used until recent years for horse-drawn vehicles and automobiles. Yet nobody ever thought of levying toll charges on those bridges. I am referring to the bridge that connects Montreal island to Charlemagne and the one that connects Charlemagne to Repentigny.

We used them for several years—as all those who live in Montreal and the vicinity very well know—before the new bridge was built by the provincial government and nobody ever paid for using the bridges, although they are the property of the Canadian National, just like Victoria bridge. It is useless to go back several years past in order to try and find who decided to levy toll charges on Victoria bridge. Perhaps the reasons put forward at that time justified the levying of such charges. But those reasons cannot hold today when the financial situation regarding the cost of erecting the bridge has greatly improved, even though it may not be entirely paid for, because I am convinced that it is not far from being so.

Mr. Speaker, it is unfair to tax, and I repeat the word tax, indirectly the citizens of Montreal and the vicinity in order to increase the revenues of the Canadian National.

In my opinion, the share paid by the eastern provinces in the cost of building that railroad and to make good the operating deficits of the railroad is at least equal to that of the western provinces. Shall we continue to pay the operating expenses of our railway system by means of a tax in disguise levied in the form of toll charges on this bridge that is far from meeting our traffic needs and is used mainly by the Canadian National and the Montreal and Southern Counties Railway?

I know that the Minister of Transport is well disposed. He clearly stated his position in a speech he made in the house on February 22, 1951, as reported at page 570 of Hansard and of which I quote the following excerpt:

> I do not think there can be any disagreement in principle as to the elimination of tolls. In principle we favour doing away with the toll system. There is no difficulty on that point. But we have to decide who should bear the costs. As regards jurisdiction, moreover, the three parties have already come to an agreement. To my mind, tolls cannot be removed unless there is some agreement on the procedure to be followed. It goes without saying that, for the time being, this agreement concerns only Jacques Cartier bridge. Nor should hon. members forget that the agreement which related to the building of the Montreal bridge, the Jacques Cartier bridge, was signed following the enactment of a statute by the house, the passing of legislation by the provincial legislature and the approval of a minute by the city of Montreal.
> Therefore, I submit that the suppression of the tolls would necessitate the agreement of the three parties concerned.
> We must also consider the practical side of the matter which is no less important than its legal aspect. In 1950, the national harbours board collected, I believe, $1,200,000 in tolls on Jacques Cartier bridge. As for Victoria bridge, I cannot give you any idea of the amount collected since it is buried in the accounts of the Canadian National.
> What I mean is this. It is not easy for the national harbours board or for the Canadian National to give up without further ado revenues exceeding a million dollars.

I agree with the Minister of Transport that the abolition of toll charges on these bridges will bring about considerable loss of revenue for the national harbours board or the Canadian National Railways. He might allow me to add, though, that the situation would be identical with that brought about by the abolition of toll charges on the Quebec bridge.

At that time, the Canadian National Railways had the benefits of the toll charges levied on this bridge; however, the practice has been discontinued.

Once again, I know that the federal government cannot abandon the toll charges without the co-operation of the province.

Before going on any further, I should like to point out that the Quebec bridge has nonetheless remained the property of the Canadian National Railways. So, the national harbours board could very well remain the owner of the Jacques Cartier bridge. The suggestion I made a moment ago should be considered thoroughly.

In view of the capital invested in the construction of the vehicular road over the Jacques Cartier bridge, the federal government is not required to provide everything; besides it is bound by a properly drawn up contract. But, in the meantime, in order to alleviate the lot of the man in the street and settle the matter of toll charges, I think my suggestion should be accepted; it is supported wholeheartedly by all my colleagues who are interested in the matter.

Therefore, I humbly submit that in so far as the Victoria bridge is concerned, I cannot admit that we should have to increase the income of the Canadian National Railways by means of a toll charge, however low it may be, which is not required anywhere else in this country. I do hope that this situation will come to an end as soon as possible.

A few years ago, the Minister of Transport stated that the implementation of the St. Lawrence waterway project would settle the problem of the Victoria bridge. This project would include the construction of a tunnel below the Victoria bridge, which would be used by the Canadian National Railways trains. My colleague, the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Pinard), has already quoted in this house part of an address delivered by the Minister of Transport, in Montreal, a few years ago. Allow me to quote once again what the hon. minister had to say then:

> The plan provides for the construction on the north shore of one or two locks designed to overcome the difference in level and to make navigation possible from Montreal harbour to and above the new industrial area which is to be established. Thus, the level of lake St. Louis would extend as far as below Victoria bridge and would provide a maximum fall for power development. One of these plans considers diverting railway traffic from Victoria bridge to a tunnel. Thus, Victoria bridge could be used exclusively for motor vehicles. This would improve markedly transportation on the south shore.

Of course the carrying out of such a project would solve our problem. But how many years will that require? Therefore I think we should settle at once the toll problem, without waiting for the carrying out of the huge St. Lawrence project. The reasons I have already set forth warrant the earliest possible action by the government in an attempt to settle the matter of the abolition of tolls. I realize that the problem of Jacques Cartier bridge is different from that of Victoria bridge. The former was built after an understanding between the province of Quebec and the city of Montreal, both parties agreeing to assume jointly maintenance costs, interest on debentures, etc., up to $150,000 a year.

I am not familiar with the conditions laid down when Victoria bridge was built, but I doubt very much that the city of Montreal agreed to accept indefinitely the charging of a toll, even after the cost of the bridge had been fully paid for. At any rate, if the administration of the day signed such an agreement, it is time for the government to correct the situation and to grant the repeated requests of the people who want an end to a situation which is indeed detrimental to them.

I do not know the feelings of the provincial government, but I rather believe that an agreement could be entered into on a basis that would be mutually satisfactory and in the interest of the people who have been asking for a long time that the toll be abolished on these two bridges and more particularly on Jacques Cartier bridge as far as the Quebec government is concerned.

I have not been asked to speak on behalf of the Quebec members, but I remain convinced that all right-thinking members of this house would favour an agreement to eliminate the evil of tolls required from those who have to use these two routes.

As some time is sure to elapse before such an agreement is signed, might I suggest a middle course until the matter is finally settled? Since 1950 or so, the revenue from tolls on Jacques Cartier bridge brought a rather large surplus. In 1950, I think that the revenue was $1,250,000, and it is possible that, in 1951, it was quite as high. With regard to 1953, the revenue has perhaps reached a million and a half dollars, if not more. I do not have the exact figures here, but let us suppose that, for 1953, it amounted to $1,200,000.

Well, with regard to Victoria bridge, the receipts have also been more than satisfactory for some years already. It seems to me that means could be found to do something pending the final solution of the problem, and I am still speaking of Victoria bridge in particular because the province of Quebec is not bound to it by contract. If tolls cannot be completely eliminated I wonder whether it would not be possible to at least reduce it on the two bridges and abolish entirely the fee required from the passengers in these vehicles. Both these things should be done or one at least.

We could manage in such a way that the national harbours board, like the Canadian National Railways, would not have a deficit. It should be possible also to bring relief to the taxpayers. It would be an excellent opportunity for the government to show that it gives serious consideration to this problem. It would be a generous not to say a liberal gesture, which is synonymous, to reduce these charges upon that part of the population.

In conclusion I wish to let the government know that all I have said has been said in the best possible spirit. I feel that I am at present faithfully discharging the mandate given me by all my fellow citizens. Not only is it my duty to request abolition of toll charges on the Montreal bridges, but also to insist that at least cogent reasons to justify a possible delay in this connection be given to me and to those colleagues of mine who will no doubt take part in this debate.

Once again I wish to remind the house of the difference between a resolution moved here, in the House of Commons, and a motion put before a municipal council. Here we are moving something that requires the government to consider the advisability of doing such and such. We are not instructing the government to do this or that, but simply to take a certain thing under consideration.

We merely ask the government to consider the advisability of doing something. To ask the government to consider the advisability of enacting a measure does not mean that the government has to recommend the measure which we asked to be considered. For instance, when the members of the city council of Montreal submit a matter to the executive committee, the latter is in no way obliged to report favourably on the proposals. That is the difference between the interpretation given to motions here and that given elsewhere.

It is not a matter of abolishing tolls directly. We simply ask that the government consider the advisability of entering into negotiations with the provincial authorities of Quebec, and request them to see that the tolls on the bridges concerned are removed.

I believe I am speaking on behalf of all the citizens of Montreal, of the greater part of the people of Quebec, and of the chamber of commerce. I also hope that in the very near future the government will find it possible to meet the wishes of all the citizens concerned. Needless to say it would then be entitled to the gratitude of all those people as well as of the member for St. Mary.

Mr. Roch Pinard (Chambly-Rouville): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I wish first of all to reassure the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Dupuis) and those who do me the honour of listening to my speech by stating that I do not intend to unduly prolong this debate or to prevent the hon. members of this house from expressing their opinion on the question before us.

The problem is important and of interest not only to the population of the towns, municipalities and villages situated on the south shore of the St. Lawrence river, in the Montreal area, but also to the people of Montreal and vicinity. I take pleasure in supporting the resolution submitted by the hon. member for St. Mary. I am at ease to do so for I can say, without giving myself undeserved credit, that I have always been highly interested in this problem ever since I came to this house in 1945, when, for the first time, I had the privilege of representing the people of Chambly-Rouville county.

As I was saying a moment ago, the learned member for St. Mary has submitted a resolution similar to the one I had the honour and the privilege of presenting in the course of previous debates. The principle involved is the same and I can safely say, I think, that the representatives from Montreal and the vicinity are unanimous in requesting the prompt intervention, immediately if possible, of the federal government to eliminate what we may well call an anomaly, but which I consider as a real injustice to the people concerned, who have to bear with a toll system which has now been in force for so many years.

I do not intend to take up one after the other the arguments I had the opportunity of expressing in the course of previous sessions when I submitted similar resolutions, because it would take too long and the house would not be able to vote on the motion moved by the hon. member for St. Mary.

I take the liberty of making a few remarks on the toll system now in force in connection with the two bridges concerned, Victoria and Jacques Cartier bridges. My first words will be on the tolls now levied on Victoria bridge.

Victoria bridge is nearly a century old. I believe it was built during the last century, in 1860. At that time it was open to railroad traffic. Contrary to other bridges built in the province of Quebec, Victoria bridge has the merit of lasting long, of being strong and soundly built. As I stated a moment ago, Victoria bridge is nearly a century old and I hope that the centenary will be celebrated in 1960. I hope that the authorities of the national railways system will invite the members concerned, as well as the people who use the bridge and have made it a profitable venture that brings revenue to the Canadian National Railways. Like the hon. member for St. Mary, I hope that those who take part in the celebrations will be able to do so without paying the toll charges.

Victoria bridge, Mr. Speaker, was built with subsidies which were generously provided by the central government to the company which undertook the work, in the course of the last century, and it is the Grand Trunk Railway which benefited from these subsidies. The subsidies were renewed under various forms. I remember having read, while I was studying the question some years ago, that in 1900, some 54 years ago, a member of this house requested from the government authorities the abolition of toll charges on this bridge. At that time a subsidy was granted by the federal government to the Grand Trunk in order to allow it to make certain improvements to Victoria bridge. As a matter of fact, I have here a statement made at the time by a member of the loyal opposition, Mr. Cochrane, who stated in column 9989 of Hansard the following, and I quote his words in English, just as he uttered them:

(Text):

If the Grand Trunk Railway saw fit to reconstruct that bridge it was their own business and not ours. We have paid all this country could afford to pay as a subvention to the Grand Trunk Railway. Now, why, after giving a subvention of $300,000, do you want to give them $200,000 more when you are paying them $40,000 a year for the user of that bridge?

(Translation):

And later the same member added:

(Text):

Why do you not put in a condition that the people should travel over the Victoria bridge free, and then you would get something for the people in return for this subvention?

(Translation):

In other words, Mr. Speaker, as far back as 1900 a member of the opposition asked the government of the day to abolish the toll on Victoria bridge. This should prove to the hon. member for St. Mary, and to other interested members, the importance of putting into practice the maxim of the French writer who said: "Put back your work twenty times on the loom" if you want to get good results. Nevertheless, it is a matter of some surprise, if not of satisfaction, to find that more than 50 years ago there came from quarters just as responsible as ours a request for the rectification of what the member called at the time an injustice.

There is no doubt that Victoria bridge has been an extremely profitable venture first for the Grand Trunk and later on, in 1909 or 1910, when the Canadian National Railways were organized, for that new agency of the federal government. Perhaps that is why the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), during the debate on that same question two years ago, said that the Canadian National Railways were reluctant to give up such a revenue.

I quite understand their hesitancy, but I refuse to believe that it is the responsibility of the people of the municipalities and towns on the south shore of the St. Lawrence and of the city of Montreal to carry alone the occasional deficits of the Canadian National Railways. Such a state of affairs is unjustified, and I do not think that the minister could deny this statement; there is no doubt, in my mind, that Victoria bridge has been entirely paid for by those who used it. At any rate, as far as those who used it are concerned, the system of tolls should disappear, especially since the public enterprise that brought it into being is entirely paid for. The authorities of the Canadian National Railways are, therefore, in no way justified in allowing this state of affairs to remain, and the tolls on Victoria bridge should be abolished forthwith.

May I add that while this bridge has as I just said the merit of being strong, it is not very practical as the vehicular roadway is very narrow, and even dangerous. The tolls are surely not related to services rendered.

Consequently I feel that it is imperative for the Canadian National authorities to immediately abolish the tolls on this bridge.

I shall only add a few words concerning Jacques Cartier bridge. As the Minister of Transport gave us to understand, and justly so, when he discussed the problem raised by the Jacques Cartier bridge, it cannot be considered in the same way. This bridge has been built following an agreement involving three administrative authorities: the federal government, the government of the province of Quebec and the city of Montreal. It seems quite difficult to decide who should take the initiative.

I have been told that the situation was somewhat similar with regard to the Quebec bridge and that the government of Quebec had taken the first steps and contacted the authorities of the Canadian National Railways in order to bring about the abolition of the tolls on this bridge.

May I point out, with regard to the Jacques Cartier bridge, that at the present it has surpluses rather than deficits.

The annual report of the national harbours board for 1952 shows that the operating surplus of the Jacques Cartier bridge amounted to $123,635 in 1951 and to $300,156 in 1952.

I am emphasizing those figures because when I put forward a similar motion in 1951, that year was likely the first in which the operation of the Jacques Cartier bridge did not end in a deficit.

As there is now a surplus, and since the municipal authorities of Montreal have accepted the decision of the courts and have paid the arrears they owed according to that judgment, a matter of nearly a million dollars, it seems to me that the national harbours board authorities should themselves open negotiations with the provincial government in order to do away with such an injustice and abolish the toll on Jacques Cartier bridge. If the provincial government has been negligent that is no reason for the federal government to wait and adopt a policy of laissez-faire, because the provincial government does not wish to intervene.

I strongly urge the Minister of Transport, who has shown that he is very well disposed since the beginning of these debates on this same question, to make representations to the body concerned and, if necessary, directly to the provincial government in order that negotiations may be started without delay with a view to doing away with toll charges on Jacques Cartier bridge also.

Besides, I am convinced that the minister shares my views. He has already stated quite emphatically that he favours the elimination of toll charges. It is evidently the means of arriving at this result that makes the situation complicated and difficult. I am confident that with his kind co-operation, well before the time comes to commemorate the centenary of Victoria bridge, toll charges will have been eliminated on those two bridges and the present unfair situation will have been done away with.

Again I congratulate the hon. member for St. Mary on his initiative in agreeing to submit such a resolution. By putting it on the order paper he perpetuates a practice that seems to have become a tradition in the house, a tradition that tends to bring about, at regular intervals, debates on a matter that should no longer be debated and that should have been settled a long time ago.

(Text):

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate on this resolution this afternoon I will deal particularly with the Jacques Cartier bridge. There is reason for that. The Victoria bridge is the property of the Canadian National Railways, and we have already seen this afternoon that the Canadian National Railways are a little organization largely independent and to themselves, and are rather reticent about supplying information through the minister. Therefore it would seem not quite fitting to discuss something which comes under their jurisdiction, because apparently there is nothing that we can do about it.

The whole question of these bridges is an important one in Montreal, because Montreal is an island, and these are the lifelines upon which all of our blood travels. Our great metropolitan area on the island itself is connected with another large area on the south shore, and an area extending many miles beyond that, all of which commutes daily back and forth over these bridges to Montreal. The bridges are one of the major links between Canada and the United States. Perhaps there is at least one advantage in the present tolls on these bridges. It means the people entering Canada, our visitors from the United States, are given a foretaste almost immediately they come within seeing distance of Montreal of what Canadians encounter each day of their lives, because they are asked to pay a tax, an unnecessary tax. Perhaps it is right, although I do not think that we should meet our visitors at the door of our city with a tax in which the federal government is deeply implicated.

The Victoria bridge itself is one of the great antiques still standing. That is about the only tribute that I can pay to it. On the other hand, the Jacques Cartier bridge is a magnificent piece of bridge architecture. It was built just prior to 1930. If they go back and read the Hansard debates of that time, those who are seeking information will have great difficulty in finding it, because the bridge was then called the South Shore bridge. It took me some hours without the help of any adequate research service to find any reference to the subject in Hansard, but you will find there was much discussion at that time about the cost of the bridge. As I remember it from Hansard, the figure of some $10 million was bandied about. When the bridge was constructed it cost some $18,500,000. But there again, that is one of the things which we must expect in this life, I am afraid.

The bridge was built under an agreement among three governments. The fact that three governments have to do with this bridge should be emphasized because the resolution before us suggests only that our federal government enter into negotiations with the provincial government. Deeply implicated in this subject are not only the federal and provincial governments but also the municipal government of Montreal. Under the original agreement both the provincial and the municipal governments contracted to underwrite for a period of forty years deficits arising from the operation of the bridge up to an amount not exceeding $150,000 a year. These agreements and these payments of the governments have had a rather checkered history. For some years the city of Montreal refused to pay a large part of their undertaking, their objection being based on what they felt was the high cost of constructing the bridge. They were sued and they lost. The city of Montreal is paid up at the present time.

The province of Quebec enjoyed a somewhat more favoured position because it was only very recently that the federal government moved to collect from the province the payments that were owing. I understand that the case has now been initiated.

Over the period since the Jacques Cartier bridge was constructed the city of Montreal has paid between $2 million and $3 million towards deficits on that bridge. This has been a charge against all the taxpayers of the city, and not only against those people who use the bridge on the one hand, nor on the other hand against all the residents of the province, as happens with our other bridges which are owned by the province, and on which there is no toll.

At the present time the Jacques Cartier bridge is being used beyond its capacity. Additional capacity could be constructed on the bridge, roadways for streetcar lines, and that sort of thing, but nothing seems to be done about it. That is one thing which might be brought to the attention of the government in the hope that the capacity of the bridge could be expanded. The upkeep of the bridge could be improved considerably. Finally, it might be mentioned that most toll operations of this kind have a rather interesting arrangement so that, as a vehicle goes through, it is counted off automatically, and at the end of the day there is a reckoning of some sort between the man who collects the money and the automatic machine which has counted the number of vehicles going through. There is nothing of this sort on the Jacques Cartier bridge. Doubtless it could lead to abuses with respect to the current collection of tolls.

The revenues from the Jacques Cartier bridge run in the neighbourhood of $1,225,000 a year. Thus, if these tolls are removed we shall have to find $1,225,000 a year somewhere to make up that revenue. That is a very great sum. I also have the privilege of sitting on the city council of Montreal. I feel quite sure that the city would not be particularly interested in acquiring or taking over any share of that amount of money.

On the other hand I most certainly and beyond any doubt favour the abolition of tolls on this particular bridge. I favour the abolition of the tolls on both bridges but I am referring particularly to the Jacques Cartier bridge for reasons previously outlined. I favour the abolition of tolls on this bridge because most bridges in the provinces are free. The existence of tolls on one or two bridges used by great numbers of people is most unfair to those people. I have given the example of the United States tourist coming into Canada and being greeted almost at the gateway to Canada by a tax collector with his hand out. The tolls charged on these bridges do give a bad impression to people entering Canada from the United States or those who are entering Montreal for the first time.

Another point is that these tolls place an unfair burden upon certain groups of people who have paid already for bridges and roads and other things through gasoline and automobile taxes paid to the province. I was talking recently with a gentleman in Montreal who has a large enterprise on the south shore of the river which entails considerable travel back and forth. He told me that in the course of a year his firm paid $20,000 in tolls on the Jacques Cartier bridge. It will be seen what a heavy burden is placed upon a small group of people or a small section of the community.

It must be remembered also that the federal government, or the harbours board which is its agent in this connection, owns no other bridge anywhere in Canada, at least as far as I can find out. I am glad to know that the government is almost out of the bridge business, but I would be happier if it were out of it completely. I cannot see any justification for the operation of bridges by the federal government. In this case the federal government is underwriting the deficits and the expenses of operating the bridge, which I understand to date have amounted to almost $7 million.

I have a suggestion to make, but before doing so I should like to cite one further figure. I understand that the bridge finally cost the government $18,500,000, and that up to the present it has been depreciated by some $3,500,000. This leaves the bridge with a book value, shall I say, of $15 million. The government carries it at $19 million because they have funded all the deficit, but that is just one of the peculiarities of government finance, where they consider that the longer they hold a thing the more valuable it becomes.

I am just wondering whether the government could not get out of the bridge business by selling the Jacques Cartier bridge—I make this suggestion in all seriousness—to the province of Quebec. After all, bridges and roads are the business of a province, not of the federal government. Despite the figures I have quoted I shall not venture to suggest a price, but judging from other government sales of war surplus material and that sort of thing perhaps ten cents on the dollar or even less would be adequate. I have seen a great deal of other material go through at absurdly low prices. Seeing the government in the bridge business like this makes me come to the conclusion that this is just another example of the "Howe" mentality of the government, how much can we get our hands on and how much can we control.

In closing I suggest that instead of merely abolishing the tolls on this bridge, which certainly should be done, and staying in the bridge business and thus saddling the taxpayers of Canada with an expenditure of $1,250,000 a year, the government should consider the advisability of selling this bridge or transferring it to the provincial government. In line with what the provincial government have done in connection with other bridges which they control they would probably move immediately to remove the tolls from this bridge. As I say, that is what has been done in the case of all other bridges under their control.

Mr. Maurice Boisvert (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, even though I do not entirely subscribe to all the views expressed by the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Dupuis), I nevertheless wish to express my concurrence with regard to the advisability of entering into negotiations with the Quebec government with a view to concluding a mutual agreement providing for the abolition of toll charges on Jacques Cartier and Victoria bridges.

I represent a constituency situated on the southeast shore of the St. Lawrence. My constituents earn their living through agriculture. It is therefore on behalf of the farmers of my constituency and of those of every other constituency whose livelihood depends on the sale of their farm products in Montreal that I wish to take part in this debate. On their behalf, then, I ask the government and the minister who is most kindly disposed, in principle, in this regard, to leave no stone unturned, in order to bring about the abolition of these toll charges which weigh heavily upon the agricultural population of the district lying to the southeast of Montreal.

I know that a large number of representations were made to me, at various times, either by agricultural societies, farmers associations of my constituency, or federations of agriculture representing several counties, urging me to work towards the abolition of these toll charges.

On the other hand I am well aware of the fact that the people of this country should, in one way or another, pay for the public works they benefit from.

If ever an understanding can be arrived at in this connection with the province of Quebec, I would like some consideration to be given to the farmers of the province and, more particularly, to those whose living depends on Montreal. The problem is most involved and difficult. There are a great many difficulties standing in the way but I am convinced that the Minister of Transport will find a way out and that, some day, we shall see these toll charges abolished.

We will, of course, be told in some quarters that in the United States toll charges are coming back into favour, that if we go over there we have to pay fairly large amounts of money to cover long distances on super highways. But we should not compare our economy and population to that of the United States. And should the final settlement of this matter make it necessary for us to retain these tolls, we might maintain them in the case of tourists. If we go to the United States, we have to pay what is asked. They, in turn, should have to pay us what is required for the maintenance of these bridges.

Those are the few remarks I wished to make. I have spoken with the greatest confidence in the minister and in the government; I believe that this problem can and will be solved to the satisfaction of the agricultural population of my constituency.

Mr. Marcel Boivin (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on the resolution introduced by the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Dupuis).

He referred to various municipalities of the south shore and mentioned a tripartite agreement which used to be in force between the harbours board and the federal and provincial governments. My colleague referred in particular to the beautiful city of Montreal.

He also pointed out that the municipalities of Longueuil and St. Lambert had expanded. May I add that there is a great industrial centre in the constituency which I represent in this house, namely the city of Granby, which has doubled its population during the last ten years.

Mr. Speaker, the matter of toll charges has been brought up. I should like to use a phrase which is perhaps less polished: I would say that we, from the south shore, have an additional tax to pay, a tax which the people of the north shore do not have to pay. The farmers of the south shore, the merchant who comes to Montreal, the manufacturer, the transport companies must pay a tax which increases their operational costs.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say that that notorious toll is not favourable to the development of the south shore. The citizens of Montreal and of the north shore, out of stubbornness and because they refuse to pay the toll, do not cross over to the south shore when they go for a drive.

The member for Notre Dame de Grace (Mr. Hamilton) said a moment ago that bridges and roads should not be under the jurisdiction of the federal government. May I be permitted to congratulate the federal government for the initiative it took years ago of building that bridge with the aim of furthering the expansion of the south shore. May I remind the house, without further ado, that there is in the province of Quebec a certain man who likes to claim that anything proposed or done by Ottawa is wrong. That is why I wish to state that I share the opinion of my colleague, the member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Pinard), who said that the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) had shown good faith in his efforts to solve the problem.

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that this debate, this afternoon, will prove not only to the province of Quebec but to the entire country that the federal government favours the removal of tolls.

(Text):

Mr. Auguste Vincent (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a great pleasure for me to address the house on a question which has been the cause of debate for many years, and I am glad that in this maiden speech I am afforded an opportunity to ask on behalf of my own constituents, and on behalf of the two million people who inhabit the constituencies in the Montreal region, that once and for all free trade be established between Montreal and the south shore. In the international field we call for free trade among countries. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think free trade at home is one of the main objects at which we should aim. In the economic interests of all concerned I would urge that the tolls on the Victoria and Jacques Cartier bridges be abolished as soon as possible.

There is a difficult legal question involved here because the three parties concerned enacted legislation to enable the bridges to be constructed. Therefore these three parties must act on the question before the tolls on the bridges can be abolished. In this connection I would like to give a slogan to the powers that be, and that slogan is "Down with the tolls in 1954". I think that with all the good will shown on Christmas cards during the holiday season just ended all those concerned in abolishing tolls should get together and realize once and for all that they are not dealing with a personal question but with a public question, and in this regard they should act accordingly.

Taxes imposed by the city of Montreal, by the province of Quebec and by the federal government of Canada on the two million people living in the region of Montreal are all paid by the same people, and I would ask the powers that be when and if they discuss the possibility of abolishing the tolls on the bridge to consider this fact and remember that while they are quibbling over this question the people on the south shore are paying tolls.

I think I should tell the house why I am interested in this toll situation. I am interested geographically and also as a matter of principle. Geographically my constituency lies on the south shore of the St. Lawrence river and is separated from the city of Montreal by a toll curtain, and I would describe the people of my constituency as the south shore pioneers for whom the bridge has "tolled". I would again urge the powers that be to give serious consideration to the abolition of tolls in 1954, and I trust that this year the tolls will be taken off.

This toll situation is a question of national interest, because whenever a member from western Canada comes into the House of Commons and asks for a grant it is the labour and the earnings of the people in the region of Montreal, Toronto, and other large centres in Canada that pay for this grant. Confederation means co-operation among all the provinces of Canada, and consequently I would urge this confederation to institute free trade between the island of Montreal and the south shore. It is about time we had it, and I would ask all the parties concerned to live up to their obligations. I know the province of Quebec has not lived up to its obligation.

It is not for me to say to what extent the powers that be have defaulted in carrying out their obligations, but I can say that since 1946, when this question was first introduced in the house, no solution has been found. That is a long time. I am a practising lawyer in Montreal, and if a client comes to me and says, "I have a problem for you", I just cannot tell him that I can do nothing for him because there is a problem. Governments, whether provincial, federal, or municipal, are paid through the medium of taxes on the people to resolve the problems of the people.

This is a vital problem. As a representative of the people I ask the executive of the government of Canada to bring before the other powers that be the question of the bridge situation and, with good will, to find a solution for the problem. I say there is no reason why the people on the south shore should pay more for their meat. There is no reason why a man on the south shore should pay 50 or 60 cents more just because he has to cross the bridge. Furthermore I say that property values would rise enormously if this problem were solved. I may be criticized for this statement, but I know that the chamber of commerce of Montreal, and also the junior chamber of commerce of the province of Quebec, have prepared a statement to that effect and there are figures to prove it. Consequently, in closing, I would ask the good will and co-operation of all. In ending his speeches Cato used to say delenda est Carthago. In ending my speech I will say, down with tolls in 1954.

(Translation):

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, the motion which is now before the house is certainly important. It concerns the welfare of several million people, either citizens of Montreal or of its suburbs, or the ever-increasing population of the south shore. A tripartite agreement, in regard to the Jacques Cartier bridge, has been concluded between the harbours board, the Quebec government and the city of Montreal. As for the Victoria bridge, it obviously does not any longer fill the purpose for which it was built. Moreover, I should add that it is exceedingly dangerous.

There is one point I should like to raise here and it is the fact that thousands of car owners today do not hesitate to go out of their way in order to cross the Jacques Cartier bridge. So that this district is not served by two bridges, but at the most by one and a half.

Mr. Speaker, this situation has become intolerable and it would be a good thing to emphasize the following two points: The government of the province of Quebec has failed to meet its obligations in not paying the part it had pledged to pay.

Moreover, the city of Montreal did not deem it advisable, as far as I know, to enter into negotiations in order to bring about the removal of tolls on Jacques Cartier bridge. The federal government has been criticized in certain quarters as regards the tolls on these bridges. The people concerned should know that the Quebec government has failed to meet its obligations and that this failure to meet the obligations laid down in the contract now gives rise to an uneasiness which makes it more difficult to settle this problem.

It seems to me that the city of Montreal, directly responsible for the well-being of the population served by these two bridges, should have entered into negotiations with this government before now. It did not deem it advisable to do so.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that we have to take into account the needs and the wishes of the citizens of Montreal and of the south shore. The time has come, it seems, to settle this matter. I have no solution to offer, but I think that any step that would make it possible to abolish tolls on these two bridges should be taken.

I wanted to take part in this debate in order to put before this house the feelings of the electors of Maisonneuve-Rosemont, who feel that the time has come to study the means of abolishing tolls on these two bridges. I congratulate the hon. member who has introduced this motion, which I think is absolutely necessary and timely having regard to the present-day needs of the population of Montreal and of the south shore.

(Text):

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): I should like to join with hon. members who are now asking again that the government consider abolishing the tolls on the Victoria and Jacques Cartier bridges. I do not need to repeat any of the arguments that have been made or to refer to any of the problems or inconveniences—or even the mental anguish—that are experienced by a large population in and around Montreal every time they want to get in or out of the city. Hon. members who have spoken on the subject this afternoon and those who in past years have brought to the attention of the government the different problems and difficulties which exist in connection with tolls have done so in such a way that it is now impossible for the government to be unaware of the situation that exists.

I am sure I cannot add any new facts that can assist the government in dealing with this matter promptly. Nor do I believe there is any serious opposition in this house concerning the proposition that has been made by the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Dupuis). I am also optimistic enough to believe that the government has no objection to the abolition of the tolls on both these bridges. As a matter of fact I recall that early last spring the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) made a statement in which he said the government was contemplating a meeting with the provincial government and the city of Montreal in connection with the structural changes that will have to be made on the Jacques Cartier bridge as a result of the St. Lawrence seaway project, and that during this discussion consideration would be given to the question of abolishing the tolls on the Jacques Cartier bridge.

There is one thing I should like to urge on the government—this is one of the reasons I took this opportunity to speak—and it is this. If they foresee any delay in this meeting with the province, in connection with facilitating the St. Lawrence seaway project, I believe it is the duty of the government to convoke that meeting with the province and the city of Montreal for the sole purpose of clearing away the difficulty with regard to abolishing the tolls on both bridges.

A great many people seem to think that the agreement in connection with the Jacques Cartier bridge is a three-way agreement with the provincial government, the municipal government and the federal government. But there is a fourth party to this agreement. That fourth party is the people who have been paying for the bridge for years and years, and who I believe have done their share in maintaining the bridge. I believe they also should have recognition at this time.

In my opinion the government should consider this problem on its merits. Of course, if the government foresees the meeting with the province in the near future, then the matter can be dealt with. But if there is to be any delay in meeting with the province of Quebec and the city of Montreal to discuss this problem, I believe the government should convoke a special meeting in order to settle any problem that may exist with regard to the province of Quebec or the city of Montreal, and in order to do some serious work on this particular question.

Mr. T. P. Healy (St. Ann): I should like to say a word, Mr. Speaker, since I am a Montreal member representing a district which the Victoria bridge enters. I should be glad to see this fine one hundred year old structure finally free from taxes, and I support the resolution moved by the hon. member.

Mr. J. G. Ratelle (Lafontaine): Mr. Speaker, in my capacity as member for the north shore constituency closest to that of St. Mary, which is represented in this house by the mover of this motion, I would feel remiss in my duty were I not to take part in this debate.

Now, before I go on to anything else, I should like to point out that in directing certain remarks to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) a while ago, some of us seemed to have neglected to find out if Victoria bridge was entirely paid for, if moreover there was an agreement between the province of Quebec, the city of Montreal and the harbours board (i.e. the government) or if certain sums were still owing to the federal government. There is some misunderstanding on that score, but I do believe that assuming good will on the part of the federal government, who have not failed to show it up to now, there should be some way of forcing the provincial government to live up to its obligations and to come to an agreement if possible with the city of Montreal. This would greatly improve traffic conditions between the two shores. As a matter of fact there are some days when it is impossible to transport goods to and from Montreal, a situation which causes great inconvenience to those who live on the south shore.

Moreover, at rush hours it takes over an hour to go from Montreal to the south shore. At the present time certain important undertakings are being carried out in our district and so as not to delay their completion we have asked certain members to help us to obtain the abolition of these tolls on Jacques Cartier and Victoria bridges. This would, I believe, be doing a real service to the people not only of Montreal and the south shore, but also to those tourists who come to see us. They would be all the more interested in seeing our city if they did not have to wait so long before entering it.

For all these reasons I support entirely the proposal made by my colleague and seconded by the member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Pinard). Both of them made an eloquent plea in favour of the abolition of toll charges on these bridges, which is very important, for we all know that it is in the interest of the population to be able, in due course, to cross over to the south shore, and from there back to the north shore, without having to pay any toll charge.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate, particularly after hearing the excellent speeches delivered this afternoon. I think the house should be grateful to the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Dupuis) for having placed on the order paper this resolution, which, by the way, is not new, as the house has had the opportunity to consider it on various occasions before. I therefore thank the hon. member for his remarks, as well as all the other members from constituencies surrounding the city of Montreal, for their splendid contribution to this debate.

This afternoon, I would have liked to add something new to all that has been said with regard to this discussion on the abolition of tolls on the Jacques Cartier and Victoria bridges, which cross the St. Lawrence, and link the south and north shores at Montreal. I am sorry to say, however, that my remarks this afternoon will in part be a repetition of what I have already said. There will be something new, to a small extent, but nothing substantial because, since the matter was last discussed in this house, nothing has happened following negotiations that might have taken place between the parties concerned.

However, I think that, as an answer to those who argue that there should be no distinction made between the two bridges, I must say that, if these bridges are to be considered together with regard to tolls, it will, as I see it, be very difficult to abolish the tolls on Victoria bridge without removing them on the Jacques Cartier bridge. And, if we were to abolish them on one, without settling the whole matter immediately, I think it would give rise to a great many difficulties. At any rate, the hon. members are quite as conversant with the situation as I am myself, and those who contributed to this debate have shown it.

First of all, they have drawn a distinction between the tripartite agreement between the municipality of Montreal, the province of Quebec and the national harbours board, on the one hand, and the position with regard to Victoria bridge on the other hand. This tripartite agreement, we should remember, has been approved by the house.

As a matter of fact it has also been approved by all the governments concerned, namely the city of Montreal, the province of Quebec and the federal government, which has passed an act to that effect. That is why I doubt seriously that the tolls could be abolished without a similar enactment by the present government. Besides, it was decided, at that time, that an act was needed to give approval for the construction of a bridge. Consequently I feel that we cannot eliminate tolls without another agreement being signed which would have to be approved by the house.

Then what are the facts at the present time? Here they are: two of the parties involved, the city of Montreal and the province of Quebec, have refused, one of them for a certain period at least, to fulfil the obligations assumed under this agreement. As a matter of fact, during five years the city of Montreal had not honoured its undertaking to pay one-third of the deficits, one-third of the amount necessary for the maintenance of the bridge. So the government or at least the national harbours board had to take legal action. Those proceedings have been concluded after a period of litigation of over two years. They have been settled in favour of the national harbours board and the city of Montreal has now honoured its obligations through the payment of nearly one million dollars, made up of about $750,000 in arrears plus the interest.

The same does not apply to the province of Quebec. I would like now to reply to the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace (Mr. Hamilton) who claimed that some preference had been given to the province of Quebec since no proceedings had been taken against it. Such is not the case, I must say. According to the opinion given by the Department of Justice it has been decided to start proceedings against the city of Montreal first, and to consider the other matter after the litigation between the national harbours board and the city of Montreal had been settled. That dispute with the city of Montreal has been settled only very recently and there was no need therefore to consider the position of the province of Quebec until a few months ago. I wrote to the provincial minister concerned. I reminded him of what had happened and asked him what attitude he would take under the circumstances. I do not remember exactly what he replied but at any rate the province of Quebec has not paid the third of the cost of maintenance as it was supposed to do according to the tripartite agreement which has been mentioned during this debate. We are now considering the course, the proceedings which we should take.

Now, as far as the principle of elimination of tolls is concerned, there can be no difficulty, no disagreement, because we all favour, I am sure, the elimination of tolls. Everyone, including all members who have taken part in these debates, has said that it is unfair towards a certain part of the people, and more particularly towards the people of Montreal to levy tolls in that way. But what has not been said and what should be said is that if we decide to abolish those tolls, at whose expense shall we do so? Should we do away with those tolls at the sole expense of the federal government, that is at the expense of the national harbours board, or should we eliminate them following an agreement? I believe that everyone agrees that if tolls have to go, they should be eliminated only after agreement between the various parties concerned.

As I stated a while ago, it is parliament that authorized the division of operating costs of that bridge and, in my opinion, it is also parliament that should decide the manner in which those tolls are to be abolished.

I should add that an official of the city of Montreal, who very much desired to settle this matter, has, I believe, consulted certain of the members who have spoken this afternoon and then has discussed this matter with me. Unfortunately we came to no agreement. In any event this was not the object of these discussions. The object of this visit was to begin preliminary talks with a view to determining whether it would be worth while to prepare an agreement which would lead to the abolition of these tolls. I must say that this conversation was quite pleasant, quite interesting and, also, quite friendly. I believe it would be possible, by continuing these discussions, to arrive some day at a satisfactory solution to this problem.

Now, as far as the Victoria bridge is concerned, this afternoon we saw what happened during the discussion of certain matters. The house will recall what I said in reply to a question raised by a member, in regard to the Canadian National, as well as the attitude taken by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). Unfortunately or fortunately the organization known as the Canadian National is not a division of the Department of Transport. It is a crown agency, a crown corporation whose function it is to administer the affairs of the Canadian National and to do so in the interest of all its shareholders who are the Canadian people in general. Now, the directors of the Canadian National are in favour of abolishing toll charges on Victoria bridge, but under certain conditions. These conditions I have already mentioned in this house and I mention them again, referring to what I said on page 570 of Hansard of February 22, 1951:

> As regards Victoria bridge, I have already informed the house that, on the condition mentioned in Hansard, the Canadian National Railways were ready to consider the removal of tolls now levied. The Canadian National has already indicated its approval of legislation that would do away with tolls for non-commercial passenger vehicles and for passengers. The removal of tolls is based on the contingency of a satisfactory agreement with the province. This agreement would compensate the Canadian National for monetary losses sustained and would also protect its interests.

The Victoria bridge situation is comparable to that of Jacques Cartier bridge, for if the Canadian National loses one million or several millions in revenue derived from these tolls, it must be compensated. And if we were able to tell the Canadian National, "Tomorrow, you will abolish tolls on Victoria bridge", they would say, "Very well, we will do it, you can order us to do so, but in the name of the shareholders of Canada, we ask that you pay us the amount we have been collecting until now". It is a very large amount. And the house, which has to approve each year the amount necessary to run the Canadian National, would then have to vote that additional money which would come from the revenues of the country and would be paid by all the shareholders. That is why I repeat what I said at the beginning, that it is very difficult to make a distinction between the policy for the removal of tolls on one bridge, on the one hand, and the policy for the removal of tolls on the other bridge, on the other hand. I believe that our policy should be the same in each case and that the matter should be settled at the same time for both bridges.

(Text):

Here, Mr. Speaker, I should like to pause for a moment to deal with one or two matters that were raised by the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace (Mr. Hamilton). The hon. member is, as he has himself said, a member of the city council of the city of Montreal, and he indicated this afternoon a knowledge of this question that I was pleased to see. It was evident from his remarks that he had given the subject some thought. But there were one or two matters dealt with here that I am afraid do not accord with the facts.

For instance, it was suggested that the federal government get out of the bridge business. Well, no one would be happier than myself to see the federal government, or its agency the national harbours board, get out of the bridge business. But had it not been for the national harbours board or its predecessor, the Montreal harbour commissioners, there would be no Jacques Cartier bridge in the city of Montreal. It was thanks to the fact that the predecessor of the national harbours board agreed to provide the funds that a bridge was constructed. Therefore it seems to me that the citizens of Montreal should be—and I am sure they are—grateful for the action taken by the federal government at that time in connection with the construction of this bridge.

So there will be no doubt about the figures, I should like to place on Hansard the position in so far as the Jacques Cartier bridge is concerned. After all, the suggestion has been made by an hon. member that we should sell the bridge to the province of Quebec. That is not a new suggestion. It was suggested as far back as ten years ago, and I am sure that is what is in the mind of the negotiators who will deal with the province and the municipality, namely the sale of the bridge either to the province or to the city. But there are two criteria by which we must be guided, first, what did the bridge cost the taxpayers of Canada in the first place? According to the figures that have been prepared for me by the national harbours board, the debt to the government in respect to the original capital cost is $16,976,000. The debt due to the government in respect of deficits is $6,489,000, and the debt to the government on account of the accrued interest on the deficit debt is $5,019,000, making a total of $28,485,000, roughly speaking.

Following the argument made by an hon. member, whose constituency I have forgotten, that physical assets of this nature have increased in value over the years, there is no doubt that the physical asset known as the Jacques Cartier bridge has increased tremendously in value. In fact it has increased to the extent that the national harbours board feels that today, after allowing for depreciation and taking right of way, at original cost, the present value of the bridge is $37 million.

Mr. Macdonnell: That is replacement value?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. The position as I understand it is quite clear. The debt to the government is $28 million, and either we sell it for that figure or we give it away at a nominal cost. If there are to be negotiations between this government and other parties, these are the two lamp posts between which negotiations must take place. In other words, I do not think anybody in this house will suggest for a moment that we deed the bridge to the province or to the municipality for a nominal sum, and I would not suggest for a moment to the house that if we are to settle this question we insist upon a payment of $28,485,000, because if I did I do not think we would ever settle this question as between these two posts. I think between them there is a possibility for discussion.

Some hon. members have said earlier—and their contention was correct—that in the case of the Quebec bridge an amicable solution was arrived at. That bridge is owned by the federal government. It is entrusted to the Canadian National Railways for operation, and the province of Quebec and the Canadian National Railways came to an understanding without the slightest difficulty. I hold the terms of that understanding in my hand but I do not want to put them on Hansard because they have already been made public; the house is familiar with them. But here was an instance where there was a desire on the part of the two parties concerned to come to an understanding on a very complex and difficult problem, because there it was a question of the abandonment of one rail line and the substitution of an asphalt coating over the line, together with the establishment of a lighting system, a signal system, over the bridge and the change of abutments, which was a complicated matter. It took some time; but the powers that be at Quebec and the president of the Canadian National Railways had no difficulty in arriving at an agreement, and I am confident that—

Mr. Macdonnell: Can the minister give us a brief outline of the nature of the agreement?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. In return for the Canadian National Railways giving up its second track over the Quebec bridge the province agreed to bear the total cost of relocating the railway track and also the first and subsequent costs of maintaining and operating a C.T.C. signaling installation system; that is the system known as centralized traffic control on the Canadian National Railways at the end of the bridge on either side of the St. Lawrence river.

Then again, the province agrees to bear all the expense of constructing and of subsequently maintaining the roadway on the bridge and approaches thereto. The province agrees to provide at its own expense any lighting necessary for the roadway. The cost of all structural steel or other material which will have to be added to the bridge on account of the construction of the highway shall be borne by the province. There are a number of other provisions under which the province undertakes and agrees to save harmless the minister in his capacity as representative of the owners of the bridge from any damage or the like that may be caused because of the construction or the maintenance of the asphalt coating.

These are the reasons why I commend the hon. members from the Montreal area who have pointed out that since it was possible to arrive at an agreement there, surely it is possible to arrive at an agreement in this instance.

Coming back to the resolution, it reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of entering into negotiations with the government of the province of Quebec for the purpose of reaching a mutual agreement for the abolition of tolls on the Jacques Cartier and Victoria bridges.

The hon. member has somewhat modified the terms of his resolution, and rightly so, I am sure. It is not quite similar to the other resolutions that have been previously discussed in this house; if we read it carefully, we see that the government is requested to consider the advisability of entering into negotiations with the province. This has already been done. The Minister of Transport has himself made a statement, which was approved by the government, to the effect that he would be prepared to welcome any suggestion from the municipality or the province of Quebec, with a view to reaching an understanding. One of the parties interested has already benefited from this statement. As I was saying a while ago, one of the representatives of the city of Montreal has already opened preliminary negotiations with the minister. It was a bit more difficult I am sure in the case of the other party, because in my opinion it owed a large sum of money to the federal government in connection with the operation of Jacques Cartier bridge.

What the hon. member requests, in fact, is the opportunity to open negotiations. As I have said, the government has already examined this problem and has made a subsequent statement. I respectfully and humbly submit to the hon. member that the resolution need not go any further. Since the request has already been made, since moreover one of the parties has already submitted its representations, then it seems to me that it might be possible to accept further statements from this third party when it will have fulfilled its obligation toward the national harbours board.

As I indicated at the beginning, it seems to me that I must take roughly the same attitude as we have always taken regarding this question, namely that it would be impossible for us, on our own initiative, to abolish the toll without being unfair to the other Canadian taxpayers and without submitting such a decision to the house.

I would have liked to add that another matter is involved. Now that the traffic has considerably increased on the two bridges, it becomes necessary to spend considerable amounts of money not only on the Victoria bridge but also on the Jacques Cartier bridge. As a matter of fact, there is some talk about a new right of way for vehicles the cost of which would be at least one million dollars and there is also some talk about a ramp on St. Helen island which would cost $200,000 or $250,000; that would make for this bridge a total expenditure of $1,250,000. The addition of another vehicular road on Victoria bridge would cost a great deal of money.

Therefore, one should not advocate the immediate removal of the toll without giving particular consideration to all the facts I mentioned here this afternoon.

It seems to me that the aim the hon. member had in sight when he introduced his resolution this afternoon has been achieved. If he believes it to be for the common good, he might come to the conclusion that it would be advisable to withdraw his resolution.

(Text):

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, one of the advantages and privileges of being a member of parliament is that through years of experience in the House of Commons one learns a great deal about his own country, particularly those parts of it far away from home. I have been interested across the years in the debate which has taken place on a number of occasions with respect to tolls on the Victoria bridge and the Jacques Cartier bridge in the greater Montreal area.

I note that a number of those who have taken part in the debate today are hon. members who took part on previous occasions. The hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Dupuis) moved the motion today, and he had the support of the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Pinard). I believe the last time this matter was before the house the tables were reversed; it was the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville who moved the motion, and on that occasion he had the support of the hon. member for St. Mary.

He also had the support of the then hon. member for Matapedia-Matane, Mr. A. Phileas Cote, who did not come back to the house after the last election, and also the support of another Mr. Cote, namely the hon. member whose resignation from this house was announced today, Mr. Paul Cote, who I understand has been appointed to the superior court of the province of Quebec. Perhaps it would not be too far out of order for me in just a passing moment to offer my congratulations to our former colleague upon his elevation to the bench.

Other members who have been here from time to time from the greater Montreal area and have taken part in debates on this question have made it very clear that this is a most important issue to the people of Montreal. After listening to as much of the debate today as I could understand and from my reading of debates on former occasions I feel that the request by those members that steps be taken leading to the abolition of these tolls should be met. I regret that I do not understand the French language as well as I wish I did, but I think I understand it well enough to realize that in his closing words the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) was making the usual suggestion to the sponsor of the motion that perhaps it might now be withdrawn.

I hope that course will not be followed on this occasion as it happens all too often in connection with motions moved by hon. members on the government side. In respect to this motion I would suggest to the hon. member for St. Mary that he not withdraw it. As a matter of fact I am not sure that those of us who feel the motion should be supported should give the unanimous consent required for the withdrawal of a motion of this kind. I think it should be voted on; I think it should be passed by this house.

I know the Minister of Transport will say, as he has said on former occasions, that this is a matter that calls for negotiation among the three bodies concerned, namely the national harbours board which is an emanation of the federal government, the provincial government and the municipal government of the city of Montreal. Nevertheless I suggest it would strengthen the hand of the federal government or the national harbours board in connection with this matter if today a motion of this kind could be passed by this house. It seems to me that the position of those who argue for the abolition of these tolls is weakened when motions are placed before the house and then withdrawn simply on the basis of the assurance that the minister will do his best to see that something is done about the matter.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, this matter was last debated—I do not think it has come up in the meantime, but if so I stand subject to correction on that point—on February 22, 1951, and on that occasion it was the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Pinard) who asked that the house give consent for the motion to be withdrawn. I would remind hon. members that we did not feel in that sort of mood that day and we did not give consent, and so the motion was lost, the government expressing its opposition to it. But on that occasion, when the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville was asking that consent be given to the withdrawal of this motion, he indicated certain conditions. He said this, as will be found at page 571 of Hansard dated February 22, 1951:

> In withdrawing my resolution I wish to say that if nothing has been done by that time, I shall propose the same resolution next year.

Well, next year was 1952, two years ago, and it would seem that nothing has yet been done. The people of Montreal are still being required to pay tolls at these two bridges; therefore I suggest to the hon. member for St. Mary and the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville, and to others interested in this matter, that surely they should have learned their lesson. Surely permitting this motion to be defeated or having it withdrawn is not serving the purpose they have been assured it would serve. Indeed, tolls are still being exacted from the people of Montreal and I would suggest to them as a matter of tactics, if I may put it that way, that if they want to strengthen their case they should round up all the support they can in the party to which most of them seem to belong and try to get this motion passed.

For my part, I think it should be passed. I do not deny that the party to which I belong has not as large a membership or is as strong in the city of Montreal as I think it should be, but I can say that our people in the city of Montreal have been in touch with us about this very motion respecting these tolls on these bridges and have urged us in the name of the little people of Montreal to support this motion for the abolition of these tolls.

So I take this stand and support this motion and urge that it be passed, not just from my own reading of debates that have taken place and from the attention I have paid to the debate that has taken place today, but because of representations made to us by the people in Montreal who share our point of view and who feel it is unfair that these tolls should continue to be paid.

So, Mr. Speaker, I urge most strongly that the house pass this motion. I am not going to have a chance to record my vote for it if the hon. member for St. Mary responds to the request of the Minister of Transport and agrees to withdraw it. But if we do not give consent to its withdrawal it will go to a vote; and if it does so, I hope this time it will be passed. The last time we refused consent for withdrawal the motion was defeated at the will or desire of the government, but I still fail to see why the government should regard it as embarrassing to have a motion of this kind passed. What does it say? It reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of entering into negotiations with the government of the province of Quebec for the purpose of reaching a mutual agreement for the abolition of tolls on the Jacques Cartier and Victoria bridges.

Now, what is there in that motion that could be embarrassing to the government? I suggest that it would strengthen the government in any attempt to negotiate with the province of Quebec or the city of Montreal on this point. It would let these jurisdictions know that members of this house representing all parts of Canada agreed with the members from the city of Montreal that the time for these tolls to be abolished certainly had come.

I listened today, Mr. Speaker, to the figures the Minister of Transport placed on the record, and I have read the remarks he has made in the past, particularly with respect to the loss of revenue that would result so far as the national harbours board is concerned if tolls were abolished on the Jacques Cartier bridge. I have also noted that he has referred to the loss of revenue the Canadian National Railways would suffer if tolls were abolished on the Victoria bridge. I understand he is not in a position to indicate what that amount would be because that type of revenue is buried in the general revenues of the Canadian National Railways. But any public project, be it a highway, canal, ordinary road, aid to navigation or aid to aviation, any project of that kind costs money and we enter into these things because we feel they are necessary public services; they are necessary to the progress and development of the country, and they are necessary for the well-being and the welfare of the people of Canada as a whole.

Now, there are some of these things for which something corresponding to a toll might be said to be in existence. I mentioned, for example, aids to aviation. There are landing fees that pay part of their cost, but they do not pay the whole cost. We spend a great deal of public money providing aids to aviation; we spend a great deal of public money providing aids to navigation, and we also spend a great deal of money on highways. We are spending federal money, in co-operation with the provinces, on a trans-Canada highway, but it is not proposed that there be tolls on the trans-Canada highway in order to get that money back. We regard the country as that much better off because we have these aids to aviation and these aids to navigation, and because we have or will have some day a trans-Canada highway.

I submit that in the same vein conditions are better in the Montreal area because we have these bridges, and we should not be told that the moneys that have been spent in producing them are moneys that have to be recovered. They are expenditures and investments in improving the living conditions and means of transportation in the Montreal area, and I think we get our value for them as a nation in the very fact that we have these aids to transportation, if I may call them that.

Therefore I think, bearing in mind the large number of people, and indeed the very large percentage of the population of Canada residing in the Montreal area, it is not at all unfair for us to urge that the necessary steps should be taken to abolish tolls so far as that area is concerned.

A good deal has been said in the course of this debate and in the course of other debates about the part played in these things by the other two jurisdictions. I understand that the city of Montreal is regarded as having reneged a bit on its part of the agreement, and of course when you get negotiation between the federal government and the government of the province of Quebec there is always a little game of each blaming the other. But in the meantime the ordinary citizens of Montreal are being called upon to pay these annoying tolls, these amounts which seem to be in the nature of nuisance taxes. Tolls on bridges and tolls on roads were part of the ordinary course of things a century or two ago, but we have moved on; we have made progress, and we recognize that the day of that sort of thing has gone. I think it is unfair to the citizens of that great metropolitan area of Montreal that these tolls should be continued.

If I were one of the members from Montreal, with the keen interest they have in this question, I certainly would not be satisfied just to be given the same explanations, the same figures and the same assurances that have been given from time to time back over the years. When the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville introduced this matter in 1951, he said it had first been introduced in 1946. That is eight years ago. Indeed, in 1951 the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville made the statement that this motion had been on the order paper every session from 1946 on. It has not reached the debate stage in every one of those sessions, but every time it has come up we have had the same approach to it as that which was made today on both sides. We have had the members from the city of Montreal bringing out some of the same arguments they have made today, namely that the citizens of Montreal are entitled to free passage over these bridges.

The members who speak on it are conversant with the arrangements among the three jurisdictions. They are conversant with all the figures. They lay their case before the minister. The minister stands up and expresses sympathy with them. He understands their position. He says that nobody would like more than he or the federal government to get out of this business of collecting tolls, but in the end all he can give is the assurance that they will continue to press for the kind of negotiations which he hopes may some day solve the problem. He sets up as lamp posts the question of giving the bridge away for nothing or trying to get out of it the $28 million that has been put into it. Having set up these lamp posts he asks the members who brought this matter before the house to accept his assurance that efforts will be continued to bring about the kind of negotiations that may result in something.

How many times do the members from Montreal have to go through this kind of experience before they realize that they are not getting anywhere by this method of simply discussing it in the house and then withdrawing the motion? I suggest that to have the motion voted on in a formal division, and defeated if necessary—but having on the record who the members are in this house who support this proposition—would do more good than will be done by having it withdrawn. What would do them even more good, of course, would be to have the motion passed. I hope some of us will be able to persuade the Minister of Transport and the government that there is nothing that will embarrass the government by having this motion passed.

I wish to indicate my wholehearted support of the plea that has been made by the members who have spoken on this matter today. I hope they will continue to press for it. If the matter reaches a conclusion before the day ends, I hope they will let us have a vote on it so we may see where the house stands. I certainly will give the motion my support. I am prepared to vote for it. I think the votes that would be recorded in this house for the motion would strengthen the hands of those who, in my view, take the correct position that no longer should there be these tolls on the Victoria bridge and the Jacques Cartier bridge in Montreal.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, when this matter was first brought up in the house this afternoon I was under the impression that it was the first occasion on which I had heard of the Victoria and Jacques Cartier bridges. After some investigation, however, I discovered that my first sight of the Victoria bridge, on which apparently the unfortunate inhabitants of that area pay tolls, was no less than 46 years ago when, as quite a young boy, I first entered Canada. One of the first sights I saw in the Dominion of Canada was the famous Quebec bridge. Not long afterward that particular bridge collapsed. It was rebuilt, and to my astonishment today I discovered that they are still charging tolls upon that bridge.

In view of that fact it would seem to me that the hon. member for St. Mary would have to take with a grain of salt the minister's assurance of the utmost consideration for his plea, if it has taken them 46 years to consider the matter of abolishing tolls with respect to the Victoria bridge—and I presume the government have been considering abolishing tolls at intervals during those 46 years—and they still have not abolished them. It would seem to me that the hon. member for St. Mary had better view the minister's assurance with a considerable amount of misgiving.

I do not think there can be any doubt that the Victoria bridge has been paid for several times over. I do not imagine that even the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) would suggest that there is very much owing on the Victoria bridge. I noticed that on a previous occasion in this house the minister made the statement that the tolls from that bridge in 1950 amounted to $1,200,000. It was also stated at that time that the new arrangements with regard to the financing of the Jacques Cartier bridge had resulted in a reduction of the carrying charges, which had been somewhere in the neighbourhood of $1 million a year, to somewhere in the neighbourhood of $500,000 a year.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that even since 1950 the government has been receiving $1,200,000—and presumably for some years prior to that date—that it has already accumulated quite a healthy surplus with regard to the carrying charges of the Jacques Cartier bridge. Even if we were to consider the carrying charges for the next 15 years—I believe the period of this new financial arrangement was until 1969, some 15 years from now—the sum of $7,500,000 would be the total amount the government of Canada would be out of pocket if we did not take into consideration the surplus amounts they have been collecting over a long period of years; that is, surplus over the carrying charges on that particular bridge.

I have been rather amazed to find that, leading into the largest city in Canada, we have two bridges upon which we still preserve the antediluvian arrangement of tolls. In the city of Vancouver we were in a similar position until quite recently, and there was a continual outcry. It may be that British Columbians cry more shrilly to their provincial government than the Quebec members cry to the federal government; or it may be, of course, that provincial governments have more acute hearing than have federal cabinet ministers. But certainly the tolls on the Pattullo bridge were abolished as a result of public outcry at the fact that the city of Vancouver was virtually isolated from anybody who did not have the toll in his pocket; it was not possible to get to the city of Vancouver from the rest of the province unless you came from the best part of the province, namely from Vancouver island, in which case you paid your toll to the C.P.R. The toll on the Pattullo bridge was abolished at the same time as the toll which had been imposed on the Alexander bridge at Spuzzum in the Fraser canyon, and in that case I may say there was not even a suggestion on the part of the government that there was any basis for preserving the toll on the Alexander bridge. The cost of this bridge had been refunded out of tolls time and again. Finally the tolls were abolished, and we now have easy access to the city of Vancouver.

Like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I certainly hope the hon. member for St. Mary will not withdraw this motion. I would suggest this to him that in August of this year practically every Liberal member in Canada told his audiences at political rallies that one of the major reasons they should vote Liberal was that the Liberals could get things done. Certainly they were going to win the election, and Liberal members had the ear of the government. I am going to suggest to the hon. member that he will have to prove to his constituents that his pipe line to the minister's ear is as adequate as I fancy he suggested to his constituents it was during the election campaign.

Mr. Low: A thirty-inch.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Is it a thirty-inch line? We shall know, after this debate is over and the motion comes to a vote or has been withdrawn, just what we are to believe. We shall know what weight we are to give the minister's assurance that careful consideration will be given to this plea to which he has listened, I would have thought ad nauseam. I would have thought the minister would have been anxious to abolish these tolls, if for no other reason than to avoid having to listen, session after session, to the plea of the Montreal people to have their area brought into the twentieth century and out of the era of darkness.

Mr. Chevrier: Let me tell my friend that his speech is very much ad nauseam.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Is that so? Apparently I am doing a good job, because I would have thought the minister would not be anxious to continue giving these assurances in the house year after year. I would have thought that would have given him nausea without any help from me. I would close by urging the hon. member for St. Mary to insist on the matter going to a vote at this time.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): As I listened to the debate that has taken place this afternoon, my interest in toll bridges mounted. I had not felt the pangs of toll bridge consciousness very much until after I had listened to several of the interesting speeches that were given here this afternoon, principally by members representing Quebec constituencies. Now I am somewhat consumed with interest in the principle of this whole matter of toll bridges. I will not be able to speak too much in detail about the two bridges that are mentioned in the motion, but I take it, Mr. Speaker, that members of the house can discuss the principle of toll bridges along with the two particular ones that are mentioned.

Bridges

In the first place, I am interested in toll bridges because I think they are a nuisance, no matter how much we owe on them or for what purpose they have been erected. I think the only justification for a toll bridge in any country is that the bridge is owned by a private concern which put up the capital and must recover it. We have one or two bridges of that kind in Canada. I know of one in British Columbia which crosses the entrance to the inlet. I suppose people making use of that bridge to cross into North Vancouver do not object to paying tolls because they realize they are paying a private concern which actually financed the bridge and have to recover the money. For the people of Canada to have to pay tolls on any bridge that is built by a government or any combination of governments, as in this case, it seems to me is an antiquated idea that should be abolished at the earliest possible moment.

It is for this reason that I am particularly interested in this whole subject of toll bridges. I am glad to be able to state at this time that I do not think there is a single toll bridge in Alberta, thank heaven. I would be one of the first to try to get the tolls abolished if there happened to be such a bridge, but we have not thought of bridges in that fashion. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said, it would be just as antiquated to begin charging tolls on the trans-Canada highway because public moneys have been used in its construction. I hope there is no inclination on the part of the government to try to attach tolls to that trans-Canada highway. They will have a fight on their hands if there is. Certainly there would be just as much reason to charge tolls on the trans-Canada highway as there is to charge tolls on the two bridges in question.

Another reason I am keenly interested in this matter of toll bridges, and particularly these two, the Jacques Cartier bridge and the Victoria bridge, is that so many tourists coming to Canada have to enter by way of these bridges, or at least they enter the city of Montreal by way of these bridges. I can imagine how these tourists must feel toward Canada as a whole when they are confronted with the necessity of paying tolls before passing over the bridge. I know how I have felt when I have travelled by car through the United States and have had to pay tolls on a great number of bridges in that country. I have in mind some of the bridges in the middle western states over which one has to pass to get out west. I have felt quite angry about it, because I could never see the justification for a government imposing tolls year after year on the people who have to use the bridges.

We want to create a favourable impression on our tourists. If we are going to create a favourable impression and try to get them to come back, it seems to me one of the things we ought to be doing is opening our gates a little wider, and making it a little easier for them to enter. Let us not get them fiery mad just the minute they get to the gates of our country. Let us get them in and get them to come back to spend their dollars. They would be glad to spend many times over the sum they would pay in the form of tolls, but they get angry at having to pay a simple toll of 50 cents.

Even more important than that, important as the tourist traffic is, is the fact that the people of Montreal and environs must pass over these bridges every day and sometimes two or three times a day to get to and from their work. Having to pay tolls, even at a reduced rate—I understand that is sometimes made possible for the citizens of the community—it seems to me is imposing on these people a burden that they should not have to carry. It is argued, of course, by officials in government that the people in an area like Montreal who are using the bridge most should be the ones to pay for it. If we are to use that as the principle guiding the construction and use of many national assets, I am afraid there will not be too many of them built.

In western Canada we have some irrigation projects that have been built with the costs shared by this government, the provincial governments and the local governments. They have all shared in the expense of construction. Are we going to turn around and get that money back out of the people who operate irrigation districts by charging tolls? We do not do that. Those contributions by this government are made in the hope that they will create a national asset and build something that will return value to the whole of the people of Canada.

That is the hope we have in building these bridges. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it is very important for us to try, if we possibly can, to relieve the people of the city of Montreal and the immediate district of the load they have to carry, by making it possible for the fourteen million people in the whole of Canada to share that load.

Mr. Knowles: It is fifteen million now.

Mr. Low: Fifteen million, then. There is another thing that makes me interested in this whole matter. When he spoke, the minister revealed to us that while he thought there was a value of something like $37 million in the Jacques Cartier bridge, yet we still owe against it something like $28,400,000. On that feature alone a person could occupy the attention of the house for a very long time. It must be an amazing revelation to the people of Canada to find that after all these years we still owe $28,400,000 on the Jacques Cartier bridge, in spite of the fact that ever since it was put into operation we have been exacting something like $1,200,000 each year in tolls. That may not be an average figure, but I believe it is the figure that was given for one year.

It seems to me that this offers an excellent example of asinine financing, and it gives me tremendous pleasure to be able to hold it up so people can see just what is in it. Here is a situation in which I think every member in the house ought to be interested. I do not know just what the original cost of the Jacques Cartier bridge was but, if I remember correctly, it was estimated originally that it would cost $12 million. I understand, however, that once the bridge was under construction some difficulty arose as a consequence of someone holding up the price of the approaches to the bridge and, if I remember correctly, it became necessary to pay a greatly enhanced sum of money in order to get those approaches. So the bridge cost something like $18 million. It will be understood that I am giving these figures from memory, going back over a number of years.

What happened? I understand the federal government financed it by floating an issue of 5 per cent 40-year bonds. We know that 40-year bonds carrying an interest rate of 5 per cent will yield during the lifetime of the bonds 200 per cent of the principal. If the principal sum spent on the bridge was $12 million—and we will put it at that figure as a beginning—then over the years those bonds would be out the people of Canada would have to dig up, through taxation, $24 million in interest. This would mean that for a $12 million bridge, when the interest on the bonds had been paid for 40 years the cost to the people of this country would be $36 million.

To my mind it is completely asinine to go on financing in that fashion what we are pleased to call national assets. When one digs into the matter these facts stare him in the face. Over the years since the Jacques Cartier bridge was conceived and work on it was begun, this country of Canada has passed through some hard times. There have been bad years, times when we had tremendous quantities of surplus production going to waste. We also had quantities of unused labour and unused power. These could easily have been used. What in the world are we thinking about when we fail to transform surplus production and surplus energy in the form of manpower or machine energy into a national asset that is truly an asset, and one on which there is no debt? It is just utterly foolish, when one thinks of it.

But this is what we have done. Hon. members seem to fail to grasp the significance of true financing, where the government has the sovereign right and authority to do what is required to make the money that we have, our purchasing power, match the figures representing our national production. The government can do that, without running this nation into pawn to the merchants of debt. But it has not done so. It prefers to put a yoke around the necks of the people of Canada, to keep them with their noses to the grindstone, paying interest, and digging it up year after year to pay for an asset that should have been paid for long ago. In spite of the fact that we did have the surplus production, the surplus energy and manpower, we failed to convert it into a national asset. As a consequence, having paid millions of dollars in interest on a bridge, we find that we still owe on it $28,400,000, or a sum one and a half times its original cost, even at inflated values.

This just does not make sense. And, to add insult to injury, the government proposes now that we should go on paying tolls on the bridge for I don't know how many years. Maybe it will be a century. If what was said by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron) with respect to the Quebec bridge is any criterion, then we can expect that perhaps 50 years from now we will still be paying tolls on the Jacques Cartier bridge and the Victoria bridge.

I suggest that for these reasons we ought not to be treating the matter lightly, but that we should be giving it most serious consideration while at the same time giving all honour to those hon. members who have raised the question in the house. I hope they will not withdraw their motion, and that it will be possible for them to hold out so as to get a vote. I would like to see a vote, and if there is one I shall support the resolution, because I feel that in the interests of the people of the province of Quebec, and for that matter of the whole of Canada, those tolls ought to be removed. I do not want to delay this matter, or to talk it out. My only wish is to express my views sincerely, and I shall now give way to anyone else who wishes to take part in the debate.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I shall take only a moment. My only reason for speaking is that we have heard from practically every province in Canada, and I feel that if I were to sit here and say nothing people might think I agree with the principle of tolls on bridges.

For the minister's benefit I should like to say that when you have the provincial government of Quebec, the city of Montreal, the national harbours board, and perhaps the president of the Canadian National Railways on top of that, you have a pretty hard aggregation to come to an understanding with. I appreciate the minister's position. It may be just as difficult for him to get an understanding with the people concerned as it is for hon. members here to get an understanding with the minister. I do not believe he is in a position to give us a lucid answer to this question because of the people who are involved in coming to an understanding on the matter.

I am going to support this motion for this reason. I am affected by the Jacques Cartier bridge. Any time I go home and take a car with me I go down through the eastern townships and cross that bridge. When I return by car I come up that way. At times I have been in line there for at least half an hour waiting my turn to get across that bridge. I agree with what the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) has said. I have seen hundreds of United States cars lined up to pay a tax to enter the city of Montreal. They are people who would perhaps proceed to the rest of Canada and leave a lot of money behind them. After the inconvenience they experience on their first visit by being held up at the border and asked to pay an entrance fee, I do not think it encourages them to come back.

The other reason I think the matter should be taken in hand by the government and by the minister's department, and an understanding arrived at, was given by the hon. member for Peace River. The financing of the Jacques Cartier bridge as outlined by him is ridiculous. It seems that the longer you have to pay tolls on that bridge and the longer you continue to finance it in the way it is done at the present time, the more you will owe 50 years from now. This resolution should be voted upon. This house should unanimously pass this resolution, because it would strengthen the minister's hands.

We have been discussing this matter for eight years. It has been on the order paper for that length of time. It has been thoroughly discussed in the house on several occasions, and it has been withdrawn each time. It has not been voted upon. As far as the Minister of Transport is concerned, he has left the house in exactly the same position it was in when the discussion opened.

If this matter is voted upon and hon. members tell the minister that as far as they are concerned they are prepared to abolish tolls on the Victoria and Jacques Cartier bridges, then he will have an ultimatum from the House of Commons. He will then be in a position to meet with the representatives of the city of Montreal, the provincial government of Quebec, the national harbours board and the Canadian National Railways and say that something has to be done about the matter. He will be able to tell them that the next time he appears before the House of Commons and this matter comes up he must be in a position to give a more reasonable and concrete answer to the house than has been given up to date. If for no other reason than that I hope we are not going to take the weak attitude we have taken in the past and withdraw this motion. This discussion should not be looked upon as a gesture to the constituencies from which the hon. members come who have raised the matter. We should show that we mean business on it.

I am not going to talk this matter out. Five minutes remain, and I presume the hon. member for St. Mary wishes to close the debate, but I would follow other hon. members and suggest to him that he do not withdraw this motion at the present time. Let us tell the Minister of Transport that we mean business and we are giving him an ultimatum to go to the people concerned, when he has to discuss this matter, and get an answer back to this House of Commons when this matter comes up again.

Some hon. Members: Question.

(Translation):

Mr. Hector Dupuis (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, I believe that I have the right to reply in order to explain part of my speech and complete remarks that may have been wrongly interpreted by the house. I believe that is my privilege to do so.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member wish to give a few explanations and perhaps conclude by withdrawing his motion?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Dupuis: Now, Mr. Speaker, I asked you a question. In my humble opinion, I have the right to explain certain points that may have been misinterpreted by members of the house. No hon. member has a right to call me to order or ask me to withdraw my motion or vote on the motion. It is your duty to rule on the point I am raising. I am not as great a parliamentarian as all these people who want to make a ruling on the point. It is within your province to state whether, in accordance with the rules of the house, I am entitled to continue my remarks and give explanations pertaining to the motion I have submitted today. I am awaiting your ruling.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member asks whether he has the right to do a certain thing. Now, the Speaker rules on the various points of order as they arise. A member should not ask questions of the Speaker from his seat in the house.

In rising the hon. member stated that he wanted to give further information about some important parts of his speech which may have been misinterpreted in the discussion that followed. He has the right to do so. I would call his attention to citation 235 of Beauchesne, third edition, which states that a member who has heard certain parts of his speech misinterpreted by hon. members taking part in the debate may rise and give explanations.

(Text):

It may be fair that I should explain the point raised by the hon. member. It is to the effect that certain material parts of the speech he gave have not been interpreted correctly by hon. members who have followed in the discussion. He asked me whether he was in order in explaining these points. I told him that it was not proper for a member to ask questions of the Speaker from the floor, that the Speaker settled points of order as they arose.

On the point that a member may correct parts of his speech that have been misunderstood or misinterpreted, I quoted to the hon. member citation 235 at page 101 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, which is to the effect that:

> A member who, during a debate, has spoken to a question may again be heard to offer explanation of some material part of his speech which has been misunderstood; but he must not introduce new matter . . .

And so on. That is the very matter which the hon. member brought to my attention, and that is the explanation I gave him.

Since it is six o'clock the hon. member will have to continue his remarks at a later date.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Drew: Before the house rises may we have the order of business for tomorrow?

Mr. Harris: We shall take up the resolutions indicated by me on the closing night before Christmas, namely the resolution with respect to the Quebec battlefields, the Post Office Act and then the housing bill.

Mr. Fleming: In that order?

Mr. Harris: In that order.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, January 14, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EXPERIENCE IN SOVIET PRISON—REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the minister's attention been drawn to an article appearing in the New York Times of January 1, 1954, bearing the caption "U.S. Soldier and Seaman recount Soviet Prison Terror"? Has the department checked the accuracy of this statement and, if so, would the minister care to comment?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The hon. member for Cape Breton South was kind enough to give me notice of this question. I have seen the article to which he refers, and another press report about the same date which referred more specifically to a Group Captain Roy L. Linden, or Linder, of the Royal Canadian Air Force. In each case the reference is to a member of the Canadian armed forces. The Department of External Affairs therefore checked with the Department of National Defence when the story first appeared.

We were told that no member of the Canadian armed forces of similar rank or name to that mentioned in the press accounts has been listed as missing. However, the department is making further inquiries to see whether any light can be thrown on the report.

UNITED NATIONS—INQUIRY AS TO CONVENING OF SPECIAL SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has any decision been reached by the Canadian government yet with reference to the Indian request for the reconvening of the United Nations assembly? Is the minister in a position to tell us the attitude taken by Her Majesty's government of the United Kingdom and by the United States government with reference to these matters?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No decision has been taken with regard to this matter, but one will naturally be taken within the next few days. Before reaching a decision we have made some inquiries of the Indian government as to what they expect to be on the agenda at this session of the United Nations assembly that is being called, and we are also consulting with our friends with respect to this matter. We will be able to make a decision within a few days.

TRADE

JAPAN—INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS OF TREATY NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he will give the house some report on the progress of the negotiations being carried on with Japan, looking toward a trade treaty, and if he will tell the house what instructions the Canadian representatives have received from the government, under which they are working.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): All I can say is that the negotiations are proceeding. The instructions given to our committee are to work out a trade treaty which will be advantageous to Canada. The work has been closely supervised. I can assure my hon. friend that as soon as the treaty is ready for signature it will be tabled in the house. I do not know that I can give any further information at this time.

Mr. Fleming: Is there any indication as to when it is expected the treaty will be completed?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I think it will be perhaps the latter part of March.

FLOODS

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER—POSSIBLE FLOODING IN LONGUEUIL AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Auguste Vincent (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport. Is the minister aware of the rising waters of the St. Lawrence river in the vicinity of Montreal, and also of a newscast over station CKAC at 6.30 p.m. on January 12, suggesting that the government icebreakers would not move above Sorel? This statement has caused considerable alarm in the city of Longueuil over possible damage to be caused by floods.

Would the Minister of Transport tell the house whether or not he is aware of the situation and, if so, what is being done by the Department of Transport to prevent flood damage at Longueuil?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I thank the hon. member for having given notice that he would ask his question. The position is as follows. Yesterday, January 13, the level of the water at Montreal was 14·9 feet. That is normal winter level. It rose one foot this morning, and there is nothing abnormal about that condition. The officials of the department advise me that they do not anticipate under present circumstances any flooding in the Montreal area.

STEEP ROCK IRON MINES

PROPOSED LINE TO CONNECT ATIKOKAN WITH MAIN CANADIAN PACIFIC LINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the Minister of Transport whether Steep Rock Iron Mines Limited is trying to get a line of railway built from Atikokan across to the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway? If so, what is the government's attitude toward such a proposal?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): When an application is made by the Canadian Pacific Railway or Steep Rock Iron Mines Limited to the government, it will consider the application and its decision will then be made known.

Thus far no application has been made.

GRAIN

AMOUNT DELIVERED FROM AUGUST 1 TO DECEMBER 31

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. P. Mang (Qu'Appelle): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce with respect to how much grain has been delivered during the period August 1 to the end of the year or up to the present time, and to what extent the three bushel quota objective had been met up to December 31.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): When I spoke in Winnipeg some time ago I said I felt confident that deliveries of grain to country elevators could be made to the extent of 300 million bushels. The amount of grain delivered in the country from August 1 last until the end of the calendar year was actually 341 million bushels. I might say that the average deliveries in the same period over the last ten years have been 328 million bushels, so deliveries this year have been well above average in spite of the congestion.

The deliveries under the three bushel quota have been completed at all delivery points, as far as I am aware. I have been advised that this is the case. Good progress is being made toward the delivery of the second two bushel quota, as well as the supplementary quotas. Deliveries are still being made in considerable volume and cars are being loaded in the country at the rate of about 1,000 a day.

Mr. Argue: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Can the Minister of Trade and Commerce say when the very severe restrictions on the shipments of wheat out of local country elevator points is likely to be lifted or altered so the two bushel quota may be marketed? Is the minister aware that for all practical purposes there is now an embargo on the shipment of wheat out of country elevators?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The minister is very well posted on these matters. The embargo on shipment applies to points where the five bushel quota and the supplementary quotas have been delivered. Obviously it is not fair to let these points deliver further grain until all points have reached the same position. There is also a slow-down on the delivery of wheat except where the wheat is delivered under the original three bushel quota. The reason for this is that it is not desirable to use all the elevator space at the lakehead for wheat. There will be demands for barley and oats when the season opens, and it is desired to keep the stocks in reasonable balance. However, I may say that considerable quantities of wheat are being delivered to the lakehead under the regulations now outstanding. The purpose of the regulations is simply to give a fair chance at available storage to every shipper in western Canada.

DUMPING

ALLEGED IMPORTATION OR DUMPING OF VEGETABLES IN MARITIMES PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue of which I have not given him notice. Perhaps he will take this as notice. Has his department received complaints with respect to the importation or dumping of United States vegetables in the maritimes provinces? If so, has his department taken any action with respect to it?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): I shall take the question as notice and give a reply later.

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER

MAINTENANCE OF ICE BRIDGES BETWEEN SOREL ISLANDS AND MAINLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport with reference to the matter brought up today by the hon. member for Longueuil (Mr. Vincent). Is the government giving any consideration to the maintenance of the ice bridges between the islands of Sorel and the mainland? If so, how long does he propose to maintain these bridges?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Yes, it is my understanding that the bridges between the islands of Sorel and the mainland will be maintained until January 21. Thereafter it is the intention to have the icebreakers proceed up the river.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

PORK—AMOUNT PACKED—SALES

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): May I ask the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture when I may expect an answer to a question of mine which was passed as an order for return on December 7?

Mr. Robert McCubbin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): We were just looking at the question this morning. An answer will be forthcoming before very long.

NATIONAL BATTLEFIELDS

QUEBEC—AMOUNT PAID TO COMMISSION INCREASED TO $125,000

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend an act respecting the national battlefields at Quebec to increase the amount that may be paid to the commission from $100,000 to $125,000 during each of the four years commencing April 1, 1954.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Mr. Dufresne: There are a few questions I should like to ask the minister regarding the increase in the amount from $100,000 to $125,000. Can the minister tell me how many members there are on the battlefields commission at Quebec?

(Translation):

Mr. Lesage: The commission is composed of the following members: Lieutenant Colonel L. J. Adjutor Amyot, since March 31, 1939; the Hon. Wilfrid Bovey, since July 31, 1947; Lieutenant Colonel Oscar Gilbert, since May 2, 1938; Reverend Arthur Maheux, since July 31, 1947; Mr. James Y. Murdoch, Q.C., of Toronto, since January 19, 1949; Mr. William Stobo, since January 19, 1949; Lieutenant Colonel Raymond Garneau, of Quebec, since September 5, 1951. Those commissioners have been appointed by the federal government. On December 23, 1924, the government of the province of Ontario appointed the Hon. William H. Price, of Toronto, and the government of the province of Quebec had appointed, on May 4, 1908, the Hon. Alexandre Taschereau, who died on July 6, 1952, leaving a vacancy.

Mr. Dufresne: Could the minister tell me whether the commissioners receive an indemnity or some kind of expense allowance during the year?

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, the commissioners do not receive any indemnity. As far as expense allowances are concerned, I must say that I am unable to answer the question at this time. I shall make inquiries in that connection and will give an answer when the bill comes up for second reading.

Mr. Dufresne: Does the minister intend to make new appointments or to replace some of the present commissioners?

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, the federal government cannot make other appointments, because there are no vacancies. The hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne) is much more friendly than I am with the authorities of the province of Quebec and the only vacancy on the commission must be filled by the government of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, I shall not discuss my relations with the government of the province of Quebec and I shall let the said authorities make the appointment they deem advisable in that connection.

Could the minister tell me exactly what purpose the increase requested in the resolution will serve?

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, in 1948, the act was amended by parliament with a view to granting a subsidy of $100,000 to that commission for a ten-year period ending March 31, 1958. Since 1948, however, when that amendment was brought in, maintenance costs have increased by more than 25 per cent. In other words, the wage level, the cost of necessary stores and supplies have increased by more than 25 per cent, so that during the last few years, the commission has been unable to pay its workers salaries equivalent or equal to those prevailing in the Quebec district for the same kind of work. Moreover, the area of the battlefield park, which was in 1948, I think, 157 acres, has since been increased to 232 acres.

Mr. Dufresne: According to what the hon. minister just said, Mr. Chairman, salary increases are being considered. It is exactly the point I had in mind, because I have received representations to the effect that the wages paid by the battlefields commission to its workers not only did not constitute a fair remuneration for the work done, but also, and more particularly, were lower than the cost of living. Is that the meaning of this request for this extra $25,000 made by the minister on behalf of the battlefields commission? Should this be the case I would like to congratulate him on this proposed increase to the workers employed by that body. I hope that this is the case. I am quite willing to add an extra $5,000 in order to ensure that our workers are well paid.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Speaker, I hope that there will be no misunderstanding. It is not up to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources to set the salaries of the workers employed by the battlefields commission. That is up to that body itself, within the limits of its budget. And that depends largely on the amount of the annual grant it receives from parliament.

Mr. Dufresne: Such being the case, Mr. Speaker, I would like the hon. minister to use his influence with the commissioners so that they will give as much as possible to our workers.

Mr. Dupuis: It would be better than to consult the Quebec provincial government which does not pay its employees.

[Mr. Dufresne.]

(Text):

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Chairman, there is one thing I regret with regard to the Quebec battlefields. These battlefields are located on the Plains of Abraham in the western part of the city of Quebec near the Quebec jail. What astounds me is that the monument to the memory of Wolfe and Montcalm, which bears a fine inscription in Latin, is not located on the battlefields but is to be found in the governor's garden west of the Chateau Frontenac, a distance of approximately two miles from the battlefields. There is no monument to the memory of Wolfe and Montcalm on the battlefields. They have been honoured by a monument located in this other place, which may have been the right place before Sir Wilfrid Laurier established the Quebec battlefields commission. I suggest that a new monument should be erected on the Quebec battlefields to commemorate the memory of both the victorious and defeated generals.

There is a monument to the memory of Montcalm located on Grande Allee in Quebec city, half-way between the Wolfe and Montcalm monument and the battlefields. I wonder if it would not be possible to transfer that monument to the battlefields. I know it would be quite impossible to transfer the monument to Wolfe and Montcalm in the governor's garden in Quebec city to the battlefields, but there should be a decent and appropriate monument commemorating these famous deeds of the past.

If there are any direct or collateral descendants of Wolfe or Montcalm now living in Canada they should be given preference for appointment as trustees or members of the Quebec battlefields commission, without any consideration of political partisanship.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, I shall certainly look into the possibility of transferring this monument. However, I should like to point out that there is a monument to the memory of Wolfe at the main entrance to the battlefields, and there is also a monument to General Montcalm near the battlefields on Grande Allee, across the street from the Saint-Cœur de Marie church. However, I shall certainly look into the matter.

Mr. Dufresne: As a suggestion has been made by the hon. member for Temiscouata, would it be possible for the hon. member for Quebec West to make another one?

An hon. Member: Move the battlefields.

Mr. Dufresne: We will not move them to New Brunswick; we want to keep them in Quebec. There is in Quebec city a committee which is working to get the necessary funds to erect a monument to a great Canadian and former prime minister of Canada, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Sir Wilfrid Laurier created the battlefields commission of Quebec, and I would suggest to this committee that the monument to Sir Wilfrid Laurier should be erected on the battlefields.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Lesage thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 167, to amend an act respecting the national battlefields at Quebec.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

POST OFFICE ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE POSTAGE ON LETTERS AFTER APRIL 1, 1954

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Post Office Act to increase the rates of postage on letters posted in Canada from the 1st day of April, 1954,

(a) on each letter for delivery within the postal area in which it is posted, from three cents to four cents for the first ounce or fraction of an ounce, and from one cent to two cents for each additional ounce or fraction of an ounce, and

(b) on each letter posted within one postal area for delivery in another postal area from four cents to five cents for the first ounce or fraction of an ounce, and from two cents to three cents for each additional ounce or fraction of an ounce.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, will you put the question, please, and call for the yeas and nays on this motion?

Mr. Speaker: First of all I have to put the motion. Those in favour of the motion please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Cote) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Goode: I was paired with the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Wylie).

The house went into committee, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

Mr. Cote: Mr. Chairman, this resolution proposes an amendment to the Post Office Act to increase the rates of postage in the way indicated in the resolution itself, namely:

(a) on each letter for delivery within the postal area in which it is posted, from three cents to four cents for the first ounce or fraction of an ounce, and from one cent to two cents for each additional ounce or fraction of an ounce, and

(b) on each letter posted within one postal area for delivery in another postal area from four cents to five cents for the first ounce or fraction of an ounce, and from two cents to three cents for each additional ounce or fraction of an ounce.

It has been the policy throughout the years for the postal service to pay its way and not be a burden on the general taxpayer. As a matter of fact, through the years we have usually had a slight paper surplus. Now we are faced with certain heavy additional expenditures which the department has to meet. The five-day forty-hour week will cost the Post Office Department $5 million. The salary increase which went into effect on December 1 will cost the Post Office Department $7 million. The improvements authorized by parliament for rural mail carriers will cost the Post Office Department $1,500,000. These three items alone amount to $13,500,000. Expected net revenues from the increase in postage rates will be approximately $14 million, leaving only $500,000 to take care of possible normal increases in the price of basic materials and services which are essential for the operation of the postal service.

I think everybody will agree that the heavy additional expenditures aforementioned must be paid. Therefore increased revenues are necessary. If these additional funds are not obtained through a reasonable increase in postage rates they will have to be obtained in some other way. I believe everyone will also agree that the most equitable arrangement is for the cost of service to be borne by the users, and this is exactly the object of the present resolution.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I think it was made apparent to the house when this proposal was announced by the Minister of Finance that we would be opposed to any increase in postal rates at this time. I recall that at that time the Leader of the Opposition spoke briefly and in the course of his remarks said that the claims made by the Minister of Finance with respect to the feeling of the people of Canada that the department should pay its own way were not, in his opinion, true, and could not be proved. In part I should like to review his words on that occasion. He said, as will be found at page 692 of Hansard for December 8, 1953:

Throughout the years the speeding up of business communication, the speeding up of personal communication, the speeding up of human contacts, whether it be by mail, telephone, telegraph or any other means of communication, has in itself been an essential part of the material advancement of society. There are few aspects of our social and business contacts which mean more to our people than the efficient delivery of mail at a cost which is consistent in every way with the general public interest. I would have hoped that before a decision of this kind was made, which creates still further differentials between our own postal costs and those of our neighbours in the United States, we might have had some consideration of the possibility of dealing with this problem in another manner.

The Postmaster General has now said that this is the only way in which the increased costs of the department can be met. I should like to reiterate the opinion of my leader expressed on December 8. It is our opinion that mail delivery is a service which the taxpaying public has a right to expect the government to provide, and that the taxpaying public does not necessarily expect that the department which provides this service shall be self-sustaining. Quite apart from being self-sustaining, it has in the past few years been profit-producing. These profits, I presume, have gone into the general revenues of the government and have been used for other services which the government provides for the people of the nation. Therefore I see no reason at all why the government should be in such a mad rush to offset any possibility of loss in the department by increasing rates before they have found out whether or not they are going to need the extra revenue.

Certainly the government does not take this attitude with regard to the Canadian National Railways. It does not take this attitude with respect to Trans-Canada Air Lines, and certainly not with regard to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. Lennard: I should say not.

Mrs. Fairclough: As a matter of fact, so far as T.C.A. is concerned, the Post Office Department was called upon to accept a rather heavy charge for first class mail which, if one wished to be cynical, might very well be described as a backhanded subsidy to T.C.A. which prior to that time had not been doing so well in the revenue department.

There are other matters to consider with respect to the revenues of the Post Office Department. Those people who consider that the department should be self-sustaining might very well take a look at the report of the Postmaster General for the year 1946 which, as far back as that time, drew attention to the tremendous cost to the department of the franking privilege enjoyed by government departments generally. In the report for that year appears this statement:

> The franking privileges enjoyed by various government departments deprived the department of revenue, approximating $4,700,000 . . .

As far back as 1946 the amount was nearly $5 million. I draw the attention of the committee to the amount estimated by the Postmaster General in the latest report. It is only an estimate, I suppose what one might call an informed estimate; nevertheless in the report which came into our hands not long ago the Postmaster General concedes that for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1953, the franking privilege alone still costs the Post Office Department well over $4 million, actually $4,129,770.

I am always amused by these estimates which manage to get down to within $10 of what they are supposed to be. If an estimate is going to be made, then I wonder why they do not just say four and a quarter million dollars, or something like that. If there are figures to substantiate the estimate, why not give them in detail?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is a "guesstimate".

Mrs. Fairclough: My hon. friend says that it is a "guesstimate". It is true that the revenue calculations of the department would be materially altered, whether any actual cash transfer took place or not, if the department were credited with the amount of postage which would normally accrue to it from those various departments of government which load the mails with all sorts of material, some of which is necessary and some of which is straight propaganda. From personal experience I know that the mail from government departments which comes to the desks of business people in this country is so voluminous that it cannot even be scanned and, most appropriately, finds its way into the waste paper basket. Some of it, Mr. Chairman, is pure junk.

Mr. Fleming: Ministers' speeches.

Mrs. Fairclough: Yet it passes through the mails under departmental franks. I suggest that before considering any increase in postal rates these amounts should be calculated accurately by the departments concerned and credited to the revenues of the Post Office Department.

In the report for last year, to which I have just referred, the revenue is shown at almost $130 million and the expenditures at almost $123 million, leaving a profit of about $6,500,000. As a matter of fact the actual amount is $6,471,053.31. Despite the fact that it was expected the department would have much less revenue last year than it had the year before, this was the result. As a matter of fact at one time another "guesstimate" was made that the profit would be reduced from the approximately $6,500,000 of the year before to something like $4 million last year. In spite of that, however, the profit was only about $150,000 less than it had been in the preceding year, and this despite the fact that a great deal of the first class one-ounce mail had gone by air to distant parts of Canada and, as I said before, had thereby given an indirect subsidy to Trans-Canada Air Lines, one which they sorely needed.

What interested me more than anything else in the remarks of the Minister of Finance was the fact that the blame for what the minister described as this necessary increase in the postage rates was based largely upon the intention of the government to inaugurate a five-day forty-hour week among its employees. The Post Office Department is not the first department whose employees have been placed on the five-day basis. I cannot recall that in any other instance a department has been told that it must produce revenue sufficient to pay for this change in the working conditions of its employees. Because the Post Office Department is the only one producing revenue in this way, apparently it is to be saddled with the cost of changing working conditions in that department so they will be in line with other departments of government and with industry generally throughout the country.

The minister has said that it will cost $5 million to put this plan into effect, and that it will cost another $7 million to increase the wages of the employees in the department. Well, he had a profit last year of $6,500,000. The franking privilege costs almost $5 million. Then it is proposed to drop about $650,000 by reducing the air mail rates from 7 cents to 5 cents. On the basis of the number of pieces, shown in last year's report at 32,808,019, this would amount to $650,000.

These sums add up to $12,250,000. The minister has been talking about having only another half million dollars to play with. I think if there is any playing to be done he might consider that the average taxpayer, the average person who uses the mails, would like to join in the game. Certainly that is true so far as the individual is concerned. We know that the excise tax was taken off cheques, but this did not affect a great many of the people in Canada.

Mr. Cote: We lost seven and a half millions on account of that.

Mrs. Fairclough: Very well; but how many people did it affect? There are many people in this country who do not issue a cheque from the beginning to the end of a year, a great many of them.

Mr. Cote: I presume my hon. friend does not suggest that we should restore the excise tax to that extent?

Mrs. Fairclough: I am merely trying to give the picture that I have found in the last little while. I am stating the individual did not benefit to any great extent or to any marked degree by the abolition of the stamp tax on cheques. The individual, speaking generally, will not benefit to any marked degree by the reduction of the air mail rate from 7 cents to 5 cents, because the number of letters which the average individual will mail in the course of a year in respect of which air mail service would be helpful would not be very great.

True, air mail speeds up the service for business mail; but most business houses now use air mail anyway, wherever they think it is necessary. It seems ridiculous that a letter can travel across this country and be delivered in Vancouver at the same cost as a letter delivered in the next town—and that it will arrive there probably a full day ahead of the letter sent to the next town. Certainly that has been our experience, in this part of the country at least. It is not at all uncommon to find a letter taking two or three days to move from one address to another in a city. It is not at all unusual to have mail taking three or four days to reach a neighbouring town.

It seems to me I recall some newspaper comment to the effect that if you want your mail to reach its destination in a hurry you had better get into your car and deliver it personally. We have just about reached the point where we are subsidizing mail delivery of those pieces which go to the far corners of the country by increasing the postage rates on the mail delivered within reasonably short distances of the point of mailing.

I do not think this drop in the air mail rate is even going to benefit business to any marked degree because, after all, it is an expense chargeable against the revenue of the company, and of the net profit of that company the proprietors pay a sizeable portion to the income tax department. When the whole thing is calculated the business itself will not be affected very materially. Likewise they will not be affected very materially because the first-class mail rate goes up. They do not have to worry. The common attitude is that it does not matter, Mr. Abbott takes half of it anyway. Therefore it all boils down to the fact that the individual in this country gets caught between the opinion of the government that this department must pay for itself and the nonchalant attitude of business generally on the matter of increased rates.

All of this, or a large part of it, comes about because it has been finally recognized that the salaries paid to the employees of the department were too low, and the conditions under which they worked were not in accord with conditions generally in the country.

I might point out that although the postage rates are being increased in this country, we are shortly to consider some other legislation of another department which has a bearing on these matters also. I drew to the attention of the Postmaster General in 1953, when the estimates were under discussion, the fact that a letter carrier earning $2,850, which at that time was the maximum, was not considered a good financial risk by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for a loan on a house in order to put a roof over his family. I believe the maximum has now been raised to $3,060, but he still will not be able to buy a house under Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation because the requirements are such that his maximum salary falls far short of the minimum which must be made in order to qualify for a loan.

We used to be able to buy many things for a nickel in this country. There are no longer many things you can buy for a nickel. My friend beat me to it—you can now post a letter for a nickel, or you will be able to do so after April 1. If there is one thing that will cost us too much it is nickel postage.

Even the four-cent rate failed to give us the service which the people of this country have a perfect right to expect from a department which is charged with the responsibility of maintaining the lines of communication across this nation and internationally.

It is not so long ago that in an effort, so it was said, to economize within the department the two-a-day delivery was abolished on residential walks in municipalities and urban centres, and one-a-day deliveries took their place. I suppose this one-a-day delivery has a great deal to do with the poor mail service we are now receiving in urban centres, because if the letter is cleared in the post office after the one delivery has gone for that day, then of course it stays there for another 24 hours.

Many peculiar situations arose as a result of that move. It was found that a great many places of business were situated on residential walks. Since that time some of those defects have been rectified. In places where it was found that a great many businesses were on residential walks some adjustment was made and the two-a-day delivery was reinstituted in those instances.

However, during the time these people were receiving one daily mail delivery, with a consequent disruption in their business processes, some of them, in an attempt to correct the situation themselves, tried to obtain post office boxes. To their dismay they could not even obtain post office boxes in the city of Hamilton because the post office was all filled up. Therefore they had no alternative but to sit and wait for 24 or 48 hours for their mail to be delivered to them. In some instances this meant that cheques in the mail, which should reach the banks, were delayed for a matter of 48 hours. And if it should happen that the cheques were received on Saturday, the banks were closed and naturally they had to pay interest charges on the overdraft, if they had one, for the ensuing three days, during which time they should have been able to make their deposit, as the customer intended when he mailed the cheque.

I suppose this does not sound like a terrible increase, when you add one cent to an existing rate; but I should like to point out, Mr. Chairman, that on drop letters the raising of the rate from 3 cents to 4 cents for the first ounce and from 4 cents to 6 cents for the second ounce means an increase of 25 per cent in the former case and 50 per cent in the latter. In the matter of other mail, raising the rate from 4 cents to 5 cents for the first ounce and from 6 cents to 8 cents on the second ounce means 25 per cent in the first instance and 33⅓ per cent in the second. It would be a very reckless businessman who would increase his prices to that extent in one jump.

As I said before, we have suffered by reason of the decision of the department to put in the one-a-day delivery in urban centres. We have had less service; we have had higher postage rates; we have had delays, which I mentioned before. It practically boils down to the fact that the only appropriate thing about the proposals which have been made is the date on which they are to take effect, because the people of Canada are certainly going to have a proper April fool.

There is no guarantee of better service. Not so long ago I asked whether the two-a-day delivery would be reinstituted. The minister is quoted as having said that he could not see it in the immediate future. There is no guarantee that the Post Office Department will benefit by the allocation to it of revenues which should normally reach this department; there is no guarantee that Trans-Canada Air Lines will be allowed to flounder along on its own revenue without leaning heavily on the Post Office Department. The only thing we have is just an increase in rates on April fool's day.

Mr. Cote: I want to give some explanations. I think it would be practical for all of us to study the whole problem. At the end of the year we expect to have a deficit of $1 million. This deficit will be brought about because we have lost $7,500,000 through the removal of the excise tax on notes and cheques. Formerly we received that amount of revenue through the sale of stamps to the general taxpayers. I am giving this explanation so we can understand the deficit we are going to have. We had a surplus last year of $6,500,000 but we are now faced with a revenue loss of around $7,500,000. That is the explanation for the deficit of $1 million which we expect to have at the end of this year.

So we start with a deficit of $1 million. That is why I have given these figures, so hon. members may better understand the situation. We have to face the payment of over $13,500,000.

Mr. Knowles: Before the minister leaves that point may I ask if we are to understand that one purpose of this increase is to make up for the loss which arose from that pre-election move of taking off the stamp tax?

Mr. Cote: It might be a good political move to put it that way, but let us be realistic about it. We have to pay $7 million for increased salaries to all the employees of the department. We have to pay the increased cost brought about by the institution of the five-day week, and that amounts to $5 million. We have to pay $1,500,000 as an increase to the mail carriers. Those three items alone total $13,500,000. Even if we still had the $6,500,000 we would not have enough.

I do not want to take just one item and say we want it for that. We want it to pay the whole amount. This brings me to the answer to the other question put by my hon. friend. She said that I said it was the only way to do it. I did not say that. I said that in my personal view it was the only equitable way to do it. There may be a difference of opinion in that connection, but I cannot see any other equitable way. If the general taxpayer were to be charged with this $14 million or $15 million it would mean that those who were not using the mails would have to pay for those who were using them. It would mean that if my hon. friend sent only one letter a year she would be contributing toward those who buy stamps in great quantities. The ordinary worker would be contributing for the stamps used by big companies like Simpson's, Eaton's and Morgan's. I do not think that would be a fair way to do it, just to take it out of the general taxation fund in order to pay the cost of operating the post office.

That is the way I put it. I say again that I do not say that is the only way. I repeat what was said by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), that it had been the habit to do this in the past and it is the most equitable way.

I do not contend that the postal service is the best possible; I do not claim that it is perfect in all respects. It is administered by humans, and errors occur for which we are responsible. But every time we find errors we try to correct them. As a matter of fact we invite everyone to point out any errors that may exist, but the fact remains that there are some errors for which we are not responsible.

Let me relate a true story. Recently a man was expecting a cheque, the same thing my hon. friend referred to in connection with other circumstances. When he did not receive that cheque through the mail he called the sender and asked why he had not sent his cheque. The sender said he had sent it, and the other man said he had not received it. The sender then said that he would check the matter, and he called the postmaster. The postmaster asked where he had mailed his letter and he said he had mailed it in the mail box in front of a certain store. The postmaster thought that was strange, because there was no mail box there, and he suggested that they go to look. They both went to that place, and they found that the sender had mailed this letter enclosing the cheque in the municipal garbage can.

They then asked permission from the mayor to open that garbage can, because it had not been emptied for the past few days. They obtained that permission and took the box to the waterfront, because it was Saturday night, where they opened it. They found the letter in question and they also found 19 other letters which had been posted in that municipal garbage can.

Mr. Hamilton: You had better clean up your mail boxes so they do not look like garbage cans.

Mr. Cote: That was an error for which we were not responsible. We are doing our utmost to give the best possible service under the circumstances. If hon. members will look over the reports for the past 30 years they will find that expenditures have been trebled. During that period we have given the best service within our means. We are receiving every day suggestions for the improvement of the service, but many of these entail the expenditure of money. Today we are not against the principle of spending more money, but we must meet the necessary expenditure. We have to meet those expenditures up to the limit. Sometimes we are prevented from doing something we want to do because we have not sufficient money.

My hon. friend mentioned the second daily delivery. She knows my personal views on that matter. I hope that eventually we will be able to do that, but again that would mean an additional expenditure of between $4 and $5 million. We are giving two deliveries a day to the business centres, and it is only when the percentage of business places on a carrier's walk falls below 25 per cent that we give only one.

My hon. friend says this is not the only department with a five-day week. However, I think it is the only department where so many people are employed. Actually we have about 50,000 employees, without counting some 25,000 extra workers hired to take care of the Christmas rush. The five-day week means a terrific amount of reshuffling, switching of hours, hiring of new employees and instructing them how to do their jobs. That is why we have to spend up to $5 million more on that account.

I give these facts only as explanation. The main point is that we are faced with these expenditures. I do not think any hon. member will say that we should not make these expenditures. I think all will agree that we should pay the increased salaries as of December 1. I do not believe anyone will deny the necessity of implementing the five-day forty-hour week. I do not think anyone will deny that improvements should have been made in connection with the mail carriers which necessitates an expenditure of $1,500,000.

Those three items alone account for $13,500,000. If we agree that those expenditures should be made, then we have to have the funds to make them. We propose to get those funds by means of this increase, as we think it is the most equitable way to do it. If it were done in any other way we would be asking those who do not use the mail to pay for those who do.

Mr. Diefenbaker: How much revenue was lost by the removal of the tax on cheques?

Mr. Cote: I stand subject to correction, but I think it was about $7,500,000. This was first imposed as an excise tax. I would like to reserve the right to correct this figure if I am wrong, but I think I am close to the right amount. That whole amount was between $9 and $10 million a year, but this was a holdover from the first world war. This was an excise tax. At the beginning only blue stamps were used, but gradually the public at large began using postal stamps. There was no direction to that effect within the department, but when this tax was taken off we found we were losing $7,500,000.

Mrs. Fairclough: The minister has made quite a protest against the remarks I made, but at no time did I indicate that we were not in favour of protecting the employees in the postal department. As a matter of fact I made it quite clear that their working conditions should be brought into line with conditions existing in other branches of the civil service and in business generally throughout the country. What the minister has undoubtedly overlooked is that I very definitely said I saw no reason why the employees of the Post Office Department should be blamed for the increase in the postal rates when all the other civil servants have enjoyed the forty-hour week and increases in pay and so on, and I do not think it is—

Mr. Cote: I agree with my hon. friend. I believe she does not want to blame anybody, but I do not want to blame anyone either.

Mrs. Fairclough: But I do not see why the blame should be placed—

Mr. Cote: This is not to blame. This is a set of facts, and there is no blame attached to anyone.

Mrs. Fairclough: You might as well have raised the postal rates when you increased the salaries of the other civil servants. You did not come into the house and say that because other civil servants had received an increase in salary you would have to put up the postal rates.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Winch: This is a very important motion which we now have before this committee for discussion, and it is one that deserves the utmost attention of all hon. members. It certainly demands that the minister supply the fullest possible information as to why he thinks this increase in the postal rates is required. I was very disappointed in the paucity of his remarks in introducing the motion because there must be a great many particulars and statistics, policies and policy changes, that go to make up the picture. They should be supplied if we are to have a complete understanding as to the necessity for the increase in the postal rates.

I sincerely hope that before this discussion is through we will get not too many stories, much as I enjoyed the story by the minister a few moments ago, but rather factual information for consideration by members of this house. I was very intrigued with the statement made by the Minister of Finance on Tuesday, December 8, when the minister said, as will be found at page 691 of Hansard:

> It is the view of the government that the people of Canada expect the post office to pay for its operations out of postal revenues and not out of taxes.

That same position was taken by the minister this afternoon, and I was looking forward to hearing from him just on what basis in fact they reached that conclusion; or are they merely indulging in wishful thinking when they say that the people of Canada expect the postal services to be on a self-sustaining basis?

I would assume that when the government go to the extent of introducing a motion that calls for the introduction of legislation that will mean a 25 per cent increase in postal rates they would have made a survey to find out if that was the prevailing opinion. If they did so I would like to know just where they made that survey and who conducted it, because I doubt very much if there ever was any survey. As a matter of fact it is almost axiomatic that there was not a survey. Therefore the Minister of Finance and the minister who introduced this motion are merely expressing their own opinion in the hope that they can get away with an increase of 25 per cent in the postal rates.

The minister gave us the information a few minutes ago that the introduction of the five-day forty-hour week would cost the department an additional $5 million over a twelve-month period. I think, Mr. Chairman, we are entitled to some details from the government as to the composition of this $5 million; that is, on what basis and on what policies are the government going to introduce this five-day forty-hour week. It is quite obvious that it is not going to apply to all employees because, if I can refer back to the statement of the Minister of Finance on December 8, the minister had this to say as will be found on the same page of Hansard from which I have already quoted:

> . . . the policy of readjusting the working week of operating staffs in the post office, customs and various other operating branches of the public service to the five-day forty-four week where that is the prevailing practice in the locality . . .

I think that makes it fairly obvious, subject to any correction from the minister, that it is his intention in the Post Office Department to follow the policy line that was laid down in circular letter 1953-28, a copy of which was published in the Canadian Civil Servant on page 9. This circular was sent to the deputy heads of government departments in Ottawa, and its purpose was to consolidate all the circular letters issued heretofore regarding the year round five-day week. It was an attempt to clarify some of the previous instructions.

In view of the statement by the Minister of Finance before the Christmas recess, and in view of the fact that we have had no indication from the minister at the present time that the five-day forty-hour week in the postal service is going to be on any different basis, we will have to take it that it is on the same basis as that outlined in circular letter 1953-28 on the other services.

That leads to an interesting situation that has not yet been explained by the minister, and it is important that we should know how this $5 million is made up. I have endeavoured to have a breakdown made, not so much of those who will be covered but of those who will not be covered, and it was done by those in the postal service at my request. I may not have the figures exactly correct, but I am sure the minister will understand that. I think they are approximately correct.

There are in the neighbourhood of 162 grade 9 post offices in Canada. Under the policy as outlined by the Minister of Finance, which is I believe the one which is now going into effect, only 12 of these 162 post offices will go on the five-day forty-hour week; and they have an average staff, I believe, of 6. There are 46, or thereabouts, grade 10 post offices in Canada with an average staff of 25. Out of that 46 only 22 will be covered under this new policy. There are 33 grade 11 post offices with an average staff of 40. Twenty-one out of that 33 will be covered. There are 16 grade 12 post offices in Canada with an average staff of 170. Twelve will be covered. From grade 13 to grade 18 we find that all the post offices will be covered by this new policy.

As I understand it, this is the situation, and I hope the minister will correct me afterwards if I am wrong; I know he will. Of grade 9 to grade 18 post offices in Canada there are in the neighbourhood of 274, and only 84 are covered by this order if you follow the circular letter which outlines the policy in the other departments of government. That raises the question of what is going to happen to those in the grades not covered. Are their colleagues in other post offices on the five-day forty-hour week going to get the same take-home pay as when on the forty-four-hour week? That point should be noted. If they are, is any additional compensation going to be granted to those employees in the post offices that are not going to be covered by the five-day week? Is that part of the $5 million? Is there any such policy or plan in the mind of the minister? I maintain that is information which will help us in making up our minds on this matter.

I strongly feel that the minister should take all the members of this committee really into his confidence. Knowing as he must have known that people will not look with favour upon an increase of 25 per cent in postal rates, what has been done to see whether, with the maintenance of efficiency in service, economies could be made in the Post Office Department? Has there been a full-scale inquiry into the operations of the Post Office Department in Canada? It seems to us that before such a far-reaching policy was introduced by the government there should have been a full-scale inquiry into the operations of the Post Office Department; and by that I do not mean an inquiry by post office officials who, fair and decent as they may be and undoubtedly are, would unquestionably be a little bit prejudiced, human nature being as it is, because they are the ones who are operating the postal service in this country and who have been and are responsible for it.

I would respectfully suggest to the minister right now that before this matter proceeds any further there should be established by the House of Commons either a committee or a royal commission to make a thorough and searching examination of all phases of post office operations with a view to seeing whether, basically, it is necessary to place an additional charge on first-class mail.

Moreover, I believe the minister should take us into his confidence as to what other discussions might be going on right now in the department with a view to trying to pass on these additional costs he mentions, and perhaps put them on the shoulders of the workers themselves. I am informed, I think I can say on quite reliable authority since I obtained the information in Vancouver and it was confirmed here in Ottawa, that the departmental officials—I do not say the minister, because I do not know whether he has been consulted on it yet—are considering whether or not they should wipe out the night differential, which is the time an employee has to put in if he is not on the day shift. As it is now, he does not have to put in his full eight hours; but I am informed that the department is considering a plan to remove that night differential. I think we should be told by the minister whether or not that is correct. If that is so, the government is not only trying to make up this deficit it is telling us about by increased postage, but it is also trying to make up still more by certain policy changes in the Post Office Department.

I think the minister should also tell us whether it is not a fact that the heads of his department are now considering a plan of reclassification of the clerical staffs in the post offices throughout Canada. If so, that too can have a great bearing on the cost of the Post Office Department. These things should be known before members of this house are asked to accept, through increased postal rates, the entire anticipated cost as outlined a few moments ago and reiterated by the minister.

The matter goes beyond that, Mr. Chairman. I mentioned an inquiry because we believe it is vitally necessary. I want to add to the words of the hon. member for Hamilton West on this matter of second-class mail and methods of distribution. I think it goes without question that the second-class postage rate does not meet the actual cost of service and that, basically, the second-class mail is subsidized by the first-class mail. The only reason I can think of why printing firms, newspaper firms and book publishers are subsidized is as a result of what might be termed an accepted principle that a well-informed public is good for democracy and good for Canada. Therefore we assist in getting newspapers, magazines and books into the hands of the people.

If it is a right principle that we should subsidize second-class matter, then let us do it on an honest basis out of the general revenue of the country, and not make it a charge on our postal service. Let us do it right out in the open, say it is a good thing and make it a charge on the general fund. Why should those who want to deal in first-class mail be penalized because of our subsidy to private-enterprise firms? In my estimation that principle applies also to another matter raised by the hon. member for Hamilton West, and brings to mind a phase of operations upon which we should be completely informed by the minister. What kind of check have you made on your postal distributive system? Are you doing it in the most efficient way?

Mr. Michener: Will the hon. member permit a question? The hon. member referred to the subsidy on second-class mail. Does the hon. member disagree with a subsidy for second-class mail?

Mr. Winch: I disagree with the method of the subsidy. I say if we are going to subsidize let it be a charge, according to ability to pay, out of the general funds of the country, and not a charge on those who are sending out first-class mail. That is rank, outright discrimination and should be abolished.

As I was saying, what kind of study has the minister himself made of the postal distributive system in Canada? Are you using the most efficient methods? Are you getting the mail delivered at the lowest possible rate commensurate with good service? I should like to hear from the minister on that matter.

There are a great many things in Canada that should be explained before this resolution gets out of this committee. Are you, indirectly again, subsidizing private companies? Mention was made by the hon. member for Hamilton West of Trans-Canada Air Lines. I should like to mention Canadian Pacific Air Lines and the Canadian Pacific Railway. If it is necessary for lines of transportation to be subsidized then let us do that honestly out of general revenues and admit it, and not hide such subsidies in the Post Office Department. It is an unnecessary charge and it is unfair.

My hon. friend wants to know what I have in mind. It is for him to state how the mail is delivered. Before I left the city of Vancouver to come back to the house I got in touch with the Post Office Department and asked them if I were to send a letter air mail from Vancouver to Calgary how it would get to Calgary. I thought the answer would be by T.C.A. because T.C.A. flies directly from Vancouver to Calgary and has more than one flight a day, which flights take less than three hours. I want to give the minister the information I was given. I was told that it would go by Canadian Pacific Air Lines. If that is correct I do not know of any direct C.P.A. flight from Vancouver to Calgary. There are two C.P.A. flights a day from Vancouver to Calgary via Penticton, Castlegar, Cranbrook and Lethbridge. It is an all-day flight.

An hon. Member: Maybe they do it cheaper.

Mr. Winch: My hon. friend says maybe they do it cheaper. Let me tell him that if Canadian Pacific Air Lines can operate an all-day flight over three times the distance cheaper than T.C.A. can fly from Vancouver to Calgary, then it is time we did something about the operation of T.C.A.

Has my hon. friend ever thought of finding out how train mail proceeds from Vancouver to Prince George? The main line of the Canadian National Railways across Canada ties in at Red Pass with the Grand Trunk line running north to Prince George, which is operated by the C.N.R. That seems to be the logical route, does it not? Check up and find out whether the mail always goes that way or whether or not it goes by another railroad and then has to be transferred to a train that eventually gets to Red Pass in order for that mail to proceed to Prince George. These things should be checked.

I can tell the minister that a number of years ago—I cannot remember exactly, but it is eight or ten years ago, maybe longer—I was on a C.P.R. train going west through British Columbia. The Chase river bridge, east of Kamloops, had collapsed. Mail was coming down from northern British Columbia to Red Pass on the C.N.R. transcontinental line to Vancouver. The Canadian National line was not out of operation. It went straight through to Vancouver and passed through Kamloops. I was there, Mr. Chairman, and mail bags destined to Vancouver were taken off the C.N.R. train and transferred to the C.P.R. station and remained there until the Chase river bridge was again in use and the C.P.R. could take the mail to Vancouver. I was there, Mr. Chairman, and I saw the mail bags unloaded.

Have you made a study of these things? Are you sure? If there are reasons for them, I know the minister will explain the reasons. I expect and anticipate that he will do so. If I am making wrong assumptions I stand ready to be corrected at any time. These things do not look right. I am not going to give any more illustrations, but I could do so all across Canada. I know there are members who can tell you of incidents in their own provinces. There is the case in one province where, instead of mail being carried 30 miles by C.N.R. from one spot in order to proceed thence by air mail, it is taken 300 miles in the other direction by the C.P.R. and comes back by air.

Mr. Cote: Can you give me the details?

Mr. Winch: Yes, and I am sure other hon. members will give the minister details.

Mr. Cote: I am ready to co-operate with my hon. friend. If anybody, not only members but anyone who is interested in the mail service, will tell me about any defects I shall be glad to inquire into any cases that are pointed out to me and correct them according to the circumstances.

Mr. Winch: I am sure the minister will get that information this afternoon.

Mr. McIlraith: On the record?

Mr. Winch: On the record, by the member who mailed the letter. Do you want anything better than that?

An hon. Member: Friends of the C.P.R.

Mr. Winch: What is going on across Canada? What is the state of your distributive organization throughout Canada? Is it on the most efficient basis—

Mr. McIvor: Yes.

Mr. Winch: —and yet providing service at the lowest possible cost? I say these things have not been established by the minister. I say no inquiry has been made by a committee or royal commission or by outside efficiency experts.

Mr. Cote: That has been done.

Mr. Winch: Then the minister should give us the information.

Mr. Cote: It is actually being implemented.

Mr. Winch: You say so. I do not know. I have not seen the report. Perhaps we question your judgment. We do not know until you give us the facts. Unless the minister gives us the facts and produces the evidence—

Mr. Cote: I am asking you to give us the facts.

Mr. Winch: You are introducing this bill, not the opposition. You have to produce evidence as to why this measure is required, and my hon. friend has not done that.

The Chairman: Order. I think the debate might proceed in a more orderly fashion if the hon. member who has the floor would address the chair.

An hon. Member: And the minister.

The Chairman: And the minister.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I can assure you that at all times I am addressing the chair but I am looking the other way.

An hon. Member: Wrong-way Corrigan.

Mr. Winch: This is a pretty important thing. Basically it is a back-door way of bringing in additional taxation. That is all it amounts to. It is increasing the taxes of the people of Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is not much back door to it.

Mr. Winch: It is back door in this way, that they do not call it increased taxation although that is actually what it is; and it is a big increase, 25 per cent. According to the minister the increase in postal rates will mean additional revenue of $14 million. It is rather strange to me that if you take the surplus of $6½ million the department had last year and subtract it from the $14 million additional revenue anticipated under the legislation to be introduced, you get exactly the amount of the deficit brought about by removing the stamp tax very conveniently just before the election. Basically the government is trying to cover that up and make up the deficit by an increase in postage rates.

I shall not take too long. I think this matter requires much more study. I am convinced that we have not been given all the facts yet by the minister. I am further convinced that no such action as an increase in postal rates should be contemplated until there has been a full scale inquiry, and I say the government should reconsider its own point of view from the basis that the people of Canada have never taken the position that the postal service should be self-supporting.

It is rather a coincidence that almost exactly the same kind of debate is going on in the United States, where their government want to increase postal rates. But they at least did something that has not been done in Canada. They did appoint a committee of inquiry. Of course the amazing thing is that they are talking about increasing the postal rates before the committee of inquiry in the United States has made its report. This is not only amazing, it is fantastic, I should say. But the fact remains that over there they did appoint the committee, while in Canada we have not got even that much.

Because there is almost an identical situation between these two countries I think it would be worth while to quote from an editorial which appeared in the Red Book magazine of January of this year. To my mind the situation in the United States therein described is applicable in Canada. With your permission, sir, I should like to quote from this editorial, which is headed "Your Right to Know". This is what it said:

> Should the postal service be self-supporting—pay its own way, or most of it? Should balancing the account books be more important than providing inexpensive service?

Actually, Mr. Chairman, I am reading this for the benefit of the minister, and if you do not mind, sir, I shall wait until he can listen to me.

Mr. MacDougall: Oh, go ahead.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Do not take yourself so seriously.

Mr. Winch: I am glad that these hon. members are at least taking note of what I am saying. However, if I may I shall wait until I have the attention of the minister. The article is as follows:

> Should the postal service be self-supporting—pay its own way, or most of it? Should balancing the account books be more important than providing inexpensive service?
> "No", has always been the answer of the American people, who have rejected this concept every time it has been pushed.
> Newspapers and magazines comprise second-class mail. They are carried by the post office at second-class rates because, from the beginning of the republic, the idea has prevailed that the people must be kept informed if the nation is to remain unified and free. One open question involves the relationship between second-class service and first-class service. The United States postal service was established primarily for the collection and delivery of first-class mail, and this is still its main function. First-class mail comes first, gets the fastest and safest handling at every stage, and determines the sizes and locations of post offices and routes. Second-class mail, by its very name, gets handling which is secondary to letter mail.
> It has always been an erroneous theory in the history of the postal service that it was established or sustained on the principle that it should be self-supporting. Not for many years has anyone seriously challenged the historic philosophy of a postal system based on service rather than cost. This magazine believes that, before upsetting a system which has proved to be so successful for so long, the people and their representatives should wait for the Carlson committee's report and then consider it carefully.

I shall conclude by saying that I agree with these last words in the editorial:

> Let us not hastily cast away the greatest information exchange the world has ever known.

I suggest to the government and the minister that they listen very carefully to the words in this editorial, and recognize that the postal service is a service to the public, just as is the furnishing of roads and other public services. No one expects those services to be self-supporting; yet transportation and communications are some of the most vital requirements in a society. A cheap postal service is the backbone of democracy. Unless we get more information, let us turn down the motion until a great many more facts are known and an inquiry has been completed.

Mr. Fair: Mr. Chairman, I have listened attentively to the debate which has taken place thus far and the statements of hon. members. I expect we will hear a good deal more before the resolution is passed, and more again before the bill is passed after its introduction.

I was somewhat surprised to hear my hon. friends to the right put up the case they did this afternoon because we know that for a great many years we have heard them refer to the Post Office Department as one of the great examples of public service and public administration.

I am not sure whether all the arguments have been placed before the committee. I had intended to state many of the things said by the hon. member for Hamilton West and the hon. member for Vancouver East; but, because they have made those observations I shall not waste time by repetition. No doubt many others will wish to speak before the bill is introduced.

I believe the administration of the Post Office Department can be improved. It may be that many experts have gone over the situation; but, to my knowledge, some of the things they have done were very foolish when they have had the result of cutting out the mail service to some people while at the same time giving others an advantage in that service.

I believe we can modernize and streamline the administration of the Post Office Department. Before the legislation becomes law we should, in my view, look into some of the points made this afternoon by the hon. member for Vancouver East. He gave instances where mail is routed for the benefit of certain carriers. For instance, isolated areas in the Peace river country send their mail to Edmonton for delivery in Vancouver. At the same time, while we have a Canadian National train going to Vancouver every day, we find the mail is sent to Calgary so that the Canadian Pacific can carry it—and possibly make delivery a day later.

Conditions of that kind should be looked into. While I believe we should have adequate mail service, I also believe we should cut out waste before making any addition to our taxation so far as postage rates are concerned. A 50 per cent increase is a stiff one; it is hard to take. While my sympathies are with the minister at this time, in anticipation of the number of questions he will be asked to answer, my sympathies must be transferred to the taxpayers of this country who on April 1 will have to pay their taxes. That date will sneak up on us and we will not know the first thing about it. We are now asked to pay this additional taxation.

In the United States postcards are mailed for two cents. I sent some while I was down there, and became familiar with that fact. We know that in Canada we have to pay three cents. In the United States first-class mail carries a rate of three cents, while in Canada the rate is four cents.

I wonder if any investigation has been made of the system operating in the United States. If not, perhaps we could take a leaf out of their book, because in other matters we seem to follow them to some considerable extent.

I should like to say a word on behalf of those parts of the country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, which in the past have been sadly neglected. I have special reference to the rural post offices as well as the post offices in the small towns. I have received complaints from postmasters who have made applications to the Post Office Department for equipment such as work tables, cancelling machines and the like. An inspector has come along from Edmonton and approved those applications; but when they reached Ottawa they were turned down.

Little things like that would not amount to much, so far as expense is concerned. I would suggest, further, that rural and small town postmasters should be paid decent wages instead of the ones they are receiving at the present time. I have received many complaints in that connection. Then, in those cases where rents are being paid for the use of buildings to house the postal service, I suggest the rates be looked into and elevated to their proper amount, or to a point where they will bear some relationship to other rents paid in those areas. Perhaps these things do not matter very much to some hon. members or to the department. Those of us who live in these districts know very well what is happening.

Take the extra help provided to the post office. I was told last summer by one postmaster that he is allowed 50 cents an hour to pay experienced post office help when he needs extras. I am advised by the hon. member for The Battlefords that they received two cents an hour increase at Christmas. That is not enough. We do not find anybody, even the workmen doing the roughest kind of labouring work in this city or in any other city, working for 50 cents an hour, or for double that amount even. It is time that these things were looked into.

In connection with rural mail, at the present time I have a constituency which covers approximately 7,500 square miles. We do have rural mail service in part of that territory, but in all that territory, with the exception of two rural routes out of the Camrose territory, we have two mails a week. I wonder whether that is good enough for our people, namely, the farmers who are producing the greatest share of wealth in this country. I do not believe it is. They should be taken into consideration when the minister is spending the additional money that he hopes to collect on account of this rate increase.

I do not suppose I should speak longer on this question at this time. A great deal more will be heard on it before the bill is passed. If we must have additional money may I suggest to the government that in order to cut down on car accidents and prevent further loss of life we might transfer some of the taxes obtained from liquor and tobacco. It would also prevent a number of fires that are occurring in this country. These two methods of taxation might be looked into to take the place of the proposed increase. I am not in favour of this increase if there is any other way to obtain the needed revenue. But I do feel that we should continue to have good mail service in this country.

Mr. McIvor: May I make a few remarks? I congratulate the minister on having the courage to bring in an unpopular piece of legislation, even though it is honest and needed.

Mr. Castleden: Right after the election.

Mr. McIvor: There are not many people in Canada who think that our post office is not doing a fine job. I do not think I wrote a letter this year that did not get to its destination, but we want to do everything in such a hurry; we want a letter to get to its destination just a few minutes after we write it.

I know there are a lot of people who did not pay the tax on the cheques, but there are a lot of people in Canada who do not send many letters by air mail or otherwise. The Post Office Department is like any other business; those who use the post office should pay for the service.

When my hon. friend from another part of Ireland was speaking, and he is a real friend of mine, he said he was not going to support this measure if a better way to raise the money could be found. Well, I can suggest another way of helping the post office out. Today we are asking the post office to carry every department of government and to carry every member of the House of Commons and pay for our franking. Let us drop franking and we would have no worry. I do not think that is a very popular suggestion, since I did not see anybody pounding his desk.

Let us think of the Postmaster General and the officials behind him. In my eighteen years' experience I have found the Postmaster General very efficient, and I trust him to be efficient in the future. I would rather pay an extra cent on my mail outside the house than have my franking privilege cancelled.

The Postmaster General will give the facts; he has them, and his officials have them. They have been efficient. I have suggested another way of dealing with our rural mail carriers, but I was not heeded. I shall be at it again on some future occastion, but that is not the question before us at the present time. This resolution should carry one hundred per cent, and I will support it. Thank you.

Mr. Coldwell: May I just say one word, Mr. Chairman? A few minutes ago the hon. member for Vancouver East made some criticism of the manner in which mail is carried between various points, and he referred to an air mail letter that was posted within some twenty-five miles of a city and carried three or four hundred miles away in order that it might be air mailed. I can tell the Postmaster General that I told the hon. member for Vancouver East that story. Several years ago I posted an air mail letter at Asquith, Saskatchewan, which is served by both the Canadian Pacific and Canadian National Railways. The Canadian National Railways had a train running into Saskatoon that same afternoon, and I said to the postmaster: "That letter of course will get out from Saskatoon this evening on the air mail east?" He said: "No; that letter will go to Edmonton to be air mailed east". The Postmaster General and his officials will know of what I am about to say, for I took it up with them several years ago. In the same vicinity you have the Canadian National Railways with its main line running from the east through Saskatoon via Edmonton direct to Vancouver, and yet at the intermediate points at which this train stops—Biggar, for example—no mail is carried. This train carries no mail west of Biggar for the post office because it is sent by the Canadian Pacific Railway line which stops all the way between Saskatoon and Edmonton and then down the C.P.R. line to Calgary and to Vancouver. These are matters that have come to my personal knowledge. I took the latter up with the department and I do not know whether it has been rectified or not.

Mr. Cote: That was some years ago.

Mr. Coldwell: Yes. I hope it has been rectified. It does seem to me that what the hon. member for Vancouver East suggested, namely, a thorough inquiry into the manner in which the mail is carried and the disposition of contracts to the carriers, should be authorized in order to see if it would not facilitate the service first, and second, whether we might not get better rates perhaps because of the shorter hauls. That is something that should be very carefully considered by this house. I want to support the hon. member for Vancouver East who made that suggestion. I am not criticizing the efficiency of the local post offices or of the postal officials. On the whole we have a very efficient staff in our post offices and we always meet with the utmost courtesy and consideration. I would not have it thought for one moment that any criticism of the work of the department was a reflection on the people connected with that service in behalf of the department itself; but I do say to the minister, I believe this whole matter of how contracts have been allocated for the carrying of mail should be carefully gone into and that every attempt should be made to eliminate favouritism or the subsidization of one company in preference to another. Where it is convenient and more expeditious I submit also that an established bus line should be used.

I have another case of this kind in my mind. A few years ago I took up the matter of having the mail from the southern portion of my constituency moved more expeditiously. A bus line runs from Saskatoon right through Kyle and thence down to Swift Current. It seemed most logical to most people that the thing to do, since there were only two trains a week, was to have the mail carried by that bus line. Instead the mail was given to a private contractor in Swift Current who makes a special trip up to Kyle and then back to Swift Current. It may be my imagination or perhaps evil thought that as the bus line happened to be publicly owned by the province of Saskatchewan there was an aversion to dealing with a publicly-owned institution. To a good many other people that also seemed to be the case.

I believe that the whole matter of the carrying of the mail and contracts should be thoroughly investigated, as well as other facets of the Post Office Department. We want the best service we can get. I believe we have a good staff, and poor service reflects on a good staff. We should not allow that reflection to remain if we can possibly avoid it.

Mr. Cote: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate very much what has just been said by the leader of the C.C.F. party. I am glad he has thrown some light on what happened a few years ago. As was suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver East, after many months of work a report was submitted by J. D. Woods & Gordon Limited, a well-known firm in Toronto who are experts in this line. They studied the whole system and gave a managerial report thereon. Their work was started before I came into the department and the report was received only after I had been there a few months. The implementation of their recommendations was started a short while ago and is still being carried on.

I think the hon. member for Vancouver East has confused C.P.A. with T.C.A. As a matter of fact, air mail is not carried from Vancouver by C.P.A.; it goes by T.C.A. With other cases which may be brought to my attention, I shall look into this. As I said before, we try to correct any errors or defects that are pointed out. Every official in the department has instructions to speed up such matters and try to find ways of correcting any defects.

This discussion is very interesting and the debate may point out some weaknesses in the organization. But it does not change our problem. This resolution is to amend the Post Office Act to increase the postal rate. We may not like doing that; I do not like it myself, but I do not see any other way out. As I think I have said already, I do not think there is any other way that would be equitable.

If we are to deal with this matter realistically I think we will realize that the individual who does not use the mail should not be asked to pay for those who use the mail in a big way. It would not be fair to ask the stenographer in the House of Commons or a worker to bear a share of postage costs of large firms who must face such costs in the carrying on of their business. So far no one has convinced me that this argument is wrong.

So long as we accept the principle that we must pay our expenditures, whether we like it or not I think we will have to go along with it. It is not an easy thing to do. As was suggested a few minutes ago, it is not a popular thing. However, I am not here to do just the popular thing, I am here to do my duty and I feel it my duty to introduce this resolution because I think it is in the interests of this parliament and of the Canadian public.

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Chairman, listening to the explanations just given by the minister this afternoon I could not help going back to a remark made by a colleague of mine who said that the minister was such a charming man that the explanations he gave always convinced him that he was right until he could get away to think about them, at which time he came back to his original opinion.

This is an important matter we are dealing with. Our whole social organization has come to depend to a large degree upon the mail. Business in all its branches, the whole nervous system of the modern state, depends upon the quick transmission of information and ideas. We could not have arrived where we are today if it had not been for a reasonably effective international postal system. But this means that the indirect effect of any change in our postal system, even though it be small, is sometimes quite extensive or almost completely incalculable.

The Post Office Department is our largest civil government department, and this has been so throughout most of our history. The minister seems to feel that there are some 50,000 employees in the department, but I think the figure is just under 44,000. In the light of other things I have seen in this house, I am not surprised at the possibility of there being another 6,000 employees in the Post Office Department which the minister knows nothing about.

Of necessity our postal service must be a government monopoly. I do not think anyone could see anything wrong in that since the logic of the facts demands that that be so. But there is one thing we must remember. We should be as cautious with a government monopoly as with any other kind of monopoly. We must examine its actions very carefully in this house because we can be quite sure that there is no combines investigation legislation to look into the actions of the Post Office Department. I hope to show later on in my remarks this afternoon what can happen when you have two government monopolies working together, one in the field of transporting the mail and the other in the field of charging for the handling of the mail. It makes a very interesting and sorrowful picture from the viewpoint of the taxpayers of Canada.

The history of this department is a proud and interesting one. As you go back you find that the first carriage of letters in Canada occurred shortly after the British capture of Quebec. Interestingly enough, we find that at that time a letter posted in Montreal on Monday evening arrived in Quebec on Wednesday morning. From various indications I have seen, we have not made a great deal of progress since, at least on that particular route. However, at that time there was another service which was definitely inferior to anything we have today because it took almost thirty days to get a letter from Quebec to Halifax. I congratulate the Postmaster General on having improved that service.

Even as early as 1800 the subject of post office surpluses was a subject for debate, primarily on the question of whether they arose from one class of mail or another, and since I will be dealing with these surpluses in detail in my remarks it is interesting to note that the history of this contentious subject goes back as far as that.

There is another little item of history of direct interest to us today and that is the fact that the early post offices before confederation were operated under the direction of the Postmaster General in London, and he instructed his deputies in Canada to operate only those routes which were economically profitable. The result was that the various provinces, in order to give what they considered adequate service, were driven to making grants-in-aid so that certain other routes could be operated. It is interesting to note that an authority on the subject, Mr. A. D. Smith, in his book "The Development of Rates of Postage", states, on this question of grants-in-aid:

> This development is noteworthy. It has always been found in Canada that for a large part of the country the circumstances are such a postal service adequate to the necessities of the inhabitants cannot be self-supporting, but the legislature has never hesitated to make grants from general taxation in order to provide means of communication.

If the minister has read this book I want to forestall him. I admit immediately it was published just before 1920, but the history of the department, as I shall show in a moment, bears out the statement made by this authority.

The question of the amount of the increase in rates is interesting. Instead of examining it from the viewpoint of the present rate to the proposed rate, let us look at it between 1942 and the date of the proposed rate. In 1942 our local rate was 2 cents for the first ounce. It is now proposed to make it 4 cents—an increase in the past twelve years of 100 per cent on local mail. In 1942 the long distance rate was 3 cents. It is proposed to make it 5 cents, an increase of 66⅔ per cent.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that this increase far outstrips the increase over that period in the cost of living, and the increase we have seen in almost any other field of endeavour, or the increases which business has seen fit to put into practice. These increases are tremendous.

Even as late as 1951 we had a 100 per cent increase in our third-class mail—the second-class mail situation is hardly susceptible to debate here in so far as rate increases are concerned because of its complexity.

Now, let us turn for a moment and look at the fascinating financial history of the Post Office Department. We find that from 1869 to 1901 the department had a clear record —a deficit every year. From 1902 to 1932 it had twenty-two surpluses totalling $30,970,000, and nine deficits totalling $21,480,000. In other words, in this intermediate period in the second thirty years of its operation it was coming somewhere near breaking even.

From 1934 to 1953, the last twenty years, the department has had eighteen surpluses, totalling $94,658,000 and it has had two tiny deficits totalling $1,495,000. I will have occasion to refer to this later on, but I cannot emphasize this point too much, that the post office has turned from a department which was on a break-even basis—it was offering services to the public of Canada on an even keel—to a department which year after year after year has piled up surpluses and it has amassed money which it is putting into the treasury of Canada.

I also want to put on the record, Mr. Chairman, the figures for the past five years. In 1953 there was a surplus of $6,470,000—I am giving round figures—in 1952 the surplus was $6,649,000; in 1951 somebody made a mistake and there was a deficit of $1,327,000; and in 1950 there was a surplus of $1,889,000; and in 1949 a surplus of $2,976,000.

Let us examine the effect of an increase which happened in the past in the Post Office Department so that we can evaluate the possible effect of this proposed increase.

In 1943 the rate for both local and out-of-town first-class mail was raised to the present rate although other rates remained the same as is proposed under the new procedure. The gross revenue of the department, which had been going up slowly but steadily, and which had increased $3,698,000 the previous year, jumped $13,829,000 the first year of this increase, and the surplus, which had been $4,127,000 the previous year, was $12,586,000 the next year.

If you want to see it even more clearly, the surplus for the five years preceding the rate increase averaged $2,028,000, and for the five years following the rate increase the surplus averaged $10,707,000. There was five times as great a surplus arising out of this tiny one-cent increase in the letter rate.

Now, to get to just one or two other figures on which I will subsequently draw, we have the fascinating case of the carriage of air mail by Trans-Canada Air Lines, the government's private airways. Every month the post office pays the Trans-Canada Air Lines $487,000 for air mail carriage in Canada and the United States. I am dealing only with domestic air mail and not overseas. Just to get the figures on the record, let us see what happens to T.C.A. as a result of these payments. In 1952 T.C.A. received a total revenue of $44,012,000 of which $5,844,000 was for air mail. Their profit was $1,625,000. In other words, if the revenue from the air mail was deducted—I will develop this subsequently to show just how much larger this revenue to T.C.A. is than it should be—T.C.A.'s revenue would consistently show an operating loss, because in the past five years—I do not want to take time to put the figures on the record —the revenue from the carriage of air mail has been from three to five times the amount of profit T.C.A. has made.

For those of us who want to do a job of evaluating the post office system it is difficult to study it adequately because it is not completely operated and accounted for in the way that would be adopted with regard to an ordinary business. For example, certain costs of the department are not charged to them. The most outstanding example is the cost of its buildings. It gets them free from the Department of Public Works. On the other hand, the department is burdened with the perfectly legitimate costs of other departments, to the tune of over $4 million a year through the use of franking. In the third place, when you come to discuss individual types of mail carriage, you find that you cannot differentiate very successfully between first and third-class, air mail, local and long-distance, since stamps of the same denomination or a combination thereof might be used for any type of carriage.

Another factor is that 32 per cent of our long-distance mail is now carried by air, of which 7 per cent is paid for at air-mail rates and 25 per cent is paid for at regular rates but is carried by air. Then, to increase these complications, we have the business of the excise tax, a tax which apparently comes off before an election in one department and in one field and goes on following an election in another field and in another way. In my short tenure in this house or in the study I have made of the matter, I have never before seen anything which was more closely related than is this business of taking a tax off before an election and putting it back on immediately following an election. I certainly was glad to see the tax come off. I agree that the excise tax should be off cheques. But when, previously, has a minister of the government had the audacity to stand up in the house and say, regarding a measure of the government introduced immediately preceding an election and which had cost the government revenue, that that revenue was going to be recaptured by introducing another tax at the first session of the house following the election? I do not think that has ever been done before in our history. I do not think anybody has ever had the audacity to do it.

Despite the complications, we certainly know that the rate structure of the post office is designed to charge more for one type of letter than for another. The book to which I referred earlier says this:

> The penny rate for the ordinary letter, though so moderate, is considerably in excess of the average cost even of long-distance letters. Its maintenance, therefore, depends not on economic, but on general political and financial considerations. The question is, what general considerations shall be allowed to govern the rate? Shall it be fixed on the simple basis of cost and revenue or shall it be fixed at such a level as to yield a surplus revenue?

We can see this in the case of newspaper rates, or the second-class rates, because in those cases the post office has a deficit. I quote here from the evidence of the deputy postmaster general given before a committee of this house last year:

> The newspapers, even after an increase was put into effect in 1951 for handling them, still pay next to nothing for the service they get. This handling brings about a deficit of about $13½ million annually.

There is nothing wrong with the fact that there should be a deficit for the handling of newspapers through our post office. It is right that the government of Canada, at the expense of the taxpayers, should do everything possible to see that information is disseminated as widely as possible and is carried from one end of this country to the other. We must keep our people informed. We must distribute these newspapers and magazines because of their cultural interest. We must do it because we have, with public funds, brought into being a great radio and television system which we are subsidizing, and this system is certainly in competition with the newspapers and the magazines. There is every reason in the world why this $13½ million should be spent for what it is being spent for, but there is absolutely no reason why it should be charged to other users of the post office services. We should not load one class of mail with the costs of another class but we should rather bring out into the open and pay from general government revenues any special costs of this kind in the operation of a department.

Certainly the Post Office Department is trying to stay within its revenues. That fact can be seen very clearly. I refer again to the evidence of the deputy postmaster general when he appeared before that committee on rural routes last year and when he said:

> We have followed the policy of trying to stay within revenues. You can never do so exactly. Sometimes we get a profit and sometimes a loss, but by and large the policy is to try and have services paid for by users rather than impose it as a tax through income tax or other devices.

A policy of trying to stay within revenues! Mr. Chairman, if a policy of trying to stay within revenues is one that results, over a twenty-year period, in a total surplus of some $90 million, either the policy is wrong or the interpretation of it is wrong. I do not know which it is, but I certainly know that when you make $90 million over a period of twenty years, and when you make $6 million and sometimes $12 million a year through the operation of your department, you are going far beyond the principle which has been set out by the minister this afternoon and by others of his associates in information such as this which we have set out before us. I admit that the deputy minister is quite right when he says he can never stay within revenues exactly, but I think $90 million is much too far away from being exact.

As to air mail, this resolution proposes to eliminate all air mail postage special rates and to carry all forward letters by air where delivery can be speeded. This is a commendable idea but it is not as significant as it may seem. In the first place a great deal of the mail can be handled more expeditiously by train or by surface transportation than by air. I need only mention all the mail between Montreal and Toronto or within 300 miles of any central point, where it is loaded onto the train at night, is sorted while it is travelling and is delivered more quickly the next day.

We have already noted that almost one-third—32 per cent—of our mail is now going by air and that only 7 per cent of our air mail is actually prepaid as air mail. So do not let us think by any manner of means that this is a useful gesture or one which means a great deal. Let us not think that the Messiah has come down from on high and is now taking off the seven cent tax on air mail, something which will benefit every one of the citizens of Canada. It may be presented in such a way but it certainly is not so. In fact, I think that in the light of the things I have set forth it is highly unlikely that any really sound improvement or advantage is going to come from the proposed reduction in the air mail rate. Let us examine the weaknesses of the agreement with Trans-Canada Air Lines. It costs the Post Office Department at the present time approximately $1.20 a ton mile to ship mail by T.C.A. T.C.A. will carry freight at approximately 30 cents a ton mile, so the Post Office Department is paying four times as much for exactly the same type of cargo as commercial business or the man who is shipping freight by air. What does this show us in the over-all operation of this air line? How does the Post Office Department become implicated in it? It becomes implicated in it because in 1952, 59 per cent of the freight and express paid only 36 per cent of the air line's revenue from freight express and mail. Everything else was loaded on the post office.

Not only is this inequitable, not only is it most unfair, not only is this one of the major reasons why the department is in the position it is today, but it is an example of what happens when two nice little government monopolies get together. The government-operated air line needs some revenue at this point so it can make a good showing and not have a loss. Therefore the minister concerned comes along and presumably makes a private deal, certainly not one in the eyes of the public, with the minister responsible for the Post Office Department. They probably spend fifteen or twenty minutes over the thing. They work out their mutual problems, and we end up with the taxpayers being loaded with this burden which is transferred down through the Post Office Department.

As far as I can see, there has been absolutely no public discussion of this agreement, and this is in such marked contrast to what has taken place south of the border that I think it should be brought out into the open. I do not think any of us on this side of the house like these little private government deals by which two departments work out something so that they can put the best face on things as far as the public is concerned and so that they can bail themselves out when they get into difficulty. Here is a book of 400 pages entitled "Air Mail Payment and the Government" which is concerned solely with the practice in the United States. I should like to quote a few words from page 102 as to their rate-making technique with respect to the charges which are made to the post office for the carrying of mail. The extract reads as follows:

> The examiner studied the record of the hearing with a view to making a "proposed report". Fortunately for the examiners the record was usually short in comparison with the records of long drawn out rate cases in other utilities. The longest record contained 1,975 pages, the shortest about twenty-five, and the average case only about 250.

I would love to know the length of the record by virtue of which the agreement between T.C.A. and the Post Office Department was made and how much examination was given to the facts of the case. I do not think that is the sort of thing that can be brought out publicly and laid before this house. I do not think anyone would dare because I do not see how it is possible for them to defend a case in which post office mail is carried at four times the rate for exactly similar commodities being airlifted for private firms or other organizations.

Mr. Hardie: Will the hon. member permit a question? He quoted a T.C.A. rate of 30 cents a ton mile. Is that the air cargo rate or is that the express rate?

Mr. Hamilton: That is the air freight rate. The other is an estimate made from the Post Office Department report and the T.C.A. report.

Mr. Hardie: I presume that air cargo is carried at that rate when space is available, but the rate paid by the Post Office Department is paid by it so that mail will be given immediate consideration on all aircraft. Is that not true?

Mr. Hamilton: As I understand it, air mail is carried on Trans-Canada Air Lines in two ways. If it is prepaid, in other words, at the seven-cent rate, it automatically goes by air. If it is not prepaid it is treated on the same basis as air cargo, and since only 7 per cent of air mail is prepaid whereas another 25 per cent is carried at normal postal rates I would assume that the situation with respect to air cargo and air mail is very similar. However, I have no doubt that the Postmaster General will be good enough to explain that to us as time goes on.

I should like to say just a word, because I did cover the matter previously in an earlier speech, on the question of deliveries of mail. What a miserable situation it is that great areas of our country, major portions of our cities, important business communities, important sections of important business communities, should be denied adequate mail delivery, and should be told that they have to get by with one delivery a day.

Streets where you have store after store after store and business after business after business adjacent to each other are, in many cases, denied twice daily delivery. They have to work out other methods. They have to supplement the work of the Post Office Department with the work of their own staffs in order to be able to get their mail on time and deal with it adequately.

This and many other things are a reflection of what seems to be a general decline in the standards of the post office service in the last number of years. I do not think that it is necessarily a decline due to the members of the staff at the lower level, because most of them have been in their positions for many years. But the decline is taking place and we must search for the cause somewhere. Since the only place where there seems to be some change is in the top people in the department, and particularly the minister, perhaps we should examine the minister. However, I would suggest that if the minister feels so inclined he might be brave enough to let us have access to the Woods-Gordon report to which he has referred. As I understand it, that was a study of certain aspects of the operation of the post office, and I believe it has never been tabled in the house.

Mr. Cote: It was a managerial report. We only have a few copies, but if my hon. friend will come to my office I will be glad to let him see it.

Mr. Hamilton: I think we might get a great deal of interesting information from it and I shall be delighted to see it. Thank you for the offer.

Summarizing what I have tried to set before the house today, may I say that, first, the government has used the post office to pile up huge surpluses in the past twenty years in direct contradiction of the policy of the Post Office Department in previous years; second, the government, for reasons best known to itself, has forced the post office to subsidize the operation of Trans-Canada Air Lines in order that Trans-Canada Air Lines might show a profit; third, the government, through excessive use of the franking privilege by its various departments, is burdening the post office with costs of other departments; fourth, that the users of first-class mail are being forced to pay more than the cost of their service in order to subsidize losses on other classes of mail which are quite legitimate, but which should be properly charged to the general revenue of the government; fifth, that this government is not giving adequate or sufficient postal service at the present time; and, sixth, that the government and the Postmaster General seem to have made no demonstrated case at the present time that the proposed increases are required.

For these reasons I am opposed most definitely to the legislation now before the House of Commons.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I rise at this moment only on a question of privilege. I wish to make it clear that I do not raise this point of privilege in any feeling of anger—perhaps it is more one of sorrow than of anger. But I do think the record should be kept straight.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Before the hon. member states his point of privilege, is it not a fact that a question of privilege should be raised when the house is sitting and Mr. Speaker is in the chair?

An hon. Member: Quite right.

Mr. Knowles: I draw to your attention the fact that this point of privilege which I wish to raise has to do with an incorrect statement concerning this afternoon's vote; in other words it has to do with the very matter we are discussing right now. And, from the laughter on the other side of the house, I should think that most members know what I have in mind.

The afternoon issue of the Ottawa Journal states that it was the P.C.'s who forced the vote which we had a while ago on the question of increasing the postal rates. We are fully aware of the fact that the Conservatives are just as much opposed to this increase as we are, and have expressed strong views against it. But let the Journal keep the record straight. Surely they know that it was the C.C.F. which forced the vote against this measure.

Mr. Noseworthy: Mr. Chairman, I am sure every member in the house agrees with the minister that probably more revenue is needed by the Post Office Department by reason of the introduction of the forty-hour week and the increased remuneration for postal employees. We have no quarrel with him on that point.

Our quarrel is with the principle he laid down that the Post Office Department should be a paying concern, that everyone agrees with that principle, and with the ideas in that connection he expressed. We disagree with him in what he describes as the equitable way of bearing the cost of the Post Office Department. He says the most equitable way is for the users of a service to pay for that service. We know that in the session of 1951, when the Postmaster General came before the house and pointed out that there was a deficit of something more than $20 million in the service rendered by his department to the newspapers and periodicals by way of second-class material, and at that time proposed to raise the postal rates, everyone in the house agreed that those who were using the service—that is, the newspapers and periodical publishers—should not be required, by way of increased postal rates, to make up on newspapers and periodicals the deficit then existing.

We recognized that there was a service to the community at large. The question is: should the users of first-class mail be saddled with that deficit? In 1950 and 1951 the reports given by the Post Office Department set out graphically a breakdown of the postal dollar received and spent. That information is omitted from the 1953 report, and I am going to ask the minister to give us similar information for that year. We see that in 1951, out of every postal dollar received, 53 cents came in from ordinary first-class letters. Only 35 cents of the postal dollar was spent in connection with servicing that first-class mail. Here was a surplus of 18 cents on every postal dollar, or roughly $36 million surplus in that year. The users of the first-class mail service paid into the Post Office Department approximately $36 million more than the first-class mail service cost the Post Office Department. In that same year there was a deficit from the service given in respect of newspapers and periodicals amounting to about $28 million.

I do not know what change has taken place. We raised the rates slightly for newspapers and periodicals; but in recognition of the fact that it was in the best interests of our society that we should subsidize that particular service, the government modified its original bill and raised the rates less than it had intended originally. This was by way of a concession to the principle that we were justified in subsidizing that particular post office service.

Is there anything equitable in asking the users of first-class mail to bear the brunt of that subsidy? In that same year of 1951 we see that two and one-half cents out of every postal dollar was spent on franking, making a total of something over $4 million. There, again, are we justified in asking those who are using the ordinary mail service and who are sending first-class mail to bear the cost of the franking privileges exercised by the government? Are we justified in asking those people to pay an extra $4 million for the government franking service and about $20 million by way of a subsidy to the newspapers and periodicals?

If we are to accept the principle that those who use the postal service should pay for it, then we would certainly have to increase drastically the rates paid by, for instance, Life magazine, to mention only one. But that principle has never been recognized. As I have said, I feel there is no call at this time to add another $14 million to the amount to be paid by the users of the first-class mail privileges in order to pay the subsidy which the Post Office Department is paying to the newspapers and periodicals, by the franking privilege and in other ways.

Will the minister tell us what the revenue from ordinary letter mail was in 1953; what the expenditure on ordinary mail was; what the revenue from newspapers and periodicals was and what the cost to the post office of that service was, so that we may get that picture straight for 1953 as it was given for 1950 and 1951?

Mr. Thatcher: Very briefly I should like to join with hon. members who have this afternoon protested against the increase in postage rates. In my opinion the Postmaster General did an excellent job of presenting the arguments for a very weak case.

What does this legislation ask for? Specifically, it asks parliament to increase the general postage rates by one cent. Actually the legislation is much more significant than it appears to be on the surface. Apparently for the first time since the last election, the government is going to embark on a new program of heavier taxation. Today the government is asking parliament to approve legislation, which in effect will force the hard-pressed Canadian taxpayer to dig down in his pockets for another $14 million.

What is the reason that the minister gives us for bringing in this legislation? He argues that the post office must be kept self-sustaining. He says that if it is to be self-sustaining, he must have another $14 million. Personally, I cannot accept that point of view without qualification.

Of course everybody would like to see the post office balance its books; but it seems to me that the main function of the post office is to provide essential public service, and not be a revenue producer. I believe that when this tax bill or any other tax bill comes before parliament we as members should look to the over-all financial picture, and not just to the revenue and expenditure position of one specific department. If today we look at the over-all picture, what do we find? Does this government need an extra $14 million in revenue? The answer is a very emphatic "no".

I remind the committee that for the past seven years the government has had very heavy and very substantial surpluses. These surpluses have reached the approximate total of $2·5 billion. I also remind the committee that these surpluses have been achieved, despite the fact that at the end of each fiscal year the minister has been able to bury a few hundred million dollars in such funds as the "civil service superannuation fund", "the reserve for possible loss on the ultimate realization of active assets" and others. There is every indication that these annual surpluses are continuing.

If any hon. member will look over the accounts it will be obvious to him that we shall have another large surplus this year. According to the reports from the Department of Finance, in the first seven months of this fiscal year, Canada had a surplus of $266 million. In other words, up to the end of October the minister took $266 million more from the taxpayers than he needed. Yet despite that fantastic surplus the government today has the audacity to come to parliament and say: "We need another $14 million". I say that this postage increase is unwarranted; it is unnecessary and in my opinion would be harmful to the best interests of the country. It should be rejected by this parliament. If the minister needs more revenue for the post office, let him take it from the huge surplus which the over-all revenue accounts are bound to have at the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. Pouliot: Before this resolution carries I have a few remarks to make. At first sight it must be unpopular on account of the fact that taxes are always unpopular. It is very easy to deliver a speech saying that there is great taxation and that there should be less. But last year there was less taxation in the Post Office Department, because stamps were removed from cheques, drafts, notes, and so forth. It is true that it was a measure that was initiated by the Department of National Revenue, and that we were supposed to affix national excise stamps to negotiable instruments; but most people used postage stamps for that purpose. If the abolition of that tax did not affect the post office apparently, it did materially; and since the tax that represented the postage stamps on negotiable instruments no longer exists it means that last year there was a reduction of taxation in the Post Office Department. That is the first point.

The second point is this. How many people will be affected by this measure? A very small number. It is true that the new tax will have to be paid by those who write letters; but how many people have an extensive correspondence? How many people write more than one or a few letters daily? In each constituency there is a large number of people who think a lot before writing a letter. They put their hand ceremoniously on the pen handle and they dip it in the inkstand and write the letter, and they also affix the stamp ceremoniously on the letter. They do not write many letters. I know that sometimes I have to wait a long time to receive an answer to my letters, although they are sent by Her Majesty's mail from the House of Commons. It happens so often that frequently I have to supply a stamped envelope to get an early answer. It is not because people are neglectful; it is because they have not the time to write. How often do we apologize, sir, in answering a letter, for the delay. Sometimes we meet friends and then we are quite embarrassed. We say to them: "You sent me quite a nice letter. I apologize for being so long in answering you, and I hope you will pardon me." Everybody knows that that is so. It happens to everybody. To be honest, sir, how many of your constituents and mine have an extensive correspondence, a correspondence that can be compared with that of any hon. member in the House of Commons? There are very few. Therefore the tax will not be a heavy imposition on a large number of Canadians. That is the second point.

The third point is that those who have heavy mail will have the opportunity to charge the cost of the stamps against their income tax returns. Any company or individual spending $1,000, $2,000, $5,000 or more for the purchase of postage stamps can deduct that amount, along with other office expenses, from income for income tax purposes. This expenditure will not affect revenue or profit; it will not be deducted from revenue but from income for income tax purposes.

My fourth point is that no serious complaint has been made of the administration of the Post Office Department. I am satisfied that the letters that I send reach their destination and that the letters sent to me come to me. It is easy to complain that the service is not satisfactory because it takes so long for a letter to go from one point or another. The fault may lie with the people writing the letters waiting until after the mail carrier has gone before mailing their letters.

In the larger communities the number of deliveries per day has been reduced from two to one. That may create some inconvenience, but the mail is delivered as early as possible. Large corporations, companies and many individuals engaged in business have post office boxes from which they can get their mail any hour of the day as it comes off the trains. This is most convenient.

Because of the requests of the unions the work week is not as long as it was before. As a result the department requires more men. I have written many times to the Postmaster General asking him to adjust the payments made to the mail carriers, and I suppose all hon. members have done the same thing. All this costs money. I regret that I did not receive a favourable answer early enough and as a result have had to write quite often and thus my file dealing with the adjustment of mail contracts has grown fatter and fatter.

These people need to be well paid. When the minister was faced with a decrease of revenue in his department he sponsored legislation to adjust mail carrier contracts. That move was supported by all parties in the house. There was no objection to it, but now we have to pay for it. We cannot eat our cake and have it too.

I do not think anything serious has been said this afternoon against the proposal except the fiery speech of the hon. member from Montreal who tried to create the impression that it was the Progressive Conservative party rather than the C.C.F. which had initiated the vote this afternoon.

I listened to the remarks of the hon. and gracious member for Hamilton West. My knowledge of the English language is rather limited, but I think I understood her to indicate that she was not supporting the minister's resolution. Her remarks were quite technical in nature and I could not possibly memorize them and therefore I am not in a position to answer her.

To conclude, as it is about time to do so, I wonder if there is any other country where a letter carrying an ordinary stamp goes air mail. I was struck with the statement of the minister that he hopes in future to have all letters carried by air. As I say, I wonder if that is done by any other country. If not, then Canada is in advance of all countries in the postal union.

This is most important because of the great distances between our coasts, between Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and British Columbia. We should be able to keep in touch with each other in the easiest manner and shortest time. This has been done and I congratulate the minister upon his accomplishments. I believe that in spite of what has been said, much of which I have not understood, everybody is satisfied.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I believe that those of us on this side of the house would like to express to the Postmaster General our sympathy for him in having to present this resolution to the house, and having the task of piloting it through. After all, it did so happen that the announcement that there would be this increase in the postage rates was made by the Minister of Finance on December 8, 1953, when the Postmaster General was not even here. He was down in New York at the United Nations representing Canada. Then, two days later, on December 10, another colleague of his, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, moved the resolution at its first stage, that stage when the approval of the Governor General was announced, and that put the resolution on the order paper to be dealt with later. Now, when it is dealt with, it is the Postmaster General who has the unpopular task of trying to sell the house this proposal for an increase in the postage rates.

During the attempt the Postmaster General made this afternoon to defend this increase he referred a number of times to the fact that there had been a loss in post office revenue because of the removal of the tax on cheques, which was effected in the budget of last year. When the Postmaster General was pressed as to what that loss was he said, subject to correction, that it was around $7 million or perhaps $7½ million. Later I understood him to suggest that the figure might be $10 million altogether and I take it when he was quoting that figure he had in mind the loss in the purchase of postage stamps for use on cheques as about $7½ million and the rest of that loss as due to the discontinuance of the little blue excise stamps, which I take it came from another department.

Mr. Cote: Perhaps I may complete my views on that subject. We had a surplus last year of $6½ million and this year we are going to have a deficit of $1 million. This deficit will result through the loss of $7½ million by the cancellation of the excise tax. The balance of the amount of $10 million mentioned, I have to conclude, is made up of blue stamps, but as far as we are concerned the postal service loss is $7½ million.

Mr. Knowles: The minister and I have said exactly the same thing. In so far as the Postmaster General's department is concerned the loss in revenue from the cancellation of that tax was of the order of $7 million, and the additional loss arises from the fact that the blue excise stamps are no longer being purchased.

But may I draw to the attention of the Postmaster General and to other members of the house the fact that there has not yet been a full year's experience without the stamps on cheques. As a matter of fact, when the Minister of Finance presented his budget last year, on February 19, he gave an estimate as to what would be the loss in revenue for a full twelve-month period from the cancellation of that tax on cheques. That estimate of the Minister of Finance can be found at page 2134 of Hansard, dated February 19, 1953, and the figure given by the minister was $12 million. I realize there is a difference between $12 and $14, but these figures are awfully close together. Here we have the Minister of Finance telling us last February, just before an election, that he was prepared to cancel the stamp tax on cheques at a loss of $12 million. As soon as the election is over the same Minister of Finance announces he will recoup that loss by asking the Postmaster General to collect an additional $14 million a year by an increase in the postal rates.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that we on this side of the house who are drawing attention to this fact are pointing to something that is very real, namely, the way in which this government juggles with figures and juggles with these taxes, particularly at election time. Actually what we have here is the removal of a tax just before an election and putting it on again just after. To put it on under precisely the same name would be a little too raw even for this government, so the name is changed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Chairman: I wonder if the hon. member would direct his attention to the imposition of this tax and not to the removal of another.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I am merely following the remarks of the Postmaster General himself. He said several times and said it again just now that one of the reasons it was necessary to put on this extra tax and raise an extra $14 million was because of the loss sustained due to the fact that people no longer have to buy stamps to put on cheques. Even before you rose, sir, I had made my point, but perhaps I can make it again. What we have here in the imposition of this increase in the postage rates is simply the reimposition of a tax that was taken off just before the election.

Mr. Forgie: Is not that good bookkeeping to place the liability where it belongs?

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member wants to know if it is good bookkeeping. It is political bookkeeping; it is cyclical bookkeeping, related to the election.

Mr. Forgie: Could the hon. member point to anything that is good on this side of the house?

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Knowles: Some day I will take a week off and try to find something.

Mr. Forgie: The noisy geese that gabble o'er the pool.

Mr. Knowles: At any rate, Mr. Chairman, the uneasiness felt on that side of the house is a recognition by Liberal members that what we are charging is perfectly correct, that this is simply to make up for a loss that was sustained just before the election, and the purpose of that was pretty clear.

An hon. Member: For political purposes.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I think that those who in taking part in this debate, like the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre, have underlined the fact that government finances have to be looked at in their entirety in order to place things in the proper light are perfectly correct. There is no use talking about a deficit that has to be recouped by a tax like this when the government is still piling up surpluses.

The Postmaster General makes the argument that the people who use the mails should be the ones who pay for it. If he is going to use that argument I would draw particular attention to the use that is made of the postal service by newspapers and periodicals, for which they do not pay the full cost. I will not go further than that. One of my colleagues will have some interesting and very pertinent statistics to lay before the house on that point.

But at any rate the minister says that if the post office is financed in such a way that there is a deficit, that has to be made up out of general revenue, and that that would be a case of making the people who did not use the mails pay for those who did. May I suggest that there is a very close relationship between the incomes of people and the question of whether they use the mails. When you talk about people who do not write very many letters, they are the people whose incomes are low. They are not paying directly into the general funds of the country because they have not sufficient income to put them in the income tax bracket. If deficits are incurred by the post office which have to be met out of the general revenue, I suggest that the burden of those deficits will fall on those who are in the income tax brackets, both individuals and corporations, and that that is a fairer way in which to deal with the financing of a service of this kind.

Earlier this afternoon the Postmaster General said that nobody had tried to meet that argument. I think I have met it. I think that this matter should be looked upon not as a commercial operation that has to stand on its own feet but rather as a service to the nation to be treated as one of many services, with the financing of it to be looked at in the light of the whole picture.

The Postmaster General tells us that the increased postage rate will result in this increased revenue of $14 million. In arriving at that estimate I wonder whether he has taken into account the fact that there will be some falling off in the use of the mails. As the cost of any product goes up, there is a tendency for less of that product to be purchased.

Another question I raise is this. The Postmaster General says that there will be $14 million increased revenue to the Post Office Department by virtue of these increases in postal rates. I do not know what percentage of the postal business is done by business firms as compared with that done by private individuals but I imagine that business mail constitutes the lion's share of the mail of this country. But even if only half of the mail is business mail, that means that $7 million out of this $14 million which is anticipated will be paid by business firms. Most business firms are already paying corporation income tax. Therefore you have to assume that there will be these further exemptions claimed, perhaps for that additional $7 million, and if the rate of taxation is 30 per cent, 40 per cent or 50 per cent, you are going to lose another $2 million, $3 million or $3½ million in income tax by virtue of this extra charge that is made by the imposition of this increased rate. Hence the gain to the Post Office Department will be a loss to the Department of National Revenue in the collection of income tax and we shall have some more juggling which may well result, of course, when another election comes around, in a reduction of the postage rate once again.

There is one other comment I wish to make with regard to this increase, and it arises out of the fact that the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace this afternoon referred to the fact that in 1942 the postage rate on first-class letters going from one city to another was only 3 cents. He pointed out that the rate was raised in that year from 3 cents to 4 cents, and now it is being raised again from 4 cents to 5 cents. There is in that procedure a bit of a trick which hon. members should recognize. When the rate was raised from 3 cents to 4 cents in 1942 in the case of letters going from one area to another or from 2 cents to 3 cents in the case of letters within the same area, that raise was made not by the Postmaster General of that day and not by the Post Office Department. It was made by Mr. Ilsley. The then Minister of Finance put that extra cent on as a tax to raise money for purposes of the war. I well remember how Mr. Ilsley made it clear time and time again that the charge for mailing letters, in so far as post office revenue was concerned, had not been increased but that a war tax of one cent had been put on the 2 cent rate making it 3 cents, and on the 3 cent rate making it 4 cents.

The fact that that one cent was a tax obtained right down until 1951. It is only two and a half years ago, when the Post Office Act was being amended, that that increased amount—that tax—was built into the actual postage rate. Down until 1951 the official postage rate was still 2 cents and 3 cents, with one cent tax; but in 1951 the 2 cents was raised to 3 cents and the 3 cents was raised to 4 cents. Now, only two and a half years later, we are getting this further raise to 4 cents and 5 cents. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that all of the statements that have been made about the percentage of increase involved in these higher wages are well put. In fact, I believe that the story is even worse than members have suggested thus far and that this is a resolution which this committee should turn down.

Mr. Small: Mr. Chairman, as I followed the reasons for the increase in the postal rates advanced by the Postmaster General, they are the five-day week or the forty-hour week at a cost of $5 million; the increase in wages that is involved in the amount of $7 million, and for the rural mail $1,500,000, amounting to approximately $13,500,000. He has endeavoured to assess the approximate cost of the service for the next year. As to the introduction of the five-day week or the forty-hour week, I do not think that matter is as serious a one as he is trying to portray it to this committee. The purpose behind the five-day week or the forty-hour week is to create more employment, to do away with overtime, and to do away with matters that cause excessive cost. By putting on more men you will improve the service and it will not be at too great a cost.

The matter of increased wages of $7 million involves, as has been stated by the Postmaster General, some 50,000 people. If you will scan the record, you will find it is not the first time that the salaries of the postal service have had to be increased in the period of the last twenty years, and as to any increase that has been made in the past, the revenues have been sufficient to take care of it. Why should there now be such great alarm about an increase in wages? If the revenue in the past has taken care of the increase, why should it not take care of it in the future? That consideration applies likewise to the rural mail in the matter of wages.

In making his presentation to the committee the Postmaster General elaborated on the fact that an investigation was going on with regard to improvement of the services. That is something that remains to be seen. In his plea for an increase in rates he said that there would be very few who would not agree with him. I think it has been well established here that there is a great deal of disagreement with him. I think it is quite evident to everyone present that the inadequacy of the services has been established, particularly with regard to those who live in or who are representing what may be called suburban constituencies. I represent one that is one-third suburban.

The service is far from what is desired as to postal collection boxes, the lack of distribution services and post office substations where people call for their mail and have to line up to get it. Sometimes when they go there the post office is closed. These things have been well established this afternoon and tonight and they indicate that there has been some error in judgment in the introduction of increased postage rates at the present time. I would think it would be sound business practice before asking for an increase in rates to have a well established service that was giving satisfaction, but that is far from the case. In almost any constituency in this great dominion you will find that the same complaints exist.

Before introducing increased rates to pay for a service that we are not getting, I say that we should examine what has been said this afternoon and tonight. In the last ten years there was another increase in rates. It was an increase of practically 33 per cent and now the department comes back with a 25 per cent increase. There has been almost a hundred per cent increase in rates. If people were receiving satisfactory service, probably there would not be so much objection, but the government is adding insult to injury by asking the people to pay for something that they are not getting.

There are one or two observations I should like to make with respect to the report of the department. At the bottom of page V there is a reference to the employment of J. D. Woods and Gordon Limited, management consultants. I suppose they were called in to improve the efficiency of the department, but if cutting deliveries in half and trying to find other ways to get more work out of the staff of the postal department, instead of hiring more men, is any criterion of the new methods to be introduced, I think they had better re-examine the situation. Certainly people are not satisfied with the delivery service either in cities or in rural sections. Mind you, there are one or two improvements that might be made, and I do not say that they will not be able to do a good job; but if they are attempting to try to improve the service by curtailing employment, then they are on the wrong track.

Later I will present evidence of a postmaster general who did not look at the situation in that way. On page 1 of the report you will find that they set out a new method of creating decreases. There is reference to a credit balance of $6,471,000 as against $6,648,000 last year. Suppose there was a decrease of $177,891: that decrease is only apparent; for the fact remains that there was a surplus and not a deficit. It is a new method of establishing a decrease which I have not noticed in any other report.

In going over the whole report there is one thing that stands out, the post office savings bank, which is referred to on page 10 in these words:

> This is a service which the Post Office Department maintains without receiving any financial recompense.

A wonderful service is being provided for the citizens of this great dominion, but it likewise comes within the same category as second-class mail covering newspapers and magazines. The cost should not be charged against the postal department but should come out of the consolidated revenue fund. The gentlemen who have been retained to introduce improvements might look at these matters. They may be small and insignificant but when they are added together they will reduce the expenses of the Post Office Department.

I cannot see why civil defence training should be a burden of the department. Apparently the idea is to establish a nucleus or committee, or whatever you like to call it, within the department, and I do not think that should be charged against it. The cost of any matter involving defence or civil defence should be transferred to the Department of National Defence. All these things are piled up against the Post Office Department and they should be removed and put in their proper perspective.

There is one matter that is rather amusing. The report contains illustrations of the postage stamps that are in vogue at the present time with explanations about the premiers and so on. The report states that on July 26, 1952, a seven-cent postage stamp was issued depicting the Canada goose in flight. I suppose it is symbolic. The Canada goose represents Canada and the citizens of Canada. I suppose it signifies to the people of Canada that this is the goose that lays the golden egg and they should take care not to kill it.

Mr. Knowles: The people of Canada are the goose that was cooked.

Mr. Small: I suppose the government thought that people were showing confidence in the administration and that they had told them they were the ones who could administer this great country more efficiently than anyone else. But the government deluded the people and thought they could go to untold limits, and this is another way of trying to make the people like the medicine that they administered to them.

Let me go into the figures that have been represented by the department. I think they will reveal to hon. members that the Postmaster General has not established a very clear case. I have taken the figures for the years 1934 to 1953 contained in his own report plus the deficit of $1 million which the minister predicts by the end of this year. The aggregate figures show that the total revenue surplus for these years amounts to over $90 million, and taking the increases in revenue over the twenty years we see that there has been an average increase in revenue every year of $4,101,000. Those in business would consider that was very good. The average increase in expenditures each year is $4,065,000. There was a deficit in one year but otherwise surpluses ranged from $1 million to $16 million. The highest increase in expenditures in one year was $8 million odd. In the face of these figures the prospective deficit that the Postmaster General talks about for the future does not hold good. There has been an increase of an average of $4 million every year in the revenues of the department, and on their own figures there is no indication that that increase will not continue. I do not think the Postmaster General established a very good case. Probably he had the unwelcome task imposed upon him by his colleagues, of producing more revenue. I think he would be well advised if he were to recommend to his colleagues in the cabinet that they withdraw this bill until such time as they have established upon a solid basis that there will be a deficit or that the people of Canada are not prepared to provide the revenue to make this department pay its own way.

These figures have been taken from his own records. I shall go on now to discuss why the service is not being used as it should be and how, if it were improved, the use would increase. There has been a reduction of nine staff post offices, of forty-six general post offices; and I suppose if one were to scan the complement of labour required to produce an efficient service he would find that the Post Office Department is sadly lacking in the complement required to give that service.

Therefore before the government proposes to increase the rates I suggest that the Postmaster General should increase his staff and improve the services. If he did this he would probably receive the attentive ear of the people. They would be agreeable and acquiesce in his suggestion or to any reasonable proposition he might put forward.

I should like at this time to make a comparison between the attitude and the approach by the Postmaster General in this government and that of a former postmaster general who introduced the postal service, as we know it, for the people of Canada. I go back to the introduction of the Postal Act in 1898 by the then postmaster general, who became afterward Sir William Mulock, a man who was imaginative, who had initiative and was progressive. He made the office of postmaster general one recognized with pride throughout the world.

What took place in 1898? He was not asking for an increase in rates, when at that time he had to defend himself; no, he was asking for a reduction in rates, and had to defend that reduction in the chamber of the House of Commons. At that time he said:

> I presume that no hon. gentleman would object to the reduction of the rate from 3 cents to 2 cents. Public opinion favours the cheapest and freest possible communication by mail throughout all parts of the country.

And then, on being further questioned as to the revenue, and what it was going to produce, he said, as reported on the next page:

> Assuming that the volume of business does not increase or decrease, it would result in a present loss to the revenues of $650,000 a year. That is the worst phase of the question financially. I shall endeavour to establish by precedents that a reduction in the letter rate is always followed by an increase in volume of business.

Is that not a different picture from what is presented to us today? At this time the government is raising the rates; it is charging us more for the service we are to get, and its cry is that there is a deficit, decreased revenue.

Here, in those early days, we had a postmaster general who had a different approach. He then proceeded to give the statistics from Great Britain, The Netherlands, France, the United States and Canada, and showed how from time to time they had reduced the rates. Then in an interval of three or four years the loss of revenue was overcome and surpluses were presented.

The then postmaster general went on to say:

Prior to the year 1851, the domestic letter rate in Canada was 18 cents per half ounce. In the year 1851, the rate was reduced 66⅔ per cent from 18 cents per letter to 6 cents per letter. I take the last clear year under the old rate, and the first clear year under the new rate. In 1850, when the rate was 18 cents, the revenue amounted to $362,065.

He then proceeded to show how, by reducing the rate, the revenue had increased, and while they had been worried about a deficit he gave absolute evidence that with the lower rate they would make the postal service the best in the world.

Then the postmaster general went on to say:

I quite recognize that there are many causes which contribute to the increase of postal revenue. Where you have a great country with a growing population, no doubt there are many elements that affect the revenues advantageously.

I do not suppose our Postmaster General today has assessed this situation properly. If he were to follow the practice set down by that earlier postmaster general, then he could find revenue where nobody else could.

Making a favourable comparison of our postal services with the United States postal service the former postmaster general said, in 1898:

At all events, I venture to say that these statistics establish beyond all question that the reduction in the letter rate promotes an increase in the number of letters, in the volume of business, and in the revenue, and, at any rate, it is essential to the interests of the country, that there should be the cheapest possible mail communication, and for that reason should commend itself to the good sense of the people and meet with their approval.

It may be that I am tiring hon. members in what I am saying, but I am trying to make a comparison between postmasters general. In 1854 the rate was reduced from 6 cents to 5 cents. It has taken us 100 years to undo what that previous postmaster general did when he reduced the rate to that amount. Now they have got it back to 5 cents, and I suppose we will have to submit to it.

Replying to a question as to whether there was to be a reduction in the drop letter rate he had certain things to say. It will be kept in mind that the postmaster general of that day was on the spot, just as the minister is in this chamber. At that time the reason for being on the spot was different. He was being questioned and held up to the opprobrium of the people of Canada because he was reducing the rate, not increasing it. And he made a very good defence of what he wanted to accomplish.

Being asked about drop letters, he said:

Drop letters are at present charged at 2 cents. That was a rate imposed some years ago by the last administration,—

And, get this, Mr. Postmaster General:

—and while my own bent of mind favours at all times the reduction of the cost for postal communications within reasonable limits, I am not prepared at this time to make any proposition in regard to the rates on drop letters.

Questioned by the then member for Three Rivers, Sir Adolphe Caron, who asked how he was going to make up the deficit, the then postmaster general replied:

By economy and by the improved revenues in the department.

I suggest that these quotations should commend themselves to hon. members on the government side of the house. They have not established a very clear case for raising the rate; and I think if they will take the opinion of the large phalanx of their followers they will find that they would be faced with a problem that has not found solution by the Postmaster General in adequate postal services.

I still think that if members on the government side would impress upon the cabinet the fact that this is not the time to increase the rates for the postal service, and if they were to ask for evidence that the government is prepared to effect economies to improve that service, the government might come back in a year or two and ask for an increase in rates, if a deficit persists. I doubt however that it will because, on the picture that has been presented here, one of expansion and increased immigration to this country, as well as increased revenue, one might expect the opposite result; one would expect to see a surplus revenue instead of a deficit.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, when I left for home last month I had given this matter of the increase in postal rates some thought. To me, at the time, it did not seem to be a vital matter. However, I was not home very long when my electors in no uncertain terms let me know the great measure of importance they attached to this move. They do not look upon it in the light that others look upon it; they take an altogether different view.

A little while ago an hon. member asked the question whether any good is ever found on his side of the house. In answer to that question I should like to convey to the Postmaster General what I have been asked to convey to him by a good number of electors back home. There is amazement over the fact that for many, many years tens of thousands of people have given us faithful and efficient service, rain or shine. I do not think there is any other public service in the world that gives such faithful devotion to their responsibilities as do our postal employees. To me that is as good an answer as any to the lie we find being propagated within our nation that the profit motive is essential for one man successfully to serve his fellow men.

As a student in high school days I remember the then leader of the opposition, the late William Lyon Mackenzie King, speaking in our local community in the province of Saskatchewan. He was severely critical of the Conservative administration. Out of his pocket he took an envelope, held it up and showed it to the large audience. He waved it around. He said: "When I was head of the government and the Liberals were in power, on this letter we had a two-cent rate. Today you pay three cents." At that time, even as a student in high school, I thought that he was being most unfair, because we were in the middle of the hungry thirties, and even a high school student could understand the need of a government resorting to all measures at their disposal to obtain the necessary revenue. However, as the Liberals have often done, they fooled the nation. They attacked the Tories in power for high taxes, and once elected they have imposed still higher taxes. The result is that we have not a return to the two-cent rate, but an increase in the rate from three cents to four cents.

I realize that the time has come when even the Liberals admit that they will have to wait a long long time before we ever have a Tory government in power again to raise the postal rate. Therefore I suppose they feel that they have to raise it themselves.

Mr. Knowles: They are more Tory than the Tories.

Mr. Regier: The minister asked for some advice on other possible sources of revenue. That takes me back again to my electors. My electors have a very strong feeling that the postal rate ought not to be raised as long as we are subsidizing advertising in the nation. There is a feeling that if we were to raise the rates on advertising material going through the mail to anywhere near a fair share of the cost we would be accomplishing a number of useful things. Firstly, we would be relieving the postal service of much of the heavy load; secondly, it would yield more revenue to the Post Office Department; and thirdly, it might persuade some of the commercial firms in Canada to spend a little less money on advertising. We have reached a rather unhealthy situation when we consider the amount of human energy that goes down the drain on largely useless advertising. Yesterday I received the annual report on small loan companies and money lenders. I noticed that a relatively small organization such as the Household Finance Corporation spent in the year 1952 over half a million dollars on advertising, 7½ per cent of their expenditures. The income tax division might be able to help out with some revenue by eliminating some of the advertising exemptions from income tax.

I represent what is often known as a suburban riding, and there are a few things on which my people back home would like to hear a declaration of policy. They would like to know when is a community entitled to its own identity as a postal area. I know there is at least one community, that has a population of 63,000, yet it has not its own postal identity. We have another community with a population of 13,000 which has not its own postal identity. And yet right beside it we have a community with a population of 3,000 which has a post office. In my riding we have another community with a population of 5,000 and it has its own post office. The people feel that a policy should be established, and it should not depend on the economic situation and attitudes of postmasters who have hitherto served the area. We feel there is a time when a community ought to be entitled to postal services of its own. I know the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond has been working on this same difficulty for a number of years, and all I can say is that I hope he has the ear of the government, shall I say, and that something will come out of it.

Another thing that worried the people back home was a report in the newspapers at the time that under the free franking privileges one office had sent out 15,000 Christmas cards. I know the hon. member for Fort William commented on this earlier and said that it was not a popular subject. There may be a feeling abroad that not all economies that might be resorted to are being resorted to.

Then there is the matter of service. We do not think that it is necessary to have a central post office serving almost half a million people close its wickets on Saturday afternoon. We feel that we can have a five-day, forty-hour week, and an arrangement can be made with the staff so that at least some wickets can be open on Saturday afternoon in one of the largest cities in the Dominion of Canada.

I know these are small things. There is another matter that has often worried me. Lately I have seen new buildings being erected in Canada and being leased by the Post Office Department. I can easily understand why a small community might find it advisable to lease or rent a place for postal service. However, I find it rather hard to understand why we should have to rent new buildings that apparently have been expressly built for the purpose of being leased to a department of the federal government. Surely, if it is worth someone's while to erect a building and lease it to the Post Office Department, it should be worth our while to erect our own buildings in such places. I am afraid that the electors back home insist that as long as we are subsidizing advertising to the extent that we are we should not be in accord with the proposed increase in postal rates.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Chairman, I assure you that my remarks will be brief. After listening to the discussion today it seems to me that we have had the same old story. The procedure would appear to be proper but they are going about it in the wrong way. During the past year I listened to debates in this house with regard to increasing the remuneration of mail carriers and I noticed that those on my left together with members of the government supported the stand taken by the government. When the five-day week was being discussed it also had the support of the House of Commons. After listening to this debate today it would appear to me as though it was a case of some hon. members wanting to have their cake and eat it too. With that I cannot agree.

I feel that the Post Office Department should pay its way. My reason for saying that is that it is not the little fellow, whom we always seem to be worrying about, who pays the shot in the case of postage; it is the big fellow who pays it. The family that mails out two or three letters a week will find that the extra cent will amount to only about $1 or $1.50 at the end of the year. It is the big businessman who will be affected by this legislation and he is the man that should pay for it. He is the man I want to see pay for it.

Mr. Fulton: He is the man who will not pay for it because he deducts it from his income tax.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I did not interrupt the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Fulton: I did not make a speech.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): The suggestion has been thrown out that the citizens of this country have made no contribution toward the Post Office Department. I want to take a shot in the dark and make an estimate that billions of dollars, not just millions, are represented by public buildings which have been paid for by the citizens of this country and which are used by the Post Office Department rent free. If I am wrong, I should like to be corrected.

An hon. Member: You are right.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Those buildings are provided by the Department of Public Works; they are heated by the Department of Public Works and are to be found from Vancouver to Newfoundland. If the cost of those structures and their maintenance were added to our postage, where would we be? That is the contribution made by the citizens of this country and it represents billions of dollars in public buildings so that the Post Office Department may carry on in the proper environment.

I support this legislation. It has been said here tonight by previous speakers that in the last ten years postal rates have advanced as much as 58 per cent. I would like those hon. members to tell me of a single thing in Canada that has not advanced 58 per cent in the last ten years. If we want the forty-hour week or the five-day week the only way it can be provided is to increase personnel, and that means more salaries and greater expenses.

Where is the money going to come from? Are the taxpayers generally going to have to dig down and pay it in the form of income or some other tax, or should it be provided for by postage rates? Again I say that it should be paid by the people who are using the service.

I have heard some criticism tonight about there being only one mail delivery in the cities. When I look at some of the rural areas in my constituency and see they have only three deliveries a week, and sometimes not that many, I wonder just how far the people in the cities are going to push us around. We who live in rural areas like to have our mail just as much as the people in the cities. Many of those people are within a block of the post office and they cannot walk down to get their mail. Some poor fellow must strap it over his shoulder and carry it to them. One delivery a day is not sufficient, they want two.

We hear a lot said about what must be done for the little fellow in the back country, but I have not heard him mentioned today. That little fellow seems to be completely forgotten. If my C.C.F. friends are really serious in what they have said today, let them all get together and agree to do away with our franking privileges. Let us pay for our own postage. I am prepared to do that; I am prepared to do away with the franking privilege and pay my shot. I think that would be a good procedure for us to follow as members of parliament. Let us do away with the franking privilege and pay our own postage. Some hon. members may have more mail than I have. If I do not have as much I may save a few cents, but let us be honest and sincere. Let us dig down in our pockets and pay for this ourselves. When we have done that we will have shown the way.

Mr. Fulton: Make a motion to that effect and we will second it.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): It would appear that when a few facts are stated it gets under the skin of some hon. members. I am just stating facts.

Mr. Fulton: Let the hon. member make a motion and we will second it. Let him put up or shut up.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): When some of the protectionists in the house are speaking they argue that there should be protection in Canada against the United States with its enormous population. Here we have a reverse situation. This country is larger than the United States and a mail service must be provided. Is it not natural that it should cost more in a country of 15 million people than in one of 150 million and of a lesser size? All over this country they are asking for air mail; they do not want the horse and buggy system they had 50 years ago. Those are the people who should pay for it.

Let me give one example. In the little town where I live there is just one company of any size, but they mail out 5,000 letters per week. The operators of that company are personal friends of mine. This legislation will affect them financially but they have never come to me complaining about this legislation. Those are the people who should pay for this service because it is a service like this that helps to build up their business.

I am prepared to pay for it myself. I feel that if hon. members are sincere they should get together and say, "Let us do away with this franking privilege; let us dig down in our own pockets and pay for our postage, as the other citizens in the country do". I am reminded of a debate that took place here some time ago and which of course I cannot mention. It would appear to me that there are members in this house who want to have the de luxe services that they describe but who are not willing to pay for them.

If we want these services they should be paid for. I believe that the cost of this service should come from the people who use it. The person who does not use the mail should not have to reach down into his pocket in order to provide revenue to maintain the Post Office Department. If it were just before an election I might expect something like this.

I do not think I can speak for all the people in my county as to how they feel in this regard, but I can say sincerely that I have not had one request or letter from a single person in my county asking me to oppose this measure. I notice the hon. member who spoke just before me said that when he got home they were running in at both doors and coming in through the windows.

An hon. Member: And through the side doors.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): They were all asking him to oppose this legislation. But that does not apply where I live because I have not had one single bit of correspondence or one single request. I am quite prepared to pay my proportion of this increased cost. I am quite prepared to give up my franking privileges in order to show that I really believe what I am saying.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I suppose it is a mark of the weakness of this government proposal that it fell to one of the most popular of the ministers to take the responsibility for sponsoring it in the house. I am sure that no hon. member, whether he sits to your left or to your right, Mr. Chairman, envies the very popular Postmaster General the task which his colleagues have assigned to him today. Some of the pre-election chickens are coming home to roost.

An hon. Member: A lot of them came back.

An hon. Member: This one is a turkey.

Mr. Fleming: I intend to be very brief because the ground on this matter has been effectively and comprehensively covered today in some of the preceding speeches, and I am thinking particularly of my colleagues, the hon. member for Hamilton West and the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace.

Let there be no doubt in anyone's mind, Mr. Chairman, that we fully support the advance in wage rates for the employees of the Post Office Department. As a matter of fact, we urged it long before it was made. It was a belated and not too adequate measure of justice to these employees.

But one can say all that and more on the subject and say the case that the government is putting before the house today is completely unproven. The government is trying to support this motion on the ground that a deficit is going to occur unless the rates are increased. Mr. Chairman, they have not proved their case and what business have they coming before this house and saying, "We anticipate a deficit", until that situation has arisen? They are altogether too eager. This is a habit born long ago and bred in the members who have grown up in this government, that they think they have a right to increase all rates whether it be for government services or for taxes. It is so easy for them to increase the rates that are imposed on the people. It is a bad habit; it is a vicious habit; and it is to be hoped that the house is not going to tolerate much more of it.

Mr. Dupuis: It is a preventive measure.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, there is an interesting reflection of the kind of mentality that has obsessed this government for years. There are a great many ills that they anticipate by going ahead at every turn and without any pretext or justification increasing the rates upon the people of Canada. The hon. member for St. Mary, who has just interrupted, completely reflects the mentality of this government, a mentality that obsesses those who have sat on your right for altogether too long.

Now the government has staked its case upon its powers of anticipation, looking in the crystal ball and seeing there a deficit that might accumulate, and rushing of course to anticipate such a situation and to take strong measures to make sure there will be no possibility whatever of the people of Canada riding along without an increase in rates if the government can find a pretext or excuse for raising the rates.

Mr. Pouliot: When we look across the house we do not see a crystal ball but a political football.

Mr. Fleming: Let me assure my good friend from Temiscouata that every time I look at him I see the best looking crystal ball in the house.

Mr. Pouliot: But you are not a mind reader.

Mr. Adamson: The government is the lady in waiting.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, the Postmaster General exhibited not a little ingenuity today. It was the same type of ingenuity that was exhibited by the Minister of Finance when he made the preliminary announcement of this increase in rates about a month ago. He said that the postal department must be made to pay for the services. There must be no deficit. The suggestion was that there is something very scientific about the way the postal rates are struck, that the government tries to make sure that the service must pay for itself. It is a scientific approach: that is the impression they seek to create.

Well, Mr. Chairman, just how scientific is it? One has only to look back on these figures which were put on the record this afternoon by the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace to see how far the results of this method have proven that there is no science whatever in the approach to it. It has been a very rough and ready method that has been followed at all times in regard to the relationship between postal rates on the one hand and the cost of operating the postal department on the other. Otherwise how can one account for these huge surpluses that have accrued year after year?

What is more, Mr. Chairman, if the method were scientific it would apply to every class of postal material. If that were the case then every class of postal material would bear its own cost. But that is not the principle. You know perfectly well, Mr. Chairman, that there is one class of postal material that has been subsidized for decades.

Let us have no more nonsense about the scientific approach and trying to make the postal services, the cost on one hand and the revenues on the other, balance out. That picture just does not fit the facts, and it does not fit history if you look at the approach to this matter in times past. If you approached it in a scientific manner you would have to consider all the other real costs referred to today, rent and overhead, on the one hand, and on the other hand what revenue the department should receive on account of free postage to government departments. Well, I do not think we need to spend any more time on this nonsense of equating or balancing the cost of the postal service with the revenue.

But the timing of this measure, Mr. Chairman, should not escape comment. My heart was wrung, Mr. Chairman, when listening to the words that fell from the lips of the hon. member for Charlotte just now. My heart was wrung when he pictured how the taxpayer was going to be burdened with the cost of carrying the deficits of the Post Office Department. As if the man who is using the postal services now is apparently some bloated plutocrat, and therefore a bloated plutocrat who should not receive the benefit of the service at less than the cost. That would be altogether wrong. He pictured the bloated plutocrat who puts a stamp on an envelope and who, according to the hon. member for Charlotte, should not have any consideration, and whom the taxpayers of course should not be called upon to subsidize.

Well, Mr. Chairman, it is an extraordinary thing, but I always thought that the taxpayer in this country was on the whole the man who was able to pay. It did not have anything to do as I understood it before with the ability to put a four-cent stamp on an envelope. I thought it had to do with the ability to pay income tax; the ability to pay excise tax; and the ability to pay customs duty, the kind that the hon. member for Charlotte in this house several years ago indicated he was not in the habit of paying when he brought back into his constituency goods that he acquired in the United States.

Mr. Adamson: Why does he not go across and post his letters in the United States?

Mr. Fleming: We were so appropriately reminded this afternoon by the Postmaster General with his usual pleasantness, his disarming pleasantness which we all greatly admire, that after all the treasury of this country had forgone the revenue of $7½ million last spring just before the election and that now apparently that loss of revenue must be made up.

Well, Mr. Chairman, that is why I venture to comment that the chickens are coming home to roost; those election chickens, because we warned the members of this house at the time and we told people outside the house that if there was any appearance of reduction on the part of this government in the imposition of taxes upon the Canadian people it would be a very chimerical form of reduction—here today and gone tomorrow. So, Mr. Chairman, we are beginning to see the unfolding of the government's plan: taking off the stamps on cheques and making great fellows of themselves before the election. They were a tax-reducing government last summer but come the fall, Mr. Chairman, and with the winter setting in they are a rate-raising government. These points have been covered. I am sure I do not need to spend any more time on them.

In closing I wish to say just a word on the subject of service. I do this with not a little feeling because I recall that not many years ago the service given by the Canadian Post Office Department was as good as was to be found anywhere in any government service. It was a matter of boasting and pride on the part of the Canadian people. But that time has gone. The Canadian people take no pride in the kind of service they have been receiving under the management of this government. The men who are doing the delivering are doing an excellent job; in rain and shine, cold weather and hot, they are going the rounds. There have been times when they have been called upon by this government to bear shockingly unfair burdens. Two years ago some of us had to fight for these carriers, at the time the one-delivery-a-day service was instituted, to complain about the shockingly heavy burdens which the carriers were obliged to bear under that system. These men have done and are doing their work well. The fault lies with the management of this department.

The reduction of service to one delivery a day was a mistake. I am sure every member of the committee who is prepared to recall the facts of this situation will not be slow to remember that many people receive their mail today long after the close of the banks, in the late business hours of the day. The service in recent years has deteriorated to a shocking degree. Let us hope, Mr. Chairman, that no time will be lost in improving this service substantially. If there is any Liberal member in this committee who is prepared to stand up in his place in this chamber and say that the postal delivery service in his riding is satisfactory, I think we would be interested to hear him.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to give you some recent examples which have come into my experience. This afternoon the Postmaster General invited hon. members who have complaints to lay them before him. I think he will agree that any time I have had complaints I have taken them to him immediately by correspondence. Sometimes he has been able to find the reason for the delay and sometimes he has not been able to do so. However, so far as he is concerned, I am satisfied that he has at all times done his best to track down the reason for these delays. But these particular pieces of mailing material to which I am about to refer are some that have come to me recently, indeed since the house adjourned in December, and they are the sort of thing that I would have sent to the minister had this debate not provided an opportunity for bringing them directly to his attention.

I have here, first of all, a cover consisting of a House of Commons envelope that bears the postal mark of the House of Commons post office and the date of December 15, 1953. I received that communication on December 29, fourteen days later. As you will see, Mr. Chairman, it was posted in ample time to have been delivered long before the great rush of Christmas matter. I will say that this one is addressed to Mr. D. M. Fleming, M.P., Toronto. In case that be thought to be an inadequate address, may I say that I think we might improve our rules around here for addressing material that is going to members who live in a large metropolitan area. The fact of the matter is that the address which this envelope bears is the address given in the official government directories and it is the address used in the parcelling room downstairs for any mail that goes to the member in question. Hence there cannot be anything very wrong about the address. That one took from December 15 to December 29, fourteen days, to be delivered.

The next one is in a House of Commons envelope with a four-cent stamp on it. It was sealed. It was postmarked from the city of Quebec on December 21. It was addressed to Mr. Donald Fleming, M.P., Toronto. It was delivered on January 11, 1954, twenty-one days after it was posted. It took three weeks for that communication, with a four-cent stamp on it, in a sealed envelope, to be carried from Quebec city to Toronto and to be delivered there.

The third one I have in my hand also comes through the parliamentary post office. The second one did not. This one is touching because it contained a Christmas card that was sent to me by one of the Liberal members from a Toronto riding. It was postmarked by the House of Commons post office on December 21.

Mr. Drew: Was it franked?

Mr. Fleming: It was franked. The postmark is dated December 21. It was delivered to me on January 6. It took sixteen days to come from Ottawa to Toronto and be delivered there.

As to the last one, Mr. Chairman, there cannot be any question about the address on it. This next piece of postal material to which I should like to refer is a card. It is one of the regulation cards sold by the department, on which a two-cent stamp is adequate provided the material on the card is printed; and this is printed. This card was postmarked Toronto, December 30, 1953. It has a two-cent stamp on it. It is the ordinary postal card sold by the post office. It is addressed to Mr. and Mrs. D. M. Fleming, 259 Glencairn avenue, City, 12. It has a Toronto postmark, December 30, 1953. That card was delivered January 5. It did not go outside of the city of Toronto. It took a whole week to get to 259 Glencairn avenue. As you will see, Mr. Chairman, this was long after the Christmas rush of mail had all passed. May I now turn to the other side of the card. It reads as follows:

> The Eglinton Riding Women's Progressive Conservative Association will hold their regular meeting and New Year's party Tuesday, January 5, 1954, at 8 p.m.

Mr. Cote: I am really sorry.

Mr. Fleming: Being an innocent sort of politician, Mr. Chairman, I do not suppose there is anything more than coincidence about this matter; but I do say that it is a curious coincidence that, having been placed in the post office and having received the postal mark in the Toronto post office on December 30, it arrived at my house on the day of the meeting. But that is not the whole story. A number of people telephoned me the next day to tell me that their cards arrived on January 6, the day after the meeting.

Mr. Cote: May I ask my hon. friend to give me those postal items so that I may inquire as to the reasons for the delays.

Mr. Rowe: The meeting is now over.

Mr. Cote: Of course I would not be able to revert and allow my hon. friend to attend the meeting, but I will do my best to find out the reasons for the delays.

Mr. Nicholson: I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that during the years I have been in parliament I have not experienced the sort of thing outlined by the hon. member for Eglinton. There was an incident in my constituency at the time of an election. The postmaster delayed distributing a parcel of election literature until after the election. When this matter was reported to the post office authorities, they investigated, took action, and there was a new postmaster there, although the postmaster who had offended had been a prominent supporter of the Liberal party. I think on the whole the Canadian people have reason to be proud of the outstanding service performed by the Post Office Department for many years. I have had very happy associations with the postal personnel in my constituency and the post office officials in Ottawa. Nevertheless I think this is a very unfortunate piece of legislation to bring before parliament. I have two opinions to express for what they are worth and I present them in the hope that the Post Office Department will be relieved of the blame that unfortunately will be attached to it for this very unpopular increase in postage rates.

While I was in Ottawa from 1940 to 1949 I made some study of the very large number of post offices in Canada where there was very little revenue. In the 1952 report of the Postmaster General I notice that there are 160 post offices in my own province of Saskatchewan where total sales of postage stamps for the previous year were less than $100—$11.50, $13, $12.64, $16.06, $9.20, and so on. I think it would be difficult to argue that, where postage sales are less than $1 a month, there is very good reason in this day and age for continuing considerable public expenditures in maintaining offices in these communities. I realize that patronage enters into the picture, that supporters of the government are given post offices, and that it probably is not easy to change the practice. But before asking all the taxpayers of Canada to accept such a heavy burden as is involved in a 25 per cent increase on the four-cent rate and a 33⅓ per cent increase on the three-cent rate we should have a look at the very large number of post offices in Canada that might have been justified fifty years ago but certainly are not justified today when so many people have cars and when there are obviously so few people making use of these services.

The second point I want to mention is found in the report that the Postmaster General presented in 1952. There are two pies offered in this report. I am sorry that they do not appear in the 1953 report. One pie is receipts, the other disbursements. In the first case newspapers and periodicals pay for a five cent piece of pie. They give a five cent pie to the Post Office Department but when they want to eat their pie they want an 18¼ cent piece. I submit to hon. members that it might have been argued fifty years ago that newspapers should be subsidized by the Post Office Department, but in this day and age when daily newspapers have fallen into the hands of a few very wealthy corporations that control not only chains of newspapers but radio stations, I think there is no justification for asking the Post Office Department to take a five cent pie from newspapers and periodicals and dish out an 18¼ cent pie. On the basis of the year's revenue there is a loss of over $16 million in connection with this one item.

As the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam mentioned, in view of the fact that so many of these papers and periodicals carry such a heavy volume of advertising I think we cannot justify subsidizing to this extent. I for one take strong objection to the very large amount of liquor advertising now appearing in so many Canadian periodicals. I object to having such periodicals come to my home at public expense inasmuch as the Post Office Department is subsidizing them to the tune of $16 million per year. I do not have these figures from the minister, but on the basis of the picture of the pie appearing in his report, taking the amount of receipt for that year as $122 million—I am sure he will correct me if I am wrong—it is my conclusion that the loss in connection with these two items for the year reviewed in his report is $16 million.

In the same pie we notice ordinary letters, and this affects the people who are taking the rap in this latest increase. The figure is 46 cents and it only costs 29 cents to buy their piece of pie. That is, there was a profit of 17 cents on every dollar of revenue from ordinary letters. This gave a profit of $20,700,000 on this particular operation of the Post Office Department. Therefore the people who are going to take the rap if this legislation passes, and the handling of whose letters shows a profit of $20 million, will have an increase of a further 25 per cent on the four-cent rate and 33⅓ per cent on the three-cent rate, which cannot be justified.

I have a good deal of sympathy for the Postmaster General. Very few members on his own side of the house have indicated that there has been much criticism in the country. It takes a long time for us to get a reaction here, but I am very sure that this move will be most unpopular throughout the country. The Postmaster General will have a letter from me in a day or so seeking information so that I may reply to the parish priest at Perigord, Saskatchewan, who writes that the postmistress there has an inadequate salary of $40 a month. She has five children and is giving excellent service. He wonders why we ask a widow, I presume, with five children, to work for $40 a month.

An hon. Member: She should be getting that a week.

Mr. Nicholson: I know that the Postmaster General will reply by saying that unfortunately the total revenue at Perigord is not as high as it should be for the postmistress to get a higher salary. But I suggest that the people at Perigord do a large volume of business with Eaton's in Winnipeg, Simpson's in Regina, and a great many of the mail order houses, and these country post offices have to exist if the city mail order houses are to show profits. I am sure the Postmaster General is going to find it very difficult to satisfy a large number of postmasters across the country who are giving outstanding service and who are receiving a very low annual remuneration.

Therefore on the basis of the fact that wealthy newspapers and periodicals in Canada using the mails are subsidized to a large extent, and in view of the fact that the three cent tax on cheques should be reimposed before there is any increase in postage rates, I cannot support this measure.

Mr. Goode: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that I was not in the house when the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam was speaking. I am not too sure what he said but I am quite sure of his intent. He may have said something that I will repeat but it may be that the Postmaster General will attach more importance to it if it is said twice today. I speak about the municipality of Burnaby in British Columbia where we have the second largest aggregation of population in the province. We have some 60,000-odd people with four different post office addresses and yet no post office address of our own. When you send a letter to North Burnaby or South Burnaby you address it to North Burnaby, Vancouver, or South Burnaby, Vancouver. For part of West Burnaby letters go to the Vancouver office and those for East Burnaby go to New Westminster. If you ever saw a puzzle in your life that is one.

I am quite sure that the Postmaster General does not know of this situation, and I am quite sure that something will be done now that the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam and I have spoken about it. What we want there before we start paying too much in extra postal charges is a post office of our own. I think 60,000 people are entitled to it. We have a larger gathering of population than in the city of Victoria, and we think we should have this identification of our own.

In regard to this matter of postage, and the increase in rates, it might be that the hon. member for Eglinton has some complaint to make. We could all get up and say that in our ridings we have had half a dozen, or perhaps 20 or 30 mistakes made during the Christmas rush. I have had people write to me and say that they have had half a dozen letters come to them two or three weeks after they were posted. But when one comes to think that in the city of Vancouver there were about 40 million pieces of Christmas mail to handle, he must conclude that the job was done in an excellent manner.

It seems to me too much is being said from the opposition side with regard to the increase in postage. To my mind a five-cent letter is good value, if it is delivered promptly. I am quite sure the Postmaster General's department is doing the best job of which they are capable. Indeed, they are doing a fine job. And if everyone on the opposition side would speak honestly and according to his conscience, I think they would agree with me, too.

Sure, there are complaints—and there will be complaints about every government department, so long as the government is in business. But in my opinion—and I have no wish to curry favour with the Postmaster General, because I have nothing much to ask of him—he and his department are doing an excellent job, and I hope that he will continue to do the job he is doing today.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, the ground has been so fully and so well covered that I have no intention of making a speech. I rise merely to give a friendly warning to the government. It may be surprising that I should do this, but I do it in the manner in which the late Humphrey Mitchell, whom many of us will remember, always issued his warnings: in a kindly way.

I just want to remind the government that a five-cent piece once lost them an election and to suggest to them that possibly they had better beware of the danger that a five-cent stamp may do the same thing.

Mr. Castleden: Mr. Chairman, may I say a word with regard to this increase in the postal rate. In what I shall say I believe I am expressing the opinions of the majority of people in my constituency.

The vast majority of those people in their small homes do not use the air mail facilities to any great extent. Most of them have few letters to write each week but they realize that Canada is today paying one of the highest postage rates of any country in western civilization. They look with considerable regret on the fact that the government at a time like this, so soon after an election, is prepared to turn around and place an extra tax upon them. They remember that it is only a few months ago that the government came out, shortly before the election, as the great benefactor of the people. At that time they took the excise tax off cheques. They were posing as a tax-reducing government, one that the people should support.

Now, within 140 days after the election is over, the government is seeking to increase the postal rate, and the rank and file of people in my constituency recognize what the government is doing and why it is doing it. If this increase was required, why could it not have been made known eight or ten months ago? This boost in rates is obvious; the people understand it, and they do not like it.

Then, they do not like it for the further reason that they know second-class mail is being subsidized while the little fellow who writes the first-class mail is having to pay the shot. The increased costs which this government is encountering all along the line did not develop overnight. For years the party to which I belong has raised its objections in the House of Commons to the removal of price controls, thus permitting the cost of doing business and the cost of living to continue skyrocketing.

We tried to warn the government that if it did that there would have to be increased costs along with it, and that many of those costs would become permanent. Now we see the cost of living going up, the cost of doing business going up and wages will have to go up. In the light of these facts the government has to come back to tax the people.

The same is true of the increased cost of production of those commodities which our people have to sell. Those production costs have gone so high because the government would not hold the line. When price controls were in force, and when costs could have been kept down, the government did not permit that condition to continue. At this time, with possible recession facing us, and with constant difficulties in selling our products, the government is continuing with these increases. This is just one further evidence of that process.

It is the same story all along the line. The attempt now is to make this increase a permanent one. The Canadian people are now asked to pay for what the government failed to do when it should have been watching costs and keeping them in line.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, reference has been made to the increase in wages for postal employees. I cannot think of any group of employees in this country to whom wage increases were so long overdue. I think it rather shameful that the government should seek to use this rather modest wage increase, and the undertaking to have the 40-hour week in certain localities, as an excuse throughout the country for this increase in postal rates.

Some reference has been made to the postal service. If there has been any inefficiency, it is not too difficult to understand when we consider the poor working conditions and the very low wages which have been paid to the postal workers over the past few years. I believe we will have increased efficiency when those workers receive better wages and when there are better working conditions.

One important principle is involved here, just as important as the increase itself. Two ministers of the government have stated that the people of Canada expect the post office to pay for itself. There are two ways of looking at the Post Office Department. Either it will be considered as a public service to provide a very valuable service for the people in this far-flung country or it is going to be considered simply as a commercial venture.

If the government takes the stand that the Post Office Department must pay for itself, then I must ask, in all sincerity, how it can reconcile, on the one hand, the fact that it subsidizes second-class mail, with the argument, on the other, that the post office must pay its own way. You cannot have it both ways. If you believe the post office should be operated strictly along business lines, then logically you must expect the publishers of newspapers and periodicals throughout the country to pay the cost of transmitting their materials through the mails.

I am not going to debate the question as to whether that is advisable or not. What I am saying is that if you accept the principle of subsidizing second-class mail, then you cannot in the next breath offer the argument that the post office ought to pay its own way. You cannot have it both ways. Either the post office is going to pay its way, in which case second-class mail must bear its fair share of the cost of transportation throughout the country, or it will not pay its way.

I suggest that before we have a vote we should have an explanation from the government as to what its attitude is. We must have a clear understanding. If the post office is to be regarded as a commercial venture, one which is to be self-supporting, then I must ask the minister in all sincerity how he justifies a subsidy on second-class mail.

Mr. Mang: I should like to add only a few words in this discussion. Throughout the country we have had in the past decade a great deal of commercial prosperity. As this prosperity has increased, so has the use of the mails increased. In these local post offices spread throughout the rural parts of Canada these public servants, the postmasters in the small areas, towns, villages, hamlets and so on, have found that their work has increased. I am hoping that they will get some small share of this increase in postal rates to compensate them for the extra work they have to do. The days upon which the bags and bags of Eaton's and Simpsons-Sears' catalogues arrive the work of these men assumes such proportions that even in a small village of 185 people they almost have to hire a drayman to deliver them. That means a tremendous amount of work. Father, mother, brother and sister are recruited on that particular day to help get these catalogues into their particular cubby holes and heaven help the local postmaster if that catalogue is not there at the proper time. The problem is of such proportions that postmasters phone each other ahead and say: "Eaton's catalogue is here; get ready!" These men have been rendering a great deal more service than they have in the past. The only way we can recompense them is by giving them extra pay, and I am hoping that when this increase goes through they will get consideration in the distribution of the extra money.

With respect to the other point, I find myself in a peculiar position. I am supposed to be on a side of the house that is presumed to represent big business and big corporations, and so on. The burden of this increase is going to fall on big business, and on those people who send out circulars, advertising, catalogues and so forth. Very few farmers in western Canada write many letters. Very few rural people write letters. They do not like to write them, even if they have the time. Even if the income tax department sends them a registered letter they sometimes neglect to answer it. They just do not do much writing. But the people who will be affected by these costs are the people best able to bear it, the corporations and big business generally. And they are the very ones who are trying now to give that section of business life in Canada protection.

I just thought I would put in a plug for the small country postmasters who can only get their salaries increased to even a small degree by the addition of further increases of this kind. Nobody is going to miss it very much. I am in agreement with the principle that this government has been following in that it is trying to show the people that what they ask for in service they must pay for, and I think that is a very good principle.

Mr. Nickle: I should like to get in the last extra word here. This discussion today, Mr. Chairman, has been very much like the unfolding of a mystery story along the lines of those written by Erle Stanley Gardner and Mickey Spillane. I have been very interested in listening to the debates today and to get into that mystery of the Canadian post office. As a matter of fact, to use the analogy of a mystery story, what we have unfolded here today has been the story of the hidden subsidy of the post office, and who subsidizes whom, how and why.

In that regard, Mr. Chairman, it came as a surprise to me, and I am sure it will to the people of Canada, that in the first of our many subsidies connected with the Canadian post office we have those who for many years past have been attaching a three-cent excise stamp or postage stamp to every cheque that they issued. As a result that subsidy has been paid by those who write cheques in order to help subsidize the post office operation, to the tune, I understand from the minister, of some $7,500,000 a year.

The next subsidy that became apparent today in the discussion seems to be the subsidy which has been paid and continues to be paid by the Post Office Department to help support that other arm of government, the Trans-Canada Air Lines. One hon. member brought out some figures which indicated that from the post office revenues the Trans-Canada Air Lines are receiving $5 million or more a year. The T.C.A. is being paid that amount by the post office to carry mail at a rate some four times the rate charged by the same Trans-Canada Air Lines for the transporting of normal air cargo.

Then there appears to be a third type of subsidy, namely, the subsidy that is being paid by the post office to help along other government departments, the franking privilege. That amounts to somewhere around $4 million or $5 million a year, which should properly be charged to all departments of government rather than against the users of the postal service of this country.

We then come to a fourth subsidy, namely, the subsidy paid by the post office to help provide Canadians with their newspapers and periodicals, the second-class mail. It was mentioned today that in the handling of second-class mail the post office shows a deficit of some $28 million a year.

Then we have another subsidy, namely the subsidy paid by the post office to subsidize third-class mail, circulars and the like. Perhaps we should include in the third-class mail such things as Christmas cards. I understand that they come in that category, provided they are unsealed. Since that type of business comes at a particular time of the year, I think it might rank as one of the small things that government might very well do for the people who make government possible. Then we come to another subsidy again. It has been disclosed here as the subsidy which the taxpayers through the Department of Public Works are passing on to the Post Office Department by the provision of postal buildings to the Post Office Department across the country.

We now come, sir, to the increase in postal rates, and here we have another new type of subsidy, or rather an extension of former types of subsidy. Those who load the mail with love letters and the like are now going to be asked to increase the subsidies they will pay to help keep this post office on an even keel. Well, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that we have a conglomeration of subsidies: the Post Office Department subsidizes Trans-Canada Air Lines, and other departments of government with the franking privilege, and the Department of Public Works subsidizes the Post Office Department in the provision of buildings; the newspapers and periodicals are being subsidized through rates which certainly do not meet the cost of providing this service; and now we have this new proposal for increased postal rates which are presumably going to yield something like $14 million in extra revenue in order to permit the Post Office Department to break even. Now that we have eliminated one subsidizer, the writer of cheques, who no longer has to put that three-cent stamp on a cheque, we find that the Post Office Department has lost $7,500,000 in the past year. But, Mr. Chairman, in the attempt to break down the new revenue of $14 million which it is expected will come from this proposed increase in postal rates, I have been wondering who is actually going to pay this cost, so I should like to take one specific case of a business of which I have some personal knowledge. This business is located in the west and uses the first-class mail a great deal. Its cost of postage is going to increase slightly over $3,000 a year, but that company is not going to lose $3,000 a year. As it turns out, it can take a tax write-off on the extra postage it is going to be charged of $1,500 through reduced corporation taxes. Then the shareholders of the company with their present taxable position will find that on their personal taxes on the dividends accruing they will save another $600. In other words, in the case of this particular company, while there will be an increase in the payment to the Post Office Department of $3,000, approximately $2,100 will come out of the hands of the federal government through reduced tax income.

The result is that the company will actually pay only about $900 or 30 per cent of the total increased postal charges while the federal government will be providing the other 70 per cent. In the case of individuals who write the occasional letter they will find their postal costs increased 25 or 40 per cent, but that will not amount to very much money.

Is the Post Office Department in a position to give us an estimate as to what proportion of this $14 million added revenue is going to be offset by reduced tax income to the federal government, in effect being paid by other government departments? In other words, to what extent is this $14 million which is to go to the Post Office Department going to be another subsidy paid by other departments of government?

It seems to me that it would be far better if instead of increasing the postal rates at this time the government reviewed carefully all these hidden subsidies that are now reflected in the operations of the Post Office Department. If the handling of second-class mail, newspapers and periodicals at present rates is justified as a form of subsidy, then that subsidy should be included openly in the accounts of this government instead of being paid for by the users of first-class postal service.

Let us look at all these other subsidies. When we have added them all together, the subsidies paid by the post office and the subsidies paid to the post office, let us try to determine whether the Post Office Department cannot be self-sufficient and operate at a profit without the increased postal rates proposed in this measure.

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to take up too much of the time of the committee, but lest it be thought that by not speaking I was indicating I was for increased rates I think I should at this time let the Postmaster General know what my attitude is as well as the attitude of a number of people in the Westminster area toward this proposed increase.

If this proposed increase is put into effect, and I imagine it will be, there will be additional revenue to the Post Office Department. I submit that that revenue should be passed on to the civil servants. The new rates of pay provided earlier in the session were a great help to the civil service and to the post office officials especially, but if the public is going to be milked for an additional cent or more in postage then any additional revenue derived from such increase should be passed on to those particular civil servants.

Possibly one reason why we do not have too good a postal service lies in the fact that in my area at least the Post Office Department has lost a number of its best civil servants who were able to obtain more money from private industry. Casual labour in Vancouver receives $1.35 an hour; contract labour receives around $1.59 an hour; while the letter carriers were paid $1.28 an hour. The new increase, while commendable, does not bring these men up to that particular rate.

It is the business of politicians to shape the policies and statutes of the country, but the carrying out of legislation is the job of the civil service. I suggest that the wage scale of the civil service should be as high as that of private industry so that we can keep our services as efficient as possible. Perhaps this increase would be warranted if that were kept in mind.

Mr. Knowles: When the Minister of Finance made his announcement on December 8 I asked him if he could make available in some appropriate manner a list of the localities in which the five-day week would be put fully into effect. If I may paraphrase the minister's answer, it was to the effect that he hoped very shortly to make public a statement along the lines of the one for which I had asked. Can the Postmaster General state whether that list has yet been made public or whether it is to be made public soon?

Mr. Cote: I am not in position to answer my hon. friend tonight, but I shall investigate the matter. My officials are working with the civil service commission and the Minister of Finance. I cannot cover all the ground which has been covered by many hon. members today but I shall peruse what has been said and I will try to give all the information I have been asked to give.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mrs. Fairclough: Do I understand that the minister is not going to make a statement while we are at the resolution stage?

Mr. Cote: I do not want to duplicate anything I might say. I made a statement; I could make a long speech now and then on the second reading make another long speech. I do not want to impose two speeches on the same subject on the members of the house.

Mr. Knowles: It would be better to withdraw the resolution.

Mr. Cote: Hon. members have asked so many questions today that I am not in a position to answer all of them now. I assure the hon. member for Hamilton West that I shall give her all the information she has asked for today.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow we will continue this debate; then the housing bill; then the bill to amend the acts respecting the Northwest Territories; and then begin our study in committee of the whole of the Criminal Code.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, January 15, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

KURT MEYER—JOHANN NEITZ

STATEMENT WITH RESPECT TO REVIEW OF SENTENCES

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in view of the interest which has been expressed by a number of members from time to time in the Kurt Meyer case, I should like to make a brief statement with respect to his case and that of Johann Neitz, the only two German war criminals convicted by Canadian military courts still serving sentences. Their sentences are being served in a British administration prison at Werl, Germany.

The terms of the agreements between the occupying powers and Germany provided for the review of the sentences of war criminals. In view of the delay in bringing these agreements into effect, some time ago boards were set up in each of the British, United States and French zones to review the sentences of all convicted German war criminals still held in custody in those zones.

The Canadian government appointed Brigadier Sherwood Lett, Q.C., C.B.E., D.S.O., M.C., E.D., of Vancouver, to represent it as an observer when the cases of Meyer and Neitz were considered by the board set up in the British zone. This board has reviewed the sentences now being served by Kurt Meyer and Johann Neitz and has recommended that in both cases the sentences be commuted to fourteen years.

The recommendation of the board in each case was unanimous and Brigadier Lett has recommended that the government should accept the recommendation of the board.

After the most careful consideration of the circumstances the government has accepted the recommendation of the board.

Both Meyer and Neitz will be eligible for such remission of their sentences as they may have earned or may earn in accordance with the rules in force in the prison where they are confined and which are laid down by the British custodian.

I might add that I understand the reviewing boards' recommendations in each zone have been accepted in each case by the governments of France, the United Kingdom and the United States.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence arising out of the announcement which he made a moment ago of the reduction of sentence imposed upon Kurt Meyer. Is that reduction not most generous compared to some of the other sentences? Did the government agree with it? Will the minister say when under the present rules now in effect Kurt Meyer will be released from custody?

Mr. Claxton: With regard to the first part of my hon. friend's question, the reduction in sentence is by no means generous in comparison with others. I understand it was made on precisely the same basis as similar sentences have been reduced. Indeed it is a fair thing to say that a great number of men sentenced to life imprisonment for much more serious crimes than this—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Claxton: —have been released already.

An hon. Member: What could be more serious?

Mr. Claxton: With regard to the second point, that will depend upon the rules in effect in the prison where he is confined, which prison is administered by the British authorities. He will receive exactly the same treatment for good behaviour or whatever service he has rendered as other prisoners who are there.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does not the minister know when Kurt Meyer will be out on the basis of the regulations that are in effect there?

Mr. Claxton: I cannot tell the hon. member.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is it not a fact that on the basis of a 14-year sentence he would be available to be released immediately?

Mr. Claxton: It should be some time within a matter of months or a year or so. I cannot give the exact information because we are leaving that recommendation to be made later by the British authorities.

Kurt Meyer and Johann Neitz

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, supplementary to that, I should like to ask the minister what could be more serious than to order the shooting down of young Canadians in cold blood contrary to every rule of war?

Mr. Claxton: I am sorry, but Kurt Meyer was not convicted of ordering the shooting of Canadian prisoners of war.

Mr. Drew: May I ask what he was convicted of, since that certainly was the charge.

Mr. Claxton: He was found not guilty of that on the evidence as disclosed to the court. The sentence imposed upon him was imposed in view of his conviction of having what would amount to constructive responsibility for this action. It took place in an area where he was in command. I am speaking from memory, and I should not do so in connection with a matter of this kind, but my recollection is that he was not found guilty of actually ordering the shooting.

I think I should make it plain that some people who have been released were in the gestapo or security police in some of the countries and were found guilty of killing, torturing to death or causing to be tortured to death numbers of citizens of those countries. Still they have been released.

Mr. Drew: I should like to ask another question. Is it not correct that Kurt Meyer was found guilty and sentenced to death for his responsibility for the inexcusable shooting of Canadian soldiers under his control?

Mr. Claxton: That is quite a different thing from the first statement made by the Leader of the Opposition. That is substantially correct.

Mr. Speaker: May I point out for future guidance that sometimes several supplementary questions following a main question are tantamount to having a debate on the matter. I did not want to stop the questions being asked because I realized the interest which hon. members had in the subject matter of the announcement made by the Minister of National Defence. However, I should like hon. members to refresh their memories as to the rules governing oral questions to be asked before the orders of the day. I should like to quote briefly from a ruling by Mr. Speaker Macdonald to be found on page 428 of the Journals of Tuesday, May 29, 1951, as follows:

> I would however emphasize that these oral questions should be asked only in connection with very urgent and important matters of public concern and only if it would not be in the public interest to place them on the order paper and receive answers in accordance with the method provided for in the standing orders. They should always be brief. No debate is permitted and the reply should be as concise as possible.

DUMPING

INQUIRY AS TO REGULATIONS UNDER AMENDED ACT

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday last the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) asked whether any regulations had been passed under Bill No. 29 or whether any instructions had been issued under that bill since it was passed. I took notice of the question and promised to reply to it as soon as possible.

The amendment to the Customs Act contained in Bill No. 29 did not call for the issuance of regulations, and no regulations have been issued. Instructions, however, were issued to all customs officials. The terms of these instructions I conveyed to the house on December 16 and they may be found on page 978 of Hansard of that date.

ALLEGED IMPORTATION OR DUMPING OF VEGETABLES IN MARITIME PROVINCES

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Yesterday the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) asked whether the department had received complaints with respect to the importation or dumping of United States vegetables in the maritime provinces, and if so whether my department had taken any action with respect to the complaints.

The department has not received any recent complaints in respect to the dumping of United States vegetables in the maritime provinces. However, the minimum seasonal specific duties provided in the tariff are being applied regularly on recommendation of the Department of Agriculture, and as recently as January the 13th the minimum specific duties on cabbage and carrots were applied in the maritime provinces.

The duty under that is cabbage nine-tenths of a cent a pound and carrots one cent a pound in place of the regular tariff of ten per cent. The former of course is much higher.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO SPECIAL DAY FOR DISCUSSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister? In view of the proposed calling of the general assembly of the United Nations and the developments in international affairs since external affairs were last discussed in the house, would it be possible for the government to arrange for an early discussion of external affairs?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this matter has been under consideration, as you know, and has even been discussed with you, and I hope we have found a method whereby it can be arranged to have a date next week when external affairs might be discussed, provided of course that there was no serious objection from any quarter of the house to this interruption in consideration of the ordinary business of the house.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO DISCIPLINARY ACTION AGAINST COLONEL PECK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the news dispatches in this morning's papers, which read, "Hear army critic asked to resign as blast sequel", is the minister in a position to inform the house whether any disciplinary action has been taken against Colonel Peck as a result of the recent speech he made?

Mr. Dechene: A soldier wants to run the country.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): The situation regarding this, Mr. Speaker, is as follows. Lieutenant Colonel Peck made a speech before a branch of the Vancouver board of trade, and that speech was reported by the Canadian Press. If Colonel Peck or any other officer made a statement such as appeared in the report of the speech in the Toronto Globe and Mail of last Tuesday, then I believe everyone would recognize that he was quite unsuited to command any unit of the Canadian armed forces.

However, I did not take that dispatch without making inquiry. When we got a copy of the speech which Colonel Peck says he delivered it appeared that while there were some remarks in it which might be injudicious or injustified, still it was a sincere and honest and well-intentioned effort to arouse interest in the reserve army. On the understanding that the speech was given as he says it was given and according to the text that was made available to us, no further action need be taken. I would point out that Colonel Peck as a member of the reserve was not on duty at the time and consequently was not subject to the code of service discipline.

Mr. Fulton: Has the Minister of National Defence any information as to whether Colonel Peck's speech was in effect cleared with the area commander, Brigadier Megill, before its delivery?

Mr. Claxton: I understand that that was done, yes.

THE BANK ACT

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Is the Prime Minister in a position to inform the house approximately when the government expects to be able to bring in the amendments to the Bank Act, and when those amendments will be referred to the banking and commerce committee?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): A similar question was asked of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) on December 1 last by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). At that time the Minister of Finance stated that he did not anticipate it would be possible to bring in this legislation before early in February. As a matter of fact I know that the drafts have practically been completed, but the government does not wish to pass definitely upon them in the absence of the Minister of Finance. They would like to have him present when the official drafts are being put into final shape for recommendation to the house.

We expect the Minister of Finance back here in the latter days of January and we know that he, as well as other members of the government, is anxious to have the legislation brought before the house as soon as possible and to have it go to the banking and commerce committee with as great dispatch as is convenient.

HEALTH INSURANCE

REFERENCE TO SPEECH OF ONTARIO MINISTER OF HEALTH—INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the announced increases in Blue Cross rates in Ontario and in view of the statement made by the Ontario minister of health regarding national health insurance, can the minister say whether the government will reconsider the matter of legislation with regard to a nation-wide health insurance plan at this session?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have dealt with this matter on at least two occasions during the course of the present session. I have not seen the statement of the minister of health in Ontario to which my hon. friend directs my attention—

Mr. Knowles: He said he would have national health insurance within five years.

Mr. Martin: I did read in this morning's Globe and Mail that the minister of health in Ontario spoke appreciatively of the co-operation he has had from the federal government.

POLIOMYELITIS

REFERENCE TO TESTS BEING MADE WITH NEW VACCINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, has the attention of the Minister of National Health and Welfare been drawn to an article appearing in the New York Times of January 2, 1954, regarding extensive tests being made with a new polio vaccine? If so, is any similar action being taken in Canada, or is there any joint action of the two governments?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what your ruling would be as to whether this question is one that should appear on the order paper. I should think it would be one of that kind. However, I can dispose of it now by saying that we are aware of the vaccine mentioned.

Perhaps the hon. member will recall that I made a statement early in October to the Canadian Public Health Association pointing out that this vaccine was now being produced at the Connaught medical research laboratory at the University of Toronto, and that the federal government through the national health program had made available to the Connaught laboratory substantial funds for its more general research program. I said that we were following this particular research project with great interest. It is clear therefore that in this way we were well aware of the situation, long before the New York Times called attention to it.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE—BIRTHDAY CONGRATULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. As I represent a large number of the friends of the first and No. 1 optimist in Canada, we would like to express to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) our hearty congratulations, wishing him success, true happiness and long life.

ARMED FORCES

ALLOWANCES PAYABLE TO CANADIAN PRISONERS OF WAR IN KOREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill). Would he inform the house if payments of prisoner of war allowances will be extended to Canadian prisoners of war in Korea? And another question along the same lines. What percentage of Canadian prisoners of war who are eligible have, to date, applied for these allowances?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think this is one question which should be placed on the order paper.

POST OFFICE ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE POSTAGE ON LETTERS AFTER APRIL 1, 1954

The house resumed, from Thursday, January 14, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Cote—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair:

That it is expedient to amend the Post Office Act to increase the rates of postage on letters posted in Canada from the 1st day of April, 1954,

(a) on each letter for delivery within the postal area in which it is posted, from three cents to four cents for the first ounce or fraction of an ounce, and from one cent to two cents for each additional ounce or fraction of an ounce, and

(b) on each letter posted within one postal area for delivery in another postal area from four cents to five cents for the first ounce or fraction of an ounce, and from two cents to three cents for each additional ounce or fraction of an ounce.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, is not the minister going to make some attempt to answer some of the questions he has been asked?

Mr. Cote: Mr. Chairman, I would be glad to do so. I wish first to thank all those who have participated in this debate so far and who, whether they were sitting on this side of the house or on the other side, have expressed their appreciation of the postal service, postal officials and postal employees—and even the Postmaster General.

There are those who are opposed to the resolution and, in greater numbers of course, there are those who are in favour of it. It is interesting to note that even those who are opposed have the same object in view. They are in favour of the object of the resolution, which is to seek to amend the Post Office Act so as to meet an expenditure of $13,500,000. The only difference between these two groups of members is this: those who favour the resolution say that they want the users of the service to pay for it; while those who are opposed to it say, "Let everybody pay for it, whether they use it or not."

Incidentally everyone knows that there is no connection at all between this resolution and the provision in last year's budget under which the excise tax was abolished. Even those who are criticizing the abolition of the excise tax should remember that at that time, in 1953, there was no question of expenditures amounting to $13,500,000 for the implementation of the 5-day 40-hour week, and a general increase in salaries and improvements for mail couriers.

As I have already indicated, I am going to try to answer most of the questions which have been asked. The proposed increase in letter rates is occasioned by certain definite factors. The salaries of civil servants have been increased since December 1 last. Similar increases are being granted to revenue postmasters. Rates paid to rural mail couriers have been and are continuing to be adjusted upwards.

On April 1, 1954, the five-day 40-hour week will go into effect, necessitating extra staff. These items all involve additional expenditures which must be met either by the payment of additional taxes by the general taxpayers or by an increase in postal rates. It has been the aim of the department for many years, as I said before, to endeavour to operate so far as is practicable within its revenues.

Some hon. members may not agree with my view, but I am convinced that it is the most satisfactory and honest method. The Post Office Department is a service department and should, within reason, pay its way. In my opinion it is equitable that the increased costs should be paid by those who use the service.

The accounting picture is a simple one. Now I am going to give the committee some figures. The surplus at the end of the fiscal year 1952-53 was $6,500,000. The decrease in revenue in 1953-54 due to the elimination of postage for the payment of the tax on cheques and remittances amounted to $7,500,000.

So right there, on April 1, we are going to have a deficit of at least $1 million. The foreseeable added expenditures are as follows: additional payments to postal employees and revenue postmasters, $7 million; adjustment in rates to mail contractors, $1,500,000; added staff to cover the five-day week scheme, $5 million. This makes a total of $13,500,000.

We are expecting an added amount of $13,500,000 for the foreseeable increased expenditures and this, with the deficit of $1 million we are going to have on April 1, makes $14,500,000. Taking a gross expected revenue of $15 million from the increased rate on letters it will be seen that we have left only half a million dollars to cover other increased expenditures.

Thus an additional amount of $14,500,000 is required to meet additional costs, which will have to be met during the next fiscal year. This leaves approximately $500,000 to take care of possible developments. It does not include any leeway for increases in cost of material, increases in cost of transportation, or other contingencies.

Reference has been made to increases in rates which have been granted within the last decade. These increases, however, apart from the increase in the letter rate of one cent, which took place in 1943, affected only a small portion of the total mail. As a matter of fact the total increases in postage rates in the past ten years have resulted in an increase which presently works out at approximately $28 million per annum. This in total is only 22 per cent of the gross revenue of approximately $130 million. The balance of revenue growth is due to increased business with its corresponding increase in expenditures.

Let us look for a moment at a comparison of increases in postage rates with increases in costs of other public services or commodities. The increase in the letter rate of postage over a period of 30 years is approximately 66⅔ per cent. During that period what has happened in other public services? The streetcar fares have gone up by over 100 per cent. The price of newspapers has been increased by more than 150 per cent. The charges for public calls on the telephone have increased by over 100 per cent. I could go on making similar comparisons. Why then should not the postage rates also bear some relation to the added costs?

If we make a comparison with other major items of expenditure within the service, what do we find? The rate of a 60-foot postal car has gone up over 71 per cent within the last twenty years. The expenditure for rail transportation has increased nearly 100 per cent. The cost of carrying mail by water has increased by over 300 per cent. The cost of our land mail services has increased by approximately 150 per cent, and the salaries of the basic classes of employes in the public service, such as letter carriers, postal clerks and railway mail clerks, have increased approximately 100 per cent.

As I have indicated, the estimated effect of the proposed increase on the revenues of the department will be approximately $15 million. If you look at the Postmaster General's report for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1953, page 3, you will find statistics which will enable you to check this estimate. I am now trying to answer directly the question: How did you arrive at this estimate? There are approximately 1,500 million pieces of first-class mail which, at one cent an item, will give you $15 million. To this should be added additional postage on the items which require more than the initial rate of postage. The total increase we estimate will be in the neighbourhood of $15,750,000. Against this, we must deduct the items forwarded by air mail, on which at present an air mail surcharge is paid. We estimate that this will be in the neighbourhood of $900,000, so that you will see that the amount we expect to obtain is slightly less than $15 million.

Reference has been made to the rates of postage paid in the United States. In this connection I would suggest that you examine the financial statement of the United States Post Office Department and look also at the deficit. I could further support the case for the increase by referring to the rates paid in other postal administrations, but I prefer to deal with this matter in relation to the Canadian economy.

Reference was also made and opposition expressed on the one hand to so-called hidden subsidies, but on the other hand it was suggested that the additional costs to which I have referred should be overcome by charging them to the general surplus. In the same breath some have criticized the subsidies and they have suggested them. These two approaches appear to me to be inconsistent. As far as I am concerned, I prefer to make an outright statement as to what the cost will be and, as I have already indicated, have those persons who use the service meet the additional expenditure. This seems to me to be the most equitable and straightforward way.

Some hon. members have referred to the surplus which the Postmaster General's reports show over the past twenty years. I would ask these gentlemen to bear in mind that during these years the department's revenues were augmented by the amount of postage stamps which were being used in payment of the tax on cheques or other remittances. Had this not been the case, then the surpluses to which they refer would have been materially reduced, if not dissipated entirely.

This year no postage stamps have been used in payment of the tax on cheques. As a result the surplus of $6,500,000 shown in the accounts for the last fiscal year will, it is estimated, become a deficit of at least $1 million.

It has been suggested that the department should not anticipate the increased expenditures, but should wait until the deficit actually occurs. I might say it is not a question of anticipation but one of fact. The increased rates of payment to postal employees are effective from December 1, 1953. Adjusted higher rates have already been paid to rural mail couriers, and adjustments are continually taking place. Arrangements are already being made for the recruiting of the additional staffs required to give the five-day forty-hour week service, and there is already a potential deficit as the revenues have barely been maintained compared to last year, whereas the total expenditure has increased during the nine-month period already elapsed by $4 million.

I appreciate the reference made to that great Liberal, Sir William Mulock, and to the fact that, while he was postmaster general, he reduced the letter rate of postage from 3 cents to 2 cents. At that time the opposition opposed the decrease. Now they oppose the increase. But the point I wish to make is that in 1898 the initial salary of postal employees was $400 a year. Now it is $2,400 a year, an increase of 500 per cent. The letter rate now proposed, namely five cents, would mean an increase of 150 per cent over the rates charged more than 50 years ago.

I now come to two specific cases. The hon. member for Vancouver East made the statement that direct air mails from Vancouver to Calgary were carried on the Canadian Pacific Air Lines rather than on the direct Trans-Canada Air Lines. Such is not the case.

He also made reference to mails being carried on the Canadian Pacific Railway to Kamloops and then transferred to the Canadian National Railways. There is nothing wrong with this. It is good post office practice and is simply the most economical utilization of space paid for and available.

I believe he also stated that he had been informed that the department was endeavouring to eliminate the night differential granted to postal employees. We have no such thought in mind. I am afraid that he is getting his information from an unreliable source.

Another point which was raised related to an incident mentioned by his leader which happened a number of years ago where mails were stated to have been carried in what seemed to be an illogical manner. The department does not claim to be perfect. Errors are bound to occur in an organization of this size, but there is usually some justifiable reason for the action taken. We are always desirous of being told when our decisions do not seem to be logical or justifiable, and we shall always be glad to explain the situation, if necessary to make inquiries, and, if any reasonable improvement can be made with due regard to economical operation, it will be done.

Now that we are talking about the service, let me give you some indication of the additional service which has been given by the Post Office Department during the past ten years. This is in answer to some suggestions that the service was poor or even worse. The number of cities where door to door delivery is given has increased from 89 to 127, or 38 additional cities. The number of additional homes served by letter carrier during this period is over 750,000. In the rural areas the number of patrons receiving rural mail delivery has increased from 290,000 to 410,000, an increase of 120,000 boxes. Therefore in the urban and rural areas over 870,000 additional families have been given individual service to their own homes or boxes in the last ten years.

In the outlying districts postal service has assisted in the development of such areas as Yellowknife, at points where there are uranium and other mining projects and where there are water power and aluminum developments such as at Kitimat in British Columbia. Additional service has also been given to Sept Iles in the province of Quebec in connection with the iron developments in Ungava, Labrador and northern Quebec. Many other such cases could be enumerated. As a matter of fact, the amount which we are paying for air stage services, that is, services to outlying and pioneer points, is approximately $1,500,000 a year.

May I come now to my hon. friend, the hon. member for Eglinton. He exhibited to the house several envelopes to indicate the standard of service. I know he did not knowingly wish to be unfair, and he was good enough to give me the exhibits so that due inquiry could be made. This has been done. I am going to read to the house the report I have received in each case. I am glad to do this as many charges of poor service are due to carelessness or irregularities on the part of the complainants themselves. Hon. members will recall that there were three letters addressed to the hon. member for Eglinton which were delayed unusually, even if it was at Christmastime. These letters could not be sorted because they lacked the necessary street address. All postal sortation distribution methods are based on address. The item would have to be diverted to the directory branch for search. During this past Christmas rush the volume given directory service was approximately 3 million pieces. It would be completely impracticable and impossible to expect that 6,600 helpers and 3,000 regular staff could memorize the addresses of individual people. It cannot be assumed that the residence of the hon. member for Eglinton would be known to individual members of the staff. I know that for me personally there is only one member for Eglinton, but I will assure him that for the employees of the postal service the situation is a little different, even if he is disillusioned on that ground.

Mr. Fleming: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Cote: Let me finish. I think the hon. member needs this information to put a true question. The latest Toronto street directory lists the names of fifteen people with the name "Fleming" whose first initial is "D". Of course, as I said, there is only one Don Fleming to me, but to these people there is one Don Fleming, one Donald Fleming, one D. M. and one Donald M. In the latest Toronto Bell Telephone directory there are eight male Flemings whose first initial is "D". There is one D. M. Fleming and one Donald M. Fleming. All of the foregoing are at different addresses. Neither of the directories indicates that any of these Flemings is an M.P.

During the peak there were seventy-two people devoting their time exclusively to insufficiently and improperly addressed items of mail. The individual search for information, it will be appreciated, is time consuming and involves high cost because of the number of people necessary to rectify the neglect of mailers. Let me add this in order to be fair to my hon. friend. He said that the name and address, "Donald Fleming, Toronto, Ontario", this is the way that the name appears in the house directory, parliamentary guide and similar works giving addresses. May I suggest to him and to all members who live in important cities similar to Toronto—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: Nothing is similar to Toronto.

Mr. Cote: —that where people have common names the address should be given as completely as possible. As I have already said, the fact that this occurred at a time when the department was dealing with millions and millions of letters explains the little delay in the case of the letters to my hon. friend.

Mr. Fleming: Has the time arrived for the question?

Mr. Cote: Yes.

Mr. Fleming: Is the minister aware that mail goes that way from Ottawa all the time in the case of Toronto members, that is to say, with nothing but "Toronto, Ontario" and "M.P." on it, and that in the ordinary case delay in delivery for the purpose of finding the street address is never more than half a day? That is a far cry from three weeks' delay as in one of the cases I mentioned last night.

Mr. Cote: It is possible in these cases, since the letters must have been returned to my hon. friend, that they came back here because there was no Toronto address on them.

Mr. Fleming: No, they did not come back.

Mr. Cote: A delay of ten or eleven days or even three weeks is self-explanatory in the light of the information I have already given. I can appreciate that other persons may have some friendship for my hon. friend. There is only one man like him and he may receive letters more rapidly in other circumstances, but even if he is well known the fact is that at Christmastime we have additional staffs including some people doing work on a determined route who cannot memorize even important names. I must give the hon. member full information because I want to satisfy him. Then there was a card and in this case the card was well addressed. There is no doubt about that.

The Chairman: Order. I can recognize the minister's desire to satisfy the hon. member for Eglinton, but I hope that hon. members will realize my difficulty in that the taking up of individual cases in the committee will delay the debate. I think we should confine ourselves to examples for the purpose of clarifying the debate rather than take up individual cases.

Mr. Cote: If my hon. friend is satisfied, I am satisfied.

Mr. Fleming: I am anything but satisfied, Mr. Chairman. I am only satisfied of this, that the post office service has deteriorated to a shocking degree, and if the minister has not got a better explanation than he has offered this afternoon he had better look elsewhere for any justification for this monstrous increase in rates. Why not let us hear about the card that was delayed a week and which was properly addressed to the street address?

Mr. Cote: I do not want to be out of order, but if the chairman will allow me I will give the explanation about the card. This item is prepaid at the third-class rate. First and second-class mail has priority over it. This item is postmarked December 30 which would be at the peak of the rush of New Year's cards, the peak of New Year's cards being the day before New Year's eve. With the long week-end intervening, this third-class item would be processed on the first full working day with total staff on duty, namely, Monday, January 4, and, as stated by the hon. member, it was delivered on January 5, 1954.

Mr. Fleming: No, January 6 for the others. They were after mine.

Mr. Cote: No, he said the 5th.

Mr. Fleming: To me, but I said the others received their similarly mailed cards on the 6th.

The Chairman: I wonder if the minister would agree with me that these individual requests will simply delay the business of the committee. Surely, they can be handled individually by the member for Eglinton and the minister.

Mr. Fleming: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Cote: I have attempted to reply fully to the representations which have been made by the opposition. If any further information is required I should be very glad to furnish it, if possible when the house is in committee on second reading. If there are further specific cases, I shall be glad to deal with them in my own office if hon. members will bring them to my attention.

In view of the remarks made concerning delays in service in the speeches delivered by the hon. member for Hamilton West and the hon. member for Vancouver East, it might not be inappropriate for me to read two letters which have been received concerning the postal service in those centres. The first one is a letter dated December 28, 1953, from Mr. J. H. Moore, general manager of the Hamilton chamber of commerce, to Mr. W. J. Turnbull, the deputy postmaster general.

It reads:

Dear Sir:

On behalf of the members of the Hamilton chamber of commerce I should like to express to you our sincere appreciation of the wonderful efforts made by the Hamilton post office in caring for the heavy Christmas mail this year.

Under the leadership of our postmaster, Mr. C. D. Stipe, the staff of the post office has done a magnificent job in keeping deliveries of regular and Christmas mail up to date for the past week or ten days.

I understand that our post office handled over one million more pieces of mail this year than was the case last year and in spite of this we have received all our regular business mail on time every day.

Speaking personally for this office, I think I can safely say that all our first-class mail has been delivered the day following its mailing and even second and third-class mail has been delivered by the second day after mailing.

This is, indeed, a very fine record and on behalf of the business and industrial firms of Hamilton I feel that you would be interested in knowing how much we appreciate this very fine service.

Yours sincerely,
J. H. Moore
General Manager.

Now, I turn to the member for Vancouver East because there is a letter from his riding. This letter is dated January 11, 1954, and is from Mr. Reg. T. Rose, executive secretary, Vancouver board of trade, Vancouver, B. C., to the Postmaster General. It reads:

Dear Sir:

At a meeting of the council of the Vancouver board of trade on Thursday last, I was asked to advise you that the council had noted the efficient operation of the Vancouver post office during the heavy pre-Christmas period and desired to extend, through you, to Mr. James Turner, the postmaster, our appreciation of the splendid efforts which he and his staff made to ensure a prompt and efficient delivery of the heavy volume of mail.

The president and a number of officers of the council visited the post office at the height of the pre-Christmas mailing season and were impressed at the effective way in which handicaps caused by lack of proper equipment, overcrowding of floor space and the use of part-time inexperienced staff had been overcome.

Your department is to be complimented on the efficiency of its operation, as it is evidenced in Vancouver.

Yours very truly,
Reg. T. Rose,
Executive Secretary.

Mrs. Fairclough: May I ask the Postmaster General a question? Did the department issue a form letter by which the chambers of commerce were provided an opportunity to answer?

Mr. Cote: No, we have enough to do to look after your mail.

Mrs. Fairclough: They are similar.

Mr. Cote: Now, Mr. Chairman, may I resume by saying that we must be fair to one another and realistic about the whole problem confronting us. After all, we all agree that these expenditures are necessary in order to implement the five-day week, and cover the salary increases of the post office employees and the rural mail carriers. No one is to blame. I believe I have given sufficient information by way of comparison between the increases in the different public services and the department. I believe the increase in the postal rate is quite moderate. Let us admit that this is a reasonable increase.

Let us face the facts. Since we are all agreed that these expenditures must be met, there are only two ways of doing it. One way is to let the users of the service pay for it. Those who are against the resolution say that the general public should bear the burden of the increased expenditures, even although some of them do not want the service. I believe that if each member in this house faces the facts and realizes the necessity for the increased expenditure, he should vote in support of the resolution.

Mr. Drew: The minister has dealt rather generally with the situation, Mr. Chairman, and to his own satisfaction has partly disposed of the example given by the hon. member for Eglinton concerning certain delays. I doubt, however, if there is any hon. member in this house who is not well aware of the delays that have occurred. Many have been ready to recognize the difficulties with which the post office department is confronted, but to suggest that there have not been extensive delays wholly unrelated to misaddressing, or lack of address, is simply to deny the facts that are in the minds of almost all hon. members here.

There have been comments, and not unfriendly comments, about the change in the postal service in this country. For instance, there was the statement made in more than one city that mail posted in Britain was being delivered here more quickly than mail posted and delivered in the same city. Having said that I think that every hon. member here knows from his own experience or her own experience that we have no more loyal, trustworthy and devoted civil servants in Canada than those who are delivering and handling the mail in this country. There is probably no public servant who is so closely in touch with the daily life of every one of us as the postman who delivers the mail at our door. He is practically a friend of the family. He is very much a part of the life of each family.

I am satisfied that there is nothing but praise and commendation for the way in which those who are carrying out the daily routine of the mail service have been performing their functions. The criticism which has been directed to the situation which exists is a criticism directed to the administration of the department. It is a criticism such as was made by the business firm which inquired into the activities of that department less than a year ago. It is a criticism of the kind that was placed, as a matter of record, by the firm of J. D. Woods and Gordon, and referred to in this house, although not in detail. It is criticism of the failure of the department to implement recommendations that could have been carried into effect.

The minister is quite correct when he says that it is so easy to suggest that increases of any kind should not be made, because no one of us likes paying more than we paid before for any other service. This, however, is something a little different from those ordinary increases which take place in regard to the daily necessities of our life. The minister has said, and it is no way an unfair suggestion, that we should look at the comparison between the increase in postage rates and the increase in the costs of other public services of a similar nature. At first glance that seems a cogent argument. There is another argument, however. The rise in cost of service has been general throughout the world. We must not only look at the increase in rates in relation to the increase in the cost of other services. It would be advisable for us to look at our rates in comparison with rates for similar services in other countries where there are similar social and economic conditions.

With that thought in mind, naturally we first direct our attention to the United States. We find that at a time when we are asked to approve an increase to five cents for the first ounce, in the United States, where in the ordinary course of events the cost of service is certainly not less than in Canada, they pay two cents for first-class mail placed in post offices where there is not a pick-up postal service, and three cents for the first ounce where there is the ordinary pick-up service.

In Britain they start with a higher weight. In Britain the unit of weight is the first two ounces. There they charge just over three cents, which is the present value of the two-pence-halfpenny postage. If we examine the rate that is charged for that service in countries of similar economic and social structure, I think we shall find that we have the highest rate in the world for that ordinary service to the homes of our people where family messages and the other communications are carried in this way.

The attitude on this occasion is simply one of showing where the department estimates that new costs are going to be incurred but there is no suggestion of what the department could do or has done to bring about some of those economies that might be effected. Already the minister has expressed his approval when one hon. member last night referred to a great postmaster general, and I might say he is regarded as a great postmaster general by all Canadians, namely the late Sir William Mulock. Sir William Mulock became famous not only in Canada but throughout the world because of the reduction of postage rates to what was then known as the penny postage, the two-cent stamp. He was reversing a trend that had gone on for some time. He was carrying forward a trend that had developed from 1851. To show the changes that had taken place, in 1851 the lowest charge for a letter was 18 cents, and then we came to the point in 1898 when living expenses were certainly far higher, and when any comparison of the cost of ordinary services would suggest on the present basis an increase. Nevertheless we find that there was actually a decrease at that time. No matter what some people may have thought at the time, I believe that because of the general acceptance, over the years, of the soundness of the position taken by Sir William Mulock at that time, it might be well to refer not only to the words which have been quoted but to certain other views that he expressed.

At column 5525 of Hansard of 1898 I find these words:

> I venture to say that these statistics establish beyond all question that the reduction in the letter rate promotes an increase in the number of letters, in the volume of business and in the revenue, and at any rate it is essential to the interests of the country that there should be the cheapest possible mail communication.

May I say that this statement has found general acceptance throughout the years:

> —that there should be the cheapest possible mail communication.

The minister is quite correct when he says that there was some questioning at that time about the wisdom of this course. From Hansard I read the following:

> Mr. Sproule: May I ask the hon. gentleman, does he mean that it will be self-sustaining, without charging any postage on newspapers?

Well, of course, that is another story for another time. I continue:

> The Postmaster General: Yes, I do; I mean to say that by the first day of January next, this department will be self-sustaining, without any revenue derived from the postage on newspapers, but it has to be borne in mind—
> Sir Adolphe Caron: How are you going to make it up?
> The Postmaster General: By economy and by the improved revenues of the department.

I suggest that the answer of Sir William Mulock on that occasion, in a speech that has been taken, over the years, almost as a textbook on the general desirability of encouraging the use of mails by the lowest possible postage rate, stands up. When he was asked how he was going to do it he said:

By economy and by the improved revenues of the department.

The fact that we shall have a five-cent stamp to perform the same service as a three-cent stamp will perform in the United States, just across that long border, is something that is not to be completely disregarded. After all, there are large business enterprises at many points along that border in cities from the Atlantic to the Pacific, some of them larger than others, some of them enormous businesses, sending out many thousands of pieces of mail every day. There would be nothing illegal in anybody getting in an automobile and driving across the boundary and posting these several thousand pieces of mail for three cents apiece and sending them into Canada at the reduced rate, below what they would pay if they posted the mail in Canada in the first place for delivery within our own country. I do not say that that is an impossibility. It would be a perfectly reasonable thing to do when in many cases they are just as close to a post office in the United States as they would be to a post office in a Canadian city.

Naturally Canadians want to support their own services and naturally there would be criticism if Canadians went outside the country to do that. However, we found in the case of cigarettes and a number of other things that people do look at the dollars and even at the cents. We are talking about cents in this case but those cents can accumulate to a great amount. No better evidence of the fact that many a mickle makes a muckle is to be found than in the amount of revenue the Postmaster General expects to obtain by this increase of one cent. Surely that is a fine example to our children of the law of economics and how much a cent may mean if there are enough of them put together.

Then there is another point. I think it is appropriate to mention this at this time. Hon. members of this house must have noticed that during the past week two important Canadian banks held their annual meeting. The Banque Canadienne Union Nationale—

An hon. Member: That is not a bank.

Mr. Drew: No, that is not a bank. The Banque Canadienne Nationale and the Royal Bank held their annual meetings last week. In each case the president of the bank emphasized that we must no longer be complacent about our high-priced economy. It was pointed out without in any way being alarmists, without in any way suggesting that this country of ours with its unique opportunities is not likely to see greater and more prosperous days ahead, that it would be wise for us Canadians to remember that we live in a competitive world where price along with quality is going to determine whether the things that we produce are going to be sold.

This is not the first time that I have raised this point in the house, nor is it the first time that it has been raised by other members of the Conservative party. We have sought to emphasize that in a period of increasing world competition taxes of all kinds and burdens of every nature which increase the ultimate cost of the thing we sell must be examined, not only from the point of view of the burden on the individual but from the point of view of the effect it will have upon a nation which is today more dependent than any other nation in the world upon the maintenance of its export business for the continuance of its prosperity.

I suggest that this is not the time to be increasing the tax burden, and this is a tax for a service. This is not a time to be increasing this burden when we should be looking for every opportunity to save even one cent. We must recognize that this becomes a part of the general cost of doing business and selling the things that we produce.

There is another feature that arises in the cost of postage. Unless the newspapers of Canada from one side of the country to the other have been quite wrong in their comments about delays in deliveries, there has been an increasing number of delays in the delivery of our mail. Even if it is a question only of three days instead of one, that is important. One clear demonstration of the efficiency of organized society is the speed with which people can communicate with each other within that society.

In other countries they have been increasing the speed of delivery. In other countries, even where the costs are high, there are several deliveries a day. In some of the larger cities in other countries a letter posted one day is delivered the same day. We should be striving to improve the effective delivery and more frequent delivery of our mail, instead of having a less frequent delivery with unexplainable delays of one, two and three days in the delivery of business mail.

All this tends to persuade people to use other services such as the telegraph and the telephone. Who knows but that may be one of the reasons why so many millions of dollars have been added to the cost of telegrams sent by this government. It may be due to the fact that the government departments know that their own Post Office Department is so slow that if they want to get a quick answer they had better use the telegraph or the telephone. We have been curious as to the tremendous increase in the cost of telegrams and telephone calls and perhaps that is the explanation. It would be interesting if we could get that answer. Certainly a higher cost of postal service will encourage people to use these other services.

We pride ourselves on the efficiency of our telegraph and telephone services. I think we can say with satisfaction that they are not surpassed in any country of the world, even when we consider the long distances of this country. The Post Office Department should be doing everything they can to provide a cheap service by mail which offers a means of communication to the masses of our people. The rate should be such as to encourage them to use it more and more.

The attitude of the government in regard to these costs is demonstrated by the fact that emphasis has been placed upon a supposed loss of $7,500,000 because of the elimination of the stamp tax. Are we to believe from that statement that the Post Office Department can sell $7,500,000 worth of stamps without additional cost? Does it cost nothing to produce stamps? Whether they are right or wrong, some newspapers in this country have suggested that some stamps look as though they had been produced without much cost.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Produced by themselves.

Mr. Drew: The fact remains that there is a specific cost element in the production and handling of stamps. Surely we are not going to be told that there was no difference in the cost of the operation in the handling of the $7,500,000 worth of stamps? Surely that would be a condemnation of administration which the department would hardly like to place before us. No, it is not $7,500,000 we are dealing with; it is the net result of the elimination of that.

But there is something more. The measure now before us is the pay-off on the political bait that was offered last spring. The government knew perfectly well when it removed the stamp tax that this result was going to follow. It pointed out how convenient it was going to be not to have to put stamps on cheques; but it is only now that we are being told that the taxpayers of Canada have got to pay for it in another way. Instead of paying it on the cheques, so many of which are issued by the larger corporations in this country, this is going to be paid by way of the postage stamps which are so much a part of the service rendered to the masses of the people in every part of Canada.

Mr. Hodgson: They will take the cent off at the next election.

Mr. Drew: When today the minister tells us that some of these expenses could not be anticipated, may I remind him that the general policy of a five-day 40-hour week was being instituted some considerable time ago, and that this must surely have been in the minds of officials of the department at that time.

No, Mr. Chairman; this is another case where the pleasant thing was done before the election. And now, with all the smiling blandness of the explanation given by the minister here today and yesterday, we are asked to approve the adding of this burden to the postal service of Canada.

I was interested in the statement made yesterday by one hon. member when he said that if big businessmen were paying it this government would not be making the change. I do not quite understand that statement; but let us remember that, very largely, it was the big businessmen who paid the stamp tax, in so far as those big businessmen may be regarded as paying what the corporations pay. But we know perfectly well that the costs of those things are added to the cost of doing business in this country anyway; and they are deductible for income tax purposes. This was known very well by the minister who is sponsoring the bill as well as by the minister who announced this increase in the price of postage stamps.

A good deal has been said about the cost of post offices across the country. The suggestion seems to be that we should not worry about an increase of this kind when we think about all that is being spent on post offices. Let me point out that post offices do not serve only in the handling of letters on which this postage will be paid. Those post offices handle registrations and special delivery services. Then, in addition to that, in most places the post office building houses the customs offices. In other places we find in the post office buildings the offices of the government annuities service as well as services rendered by the Department of Labour.

In short, post office buildings across this country are for the general service of the community. Certainly nothing I am saying suggests that we should be reckless in the handling of our postal service, or in any other services, or that we should disregard the costs. But having regard to the fact that our neighbours in the United States, who live lives very similar to ours and who are faced with costs very much like those we face, are called upon to pay only two or three cents for first-class postal service of this kind, I suggest it is very unsound, in this very competitive world, to ask our people to pay five cents for a similar service.

I repeat that we are not just dealing with one cent, or even with a five-cent piece which, on occasion, has been embarrassing to governments before. We are dealing with the total amount of this increase in a service that is closely associated with the daily lives of our people, perhaps more closely than any other service they receive from the government each day.

I suggest therefore that much more than a casual explanation of expected added costs should be given to us by the Postmaster General, who heads a department which has accumulated such enormous surpluses in years gone by. I know that reference has been made to them; but, having regard to the explanation offered today, may I remind the minister how easy it would have been to wait and see just exactly what the net result of changes being made would be, and whether certain things could not be done to expand the services offered by the Post Office Department through the introduction of new devices, such as have been introduced in the past to encourage the use of the postal service.

We know that over a period of 10 years the surpluses of this department amounted to $70,193,330.54, and that for the preceding 10 years the surpluses were $22,969,606.69, making a total of more than $93 million surplus in the last 20 years in the operations of this department, and at the lower stamp rates which have been in effect during that length of time.

Mr. Cardiff: What did they do with the money?

Mr. Drew: It has gone into accumulated revenues; and the people paying for this service have been asked to contribute in that way to the maintenance of other government departments where this principle did not apply.

Nevertheless those who are paying for a service of this kind surely have the right to say that it would be better, before we are asked to approve a five-cent or any other rate, to see exactly what the result of changes will be. And also we might hope that there might even be some attempt at improving the efficiency of the service and introducing new devices to encourage its use.

If we were told that never in the past had there been a deficit in the Post Office Department within that period when those huge surpluses accumulated, then perhaps we might understand the minister's sensitivity on this point. But the fact of the matter is that there were deficits. Within that 20 year period when $93 million accumulated in surpluses, there was a deficit in 1939 of $167,961.80 and in 1951 of $1,326,788.51. But these deficits were absorbed in the general activities of the department. The surpluses to which I have referred accumulated, in spite of the deficits in the two years to which I have referred.

There is one other matter that certainly should be examined before we are asked to approve this recommendation. I submit this is the time for us to leave no doubt that we do not approve of the principle placed before us, because in a democracy it is always hoped that even a government that is the least responsive to the will of parliament will sometimes feel that arguments offered have had weight sufficient to persuade them to change their course.

I suggest that the present Postmaster General would be taking a step in the right direction and one which would win him a substantial measure of commendation if he announced that, in view of the arguments which have been presented, he proposed to let this motion stand. That course would be consistent with our democratic system, because no argument has been presented which justifies this increase now proposed to us. I therefore most earnestly submit to the Postmaster General that he should not close his ears to the arguments that are being made or close his thoughts to the possibility that he might go down in history as a great Postmaster General if he would assert his belief that economy is a sound course and that we should stand where we are until he has tested the changes that he has made.

Mr. Cote: I just want to say one word since the Leader of the Opposition raised the matter of making comparisons with the United States. The letter rate is three cents, but the Postmaster General in the United States has made representations for an increase. Rates have been increased on newspapers and parcel post. One most important fact he forgot to tell us is that in the United States there was a deficit last year of $770 million. If the Leader of the Opposition wants our economy to be exactly like the one of the United States, I hope at least he does not wish that we have a deficit similar to that in the United States.

Mr. Drew: I think the minister is aware of the fact that the increase that he is referring to is not an increase in the first-class postal rate.

Mr. Cote: The letter rate is three cents; an increase to four cents is proposed.

Mr. Drew: A newspaper rate increase.

Mr. Cote: No; letter rate.

Mr. Drew: It has not been put into effect.

Mr. Cote: They are actually studying it now and representations to that effect have been made by the Postmaster General himself.

Mr. Drew: I have no doubt that the Postmaster General has read the reports of the strong objections that have already been raised by members of congress to any such suggestion.

Mr. Cote: I do not want to enter into a discussion of the matter. I would be out of order if I did so. But let me remind the Leader of the Opposition that there is an eloquent piece of evidence here in the annual deficit of more than $700 million. When it is recalled that the population of the United States is at least ten times greater than our own, he will understand why, according to our economy with our smaller population, the five-cent rate is reasonable.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, yesterday I stated my very strong opposition to this increase in postal rates. I therefore do not need to repeat my arguments today. I then made it clear—and I still feel that I was right—that this is just a case of putting back on a tax which was taken off just before the election.

Mr. Hodgson: And it will be taken off before the next election too.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, no doubt. But next time a tax is taken off just before an election, we will ask the Minister of Finance under what name he proposes to reimpose that tax after the election if the government should be elected again. However, I have another purpose in rising at this moment. Naturally most of the stories that are told from this side of the chamber are stories that show up the weaknesses of the government or inadequacies in government services. But once in a while we have an example on the other side. I have had this one in my files for some time. I did not know whether I would ever have the nerve to tell about it in the House of Commons, but the discussion today about the difficulty that the post office people had in locating the hon. member for Eglinton in the city of Toronto reminded me of this piece of evidence which I now have in my hand. I therefore went up to my office and got it.

It so happens that, as is the case with many other hon. members, a great deal of mail comes to my home in Winnipeg when I am down here and which my family has to re-address and forward to me here. To save them trouble I had made some time ago a rubber stamp which reads, "House of Commons, Ottawa, Ontario". All that the members of my family need to do is to stroke out my home address and rubber stamp the new address. Some of the members of my family have formed the habit of using that rubber stamp even when they write me personal letters. They simply write my name on the envelope and then use the rubber stamp "House of Commons, Ottawa, Ontario". But on March 14, 1950, one of the members of my family wrote me a letter and, as was usual, wrote on the envelope in ink "Mr. Stanley Knowles". But that member of my family forgot to apply the address by means of the rubber stamp. Nothing else was put on the front of the envelope, not even "M.P.", not even "O.H.M.S.", not even "Ottawa", or not even "Canada"; just "Mr. Stanley Knowles". It was postmarked at Winnipeg at 11.30 p.m. March 14, 1950.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It has the House of Commons stamp on the back of it.

An hon. Member: There is only one Stanley Knowles.

Mr. Knowles: I received it here in Ottawa the next day. It is postmarked on the back as received at the House of Commons March 15, 1950.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend points out that "House of Commons" is stamped on the back.

Mr. Knowles: No, that is just the House of Commons crest on the flap.

Mrs. Fairclough: It is still pretty good.

Mr. Knowles: As the hon. member for Hamilton West says, it is still pretty good for the post office employees in Winnipeg not to have to spend two or three weeks but rather to put the letter in the proper bag and to see to it that it reached me within 18 hours after the letter was written. So there are times when the service provided by the post office is pretty good.

Mr. Hodgson: They all vote for the hon. member so they know him.

Mr. Knowles: I was not asking for that sort of comment but I have no objection to it, Mr. Chairman. As I say, when we have examples like this one, there is no reason why we should not give the commendation that is deserved. But that still does not justify putting on, after an election, a tax that was taken off just before it.

Mr. Hees: When the Postmaster General was replying to a statement made by the hon. member for Eglinton last night pointing out certain delays in the delivery of mail, I think the Postmaster General implied that, provided the mail was properly addressed, there would be no delay in delivery. This morning I received a letter from one of my constituents, and I took the trouble to telephone him long distance to find out whether these letters to which he referred had been properly addressed, and he assured me that they had been. I should therefore like to read exactly what he says. The letter is from Mr. Willis L. Blair of 2 Kimbourne Avenue, Toronto. He says:

Dear Mr. Hees:

I wish to pass on to you two instances of serious delays in the mail service in the city of Toronto.

In the one case, I mailed a letter with 3 cents postage affixed in proper place, on the 17th of December, 1953. This letter did not arrive at its destination until December 23, 1953.

That is six days later. The letter continues:

In the other case the letter was mailed on January 1, 1954 (in plenty of time for the 5 o'clock pick-up)—

That being a holiday.

—with a 3 cent stamp on it, and it did not arrive at its destination until January 6, 1954.

Mr. Cote: Will my hon. friend let me have the envelopes so that I may have inquiries made?

Mr. Hees: I will get the envelopes for the Postmaster General and I shall be glad to do that. My constituent goes on to say:

I can appreciate the fact that the post office facilities are taxed to the limit at the Christmas season, but I can see no justifiable reason for first-class mail to take five and six days to reach its destination right here in the city. It may be a coincidence but both pieces of mail mentioned above were delivered from postal station "J" on Danforth Ave.

Second class mail has been taking anywhere up to seven and eight days for delivery. This situation is certainly deplorable but it is about the delivery of first class mail I wish to complain.

I would appreciate it, if at some appropriate time, you would take this matter up with the Post Office Department. How is this department going to justify an increase in postage rates of 25 per cent to 33⅓ per cent, when their present service is not worth the current rate we are paying?

Yours truly,

Willis L. Blair.

I hope that the Postmaster General will have these cases investigated. I am giving him all the information I can because I think that first-class mail delivery is, as Mr. Blair says, deplorable.

I want to speak for a moment about the reduction in the air mail rate. The Postmaster General has told us that the air mail rate will be reduced from seven cents to five cents.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I hesitate very much to interrupt the hon. member in his remarks, but I do not believe that the reduction of air mail rates comes within the purview of the resolution before us, which is entirely one to increase certain postal rates. I would ask the hon. member to bear that in mind.

Mr. Hees: With all deference to you, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this is an important part of this whole discussion because the reason given for the increase in rates is loss of revenue. I want to point out here why I believe that the loss of revenue which will take place because of the decrease in the air mail rate from seven cents to five cents is unjustified. I believe that, quite the reverse of regular mail, air mail is something for which a person can pay an extra fee if it is so important for him or her to have such mail delivered in a hurry. If I have to have a letter delivered somewhere in Canada faster than ordinary mail delivery will take it there, then I am perfectly willing to pay two or three cents extra to have that service. I am sure every Canadian feels exactly the same way about it. This is not regular postal delivery. This is, if you want to look at it in this way, a luxury service for which people should be willing to pay if they receive the service.

Mr. Cote: Will the hon. member permit a question? Does he suggest that we should abolish air transportation for mail?

Mr. Hees: I am going to make two suggestions to enable the Postmaster General to keep his service on a pay-as-you-go basis without increasing the general postal rate. The first is to leave the air mail rate at seven cents. According to simple arithmetic, a reduction of two cents on 32 million pieces of mail amounts to $640,000 a year, and leaving the air mail rate at seven cents would mean a saving of that amount. Then I come to my second suggestion. In his budget last year, the Minister of Finance cancelled the stamp tax on cheques. That matter has already been discussed by several members. The Minister of Finance estimated that it would cost the government $12 million to effect the cancellation of the stamp tax on cheques. That tax was borne largely by business, and very little by the ordinary people of the country.

The ordinary workingman receives his pay cheque, takes it to the bank and cashes it. When such cheque had a stamp affixed to it, the stamp was put there by the firm employing him. He cashes the cheque, takes the money home, gives most of it to his wife, keeps some for himself, and carries on for the next week or two. If the ordinary person has a bank account, it is usually a savings account and he issues relatively few cheques. To me the cancelling of the stamp tax on cheques was simply a pre-election inducement, shall we call it, to business. I do not know any ordinary citizens who were very elated about its cancellation, or felt that they benefited very much from it. It is something which everybody certainly accepts, but if it is a question of a choice between requiring people to affix a stamp on a cheque, and raising the general postal rate one cent right across the board, then to me there is no comparison.

The arithmetic of this whole thing adds up in this way. Last year the Post Office Department showed an operating surplus of $6 million. If the stamp tax on cheques had not been cancelled, that $6 million surplus, together with the $12 million which the Minister of Finance estimated it would cost the government to eliminate the stamp tax on cheques, would add up to $18 million. The Postmaster General estimates that his new expenses are going to run around $14 million. Therefore, according to my arithmetic, the Postmaster General and the government, if they would follow the suggestion I am making, would be able to show a surplus of $4 million, and it would not be necessary to tamper in any way with the general postal rates which affect the ordinary people of this country; the people whom we must protect. They are the people who are going to be hurt very materially by this general increase in postal rates. If the Postmaster General and the government feel that the Post Office Department must pay its own way, this is a suggestion how to do it. It is a suggestion which I feel will meet with the general approval of people throughout the country, and for that reason I recommend it most seriously to the Postmaster General for his consideration.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take part in this discussion for a moment not so much as a politician or parliamentarian but as a philatelist, a stamp collector. I have one or two observations leading up to one point I have to offer. I am a member of the Saint John stamp club and, I think, still a member of the Canadian philatelic society. Stamp collectors generally have a pretty good idea of the whole picture so far as the stamp business is concerned.

First of all I should like to make an observation about our Canadian stamps. Back in the 1920's we turned out some very lovely, finely engraved and beautiful stamps which received attention all over the world. I refer particularly to the 50-cent Bluenose stamp which I think won an international prize at that time. But since the twenties our stamps have deteriorated greatly in their engraving, and while Canadian stamps are generally very highly regarded by collectors in the sense that they are scarce and in demand on the market I do think we should note that our stamps have fallen off slightly in their beauty. When this increase goes through and new stamps are needed I think it might be noted that perhaps we could concentrate a little bit more on the standards that we followed formerly.

Another point, and one that is perhaps more important here, concerns the relative value of ordinary postage in other countries of the world. As a collector thumbs through his stamps he naturally notices the value of the stamps of these other countries that are found in the largest quantity, and I should like to take a minute now to compare the rates or values of stamps in the countries of Europe and elsewhere in the world. It was not possible for me to get any exact figures on the relative rates in other countries. I checked with the Post Office Department, but they did not have any information. I quite appreciate that a request for such information would be unusual, and also difficult to fill. The rates would have to be translated into our own currency, and in addition to that some of the countries are on the metric system of weights.

Nevertheless, from a quick observation, from talking with people who have travelled and from my own travels, I have gathered some figures which I should like to throw into this discussion. I believe that in Poland it costs six cents to send a postcard. Czechoslovakia and Bulgaria are both a cent less than that figure. The other figures decrease generally until you reach countries with a better culture and a better standard of living. I happen to know that in Portugal, Egypt and India the rates for both postcards and ordinary mail are very high.

Turning to Great Britain and the United States, the two countries which are perhaps most comparable with our own today in terms of general enlightenment and culture, I believe that the postal rate in England is one and a half pence. I am still sure that the postal rate in the United States is three cents, although the Postmaster General hinted there might be an increase. I know that in his state of the union address, President Eisenhower recommended moving the rate to four cents, but no action has been taken in congress. We have rates, therefore, in both England and the United States of about three cents.

Now, the conclusions I shall draw from these one or two observations, as a stamp collector, are alarming. When other people who are familiar with the situation see that countries with depressed conditions, that do not have the fine standard of living we have, charge high rates for this necessary service and the other countries with better living conditions have a lower postal rate, and this proposed increase in Canada will be going in the direction of the depressed countries, then people will be forced to conclude that Canada is stepping down to the levels of those countries. I know that my stamp collecting friends will agree with that.

Mr. Dinsdale: I should like to comment briefly on this proposed increase in the postal rate, mainly because yesterday the hon. member for Charlotte made an observation to the effect that people in the various parts of Canada were not too interested in the effects of the proposal. I have received several communications on the subject, and as the information arising from this discussion is scattered across the country through the medium of the press, I am sure I shall receive further communications. I believe that is to be expected because, as was pointed out by various speakers, the people of Canada, like the people of all democratic countries, have come to regard the provision of a reasonably inexpensive postal service as a part of their democratic heritage.

It seems that it is an unwritten principle that they identify the provision of cheap postal service with the provision of highways, bridges and other means of communication. The proposed increase, therefore, even though it seems to be infinitesimally small, as it is in this case, will draw considerable protest from the people of Canada.

I should like to make one brief suggestion to the Postmaster General on this matter. During the debate several members have made statements praising the efficiency of the employees in the Post Office Department. I am rather inclined to conclude that, as a result of the improvement in working conditions recently made, the introduction of the five-day, forty-hour week and the increase in wages, you are going to see a further increase in efficiency. It might be that the increased volume of work handled by the employees would tend to offset the increased expenditures that have resulted from these improvements. I say this because from a very narrow knowledge of the subject—I have knowledge only of the conditions in our local post office in Brandon—I would be inclined to think that if efficiency is the same in every post office as it is in Brandon we might increase revenue to such an extent by the improvement in productivity that it would more than offset the expected $12 million deficit.

For example, some statistics I have in front of me relating to the Brandon post office show that in 1925, with an annual revenue of $110,600, there were 44 employees. In 1952 with a revenue of $217,120, there were 41 employees, a decrease of three employees and almost a doubling of the revenues. In terms of the employee situation, before the change-over to one delivery per day there were 15 walks in the city of Brandon. As a result of the decreased frequency of service the number of walks was decreased to 12 and eventually cut to 11. Since the improvement in the salary situation, and notwithstanding the rapid expansion of the city of Brandon since the war, the number of walks stands at eleven and a half.

I was rather curious about the half a walk, so I inquired about it. I understand that as a result of appeals from the local office it was decided to put on a carrier for four hours a day, and this constitutes half a walk. It seems to me here is efficiency par excellence. In our local post office unit with revenues going up and work increasing—no doubt the figures for 1953 will be considerably above those I quoted for 1952—there has been a decrease in the personnel employed. I see no reason why, if such efficiency is possible right across Canada, sufficient savings might not be made to meet the expected deficit.

In any case the proposal is of such a controversial nature that it would be wise to postpone a decision for two or three years to ascertain the effect of the new situation in the Post Office Department. If, as the member for Charlotte concluded yesterday, there is no undue anxiety in the minds of the people of Canada concerning this one-cent postal increase, it would not do any harm to the government if it waited even until a pre-election year before introducing this measure.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I rise to support hon. members who have spoken against the introduction of this resolution at this time. Some members of this group rose yesterday and asked for a vote on the matter. It is a pleasure to listen to the explanations of the genial and courteous Postmaster General. He has always been nonchalant in his answers, and courteous throughout the whole debate. I think he is taking the matter more seriously now than when he first introduced the resolution. The preponderance of evidence which hon. members have brought forward in this debate indicates that at this time the people of Canada do not like this increase in the postal rate in any way, shape or form, and are not in agreement with it.

In his explanation this afternoon the minister told us there are only two methods by which we can meet the situation which faces the post office at the present time. He said that owing to the introduction of the five-day and forty-hour week there have been increases in costs. I want to suggest to him that the two methods which he indicated, namely an increase in the cost of postal service or subsidization of the Post Office Department, are not the only ways by which improvements can be brought about. Economies in the operation of the post office could be effected. If his department would seriously undertake economies I am sure that improvements could be brought about.

I suggest to the minister that the United States post office department has just done that very thing in one operation. They investigated different methods by which they could inaugurate economies, and they found that by using nylon mail bags instead of the heavier canvas bags they could save the post office department $800,000. That change is to be instituted in the near future. I know very well that the United States post office department handles a great deal more mail than we do in Canada, but I want to promote the idea of that change here in Canada, and I am sure we could make a proportionate saving in this country.

It surprises me that 125 days after the August 10 election we should have this government introducing a resolution such as this. Prior to the election they brought in a so-called election budget, which was given a great deal of publicity in Canada. I know that in my own province the Liberal candidates referred to it quite often. Frequent reference was made to the discontinuance of the 3-cent tax on cheques.

It seems to me this government has some sort of tax malady. In my school days we used to hear of trigger-happy people who would go out and shoot up everybody. Now we have a government that is tax-happy. Before the election they became affected in some way, and they found ways and means of reducing the revenue of the government by eliminating the tax on cheques, and taking off a tax here and there. The Liberal candidates in the west went around the provinces indicating that the government was going to slash taxes, and suggested that if they were returned to power that sort of thing would continue. What do we find? Immediately after the government returns to Ottawa they ask hon. members to impose a tax on the mails of this country.

Let us look at this question. Yesterday the hon. member for Charlotte said he felt the people were willing to pay this extra amount. He said it would be big business who would pay the bulk of the increase. Today we are living in a complex society. It is quite different from 30 or 40 years ago. Today many of our young people are in the armed forces and are away from home. This is going to be an important restriction on the people in the low-income brackets. The people we are concerned about are not the people in big business. They can take care of themselves. If we have a 7-cent air mail stamp they are able to put the 7-cent stamp on their mail and have it go by air. I am concerned with the people in the low-income brackets.

We have a government across the way who by their decontrol policy and tax policy are leaving with the people in the small income brackets only a small amount of money to take care of their needs. They have to budget very carefully. If we accept the truth of the statement that today our dollar is worth perhaps 50 cents, then it becomes obvious that every cent we take from the purchasing power of the people in low-income brackets will have an important effect on the livelihood of these people.

I feel quite confident, and I say it to the minister, that the young people in the armed services want to continue to correspond with their people at home. They want to continue writing to their people, and they are not worrying too much about fast mail service. If the minister cannot assure the committee that first-class mail will go by aeroplane, then I am sure these people would rather have the lower rate than the higher rate suggested.

I do not want to prolong this debate, but in view of what has happened the Postmaster General might tell the committee now, since he is bringing in this measure 125 days after the election, whether when election time rolls around three years from now we shall again have the 4-cent postage.

Mr. Thatcher: May I direct one question to the minister, and I do this for clarification purposes. Perhaps the minister has given the information, but can he tell the committee exactly what deficit or surplus he estimates the post office will have next year if this resolution passes?

Mr. Cote: If we could be assured of no other increases in either material costs or wage rates and so on, we should have a surplus of half a million dollars. We should have a surplus of half a million dollars, but according to the experience of the past this half a million dollars may not be enough to cover the increase in cost of basic materials or other services necessary to the operation of postal services. Therefore it might be a few hundred thousand dollars, or it might be less than a hundred thousand dollars. In other words we might have a little surplus or a little deficit.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There are one or two questions I should like to ask the minister. I am not going to repeat the arguments that have been advanced in the last two days in opposition to this resolution. I rise merely to ask one or two questions because after all this gives the minister an opportunity to answer questions that may be relevant to the resolution. Indeed I think the minister deserves credit for being almost the only one of the ministers who in introducing a resolution is not surrounded by officials. He has actually answered the questions by himself and of his own knowledge.

Having said that, may I ask whether or not consideration has been given to the fact that in increasing the rate from 4 to 5 cents, there will be a decrease in the amount of revenue. As the Leader of the Opposition said, that was the experience when a heavy tax was placed on cigarettes. At that time we pointed out the great danger that the law of diminishing return would apply and that ultimately the government would find itself in the position where it would have to retreat from the taxation it had imposed. No doubt the minister and his officials have given consideration to this matter, and I should like to know the degree by which it is thought this increase of 25 per cent in postal rates on ordinary mail will reduce the total revenue.

The minister referred to a commission or committee which over a period had investigated the Post Office Department with a view to improving its efficiency, or at least its effectiveness. Certainly my experience with the department has been such that I can make no criticism, but naturally when an experienced group of chartered accountants make what the minister has referred to as a full and complete examination there is no doubt that in their report generalized considerations and decisions would be arrived at.

Would the minister place before the committee a summary of the recommendations of that commission and also of what changes, if any, have been put into effect in order to implement their report? As I remember, the minister stated yesterday that various recommendations had already been implemented. Would the minister take the committee into his confidence and summarize in a general way the criticisms that were made and also in general outline the improvements that have been brought into being in an effort to remove such shortcomings as were found by the commission?

Mr. Cote: In answering the first question, may I say that I cannot state exactly to what degree this increase will decrease postal revenue. If I correctly recall the information I have received, it will not affect in a big way the estimate we have given to the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What has been the experience in the past when an increase has taken place?

Mr. Cote: I could not say. I shall get this information and give it to the house on second reading. As far as the other question asked by my hon. friend is concerned, may I say that I invited the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace to look over the Woods-Gordon report. As I remember, that report was made a month or two after I took over the department. It was a managerial report for the use of the department alone. It would not be fair if I gave one hon. member a copy and not another. I extended that invitation last evening to the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace, and he was in my office this morning and again this afternoon.

We asked these experts to go all over the department to find out where, when and how it could be improved. That was why we had experts come in to show us if it could be improved. Necessarily this department must follow the expansion of the country. If there is one department which must closely follow the expansion of this country it is the Post Office Department, because of its work in establishing communications between members of the whole Canadian family which necessitates our going everywhere in Canada.

That was one of the factors which inspired the department to ask for this managerial report. The report is in my hands and I have no objection to showing it to any hon. member. We have started to implement the recommendations of the report. For instance, there was some criticism of the location of a sorting table and the suggestion that it be moved from one place to another to permit a speed-up in the mail and bring about greater economy in that particular place.

I shall be only too glad to ask my officials to give me an up-to-date report. I would not like to impose upon hon. members by making another long speech, but if it is the unanimous desire of hon. members I shall be only too glad to bring in a summary of the implementations already made in following out the recommendations of the Woods-Gordon report, and also some information as to any possible decrease in the volume of business because of the increase in rates.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Did that commission suggest that many of the difficulties would be solved by increasing the rate from 4 to 5 cents?

Mr. Cote: I am not in a position to answer that question. I have not read the report lately, but I shall be glad to look into that matter.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that so many hon. members have spoken on this resolution I feel I would be remiss if I did not make at least one or two observations.

In rising to speak on this resolution with regard to increased postal rates I want first of all to commend the Postmaster General and the employees of the Post Office Department for the services they have rendered. I am sure that we all recognize that in carrying out their responsibilities they are faced with considerable difficulties. We appreciate what they are endeavouring to do in spite of those obstacles, and I do want to express my appreciation.

We feel that they are endeavouring to finance the operations of the department from the revenue received and in one sense that is commendable. However I feel, like other hon. members who have spoken, that the proposed increase should not be put into effect until it has been proved conclusively that the increased revenue is required, until such time as it has been proved conclusively that there is no other adequate solution to the problem. Therefore I oppose the putting into effect of this resolution.

Many suggestions have been made which I trust will receive the careful consideration of the Postmaster General and the department. One hon. member has stated that in the final analysis it is the corporation, the big business house, that will carry the load in this new tax; but I wonder if that is actually true. It seems to me that corporations and big business would see to it that they recovered that additional cost through higher prices.

Then I should like to interject another thought at this point. This has to do with the use of air mail by corporations. I am thinking of one such corporation that has been called to my attention as using air mail almost exclusively. They put 7-cent stamps on their letters, and in this way make use of the air mail service. I realize that that is only one isolated company; but if there is one, then it follows that there may be dozens or hundreds more.

The suggestion would appear to be that the air mail rate will be reduced, so there will be a straight 5-cent rate. Therefore the big business concerns, these corporations to which I have referred, will receive the benefit. Instead of carrying on as they are doing, the revenue will be further reduced because the postal rates on their mail will be reduced as I have indicated. I have referred to only one case; but if there is one it is possible there may be others as well.

One or two hon. members have called attention to the fact that in past years the postal department has piled up great surpluses. In fact our attention has been drawn to figures which indicate that in a period of 19 years over $90 million in surpluses has been piled up.

The estimate submitted by the Postmaster General is sufficient not only to take care of the anticipated increased expenditures and the deficit, but an additional $500,000 as well. Why all this hurry? Why all this rush? If in past years there have been surpluses amounting to more than $90 million, perhaps the Post Office Department should be something like the bear who is content to hibernate and live off his excess fat for a while. Perhaps the department should leave things as they are. There might be some virtue in the suggestion that they consider the matter for about three years, and then if they find it necessary they could increase the rates or bring the situation to the attention of parliament.

I support the suggestion offered by the hon. member for New Westminster that, should this increase be imposed and the anticipated surplus be realized—and I believe it is expected that there will be a surplus—it should be passed along by way of benefits to the civil service, the members of which are striving to fulfil their duties, many under very discouraging circumstances. We appreciate the work being done by postal employees. They are doing a tremendous job that is deeply appreciated. Therefore I suggest that their services be further recognized by permitting them to participate in the benefits flowing from these surpluses.

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to make a speech on a subject which has been so well discussed. However, I have a few questions to ask the minister.

First, in the debate yesterday the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, I believe it was, expressed the hope that some of the financial benefits accruing from this increase might find their way to the postmasters in the smaller post offices throughout Canada. I am wondering whether that was just a hope on his part, or whether he had some indication from the government that that is to be done. Would the minister comment on this point?

Mr. Cote: I understand that actually the officials are considering giving an increase to revenue postmasters. However, I shall be in a better position to give details when the bill is before us for second reading.

Mr. Zaplitny: A further question has reference to a part of the discussion to which I believe the Postmaster General has not replied, unless I missed it. The question has come up repeatedly in connection with second-class mail not being included in the proposal before us. I suppose there must be some reason why the increase is for first-class mail only. In view of the fact that it has been pointed out that we are losing money on second-class mail, from a cost accounting standpoint, while we are making a profit on first-class mail, would the Postmaster General tell us why he is not proposing an increase in the rate on second-class mail?

Mr. Cote: According to statute, parliament has to decide about any increase in the rate on first-class mail. However, we may take it for granted that it is a general increase of one cent all along the line.

Mr. Zaplitny: Either the Postmaster General did not understand my question or I did not understand his answer. I have asked why he is confining the increase to the rate on first-class mail, and leaving second-class mail untouched.

Mr. Cote: I do not understand what my hon. friend is saying. Does he ask whether we are going to increase the postage rate on newspapers?

Mr. Zaplitny: Anything which would fall within the definition of second-class mail.

Mr. Cote: No.

Mr. Zaplitny: Newspapers would be one of them.

Mr. Cote: We are not going to touch newspapers.

Mr. Zaplitny: You have no intention of asking for an increase on that?

Mr. Cote: No, not on newspapers.

Mr. Zaplitny: Would the Postmaster General explain why he is not asking for an increase in the rate on a class of material on which we are losing money, from a cost accounting standpoint, and why he asks for an increase on a class of mail on which we are now making a profit?

Mr. Cote: The increase we are asking will be made all along the line in first-class mail. I do not want to make a speech about the way news is spread and publicity is required by the people. That has been discussed by several members. We are not increasing the rate on newspapers. However, I shall make inquiries as to exactly what the increase will affect, and I may make a detailed report on every item. At the moment, however, I do not think there will be any increase on newspapers.

Mr. Zaplitny: It is five o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated on Tuesday it is not my intention, for the reasons I gave at that time, to ask the house to take any time in the discussion of these bills at the moment. However, I think it might be well for us to keep a box score. We gave second readings to 60 divorce bills in half a minute on Tuesday, and we are asked now to give second reading to another 80 in a half minute today.

Motion agreed to and bills read the second time.

CANADA GRAIN ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR FAIR ALLOCATION OF BOX CARS

The house resumed, from Tuesday, December 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Argue for the second reading of Bill No. 3, to amend the Canada Grain Act (distribution of box cars).

Mr. W. M. Johnson (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I am particularly pleased to rise at this time to speak in support of Bill No. 3, an act to provide for the distribution of box cars at a marketing point in accordance with the wishes of the farmers. I do so at this time because I had the opportunity, during the Christmas recess, to return to my constituency and discuss this proposal with the farmers in the various districts concerned, and I found that they were unanimously in favour of a system whereby they would have some say in the allocation of box cars among the elevators at a particular marketing point. They favour a principle whereby they would state their intentions of delivery to the various elevator companies, and the railways would then be obligated to deliver railway cars in response to their wishes.

In addressing the house the last time we were debating this motion, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) made the point that the car order book as at present constituted is perfectly adequate as a mechanism to allow the farmers to deliver grain to the elevators of their choice. He implied that there was no necessity for any further regulations in order to give the farmers the privilege of delivering to the elevators of their choice. In that regard I might state that the president of the Saskatchewan wheat pool, Mr. J. H. Wesson, speaking to the annual convention of the pool, had this to say:

> I notified the minister that as far as the pools were concerned our main interest was not to eliminate the car order book section but to do something by an amendment to the act to deal with the distribution of cars when the car order book section could not function under these conditions, —to deal with the distribution, not by regulation of the board of grain commissioners but by a definite amendment to the act.

The bill we have under debate is a definite amendment to the act that is aimed at distributing box cars according to the farmers' wishes. At the same time the memorandum to the government of Canada from the interprovincial farm union council in November of last year had this to say:

> We realize that the present car order book provisions are inadequate to meet present conditions, and we submit they were not framed for such a purpose. We desire now, as we did when we appeared before the agricultural committee of the House of Commons last spring, to make a specific recommendation that the proposals put forward in the committee's report to the house on that occasion, following our presentation, be proceeded with immediately to review and revise the Canada Grain Act, including the section dealing with the car order book, and add a new section providing the farmer opportunity to deliver his grain to the elevator of his choice. However, we urge the retention of the present provision for the farmer to order a car in his proper turn to the loading platform or other place of his own choosing.

Our bill meets with the exact requirements as set out by the memorandum to the government from the interprovincial farm union council. I believe the two statements I have referred to would refute in its entirety the statement made by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) who, as reported at page 934 of Hansard, said:

> . . . no demand has been made for it by the western farmers themselves.

As reported at page 936 of Hansard, the Minister of Trade and Commerce stated that Mr. R. H. Milliken, solicitor for the Saskatchewan wheat pool and a lawyer, finds the legal terminology of our bill not to his liking. We do not profess to be lawyers. If Mr. Milliken takes exception to the legal terminology of our bill—and I maintain that is what he took exception to, and not the principle contained in it—then I suggest that the government themselves could improve on the legal wording by giving the task to one of the abundance of trained legal backbenchers so they would have something to do this session.

As practical farmers we all realize that delivery to the elevator that has the room is a most unsatisfactory criterion. On occasion I have been forced to deliver one load to each of three elevators because they filled up in that order. I have my own desires as to where I want to market my grain, and I do not want to be governed by the principle that there is room for only a certain amount of my grain in a certain elevator because the railways have allocated box cars in that particular proportion.

This matter was taken up by a group of individuals in my constituency, and I have some highly interesting correspondence to prove the necessity for the inclusion in the Canada Grain Act of a principle whereby the railways would have definite guidance in the allocation of box cars at a marketing point in accordance with the wishes of the farmers. Here is a copy of a telegram sent to Superintendent E. Cutts of the Canadian National Railways at Saskatoon, copies of which were later sent to Mr. McIvor and to Mr. Milner. The telegram reads as follows:

> We the shipping committee as representatives of the wheat pool members of Springwater district do not see why Federal Grain with two licenses but only one agent, should get two-thirds of grain cars at this point when they continually show space, while the pool is plugged and patrons cannot deliver their quota to the elevator of their choice. It would seem to us that this being a democratic country there should be no reason why we cannot have sufficient cars to handle our quotas through our own pool elevator system.

That telegram was sent over the names of Mr. H. W. Turner, chairman, and Mr. R. C. Staples, secretary of the local wheat pool committee. They received in reply a telegram from Mr. Cutts. It was addressed to Mr. H. W. Turner, chairman, and Mr. Robert C. Staples, secretary, wheat pool committee, Springwater, Saskatchewan, and reads as follows:

> Wheat board instructions require empties be supplied each elevator equally when they have grain to ship.

That is the answer they received from the railways. Here is the answer they received from the Canadian wheat board, signed by Mr. W. Riddel, commissioner:

> In the absence of Mr. McIvor I wish to acknowledge receipt of your telegram of November 27 last, regarding distribution of cars to the elevators at Springwater. I note that the pool elevator is receiving one third of the cars whereas the Federal Grain with two elevators but one agent is receiving two thirds of the cars being supplied.
> While our board has no control over the distribution of cars at local points,—

That is a significant point.

> —I wish to advise that I have brought your complaint to the attention of the railway company. I trust that as a result they will take some action to correct the situation.

I think here we have two very significant statements made by two significant authorities. Canadian National Railways, on the one hand, is saying that it is the responsibility of the wheat board to distribute box cars among the elevators at a marketing point. On the other hand the wheat board comes back and says it has no control over the distribution of cars, that the railway has that job. It looks to me like the old army game of trying to find the pea under the shells, but in this case the C.N.R. and the board of grain commissioners do not themselves know which shell the pea is under. It makes it very difficult for the farmers to try to figure it out. It points to the fact that legislation is necessary in the form of an amendment to the Canada Grain Act to provide a system whereby the railways and the Canadian wheat board can allocate box cars according to the wishes of the farmers among the elevators at a particular marketing point.

I believe if the principle of allowing farmers to select the elevator of their choice were introduced it would not involve too much rigidity and would not substantiate what those who oppose this bill believe, that the farmers are continuously changing from one elevator to another. I think if you take the pattern of several years' delivery at a particular point you will find that the same farmers deliver to the same elevator year after year. Conditions became particularly aggravated in periods of congestion when the elevators did not have room to accept the grain offered, and therefore the farmers had to change their pattern of delivery. Rather than being able to deliver it to the elevator to which they would prefer to deliver, they have been forced to deliver to the elevator that has space or suffer the consequences.

When you have a condition in which elevator agents and elevator companies have complete control over the purchase of grain you run across some situations which are not conducive to good farming practices. For example, the elevator agent who has a certain amount of room in his elevator is certain that it will be filled very shortly because of the necessity of the farmers to deliver grain. Therefore he does not have to concern himself with providing service to the farmer in order to induce him to deliver his grain to that elevator.

We have instances of grain elevators closing their doors sharp at six o'clock. I do not object to that, but I do object to their closing the doors at six o'clock sharp when there is a load of grain coming up the runway, and I can cite more than one instance where that has happened. The agent has become very independent. It is not his responsibility to be at the elevator. He can take up other occupations. It may be selling insurance, it may be helping one of the neighbouring farmers to combine or complete his harvesting operations. In any case he is absent from his place of business, and when a farmer comes to have a moisture test made to learn whether it is safe to harvest his grain, or to get a dockage test made or have his grain graded so he will have some guidance as to what bin he should put it in, the agent is absent.

I think the responsibility for providing service to the farmers rests on the elevator company, and this situation has arisen through lack of competition. We have an outstanding example of that reported by Mr. M. M. MacKinnon, assistant commissioner of the board of grain commissioners. He made an investigation into the marketing situation at Tramping Lake and this is what he had to say:

> Mr. P. Wisbeck, the Searle agent, advised that he is farming 300 acres. . . . The United Grain Growers' agent is also farming and has not sold any of his grain yet.

When you have a situation where companies are allowing their agents to completely disregard the service they should provide for the farmers, and are permitting them to go and farm themselves with no serious loss in their deliveries, surely you are creating a problem that needs correction. The way to do that is to amend the Canada Grain Act as set out in Bill No. 3, in order to provide farmers with an opportunity to deliver their grain to an elevator of their choice. These points I have raised would automatically be eliminated. The agent would be there providing service. He would be looking for business and wanting the farmer to deliver his grain to his elevator.

I maintain that the same principle holds with respect to agriculture that applies to other industries. I do not believe the railway rations automobile cars among the Chrysler corporation, Ford and General Motors, or that it is laid down how many cars they may get to ship their automobiles to western Canada. Cars are not given to these companies on the basis of one each. They are given to them on the basis of need, and I maintain that the same principle should hold true in the case of farmers, who should be given box cars on the basis of need. If a particular farmer wants to deliver his grain to the Federal elevator, for example, he will have the opportunity of doing so. If he wants to deliver it to the pool elevator he will have the opportunity of doing so.

That is exactly what the bill stipulates. It provides a mechanism which, as I have already mentioned, may not be perfect so far as legal terminology is concerned, because after all we are not lawyers, but I suggest that if the government really want to do something to improve this situation they could devise a workable and practical amendment among the lawyers who sit idly on the back benches.

I would also suggest that when the time comes to vote on the bill hon. members from the wheat-growing areas should consider the people they represent and vote according to their wishes rather than according to the conscience of the Liberal party. In that way we would find all members from the wheat-growing areas voting in support of a bill that involves the principle of allocating box cars according to the wishes of the farmers. No one can tell me that the farmers do not wish this procedure. I have had enough experience with farmers and farm meetings, and through being a practical farmer myself, to realize that this principle is most important and necessary, particularly in periods of congestion.

I am not criticizing the period of congestion. I realize the circumstances that have led up to it. We have had three excellent crops, and I would certainly commend the government and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) for at long last giving us the Canadian wheat board to market our grain and afford us some stability. The principle of marketing grain through the Canadian wheat board is one that has proved of immeasurable value to the farmers of western Canada, and I think we can improve on the system of delivering our grain by giving farmers the privilege of allocating grain to the elevators of their choice.

Finally, I say this bill covers the principles desired by the farmers, and it could be made workable. It is requested in principle by the three western pools, and it is a measure that will solve the temporary problem confronting us.

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): I wish to speak in support of this amendment to the Canada Grain Act because I think it is aimed at removing an injustice which has lasted far too long. The hon. member for Assiniboia who introduced this bill, and who introduced a similar bill last year, is motivated by the hope that this injustice against the Saskatchewan pool organization can be remedied. I hope this afternoon to prove, first of all, that there is an injustice and, second, that in spite of what has been said in this house the farmers in the pool organizations do wish this injustice removed.

In the annual report of the Saskatchewan wheat pool for 1953 they set out as item No. 5 in their future policy the following:

> A workable plan for the equitable distribution of cars between elevators and shipping points throughout the three provinces, on the basis of the amount of grain handled or to be handled during the season, to the end that growers may be able to deliver grain to the country elevator of their choice; at the same time preserving to the individual grower his right to order cars under the car order book sections of the Canada Grain Act.

In that same report we find that during the crop year 1952-53 the Saskatchewan wheat pool delivered some 46 per cent of the grain. Further figures show that farmers belonging to the Saskatchewan wheat pool, who are active members of that organization, number almost 80,000 out of an estimated 112,000 farmers in that province. This means that approximately 70 per cent of the farmers in that province are members of the Saskatchewan wheat pool. It is natural to expect that these farmers, since they recover a dividend of approximately 3 cents per bushel from their own organization for the handling of that grain, would, if permitted, deliver their grain to their own organization. They would not then be assisting in the making of profits for other organizations, line companies, which have in the past exploited the farmers to the full.

Actually the number of elevators in the province is not the proper criterion by which to measure the deliveries that any pool organization would likely get. This bill is an appeal on behalf of the organizations and the farmers themselves to permit the farmers to deliver their grain to their own elevator, and thus share in the profits accruing from the handling of that grain through their own organization.

Under the present set-up the injustice results from the inequitable distribution of cars because of the failure to give instructions to train crews to see that cars are delivered to the various points according to the wishes of the farmers. Thus, instead of the pool farmers being allowed to deliver their 70 per cent of the grain, they have only been allowed to deliver 46 per cent of all grain, a loss of approximately 24 per cent. I believe the total deliveries to the farmers' organizations in 1952-53 amounted to some 214 million bushels. You can see that the failure to deliver the other 24 per cent caused the farmers a severe loss.

If you take a year when the elevators are empty and there is an opportunity for the farmers to deliver to the elevator of their choice, you will find that they will deliver 70 or 75 per cent of their grain to the wheat pool elevators. As soon as the elevators become filled, then the wheat pool deliveries drop off. The farmer must get money somewhere, and he is compelled to deliver his grain to the opposition elevators. When there are empty elevators at other points, he has to go there, or else forgo the cash advances on his grain.

It is understood that the adoption of this measure will mean more administrative work. It will require that the train crews be instructed definitely. It will require that the wheat pool elevators at various points show what their business is. Elevators will be filled, and cars will be distributed to them in proportion to the business they are doing. It is because of the injustice in the situation that the proposal is being made. Surely a person who produces a commodity, and has an organization through which he can distribute it, should be allowed to distribute it through that organization. He should not be compelled, because of a lack of administration, to deliver the commodity to his opposition.

Perhaps members of the house would appreciate the problem if I were to make a comparison with a manufacturing concern. We will say a company manufactures refrigerators, shoes, shirts or something else, and to get that commodity to the retail market the company handles it through jobbers. What would happen if the company had its own jobbers and was suddenly, through the manipulation of box cars, delivery systems or something else, compelled to deliver that commodity to an opposition firm or through some other jobber who would not give it returns on its commodity?

The wheat pool organizations are behind this. The wheat pool members are behind this. There is a basic human right here which I feel should be recognized. The pool organizations realize that we have had a large wheat surplus for a couple of years. There is a large carryover. We might even have larger carryovers in the future, but surely if this can be done we see no reason why it should not be done. If cars can be distributed according to the wishes of the farmer so he can choose the elevator to which he wishes to deliver his grain, surely that right should not be denied to him. If the present system is continued the farmer's position might be reduced still further, and he does not look forward with any joy to helping build up his competitors. In addition to that there is the aspect of personal gain, the 3 cents per bushel. Over the past years that amount has been paid, and in some cases even more. Why should we deny that right to these farmers if there is any way of granting it?

While I was home at Christmas I made an examination of this problem. I obtained reports from the various pool committees showing the actual record of car deliveries. The car order book is operating at some points, but oddly enough we find that the train crews have avoided, if possible, spotting cars at those points where there is a car order book. In proportion, more cars were delivered to places where there was no car order book. Then the cars could be spotted in front of the opposition elevator companies; at least that is the way it worked out. At another point where there was only one elevator, a wheat pool elevator, for some reason or other there had not been sufficient cars spotted to enable the farmers to deliver their 3 bushel quota, much less than the 5 bushel per acre quota which prevails today.

When the 5 bushel quota was announced the instructions were very definite. No cars were to be distributed to those points at which there was space in the elevators. This action meant that if the farmers wished to deliver their grain, they must deliver it to the opposition elevator companies, their own elevator being full.

There is something basically wrong here; there is a right which we think under our Canadian system should belong to every individual, namely the right of freedom of choice, to deliver his commodity to an elevator of his own choosing, particularly if it is his own. That is being denied to him. It is because of that injustice that we are bringing in this amendment, in the hope that something can be done to rectify it. There may be imperfections in it, but the basic principle and the causes behind it are sound. It is a case of justice, a case of a right that is not being given to these people. I can tell you in all sincerity that they look upon the present situation as a move on the part of some people who would like to see the Saskatchewan wheat pool and the co-operative pools of the west damaged in whatever way may be possible.

These people have carried on a fight on the western prairies for over 40 years. Throughout my lifetime I have watched the wheat pools and the co-operative organizations bit by bit getting themselves out of the clutches of the line elevator companies and the grain exchange people who operated the grain exchange to suit their own ends. When the farmers had no organization of their own and no elevators of their own they were compelled to drive up to the line elevator companies and take whatever price was offered and pay whatever price was charged for the service given. In the operation of the grain exchange the elevator companies set the price at which the wheat was sold and pocketed the millions that they obtained for the wheat.

Today, after 40 years of struggle, the farmers have their own organization; they have their own elevators. They have something over 1,100 in my own province, and they have annexes and other storage facilities there equal in number, if not greater. When they finally got their own terminals and their own flour mills set up they thought they would be allowed to deliver the grain to their own elevator companies. Now they have finally reached that goal they find that somebody else has put in a roadblock which prevents them from reaching the point they have been trying to get to. They are being penalized to the extent of 3 cents a bushel on about 24 per cent of the grain which is being delivered, about one-third of the wheat pool grain, and which should be going through their own elevators.

I am not able to say whether or not this bill will go through. I only know the cause is just; I only know that what they are asking for is fair. I know the organizations themselves are after it. I have not heard any real reason as to why this right should be denied them and why this principle should not be established.

Naturally, in a time of congestion such as we have at the present time some leeway must be given. It is impossible to handle all the grain through perhaps one particular elevator, but if you give these people the right to choose where they wish to go, they will be satisfied. Nobody says everything should be handled by the pool. That would be a monopoly and we do not believe in that. The farmers should be given free choice in the matter.

The facts prove that 70 per cent of the farmers in Saskatchewan are members of the wheat pool, but the facts are that so far as this 70 per cent are concerned they have a right to ask that they be given the privilege of delivering their grain to their own elevators or the elevators which they choose. In support of that we shall continue our fight.

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): Mr. Speaker, in view of the very fine presentations that have been made by the two hon. members who have preceded me there is little, if anything, new that I might add to this debate. However, I should like to emphasize once again some of the points which they made. At the outset I should like to make one or two observations on this problem of box car shortages.

In the last 25 years technical advances in the agricultural industry have been phenomenal. The mechanization has taken place in almost every phase of the agricultural industry, with the result that like other industries it has become a streamlined and efficient business in this country.

What we find today is a situation like this. While one end of the industry has been completely changed through technical advances and mechanization, the other end of the industry, namely the transportation of the products produced, is just about the same as it was 25 or 30 years ago when farmers took their grain to the market with a horse and wagon. This is one phase of the problem to which we should give some thought.

We hear a great deal about pipe lines for oil and gas. Possibly we should be giving some thought to a pipe line for wheat as a solution to this real problem of box car shortages. The problem we have to try and solve is that of the shortage of box cars. We must try to get the best, the fairest and the most equitable distribution of the facilities at hand.

In spite of everything that has been said about this bill I believe it remains a fair measure. We believe that its adoption will give the farmers of this country an equitable distribution of box cars.

The bill is in line with views held by farm organizations. As has been pointed out here this afternoon, it has been endorsed by the annual meetings of both the Saskatchewan wheat pool and the Saskatchewan farmers' union. I said there was argument against it. One of the arguments was put forward by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He said that it was physically impossible for 90 per cent of the grain to be handled through one elevator system. To some extent I doubt the validity of that argument, because I know of a great many places in the province where there is only one elevator, and it does not seem to have too much trouble taking all the wheat in that area that is designated to be put through that elevator.

Another argument put forward is that it will interfere with the car order book. I have heard that several times and of course it is absolutely untrue, because the bill as presented is very explicit in that regard. It is intended to apply only where the car order book is not in effect.

While I am speaking about the car order book, I should like to say something more about it. I think we have to support the provisions respecting the car order book in the Canada Grain Act until we have something that is going to work better. I am of the opinion that the provisions regarding the car order book are completely antiquated, for the simple reason that the original purpose of the car order book in the main does not apply at this time. I am sure one of the main reasons the car order book was instituted in the first place was to protect the farmers in western Canada from the unfair practices they had to contend with in the private grain trade as to grades and weight, which of course reflected ultimately in the price they received for their product.

[Mr. Bryson.]

Those unfair practices do not apply at the present time in so far as the private grain trade is concerned. I am of the opinion that the private grain trade will give as good service as the pools, but I hasten to add that they are giving that service because of the presence of pool elevators throughout the country which constitute a threat to their very existence unless they deal fairly with the producer. That is one reason I believe the car order book is more or less obsolete at the present time.

One other reason why I believe it is inadequate is that set forth by the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he referred to the suspension of the car order book. He said, as reported on page 939 of Hansard of December 15, 1953:

> With the absolute need for priority shipments, the distribution of cars in accordance with the applications in the car order book cannot be properly carried out. To check every application to ensure that the grain to be shipped has a preference is impossible, and would unnecessarily delay shipments.

Looking at it from that point of view I think it is pretty safe to say that the car order book is not as important as it might be.

As I said a moment ago, I doubt if anything I can say will add to the fine presentation we have heard already. The arguments by the minister with regard to the suspension of the car order book do not seem to be very valid. It must be remembered that at the time of its suspension it applied only to 200 points out of some 1,200 in Saskatchewan, and did not apply in either Alberta or Manitoba.

In conclusion may I point out again that I believe the proposals outlined in the bill now before us are fair and have the support of farm organizations and farm people in western Canada. I am sure their adoption will make for a more equitable distribution of box cars.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would remind hon. members that if the hon. member for Assiniboia speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I believe there has been a very good discussion of this bill, and from that discussion I think it is clear that if it becomes law it will provide a fair, equitable and workable method of distributing box cars.

When the Minister of Trade and Commerce enters a debate he usually takes a very decided position. He opposed this bill, but in doing so I think he made one of his milder presentations. The minister claimed that this bill would make the distribution of box cars more rigid. Then in the very next sentence he complained that the bill was not rigid enough. He said that another difficulty in the bill was that it did not require the farmer to deliver grain to a particular elevator. First the minister said it was too rigid and then he said it was not rigid enough. The minister went on to say, and I quote from page 935 of Hansard of December 15, 1953:

> We are not discussing grain marketing in general but a particular bill related to it, and if there are weaknesses in that bill, obviously the bill should be opposed whether you like the principle or not.

I submit that that is no reason for defeating this bill. Rather the subject matter of the bill should be referred to the agriculture committee of this house for discussion and consideration. The problem of the distribution of box cars in western Canada is serious. Its solution is urgent, and I believe members of parliament should be giving consideration to a solution of that problem.

I think most hon. members in the house agree that the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce is particularly able. I have enough confidence in the minister to believe that he could bring forth a workable solution to this problem if he cared to. There is just one difficulty. If a workable solution to the distribution of box cars is brought forward it will allow farmers to deliver grain to the elevator of their choice. When they are able to do that it will mean more grain for their own elevator system and less grain for the private elevator system.

The minister said he had never heard any complaints from the wheat pool organization about the distribution of box cars. Well, I certainly have. They complained in their latest annual report. A committee of the three western wheat pools have been considering this problem for the last year. A resolution was passed at their most recent convention asking for a proper and fair distribution of box cars.

I hope when the vote is taken members from all sides of the house will support the bill. I was glad to note that we are receiving support from members of the Social Credit party. I am hopeful that we will receive some support from western members of the Conservative party. The problem is certainly urgent; it must be solved, and to say that it does not exist is not being realistic.

Mr. Goode: I was paired with the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Wylie).

Mr. Speaker: The hour devoted to private and public bills having expired, the house at eight o'clock will resume the business that was interrupted at five o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

POST OFFICE ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE POSTAGE ON LETTERS AFTER APRIL 1, 1954

The house resumed consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Cote —Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair:

That it is expedient to amend the Post Office Act to increase the rates of postage on letters posted in Canada from the 1st day of April, 1954,

(a) on each letter for delivery within the postal area in which it is posted, from three cents to four cents for the first ounce or fraction of an ounce, and from one cent to two cents for each additional ounce or fraction of an ounce, and

(b) on each letter posted within one postal area for delivery in another postal area from four cents to five cents for the first ounce or fraction of an ounce, and from two cents to three cents for each additional ounce or fraction of an ounce.

Mr. Montgomery: Mr. Chairman, while a good many members on this side of the house have entered the debate, nevertheless I feel that people outside the house and particularly in my part of the province of New Brunswick are becoming more interested as more is said here.

One point has been brought to my attention from my own province since this debate started. I have no desire to criticize the Post Office Department and the congenial minister in particular, inasmuch as he is one person with whom it is difficult to argue because he is very co-operative. I also believe I can honestly say that in general the post office officials give exceptionally good service and sometimes, as in the case of my own constituency, under most difficult circumstances. But I understand that the increase in postage rates is not being introduced for the purpose of increasing or improving the service. Like other speakers I say that neither I nor the people whom I represent believe that this tax—and it is a tax—this increase in postage rates is being imposed solely for the purpose of meeting increased expenditure in the department.

In other words, having in mind the farsightedness of the Minister of Finance, we do not believe it can honestly be said that this situation could not have been anticipated when the budget was brought down last February. We also feel that there is discrimination, and I will come back to that in a few minutes. However, as the Postmaster General said, let us be fair about this matter. Let us examine the facts as the government has placed them before us and as it placed them before the people last summer and in the budget debate last spring. When the Minister of Finance brought down his budget he reviewed very ably the financial situation of the country. After making that review he told us that he was going to eliminate the stamp tax on cheques. He could very well do so because he was still budgeting for quite a considerable surplus.

At the very time he was doing that, at the very time he was telling hon. members that he could dispense with the stamp tax on cheques, he also knew that he was going to take away a tremendous amount of revenue from the Post Office Department. I am satisfied of that, and I think any member of the house, knowing the Minister of Finance, knew very well that the minister realized that the department would suffer. For over 20 years this department has contributed millions of dollars to the consolidated revenue fund. About eight or nine months after removing the stamp tax the Post Office Department found itself in financial difficulties. Why? I am not convinced that this was a surprise to them, and I do not think any member can say, after listening to the arguments put forward in the house in the last two days, that anyone should be surprised who knew the situation prior to last February.

Therefore the government knew quite well when they removed the stamp tax that something had to be done for the Postmaster General. The Minister of Finance budgeted for a surplus, and as far as we know he is going to achieve it. Let him turn over part of that surplus to the Post Office Department to meet its expenses for this year. Give the Postmaster General a chance to put into operation some of the recommendations made by the firm of consultants which investigated the department at their request. I understand he is starting to implement them. Give him a year to see what economies he can put into effect. Give him a year to see what the picture will be. I am very doubtful that there will be much of a deficit, because I believe the Postmaster General is just as efficient as any other minister and his department can be run just as efficiently as any other. Give him a chance to see what he can do, and if it is necessary to provide funds to meet a deficit let them be provided out of the consolidated revenue fund, because over the years that fund has received millions of dollars from the department.

If the government do not consider that is the fair thing to do, then they will have to face the criticism which is going to be made, and which I believe we are quite justified in making, that the stamp tax on cheques was removed simply as an election promise and for no other reason. It is a tax. I do not care whether you call it postage; I say it is still a tax. It comes out of the people.

Coming back to the question of discrimination, the stamp tax on cheques was paid largely by the people who could better afford to pay it, but now everybody who happens to write a letter is going to have to pay the higher postage rate.

There is another point in connection with discrimination. From what has been said here there seems to be no doubt that the air mail rate is going to be reduced. It is going to be eliminated, if you wish, because all mail will carry a 5-cent postage stamp for the first ounce. I happen to live in an area where very few people use the air mail service. If I want to send a message from my home to Ottawa it will arrive here quicker by train than by plane. That is the case for all of the area I represent, because we are so far from an airport that by the time a letter has been mailed in the post office and taken to the airport it will take longer to reach Ottawa than if sent by train. But we will have to pay the same amount of postage on our mail as will those people who can and do use air mail service substantially.

As one of my colleagues said this afternoon, if a person wants to use the air mail service he can do so. I do not think anybody has been kicking about paying the extra postage, but let those people pay for the service who want it and use it. We do not want air mail service because in our community it is of no particular benefit to us. It does not seeem to do us much good. If we happened to be sending letters to Vancouver, Victoria or other places in the west we might get some advantage from it, but most of our people do business with people in Montreal, Toronto, Ottawa and other points in the east. If they want to use air mail they are quite willing to pay for it, and that is the opinion I have received today from my constituency.

Last night the hon. member for Charlotte said that as far as he knew nobody in New Brunswick was kicking. That may have been true up to the point when people began to wake up to the fact that this was simply a case of robbing Peter to pay Paul, that it was a case of removing a tax in one place and imposing it in another. There is, therefore, some opposition to this increase in the postage rate.

An hon. Member: The same thing over and over.

Mr. Montgomery: It may be the same thing over and over, but it pays to say these things over and over. If we do not say them over and over, the people will not know about them. Hon. members can sit over there and smile because they know they have the power to put this thing over whether or not we like it. However, that is not going to keep us still. You are not going to shut us up. We have to talk about this in order to enlighten the people. I have not heard any hon. member on that side of the house say anything about this to support the minister.

The Chairman: Has the hon. member concluded his speech?

Mr. Montgomery: No, I have not, but I am very near the end, Mr. Chairman.

I know I am not going to add a great deal to the debate so far as the house is concerned, but I do believe I should speak for my people. I feel that I have made my points pretty well. You may not wish to pay any attention to them, but there is a discrimination. There seems to be no good reason for reducing the air mail rate. I am not satisfied, and there are lots of people who are not satisfied, that it is necessary to make this increase in postal rates.

Mr. Hamilton: In the annual report of the Postmaster General for last year we find a sentence to the effect that the department has received assistance from the firm of J. D. Woods, Limited, management consultants. This was the report to which I referred yesterday in this house, saying that we had not seen it. The minister was kind enough to say that he would make it available to me for whatever use I wanted to make of it.

I want to thank him for doing so. I am sorry he could not lend me a copy of the report, because I did find it a little difficult working on the corner of his secretary's desk throughout this morning and studying the report while she dictated to a succession of three of her secretaries. Apparently there is no shortage of staff in the hierarchy of the Post Office Department. Perhaps that is the reason it just seemed to the minister yesterday that he had 50,000 people instead of the 44,000 he actually has.

Before we examine the statements made in this report, I think two general points should be made. First of all the report was commissioned by the department itself, which paid many thousands of dollars for it. I do not know how much. Perhaps the minister might tell us. From having seen other jobs of this kind done, I would imagine it cost between $10,000 and $15,000 for the complete job. It is quite obvious, therefore, that the department is to a certain extent, as in all these cases, in a position to suggest to the group doing the job the nature of the treatment that should be undertaken, and perhaps in a certain way how their remarks might be phrased.

I think this is particularly important, because as I understand it the government has a number of jobs of this kind which are done from time to time, and it is quite obvious that any firm would want to retain this connection. When the report is critical, it is no defence to say you will take measures to correct this situation unless the criticism contained in this report is very limited. Throughout the whole of this report we find generalized criticism of the department which indicates a state of affairs that can only be solved by a general housecleaning. There has been no indication in the department's annual report or in anything that has been said in this house that there is going to be any general housecleaning of the Post Office Department.

We must remember also that in its own report for this year the Post Office Department has said that it has for a number of years been devoting a great deal of time and effort to management and organizational problems.

If the department has been doing that for a great many years, and a report is written concerning their operations at the end of 1952, we would logically expect to find the department in fairly good shape. On the other hand, if after all this an independent organization paid by the government to study a government operation is still critical of that operation, then surely we are correct in assuming there is something wrong with that department. The department has demonstrated its inability to correct the situation.

We come now to the report itself. It opens with a glowing sentence praising the Post Office Department. As I have already said, that is what we would logically expect to find. After all, the government paid for it. The opening sentence says that the firm has been impressed by the over-all efficiency of the department, the basic soundness of its administration and organization. That is almost standard in any reports where companies are involved, as any of you who have seen these reports know. As we have said, the government is paying for it. This is very much the same sort of thing as the Dale Carnegie principle which says that you say something nice before you criticize. It is along the lines of the standard sales technique which is to the effect that everything you say is fine, but—and then you give the fellow the truth.

We must not be misled, therefore, by a few statements—and there are a few—in the report which commend the department. I leave those for the minister to bring up later. The basic fact is the report recommends a complete and sweeping reorganization of this department, implying that it is poorly organized, poorly run, inefficient in many cases, and that savings of hundreds of thousands a year could be made in one operation in one city.

It is said that previous recommendations by the civil service commission for increased efficiency have not been followed; that physical facilities presently available for the receipt, storage and dispatch of postage stamps and unemployment insurance stamps are inadequate, both from the viewpoint of security and material handling. Later on I am going to bolster all this with specific quotations from the report.

The report makes over 75 major recommendations of one kind or another. To my mind that is a clear indication of the sorry state of the department now. The recommendations in that report, and I am not going to list them here, range from radical reorganization of lines of authority, decentralization of much activity, and complete changes in the personnel operation, to the establishment of new divisions, increases in the special delivery rates and improvement in the service and reorganization of the tender procedure. The report continues by suggesting such things as the introduction of a system ensuring direct review of services provided for the public so that the complaints and requests of the public may be anticipated.

If 75 sweeping changes of this nature can be logically recommended by this organization, then something is certainly wrong within the department.

The Chairman: I just noticed the hon. member turning a page. May I point out that in committee, as in the house, hon. members are not allowed to read speeches.

Mr. Hamilton: I thank you, sir, for that. These are notes. I presume I can start over again and have another 40 minutes because of these interruptions.

Now let us turn to an examination of some, not all, of the specific charges made in this report. Here is what the report says regarding planning:

It is apparent that the number of clerical staff presently available for this type of work is completely inadequate to deal with the problems being encountered throughout the department.

That idea is bolstered again in another section of the report. We shall now deal with the section having to do with the present method of operation. It says:

Many of the problems raised by the postmasters . . . are referred to the operations branch at headquarters for decision. This system requires the staff at headquarters to deal with a multitude of individual problems . . . The staff at headquarters operate under continuous pressure and there are many delays in dealing with comparatively minor matters. The staff are so occupied in this routine that they are unable to develop and apply policy decisions which would eliminate many individual requests.

If I may say so, it is necessary that I put this on the record because the report is not available to us. I have had the opportunity of studying it, and this is the only way I can put it on the record so the people of Canada can see what is happening in the Post Office Department. In giving these quotations I am abbreviating somewhat but retaining the nature of the quotation and the words used in the report.

With regard to the operations branch the report says:

The work of the operations branch has over the years increased to the point where the staff at all levels are overloaded with a multitude of routine problems and correspondence. No one has had the time to develop policies which can be applied on an over-all basis.

Is it any wonder, when we see these things unfolding before us, that the Post Office Department finds it necessary to come and ask for an increase in the postage rates? Is it any wonder they should do that with this type of internal organization?

Turning to the buildings which are used by the post office we find the report saying:

It is essential that detailed consideration be given to new construction in order that the most efficient operating methods be incorporated in the design.

Quite properly, the postal superintendent in charge of the buildings division has concentrated on this phase of his activities. All the staff in the division have been so engaged. They have not had time to seek out and introduce operating economies throughout the existing post offices. Our survey has disclosed that there is room for substantial savings through better layout, equipment and control.

The post office needs information; it needs controls. Here is one of the things the report has to say regarding controls:

The branch is operating under a severe handicap as there are no standards established to measure the relative efficiency of a given method of operation. The lack of such standards is particularly felt when requests are received for additions to staff or accommodation. The only relative comparison of the volume of work in various post offices is the revenue received by each for the services it renders to the public. It is recognized by the department that this is not an adequate yardstick due to the varying conditions under which post offices operate. The lack of such a standard also makes it difficult to appraise the benefits which might be obtained from improvements in methods and equipment.

We have here another indication why the department is operating largely in the dark, yet it comes to us asking for an increase in rates. We know now, on the basis of the information which is going on the record, that really this department knows not whereof it speaks.

Another section of the report deals with the mechanical engineering division, which is a new department suggested by this report, and I quote:

A mechanical engineering division should make a detailed examination of the equipment and layout presently in use in post offices. This study will disclose great differences in the equipment. In some instances, equipment installed many years ago was continued in use although more efficient equipment is now available. No attempt has been made to standardize on the most efficient equipment.

The report goes on:

There is a need for a reappraisal of the services being provided at various centres across the country. The department should be continually examining the nature of services provided and prepared to make alterations as required to keep pace with changing conditions.

There is very clearly a suggestion there that the department is not doing that; that it is static; that it is not keeping abreast of what is going on in the world.

We now come to another section of the report, regarding a methods and procedures division. The report says:

This division would be responsible for preparing and amending operating manuals. This is presently the responsibility of the services, methods and examinations division. The staff available for this work has proved inadequate and the existing manuals were, in many cases, issued years ago and are now in a large extent obsolete.

The production of up-to-date operating manuals should more than repay the expenditure involved in staff salaries required to prepare them. At the present time there are numerous errors occurring throughout the service and the correction of each one requires the expenditure of time and labour.

We now come to the question of workshops which the department is operating. I never knew that the post office operated workshops. This is what the report says:

At headquarters in Ottawa and a number of the large centres across the country workshops under the supervision of local plant engineers have been established . . .

Then comes an interesting point, because we find that these workshops have been greatly enlarged so that they are doing something else. Here is the quotation from the report:

It was noted during our survey that a number of these workshops have extended their activities to the manufacture of equipment such as cupboards, wastepaper containers, binneys, and skids, and to the repair of typewriters and other office equipment.

The Post Office Department is in the office equipment business. The report goes on:

These workshops were not established for this purpose and it is questionable if this type of work is economical.

It is suggested that a detailed study of the actual staff requirements to carry out the essential repair work be made and the staff be reduced to a minimum required to perform these duties.

I should now like to give hon. members an item in the report which will capture the imagination of Canadians across this country more than anything else in it. After all, what I have shown so far is fundamental; terribly important, but it is fundamental; it is the organization and operation of the department. Here are three ideas for this committee which show clearly where the department is not taking advantage of current operating methods and the information available to it in order to save the taxpayers' money. Item 1 has to do with floor space and reads as follows:

Floor space,—a redesign of a letter-sorting rack in the forward letter section of the Toronto post office, and improved layout of these racks would result in a 45 per cent saving in the floor space used for this purpose. The changes would not have any significant effect on the labour cost of the operation as it is presently performed.

Item 2 is as follows:

Equipment design. The use of conveyor belts and changes in equipment would allow two operations to be combined.

I understand that this refers to Toronto. Hon. members understand that I have not the report immediately in front of me. The minister has it. There are minor matters which I have no doubt he will correct me on, but there are no major ones.

I am giving just a few of the quotations from the report, which goes on to say that a change in the equipment used would allow these operations to be combined.

While this plan will require further development there is an indicated annual saving in the forward letter section of the Toronto post office alone of approximately $200,000 per annum.

This is referring only to Toronto, and it states it will require further development; but there is indicated an annual saving in the forward letter section of the Toronto post office alone of approximately $200,000 per annum. Let us make it quite clear that this $200,000 saving is possible after the necessary equipment and everything else connected with the operation is installed. That would mean the taxpayers of this country would have to pay to the Post Office Department $200,000 a year less. Putting it another way, the expenses of the Post Office Department would be $200,000 a year less.

With regard to the work place lay-out, the report states that a rearrangement of the lay-out equipment used for sorting tables would increase the efficiency of the operation by from 10 to 26 per cent, with resulting reductions in staff.

Let those three examples be impressed in the minds of everyone as an indication of what is happening today in the Post Office Department, and the tremendous savings of hundreds upon hundreds of thousands of dollars that it would be possible to make if this department would smarten up and operate in the most efficient and economical way.

The report then goes on to refer to the special delivery service. It is interesting to note that for reasons best known to himself the minister decided this year to raise the other rates of postage but not the special delivery rates. The report states:

The cost information available to the department discloses that the special delivery service is operated at a considerable loss. In some centres the postal rate for a special delivery letter is less than the contractor is paid to deliver the letter. The user of the special delivery service is interested in a rapid and assured delivery. It is believed that the majority of users would be prepared to pay considerably more for this service if their requirements were met.

The special delivery is used by only a small number of people, but it is not paying its way; yet in the case of another service the rates are increased. At this point I should like to make just a passing reference to another item in the report which I think is tremendously significant. I am surprised that neither the government nor the Postmaster General has seen fit to make some mention of this matter at some point. There is a suggestion in the report that the post office savings bank, once a most vital part of the economy of this country, has now largely outlived its usefulness, that there is little demand for it. The report recommends categorically that this operation of the Post Office Department be abolished, and it points out that a saving of $377,000 could be made in that one particular instance.

I am not committing myself, nor do I intend to get into a debate on the question of the abolition of the post office savings bank, but here is a potential saving of $377,000 mentioned in this report of which we knew nothing. No one outside the confines of the minister's office, as far as I can find out, knew of this until last night when for reasons which I should like to think were good the minister made the report available to me.

With regard to the transportation and carriage of mail the report says:

> Little effort has been made to appraise the whole transportation problem and to develop a rational plan or policy to govern future operations and methods.

The report continues with a discussion of subsidies as an important factor in the operation of the Post Office Department. It states:

> The need for a subsidy should, however, become less as an area grows and the volume of normal traffic increases. In the past in negotiating contracts no effort has been made to set out the amount that has been paid as subsidy as opposed to what might be described as the normal cost of operation.

And again:

> The subsidy may therefore be perpetuated long after the justification for it has ceased to exist.

Then with regard to the railway mail service division the report states:

> At the present time there is no one senior officer at headquarters responsible for the over-all direction of the railway mail service.

There is much more in the report. Then another quotation:

> A limited survey of the conditions in Toronto discloses that the planning of this pick-up and delivery service has not been given the consideration which it deserves.

I come now to a reference to how they handle their stamps, which represent money. The report states:

> The postage supply section of the postage stamp division is responsible primarily for the receipt, storage and dispatch of postage and unemployment insurance stamps to postal depots and government agencies. The physical facilities presently available for this purpose are inadequate both from the viewpoint of security and material handling. Many improvements in procedure could also be made.

Then follows an important matter which I believe others of my colleagues will take up and comment on later. The report goes on to say:

> We have reviewed a report of the civil service commission. A comprehensive analysis was made in 1950 of the method of keeping records and issuing stock. It is suggested that this report be reviewed and the suggestions put into practice.

Mr. Fulton: Three years too late.

Mr. Hamilton: Three years too late, and probably gathering dust somewhere on a shelf.

Mr. Cote: I think my hon. friend is a little unfair. After all, I opened the door of my office and he spent the whole day there. Although he may throw flowers at me, I think he should also give me a chance to explain that this report was asked for by my department. The other day hon. members were complaining that we were doing absolutely nothing, and I replied to my hon. friends on the other side of the house that we were doing something. As a matter of fact we did ask for the report. We asked these experts to go through the department, to consider all the problems of the department and make recommendations. It is from their report that my hon. friend is quoting.

On the one hand he does not seem to be satisfied with the way the Woods-Gordon people appraised the department, yet on the other hand he quotes their recommendations without knowing that some of them have already been implemented, which is a little unfair on the part of my hon. friend. When my hon. friend came to me last night I told him that this was a managerial report and as I had only my own copy, it would have been unfair for me to give it to him when I could not make copies available to other hon. members.

I was the one who invited him to my office to peruse the report. Then this afternoon he came to me again and asked if he could go to my office once more. I said yes, and he went there. He may have forgotten this, but he said to me, "When the bill is up for second reading I will want to ask a few questions as to whether these recommendations have been implemented". When he was still at my table at noon I said to him, "Are you still at it?" He said, "Well, I will tell you—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Cote: He told me—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Hamilton: I shall resume this talk, after the short speech that has been given by the minister. I want to thank him, because I was getting close to my 40 minute limit. I have another ten minutes. I think I shall start all over again now.

The Chairman: I would ask the hon. member to note that I cannot allow him to refer to the report.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, would you repeat that statement. I did not understand it.

The Chairman: The ruling is this, that we cannot allow this exchange between the minister and the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace. If he wishes to refer to the report, that is all right. But please, can we confine ourselves to the resolution increasing the postage rate?

Mr. Green: I understand, then, Your Honour is not ruling that the hon. member cannot refer to the report.

Mr. Fulton: He said he could refer to it.

The Chairman: The hon. member can refer to the report. Certainly he can refer to the report; but the hon. member will please direct his remarks to the resolution which is before us.

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Chairman, it would seem to me that my remarks were just a little bit pertinent to the resolution before us. If someone comes to me and says, "I need more money to operate my business", and I find that his business is operated in a shockingly inefficient manner, then I think I am quite right in asking him to straighten out his business before he asks for more money.

The Chairman: Order. What you can do is ask the Chair and, through the Chair, ask him to operate his business in a more efficient manner.

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Chairman, I must say, as an aside, that I am very much a neophyte in this house. I am not too conversant with its rules. I am deeply appreciative of the courtesy which has been extended to me by Mr. Speaker, by yourself and all the members of the house.

Mr. Cote: And the minister.

Mr. Hamilton: I will try to improve as time goes on.

An hon. Member: You cannot get any worse.

Mr. Hamilton: The report contains a section concerning licensed vendors. Apparently a licensed vendor is a man who purchases stamps from the post office and resells them. These would be tobacconists and places of that kind. Quoting from the report I find it says:

> Even the most active vendors rarely receive more than 75 cents per month and the stamps are generally sold as a convenience to their customers. In one instance that came to our attention the vendor made 17 trips to the post office in one month to purchase stamps for resale and received a total commission of 57 cents. Each purchase involved a preparation and signature of the receipt which was later forwarded to Ottawa and processed.
> Permit holders on the other hand purchase their stamps at face value and there is no special accounting involved. It is suggested that the licensing of vendors be discontinued.

That is one thing which I hope the government has already done.

Mr. Cote: We have; and that is why I think my hon. friend should wait until I make a report. He should see what implementation there has been before criticizing since he does not know what has been done so far.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. Hamilton: It seems to me that by putting this material on the record it will give the Postmaster General something to report upon. He can cover all these various points at once, and we will not need to bring them up individually.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hamilton: All right; these are facts. These are not just opinions. These are not just ideas. These are facts which have been set out in cold, hard type, by an organization retained to examine the Post Office Department. And if it hurts just a little bit, that is too bad. I am not happy to see a department of government, one of the agencies of government, subject to this sort of thing. I do not want to stand here and say these things.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hamilton: I do not want to stand here and say these things about any department of government. But, just as the Postmaster General said yesterday that he was not always going to do the popular thing, but that he had his duty to do, I, too, on this side of the house have my duty to do. And I think hon. members are just a little bit unfair. When what I say begins to gouge and hurt, and when the facts come out, they begin to try to shout me down.

Mr. Fulton: You will get used to it.

Mr. Hamilton: Turning now to the report—

Mr. Knowles: It is standard practice.

Mr. Hamilton: Turning now to the report, and the section regarding the financial and statistical controls, we find that it says:

> It has been recognized in the department for some time that there is a lack of information on which to base policy decisions and control activities. The only existing data which can be used to compare the operations of two post offices is the dollar revenue received by the post offices. This is not an adequate measure of the volume of work performed by each.

The report continues with other criticisms along the same line, which I shall not set out in the record. I have no doubt that later on the Postmaster General will tell us about all the things he has done to implement the report and what he is going to do later on. He will tell us what a bright picture there will be. I would like to put on the record something regarding past history and what might have been done by a particular division. The report says:

> A cost ascertainment division was established to devise a practical method whereby the cost of handling various types of mail could be established or estimated.

We know that the cost ascertainment division was established in 1946. Then quoting again from the report:

> The division has made some progress and each year produces a statistical report in which the cost of the various postal services is estimated. During recent months—

And remember that is six years after.

> —a few of the large post offices have been asked to estimate their expenditures in advance and submit monthly reports comparing their actual expenditures with these estimates.

And so, six years after we established a division to do something, the cost ascertainment division, they are still beginning to go into action. This is one of the reasons I hesitate to put any confidence in any statement to the effect that we are going to rush into action on all the recommendations in this report, or any statement that they have been already implemented or that they are going to be implemented very shortly.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Hamilton: Quoting again from the report—and I am almost to the end of the quotation—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hamilton: All right. This is a $30,000 saving. It states:

> A number of suggestions in connection with the routines in use in the purchasing and stationery division are set out in appendix I. The adoption of these suggestions should allow reductions in staff with savings up to approximately thirty thousand dollars a year.

Here is a department which has been in operation since 1869. In 1952, after having studied their own operations over a number of years, as they say in their own report, always attempting to become as efficient as possible, it is possible for outsiders to come in and show where the department can make a saving of $30,000 a year on stationery and purchasing alone. Then it continues, dealing with accident prevention:

> At the present time there is no formal program for the reduction of accidents.

That is in the report. Then it says:

> This is a costly waste both to the individuals concerned and to the department.

And then the final quotation, and one which I think sums it up. The report speaks about communications between field and headquarters and it says:

> It was apparent from discussions in the field that a certain amount of frustration exists.
> This condition probably arises from a lack of understanding of the field problems by headquarters and the headquarters problems by the field. Suggestions and important matters from the district offices forwarded to headquarters for comment and approval are often not dealt with for long periods or put off by repeated requests for further information. From the headquarters standpoint these suggestions are often so poorly presented that it is impossible to take intelligent action.

We have here a summation of the whole operation. Headquarters does not understand what is happening out in the field and the field does not understand what is happening at headquarters; and we have 44,000 people operating the post office under those conditions. Then the Post Office Department comes in and says, "We want to increase the rates because we are not going to make any money, and we are not satisfied with the $90 million we have made over the past 20 years".

I am just wondering—and I am afraid I am not going to see them—what other reports of this nature the government has in its files and which contain similar information. I will just bet there are dozens of them if it but had the courage to show them.

In my discussions with the minister at one point today I said that I proposed to extract material from the report and ask him what he had done about it, and I referred to second reading of the bill. I apologize to the minister for not having delayed until then. The reason was my ignorance of the rules of the House of Commons.

The Chairman: Order. I very much regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, may I ask on what basis you make that ruling? Two or three speeches have been made by the Postmaster General since the hon. member started to speak.

The Chairman: If the hon. member wishes to speak again, that is his privilege; but his time has expired on his present speech.

Mr. Hamilton: I can finish in about one minute.

Mr. Green: May I point out to you, Mr. Chairman, that time and again this matter has been ruled on by other chairmen where there has been an interruption of the kind made by the Postmaster General tonight, not once but two or three times. The ruling has been that such an interruption starts the time of the member who is speaking running again, and that under those conditions the hon. member may speak for another 40 minutes.

Mr. Harris: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I say that I think I saw the hon. member back of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra indicate that if he had not already completed what he was saying, he had almost reached that point. I think everyone wants to complete this discussion before we adjourn tonight. I wonder if we might just leave the matter in this position, namely that anything more the hon. member wishes to say he may say at this point, and then if later, because of other things that may be said in the meantime, he feels he should continue, of course that is his privilege as an hon. member.

Mr. Hamilton: About one minute will do it.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

The Chairman: I am entirely in the hands of the committee. Does the commitee agree that the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace has the floor?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hamilton: As I was saying to the minister, Mr. Chairman, when this point came up I did not realize that I would have the opportunity to put this information on the records of the House of Commons at as early a stage as this, and I took advantage of the opportunity in order that, as I said to him today, the information having been set out he might give us his answers and his explanations of these facts.

Before I resume my seat I have just one further question. I should like to ask the minister when we in Notre Dame de Grace are going to get our second mail delivery a day.

Mr. Cote: Mr. Chairman, I wish to deal with one point only. The hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace presumed that it would be possible for me to give the answers to the questions which he has just asked or the matters which he has just brought to the attention of the committee. Unfortunately I could not be here and in the department at the same time. While I was here today, he was in my office perusing the report. I may assure him, as I assured the hon. member for Prince Albert, that I will eventually give a summary of what has been done so far.

May I say this. I want to be fair with everybody, and I want everybody to be fair with the Postmaster General. Having regard to the way these representations were made tonight by the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace, I think they must be completed by the following statement. The report was asked for by the postmaster general who was my predecessor. When it came, we immediately implemented the recommendations in so far as it was possible or advisable to do so. Next week there is to be another meeting to study the matter and see what more could be done. When I make my statement with regard to implementation of the recommendations I will say what my hon. friend forgot to say, namely that most of these recommendations cannot be carried out in one year; their implementation must be spread over a period of years. I may add that if he still has some doubt about the experts of the Woods, Gordon company—as he insinuated at the beginning of his statement—these experts are also employed by the premier of the province of Ontario.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I have no intention of bringing to the attention of the Postmaster General any personal complaints with regard to the delivery of mail. Over the years I have received from the post office nothing but excellent service. Consequently I have no letters to produce that have been delayed in delivery. I have none to produce that have been incorrectly addressed or anything of that nature. In fact, what disturbs me so frequently with regard to the postal delivery is that some letters I would prefer not to receive arrive with great promptness. I would be perfectly happy if they were delayed for several weeks. I have never been quite able to understand why a letter advising me that I have overlooked some account or other arrives the day after it is mailed.

I should like to pay my respects to the postal employees who, over the years, have delivered mail at my home. They have been looking after me extremely well during the last few years. I find that their work is very well done and I am perfectly satisfied. I have no complaints on those scores at all.

I intend to direct any suggestions I may have to make with regard to the administration in general and to the Postmaster General himself. I think one of the reasons this debate has gone on as long as it has at the resolution stage is the fact that the Postmaster General took an improper approach to this problem. It is a matter of experience, I suppose. We all learn. If, on the introduction of the resolution yesterday, the Postmaster General had given a detailed explanation of the operation of the postal department and had given the figures and the statistics to prove conclusively that an increase in postal rates was needed, I think perhaps this debate would have been over long before this time. It is because that information has not been given to us that we have been searching for it from this side of the house.

For example, on a first reading of what the minister said yesterday one would be inclined to think there will be increased costs for postal service next year, that we must therefore have increased revenue to look after that opportunity. He should have said, as that Nothing at all is said with regard to any of the economies that might be introduced, and nothing at all with regard to the nature of the postal service and its effect on and importance to our country.

The Postmaster General had an opportunity of presenting a broad picture of the importance of postal service in Canada. He missed that opportunity. He should have said, as that great postmaster general who has been mentioned earlier, Sir William Mulock, said, something about the nature of the postal service and its importance. These are words of Sir William Mulock which were quoted yesterday:

> Public opinion favours the cheapest and freest possible communication by mail throughout all parts of the country.

I think that holds true today just as surely as it did in the days when Sir William Mulock made the statement. I think the present Postmaster General should have emphasized that point and pointed out to us the nature of the postal service in Canada. He should have disclosed to us what in his opinion is the business part and what is the public service part, because these things should be clearly understood. If you are going to consider the postal service merely as a business, then you balance expenditures against revenues and you say that this or that must be done. But there are other factors concerned.

Again this afternoon I thought the Postmaster General's replies to the statements made yesterday by hon. members were inadequate. I think I recall him saying yesterday that so many things were discussed during the course of the day that he could not begin to answer them all at that time. He had an opportunity today, and we would have been quite content to listen to him for a considerable period if he had dealt point by point with the matters raised by hon. members on this side of the house. But he summarized very rapidly. He said—and I hope I am quoting him correctly or at least giving the gist of his remarks—that those who have spoken in this debate so far can be divided into those who think the users of the postal service should pay and those who think everybody should pay. There was more to it than that.

There was certainly a third view expressed by member after member on this side of the house. Granted that there were those who said the users should pay; granted that there were those who said everybody should pay, but what about the remarks that were made about the increased business that might result for the post office through greater efficiency? What about the remarks about searching for other sources of revenue? What about the remarks reviewing accounting procedures within the department, and the suggestions that some of the subsidies to other governmental departments and to Trans-Canada Air Lines, for example, might be discontinued?

Surely this was a different point of view from the two the Postmaster General mentioned, and I regret to say that the Postmaster General did not deal with these matters. Then we had set out for us yesterday by the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace, who has made such a splendid contribution to this debate, the surpluses and the deficits over a long period of years. I think this is the type of background material that the Postmaster General should have given us. We were informed that for the first 30 years following confederation there was a series of unending deficits and that then, with the change in postal procedure and a reduction in postal rates, surpluses resulted in the second 30 years. There were twenty-two surpluses and nine deficits, but on balance surpluses. There was a surplus for that 30-year period.

For the last 20 years we had our attention drawn to the fact that there had been eighteen surpluses and two very small deficits, resulting in a surplus of $90 million for the final 20-year period.

An hon. Member: Good government.

Mr. Churchill: In speaking about these surpluses the minister attempted to tell us that the ones we have had recently were due to the stamp tax which was removed last year, but he did not give us any figures to indicate how much of the surplus was due to that tax, and he did not go back over the years to show when the stamp tax began to increase the surplus. He said nothing about these matters at all but just made a statement, not backed up by evidence, which he asked us to accept. I think that is not quite good enough when we are dealing with a matter as important as this.

This then is the objection I make on this occasion with respect to this important matter, and it is important because it affects everybody in the country. There are some who say that people do not write letters. I have never met anyone who did not write a letter or did not receive letters. In some way the postal service affects everybody in the country. In a matter as important as this I think we should have had full information, but we have been dependent on this side of the house to provide that information.

Look at the research that has been done by the hon. member for Hamilton West, the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace, the hon. member for Danforth and others on this side of the house who have done the reading, compiled statistics and presented a picture to us of the functioning of the Post Office Department over the years. Why did we not have that presented by the Postmaster General himself? I think he missed a very great opportunity there. In my opinion sufficient information has been disclosed in the course of the debate to indicate that there are a great many ways of saving on the postal service; that there are ways and means of increasing, we hope, the efficiency of the service, and that these should be explored before an increase in the first-class postal rate is put into effect.

The Postmaster General neglected to give us a picture of the future of Canada. Are we not expecting great things? Do we not hear from other ministers of the crown about our expanding economy? Do we not hear about the increase in our population and the general advance of Canada? Is it not right to expect that as our population increases postal service will increase, and that additional revenue will be produced from that source?

The statistics shown in the minister's annual report, and the ones upon which I think he based his expected revenue from the addition of one cent on first-class mail, show that per capita about 100 pieces of first class mail are carried by the post office during the year, and the corresponding revenue from that source. Our population, by natural increase and by immigration, is increasing yearly at a rate—I will use round figures—of about 300,000. On a per capita basis that should surely indicate almost a million dollars additional revenue to the Post Office Department with each succeeding year.

The Postmaster General has not taken that into account in his consideration of this problem. Had a proper picture been presented to us it would have made it much simpler for us to consider the whole problem. We might have been saved some of this lengthy discussion, and perhaps we would have been less critical of the Postmaster General and the administration of his department. We would like an assurance from him that the Post Office Department is going to continue to serve the people of Canada with greater efficiency, with speedier service; that the revenue of the Post Office Department will increase on that account; that there will be a reorganization so the department is bearing only those expenditures that are properly those of the Post Office Department, and so on. Such information, however, was not forthcoming.

I believe the Postmaster General still has an opportunity this evening to deal with some of these matters and answer some of the questions that have been raised on this side of the house. He should tell us, for the information of members and the people of Canada, the place the postal service has in this country, and what part of it is strictly business and what part of it is a public service.

Mr. Adamson: I should like to make a suggestion to the minister. I represent a riding which contains a part of Toronto 9, part of Toronto 3, all of Toronto 15, all of Toronto 14, and all of Toronto 18. I think the old constituency of York West has had the most rapid growth in so far as postal services are concerned of any riding in the dominion. I should like now to pay a tribute to Mr. MacNabb and the officers of the operations department of the post office. Hardly a week has gone by without some new section of suburban Toronto which I represent requesting increased service, increased postal walks or other services. I may say that I have never had anything but the utmost co-operation from the operations department.

There are one or two problems I should like to mention which are peculiar to suburban ridings. I should like to comment on the regulation which prevents two sub-post offices from being within a statute mile of one another. I think that regulation is archaic, for this reason. The suburban highways leading from our metropolitan centres are six and eight lane roads. Traffic travels both ways along those roads at an average of 40 miles an hour, although 30 miles per hour is the statutory speed limit. When one has eight lanes of traffic travelling at that speed, it is as difficult and dangerous to cross that road as it is to cross the Niagara river.

The regulation states that if a sub-post office is on one side of the road another sub-post office cannot be situated within a mile of it, even although it is on the other side of the road. It is obvious that these main highways and this traffic present a barrier which, while not constituting a statute mile, is at the same time a hazard and an obstacle far greater than the statutory distance. I only hope that when this matter is dealt with this regulation will be reconsidered, particularly as it affects suburban municipalities. There have been several sub-post offices, and one in particular, at which a great deal of congestion has taken place simply because no other post office can be located closer than one mile.

There is just one more thing I wish to bring to the minister's attention, and that is the question of the timing of the mail. A business organization may start—

The Deputy Chairman: I hesitated to interrupt the hon. member, but the resolution before the house is for the introduction of an amendment to increase certain postal rates. I would suggest to the hon. member that this does not give this committee the right to discuss any subject matter which might properly be discussed on the Postmaster General's estimates, but only those which would have some effect upon the cost of operation or the necessity for increasing postal rates.

Mr. Adamson: That is exactly why I brought up this question of postal delivery to business firms. I do not think the average firm would object seriously, at least most of them would not, to paying increased rates if they got their mail at a sufficiently early hour in the morning so the day's work could commence with the delivery of the mail. There have been several complaints that mail is not delivered sufficiently early. As I say, these firms would not object to the increased cost of mail service so long as they received the mail early, because the cost of keeping a business organization sitting around for an hour in the morning is infinitely more than the increase in the postage rate.

I hope that when this increase goes through, as it apparently is, part of the increased revenue will be directed toward getting mail to these business firms early in the morning.

Mr. Macdonnell: It seems to me quite clear that we have drifted into a ridiculous position. When this debate began yesterday certain figures were put forward, and they were queried. They have been disintegrating ever since. In addition to that, tonight we have had the report about which the minister and the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace told us. We have been given figures of possible savings running into a very considerable amount. If my memory serves me correctly, the figures mentioned must have been a million dollars or more.

This report contains many recommendations. The minister told us frankly that he is beginning to implement them, but it seems to be asking a great deal of members to ask them to take this step at this time when we simply do not know the facts as they exist, and when the minister tells us he hopes he is on the verge of making a good many improvements. It seems to me a most inopportune time to take such a step.

Mrs. Fairclough: This afternoon I was interested in some of the remarks the minister made, and particularly the letters to which he referred from the chamber of commerce in Hamilton and the board of trade in Vancouver. I might tell the minister that he missed a good bet if he was looking for congratulatory messages to the department. He missed the one I wrote to the postmaster in Hamilton complimenting him on the excellent service which he gave me over the Christmas season on mail which had to be redirected because we had changed our place of residence. If the minister had obtained that one, possibly he would have been able to gloat a little bit. The post office has done an excellent job for me, and I give it credit.

However, I might say that while we do have an excellent staff in Hamilton, even an excellent staff can be sabotaged by inefficient administration; and I am very much afraid that is what has happened in a great many centres, because a two, three or six-day delay in the delivery of mail over comparatively short distances is not at all rare. The instances which have been brought up in this house are only a few from the many hundreds which come to the attention of members of parliament from time to time. I am sure members on the government side of the house get just as many of them as do members of the opposition, but perhaps they do not talk about them so much.

I was also interested in the figures which the minister read with regard to the mounting costs of administration and the mounting expenses of the department. While they are interesting, they are to be expected. A nation cannot increase in population three, four or fivefold without all these services increasing to the same extent. Certain it is that we have many more towns and municipalities benefiting by reason of house to house delivery than we had years ago. Certain it is that if tomorrow a municipality makes application to the department and can prove it is of a size that requires that type of service, it would be the minister's duty to see that such service was instituted. We would expect that. It cannot be taken by the same token, however, that this service which is rendered is entirely without any revenue to substantiate it.

All of us were interested in the Woods and Gordon report. The report of the department for the year ending March 31, 1953, has not been in our hands too long. It is only natural that the reference to the services of a prominent firm of management consultants would whet the interest and certainly the curiosity of an opposition which is charged with inquiring into these very things. Therefore the minister should not feel at all badly that someone should put the necessary hours of work into digging into this report and then produce what he found.

Yes; I can imagine the minister's chagrin that probably these facts were produced before he himself had an opportunity of giving a full report, but it is a fact that four months after this report was received, in the departmental report of March 31, 1953, there is what might be considered a mild sort of boast that considerable progress has been made with changes in organization along the lines suggested. Then in the next paragraph the lines suggested are described rather broadly. As a matter of fact "broadly" is exactly the word used. That is what the report says:

> Broadly, the recommendations provide for greater decentralization of responsibility for operations into the field organization; strengthening and reorganization of staffs at headquarters so that senior officials may be able to devote more of their time and energy to over-all operational study and planning; strengthening of the engineering organization at headquarters to provide the means for time and motion studies, greater designing facilities and the setting up of standards for application throughout the service; intensification of research and planning in the field of transportation; further development of cost controls, so as to make available information on which to base decisions affecting all aspects of the service.

It would be a very incurious person indeed, Mr. Chairman, whose curiosity would not be whetted by this general statement of what the department was undertaking as a result of having received this report.

While I have no intention of quoting the report clause by clause, I might say that every hon. member should be interested in knowing just what savings can be effected by the implementation of the report brought down by a very capable firm of management engineers after months of study. In particular, just to mention one or two items, it would be interesting to know what has been discovered with relation to the cost of government-owned transportation for city delivery as against that provided by private contractors. It would be interesting to know also what has been discovered in the field of tenders, because the minister will remember that on a number of occasions we have discussed tenders in the house.

No doubt under this heading the suggestion would cover a very broad field. We would be interested to know that; we would be interested also to know what has been discovered with reference to the operations of the post office savings bank. It is true that in some centres of this country it is the only bank that is available to the people in that locality, but in a great many other places it is simply an additional service provided in a centre where other banks are and have been operating, and generally speaking take care of the requirements of the citizens of the locality.

I see that in the current report—if I have overlooked it I apologize—no mention is made of the loss in that department for this year, although in 1946 the loss on the operation of the post office savings bank was given as over $260,000. If that was the loss in 1946 I would think you could reasonably expect that it would be half as much again today, and that is a sizeable amount of money. You are getting well up toward half a million dollars.

I should like to quote one or two other very interesting suggestions which were made, and on which we may be pardoned for having reasonable curiosity. We can take the remark which appears on page 33 of the report and which reads:

> The work of the operations branch has over the years increased to the point where the staff at all levels are overloaded with a multitude of routine problems and correspondence.

Then there is another matter which to my mind is most important to a department handling the volume of not only mail but also parcels, all of which pass through the post office. I refer to materials handling. I suppose the whole field of materials handling has received more expert study in the last ten years in industry generally than almost any other phase, with the possible exception of accounting by tabulating machines. If, as is indicated in this report, the materials handling in the Post Office Department is many years behind the times, then we would be interested to learn in what way the department proposes to remedy that situation, and what they estimate the savings to the department will be by reason of accepting these recommendations.

As I said a moment ago, Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to go into the Woods and Gordon report. That does not mean I am not curious about it. On the contrary, I shall watch with great interest for some report from the Post Office Department as to just what has taken place. But I do say that the Postmaster General has probably been given a most unsavoury task. Whether that is true or not, I would say that it is in my estimation a most audacious move to come before this parliament and propose an increase in the postal rates of this nation, to ask the people of Canada to give to a department something in the nature of $15 million more revenue, when that department has not the least idea what it needs this money for. Neither has it any idea just where it can save a sizeable amount of money, and that despite the fact that they have in their hands, and have had now for some 14 months, an excellent report which might very well have been implemented before this request came to the people of this country through this parliament.

Mr. Hardie: Mr. Chairman, during the last few days there has been considerable discussion from the other side of the house with regard to this suggested raise in postage rates, and it has been said by hon. members on the other side that hon. members on this side have taken very little interest in this matter. The position of the government is not a happy one, and they know it; but when the government has to raise rates by one cent in order to provide services and give its employees dollars and cents and not lip service, we are ready to support the stand of the government in that regard.

During the debate some mention has been made of the 5-cent defeat of this government, but it seems to me that for the last two days the taxpayers of Canada have been paying for campaign speeches by hon. members across the floor.

Another thing that more or less amazed me was the statement by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton that he could pay 4 cents and get better service than air mail by putting his letter on the train. There are other parts of Canada where we have to pay 7 cents in order to get the same service he gets for 4 cents, and we will be most happy with this 5-cent rate across the board under which we will receive the same service as the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton is getting for 4 cents. I think it is about time we got it.

Resolution agreed to: Yeas, 49; nays, 34.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the resolution carried. Shall I report the resolution?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Cote thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 168, to amend the Post Office Act.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. minister leave to introduce this bill?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fleming: On division.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Cote moved the first reading of the bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt this motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: On Tuesday we shall take up second reading of the bill to amend the acts respecting the Northwest Territories, and then the committee stage of the Criminal Code. Monday and Wednesday being private members' days I shall have nothing to say about them. On Thursday we shall begin with the housing bill and continue until it is completed on Thursday or Friday.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 9.40 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DREW—REFERENCE TO NEWSPAPER COMMENT ON USE OF POST OFFICE MANAGERIAL REPORT

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. On Friday at a time when debate was taking place on a motion presented by the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) certain discussion took place in connection with references to a report which had been made to that department. I raise this question of privilege because of the interpretation which has been placed upon the statement made by the Postmaster General by different newspapers and which might reflect in some way upon the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace (Mr. Hamilton) and the manner in which this information came into his possession.

I might say that the comment made by the minister would appear to fully justify the interpretation placed upon it; but I see, for instance, a report in the Ottawa Journal under the heading "Postmaster Plays Host Unawares". Merely to indicate that that was the general impression, the other newspapers picked it up. I see in the Hamilton Spectator of Saturday, January 16, this heading, "Postmaster Cote Pained, Surprised..."

That refers to a statement made by the Postmaster General on Friday after the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace had made certain references to the contents of a report made to the department by J. D. Woods and Gordon. These are the words of the Postmaster General appearing on page 1175 of Hansard of January 15 and referring to the statements which had been made by the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace:

> I think my hon. friend is a little unfair. After all, I opened the door of my office and he spent the whole day there.

Half humorously and half seriously one of the newspaper reports I read created the impression that a new member in his innocence had almost stumbled on information which had not previously been available. Certainly the information was not previously available but there was no question of his stumbling on it. Certainly there was no question of his using information that had not been available in any manner that did not justify its use. I think it would be most unfortunate if public impressions were left or taken from the Hansard record that there was the slightest impropriety or unfairness on the part of the hon. member.

I think that this is of sufficient importance that I should refer exactly to what took place. On Thursday, January 14, the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace, in an earlier discussion of this motion, said, and I quote from page 1119 of Hansard of that day:

> I would suggest that if the minister feels so inclined he might be brave enough to let us have access to the Woods, Gordon report to which he has referred. As I understand it, that was a study of certain aspects of the operation of the post office, and I believe it has never been tabled in the house.
> Mr. Cote: It was a managerial report. We only have a few copies, but if my hon. friend will come to my office I will be glad to let him see it.
> Mr. Hamilton: I think we might get a great deal of interesting information from it and I shall be delighted to see it. Thank you for the offer.

I would point out that the word "we" appears twice. I suggest that it was not to be supposed that the hon. member was referring merely to a period of entertaining reading to divert himself for a while. It was quite clear that he had a definite purpose in mind and it was information in connection with the motion that he sought.

As the result of that offer by the Postmaster General he visited the office of the Postmaster General. He was not able to complete his investigation on his first visit and he sent a note to the Postmaster General, the original of which I have in my possession. It was written by the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace; he asked for an answer and the answer was placed on the original note. It is on House of Commons paper and reads:

> Mr. Cote:
> I would like to work on the Woods Gordon report again this afternoon. Would you be again good enough to have it made available for my use in your office in the Langevin building this afternoon, starting immediately.
> Thanks a lot.
> Bill Hamilton
> P.S. Would you please confirm this is O.K. to me.
> H.

It was returned with the word "Yes" written on it and the initials of the Postmaster General. Pursuant to that, the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace (Mr. Hamilton) visited the offices of the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) with a stenographer and in the presence of the secretary of the Postmaster General proceeded to dictate further notations from that report, all of which was known to the secretary of the Postmaster General and to the office staff. It was from these dictated memoranda, taken from this report with its various recommendations, that the hon. member made his statement, and I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that this is more than just perhaps taking exception to an implication of unfairness. I suggest it goes a great deal further. Far from the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace having stumbled on something, this new member has demonstrated his very great efficiency as a member of parliament and has obtained information that should have been here all along.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that there is only one way to end any suggestion of unfairness and that is for the Postmaster General to table the report. I regret being called upon to bring this up in his absence this afternoon but I believed it was necessary that I should do so, because I did not feel it was appropriate that this impression be conveyed any further through the press, quite properly as far as the press is concerned, in the light of the words that have been used. But to the assistant to the Postmaster General or the minister who may be acting for him I would direct the request that they should table the report which covers the administration of the many things that should be done to save money, and that this be tabled so that, before we have second reading of this measure, we may know something of what the situation really is in the Post Office Department and be able to find out exactly what has been done to meet the recommendations which have been made for substantial savings in the Post Office Department, before we are called upon to approve of this increase in the postage rates of this country.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) has correctly described what took place. Here was a confidential report made to the minister in respect to the administration of his department. A member expressed some interest in it and the Postmaster General allowed him to see it. I think that most of us who have been here for some time do find it rather surprising that a confidential document having been made available to the hon. member in that way was then used, or extracts from it cited textually in this house, without there being any indication to the minister that there was any intention to make such use of that confidential document.

As to the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition that the document be tabled, that would be contrary to the general practice. It has always been the practice of governments to get all the information and advice they find it appropriate to secure for the better administration of the departments for which they have responsibility, and it has never been the practice to table those documents. They are not prepared for the purpose of being a subject for discussion in the house. The minister is responsible for the administration of his department and he is entitled to get expert advice as to how the administration can be improved. But it is not the report that can be the subject of debate in the house, it is the way in which the department is administered; and I do not think there is anything unfair in the suggestion of the Postmaster General that he was surprised that a confidential document, having been communicated in that way, should have been made the object of textual citation in a debate in this house.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, since the discussions on a matter of this kind become part of the record of the house, I think I should point out that this is not a confidential document in the sense of a document that is under restriction on the ground of security or something of that kind.

Mr. St. Laurent: Oh, no.

Mr. Drew: And I would point out that I am unable to see any difference between this document and the Currie report, which was voluntarily tabled by the Department of National Defence last year. I recognize it has been contrary to the practice of this government to table these reports unless they are forced to do so in some way, but I think that practice should be changed and that report should be tabled and tabled forthwith.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a comment on this because—

Mr. Speaker: Order. In the first place, if I may be allowed to say so, this question should have been raised by the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace. That should have been his question, but the Leader of the Opposition chose to raise it himself and I saw that the house was interested in his remarks and therefore allowed him to proceed. I figured that it did not make so much difference at this point since it was raised by the leader of the party to which the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace belongs. But, in correcting an impression left by a newspaper, one should not—it being a so-called question of privilege—do more than is necessary to make the correction. But the Leader of the Opposition suggested the report be tabled and in the very last moment of the debate we were not talking about the matter in which the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace was involved. The matter which was being debated was whether or not the report should be tabled. I think that is a question which could be raised at a later stage. I do not think we should interrupt our proceedings any longer for the purpose of discussing whether the report referred to should be tabled.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Drew: Just one moment. Mr. Speaker, I just want to make this observation, not to debate in any way the point you have made, but since this will become part of the permanent record of the house I would point out that what I am referring to is a question of procedure which affects all members, and my own submission is that it was an appropriate course for me or any other member to rise on the question of principle in regard to the propriety of using information obtained in the way the information was obtained on this occasion.

Mr. Speaker: That is a point on which the Leader of the Opposition and I disagree at this time. Does the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) wish to speak?

Mr. Fulton: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I wish to refer to a question of privilege which I suggest is important since it affects the possible course of action of members in dealing with information of this type. It is in that connection that I think the position should be clarified, if not now, certainly at some future time, because my own connection with this matter is that the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace came to me on the same day he went to the Postmaster General's office, and we discussed together the question whether or not it was proper for the hon. member to use in the house extracts which he might obtain from that report.

It is that aspect of the matter which I think is of importance to every hon. member. In the course of our discussion it was my suggestion that I certainly would follow this course myself unless some ruling or authority was laid before us which indicated that it was not proper. I suggested to him that unless the Postmaster General laid down some conditions under which he would permit the hon. member to see the report, or unless the report itself were marked confidential, I felt that any hon. member who says in the house "I want to see a report", and is given access to that report, is entitled to repeat in the house what he finds in that report.

In view of what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has said about some surprise being felt that a report made available under these conditions should be quoted from, I think this is a matter that hon. members are entitled to have threshed out. My own view is, as I have said, that unless there is a condition clearly laid down as to the terms on which the report will be made available, or unless the report itself is marked confidential, then an hon. member should be free to quote from it once he has seen it.

MR. ZAPLITNY—REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT CONCERNING AUTOMOBILE ALLOWANCE

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The Winnipeg Free Press of January 15 issue carried a news item attributed to the Canadian Press.

The item refers to the government's proposal with regard to the indemnities of the members of this house and the salaries of the cabinet ministers and the leader of the official opposition. In referring to the indemnities of members of parliament, this news item states that the members, in addition to the indemnity of $4,000 and the expense allowance of $2,000, also receive an automobile allowance of $2,000 annually. This statement, of course, is obviously incorrect. Only members of the cabinet and the Leader of the Opposition receive the automobile allowance.

I raise this question in order that the public may have the correct facts in view of the lively interest in this question now being displayed in newspapers across Canada.

QUESTIONS

CANADIAN ARTHRITIS AND RHEUMATISM SOCIETY

Mr. Patterson:

1. Has the government, in previous years, made any grant or grants to the Canadian Arthritis and Rheumatism Society?

2. If not, is the government considering the advisability of making any such grant, or grants this year?

Mr. Martin:

1. Yes. In 1948-49 a grant of $60,238 was made under the national health grants program to the Canadian Arthritis and Rheumatism Society to assist it in getting organized.

The provincial branches of the society also received grants funds, as follows: 1948-49, $19,029; 1949-50, $14,126; 1950-51, $54,807; 1951-52, $47,644; 1952-53, $49,983; 1953-54, $135,926, (estimated).

2. See answer to No. 1 above.

ARMED FORCES ENLISTMENTS

Mr. Harkness:

How many men enlisted in each of the years 1951, 1952 and 1953, into the (a) Royal Canadian Navy; (b) active forces Canadian army; (c) the Royal Canadian Air Force, had prior service with sea cadets, army cadets services and air cadets?

Mr. Blanchette:

Figures for 1951 are not available. The following number of men enlisted in the Royal Canadian Navy, Canadian Army active force and the Royal Canadian Air Force with service in the sea cadets, army cadet services and air cadets:

	1952	1953[1]
R.C.N.	391	184
Army	734	421
R.C.A.F.	715	532
	1,840	1,137

[1]Figures for 1953 are for the period January 1 to September 30.

TUBERCULOSIS CONTROL GRANT

Mr. Proudfoot:

1. What effect, if any, has the federal tuberculosis control grant had on the lowering of the tuberculosis death rate in Canada?

2. What factors, if any, may have contributed to this decline?

Mr. Martin:

1. The moneys made available by the federal government under the tuberculosis control grant have made it possible for the provinces to expand more rapidly their existing services and to establish new services of various kinds where these are deemed desirable.

The death rate from tuberculosis has dropped from 37·3 per 100,000 population in 1948 to 17·1 per 100,000 population in 1952.

2. (a) Early diagnosis through increased mass X-ray surveys, widespread hospital admission chest X-ray examinations, and increased use of B.C.G. vaccine.

(b) More and better treatment facilities such as provision of extra hospital beds, the free distribution of streptomycin and other related drugs supplied to sanatoria, and the increased use of newer surgical methods of treatment.

All these factors have been assisted by the use of moneys made available to the provinces under the national health grants program.

PRIVATE FREDERICK JOSEPH BURKE

Mr. Knowles:

1. Has the report of the inquest into the death at Petawawa of the late Private Frederick Joseph Burke, been studied by officials of the Department of National Defence?

2. If so, by whom?

3. Have any reports of such studies been made? If so, what is contained in such reports?

4. Have any orders been issued as the result of such studies? If so, what are such orders?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. Yes.

2. By senior officials responsible for personnel, disciplinary and medical matters.

3. Yes. The contents of reports made by officials within the department for departmental use are confidential and privileged.

4. Yes. Assault courses as a form of exercise and training for personnel in detention barracks have been discontinued.

PAUL RICKEY

Mr. Diefenbaker:

Has the government given consideration to recommending to Her Majesty the Queen that she confer an appropriate honour or decoration on Paul Rickey of Winnipeg, Manitoba, for his courageous conduct during the month of December?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer this question orally. Following news of the precautionary landing north of Winnipeg on December 21 of pilot Paul Theodore Rickey, and his subsequent gallant behaviour in protecting his passengers, I proceeded to recommend to the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) that consideration be given to an appropriate award being made to pilot Rickey in recognition of his courage and resourcefulness under extremely difficult conditions. The Secretary of State has agreed to refer the recommendation to the awards co-ordination committee for consideration.

GOVERNMENT COMMUNICATIONS, B.C.—EQUIPMENT AND COST

Mr. Fulton:

In connection with the government telegraph and telephone system in British Columbia and the Yukon:

1. How many telephones are there in use on the whole system?

2. How many exchanges, with how many switchboards respectively, and where is each located?

3. How many poles?

4. How many miles of wire?

5. How many miles of copper wire?

Questions

6. What is the net cost (installed) of the above totals of telephones, exchange switchboards, poles (with insulators and pole hardware) and wire respectively?

Mr. Chevrier:

Mr. Speaker, this question and the one following have heretofore been on the order paper and I have answered them by writing to the hon. member at some length. I now have with me the answers which I should like to table but I should like to say that the answers do not contain all of the information included in the letter which I wrote to my hon. friend. However, they are an attempt to answer the questions to the best of the ability of my officers. My understanding with the hon. member was that if I would proceed to answer these questions in that manner, he would then withdraw the notice of motion which appears on the next page. Subject to that understanding I now table the answers to these two questions.

1. 4,720 as of 30 October 1953.

2. Exchanges are located at the following points (where multiple switchboard positions are in operation the actual number is indicated after the place name): Alert Bay, Alexis Creek, Alice Arm, Ashcroft, Bamfield, Bella Coola, Burns Lake, Clinton (2), Fort St. James, Gibson's Landing, Hazelton, Kelsey Bay, Kildonan, Lillooet, Lytton, Massett, 100-Mile House, Port Alberni, Port Clements, Port Hardy, Port Renfrew, Queen Charlotte city, Quesnel (2), Sechelt, Smithers (3), Terrace (2), Tofino, Ucluelet, Vanderhoof, Wells, Williams Lake (2).

3. There are 3,150 miles of pole line at approximately 35 poles per mile—110,250.

5. 11,354.

6. Separate net cost of telephone plant not available.

GOVERNMENT COMMUNICATIONS, B.C.—REPEATER STATIONS

Mr. Fulton:

1. Are the repeater stations on the northern British Columbia and Yukon lines of the government telegraph and telephone system included in the sale of the said system to the British Columbia Telephone Company and Canadian National Telegraph Company?

2. If so, to which company will they be sold?

3. By whom will they be operated?

4. How many such stations are there, where are they located, and when were they built, respectively?

5. What was the total cost of construction?

Mr. Chevrier:

1. Yes.

2. Canadian National Telegraphs, 4; British Columbia Telephone Company, 3.

INCOME TAX ACT

PROPOSED AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO MEDICAL EXPENSES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to the advisability of introducing legislation amending the Income Tax Act so as to remove the 3 per cent limitation from the section which makes provision for the deductibility of medical expenses for income tax purposes.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the subject matter of this motion is one which is familiar to all members of this House of Commons. Indeed, I am sure that its terms are familiar not only to those who were here in the last parliament but also to the new members of the house, for it is a subject that is quite familiar to the people of this country from one coast to the other.

As hon. members know, in the Income Tax Act there is a provision which permits income taxpayers, under certain conditions, to make a deduction from their taxable income in respect of medical expenses. However, it is important to note the conditions under which that right is extended. In the main, those conditions are three in number. In the first place, only those medical expenses can be deducted which meet the definition of "medical expenses" set out in the Income Tax Act. In the second place, there is a ceiling as to the total amount of medical expenses that any one taxpayer can enter when filling out his income tax form. In the third place there is the condition that an income taxpayer can deduct only that portion of his authorized medical expenses which is in excess of 3 per cent of his gross income.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think it should be made clear that, although hon. members may have views on each of these three conditions that attach to the deductibility of medical expenses for income tax purposes, the resolution before the house this afternoon asks for a change in only one of these three conditions. For my own part, I have no serious objection to the condition in the act having to do with the ceiling as to the total amount of expenses that one can claim as a deduction. That ceiling was raised in the budget of 1952 to the figures that are now in the act, and although there may be some members of the house who think the ceiling should be higher, I for one feel that that part of the provision respecting medical expenses is reasonable, and I do not suggest that the ceiling should be raised.

However, with regard to the definition of medical expenses I think that there is room for improvement, and despite the fact that I do not include suggestions respecting the definition of medical expenses in the motion before the house this afternoon I think the definition of medical expenses should be amended. At the present time that definition is such that it restricts a taxpayer mainly to amounts paid to doctors, dentists, nurses and hospitals, together with the right to include expenses for certain specified drugs. There are one or two other items that are included in the definition but there are many things that are not included. For example, at a time of illness many a family is faced with other expenses that can be quite substantial. The need for extra help in the home can be a very real medical expense occasioned by illness. The food budget can go out of line because of illness in the home. These matters are not taken into consideration at all when it comes to medical expenses for purposes of the Income Tax Act.

Likewise, spectacles and hearing aids are not allowed as medical expenses although a dentist's bill is allowed as a medical expense even though that bill may include the cost of dentures which it seems to me are comparable to spectacles or a hearing aid. I mention these shortcomings in the definition in passing so that I can point out that there is a field there in which something should also be done, and also so as to draw a line and make it clear that, so far as the motion before the house this afternoon is concerned, it asks for just one change in this section of the Income Tax Act. My motion asks that what is now known as the 3 per cent floor be abolished and that all medical expenses right from the first dollar up to the ceiling in the act be allowed as medical expenses for one computing his income tax at the end of the year.

Hon. members are, I am sure, quite aware of the history of this very important provision. The right to deduct certain medical expenses was first put on the statute books in time to be effective for the calendar year 1943. At that time Mr. Ilsley, who brought it in, provided that only those medical expenses could be claimed which were in excess of 5 per cent of one's gross income. It was an acceptable provision to have, but we on the floor of the house soon began contending either that the 5 per cent floor should be lowered or that the floor should be wiped out altogether. As I have indicated before, we had a very interesting experience in connection with this matter in 1944. That year there was no proposal in Mr. Ilsley's budget speech or in his budget resolutions to do anything about the 5 per cent floor, but when we were in committee on the budget resolutions there were many requests from the floor of the house asking that the 5 per cent floor be either abolished altogether or at least reduced.

On that occasion we had support from all quarters of the house including very interesting and significant support from the present member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith), and on one point from the hon. member who is now Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann). At any rate, despite the fact that there had been no proposal to do anything about this point in Mr. Ilsley's budget speech or budget resolutions, he did respond to the representations made during the course of the debate and brought in a resolution later in the 1944 session which reduced the floor from 5 per cent to 4 per cent. It was one of those occasions few and far between when the government right during the course of the session made some concession to the arguments put forward on the floor of the house.

The 4 per cent floor remained at that level until last year. In the meantime some of us kept on arguing that just as 5 per cent was too high so 4 per cent was too high. We kept on arguing that the nature of medical expenses is such that they should be on the same basis as charitable donations and that they should be allowed deductibility right from the first dollar up to whatever limits are set in the act. For a number of years it was a case of a few voices crying in the wilderness until 1950 and 1951 when considerable support developed in the house for our contention that the 4 per cent floor should be wiped out. The high point in the support for the contention that the 4 per cent floor should be wiped out was of course reached on March 26, 1952, when my private member's motion, worded similarly to the one before the house today, was passed unanimously by the house.

I do not intend to take any time arguing about technicalities on which we have spent time before. I recognize that my motion merely asked the house to express the view that the government should consider the advisability of removing the 4 per cent floor. I make the point, however, that that is all that a private member's motion can ask when money is involved, and I make the point that usually when the government allows a motion of that kind to pass it means that the government is favourably disposed to the substance behind that motion. Despite the unanimous support that the house gave to my motion on March 26, 1952, the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), who was Minister of Finance on that occasion, ignored that idea when he brought down the budget a short time later. As a matter of fact, not only did he ignore the express wish of the house that something be done about the removal of the 4 per cent floor, but he left the floor as it was and raised the ceiling. In other words, he did nothing to help the little fellow but did something to help the big fellow by raising the ceiling.

I pause, having referred to what happened on March 26, 1952, to remind the house that, in addition to the support we got away back in 1944 from the hon. member for Ottawa West and the present Minister of National Revenue, in 1952 we had the spoken support on the floor of the house of the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Henry), the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier), the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Maltais) and the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Applewhaite) as well, of course, as the support of the present Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair), who was then parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance. It is interesting to note that all those members who openly supported this important resolution are back in the House of Commons once again. I hope that their support for this proposition will be evident today as it was in 1952.

As I pointed out, Mr. Speaker, despite the stand taken by the house on March 26, 1952, to the effect that the government should give consideration to removing the 4 per cent floor, nothing was done about it by the Minister of Finance when he introduced his budget a few days later. Of course, that did not mean the end of this campaign so far as I was concerned. I put the same motion on the order paper the next year, in 1953, and it was again debated. On that occasion however, as the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) will recall, the debate was rather short-lived. It occurred on January 12, 1953, and Hansard records that I made my speech arguing that the 4 per cent floor should be removed. Then the Minister of Finance made a reply, at the end of which he simply moved the adjournment of the debate. I mentioned the hon. member for Greenwood because he was one of those who were rather shocked at the procedure being followed.

We objected to the action of the minister in moving the adjournment of the debate because that prevented others from speaking on this important question and prevented the house from taking a vote on the motion itself. We did our best to show our justifiable dislike for that procedure by forcing a vote on the minister's motion to adjourn the debate. The minister being on the other side, we lost that vote. I hope that course will not be followed today, but that the government will permit this debate to continue and will let the house make up its mind whether or not this motion should be passed. I hope we can count on the consistency of those members who supported the motion in 1952, and that they will support it again today. I hope all those members who helped make it a unanimous expression in 1952 will agree that this motion should be passed today.

I keep referring to the motion before us today as though it were exactly the same as the motion in 1953 or 1952. There is one significant difference. Despite the fact the Minister of Finance gave this debate a short life in 1953 by moving the adjournment of the debate, he paid some slight attention to the motion when he brought down the budget on February 19 of last year. As hon. members will recall, that was the occasion when cyclical budgeting brought the minister around to the idea of making certain tax reductions and certain concessions, for the election was not far off. He introduced a resolution lowering that 4 per cent floor to the figure of 3 per cent. It is the 3 per cent figure which will apply for the tax year 1953. In other words, when the taxpayers, in a month or so, start making out their income tax returns they will be able to deduct medical expenses in excess of 3 per cent of their gross income.

Well, that is good, Mr. Speaker. We are making progress. We started out with 5 per cent, then it was made 4 per cent and now we have it down to 3 per cent. It does seem strange that so many bites have to be taken to implement what, in my view, is unquestionably a matter of correct principle. I hope we will not have to wait for two or three more elections to get three more bites in order to remove the 3 per cent floor. Surely, it is time to face up to the principle in this matter and completely wipe out the floor.

One of the arguments that the minister keeps using against this proposal to remove the floor is that there is a certain average of medical expenses which people have to pay. In his view, income tax deductibility should be allowed only when medical expenses get above that average. I dislike referring again to a story I told once before. However, it is the minister's own story, and I think it is a good one. I think it drives home the point better than half an hour of argument. It is the story of the occasion when the Minister of Finance was in conversation with the late deputy minister of finance, Dr. Clark. Apparently Dr. Clark was saying something about averages, and the minister asked him if he had heard about the man six feet tall who had drowned in a body of water the average depth of which was only five feet. I think the minister's own story makes the point very well. These averages are no help to a person who has even the average expenses, let alone the person who has expenses far above them.

In addition to that, I suggest to the minister and to the government that they cannot continue using this idea about averages because as time goes on people are spending more on medical expenses than in years gone by. The manner in which we live may be responsible for that, or perhaps it is that medical science is developing and there are more ailments known with which doctors and hospitals can deal. Whatever the reasons, we are spending more. I suggest that the average portion of our expenses that Canadians are spending on health is going up all the time. Health is important, and it is a good thing that we should devote an ever larger portion of our income to the maintenance of good health. At the same time we are spending more, the minister is prepared to lower the exemption from 5 per cent to 4 per cent and then down to 3 per cent.

If the 3 per cent floor is based on average expenses, according to his reasoning he should be consistent and raise the floor instead of lowering it. I am mighty glad he has not thought of it, and I hope I have not put the idea in his head. The fact is that the argument really carries no further validity, in view of the fact the government has not given any figures to which to tie this reduction from 4 per cent to 3 per cent. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the arguments against this proposal, which were never valid, are disappearing one by one. I hope that in this session, even though it is three or four years before an election and the time when tax concessions are made, we will have recognition of this principle and that something will be done about the matter.

I have done this perhaps several times when I have raised this question, but I think I shall have to do it again. I have given a few examples to show what happens to a taxpayer, on the one hand, if he makes a certain contribution to charity, and on the other hand, what happens if he incurs that same amount of medical expenses during the course of a year. In both cases there are ceilings as to the amounts one can claim by way of income tax deductibility. But in the case of charitable donations, one is allowed, as a deduction, the first dollar one gives away, provided a proper receipt is obtained for it. In the case of medical expenses, however, one does not get the first dollar or the first ten dollars, in fact one does not get any dollars allowed until one gets above 3 per cent of the gross income.

Let us take the case of a married man without any children. Let us suppose it is a case where the income is $200 a month or $2,400 a year. If that man has no exemption other than the statutory one, the total amount of tax he would pay for the year 1953 would be $72. That includes the old age security tax. I might add that throughout these examples I am using the rates which people will have to pay by April 30 of this year when they file their income tax returns for last year's income. Now, if that taxpayer has medical expenses during the course of the year amounting to $200 the tax saving he will receive against that $72 is $23.04. One arrives at that by taking 3 per cent of his gross income of $2,400, and then giving him a deduction on the portion in excess of that.

However, if this same taxpayer who would receive a saving of $23.04 in lieu of $200 medical expenses were to give away $200 to approved charities, the tax concession he would get for that in the year would be $36. I have no objection to the tax concession made in respect of charitable donations. But it does seem to me that the treatment accorded in respect of charitable donations made voluntarily should be the same treatment accorded to medical expenses made involuntarily.

Let me take the case of a married man with a wife and two children, having a total income of $300 a month or $3,600 a year. Let us assume in this case medical expenses of $300. If this couple did not have medical expenses or any other allowable deduction they would pay on their 1953 income at the end of April the sum of $240. For medical expenses of $300 they will get a tax concession of $38.40. But if they gave away to approved charities the same amount of $300 their tax concession would be $60. This couple is given $60 by way of tax relief for giving away $300, but a concession of only $38.40 by way of tax relief if they have to pay $300 in medical expenses.

Bear in mind that no question is raised as to the average amount people give away to charities; that deductibility is allowed right from the first dollar. But in the matter of medical expenses the question of the so-called average is raised.

Let me go on and take another example. In this instance I shall work it out for a married couple with two children, and an income of $5,000 a year. In that case the gross tax is $537.50. If they had medical expenses of $500 in the year they would get tax relief of $78.75, but if instead of medical expenses of $500 in that year they had made charitable donations of the same amount they would have tax relief of $112.50. Let me repeat those figures: $112.50 tax relief if they give away $500 but only $78.75 if they are faced with the necessity of paying medical expenses to the same amount.

Then let me go down the scale again to the married couple with two children and an income of $200 a month or $2,400 a year. In that instance their gross tax, without any special deductions, would be just $18 a year. Let us suppose that they have medical bills in that year amounting to $100. The tax saving given on that $100 is only $5.04; but if they gave away $100 in the year the tax saving would be $18.

Again let me take the case of a married couple with two children and an income of $3,000 a year. In that instance the gross tax would be $126. If they have medical expenses of $100 a year their tax saving because of this 3 per cent floor would be only $1.80. But if they gave away $100 in the year their tax saving would be $18, ten times as much.

Depending upon the examples, the relationships differ. However, I draw particular attention to this example, using figures which I suggest are not uncommon. I refer to the couple with two children and an income of $3,000 a year, with $100 to be paid either as medical expenses or by way of charitable donations. Yet, because of that 3 per cent floor, this family would get ten times the tax relief for the contribution of $100 that it would get for the same expenditure by way of medical expenses. It is only $1.80 in one case but $18 in the other.

Without going into detail, the married couple with a salary of $3,000 a year and with four children, spending the same amount of $100, would be treated in exactly the same way—$1.80 tax relief for $100 of medical exenses but $18 tax relief for $100 charitable donations.

It seems to me that the unfairness of this floor, and what it does to the taxpayer with medical expenses, as compared with what it does to the taxpayer who makes church and charitable contributions must surely be obvious to everyone. It has been obvious to members in the past. It was obvious in the debates prior to 1952. I know many members spoke to me in those days and suggested that this was a case that surely should be met by the government. It was obvious to members in 1952 when they supported the motion calling upon the government to consider the removal of the floor, and certainly it was obvious to the people of Canada that this change should be made, because it was a matter of considerable interest in the press—and particularly in that year when the house expressed its view, and when the government flew in the face of that view.

I urge the house on this occasion to give its approval once again to the motion. And this time I hope when that has been done the government will take that expression of opinion on the part of the house much more seriously than it did in 1952. In fact, I think it should be taken more seriously than it was in 1953 because, although the minister did something in that year when he reduced the floor from 4 per cent to 3 per cent, it must be remembered that that action was taken on the eve of an election. And, even so, it was not good enough.

Not only do I contend for the resolution on the ground of its essential fairness, which I think is borne out by the comparative treatment I have indicated as between medical expenses and charitable donations, but for the other reason I have already indicated, namely that medical expenses as defined in the act do not cover all the bills that hit a family when there is illness in the home. I could refer to some of the other things that are not covered, and make special mention of glasses and hearing aids. I have referred also to the extra cost of help when illness strikes in a home. I would be the first to recognize that it would be pretty hard to work out a definition that would really cover everything, and I recognize in particular the problem with respect to extra help. I understand it might be argued that in some cases such help was really necessary while in others it was not, but that a person of some means might want to spend money in that way.

As I say, I will be the first to recognize these points. But the very fact that you cannot work out a definition that will cover all medical expenses makes it all the more urgent that the medical expenses that are defined, including payments to doctors and hospitals, and the like, should be allowed right from the first dollar. I know of few issues which come before the house in connection with which justice and fairness indicate so clearly what should be done.

Another example of the failure of the present provision to fill the bill has to do with drugs such as insulin. A few years ago when the minister broadened the definition of medical expenses allowable under the act he included insulin and made a great to-do about it as well. I could bring to this house a good many letters from users of insulin who wondered at all the fuss. The fact of the matter is that although they are faced with a heavy cost for insulin during the course of the year, because of what was the 4 per cent floor and is now the 3 per cent floor they find they do not get to that floor or they do not get very far over it, so in many, if not in most cases, that provision for that particular drug is just so many words in the act. It does not mean anything to the persons who are really affected.

The same applies to some other drugs that are mentioned in the act, not to mention the fact that in my view there are still other drugs that have not been included in that definition and which as I see it certainly should be.

Another reason why I contend that this motion should be passed by the house and its substance acted upon by the government is that it moves in the direction in which society is thinking these days. I for one want to make it perfectly clear—perhaps I do not need to as this house knows me well enough—that even if this motion were passed it would not be the last word from me or from this group on matters of health. This is just a drop in the bucket; this is just a small step in the right direction. There is no doubt about it that we want to go on to a program of adequate health insurance and health coverage for the people of this country. It is because it is a step in that direction that I feel the government should at least move that way.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) has got to the point where he not only dislikes my questions about health insurance, he will not give me an answer in substance, or he has even forgotten the number of times he has said that. The fact of the matter is that no less a person than the Conservative minister of health in the province of Ontario thinks that within five years we will have health insurance or at least hospital insurance covering every person in Canada.

I commend that to my good friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Trainor), who does not share my views on this question, who thinks that this party has too much to say about health insurance. In fact I will pass this clipping over to him right away which shows what the Ontario minister of health thinks on that question. The hon. member for Winnipeg South says that Dr. Phillips does not say how he is going to bring it about. It is true there are problems to be worked out, but I give that as an example from the extreme right in this country of the way Canadians are thinking. The fact is accepted that the care of the health of the people of this country is something of extreme importance and that more and more we have to make the necessary changes in our economy to take care of the health of the people of this country.

This move that I am proposing is just a little drop in the bucket. But because it is a step in the right direction, because the people of the country have become aware of the unfairness of the 3 per cent floor, I urge that the government delay no longer in taking action on this important question.

As I say, the arguments against it have in my view been pretty well set aside. The argument about allowing only those expenses which are above the normal or above the average is, as I have suggested already, really quite fallacious. I think the minister's story to the late Dr. Clark really sets that aside. So far as any individual person is concerned, if he is hit with heavy medical expenses it is no comfort to tell him that that is just the average, that that is just normal. It is certainly no comfort to tell him that if he had not been hit with that expense and had given that amount away to charity he would have received better treatment from the income tax people.

Another argument that the government has used from time to time is that it would cost a certain amount. Certainly a cut in taxes costs money just as the imposition of a tax raises money. The whole point of any income tax structure is that it should be fair. To say that there is $30 million or $40 million which the government would not get if the floor were wiped out is no excuse for keeping on the floor. That $30 million or $40 million should be made a challenge to the government to find some fair way in which to raise that amount of money.

There was one occasion when the present Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) suggested, although I think we cleared the ground between us at least—I mention this in case anyone else wants to use the argument—that we should not go too far with this idea lest we provide too much help for wealthy people. It is always interesting to note the way in which that argument is used. I simply point out that the possibility of wealthy people gaining tremendously or gaining substantially as a result of the removal of this floor is nullified by the ceilings that are in the act. I have no objection to those ceilings. It is not going to be possible when you take away the 3 per cent floor for the rich man to get his doctor to prescribe a trip to Florida and charge it as medical expenses. I suggest that that argument does not apply at all.

This request that I am making is, in the words of the hon. member of Spadina (Mr. Croll) in one of the debates on this matter on a previous occasion, a measure to help the little fellow. In view of the wide support that this measure has had across the years in the country; in view of the wide support it has had in this house, particularly the unanimous support that was given to it in 1952, I urge the house to pass the motion on this occasion.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to indicate my support for the resolution moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I have supported the same or a similar resolution on occasions before this and have indicated personally my reasons for so doing. The case submitted by the hon. member who has just spoken is pretty complete and does not need too much argument to support it. I think the hon. member has shown quite clearly that there are good and sufficient reasons why the government should listen to the members of the house and remove the 3 per cent floor on medical expenses forthwith. The reasons given by the hon. member, as I recall, were the following.

In the first place, we are doing something for the little man. I agree with that. I do not know of any better way of doing it in connection with budgetary matters than to relieve him of the necessity of paying income tax on medical expenses. I have every respect for the claim of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) that he is charged with the responsibility of distributing the tax burden fairly. That is quite true, but my own feeling is that he is not distributing the tax burden fairly if he imposes upon the little man the necessity of paying income tax on expenses in connection with medical expenditures within his own family.

The second reason given by the hon. member was that the removal of the 3 per cent floor on medical expenses would then be placing deductible medical expenses on exactly the same basis as contributions to charitable institutions. I see no reason why that should not be done. If we are going to be fair about it a person should receive the same consideration for medical expenses as he receives for contributions to charitable institutions. I believe that that is a good, sound argument.

The third reason given by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was that there is widespread support for it throughout the country and that the principle is fair and just. Certainly I can say that there is widespread support for the removal of this 3 per cent floor on medical expenses in my constituency.

My people have asked me to repeat that this is so, and during the last tour I made of the Peace river country people conveyed to me their desire that I speak in support of the removal of the 3 per cent floor, as we have done on other occasions. I think that since the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made such a good case for the removal, I should take time perhaps to supplement that by dealing with some of the arguments used by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) on January 12 last. The hon. member has, I think, dealt with these to some extent but there are two or three comments I would like to make in addition. I do not want to amplify my comments on this resolution because I think it is important that we keep our speeches as short as possible so as to make it possible for a vote to be taken in the house today.

The minister, speaking I think on the same subject at a time when the Income Tax Act adjustments were before the house, on January 12 last, had this to say as reported at page 900 of Hansard for 1952-1953:

> It is all right to pass resolutions couched in these terms, relating to budget matters, if it is understood that they do indicate what they say, in the terms indicated, namely, that the government should give consideration to certain matters. But the ultimate responsibility as to the fairness and the desirability of making these budget changes must rest with the government.

Now, the minister by these words was complaining against the impression that had got across the country in the minds of the people that this house having unanimously passed a resolution in 1952 to the effect that the 4 per cent floor as it then existed should be removed, it was incumbent on the government to take action and remove the 4 per cent in the budget. The people rightly got the impression that that was what should be done, and the people of Canada took it for granted that when there was unanimous approval of a resolution in this house the government would pay attention to it.

Mr. Benidickson: It was a motion to consider.

Mr. Low: I understand, but that is not what was in the minds of all the members who were debating the problem on the floor of this house. What was in the minds of the members when they debated the resolution was that the government ought to remove the 4 per cent floor. It is all very well to sit back and say that all you agreed to was that consideration would be given to it, and that consideration was given to it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to emphasize this very important point. It is the attitude of the government that I do not like, as expressed in these very words. It is the same attitude that Mr. Ilsley, the former minister of finance, gave expression to in this house on a certain occasion when he was confronted with the fact that while the house was in session certain orders in council had been passed, and when we took him to task for it I well recall with what indignation and heat the minister pounded his desk and said, "I want hon. members to know the executive council does not get its power from this house. It gets it from the crown." It is that attitude carried over into a resolution of this kind that we take exception to. I suggest that when members of this house, representatives of the people, unanimously pass a resolution to do a certain thing, then the government ought to take that into consideration and see that something is done. They should not sit back and say: "It is our duty to give consideration all right, but we are the ones who will say whether action shall be taken".

If we are going to have real democracy in this country, then that means there must be government according to the will of the people. If we are not competent, as members representing the people, to express their will, and only members of the cabinet are competent to express will, then I would ask what kind of government that is. It certainly is not a democratic government and I think it is about time we began to pay some attention to the expressed views of the people of this country and particularly of the members of this house who represent the people when they unanimously vote for a certain thing or a certain objective. I think it is high time the government paid strict attention to a vote of that kind and proceeded to carry out its intentions instead of complaining that that sort of resolution should not be passed.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, the government will not take the same view this year and put a block in the way of a vote on this resolution; or, on the other hand, rally the support of the members good and true of the Liberal party, the boys who at the crack of the whip vote the way they are told to vote and see to it that the resolution is voted down. There was a unanimous vote in this house in 1952 on this matter when the floor was 4 per cent, not 3 per cent. The minister last year brought in a budget that reduced the floor to 3 per cent and to that extent it was a move in the right direction. But it certainly did not do what the house gave the minister instructions to do by that unanimous vote. I suggest that the minister's argument is pretty weak. At any rate he is simply repeating what Mr. Ilsley repeated, that the executive council does not get its instructions from the House of Commons but takes them from the crown. Where is the crown in this case?

Mr. Gillis: The governor general.

Mr. Low: Well, of course, that is out of the question. I want to deal just a moment with another matter in this connection. The minister bolstered his argument for failing to remove the 4 per cent floor by using these words, that the philosophy behind this, that is retaining the floor, is that it is quite within the capacity of the ordinary individual to pay the normal expenses incurred for normal medical care or attention, but when this is beyond what can be considered as a normal amount, then and then only should there be special relief.

That is a specious argument and it certainly must have occurred to the minister in his calmer moments that it was so, because he already recognizes the principle of granting exemptions from the very first dollar on for certain living expenses. He gives exemption to single taxpayers in this country of an amount up to $1,000 on income and for married people up to $2,000 of income. Why? Because he figures it requires $1,000 to pay the normal living expenses of a single man and $2,000 to pay the living expenses of a married person. He recognizes the principle and then turns around and says that he has to recognize that there are certain normal expenses which everyone should be asked to pay and therefore it will be only the amount above this normal expense that he could recognize as being deductible for income tax purposes. His argument does not hold in any way whatsoever, and I suggest he is on much sounder ground when he resorts to a third argument, that if he should abolish the 3 per cent floor on medical expenses he will lose a certain amount of revenue. I think he is on pretty sound ground there because I think it is fairly well established that the removal of the 3 per cent might mean a loss of as much as $40 million in revenue. I think perhaps it could be shown the amount would run to that figure. That may not be, but at any rate there will be a fairly substantial loss. But, Mr. Speaker, if it can be shown—and I suggest that it can and already has been shown—that it is fair and just for the government to remove the 3 per cent floor, then I say that the Minister of Finance should go ahead and remove it; and if it requires the sacrifice of $30 million or $40 million of his revenue, I suggest that he make it up by increasing the rates of taxation on those incomes over $5,000. Then he would be covered. He would be far better justified in doing that than he would be to leave this 3 per cent floor as it is. I suggest that there is every good reason why this is the time to remove the floor and to put the taxpayers of this country on the same basis with respect to medical expenses as they are on with respect to contributions to charitable institutions.

I think I have probably said enough about the matter at the moment, Mr. Speaker, to indicate that I am in complete support of the resolution moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles); and I will just let the matter rest at that.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have not very much to add to what has been said. I should like to say a few words about the history of this resolution which is somewhat more interesting than that of most resolutions that come before us. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has made the argument very fully, as he always does. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) has done full justice to the argument that the government entirely disregarded a unanimous vote of this house. It is only fair to say that at the time that was done the then parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, now the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair), in his usual breezy way outlined what was being done and what was not being done by the resolution. This is what he said as reported at page 822 of Hansard of 1952, and I would ask the hon. member for Peace River to listen to this carefully because it has to do with what he has just said. These are the words of the Minister of Fisheries:

> . . . I should like to say that the Minister of Finance accepts this resolution for consideration the way he accepts every letter or brief or interview put forward by any group in the country at this time as a proposal that he should consider in the preparation of his budget which will be delivered to this house on the evening of April 8.

Later on I shall have occasion to point out that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre agreed with this situation. Of course it is extremely unflattering to the members of this house to realize that a unanimous vote of this house is given just the same consideration—neither more nor less—as any letter or brief or interview put forward by any group in the country. That is not very flattering to us. Let us take, for instance, the chamber of commerce of Aklavik which, as I understand, is now on the move and possibly their deliberations would not be as careful as they might otherwise be. But at any rate, we have the satisfaction of knowing that our representation was to receive—and I have no doubt it did receive—the same consideration as do all the others which have been mentioned. How much or how little that was, we do not know. I spoke briefly of what happened just as the vote was being taken because it was made very clear to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who, as reported at page 828, said:

> I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I realize full well that the passing of this resolution does not mean the immediate legislative enactment of what it asks for.

That certainly was an understatement. I continue to quote:

> The resolution asks for all that a private member, under the rules of this house, can ask for, namely that the government give consideration to the proposal that the 4 per cent floor in connection with medical expenses in relation to income tax should be wiped out. I take it that if this resolution is passed, since it has won the support of the government, the government will do what the resolution asks . . .

Later on the same page the Minister of Fisheries says this:

> I must make this correction. What the house is voting on is that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) should give consideration to this proposal.

And the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre added "That is right".

In looking at this situation, notwithstanding that the impression I think we carried away and the expectations that we naturally entertained were disappointed, nevertheless I think we must realize that technically the situation at the moment was made clear.

I refer next to what happened on January 12, 1953. Looking back I suppose we can say now that in 1952 the government probably let the discussion go a little bit further than perhaps it intended to or a little bit further than it felt, in retrospect, was wise. But in 1953 they took no chance like that because, as I shall point out in a moment, we had what I at that time called the closure. As I read my few words at that time, I have a great deal of contempt for myself, Mr. Speaker, because I did not make my reference to the closure with all the vehemence with which I should have made it. It was much too mild to do any good. There are other members in this house who have what has been well described as natural animosity and they can do that. I think the Minister of Fisheries himself would have done it infinitely better than I did it. It was a poor performance.

Mr. Sinclair: No animosity at all.

Mr. Macdonnell: I used the word "closure" and I have been wondering this afternoon whether we might have closure again, and I feel that I am rather lucky to be on my feet and speaking as I am now speaking. At any rate, what the minister said then—and I am sure he said this with great sincerity—was this. This was almost a year after the unanimous passing of the first resolution. As reported at page 900 of Hansard of 1953 he said:

> —I gave my parliamentary assistant instructions that I did not oppose the motion, and my reason for not opposing it was based upon the terms of the motion itself.

Then he read the motion and I now continue to quote later from the minister's speech:

> Now, in the light of subsequent events, I think I was wrong in taking the course I did take, in indicating to my parliamentary assistant that there should be no objection to the passing of the motion. I did it because I felt that it would be wrong and illogical for a minister of finance, at the time budget matters were under consideration, to refuse to given consideration to any proposal.

There again the minister makes it perfectly clear that we are given certain consideration. Our views carry certain weight. They carry the same weight as that of any ordinary unintelligent or semi-intelligent person.

Mr. Sinclair: I know the hon. member wants to be fair to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). Would he just give the quotation where the minister says he gives exactly the same weight of consideration to these other groups as to the committees of the house?

Mr. Macdonnell: I am going to read that.

Mr. Sinclair: He said "consideration", but he did not say he was going to give the same weight of consideration, which is the point the hon. member is endeavouring to make.

Mr. Macdonnell: I was using his word "consideration" which is the word the Minister of Fisheries has used. I continue with the quotation:

> Every day I am receiving proposals from taxpayers as to how tax laws should be amended; and on that occasion I felt that, in the terms of the resolution as framed, it should be allowed to pass. I must confess that, in my innocence, I did not realize that it would be represented to the country as being the unanimous opinion of the House of Commons that this should be done.

I am sure the minister said that in all sincerity, but I think it is equally true that, having happened as it did, it was the most natural thing in the world for members of the house to expect that it would carry considerably more weight than it did. The minister's attitude at that time in saying that he thought he had made a mistake the year before and in moving the adjournment of the debate at that time or, in other words, applying closure, showed that he did not want to let himself get into that position again. Having already said that he would consider it further, the minister said finally:

With the assurance which I have just given, that the matter will be considered again this year, I think perhaps it might be appropriate if I were to move the adjournment of the debate.

It was at that time that my protest and the protest of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre were made; but the vote, surprising as it may appear, did not support our contention. Those who had voted with us the year before to pass the resolution unfortunately voted for the motion to adjourn, in other words, for what I call closure. Since then, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the minister has made a one per cent reduction of the exemption figure. From figures that he gave elsewhere I understand that that one per cent cost about $10 million. I am assuming therefore that 3 per cent more would cost $30 million. I do not know whether that is actually accurate but I take it that it is roughly so.

I would point out that $30 million would be ·0015, if my arithmetic is correct, or about one sixty-fifth of the expenditure on defence during the current year. In other words, if we could get one sixty-fifth more economy in the defence department we would be able to find the money. Therefore I hope the minister will reconsider the matter. I hope he will not allow his heart to harden because of the fact that an election is two or three years away, and I hope that if he feels he cannot do anything else he will at least do something for the people in the very low income brackets.

The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) made what I thought was a very shrewd observation when she said that medical expenses usually mean other additional expenses. I thought that was a very valid point and I venture to bring it forward again. There is another thing I should like to say.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, with his customary frankness, has said that if he gets this it will merely whet his appetite for more, and his appetite really does not need much whetting; but if we can give this measure of relief it will at least do something to relieve the pressure at this point, and by one small thing and another perhaps we can relieve the pressure to the point that we shall not be forced into some of the extravagant and unworkable demands which some of us think our socialist friends would like to plant on us.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, this being private members' day I intend to exercise my prerogative as a private member to speak on this resolution, and I am glad to join my Conservative friend who has just taken his seat in supporting this silk hat socialist legislation. The subject matter is not a new one, and I often wonder why members sitting on the government side of the house allow so much time to be wasted on a matter that is so small. In my opinion the removal of the 3 per cent floor on medical expenses is a very small matter. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), in presenting his last budget, pointed out to us that in the lower income brackets there were more than 136,000 families in this country who did not pay taxes. Therefore the number in the lower brackets who would benefit from this proposal is not as great as we might think.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the other members who have just spoken have gone into that side of the question rather fully, and I am not going to repeat what they said. I agree with their arguments. But it is not the 3 per cent floor that worries me so much as the definitions in the act. The amount that one spends on medicine is not deductible and that is something that affects everybody. The angle with which I am going to deal is that moneys paid for health insurance to doctor and hospital schemes are not allowed as deductions for income tax purposes. I am going to take an example close to home, but it applies generally. I want to refer to the contributions that mine and steel workers make to doctor and hospital plans in the part of the country in which I live. The individual contribution amounts to $117 per year and covers complete hospital and medical service.

But the only reason that any of the present schemes are able to function at all is by virtue of the large number contributing to such insurance plans who never receive any benefits from them. Otherwise such schemes could not work. I have made payments to one for about 45 years. It is very seldom that I have ever consulted a doctor, and I have never occupied a bed in a hospital. There are thousands more like me. If there is a charitable contribution made by anyone in this country it is the contributions made to these insurance plans by those who do not receive anything from them which enable the provision of the services of hospital and doctor for those who need them. On that basis it is certainly a charitable contribution.

On former occasions I have asked the Minister of Finance to consider allowing as deductible for income tax purposes the money paid into recognized doctor and hospital plans in any part of the country. I have no hope that this resolution will pass, but it does provide a chance for members to get up and analyse the problem, and I hope that the minister will give consideration to the different views presented when he is again preparing his budget. The allowing of such payments as a deduction is one thing I want him to think about.

Another point to which I think some consideration must be given has to do with the large amount of money paid by families to drug stores year by year. It is a direct medical expense. In many cases there is a prescription ordered by a doctor. Drugs cost a great deal. Take aureomycin, for example. A man goes to a doctor, is examined by him, and the doctor says that he needs some of these pills. They cost $1 each. The man pays for them but because he purchases that medicine from a drug store he is not permitted to deduct the cost. I am safe in saying that the greatest expenditure that the average low income group family makes in the course of a year so far as health is concerned is the amount of money it spends for drugs in the corner drug store. I think people should be permitted to keep track of such expenditures and allowed to deduct them as a medical expense.

There is also the question of hearing aids which may seem very simple. But the man who has a hearing aid really needs it or he would not buy it. There is not only the initial expense of buying the hearing aid. It must be kept in repair month by month. When it is brought in from the United States in the first place it is taxed. It is quite costly. Then the person has to purchase batteries for it month by month and other little odds and ends in order to keep the equipment operating. In the course of a year a person who has to use a hearing aid will spend quite a little bit of money in keeping it running. I think the minister should give consideration to allowing such expenses as an offset against income tax.

Then there is the question of the man with an artificial leg. He has to buy it, and over the years a great deal of repairs enters into the maintenance of an artificial leg. If he lives in my part of the country, and I suppose the same is true of the western provinces, he has to ship the leg to a regular orthopedic centre in Toronto to be repaired, and such repairs are costly. That is another consideration for a man who is already handicapped by having to wear an artificial limb and provide for its maintenance year by year. Certainly, such a medical expense should be allowable as a deduction from income tax.

Mr. Benidickson: It is.

Mr. Gillis: Repairs to an artificial limb? I am very glad to know it. Some people do not know about it. I have had letters about it.

Mr. Benidickson: It is spelled out in the act.

Mr. Gillis: The purchase is, but are the repairs?

Mr. Benidickson: I think so.

Mr. Gillis: I do not think so. However, I mention it again and when the parliamentary assistant and the minister are looking over the budget they can recheck that point. If it is not covered, perhaps they can write it in.

There is another type of expenditure that has been increasing year by year, to which some consideration should be given. A person is allowed to deduct a doctor's bill if it runs beyond 3 per cent of taxable income. The same applies to the hospital bill and the dentist's. There is another expenditure, however, which in my opinion is becoming quite heavy. Perhaps you have a member of the family sick for a year. You pay the doctor bill and the hospital bill. Medical science, however, is not able to do anything for that person and the person ultimately passes away. Then there is another bill you have to face and that is the funeral bill. Anyone who has had to contend with it in the last few years knows that is a very heavy bill.

Hon. members may say that a person should have insurance for that. Consider the 130,000 people in the lower income tax brackets or the persons on the borderline of the income tax bracket. They cannot carry any insurance. Insurance premiums are not deductible for income tax purposes, and today there are many people who cannot afford to carry insurance because it is too costly. I feel that funeral costs have risen beyond reason. They are a heavy burden. It is the final climax to a whole series of hospital and medical bills. I feel some consideration should be given to the proposition of allowing funeral expenses under some circumstances to be worked out by the department.

As I said before, I have not any idea—

Mr. Knowles: Will the hon. member permit an interjection at this point? I am sure he would like to put on the record what he probably knows, that the same idea was urged by no less a person than the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) when he was a private member back in 1944.

Mr. Gillis: That is quite right. There has been some thought on the matter by Liberal members. I stress it again because I think the matter is important. It is a big handicap to the average person in the lower income brackets who may run into a hospital bill. I should like to urge upon the minister and the parliamentary assistant that in particular they look at the money paid into recognized medical schemes across this country, to see if such payments cannot be allowed as deductions from income tax. There is a lot of agitation about it, and I have received some correspondence on it. As I said in the beginning, if there is a charitable contribution made in this country it is that payment. Hundreds of people keep up that type of insurance for those who need it and never receive anything from it. There are many people who pay that $117 per year into these medical schemes, not because it is protecting them or because they get any benefit from it, but to help maintain these institutions that provide medical care for those who are in a less fortunate position.

I think that if members will consider the matter they will be able to think up new angles. I should like to see a vote on this matter to ascertain how the house feels about it. The resolution only asks for consideration.

Mr. Harris: Do not try that again.

Mr. Gillis: The fact that members voted for the resolution would be some encouragement to the minister. I know that if I were minister I would not like to change these acts without an expression of opinion by the members. If the matter were voted upon, the minister would be able to go to the Governor General and say, the members have voted upon this so I am asking Her Majesty's permission to implement the changes in the act. I believe the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) would "O.K." it if it came back to the cabinet after the Governor General had looked at it, and the members had voted upon it.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): It is true, as hon. members have pointed out, that this is at least the third session at which the house has had an opportunity to debate this motion. Last year the views of the government were presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), who is unavoidably absent at the moment. He informs me, however, that the views he expressed in Hansard for January 1953 are those that he has today.

Something has been said about the phrase in the resolution that the government "give consideration" to this problem. If, under our rules, that were all that could be read into the resolution, or if the conduct of the members of the opposition on other occasions had been different, probably the course which was adopted in 1952 could be followed today. We have approximately 70 new members in this first session of this parliament, and I think that they would probably be anxious to have some information as to the significance of a motion of this kind.

Before referring to events that took place in 1952, in a rather different way from some of the members of the opposition so far, I should like to have something to say concerning the history of this particular section of the Income Tax Act. As has been stated, it was introduced as a new form of deduction in 1942. There was a very good reason for this which has not been fully stated. In looking up the record, hon. members will find that this particular form of deduction was not introduced as a result of any pressure or in fact any suggestion from members of parliament, let alone the opposition members. In 1942 the administration realized that, in consequence of the very high rates of taxation existing at that time, certain taxpayers, faced with unusual and extraordinary medical expenses, would not have remaining with them funds adequate to take care of them and also their normal living expenses and their taxes.

I think that would be fairly evident if I were to remind members of the rates of taxation existing at that time and give some idea as to how 1942 taxes compare with the income taxes applying in 1954. In 1942 a taxpayer with single status had an exemption of only $660 as compared with an exemption in 1954 of $1,000. In the case of a married taxpayer the exemption in 1942 was only $1,200, whereas today it is $2,000. In the intervening years another new form of exemption has been introduced. This has particular significance when we are considering the problem of medical expenses.

An extra exemption has been given to the elderly in our community. Taxpayers over 65 years of age are now provided with an exemption of $500 in addition to the normal exemptions which I have indicated. To an extent this was provided because it is recognized that people of that age probably have unusual expenses, for example medical care, beyond those of younger people.

I would also like to give some comparisons to the house of what income remains in the hands of taxpayers now after paying their taxes in comparison with taxes and the compulsory savings called for in the war year of 1942. A married taxpayer with no dependents in 1942 with an income of $2,500 paid a tax, including compulsory savings, of $651. That same taxpayer today with an income of $2,500 pays only $75 plus $10 for his old age security tax.

A taxpayer married but without dependents in 1942, on a salary of $3,000 was required to pay in tax and compulsory savings the sum of $884. That taxpayer today is required to pay $150 plus $20 to provide for old age security. I am sure some members in the opposition would immediately raise the point that there has been a certain decrease in the purchasing power of the dollar in those intervening years. They might say that the take-home or the left-over pay after taxes in 1954 has not the purchasing power it had in 1942. Let us admit that, and then look at the consumer price index projected back to 1942. Doing this we find that the cost of living since 1942 has increased 59½ per cent. But, looking also at the average weekly wage in 1942, we find that those average weekly wages have risen 100 per cent. Therefore when one compares the left-over income after paying taxes in 1942 as compared with 1954, on an income of $2,500 of a married man without dependents we find that in 1942 it was $1,849 while in 1954 it is $2,415.

Then, despite the warning of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) about using averages, if we can assume that the married man with no dependents and an income of $2,500 in 1942, by reason of the doubling in the average weekly wage is today enjoying an income of $5,000, he has left over in 1954 on his $5,000 income after 1954 taxes the sum of $4,430.

The point I wish to emphasize is that while this was introduced to our income tax structure in 1942 to relieve hardship, it was not intended to be a universal deduction for everyone. Indeed, as I say, it was designed to relieve hardship, and was not intended to create benefit, unless there was more than average medical expense.

This I think was enunciated by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) last year when he spoke on a similar motion. I should like to quote from page 901 of Hansard for January 12, 1953, where the Minister of Finance expressed views on the principle of the measure. He said:

> I think it is unsound, in principle, that normal living expenses of the individual should be paid out of income before tax.

Then he said:

> If one taxpayer gets a concession or a deduction, then some other taxpayer must provide those moneys.

And again:

> The philosophy behind this actually is that it is quite within the capacity of the ordinary individual to pay the normal expenses incurred for medical care or attention, but when those exceed what can be considered as a normal amount then, and then only, should there be special relief. That is the principle which lies behind the law as it stands now.

And he said further at that time, prior to the introduction some weeks later of very substantial tax relief in his budget speech:

> It certainly can be argued that more equitable and widespread tax relief can be afforded in other ways.

When we are considering the equity of the floor of 3 per cent I think it is of interest to consider the similar provisions in other countries, notably in the United States. In that country the floor with respect to medical expenses still remains at 5 per cent, although hon. members are aware that while our floor was 5 per cent in 1942 it has been subject to two reductions, first to 4 per cent in 1944 and now to 3 per cent. That, I think, is an interesting development. While this was introduced in 1942 without any pressure from the opposition, or any suggestions from them, the provision has been steadily liberalized in the manner I have indicated, through reductions in the floor from 5 per cent to 4 per cent and then to 3 per cent.

Also the eligible list of medical expenses allowable under the act has been widened, and now includes insulin, ACTH, liver extract, wheel chairs, hearing aids, artificial limbs, as mentioned by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), and some other items.

Mr. Knowles: Also cortisone.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, cortisone. Then, in addition to that, there was a very important measure a couple of years ago which provided that bills that would be considered for income tax deductions could be those paid any time within a period of 24 months less one day. That of course is a very important advantage to the taxpayer in the matter of the consolidation of his medical accounts during that time.

In addition to that there have been very substantial increases in the ceiling referred to by the sponsor of the motion. In 1942 the maximum amount that could be claimed by a single man as a deduction for medical expenses was $400, and for a married man $600, plus $100 for each child up to a maximum of four children. Today, with two or three revisions and greater generosity in the matter of those ceilings, these deductions stand at $1,000 for a single man or $2,000 for a married taxpayer plus $500 for each child, to a maximum of four children.

One can thus see the improvements made here. In another year subsequent to the original statute it has been made possible for a crippled or blind person to claim the expense of an attendant, to the extent of $500 or, alternatively, a blind or crippled person is given a special allowance of $500.

Other forms of concessions to taxpayers have also been provided in this relatively short space of time. Claims against an estate can now be allowed. Medical expenses incurred outside of Canada can be allowed.

Some reference has been made in the debate this afternoon by both the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) and the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) to "the little man", what the hon. member for Greenwood called the man in the low income group. I think an examination of the actual dollars and cents involved as far as the taxpayer in the low income group is concerned will show that newspaper comment concerning the advantage of this proposal has been rather exaggerated. I should like to give a few illustrations of just what it means to people in the low income groups if this motion is carried.

A single taxpayer with no dependents with an income of $1,100 would pay a tax of $17 on the 1954 tax rates. The maximum amount of saving obtained for that individual by the removal of this 3 per cent floor would be $5.61. While I am quite positive that this amount would not be without consequence to that particular taxpayer—I am not minimizing that—I think I could emphasize that that surely would not be the difference to that taxpayer between hardship and well-being.

As another example let me take a married taxpayer with no dependents who is just on the borderline of paying taxes with an income of $2,100. The maximum tax saving obtained by that taxpayer through the proposal of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) would be $10.71. A married taxpayer with no dependents having an income of $10,000 would pay an income tax of $1,660 on the 1954 tax rates. With the 3 per cent floor in existence only medical expenses in excess of $300 could be deductible by that taxpayer and the result would be that $78 would be the maximum tax saved by removing the floor. I question whether in any of those instances the removal of the floor would be, as I said before, the difference between hardship and well-being.

We will look at it another way and consider the situation of a married taxpayer with two dependent children under 16 years of age who are in receipt of the family allowance. Supposing this taxpayer has an income of $3,000. The maximum saving provided by this motion would be $15.31. Let us translate that as a percentage of his total income and we find it is just about one-half of one per cent.

I do not want to overemphasize some of the problems that would be faced were this proposal accepted, but one problem is that of administration. All hon. members will realize that any deductions from gross income have to be certificated and carefully examined by officials of the Department of National Revenue. I think hon. members will readily appreciate the almost endless stream of small accounts that would be submitted for examination were all expenses allowed as deductions from income as has been proposed this afternoon.

I think hon. members could easily translate that into administrative cost and appreciate the heavy additional salary costs that would follow compared to the relatively small financial relief which I have indicated would be possible, particularly in the case of the low income group.

Let me illustrate that. As is known, a great number of persons, in the low income tax group particularly, pay their taxes by means of deductions at the source. An employer cannot anticipate what a man's medical expenses are going to be for the year and the tax deduction at the source is therefore made according to the gross income and the normal personal exemptions. It can be imagined, particularly in the case of the low income tax group which several hon. members have been emphasizing this afternoon, what administrative work would be required. Vouchers would have to be submitted and a complete check would be required because almost everybody would be putting in a claim for some rather small medical or drug expenses.

Something has been said about the revenue implications. I have had discussions with officials of the department as to what might be the loss of revenue were this proposal to be accepted. Having had some knowledge of the extensive debates that have taken place in previous years on this question I was quite prepared to give some explanation of how the officials of the department arrived at their estimate, but I do not think that is necessary this afternoon because practically all hon. members of the opposition who have referred to the loss of revenue have come quite close to the figures that our officials indicated to me would be the probable revenue lost, namely something in the neighbourhood of $35 million as a minimum. If we were to think that every taxpayer would be claiming the 3 per cent, on the basis of income subject to taxation last year that would raise the figure to probably $75 million. As I say, hon. members of the opposition more or less all admitted a revenue loss of some $35 million would be involved.

It goes without saying that if there is a loss of revenue it has to be made up in some other way. I remind the house that $35 million is greater than the surplus shown in the public accounts which were tabled here last week for the year ending March, 1953. This is given as some $23 million.

Some reference was made, particularly by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), to insurance against the hazard of medical expense, hospitalization and so on. It is true that in recent years there has been a most conspicuous growth in the number of persons who have availed themselves of the opportunity of insurance in these various forms. Hon. members will recognize that as insurance coverage increases the risk of extraordinary hazard and hardship is more or less eliminated for the insured, and thus the problem is a diminishing one.

I need only remind hon. members of the great growth of such schemes as the Blue Cross and the provision for fringe benefits in union contracts, sometimes provided by the employer and sometimes by the union. These were referred to by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. We know also that in British Columbia and Saskatchewan there is a form of state health insurance. Then there are a great number of people who are the responsibility of the state. I refer to those in the welfare class who either through the municipality or the provinces have their medical expenses borne by the state because of lack of income.

I should like to indicate how rapid this trend has been toward insuring against the hazards of medical expenses. My source of information is an article in the Financial Post in November 1953. This article states that the benefits paid by private accident and sickness companies in 1940 amounted to $4·3 million, and that in the short period up to 1952 those benefits had risen to $50·3 million. I am told that the benefits paid in 1945 by the Ontario Blue Cross were $1·9 million. Seven years later they were $18·8 million. One can therefore see that this problem is diminishing as people insure themselves against any extraordinary financial embarrassment as a result of sickness.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South complained that the premiums paid to insure against this form of risk were not deductible under our Income Tax Act law. That is true. But on the other hand the actual amounts paid by that individual, even though insured, if in excess of 3 per cent of his income can be submitted for income tax deduction.

Mr. Knowles: I think the hon. member means the actual amount paid by the association on behalf of the individual.

Mr. Benidickson: The taxpayer can get back the bills which he has submitted to his insurance company and submit these bills to the income tax department if the total paid in twelve months ending in the taxation year exceeds 3 per cent of income. You cannot have it both ways. You cannot deduct the premium and also deduct the expenses.

I would also like to point out that in certain countries where they have health insurance, such as Great Britain and New Zealand, regardless of the way you pay your tax into the treasury to support that kind of a scheme, there is no such thing as a deduction for medical expenses. In Australia I think the maximum that can be claimed is slightly more than $200. This would not be too significant in this country in relation to the resolution.

I want to come to this question of whether or not a motion of this kind can be "considered" by the government. I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in a previous debate referred to this as an "abstract motion". A member might estimate from that that it is a fairly innocent motion, and one that all members of the house could probably adopt without much hesitation. It is true that in 1952 that attitude was adopted by the Minister of Finance through his instructions to the then parliamentary assistant, the present Minister of Fisheries. He said the finance minister certainly would "give consideration" to this proposal because the budget was only some two weeks off. It is true the 1952 debate on the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre placed emphasis upon the words "give consideration" and his motion at that time received the unanimous endorsation of the house. But I want to indicate, particularly to new members unfamiliar with parliamentary procedure, just what developed as a result of the course followed at that time. The hon. member for Greenwood has made it very clear that the then parliamentary assistant, the present Minister of Fisheries, was watching the debate, as we knew he would, very attentively. Indeed he said he was watching the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre "like a hawk" and with good reason.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear.

Mr. Benidickson: So there will be no misunderstanding as to the extent of the commitment made by the then parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance I will read an extract from the debate, found at page 828 of Hansard dated March 26, 1952. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was summing up the debate that took place and said:

> The particular point that the house is voting on is the request that the 4 per cent floor be wiped out.

It was at this point that the parliamentary assistant rose and said:

> No, no. I must make this correction. What the house is voting on is that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) should give consideration to this proposal.

Mr. Knowles replied:

> That is right. The house is voting on the proposition that the minister should give consideration to the wiping out of the 4 per cent floor.

Now, what happened was that the Minister of Finance, I am sure, did give very careful and respectful attention to the resolution. But the budget that was announced some two weeks later failed to meet the wishes of the member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles: Of the house.

Mr. Benidickson: Of the house?

An hon. Member: You said it.

Mr. Benidickson: The 1952 budget did not make any change in the 4 per cent floor but then what happened? The matter of the emphasis on the words "give consideration", acknowledged on March 26, was abandoned, and on April 22, 1952, in the ensuing budget debate the leader of the C.C.F. party introduced nothing less than a vote of want of confidence by an amendment to the budget in these words to be found at page 1489 of Hansard:

> This house further regrets that the government has ignored the wish of this house, as expressed by a unanimous vote on March 26, that the 4 per cent floor under medical expenses deductible for income tax purposes should be abolished.

Some rather strong and even nasty things were said about this rather innocent development in March. I would like to quote some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on April 23, in the same budget debate, as will be found at page 1537 of Hansard:

> . . . the failure of the government to carry out the unanimous wish of the house as expressed on March 26, I can tell him that the people of this country feel that they were tricked.

On page 1539 of Hansard for the same date, he said this:

> People outside this house . . . simply understand that the 262 of us, the entire house, expressed a view but then one member in the cabinet rejected that view. The man in the street simply cannot understand such defiance of parliament.

Then he went on to quote a headline from one of four prominent newspapers, and the headline was "Parliament be Blowed". Then on page 1542 the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had this to say:

> . . . the government allowed the motion to pass, and to pass unanimously. We had every right to believe that that meant approval of the proposal contained in that resolution.

That is the implication when more emphasis than "give consideration" is expected by the opposition in moving what they describe as an "abstract motion".

I suggest to members of the house that all of us have a great admiration for our British form of government. I think some of us are not envious at all of some other constitutions. Some of these as we know do not make for very stable government. Under some other forms of government close by, as we know, there seems to be a constant tug of war between the executive and legislature. Someone said this afternoon that it is a poor indication of true democracy if we were not free at this stage to vote on a principle of this kind because it involves some $35 million.

The Minister of Finance said last year he was not satisfied that, if he had $35 million of tax revenue to forsake, this was the fairest and most equitable manner of distributing that $35 million. I know he would continue to make that assertion. I think you will agree that he would do so properly, having just concluded, prior to Christmas, an examination of expenditure proposals of the various departments and now being faced with responsibility to raise revenues to meet their total. It is not the proper constitutional procedure for the legislature to tie the hands of the Minister of Finance at this stage by saying that in any form of tax relief or any other budgetary policy he must give prior consideration to tax relief amounting to some $35 million, a sum which exceeds the actual surplus of last year.

I simply conclude by emphasizing that contrary to what seemed to be the case, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is not really arguing for relief of hardship for any taxpayer. That has been taken care of by the actual provision of relief for the unusually heavy medical expenses of a taxpayer in excess of 3 per cent of income. I repeat, while the amounts involved are by no means inconsequential, I suggest that a saving of $15.30 for the man with the $3,000 income is not the difference between hardship and well-being.

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to detain the house for long, because I am one of those who believe this motion should be settled by a vote of the house so that every hon. member may have an opportunity to express his individual opinion upon it. I am not going to repeat the arguments used by my colleagues who, I think, have stated their case very well. I should like to make one comparison which has been mentioned in this debate, namely the difference in the way deductions are permitted for donations to charitable institutions and the way this deductible part of medical expenses is handled.

It has been pointed out that the deduction for donations to charitable institutions has no floor—it has a ceiling—whereas in this case there is a floor. I think it has been the experience of most hon. members who have had anything to do with checking income tax forms or filling them out, that most business firms allow, in their own private budget, for such things as donations for charity. In other words, it becomes part of the expense of operating their business. In that way it is actually carried on and provided for in the price of the goods or services for which they charge, and thus it is actually passed on to the consumer. That is standard practice. I do not think there is any dispute about that fact.

However, in the case of an individual it is not possible to handle that matter in that way. The individual has to make his donations and contributions and those amounts are taken out of his actual income and out of his purchasing power. There is therefore less justification, as a matter of fact, for permitting the full deduction of donations than there is in the case of medical expenses which may, in some cases, result in a hardship. However, I am not going to go into the details of that matter because it has already been covered.

I should like to devote just a few minutes to the arguments we have just heard from the parliamentary assistant to the minister. It was extremely interesting to me because of the philosophy from which it seemed to flow. In a sense I was rather amazed that, after the hon. member had stated his admiration for our form of government, as he called it—the democratic system, and so on; an admiration which I am sure is shared by all of us, because I personally have nothing but the highest praise for our form of government—he then went on to make a most astounding statement. I do not see how it can be connected with his previous statement. He said it is not the proper procedure or function of a legislature to tie the hands of—I think that is the term he used—or give instructions to the Minister of Finance in the preparation of his budget.

If that is what he meant to say, then it is certainly a denial of the function of parliament as most of us understand it. If it is not the function of parliament or of a legislature to pass on and to make decisions as to what shall be done about the taxpayers' money, either that which the government already has in its possession or which it intends to get, then I do not know what the function of parliament is.

Mr. MacInnis: They should send us home.

Mr. Zaplitny: As is suggested by my hon. friend, they might as well dissolve parliament, send us home, and run the country by order in council. That may be the new philosophy that is creeping into the ranks of the government. If it is, it is a most vicious one. May I just point out that from a famous statesman who is no longer with us we have heard a famous phrase about the supremacy of parliament. In fact one of the first things that got me interested in public affairs was reading some of the debates of the house wherein the late Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King spoke in glowing terms about the supremacy of parliament and used the famous phrase which he was so fond of using, namely "parliament shall decide." I was greatly interested in that type of approach because I agree with it so thoroughly. If we are going to accept the philosophy that parliament shall decide and that parliament is supreme—

Mr. Benidickson: Shall decide at the proper time.

Mr. Zaplitny: At the proper time, says the parliamentary assistant. I am greatly surprised that it should be left to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance to decide when is the proper time. It seems to me it is up to the members of this house to decide when they should make their decision, and not have it handed down to them. However, the most serious aspect of the whole thing to me—and I am sure to others outside of this house who read its proceedings—is the position in which the private members of this house are placed. Even to a greater extent than with respect to the position of hon. members who are referred to as members of the opposition, the serious aspect is with respect to the position in which private members on the government side of the house are placed.

I think this philosophy poses to them a challenge which should be met immediately and decisively. In effect, what the parliamentary assistant is now laying down as a philosophy of the government is that the Minister of Finance and in effect the government as a whole—because if it holds good for one department it holds good for them all—shall not accept the advice of the private members of this house nor even, as he stated, seek the advice of the members of this house in making these decisions so far as the budget is concerned. As a matter of fact he also made the statement that in providing for the reduction of the floor from 4 per cent to 3 per cent, it was not done as a result of the advice of this house or of the members of this house, he even went so far as to say, on either side. That statement indicates that even the members who support the government, the private members of the Liberal party, were not consulted; their advice was not asked for or heeded.

Mr. Benidickson: I think the hon. member has misunderstood me. When I said that a certain decision was made without benefit of the advice of the house, I was referring to the introduction in 1942 of this principle for the first time.

Mr. Zaplitny: That makes it that much worse, Mr. Speaker; because not only were the members not heeded in changing the floor that was established but even in establishing the floor in the first place the members of this house, on either side, were not heeded or even asked for advice.

Mr. Benidickson: Of course they were. They had the opportunity to discuss it at the time the budget resolutions were brought to the house.

Mr. Zaplitny: That is the point I am getting at. I am glad the parliamentary assistant is coming to my aid. He is really an assistant for both sides of the house because he has helped me to point out exactly the situation, namely that the only time at which they are permitted to discuss the matter—and I point out the words "permitted", which is a fine word for a free parliament—is when the budget has already been laid on the table or has been announced in the house and it is a matter that has already been decided upon by the government. The members are then permitted to lift the corners of the budget, to take a peek at its contents and to make some comments, but they have nothing to say as to what shall be in the budget.

If that is the attitude the hon. member wishes to take, of course it is not anything that anyone individually can do anything about. But we are still in control of this house as private members, I hope; and it is a fact that there is a majority of members on the government side of the house, members of the Liberal party. I think they should pay some attention to the opinions expressed in the press across this country.

In recent months there has been a great deal of speculation as to what is the usefulness or, shall I say, the function of the private member of the House of Commons. As a matter of fact some very critical words have been used in editorials in newspapers which normally support the government with respect to how private members have acted. They have been criticized for not taking a stand on matters of this kind even though the stand be different from that taken by the members of the cabinet. I am going to plead their case now for a moment, to point out that mathematically it is an impossibility and I think they can be excused. I have worked it out mathematically and I should like to state briefly how it works out.

It appears that it is simply impossible for private members on the government side of the house to express any opposition or take an independent stand. If we start with the figure of 168, which I believe is the present Liberal membership, and deduct 20, the number of ministers in the cabinet, we find that there are 148 left.

Mr. Knowles: Too many.

Mr. Zaplitny: Then of course there are the parliamentary assistants, one of whom has just finished speaking. Naturally we would not expect them to vote against government measures because they are expected to support them. There are 13 at the present time, and if we deduct that figure there are 135 left.

Mr. Knowles: Still too many.

Mr. Zaplitny: I think it is a conservative estimate to say that for every member now holding the position of parliamentary assistant there are two more who would like to hold it. That makes 26 and subtracting that figure we are left with 109.

Mr. Knowles: Still too many.

Mr. Zaplitny: On the same basis, and I think it is a conservative estimate, there should be another 13 vacancies in the other place; and using the two to one formula again we have to deduct another 26. That leaves 83. There are also certain judgeships that will need to be filled, and if we take a conservative estimate of 13 we come down to 70. This computation of course is done on a mathematical basis, and I want to be fair. I have referred to recent divisions in the house, and I find that when votes have been taken an average of 57 members of the Liberal party have been absent. I am not critical of the fact that they have been absent; I am simply stating the figure which is taken from the record.

Mr. MacInnis: Mathematically subtracting it again.

Mr. Philpott: What is the average for the C.C.F.?

Mr. Zaplitny: Then it also appears—

Mr. Philpott: What is the percentage for the C.C.F.?

Mr. Zaplitny: —that on the average there have been 12 members of the Liberal party who have refrained from voting even though they were here.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I remind the hon. member that we are discussing a resolution in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and I think the present discussion is a little far afield.

Mr. Zaplitny: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I agree with you. I had got to the point where there were only 13 left. I proceeded to take away 12 and that of course left only one. This one member, who might have been willing to take an impartial, independent and courageous stand on this question, of course had to be given the position of deputy speaker. Therefore we are left in the position where, if an independent and impartial stand is going to be taken by any members of the house, it will have to be by the opposition. I am not saying this in any critical mood. Personally I like my colleagues on the other side of the house very much, and I hope they will prove I am wrong in what I am saying by getting on their feet and voting for the motion.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to say anything at this time, but I am not sure whether the implication of the hon. member who has just taken his seat was that we on this side of the house are rubber stamps. I should like to tell him that we on this side of the house are just as sincere as anybody on his side of the house. I am going to state now why I am opposed to this resolution. I stated in the house last year that I would support no social legislation until pensions were granted for the handicapped and helpless. I took the same stand all over my constituency and in the result it was quite evident that the people agree with me. I am honest in my statement.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I remind hon. members that if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre speaks now he will conclude the debate.

An hon. Member: Let him go.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I am sure we have listened with interest to the remarks made by the only member, except the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor), who has spoken for the government on this resolution. I refer to the attempt made by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance to persuade the house to turn down this motion. I gather, in view of the stand he has taken, and in view of the fact that apparently the government has decided not to move the adjournment of the debate as it did last year but rather to let the matter come to a vote, that it will be a bit of a surprise if we are as successful today as we were in 1952.

Before I proceed to reply to some of the remarks made by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, I wish to express my thanks to the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), and to my colleagues, the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) and the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny), for the vocal support they have given to this resolution. I was sorry that the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Henry), the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier), the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Maltais), and the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Applewhaite), who spoke in support of this resolution when it had government favour two years ago, did not get to their feet today.

The arguments put forward by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance are to a large extent the same arguments that have been put forward upon previous occasions, and I suppose someone over there will say that my replies will be the same replies. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, in view of the kind of arguments that are being advanced against the fairness of my proposal I feel that I should say a word about some of these arguments.

One of the first arguments put forward by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance was that the exemption levels in relation to the income tax were a lot lower in 1942 when this medical expense deduction provision was first written into the Income Tax Act than are the corresponding income tax exemption levels now. In my view the parliamentary assistant answered his own argument when he admitted that there has been a considerable increase in the cost of living as well as in the rates of incomes of our people since 1942. Actually in my view, if we are going to be fair, the exemption levels should have been raised a great deal more than they have been raised, bearing in mind what they were in 1942 and what they are now.

In any event, whether or not we agree on the point to which these exemption levels were raised, I suggest that they are related to the general cost of living and that they have no bearing whatsoever on other principles of income tax legislation. The fact that these exemption levels have changed has not altered the provision with respect to the deductibility of charitable donations. Why should that change have any bearing on the question of medical expenses? It has not altered the provision with respect to all the various deductible items that are allowed to business. They are still carried along despite the fact that there have been these increases in the exemption levels.

The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, in another part of his argument, also referred to the tremendous difference in the rates of taxation in 1942 as compared with today. There was quite a difference in the cost of government in 1942 as compared with today, particularly because of the fact that we were in the midst of a very real war back in 1942. The rates of taxation were much higher for that reason, and the country accepted those higher rates because they were necessary for the purposes of the war.

The parliamentary assistant makes a great deal out of the fact that Mr. Ilsley described his introduction of this proposal as being made on the basis of medical expenses being a hardship to the ordinary taxpayer, a hardship in view of the larger amount of the taxpayer's income that was being siphoned off by the income tax. Again I do not want to put a silly idea into the head of the parliamentary assistant or the minister, but if he is going to use the argument that this provision was only put in because of the hardship of excessive medical expenses in the light of excessive wartime taxation, then you would think he would remove the deductible aspect of medical expenses altogether once that so-called element of hardship has been removed. The reason he has not done so, I think, is that society has moved along and there has been substituted for that reason Mr. Ilsley gave in 1942 the recognition by society today of the importance of income tax legislation giving some recognition to medical expenses.

Another argument used by the parliamentary assistant was that the amount that would be saved by the ordinary taxpayers, particularly those in the lower brackets, would not be very great. I was a little surprised at the manner in which he put those figures forward. He seemed to act as though he were giving the house something that would be strange, figures that would make me uncomfortable from my point of view. He used illustrations in the very brackets I used in my earlier speech. As a matter of fact he came out with figures not greatly different from some of the figures about which I was complaining.

Following that line of argument the parliamentary assistant said that in the case of a couple with two children whose income was $3,000, the maximum possible saving as a result of removing the 3 per cent floor would be only $15.30 per year. I believe that is a mark of the attitude of this government. They do not seem to realize what $15.30 means to a family man with two children and $250 per month when that family is faced with heavy medical expenses. To the parliamentary assistant, the Minister of Finance or the government, $15.30 may be just peanuts, but every nickel is a help to a family faced with medical expenses. Similarly, he suggested that a single person with an income of $1,100 would be faced with a maximum saving of $5.61 per year as a result of passing my motion. The implication the parliamentary assistant put forward was that it was not worth passing this resolution for such a small saving per year.

The other day a bill was presented which was supposed to be all right because it would take only a few cents or a few dollars from the people in the course of a year. I cannot mention the bill because it is not before us now, but everybody knows what I mean. I suggest that here again you have a mark of the attitude of this government. They do not realize what every dollar means to a person who is hit by medical expenses.

Mr. Martin: Why does the hon. member say that?

Mr. Knowles: Because of what the parliamentary assistant said.

Mr. Martin: What the hon. member says is that no member of the government or on this side of the house appreciates the economic plight of certain groups of people. I say to him that he is wrong when he makes that statement.

Mr. Knowles: If the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) feels that way about it, I suggest he take the parliamentary assistant behind the curtains and rebuke him for having put forward this argument, presumably in the name of the government.

Mr. Benidickson: I said those sums were not inconsequential to the taxpayer.

Mr. Knowles: But the parliamentary assistant also questioned whether it was worth while, in view of those amounts, to remove the 3 per cent floor for the so-called little fellow, on behalf of whom I was talking.

In a brief reference he suggested that the wealthy man would be making a greater saving. I was making notes as the parliamentary assistant was speaking, but I did not get down the figures he put forward for the wealthier person. May I point out that any sum a wealthy person is likely to be able to deduct if he spends a great deal of money on medical expenses is not likely to be changed by the 3 per cent floor, because if he spends a great deal of money he is caught at the other end as well, namely by the ceiling. So far as I am concerned, the removal of the floor would not alter his position but would be of real help to the little fellow. I remind hon. members again of what the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) said in an earlier debate, that the removal of the floor would help the fellow who is just over the line. It is on behalf of that group in our society that I urge this resolution be passed by this house.

Another of the arguments put forward by the parliamentary assistant was that the removal of the floor would mean additional administrative tasks for the Department of National Revenue. He says, for example, that the 3 per cent floor means that a great many people do not make deductions for medical expenses. They do not put in the receipts they get from doctors and hospitals because the amounts do not add up to a figure equal to 3 per cent of their gross income. Surely that is no argument against doing something that is fair in principle. The government permits deductions for charitable donations from the first dollar, which encourages the taxpayer with a receipt for even one donation to charity to claim that deduction. I suggest that the argument on an administrative basis hardly holds water.

As I am going along it occurs to me that it should be clear in all of this discussion that the 3 per cent floor does not relate to the taxable income of the taxpayer. It does not relate to his income after he has deducted the $1,000 in the case of a single person or the $2,000 in the case of a married person. For all practical purposes the 3 per cent floor is related to his gross income. There are one or two things like trade union dues or donations to approved pension plans that can be deducted before applying the 3 per cent floor, but that is all. For all practical purposes this 3 per cent floor relates to the gross income, not to the taxable income. This point has been recognized by no less a body than the chamber of commerce in the city from which the Minister of National Health and Welfare comes, the Windsor chamber of commerce. I am sure he must be interested in what they have to say.

The Windsor chamber of commerce argues that if the government cannot go all the way in what we are asking for, at least they should relate the floor to the taxable income of the taxpayer rather than to his gross income. I hope the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) will give some consideration to that compromise point of view suggested by the chamber of commerce of his own city.

The next point to which the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance referred —and he did it quickly; I gathered that he had figures he was ready to use if we challenged the amount seriously—was in respect to the amount that would be lost by reason of taking off this floor of 3 per cent. But since, at least for the purposes of the debate, we accepted the government's figure that the loss might be of the order of $30 million, he did not go into the matter extensively.

I was interested, however, in his comments at that point. They were so typical of government comment, and they were made right in the face of an alternative suggestion made in this debate by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell). The hon. member for Greenwood pointed out that this $30 million would be only one sixty-fifth of the amount we are spending on defence, and that conceivably it might be made up by economies in that department of government to the extent of one sixty-fifth.

But no; so far as the government is concerned, whenever we suggest tax relief that might mean a slight reduction in revenue, it never seems to think this might be made up by some form of economy. No; they always say that the only way to make it up is by getting revenue from some other source.

I said in my earlier remarks that if it had to be obtained from some source, well and good. In our view it could be obtained in a fairer way. But I challenge the government not only to think in terms of turning to another source, but rather to think in terms of the possibility of economies to make possible this very fair proposal of removing the 3 per cent floor.

I have only a little more to say, and then we can have the vote on the question. I followed, or at least I tried to follow, the remarks of the parliamentary assistant in his effort to explain to new members in the house what had happened as a result of the way in which my motion was allowed to pass back in 1952. Incidentally, since both the hon. member for Greenwood and the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance have quoted from what I said on that occasion, I should like to draw to the attention of both hon. members one sentence they seem to have overlooked. I do not suggest it was done deliberately, but in picking out sentences they overlooked the one I have in mind.

In the reply I made on March 26, 1952, when I was recognizing that we were simply voting on a motion asking the government to give consideration to the matter, I made it very clear of course that the reason that was all my motion asked was that that was all a private member's motion could ask, when a matter of money was involved. Having made that clear I said, as reported at page 828 of Hansard:

> I take it that if this resolution is passed, since it has won the support of the government, the government will do what the resolution asks, namely will give consideration to that proposal. Naturally I hope the fact that this resolution is passed unanimously by this house will suggest to the government that that consideration should be favourable.

The present Minister of Fisheries did not interrupt at that point.

Mr. Benidickson: He did later on. He gave the words I quoted.

Mr. Knowles: It was later on—it is all on the record—when I was dealing with another point. I have stated clearly the view I held at that time and the impression that was left with the house. I made it very clear that it was just a motion, all that a private member could ask for under the rules of the house, asking that the government give consideration to this matter. But in view of the atmosphere in the house, and in view of the unanimous support of the proposal, I said that naturally I hoped the fact that the resolution was passed unanimously by the house would suggest to the government that its consideration should be favourable.

I knew it did not bind the government. But I certainly thought that with the treatment it had accorded the resolution the government was prepared to give favourable consideration to that proposal.

The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance says today that we cannot now say that this motion is just abstract or innocent. I will accept "abstract" as my word, but I do not think "innocent" was mine. He says we cannot now say that it is just an innocent or abstract motion because—and he turns to address himself to the new members in the house—it would have an effect which he deplores, namely of binding the government, when the minister is trying to work out a budget in the light of increased estimates he has before him, to giving prior consideration to this proposal involving a loss of $35 million in tax revenue.

Let us look at that. The parliamentary assistant says it is not an innocent motion. He says it has the effect of binding the minister—who has been wrestling with the estimates and will have to wrestle with the budget—to give prior consideration to this proposal. But when we said in 1952 that, morally at any rate, it had that effect, a technicality was thrown back at us and we were told that it did not have that effect.

Mr. Benidickson: You admitted that it did not have that effect in 1952, before you took your seat.

Mr. Knowles: What I admitted before I took my seat on that occasion has been put on the record today. The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance knows very well that this motion is worded to the full extent that a private member's motion can go. He knows also that almost never—in fact I have not been able to find any instance of it—does this government allow a private member's motion asking for consideration of something to pass unless it is prepared to go along with the substance behind the matter consideration of which is requested.

The government has been going around in circles with regard to this matter. However, I think the high point was reached in the suggestion by the parliamentary assistant that the government is not this time prepared to vote for the motion. And the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) says he will vote against it. I am a little surprised at his reasoning, and we will probably remember his words at a later point in the session. His argument is that he has stated, and committed himself to the effect, that he will not support any other measure of social security until there are pensions for the disabled. Well, does he doubt the word of his colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who has already assured us that there will be legislation at this session with respect to pensions for disabled persons? I do not see the force of the argument of the hon. member for Fort William.

At any rate the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance and the hon. member for Fort William, the only two spokesmen we have heard from the government side, suggest to us that by and large government members are going to vote against this motion. Well, if the parliamentary assistant has come around now to the idea that the motion only asks for consideration—and he says now that is what I admitted before I sat down in 1952—

Mr. Benidickson: But you did not stick to that position.

Mr. Knowles: I did stick to my position. It is perfectly clear that there was no chance of departing from it. It is the government that has made the great departure.

Mr. Harrison: He thought he was innocent in 1952.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) or whoever is interjecting will have an opportunity to vote on this in a moment or two. If the government now takes the position that this is a resolution simply asking for consideration of the matter and calls upon Liberals to vote against it, look at what this country is being told. This country is being told that this government will not even consider the proposal.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Knowles: This government is asking its supporters to say that they are opposed even to the request that consideration be given to removing this 3 per cent floor. I say to this government that too often they have relied on the hope that the memories of the Canadian people are short. Over and over again they are doing things like this. In the early part of a parliament they go against the wishes of the people and then try to make up for it just before an election. They have gotten away with it a number of times, but I suggest that they have gotten away with it for the last time.

The next election may be three or four years away, but this is not the last this parliament will hear of this motion for abolishing the 3 per cent floor. If the majority of this house reverse their decision of two years ago, when they supported it, and vote against it today, they will have an opportunity to deal with it next year and the year after until the election comes. I do not think the memory of the Canadian people will be as short this time as it has been. Even if the people do not remember what happened in 1954, they will have a chance in 1955 and in 1956 to see where the Liberal members of this house stand.

In 1952 the Liberal members of this house were in favour of the government considering the removal of what was then the 4 per cent floor. Those on the Liberal side who spoke to it made it clear from their remarks that they were in favour not just of having the matter considered but of having the floor removed.

Mr. Sinclair: Just on one point of order, I spoke for 40 minutes at that time giving reasons why the government did not think it should be removed.

Mr. Knowles: The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) was then parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance. On that occasion he spoke at length and gave the arguments on both sides of the question. It was not a 40-minute speech on why it should not be removed; the minister gave arguments on both sides of the question. The minister was on one side of the question only in relation to the removal of the ceiling, but he ended up by saying that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) was prepared to give consideration to the motion for the removal of the floor and was willing to have the house pass it.

But the other members who spoke on that occasion did not get involved in that technicality; they were happy that the government had given a lead suggesting that the motion should be passed, and they spoke in those terms. Certainly it was interpreted in that way by the country. If the Liberal members of this house now want to reverse their position and vote against this motion, be it on their own heads.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

GRAIN

ESTABLISHMENT OF SCHOLARSHIPS THROUGH INVESTMENT OF UNDISTRIBUTED BALANCES IN HANDS OF WHEAT BOARD

Mr. J. H. Harrison (Meadow Lake) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of amending the Canadian Wheat Board Act to provide that, where producers of any grain sold or delivered during a pool period have been for six years or more entitled to receive from the board payments in respect thereof under certificates issued pursuant to the Canadian Wheat Board Act, or out of an equalization fund, and there is an undistributed balance remaining in the accounts of the board in respect of that grain, such undistributed balances be paid over to trustees who shall be instructed to pay claims as they are submitted, to invest the remainder in appropriate government securities, and to set aside the interest earnings thereon as a scholarship fund to be awarded to the sons and daughters of prairie farmers attending the universities of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this resolution does not require a lot of explanation to members of the house. My main reason for bringing the matter to the attention of the house is the fact that many ideas have been expressed as to how good use might be made of this undistributed fund. I thought it would be a good thing for some discussion to take place in order to decide the best use to which this undistributed fund in the hands of the wheat board might be put.

I might explain something for the benefit of eastern members. One member who spoke to me just before the dinner recess thought possibly the purpose of the resolution was to get more money from the government of Canada for the farmers of the west. Let me say at the outset that that is not the case. These are funds that belong to the farmers of western Canada. They are in the hands of the wheat board and consist of final payments, interim payments and so on which the board, for some reason or other, has not been able to distribute. It may be that the man who delivered the grain cannot be found. He has disappeared, or he may have died and at the moment his heirs are not ascertainable.

These funds are kept in escrow by the wheat board for a period of six years. I think it would be wise if they were invested in gilt-edged government securities and the interest thereon used for the purpose of providing scholarships for the sons and daughters of western farmers. In that way some good would be done along educational lines. There have been indications at times from other members of the house that possibly I am not too interested in education. This resolution may be one way of showing that I am, and in a material way. I have not been particularly interested in some of the proposals that have been made to the house concerning education because they have not been of a kind that can be implemented. The procedure I have suggested would provide scholarships for the sons and daughters of prairie farmers.

At present the fund is of some size, and of course it varies from time to time. I do not propose that any of the fund shall be disposed of or that any rightful claimant shall be denied his money any time he wishes to claim it. I suggest that the fund shall be set aside and administered by the wheat board, and that from the interest on the investment scholarships be provided for the sons and daughters of western farmers.

Mr. Campbell: Will the hon. member say what the amount of the fund is now?

Mr. Harrison: I understand that it is something in excess of $2 million. I might say that a similar resolution was moved by the predecessor of the hon. member who has just interjected. It is not my brain child in the first instance. I think it is something that should commend itself to hon. members and I should like to see some discussion of the matter because, as I said at the outset, various organizations interested in western farmers and the grain industry in particular have different ideas on what is the best use that can be made of this money.

I hope hon. members who follow me will put on record their ideas as to what they think is the best use to be made of it. I think the provision of scholarships as I have suggested would be an admirable use. There are not too many scholarships available to the children of western farmers, and it would not hurt to provide more scholarships in this manner.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, this motion is one that, to say the least, is innocuous in its import as I see it. Although there is no reason whatever for any strong opposition to it, it does not meet the problem faced by the wheat board with respect to undistributed amounts on hand. I have here the wheat board report for 1950-51. It shows that for the year ended July 31, 1951, the amount due to producers on wheat, in so far as final payments were concerned, was over $9 million and on coarse grains $146,000, and that there was a balance in adjustment payments on wheat and coarse grains of approximately $2,600,000, or a total of $11,792,000. For the year 1952 the amount shown as being due to producers is approximately $5,417,000.

While on the face of it this motion can cause no serious objection to be raised, it does not really meet the problem that faces the wheat board in connection with the amount held to the credit of producers. I realize, as the hon. member has said, that many of the amounts that are held are held to the credit of estates and have not been claimed. While I feel that this resolution, if carried, will have a favourable result in so far as it purports to establish scholarships, it does not meet the problem of the disposal of the amounts on hand.

I suggest through you, Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) that it must be a serious problem for the wheat board to have such large amounts on hand to the credit of producers whose addresses are not known and for which no claims have been made. Therefore I pass on to him a suggestion I have heard made on occasion, and no doubt it has been made to him before on many occasions, namely that the wheat board might follow a similar system to that followed by the chartered banks and from time to time advertise a list of those names to whose credit moneys are held by the wheat board. While the cost of such advertising might be considerable, I am sure many hundreds of thousands of dollars, if not millions, now unclaimed would go into the hands of the proper claimants.

One finds frequently in the practice of law, and particularly in the administration of estates, that those to whom moneys have been credited having passed away without leaving any record of having moneys to their credit, such claims are overlooked.

I feel that whether or not this motion is carried the hon. member has performed a fine function in bringing this subject before the house, because it does enable a discussion to take place as to the disposition of those funds, to the end that millions of dollars may be distributed among the proper claimants. I do not know what the latest figures are because the 1953 annual report is not available.

Some might say that there is negligence on the part of the individuals for whom these moneys are held. That is not my view at all. The position of these people is much the same as those who, having credit balances in the banks, leave the locality, pass away or somehow cease to realize that the credit is there for them. It is only through advertising that these credits become known. Certainly I got a surprise on one occasion when one of the chartered banks showed I had a balance of $10.50 on hand in one of its branches. I know I would not have realized it if publicity had not been given to the fact. I know many who have had large amounts and who have had the same experience.

So far as the disposal of the moneys is concerned, the hon. member has suggested that they be set aside to establish a scholarship fund to be awarded to the sons and daughters of prairie farmers attending universities in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. Generally speaking that is a very fine objective, and no one could take any serious objection to it. I do not know whether the farm organizations made the suggestion that is now placed before the house by the hon. member, or whether in making this suggestion he represents a considerable group of farmers within Saskatchewan. Certainly as a general principle there can be no objection, but if it is accepted I can see tremendous difficulties in the way of extending these benefits. I can see no reason for casting a vote against it, for at least it envisages providing some benefit from the moneys so held by the wheat board, but who is to be entitled to it? How is it to be disbursed and on what basis? All those things are merely matters of detail.

I rise to say that the motion has in it no serious objection that I can see. I feel it would be favourably received by people in general, having the objective in mind. I believe that a more serious problem faces the wheat board, and that is the need for an out and out advertising campaign setting out the moneys held for a period of at least three years in order to clear up this large amount of money that is today apparently unclaimed from the wheat board.

Mr. W. M. Johnson (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, there are several observations I should make in connection with this resolution. The first relates to the amount of money in the fund, and where the money would come from in the first place. I think it is interesting to go through the Canadian wheat board report for the crop year 1951-52, which gives the history of the payments which were outstanding, beginning with the 1940 crop account.

For the 1940 crop account the present total of outstanding certificates and cheques is $86,672.01; in the 1941 crop account, $38,444.99; in the 1942 crop account, $44,447.05. Now we come to the 1943 crop account, in which there is a significant increase to $178,481.11; in the 1944 crop account another increase to $209,246.14; in the 1945-49 pool account, the total amounted to $2,013,355.52; while in the 1950-51 pool account it amounted to $683,169.99, the total for that period being $3,253,816.81. During the period from August 1, 1952 to November 30, 1952, the board paid $1,115,531.94 in respect to its liability of $3,388,375.58, leaving a total outstanding at that period of $2,272,843.64. As the hon. member has pointed out, the figure would stand now at just about $2·5 million.

Now, going back to show where the funds would come from, we see that they may be from cheques for participation payments made out to farmers who are perhaps deceased. I think the board has a responsibility to try to find those who would inherit the estate and who would have a rightful claim against those funds. There are those who have moved out of the locality. There may be retired farmers who have moved to some of the larger centres or perhaps out to the balmy breezes of British Columbia. As I understand it, these cheques are sent out by mail. If the individual to whom the cheque is directed is not available in the locality, and the postmaster does not know where he is, I presume the cheque would be returned to the Canadian wheat board. The board would assume the cheque was undeliverable. I presume the board would make several attempts to deliver it to make certain that the individual was not just absent at that particular time.

One difficult point is that an individual may be entitled to a payment, and may be living at an adjacent point. He may have delivered grain during an open quota to a point some 15 miles distant from his residence, and the postmaster at that point would not be personally acquainted with him.

I think we are safe in saying that in all cases the individuals are unaware that there is a credit standing in their name. As the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) has pointed out, there should be an active campaign to inform the public about those who are entitled to these funds. During the years I have farmed in my district not once have I seen a list of such individuals who were entitled to payments from the Canadian wheat board. I do not say that such lists do not exist, but I have never seen them. I would suggest to the minister, then, that an extensive advertising program be carried out in the newspapers in these areas, setting out the names of individuals who have credits with the Canadian wheat board.

I do not think it should be left to the individual to write to the Canadian wheat board and inquire if there is a credit there. I notice the hon. member for Meadow Lake has put an arbitrary period of six years in his resolution, after which the funds would become available for a trust fund. It is pointed out also that further claims may be made at any time during that period. I would just question the six-year period. I think it would be more advisable to put it on a ten-year basis, since going back ten years would bring us to the 1942 crop year, where we still have a little more than $150,000 as a beginning, and we could carry on the program from there.

Assuming every possible effort has been made to locate the owners, I think the suggestion that funds be used for educational purposes is very commendable. They should be used to assist those who created them. One method suggested is that of a scholarship fund. I believe it might be well to say here that a relatively small number of the sons and daughters of farmers are able to take advantage of higher education. When I refer to "higher education" I might include high schools. Their services may be required on the farms, or they may be in isolated locations where they are unable to take advantage of high school education.

Therefore I would question the value of confining the assistance to university scholarships, which would afford an advantage to only a small segment of our agricultural population. Only a small proportion of farm personnel, or farm boys and girls, attend university. I think it is equally significant that a very small percentage of them return to the farms to impart the advantage of their knowledge to the local communities. In many instances the students follow non-agricultural lines of study. They may study to become doctors, dentists or lawyers, in which case their studies are of value to them as well as to agriculture, but not directly to the communities from which they have come. I say they are of value to agriculture because we must face the fact that, because of the increase in technology, fewer people are able to farm the same amount of land. Therefore some will be forced off the farms into other lines of endeavour. Anything we can do by way of assistance for them is certainly valuable.

I think a more direct method of spending these funds would be desirable. This could take the form of direct assistance to the communities, through farm organizations. It could provide funds for educational work. I think we are all aware of the significance and value of adult education and the effect it has upon the cultural practices of the farming communities. In my view if funds were made available for local organizations so that, for example, they could organize tours to experimental farms, where the farmers could see the most up-to-date farming techniques and where they could see the development of new varieties, we would do more for agriculture than by awarding scholarships in universities.

In my constituency we are very close to two first-class experimental farms. I refer to those at Swift Current and at Scott. On more than one occasion farmers in that area have organized themselves to tour these experimental stations, and they are very enthusiastic about what they see. Upon returning to their farms they try to put into practice some of the policies they have seen demonstrated. If various farm organizations had funds available to charter buses and organize tours so the farmers in the district would have the opportunity of seeing these demonstrations which otherwise would be denied to them, it would be to their advantage.

In the field of adult education we cannot be negligent of a simple matter such as weed control. It would be advantageous if the farmers could acquaint themselves with weeds and the techniques required for their eradication. In this way the productivity of the farms would be increased.

Just as an example I would point out that some years back an individual in Kindersley received a plant known as toad flax. It looks a good deal like snapdragon. He brought it home with him and planted it in his garden, thinking it to be a pretty flower. I have no doubt many hon. members from northern Saskatchewan will be familiar with toad flax and the damage it can do to land. I might say that today there is a small patch of this weed growing on the fair grounds at Kindersley, and I am sure if the farmers in the community were aware of the dangers from this weed they would be out there tomorrow morning shovelling off the snow and chopping out all they could find. If one goes about 150 miles north of there he can see the devastation that can be caused by such an innocent looking plant as toad flax.

Another aspect in connection with education in the rural areas with which we must concern ourselves is the desirability of encouraging boys' and girls' club work. If a local farm organization had the funds with which to sponsor such a club it would instil in the minds of boys and girls knowledge of good farming practices. They would be taught individual responsibilities, the value of good seed, the value of education and of companionship. The other 4-H clubs are of equal value; I am thinking of calf clubs, tractor clubs and others suited to the locality.

These are some aspects we must consider when the disposition of funds from the wheat board is before us. I agree with the underlying principle of the bill, that the funds should be utilized after every effort has been made to locate the owners. They should be used to provide assistance through scholarships and assistance to the local community. However, as the resolution is now worded it does not allow for assistance to the community, and I would therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden):

That the resolution be amended by inserting therein immediately after the words "earnings thereon" in the third last line, the following:

and by adding at the end of the said resolution the following:

"and (b) partly as a fund to be paid to bona fide farm organizations in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and the British Columbia block, for use in educational work among their own membership and other primary producers in those areas."

With this amendment the resolution would read:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of amending the Canadian Wheat Board Act to provide that, where producers of any grain sold or delivered during a pool period have been for six years or more entitled to receive from the board payments in respect thereof under certificates issued pursuant to the Canadian Wheat Board Act, or out of an equalization fund, and there is an undistributed balance remaining in the accounts of the board in respect of that grain, such undistributed balances be paid over to trustees who shall be instructed to pay claims as they are submitted, to invest the remainder in appropriate government securities, and to set aside the interest earnings thereon (a) partly as a scholarship fund to be awarded to the sons and daughters of prairie farmers attending the universities of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta and (b) partly as a fund to be paid to bona fide farm organizations in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and the British Columbia block, for use in educational work among their own membership and other primary producers in those areas.

These funds should be more widely advertised so that farmers would become aware of them and would have an opportunity to make their claims. I should like to see the resolution carried in the form I have suggested, so that something would be done to provide financial assistance to bona fide farm organizations to provide for adult education and assistance for boys' and girls' club work.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I must admit frankly that I have not given this matter a great deal of thought, but on the face of it I would support the general principle contained in the resolution, that after a certain period of time unclaimed balances held by the wheat board should be turned over to a board of trustees. This board would meet any claims made by farmers who were eligible to receive payment and the balance would be invested, the interest thereon being used for the purpose of providing scholarships for daughters and sons of farmers.

The first question that comes to my mind is whether this matter has been discussed with the various farm organizations, and what is their reaction to the suggestion. Surely if we are going to go ahead with a proposal of this kind farm organizations in the west should be consulted. They might be able to offer many suggestions with regard to this matter. It seems strange to me that we should go ahead with a motion of this kind without first getting their advice. If I remember rightly they did make some suggestions regarding the utilization of these funds in the past, but I forget just what it was. I do know that at the time I was not quite in accord with the suggestions they did make.

Another point that comes to my mind is in connection with the suggested period of six years. In view of the fact that the vast majority of payments are completed in about three years I wonder if it would be necessary to wait six years. The hon. member who preceded me suggested ten years, but I would go in the opposite direction and suggest that if at the end of three years every effort to find the owners of unclaimed moneys had been without success, then it should be paid over to the board of trustees. Those trustees would still be able to pay any claims that were made, and in the meantime the money could be invested and put to useful purposes.

When I say "useful purposes" I do not suppose that the money is actually lying idle. Perhaps the wheat board borrows it to pay operating expenses. I am not certain as to that, but I suppose there is nothing to stop the wheat board borrowing the money and using it to pay operating expenses and thus saving the interest they would have to pay if the money were borrowed from a chartered bank. Perhaps that is a point the hon. member would clarify if he replies.

I agree with the suggestion made by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) that greater efforts should be made to locate the owners of this money by advertising. I have never seen printed in a newspaper any list of names of people to whom balances are owing. If the names of farmers in each of the provinces were printed in some of the principal papers, even though the actual farmer who was entitled to receive payment did not see it some of his friends might, and perhaps they would know where the farmer was living and notify him that he had money coming to him. In that way it might be possible to get more of these unpaid balances paid directly to the farmers.

The amendment suggests that a certain amount of this money should be paid to farm organizations to be utilized for a number of community purposes. The danger in that suggestion is that the money might be spread too far and too thin, with the result that not much could be done for anybody. No doubt there is enough money at the present time to provide scholarships on quite a substantial scale if it were invested, but if you tried to use the money for many different purposes you might find you were unable to accomplish anything worth while.

Another point is what farm organizations would be eligible to receive this money. I imagine that the minute you start talking about making money available you will have requests from many bodies. There would be the Canadian Federation of Agriculture; there would be the three western farm unions, the wheat pools, the western livestock growers' association, the grain growers' association. I do not know just where you would stop making contributions to various organizations.

Personally if action of this kind is going to be taken I would prefer to support the resolution as it stands, with perhaps a change in the period of six years to three years. I do not see why we should hold the money for that length of time. The three-year period would permit the wheat board to try to get in touch with farmers by means of advertising.

On those conditions we will be quite prepared to support the resolution.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the subject matter of this resolution is one on which I think it would be helpful to have the views of a number of hon. members. The resolution suggests an amendment to the Canadian Wheat Board Act. I would point out that a similar resolution appeared on the order paper last session, moved by the then hon. member for Mackenzie, Mr. Ferrie. If I am not mistaken the wording was identical. The resolution was not reached or discussed as a resolution during that session, but I looked on it with a good deal of favour. As a matter of fact I helped Mr. Ferrie draft it, or at least suggested the wording.

During that session we did amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act and in doing so we made provision for an arrangement somewhat similar to that suggested by this resolution. We provided that after funds had been outstanding for six years they would be segregated in a separate account which could be used as determined by the governor in council on the recommendation of the wheat board. The first intention had been to be more specific and carry out the terms of the resolution in full. However, on consulting the farm organizations it was found that there were as many different ideas about how the fund should be used as there were farm organizations.

Since we could not at that time determine a policy which would be satisfactory to the representatives of the farmers, we decided that we would simply allocate the money in a fund and allow some time for the wheat board to work out a solution that would be reasonably satisfactory to those who speak with some authority for the western producers.

I think the amount of money involved is being somewhat exaggerated. After setting aside all outstanding balances that were six years old, that is six years from the date on which the payment was due, the amount that accrued to the fund totalled $458,344.37. Perhaps I should read this paragraph from what I said at that time, and I quote from page 3425 of Hansard of March 30, 1953:

> Every effort has been made to locate the persons to whom this money is due. Advertisements have been used. Letters have been sent. The help of the wheat pool organizations has been requisitioned to try to trace them down. The balances that it is proposed to set aside at the moment are those from the 1940 crop wheat account, the 1941 crop, the 1942 crop and the 1943 crop. The total of these four accounts is $247,289.78; and from the other operations, the 1942 crop oats and barley equalization fund, $58,905.57; and the 1943 crop oats equalization fund, $98,717.59 and the 1944 crop barley equalization fund, $52,431.63.

That all adds up to the amount I have given.

Mr. Nicholson: Has the minister the total amount?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The amount set aside was $458,344.37.

Mr. Argue: Has the minister the figures in the 1945-49 wheat account? It seems to me a substantial amount is involved.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): They will be given as they become due, and they will be put into this fund. I am speaking of the amount already in the fund; that is the payments that are six years or more overdue. The reason for the six-year period is that debts of this kind become outlawed after that time under the ordinary civil law. However, debts owed by the wheat board are never outlawed. Someone spoke to me recently about a very old account—I hesitate to say how old it was but they came across it going through the papers of an estate—which indicated there was something payable by the wheat board. The account was rendered and paid without question. Under the provisions of this fund there is no suggestion of outlawing accounts that are more than six years old. If valid accounts are sent in, no matter how old, they will be paid.

As I said before, the action required by this resolution has already been taken. I think it is section 29 (a) of the wheat board act which was enacted at the last session of this house, which is the relevant section so far as the setting up of the fund is concerned. The subject matter for discussion, and the only subject matter for discussion, is who will benefit from the fund. Obviously the money belongs to no one in particular, except that it came from the producers of western Canada and it should be used for some project that will benefit as many producers of western Canada as possible.

One solution was that as the funds accrue they should be distributed as part of the current wheat pool, in other words that the amount accruing to the fund should be included in the receipts of the current wheat pool and distributed in that way. That did not seem to be equitable. The producers who were contributing to that particular pool had no individual claim on this money, and it seemed quite wrong to distribute the money in that manner, although that was the suggestion made by one pool organization.

I rather like the suggestion made in this resolution. I have never seen a better proposal, namely that it be used to produce a better generation of farmers by sending the young people of western Canada from the farms of western Canada to the agricultural schools of western Canada. That I believe is a very desirable way of using these funds. I hope general agreement can be obtained to that end, and I hope the wheat board will in time suggest that the funds be used in that manner.

I must say that I intensely dislike the method suggested by the amendment, that we try to devote this money to farm organizations. Farm organizations are already legion, and I think if we attempted to use these funds to support them we would have many more to support. I think that would be the worst possible and certainly the most contentious way the fund could be used, because the share of each organization would, I think, always be in dispute.

However, since this resolution is to amend the wheat board act, and since the amendment has already been moved, I hope this discussion will not be brought to a vote. We have a resolution to amend the wheat board act, and an amendment to the resolution. We are not going to amend the wheat board act, because it has already been amended. I hope we can have a discussion on the sole remaining issue, that is as to how the money shall be used. When the discussion is finished I think perhaps a very good way to end the evening would be to withdraw both the resolution and the amendment and send Hansard out to the wheat board as a basis for their examination of the proper way to use the funds in this account.

Mr. Harrison: After hearing the explanation of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the necessary amendment to the wheat board act was passed at the last session of the house I am quite amenable to his suggestion that I withdraw the resolution. Before doing so, however, I think it might be well if I discuss for a moment the amendment that has been made and the main reasons for—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I suggest the house should be told that if my hon. friend speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is speaking to the amendment, not the main motion.

Mr. Harrison: I am speaking to the amendment, Mr. Speaker, and I must say I am not much more amenable to it than was the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Several objections came to my mind when the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Johnson) was making his suggestion. The fact is that most farm organizations have ways of raising funds and most of them have funds at the present time. But the position of the daughter or son of a farmer who may not have ways of raising funds is quite different, and it is important that if they want to go to college they should have some means of raising funds so they can do so, as many of them otherwise would not have the opportunity. A group organization of farmers, on the other hand, who wanted to go to an experimental farm would have no difficulty in doing so because there are few of them who do not have some means of transportation, or their neighbours have some, whereby they can join in these excursions. Also, farm organizations generally have fairly adequate means of raising funds, and they are in a far better position to do so than the individual child of a farmer.

That is the main objection I see to the proposal. Speaking on the amendment, the member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) said there were so many farm organizations that the fund would be spread a little bit thin. On the other hand, the fund could provide fairly good scholarships for children, and provide much more benefit than it would to any of these farm organizations.

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I am indebted to the hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Harrison) for placing this resolution on the order paper, and I am sure all members appreciate the fact that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, with his great variety of interests, has been able to give constructive thought to this problem. I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce was on strong ground when he suggested that this money should be spent in western Canada in the interests of agriculture in that area.

To support the general proposal advanced by my colleague the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Johnson) I should like to say that I believe that adult education will require a good deal of financial assistance. The hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Harrison) cannot hope to suggest this proposal as a substitute for federal aid for education. As the Minister of Trade and Commerce pointed out, the sum is not going to be large. The balance he mentioned, namely $458,000 invested at 3 per cent, would give something less than $14,000 per year. If that amount were to be divided among the three prairie provinces, none would get a large amount.

I would suggest that the amount spent on university education should be earmarked for research for specific work. I think no useful purpose would be served if a student went to university and later went to California, New York city or Washington. I suggest that for every year of tuition a student accepted from the fund, one year at least should be spent on research work in the area where he lives or where he studies, with a view to solving some of the problems that I should like to submit for the consideration of the house.

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture, for example, in its December bulletin sets out the position of the farmer in August, 1953, as compared with the position in August, 1949. It shows the position to be as follows:

> Taxes, increase 16·4 per cent; Farm wages, increase 22·6 per cent; Farm machinery, increase 25 per cent; Building materials, increase 31 per cent; Gas, oil, etc., increase 10 per cent; Feed, decrease ·6 per cent; Fertilizer, increase 28·8 per cent; Seed, decrease 5 per cent; Farm family living costs, increase 17 per cent.

With those drastic increases in farm operating costs, on the next page we find this statement:

> Figuring 1949 as a basis of 100, the purchasing power of net farm income in 1953 works out at 90.

While everyone dealing in farm machinery, building materials, fertilizer and feed is able to pass on the increase to the consumer, the farmer is in the unfortunate position that his net position is worse in 1953 than it was in 1949.

In one of the other federation bulletins it is indicated that a great deal of educational work should be done in all parts of Canada in order to help people to get a little bit better sense of values. Here is what is stated:

> Let's take the year 1950. In this year the people of Canada spent a total of $1 billion on tobacco and alcoholic beverages. We could compare this with the total value of the wheat crop of that year at $712 million, or the total value of all cereal crops of 1950, including wheat, oats, barley, rye, at $1·2 billion. Or we could compare it with the total value of milk production at $432 million.

That is in contrast with a thousand millions of dollars spent on tobacco and alcoholic beverages. I submit that here would be a field for a university student to do graduate work, with a view to helping the people of Canada get a better sense of values, so that agriculture might get a larger share of the consumers' dollars. In 1952 our people spent $1,243 million on tobacco and alcoholic beverages, and on milk they spent $360 million. We find our expenditure on milk going down and our expenditure on alcoholic beverages and tobacco going up. I think all the people in the prairie provinces who have contributed to this fund that we are discussing tonight would agree that here is a field for some work by some students in some of the universities in western Canada.

The editor of the Western Producer had something to say in an editorial entitled "Danger Signals". In it he pointed out that in the United States for 1954 the program for agriculture calls for reducing drastically the level of support prices, thus discouraging production and also enforcing a substantial cut in acreage sown to crops in surplus. The comment is this:

> Here we have a situation which should give pause not only to the Americans but to the whole free world. For surely it affords the most disturbing and distressing proof of the complete bankruptcy of our economic system.

It points out that the crying need of the world is for food, and goes on to say:

> It would be wearisome repetition to quote the pronouncements of the food and agriculture organization and other authorities, showing that more than half of the people on the outside of the iron curtain are always hungry—never get a decent meal. On the radio every day our hearts are wrung by appeals for donations of scraps of food to feed the starving. At the same time the farmers of the United States have demonstrated what they and farmers elsewhere can do when given adequate stimulus. They can produce food in such abundance that it becomes a problem to find storage space for it. Then what happens? Well, we see it actually happening right now in the United States. Instead of welcoming the abundance as a God-given respite for the starving multitudes, a frantic effort is made to cut back production. We have the food and there is more where it came from but how to get it to those who need it—that's the problem that stumps the experts. So, may God forgive us, we are proposing to solve the problem of abundance by reducing production, thus creating an artificial scarcity. What more devastating indictment of our economic system could even its most fanatical critic conceive?

That is in the United States. But in Canada not so long ago we took our part in keeping down production. The editorial continues:

> It would be a tragic mistake to run away with the idea that these matters interest only one country or affect only the farmers, that the problem is not of major proportions, and, anyway, is only temporary. In plain truth it is one of the principal symptoms of the disease that is killing civilization. For if civilization should perish and freedom die it will be because of the rot within it. The average man does not take fire from eloquent exhortations that it is his duty to defend "our way of life" with his own life if necessary. Wrongly, no doubt, having enjoyed free institutions all his life he takes them for granted like the air he breathes. He judges the value of "our way of life" by its economic performance and because he has himself, in so many instances, experienced the corroding effects of poverty in the midst of plenty, he judges that it has been a miserable failure.

I therefore submit, Mr. Speaker, that the problem of having so much food in some parts of the world and so many people going hungry is a matter to which it would be well worth while having a few young western Canadians devote some post-graduate work, in order to see if in the next generation a better job can be done than has been done in the past.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

In support of the proposal made by the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Johnson), the educational work that would be done by the farm organizations might be the bringing of a man like Dr. Keenleyside to the annual convention of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, as was done in Victoria last year. Dr. Keenleyside opened his remarks with this comment:

> Why is it, for example, that although the most famous philosophers, statesmen and poets have praised farming as the ideal mode of life, and the farmer as the most virtuous of men, history proves by endless repetition that the farmer is almost always the last member of the community to receive political and economic recognition? It is a tradition that farmers should have soft words and hard knocks; flattery but seldom a fair deal.

In commenting on some of the problems about which farmers are thinking and to which we all have to give consideration he has this to say on page 7:

> Over half the people in the world are illiterate, thus providing fertile soil for the weeds and tares of superstition, prejudice and fanaticism. Over half the people of the world are ill, though most of them could be cured and many of the most prevalent diseases could be permanently eradicated . . . Most of the people in the world are hungry most of the time, yet by applying even our present knowledge to the problems of production and distribution we could ensure reasonable standards of nutrition for all.

Therefore bringing men from the food and agriculture organization, the world health organization, UNESCO and other international and national organizations would no doubt create a desire and interest among all our people to face up to these problems and solve them.

I believe these problems can be solved. I do not think it is to be expected that the farmers of this country should live for all time in a position where roughly 20 people out of 100 get 12 per cent of the wealth produced by all the people. Therefore I submit that some of our young people from the west should be encouraged to do post-graduate work in our universities. I would not limit it to our own, but I would suggest that one of the terms of accepting a scholarship should be that an equal amount of time would be spent in trying to evolve solutions for these problems.

In our province we have a new medical college that has been completed and is now operating. In ten years time I think we will certainly have the best medical college in Canada. But it is going to cost the people of our province at least $50,000 for every medical doctor turned out. We do not begrudge that, but I do not think it can be expected that the people of Saskatchewan should turn out the best qualified young medical doctors merely to have them go to the United States or even to eastern or far western Canada, when the shortage of doctors is so acute in our own province. I think it is a fair rider to attach to the granting of scholarships—and we all seem to agree on the question—that those who accept funds should be required to devote some time and thought to trying to make a contribution toward the solving of the agricultural problems I have mentioned.

Finally, I should like to suggest that for quite some time education, health, transportation and markets will be the four major problems of the prairie provinces. With respect to the field of education, inasmuch as the federal authority has the power to tax all the people of the country I think it must participate in that field in order to see that every Canadian has the best available education. As I pointed out with respect to health, I think it is unfair to the people of Saskatchewan to have to pay to train doctors at the very high expense I have mentioned, when there is nothing to prevent these doctors from practising anywhere in Canada or the world. If these doctors are going to be citizens of the world I think at least all the people of Canada should participate in the cost of training them.

The same goes for transportation. The federal government is in a position where it takes the cream of automotive taxation money. People on the prairies wear out cars and help to channel funds into the federal treasury through corporation taxes. I think negotiations between the federal and provincial authorities would be quite justified for the purpose of bringing about federal government participation in those fields of activity which in the past, in the horse and buggy age, were thought to be fields for which the provinces were entirely responsible. Therefore I hope some of these funds can be devoted to research work, with a view to finding a solution for some of the problems that are perplexing the prairie provinces.

Mr. W. A. Tucker (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, the minister has stated that the real purpose of this resolution can be served by hearing from hon. members as to ways in which this money might be spent. I suggest to the minister that there is another purpose in the resolution which is quite important, too. In section 5 of the act amending the Canadian Wheat Board Act passed last year we find the following:

> Any balance transferred to the separate account pursuant to subparagraph (ii) of paragraph (a) of subsection 1 shall be used for such purposes as the governor in council, upon the recommendation of the board, may deem to be for the benefit of producers.

In other words the governor in council has to appropriate the money on the recommendation of the wheat board. I suggest for the consideration of the minister that the wheat board is very busy with the problems involved in the marketing of wheat, and that it is going outside its own field when you ask it to try to decide in what way this money could be spent in the best interests of producers. It might have to decide between competing claims for this money, and the board might not want to do that in view of the fact that it is supposed to serve producers with respect to marketing their grain. It might not want to adjudicate between conflicting claims.

I suggest that the resolution should be considered by the government from the standpoint of the proposed setting up of a board to advise the governor in council as to the use of this money, and that in view of the fact it is going to spend money which belongs essentially to the producers of western Canada such a board should be very closely in touch with what might be considered in the best interests of the producers of western Canada. The personnel of such a board might consist, for example, of the presidents of western universities or the deans of agriculture of the western universities. If such a board were constituted it would doubtless come forward in a very short time with some suggestion to the government as to how this money might be used to the best advantage of the producers of western Canada.

The difficulty with the present legislation is that the wheat board is so busy with its normal work that it does not have the time, is not set up to investigate and would not want to weigh competing claims. I suggest, whether this resolution carries or is withdrawn, that the government should consider amending the legislation to put the matter of recommendation as to how this money should be used in the hands of a board of trustees constituted perhaps of the heads of the western universities or the deans of agriculture of the western universities. If the matter is placed in their hands there are so many worth-while matters that would be helpful to western agriculture about which they would know that there would be no delay in coming forward with suggestions as to ways in which this money might be used.

I think that is what the mover of the motion had in mind when he spoke about using this money for scholarships to be awarded to the sons and daughters of prairie farmers attending the universities of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. I fancy that not only would he have in mind assisting the children of prairie farmers as such, but in addition that the work they might do would also be furthering the best interests of the farmers of western Canada. It is for that reason I suggest that this board should be composed of the deans of agriculture of the western universities, because in awarding these scholarships they would have in mind the people who would be likely to carry on for western agriculture. The proposed scholarships probably would be post-graduate research scholarships to enable research to be carried on in some field that needed work done in it, and for which there was not the necessary money.

I do, therefore, heartily commend the hon. member for Meadow Lake for moving this resolution. If we are going to have steps taken without delay to make use of these moneys, we need to put the matter into the hands of a special board set up for the purpose, and leave that board to deal with the way in which this money might be used. I would think the wheat board would be pleased to be relieved of this duty that is placed upon it by last year's amendment. I suggest that the government give consideration to further amending the wheat board act to provide for advice by this board, to be set up somewhat along the line I have mentioned. It seems to me that a board such as that would be better able to decide how best to use this money than we sitting here and making decisions more or less offhand.

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): Mr. Speaker, the only reason that prompts me to take part in this discussion is a fact which has been mentioned by many of the people who have spoken, that the subject is of interest to western farmers. Therefore I should like to say a few words in support of the principle involved. I heartily agree with the proposed disposition of this money.

Someone suggested that possibly it could be used to better advantage by educating the rest of the people of Canada as to the farmers' problems. I feel, however, that possibly the resolution does not go quite far enough. I have thought that possibly we could go a little farther with it. In view of the remarks by the Minister of Trade and Commerce a few minutes ago in that regard, that does not seem to be the case. I should like to read the resolution as proposed by the farm union of Alberta; the British Columbia bloc; the Saskatchewan farmers' union; the Manitoba farmers' union, and the Ontario farmers' union in their submission to the Canadian wheat board. They say:

> We would recommend, after moneys have been unclaimed in the Canadian wheat board funds for a period of six years that a special trust account be set up under a board of trustees approved by the farmers, that a portion of these moneys and the annual interest accrued thereon be made available to the three farm unions periodically on a basis of and in proportion to the amount of deliveries of grain during these years from each province.

This again brings up the fact that there are a great many farm organizations in western Canada which would undoubtedly lay claim to this money. I was a little disappointed on learning that the amount involved was not as great as some of us had been led to believe. I believe there are some 14 different farm organizations in western Canada which undoubtedly would lay claim to a part of this money. Nevertheless the idea is good, and it is something that has been proposed by other branches of agriculture. For instance, the stock organizations have been proposing that the horned cattle fund be turned over to the universities to carry on work in connection with livestock.

A year ago I had an opportunity of discussing this subject with Dr. Bell of the University of Saskatchewan who, incidentally, is Canada's outstanding man in the field of animal nutrition. He was deploring the fact that trained personnel were not available in the field of animal nutrition to carry out very important work which needed to be done. He also deplored the fact that facilities for carrying out the work were inadequate, and much time had to be consumed in carrying out particular research. It was felt that this did not apply only to universities in Saskatchewan but to many universities with which Dr. Bell had been acquainted. I know it can be argued that the money is being used to the advantage of farmers now. However, I feel that it could be used to even greater advantage. I had hoped that possibly we would have access to some of the principal in the hands of the wheat board, but as I said a moment ago the minister indicated that was not to be had.

I am sorry I cannot go along with the hon. member for Kindersley and support what he said about the lists of names of men who had money in this fund in order to locate them. I know that at my grain delivery point in Tisdale I have often seen lists of names of men who had money in this particular fund. When I heard the hon. member for Kindersley I thought possibly what I had seen was not a directive from the wheat board, but the minister said a moment ago that the board had received co-operation in posting these names. I presume, therefore, there is some neglect on the part of local elevator agencies when these names are not posted.

However, I should like to add that possibly these names should be listed once a year in the local farm newspapers in order to do everything possible to see that these men are notified they have money in the fund. I believe there are a great many retired farmers who would be quite anxious to give that money to a scholarship that might further the aims of the agriculturists in western Canada. I believe that is a possibility that has some merit.

A moment ago I mentioned that no decision has yet been made about what to do with the horned cattle fund. I imagine that it will be turned over to this work, regardless of how small the fund may be. As the hon. member for Mackenzie stated, a fund of $14,000 or $15,000 would help. We are in hopes that it will be more than that, but even that amount could be used to great advantage.

I should like to mention just one phase of research work which is carried on in the University of Saskatchewan which could use money if it were made available in this way. I am thinking of the work done in connection with rhinitis, a disease of swine. I was out to the experimental farm in Ottawa recently in connection with research that is going on at the farm at Lacombe. Today there is absolutely no clue to a possible solution to this problem. In talking to Dr. Bell I was convinced that the solution will not be found until they have more trained personnel who are prepared to take on some of the more technical work.

I must go along with the hon. member for Kindersley, who has said that practical farm problems could be attacked if some of this money were made available. I might point out that a royal commission has been set up in Saskatchewan to deal with rural life. I am sure that before many months we are going to see that the position of the farmers in western Canada will have to be studied. It will require a great deal more study than can be given to it by one royal commission. Perhaps some of this money could be spent along those lines.

I think the idea in the resolution is sound, and I support the principle of it. Some move along this line has been long overdue, and I was happy to hear the Minister of Trade and Commerce speak as he did in support of this plan. I do not think I can add anything more at the moment. I think all hon. members are agreed that the principle is sound. In spite of what has been said by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and by the hon. member for Meadow Lake who sponsors the resolution, I still feel the amendment has merit, and I shall support it.

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, no one I am sure will disagree with this resolution, dealing as it does with the problem of education in the rural parts of the prairies. It does make a small contribution to the subject of education in those areas. In our prairie provinces we are faced with many educational problems, the most important of which is the fact that only a small percentage of the rural young people take advantage of the opportunities offered in higher education.

The resolution would seem to offer some assistance in this direction, in giving encouragement by way of scholarships to the group of young people eligible to take advantage of higher education. Before coming to the house it was my opportunity to be in touch annually with most of the high schools in the western part of Manitoba, as well as southeastern Saskatchewan. I found that notwithstanding the increased enrolments in our universities and colleges since the war, it is still true that there are some rural communities that never send any of their high school graduates to institutions of higher learning, chiefly because the tradition of the pursuit of higher learning has not yet been generally established in the rural parts of the prairies.

I do not know the statistics for the provinces outside Manitoba, but I do know that some two years ago statistics for registrations at the University of Manitoba, as between rural and urban students, stood at a ratio of something like 75 per cent urban and 25 per cent rural. I am sure the same pattern would be established in the other prairie provinces.

Going a little further in this matter the Minister of Trade and Commerce suggested that the key problem in connection with the resolution was to decide how the money could best be disbursed for educational purposes. I would suggest that two critical problems in the rural west are those of entrance scholarships and the great need for encouraging research activities.

In connection with entrance scholarships, I am sure there are many eligible young people, so far as academic standards are concerned, who would carry on their studies in our institutions of higher learning, if the necessary financial stimulus was provided to get them over the initial hurdle. Even though on the prairies tuition fees and general living expenses at our colleges and universities may not be as high as they are in the eastern part of Canada, it is still true, unfortunately, that the expense of higher education is sufficiently great to discourage many students who have demonstrated high academic ability in their high school education.

I am one who believes that any student who fits into that rare category of exceptional academic ability should have the opportunity to carry on his or her educational interests in a chosen field. There are many scholarship schemes already available in our prairie universities and colleges, but I do not think the demand could ever be exhausted. When we consider the relatively small sum that would be available from the fund mentioned in the resolution—I believe it amounts to $14,000 a year—I am sure there would be no difficulty whatsoever in apportioning the amount equitably among the three prairie provinces.

Therefore I would strongly recommend that in addition to setting aside part of this fund for research purposes, consideration be given to making some of it available for entrance scholarships. I would not leave the matter at the entrance level, because I know from personal experience that we have students who succeed in meeting the necessary costs in the first year of higher education, only to find it necessary at that time to withdraw. I suggest that any student who in his first year at university has demonstrated exceptional ability should be permitted to draw on the fund to assist in the continuation of his studies, if financial need demands such action.

I do not need to stress the great necessity for research. That has already been dealt with by several hon. members. In view of the relatively small amount involved, however, I suggest it might be wise to restrict the use of these moneys to agricultural research. The surplus funds result from wheat-producing activities, and it seems only reasonable to me that such money should be used, so far as research work is concerned, to deal with problems most closely related to the agricultural field.

Since world war II many veterans from western Canada have used their re-establishment credits to train for specialized agricultural research. I have friends who otherwise would not have gone beyond high school, who have taken their doctorates in agricultural research. Many of them are now becoming active in this important field. But these funds are drying up, and it might well be that as money becomes available through the surplus wheat board fund it could be used to fill the gap left with the completion of the D.V.A. rehabilitation program.

Turning now to the amendment, I have noticed that many hon. members who have spoken for the group that has brought forward this amendment, discovering the relative smallness of the sum involved, have begun to doubt the value of the amendment, providing that the money should be distributed among the various farm organizations. If the interest from this fund would not be more than $14,000 a year, there would be little merit in such a recommendation.

As far as general educational facilities are concerned I should like to point out that the extension departments of the three prairie universities are making an extremely valuable contribution to these activities. I refer particularly to the University of Manitoba because I have a most intimate knowledge of the activities being carried on there. The University of Manitoba has within the past few years reorganized its extension activities and appointed a full-time director of adult education. During the past two or three years its activities in connection with education among the adult population have increased at an impressive rate.

I know this work has only begun. It is hoped that regional directors of adult education will be appointed and scattered throughout the province of Manitoba to make the contribution that is so necessary in all phases of adult education, which of course would include subjects of agricultural interest. In addition to all this we have our agricultural representatives who make an excellent contribution in the field of popular adult education.

I was glad to hear the Minister of Trade and Commerce indicate that the necessary amendment making it possible to implement this motion had already been made to the wheat board act. In the strongest way possible I would suggest that something be done at the earliest moment to implement the recommendations being made here this evening as provided for in the wheat board act.

I believe it was the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) who suggested that an advisory board be established immediately to deal with the details involved in a program of this kind. I agree heartily with that suggestion. It seems logical to me that the deans of agriculture of the respective prairie universities would be the men best qualified to deal with specific recommendations.

I have one further suggestion to make. If it ever becomes difficult to decide who should be eligible for assistance from this fund I am sure the farm organizations, especially the 4-H clubs, could assist in the process of selecting the young people who would benefit most under this worthy program.

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, if I were offering any objection to this resolution I think perhaps it would be that no reference to British Columbia is made in it. If I were offering an amendment I would suggest that the last two lines should read:

—the sons and daughters of prairie farmers attending the universities of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia.

While many hon. members may not have forgotten, perhaps they have overlooked the fact that quite a substantial amount of wheat is grown in the Peace river district of British Columbia, and to no small extent in the Creston valley district in my own riding.

There is perhaps an even more important point that has been overlooked in connection with this resolution. Where are the farmers who originally were entitled to this money which is now with the wheat board? I think it is inconceivable that the majority of them are still farming, because they have been alert to the fact that money was available and perhaps would be to their credit in the records of the wheat board. It is my opinion that a large number of the producers, either young or old, have migrated to British Columbia and retired. No doubt if advertisements were run in the British Columbia papers it would be found that a large number of claims would come from that province. If they did not come from the farmers themselves, undoubtedly there would be children of those producers who should be in a position, just as much as the children of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta farmers, to benefit from the terms of this proposed resolution.

This debate has pointed out one thing that we have always feared in connection with federal domination in the field of education. In the various resolutions that have been brought forward in this house requesting federal aid for education it has been pointed out that it is impossible to give substantial aid without there being some direction. As the hon. member for Mackenzie has indicated already, the C.C.F. party would wish, if these funds were set aside and controlled by federal legislation, to have strings attached. They are going to designate where the students should go, that they should not go to the United States or from province to province. It is just another indication of where we are going to head when we get into this particular field.

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, as seconder of the resolution I should like to point out that apparently the amendment is the only part that is of much value, since what is proposed by the resolution has already been provided for by an amendment to the act. All that can be done now is to have the wheat board recommend to the governor in council what should be done with the money available. The governor general in council can then be influenced by recommendations from the board and it is up to us, I suppose, to let the board know what we as members of the house feel, and the board can pass on these recommendations to the governor in council. Since the minister himself is head of the wheat board I suppose the thing is pretty well cut and dried in any event.

Our amendment asks that a portion of the money which became available through this fund should be distributed to farm organizations throughout western Canada so they can carry on educational programs within their own organizations and among their own membership to the benefit of the people generally in their area, and I do not think we can use it for a much better purpose.

The educational program outlined here is quite good, and I would support the request of the hon. member who spoke last, that some benefits be made available to those people in that part of British Columbia who made contributions to this fund. Certainly they should be included in the whole set-up.

With regard to farm organizations and their educational work, anyone who has followed what has been done in the west among farmers who in the past have contributed this money and to whom it really belongs would know that ever since the inception of the old united farmers of Canada and ever since the organization of the Saskatchewan wheat pool they have set aside certain funds for carrying on educational work among farmers in the rank and file of their organizations. I do not think you will find a better informed rank and file among the agricultural population in any part of Canada than among the people of the west who constantly have these matters before them and who constantly study them. These organizations can speak with one voice, can agree on matters of principle and obtain agreement on what action should be taken and then strive toward their objective.

At the present time you have growing in western Canada one of the finest farm organizations that was ever developed, and that is the farmers' union. The Saskatchewan branch of the farmers' union held a convention in the city of Regina in December last, and they had 1,400 delegates from all parts of that province. At that convention they threshed out the problems facing western farmers and obtained the facts with regard to present and future markets, and in relation to the present Canadian surplus. They carry on research work, but they are hampered to a large extent because there are not sufficient funds available in order to study the various forms of farm organization and development; the marketing of livestock; the future needs of the world in agriculture; and what they can do to adjust their production under existing circumstances so they can meet what the world needs.

I do not think there could be a better use made of the funds that become available than in this fashion, so these organizations can be assisted in carrying on that kind of research. I am sure these groups would heartily endorse a proposal that money of this kind should be made available to them on a membership basis to carry on educational programs. After all, the welfare of Canada depends on the welfare of its people and its producers, and if these people know what the world's needs are and can adjust their production to meet the world's needs then agricultural problems and problems of surplus can be taken care of. It would ease the way for the future. You would have a better informed population, and the rank and file would know what was required.

I hope the minister will change his opinion with regard to the value of farm organizations. I do not think this money would be spread too thinly. I believe farm organizations would get together and decide where the money could be spent on the kind of research work that would be of value to them all. I think the Saskatchewan wheat pool, the Saskatchewan farmers' union, the Canadian farmers' union and the farmers' union of Manitoba are all working together and making a splendid contribution to the future welfare of their people. I do not believe these people, whose money this really is, would want anything better than that a large portion of it should be used to carry on the work of research and education among the farm organizations in the west.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I cannot hope in the short time left to make a contribution that would be of any value in this debate. I did intend to ask the hon. member from Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) a question. Perhaps I may be permitted to ask that question through you, Mr. Speaker. When the hon. member advocated the inclusion of British Columbia, did he mean that this fund should be spent for the benefit of the province or the people in the province in proportion to the amount of contributions by the province? Was that his idea and is it his intention that British Columbia should have its share on that basis?

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker, it is my contention that there are a large number of retired prairie farmers both young and old who have contributed a large amount to this fund, and I think they should share in the fund in proportion to their contribution. That is, if there are farmers who have retired and are living in British Columbia they should not be overlooked. If that would be difficult to work out, then let it be on the basis that British Columbia farmers who have made very great contributions would be paid on a per capita basis.

Mr. R. J. Wood (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say a brief word on this motion and on the amendment. I think the setting up of a fund as suggested by the hon. member for Meadow Lake is a very good idea, and I want to congratulate him for having proposed this motion. I think it should be borne in mind that this is a fund that has accumulated with the wheat board and is the result entirely of the efforts of the grain producers of the three prairie provinces; that this fund by which it is suggested we create scholarships would be set up on interest accumulated on securities to be bought by the board that would be appointed to look after the fund. That fund would provide scholarships for boys and girls of farmers of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, to enable them to study in the colleges of these three provinces.

Very important research work has been done in plant and cereal fields in years gone by and through that research, particularly in regard to the problem of rust, farmers in the west have saved millions of dollars. I know a young man from my constituency by the name of Leonard Shebeske who took up research work before the war and followed it up after the war under a similar scholarship which he obtained, and through hard work he is now a professor at the Manitoba college and head of the cereal and plant research work there. If a fund such as that suggested in this motion were set up to encourage other young farm boys and girls to follow this type of work I think it would prove to be very desirable.

Just recently we had in this house an announcement by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that we have now what is known as Selkirk 15B rust-resistant wheat available in small quantities to farmers in Manitoba and eastern Saskatchewan at $5 a bushel. In the Winnipeg Free Press a couple of days ago I noticed a report to the effect that there is a big demand for this same wheat across the border in the United States at $100 a bushel, and that it is not available there. This gives a little idea of the value of research work of this kind.

The losses from rust in the western prairie provinces have been very great in the past. Back in 1935 I think the losses amounted to over $30 million; but, through research, losses last year amounted to approximately $8 million. As I say, through research these losses are becoming less year by year. Now with the introduction of this Selkirk 15B rust-resistant wheat the losses will be still smaller.

I think it is commendable that a fund of this kind should be set up to permit research work on plants and cereals in the universities. In view of the fact that this money has accumulated from the grain producers of the prairie provinces, I think it is proper that it should be spent to the benefit of the grain producers of those provinces. I believe the suggestion in the amendment to divide the money among the farm unions of the prairie provinces would just create a lot of trouble.

Mr. Argue: In what way?

Mr. Wood: The idea might be commendable, but we have many farm organizations in western Canada; and I would not want to be a member of any board which had to decide how that money should be divided. If that money could be divided without any trouble the idea might be commendable. I believe the idea of setting up a fund to give to boys and girls from the farms of the prairie provinces scholarships in the colleges of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, in order to follow this class of work of research and the like, is highly commendable. Therefore I consider that this motion deserves the support of the members of this house.

Mr. Argue: Question.

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Halifax): I have followed this debate, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Argue: Do not talk it out.

Mr. Dickey: —with a great deal of interest, as have the other members of the house. It has certainly served very well the purpose indicated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in that it has resulted in a number of members expressing fully and frankly the views they hold in connection with this matter, which is one of some concern.

My interest in the problem is not a practical one in the sense of my representing a constituency in which live and operate a number of producers who have a direct interest in this fund. My connection with it started when it became my duty some time ago to look through the files and see what had been done about this particular problem in the past. I must say that it was a highly interesting study.

In his remarks the hon. member for Rosthern suggested that the wheat board, being extremely busy with their business of selling wheat, should not be asked to give consideration to a problem of this kind. To the hon. member and to the house I should like to say that from the files it is evident that the wheat board have taken a real interest in this particular matter and that they have found time to give it considerable study and careful consideration. I believe they have agreed in principle with the suggestion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the interest from these funds should perhaps be used for purposes of education.

However, there is one thing that I think should be made clear, and it is this. Up to the present time the principal consideration has been in connection with the employment of the funds that are realized by way of interest on the principal amounts that have been and are still held for the persons actually entitled to them, namely the producers who are entitled to these participation payments but who, for one reason or another, have not received them.

The system is that the board keep a record of the participation—the deliveries—of the various producers, and they do not consider any of these funds as undistributed until the final payment of the pool has been made. Then the funds are considered as undistributed but are held for six years in the general funds of the board and, of course, are available to the producer whenever he comes forward and asks for payment.

Then as a result of the amendment to the wheat board act passed by this house at the last session, the act now authorizes the wheat board to pay into a special separate account the amounts which are regarded as undistributed. These funds are still held with the idea and the hope that some day the person or persons really entitled to those funds, as owners, will come forward and collect them. For that reason no serious consideration has been given to disturbing the principal amount of these funds. However, it is recognized that it would be valuable to find some practical means of employing the moneys that accrue by way of interest to the benefit of producers of western Canada. That is really the problem that has to be solved.

Mr. Speaker, as it is ten o'clock—

Mr. Knowles: You did it. It is ten o'clock.

Mr. Dickey: —may I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Dickey the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow we shall consider first the amendment to the Northwest Territories acts, and then the Criminal Code. Should we complete that business, we shall proceed with consideration of the bills standing in the name of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham), with respect to the boundary between the provinces of Ontario and Manitoba, and with respect to the Explosives Act.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, January 19, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

THE LATE CHARLES DELMAR COYLE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it was with deep regret that we learned just a few hours ago that another member of this house had quite unexpectedly passed away. I refer to Mr. Charles Delmar Coyle, the hon. member for Elgin, who was with us last week and whom I think most of us regarded as enjoying good health.

Mr. Coyle was born in Kinglake, Ontario, in 1887, and educated there. He was a farmer and tobacco grower, and he also found time to render outstanding service to his fellow citizens in his community. This service included that of occupying the positions of reeve of Bayham township and warden of Elgin county.

He was first elected to the House of Commons for the constituency of Elgin in 1945, and successfully contested that seat in both elections since that date.

He took a keen interest in the work of parliament and made a real contribution to the work of the committees of which he was a member. In fact, I understand he expected as recently as yesterday to be with us today, and to attend meetings with officials of the government. He always worked hard and conscientiously to serve the best possible interests of his constituency and of the country. That his efforts were appreciated is well indicated by the fact that he was returned at the last election with a substantial majority. During his lifetime he established a fine reputation for his industry and public-spiritedness and for his personal integrity.

I should like to extend to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and to members of his party our sincere sympathy in the loss of a valuable member; and to Mrs. Coyle and her family our very sincere condolences in her and their bereavement.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I know that all members of the Conservative party will appreciate very much the expression of sympathy extended by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent); and that Mrs. Coyle and her two sons and her daughter will greatly appreciate the sympathy expressed by the Prime Minister on behalf of all the members of the House of Commons.

It does come as a great shock to all of us who were closely associated with him, as I know it does to every member, to see a man suddenly leave us in this way when he was in apparently the very best of health, even until last night. He was here in the house last Friday until the house adjourned at ten o'clock. There are members here who walked down with him from the house on that occasion just prior to his departure for home where he stayed over last night to attend a meeting of a service club in his own riding in order to be associated, as he has been for so many years, with those who have served that community.

Like many others in this house, as the Prime Minister has already mentioned, Charlie Coyle, as we all knew him and shall continue to know him, had served his own community in many capacities and for many years. He had that ground work of public service that comes through association with municipal council. He was a councillor for years, then he was reeve of his own township, and then he received the highest honour that can be conferred in the local municipalities in the rural areas when he became warden of his own county. He was highly respected and greatly loved by all who knew him.

One of the things that make it so difficult to realize even yet that he has left us is that with his lovable and friendly qualities he had made a wide circle of friends, which I know embraced every member of this house.

I do hope there will be some very real measure of comfort for his family in their tragic and sudden loss in the knowledge that his associates are thinking of his family at this time and sharing, at least in some measure, their sorrow in the loss of a devoted public servant.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself and all members of the C.C.F. group in the expressions of sympathy and appreciation that have been made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) in regard to the death of Mr. Coyle.

During the last parliament Mr. Coyle sat over here on this side very close to us.

The late C. D. Coyle

Generally speaking, I have found that when you get fairly close to people and get more or less to know their intimate thoughts, you find that there is a great deal of humour and, if I may say so, a great many lovable qualities about them. That is how we felt about Mr. Coyle. When we see members from back here, we just glare at one another; but when we get as close to members as we are to our friends here, we find that they are really a good bunch of fellows; and Mr. Coyle was one of the best.

We wish to extend our sympathy to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and his party, and to Mr. Coyle's relatives.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise to associate this group for which I speak with the tributes which have been paid to the late hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Coyle) and to extend to his family and to his party in the house our sincere sympathy in the loss of a very fine man and follower.

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, it is on an occasion such as this that we probably get to appreciate one another better when we lay aside for a moment or two the cares of the country and of parliament and consider our friend who has passed on. It has been my privilege to know him through three parliaments. He has been my roommate for some five years. I came to know Mr. Coyle very intimately; and I agree with the words of other members who have spoken previously. I know that he was a man of integrity. He was a man of good judgment. I greatly respected his opinion on the various matters that came up from day to day. I can only join with those who have already spoken in paying my tribute to him and in conveying my condolences and sorrow to the bereaved family.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

APPROVAL OF REPORT OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION RESPECTING CERTAIN EMPLOYEES

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, by leave of the house I should like to move, seconded by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann), that the report of the civil service commission respecting certain employees tabled January 18, 1954, be now approved. By way of explanation, may I say that this report refers to two members of the staff whose names were omitted from the list of those who were granted increases before Christmas.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

EXPORT CREDITS INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE AUTHORIZED CAPITAL STOCK, ETC.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Export Credits Insurance Act to increase the authorized capital stock of the Export Credits Insurance Corporation from five million dollars to fifteen million dollars; also to require the corporation to continue the underwriting reserve to cover future losses under contracts of insurance; and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE SALARIES OF SPEAKERS AND DEPUTY SPEAKER, SESSIONAL ALLOWANCES OF MEMBERS, ETC.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce measures to amend

(a) the Senate and House of Commons Act to increase the salaries of the Speakers and the Deputy Speaker, the sessional allowances of members of the Senate and of the House of Commons and the annual allowances of the members occupying the recognized positions of leader of the government in the Senate, Leader of the Opposition in the Senate and Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons;

(b) the Salaries Act to increase the salaries of ministers mentioned in sections 4 and 5 thereof, substituting for the Minister of Resources and Development, the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources and adding thereto the Associate Minister of National Defence.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

INCOME TAX

REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT—DEDUCTIBILITY OF PROVINCIAL PAYMENTS FROM FEDERAL TAX

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is there any truth in the reports that have appeared in the press over the last couple of days to the effect that the federal government will deny to the taxpayers of the province of Quebec permission to deduct from their federal income tax the portion paid in income tax to the provincial government?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): There is no truth in that report. The federal government has not had any official information of the intentions of the Quebec government with respect to local income tax in the province of Quebec. Until we have something more precise and of a more official character than what we have read in the newspapers, we shall not feel it necessary to give consideration to that matter.

HOUSING

VANCOUVER—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE IN HOUSING AGED CITIZENS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the minister received a letter from the mayor or acting mayor of Vancouver asking for a financial contribution to a plan for the building of homes for persons on old age security and old age assistance pension? I think he said "senior citizens" in the letter. Has the minister replied to this communication? If so, what was the nature of the reply?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The minister has received a letter from the acting mayor of the city of Vancouver, and the minister has answered that letter. In his answer he has pointed out that the subject matter referred to the minister was one that should have been referred to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters). The letter from the acting mayor of Vancouver has been referred to my colleague, the Minister of Public Works. The question was whether the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation would be prepared to extend to the city of Vancouver credits to assist in a housing scheme for aged citizens. While the Department of National Health and Welfare is naturally vitally interested in this problem, the authority if it exists is vested in another minister.

Mr. MacInnis: I wish to ask a supplementary question. Did not the writer of the letter also ask or suggest that the federal government itself might contribute the amount of $200,000?

Mr. Martin: That might have been the thought that was in the mind of the acting mayor, but he has not communicated it to me.

Mr. MacInnis: I thought it was in the letter.

[Later:]

Mr. Martin: I should like to say to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway that since making a reply to his question one of my officials has sent in the letter and I find that the hon. member was correct when he said that the figure of $200,000 had been mentioned in the letter. However, that does not alter the reply I gave.

COMMONWEALTH FINANCE CONFERENCE

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON RESULTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to address to the Prime Minister a question of which I have given him notice. Is the Prime Minister able to give the house any information with regard to the results achieved at the recent commonwealth conference in Australia which ended a few days ago?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has not made any direct report to the government as yet about that conference. The only information we have is the information that the hon. member himself probably has, namely the press reports of the statements made by the participants at the end of the conference.

POWER

REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT OF PROPOSED SURVEY BY THERMO EXPERT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys? It arises out of a press dispatch in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of January 15, 1954. The caption of the article was "Top Thermo Power Expert engaged to undertake Survey". Has the minister seen this press dispatch? If so, would he care to make an official statement to the house, as the subject matter is one of great importance to the maritime provinces?

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. I have not seen the press dispatch to which he refers and I have no comment to make on it today, but I hope to be in a position to make a statement in the near future.

PASSAMAQUODDY PROJECT—INQUIRY AS TO PARTICIPATION IN ECONOMIC FEASIBILITY SURVEY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. My question is based on an Associated Press dispatch of January 16 which states that a subcommittee of the United States Senate foreign relations committee has recommended an economic feasibility survey of the Passamaquoddy tidal power project by the United States army engineers in conjunction with the international joint commission. Is it the intention of the Canadian government to join with the United States and assist with this survey?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): My hon. friend was good enough to give me notice of his question about which inquiries have also been addressed to me by the hon. member for Charlotte. I have seen the press dispatch to which reference has been made and we have made inquiries concerning it but have not yet received an official report from the Senate subcommittee in question through our embassy in Washington. However, I have no reason to believe that the press report is not accurate. The suggestion that is said to have been made by the subcommittee for a full-scale investigation of this project costing approximately $3 million is not a new one, and I can assure hon. members that if and when the United States government makes a specific proposal for investigation of the possibilities of this tidal project it will be examined most carefully by the government.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST THAT STANDING COMMITTEE HEAR REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING IMPORTATION OF FOREIGN OILS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): I wish to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture. Will the standing committee on agriculture be called to hear representations of the dairy industry regarding the importation of foreign oils?

Mr. Robert McCubbin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): I feel that this is a request that any group of members could make to the chairman of the committee, and if he deems it proper he will call the committee together to discuss it.

ATOMIC ENERGY

PROGRESS IN DEVELOPMENT BY CANADA FOR INDUSTRIAL USE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the disclosures by the British government, as reported yesterday in the press, of the advances made in Britain in the field of developing atomic energy for industrial uses, can the minister tell the house if similar developments are taking place in Canada?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Work on atomic energy in Canada has for several years been devoted to domestic development. We have not carried on our work at Chalk River with the intention of developing war uses for atomic energy. The experimental work for peace has been proceeding actively for some years. Considerable progress is being made, and I think that Canada will not be behind other countries in bringing atomic energy into practical use.

WATER POLLUTION

NORTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Would he say what his department has done since I brought to the attention of the department some three weeks ago the pollution of the waters of the North Saskatchewan river caused, it is said, by the dumping of certain chemicals into the river at Edmonton resulting in the water being almost totally unfit for use in Prince Albert and also latterly in the city of North Battleford? Would the minister also say what attitude the federal government intends to take to preserve from pollution the waters of rivers that flow through two or more provinces?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): My hon. friend was kind enough to give me notice of his question. He asks first of all what, pursuant to the inquiry made of my officers in my absence, was the situation resulting from communications made by the Department of National Health and Welfare to the appropriate departments of health of the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta. Contact has been made with the officers in the two departments of the two provinces. The facts of the matter have been ascertained. The responsibility for remedying the situation is recognized by both provinces as not coming within the competence of the federal government. Indeed, whether or not there was that acknowledgment I would have to submit that would have to be the situation as far as the federal government is concerned, for this is clearly a matter that does not come within the competence of the federal government.

My hon. friend asks a supplementary question as to what the effect would be of polluted waters flowing from one province into another, and what steps the federal government would be prepared to take in that eventuality. I have to say that again the judgment of the department would be that that was not a matter within the competence of the federal government. My hon. friend will find that this matter—I do not mean this particular situation but the principles involved—was fully discussed in the house in 1949, and the discussion can be found at page 571 of Hansard of October 6. However, the supplementary question raised now has some new aspects, and I have suggested to the departmental solicitors that they might care to discuss the matter with the law officers of the crown.

Mr. Diefenbaker: During the past seven weeks it has been human beings who have suffered, but now I understand that the condition of the water is dangerous to the fish. Will that result in some action by the federal government?

Mr. Martin: I was going to say that my hon. friend was perhaps fishing for a further answer, but I think what he has said does not really contribute anything more than what I have said about the matter. If there is any further problem involved it will be discussed.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

INQUIRY AS TO RECONSIDERATION OF REMOVAL TO MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister say whether press reports appearing during the last twenty-four hours respecting the national film board are correct and if the government does intend to reconsider its decision to move the national film board from Ottawa? At the same time I would ask whether there will be an opportunity to discuss the matter if this is so.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): There has been no decision reached in that matter. What is under consideration at the present time is the tenders that were submitted for the construction of a building in Montreal. They are all of a very substantial amount, and the matter that is now under consideration is as to whether or not the government will recommend the appropriations required for that large expenditure at this time.

Mr. Drew: Do I understand from what the Prime Minister has said that, having regard to the amount involved, the government may actually be reconsidering whether it will or will not move the national film board from Ottawa?

Mr. St. Laurent: No decision has been reached in that regard, but until the government comes to parliament with a definite recommendation for a definite amount to be expended for a building at a definite place there is always a possibility that changes in the recommendation may be made.

Mr. Drew: There is always a possibility that reason may prevail.

VANCOUVER PARKS

WITHDRAWAL OF GRANT TOWARD COST OF FIRING SIGNAL GUN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the attention of the minister been drawn to the views of the parks board of the city of Vancouver and the editorials in the Vancouver papers relative to the decision of the department to cease, after February 28, allowing the sum of $1,000 a year for the supply of powder for the firing of the 137-year-old traditional nine o'clock gun in Vancouver? If so, why is there discrimination against Vancouver, and will the minister reconsider?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I do not know that there is any urgency with respect to this question. I think it is the kind of question which should be placed on the order paper, and if my hon. friend will do that I shall see that he gets an answer.

Mr. Winch: May I say that it is a matter of urgency.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Winch: May I say that the date for cessation has already been set.

Some hon. Members: Order.

IMMIGRATION

INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Dufresne (Quebec West): I should like to direct a question to the minister of immigration. On January 11, 1954, in an address delivered before the members of Knox Presbyterian church at St. Thomas, Ontario—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Dufresne: I shall start over again, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I ask hon. members to remain silent so I can decide whether or not the question is in order.

Mr. Dufresne: In an address delivered before the members of Knox Presbyterian church at St. Thomas, Ontario, the minister discussed the government's policy concerning immigration into Canada. Was the minister on that occasion outlining the official policy of the government? Must one conclude that the government intends to maintain the demographic balance between Canadians of French origin and those of British origin to the proportions which existed in 1867?

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member will agree his question is not the type of oral question which is allowed before the orders of the day. There will be a time when a debate will be conducted on immigration affairs and the hon. member can then discuss that statement or obtain further information concerning the purpose of the government in pursuing its policy.

Mr. Dufresne: May I add that I gave notice of my question to the minister yesterday.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member gave notice of a question which is not in order, that does not mean the hon. member has a right to an answer.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

REPORTS OF ALLEGED FRAUD—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): In the absence of the Minister of Public Works, perhaps the parliamentary assistant could take my question as notice and bring an answer tomorrow. Has the attention of the government been drawn to recent newspaper reports of alleged fraud involving federal government expenditures on the Ontario portion of the trans-Canada highway? If so, has the government considered naming any independent firm to investigate the charges?

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Public Works): I shall be glad to take notice of this question and get the information as soon as possible.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING ELECTIONS, APPOINTMENTS TO COUNCIL, ETC.

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources) moved the second reading of Bill No. 77, to amend the acts respecting the Northwest Territories.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the bill to amend the acts respecting the Northwest Territories is divided into two parts. As I explained at the resolution stage, it is necessary to amend both the existing Northwest Territories Act and the new Northwest Territories Act which will not be proclaimed until after the new Criminal Code is enacted. The amendments to the existing act are contained in part I of the bill, and the amendments to the new act are contained in part II.

When we were at the resolution stage, Mr. Speaker, I explained some of the purposes of the bill as they are mentioned in the explanatory notes in the bill. The purposes which I have already discussed are as follows:

(a) to provide that the governor in council may, after the expiration of two years from the return of the writs of election of elected members of the council, dissolve the council and cause a new council to be elected and appointed;

(c) to add provisions relating to reindeer and penalties similar to those already included in chapter 331;

(e) to provide that the governor in council may appoint a member of the council in place of an elected member who resigns.

Other amendments will increase the time within which copies of ordinances enacted by the territorial council are to be transmitted to the governor in council from 10 days to 30 days, and raise the living allowance payable to members of council from $15 to $25 per day. Both these provisions are already contained in the new Northwest Territories Act, chapter 331 of the Revised Statutes of 1952.

Both the existing act and the new act are to be amended to clarify the provision relating to indemnity and living allowances, and to include provisions relating to the holding of land similar to those added to the Yukon Act by chapter 53 of the Statutes of 1952-53. This amendment is necessary in order that the territorial government may hold title to public buildings constructed with territorial funds.

Another amendment to both acts provides for authority being given to the territorial government to enter into agreements with the government of Canada under and for the purposes of any act which authorizes the federal government to enter into agreements with the provinces. This will enable the territorial government to receive assistance under any such acts in the same manner as the provinces are now receiving it. As an example, I might mention that negotiations are now under way for assistance being given under the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act, which will be made possible when the bill is passed.

In the course of the debate on December 10 on the resolution for introduction of the present bill, the Leader of the Opposition suggested that it would be desirable to take advantage of this amendment to increase the elected representation on the council of the Northwest Territories. The council legislates for the territories, in the manner of a provincial legislature, and also advises the commissioner on questions referred to it. At the present time the council consists of 8 members, of whom 3 are elected and 5 are appointed by the governor in council. The Leader of the Opposition proposed that the number of elected representatives should be raised so that "they will balance the appointed representatives and give greater opportunity for representation, consistent with the same contact with the government."

Following the hon. member's suggestion I undertook to discuss the matter with the members of the Northwest Territories council who were meeting in Ottawa at that time.

The question of the size of the council and of its composition is, of course, not one that comes within the jurisdiction of the council itself. However, the matter was discussed informally with its members. I may say to the Leader of the Opposition that the general feeling of the members, both elected and appointed, was that there is a great deal of merit in his suggestion. They were unanimously of the opinion that, if the government were disposed to recommend such a change, they would be in favour of an amendment to the Northwest Territories Act that would provide for some increase in elected representation.

With regard to the extent of any increase in representation that might be made at this time, the feeling of the members was that account had to be taken of the varying degree of development of the different parts of the Northwest Territories. At the present time much the largest proportion of the population of the territories is concentrated in the western part of the district of Mackenzie—particularly in the basin of the Mackenzie river itself. The 3 constituencies that send elected members to the council are all in the district of Mackenzie. There are no elected representatives from any part of the districts of Keewatin or Franklin, which make up the eastern part of the mainland and the Arctic islands. The view of the members of the council was that the population and state of development of the districts of Keewatin and Franklin is not such at the present time that it would be desirable, or even feasible, to have an elected member from a constituency that covered those areas, or any part of them. They consider, however, that the objective should be to have a member from that part of the territories as soon as the development and the growth of population justifies it.

In the circumstances, the members of the council were of the opinion that the best course at this time would be to amend the Northwest Territories Act to increase the elected representation from three to four. The fourth constituency would be inserted in the district of Mackenzie. The definition of the boundaries of the constituencies is done by ordinance of the council of the Northwest Territories. It is not a matter for this parliament.

The necessary changes would be made before the next election in the territories, which will probably take place in September, 1954. Provision for the fifth elected member, which the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) had in mind, would be held in reserve for a further amendment at a later date when the growth and development of the territories has made it clear that the addition is desirable and has shown more clearly just what the area should be that the additional representative would cover.

That is the advice of the members of the council of the Northwest Territories. Since they themselves feel that the fifth elected position ought to be held in reserve, I think that is the best course to follow. Up until 1951 there was no elected representation on the council at all. The proposed increase of one will be an indication of the kind and direction of the progress in self-government that is desirable. Further development will come as circumstances justify it.

In view of the importance of this proposal to the people of the Northwest Territories, I have discussed it with my colleagues and I am glad to advise the Leader of the Opposition that, at the appropriate stage in the consideration of the present bill, I shall ask one of my colleagues to move an additional amendment which will increase the size of the council of the Northwest Territories from eight members to nine, and the number of elected members from three to four.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the statement by the minister that the government has decided to make this increase from three to four, and welcome, too, the manner in which the statement has been made. It is encouraging to feel that, out of a discussion of this kind, we can find a substantial measure of agreement in matters of great importance for the years ahead.

I accept without any criticism or objection the suggestion by the minister that the decision to designate a fifth area in which there would be an elected member for the time being should stand in abeyance. I would have welcomed a decision to do this at the present time; but I think there is a great deal of merit in the view he has expressed.

The important thing is that a decision to increase the number of elected representatives is positive evidence to the people in northern Canada, as well as the people in other parts of this country whose interest we wish to arouse in the north, that there is a steady movement toward elected representation for that area.

By the standards of representation in the southern areas of Canada, the numbers in those northern parts are small. It is not likely that at any time there will be a great concentration of population in the north. Nevertheless within a comparatively few years we have seen enormous changes taking place. It is only a few years ago that there was practically no mineral area of importance in the north, with the exception of the romantic Yukon. Since then we have seen the discovery of increasing quantities of rich ore of different kinds. The Northwest Territories have played a vitally important part in the development of atomic energy. In many ways the north beckons to the young and the vigorous, to people of all ages, who look for the rewards that come with adventure and with new developments such as we have seen in that part of Canada.

I appreciate the words in which the minister announced the decision of the government. I should hope the fact that we can find such a substantial measure of agreement as to the desirability of dramatizing in some measure the move toward greater representation in the northern area would be a happy augury of the approach to be made to the broad problems of that great internal empire. Numbers of population are small. I agree with the minister that in the Keewatin and Franklin areas it would be so small that it would be difficult to have separate representation there at the moment, with any sense of reality. Nevertheless we recall that the Franklin area is one of the historic sections of Canada. Who can tell that any part of that great northland will not provide new opportunities in the years ahead.

All Canadians should regard the north as an important area for development. There are reasons why the government and parliament should seek in every way to encourage increased population in that area.

We speak often about our neighbours to the south, but not nearly so often in friendly terms about our neighbours to the west and north. Yet, the fact is that only a little more than 50 miles of open water separates this continent from the mainland of Russia. Our great northland is of vital importance in many ways. I do not often speak of Russia as offering us examples of desirable things, but I must say it is worth noting that Russia has been devoting a great deal of attention to the development of its northland, and to the opening of new possibilities for supporting population in that area. We will hope that those developments will be for peace rather than for war—peace that will provide opportunities for us and for other people.

I would hope that in every way possible we would direct our attention to that distant area so as to encourage young Canadians and others who have not yet come to Canada to seek opportunity there. I welcome the minister's statement today respecting the proposed change and accept it as a gesture on the part of the government which will be welcomed by parliament, and as an indication that we are interested in the expansion and development of the north.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

Mr. Lesage: The act respecting the Northwest Territories, chapter 195, reads as follows:

2. In this act,
(h) "Minister" means the Minister of Resources and Development;

When Bill No. 77 was printed, after the resolution was passed, the name of the Department of Resources and Development had not been changed. Now that it has been changed we might as well profit by the occasion and move that paragraph (h) of section 2 of the Northwest Territories Act, chapter 195 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, be amended to change the words "Resources and Development" to "Northern Affairs and National Resources". I would ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration kindly to move that amendment.

Mr. Harris: I move:

That Bill No. 77, an act to amend the acts respecting the Northwest Territories, be amended by adding the following as clause 1 thereof:

1. Paragraph (h) of section 2 of the Northwest Territories Act, chapter 195, of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, is amended by deleting the words "Resources and Development" and substituting therefor the words "Northern Affairs and National Resources". And that the remaining clauses of part 1 of the bill be renumbered accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Section 1 now becomes section 2.

On section 2—Tenure of elected members.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, when I made my statement on second reading I said that at this time I would ask one of my colleagues to move an amendment following the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition regarding an increase in the number of elected representatives on the Northwest Territories council. This is the time to move the amendment, and I would ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration kindly to do so.

Mr. Harris: I move:

That clause 2, as renumbered, of Bill No. 77, an act to amend the acts respecting the Northwest Territories, be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

2. (1) Subsections (1) and (2) of section 8 of the said act are repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"8. (1) There shall be a council of the territories consisting of nine members, four of whom shall be elected to represent such electoral districts in the territories as are named and described by the commissioner in council, and five of whom shall be appointed by the governor in council."

(2) Subsection (4) of section 8 of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(4) Unless otherwise provided in this section, an elected member of the council holds office for three years from the date of the return of the writ after his election."

(3) Subsection (6) of section 8 of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(6) Where an elected member resigns or dies while in office, the governor in council may appoint a member in his stead for the balance of his term of office.

(7) The governor in council may, at any time after the expiration of two years from the date of the return of the writs of election of elected members of the council, dissolve the council and cause a new council to be elected and appointed".

(4) Subsection (1) shall come into force on a day to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council.

Mr. Hardie: Are we dealing with the subsections having to do with the death or resignation of a council member?

Mr. Lesage: Yes.

Mr. Hardie: A few moments ago the minister said that in 1951 the Northwest Territories Act provided for the first elected representatives to sit on that council. Prior to that time, in 1946, I think it was, the act provided for the appointment of a resident of the territory to sit on the council. In the case in question, if a member dies or resigns, provision should be made for a by-election to permit the people to tell us whom they want to send down here. It has been said, and I agree, that in the Northwest Territories it is very difficult to hold an election at certain times of the year. For the first eighteen months after an election of those members, a by-election should be held to fill a vacancy. It would be the only democratic thing for us to do to replace, by means of a by-election within the first eighteen months after the election, a member who dies or resigns. In the case of an appointment after eighteen months the act should provide—and I hope the minister will agree—for the appointment of a resident of the constituency that was represented by the man who died or resigned. I feel strongly on this. If we are going to act in a democratic way we should make the appointment from residents of the constituency of the man who died or resigned. That is all I have to say.

Mr. Lesage: There is a great deal in the representations and suggestions which have just been made by the hon. member for Mackenzie River and we have considered the suggestions.

May I point out first of all that in 1946 the act did not provide—as a matter of fact no act ever provided—for the appointment of a resident of the territory. That was a matter of policy which was followed in the appointments, but the act never provided for it.

The hon. member himself has mentioned one of the difficulties of having by-elections in the north. We can have effective by-elections or elections in the north in a period of only three or four months, at the most, in the year. We feel that every constituency should be represented as far as possible at every session of the council. At the last session of the council, following the resignation of the then member of the council who has since taken his seat here, the constituency could not be represented because the act did not provide for the replacement of a member who resigned; it provided only for the replacement of a member who died. Provision for the replacement of a member who died was by appointment because of the very high cost of holding elections in the territories.

Second, the government wanted to be sure that every constituency would be represented at meetings of the council. It would not have been possible to hold a by-election in the Northwest Territories following the resignation of the then member, Mr. Hardie, who is now the hon. member for Mackenzie River in this house, before the meeting of the session of the council last December.

May I give a few figures on the cost of elections in the Northwest Territories. I might mention that appropriation for expenditures of $1,236.73 was made in connection with the plenary conference held between representatives of the chief electoral office and the three returning officers. This was the only item of expenditure made by this administration in connection with these territorial elections. The other expenditures were made by the chief electoral officer out of his own funds. I have obtained from him details of expenditure broken down by electoral districts and these are as follows: Mackenzie West—a little over $7,000; Mackenzie South—$2,677; Mackenzie North—$3,664.96. That is a total of over $13,000, and that is apart from the appropriation made by the territorial council itself under ordinance No. 1, dated February 15, 1951, providing for the sum of $11,000 for the cost of elections.

As to the suggested inclusion in the act of a condition that an appointment be conferred only upon a resident of a constituency, it seems to me that is more a matter of policy than one of legislation. No member of this house has to reside in his constituency in order to be elected. I feel that is a matter for the electors themselves to decide. I believe we should not create a precedent by requiring the appointed representative to reside in the district. On the other hand, I wish to assure hon. members that, unless there is something very exceptional, this government will see to it that any appointment that has to be made in accordance with that section of the act will be conferred upon a resident of the constituency wherein the vacancy occurs.

Mr. Hardie: I am happy to see that the policy will be to appoint the man in the constituency, but I feel, considering what the minister said concerning members of this house, that such a person will not have to reside in the constituency he represents. I am sure any member of this house who went to another constituency would receive his nomination from that constituency. In other words, the people would have some say as to whether he was to run. We are speaking now of an appointment and I feel this provision should be incorporated in the act. The person appointed should come from the constituency represented by the man who died or resigned.

As to the cost of elections, you will notice that in Mackenzie West the cost was over double the cost of the election in Mackenzie South or Mackenzie North. According to what the minister said a few minutes ago, an additional member will be representing the constituency where the cost of election is so high, and I would venture to suggest that the cost of running a by-election in any one of the four constituencies would be $3,500 at the most. I still feel there should be a by-election over the 18-month period. In the district of Mackenzie South there are only two periods during the year when an election cannot be held. One is at the break-up between the months of May and June, and the other is at the freeze-up during the months of October and possibly part of November. In the other constituencies on the Arctic coast the holding of a by-election may be a little more troublesome but even then the election could be held in August or September or any of the months from December to April.

Mr. Lesage: I am sure my hon. friend knows much more about the north than I do, but I have read quite a lot about it and I am informed by my advisers that it would be impossible to hold an election in wintertime unless we wished to disfranchise the Eskimos who are then living their nomadic life.

Mr. Hardie: During the federal election there was in the electoral district of Mackenzie West, at Stanton and Paulatuk, a total, I think, of 70 votes, and in the constituency of Mackenzie North, at Coppermine and Bathurst Inlet, there was a total vote of, I think, around 70. I still believe that as long as these people are in the forts at Stanton, Paulatuk, Coppermine or Bathurst, elections could be held in the winter just as easily, or possibly more so, than in summer, as the returning officer can travel in a plane equipped with skis during the winter. People come into these forts at various times during the year, and for instance at Coppermine last winter there were more people in the fort than during the summer months.

Mr. Adamson: I can see the point raised by the hon. member for Mackenzie River in regard to the cost of a by-election in a territory as sparsely populated as the Northwest Territories, but my fear is that if a member of the council dies or resigns, then the residents of the Northwest Territories will be at the mercy of Ottawa. They feel that somebody in Ottawa will appoint someone they do not know. I do not say that will happen but that is the feeling. Would it not be at least a step halfway in the direction of meeting the wishes of the member for Mackenzie River if the territories council appointed a member rather than the governor in council?

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Lesage: That suggestion has been considered but the trouble is that the appointed member would be sitting with the members who have done him the favour of appointing him. On the other hand, following the policy I propose, a member is appointed by the governor in council and he will sit on the Northwest Territories council. The policy I would follow is to appoint a resident of the district which he would represent. Such a person would then feel much freer vis-à-vis his colleagues than if he had been appointed by them.

Mr. Adamson: I think the minister's argument is rather tenuous because I feel the point is that he would be sitting amongst his electors.

Mr. Lesage: Those who have appointed him.

Mr. Adamson: Yes, those who have appointed or chosen him. And he would be responsible to those who form the council. But I think the argument is tenuous in that regard.

Mr. Green: If this legislation is passed will the position be this, that if a member of the territories council dies or resigns then there cannot possibly be a by-election?

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, that is the position now if a member dies. I would refer the hon. member to section 8, paragraph 6 of the present act, which now reads as follows:

> Where an elected member dies while in office, the governor in council may appoint a member in his stead for the balance of his term of office.

The only words which are added are "or if he resigns". We are following exactly the same policy as that which was followed in the case when a member dies. We are just providing for a case which had not been provided for, namely the case of resignation of a member, which happened last summer.

Mr. Green: Why should power not be taken at least to hold a by-election? The chances are that one could be held. Yet as the act will read, the government could not possibly call a by-election. Why not take the power to hold a by-election? Surely that method of filling a vacancy is to be preferred. Suppose the present member for Mackenzie River were to resign from the house. His seat would have to be filled by a by-election. Surely it is just as easy to elect a member to one of the territorial seats as it is to elect a member to the federal house representing the whole area, or easier. Why cut down the democratic rights of these people, as is obviously being done under the law at the present time?

Mr. Lesage: As I have already explained, I and my officers believe that it is really important that each constituency should be represented at each session of the council. The council meets twice a year, once in the wintertime here in Ottawa and once in the territories early in the summer. After weighing the pros and cons, it was found that the only way in which to provide representation at each of the sessions of the council for every local constituency was to have the vacancy filled by appointment because the time of the year when it is impossible to hold elections in the territories is so long; it is practically five-sixths or at least three-quarters of the time.

As to the suggestion that the governor in council would have the option of deciding, should there be an election or should there be an appointment, that can be dealt with by the difficulty that I have just encountered. The hon. member for Mackenzie River says it is possible to hold an election in the wintertime.

Mr. Green: He probably knows.

Mr. Lesage: I am advised by my officers and by the officers of the chief electoral officer's office that it is not to be recommended and that it is not feasible in a democratic way. I do not wish to be faced with that option at this time. I am ready to consider the whole thing again, but at this time I believe that if we want to have representation from each local constituency at every session of the council, it is important that the filling of a vacancy after a resignation should be provided for by appointment.

Mr. Green: What length of time is required for a by-election?

Mr. Lesage: According to our experience in the first election and with the coming election now, it takes about six months to organize an election in the territories. One of the reasons why I asked the leader of the house to give some priority to the second reading of this bill is that we intend to hold an election in September, and it is urgently necessary that we start work now for an election in September.

Mr. Green: Is the fourth member of the council to be appointed or elected?

Mr. Lesage: The fourth member of the council will be elected in the next general election. The provisions dealing with the reorganization of the territories into four constituencies will come into force by proclamation, and we intend to proclaim that paragraph or section of the bill when the council is dissolved after its next meeting which is to be held in Yellowknife on June 14 next.

Mr. Hardie: I do not want to hold this matter up unduly, but I think there are times when a by-election might be held. For instance, if a man died or resigned any time prior to the month of June, it would be possible to hold a by-election in September. I think some provision should be made whereby there could be a by-election. I go so far as to say that I would go along with the minister if he would have the section worded in some way that would allow a by-election within six months of the death or resignation of the member. If they cannot call one within six months, then they can make an appointment.

Mr. Green: I think the representations of the hon. member for Mackenzie River should be given serious consideration. I am quite sure he knows the conditions there far better than anyone here in Ottawa. The whole democratic process is at stake. You are setting up a council, some of the members of which are elected. Yet there is this provision that there cannot be a by-election. The term of that council may end up with the whole nine having been appointed. I think we could well afford to go the whole way but at least provide that there shall be power to hold a by-election.

Mr. Lesage: I just want to say a word, not to take exception to anything which has been said because I hate to take exception to what hon. members have to say. I agree that the hon. member for Mackenzie River knows much more about his constituency than do all of us in the house, but the chief electoral officer himself well knows how long it takes to organize an election in the Northwest Territories. He knows even better than I do how long it takes to organize an election in Montmagny-L'Islet; and he certainly knows better than does the hon. member for Mackenzie River how long it takes to organize an election in the district of Mackenzie. I am informed that it is necessary to pass the bill so that he can, starting in February, organize the election for next September.

Amendment agreed to.

[Mr. Lesage.]

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 3 and 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Regulations respecting reindeer.

Mr. Green: On December 10 the minister promised that he would look into the question of the raising of musk-ox in the Northwest Territories and give a reply during the debate.

The Deputy Chairman: I may have been responsible for some misunderstanding here. I have been calling the clauses as renumbered. We inserted a new clause 1. The printed clause 4 is now clause 5. Therefore I think the hon. member's question comes under the original clause 5 which is now renumbered clause 6. Clause 5 as renumbered is carried and we are now on clause 6.

Mr. Lesage: It is true, Mr. Chairman, that when we were at the resolution stage I undertook to give the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra some information regarding musk-ox. I have some here which I will give now if he wishes to have it.

In the early days of the fur trade a great number of musk-ox robes were taken. This led to a great reduction in numbers on the Canadian mainland. Exploration and development in the high Arctic led to similar reductions on many of the islands. The animals are easily destroyed as they form a defensive circle when attacked. This repels the wolves but leaves the musk-ox vulnerable to the rifle.

In 1917 the musk-oxen were given total protection and the export of robes from Canada prohibited. In 1927 the Thelon game sanctuary was established to protect the last stronghold of the species on the mainland, which area was thought to contain 250 animals. By 1937 the population was estimated at 290, and under continued protection the sanctuary population has continued to grow to the present estimate of 600 to 1,000.

In 1930 the total Canadian musk-ox population was estimated to be about 14,000 animals, 500 of which occurred on the mainland. In 1937 the mainland estimate rose to 1,200. The mainland population has continued to grow, though improved transportation facilities have no doubt led to increased musk-ox sightings and consequent apparent increases in population figures. At present herds outside of the Thelon game sanctuary are known to occur at the following localities: north of Great Bear lake, 90 animals; Bathurst inlet, 500 animals; and in the vicinity of Pelly bay where there is no count.

The recent increased aerial reconnaissance in the Canadian Arctic archipelago has added considerable information to our knowledge of musk-ox distribution in that area. They are known to occur on Banks, Victoria, Prince Patrick, Melville, Eglinton, Bathurst, Cornwallis, Devon, Graham, Axel Heiberg and Ellesmere islands. The population on Ellesmere island is considerable. Herds of 500 and 200 have been estimated on the Fosheim peninsula and south coast respectively. There is every reason to believe that the population of this interesting Arctic mammal will continue to increase under proper management and may yet yield valuable products for the Arctic economy.

May I also mention at this point that when we were at the resolution stage some very high figures were mentioned for the population of reindeer. Following that discussion there has been mention in one newspaper, I believe, of the population of reindeer in Alaska as being 20 million. A few zeros should have been taken from that figure, for it is 20,000.

Mr. Green: Are there economic possibilities for the musk-ox herds in the north? My question of course is based on the article in Maclean's magazine for August, 1951, by Vilhjalmur Stefansson. In that article he referred particularly to the musk-ox. He seemed to place more importance on them than on reindeer. He told of spending a year on uninhabited Melville island which is north of the 75th parallel. He went to to say:

> Our chief source of food was the shaggy, sheep-like, hulking ovibos, often miscalled musk-ox . . . The meat is excellent, the hair makes a wool finer than cashmere and does not shrink when dyed or washed.

He went on to say that a magnificent way to use much of the otherwise forbidding northern land would be by using it for the development of musk-ox herds. He then said:

> The musk-ox, whose feeding habits are even better suited to the north than the reindeer, could do far better. I estimate that Canada's north could maintain a hundred million musk-ox, which is the equivalent of 400 million sheep. What such a vast industry would do for Canada, and what such supplies of food might do to assist in other developments of the north such as mining and oil, I leave to your imagination.

Those figures may be much too high but even if they are within shooting distance of the truth this development might be very significant. Can the minister tell us whether or not Stefansson was reasonably accurate in his statement?

Mr. Lesage: The information given by Stefansson is of course accurate. The musk-ox can be used for its fur and for its meat, but it is because there are so few musk-ox that we have to prohibit their killing. One thing must not be forgotten. While the annual increase of reindeer is about 25 per cent the annual increase of musk-ox is not more than 10 per cent. Musk-ox females have their calves only every two years. The rate of increase is very slow. We have to protect them, and it is still too early to think of drawing any economic benefits from the musk-ox which, by the way, is a wild animal while the reindeer is domestic.

Mr. Green: I hope it is the policy of the department to build up herds of both these animals. Is that correct?

Mr. Lesage: That is correct. That is our policy, and that is why we have very strict regulations, in order that we may increase the population of both reindeer and musk-ox to the extent where they will be an economic asset in the development of the north.

Mr. Knight: I do not know whether the minister will remember that the last time this subject was under discussion I brought to his attention certain allegations—they appeared to me to be allegations—that had been made in a book which I think should deeply touch our consciences, namely, "People of the Deer" by Farley Mowat. I am not sure, but I think that at that time the minister said he would look into the subject and see what he could tell me about it when this measure came up in committee. If the allegations contained in the book are true, it is a terrible indictment of neglect upon the part of somebody, and I do not know anybody better to blame than the department of the dominion government that handles these affairs.

It is true that some of Mr. Mowat's assertions were denied publicly, and to that denial he replied in terms which I see no reason to disbelieve. His allegations were that a certain tribe of Eskimos, who are not sea-going Eskimos and are not even found along the seacoast, have been allowed through various circumstances to disintegrate, and that in fact their numbers were decreased and even depleted by starvation. The theme of the book is that the natural way these people live is through the use of their natural food, the reindeer. They were coaxed away from their natural manner of life, and I think in some cases there is an allegation made against the Hudson's Bay Company. I did note that the Hudson's Bay Company was severely critical of the book, and I believe approached the library authorities of the provincial government in Toronto suggesting that perhaps the book should be removed from the shelves. I do not know whether or not that is true, but that is what I have heard.

Now, the allegation is that these people were separated from their ordinary means of livelihood; that they were induced to work for private companies, notably certain fishing companies, and when the market for fish disappeared, these people were thrown back on their natural resources, but at that time the natural resources, the caribou, were not available. I have been able to give only an incomplete résumé of the whole situation, but I should like to know if the minister has anything to tell us about it. It is a rather serious business. It involves the lives of people. It involves their extermination by starvation. As a matter of fact, the regulations concerning the preservation of caribou have improved, and I am glad to see that this section provides for that.

I was interested enough to write to my friend the minister of natural resources in Saskatchewan, Mr. Brockelbank. I need not read the whole of the letter. I was protesting that the government allowed hunting parties to go up there, particularly in aeroplanes, to bag these caribou. I am glad to say he has informed me the practice has been stopped, and that the year 1950-51 was the last year in which caribou were killed for sport. I take it these regulations in the bill will be strictly enforced. Mr. Brockelbank suggested that perhaps the worst offenders were not these outside people who came to enjoy the sport. By the way, I imagine it is an expensive sport and that most of the hunters come from south of the line in their own aeroplanes. It was suggested that the Eskimo themselves were not guiltless in the matter. I quote from his letter where he says:

> However, I would point out that much more important in the question of preservation of the caribou is the conservation of the herds by the native people themselves. Too often in the past they have wantonly slaughtered the caribou for dog feed . . .

He goes on with some other matters that are not relative to the question. The thought of people dying out there for want of assistance certainly touched my conscience, if it did not touch the conscience of the people in the department.

I made some inquiries of the department in the last parliament by putting questions on the order paper. I have to say that the replies I received were not adequate. I would not like to call them evasive, but they certainly were not satisfactory to me at that time. I am informed now that this tribe, the so-called Ihalmiut—I am not suggesting that people should copy my pronunciation because I do not know how it should be pronounced—are now subsisting largely on the charity of the members of some military expedition in that north country. The assertions are that such aid as the government did send to them, when it finally was seized of the importance of the question, was too little and too late. For example, white flour is not much good to an Eskimo.

I have covered a lot of ground. I have to admit my ignorance of the subject, but one of the purposes of a discussion in committee of the whole is to find out these things. Some time ago I gave the minister a warning that I would pursue the question. I notice he shakes his head, which means he has no recollection of such a warning. It was the former minister. In any event, I should like to have his comments on this matter.

Mr. Lesage: The first important question is that the hon. member has suggested this book "People of the Deer" should be suppressed.

Mr. Knight: I have not suggested it. I say someone suggested it. I mentioned that it was rumoured that the Hudson's Bay Company thought it would be advisable to have this book suppressed from the shelves of certain libraries. I say that is a rumour, and I am merely giving it as such.

Mr. Lesage: It amounts to the same thing if the hon. member thinks it might be advisable to suppress the book from the shelves—

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, how many times, in my inadequate English, do I have to explain that I am not in favour of censorship or anything like that?

Mr. Lesage: I am sorry; I misunderstood.

Mr. Knight: I said that certain people had reported to me, as a rumour which I cannot substantiate, that the Hudson's Bay Company —can the minister hear me?—suggested that perhaps, in view of the attack that had been made upon the reliability of Mr. Mowat's assertions, it would be a good thing if this book were suppressed from certain library shelves. May I say that I welcomed the writing of the book just as I welcome the writing of any controversial book which makes people think, and which might be the subject of a discussion such as the one we are having now. I hope we are now clear on that point.

Mr. Lesage: I am clear, Mr. Chairman. Since I misunderstood the hon. member and had gathered that he was making the suggestion at that time, he will not be surprised if I say that I was surprised that a proposal for suppressing a book should come from a socialist. If the hon. member agrees with me, I would suggest the thing to do would be to take that book from the factual shelves and put it on the fictional shelves of the library because it is based on false and partial information.

Mr. Knight: The minister has completely misunderstood me. He is putting too much emphasis upon this part about suppressing the book. Let us leave that out. What I am seeking is information from the minister concerning the allegations made in that book. What are the comments of the minister upon the whole situation, and the allegation that that particular tribe was allowed to be starved and separated from their natural means of livelihood? Let us have no red herrings. This book is merely a red herring.

Mr. Lesage: I just said, and I do not believe I can say anything more, it is false, the allegations are false. If the hon. member wishes to have a detailed criticism of that book indicating the extent to which the information upon which the book is based is false, I am sure that my officers and especially my deputy would be delighted to send it to the hon. member so he will have an opportunity to peruse it. There is nothing more false than that part of the book which says that a certain tribe was allowed to perish by starvation. There is no ground at all for that allegation.

Mr. Knight: Does the minister say, then, there have been no such occurrences as the one described concerning any tribe of Eskimos in that territory?

Mr. Lesage: Years ago there were some cases of starvation, I am afraid. One can appreciate how difficult communications were in the north before it was possible to have air patrols up there. There might very well have been cases of starvation because of the sudden disappearance of the caribou from their usual migration routes. The basic information in the book is false. It was based upon partial information. As I said, I do not have in my mind all the facts concerning the allegations in the book, but I shall be delighted to have an officer give the hon. member all the information he requires in order that his soul, as a member of this parliament, may be at peace and that he will not believe he has been at fault in allowing starvation to occur in this country without any measures being taken against it.

Mr. Knight: Since the minister has said categorically that these things are false I should like to say that I, too, have information from what I consider a fairly competent authority stating that such allegations are largely true. I think it is only fair to the writer of the book that I should say that. The attack upon the book was made by A. E. Porsild. While I do not wish to go into the whole matter, I may say that I have read Mr. Mowat's reply.

I would ask the minister if it is not a fact that a government department did receive from Mr. Mowat, and from others who were investigating the problem at the time, certain reports, and if it is not true that there was a great deal of delay on the part of the department in investigating the truth of those reports, or sending relief as a result of them.

It is a matter which should be cleared up, in the public interest. Of course what is bygone is bygone; we cannot bring back lives. I bring this to the attention of the House of Commons, the department and the public generally in the hope that things like this will not occur again and that we may have more prompt action on behalf of people who are in difficult circumstances and people for whom, as in this instance, we have assumed responsibility.

Mr. Lesage: At the time the book was written and the events occurred to which my hon. friend has referred, I was not very well versed in either northern affairs or Eskimo affairs. However, I am now informed by responsible officers in my department that the information in the book is false, and that the statement just made by the hon. member would not be exactly correct. My officers are in a position to give information to the hon. member which would satisfy him that there was no delay by the proper officers in doing whatever was necessary to cope with any emergency.

Mr. Knight: I think it would be wise if the information, which the minister asserts his officers can give, were to be given publicly, to the whole country. I do not blame the minister, or any other minister; but I do say that if he will look into my question and the replies given—I cannot remember the exact date—he will admit that they are pretty vague and wobbly. Any department, or any minister as sure of himself as the minister seems to be now, would have been able to set forth information to prove that the allegations in Mr. Mowat's book were in fact false.

The minister's statement that these allegations are false is a pretty broad one. I take it that he makes the blanket assertion that the statements contained in the book are not in fact true. I do know that reports went in to the department.

Mr. Adamson: Would it be possible to have Dr. Porsild's monograph on the subject given to those members who may be interested in it? I have listened to this controversy before, and I would be interested in knowing what the facts of the matter are. I am a great admirer of Dr. Porsild, because he is the man who brought the reindeer from Alaska to the Northwest Territories, and one who probably knows as much about game in the Northwest Territories as any living man. While I have read the book, I have not read the monograph written by Dr. Porsild, and I would be interested to do so. Indeed, I think hon. members generally would like to see it.

Does the department make a grant to the Arctic Institute of Canada? Is the department carrying on any research with a view constantly to increasing northern limits of vegetation? If so, would the minister give us information on that, either from his department or otherwise? That is one of the most interesting subjects affecting the northwestern section of Canada.

Mr. Lesage: I thank the hon. member for his suggestion and, if it suits the wishes of hon. members, I will see to it that Dr. Porsild's monograph is mimeographed and distributed to them. I shall undertake to do that. This would be one of the best answers to the allegations contained in the book "People of the Deer".

I might reply to the hon. member by saying that the department does grant $5,000 a year to the Arctic Institute. And, as to his question about developing agriculture in the north, I would reply that an experimental station is operated at Fort Simpson by the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Knight: Let me suggest that in all fairness in this controversy, one in which I am not taking sides—because I am making no accusations—if Dr. Porsild's statement is to be made public then the reply by Mr. Mowat to Dr. Porsild's review should be made public so that hon. members could come to their own conclusions.

Mr. Mowat did spend a good deal of time in the north country and among these people in the study of their habits and to learn their language. I have in my hand a copy of the reply by Farley Mowat to A. E. Porsild's review, and I would be prepared to put it on the record. However, I do not want to hold up the discussion in committee by doing so, because a good deal of Mr. Mowat's work is not directed to the main question but rather toward certain allegations made by Dr. Porsild to the effect that he, Mowat, was not qualified and that he did not spend time in the north country so as to be sure of what he was talking about.

[Mr. Adamson.]

However, there is this reply, and in the interests of fair play, if Dr. Porsild's denials are to be published, then this should be published too. It is available.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the section carry?

Mr. Knight: No. If the government is going to mimeograph Dr. Porsild's reply at public expense, then I suggest that it should mimeograph the other at the same time. It would require only a small addition. Does not the minister consider that that would be the fair way to handle the matter?

Mr. Lesage: I do not want to enter into this controversy, and I can see no reason at all why we should perpetuate it. Under the circumstances, since the hon. member objects, nothing will be mimeographed.

Mr. Churchill: Then are we simply left in the position that we have to accept the minister's statement that Mowat's book is false? That is what we are left with.

Mr. Adamson: I think that is a very unsatisfactory statement to leave on the record. The allegation is correct or it is false. There is expert testimony on it. I do think the department owes it to this house to have that expert testimony made available.

The Chairman: Perhaps I am somewhat at fault in this matter by allowing the discussion to have proceeded so far. We should have limited ourselves to a more strict consideration of the clauses themselves. However, my understanding is that the clause is carried.

Mr. Lesage: May I say that anyone who is interested in having any expert information has only to tell me or come to my office and he will easily get it.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Resignation or death of elected member.

Mr. Lesage: I have here an amendment corresponding to the one which was made when we dealt with new clause 1, and I would ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to move the amendment.

Mr. Harris: I move:

That Bill No. 77, an act to amend the acts respecting the Northwest Territories, be amended by adding the following as clause 7 thereof:

7. Paragraph (f) of section 2 of the Northwest Territories Act, chapter 331 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, is amended by deleting the words "Resources and Development" and substituting therefor the words "Northern Affairs and National Resources". And that the remaining clauses of part II of the bill be renumbered accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

The Chairman: Would hon. members mind if I kept to the numbers which appear in the bill as printed before us?

Mr. Lesage: No. Before we get to that point I have another amendment that I should like to ask one of my colleagues to move. It is an amendment corresponding to the one which was made in the first part of the bill, following the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition, which was accepted, to increase the number of elected representatives. I would ask my colleague, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, to move accordingly.

Mr. Harris: I move:

That clause 8, as renumbered, of Bill No. 77, an act to amend the acts respecting the Northwest Territories, be deleted and the following be substituted therefor:

8. (1) Subsection (1) of section 8 of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"8. (1) There shall be a council of the territories consisting of nine members, four of whom shall be elected to represent such electoral districts in the territories as are named and described by the commissioner in council, and five of whom shall be appointed by the governor in council."

(2) Subsection (5) of section 8 of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(5) Where an elected member resigns or dies while in office, the governor in council may appoint a member in his stead for the balance of his term of office."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

The Chairman: Clause 7 now becomes clause 9. Shall it carry?

Section agreed to.

The Chairman: Clause 8 now becomes clause 10; shall the clause carry?

Section agreed to.

The Chairman: Clause 9 now becomes clause 11; shall the clause carry?

Section agreed to.

The Chairman: Clause 10 now becomes clause 12; shall it carry?

Mr. Lesage: I have another amendment to move, because this new disposition providing that there shall be four elected representatives cannot come into force before the present council meets next June. This new provision for four elected representatives instead of three on the council should come into force when the present council is dissolved and writs are issued for a general election which will be held next September. That is why we have to provide that this part of the present amendment shall come into force on proclamation, which proclamation will be on the day the governor in council dissolves the present Northwest Territories council in order to hold an election next September. I would ask my colleague to move this amendment.

Mr. Harris: I move:

That Bill No. 77 be further amended by adding thereto immediately after clause 12 thereof, as renumbered, the following clause:

13. Section 48 of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"48. This act or any provision thereof shall come into force on a day or days to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council."

Mr. Knowles: This is new clause 13.

Mr. Lesage: New clause 13. It is consequential to the other amendments.

Mr. Adamson: That means that this act will come into force in two sections?

Mr. Knowles: A dozen sections.

Mr. Adamson: In a number of sections.

Mr. Lesage: That is right.

Mr. Adamson: The reason for this is the same as in redistribution legislation, that the redistribution act comes into force on the day parliament is dissolved.

Mr. Lesage: That is right.

Mr. Adamson: But the other sections can come into force at once?

Mr. Lesage: At the moment the Criminal Code comes into force. We are waiting for that to have chapter 331 come into force.

Mr. Adamson: Apparently the period of gestation and the coming into effect of that act will be as long as the period of gestation of the musk-ox.

Mr. Lesage: Well, it might be.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. Knowles: Next sitting.

Mr. Speaker: Next sitting.

CRIMINAL CODE

REVISION AND AMENDMENT OF EXISTING STATUTE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, December 15, consideration in committee of Bill No. 7, respecting the criminal law—Mr. Garson—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Criminal Code

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Garson: During the discussion of the last order of business a remark was made about a certain developmental period in relation to that piece of legislation. Bill No. 7 has had an even longer period of development. A royal commission was set up to inquire into it, on February 3, 1949.

That commission reported in January, 1952, and the first bill consolidating the Criminal Code was introduced in the other place in May, 1952. At the end of that session it died on the order paper in the other place. It was then redrafted in the light of discussions in the other place and its committee and reintroduced in the other place in the fall session of 1952. It was reported from the other place on December 16 of that year with no less than 116 amendments.

That bill then came to the House of Commons in the early part of 1953 and was sent to a special committee of this house where it received detailed consideration, section by section, from beginning to end; and it was reported, as those members of the present house who were in the last parliament will recall, with some 70-odd amendments in addition to those which had been made by the other place.

The bill therefore which we are about to consider in committee has already received a very great deal of consideration indeed; first by the royal commission for a period of some three years, then by the drafting officers of the Department of Justice, then by the other place in two separate legislative sessions and by its committees, and finally at the last session of parliament by a special committee of the House of Commons.

Hence it should not be surprising if it would be possible for us in considering the sections of the bill in committee of the whole perhaps to be able to approve of them in an expeditious manner. To that end I would suggest there is no better method than to follow the procedure that was followed with great success in the committees of the other place and in the special committee of the House of Commons, namely that the sections should be called one by one.

Our experience in these other committees was that the great majority of sections, being merely a re-enactment of sections of the present Criminal Code which have been the law for a long period of time, are passed without comment. When we came to some particular section or group of sections of a more serious character, such as, for example, those relating to sedition, treason, criminal liability and the like, if any of the opposition parties or for that matter the government members wish to examine such sections more carefully, we set them aside for this purpose. In the same way now, with a view perhaps to reconsidering the conclusion in relation to such clause which has been recommended by the special committee of the House of Commons, we might set aside such sections and come back and consider them after we had gone through the whole bill. In that way we can proceed with some expedition through the whole bill, and then come back and give regard to the difficult sections separately at the end.

I am sure I do not need to emphasize that the Criminal Code as we have it deals with a large group of subject matters that in the United Kingdom, which does not possess a criminal code, are covered by some 150-odd separate statutes. Each of these subject matters to which I have referred, such for example as treason and sedition, is most important. If therefore we feel that we should not accept the conclusions to which the committees of the other place and the special committee of the House of Commons have come, then I think we owe it to ourselves and the people who sent us here to give very serious consideration and subject to carefully considered debate every matter that is reserved in that way.

With that in view I would suggest that we might start consideration of the bill section by section. If there is any question in relation to any one of them which can be disposed of by brief discussion, then we might deal with those now and pass it. If we come to any question that promises to develop into a more serious debate, perhaps it would be better to set it aside and come back to it later on.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I can say at once on behalf of the official opposition that the procedure outlined by the minister is acceptable and conforms to the preliminary and informal discussions we have had outside the chamber as to the best and most efficient method of dealing with this very lengthy bill. I am grateful to the minister for making this statement because it will explain to the house and to the committee itself, and to others who may be watching our proceedings or be interested in them, what perhaps would otherwise be open to misunderstanding and subject to the interpretation that the members of the committee are not considering this serious and important legislation with the care it deserves.

What the minister has said makes it clear that what we are going through here is in fact the last stage of a process of consideration which has occupied some four or five years—

Mr. Garson: Five years.

Mr. Fulton: —and consideration by other bodies including this house and its own special committee. I would imagine that a large number of the sections will carry almost automatically, but that does not mean they have not already received the serious consideration which they deserve.

Mr. MacInnis: I think the method outlined by the minister will be entirely satisfactory to us. The minister was good enough to talk the matter over with me before the Christmas recess, and I indicated at that time that I thought it was the most satisfactory way of dealing with this very important bill.

May I say, as an incentive to the minister to do the best he can here, that if he will be as fair on this committee and as anxious to get every point of view as he was in the parliamentary committee last year, then we will get along very well indeed.

I would make only one further observation to the committee, and it is one that I found it necessary to make to the minister on several occasions during the sitting of the committee last year, namely that this is no mere consolidation. There is an enormous volume of new material in the new Criminal Code, and we should be very careful that in so far as this is a change from the old code it is a change for the better. I will say again that I have no doubt we can deal with this last phase of this very exhaustive examination of the matter satisfactorily.

Mr. Thomas: I just want to say that we have no objection whatsoever to examining this bill in committee as suggested by the minister. We feel there is no reason to hold up the non-contentious items. There is no reason why we cannot get through with them and hold up the others for further consideration. I will not say any more at the present time, but undoubtedly on some of the individual items I will have more to say.

Mr. Knowles: May I just make one point so it will be clear. My colleague the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway has already indicated that we are in agreement with the procedure suggested by the Minister of Justice. The one point I had in mind is this. Obviously there will be many sections, in view of the exhaustive consideration that has been given to them, which we will agree to without asking that they stand or without asking questions. However, it may develop that after some section has gone by, something that develops later will have a bearing on an earlier section or that a member will wish to say something about a section about which nothing was said in the earlier discussion. I am sure the minister is agreed—I know it from something he said to me privately—that so long as there is good faith on both sides we can go back to such a clause. I thought that point should be made clear now.

Mr. Garson: I am glad that my hon. friend has raised this point, because it was one that I did not cover in my own remarks and I think perhaps I should have done so. In the special committee at the last session, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway who was then the hon. member for Vancouver East has just said, we found that we were able to achieve a great deal of harmony in the committee by addressing ourselves to the task of getting as good a code as possible and not showing any interest whatsoever in scoring procedural victories over one another. I think I am correct in saying that at any time a member wished, for substantial reasons—and he never asked to do so for any other reasons—to reopen a section, there was never any hesitancy in so doing. We found that by opening up a section, instead of arguing whether it should be reopened, very often we could get the whole matter disposed of and get on to the next section in the time which would have been taken in arguing whether or not it should be reopened.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

The Chairman: Shall the section carry? Carried.

Mr. Fulton: Not too fast, Mr. Chairman. There are a great many pages.

The Chairman: Shall the section carry?

Section agreed to.

On section 3—General.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a question about paragraph 1 of section 3? This is not anything that is important enough—

The Chairman: Order. May I make this observation at this time. It will perhaps put the chairman in a difficult position to decide how long a debate is going to take place on any particular section. I was wondering whether it would not be a more satisfactory procedure simply to allow to stand a section on which any questions were to be asked.

The chairman cannot possibly anticipate in advance how long debate or questioning will take.

Mr. Knowles: With respect, Mr. Chairman, I think the minister's suggestion on that point should be considered. I think this section is a good example. The question I wish to ask about this section is just a question for the purposes of information so that I, as a layman, might understand the wording. I do not think it is worth letting it stand over. I believe hon. members themselves will know whether the questions or the points they are raising are likely to be contentious and prolong the debate, or whether they are really just something in passing.

Mr. Garson: Yes, Mr. Chairman; I think probably our experience in the other committee last year indicated that it was not hard to determine almost at once whether a certain topic could be concluded fairly quickly or was going to develop a long discussion. Our practice in the latter event was for the government to throw in the sponge at once by agreeing to set it to one side, and not waste time in carrying on an argument as to whether or not we should adjourn it. I think we might follow that practice in the present case. I think perhaps we can dispose of my hon. friend's question right away, if he will ask it.

Mr. Knowles: Yes. I am sure this is a question that will not make it necessary for the government to throw in the sponge; not yet, at any rate. That will come later.

Mr. Sinclair: Not in your time.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister tell us in simple language what section 3, paragraph 1, means? I wonder whether it would not have been possible to word the clause in a way that would have been clearer to some of us ordinary people?

Mr. Garson: At the risk of being thought facetious, Mr. Chairman, I think it means what it says.

Mr. Knowles: But does it say what it means?

Mr. Garson: Yes; it says what it means. Any difficulty that my hon. friend experiences in interpreting it arises from the fact that one of the functions which a legal draftsman has to perform carefully is to make sure that it does say what it means even though, in some cases, in doing so it may not be, on the surface, too intelligible. The paragraph reads as follows:

> For the purposes of this act a person shall be deemed to have been of a given age when the anniversary of his birthday, the number of which corresponds to that age, is fully completed, and until then to have been under that age.

When the anniversary of his birthday, the number of which—we will say the tenth anniversary of his birthday—corresponds to that age, then until that tenth birthday is reached, he is nine.

Mr. Knowles: Just a minute. I thought I understood it; but in view of the minister's explanation I am now not so sure. The minister said that until that person's tenth anniversary is reached or until his tenth birthday is reached, he is still nine.

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: What is the meaning of the words in the paragraph to suggest that it is until that anniversary is fully completed? When is the person ten years old in relation to his tenth birthday? Let us say a child's tenth birthday is on July 1. When is he ten years old?

Mr. Garson: At midnight of that day.

Mr. Knowles: Midnight of the 1st of July?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Midnight between July 1 and July 2?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Section 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Punishment only after conviction.

Mr. Fulton: I have a question which I think is a relatively simple one to answer. I am not raising it as a point of substance, although I would ask the minister just to give it something more than cursory consideration. I refer to subsection 2 which, according to the explanatory note, is new and which provides as follows:

> Subject to this act or any other act of the parliament of Canada, no person shall be convicted in Canada for an offence committed outside of Canada.

It may be—and I should be glad to know whether this is the case—that this merely puts into statutory form what is already followed in practice or perhaps is a rule of law. But if it is new legislation, I just wish the minister would tell us what was the reason for it. I think it could be urged, on superficial grounds at any rate, that there are cases in which it would be desirable to convict a person in Canada for an offence committed outside of Canada.

Mr. Garson: This provision puts into statutory form the practice which has always been followed; and in that sense, while the wording is new and the fact that there is a statutory provision is new, there is no change in the practice. If my hon. friend reads the provision he will see that it says:

Subject to this act or any other act of the parliament of Canada . . .

So if in any other given act it was desired to exercise our extraterritorial jurisdiction in relation to a certain offence, we could do so under that other act and it would not affect the operation of this section.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps this will dispose of it. Would it be the case that a person who contracts a bigamous marriage outside of Canada could on his return be convicted of bigamy? Let us say that he has married a girl in Canada, has gone away to some other country and contracted another marriage there and has now come back to Canada. Could we convict him of bigamy under the Criminal Code?

Mr. Garson: In a case of that sort my hon. friend would have to look at the provisions relating to bigamy in this act or any other act of the parliament of Canada. If the provisions relating to bigamy cover an extraterritorial crime then he could be convicted, but not otherwise. The nub of the matter is found in these words:

Subject to this act or any other act of the parliament of Canada, no person shall be convicted—

Mr. Brooks: What would be the situation with reference to a crime committed on a Canadian ship on the high seas?

Mr. Garson: Speaking offhand, I would think the Criminal Code of Canada would apply to offences committed upon a ship of Canadian registry on the high seas, because a ship of Canadian registry is a part of the Canadian realm.

Mr. Winch: On that very point I should like to get a clearer explanation as to what is meant by an offence on a ship of Canadian registry and what is meant by "on the high seas." I draw to the attention of the minister the case of Mr. Harold E. Graham, who was on board a tug operating outside of the harbour of Vancouver. The tug was tied up at the dock in Bellingham, Washington. As it was to be there for several hours the crew did a little imbibing, and while the tug was actually tied up at the dock in Bellingham two of the seamen got into a brawl. One man was knocked out. He was checked by the officers of the tug and there was no question that he had had a beating.

Several hours later the tug sailed from the port of Bellingham. One hour later the injured seaman was checked and the chief engineer reported to the captain of the tug that he thought the man was dead. The tug proceeded on its way until it reached Vancouver. A coroner's inquest was held at Vancouver, and according to the report of the doctor who did the autopsy the man had actually died before the tug had left the port of Bellingham. The man who committed the assault was charged in Canada and is now serving a term in the British Columbia penitentiary.

I should like to have that situation clarified. The man was on a tug which was tied up in a United States port. The brawl which resulted in the death of the man occurred in the United States. How does what the minister has said with respect to the interpretation of subsection 2 of section 5 apply to the situation I have described? The brawl and the homicide occurred in the United States but the man was tried, convicted and jailed in Canada.

Mr. Garson: It would be very difficult if not impossible for one to express an opinion—and that is really what my hon. friend is asking me to do—upon the facts of the case he has just recited without checking the facts very carefully as they were established in the legal proceedings which subsequently took place in Canada. If my hon. friend is right in the latter part of his statement, when I understood him to say that the man was killed not on the Canadian tug but on United States soil—

Mr. Winch: On the tug but at the dock.

Mr. Garson: Right; but if he is on the tug it is one thing and if he is on United States soil it is another. In any event, with respect, I do not think this matter has any particular relevance to section 5, subsection 2, because all it says is that subject to the provisions of this act or any other act of parliament, like the Canada Shipping Act, which may create extraterritorial jurisdiction over offences committed outside of Canada, no person shall be convicted in Canada for an offence committed outside of Canada. But I am sure my hon. friend will find, if he examines the proceedings in Vancouver with care, that they were taken under some act of this parliament.

For another reason, my hon. friend will see that the case he cites has no relevancy to this particular section. As he can see from the opposite page, this is a new provision, and as the bill has not yet been passed this new clause has not gone into effect and it is not yet law.

Mr. Winch: I know that, but I had reference to the minister's statement that what was being put into the statute now was what had been the custom in the past.

Mr. Garson: What had been the custom, subject to the various acts. In other words in the past it has not been the custom to charge people with such offences committed outside of Canada; and the reason an offence was charged in the case to which my hon. friend has referred is presumably because it was covered by some existing statute law which he has not cited to us.

Section 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Application of criminal law of England.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Section 7, subsection 1, reads as follows:

> The criminal law of England that was in force in a province immediately before the coming into force of this act continues in force in the province except as altered, varied, modified—

And so on. What has the minister to say with reference to this section in so far as the law of mischief in the matter of peeping Toms is concerned? Will the law against peeping Toms be in effect? The minister will remember that there was a case which came before the Supreme Court of Canada. In view of the decision in that case what change, if any, will be effected as a result of the enactment of this new section?

Mr. Garson: The law with regard to peeping Toms is covered in new section 162 of the present bill. When that section goes into effect, this offence will be defined by it and not by the law of England.

Section 7 reads:

> 7. (1) The criminal law of England that was in force in a province immediately before the coming into force of this act continues in force in the province except as altered, varied, modified or affected by this act or any other act of the parliament of Canada.
> (2) Every rule and principle of the common law that renders any circumstance a justification or excuse for an act or a defence to a charge continues in force and applies in respect of proceedings for an offence under this act or any other act of the parliament of Canada, except in so far as they are altered by or are inconsistent with this act or any other act of the parliament of Canada.

In other words, as I indicated on the second reading of the bill, so far as procedure law is concerned, and to use the language of the bill, any circumstances which constitute "a justification or excuse", the English law in relation to these is retained, but not as to the definition of criminal offences. By means of this present consolidation we are providing that after it has been passed there will be no offences for which a Canadian can be tried except such as have been defined by this legislation, or other acts of this parliament.

The Chairman: It being five o'clock, the house will proceed with the consideration of public bills.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE QUORUM OF HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house resumed, from Tuesday, January 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Knowles for the second reading of Bill No. 81, to amend the British North America Acts 1867 to 1952, with respect to the quorum of the House of Commons.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker—

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I take it, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member is about to speak, and that would close the debate on second reading of this bill. I was hoping that earlier in the course of his remarks on the bill he might have indicated a desire to deal with it in the same manner as we did on the former occasion, namely that we should have the matter considered by the committee on rules. This committee, having had two or three years of rather extended consideration of some factors in connection with our procedure, I should think would be prepared to deal seriously and at some length with the matters that come before it. For that reason I would hope we would not make a decision on this particular point in the house now, but rather deal with it as part of the larger picture and as part of the effort to obtain a more expeditious procedure in the house.

I repeat my request, therefore, that the hon. member give consideration to following that course. If he chooses not to do so I feel that I should dispose of it in the same manner as I did on the former occasion. I leave it to him to decide at the moment which he would prefer to do.

Mr. Knowles: On a point of privilege, if I may be considered as making an interjection in the remarks of the minister, I would point out that it is not within my power to move that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the committee on procedure; that is something the minister could do. The minister said he was hoping I would express the same wish concerning the course to be followed in connection with this bill that I expressed last year. If my memory serves me correctly it was the minister who expressed the view that the subject matter should be referred to the committee on procedure, and I went along with the idea. I can only say, Mr. Speaker, that if the same proposition is made again by the minister I would give it the consideration it merits.

Mr. Harris: On the point of order, perhaps without actually so moving and in order not to dispose of the bill—I would prefer not to do that for the hon. member's sake—would he consider merely allowing the motion to stand on the understanding that the matter would be discussed with the rules committee reasonably soon?

Mr. Knowles: If you would overlook the impropriety of this back and forth discussion, Mr. Speaker, I may say that I welcome the suggestion the minister is now making. I feel it is a better one than was made last year. So far as I am concerned, if he wishes to move the adjournment of the debate or if he wishes to let any other member speak and then move the adjournment of the debate, I would be prepared to follow that course and let the motion for second reading of the bill stand on the order paper pending a discussion of the question of the quorum in the committee on rules, in view of the undertaking the minister has given that we will study the question in that committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand that the bill cannot stand. The debate will either have to proceed or be adjourned.

Mr. Harris: I move the adjournment of the debate, Mr. Speaker.

On motion of Mr. Harris the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The business under private and public bills having been disposed of, the house will resume the business which was under consideration at five o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE

REVISION AND AMENDMENT OF EXISTING STATUTE

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 7, respecting the criminal law—Mr. Garson—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On section 7—Application of criminal law of England.

The Chairman: We were considering section 7. Had the explanation been completed on section 7?

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Criminal offences to be under law of Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like an explanation from the minister concerning the reason for this new section.

Mr. Garson: This is a continuation of the idea that was considered in part by the preceding section, concerning which the hon. member asked some questions. This is the section which states that from now on all of the offences for which a Canadian can be tried must be those which are covered by this bill. From now on it will not be possible, in Canada, to charge a Canadian with a common law offence. If the crime for which he is to be charged cannot be found within the limits of the Canadian Criminal Code or another act of parliament, then he cannot be charged at all.

It might be thought, perhaps, that in adopting the new rule we were leaving some gap that was formerly covered by common law offences. Before we put this section into the bill we went carefully over the records and checked with the provincial law enforcement officers to get a full list of all the common law crimes that had been charged in Canada since the code was first passed in 1892. All of those common law crimes which have been charged in the interval have now been incorporated in the present Criminal Code bill. The only possible gap there might now be would be if there were some form of common law crime which we have not had occasion to charge in past Canadian history. We think if a case of that kind were to come up—and it seems most unlikely—it might be better at that time to bring in an amendment to the Criminal Code making provision for such an offence. For we believe if we are to have a Criminal Code in Canada it is desirable that we should be in a position to say to all Canadians, "Here is an exhaustive list of Canadian crimes. Unless the offence can be found in this code it cannot be charged."

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is a very commendable purpose, but I find it difficult to understand section 7 (1) when read in conjunction with section 8. Section 7 (1) is in these words:

> The criminal law of England that was in force in a province immediately before the coming into force of this act continues in force in the province except as altered, varied, modified or affected by this act or any other act of the parliament of Canada.

And section 8 is in these words:

> Notwithstanding anything in this act or any other act no person shall be convicted
> (a) of an offence at common law,
> (b) of an offence under an act of the parliament of England, or of Great Britain, or of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or
> (c) of an offence under an act or ordinance in force in any province—

And so on. How does the minister make those two sections coincide with each other?

Mr. Garson: I thought I had already done so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, I did not follow the minister in that.

Mr. Garson: Then I shall try to repeat, perhaps more briefly, what I said before. Section 7 says that the criminal law of England is in force with regard to all matters of procedure and evidence, and those circumstances which constitute a justification or excuse. But so far as the definition of crimes is concerned, section 8 says that from and after the passage of this bill the law of England shall not be in effect in Canada as regards the definition of crimes. It is in effect for procedural matters, but not for the definition of crimes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I can understand the purpose, but I am wondering whether the wording covers that purpose. Section 7 (1) does not say anything about procedure. It simply says that the criminal law of England that was in force in a province immediately before the coming into force of this act continues in force in the province except as altered, and so on.

Mr. Garson: Except as altered, modified or affected by this act or any other act of the parliament of Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Surely that is a most roundabout wording to achieve a narrow result. I can understand the purpose of section 7 (1), and that section 7 (2) is a matter of procedure. But when we read section 7 (1) in conjunction with section 8, then it seems to go a long way around to express a very small thing, and with the use of a lot of unnecessary words. Who drafted this new section? Was it the law officers, or was it drafted by the commission?

Mr. Garson: The whole bill, including the section to which my hon. friend has referred, was first considered by the royal commission, whose names I have already placed on the record.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I know that.

Mr. Garson: These were men of great eminence in the field, as I am sure my hon. friend would be the first to admit. Then after they had drafted the bill it was gone over by the parliamentary draftsmen in the Department of Justice. Then the bill, including these sections, went to the other place, and was considered there at great length by the banking and commerce committee of the other place, and particularly by a subcommittee of that committee consisting of Senators Salter Hayden, J. W. deB. Farris and A. W. Roebuck.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is immaterial; they are all good men.

Mr. Fulton: It is conceded that they were good counsel. The minister need not go into that.

Mr. Garson: After it was considered by this subcommittee composed of eminent counsel, as my hon. friends agree, it then came before the House of Commons special committee and was considered at great length by it. We can only take the position at the moment that the wording which my hon. friend criticizes has received the approval of these bodies to which I have referred. It would not be in the form in which it appears here if it had not.

Section agreed to.

Sections 9 to 15 inclusive agreed to.

On section 16—Insanity.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is one of the sections which deserve consideration, and cannot be carried quickly. It covers the whole defence of insanity, and is one of the most important sections in the Criminal Code.

Mr. Fulton: Before the minister deals with any particular point of view, would he tell us when it is anticipated that the royal commission to which this subject will be referred will be set up. Has he in mind any of the persons who will be appointed to it?

Mr. Garson: Yes. As the hon. member for Prince Albert has said, this is an important section in that it sets out the defence of insanity. As the hon. member for Kamloops has indicated, it is a matter which we had proposed to remit to a royal commission for consideration. It is our wish to set up that commission at the earliest possible moment.

I may say that already I have been discussing the matter with a man whose eminence and abilities in our opinion entitle him to consideration as a possible chairman of the royal commission, and I have discussed with him the possibility of finding time from his other preoccupations to act for us in this capacity. I have received a tentatively favourable answer, but he has not been able to assure me formally that he can act until he takes up with his colleagues the matter of whether he can get the necessary time off. However, as soon as he, or another person of equal ability, agrees, we can proceed to collect the other personnel. We do wish to set up the commission as soon as we possibly can.

Mr. Brooks: Is it possible that the commission might recommend amendments to this section? Perhaps it would be better if it were allowed to stand.

Mr. Garson: It is possible; but on second reading of the bill I indicated that when the present bill comes into effect it will abolish the existing code, and we cannot leave a gap in the law on this subject. Therefore I suggested to hon. members that these subject matters which are being remitted, in the one case to the royal commission and in three others to a special parliamentary joint committee, might be passed in their present form in order that we should have that part of the law covered; and then when we get the reports back from the royal commission and the parliamentary committee we would proceed to bring in amendments to carry into effect their recommendations.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In connection with the royal commission, can the minister take the committee into his confidence a little and say how many members are going to be on this commission, and whether it is intended to have on the commission at least as many who have been outstanding counsel for the defence as those who have been crown counsel; for this is the type of section that deserves the consideration of a commission on which neither crown nor defence shall be overweighted.

This is a section that more and more is affording a defence to those charged particularly with capital offences. The reason for that is simply the fact, as someone said the other day—and I am not referring to another debate, Mr. Chairman—that if juries can find reasonable grounds for believing that insanity exists to such an extent as to have dethroned the reason of the person charged with the offence, they bring in verdicts of manslaughter even when manslaughter ought not to be the verdict, but in point of fact the verdict should be not guilty by reason of insanity. Certainly the law of insanity as applied today does not meet with the advances that have been made in recent years in the matter of mental diseases.

This is a section that will deserve the serious attention not only of the committee of parliament and of the royal commission that is to be set up, but the utmost consideration on the part of penologists and those who are specialists in mental diseases, so as to bring the criminal law up to date. As the minister knows, this is one of the major means of exculpation that exist today in the criminal law.

Mr. Garson: I am in complete agreement with my hon. friend as to the importance of this subject. We are hopeful that we can get men—and we think on this commission we should have at least one lady—of real eminence in their fields. We think, although this is not a final decision by any means, that the number of the royal commission might properly be seven. We have no idea of making it up entirely of lawyers—either for the prosecution or for the defence—because we think that there should be at least one psychiatrist upon it, in view of the fact that the subject of psychiatry is involved.

In our search for proper candidates for such a commission we not only have to find men and women who are properly equipped, but in these busy days it is sometimes very difficult to find those who are properly qualified and who also have the necessary time which they can devote to work of this sort. Sometimes a first-rate potential appointee simply cannot get the necessary leisure from his other duties in order to discharge a task of this sort. We want to have legal representation on it; we want to have the fair sex represented; we want to have psychiatrists represented. But we do not think it would be appropriate to have the commission made up of psychiatrists and lawyers. And seven is the number we have in mind.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have one other question. Without identifying the person to whom the chairmanship has been tentatively offered, would it be an improper question to ask whether or not that person is a member of the judiciary?

Mr. Garson: I mean no offence to my hon. friend, but it would be an improper question, because it might indicate some time later on that the candidate whom we finally selected was not the first choice.

Mr. Fulton: Would it be appropriate to suggest that this section stand? I do not want to press that, but I want to make certain other observations with regard to insanity, and I should like to ask some questions as to the scope of the intended reference to the royal commission and so on. I do not wish to delay the committee. While I do not want to go into technicalities and the law of insanity, because it is going to be referred to the royal commission, there are those aspects as to the scope of the reference, whether insanity with its relationship to the defence of provocation is also going to be referred, and so on. So it might be better to have this section stand.

Mr. Garson: I have no objection. This is in accord with the spirit in which we are approaching the whole thing. I am sure my hon. friend is not urging that we should stand it over permanently.

Mr. Fulton: No, just for later discussion.

The Chairman: Section 16 stands.

On section 17—Compulsion by threats.

Mr. Nesbitt: There are a number of offences listed in this section which are separate. In spite of that, compulsion is no excuse for an offence. I should like to ask this question. Would there be some merit in separating the words "immediate death or grievous bodily harm"? A person may believe that the person compelling him may carry out the crime of murder, let us say, at the point of a gun, and that may well be an excuse for committing this offence; whereas the threat of grievous bodily harm could very well not be accepted. Can the minister tell us whether any consideration has been given to that? This puts the person in a position where he might commit the crime of arson, of robbery or even of murder merely in order to save his own life? Has that been considered?

Mr. Garson: Perhaps the question of my hon. friend might be put in this form. This new section 17, apart from one or two small consequential changes, is in substance identical with old section 20, which apparently through the years has stood the test of time. We thought if it had been challenged, or any difficulty had been found with it, that it would likely have had at least decided cases that would have resulted in our changing the wording somewhat. But we followed what I think is the right practice in that the sections of the old code that have been found to be workable have been retained, and it is only those in connection with which difficulty has been experienced that we have changed. We have not changed for the sake of changing.

Section agreed to.

On section 18—Compulsion of wife.

Mr. Winch: Should the woman not have some protection?

Mr. Garson: In section 18? You mean both ways; should the man not have the same protection?

Mr. Winch: Yes.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Garson: With ladies in the committee I feel rather shy about expressing this thought, that I think this is a reflection of the old theory that a man can compel his wife but not vice versa.

Section agreed to.

Sections 19 to 31 inclusive agreed to.

On section 32—Use of force to suppress riot.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps the minister will agree to let sections 32 and 33 stand for more complete discussion.

Mr. Garson: Yes.

The Chairman: Sections 32 and 33 stand.

Sections 34 to 45 inclusive agreed to.

On section 46—Treason.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I submit this should stand.

Mr. Garson: I was about to suggest that sections 46, 47 and 48, being a group related one to the other, should stand if that is agreeable.

The Chairman: Agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Section 49 agreed to.

On section 50—Assisting alien enemy to leave Canada.

Mr. Knowles: I think this should stand.

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Section 51 agreed to.

On section 52—Sabotage.

Mr. Knowles: I think this also should stand.

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Sections 53 to 56 inclusive agreed to.

On section 57—Offences in relation to members of R.C.M. Police.

Mr. Knowles: Section 57 stand.

Sections 58 and 59 agreed to.

Mr. Knowles: Sections 60, 61 and 62 stand.

Section 63 agreed to.

Mr. Knowles: Sections 64, 65, 66, 67 and 68 I think should stand and be considered in relation to sections 32 and 33 which were set aside earlier.

The Chairman: Sections 64 to 68 inclusive stand.

Mr. Knowles: I am sorry; I should have included section 69.

The Chairman: Section 69 stand.

Sections 70 to 76 inclusive agreed to.

On section 77—Duty of care re explosive.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On section 77, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister why the new section was not left to common law rule. Before the establishment of this section was this not the rule of law under the Criminal Code, and why was it necessary to make a new section?

Mr. Garson: When one started out to make the Canadian Criminal Code sufficiently exhaustive to cover all Canadian crimes it was necessary in connection with those crimes relating to dangerous substances to insert section 77, as having a necessary bearing upon the definition of crimes relating to such substances.

Section agreed to.

Sections 78 to 80 inclusive agreed to.

On section 81—Engaging in prize fight.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, section 81 reads as follows:

(1) Every one who

(a) engages as a principal in a prize fight,

(b) advises, encourages or promotes a prize fight, or

(c) is present at a prize fight as an aid, second, surgeon, umpire, backer, or reporter, is guilty of an offence . . .

"Prize fight" is defined as:

. . . an encounter or fight with fists or hands between two persons who have met for that purpose by previous arrangement . . .

What is the difference between a prize fight and a boxing contest? I see no reason why this section should be continued at all. At the time it was actually made law it was a serious offence to hold prize fights and in 1913 or 1914, I believe it was, I remember the occasion in Calgary when Arthur Pelky was indicted for manslaughter arising out of a prize fight held with the then champion of the world, Luther McCarthy. As far as the jury were concerned they said the law was there, but they brought in an acquittal. I would ask the minister how many times this section has been used since 1914, and why it is necessary to incorporate a section in the law which to all intents and purposes has no application today.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I think if my hon. friend had just kept on reading the section—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I know the section.

Mr. Garson: —beyond the point where he left off he would have found the answer to his question. Perhaps I had better read the whole of paragraph 2 of section 81, which reads as follows:

In this section, "prize fight"—

—the participation in which is the offence specified in the first subsection of this section—

—means an encounter or fight with fists or hands between two persons who have met for that purpose by previous arrangement made by or for them, but a boxing contest between amateur sportsmen,—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, between amateur sportsmen.

Mr. Garson: Yes, but just let me finish.

—but a boxing contest between amateur sportsmen, where the contestants wear boxing gloves of not less than five ounces each in weight—

Now here it is here.

—or any boxing contest held with the permission or under the authority of an athletic board or commission or similar body established by or under the authority of the legislature of a province for the control of sport within the province, shall be deemed not to be a prize fight.

In other words, in the course of consolidating the code we have dropped the present sections 104, 107, 108, 627, and 628 because they are no longer of any use, and because most boxing contests are now staged under the authority of a provincial boxing commission. The only residual offence to which this section relates is a professional prize fight staged outside the authority and control of a provincial commission. I am sure my hon. friend would agree it is desirable, if we are going to control boxing, that we be able to prohibit all unauthorized contests.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would like to ask the minister how many provinces have no athletic boards today. Are there not only three provinces with this type of board or commission?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I cannot answer that question, but if my hon. friend suggests three, my view would be that there were more. There must be commissions of that sort in British Columbia, Alberta, I think Saskatchewan, certainly in Manitoba and Ontario, and they have prize fights in Quebec.

Mr. Knowles: Prize fights?

Mr. Garson: I beg your pardon; boxing contests within the meaning of the act.

Mr. Knowles: You will be in a fight if you say that.

Mr. MacInnis: I do not think the minister has made that section very clear, to me at any rate. It would appear a prize fight means an encounter where boxing gloves are not used, and in the latter part of the section it states that in a boxing contest gloves must be used. I do not know very much about prize fights, but I understand that in all prize fights today boxing gloves are used. I do not see the difference, since all boxing contests today are fought for a prize. There is a cash prize for one person, or it is divided between the two. Under this section could a prize fight with gloves between two professional boxers be allowed if authorized by these boxing commissions?

Mr. Garson: Yes, I think so. It would mean that—> . . . any boxing contest held with the permission or under the authority of an athletic board or commission or similar body established by or under the authority of the legislature of a province for the control of sport within the province, shall be deemed not to be a prize fight.

In other words, if amateur sportsmen desire to get together at the Y.M.C.A., at an athletic club, a boys' camp or something of that sort, not for money but as amateurs and have a boxing match, and wear gloves of at least five ounces in weight, they are not covered by the section. Nor does the section cover contests which are held under the auspices of a provincial commission set up for that purpose. However, other contests are covered.

With his usual acumen my hon. friend has put his finger on the point. If money is involved, if they are not amateurs, and if they do not have the authority of the provincial commission, then they have committed an offence under the section. The purpose of the section, having regard to the point which was raised by my hon. friend the member for Prince Albert, is to cover all efforts to stage a professional prize fight which has not been authorized by a provincial boxing commission.

On section 84—Carrying concealed weapon.

Mr. Fulton: I have no specific amendment to suggest or anything of that nature, but I want to ask the minister whether he is able to say what consideration was given, as a matter of general policy, to making it more difficult to obtain pistols or revolvers. While I observe that section 84 continues section 117 and therefore is not any new law, it seems to me to make it easier or to lay down a certain immunity for a person who carries a pistol or revolver, whatever may be the intent with which he is carrying it. I should have thought that it might be somewhat more difficult for a person who has a nefarious intention to carry out that intention with a shotgun than with a pistol or a revolver; yet he is prohibited from carrying a shotgun, even a sawed-off shotgun. In other words if he can conceal his shotgun he might carry out his intention with immunity.

Mr. Garson: No. If my hon. friend will look at the next clause, he will see that that matter is covered.

Mr. Fulton: No.

Mr. Garson: It is covered in section 85.

Mr. Fulton: Section 85 simply makes it an offence to carry a sawed-off shotgun with a barrel less than 20 inches in length.

Mr. Garson: It is only a sawed-off shotgun that could be tucked inside one's coat.

Mr. Fulton: That is the point exactly. The other type of weapon cannot be concealed. A pistol or a revolver is easily concealed. Therefore I am wondering why section 84 was not changed. A pistol or revolver can be concealed very easily. It seems to me that the person who carries a pistol or a revolver should be under some onus to explain for what purpose he is carrying it. He is not guilty of an offence under section 84. Perhaps, to make the matter clearer, I should put it in this way. By section 84 he is absolved from committing an offence when he carries a pistol or a revolver.

Mr. Garson: No. Section 84 provides as follows:

> Every one who carries concealed an offensive weapon other than a pistol or revolver is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Garson: But in another part of this little code on firearms my hon. friend will see that, in order to carry a pistol or a revolver, he must get a permit from the police to do so.

Mr. Fulton: I know that. But in order to carry a shotgun you have to have a licence.

Mr. Garson: No; not a shotgun.

Mr. Fulton: Not under this section, but under most provincial statutes you do.

Mr. Garson: Oh.

Mr. Fulton: The point I am raising is the general point as to whether it would not be desirable to make it more difficult to obtain pistols and revolvers. I know there are some authorized revolver clubs. I am not suggesting that their activities should be curtailed in any way. I am really asking what consideration was given to making it more difficult to obtain pistols and revolvers in Canada.

Mr. Garson: As a member of the last parliament my hon. friend will recall that in the year 1951, if I remember aright, I brought into the house all these sections dealing with firearms that we now see in this new Bill 7 pretty much unchanged. At that time this code of law dealing with the possession and the registration of firearms had been passed upon by the mounted police in consultation with the various police forces in Canada. I think it was in view of this recent consideration of the whole subject matter that the royal commission and all the subsequent bodies who have considered this Bill No. 7 thought the law in this respect was quite up to date and hence left it pretty much in the form in which it was brought into the house in 1951.

Mr. Winch: I should like to ask a question with regard to section 84. Having regard to the reading of the section, what is the position of a man out in the woods who has a hunting knife underneath his mackinaw? Is that against the law here? I know that is the regular thing out in the woods. It might also be interesting to know what is the position of the policeman, because he has a baton underneath his coat and that is described as an offensive weapon, I know.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will look at page 4 in the interpretation section at the beginning of the bill, he will see that "offensive weapon" is defined. It will be found at the bottom of page 4, paragraph 29. The definition reads as follows:

> "offensive weapon" or "weapon" means
> (a) anything that is designed to be used as a weapon and
> (b) anything that a person uses or intends to use as a weapon, whether or not it is designed to be used as a weapon, and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, includes a firearm, air-gun or air-pistol and ammunition for a firearm, air-gun or air-pistol;

It may be the case that, under that definition, the possession of the knife would be regarded as an offensive weapon, although I wonder. Would one consider that the knife which the person my hon. friend has in mind, out in a camp and which he has in his pack for perfectly peaceful purposes, was designed to be used as a weapon? Would he say that knife was designed to be used as a weapon? I suppose that argument could be made, but I cannot conceive of any prosecution ever being launched against such an individual unless it was under some set of circumstances in which it appeared that he intended to use it as such. I do not think there is much likelihood, for example, that if a chap out hunting has a hunting knife along with him to skin a moose he has killed, the mounted police are going to come along, pick him up and charge him with carrying an offensive weapon. It depends on the circumstances of the individual case.

Sections 85 and 86 agreed to.

On section 87—While attending public meeting.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am interested in knowing the reason for the need for protection of those who are at a public meeting. Section 87 reads as follows:

> Notwithstanding anything in this act, every one who has an offensive weapon in his possession while he is attending or is on his way to attend a public meeting is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

This is a new section. I was wondering whether the law previously lacked any provision designed to protect those who are at public meetings, or the reason for this new section.

Mr. Garson: Well—

Mr. Knowles: Does that include rotten tomatoes?

Mr. Garson: My answer to that would be an unhesitating no. A provision to this effect was in the law prior to 1951. It was then removed, and it has been thought desirable to restore it. As to its purpose, I think it is obvious from a perusal of the section. It is to guard against people carrying offensive weapons to public meetings.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Possibly the minister will explain what was the justification for removal in 1951 and the need for restoration in 1954. Has anything happened in the interval? Have there been any incidents at public meetings for which there was no applicable punishment for the carrying of such instruments?

Mr. Garson: The note I have on this clause is that it was felt that persons should be prohibited from attending public meetings while armed, whether or not they had permits to carry revolvers. A man having a permit to carry a revolver or pistol could, in the absence of a clause like this, rely upon his permit to carry it to a public meeting. Under section 619 justices had power to seize offensive weapons from persons attending public meetings. Sections 620 and 621 provided for the restoration of such weapons after seizure. It was felt that these weapons should not be restored but should be forfeited.

As the result of the inclusion of this section, however, sections 619, 620 and 621 have been dropped. In other words, instead of having the provision that was in the law previously, namely that a justice of the peace could go and take these weapons away from a man, it was thought that there was more common sense in saying that he could not take them there in the first place, and that if he did it would be an offence.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is it to protect political speakers?

Mr. Garson: The hon. member for Prince Albert raises an important point. He asks whether it is designed to protect political speakers. If that were so I would say it would be a very laudable objective.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pouliot: I regret very much that this clause is new. It should have been in force at the time my father was in politics, when Sir Charles Tupper was prime minister of Canada and the Intercolonial Railway kept men at the Riviere du Loup shops to use crowbars and other iron bars to disturb Liberal meetings. That was the way the Tories acted at that time, and this provision should have been in force then.

Mr. Knowles: Since this question has been raised, if one were to go to a Liberal meeting armed with a copy of the Liberal platform for 1919 for the purpose of throwing it at the speaker would that be considered an offensive weapon?

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will examine the definition of "offensive weapon" on page 4 of the bill he will see that it does not include what he thinks is an offensive weapon.

Mr. Knowles: In other words it was not intended to use the 1919 Liberal platform.

Mr. Campbell: I should like to ask the minister how strict the regulations are with respect to the issuing of permits. It seems to me that some people are able to get hold of revolvers too easily. What are the regulations? Is it easy for me or anybody else to go and get a revolver?

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend, having the bill before him, will look at page 31 he will see in sections 93, 94 and 95, which take up a page and a half, the procedure that has to be followed to secure a permit. I think by the time he has read those sections he will come to the conclusion that it is not an easy matter.

Section agreed to.

On section 88—Delivering firearms to minors.

Mr. Winch: I am not quite certain that this is the right place, but I think it is the only place I can raise a matter upon which I should like the minister to comment. I raise it under section 88 because in answer to a previous question he was in doubt but he thought perhaps a knife would come under the definition of "offensive weapon" on page 4.

Section 88 deals with the selling, giving, lending or transferring of certain types of offensive weapons to children. Has any consideration been given under this section or otherwise to dealing on the same basis with the selling, giving, transferring and lending to children of these vicious things called spring knives or switch knives?

In recent years a serious problem has developed across Canada—I know it has in the west—in that some young punks, whether because of the type of literature and comic books they read or the type of training they receive, think they are big shots and gangsters and carry in their pockets not only on the streets but to school functions these very vicious spring knives. I know there have been incidents in Vancouver where at a school dance, school reception or during the recess period some young boy did not like the attitude of somebody else and whipped out one of these definitely dangerous and offensive weapons.

From my own personal knowledge I know that young boys have been severely slashed and required a great many stitches and other medical attention to close their wounds. I understand that at the moment there is no provision whereby the authorities can deal with such situations and stop these young people from having these dangerous weapons in their possession. I should like to know whether or not the minister or his department have had this matter brought to their attention and if they feel, although it may be a rather difficult problem, that there is any way under this or any other section by which this situation can be dealt with.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Fulton: Six o'clock.

Mr. Garson: Perhaps I might attempt to answer this question. I would refer my hon. friend to the definition of "offensive weapon" which means "anything that is designed to be used as a weapon". I think he would agree that a spring knife is not for manicuring. Without any question it is an offensive weapon. If he will look at page 28 he will see that section 82 reads this way:

> Every one who carries or has in his custody or possession an offensive weapon for a purpose dangerous to the public peace or for the purpose of committing an offence is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for five years.

He will also see that section 84 reads this way:

> Every one who carries concealed an offensive weapon other than a pistol or revolver is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

Mr. Winch: What about section 88? It is not mentioned as an offensive weapon in section 88. That is my point. It just mentions firearms.

Mr. Garson: That is quite right, but it does cover the case to which I understood my hon. friend was referring, where these young chaps come along, flash these knives at a dance or a gathering of that sort and carve up their associates with them.

They would clearly come under section 84 and possibly section 82, because the weapons which they had would be offensive weapons. Under section 84 they would be concealed weapons, and if used for a purpose dangerous to the public peace they would come under section 82.

Mr. Winch: It would not come under section 88, on the basis of sale?

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The Chairman: When the committee rose at six o'clock section 87 had been carried. We will now proceed with the consideration of section 88.

On section 88—Delivering firearms to minors.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, continuing the discussion on section 88 following the intermission, I have given a great deal of thought to the statement of the minister as to how other sections of the bill cover varying aspects of the problem where a person may have in his possession a knife or, in particular, a spring knife. I am certain the minister is correct in his interpretation of the other sections, but I should like again to draw to the minister's attention the fact that the point I have in mind is not covered by section 88, because it will be seen that it is in these words:

> Every one who sells, barters, gives, lends, transfers or delivers a firearm, air gun or air pistol or ammunition therefor to a person under——a certain age. This section does not use the expression "offensive weapon" but merely has reference to a certain type of firearm, air gun or air pistol. I am strongly of the opinion, in view of what many of us have read and know in connection with the use of the type of knife I have described, that it is an offensive weapon. I feel if it is wrong to have other types of offensive weapons sold to those under a certain age, the minister might consider some slight alteration in the wording of section 88 so as to introduce into the Criminal Code an additional deterrent to the use and sale of these spring knives.

Has the minister given any more thought to this matter, and does he not consider this would be the logical place to introduce words to take care of the situation I have described? While it might not be a major deterrent, I believe he recognizes the fact that it is a help.

Mr. Garson: Upon reflection, and after listening to what the hon. member has just said, I am of the view there is considerable merit in the point he makes. I am wondering however whether it would necessarily be limited in its application to persons under the age of 14 years. I am wondering if the hon. member would leave the matter with me, with a view to including the substance of what he has in mind either in section 88 or in some other section that might be even more appropriate.

The Chairman: Shall section 88 stand?

Mr. Nesbitt: I wonder if I might ask a question—

The Chairman: If the section is to stand, should not the question be asked when we are dealing with it later.

Mr. Garson: If the hon. member wishes to make a suggestion I would rather have it now so we could consider them at the same time.

Mr. Nesbitt: This section states clearly that everyone who sells, barters, gives, lends, and so on, to a person under the age of 14 years, who does not have a valid permit, is guilty of an offence. Has the minister considered whether the question of motive or intent of the person selling could be used as a defence? In other words, if we refer to section 150, and particularly to subsection 5 which deals with comics, we see that it says:

> For the purposes of this section the motives of an accused are irrelevant.

Then subsection 6 of section 150 states that the fact that an accused was not aware of the objectionable material in the crime comics is not a defence.

Would the minister consider in this case that if an accused sold an article to a minor, the question as to whether or not he thought the purchaser was under age should also be considered, or allowed as a defence? The burden of proof in that instance would not be on the accused, to show that the purchaser was not under 14 years.

Mr. Garson: I do not think there is any analogy between sections 88 and 150. Section 150 deals with crime comics and obscene literature, and there was a special reason connected with the contents of that section which made it necessary to include the subsection to which the hon. member has referred. But so far as section 88 is concerned I do not think there is any considerable element of mens rea. It says that everyone who sells, barters, gives or lends to a person under 14 years is guilty of an offence, and I think the offence would be complete if it were simply proved that this was done. Proof of age would be established in the same way it is always done in connection with sections of this nature.

Mr. Nesbitt: Once the crown had established the fact that an offence had been committed, and that it was in respect of a person under 14 years, would not the normal defence be that the accused did not know, or that he had no way of knowing? Should not the burden be placed on the person who is selling, just as it is under the liquor control act in Ontario, where a waiter selling to a person under 21 years of age has first to satisfy himself as to that person's age?

Mr. Garson: I must say I am not temperamentally enthusiastic, as a general rule, about shifting the burdens of proof to accused persons. I think in most cases magistrates would not have too much difficulty in reaching opinions on the facts, as to whether accused persons have given satisfactory explanations for having sold to other persons under the age of 14 years.

Mr. Fulton: We must keep in mind that it is the Criminal Code which is up for review. If it is felt to be an offence to sell a dangerous weapon to a person under 14 years, I wonder if it would not be well, while the minister is considering this section, as he has indicated he will, for him also to consider that there should not be left open to an accused person the defence of saying, "I did not know the boy was under 14 years." After all, if a person is accused of the offence, he is accused of selling a dangerous weapon to a minor, to a child; and it seems to me that when people undertake to sell dangerous weapons, and when they are going to make a profit out of selling them, there should be cast upon them the absolute duty of ascertaining that the person to whom they sell is a fit person to receive such an article.

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

Therefore we should not leave it open to them to say, "I had no mens rea; there was no element of intent, because I did not know and could not be presumed to have known that the boy was under 14 years." The hon. member has suggested that the minister should consider casting that burden on the accused at the same time he is considering enlarging the list of weapons with respect to which this offence would lie.

Mr. Garson: The minister is always prepared to consider reasonable requests; and in this instance I have no objection to giving further consideration. If there is some way in which we can meet my hon. friend's point without introducing the rather bad principle of casting the onus upon an accused, we will be glad to do so.

Mr. Enfield: I was wondering whether hon. members had discussed the age under section 88. Then, there would be no offence if you sold it to a person who had a valid permit. The question of age could surely be covered in the permit concerned. In other words, how could anyone get a valid permit to own a firearm if he was under the age of 14 years? Therefore if they present a valid permit to the person vending the article in question surely he should go free in so far as the age question is concerned. That was the question in my mind with respect to the permit.

One does not like to see the burden of proof thrown on the accused, to show that he did not know the person was 14 years of age. There is a very good principle there that we should try to uphold, the principle that you have to prove the intent of the person who is accused of committing a crime. If you start to make inroads on that principle I do not think generally it is a very good thing.

Before we leave the question of offensive weapons—and this applies to section 88, because the question of defining offensive weapons arose here when the hon. member for Vancouver East was speaking—may I say that in the 1927 Criminal Code offensive weapons were defined in a rather long list. In 1951 the definition was cut down and made more general in its scope. I wondered what had happened in so far as case law was concerned regarding the definition of offensive weapons to bring about a more general definition. Has it been found to be more efficient and to give a better picture of conditions since 1951? Has the problem of the definition been considered in the new amendments to the code?

Mr. Garson: On two or three different occasions during the progress of the present bill, at various stages, I have emphasized that one of the most important instructions given to the royal commission was that they should endeavour to bring the substance of the law into as small a compass as possible, the law set out in the 1,150 odd sections of the existing code. In the existing code there are, for example, a large number of sections and a great mass of language used to describe a number of different kinds of theft. In Bill No. 7 we have been able to cover, we think quite satisfactorily, the whole field of theft by the use of perhaps not more than 25 per cent of those words. In this bill's definition of offensive weapons we are trying to cover the field with the use of a lot fewer words. The result in each case is easier for the average man to read and convey a clearer impression to him. It also produces an act which now has about 750 sections whereas the present code has 1,150.

Section 89 agreed to.

On section 90—Unregistered firearm in dwelling house.

Mr. Fulton: Will the minister just tell the committee, please, what are the present requirements with regard to registration? I notice that section 93 reads:

> The commissioner shall cause a registry to be maintained in which shall be kept a record of every firearms registration certificate that is issued under the authority of this act.

Then other sections provide for registrars of firearms; but I wonder whether it is generally realized, if my understanding is correct, that a person is required to register every firearm which may be in his possession, even though it is not a pistol or a revolver. I know that during the war the requirement was insisted upon, and everybody knew that you had to register a shotgun, a sporting rifle and so on. While I know that ignorance of the law is no excuse, it does occur to me that this might be the appropriate time, if it is the case, to point out for the benefit of the committee and the public generally that even though there is not a war on, people who are in possession of shotguns and other sporting firearms are under obligation to register them.

Mr. Garson: Has my hon. friend looked at section 98 on page 33 of the bill? Section 98, (b) reads:

> "Firearm" means a pistol, revolver or a firearm that is capable of firing bullets in rapid succession during one pressure of the trigger.

Mr. Fulton: That is an automatic.

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: But those firearms which are covered by this section of the code dealing with the registration of firearms—

Mr. Garson: With respect, I do not think it covers shotguns or rifles and so on.

Mr. Fulton: That is fine, if it is given appropriate publicity.

Section agreed to.

Sections 91 to 95 inclusive agreed to.

On section 96—Search and seizure.

Mr. Knowles: I should like the minister to make a few comments on section 96. We have already been referred a number of times to the definition of offensive weapons which is found in section 2, subsection 29, and that definition does seem to be rather wide. In the light of that, the point upon which I would like the minister to comment is the authority given to a peace officer to make a search without warrant. I should like to know whether that phrase "without warrant" is new. Even if it is not new, will the minister comment on it in relation to, as I understand it to be, the general practice that searches are not made except with warrants?

Mr. Garson: On the last point that was made by my hon. friend, it is not new; it is the present section 128. My hon. friend will perhaps recall that when in 1951 this series of sections of the code dealing with the registration of firearms, containing amongst others this provision, was before the house, there was a debate upon this point as to the propriety of permitting the peace officer to make this search. He will perhaps recall that upon balance it was thought to be in the public interest that he should have the right to do so whenever he believes on reasonable grounds that an offence is being committed or has been committed against any of the provisions of sections 82 to 91. The section goes on to say that he may search, without warrant, a person or vehicle or premises other than a dwelling house, and may seize anything by means of or in relation to which he reasonably believes the offence is being committed or has been committed. But unless there is that necessary antecedent of reasonable grounds he will not have the right to make the search or seizure. Only then can he do it.

When we take into account that if a peace officer on reasonable and probable grounds believes that certain offences have been committed by an offender he may without warrant arrest him, it would not seem that the powers given under this section are an unreasonable addition to the other powers which he always has had.

Mr. Knowles: It was perhaps because of that discussion a few years ago that the thought has been lingering in my mind. I do not wish to appear to be saying anything that would seem to condone the concealment of any of the really offensive weapons that are referred to in the sections to which there is cross-reference in this section, but I did wonder if there was any kind of restraint on a peace officer under those conditions. What would happen if for example, despite the fact that in the opinion of a peace officer there were reasonable grounds, it turned out there were no such reasonable grounds?

Mr. Garson: The law says when a peace officer believes "on reasonable grounds", not upon grounds that he believes to be reasonable. The reasonableness of the grounds is an absolute condition. If he believes upon grounds which in fact are not reasonable then he is exceeding his jurisdiction.

Mr. Knowles: Are these "reasonable grounds" defined in any way?

Mr. Garson: No, because it would be very difficult to define them. The grounds in a case of this sort, will vary a great deal from one case to another, but under language of that sort the onus is upon the peace officer to show, if his action is challenged, that the grounds upon which he acted in a particular matter were in fact reasonable, and he has to convince not himself but other people.

Mr. Winch: He has already made the search, has he not?

Mr. Garson: Yes, he has already made a search or it may have been a trespass or an assault if he has stepped in and made a seizure like that upon grounds which are not reasonable. If the person against whom the seizure is made attacks the search or seizure, the peace officer has to defend his position by showing that he acted upon grounds which were in fact reasonable.

Mr. Winch: I am very interested in this section. I honestly admit that I am in search of information so as to completely understand it, because in my estimation it is a very important section. Anything that deals with the civil rights of the individual and a denial of these rights to the extent that a person can be searched, his offices can be searched or his place of business can be searched without a warrant, is something that should be understood in all its implications, and it should be fully interpreted before it is placed in the Criminal Code of this country.

[Mr. Garson.]

For a long time I have been interested in knowing just what amounts to "reasonable grounds". If the Minister of Justice were not as well known as he deserves to be, and he was in front of the Canadian Bank of Commerce here in Ottawa, walking back and forth repeatedly and looking around him suspiciously—I know this would never occur —because his wife had arranged to meet him there at three o'clock and he had misunderstood and thought she had said two o'clock, would that be reasonable grounds for searching the minister without a warrant, simply because he was loitering around the bank? It may seem rather far-fetched, but I simply wanted to give that illustration.

Under no circumstances would I want to be misunderstood. The people of this country have to be protected and their property has to be protected; therefore peace officers must have certain powers. That a man's home is his castle is well recognized under this section, because the section does not apply to a person's own dwelling. As I read section 96 in that case a peace officer must be in possession of a search warrant; and if that is a recognized principle as regards a person's home just where does the principle vary to permit a search of his office or his place of business, without a search warrant?

I am particularly interested in the right to search a person without a warrant. There is a very grave matter here of civil rights and I would like to have, if at all possible, the clearest indication and interpretation of the administration of this particular section.

Just one word in regard to what the minister said a moment ago about the responsibility of the officer in having to show, if challenged, the "reasonable grounds" on which he acted. The fact remains that the act of search has already been concluded and the embarrassment that might result is already there. It is just a matter then of the pride of the individual as to whether he wants to take the matter into the court.

My hon. friend is shaking his head. Perhaps he can explain. The fact is that there can be a search without a warrant. An officer or anyone with the necessary authority can, if he so desires, search a person and go right through with the search and there is nothing you can do about it. At least that is my understanding. I do not know if I have made myself clear. I would certainly like to have from the minister the clearest possible definition of what is meant by "on reasonable grounds". I would also like to know what the position of a person would be if they objected. Suppose a search is made, and as I interpret the section it will be made if the officer so desires; what is the right of the citizen in this matter if it is proved he was searched on unreasonable grounds.

Mr. Pouliot: I wonder if the hon. member would care to give us his interpretation of what he might consider to be "reasonable grounds" for search?

Mr. Winch: I will answer that by saying I am not a member of the legal profession. I am not bringing in this act. I am asking those responsible for bringing it in to explain it so I can use my own good judgment on their explanation. I will say this, though; that my interpretation would depend on what province I was in.

Mr. Pouliot: But that is not the answer. The hon. gentleman has been discussing law for a long time, and I am sure he knows what he speaks about. I therefore ask him to kindly clarify what he means by "reasonable grounds" himself, or if he thinks there are none.

I am very much interested in what the hon. gentleman says, for he speaks with authority in this house. I would like to enjoy a part of his knowledge. I have been listening to him for a long time, since the beginning of the session, and always with interest for he speaks with clarity and with knowledge. My only complaint is that he does not speak often enough. He should speak more. I want more enlightenment from him and I am sure he will not be stingy enough to refuse me or refuse his colleagues. It is a joy to listen to the hon. gentleman. He is a born speaker, a born philosopher, and every time he speaks it is only drops of wisdom that fall from his lips. I have been here a long time but I have never listened to an hon. gentleman who spoke with such ease and fluency.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, surely it is not too much to ask the hon. gentleman to tell us what he means by "reasonable grounds" so his constructive suggestion may be taken note of by the minister. I am sure he knows what he speaks about. Therefore why should he be adamant in refusing to give the simple explanation that we are asking from him?

I am not asking much. He says a great deal. I do not understand the meaning of what he has expounded, and it is necessary for me to know a little bit more. Perhaps all I want is a dot over an "i", a comma or something like that, just a tiny little bit of information that will help me, the minister and the whole committee to understand something in the fine demonstration of oratory the hon. gentleman has given.

Some hon. gentlemen are smiling. I am extremely serious. I want to know what it is about. I am ready to learn. I am in the learning stage. I am not doctrinal. I am not ponderous; at least, I do not think I am, except when I am serious. This point I must insist upon. I want the committee to realize that this is a serious question. I want to know what is in the mind of the hon. gentleman because unfortunately I am not a mind reader.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman would be very gracious if he were kind enough to make another short, didactic speech to us. My knowledge of the English language is not extensive, but I will use the adjective "didactic"; I want to learn. I am ready to listen to the view of the hon. gentleman provided that I know what he is speaking about.

The matter of "reasonable grounds" has been mentioned. May I say that I am on reasonable grounds when I am asking my question. It is a reasonable ground because this is a serious question and I am just as anxious as is the hon. gentleman that no one should suffer any injustice.

There are courses provided for the R.C.M.P. constables. They are told how to proceed when they have cases to investigate. They must be told what is a reasonable ground for searching a place or an individual. If the hon. gentleman does not find that the act is clear enough, it is unfortunate. He says he is not a legal man, but he is a man with great experience in politics and in debate in particular. He could quote examples to illustrate his view. That is the method teachers use, at blackboards with chalk in hand, in order to explain problems. This time no blackboard or chalk is necessary. The hon. gentleman has only to open his mouth and let the drops of wisdom fall from it.

That is all I want. I do not want any more than that. Then the hon. gentleman would confirm his reputation as a debater of note, and I would know what he is speaking about.

Mr. MacInnis: After having listened to these pearls of wisdom, Mr. Chairman, may I draw attention to the fact that as to this right of search in section 96, the purpose is extremely limited. It all has to do with something about firearms, the possession of them, the buying of them and so on. As I understand it, it must be in the code now. If it is not, the policemen in Vancouver are violating this code every day. Whether or not the officer would feel that he had reasonable ground would depend upon where the individual might be.

I am quite sure that in the circumstances in which the hon. member for Vancouver East found the Minister of Justice, the officer would take one look at him and conclude that there were no reasonable grounds, and that would be the end of the matter. But if, for instance, in the city of Vancouver a policeman were to find the hon. member for Vancouver East and myself walking in the lane between Cordova and Powell streets on a foggy night, he would very likely tap us on the side to see what we had on us and with a warning he would let us go. If he found us up by the Hudson's Bay Company's store at Granville and Georgia streets he would not bother us at all. In the committee I thought there was something sinister in this section; but if the hon. member for Vancouver East will read it I think he will find that it is very limited in what it allows.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, does not the question of urgency enter into the matter? If the officer has to wait to get a warrant he may find that the crime will be committed before he gets it.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, let us not carry this matter to the farcical stage. I thought I made the point clear that, as far as I was concerned, we all fully understood that there must be certain rights and authority in the hands of the police officers of this country. There is no question about that whatsoever. My hon. friend who has just spoken knows that. On this question of what is meant by reasonable grounds, may I say that I greatly appreciate the remarks of my friend the hon. member for Temiscouata.

Mr. Knowles: He is everybody's friend.

Mr. Winch: As a matter of fact I am starting to wonder whether the minister, in holding over section 88, should not also take under consideration the banning of switch knives, not only those up the sleeves but also the linguistic ones of my hon. friend. I know he said he is very ignorant, but since I have been here I have noticed that he is one of the most politically wise men I know of the 265 members in the house.

Mr. Sinclair: How the compliments are flying.

Mr. Winch: He is not ignorant at all. He did me the great honour of asking me to explain this matter. That was a great honour. With all his wisdom and experience I think he should have explained it. But as he does not require an explanation from himself, he is asking me the very question we are asking the minister who introduced this bill. Surely it is an axiom that, before passing legislation, we should ask from the one who introduces it just what is the purpose of it, the meaning and the interpretation.

I have just one further word to say. The question of what is reasonable will have as many interpretations as there are police officers. Any clarification on that point that can be obtained will be most useful, and also with reference to the search of premises without a warrant. We must go every step of the way that is required to give police officers the means to protect property and society, but I would emphasize again that in the granting of such authority we must also not overstep the mark so far as the protection of the civil rights of the people of Canada is concerned.

Mr. Pouliot: I thank my hon. friend for his little speech. I am sorry there was no more enlightenment, but I will explain to him what I understand by this provision of the law. I wonder what his reaction will be and whether or not he will agree with me. We must take a classic case. Police constables are on duty on a street and they hear the noise of guns. They go to the corner, and they see a man running away. They cannot recognize him because they see him from the back, and looking at him from a distance they see him go into a house. They have not seen his face. They go into the house and they see some men there wearing clothes of the same colour as those of the man they are pursuing. Would my hon. friend have any objection to the searching of those men by the constables who were running after a man who went into the house?

Mr. Winch: No.

Mr. Pouliot: Well, then, that is a reasonable ground.

Mr. Jones: May I point out to the hon. member that he has not read the clause. Dwelling houses are exempt. Policemen cannot enter dwelling houses without a warrant.

Mr. Pouliot: Then the law should be amended in order to include rooming houses. I want my hon. friends, or any one of them, to mention the flaw in the law. The law must be more severe than it is now to meet emergencies, and of course most arrests are emergency arrests. I could ask the Minister of Justice whether the largest number of arrests are not made without warrants right on the spot by the constabulary, whether federal, provincial or municipal. These men are on duty to protect human life and property, and when they receive a telephone call at night they do not go to a magistrate to get a warrant. They are on the spot and they make the arrest. This is how they do it, and I am not speaking as a lawyer. I am speaking as a man on the street. It is general knowledge. Therefore they must be empowered to act.

I will agree with the hon. member for Vancouver East that there are some constables who have no judgment. It happens in any class of society. There are men without judgment, and there may be errors. It is unfortunate, but on the other hand there must be protection of the people. This is very important, and this is the very reason we are now discussing this piece of legislation. It is all right, as my hon. friend has said, to protect liberty and freedom, but those who want to enjoy liberty and freedom must abide by the law of the land. I do not see why we should be more indulgent to thugs, bandits, housebreakers and all those who create disorder and are a plague on society.

The other day I heard one hon. member say that in the future when we are more civilized punishment will not be so harsh as it is now, and that this will be a sign of progress. What I maintain is that progress will be achieved through abiding by the law. That will be progress. When constables are on duty and risking their lives to protect the Canadian people they deserve consideration. They are not all perfect. I give some of them the benefit of the doubt. They are entitled to it because they risk their lives at every moment of the day.

My hon. friend enjoys liberty. I do also, and we all do, but we want the Canadian people to enjoy the same liberty that those who do not respect the law are supposed to have, according to some hon. members. If I spoke in a jocular or light vein in the first place, I am very serious now. There are those who contend, like the hon. gentleman, that we will have progress in Canada when the law is not respected or when those who infringe the law go scot free, but I say if that happens we will have chaos and anarchy in the country. I want order in the country. I want good government, and we have it. I want order, and I hope we will have it. That is the purpose of the Criminal Code of Canada.

Sir, there were ten commandments given by Jehovah to Moses a long time ago by which the world was ruled for centuries, and the penalty was to come from God in the other world. But now mankind has grown so wicked that there cannot be enough law to maintain order not only in this country but in all countries of the world. Therefore I hope that my hon. friend will realize that it is important to have an enactment like this which will permit constables to protect human life and property in Canada.

The Chairman: Order. The manner in which the debate on section 96 has proceeded has pointed up a difficulty which I am experiencing, and which I pointed out I would experience when the bill first came into committee. Apparently I am not bound by the ordinary rules of the house whereby I should call the bill section by section, owing to an agreement among hon. members that we will call the sections in order but that certain sections will stand and we shall then return to them in an orderly manner at a later date.

This rule would be easy of application, but unfortunately a rider was added under which certain clauses were not to be dealt with if, in the words of the minister, the debate seemed to be proceeding too far. It is impossible for me to decide when the debate is proceeding too far. The minister assured me he would throw in the sponge when he decided it had gone too far. I believe the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said that we would know from the sense of the house when the debate had gone too far. In my opinion section 96 must stand, or the debate must be concluded, or we must go back to the regular rules of the house.

Mr. Garson: I was waiting for an opportunity to answer the very fair question which was asked by the hon. member for Vancouver East. I doubt very much whether I can improve upon the answer which was given by his own colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway.

The Chairman: Order. I must ask whether this agreement is to stand, whether we are going to proceed with an unlimited debate on the section at this time, or whether we must proceed to deal with the bill section by section.

Mr. Fulton: May I help the minister with a suggestion? The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made his suggestion earlier, and I wonder if I might make this suggestion now. While we appreciate to the full the difficult position in which this unwritten agreement places you, Mr. Chairman, we are all endeavouring, so far I think it is fair to say with considerable success, to live up to the spirit of that agreement. If on any side of the house, either the minister or his colleagues, here in the official opposition, my friends of the C.C.F. or the Social Credit, we should feel that the discussion has proceeded to a point beyond which it is not sensible to go and there is no indication the section will be carried in a few minutes, then one of us will indicate that we think the section should stand.

I would suggest to you, sir, with the greatest respect possible, that until you receive such an indication from one or more members of the house you might allow the discussion to continue in the expectation, which I think is reasonable, that so long as no member says the time has come to stop this discussion and have the section stand, of concluding the debate on it within a time which appears reasonable to us. I can assure you that when any one of us feels that that time has come and we must put a stop to this, one of us will so indicate and then perhaps you, as chairman, could say that the section should stand.

Mr. Garson: As I was saying, Mr. Chairman, I doubt very much whether I can improve upon the excellent explanation which was given by the member for Vancouver-Kingsway. Let me take the case which was cited by the hon. member for Vancouver East, and I discuss this with some modesty. If a police officer proposed to search me without a warrant, merely because he saw me waiting for my wife, he would not be acting upon reasonable grounds, I suggest, under all the circumstances.

On the other hand, if a police officer were looking around at night in a dark alleyway at the back of a warehouse and discovered one man lifting another through a window which had just been broken open, and he proceeded to search them for weapons, I would think he would be acting upon reasonable grounds. As to whether, between those two extremes, the facts of a particular case constitute reasonable grounds, that is a matter the peace officer must establish in each case in order to justify his search. The idea that he can just do these things without reasonable grounds and shrug off responsibility is without foundation.

If the hon. member for Vancouver East will go back to section 28 and following sections in this bill he will see there set out the circumstances under which a peace officer is protected from criminal or civil liability in respect of the actions which he takes as a peace officer. In a free, democratic country, such as we have in Canada, a peace officer has little more power than the average citizen. He is strictly answerable for his conduct. He must find, under the code, legal support for whatever action he takes.

Now, it may be that in so far as his civil liability is concerned he would not have the financial resources to make a suit for damages worth while. But I am sure the hon. member has heard of cases in which a private detective operating in and for a department store detained a person suspected of shoplifting upon what he thought were reasonable grounds, and to his consternation discovered later that his employer was on the receiving end of a heavy suit for damages. That is the kind of liability which arises when a peace officer exceeds his powers under the law.

In this particular case, as has been explained by other speakers, the question with which we are faced is whether we shall ask a peace officer, when he finds men under those conditions I have cited—in the course of breaking into a warehouse—to get a police magistrate or justice of the peace out of bed in the middle of the night to obtain a warrant and then go back to search or arrest the men. The only other way in which he could make a search is upon reasonable grounds.

I must confess that when I first saw the section my reaction was somewhat along the lines of that of the hon. member for Vancouver East. When I read that a peace officer had the power to search a structure, I rather objected until I saw that a dwelling was excepted from it, and that as a result our homes were still our castles. When this section is confined to those cases in which reasonable grounds can be shown, and when it only applies to premises that are not dwellings, I really do not think it is as exceptional as the hon. member for Vancouver East has thought.

Mr. Michener: To my mind the minister's explanation leaves one point obscure which I think the house ought to appreciate. The object of this section is to give the peace officer power to search vehicles and premises only in a limited number of cases. In the cases that have been presented to the house we have had conjured up crimes of violence, forcible entry and robbery. Those cases are not covered by this section. The code does contain, and very properly, provisions which not only permit but exhort even ordinary citizens to arrest persons committing acts of violence. It is the duty of people to do that, without any such section as we have here. This section gives the peace officer the right in a limited number of cases, namely cases involving carrying firearms—am I right?

Mr. Garson: No. According to section 82—

> Every one who carries or has in his custody or possession an offensive weapon for a purpose dangerous to the public peace—

In other words, if a burglar is going through a window he can be searched to see if he has a revolver on him.

Mr. Michener: I follow what the minister says, but the section is limited to searches under sections 82 to 91, and those sections involve carrying or dealing in offensive weapons or firearms. For example, section 84, which we discussed earlier, deals with concealed weapons. A peace officer may come up to a person on the street, and noting a bulge in his coat conclude that he had a concealed weapon. Then, if his grounds were reasonable, he could make a search to make sure whether it was or was not a concealed weapon. But that is not the kind of offence where anyone is immediately in danger. So I do think the committee should appreciate that this sort of leeway given to a police officer is for a different kind of case from the hot pursuit of a criminal who has just committed a crime, or when a crime of violence is imminent.

Mr. Garson: With great respect to the hon. member I suggest that he might keep in mind the very case I cited, that dealing with the two men who got through a warehouse window in the middle of the night. One of the things of which they are guilty, before they have begun to commit the robbery of the warehouse, is that under section 82, which is covered by section 96, they are carrying or they have in their custody or possession an offensive weapon for the purpose of endangering the public peace or for the purpose of committing an offence.

Mr. Michener: I appreciate what the minister has said, but I do not believe I follow his reasoning exactly. The person to whom the minister has referred, who enters a warehouse for the purpose of committing a robbery, would be committing the crime of breaking and entering.

Mr. Garson: And also the crime of having in his possession an offensive weapon.

Mr. Michener: And therefore he could be searched or arrested without the benefit of section 96 at all.

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Michener: So if section 96 were used, it would be because of some weapon being carried?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Michener: So I suggest the distinction should be borne in mind that we are extending it to a classification where there is no imminence of a crime. It is just the fact of carrying a dangerous weapon that has to be considered.

Mr. Garson: May I cite a case to my hon. friend where two gentlemen are not going through a window. These two gentlemen are walking up and down behind a warehouse, or in the alleyway adjoining a store. A policeman comes along and, as my hon. friend has said, sees something bulging in their pockets. Would he not be under some compulsion, in the discharge of his duties, to make a search for offensive weapons?

Mr. Michener: I would answer in this way, that in my view unless there is some more serious crime involved or suspected by reason of that loitering, it is not enough to give the right to search a person without a warrant, simply because he is suspected of carrying firearms. After all, the inviolability of the person is something we should not give up lightly, unless a serious crime is involved.

Mr. Hahn: Under this section would a police officer be privileged to, let us say, pick up a youth if he thought the youth had in his possession certain things taken from a building that had been entered? Could he pick up that youth, if he saw him in that area?

Mr. Garson: I do not think I understood the hon. member's question.

Mr. Hahn: I am referring to a youth or some other individual whom a police officer might have seen near premises, and of whom he had reason to be suspicious at, let us say, four o'clock in the morning. The boy might not have a gun, or anything like that, but he might have in his possession some money or some other things he had stolen.

Mr. Garson: Under this section the officer would be confined to the power given by it, and for any other purpose he would have to find his authority in some other section of the Criminal Code.

Mr. Fulton: I suppose if a police officer arrested this person for some other motive, that is to say if he suspected this person of some crime or an attempt to commit a crime but picked him up on the grounds of having a weapon, following which it was found that he had not committed a crime and did not have a weapon, the police officer would still be liable to proceedings for unlawful arrest?

Mr. Garson: I apprehend that when a police officer takes this action he is in a position where, if the validity of what he has done is challenged, he must show that he acted upon reasonable grounds. Canada is not a police state. The police here do not have unlimited powers. They have only those powers given in the statute. A police officer acting under this section must show in every case reasonable grounds to protect himself against both criminal and civil responsibility.

Mr. Fulton: If a police officer arrested a person on some fancied or unreasonable grounds because he thought such person was guilty of a crime, and used this section as an excuse, it would not protect him from proceedings for unlawful arrest?

Mr. Garson: No, or assault.

Section agreed to.

Sections 97 and 98 agreed to.

On section 99—Interpretation; "evidence".

Mr. Adamson: I would call attention to subsection (c) (ii) which says:

—before the Senate or House of Commons of Canada or a committee of the Senate or House of Commons, or before a legislative council, legislative assembly or house of assembly or a committee thereof that is authorized by law to administer an oath—

I have been a member of the house for some time and have served on committees. What committee is authorized to administer an oath?

Mr. Garson: I think the answer to my hon. friend's question will be found in the rules of the house. Then he will recall that in the setting up of committees they are usually empowered to call witnesses and administer oaths. They derive their authority in that way.

Mr. Adamson: I realize that that is so, but I do not remember any case where a witness has been examined under oath by a parliamentary committee. I think it is a retrograde step in a parliament under the British system to have the power to subpoena witnesses and administer oaths to them. I am asking the minister to explain the system, because our system has been one of voluntary witnesses appearing before parliamentary committees to give their evidence or their opinions. The committees in turn are responsible to the house. What I am really driving at is to indicate the difference between our system and that in the United States today, where people can be brought before a house committee and summoned for contempt of court. I would ask the minister to explain that one point in the Criminal Code.

Mr. Knowles: I have known of witnesses being sworn before the prices committee, and before other committees of the house. And if the hon. member for York West wishes to visit a committee where witnesses are sworn every day, let him visit the divorce committee in the other place.

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Garson: What the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said is perfectly true. While it is true that probably there are more committees of the house before which witnesses give their evidence voluntarily, and without being sworn, there are plenty of examples where it is deemed wise by the committee to have the evidence taken under oath. This is done in those cases where it is considered that an oath is required in relation to the evidence given, such as in divorce proceedings.

Mr. Adamson: Not being a senator, I have not sat on those committees.

Section agreed to.

Sections 100 and 101 agreed to.

On section 102—Frauds upon the government.

Mr. Knowles: It seems to me attention should be drawn publicly to the wording of subsection 2, which is as follows:

Every one commits an offence who, being a party to a contract with the government directly or indirectly subscribes, gives, or agrees to subscribe or give, to any person any valuable consideration

(a) for the purpose of promoting the election of a candidate or a class or party of candidates to the parliament of Canada or a legislature, or

(b) with intent to influence or affect in any way the result of an election conducted for the purpose of electing persons to serve in the parliament of Canada or a legislature.

Perhaps at the same time I should put subsection 3 on the record, which prescribes the punishment for the offence against the subsection I have just read. It reads:

(3) Every one who commits an offence under this section is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for five years.

Mr. Chairman, I am not going to go back as far as Beauharnois, but I do recall that about 1946, I believe it was, when the question of the increase in the price of steel was under investigation by a committee of this house, Mr. Hilton, the president or the head of the Steel Company of Canada, was before that committee. If I remember correctly, one of the bits of evidence he gave was that that company had made contributions to both the Liberal and Progressive Conservative parties. He was asked whether he had gone any further than that, and it was clear that he had not. It was the company's own statement that contributions were made to these parties. Well, surely contributions of that kind come within the definition spelled out in subsection 2 of this section.

I confess that I have not any evidence at the moment on this further point, but it does occur to me that it is very likely that the Steel Company of Canada, being the large company that it is in the field of steel, in view of the defence requirements of this country, undoubtedly has contracts with the government of Canada. I should like to know what the application of this section is to the Steel Company of Canada or to any other company that has any kind of government contract and makes contributions to the funds of the Liberal party or of any other party in this house.

Some of my Conservative friends around me are drawing my attention to the point that the Steel Company of Canada is not a person. I am prepared to hear comments on that point. It does seem to me that a corporation surely cannot get out from under the law. Surely if this means anything it should be brought to bear on the kind of case to which I have just referred. I should like to hear from the minister as to what he thinks is a proper interpretation of this subsection. I should like him to tell us whether there have been any persons or firms charged under this section. I should like him to tell us whether the government is serious in having this section continued on the statute books of the country.

Mr. Fulton: Before the minister does that he might also like to take into account this possibility. I mention it as a possibility, because I am sure the state of affairs my hon. friend has in mind would not be referred to by him otherwise than as a possibility, either. My hon. friend believes that unions should be free to make contracts with the government. I believe that my hon. friend's party also believes that unions should be free to contribute to the political funds of the party of which he is a member. Therefore I wonder whether the minister would take that possibility into consideration when he comments.

Mr. Michener: Will the minister also take this possibility into consideration? There are a great many farmers on the prairie provinces who have contracts for the sale of their wheat. It is true that they are not directly with the government, but with an agency of the government. I am sure they would like to be free to make contributions to any party.

Mr. Ellis: I should like to know from the hon. member for Kamloops what unions have ever had contracts with the government or have been doing business with the government in the manner in which the Steel Company of Canada might be said to be doing business with the government.

Mr. Fulton: I have just said it is a possibility. The hon. member and his party have always advocated the right of unions to make contracts.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Knowles: We are waiting for the minister; we are all ears.

Mr. Garson: I am afraid I did not get my hon. friend's question. Would he please repeat it. Is he opposed to the section?

Mr. Knowles: By no means. I could make the speech again, if the minister did not hear it when I made it before.

Mr. Garson: Just the question, that is all.

Mr. Knowles: My question is, has anything ever been done to a company like the Steel Company of Canada which admitted through its president in 1946 that it made contributions to the Liberals and the Conservatives and which has, I would assume, because of the field in which it is working, contracts with the government; or has any person or any company been charged under this section? My last question was, is the government serious in having this section on the statute books? Does it intend that it shall be enforced?

Mr. Garson: The government is certainly serious in having it on the statute books, and it has been on the statute books, as my hon. friend is aware, for many decades.

Now, as regards my hon. friend's allegations with regard to the Steel Company, or any other company, it is very easy to make them. But if my hon. friend is under the apprehension that the Steel Company or any other company has committed an offence under this section, then if the prosecuting officers whose responsibility it is to lay charges in these matters do not do so, there is nothing in the world to prevent my hon. friend, in the discharge of the same virtue which he displays here on so many occasions, himself going down to the police court and laying a charge against the Steel Company, which would then be prosecuted.

Mr. Nicholson: I happen to have the evidence that was placed before the committee in 1946.

Mr. Fulton: I think my hon. friend should be informed that the statute of limitations takes effect after about six years. The right has now expired.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Garson: That did not prevent my hon. friend from laying the charge before the expiration of the time limit.

Mr. Knowles: There have been two elections since then.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Sinclair: How did you do?

The Chairman: Might I now take this opportunity of saying to the committee that I am afraid we shall make very little progress if hon. members choose on particular sections to bring up matters of certain particularity. I would like to see hon. members confine their questions to interpretation, to meaning or to matters pertaining directly to the section, and not to some particular case which has come to their knowledge.

Mr. MacInnis: I do not think you should be too impatient. We are making excellent progress. You must remember that the Criminal Code has not been revised since 1892. That is a long time for people to accumulate grievances. We are doing excellently; do not try to limit us too much.

Mr. Nicholson: The fact that we are dealing with section 102 indicates that we have really made excellent progress, but it appears that immediately we reach an interesting point we are told we should close the discussion.

At this particular time perhaps hon. members would be interested to learn that on July 23, 1946, the question the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was discussing was before the special committee on industrial relations. Mr. Case, a Conservative member, had made a good deal of the fact that the unions had made contributions for political purposes, and apparently no member of the committee took any exception to the questioning. The following day my hon. friend the member for Vancouver-Kingsway asked a perfectly logical question of Mr. Hilton, president of the Steel Company of Canada. The question was this. "Do you or your company make contributions to political parties?"

That appeared to be a somewhat embarrassing question and it was not answered immediately, but the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, then as now, was a very persistent person, and he was able to convince them that this question was very reasonable. Finally, after a good deal of bickering, Mr. Hilton said, as reported at page 179 of the proceedings of the standing committee on industrial relations, dated July 23, 1946:

> If the committee feels that the question should be answered, yes; we make contributions to political parties.

Then it was the hon. member for Trinity, I think, who followed up with some more—

[Mr. Garson.]

The Chairman: Order. I hope the hon. member will be able to conclude his remarks by relating them to the section under consideration and by asking the minister a question which will have pertinency to the section under consideration.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, let me call the attention of the committee to section 102, which states:

> (2) Every one commits an offence who, being a party to a contract with the government directly or indirectly subscribes, gives, or agrees to subscribe or give, to any person any valuable consideration
> (a) for the purpose of promoting the election of a candidate or a class or party of candidates to the parliament of Canada or the legislature, or
> (b) with intent to influence or affect in any way the result of an election conducted for the purpose of electing persons to serve in the parliament of Canada or the legislature.
> (3) Every one who commits an offence under this section is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for five years.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked a pertinent question, as to whether the government has been serious about this section and if there have been prosecutions. I was on the point of asking if anything had been done about the questioning by Mr. Skey. He asked Mr. Hilton whether Mr. Hilton had come to Ottawa to make representations to the wartime prices and trade board with a view to increasing their income by $2,500,000, and Mr. Hilton had. I submit, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Hunter: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, surely the purpose of this committee is to study these sections and see whether they are desirable or whether they should be amended. If the wording is agreeable they should be passed. We are not here to examine some specific act that may or may not have occurred or to examine some alleged offence against the section. We are here simply to determine whether a section is good or bad law and whether it should be adopted, and if it is not good law how it should be changed. We are not here to try any alleged offence but simply to look at the wording and to see if it is desirable law for the people of Canada.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, I am about to conclude my remarks—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nicholson: —but I submit that if we are going to keep this section on the statute books we should know whether the government has taken action—

The Chairman: Order. I assure the hon. member for Mackenzie that I would not interrupt him if he were merely using a specific instance for the purpose of clarifying this section in some way. He will notice, however, that this section sets out a great many elements in the offence and I think, on his responsibility as a member of the house, he would be loath to mention any particular name unless he wishes to make an allegation that the offence embraces all these elements.

Mr. Nicholson: I am not taking any risks whatsoever when I read from a record placed before the house some years ago. If I had not been interrupted so many times I would have been through a long time ago. I think the minister should make some statement as to whether any action has been taken by the government when instances such as the one I have mentioned in connection with the Steel Company of Canada have been brought to the attention of the government.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I can certainly disabuse my hon. friend's mind so far as I am concerned, because I was not here in 1946. I did not come here until January, 1949, and I must say that the remarks of my hon. friend and his colleagues of the C.C.F. party this evening are the first I have heard of this matter. If, therefore, my hon. friend is looking to me to elucidate it for him he is not going to get much comfort.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, in rising on this point I do so believing there should be some reasonable method in this country by which a private person or a corporate body can back their political beliefs and faiths with their dollars. But there are one or two things in this section which give me pause for thought. Section 102 says:

> (2) Every one commits an offence who . . . directly or indirectly subscribes, gives, or agrees to subscribe or give, . . .

As in section (b) where it states:

> (b) with intent to influence or affect in any way the result of an election conducted for the purpose of electing persons to serve in the parliament of Canada . . .

The illustration which comes to my mind and which gives me pause for thought arises out of my recollection that in British Columbia we have an organization known as the British Columbia federation of trade and industry. It is a rather all-inclusive organization as far as some of the corporate interests in that province are concerned. Now, can this section as it now reads be interpreted to mean that a certain corporation, being a member and contributor to that federation of trade and industry, which publishes large advertisements and so on at election time, is thereby committing an offence if it happens to have a contract with the government of the day?

I wonder whether this section should not be considered for some possible rewording in that direction. If it is going to be out of line with what in many ways is becoming the accepted practice with regard to supporting and influencing an election then I think perhaps we should reconsider the section from that point of view; or are we going to agree that the method whereby certain interests in the province of British Columbia are continuing to influence elections is not right and proper and should not be continued? I feel this section should certainly have some further study before being passed in its present form. The use of the words "directly or indirectly" is subject to a very wide interpretation and it may very well be that charges could be laid.

An hon. Member: What political party do they support?

Mr. Barnett: They do not advertise in specific detail which of the political parties they wish to help. They seem to be helping a multiplicity of parties.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, in this regard the wording of that section states:

> (2) Every one commits an offence who, being a party to a contract with the government directly or indirectly subscribes, gives, or agrees to subscribe or give, to any person any valuable consideration
> (a) for the purpose of promoting the election of a candidate . . .

And so on. Has the minister in this case envisaged a situation where a firm had a contract with this or any other government which might be completed in a matter of a week, and in a case of that kind would a person be committing an offence if he contributed to a campaign fund after the contract technically had expired? Would he be committing an offence just if he gave funds at the time, or does the time when the election is going to come up have a material bearing in this case? There is a time factor here that is extremely important.

Mr. Philpott: It seems to me that a strict interpretation of this section, as it stands now, would make a great many corporations in Canada liable to court process. It would also be embarrassing for a good many governments in Canada, including the present federal government, the Social Credit government of British Columbia, the Social Credit government of Alberta and also, I might say, the C.C.F. government of Saskatchewan. I believe a strict interpretation of this section would make liable to some kind of process of law not only any corporation that ever subscribed to campaign funds but also I think certain trade unions that have political levies and also have contracts, for instance, in connection with transportation in some of the provinces.

I am wondering whether the minister would care to let this clause stand over and perhaps reword it in order to give it the meaning that everyone commits an offence who, in order to obtain a contract with the government, directly or indirectly, and so on. It seems to me that would better carry out the meaning of the section.

Mr. Adamson: Mr. Chairman, there is one suggestion that I wish to make. I am going to move an amendment at line 22, with regard to the words in subsection (a) "for the purpose of promoting the election of a candidate or a class". I am going to move that "or a class" be deleted. We in Canada pride ourselves that we are a classless democracy. We have no class in Canada. There is no upper class, no lower class, or no labouring class; we are all Canadians. I think that to have in the Criminal Code these words "or a class" is an archaic thing and denotes that horrid word "colonialism". I believe the words "or a class" should be deleted from the Criminal Code. We have done away with titles. Regularly we pass in this chamber bills about discrimination. To have the words "or a class" in the Criminal Code is to me archaic and wrong. If I am in order, I move that the words "or a class" be deleted from this section. I will write out the amendment, Mr. Chairman, if I must.

Mr. Fulton: The word is used in schools, so why not in the Criminal Code?

The Chairman: Shall the section stand?

Mr. Garson: Yes, I think we had better allow the section and my hon. friend's amendment to stand. I doubt whether the word "class" in this context has the meaning which my hon. friend describes.

Mr. Adamson: I am glad to hear the Minister of Justice say it does not, but it certainly seems to me something which is perhaps undemocratic.

Section stands.

Sections 103 to 113 inclusive agreed to.

On section 114—False statements in extra-judicial proceedings.

Mr. Nowlan: This section deals with the ordinary formal statutory declaration which can be made at any time or at any place. I notice that the punishment provided for that offence is 14 years—that is, of course, the maximum—which is the same as that provided for perjury of the very worst kind. Although the notes refer to sections of the code, yet in the code that exists today there is not such a severe sentence provided.

It seems to me that you are bringing into disrepute one or the other if you classify somebody making a false declaration on matters that cover everything under the sun in the same way that you classify somebody who goes into a courtroom and deliberately commits perjury. It seems to me that there is a matter of undue emphasis here, and that the sentence is altogether too severe. I think you are bringing the matter into disrepute by doing that.

Mr. Garson: As my hon. friend is aware, the penalties which are provided in the code, such as this one, are all maximum penalties. Under this section, if the circumstances and facts are of a particularly heinous character the magistrate or judge may impose a penalty of as much as 14 years. On the other hand if they are not serious he may impose a penalty of one day in order to meet the ends of justice as he sees them.

In this connection I think I should say that one of the main objectives of the draftsmen of the new consolidation bill has been to widen the scope which is given to the courts in fitting the punishment to the crime, by giving them a broad discretion from the maximum down to the minimum. I have sufficient confidence in our courts to feel that they will exercise this discretion properly.

I agree with my hon. friend that it is rather difficult to imagine a case of a false oath being taken in, say, a statutory declaration, which would be of a sufficiently serious character to warrant the imposition of a penalty of 14 years. But it is conceivable that such might be the case. I can recall one instance in my own province where it was on the basis of a declaration of this sort that determination was made of the validity of a will which diverted an extremely large estate to other people than those who would otherwise have been the heirs. In a case of that sort, if it could be shown that it was deliberate, and if it was in relation to a large sum of money like that, I do not know any reason in the world why the penalty for an offence of that character should be any less severe because the oath was taken in the form of a statutory declaration rather than by a witness in court.

Mr. Nowlan: Of course, with due respect to the minister I think he will agree it is no answer to say that the section is only providing the maximum and therefore you do not have to impose that. If that were logical, then I would suggest to him that we could shorten the code a great deal by putting in one section and saying that the maximum punishment for any offence will be imprisonment for life; then you would not have to deal with these matters at all. But that is not the practice we have adopted in this code, and we do try to differentiate.

As the minister knows, it is always possible to reach into experience or history and find some isolated example or something which you can say justifies a certain act, such as the statutory declaration to which he refers. Yet I think he will agree that ordinarily the class of crimes contemplated by that section falls far short of perjury.

The code provides two years in one section and seven years in the other; I refer to the existing code. Now we are jumping the penalty to 14 years. You are either cheapening perjury or you are exaggerating the taking of a statutory declaration, one or the other. Can this offence be punishable on summary conviction? Can this offence be tried by a stipendiary magistrate and, on speedy trial, are we giving to the magistrate power to impose a punishment of 14 years? I am not clear on that matter right now. I should like the minister to cover it.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the section carry?

Mr. Nowlan: No.

Mr. Garson: Just speaking from memory, I think the only magistrate who can try an offence of this character is a magistrate in a larger city, as the summary trial of an indictable offence. He is usually a man whose experience will compare favourably with that of a superior court judge.

Mr. Nowlan: He would be limited to two years under that section.

Mr. Garson: Surely the proper measure of a maximum penalty for an offence is the maximum culpability which can occur in association with that offence. In that connection I would remind my hon. friend that even in court proceedings there are some whose religious beliefs prevent them from taking an oath in the ordinary sense, and they would have to take a statutory declaration.

Mr. Nowlan: This section refers to "every one who, not being a witness". I draw that to the attention of the minister. This section does not deal with a witness in judicial proceedings, so it does not include that particular case.

Mr. Garson: That is right, but I think my hon. friend will agree from his experience as a lawyer that there are cases in which a statutory declaration of this sort can have, and in some cases has had, consequences just as great and just as deliberate as in any court proceedings.

Section agreed to.

Section 115 agreed to.

On section 116—Witness giving contradictory evidence.

Mr. Fulton: I have certain very deep-rooted objections to this section.

Mr. Knowles: Me too.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the section stand?

Mr. Fulton: I thought we could perhaps dispose of it on an adverse vote tonight.

Mr. Garson: I think the arguments for and against with respect to this section are sufficiently strong that it might be better to present them on another occasion.

Mr. Fulton: All right.

Section stands.

Sections 117 and 118 agreed to.

On section 119—Obstructing justice.

Mr. Winch: Subsection 1 of section 119 reads as follows:

> Every one who wilfully attempts in any manner to obstruct, pervert or defeat the course of justice is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years.

I would be very happy if I could obtain a definition of what is meant by "the course of justice". Is it used in the sense that it is used in legal circles and in the act, or does it mean obstructing, perverting or defeating the application or course of statutory authority? Basically is that the meaning of "the course of justice"?

I know that on the basis of justice a person can take action which may be in opposition to statutory authority. Back in the hungry thirties—and I hope such times will never return to Canada again—I can remember that under statutory law the mayor of Vancouver determined that he was going to go ahead and read the riot act when there were 5,000 hungry men gathered in Victoria square in Vancouver. That might have been all that was required to bring about a serious situation. A number of people, including members of the legislature, took the position in the interests of justice that the riot act should not be read and endeavoured to persuade the mayor, in the interests of justice, not to take this action, although he would have been doing so in the course of statutory law.

I do not want to go into too much detail, but perhaps I have said enough to have my hon. friend realize what I have in mind and why it is of the utmost importance as far as I am concerned to know what is meant by "the course of justice", and whether it means the course of statutory law.

Mr. Garson: In reply to my hon. friend's question I would ask him to permit me to refer first of all to subsection 2 of section 119, which reads as follows:

> Without restricting the generality of subsection (1), every one shall be deemed wilfully to attempt to obstruct, pervert or defeat the course of justice who in a judicial proceeding, existing or proposed,
> (a) dissuades or attempts to dissuade a person by threats, bribes or other corrupt means from giving evidence,
> (b) influences or attempts to influence by threats, bribes or other corrupt means, a person in his conduct as a juror,
> (c) accepts a bribe or other corrupt consideration to abstain from giving evidence, or to do or to refrain from doing anything as a juror,
>
> (d) before or after being released from custody under recognizance, indemnifies or agrees to indemnify in any way, in whole or in part, his bondsman, or
> (e) being a bondsman, accepts or agrees to accept indemnity, in whole or in part, from a person who is released or is to be released from custody under a recognizance.

It is noted that subsection 2 covers a judicial proceeding existing or proposed, and I can cite my hon. friend the case of St. Jean v. The King, 69 Canadian Criminal Cases, at page 240. I think that probably covers my hon. friend's question. The phrase "attempts to obstruct, pervert or defeat the course of justice" is spelled out in this section itself.

Mr. Winch: That is my very point. It is my understanding that when you first have a subsection which sets forth very clearly the intent of the subsection and you then have a subsection which says "without restricting the generality" of the first subsection, you leave in full power and effect the wording of the first subsection. If we are not concerned with all the details of subsection 2 and the clauses thereunder we can consider subsection 1, and there is no control over subsection 1 except its own wording which says very specifically that every one who wilfully attempts in any manner to obstruct, pervert or defeat the course of justice is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for two years. There is no restriction of that power in subsection 2, absolutely none. Therefore I am asking what is the interpretation of the words "the course of justice" in subsection 1.

Mr. Garson: I am just as convinced as I was before my hon. friend began his argument that subsection 1 also refers to a judicial proceeding, but just to make sure that I convince my hon. friend more effectively I suggest that we let this matter stand and I will bring forward additional material which I hope will convince him.

Mr. Winch: Thank you.

Mr. Garson: I do not see how it could be given any other meaning, and the language used in subsection 2, "without restricting the generality of the foregoing", really is illustrative of what would happen under subsection 1.

Section stands.

On section 120—Public mischief.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to ask the minister a question or two regarding section 120. I note from the reference on the opposite page that this is a new clause, and I may say quite frankly that the comments I am making arise out of certain remarks made to me by a friend who is a lawyer. It does look to me as though the section in its present wording makes it possible for a person to be charged with an offence for doing something that really was not wilful or intentional on his part. For example, I think the point I have in mind could be made if I could simply refer to subsection (c), which reads:

> Every one who causes a peace officer to enter upon an investigation by wilfully
> (c) reporting that an offence has been committed when it has not been committed, is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for five years.

In my view the quality of knowledge ought to be put into that section. The reference ought to be to a person reporting that an offence has been committed when he knows or ought to have known that it has not been committed. The same idea occurs to me with regard to paragraph (b), but I shall not spell it out for the moment because I am interested in what may be the meaning of the gestures the minister is making toward me at the moment.

Mr. Garson: My gestures meant that if the hon. member had finished his remarks I would be glad to try to answer him. Earlier I indicated that one of the purposes of the present consolidation of the code was to make the definition of Canadian crimes set out in this new consolidation bill inclusive of all the crimes that could be charged in Canada. To that end I stated that we went back to 1892 and took a record of all the common law offences which had been charged, and one of those is the common law offence of public mischief. The reason this section is new is that this is a codification of the common law offence of public mischief.

The hon. member says he objects to paragraph (c) of the section because he thinks that under it a man who had innocently reported that an offence had been committed, when in fact it had not been committed, might be charged and perhaps convicted under this section.

Mr. Knowles: And sent down for five years.

Mr. Garson: I would ask the hon. member to read the whole of the section carefully. He would see that it reads this way:

> Every one who causes a peace officer to enter upon an investigation by wilfully—

I emphasize that word.

> —reporting that an offence has been committed when it has not been committed—

In other words, in order to establish that the accused is guilty of an offence under this section it is necessary for the crown to prove a guilty mind or mens rea. If the accused could say truthfully and convincingly "I am sorry that I passed on to you a report of this thing that I thought was true but which has proven to be untrue" I believe that would clearly establish a defence for him. The crown has to prove its case beyond reasonable doubt when the word "wilfully" is used. The accused can meet the prima facie case which has been so proven by establishing that, although he did report an offence had been committed when it had not been committed, he did not so report wilfully.

Mr. Knowles: I enjoy these free lectures in law that one gets along with being a member of parliament, but it seems to me that the word "wilfully" does not cover the question of knowledge. It seems to me that a person could wilfully and, shall I say, intentionally make a report to a peace officer because he believed such and such had taken place, but it just so happened that it had not taken place. It seems to me it could be established that the accused had done this wilfully. He meant to do it, but because he did not know the facts of the case he was in error. It seems to me that to write something into the Criminal Code that provides a five year penalty for that is a little bit stiff.

Mr. Fulton: I am sure we should not get into a technical discussion of the law, but does the minister not consider he is giving a meaning to the word "wilfully" which, if it were in fact to be written into the section, would require the use of the words "with malice aforethought", or some reference to maliciously or fraudulently? I do not think the word "wilfully" goes to the question of motive. The minister is quite right when he says the crown has to prove it was done deliberately, but as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says that does not go to the question of motive. Before taking his seat, he said that words ought to be inserted in paragraph (c) concerning the reporting of an offence which he knows or ought to have known had not been committed. Otherwise you might get a man who made an innocent statement that an offence had been committed convicted and sent up for five years, when he acted in good faith.

Mr. Garson: As in the special committee of the House of Commons, I am quite prepared when we meet again to convince hon. members that what I have just said is right, or accept their wording.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DREW—REFERENCE TO ANSWER TO QUESTION CONCERNING NATIONAL FILM BOARD

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege in relation to a statement made to the house yesterday by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). Yesterday afternoon, in response to a question, the Prime Minister made the statement that the question of the removal of the national film board remained an open one until some definite item would be brought before the house. Then in the late afternoon edition of the Ottawa Journal I read that the definite recommendation in regard to the adoption of a tender for the construction of the national film board building was definitely going to the treasury board. It seems to me that these statements are inconsistent. Having regard to the general principle involved and the assurance by the Prime Minister that we would have something before us before this move was definite, it seems to me that we should know what the situation is.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would hope that the house would take the statements made by the government in the house in preference to speculative reports by newspapers.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, of course that will depend upon the extent to which we can accept the statements. Does the Prime Minister say that the report in regard to this matter—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not altogether sure that because a reply was given to a question on a certain day, the hon. member may rise on a question of privilege the next day in order to get the answer corrected, especially if it is because of a report in a newspaper. As is provided by the rules, a member who makes a statement in this house does so upon his honour and the statement must be accepted. Once the question has been raised and a reply has been given, I should like to submit to the house that the matter cannot be debated. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) has submitted his case. The Prime Minister has replied. I do not think that at this time, on this formula—that is, on the question of privilege formula—you can have a debate on the point which has been raised. That is the matter that I should like to submit to the attention of the Leader of the Opposition at this time.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I accept without any question the proposition you have put forward. You have stated that when a question is asked and a reply is given, that disposes of the matter and there can be no debate. However, I submit that it is not an answer to the question I have asked to state the hope that the Prime Minister has that we will accept one formal statement instead of another. I have pointed out that there is a positive statement that this matter was to be submitted to or to go before the treasury board, a statement which is inconsistent with the statement made here. I think we have a right to know which is the correct situation.

Mr. Speaker: The Leader of the Opposition will recall that I prefaced my remarks by saying that when a member—and that includes, of course, the Prime Minister—makes a statement in the house, it is made upon his honour and must be accepted. What the Leader of the Opposition is putting against that statement is a statement which appeared in the press. Once he obtained clarification from the Prime Minister, I think the matter should end there. There will be other opportunities to discuss the point but I do not think that the matter, in the way in which he raised it—that is by way of question of privilege—should be debated at this point.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, in order that the record will not be uncertain, may I say that I am not questioning the fact that the Prime Minister stated yesterday what was, in his opinion, the correct position. But I would point out that circumstances change and that this was a later statement. I want to know if there has been a change.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

TABLING OF REPORT BY MESSRS. J. D. WOODS AND GORDON

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) spoke to me yesterday about the request made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) that the report to the Postmaster General by Messrs. J. D. Woods and Gordon be tabled in the house. After pointing out that it was not the practice to table such documents and that there was no obligation to do so, the Prime Minister said that a minister could of course table such documents if he felt it was desirable, and he asked me if I had any objection to doing so. I would not wish to do anything to alter the general practice or to create a precedent which would have a bad effect on the proper administration of government.

The investigation by J. D. Woods and Gordon was undertaken by my predecessor, Hon. Edouard Rinfret, in a laudable desire to improve further the efficiency of a department which most hon. members have agreed was already well administered. The report was prepared for the guidance of the minister. When I received it, I studied it with the senior officials of the department and we have sought, where possible, to follow its recommendations.

The report was not prepared for parliament and I had no intention of tabling it, though I was not in the least ashamed of it. On the contrary, it emphasizes that the department is well administered and any changes they suggest should be carried out by departmental officers, who are well qualified to do it. However, it is well recognized that a minister may, if he feels it is desirable and will serve a useful public purpose, table documents which he is not required to table and which it is not the practice to table.

Since the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace (Mr. Hamilton) has seen fit to cite selected extracts from the report with a view to putting the department in an unfavourable light, it is only fair to let the house have the full information; and since no harm will be done to the public interest by making the whole document public, I am tabling it.

In doing so voluntarily, I am expressly repeating the position of the government that there is no obligation to table documents of this character and that it is not our parliamentary practice in our Canadian system to do so.

If managerial reports to ministers are to be written with a view to tabling or publishing, they will deteriorate to uselessness. I hope, Mr. Speaker, it will not become a parliamentary practice in our Canadian system to cite in parliament documents to which one has been given confidential access.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, naturally I welcome compliance with the request for the tabling of this document, but I submit that the closing remarks of the minister were most improper. The document was made available to the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace for the purpose of examination and for the purpose of taking a record of what was there. It was known to the minister that this was being done. I submit that the business of government is not the private business of those who temporarily occupy these executive offices but that it is the business of the people of Canada, and that when such a procedure is followed the people of Canada, through their representatives, have a right to know what the information is.

Moreover, I would point out that the practice that is now suggested as being an acceptable practice, that of hiding behind the statement that reports of this kind are confidential, could quickly close the door to all information about departments by the simple device of having the minister who orders inquiries in every case of this kind declare such reports confidential. Thus he could throw a veil over all the administrative activities of the department by means of this device, and I submit this should not be accepted as the practice in this house.

Mr. Claxton: That would close the door to all confidential advice.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—BASIC PENSION

Mr. Knowles:

1. Has any provision yet been made for any increase in the pensions of retired employees of the Canadian National Railways who are in receipt of only the basic pension of $25.00 per month?

2. Has any reconsideration been given by the government at any time since the matter was last discussed in the House of Commons on May 12, 1953, to increasing the amount of the said basic pension? If so, what is the result of such consideration?

3. Has the management of the Canadian National Railways, at any time since May 12, 1953, discussed with the government the possibility of the amount of the said basic pension being increased? If so, are there any records of such discussions?

4. Has the management of the Canadian National Railways, at any time since May 12, 1953, asked the government to approve of the Canadian National Railways increasing the amount of the said basic pension? If so, what was the government's answer?

5. Has the management of the Canadian National Railways, at any time since May 12, 1953, asked the government to take the responsibility for providing an increase in the amount of the said basic pension? If so, what reply has the government made to any such request?

6. If no decision has yet been taken on this matter by the government, is the matter now under consideration?

Mr. Chevrier: I have explained to the hon. member that the answers to these questions will take some weeks to obtain because of reasons that I enumerated to him. He may find it possible to withdraw them and perhaps put them on the order paper at a later date, say in five or six weeks' time, when the answers will be available from the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Knowles: The minister did speak to me about these questions this morning, and I want to say that I appreciate his desire not to have them appearing on the order paper for several weeks. It might seem to indicate that the department was not giving attention to them. I also appreciate the point that there is no need to have them printed every day until the time the answers are ready. Therefore I am quite willing to withdraw the questions now on the understanding that I will put them on the order paper again six weeks or two months from now when I understand the minister will be prepared to place the answers on Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Withdrawn.

PAYMENTS TO GOLD AND COAL MINES

Mr. Balcom:

1. What were the total payments made to Canadian gold mines under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, for the fiscal years ending March 31, 1952 and March 31, 1953?

2. What assistance was given to the Canadian coal industry, for the fiscal years 1951-1952 and 1952-1953; (a) by subvention payments on the movement of Canadian coal to market; (b) under the coke bounty act?

Mr. Prudham:

1. 1951-1952, $11,207,863.27; 1952-1953, $11,016,099.40.

2. (a) 1951-1952, $4,623,696.94; 1952-1953, $5,949,004.86; (b) 1951-1952, $396,935.55, 1952-1953, $337,631.07.

With regard to (b) it should be pointed out that this assistance is paid to a steel manufacturing company to implement one of the recommendations of the royal commission on maritime claims and was approved by parliament on May 30, 1930.

It provides that, so long as the provisions of tariff item No. 1019 in schedule B to the customs tariff, permitting a 99 per cent drawback on coal used for making steel remains in effect, the government would pay to the manufacturers of iron and steel 49·5 cents per ton on bituminous coal mined in Canada and converted into coke and used by the manufacturer in the smelting in Canada of iron from ore, or into the manufacture in Canada of steel ingots and steel castings.

KIPLING, SASK., POST OFFICE

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain):

1. Has the government purchased property in the village of Kipling, Saskatchewan, for a new post office?

2. If so, (a) what is the location; (b) from whom was it purchased; (c) what was the purchase price?

Mr. Bourget:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

Questions

STEEP ROCK IRON MINES—RAILWAY LINE

Mr. Knowles:

1. Have there been any discussions, at any time since January 1, 1952, between representatives of Steep Rock Iron Mines Limited and the federal government concerning the possibility of a line of railway being built from Atikokan, Ontario, to the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway? If so, when were such discussions held, and what views were expressed by the government?

2. Have there been any discussions at any time since January 1, 1952, between representatives of Steep Rock Iron Mines Limited and the Canadian National Railways concerning the possibility of a line of railway being built from Atikokan, Ontario, to the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway? If so, have such discussions included any reference to a reduction in freight rates between Atikokan and the lakehead on the Canadian National Railways as an alternative to the building of such a line?

3. What is the present status of any proposal for the building of a line of railway from Atikokan to the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe):

1 and 2. No.

3. Answered by Nos. 1 and 2.

PATENTS ISSUED

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West):

How many patents were issued in Canada in each of the years 1950 to 1953 inclusive, to (a) Canadian citizens and/or Canadian corporations; (b) government-owned agencies or corporations; (c) citizens and/or corporations of a foreign country, indicating the total for each country?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, it would be extremely difficult to prepare an answer to part (b) of this question as there is no separate record kept in the patent office of the patents granted to government departments and agencies, and probably the only way to secure the information would be either by an examination of the individual files or by making inquiries of every department and agency. It is quite easy to answer parts (a) and (c), and perhaps the hon. member would consider whether he really requires an answer to part (b). If so, he could put the question on again. Parts (a) and (c) are answered.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed.

Mr. Pickersgill: The answers are as follows:

Fiscal year	Total patents granted	(a) Patents granted to Canadian applicants including corporations	(c) Patents granted to foreign applicants including corporations
1949-1950	8,513	1,478	7,035
1950-1951	8,461	1,389	7,072
1951-1952	9,516	1,538	7,978
1952-1953	9,700	1,393	8,307
	36,190	5,798	30,392

CHILDREN OF WAR DEAD—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO EDUCATION

Mr. Knight:

2. What is the monthly amount now being paid to such children in each province?

3. Have the authorities in any of the provinces protested such federal payments?

Mr. Bennett:

Return at January 18, 1954:

1. British Columbia, 36; Alberta, 18; Saskatchewan, 14; Manitoba, 26; Ontario, 115; Quebec, 26; New Brunswick, 20; Nova Scotia, 33; Prince Edward Island, 6; Newfoundland, 2.

[Mr. Bourget.]

2. $25, plus the pension to which they are entitled under section 26 (1) (b) of the Pension Act.

3. No.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

INCOME AND INCOME TAX

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain):

1. How many persons in Canada had incomes of (a) $2,000; (b) $2,500, in each of the years 1951 and 1952?

2. How many farmers, by provinces, paid income tax during each of the above mentioned years?

3. What was the total payment of income tax paid by farmers in each province during each of the years 1951 and 1952?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT—CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION REPORT

Mr. Fulton:

For a copy of the report of the civil service commission on the method of keeping records and issuing stock in the Post Office Department, made in 1950, and referred to in the report of J. D. Woods and Gordon.

Mr. Pickersgill: This document is a document which is prepared by the organization and methods branch of the civil service commission in the ordinary operation of the administration of the government for the purpose of keeping the machinery of government as efficient as possible in all the various departments. These reports are prepared often in very candid terms for the information of various senior officials of the government, and the whole purpose of preparing them would be defeated if they were made public. It is well understood that documents having to do with the internal administration of departments and agencies of government are not made public, and the government therefore will have to oppose this motion.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Fulton) which was negatived on the following division:

Family Allowances Act

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT

PROPOSAL TO INCREASE AMOUNTS PAID TO COMPENSATE FOR INCREASE IN COST OF LIVING

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to the advisability of introducing legislation increasing the amounts paid under the Family Allowances Act to the extent necessary to compensate for the increase in the cost of living since the said act was first enacted.

He said: I am glad to have the opportunity once again, Mr. Speaker, of moving a motion asking for a substantial increase in the family allowances. I only wish that a similar motion that I moved in this house a year ago had received the approval of the Minister of National Health and Welfare and that the government had put it into effect. The approval of such a measure would have made this resolution unnecessary.

I should like to see the family allowance increased by 60 per cent, the minimum payment increased from $5 to $8 a month, and the maximum family allowance payment increased from $8 to $13 a month. I believe sound argument can be submitted for a 60 per cent increase in the family allowance. Moreover, I believe the country can well afford it. I also believe that at this time, when we see a loss of overseas markets for food products and a rise in industrial unemployment, our home markets should be expanded. In that regard I can think of no better way of expanding the home markets than by increasing payments made under the Family Allowances Act.

Since 1944 the general cost of living, according to the consumer price index, has increased by 55 per cent. The two main components of that index, particularly as far as home-makers are concerned, are food and clothing. The food index has increased 73 per cent and the clothing index by 65 per cent. I am sure food and clothing must constitute the two main items on which family allowances are spent, and I would therefore submit that the suggestion I am making of a 60 per cent increase in the family allowance is a very moderate and reasonable one.

I would like to make it quite clear to the house that there is one thing this motion does not ask for. A year ago when a similar debate took place the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Applewhaite) suggested that if this resolution was passed and the government changed the family allowances in accordance with the terms of the resolution it would mean that family allowance would be tied to the cost-of-living index. The resolution does not say anything of the kind.

This resolution merely asks for an adjustment now in the family allowance based upon the increase in the cost-of-living index. It would not mean, as the hon. member for Skeena suggested and as the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) appeared to agree, that the family allowance cheques would be up a few cents one month and down a few cents the next as the cost of living altered. I would suggest to the minister that that is no argument against the merits of increasing the family allowance at this time.

The government has increased—and we all supported the measure—the salaries of civil servants, and recently the old age pension has been extended. In my opinion any progressive government must from time to time examine its social security measures and see if some adjustments should be made. I say that the Family Allowances Act, which was passed almost ten years ago, should now have an upward adjustment of 60 per cent in its rates.

A year from now, two years from now, or at some later date, we can then look at the new family allowance rates and see whether there should be a further change in them at that time. Certainly this motion does not advocate a varying family allowance rate from month to month, depending on changes in the cost-of-living index.

I believe that the family allowance legislation has been of real benefit to the people of Canada. The government of 1944 deserves credit for having introduced the measure, and the members in the house at that time deserve credit for having supported and having placed this valuable measure on the statute books.

The party of which the Minister of National Health and Welfare is a member has never ceased to remind the people of Canada that it was the Liberal government that brought in family allowances. That is fine, but when they are doing that I would suggest to them that they also remind the people of Canada that they are the same government that, by allowing inflation to take place in Canada, took back 40 per cent of the purchasing power of the original family allowances passed in this house in 1944. That is the government that gave family allowances to Canada; that is the government that over the last ten years has been taking the purchasing power of family allowances away from the people of Canada. All I am saying now is that the government and parliament should restore to the family allowances their purchasing power as of 1944.

I do not think there is any argument that family allowances have been of real benefit to the mothers of Canada. It has enabled them to clothe their children more adequately, to feed them more adequately, to give them better education and better medical attention.

I believe that the greatest asset any nation can have is the children of the nation, because they will be the citizens of tomorrow. If we are to have a healthy and progressive Canada we should be taking every practical step to see that the health and the educational standards of our children are steadily improved.

There are other reasons why I believe an increase in family allowances should take place at this time. For example, I believe that an increase in family allowances would result in greater employment in the textile industry in Canada, because I am sure it would result in a greater demand for clothing. I am sure that the dairy industry, the poultry industry, and the beef producers of Canada would welcome an increase in family allowances, because it would result in an increased demand for their products.

Every time the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), a colleague of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, speaks of his agricultural policies, he says that one of the main planks in his agricultural policy is to see that surpluses are consumed in Canada. If that is the policy of the government, one of the best ways of seeing that it is brought about is to provide for this suggested increase in the amount paid in family allowances.

I notice that in Canada in 1946 there was 60 million cwt. of milk consumed, but that in 1951 the consumption of milk had dropped to 58,600,000 cwt. During the ten-year period from 1941 to 1951 there was an increase in the population of Canada of 18·6 per cent. I can only come to the conclusion from these figures that since 1944 there has been a drop of 10 per cent in the per capita consumption of milk. The dairy farmers do not know what to do with their surplus milk, butter and cheese. The people of Canada cannot afford to consume as much milk per capita now as they did ten years ago. So I suggest that for the health of the children of Canada, for the health of the people generally, for the benefit of the dairy industry of this country, the minister should recommend to his colleagues an increase in the amount of family allowances.

I believe that the degree of prosperity in the nation is not nearly as great as many members of parliament believe, and would have other members of parliament believe. There is a real need, in the majority of families in Canada, for increased family allowances. In the debate a year ago the Minister of National Health and Welfare pointed out that 19 per cent of the wage earners in Canada are responsible for the care and maintenance of 84 per cent of the children of Canada. The minister nods his head in agreement. Nineteen per cent of the wage earners in Canada are responsible for the care of 84 per cent of the children. If that is so, then surely we should consider a redistribution of the purchasing power in Canada so that the 19 per cent responsible for 84 per cent of the future citizens of Canada will have a better opportunity to clothe, maintain, educate and provide better medical care and so on for the children.

What is the income of the wage earners of Canada? Their wages have increased year after year, but how prosperous is the average wage earner in Canada? How high is the standard of living of the average wage earner in Canada? According to the 1951 census there were 4,085,000 wage earners in Canada. In that year 2,188,000, or 53·5 per cent, or well over half of all the wage earners in Canada in 1951, earned less than $2,000 a year. That is not a very high standard of living. In Canada in 1951 1,497,000 workers earned less than $1,500 a year. Thirty-seven per cent of all the wage earners in Canada earned less than $1,500 a year. Put these figures alongside the statistics of the minister, which were that 19 per cent of the wage earners of Canada must care for 84 per cent of the children of Canada, and I believe you have an irrefutable argument in favour of the resolution I am proposing.

I say that we must come to the assistance of the heads of families in Canada at this time, to assist them to take better care of our future citizens of Canada and we will when we realize that 19 per cent are responsible for 84 per cent of the children, and 37 per cent of the wage earners earn less than $1,500 a year.

The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair), who in the past has been parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, has pointed out on past occasions that family allowances are not an ordinary tax; that it is not in the economic sense the same type of burden on the Canadian economy as the armament program. The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) has pointed out that family allowances are transfer payments, that family allowances are the transfer of income from the well-to-do to the less well-to-do. Therefore the adoption of this motion would mean that a small percentage, the well-to-do in Canada, would help to pay by this method some of the costs of rearing the future citizens of Canada.

In practical terms, as I said a year ago, all it would mean would be that perhaps a few people would make one less trip in their lifetime to Bermuda, Florida, or California but a great many children who are in need of medical attention would be able to make more visits to the doctor. It might mean the purchase of fewer mink coats but it would mean more snowsuits for children. It might mean fewer Cadillacs, but more baby carriages. It might mean a little less champagne but it would certainly mean more milk in the stomachs of the children of Canada.

I believe that this motion should be supported on all sides of the house. The Family Allowances Act of 1944 was a good measure. I contend that it was such a good measure that in 1954 its value should be restored. But that is not being done because the family allowance cheque today will buy just 40 per cent less than it bought when this act was placed on the statute books.

Hon. members may ask: Can Canada afford an increase in family allowances? In one budget speech after another the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has been telling us that the gross national product of Canada is increasing each year by four or five per cent. If this motion were put into statute form it would take just one per cent of that four or five per cent increase in the gross national product. In other words it would not in any way lower the standard of living.

First of all, it is a transfer payment. If it were actually a levy, which it is not, on the standard of living of the people of Canada it would constitute only 20 or 25 per cent of the increase for one year in the gross national product. In 1946-47 family allowance expenditures amounted to $245 million while in that year the gross national product was $12,000 million. In 1952, which is the last year for which figures are available, the cost of family allowances was $320 million but the gross national product was over $23,000 million. In other words, during that short six-year period the gross national product almost doubled.

I submit that this measure should be implemented in order that family allowances shall continue to represent a reasonable percentage of the gross national product. As compared to the gross national product, family allowances are going backward year after year. While the minister may not agree with this there are a great many Canadians who will agree that the government might be able to obtain a large part of the amount necessary to increase family allowances by squeezing out some of the inefficiency there is in government departments.

The budget for this year is well over $4,000 million. I think it is reasonable to suggest that there could be a substantial saving by more efficient methods of administration.

Our defence program, which includes the estimates of the Department of National Defence and the Department of Defence Production, totals $2,067 million. On January 19, 1953, the Minister of National Health and Welfare told us, as reported on page 1122 of Hansard, that in the first nine years of the operation of family allowances it had cost the Canadian treasury $2,131 million. In other words, the cost of family allowances for a nine-year period was just about the same as we are spending this year on national defence. I think that puts the amount of money necessary to provide family allowances in its proper context; it is a small percentage of the money we expend on national defence.

Mr. Boisvert: Is the hon. member opposed to national defence?

Mr. Argue: Not at all. That is not a very sensible question.

Mr. Boisvert: It is a very sensible question.

Mr. Argue: We in this group have always supported the government's defence program, as the hon. member knows. But that does not mean that we will consider the government right to the precise dollar in the amount it may bring down any time in the future for defence expenditures. I think other hon. members of the House of Commons will agree that if as a result of the lessening of tension in the world we can get a reasonable settlement with the Soviet union, if there is a new atmosphere in the world, as I believe can already be felt, then before too long consideration will have to be given to the size of our defence program. I for one hope that the time is not far distant when the defence expenditures of Canada can be reduced because of a lessening in international tension.

In a series of articles appearing in the Ottawa Journal Henry Shapiro, who has been a correspondent in Russia for 21 years, states, in the first two articles at any rate that have appeared to date, that in his opinion there has been a definite shift in emphasis by the present Russian administration. He suggests at the end of his article that in the future it may be a case of competition between standards of living. He believes that the Soviet union is now turning toward increasing the standard of living of the people of that country.

If Mr. Shapiro is correct, then I submit that the government of Canada must more than ever give sympathetic consideration to all measures which will increase the standard of living and the well-being of the people of Canada. I think an increase in family allowances is one of the best ways to bring about a definite increase in the standard of living of the people of Canada.

During and after the last war the government said that it would have a plan to take care of any unemployment that might come about in the future. They said they had a program for full employment and for adequate markets. Farm income is going down today in Canada at an alarming rate and there is unemployment in many industries. The head of General Motors yesterday forecast that there will be 11 per cent fewer automobiles sold next year on this continent. I think now is the time for the government to make certain that a recession does not occur. I hope the government will not wait until unemployment reaches tremendous proportions, or until there is a further large and severe drop in the income of agriculture, before it takes action. Action should be taken now in order to prevent a recession. I suggest to the Minister of National Health and Welfare that this is one of the best ways by which this parliament could improve employment, improve markets for agriculture and assure our nation that a recession does not take place.

The minister could say, "This suggestion is fine; I am all for it; but we are going to have to add $200 million and perhaps more to the tax burden of the people of Canada". I suggest to the minister that that is an old record, one that is fairly well worn and that it does not necessarily mean a thing. When we had this discussion in the house last year on January 19 the minister raised the same objection. Here are his words which are to be found at page 1122 of Hansard of January 19, 1953. I shall quote a full paragraph so that I will not be taking anything out of context. This is what he said:

> The proposal put forward by my hon. friend is naturally one that captures and encourages the support of anyone who wants to see our children receive increasing opportunities. There is no one who could legitimately oppose that measure.

I might interject that the minister, shortly after he said that, moved the adjournment of the debate, a procedure which is a very good way of opposing and killing a measure like this. In any event this is what he says:

> There is no one who could legitimately oppose that measure.

Someone behind me says perhaps he then opposed it illegitimately. He continued:

> But it is one thing to propose, and then it is another thing to be able to find responsible and practicable means of carrying out that proposal.

There is the reference to responsible and practicable means of carrying out that proposal. He continued:

> And I suggest with vigour and sincerity to the hon. member who proposed this resolution that his suggestion is not practicable.

In other words, you would have to add another $200 million to the tax rolls in Canada.

One month later, to the day, the minister's colleague, the Minister of Finance, brought down his budget; and lo and behold, he reduced the taxes in Canada, mainly on the well-to-do, by an amount that would have provided a 60 per cent increase in family allowances, as well as tax reductions.

I thought the argument made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare was a fairly good one at the time, and that a member should be prepared to suggest ways and means of adding to the tax burden in order that this amount of money could be raised. But the government did not need to do that at all. All it had to do was to leave the corporation tax where it was. All the government had to do was to leave the income tax on the wealthy where it was. The government also could have left the $12 million stamp tax on cheques and could have forgone the unnecessary removal of further taxes. I therefore suggest to the Minister of National Health and Welfare that when the Minister of Finance brings down his budget for this year, there may perhaps once again be a sufficient surplus in that budget so that this necessary reform could be brought about without increasing taxes in any way. If there is not enough in any surplus there may be in the budget; if there is unemployment, and if there are surplus farm products, I say to the minister that this measure should be adopted and that the government should not add an equal tax burden, as a result of the adoption of this measure, on the backs of the people of Canada. That is the cyclical theory of financing. The government has said that it is for it, that in times of scarcity when you have a budget surplus, you reduce the national debt; and then in times of overproduction, when there are falling markets and growing unemployment, you adopt worthwhile social measures in order to take up the slack. I suggest to the minister and to the government that the proposal I make, namely that family allowances be increased by 60 per cent, is a sensible and realistic proposal and one which would contribute to the welfare and the well-being of the people of Canada.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I imagine that the hon. members of this house could be forgiven if, when a motion of this kind comes before us, we indulge in a bit of history. Family allowances in Canada have been on trial now for eight years. During that time, it would appear to me, we should have learned a good deal about them. I think it is about time for somebody in the government to present to parliament a detailed report, with plenty of evidence, showing what the effect of family allowances has been upon the economy, upon the people and upon our financial system. I should like to know if a careful study of the kind that I have mentioned has been made, the kind that would make possible a really comprehensive report of the financial consequences, the moral effects and the overall economic results that accrue from this social security measure.

The fundamental principle upon which family allowances were based was a measure of stabilization of our economy through maintaining consumer purchasing power at a level high enough to prevent widespread unemployment and business recession. The procedure or technique which was originally decided upon was that of direct gifts of purchasing power by the government to ultimate consumers throughout Canada. In my judgment this was a wise procedure, because through its use the aggregate of purchasing power in the hands of Canadian consumers could be kept at a satisfactory level without creating much, if any, inflationary pressure. This result was made possible by the fact that the purchasing power was to be paid directly to consumers without having it first pass through the channels of industry, and thus enter into costs and hence push prices higher.

I recall that over twenty years ago we Social Crediters began pressing hard and consistently for the adoption of this basic principle, namely that of direct gifts of purchasing power to the Canadian consumers, in sufficient amounts to balance our economy and to induce full production and employment. At that time we were called economic idiots for even daring to suggest gifts of purchasing power for this important purpose. Imagine, we were told, gifts! Why, you destroy the moral fibre of the people and, not only that, you ruin the economy. These were the things that were thrown at us at that time. However, we were not to be dissuaded. We thought we were on the right track. We believed we were and we still believe we were. At that time we were not only called economic idiots but there were some in the Liberal party who attempted to debate with us. That day seems to have passed because I do not hear them trying it nowadays.

If the idea of direct gifts of purchasing power by the government to ultimate consumers in Canada had been employed in the thirties, Canada could very quickly have pulled out of the depression she was then in and could have avoided much of the dislocation, suffering and frustration that attended that terrible depression of the thirties. But then, of course, the idea was ridiculed, and that was the only kind of consideration that we got. We were ridiculed.

We Social Crediters were not alone in advocating gifts of purchasing power to consumers as a means of stabilizing the Canadian economy and preventing depression. In 1934 the government of the United States appointed a body of commissioners. There were amongst them economists, engineers, accountants and students of every description. I understand there were about forty of them under the chairmanship of Dr. Harold Loeb. Their purpose was to investigate the United States economy fully and to report to the government what it was that was causing the depression. In 1935 this commission, called the national survey of potential product capacity, made its report to the United States government and it was published in that year under the name of "The Chart of Plenty". I should like to refer very briefly to page 161 of that report where one finds words to which I hope hon. members will give careful attention, and I hope they will let them soak in. At page 161 there is the following:

> Since the present economic system has no means of distributing goods and services in excess of an amount which provides little more than subsistence for those possessing no property income, either the present system of rewarding labour must be discarded, or the plant and personnel must be operated at two-thirds' speed, or one-third unneeded productivity must be diverted into waging war, preparing for war, or some new large-scale speculative undertaking whose nature has not yet been envisaged. This is the dilemma of society as exposed by the study of the national survey of potential product capacity.
> It would seem that the simple and obvious way out, that of giving a buying power adequate to procure desired goods and services to the limit of our ability to produce them, might well be tried. It is simple in principle but has not been attempted.

I should like to emphasize what the survey committee said, "it would seem that the simple and obvious way out"—and remember they were in a depression at that time and a serious one—"that of giving a buying power adequate to procure desired goods and services to the limit of our ability to produce them, might well be tried." But when we Social Crediters put forward the idea, an idea, by the way, which had been first promoted by Major C. H. Douglas of Scotland back in the early 1920's, we were ridiculed and were called a bunch of economic idiots.

Mr. Blackmore: The lunatic fringe.

Mr. Low: Yes, and funny money artists and all that sort of thing. However, we Social Crediters quoted the recommendations of the national survey of potential product capacity, Dr. Harold Loeb's report. We continued to argue the principle and to put it forward throughout the years in spite of the ridicule that was heaped upon us. Not only did we advocate these things on the floor of the house and invite intelligent debate on the matter, but we also attempted to educate the people of the country far and wide with respect to it. We showed the government how such gifts could be given without taxation and without creating inflation.

We were alone in advocating the principle in those days. We continued to be alone all during the hungry thirties, and everybody, including the Liberal party, called us crazy. Came 1944, and the end of the war was in sight. That meant of course that within a few months over two million soldiers, airmen, sailors and other servicemen would be thrown back into civil life and into productive effort. Of course anyone with a lick of sense could see that the productive capacity of Canada would go ahead by leaps and bounds, and that an economy that could not distribute what we were then producing certainly could not distribute successfully the increased production as well.

The judgment of the government economists at that time told them that adequate preparations would have to be made for maintaining mass purchasing power at an economic level, one that would make it possible for our people to maintain a high standard of living and to maintain in Canada a high level of production and employment. Prime Minister Mackenzie King was one of those who did not turn a deaf ear to the arguments which we Social Crediters had put forward over the years. It is quite evident that he was wise enough to recognize an important principle. Of course he was very fortunate in those days in having at his elbow the gentleman who has since become the crown prince of Newfoundland, the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill). He was very fortunate because I understand that this gentleman claims that he was the one who put the idea in Mr. Mackenzie King's mind. We will not quarrel about whether or not he is the father of family allowances. We are ready to give credit to whoever deserves it.

However that may be, it is correct that Mr. Mackenzie King, facing the end of the war and some economic changes of magnitude as well as an election campaign, did need a real issue for that coming election, and he saw in the principle of these proposed gifts of purchasing power to ultimate consumers in Canada exactly the kind of issue he needed. He recognized the soundness of our contention that some method of putting purchasing power into circulation, without first having that purchasing power pass through the channels of industry, entering into costs and prices, would have to be found. So he held out to the people the hope of an increase of purchasing power through family allowances, and family allowances were introduced.

All honour to the man and his government for doing what I think was an essential job and a good job. But the method he used at that time was a method which did not succeed in increasing the aggregate of purchasing power in the country at all because he proceeded to give with one hand and take back with the other. All it did was to introduce the principle of gifts which we had advocated, but he used the socialist technique of doing it which meant a redistribution of what was already there. It was just a straight redistribution of purchasing power that was already in existence. We had been arguing the case of a need for an increase in purchasing power and we were not the only ones. We were able to support our case with incontrovertible evidence; at least no member of the government ever took issue successfully with us on it and has not to this day. The fact was that what our economy needed was an increase in purchasing power, not a redistribution of the poverty that existed.

However, the method having been decided upon, the government embarked upon it. Since that time it has never been of maximum benefit to the people of Canada, because even in times when we needed an increase in purchasing power the method of giving a direct gift of that purchasing power to the people without first taking it away from somebody was never tried. Over the years since 1945, when family allowances were introduced, through the mismanagement of the Canadian economy by the present Liberal government there has been a serious decline in the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar. This has had a most serious effect upon family allowances.

The hon. member who introduced this motion said something about that. I should like to support the figures that he gave with some figures which I have been able to collect.

Mr. Martin: Will the hon. member be correcting the figures given by the proposer of the motion, because they were not accurate?

Mr. Low: I think I shall. I obtained these figures from government publications which I feel are accurate.

Mr. Martin: Government publications are, but the hon. member was not.

Mr. Low: I do not know about that. I am not going to vouch for the accuracy of the figures the hon. member used, but I certainly will vouch for the accuracy of these, which have been checked rather carefully.

When family allowances were introduced in the year 1945-46, we find that in current dollars the average payments per child in Canada—by the way, they were paid to 3,299,000 children in that first year—amounted to $52.32. Now, between 1945-46 and 1947-48 the average per child increased from $52.32 to $70.07. The average per year in current dollars has remained approximately at $70.00. I think that it could be shown that in 1953 the average in current dollars was $70.66 per child. It was evident to me from the way the average in current dollars levelled off at about $70 per child that the government felt we needed to inject into our economy, in the hands of the ultimate purchaser, about $70 per child in order to create the results they wanted.

If that is so, let us argue from that point for just a moment. Between 1945 and 1953, the cost-of-living index was allowed to rise from 123·6 to 183·6 which meant that, with respect to the real purchasing power of the family allowances, there was a decline from the original $70 to $38.48. By 1953 this meant a decline of no less than $32.17 per child in Canada, as a consequence of the mismanagement of our economy and allowing the purchasing value of the Canadian dollar to seriously decline.

What would that mean to the children of this country? I think I have heard it said that a child needs about a quart of milk a day to sustain it in good health and well-being. I am prepared to accept that estimate. I think the minister's department has put out figures that would indicate that fact. If we accept that as a necessity for the children of this country, and if we argue that family allowances were originally given at least partly for the purpose of helping the children of Canada to live in something like a state of good health and well-being, then surely we must take a look at the effect of the reduction of the purchasing power of family allowances in supplying milk and other necessities to our children.

The fact is that by 1953 the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar had declined so seriously that every child in Canada was being denied 151-8/10 quarts of milk as a consequence of the decline in the purchasing value of the original family allowance. This amounts to almost a pint a day or half of what a child requires to maintain it in a state of health and well-being. Now, that is the effect of the mismanagement of our economy by the Liberal party during those years. When I supply those figures, Mr. Speaker, I calculate them on the basis of an average price across the country for a quart of milk in 1953 of 21·2 cents per quart. That is a serious thing, when you contemplate denying each child in the country as much as 151-8/10 quarts of milk which he could have had if we had taken the trouble to maintain the original purchasing value of the family allowances.

It is clear then, Mr. Speaker, that something will have to be done if we are going to achieve the original objective, at least so far as helping the children and the families of the country is concerned. Certainly, we ought to take steps to restore the original purchasing value of these family allowances. If $70 is considered to be necessary, then we should see that they have $70 of purchasing power. This means that something needs to be done to restore the value of our dollars. I think we should have tackled the taxation question long ago, especially the kind of taxation which enters directly into costs and has the effect of pyramiding prices. I suggest that the government should pause and consider the unemployment situation today. I am told by those in authority that in Canada today unemployment is at a higher level than we have ever had it in history, that is by numbers and not by percentages. It is becoming serious.

I say that as unemployment does become more widespread, then family allowances should be increased to take care of the distribution of surplus goods and services. Then, our people would be able to use and enjoy them and these surpluses would not clog up markets and bring on a business recession. The method of payment should be changed so as not to be simply a redistribution of the inadequate purchasing power presently in the hands of the people. There should be a clear addition to the purchasing power so that it will fill the need, and fill it completely.

In my judgment the value of family allowances has been adequately demonstrated. There have been some abuses of course. I think the minister is wise enough and his advisers keen enough to clear these things away. I believe family allowances provide a measure of stabilization for our economy and they will go at least some distance in preventing depressions. But if they are to fulfil their purpose then we must change the method by which we handle them and see to it that they are not paid out simply as a means of redistributing the purchasing power that is already in existence, but rather to put a fair share of the purchasing power into the hands of the people. I support the resolution.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): I had not intended to take any part in this debate, sir, and I do not intend to transgress on the main subject matter of the resolution which, I am sure, will be discussed more than adequately by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). But since the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has seen fit to bring my name into his remarks, or at least to bring the name of the office I occupy into the debate, and also to bring in the name of the prime minister I had the honour to serve for a good many years; and since I am by profession an historian and actually made my living at it at one time, it seemed to me it might be useful if I corrected the historical version placed on the record by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) when he said I claimed that I was the father of family allowances.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Don't be too modest.

Mr. Pickersgill: I made no such modest claim, sir. As a matter of fact, I heard it suggested in my presence on one or two occasions and on every one of those occasions I demurred.

Mr. Low: May I ask the Secretary of State this question. Is it not a fact that during the election campaign that statement was made in newspapers throughout Canada on a number of occasions, and did the minister deny the statement at that time?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, sir. I did not attempt to deny it to every newspaper that published it—

Mr. Knowles: It was the subject of many choice cartoons.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, several of which I treasure, and there are some others of which I would be glad to get the originals.

Mr. Martin: I have these.

Mr. Pickersgill: There was one, in fact, if I may interject a light tone, which annoyed my wife very much because it showed my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare about twice my height.

Mr. Knowles: Which way are you looking?

Mr. Pickersgill: On every occasion on which any allusion of this kind was made in my hearing I demurred, and it was not simply my natural modesty. I demurred because it is not true. My recollection of the course of events with respect to the enactment of family allowances in Canada is, I believe, still fairly clear and precise. As I recall it the subject first entered what may be called the field of practical politics when it was adopted as a resolution by the Liberal party at a meeting of the advisory council of the national Liberal federation in, I believe, the month of September, 1943.

Mr. Knowles: It was in our national platform in 1942.

Mr. Martin: No, it was not.

Mr. Knowles: I will send a copy of it to my hon. friend.

Mr. Martin: Your party was opposed to it.

Mr. Knowles: Nonsense.

Mr. Pickersgill: In any event, I think it is a matter of record that it was in the document which was the result of the deliberations of the advisory council of the national Liberal federation in 1943. My hon. friend who is now the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and a number of other members of the present government, were present at those meetings. I was not.

Mr. Low: You were close by.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was in the east block, yes. The hon. gentleman suggested that I put the idea into Mr. Mackenzie King's head. I can assure him I did nothing of the kind. The idea was there, it was very much there, though I will not deny that I encouraged Mr. King as much as I could to inaugurate this very important reform, and I am very happy to think that such little encouragement as I was able to give him may have been of some practical advantage. But there were a great many other people who could make the same claim. The point I wanted to make was that it was Mr. Mackenzie King himself who was the father of family allowances and no one else, and that the measure was introduced in this parliament—

Mr. Campbell: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? Would he give any credit to Mr. J. S. Woodsworth for fathering the idea?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am a Winnipegger and like most civilized Winnipeggers of my age I was a friend and an admirer of the late Mr. Woodsworth. I revere his memory. I believe he was a great Canadian. Though I did not agree with everything he did and I was never a political supporter of his at any time—

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Pickersgill: —I do not think there is any doubt that on balance he made a constructive contribution to the public life of this country. But so, I think, did Mr. Mackenzie King.

Mr. Knowles: On balance?

Mr. Pickersgill: It seems to me it would be rather difficult, since Mr. Woodsworth unfortunately died in 1940—

Mr. Knowles: 1942.

Mr. Pickersgill: 1942. At any rate, whoever had it in his political program this subject only became active politically in 1943.

Mr. Low: 1935.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was enacted in 1944 and it came into force in 1945.

Mr. Low: It became active politically in 1935.

An hon. Member: $25 a month.

Mr. Pickersgill: My hon. friend seems to equate family allowances with social credit. I lived in western Canada in 1935, and I do not recall that the ordinary uninitiated person at that time made that kind of equation, whatever we now do in retrospect in trying to climb on bandwagons.

Mr. Low: You know all about climbing on bandwagons.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think there is any doubt we would not have had family allowances at the time we got them if it had not been for the action taken by Mr. Mackenzie King and the government of which he was head in bringing the bill into this house in the year 1944. That was inspired, as far as I know, by no one but Mr. Mackenzie King himself and it seemed to me only fair to his memory, since the matter was raised by the hon. member for Peace River, to have this correction made.

Mr. Knowles: Question.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): I should like to make it quite clear that as far as I am concerned I am not personally opposed to any increase in family allowances. I think I should make that clear at the beginning. The bill to provide family allowances is a progressive social measure, and in a manner these allowances serve to share the production of a rich country among all classes of people, particularly to the benefit of those who are not so well off. We all recognize that family allowances are considered as a strong bulwark in fighting the menace of communism. Therefore there is no quarrel either with the principle of family allowances or, as far as I am concerned, with increasing the amount.

After listening to the arguments put forth I have some questions that come to my mind that I should like to put forward early in the debate so later speakers may be able to deal with them to my satisfaction. We all agree that the family allowances measure was introduced and implemented in the interest of the poorer classes. This resolution also has as its object to benefit those classes whose incomes are in the lower brackets.

The first question that has come to my mind is whether it is really in the interests of these people whom we are trying to help. We cannot consider any measure of social security, or any measure that is going to involve an expenditure of government funds, without coming up against the hard question of where the money is going to come from. The government as such certainly has no money of its own. If it is going to spend additional money it must get it from the people, and the first question that comes to my mind is this. Is it really in the interests of the people to give them something with one hand and then turn around and take it away from them again with the other hand? That is something we should examine very carefully lest we offer our people something which may turn out to be a delusion.

The second question that comes to my mind, after listening to the arguments, is this. Is there not a better method of helping these people whom we are trying to help by this resolution? We know that the main argument put forth by the proposer of this resolution was the lower purchasing power of the dollar. We have used that argument in a great many different ways. Particularly it has been used by the labour unions as an argument for higher wages. The value of the dollar goes down and therefore we must pay more dollars to compensate for it.

I was interested in an editorial that appeared in today's Gazette which speaks about a resolution which was adopted by the Norwegian federation of labour, in which they resolved not to ask for any general revision of wage contracts because they have really come to the conclusion that higher wages and more purchasing power are really not in the interests of the people themselves. There is some parallel in this question of increasing family allowances, because some economists—rightly or wrongly I cannot say, because I do not pretend to be an economist—hold that measures such as family allowances are responsible for inflation, which in turn lowers the purchasing power of the dollar.

Therefore, if we are trying to help these people would it not perhaps be better to adopt a measure which would increase the purchasing power of the dollar itself rather than giving more dollars which would perhaps accentuate inflation and reduce the purchasing power still further? That is the second thought that came to my mind as I listened this afternoon, and I hope somebody will undertake to answer these questions during the debate.

In addition there are other considerations which must be taken into account. We all agree that the family allowance is a good thing. I am not saying that an increase in family allowances would not be a good thing; I am not sure yet as to whether it would be. But even assuming that it would be good, is it not possible to have too much of a good thing? Here we must pause and consider our country, this great nation of Canada, and examine whether or not we might be travelling a little too far along this road of security.

It would be a great tragedy if a country such as this did become security conscious or security minded. The greatness of the country and the great wealth that we enjoy were brought about by people who were certainly not security minded. If our forefathers, the pioneers of this country, had thought mainly in terms of security we would never have had the great country that we have today. There is a danger here which perhaps it would be well to stop and examine to make sure we might not be going too far along this road.

As the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low) said just now, when we consider a measure like this we have to take into consideration its effect, not only the financial effect upon the people and upon the economy of the country as a whole, but also its effect upon the minds of the people. That is something we may well pause and consider, as to whether it is not possible to have too much security, and in concentrating too much on security we may achieve a state of mind which later on will retard the progress of this country and perhaps be an obstacle for the generations that are to come.

The other consideration that has come to my mind, Mr. Speaker, is this. May there not be a danger in removing the incentive to produce? In my province at the time of union we had a flourishing bank fishing industry. Within four years of union that industry absolutely and completely disappeared. Some people claim the reason the bank fishing industry disappeared so rapidly was the payment of family allowances. The fact that this additional income was coming to the family removed the necessity for the father, the breadwinner, going to the banks and undergoing all the hardships that are associated with that very arduous fishing industry. I do not know how much truth there is in that, but some very serious-minded people believe that if family allowances did not destroy that industry altogether, they certainly accelerated its passing.

I mention that merely as an example of what is possible if we remove the incentive to produce. Most of my constituents are people in the low income bracket, and we certainly want to help them all we can. But much as I would like to see family allowances increased, if that is the best way of doing it, on the other hand I would not want to offer them any illusion. If the same objective could be attained by increasing our production and having a larger share of our wealth divided among all the people, if it could be done by providing more encouragement to produce rather than by reducing the incentive to work, then I think we could increase our gross national product which in the final analysis is the source of all social security and of every other kind of material security.

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say only a few words in support of this important resolution. I shall not go into the matters which have been discussed most thoroughly by my colleague, but there is one phase which I think is very important and to which I should like to devote a few words.

During the course of his remarks the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) referred to the necessity of keeping up the purchasing power in our economy in relation to the production of the country. There may be some who will question whether this is the right time to bring about these social security measures or improve them in order to keep up our purchasing power, but I notice that only as recently as January 8 a statement was made by an official of the government. I am always curious to know who these unnamed officials are. There seem to be many of them, as they are forever making statements. But they are not named; they are referred to as government spokesmen. I should like to quote from a statement made to the press by one of these mythical characters, and I refer to a Canadian Press dispatch of January 8 as follows:

> The government is convinced that Canada's economy will continue its post-war growth this year, but its advisers have carefully mapped out means of fighting a recession if it comes.
>
> The strategy is to employ fully "built-in stabilizers", monetary and fiscal measures, public works projects, incentives to investment and even deficit financing in the drive to keep the economy buoyant, an official said Thursday.

The definition of "built-in stabilizers" is given as follows:

> "Built-in stabilizers" are such things as unemployment insurance, family allowances, and old age and veterans pensions.

That is apparently the plan of the government, as that is a statement made by advisers of the government. I am not in a position to know who are those advisers, or who that particular spokesman was. However, it was handed out as government policy. If that is the case it would appear that the government, or at least the advisers of the government, agree with the mover of this resolution that now is the time to protect the purchasing power of the people in order to avoid a recession or what might develop into a major depression.

I was pleased to see that statement in the press, but then when I read further down the column I come across this statement:

> Officials emphasized, however, that the government has "no over-all, grandiose blueprint" for fighting depression.

Of course that is a masterly understatement. Any time this government had an over-all blueprint for fighting depression would certainly be something new. But even if they are prepared to go only part of the way and protect the economy of this country by providing sufficient purchasing power to buy that which is being produced and which will be produced in such abundance, then I believe this is the most desirable means by which we can place that purchasing power in the hands of the people who need it most.

I am not going to repeat the statistics which have been placed on the record, as they speak for themselves. They do point out that a large portion of the population of this country are still living on very low incomes. The families of wage earners in the lower income groups certainly would be able to use the extra help which would be made available by means of increased family allowances.

I should like to place some emphasis on another phase of this discussion. While it is true that the group with which I am associated have been spearheading the drive for social security over the years—

[Mr. Zaplitny.]

Mr. Martin: You have supported the drive the government has initiated.

Mr. Zaplitny: I am glad the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) thinks there is something to support. I would like to point out that when it comes to action there seems to be a lapse of at least 20 years between what his party proposes and what they are prepared to do. I am not going to go back 20 years at the moment.

Mr. Knowles: It is 35 years in the case of health insurance.

Mr. Zaplitny: I shall not go very far back, because a jump of 20 years might prove a shock to the minister. Reference has been made to the possibility of financing an enactment of this kind. The hon. member who just spoke indicated grave doubts in his mind as to whether the production of the country could carry this extra expense.

As has been pointed out already, the government has estimated the gross national product for 1953 to be in the neighbourhood of $24 billion. That is a tremendous increase over previous years, and certainly a large increase over the year in which family allowances were first enacted. So far as the production of the country is concerned, certainly there can be no question that we are able to support far greater measures of social security than we have had until now.

It boils down to the question of how we are going to allocate our finances. Shortly after the budget was brought down last spring I received a copy of a Liberal newsletter which apparently was produced for general distribution. I hope it was not sent out without postage. This came from the Liberal association, and they seemed to take a great deal of pleasure in the headline "Smile in Every Line of Budget". This was their sunshine budget. The newsletter stated that government revenues were slashed $361 million, nearly a million dollars a day in a full year.

I am not going to quote the newsletter in full, but as you go through it you find they refer to the fact that the stamp tax has been taken off, that there is an increased deductibility of dividends from corporations, and so forth. In most respects those measures provide relief not for those in the lower income groups but for those who were comfortably well off. By doing that the government reduced the revenue to the treasury by $361 million. That would be more than enough to double family allowance payments. It is a matter of choice. We feel that it should be the first concern of the government, whether it is in this parliament or in the provincial legislatures, to look after the general welfare of the public. Certainly if we have to make a choice we should lean toward the public welfare.

I also want to point out that certainly candidates of the party which now occupies the government benches left the impression as late as August, 1953, that they were all-out for social security and for the improvement of our social security measures. I have in my hand the official platform of one of the candidates of the Liberal party, published by authority of the Manitoba Liberal Progressive election committee. I might point out to some of our eastern friends that out west they are Liberal Progressives. They are only Liberals here. In that platform very prominently displayed we find such words as these, "Vote Liberal for advanced social legislation". On the next page they are even a little bit critical of the party to which I belong. They say:

> Have you any time to listen to the socialist party's promises of social security measures to be enacted only if they form the next government!

And they end up by saying, "Where have the socialists spent their time?"

As I have already pointed out, we have spent a good portion of our time urging this government to go ahead with these social security measures of which they say they are in favour. If the question arises as to where we have spent our time, I will go back 20 years and see where some other people have spent their time. I have in my hand a copy of the Canadian Liberal Monthly. I do not know whether it is still in circulation, but this issue goes back to January of 1934. At that time, as will be recalled, a Conservative government was in power. The Liberals were attempting to point out what they would do if they replaced that government. Here is a statement made by the then leader of the opposition, Mr. King, who sets out Liberal policy in these words:

> The Liberal party recognizes that the problem of distribution has become more important than that of production, and believes that personality is more sacred than property.

That belief certainly was not reflected in this sunshine budget of 1953. I continue the quotation:

> It will devote itself to finding ways and means of effecting a fair and just distribution of wealth with increasing regard to human need, to the furtherance of social justice, and to the promotion of the common good.

Those are fine words I agree with every syllable of them. But those words were spoken on February 27, 1933, more than 20 years ago. Yet today, when a proposal is made which would carry out that philosophy, we find that in the government ranks there is reluctance to take any action.

The hon. member who just preceded me expressed some doubts as to whether social security was the best thing for the future of the people of this country. If he has any doubts may I suggest to him that he should take them up with the Liberal federation because, as late as 1948, when the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was chosen leader, one of the most prominently displayed resolutions passed at that convention was one which called "for the provision of adequate social security". It is one thing to talk about social security, but it seems to be another thing when it comes to the practical problem of putting it on the statute books of the country or improving it.

In view of the fact that we in Canada are now facing surpluses of a variety of goods for which we can improve the domestic market only by increasing the purchasing power of the public; and as the cost of living since 1945 has risen to the extent pointed out by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), thus cancelling approximately 40 per cent of the original provision in the Family Allowances Act, in view of these two developments alone there seems to be no good reason why the members who support the government should not on this occasion rise and support this resolution.

Mr. H. P. Mang (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, may I just add a few words to what has already been said on this resolution. In doing so, I do not want to give the impression that I am against family allowances. I cannot be in that position, because it was this government and its predecessors who initiated the move for family allowances. It would therefore be extremely illogical for any member on this side of the house to speak against family allowances.

The only question is this. Are we at this time in a position financially, as a government, to make the increase that is suggested? I do not know. I am here for the first time. I am a freshman. I am in the kindergarten, you might say, of the House of Commons. I find some statements that are made here to be extremely confusing to my immature mind and little experience in this house. In this discussion there have arisen some basic questions concerned with government and economics. For instance, it is a peculiar statement to hear someone say that all this government is doing is distributing what it collects. You cannot distribute anything that you cannot collect as a government; hence that is to me a confusing statement. I will pursue it further in the privacy of my own thinking.

As to the question of raising the allowances and the general discussion on the allowances, it has been stressed by certain hon. members that the main purpose in bringing in this legislation originally was to stabilize the purchasing power of the people of Canada by putting extra money into the homes in Canada. To my mind there has always been another consideration in connection with this matter of family allowances, namely the question of equalizing or stabilizing the family income.

I will illustrate what I mean, and then it will be clear. For instance, suppose you have a bachelor holding down a job at $200 a month and a married man holding down a job at $200 a month. Let us say that the married man has responsibilities to the extent of five children in his family. The wage is the same for the same work. I think one of the intentions with regard to family allowances was to assist that married man and bring some additional funds into that home in order to iron out the differential as between the bachelor and the family man. It would give him not a wage boost, but extra money coming into that home to the extent of $15, $20 or $25 a month. I think that is an extremely important consideration in connection with family allowances, as well as this idea of bringing more purchasing power into the hands of the general consumer in Canada, and I do not think it should be lost sight of.

As to the question of increasing the allowance, here again I meet extremely confusing statements. The same people who are battling to reduce taxation do not want to see an increase in the postage rates, and they want us to remove the 3 per cent floor on medical expenses in the income tax structure. I suppose both these ideas are all right, but the same people who are asking for an increase in the expenditure of money are the people who, defending the taxpayer in holy righteousness, are asking us to reduce taxation. As I say, my immature mind just cannot grasp that, and I go on record as saying that the reconciliation of these two attitudes is very confusing to a new member of the house when such suggestions come from people who have been here a long time.

I am willing to learn and I hope to learn, but so far as this whole matter of increasing services and decreasing taxation is concerned I believe there is some loose thinking going on somewhere. I do not know where it is, but it is somewhere.

[Mr. Mang.]

Mr. Argue: We can hear it.

Mr. Noseworthy: You had better move over to the right side.

Mr. Mang: I am on the right side.

Mr. Argue: If he moved over he would be out.

Mr. Mang: I am on the right side.

Mr. Noseworthy: Still wrong.

Mr. Knowles: You are at the extreme right.

Mr. Mang: What I am getting at is that there are people in this country who are telling the public that we can distribute something we do not have, that they can ask for more services without paying more taxes, and all that sort of thing. As I say, to my mind there is some loose thinking somewhere.

An hon. Member: That is where it is.

Mr. Mang: Let me start with what I believe is the foundation of all our thinking in this house. I look at the whole economy of the country in this light. In the early days of Canada there were no people here at all.

Mr. Noseworthy: No Liberals.

Mr. Mang: All there was in the country was that with which nature had endowed us, iron ore in Quebec, fish in the sea, forests, lakes, rivers, and vast plains in western Canada. These are the things that nature gave us. I am trying to get to the bottom of the economics of the situation, and I am using some little economic blocks, if you like, to build this house. Then you can knock it down and start all over again.

An hon. Member: Don't talk about building houses.

Mr. Mang: What applies to this country applies everywhere. Then people came to Canada, but all the things nature had left us were of no value to anybody except to look at.

Mr. MacInnis: Until labour was supplied.

Mr. Mang: The fish are not good for anything other than to look at until someone from Newfoundland catches and prepares them for use. The same thing is true of our forests. They are not worth anything other than to look at until someone with ambition, drive, imagination and vision chops down the trees and makes logs out of them or saws them into lumber, thus making the forests usable. The same is true of all our gifts from nature. By making the things that nature left us usable, call them natural resources if you like, you create wealth, and that is the only way you can create wealth. By people applying their brains, brawn, initiative and imagination to the job of turning natural resources into usable things you create wealth. You do not do that for anybody else. You do it for yourself.

Mr. MacInnis: There is one way of creating wealth but there are several ways of accumulating it.

Mr. Mang: That is the only way you can create wealth, and that is what we mean by applying private initiative to our natural resources to create the wealth we have. We have many individuals who are making usable things. In the west they grow grain, in the east they manufacture, and the people of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia catch fish, as is also done off the shore of British Columbia. By this process you create wealth. What happens?

Mr. Noseworthy: Who gets it?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Somebody takes it away from you in taxes.

Mr. Mang: All right, just hold your horses.

Mr. Knowles: It is you fellows who have the horses.

Mr. Pickersgill: They are not there.

Mr. Mang: The responsibility of governments enters into the picture after a country is developed. Let me put it this way. This is not a prepared speech, and hon. members will pardon me. I am a beginner but I am trying to get an idea across. Where does the wealth come from that we are trying to distribute so equitably?

Mr. Noseworthy: Tell us where it goes.

Mr. Mang: Yes, I will.

Mr. MacInnis: Tell us who has it.

Mr. Mang: In this process we do work as individuals, and as the country develops we find that we need certain public services. For instance, we have to build a road. We as individuals cannot build it, so we get together with our neighbours and build the road. Each family cannot hire its own teacher for its children, so we get together, form a school district and provide ourselves with that public service. It is the same all down the line.

Mr. Noseworthy: Right down to family allowances.

Mr. Mang: It is the duty of government to perform this function. It is the fundamental duty of any government to do those things for the people which they cannot do for themselves.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacInnis: Good C.C.F. philosophy.

Mr. Mang: Having created this wealth as individuals, what do we do? We take some off the top, throw it into the pot and build a school. We take some more and build a road. We take some more to provide other services for ourselves. We take some more out of our wages, or from the sale of our wheat or whatever it is, throw it into the pot and give ourselves pensions at 70 and family allowances. We retain the rest.

I maintain that these social services can only grow and expand to the extent that individuals within the nation are prepared to put something in the pot to be redistributed. You cannot create something out of nothing merely by putting some little monetary gadget of interest-free money into the hands of our treasury department or the Minister of Finance. It is only brains, brawn, vision and ambition that create the wealth that some people are asking us to distribute in the form of social services.

I maintain that we reach a point in our economy where the individual is no longer prepared to put more into the pot for general distribution to all. It has been the policy of the Liberal government to gauge what our people are willing to put into the pot, and increased social services are brought about having in mind not only what people can pay to the treasury but also, which is just as important, what people are prepared to pay.

There is a point in taxation beyond which you cannot go because two factors enter into the picture. One is ability to pay and the other is desire to pay. The second is as important as the first. This government has always followed the policy of trying to gauge and time advances in social services with these two things in mind, ability to pay and desire to pay. It is only upon that bedrock or elementary basis that you can increase those family allowances which have been introduced and maintained by a Liberal administration, and will be expanded when the proper time comes.

I hope hon. members will forgive me for not having all my thoughts in sequence. I had not expected to say anything at this time. You will pardon me for being in the kindergarten. The people did not elect me before, so it is not my fault. I am willing to learn. If anyone in this house can show me how you can distribute something which you do not have or do not know where to get, I am willing to learn. If people here are prepared to show me that by substituting these monetary gadgets of interest-free money or substituting in our economy the idea of having the state own and control the mediums of production, distribution and exchange, and thereby create a higher standard of living, create more wealth and power, then I am prepared to learn. So far I am only at the kindergarten stage, where I sincerely believe that the only way you can create wealth is by the individual applying his brains, his brawn and his vision and ambition to those things with which nature endowed us. Those things are then distributed by means of those green tickets that we call money.

Until the proper time comes when the people are willing, as I said before, to pay more taxes—I should not call them by that ugly word, but I should say willing to put more of their things into the pot—and have the ability to pay, I do not think we should call for an increase in family allowances as requested in this resolution.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): When the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) introduced this resolution in the last parliament, Mr. Speaker, he spent, as I think you will remember, some time in defining the authorship of family allowances. Other members in his group in supporting his motion claimed greater authorship for the measure than any other political group in this house.

I could not help but note with great interest today, when the hon. member introduced the resolution we are now discussing, that he was generous enough to pay credit to the government of the day for having introduced this important social measure. He went on, quite properly, to pay tribute to the members in this house who supported the measure which was proposed in the first instance by the government of the day headed by the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King. I am glad the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) took occasion, on invitation by an hon. member opposite, to place on record the undoubted fact that authorship of family allowances in Canada must be credited to that statesman who, more than any other up until the time of his death, had done so much to promote the social welfare of this country.

The resolution which we are debating is an important one. It affords us an opportunity of assessing the value of family allowances, a measure that is costing this country a considerable sum of money and which, at least once in every session, should bear examination at the hands of this house. Not one of those who have opposed the resolution can be accused of being opposed to the principle of family allowances. Certainly no one on this side of the house who finds reason to make a reservation in respect to the resolution as offered can be accused of being opposed to family allowances.

Mr. Noseworthy: Some of them came rather close to it.

Mr. Martin: The hon. member says that some of them came rather close to it, but coming rather close to it does not mean that anyone has opposed family allowances in this debate. As one who is responsible for the administration of family allowances for the time being, I cannot help but feel some encouragement in noting the wide measure of support that exists for family allowances from one end of this country to the other. The only people who now oppose family allowances no longer form the bastions of privilege in the Tory party, because that party is now in support of this measure. In fact in this house the only real opposition I have noted to family allowances comes from what I might call the Tory wing of the socialist party, sometimes more properly called the Moosejavian splinter.

I am happy, therefore, that in discussing this measure today I do so with a background of general support from practically every member in this house for the principle. In order to appreciate the value of family allowances one must understand the relationship of family allowances to social welfare measures generally. As the hon. member who has just spoken said at the conclusion of his remarks, we on this side of the house do not look upon the present totality of social measures as by any means representing all that we propose to do, as a party and as a government, to improve the social welfare of the people of Canada.

Mr. Noseworthy: If you stay in power long enough.

Mr. Martin: If we stay in power long enough, and I have not any doubt we shall, this country will reap increasing benefits from increasing and new measures of social welfare yet to be introduced in parliament.

It is also very important for this house, if proper appreciation is to be had of this measure, to know something of the cost involved. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) suggested that during the course of this session he was going to push and prod me on every occasion—and he has resorted to almost every occasion—to try to get me to pronounce the government's policy concerning health insurance.

Mr. Knowles: How about it?

Mr. Martin: The other day someone spoke of the desirability of lowering the age limit for old age pensions, and someone else mentioned the desirability of increasing old age pensions. I believe no one should hope by these ventures into imaginative processes to fool themselves, this parliament or the people of Canada on one thing, and that is that health insurance, improved old age security benefits and other social measures can be brought about—

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): At an election.

Mr. Martin: —only when the nation can afford them.

Mr. Knowles: And it can.

Mr. Martin: No one is going to do social security much good by taking a course that is anything but realistic. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) just said we only introduce these measures when we are faced with an election. The hon. member knows that is not the case.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I know the Liberal party.

Mr. Martin: Family allowances were introduced in 1944, and elections took place in 1945.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin: We are now in the first session of the present parliament, within a few months of a general election, and this government is not waiting until the year before a general election to bring in a dominion-wide system of disability allowances. On Monday and Tuesday next I will be sitting in a room in this building conferring with the ten provincial governments on the proposal of the federal government to bring about a system of disability allowances. I am sure I will never hear from any of the members opposite, directly opposite, any word of commendation for having brought in such a measure in the first session of parliament immediately after a general election. In spite of what I have just said, hon. gentlemen will go from one end of this country to another and say that the only time the government brings in any social security measure is when it is faced with the prospect of a general election. Here is one instance at any rate, among many others I could recite, where that is not the case.

This measure, introduced without prodding or urging by a government headed by Mr. Mackenzie King, has resulted in the payment of over $2,480 million since the inauguration of family allowance payments. That is up to December 31 last year. Every month $29,370,000 flows into the homes of 2,080,000 families on behalf of 4,860,000 children. I need not emphasize to the house what this means in terms of improved social benefits and security for these children and these families.

As I said on a previous occasion, roughly 19 per cent of the working population of Canada is responsible for the maintenance of 84 per cent of the children of Canada, and the value and validity of this measure has to be determined by that important fact, which was outlined again today by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue).

So I do not propose in what I have to say today to justify family allowances. I take it, but for the splinter group I have mentioned, we are all in favour of this particular measure. We recognize what it does by way of providing better food, shelter, clothing, health care and education for the children of our country.

Mr. Argue: The hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Thatcher) will vote for this if he gets a chance.

Mr. Martin: It is also interesting to note that by the time a child reaches the age of 16, the average amount paid out in respect of that child through family allowances represents about $1,188. No one, particularly those who support this motion, should take the position that because of the increase in the cost of living, which has varied since the end of the war in this and in every other country, the contribution made by family allowances is not a significant one.

It is no wonder, then, that this measure has been referred to by no less a figure than the President of the United States during the course of the presidential election last year as the most significant piece of social legislation introduced in any country of the western world in the last 50 years. If this measure, which is costing us now over $350 million a year, were established in the United States it would represent an expenditure in that country of over three and a half billion dollars. So let no one say that this measure with its present proportions does not represent a very significant contribution to the problem of welfare and social security in our country.

It is all very well to suggest that this amount should be increased when no responsibility is reposed on the proposer for finding the wherewithal, the necessary resources to make this possible. It is all very well to say "Let us have health insurance, improved old age security, and increased family allowances," without giving one bit of evidence of appreciation of what the total cost would be by way of increasing the tax burden on the people, particularly when the majority of the people of this country who pay taxes are the people who themselves come within the embrace of family allowances.

It is all very well to suggest that this measure would cost only $170 to $190 million, which is estimated to be the cost of the proposal now before the house; and it is all very well to say that is not much money. That represents a great deal of money, and if that amount were added to the cost of the proposals that have been made in this house thus far one will realize how justified I was last year and how justified I am this year in saying that the proposal lacks any serious practical quality at this time in the light of existing obligations and in the light of trying to do something further in developing other fields of social welfare for the future.

We have some yardstick by which we can compare our position with that of Australia, the United Kingdom and New Zealand. They have family allowances and their schemes, while not in most cases as generous in terms of the individual amount given to a child, are nevertheless in principle comparable with ours and justify the kind of comparison I am now about to make.

The total amount spent on family allowances in Canada is greater than the total amount spent on family allowances in Australia, New Zealand and Great Britain on the basis of the figures for 1952-53. What about the percentage of national income spent on family allowances in these three countries? We are spending more by way of percentage of net national income on family allowances than Australia and Great Britain, and we are only slightly behind New Zealand. But, with regard to New Zealand, the total amount given to a child in Canada in the course of a year is greater, and the purchasing power in relation to the cost of living on the basis of the figures I have for the past six months is certainly to our advantage in Canada.

In Canada the percentage of net national income spent on family allowances for 1952-53 is 1·84 per cent; in Australia it is 1·50 per cent; in Great Britain it is ·71 per cent; and in New Zealand it is 2·61 per cent.

Another basis of comparison is the relation of family allowances to other social security expenditures. In Canada family allowances represent 25·5 per cent of all social security expenditures. That is a larger proportion than in the case of Australia where it is 23·3 per cent, and in New Zealand where it is 22·5 per cent, and in Great Britain where it is 4·5 per cent. These calculations are based upon the figures for 1951-52.

[Mr. Martin.]

When hon. gentlemen criticize the government because of the attitude which, I believe realistically, it is taking with regard to this particular measure, they should bear in mind that we have in support of the attitude we take the policies of governments in comparable countries and of governments made up of political parties who do not always share our political views. Perhaps the reason they have been actuated in the policies thus developed is that like ourselves they have other commitments and they conceivably have other social welfare projects in mind, as we have, which we shall bring in at the appropriate time, in the light of what the government conceives to be the obligations of the people of Canada at that moment.

In the estimates of my department for 1954-55, to be presented, we are appropriating or estimating $348 million for family allowances. Therefore it is against that background that we must consider the resolution now before us. The sum of $348 million represents a substantial amount of money. Compare that with the total cost of government on the federal level before 1938, and you will have some appreciation of the significance of the measure.

In 1946 the total annual cost of family allowances was $240 million. That represented at that time 2·68 per cent of disposable personal income of Canadians. My hon. friend spoke a while ago of the tremendous increase in the cost of living, and what a great reduction had taken place in the value of family allowance because of this increase in the cost of living. I have just given the figures for 1946 in relation to the disposable personal income, which I said was 2·68 per cent. In 1952, when we spent $330 million in family allowances, the figure represented 2·09 per cent of disposable personal income in Canada. It is therefore clear that family allowances, as a component of disposable personal income, have not declined to anything like the extent suggested by the proposer of this resolution when he spoke earlier today.

Mr. Argue: The value of the individual cheque has gone down 40 per cent; that was my statement.

Mr. Martin: When my hon. friend looks at the statistics he will find that that is not the case.

Mr. Argue: For food it is up 73 per cent.

Mr. Martin: If my hon. friend will choose to read what I have just said, and compare it with what he has just said, he will find that my figures are more satisfactory and more germane to the issue than the very generous oratorical luxury which he allowed himself this afternoon.

We must keep in mind three important points in connection with this measure. Family allowances were never intended to cover the complete cost of child maintenance. No social benefit can ever hope to do that. All we can provide is assistance toward maintenance in one way or another, and family allowances are no different in that particular from any other social welfare measure. But it is important to note, secondly, that without any increase family allowances, in this fiscal year costing some $348 million, represent an additional increase over last year of some $18 million.

What is proposed in the resolution before us? It is proposed in the language of the hon. member for Assiniboia that we should increase family allowance expenditures by 60 per cent. I say to him that if he carefully examines all the implications of what he proposes I do not believe that he will seriously renew this resolution in the form in which it has been presented.

Mr. Argue: Next session.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend says "next session". I am sure that before I finish he will feel that it would have been better to give second thought to this measure than to adopt precisely the words he used in the resolution last year.

If we were to accept this proposal, instead of estimating for an expenditure of $348 million I would be asking this house to approve $500 million for family allowances alone. By proposing an increase of some $170 million a year, as the hon. gentleman has done today, in family allowances, already our largest single item of expenditure in the social welfare field, my hon. friend is doing more than has yet been done this session to jeopardize the possibility of advances in other important fields of social welfare and health.

On reflection I am sure my hon. friend will realize that what I am saying as the responsible minister is really representative of the situation in its entirety. This session we are going to embark upon a system of disability allowances, and no hon. gentleman opposite has yet commended the government for the initiative it has taken, in co-operation with the provinces, in providing for a system of disability allowances. My hon. friend smiles. I suppose he smiles because I have suggested that no one opposite has commended the government.

Mr. Knowles: We are trying to get you to smile.

Mr. Martin: I do not have much difficulty in smiling because I have the advantage of looking at hon. gentlemen opposite. I do say that the measure which we are going to discuss with the provinces on Monday is an important one.

Would it have been possible to bring in disability allowances if last year, for instance, we had accepted the proposals of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and various other members, proposals which in their entirety totalled over $1,500 million? Would it have been possible to bring in a system of disability allowances if we spent all our money on one branch of social welfare? Is there any responsible member in this house who, in the light of our defence obligations of over $2 billion, and our other obligations, would seriously propose that there is merit in the suggestion now made by the hon. member for Assiniboia?

Mr. Knowles: That is the point, billions for defence, but—

Mr. Martin: We on this side of the house will take second place to no one in our zeal to do what we can to help those groups in our country who need social welfare assistance. I do not say that we have a monopoly in that, any more than I agree for one minute that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has, who says he prods me and will prod me until the last day of my political life.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin: I do not for one moment say that he has a monopoly. Every hon. member is sincerely interested in doing something to improve the lot of those who need the benefit of social security measures.

Mr. Knowles: I would be glad to see the minister introduce health insurance.

Mr. Martin: We could not do more on that particular item, or on a proposal put forward at a particular moment, but let us take the position that all of us are interested in these measures.

We are spending in Canada this year $1,650 million on social security. Of that amount $1,200 million is provided by the federal parliament; $350 million represents expenditures made by the provinces, and the municipalities are responsible for roughly $100 million, making a total of, as I say, $1,650 million.

Mr. Knowles: Without giving a breakdown, would the minister give the categories of social benefits that are included in that figure that is paid by the federal government?

Mr. Martin: Yes; family allowances, $348 million; old age security, $345 million; old age assistance, $22 million; allowances for the blind, $3 million; national health program, $30 million—these are only estimated expenditures—Indian health services, $16 million, representing in national health and welfare alone, $765 million. Veterans affairs: pensions, $128 million; war veterans allowances, $26 million; treatment and prosthetic services, $45 million, making an estimated expenditure on veterans affairs of $199 million. In the case of the Department of Labour, unemployment insurance benefits totalled $135 million. These are the principal items.

I say that this government need not ask anyone to believe in its declaration of faith in family allowances. Family allowances were introduced by the Liberal party made up of many hon. members on this side of the house who were then in the house, and it was supported by many hon. members sitting opposite. But it was initiated by a Liberal government. If my hon. friend will look over the debates in Hansard over the years he will find that it was private Liberal members of parliament who proposed in the first place that there should be adopted in Canada a system of family allowances. So no one should take the position that because we are now taking issue with the particular resolution we are not in favour of family allowances.

I read some of the speeches made by certain hon. members during the last election. When talking about family allowances they referred to this callous, this careless government, the government that is not concerned about the welfare of the people, the government that opposed family allowances when they wanted to give $170 million more to the children of Canada.

An hon. Member: Who said that?

Mr. Martin: I read that several members—

An hon. Member: Name one.

Mr. Martin: I am prepared to name them, but I want to deal with something more constructive at the moment. That is what will be said again. Hon. members will leave this chamber and will say that the government is not interested in the children of this country. It will be suggested that a motion was brought in proposing an increase in family allowances and the Minister of National Health and Welfare, that hardhearted man, the spokesman for the government of Canada, said, "no". No reference will be made to the fact that the act was brought in by the present government. No reference will be made to the fact that old age pensions were introduced in this house by a Liberal government.

Mr. MacInnis: Under pressure.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend says "under prodding", but I do not know what he means exactly.

Mr. MacInnis: Under pressure, I said.

Mr. Martin: The hon. member says "under pressure." I do not think that is really the proper phrase. I will not deny that a distinguished member of this house, a former leader of the C.C.F., played a great part in the development of social welfare in Canada. I would be the first to join in paying deserved tribute to a great Canadian statesman. But by the same token I should like to see hon. gentlemen opposite recognize the great part played in the development of social welfare by Mackenzie King. I have never heard but one hon. gentleman opposite acknowledge the contribution made by Mackenzie King, made by the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), made by the government in the development of this program.

It was a Liberal government that brought in the veterans' charter. It was a Liberal government that brought in pensions for the blind. It will be a Liberal government that will bring in assistance for certain disabled people in our country. It was a Liberal government that brought in unemployment insurance. It was a Liberal government that brought in a national health program. Every bit of social legislation on the statute books of our country on federal account was placed there by a Liberal government.

Mr. Knight: Is it not likely that whatever government might have been in power in this country during the last 20 years would have done the same thing?

Mr. Martin: I am not speaking about a hypothetical situation so remote from reality as that proposed by the hon. member. I will say that perhaps I am sensitive on the point, but I do find it difficult sometimes to appreciate some of the speeches that are made outside of this house by certain members.

Mr. Knowles: What about speeches inside the house?

Mr. Martin: I must say that I am sensitive about some of the speeches made in this house by certain members.

Mr. Knowles: Particularly when we refer to the 1919 Liberal commitment on health insurance.

Mr. Martin: Having pointed out clearly the authorship of these measures, I do not want to belittle in any way the contribution that has been made over the years by so many members of parliament and by all political groups, particularly by certain members who are now in the house. I remember a speech made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis) and I recall his words. Even though one cannot always agree with him one can always find occasion to respect what he says. I remember him talking about a particular measure and saying that we must not fool the people of Canada, we must let them realize that these desirable measures can be provided only out of the hard work of the masses of the people.

I have never forgotten the effect his statement had in that particular debate. We must not forget those words today. We must not for the purpose of political jockeying, even early in a session or in a parliament, put forward proposals for which, because of their very relationship in the context of the times, no reasonable man would conclude there was any hope of adoption or acceptance.

There are some who criticize the government because it does too much in this field. All one has to do is to pick up the editorial pages of newspapers of this country. This government was once referred to by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) as a government made up of men who give service to socialism in a silk hat. It has been said that we are proponents of the welfare state.

Then there are others who say that we do not do enough. I think it may be said that sometimes we are overly cautious. I think it can be properly said that sometimes we perhaps balance things a little too carefully. But that is the Canadian way of doing things. We believe in a responsible course, a responsible middle-way, standing in between extreme proposals, standing in between what those who are against doing too much and those who want more have to propose.

We do not believe in the welfare state in the sense in which that term is used by some people who criticize what we are doing. It is said that we are trying to create a welfare state. If by welfare state is meant something by which the state is trying to acquire more power, by which it is trying to impose exclusive paternalism, we certainly do not believe in that kind of society. We believe in the welfare state where emphasis is on welfare and not on the state. That is the idea that has characterized all we have done.

In taking the position I have taken today I do so with the knowledge that at the present time this nation has great responsibilities beyond the confines of this land in our efforts to preserve the peace of the world. That is a very important obligation. In spite of that we are gradually, in a responsible way, increasing various measures of social welfare in which we believe. We have not stopped. We are firmly convinced that additional steps will be taken by us in the light of our responsible consideration of the situation in which we find ourselves along with many other nations of the world.

With all that I am sure hon. members, whether they sit on this or the other side, cannot help but conclude that the course we are taking is in the interests of this great nation.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take part in this debate, but because of some of the things that have been said and some of the arguments that have been made I think possibly there are a few words that can be said with beneficial results.

I do not believe we should look only at what has been done with regard to social welfare in this country, but rather that we should also look at the circumstances in which it was done. I have been here for quite a long time. I came here first in the 1930's. In fact I came here in 1930, when conditions in this country were very bad. I came here at the time of the election of the last Conservative government we had, under the leadership of the late Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. Although that was a time of peace, not only in this country here but generally all over the world, we were confronted with the fact that nothing could be done to improve the lot of the common people of this country.

During the last election I was interested to hear speakers for the Liberal party assert that they were seeking election on the party's record. I was intrigued to notice that in referring to that record they never said anything about their years in office between 1935 and 1940. It was only the years after 1940 to which they referred. There is a good reason for that omission, because they were no more able to do anything in the years between 1935 and 1940 than were the Conservative party from 1930 to 1935.

Mr. Brooks: And before 1930, what did they do?

Mr. MacInnis: I am not going to get into a discussion of that matter. That was a little bit before my time. But before I go on and say something further in that connection, may I say that I have here in my hand a copy of Maclean's magazine for August 1, 1953. In that issue of this magazine was an article by four Canadians. Its title was "How I'm going to vote". Hugh MacLennan of Montreal spoke for the Liberal party; Scott Young spoke for the Conservatives; I believe Lister Sinclair spoke for the C.C.F. and Bob Bowman for the Social Credit party. I am going to read a short quotation from Hugh MacLennan's article because here is a Liberal speaking for the Liberal party. He is a reluctant Liberal, as he himself says; and I do not blame him for that because there is every reason why a person could be a Liberal but not a very enthusiastic one. Underneath Mr. MacLennan's picture are these words:

> Reluctant Liberal Hugh MacLennan lives in Montreal where he is working on his fifth novel. He also lectures in English at McGill University.

Indicating whom he would vote for in the election of last August, this in part is what Mr. Hugh MacLennan had to say. I am quoting it because it indicates whence has come the pressure for social services and other beneficial measures in this country. I am also quoting it, of course, because it is from a Liberal and for that reason could not be far wrong. This is what he says:

> As I live in the province of Quebec, it is pointless even to consider the claims of Social Credit. They will run no candidate in my riding. Nor is the C.C.F. likely to do so either. In any case the C.C.F. is in the position of a man whose store has been robbed, and robbed consistently, for more than ten years.

As the lawyers would say, the key word in the sentence is "more", "more than ten years". For how many more years than ten, Mr. MacLennan did not say; but he said that C.C.F. policy has been stolen by somebody for more than ten years. He does not leave us in the dark as to who was doing the pilfering. He says this:

> The Liberals have lifted so much of Mr. Coldwell's stock and sold it under their own trade-mark that he has been left with little of his own that would tempt me to buy.

I am not at all aggrieved at the Liberals for stealing from the C.C.F. because it indicates that the C.C.F. had something worth stealing. They could not very well steal from any of the other parties because the other parties did not have anything worth stealing; and the reason the Liberals stole from the C.C.F. is that they did not have anything worth while in their own program. I think that answers, and from the horse's mouth, as we might say—and a Liberal horse's mouth at that—the question as to who was making the drive for social security in this country for more than ten years.

I come back to the point I made a little while ago, namely that the Liberals did not say anything about the five years they were in office from 1935 to 1940. I contend that they did not say anything about their record in those years because they did not accomplish anything; and they could not accomplish anything until war came. With the exception of the old age pension that came in 1927, all our social security services and all the improvements that have come since then have come when the country was at war, or when the country was preparing to defend itself in a future war, or when the country was repairing the devastation of war.

Mr. Hahn: Will the hon. member entertain a question?

Mr. MacInnis: I would rather not, because my time is short. It is with regret that I refuse to answer the question my hon. friend wishes to ask, but I do not want to talk this motion out. I want to leave time for a vote if a vote is desired.

I have pointed out that all the improvements in our social services came under these conditions to which I referred. When did the family allowances come? As my hon. friend pointed out a while ago they came in 1944, when more than half the revenue, the labour and the resources of this country were going into the war. Then when we got old age security, in 1952, again half the revenue of the country was going into preparing for defence and for the war in Korea.

Mr. Martin: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend, but between 1935 and 1940 he forgets pensions for the blind and he also forgets housing legislation.

Mr. MacInnis: Oh, there was nothing in housing legislation since 1935; and the mere bagatelle that went for pensions for the blind is hardly worth mentioning.

Mr. Martin: But my hon. friend said nothing was done.

Mr. MacInnis: My friend realized that so little was done that he did not say anything about it himself. I am saying now that nothing was done and that the need was terrific. What I want to say now is that if we had not had the misfortune, or the good fortune, to have a war, to be repairing the devastation of that war and to be preparing to defend ourselves in another war, it is doubtful whether to this day we would have any social legislation. That is the record of the Liberal party.

We are coming now to the time when we may have no war on our hands, when we will not be preparing to defend ourselves in another war, and when we will not be repairing the devastation of war. The number of unemployed is increasing now. It is greater today than at any time since the Korean trouble started in 1950. There is nothing in the past record of the government to indicate that they have any policy for full employment except in times when great expenditures have to be made in non-constructive and non-profitable ways, such as war purposes.

I suggest that the time has arrived when we should be preparing to put more money and more of the resources of the country into social welfare projects, a time when our energies are not being used up in costly non-productive ways. I hear people refer to how much social services are costing the country. Is it a cost to the country that the people are fed, clothed and sheltered through the labour of the people themselves? The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Mang) pointed out today how wealth was created by applying labour to the natural resources of the country. As he should know, that is the only way by which wealth can be produced, but there are many ways in which wealth can be appropriated. It is up to us to see that our wealth is appropriated and kept for those who produce it and not allowed to get into the hands of those who cannot use it for productive purposes and will not allow it to be used for the welfare of the people of the country.

As I see it, there is no other reason why people should live or attempt to live except to give themselves the best standard of living that their labour and the resources of the country can provide. In this country at the present time, as was pointed out in an editorial that I read the other day, there are hundreds of people who have not enough to eat. There are hundreds of people who have none of the comforts and the few luxuries that make life worth living. If the wealth of the country cannot be used to make life better for these people, to what use can it be put?

We are coming to the stage when tensions in international affairs are lessening and when production for the wasteful purposes of war will no longer be necessary, and there is a responsibility confronting whoever may form the government of the country to see that our productive forces are kept busy providing not only subsistence but good living for every member of the community.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a brief word. When I spoke about the social legislation of the Liberal party during the last election campaign the government was accused of doing too much and killing the initiative of Canadians. I think there is something in that. I do not agree with my hon. friend that the government did nothing from 1935 to 1940. The first thing we did was to close the relief camps, and as far as those that were kept open are concerned, the people were paid.

An hon. Member: Fifty cents a day.

Mr. McIvor: They were paid wages. The people who came out of these camps were given emergency work on the C.N.R. and the C.P.R. That may not be considered much, but it was a lot of help to Fort William.

I was going to ask the minister this question. What is the outstanding need for this provision? Are children today not getting enough food? Are they not getting enough clothes? Have they not enough bicycles? Do they not attend picture shows often enough? What is the outstanding need? I think the minister emphasized a very important point when he said there is more urgent legislation ahead of any suggestion such as this. Those are not his words, but that is his meaning. If you compare this suggestion with national health insurance there is no comparison at all, and I cannot support the resolution.

I am strongly in favour of family allowances and would not agree to any reduction in the amount, but I do not see that the children of today have any outstanding need. I go to a school in Fort William or Port Arthur and what do I see? I see hundreds of bicycles. I see children who are well clothed. If you go to a picture show it is packed with children. Show me the outstanding need.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member speaks now he will close the debate.

(Translation):

Mr. Maurice Breton (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, it is always a very satisfying experience for a Liberal to speak about social security. Bearing in mind what the Liberal party has accomplished in this field in the last 25 or 30 years, it is always easy to speak about this matter pleasantly and calmly.

Long before the birth of the Canadian socialist party there were, in the ranks of the Liberal party, men who were thinking about the development of social security in this country. It is with great pleasure that I refer to the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King who, as early as 1900, was giving serious thought to social questions in Canada, and founded our first Department of Labour.

In 1917, long before the appearance of the socialist party in this country, Mr. Mackenzie

King wrote a book which has, I am sure, provided a source of inspiration to our socialists. This book, entitled "Humanity and Industry", defined for the future that very social legislation on which we pride ourselves today. In 1927, in order to carry out his ideas on the development of social security, Mr. King had parliament adopt the Old Age Pensions Act. About 1936 followed more social security legislation which was to transform this country's approach to economic problems and increasingly demonstrate to our people that social problems as such were among the first matters to be provided for in the Liberal party's platform. At that time Mr. Mackenzie King brought in the Bank of Canada Act. By thus controlling our credit, Mr. King set his footsteps firmly along the road leading to the economic transformation of this country.

On reading this interesting book by Mr. Hutchison about Mr. King, one becomes aware of the extent to which this great far-seeing statesman has influenced this country's and the United States' policy, since it is said that he influenced Roosevelt's New Deal policy. There is cause for pride if one stops to consider what the Liberal party in this country has done by way of social security and industrial legislation.

In my constituency alone, $3,600,000 was distributed last year for social security, in old age pensions and family allowances alone. Furthermore, I note that in my constituency, thanks to the Unemployment Insurance Act, $600,000 was distributed in the form of unemployment benefits. All in all, the Liberal government has re-established the equilibrium which must exist among all classes of society and it has distributed the money where it was needed; it has acted in such a way that our children, our old people and the sick may enjoy the security to which they are entitled.

We are in favour of social security; it is indeed an object of satisfaction and pride to us Liberals. The present policy, which we have been moulding these last thirty years, is essentially a social security policy. It is because of this that today, in all parts of Canada, people of all ages, religious faiths or beliefs endorse the policy of the Liberal party. Let us develop our resources for the benefit of all Canadians. However, our immense natural resources are and must be developed through private enterprise. It would be bad for our country to kill this spirit of initiative through overtaxation.

I believe that every member of this house and everyone in this country recognizes the good will of the Liberals in trying to settle this social problem in terms of security for all. A Liberal whose heart is in the right place cannot help but understand that it is necessary to pass legislation to ensure that those who have nothing may live a life that will make them proud of being Canadians.

That is something we all want, we Liberals. We have a long-term program that will, within a very short while, provide our disabled people with a little joy and sunshine. Our social security program is such that the government will be able to bring into effect necessary health insurance legislation. There are many Liberals who believe that we must always go forward, but cautiously. It is quite easy for certain political opponents to confine themselves to outbidding the social security program by asking that it be doubled or tripled, but I believe also, Mr. Speaker, that a certain middle course approach should be our aim in this field as in others.

At the present time, family allowances cost this country $350 million; to double that amount would mean an outlay of $700 million. Apart from the children who benefit from family allowances, there are those invalids who come to see their member and say: "How is it that the government seems to ignore us? How is it that we seem to be considered as outcasts in our own country? You pass legislation in favour of old people and children, but what about us who are penniless and who are out in the streets?" I think that one of the first legislative measures to be adopted in this country, at the present time, should be in favour of these invalids.

Mr. Speaker, one could speak at some length on this social security question. It is a subject on which a lot has been written in every country. But if we consider what has been accomplished in this country these last 25 years and what has been done in the United States and elsewhere, we find that, thanks to the genius of the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, our country is ahead of practically every other country, because of our decision to distribute the wealth of the nation among all classes of our population.

Well I believe that the great advantage of the Liberal policy is this: it is a middle-of-the-road policy. We sympathize with the socialist party people who feel pity for the poor and who want to help them, but they should not think that they are the only ones to have such feelings. We, also, sympathize deeply with all those unfortunate people who ask the government for assistance.

If we were able to double the amount of family allowances, if we could give to our population the benefit of all the social measures possible we would do it with pleasure. I for one believe that people with means should help the poor.

Mr. Speaker, I notice it is six o'clock. My voice is getting hoarse and I move the adjournment of the debate.

(Text):

On motion of Mr. Breton the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Brooks: What is the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, I have announced three times that the business for tomorrow is housing.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

PRISONER OF WAR ALLOWANCES

Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Will payment of P.O.W. allowances be extended to Canadian Korean P.O.W.?

2. How many Canadian Korean P.O.W. would be eligible for the allowance were payment extended to them?

3. What percentage of world war II P.O.W. eligible for these payments have applied to date?

4. What was the total number of Canadian P.O.W. during world war II, and how many of these are eligible to receive P.O.W. allowances?

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to answer this question orally. The first part inquires whether allowances will be paid to prisoners of war taken in Korea. This would normally be a question of policy which it is not usual to answer in response to questions. I think I should perhaps point out that the awards that are paid to prisoners of war taken in European or Far Eastern theatres in the late war are paid out of funds under the control of the custodian, and not out of the treasury. I feel quite sure the hon. member for Brandon-Souris would not feel that there would be any moral justification whatsoever for using any part of these funds to make any kind of awards to prisoners of war taken in the Korean conflict.

I think the second part of the question is answered by the answer I have given to the first. As to the third part, I am informed by the secretary of the commission dealing with this matter that it is of course impossible to tell what percentage of prisoners of war would be eligible for payment until each case has been examined, but possibly the hon. member really wanted to find out what percentage of prisoners of war had made application to the commission. I am informed that it was about 65 per cent by the 31st of December, and it was on account of the fact that 35 per cent of possible applicants had not made application that the governor in council had the time extended for making these applications until the 31st of March.

As for the fourth part of the question, I am advised that the number of prisoners taken in the European theatre, which includes of course North Africa, was about 9,055.

DEBTS OWING CANADA

Mr. Thatcher:

1. What steps, if any, has the government recently taken to obtain payments from China, Czechoslovakia, Roumania and Greece, on their outstanding debt to Canada?

2. Have these nations neglected to maintain payments on their debt to Canada? If so, for what reason?

3. Has any nation mentioned in (1) indicated an intention of recommencing payments on their debt in the future?

Mr. Benidickson: I understand that the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre is going to reword this question and probably advance it at a later date.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

Inquiries of the Ministry

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

VEGETABLES AND EGGS—IMPORTS

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain):

1. What kind of vegetables and what quantities of these were imported into Canada, during each month of 1953?
2. What quantities of eggs were imported to Canada, and from where, during 1953?

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—INQUIRY AS TO SYSTEM-WIDE LAY-OFFS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I have a question for the Minister of Transport, but since he is absent today perhaps his parliamentary assistant would take note of it and arrange for an answer. I should like to have the minister tell the house whether system-wide lay-offs by the Canadian National Railways are to take place on or about January 26. If so, would he also tell us whether there is not some way by which such lay-offs can be avoided?

Mr. L. Langlois (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Transport): I will take the question as notice.

WOMEN CLEANERS, WINNIPEG—INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE IN WAGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works. Has the minister as yet received a report from the Department of Labour with respect to the survey of prevailing wages in the Winnipeg area in relation to the matter of wages paid to women cleaners working for the minister's department? If so, is consideration being given to increasing those wages?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): I have received an interim report, and I am expecting the final report in the near future.

DISABLED PERSONS

CONFERENCE WITH PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS ON SCHEME FOR ALLOWANCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. P. Cavers (Lincoln): In the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I should like to direct a question to his parliamentary assistant. On Tuesday, November 24, in reply to a question concerning the rehabilitation of disabled persons, the minister informed the house that he had requested a meeting with representatives of all provinces to deal with the institution of a nation-wide scheme for allowances for totally disabled persons. Can the parliamentary assistant tell us whether this meeting can be convened, and when?

Mr. F. G. Robertson (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Health and Welfare): I am pleased to inform the hon. member for Lincoln that the provincial-federal conference to which he refers will be held on Monday and Tuesday of next week.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

STATEMENT ON STANDARDIZATION OF SMALL ARMS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): In view of the very general interest in the subject, I should like to make a brief statement on small arms. The Prime Minister of the United Kingdom has announced in the House of Commons that Britain will soon adopt a Belgian designed .30 calibre self-loading rifle as the standard infantry weapon for British forces.

Since the second world war Canada, together with other countries, initially the United Kingdom and the United States, has given consideration to the development and adoption of a standard small arm round and rifle. Over several years we conducted trials of several rifles, including the Belgian FN-2, to which Sir Winston Churchill referred. This is a fully automatic rifle capable of meeting the requirements desired in a weapon of this type and of using the standard .30 calibre round which I announced in Paris had been adopted by Belgium, Canada, France, the United Kingdom and the United States and approved as the standard NATO round.

I should inform the house that we have ordered 2,000 of these rifles for extensive user trials to further test the capacity of the rifle in all conditions found in Canada, particularly winter and arctic conditions. We have an understanding that if the rifle is accepted by this country we will produce it under licence from the Fabrique Nationale, which is one of the arsenals of the Belgian government. The Department of Defence Production will instruct Canadian Arsenals Limited to begin work on the engineering and industrial lay-outs for the production of this weapon, so that no time will be lost in anticipation of its acceptance.

It may be remembered that in April, 1951, it was announced in the United Kingdom that that country was going into production of a new British type. The co-operative and constructive course now taken by the United Kingdom is very much in the interest of unity of action among the North Atlantic treaty nations.

I expect that we will take the same course, and I hope that other countries will do the same, thereby bringing about this greatly to be desired step on which so much time and effort has been spent in the interest of standardized practice and united action.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

REPORTS OF ALLEGED FRAUD—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works, of which I have given him notice. Has the minister been informed regarding the highway swindle in the Fort William sector of Ontario? Since contracts in the division in question involve trans-Canada highway contracts in which the federal government is interested, is the minister prepared to make a statement to the house regarding the matter?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of this question. It is similar to one asked on Tuesday by the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Thatcher), so perhaps anything I say now might be considered as an answer to his question as well.

In reply to the question as to whether or not I have been informed, the answer is yes.

In reply to the second question in each case, I might say that we are informed charges have been laid against several employees of the Ontario department of highways. I understand action is being taken which will give the courts an opportunity of hearing the information relative to the charges, so perhaps I should not discuss them too fully.

I might say, however, that in the district of Fort William some 14 contracts have been let under the terms of the Trans-Canada Highway Act since it was implemented in December 1949, and the agreement signed subsequent thereto in the following year. The total amount involved in these contracts is about $10·5 million. There is no evidence that all these contracts are under suspicion. This will be determined by the investigation which is still being made. Under the terms of the Trans-Canada Highway Act the federal government is obliged to pay half the cost of construction, which would normally require us to pay about $5·25 million in respect of those contracts. So far we have actually paid about $3,210,000, which means that there is a holdback of over $2 million.

I have given instructions that no further moneys are to be paid until we are satisfied that they will be paid actually in respect of work going into the highway construction.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): I should like to ask a supplementary question, because in Fort William we are interested in this matter. What responsibility has the dominion government for administration?

Mr. Winters: I know the hon. member is familiar with the terms of the Trans-Canada Highway Act, which make it clear that the administration of the trans-Canada highway program rests with the provincial governments. We have made that clear to them and they understand the position.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENTS TO WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Can the Minister of Veterans Affairs say whether the government has yet reached a decision concerning the recommendations recently made by the Canadian Legion asking for amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act? Will there be such amendments at this session?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): The matter is still under considera tion by the government.

POWER

REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT OF PROPOSED SURVEY BY THERMO EXPERT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): On Monday last the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) drew my attention to a certain newspaper dispatch referring to a proposed survey of the thermal power possibilities of the maritime provinces. At that time I promised a statement at a later date.

The dominion coal board has for some time given consideration to the possibility of increasing markets for the coal of the maritime provinces, through its increased use in the production of power. Such a development would provide a more stable basis for industry and would lessen the need for financial help in the form of freight subventions for the movement of coal out of the area where it is produced.

Use of electric power in the maritime provinces is less than in Ontario and Quebec, and it is considerably below the average per person for all of Canada. It is only reasonable to assume that any steps taken to increase the efficiency and lower the cost of power in that area would increase the demand for power and consequently the demand for fuel. Nova Scotia has almost exhausted hydro power sources; and while New Brunswick still has a potential on the Saint John river, the coal board is convinced that large scale production of power from coal would serve a twofold purpose of producing cheap power and maintaining employment in the coal industry.

As a first step in this matter the board has been in touch with the premiers of the maritime provinces and has suggested to them that a thorough and comprehensive survey of the existing and potential power production and distribution facilities would be of value in their appraisal of the power supply and needs of their respective provinces, and it would also be of value to the board and to the coal industry in their efforts to find wider markets for coal. The premiers of the maritime provinces concerned have expressed their interest and approval and are offering fullest co-operation in such a survey.

The board has been successful in engaging the services of Professor A. G. Christie, who is an outstanding expert on thermal power of international reputation, and he will be undertaking the survey. The results of this survey will be available to the provincial governments concerned.

The dominion coal board hopes that the report of the survey will disclose means whereby the price of power can be reduced with a consequent greater demand for coal in the local market.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO SPECIAL DAY FOR DISCUSSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In order to permit hon. members to make their plans, is the minister in a position to say now whether a day will be set aside for discussion of international external affairs, and when will that date be fixed?

[Mr. Prudham.]

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): It is hoped to set aside a day toward the end of next week; Thursday or Friday.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

SUBSTITUTION OF NEW LEGISLATION TO INSURE APPROVED LENDERS, ETC.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works) moved the second reading of Bill No. 102, to promote the construction of new houses, the repair and modernization of existing houses, and the improvement of housing and living conditions.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to re-enact the National Housing Act and to make substantial changes in its application. Since it is broad in its scope, covering as it does virtually all phases of housing, perhaps I should at the outset make a few remarks about the housing situation generally.

When speaking in the house last April I mentioned that new residential construction was at a high level. At that time I had available new residential starts for the first quarter of 1953. This trend, supported by existing legislation, has continued. I still cannot tell hon. members the exact number of new residential starts in Canada in 1953 because full statistics are not yet available, but we do know that at the end of November the starts numbered 98,000 for the first eleven months of the year. It would appear that about 105,000 units were started in 1953.

Hon. members will appreciate that these are starts of all kinds, in all parts of the country. Starts of about 40,000 units were made in 1953 under the terms of the National Housing Act and other housing measures taken by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. These figures represent a record level of house building in Canada. As compared with a low of 20,000 starts in 1933 and 45,000 starts in 1945, the accomplishment of 105,000 starts last year is a tribute to all who helped make them possible.

As might be expected, completions in 1953 will be about 10,000 units less than the number of starts. There will be a corresponding increase in the number of houses under construction at the end of 1953 as against a year ago. This is a condition which always obtains in a period of expanding residential construction. In periods of decline the reverse is the case. Hon. members will recall that in 1951 the number of completions, by reason of a heavy carryover, was greater than the number of starts.

Although none of us can be complacent about the need for housing, I think it will be agreed that considerable progress has been made since the end of the war. Although by no means a complete criterion of measurement, it is to be noted that the 1941 census showed an average of 4·5 persons per occupied dwelling, whereas the 1951 census shows average occupancy to be 4·1 persons. The census also revealed a reduction of about 50 per cent in the amount of housing which in the view of the census taker is substandard.

There has been a reduction in the amount of doubling-up or multiple occupancy since 1946. Not as an accurate yardstick of the amount of new housing we need, but rather as a rough indicator, I might point out to hon. members that total net family formation in Canada, after allowance for immigration and emigration, is presently at the rate of about 90,000 families a year. I hasten to add, however, that this figure cannot be directly related to the current production of new housing units at over 100,000 per annum. Nor should it be believed that all families that are not maintaining their own household represent a housing shortage of an equivalent number of units, much less effective demand for new housing.

However, the figures I have mentioned indicate that considerable progress is being made. The number of new housing units built in any one year must be related not only to our need for housing, but also to the effective demand by the Canadian people for housing. Both these figures are ever-changing and for that reason I do not believe it is possible to establish a target figure, other than one of a fairly wide range. But having said this, I would hope that it would be possible to maintain house building at a high rate, and indeed this is the main purpose of the legislation which we are now considering.

Hon. members will recall that up to the end of 1949 the number of housing starts and completions in Canada depended in large measure upon the available supply of construction workers and materials. During the years 1945 to 1949 there was no problem of a shortage of mortgage funds under the joint lending provisions of the National Housing Act or the conventional lending operations of institutional mortgage lenders. In fact the reverse was the case, and the period might well have been described as a borrower's market. During this period the construction industry rapidly increased its output and housing starts increased from year to year until in 1950 they reached the level of 93,000 units.

National Housing Act

Housing measures introduced by the government during this early post-war period were designed to meet such conditions. In 1947 Central Mortgage was empowered to make direct loans to home owners in areas where lending institutions did not carry on a lending business. This measure has been successful. Hon. members who were in the house at that time recall the difficulties in this respect. As matters stand today, I think it is a fair statement that credit-worthy borrowers in all parts of the country are able to take advantage of the National Housing Act, either through a lending institution or directly through Central Mortgage.

In 1947 rental insurance provisions were introduced to establish incentives to rental entrepreneurs. This provision in the act has proven both popular and effective. In 1949 the federal-provincial rental housing and land assembly measures came into force. Also in that year the additional one-sixth loan was introduced to lower the down payment requirements under the National Housing Act, because at that time it was considered that the capacity of the construction industry had reached a point where the number of prospective purchasers should be increased.

I have reviewed these circumstances briefly to show that during this period there was no great need to take measures to stimulate the flow of mortgage funds for new housing, because generally the supply of mortgage funds did not constitute a limitation on the housing program. With 1950 we faced a changed set of circumstances. The more urgent matters of the Korean war took precedence over the social objectives associated with housing policy. As a means of ensuring an adequate supply of materials for defence and defence supporting construction, the one-sixth additional loan provision was withdrawn in February, 1951, to reduce effective demand and at the same time prevent the prices of houses from rising unduly. This condition prevailed until October, 1951, when it was apparent that an increased level of housing starts could be supported by the economy without prejudice to the defence effort. Higher loan levels were introduced at that time. Housing starts, which had declined during 1951, rose sharply in 1952, from some 69,000 units to 83,000 units. This period of expansion in the housing field since the end of 1951 has been characterized by difficulties not present in the immediate post-war period. Foremost among these has been the shortage of private mortgage funds.

Over the post-war period the life insurance companies have been able to obtain substantial funds for new investment by selling part of their large holdings of government bonds accumulated during the war. Since 1946, the life insurance companies have reduced their holdings of government of Canada bonds by about $800 million, or from nearly 60 per cent of their total Canadian assets in 1946 to about 20 per cent currently. At the same time they have increased their holdings of mortgages by about $1,000 million, or from somewhat more than 10 per cent of their total Canadian assets in 1946 to nearly 30 per cent currently.

Investment shifts of this kind and magnitude obviously could not continue indefinitely. Although the lending institutions have also been in receipt of a steadily rising flow of repayments on earlier mortgage loans, it has become increasingly clear that at some stage they would have to reduce their rate of new mortgage lending from its recent level.

It will be recalled that increases in the maximum rates of interest authorized for National Housing Act loans were made in June, 1951, and September, 1952, to ensure a continued flow of new mortgages under the act. Hon. members will also recall that in the summer of 1952 arrangements were put into effect whereby the corporation was authorized to make direct loans to prospective home owners in centres of up to 55,000 in population, to compensate for a withdrawal from these centres of the operations of the lending institutions under the National Housing Act. These developments indicate that during this period the available supply of private mortgage funds was tending to fall short of the demand for them.

Even though the rate of house building in 1953 is over 100,000 units, this does not establish the adequacy of existing lending arrangements. The present situation is that the lending institutions are applying such an unusually large proportion of their new money to mortgage investment that a decline in mortgage money from this source must be anticipated. And even now their heavy mortgage investment is being supplemented by Central Mortgage which, in addition to its share of joint loans, is making direct loans at the rate of about $60 million a year.

It is quite clear that if there is to be an increase in private lending, additional funds must come from somewhere other than the present sources of institutional mortgage funds. The only other source of significant size stems from that part of the personal savings of individuals which year by year flows into savings deposits with the chartered banks. It is realized that at the present time these deposits are rather fully employed in other directions but we must remember that in conditions of normal growth in Canada there should be a substantial annual increase in savings deposits.

Under our present laws these funds cannot move into the housing sector because the Bank Act prohibits bank lending on the security of real estate mortgages. It is important to remember that the chartered banks perform in Canada a function with respect to savings that in other countries is performed not only by the banks, but also by building societies, mutual savings banks and savings and loan institutions. Because of the dominant position of the chartered banks in the savings field in Canada, and because mortgage lending is prohibited by the Bank Act, the housing sector is denied access to a large part of the funds which in other countries are available to finance home building.

This situation in Canada is unique. In the United States the commercial banks, the mutual savings banks and the savings and loan institutions who are the chief holders of the public's savings deposits have been an important factor in the residential field and between them are providing about 60 per cent of all new money in mortgage financing. In Australia the banks are a larger source of mortgage funds than the life insurance companies. In contrast, in Canada the life companies provide approximately 80 per cent of all institutional mortgaging financing.

It is these circumstances, together with the wide geographical distribution of the branch banks in Canada, that have led us to believe that with proper safeguards it should be made possible for the chartered banks to enter into the new residential mortgage lending field.

Hon. members will recall that the banking system in the United States encountered certain difficulties in the early thirties, and it is sometimes suggested that mortgage lending was one of the prime causes. Careful analysis of United States banking experience indicates that their mortgage problems arose mainly in connection with industrial and commercial rather than residential mortgages. Moreover, it should be borne in mind that the proposed changes in the National Housing Act will provide a very different kind of investment from the type of housing mortgage which was current in the twenties and early thirties.

The insurance feature, an important element in this program, aimed at making mortgage money available under the National Housing Act for residential construction, eliminates any possibility of substantial losses being taken by the chartered banks on their mortgage portfolio. There is the added safety, not present 20 years ago, of principal, interest and taxes being paid by the borrower on a monthly basis.

In addition, provision is being made for liquidity of the mortgage portfolios held by the banks. In this legislation provision is made that Central Mortgage may purchase mortgages from approved lenders. In addition the government has announced its intention of proposing an amendment to the Bank of Canada Act whereby the mortgage portfolio of the banks will be eligible for loans from the Bank of Canada, as is presently the case for government bonds.

As the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said in announcing this policy on October 1, the establishment of mortgage insurance will make it possible, by safeguarding savings deposits, to remove a barrier to the natural flow of the people's savings into housing investment. Because the banks have a widespread branch system, the benefits from participation by them in housing finance should be particularly important in those communities where other lending institutions have found it difficult to provide facilities for making and servicing mortgage loans. The introduction of an important group of new mortgage lenders should make more private funds available for home mortgages and should result in better facilities in mortgage lending in smaller communities.

This brings me to the bill which is now being considered. I will review it briefly. It is proposed to terminate the joint lending arrangement as presently contained in the National Housing Act and to substitute therefor one under which Central Mortgage will insure mortgages made by approved lending institutions to finance new residential construction.

It is proposed that the group of lending institutions presently authorized to operate under the National Housing Act will be enlarged to include the chartered banks and the Quebec savings banks. The amendment to the National Housing Act will have the effect of permitting the banks to make insured loans.

There will be three types of insured mortgage loans, first, those to assist in the construction of houses for home ownership; second, those to assist in the construction of rental housing; and third, those to finance the conversion of existing houses into multiple housing units.

The amount of the loan will be based upon a statutory percentage of the lending value and will be subject to a dollar limit to be set by the governor in council. The National Housing Act now makes loans available up to 80 per cent. The bill before the house contains provision that there will be an 80 per cent maximum ratio in the rental field, but in the home ownership field the ratios will be on the basis of 90 per cent of the first $8,000 and 70 per cent of additional lending value. This has the effect that up to lending values of $16,000 the ratio of loan to lending value will be greater than it is now, at 80 per cent, with corresponding lesser amounts of equity or down payment requirements.

The proposed legislation contemplates, as in the present legislation, that the governor in council shall establish maximum loans which may be made in the home ownership, rental and conversion fields. It will be recalled that at the present time the maximum loan is $10,000 for home ownership. In setting the limit of loan one consideration will be that the present cost of residential construction is about 25 per cent higher than it was when the $10,000 was set.

I mentioned earlier that loans would be made available to assist in the financing of the conversion of existing residential structures into additional family housing units. Although short-term financing in relatively modest amounts is available presently under the home extension section of the National Housing Act, it is felt that a more suitable arrangement should be made for an improved supply of new housing accommodation in the form of the conversion of existing larger houses into well-planned multiple units. Such conversions will be subject to conformity to standards. I hope that by this arrangement we will be able to add to our supply of new housing units and avoid what unfortunately is too frequently the case, an unsatisfactory conversion job being done for the reason that financing was insufficient both as to amount and term of repayment.

The period of amortization for home ownership loans, including co-operative housing associations and rural housing, will be 25 years as a minimum and 30 years as a maximum. However, the borrower will be able to arrange for a shorter term if he so indicates in writing. In addition, the governor in council will be authorized to designate areas in which the period of amortization may be less than 25 years where economic circumstances or productive capacity of the area are not sufficient to justify the full 25-year term.

In the rental housing field loans may be made with periods of amortization up to 25 years or for such lesser period as the approved lender and borrower may agree upon. In the case of insured loans to assist in the conversion of existing property into multiple units, amortization periods up to 15 years will be proposed.

The changes in the home ownership field will have the effect of lengthening the period of amortization and reducing the monthly payments of the home owner. Under the new arrangements we expect that 25-year amortization will be the rule rather than the exception. This will result in monthly payments of about 73 cents per $1,000 less than with 20-year amortization. The longer amortization in itself makes it possible for families of lesser income to become home owners. For instance, in the case of a house subject to an $8,000 insured mortgage loan the difference as a result of longer amortization is about $5.86 a month, thereby making it possible for a family to become a home owner with about $300 less annual income than would be required if the insured loan were on a 20-year basis.

Mr. Fleming: Would the minister permit a question? Upon what rate of interest is that calculation based?

Mr. Winters: At the same rate of interest obtaining now, 5¼ per cent.

The bill contemplates that Central Mortgage will insure mortgages that are in accordance with the statutory requirements and regulations made under the new legislation. The insurance will provide that in the event of default and after title has been acquired by the holder of the mortgage, the corporation will pay in cash to the holder of the mortgage, upon receiving clear title to the property from the holder,

(a) 98 per cent of the amount of principal outstanding on the mortgage loan account and interest at the mortgage rate, if owing, up to six months.

(b) Interest at the mortgage rate less 2 per cent for amounts owing in excess of six months but not exceeding twelve additional months.

(c) Borrower's charges—such as fire insurance and taxes advanced by the lender.

(d) An acquisition fee of $125, plus approved taxable legal disbursements.

Provision is made that if the holder of the mortgage is to claim for interest arrears in excess of six months, then the approved lender administering the loan shall have satisfied the corporation at the end of three months that adequate steps were being taken in respect to the defaulted account.

[Mr. Winters.]

Hon. members will notice that this provision for loss settlement carries elements of co-insurance. In other words, in the event of loss being suffered by an approved mortgage lender under an insured loan, recovery is on the basis of somewhat less than 100 cents on the dollar.

Under the proposals the corporation will charge an insurance fee which shall be 2 per cent of the amount of a home ownership loan and 2½ per cent of a rental housing loan. The fee is payable by the borrower but shall be collected and remitted to the corporation by the lender. This fee differs from the one payable to the F.H.A. in the United States under their insured mortgage plan in that ours is in the form of a single premium capitalized into the mortgage account and repayable in monthly instalments as part of the mortgage, rather than an insurance fee of one-half of one per cent on the annual reducing balances of the mortgage loan outstanding. It also differs in that ours is about 40 per cent of that charged to the borrower in the United States.

It is proposed that these fees will be accumulated in a mortgage insurance reserve fund on the books of Central Mortgage guaranteed by the government of Canada. The assets of this fund may be invested in securities of or guaranteed by the government of Canada. The fund of course will also have among its assets properties which may be transferred to the corporation by the approved lenders, for which the approved lenders have received a loss settlement.

In the matter of liquidity, as I mentioned earlier, it is proposed to make insured mortgages eligible security for Bank of Canada advances to banks in the same way as government bonds. In addition, it is proposed that Central Mortgage will have the right to purchase insured mortgages from approved lenders.

Provision is also being made for ready transferability of insured mortgages not only between approved lenders but also to holders who are not approved lenders. In this latter case it will be required that the insured mortgage loan shall at all times be administered by an approved lender.

These are important provisions in that they meet the main objections often expressed to the banks being in the mortgage business. The insurance protects the banks and other lenders against substantial losses on their mortgage account and there are provisions for liquidity and marketability.

The bill proposes, as a change from the National Housing Act, 1944, that the appraisal establishing the lending value shall be made by Central Mortgage rather than the lending value being the lesser of the appraisals by the lender and by Central Mortgage. This change is necessary by reason of the fact that for the moment at least the banks have not the facilities to provide this second appraisal. Moreover the government considers this to be necessary so as to ensure that a uniform level of loan, authorized by parliament, is made available in all cases.

Likewise, in ensuring that the house under construction complies with minimum standards as may be established by Central Mortgage, compliance inspections previously done by lending institutions will now be done by Central Mortgage, chiefly because the chartered banks are at this point unable to undertake this work. We hope too that it will result in improved and more uniform inspection procedures.

The governor in council will by regulation determine the maximum interest rate which may be charged by an approved lender for an insured mortgage loan. It will be noticed that in the bill itself, as in the present National Housing Act, there is an upper limit, using long-term government rates as a base, within which the governor in council may set this interest rate. When the discussion took place on the resolution which preceded this bill, it was suggested by some hon. members that it would be well for the interest rate to be contained in the bill itself rather than to be set by the governor in council. This used to be the practice in the earlier acts but experience has shown that a statutory interest rate which can be changed only when parliament is in session is too inflexible to meet operational needs. Already we have experienced times when a statutory interest rate was too high or too low in relation to a change in the general interest rate structure. In fact, it was our experience in this latter respect that occasioned the provision for the setting of the interest rate by the governor in council. Were we, in this bill, to set an interest rate which seemed reasonable in light of the present general interest rate structure, and if general interest rates were to move one way or the other, we would be faced with either a lack of mortgage money, or mortgages being made but at an interest rate higher than necessary.

I am still in the same position as I was when I answered questions about the interest rate during the debate on the resolution. Although I cannot tell hon. members what the rate will be in the original instance or throughout the operations of the new insured mortgage arrangements, it might be helpful if I made some comments on this point.

When we come to set the interest rate we will have in mind that parliament would wish to keep it as low as possible for the benefit of borrowers and yet high enough to attract a sufficient flow of mortgage funds. After all, the bill would accomplish little if it contained or had set by the governor in council an interest rate which did not attract mortgage funds.

The rate upon the lending institution's share of present National Housing Act loans is 5¾ per cent. Under the new arrangement the approved lenders will be advancing the full amount of the loan and for that reason there should be a saving in their expense ratio, perhaps one-quarter of one per cent. On the other hand, there has been a general upward trend in the mortgage interest rate structure during 1953. In my opinion a maximum interest rate for insured loans of, say, 5 per cent, although desirable from the borrower's point of view, would make the legislation completely inoperative because no mortgage money would be forthcoming. On the other hand, I believe that in light of the guarantees provided by the legislation a rate of 6 per cent would be too high.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that mortgage money on prime residential mortgages at the present time is anywhere from 6 to 6½ per cent and sometimes higher depending on the areas and conditions.

Under the present joint loan arrangements an individual, borrowing $8,600 on a 20-year basis, makes a monthly payment of $57.68. A corresponding loan under the insured mortgage pattern, on a 25-year basis, which will also include an insurance premium of $172, making a total loan of $8,772, would have monthly payments of $51.03, $52.28, $53.54, $54.83 and $56.13 at 5 per cent, 5¼ per cent, 5½ per cent, 5¾ per cent and 6 per cent respectively. This will give hon. members an idea of the general range of monthly payments which may be required in the new arrangement. I think hon. members may be assured that the government will give careful consideration to all the factors involved before establishing a maximum interest rate under this legislation.

The bill makes provision that the aggregate of all loans on which insurance policies have been issued shall not exceed $2 billion.

Up to this point my remarks have been related to the first 13 sections of the bill which deal with the change from joint lending to insured mortgage loans. This part of the legislation is new and it is important because it provides facilities to those able to buy or rent accommodation on an economic basis. But there are families who are not in this position. To meet their needs loans to limited dividend companies are available. Or where a municipality and a province feel there is need for rental accommodation with subsidized rentals for families of low income, the federal government will participate to the extent of 75 per cent of the capital investment and subsequent operating losses. Where slum clearance and housing redevelopment are desirable, federal participation is available for 50 per cent of the cost of the slum clearance. These and other important provisions, contained in the present act, are submitted for re-enactment to round out authority for a comprehensive housing program. Hon. members are familiar with these provisions, but I will review them briefly and indicate any changes which are proposed.

The rental insurance plan, which must be distinguished from mortgage insurance, will be retained under the new legislation. It will be recalled that Central Mortgage has power to insure rentals and the re-enactment of this power makes it clear that where rental insurance is arranged, mortgage insurance is not necessary and therefore will not be available for the mortgage that finances the rental insurance project. Limited dividend provisions of the National Housing Act will be re-enacted. During the last year there has been substantially increased activity in this field. The present provisions contained under section 17 of the National Housing Act relating to loans by Central Mortgage to primary producers will be retained. The bill also re-enacts provisions to guarantee housing projects and land assembly projects undertaken by life insurance companies. A modification is introduced in that the allowed earnings of the life insurance company are increased from 6 per cent to 7 per cent, and the amount of the guarantee by Central Mortgage is raised from 2½ per cent to 3 per cent.

The authority contained in part IV of the present act relating to Central Mortgage guaranteeing the home improvement loans and home extension loans is to be continued. The insurance principle will be introduced by establishing an insurance fee of 1 per cent. The guarantee fund, however, will be as at present in the National Housing Act. The interest rate provisions have been removed and will be established by the governor in council.

[Mr. Winters.]

It is contemplated that the housing research and community planning provisions of part V of the present statute will be continued. It is proposed, however, that the provisions of section 25 of the present act relating to the experimental manufacture of component parts of a house, be embodied into the new part V and enlarged to permit the construction of houses for experimental purposes.

The provisions of the present section 45, authorizing the corporation to acquire land, instal services and construct housing projects will be continued.

The present partnership arrangements of the federal-provincial housing projects and land assembly are to be re-enacted without change, as are the provisions for federal participation in the slum clearance and redevelopment.

In these remarks I have tried to review all the main points involved in the bill, but there are a number of other matters, minor though important, that I have not touched upon. When the resolution was being considered I stated that I proposed moving that the bill be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce. There will be opportunity in that committee for all parts and sections of the bill to be reviewed and studied. Again, when the bill returns to this house and is in the committee of the whole, I will be glad if hon. members so request to deal with any matters which I have not touched upon today.

I feel that the various proposals contained in the bill, widening the source of mortgage funds, and the geographical coverage by mortgage lenders; facilitating more private lending by the insurance of mortgages; encouraging the extension of terms of loans and the reduction in down payment requirements, particularly in lower priced dwellings, should produce a great improvement in the financing of housing and at a time which would appear to be most opportune.

I have no desire to hurry the deliberation which should take place upon this important legislation. I think it deserves the most careful study. However, I would be remiss if I did not remind this house that the time element in connection with this bill is of great importance. Even if we proceed very quickly with this legislation there may well be an uncomfortable and unfortunate hiatus or delay in lending activities. The arrangement is new and will take some time to introduce. Every effort must be put forward to ensure that the new arrangements are in operation by early in the spring of this year.

Therefore, without any element of unseemly haste, the government will do everything in its power to see that this bill progresses through its regular stages with dispatch, and I am sure that we can count upon the co-operation of hon. members to this end.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, housing is a subject of first importance in this house at any time, not least of all at the present time. The bill we now have before us is unquestionably a major piece of legislation. I should like to indicate at once the concern of members of the opposition both for the subject and for the bill.

I was glad to hear what the minister had to say about his wish to see the bill make all possible progress. May I say at once that we are disappointed that the bill was not called for second reading prior to today. There was an indication from the government on December 16, when the house rose for the Christmas recess, that the bill would be one of the items on the order paper for immediate consideration on our return on January 12. Yet, for reasons which have not been explained, the government chose to prefer other legislation over this bill for the consideration of the house. Many of us fully expected, in the light of what was said on December 16, that this measure would be put before the house on our return on January 12, and for the delay of nine days which has followed the government must accept responsibility.

The house-building capacity of this country is a matter which we must have in our minds in approaching the provisions and effect of the bill. I take the words of the minister himself speaking in this house on April 28, 1953, when at page 4496 of Hansard he said:

> I have no doubt that if all the factors were favourable, if there were adequate serviced lands, mortgage money and so on, the Canadian construction industry could easily build 135,000 units per year.

Now, sir, I take due note of the qualifications put by the minister on that estimate, but I think we may accept that as an estimate of the house-building capacity of the Canadian construction industry, given the favourable considerations enumerated by the minister. Yet, even in the light of the figures and estimates given by the minister today, it would appear that a figure in the neighbourhood of 100,000 units is the greatest number of houses produced by this country in any year so far. Materials are in ample supply. Labour likewise is in ample supply. Yet we have in Canada a shortage of houses, and we have a shortage of funds available for financing home construction.

This house, not only during the present parliament but in preceding parliaments, has always shown that it is ready to give to the government whatever powers might be required to help to meet the housing problem of the country, and also to make funds available, in whatever form was thought best, for this purpose. Indeed, sir, it may be said that throughout this important post-war period the house has been on all occasions, I think, unanimous in supporting such proposals as the government has put before it. It is equally true to say that the house has frequently demanded of the government other measures which it has not been prepared to sponsor and which, under the rules of the house and the constitution, it was not within the power of any private member of the house to sponsor. Therefore I am sure I need say nothing more about the desire of those of us who are members of the official opposition to support whatever sound legislation may assist in meeting the housing problem. We are eager to see put into effect whatever will be sound and contribute to that purpose.

Let us go back for a moment. The Dominion Housing Act was enacted by parliament in 1935. The National Housing Act was enacted in 1944 and has been amended in almost every succeeding year. In 1946 it was given something of a major overhaul. The trend of the amendments has been in all cases to widen the scope of provisions of the act and give added powers to assist in meeting situations not theretofore fully provided for by the legislation.

The present bill, in the light of that brief review of the history of our housing legislation, is undoubtedly the most important piece of such legislation to come before the house since 1944. The importance of the bill is not to be measured in terms of size alone. It is a bill of 45 pages and some 20,000 words. Unfortunately the draftsmanship is involved, and I may say from my point of view that is regrettable in a statute like this which is not going to be construed in the main by solicitors.

But this bill owes its importance not so much to its size as to its provisions and the importance of the subject with which it deals. It does re-enact in fact the bulk of the present housing act, and I find the consideration of the changes that it introduces in our present housing legislation can very well take us into the field of economics.

Sir, it is not easy in approaching a bill of this kind to isolate the principle of the bill. We must of course have housing legislation. The house has supported in the past the kind of legislation that constitutes the bulk of the present bill, the provisions which are being carried forward.

As to the procedure recommended by the minister, I expressed my view on the subject when speaking at the resolution stage on December 16. I altogether commend the proposal that if and when the bill receives second reading it should be referred to the banking and commerce committee for consideration. That committee under these conditions, and in relation to a bill of the importance of this one, will have a heavy task and a serious responsibility to discharge, and I express the hope that that committee, if and when the bill reaches it, will insist upon the fullest possible hearings, will insist on hearing the points of view of those who are going to be affected by the provisions of the bill, and will make a most searching study of all its provisions to assure itself that the bill when put into operation will have the results held out to us by the government.

What are the principal aspects of the housing problem? Let us examine those with some care and measure the bill, as I think it is fair to do, in relation to them. What is delaying construction and greater use of the home-building capacity of the Canadian construction industry? How does the bill propose to help to make greater use of the home-building capacity of the Canadian construction industry? It would be fair to ask first of all what is the extent of the problem. I am not going to attempt to trade personal estimates of the extent of the housing shortage in Canada with the minister. The minister has expressed his view on this subject. He did so in the house on April 28, 1953, at page 4492 of Hansard when, after reviewing certain figures, he wound up by saying:

> . . . the backlog of housing needs would work out arithmetically at less than 100,000 units.

Sir, I am not prepared to accept that figure as the measure of Canada's backlog of housing needs. At the same time, I do not say that I commit myself to some of the other estimates that have been made. We have had figures from some members in this house suggesting that, in their opinion, the backlog of housing needs in Canada extends to 700,000 units. I do not accept that figure. We have not had in Canada, and I think we should have, a much more scientific effort to calculate the shortage of houses.

One method that has been applied, and which Mr. Mansur, president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, does not accept, would take the figure worked out by the Curtis royal commission in 1944, the last royal commission which investigated the housing needs of Canada on a national basis, add to that figure the family formations year by year in the interval, and deduct from it the number of houses constructed. I do not pretend that is a scientific approach to the problem, but I think until we have something more scientific it must be at least a guide to us. On that basis the extent of the housing shortage in Canada would be something like 500,000 units.

I wish to be quite fair about this matter. I said I am not committing myself precisely to any one of those figures, but I do say I am satisfied that the figure of 500,000 units as the housing shortage, which has been worked out by such a well informed body as the Canadian construction industry itself, is a more accurate figure than the minister's estimate to which I have referred, of less than 100,000 units. In fairness to the minister I wish to say that he arrived at that estimate by an arithmetical calculation. He said it was an arithmetical result. I believe, Mr. Speaker, the time has come when there ought to be some more thorough and scientific survey of the extent of the housing shortage than has been made in this country in the last decade.

Certain it is that there is still a substantial housing need in Canada. The fact is that even with the favourable report the minister has made to the house this afternoon concerning home construction in Canada in 1953, the total number of housing units constructed in Canada since the conclusion of the war has not equalled the new family formations. Again in fairness one may take a second look at that statement. The fact of the matter is that if obsolescence of existing housing is not too rapid, if you have new current needs of 700,000 units arising in such a period as I have mentioned, and you have that number of houses being built, you are going to create some improvement in the general average of housing in Canada. You will have a higher proportion of newer houses, and with modern methods of construction no doubt there will be some improvement in the total housing situation in Canada.

But, sir, the fact remains that even with such results as have been achieved in the field of house construction in Canada since the conclusion of the war, we have not kept abreast of current needs as measured by new family formations in that period. Whatever the backlog in Canada was, whether it was 300,000, 400,000 or 500,000 housing units at the conclusion of the war, the number of needed houses in Canada based on that calculation is just as great today. No doubt many of the houses that were in existence in 1945 have been improved, but likewise there has been the usual obsolescence. Undoubtedly houses which might have been regarded as of medium quality at that time have dropped somewhat since, and many of them which were of standard quality have dropped into the substandard class or close to it.

If the housing backlog in Canada were as small as the minister calculated it to be in the quotation to which I have referred, then I do not believe there would be very much need today for new housing legislation or new powers in the light of the record of home construction last year. If the backlog is only 100,000 units, then I think the minister has taken away any case at all for the government's demand for new powers to deal with the housing situation. The fact of the matter is that the housing problem in Canada is still more serious than the minister indicated it to be in his rather lighthearted estimate made on April 28 last.

Let us examine frankly and searchingly some of the aspects of this housing problem. In the first place, what are the needs? What are the factors which have contributed to the fact that, on the one hand, we have still a very large housing shortage in Canada, and on the other hand we have not employed to the full the capacity of the Canadian construction industry?

The first of these contributing factors is the shortage of serviced land. The minister has not said anything recently about the shortage of serviced land. He did in a very frank statement on the occasion I have mentioned, April 28 last, recognize the prime importance of our shortage of serviced land as the principal bottleneck now existing. At page 4451 of Hansard for that date the minister said:

> But we are still faced with difficulties.
> Most important among these I consider the shortage of serviced land.

May I interject there, Mr. Speaker, to say that I believe the minister was entirely right. It was a frank and factual statement. He proceeded:

> The post-war rate of housing starts has far exceeded the rate of lot development and the growth of municipal services, such as sewer, water, road and school facilities. Therefore the amount of available serviced land has rapidly diminished. In some centres substantial programs of new residential development must wait on the provision of additional serviced land, and in others a similar situation is approaching. An increasing proportion of current house building requires the development of new land.
> This problem has two important aspects, that of the municipality, and that of the house buyer. The problem of the municipality is more immediate. For the municipality, residential land development means the extension of pavements and existing utilities and commonly involves the provision of new schools. In some cases further land development may require enlarged central pumping plants and the like. In any case, such land development means heavy municipal expenditures. These expenditures must be financed by municipal borrowings. Because of unwillingness or inability to borrow, the municipalities do not always respond as soon as the need for additional serviced land arises. The financing problems are of particular severity in metropolitan environs where the growth associated with a great city is apt to be thrust upon a junior municipality which is predominantly residential, and which lacks those commercial and industrial assessments that bulk so large in the ordinary municipal tax base. It is this non-residential property that has traditionally given some relief to the home owner in paying for expensive urban services.

I think the minister is to be commended upon that review of what is the bottleneck today in the field of home construction. I shall attempt to ask and answer questions later as to what this bill does to eliminate that bottleneck.

The municipalities of this country, sir, are functioning today with virtually the same tax base that was given to them at the time of confederation. And, with the rapidly soaring costs of providing municipal services demanded by all residents, it has become beyond the power of municipalities to meet the responsibilities they are now expected to discharge under existing legislation. Consequently there has developed in some of these municipalities surrounding the great metropolitan areas of this country active and open resistance to house construction within their borders. It has resulted in builders opening up subdivisions being asked to assume the burden of paying for the installation of municipal services, and in other cases it has resulted in undisguised opposition on the part of the municipal government to the opening up of new areas for land development.

The second major reason for the existence of the housing problem in Canada today is the high cost of construction. In 1950, according to figures issued by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the average cost of construction of a home in Canada was $8,805. In 1951 that had risen to $10,211. The figures given by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in its last report issued recently for the third quarter of 1953 showed that in the first eight months of 1953 the average cost of construction of a home in Canada was $10,788. That report has something to say about the reasons for this high cost of construction. At page 21 of the report one finds the following:

> Building costs, after dropping from January to May, rose again in July to equal costs at January 1953. The rise in construction costs resulted from an advance in construction labour wage rates, building material prices having remained unchanged from January.

Then it proceeds to say:

> The July composite index of residential building material prices and construction labour wage rates stood at 128·7 (1949=100) in July as against 126·4 in January and 124·7 in July, 1952.

The effect of higher wage rates on building costs was offset somewhat by a reduction in the average number of months under construction. This average dropped from 8·4 months in the first half of 1952 to 7·2 months in the first six months of 1953.

There are, in the light of figures I have just referred to, some encouraging aspects, indicating that there had been a measure of stabilization in house construction costs in the year 1953. That measure of stabilization, I think, gives one hope for expanded house construction. As long as the costs of construction were advancing at the rapid rate of the several years preceding 1953, undoubtedly those rising costs had a retarding effect upon the volume of house construction in Canada.

Given continuing stabilization of costs, there is some hope, I think, for an expanded volume of construction. But, sir, let us bear in mind—and we have had many authoritative warnings on the subject in recent days—that in Canada today we are in a high-cost economy marked by rigidity in costs. And it is quite possible that in this, as in other fields, if there should be further substantial advances in the costs of construction in Canada we shall virtually price ourselves, or those engaged in the industry, out of the market.

Sir, I think it is the duty of all of us to encourage in every way that lies within our power the utmost productivity on the part of all engaged in the construction industry in Canada, because in that way we can do much to meet the problem in the aspect to which I have referred. It can be met by increased productivity. I think it is the duty of all of us to do everything that may lie within our power to point that lesson home.

The third aspect of the problem is in relation to the down payment required. This flows in part from the aspect to which I have just referred. Under the legislation which has been in effect a 20 per cent down payment has been required in the case of all, with the exception of defence workers. It is the policy of the existing legislation to encourage home ownership. That indeed has been one of the foundations of the National Housing Act. It is a goal and a principle that is desirable both from its social and its economic aspects and, I think, has the support of all members in the house.

But this gap between the available mortgage loan on the one hand and the cost of construction on the other has been widened. The effect has been to prevent more persons from taking advantage of the opportunity of owning homes constructed for them under the provisions of the act. This was an acute factor even prior to 1949. In the province of Ontario, my own province, the legislature passed legislation which was introduced by the government headed by my esteemed leader, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew). The purpose of the legislation was to break that gap in half by providing funds by way of second mortgage money to a maximum of $1,250, or one-half of the difference between the first mortgage loan and the cost of construction, whichever of the two was the lesser.

Thousands of homes were constructed in Ontario through the assistance of those second mortgages, provided under provincial legislation. Then this parliament in the fall of 1949 decided to meet on a national basis the need which had been met in Ontario by the legislation to which I have referred. In the fall of that year this House of Commons amended the housing act to make provision for what was called the one-sixth additional loan, the effect of which was to add one-sixth to the amount of the loan then provided for under the National Housing Act. Then, as the house is well aware, that legislation, while received enthusiastically by the house, was nullified by the government by its own decision, without reference to the house, at the beginning of 1951.

Let us look at the way in which the gap between the cost of construction on the one hand and available mortgage loans on the other has widened. According to figures of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, in 1950 the average down payment on a new house constructed in Canada was $1,928. In 1951—and this figure relates to the end of 1951—that figure had advanced to $3,188. In other words, in a space of less than two years the average down payment in Canada had jumped by 65 per cent. That, sir, I suggest is as effective a way of measuring the problem existing in this country as one can find. It is a problem which arises out of the fact that the number of people in Canada today who have the ready and liquid funds available to make these increasing down payments is limited. And unless something is done in this respect, or unless there are changes made in other directions, then undoubtedly there is a band of those who do not own houses today but who would like to own them, people who in other respects are credit-worthy and whose incomes may be adequate to meet the standard prescribed by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the government, who are not able to enter the field.

Sir, the fourth of these aspects of the existing housing problem is the question of available mortgage funds. Here we must recognize the fact that there has been a tremendous demand applied to the existing supply of mortgage funds in Canada. We must not forget that there are still conventional loans to be provided for in Canada on both new and old construction; but the joint loans provided for under part I of the present National Housing Act have absorbed the lending capacities of the present approved lending institutions virtually to their limit.

Now, let all hon. members be fair and recognize that the government and this legislation have received on the part of those approved lending institutions the utmost co-operation. I am sure the minister will agree with that. He did not mention it, but I think it is a fact he will readily endorse. The present approved lending institutions have undoubtedly gone the limit. They have greatly increased the percentage of their investment portfolios devoted to mortgages. Let us also recognize the fact that if there have not been as many individual loans available, it is due to the fact that the average loan has increased in amount with the rising cost of construction. Even with a continuing stable supply of mortgage funds from this source, there is bound to be a reduction in the number of loans possible, in view of the present continuing high demand, and the supply of mortgage money from this source is not unlimited.

I have heard discussion in this house and in the committee on banking and commerce two years ago which seemed to suggest that there is an unlimited supply of mortgage money in Canada. Well, there is not; and those who are acquainted with this situation realize that the present approved lending institutions have gone to the limit of their lending resources under part I of the National Housing Act.

Sir, not many days ago Mr. George L. Holmes, the president of the Canadian Life Insurance Officers' Association, said that the housing investments of the Canadian life insurance companies in Canada for 1953 were in the neighbourhood of $350 million. The amount of money the companies now have invested in mortgages, he is quoted as saying, represents nearly 25 per cent of their assets in Canada. He also said that an 18 per cent increase over 1952 in the amount of money invested in housing is reported by the Canadian life insurance companies.

It has been calculated that the present available supply of mortgage money in Canada from present sources will provide for the construction at present prices of approximately 80,000 houses. Expenditures on new residential construction in Canada today are running in the neighbourhood of $1 billion per annum and that, sir, is between 18 and 19 per cent of our total capital investment in Canada of $5·8 billion.

It is also inevitable in these circumstances that, because of the cost of servicing loans on the part of the approved lending institutions, smaller centres of this country are losing out in competition with the larger centres. Let us not forget that in the case of most of these lending institutions some 46 pieces of paper have had to be handled in connection with every one of these joint loans under part I of the National Housing Act. The house accordingly approved in 1947 the enactment of section 31A, which made provision for direct lending by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in communities up to 5,000. A further change in 1952 extended the benefit of direct loans to communities up to 50,000, where the facilities provided by the approved lending institutions were not adequate to provide for mortgage requirements.

Now, sir, to sustain the financial requirements of a program of 100,000 housing units in Canada today at present prices there would have to be, it seems to me, either an extension of direct government loans, or some scheme devised to attract mortgage funds from other sources.

The fifth of these aspects of the existing problem is the income limitation on borrowers. It is provided by regulation that the amount of the periodical payment required from mortgagors for a loan under part I of the act shall not exceed 23 per cent of his gross income, and with very slight exceptions gross income does not include the income of the family; it is the income of the head of the family, the borrower only. Consequently one has only to look at the figures given by the minister himself when he spoke on April 28, as recorded at page 4490 of Hansard, to see that taking the average estimated cost of a house in Canada at $11,358, to qualify for a maximum loan adequate to service the construction of a house at that cost a person will have to have a gross income amounting to $3,696 per annum. Consider the number of those who have that kind of income in Canada today to meet the periodical payments on that basis—and that is after providing for the down payment, of course. As we have met, through the existing legislation, the case of those with the larger incomes, the number of those who cannot meet the existing requirements is necessarily bound to increase in proportion.

Now, sir, the sixth aspect is the period of amortization, or the period of time over which the mortgagor is permitted to make his capital repayments. Twenty years is the limit provided today. The attitude of the lending institutions under the existing act has naturally been that they do not wish to see an extension of that period, because in that event the period of repayment, particularly in the early years of the life of the mortgage, when the periodical payment is largely devoted to interest and only a very small fraction to principal, does not keep pace with obsolescence of the property. Again, there is the question of incentive to the owner to go on and complete the payment of his mortgage. Then there is the problem of relating the life of the mortgage to the earning lifetime of the borrower.

These have all been important factors in the attitude of the approved lending institutions toward any lengthening of the period of amortization of the principal borrowed on joint loans under part I of the housing act. Therefore if there is to be any extension of the period of amortization it is necessary that there be some inducement held out, or some further security for the approved lending institutions which are asked to take additional risks.

The seventh aspect, sir, is the matter of interest rates. Of course the interest rate is on the one hand a matter of high importance to the borrower. It is also a matter of concern to the lender in relation to other market possibilities for return on his investment. Today we have achieved under the housing act an effective rate to the borrower on joint loans of 5¼ per cent because the government puts up 20 per cent at a rate of 3¾ per cent and the approved lending institution puts up 60 per cent of the total 80 per cent loan at a rate of 5¾ per cent, making a combined rate of 5¼ per cent.

Mr. Winters: I know my hon. friend knows this just as well as I do, but just to keep the record correct may I say that the ratio is 25 and 75 per cent rather than 20 and 80.

Mr. Fleming: I do not think the minister waited for my full sentence. I was speaking of the 80 per cent loan in relation to the lending value. The interest on the first 20 per cent of the 80 per cent as contributed by the government is at the rate of 3¾ per cent, and the lending institution puts up the other 60 per cent at a rate of 5¾ per cent, making a net rate on the 80 per cent, which is the total loan, of 5¼ per cent to the borrower.

Having reviewed these aspects of the present situation I think it is fair to apply to this bill this test: How does this bill propose to meet the problem from these various aspects? Then let us examine the bill particularly in relation to these seven aspects I have mentioned. On examination I find that these are the features of the bill:

First, the bill continues practically all of the provisions of the present act except those under part I in relation to the construction of housing on joint loan for owner occupancy. The provisions in relation to land assembly, limited dividend housing corporations, housing for rental, rural housing, home improvement loans, home extension loans, subsidized housing, research and community planning, are all continued in substantially their present form although the insurance scheme is applied to some of them.

Second, part I in relation to joint loans for construction of houses for owner occupancy is abolished.

Third, the chartered banks of Canada and the Quebec savings banks are now admitted to the category of approved lending institutions under the act.

Fourth, a new scheme of insurance is introduced in relation to loans under the act and some other forms of housing under the act, on which latter I shall not dwell.

Fifth, the amount of the mortgage loan is increased; instead of being 80 per cent, except in the case of defence workers, it now becomes 90 per cent on the first $8,000 of the approved lending value and 70 per cent on the balance.

Sixth, the period of repayment of principal of an approved loan is increased from 20 years to 25 to 30 years in the case of owner-occupied housing.

Seventh, we have a change in the provision for the interest rate. It is now to be prescribed by the governor in council by regulation and is not to exceed—this is the change—the interest rate on long-term government bonds by more than 2¼ per cent per annum.

The eighth feature is that the aggregate amount of all loans in respect of which insurance policies shall be issued under the act is not to exceed $2,000 million.

With that brief review of the features of this bill I propose now to appraise it, to submit it to the test of whether it will contribute toward meeting the housing problem in the various aspects which I have enumerated. I think it is our duty as members of the house, regardless of party, to give to this bill, in the light of its high importance, the most searching study.

Let us not be influenced by any exaggeration that has attended the announcements of the purpose or effect of the legislation. There has been the usual fanfare in the government's announcements of this legislation and the benefits that it may hold forth. The first announcement of this legislation came not from the minister but from the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on October 1 last. There has been created throughout sections of the country, partly by reason of exaggeration on the part of the government and partly as a result of innocent misunderstanding, the impression that this bill is going to create something of a new heaven and new earth overnight. Great expectations have been built up in relation to this bill and the scheme it contains. I submit that it would be cruel to disappoint expectations of this kind.

Let us see how this bill will attempt to meet the problem of our housing needs in Canada in relation to the various aspects I have mentioned. First, what does it do in relation to the shortage of serviced land or to meet the needs of municipalities? It does nothing new. The provisions of this bill offer no change whatever over those existing in the present act, and what is undoubtedly still the principal bottleneck in solving our housing problem today will continue. There is no provision in this bill in relation to it. This bill offers no help to the municipalities beyond such help as was offered to them under the existing legislation.

Second, in relation to the cost of construction, there is of course nothing in this bill dealing with that subject. It is quite possible—and the government laid stress on this in the light of the action they took in 1951 to eliminate the one-sixth loan—that the additional funds being made available for lending on mortgage security could result in inflationary pressures. My understanding is that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation intends to continue to impose a limit on the prices builders may charge for houses built with approved loans. There has been no statement on that from the minister, but the minister nods his head and I understand he confirms the statement I have just made.

I do not think parliament has any wish to put up substantial funds of the people of Canada in order to assist any but the people of Canada who need housing. I think that is a fact which should be made perfectly clear in relation to the cost of construction. The people whom parliament is seeking to help are the people who need housing.

The third aspect is this matter of the down payment. The scheme proposed by the act does offer some assistance in this regard through a reduction in the down payment. Let me give two examples. Take a house costing $10,000. Of course there is no such thing today in any of the areas where shortages exist, but let us take this hypothetical case as a sad reminder of what we used to be able to do with our money when we wanted to build a house. On a $10,000 house, under the existing act it would be possible for the builder to obtain under part I a mortgage of $8,000. He would have to make a down payment of $2,000 cash. Under the scheme outlined in the present bill he would be able to obtain a loan of $8,400 and would have to make a down payment of $1,600.

Mr. Winters: Should that not be $8,600?

Mr. Fleming: I am sorry; it should be $8,600, with a down payment of $1,400. But to that he would have to add 2 per cent as his premium on the insurance, and 2 per cent premium on $8,000 would be $160 which would be added to the down payment. His down payment will thus become $1,560. In other words he pays $440 less than under the existing legislation. Let us take the net cost of a house today at $12,000. Under existing legislation the mortgage would be $9,600 and the down payment would be $2,400. Under the new legislation the mortgage will be $10,700 and the down payment will have to be $1,300 plus 2 per cent on $10,700 which is $214. He will have to find $1,514—

Mr. Winters: No.

Mr. Fleming: Is my mental arithmetic slightly too fast?

Mr. Winters: It is not a question of speed but of accuracy.

Mr. Fleming: They are related. We are agreed $10,700 is the amount of mortgage?

Mr. Winters: $10,700 is the mortgage loan on a lending value of $13,000. On a $12,000 lending value the mortgage loan is $10,000.

Mr. Fleming: And we add 2 per cent of the $10,000, which is $200, to his loan of $10,560. His down payment is $2,440 plus the 2 per cent, which makes a total of $2,640. Undoubtedly any reduction in the down payment is going to increase the number of those who will qualify for the loans.

Now, sir, let us come to the next item in this aspect of the housing shortage, which is income limitation, another test of eligibility. There is no indication in the bill that any change is contemplated in the 23 per cent relationship between gross income and the monthly payment. It is evident, of course, that by stretching out the repayment of principal the periodical payment is thereby somewhat reduced, not greatly but certainly to some extent, by relating the 23 per cent to a slightly smaller payment. In that way the gross income required of an eligible mortgagor will be slightly reduced.

But again, subject to the accuracy of the figures of the amateur mathematician now speaking, and assuming a rate of 5¼ per cent on a loan of $12,500, under the act at present the gross income required of the mortgagor would be $4,600 per annum. Under the new act, with the 25-year period of repayment, the gross income required would be $4,360. In other words there is just $240 difference in the gross income required in that case under the present bill as compared with the existing act. Of course this is assuming that under the new act there will be the same effective rate of interest to the mortgagor as obtains at present, namely 5¼ per cent, though that is an assumption which the minister, in the light of his statement today, is not yet prepared to make.

The extension of the period for repayment of the principal will undoubtedly make it easier for some people to become eligible. But the question then arises, what about those who wish to increase the rate of repayment? We find, sir, that prepayments, as compared with the rate of periodical payment provided under the mortgage, will go to reduce the number of periodic instalments but not the amount of each.

Sixth aspect is the interest rate. This is a matter that I believe is bound to engage the attention of the house because of the importance of the interest rate in relation to the whole question of bringing into effective demand a number who are not now eligible for loans under the existing act, and obviously it concerns others outside the house as well as at least one member in the house. I have a dispatch here from the Toronto Globe and Mail, dated November 5, 1953, reporting a meeting of the young Liberals of the Toronto and York ridings. I shall read the text, though first I remind hon. members that this was after the proposed bill was announced by the Prime Minister on October 1. The report reads as follows:

> In the face of suggestions yesterday that N.H.A. rates of interest would soon be increased, the young Liberals of the Toronto and York ridings last night urged the federal government instead to reduce the rates.
> A resolution passed unanimously by the annual meeting of the Toronto and York association said a reduction in the interest rates of National Housing Act loans would encourage construction and enable easier purchase of homes.

The dispatch continues:

> Paul Hellyer, M.P. for Davenport, told the sixty young party members that he hoped N.H.A. interest rates would not go up.

That is his hope. The minister has been frank today in his approach to this question.

[Mr. Fleming.]

He has, it will be noticed, carefully refrained from any suggestion that the interest rate will not go up. Now, sir, this is a matter of extreme importance. The bill provides that the interest rate permissible under the new insurance scheme shall not exceed by more than 2¼ per cent per annum the effective rate on long-term Dominion of Canada bonds. Long-term could mean 20 years, but I understand that today the maximum maturities run to about 15 years and that the effective market rate on bonds of that maturity is about 3·65 per cent. Admitting that 2¼ per cent is the maximum additional rate under the legislation we are now called upon to enact, this new bill will provide a possible rate of 5·9 per cent on mortgages as compared with the existing rate of 5¼ per cent on loans under part I of the present housing act.

It is expected, of course, that by insuring the loan and thereby reducing the element of risk the lending institutions may be willing to accept a somewhat lower rate of interest than the 5¾ per cent they are now receiving on their share of the joint loans under part I of the act. But that remains to be seen. There is in this act a provision that no hon. member should overlook, because it is of very great importance to the whole appearance that has been given to this bill as one that will reduce down payments and reduce the periodical instalments.

Let us recall, sir, that even if you do extend the period of repayment of principal, if that mortgage should be accompanied by an increase of one-half of one per cent in the interest rate from, say, 5¼ per cent to 5¾ per cent, you immediately wipe out all the benefit the borrower receives by reason of the extension of the period of repayment, because his periodical repayments are going to be just as large as they are at the present time. That in turn relates to the provisions of the act in regard to down payments. Now, we have not heard anything of—

Mr. Winters: On the question of the down payment, and just to make one other correction of what might be left as an impression, the insurance premium will not go towards increasing the down payment, as the impression was perhaps given just now.

Mr. Fleming: I did not intend to leave that impression.

Mr. Winters: If, for example, there is a lending value of $12,000 and the amount of the loan is $10,000, the insurance premium in that case would be $200. That premium will be an increase in the amount of the mortgage loan rather than an increase in the amount of the down payment.

Mr. Fleming: I understand the point the minister is making. I must say that is one provision of this act that I think will have to have some clarifying amendments when the bill is under study in the committee because, whatever the intention may be, I am satisfied that the language of the bill is open to another interpretation on that point. I am quite prepared to accept the minister's statement of the intention of the bill. I simply say at this point that it is going to be necessary, I think, in order to carry that intention into legislative effect to insert clearer words in the bill than are used there now for that purpose.

I was speaking about the effect that would ensue from an increase in the interest rate to the borrower. In this respect we have not been told what the intentions of the Bank of Canada may be with relation to the borrowing market. It would be interesting to know. There have been vague suggestions in some quarters that the Bank of Canada intends to go into the financial market with a view, by its operations there, to making money available at lower interest rates than would otherwise be the case. I think before this debate has run its course the house should have an authoritative statement from the government as to its intention with respect to the operations of the Bank of Canada in that regard.

I come to the major question as to what effect this bill is going to have in increasing the supply of funds available for mortgage lending under the act. Here, sir, I think there are three aspects of this matter that must command the consideration of the house. The first is the elimination of joint loans under the present part I of the housing act. The second is the admission of banks to the circle of approved lending institutions, and the third is the insurance scheme.

The reasons given by the government for the bill, as stated by the Prime Minister in his statement on October 1, were to the effect that "the government is taking steps at this time because it feels that the present sources for mortgage money are insufficient to keep pace with housing needs." Therefore I take it that the principal purpose that the government has in mind in introducing this legislation is to increase the supply of mortgage funds. This must, from a reading of that statement, be the principal object of the bill. Will the bill have that effect? The minister was frank enough in his statement on December 16 to say in effect that he could not tell, and I am sure if he cannot tell nobody else can. These were the minister's words as recorded at page 1009 of Hansard, and I open with a quotation from my question to the minister in this respect:

> Will the minister tell us what is the expected extent of participation on the part of banks under the new scheme? Also will he tell us what is the anticipated augmentation from that source of mortgage funds, and how it may be expected that that augmentation will be made available for distribution in smaller communities?
> Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, it is difficult to answer those questions in detail. We do not know, for instance, to what extent the lending institutions will divert money they formerly put into conventional loans into the lending operations under the insurance mortgage technique. We would hope, however, that this would result in a great increase in the flow of mortgage money under the National Housing Act.

You will note, sir, that the minister, speaking, I take it, with reference to the existing approved lending institutions, is saying in effect: Well, we do not know whether they will be able to put any more money into their mortgage lending under the act. Then the minister proceeds:

> With respect to the last part of the question, perhaps it can be answered more specifically than the other parts.

Then he goes on to deal with something to which I shall return later, but he does not answer my question as to what might be expected to be the over-all result of this legislation with respect to the supply of available mortgage funds. The minister was not prepared to estimate the amount of mortgage funds that might have been expected from the banks as a new source.

With that background let us look at these three aspects, and first of all the abolition of part I of the National Housing Act. Those of us who have tried to keep ourselves close to the housing problem will, I am sure, view the proposed departure of part I of the act with very great regret. Part I of the National Housing Act has been in force since 1944 and it has been, I think, as fruitful a piece of legislation as this parliament is likely to enact in the ordinary course of events. It has created an individual pool for each lending institution under which the government and the lending institutions have, in approved proportions, shared the risk. Seventy per cent of the lending for new one-family residential construction today comes from that source. In the first eleven months of 1953 we saw that joint lending under part I of the act provided for the construction of some 30,500 units. Conventional loans, on the other hand, as an investment for the funds of the approved lending institutions, attracted just $92 million by comparison in the same eleven months' period for 17,500 units.

The results, I think, are also to be measured in relation to the sound social purpose of encouraging the ownership by Canadians of their own homes. Let us look for a moment at the results that have been achieved in that period. The daily bulletin issued by the dominion bureau of statistics of March 17, 1953, had this to say about the trend of home ownership in Canada in the ten-year period up to 1951:

Home ownership made a big advance in Canada during the ten years from 1941 to 1951, according to a census bulletin on housing by tenure and type of dwelling published by the dominion bureau of statistics. Of the 3,409,295 occupied dwellings in Canada's ten provinces in 1951 2,236,955, or 65·6 per cent, were occupied by owners and the remaining 1,172,340, or 34·4 per cent, by tenants. This represents a substantial jump in both the number and percentage of owner-occupied dwellings over 1941.

Sir, for that jump, the greater part of which occurred in the seven-year period from 1944 to 1951 rather than in the three-year period from 1941 to 1944, part I of the National Housing Act deserves the bulk of the credit for the substantial increase there recorded in the proportion of owner-occupied homes in Canada. What of the period since 1951? In the daily bulletin of the dominion bureau of statistics of January 8, 1954, we find the following:

Total number of households or occupied dwellings in Canada's ten provinces increased by 232,000, from 3,409,000 to 3,641,000 in the period of approximately twenty-seven months from the time of the 1951 census to September, last year, according to results of a special survey of housing characteristics and household equipment in private homes by the bureau.

Then it adds:

About 73 per cent of the increased number of dwellings was in single detached houses which rose by 172,000 to 2,448,000 units. Of the ten-province total, 2,451,000 or slightly over two-thirds were owned by the occupants.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I say that in accomplishing this result, so desirable both from the economic and social point of view, the provisions of part I of the National Housing Act are entitled to a measure of high praise. The government, of course, has participated and for the first eleven months of 1953 has earmarked approximately $106 million under the National Housing Act. In round figures there is $60 million for its share of the joint loans under part I of the act and $50 million on account of direct loans.

Let us remember again the credit that is due the approved lending institutions for putting up the other three-quarters of the total for all joint loans under these provisions. In the first eleven months of 1953 these approved lending institutions have accounted for an increase in new residential construction over the same period in 1952 of no less than 22 per cent. This is a tribute both to the effectiveness of the provisions of part I and to the co-operation that has been enjoyed by the government from the approved lending institutions in administering these provisions.

In his statement on December 16 from which I quoted, the minister was wary in his comments as to what might be expected from the existing approved lending institutions in relation to the augmentation of existing sources of mortgage funds. From the same newspaper report of the statement issued on January 2 by Mr. George Holmes, president of the Canadian Life Insurance Officers' Association, I read this:

Commenting on the new housing legislation now before the House of Commons, Mr. Holmes said:

"It is too early to foresee the effect of the government's new insured mortgage legislation. The companies desire to co-operate with the federal government as they have done in past years to provide additional housing, but the volume of funds available for this purpose will depend to some extent on whether the interest return on the insured mortgages, having regard to safety and administration costs, is competitive with other avenues of investment."

I suppose we come back to this position, Mr. Speaker, that no one can say with certainty what will be the amount of mortgage money available under the new scheme.

I come now to the second aspect, the matter of admitting the banks to the category of approved lending institutions. In this respect the bill approves a fundamental departure from all Canadian banking practice and banking legislation of the past. The Canadian banking system is, as all members are aware, unique in the world. It has been a strong system. One has only to recall the strength exhibited by the Canadian banking system in the depression years as compared with the results in the United States, to recall gratefully the strength of the Canadian banking system. Unquestionably part of that strength has been due to the presence in the Bank Act of section 75, subsection 2 (c), which provides as follows:

Except as authorized by this act, the bank shall not either directly or indirectly

(c) Lend money or make advances upon the security, mortgage or hypothecation of any lands, tenements or immovable property . . .

To maintain the strength of the Canadian banking system, we must have regard to two features which I believe are of the highest importance, namely, security and liquidity. It is because there have been security and liquidity in our banking system and in the range of investments available to the banks that our banking system has been strong. The strength of the system also owes much to the quality of leadership we have had in the Canadian banks. Unquestionably we have at the head of our banks some of the leading business executives and some of the most competent men in Canada.

The money in the banks belongs to the depositors. I am sure it will alarm not a few persons to learn that this far-reaching legislation was introduced, involving a fundamental departure from the principle of Canadian banking legislation as it has existed from confederation, without the banks being consulted by the government before the decision was taken and announced. Let us then understand that the banks have not asked for any widening of their powers in relation to investments of this kind.

Even if this legislation goes into effect quickly, it will still be necessary for the banks, in order to follow wise and prudent investment policies, to diversify their investments and to meet the traditional obligation of Canadian banks to finance the development of Canadian resources. Today bank funds are substantially employed. I do not believe the government is going to suggest there is any volume of idle funds in the vaults of the banks. It does not pay the banks to have idle funds. They make their profits from lending money prudently. On a recent occasion when the minister was speaking in the city of Toronto, he did hold out the hope that, without trespassing upon their existing volume of loans and investments for other purposes, the banks would have available a volume of funds arising from new deposits as the population increased. If the population increases, then certainly the demands upon the banks to finance increasing and expanding development of Canadian resources are likewise going to increase.

No one can fully answer this question, but in asking ourselves whether the banks are going to lend extensively under the provisions of this act let us face up to the fact that to find funds for its purpose the banks may be obliged either to sell government bonds, to call in existing loans or to expand credit. It is one thing, sir, to expand credit on commercial loans for a period, we will say, of nine months, but it is another thing to expand credit on mortgages having a lifetime of 25 or 30 years. In other words, it is an entirely new field so far as the banks are concerned.

If you will examine the December, 1953, issue of the statistical summary of the Bank of Canada, you will see that the 1953 gross national product at today's market prices is adjusted at $24,176 million. Out of that total Canada is devoting to housing a gross domestic investment of $1,032 million. That is a very high proportion going into investment in housing today.

I say these things with a view to trying to put this measure in its true proportions before the house. It is so easy for people to draw the impression that because you are going to allow the banks to lend money on mortgage security, and that because the banks have billions of dollars in their balance sheets, suddenly you will have a gigantic infusion of new mortgage money available for mortgage investment.

Sir, it would be a bold man, one indulging in a good deal of speculation on the subject, who would be prepared to say with any degree of confidence exactly what amount the banks are prepared to devote to investment under this bill, by way of mortgages. I know we can assume that the banks will co-operate; but I hope we are not going to contemplate any pressures being exerted upon the Canadian banks to put depositors' money into long-term investments on mortgages under this act, when the course of bank experience and the necessities of preserving liquidity would dictate to those responsible for the banks' investments that they should not go too deeply into investments of this new kind.

Sir, the banks must continue to have regard to both liquidity and security in all their investments. Both are of the highest importance with them; but they are not the same thing. It may well be that the problem of preserving security with bank investments is going to be met substantially by the insurance provisions, under the scheme of this act. But let us recall, sir, that even though security is provided in that way, that in itself does not provide liquidity, because after all you can have a bank mortgage guaranteed against default, but if the mortgage goes on without default on the part of the mortgagor the bank's funds are tied up. And they are tied up for periods up to 30 years under the provisions of the new scheme.

Therefore the provision for insurance by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is no guarantee whatever of liquidity for these bank investments. What is proposed by the government in relation to liquidity, as the minister stated in his speech this afternoon, is that the Bank of Canada Act is to be amended to provide that the mortgage portfolio of chartered banks is to be eligible for loans from the Bank of Canada.

That will have to be considered a feature of high importance in assessing the provisions of this present bill in regard to the needed preservation of liquidity on the part of bank investments. I make only one further comment on the matter of bank investment, and I do it by way of trying to bring this matter into its true proportions, and eliminating wishful thinking—which undoubtedly all of us have been tempted to do in this respect, not excluding the minister himself.

Speaking on the measure on December 16 last, as reported at page 1009 of Hansard, the minister made some comment in reply to a question of mine to which I referred earlier this afternoon—and I am now taking up the minister's answer at the point I broke off when reading earlier. I was asking him with respect to anticipated augmentation from banks of the available supply of mortgage funds. The minister's answer proceeded as follows:

> With respect to the last part of the question, perhaps it can be answered more specifically than the other parts. I understand there are about 4,000 branches of the chartered banks in Canada. Each branch will now become a lending institution. That in itself will increase the number of lending agencies under the National Housing Act from some 150 odd, as there are at the present time—that is, branches of authorized lending institutions—to over 4,000.

I am afraid the minister has been indulging in wishful thinking in picturing every branch of the chartered banks in Canada as a local lending agency. It may be that the banks will in time use their branches extensively in relation to whatever mortgage business they choose to embark upon; but there has been no statement from the banks to that effect. And I just throw out a word of caution at this point.

To assume that the banks are going to pump vast resources into mortgage investments on the one hand, and also that 4,000 bank branches in Canada are all suddenly going to become local lending agencies, is to make an assumption that is not warranted by any authoritative knowledge that exists at the present time.

The third feature is this insurance scheme. This is designed, of course, to make the lending on the new terms palatable to the banks, and to encourage the present lending institutions to enlarge their mortgages. Because while previously approved lending institutions have been providing 60 per cent of the 80 per cent of approved lending value, from this point forward, on an increased lending value, they are expected to put up the full 100 per cent of the loan.

Let us remember this: all members in the house with legal training know that the law in relation to guarantees is a very technical branch of the law, and that it is necessary for a person who enjoys the benefit of a guarantee to comply strictly with the letter of his contract, if he hopes to hold the guarantor to his guarantee.

While this insurance scheme has some precedent in the United States, our situation in Canada is rather different; and I do not think precedent in that respect can be pressed too far. Let us also recall that the loan is limited to 98 per cent of the mortgage risk. I am referring to the principal and the arrears up to six months. A 2 per cent premium is paid for it by the mortgagor. The limit of $125 may not be adequate to cover the expenses to the mortgagor; and for that reason I caution the house against assuming that the guarantee will be worth 98 per cent of the face value of the mortgage.

I make these further observations on this matter of guarantee. First, it is not open to individuals as mortgagors; it is confined to institutions. However, it will become open to individuals to purchase insured loans from approved lending institutions. Secondly—and this is a factor I ask the house to consider carefully—the limit of a loan which can be insured is a minimum of 70 per cent.

In other words, no approved lending institution which lends only 69 per cent of the approved lending value becomes eligible for insurance. It must be 70 per cent or more. I suppose that any of the approved lending institutions is prepared, under proper circumstances, to lend up to 60 per cent of approved lending value, without any form of guarantee or insurance. So we do not need to worry about loans up to 60 per cent of approved lending value.

But, sir, the effect of this bill will be that, in the case of loans in excess of 60 per cent and less than 69 per cent of the approved lending value, there is open to them no loan under existing practice from an approved lending institution on the one hand, and no insurance on the other hand. So that we should realize that in some cases at any rate we are insisting that the intending mortgagor, even if he can get along with 61 per cent of the approved lending value by way of loan, must take 70 per cent if the mortgage is to qualify for insurance.

The third feature that I should like to comment on is the necessity, the statutory requirement, that possession and title be given by the holder of the mortgage, the approved lending institution, to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in order to qualify for the payment under the guarantee. Is this such a simple matter that it can be just hustled over, Mr. Speaker, as has been done by the minister today? Sir, this could be one of the major problems arising under the provisions of this bill.

It is a requirement of this bill that before the mortgagee can call upon the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to pay 98 per cent of the principal of the loan, plus the six months' arrears, the mortgagee first of all shall have obtained possession and title to the property in order to deliver title and possession to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. There is only one very slight exception to this rule in the bill. Sir, that means that the mortgagee must foreclose the mortgage. Indeed, under this bill, if a mortgagee permits the arrears of interest on the mortgage to accumulate beyond six months he is running the risk of losing the benefit of the guarantee with respect to any additional arrears. What does that mean? Well, I am quite sure that the mortgagees in this case are not going to risk forfeiting the benefit of the guarantee. They are going to be required to take such steps as will put them in a position to deliver possession to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. What does that mean? It means foreclosure. It means dispossession of the owner of the equity. There is no escape from that fact under the provisions of this bill, except one very slight saving provision which will be available under the bill in very few cases.

Anybody who has had any experience with the mortgage business, especially in the depression days, knows perfectly well that in the vast majority of cases the mortgagee does not wish to take over the property. He looks on his mortgage as an investment, not as an avenue by which he can obtain title to the property. In most cases he is not interested in becoming a property owner. He wants his money back, and therefore he will nurse the mortgagor, the owner of the equity, along as long as there is a chance of the owner of the equity making good.

Under this bill, sir, a holder of an insured mortgage dare not give additional time to a mortgagor, once his mortgage is in arrears six months, without jeopardizing his guarantee. Let the house, if it will, weigh that fact carefully. And if in time to come recession should occur, with a drop in real estate values, and the owners of equity are unable to maintain their payments, if that situation should arise then this bill would drive the holders of these mortgages to insist upon the letter of the law in their mortgages and to take steps in the event of six months' default to acquire title to the property and dispossess the owner of the equity.

Now, sir, we are thinking about this in terms of what this legislation may contribute to sound social as well as economic purposes, the kind that parliament would approve. Is that a sound social objective? The owners of houses with insured loans upon them, in the light of this provision, are going to have a much more difficult lot than those whose properties are not subject to insured loans. It is going to demand of the holder of the mortgage that he insist upon prompt payment, and that he should not allow the mortgage to run into arrears, because he must be in a position to give possession to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Take this situation also, Mr. Speaker. We have had experience in this country in depressions of moratorium legislation being introduced by provincial legislatures. Suppose there should be a recession in this country. Suppose the recession should reach such a point that provincial legislatures again should decide to intervene as between mortgagors and mortgagees and impose a moratorium in such cases, preventing the mortgagee from qualifying to give possession to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in order to get the benefit of that corporation's guarantee. Here is the situation, surely, that the guarantee is intended to provide for when a mortgage goes into default. And yet in that case provincial legislation can prevent the mortgagee from obtaining possession of the property so as to put him in a position to call upon Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to make good its guarantee, because he would not be in a position to give that corporation possession. That is not the only possibility, Mr. Speaker. Suppose some provinces, in the event of a recession, decided to enact debt adjustment legislation, decided somehow or other to intervene in this field for the purpose of adjusting debts. If legislation of any kind is introduced in this respect the beneficiary is going to be the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and a guarantee to that extent is going to be worth less than I am sure many hon. members now think or have been led to think it is worth.

I am not prepared to speculate today on the possibility of that recession coming. I do know that there are some very eminent people in this country who do say that they think there is evidence of the possibility of a recession. I notice that on October 14 last Mr. A. R. Mosher, the president of the Canadian Congress of Labour, was quoted in his speech at Vancouver as saying:

> I do not want to be pessimistic, but I think there are some signs that a recession is coming.

That remark comes from a very prominent labour leader in this country.

I am not prepared to speculate on the question of a recession coming, but I do say that every hon. member must take into account the possibility. In addressing himself to this bill he must take account of the situation that would arise in the event of a recession occurring in this country, and a different situation arising from any that we have been facing in recent years.

Our housing legislation, you see, Mr. Speaker—and this goes for part I of the present act—has had the benefit, in those post-war years, of good times, rising real estate values and rare defaults on the part of mortgagors. What occasion has there been for any mortgagor to default on a mortgage, Mr. Speaker, when in most cases, unless he made a very improvident purchase, as the market rose he could sell for more than he paid? If that situation is ended, the factors that I have mentioned may come to be factors of high importance. In any event, I am quite sure they are going to be matters of importance for the approved lending institutions in weighing the value that they are prepared to attach to the guarantee provided under this bill and deciding to what extent they are prepared to reduce the return that they ask for the risks they take in connection with such loans.

There are two other matters that I should like to mention, Mr. Speaker. The first relates to the position and power of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation under this bill. If this bill is enacted in its present form or anything approaching its present form, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will derive under its terms gigantic powers. Under the terms of this bill that corporation will become the sole arbiter of at least three things, each of which is of cardinal importance in connection with parliament's expectations from this bill.

First, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation becomes the sole arbiter under this bill of lending value. The bill provides:

> "lending value" means the value for lending purposes of the house or housing project determined by the corporation.

Indeed, not only must every mortgage under this bill, in order to be eligible for insurance, be approved by the corporation, but Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will itself make the appraisal. The minister told us this afternoon that the banks have not qualified staffs or personnel for that purpose. There is a very great power.

Second, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation with respect to every mortgage under this bill will be the sole arbiter of the standards and quality of construction. There are those who may take some satisfaction from the safeguards that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will insist upon in relation to standards of construction, but let no hon. member lose sight of the implications of the inescapable fact that under this bill Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation becomes the sole arbiter with respect to every loan made under the provisions of this bill for all Canada of the standards and quality of construction.

Third, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation under this bill becomes the sole arbiter of the speed of construction with respect to every loan insured before construction is undertaken, because if the approved lending institution wants the benefit of insurance with respect to instalments made under a building loan it must accept the fact that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation controls the progress of construction. It must approve every single advance or instalment.

Speed is essential in holding down the cost of construction. In the report by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation which I mentioned earlier attention was drawn to the fact that housing costs in Canada were stabilized last year only by reason of the fact that the average period of house construction, the average period it took for a house to be constructed from the time construction was started until it was finished, had dropped from 8·4 months in the first half of 1952 to 7·2 months in the first six months of 1953. Already builders in this country have indicated very serious apprehension about delays in construction with reference to provisions of this kind. I simply content myself at this time with drawing attention to it and seeking to impress upon the house that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation under this bill becomes the sole arbiter of the speed of construction with respect to every loan approved before advances are made under it.

That is why I say that under this bill Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and its officials derive gigantic powers. Let us use the proper expression, whatever may be the implications read into it on occasions; it means the vesting of vast powers in a giant government bureaucracy.

One could use the illustration of the camel putting his head in the tent and working his way in by degrees. By this bill we see Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation growing from its modest participation originally assigned to it in the housing scheme and now stepping in and assuming the sweeping powers provided by this bill. For that reason builders are realizing how vast are the powers the corporation will hold under this bill and are therefore taking a second look at the bill.

Before I leave that subject I desire to express just one further thought in relation to the possibility of defaults in the event of recession. When speaking on housing on April 28, 1953, the minister quite properly said, as reported on page 4491 of Hansard of that date:

> I think it is important as a matter of policy that the federal government should neither be the landlord of too many Canadians nor should it hold the mortgages for too many Canadian homes.

That being the view of the government as expressed last April, let us remember that in the event of widespread defaults in the event of a continuing recession, if it makes good its guarantees the government will acquire possession and title to a great number of homes in Canada under this bill. Very quickly it will become the country's greatest landlord.

Next, the bill vests in the governor in council very sweeping powers to enact virtual legislation in the form of regulations. There are pages of provisions in the bill which vest in the government the powers to enact provisions in the form of regulations. This wide power to legislate by regulation could be applied, on the one hand, if the government so choose, virtually to nullify the legislation enacted by parliament. On the other hand, if used by the government for this purpose it could be made the occasion of rampant inflation in Canada. I express the hope that if this measure becomes law it will not be allowed to become bogged down under its own weight by reason of a multiplicity of troublesome regulations and that the government is not going to heap upon those who are going to have to work under it such a mass of paper work that it is going to make loans under its provisions distasteful to them.

The powers are so vast that those of us who do not trust power in the hands of the government will not feel that powers of this nature, powers which are so wide, so sweeping and so inclusive are needed.

The Bank of Canada is going to have an important part to play in the whole scheme, as was made apparent to us today. The liquidity of bank investments in this respect will depend upon action on the part of the Bank of Canada. Let us not lose sight of the fact that there is lurking danger of inflation here. This bill can go far beyond the present housing situation in Canada in its effect.

I have spent more time on this than I intended to in looking into the possibilities that could arise under this bill. As I say, in its effect it is going to extend far beyond the immediate situation. It is evident that in introducing a bill with powers as sweeping as this one the government is looking beyond the housing situation that exists. On the face of it, it looks as though the government is girding itself with another weapon to deal with the possibilities of recession, and is resorting to the Keynesian theory of economics.

It would appear as though the government was looking to this bill as a means of stimulating house construction, not simply with the view of improving the existing shortage but with the view of stimulating house construction in future as a source of labour and the encouragement of other consumer spending as well as having regard to the social effects which come from owner-occupied houses.

I apologize for the length of time I have spent in this review of the bill and its implications. I have done it because of the admittedly vast importance of the bill. It is extremely important that the opposition, in discussing a piece of legislation of this kind, should fulfil its duty to the house and to the Canadian people and give the most searching scrutiny to the bill so that if parliament chooses to adopt it and it should go into effect both parliament and the Canadian people will fully understand the possibilities that can arise under the terms of the bill.

It is government legislation. For that reason it will undoubtedly in due course be enacted by parliament. I have tried to point out today the fact that in the majority of its provisions this bill simply re-enacts the existing law. There are some of its other provisions which will help to mitigate our housing problem today. There are provisions in this bill which, if not wisely and prudently used, could be a source of danger to the Canadian economy. It is therefore necessary that both in this house and in the banking and commerce committee all hon. members should apply to this bill the closest and most diligent scrutiny.

When and if this bill becomes the law of this country, members of parliament should regard it as one of their highest duties to insist upon vigilant supervision over the administration of this measure and over the vast powers it confers upon the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the government. There must be searching study; there must be, it seems to me, an annual parliamentary review of all operations under this measure.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house will find relief in recalling the fact that I have only forty minutes to devote to this bill and that I shall not be able to spend two hours on it as did the preceding speaker.

This bill now before us is, as we are told on the title page, a bill that, when enacted, will become known as the National Housing Act (1954); and we are also told that it is an act to promote the construction of new housing, the repair and modernization of existing houses, and the improvement of housing and living conditions.

Notwithstanding the rosy picture painted for us by the minister when he introduced this bill, I am sure we are all satisfied that there is still ample room for improvement in housing and living conditions in Canada. Even the figures which the minister gave us, and which he summed up by saying we were making considerable progress, do not reveal the true picture of housing conditions in this country. I think the government is to be congratulated on the fact that in 1953 they completed 90,000 houses and started on around 100,000. I think they are also to be congratulated on the fact that at long last they have succeeded in completing in one year enough houses to keep pace with the newly created housing demand. This is about the first year since the housing act was put into effect, and I believe since the end of the war, that the government has in any one year succeeded in building more houses than the newly created demand in any one year.

The fact that from 1941 to 1951 we have reduced the number of persons per occupied dwelling from 4·5 to 4·1 does not convey the true picture as far as overcrowding is concerned. I shall point out later the extent to which I believe this bill fails to meet the need, and I shall have something to say in regard to that need.

This bill introduces certain new principles into the housing act and I presume it is hoped by the introduction of these new principles to solve the housing problem, at least to some extent. Among other things the government intends to terminate the system of joint lending, to insure loans that are made to assist in the financing of housing, and to bring the banks into the mortgage lending field.

The bill represents, I believe, a logical evolution of the present government's housing policy. The government apparently believes and persists in believing that private enterprise can meet our housing needs. The government is determined not to become landlord to any number of Canadians, at least not through the process of building homes for them. It may, however, become landlord to a great many Canadians through the process of mortgage foreclosure. The government is reluctant to become a landlord and apparently is still reluctant to get very deep into the housing business. The government still believes that private enterprise can provide enough houses and provide them at a profit. Private enterprise will provide houses on no other terms. They believe that private enterprise can provide at a profit houses in sufficient numbers and at prices that will meet the housing needs of the Canadian people.

Every change that has been made in the National Housing Act over the years and the changes made in the regulations for the administration of that act have followed that general line of policy. I believe we have that policy carried almost to the nth degree in the bill now before us. Year after year the government has clung persistently to the idea that if we could only make terms with the lending institutions, if we could only grant them terms sufficiently attractive and they could be induced to put sufficient money into the mortgage pool, our housing problem could be solved.

Year after year we have had one concession after another by this government to these lending institutions in the effort to induce them to put sufficient mortgage money in that pool. Year after year every move made by the government in the matter of housing has given first consideration to the lending institutions while the basic need of the Canadian people for houses and the disastrous social effects of the housing shortage have received secondary consideration. Yet, notwithstanding all the concessions the government has made, the government has failed to induce the lending institutions to provide sufficient funds to make any appreciable reduction in the backlog of needed houses. The best that the government has been able to do is shown in this year's report which indicates that the government is barely able to keep abreast with the newly created demand for houses.

It is true that one of the bottlenecks that have created the housing shortage is the shortage of mortgage funds, and apparently the sole purpose of the changes introduced into the National Housing Act by this bill is to try to overcome that shortage with the distinct understanding, I presume, on the part of the government, that if only that difficulty can be met, if only money can be made available for mortgage funds, our housing problem will be solved. Many other factors enter into the solution of the housing problem than the amount of mortgage funds available.

I shall try to deal with some of the principles of the bill. I shall try to present my criticism of them and make what I hope the government will consider constructive suggestions for improvement, although on that latter point I must say that I have not very much hope. First let us look at the proposal to insure mortgages. The principle underlying mortgage insurance is that the lending institutions can receive an insurance payment, in reality a debenture guaranteed by the government, upon the transfer of the mortgaged property to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The corporation is to be empowered to buy insured mortgages from approved investment institutions, and when the Bank Act and the Bank of Canada Act come up for revision insurance mortgages will be made acceptable security for Bank of Canada advances to chartered banks in the same way as government bonds are today.

When lending agencies are insured by the government against investment risk, and incidentally they will be insured by the borrowers who will pay the additional insurance premium, investment companies will no longer have to worry about any loss likely to be sustained through the business of lending money on houses. They can then content themselves entirely with the business of making profits out of the housing problem. Should a loan fall into default the approved lender is then expected to secure title to the mortgaged property and to convey such title to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The approved lender will then be paid in cash 98 per cent of the sum of the principal outstanding at the date of conveyance plus interest up to six months at the mortgage interest rate, or in certain cases possibly up to twelve months, plus the borrower's charges, whatever they may amount to, plus a maximum of $125 for the transfer fee, plus whatever legal expenses may be incurred.

On the whole one of these insured mortgages presents fairly good security to the lending institution. What in effect happens is that the borrower is subsidizing the lending institution against almost the total risk despite the fact that the same institutions will be charging an interest rate which should in itself be a sufficient reward for the risk that these companies take. If the fundamental principle of the free enterprise system, which is so proudly acclaimed in this house by supporters of that system, lies in the expectation of profits as a reward for risk in investment, then this insurance feature which removes the risk seems to create somewhat of an ironical situation for the private enterprise system.

Here we have a government which believes in the free enterprise system and believes that housing should be left as a preserve for free enterprise, which supports the theory that free enterprisers put their money into an enterprise and assume the risk on the basis of some profits, at the same time calling upon the borrower or home purchaser, through an added insurance premium, to secure such private enterprises against risk and loss. Mortgage insurance is unquestionably provided solely for the protection of the lending institutions against loss in the event that a purchaser should default in his payments or in the event of a recession taking place during which recession any considerable number of purchasers may be forced to default in their payments.

There is not the slightest indication in the bill that the government has given one moment's consideration to any protection for the original purchaser of a property. There is no protection whatever for the equity that a purchaser may have in a property when circumstances force him to default and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation obtains possession of the property. Moreover, I think that the protection provided under these insurance policies is entirely unnecessary. It is unnecessary protection for the lender and it creates an additional cost to the purchaser.

I notice that the government does not want to assume directly the unpopular responsibility of foreclosing mortgages in default. It leaves that unpopular responsibility to the original lenders. Nevertheless, the government becomes, indirectly, a party to these foreclosures. The only possible good that I can see resulting from the protection afforded by the mortgage insurance principle is, as I said before, the unnecessary protection for lending institutions.

Since I presume some such measure as this is necessary if the banks are to be induced to depart from their ordinary practice and put money into mortgages, possibly some new mortgage money will be made available. Whether or not the amount of money the banks can be induced, under this legislation, to put into the general mortgage pool will be more than the government withdraws from the pool by terminating its joint lending policy, or whether it will be enough to make any appreciable difference in the number of houses that will be built, remains to be seen. I notice that the bankers are a bit cagey about going into this business. In this morning's Globe and Mail, the president of the Bank of Toronto is reported to have said that it is only to a moderate extent that it would be prudent for a bank to tie up the funds of Canadian depositors in long-term fixed investments. The president of the Bank of Toronto has a good deal more along the same lines in that speech.

We may possibly get a little more mortgage money. Even if we do succeed in getting more mortgage money into the mortgage pool from the banks, that in itself is not going to solve the housing problem. I do not think it is necessary to introduce this insurance principle into our housing legislation in order to insure the liquidity of the small proportion that the banks are likely to put into the mortgage pool. It has been estimated by responsible authorities that the banks are not likely, in any case, to put more than 5 per cent of their available money into mortgages. I doubt if it is necessary to charge the purchaser of every home an additional insurance premium in order to safeguard that small proportion of mortgage money.

So far as the life insurance companies and trust companies are concerned, they have not been doing too badly in the past so far as mortgage loans are concerned. The fact that this legislation may induce banks to go into the mortgage pool, and even though we may get an abundance of mortgage money, that is not going to make it possible for those in the lower income groups to procure homes. We must take other measures. Even if we extend the amortization period to 40 or even 50 years, and thereby reduce the monthly payment on houses, there will still remain a large sector of the Canadian people who will not be able to secure homes. It is true that by some such measure as that we may be able to make it possible for those in the $3,000 bracket or those in the $2,500 bracket to purchase homes, whereas now they are excluded from that possibility. Even under those circumstances we shall still have well over 50 per cent of the wage earners of Canada unable to purchase homes.

I suggest that instead of terminating the joint lending principle under which the government has been operating in the past the government should, as we in this group have suggested many times, issue loans directly to borrowers through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and set up a special revolving fund for that purpose. I fail to see the need for this government adding to the cost of houses through this mortgage insurance principle, and depending for mortgage money on private institutions. So far as I am concerned, housing is just as great a social need in this country as schools and many other public services. If the government is to meet this need to any extent that will be satisfactory to the people of this country, then I say that instead of getting out of the mortgage business the government should get back into it directly by means of a revolving fund.

In a recent editorial the Globe and Mail took members of this house to task for always talking about the housing situation but never really doing anything about it or suggesting anything constructive. According to the Globe and Mail one factor in housing that we seem to overlook is the high cost of houses. So far as that newspaper is concerned, the way to reduce the high cost of houses is to reduce wages. Apparently the Globe and Mail feels that members of parliament should advocate drastic reductions in wages in the building trades and in other trades in order to bring down the price of houses to within reach of people in the lower income brackets. We in the C.C.F. have suggested before one means of reducing the cost of houses to purchasers, and that is a reduction in the interest rate.

I have pointed out a number of times in this house that a reduction of 50 per cent in the interest rate will do more to reduce the carrying charges on a house than a 50 per cent reduction in the cost of labour and materials.

Again, we criticize this bill because no fixed interest rate is stated. The interest rate may vary, and apparently it may go as high as 5¾ per cent or even 6 per cent. Again I suggest that the government should make money available for housing at not more than 2 per cent. That, in itself, will do more to reduce carrying charges on houses, and to make houses available to those in the lower income groups, than any other measure we could take.

If the government wants to maintain the present interest rate, then I suggest that it should subsidize the interest rate on housing, as a social service to the country, or at least that it should subsidize the interest rate on housing below a certain cost, in order that, through that means, we may make houses available to more people in the lower income groups. If the government does not want to subsidize the interest rate on housing, then I suggest that it use the facilities of the Bank of Canada to provide money for housing at the rate of 2 per cent.

I see no reason why the limitation of $8,000 should be placed in the bill before 90 per cent of the lending value can be secured. I suggest that instead of limiting the 90 per cent lending value to $8,000, that figure should be raised to $12,000. Today it is practically impossible to purchase a bungalow in the Toronto district for much less than $12,000. I suggest the act should permit a loan of 90 per cent on houses with a lending value up to $12,000. If the government would agree to a lower interest rate, then I would be all in favour of a longer amortization period than is provided in the bill.

There is no new change in the legislation, so far as low-rental housing is concerned. Low-rental housing presents one of the great needs of our time. There are and there will be a great many people who just cannot afford to buy or to build homes, even under the most favourable conditions. There are and will continue to be many people who will have recourse to renting homes, if they are to have homes at all. And for that lower income group who cannot afford to buy or to build homes, I suggest that the government should establish a rental subsidy fund.

The present legislation provides means whereby the government may enter into partnership with a provincial government or a municipality in sharing the cost of building and the cost of maintenance. However, I can find nothing in the legislation whereby the federal government undertakes to make any provision for a reduction in the rent below the economic level.

If those houses are to be available, then they must be available to the people on the basis of their income, and not on the basis of an economic rental. Somebody must then be able to make up the difference between the rent charged and what would constitute an economic rental. I suggest that if the government is to meet the low-rental housing problem, it should set up a low-rental subsidy fund for that purpose.

One of the drawbacks in connection with housing, as the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) pointed out, is the difficulty that municipalities have in providing serviced land and schools for new subdivisions. I suggest that any legislation which attempts to meet the present housing need should make some provision whereby the federal government could come to the assistance of the municipalities, through the provincial governments, for the building of schools and the provision of serviced land.

So long as we fail to face up to this problem, the municipalities will remain very reluctant to participate in the provisions of the act which are made available for that purpose. I have no particular objection to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation undertaking to fix the appraisal value of the loan. As a matter of fact I think it is likely to work out much fairer than the present arrangement. I have heard builders say that they find, by experience, it is much more satisfactory to deal with Central Mortgage than to deal with the private lending institutions. In spite of all that has been said about government red tape, as applied to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, experienced builders have told me that there is far more red tape in getting a loan through private lending institutions than when dealing with Central Mortgage.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Noseworthy: Mr. Speaker, before the house rose at six o'clock I had attempted to show features of Bill No. 102 to which I objected, to give reasons for my objection, and to put forward certain constructive suggestions which in my opinion would serve to meet the needs of Canadian people with regard to housing.

I shall now take the few minutes remaining to give a summary of these suggestions. My first suggestion was that the principle of mortgage insurance be rejected on the ground that it imposes an unnecessary burden on prospective Canadian home owners and unnecessary protection to finance institutions. I have no particular objection to the banks going into the mortgage business if they find it profitable to do so.

My second suggestion is that instead of withdrawing completely from the lending field in favour of private enterprise the government, through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, should issue loans directly to the borrower and should set up a special revolving fund for that purpose.

My third suggestion was that such loans should bear a fixed interest rate, and not be tied to a varying factor as is the case in the bill.

My fourth suggestion was that that fixed interest rate should be 2 per cent, a rate which we in the C.C.F. have advocated in this house and which we advocated on the hustings during the election campaign. I suggested that in order to achieve that 2 per cent interest rate the government might either use the facilities of the Bank of Canada or subsidize interest rates for houses, particularly for the lower priced houses.

My fifth suggestion was that the amount of the loan should be 90 per cent of the lending value up to $12,000, instead of the $8,000 imposed by the present bill.

My sixth suggestion was that, provided that the interest rate is lowered, the amortization period be increased to 30 years instead of 25 as is proposed in the new legislation.

My seventh suggestion was that in order to provide for those Canadians in the lower income brackets who cannot afford to buy or build houses, even under the most favourable conditions, the government should set up a rental subsidy fund which would assist in establishing a sharp reduction in the present rate of rent for those particular Canadians.

My last suggestion was that the federal government, in order to assist municipalities to take advantage of the provisions of this bill, should make grants to the provinces to be turned over to the municipalities for the purpose of constructing schools and other public facilities which are a heavy expense at the present time on the municipality wherever a new housing project is undertaken.

I might add that I have no particular objection—as a matter of fact I welcome it—to the change by reason of which Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation undertakes to carry out inspection of houses built with the aid of loans under the National Housing Act. Much of the criticism which I have heard about the houses built under the National Housing Act originated from the improper or inadequate system of inspection which is carried on at the present time. I have met numerous purchasers of houses who have complained of the fact that the houses which they bought were not built up to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation standards. I have raised that question with Central Mortgage and Housing only to be assured that this inspection is left to the lending institution. I am quite confident that under Central Mortgage and Housing inspection we shall have a more satisfactory and a better system of inspection that will be in the interest of the buyers.

These are the constructive suggestions, Mr. Speaker, which I submit as alternatives to the measures contained in the present housing bill.

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, frequently of recent date we have been accused by government members of not congratulating them on things that they have done. It was possibly an oversight on our part. We were so used to hearing them congratulating themselves that we did not think it was completely necessary. However, at this time, I do congratulate the minister on bringing in such a fine piece of legislation; that is, in recognizing the need of reform in this particular legislation, and on dealing with it so well and so completely, and, if I may say so, so briefly.

I should also like to congratulate the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) on doing such an excellent job of providing a summary of what the minister gave us, but at some great length, and in such a way as to show the pitfalls into which we may find ourselves were we to adopt this particular scheme.

I would also congratulate the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy), who, in his particular case, recognizing the fallacy of the socialistic way of doing things, apparently is even willing to allow our borrowing money from banks at 2 per cent interest.

On three vital points that interest me I think the minister is to be commended. First, the government recognizes the vital need for housing. Second, the government recognizes the need of improving older homes. Third, the government is trying to provide means of financing those homes. I think those are three most important essentials.

However, the object of an opposition is, first, to be critical because we have to protect the taxpayer; and, second, to suggest alternatives to what is proposed.

I am led to believe from the bill that the government probably has read certain press clippings in which frequent mention was made that incomes and savings are up. We know that incomes are up. There is no doubt that the wage earner in Canada earns more money today than ever before. But we are told also that 83·4 per cent of the population of Canada earns less than $3,000 a year.

However, the purchasing power of the dollar is down to less than 50 per cent. Savings may be up, but it is not the little man, it is not the millworker, it is not the clerk, it is not the dock worker who has the money; it is the fellow who had a little extra money beforehand that has some today. But he has not enough to invest in a home and the minister recognizes that fact by lowering the down payment.

I submit that the down payment proposed in the bill is still too high. The down payment of 10 per cent on the first $8,000 is quite equitable, but when you start adding 30 per cent above that it results in just too much money for the ordinary individual. The need for housing is quite apparent. For instance, I have a clipping from the Ottawa Journal of January 14 which tells of a family of four in Brockville who were nearly frozen because they had to live in a tent. Hon. members probably saw that article. Then to go to the Pacific coast, I find the following in the British Columbian of Tuesday, January 12, 1954:

Family offered basement

The plight of a Dutch immigrant family of eight threatened with eviction from their small Surrey home has been answered by a Burnaby resident.

I am happy that the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Goode) and the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) are both here to help in providing a residence for this family.

Mr. Regier: I am very kindhearted.

Mr. Hahn: The municipality will have to pay for the social services provided to this family. The article continues:

The family of Martin Hienan, 42, of 1974 Baldwin road, his wife and six small children, were due to be evicted from their home Monday, because they could not keep up the payments on their tiny dwelling. Because of Mr. Hienan's illness eviction has been stayed a week.

Mr. Hienan, a qualified accountant, has been unable to find permanent employment since arriving here with his family two years ago.

It will be noted that the eviction was stayed because of illness, which in turn was probably caused by lack of employment. Those two factors should play an important part in any housing bill and I hope the proposal which I will have to make later will be of some value.

I received, as I think most British Columbia members did, a letter from the acting mayor of the city of Vancouver enclosing a brief which had been sent to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), and which I think was formally sent on to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier). That stated:

There are a number of senior citizens whose means do not permit them to pay an economic rent for housing or accommodation suitable to give them adequate comfort in their declining years. Of these there are some 8,000 in the city of Vancouver alone.

I think we all realize that there is a tremendous need for housing. These three illustrations, all of recent date, indicate, as the minister suggested earlier, that we should get this bill into committee as quickly as possible so that we can deal with it more completely. I contend that housing conditions such as these should not prevail in a country like ours.

If I may digress for a moment I should like to indicate the growth of housing in the area which I represent, and when I refer to housing I do not mean under the National Housing Act. I want to tell of what has been done by the little fellow, the man with whom I am so familiar. Following the war many of these men wanted a home; they needed accommodation but they could not afford to buy a home under the National Housing Act. Many times the man in this category found that his wages were too low. He did not have job security. He did not have enough money to make a down payment. As the result of those factors he built a cheap domicile of some kind. But by so doing he depreciated the value of the surrounding properties, and that is an important factor. The values of those homes are still being depreciated on the resale market. If this man had built in a shack region he would simply be helping to build up a slum area.

That man's present needs are enhanced because his house has deteriorated. Most likely he was a married man, and in all probability his family has increased and he requires more space. At this point I should like to give credit to the builders of British Columbia, particularly the supply houses, who foresaw this difficulty and took it upon themselves to try to help those people by offering service loans up to $2,000.

However, the rates of interest were exorbitant, and the time of repayment being a matter of two years, it was impractical and it is impractical today so far as these people are concerned. They are not wealthy and what they receive from their work is not sufficient to permit them to repay such a loan, as well as taxes and other expenses they may have.

As I read the bill, it contains an arrangement whereby a man building a home may do some work on it and can apply that to the loan. The bill is not too clear, but I wonder whether or not the man who was constructing a home could work on that home himself and have that apply on the down payment, or at least a certain portion of it. I think that might be worthy of consideration.

As I said earlier, the down payment is still too high. The Vancouver Province of January 5, 1954, carried the results of a questionnaire which had been sent out by a fact-finding committee. The purpose was to find out what the people on the Pacific coast were willing to pay for homes. Here are some pertinent facts with regard to the rate of interest. An article in the Vancouver Province, dated January 5, 1954, states:

It is quite evident that one cannot get much of a house for even $10,000 plus the lot at today's building costs, which, again, is inflated owing to lack of serviced land.

Earlier the article states:

The present proposal "is not the answer for those in the lower income brackets because our building by-laws do not permit semi-detached or row housing here."

It goes on:

. . . the act should be based on a straight 10 per cent down on $12,000 to be of use to the average citizen.

In a questionnaire published the same day in the same newspaper certain suggestions were made and members of the public were invited to answer this questionnaire. For example, the first question is:

In your opinion should the municipalities and the federal government jointly finance clearing and servicing of land making reasonably priced building lots available under the terms already provided for in the National Housing Act?

The answer given on an average was: Yes.

The final tabulation of these facts and figures on this question has not yet been completed but the trend is shown and that trend is "yes". There is one feature we must definitely consider and that is the matter of exploitation. Exploitation must be stopped. The workingman, or any man for that matter, intent on building a home should not have to pay an exorbitant price for a piece of property, nor should he have to pay more than the lumber and building materials were worth to start with. That does not mean that a businessman should not get his proper rate of profit. No man can live without profit. The workingman would not have a job unless the businessman had his profit. But we must see to it that the buyer is not exploited.

The second question was:

Has the high down payment barred you from home ownership?

The answer is "Yes".

As I said earlier, the minister is to be congratulated on reducing the down payment, although I do not believe he has reduced it far enough. The third question is:

If a lower down payment results from the changes in the National Housing Act do you intend to build?

The answer again was "Yes". I would therefore expect, Mr. Speaker, that the act will be used to full advantage in the city of Vancouver. The fourth question was:

What is the largest amount you can afford for a down payment?

The figure arrived at was $1,200. I do not know how many hon. members are in business but I left my business to come to Ottawa to help look after the nation's business. I was in the credit business and I always found that if a man asked for a loan of $50 he could only afford to repay $40. Most people overstep the mark and if they say they can afford a $1,200 down payment, then it is almost certain they can afford only $1,000. Their imagination runs away with them and they overlook the fact they have other things to consider besides the down payment.

The next question was:

What monthly repayment could you afford?

The answer in this case was $55 to $60.

In this instance the same comparison applies. If they cannot afford $1,200 as a down payment, they cannot afford $55 or $60 a month either. It is true many people are paying that amount but they cannot afford it. Their homes are suffering. The average wage earner does not get enough per month to be able to afford a repayment of from $55 to $60 per month, and it is quite certain that most of these people have not allowed for such incidentals as roofing repairs, painting that may have to be done, or even income tax and medical expenses.

As regards a question of inflation, there is one factor here we should note, particularly in regard to the down payment mentioned earlier, and that is that the Americans provide homes for a down payment as low as $500. I do not know whether the minister and his colleagues have studied the United States housing plan, but I imagine they will have done so and I hope that as a result of their investigations we can expect lower down payments than are proposed under this act.

One of the most important things in life so far as owning a home is concerned is the fact that we must have security in tenancy. By that I mean that an owner must feel assured when he buys that he is going to be able to hold on to his home. He does not want to be constantly haunted by the fear that he is going to lose it at any time. I am very pleased to see that the amortization period may be extended from 25 to 30 years because that is one of the factors that will decrease monthly payments.

One other factor to consider is the rate of interest. It was dealt with in some degree by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy). The rate he suggests is 2 per cent. I imagine in this particular instance he was referring to something that is true only of the Social Credit province of Alberta where they have a 2 per cent revolving fund which is used to make community projects self-liquidating. I do not believe that is necessarily true in this instance for the simple reason that under the housing scheme now proposed the banks, which are privately owned institutions, must have some degree of profit. They exist on profit.

Under the proposal as it now stands we have an insurance scheme which will guard them against any loss; but if we are going to allow them something I think it will have to be a little more than 2 per cent, because 2 per cent will probably not pay for the cost of handling the funds.

I do not know where the hon. member got the 2 per cent figure from, but I do know that in all likelihood the facts will prove that the 2 per cent charge is not sufficient to cover the cost of handling the large sums of money to be used.

However, let us suppose we give the banks a profit of 1½ per cent plus the other 2 per cent which would give them 3½ per cent. One hundred thousand units built, not at an average cost of $10,700, but at $10,000, would give the banks a net profit of $15 million. I know $15 million is not a good return on an investment of $1 billion as far as the businessman is concerned, but the banks owe something to the Canadian people. They must recognize that fact. As a grocer I would be expected to have a certain range of loss leader goods and if I did not have them people would walk down to the nearest chain store to get them. As a garage man I am expected to give free air. In the same way the banker is expected to do something more for the people than just to take a profit. Opposed to this 3½ per cent we have the suggestion that the interest may be as high as 6 per cent. That would mean something like $60 million profit for the banks on an average $10,000 home, 100,000-unit project. That would be the regular rate of interest. Mind you, I do not think the rate will be that high. I think it was mentioned that was considered too high a figure and therefore should not be the one to be used.

I think all hon. members are conversant with the saying of that famous statesman who said, some years ago, "Give us the tools and we will finish the job." We have the tools and we have the job. Apparently all we lack at the present moment is the initiative to put the two together with a few millions or billions of dollars to complete the job. There are statements by certain individuals of national stature which we must refute. I would refer to one, R. E. G. Davis, director of the Canadian Welfare Council, who said, as reported in the Financial Times of November 26, 1953:

> The shape and composition of our towns and cities at present, and of our new neighbourhoods springing up overnight in the suburbs are being determined not by any rational consideration of how to provide the best living conditions for people, but almost solely by what will bring the largest profit to the building and shopping interests that have the development in hand. We shall never make progress so long as this situation continues and one of our first objectives must be to see it is quickly brought to an end.

Hon. members will notice these words—"almost solely by what will bring the largest profits to the building and shopping interests that have the development in hand." It is very important that we should protect ourselves against anything like that, and statements of this type must be challenged. It is a simple matter to tear things to pieces but it is quite a different thing to try to improve them. Therefore in this particular case I have a suggestion that I should like to pass on to our good friend, the minister. It is one that was adopted by another country, and undoubtedly the minister has studied it. He may even have a complete answer to the reason it has not been considered at greater length.

I speak of the experience of Brazil. Between 1933 and 1940 Brazil had a nation-wide depression similar to ours, and private enterprise Brazilian builders carried out this plan. They formulated a housing project that has resulted in between 70 and 75 per cent of the people of Brazil owning their own homes today compared with the figure of 65 per cent quoted for Canada. This result was achieved during the time when Brazilian banks were paying 7 per cent on demand savings. At that time I believe our Canadian banks were paying 3 per cent. I am not sure, but I believe that is the figure. All the bankers, builders and everyone else concerned in the project in Brazil made money. That is a very important feature; everyone concerned made money. There is a distinction to be made between the lending of money already in existence and the creation of new money. The minister knows that in Canada new money is created practically at will. Every time we have a large wheat crop we get an additional crop of new money with which to purchase the surplus immediately. Mind you, that is not true today because we cannot sell all of the surplus to ourselves. But during the years when we had elevator space available new money was created to help business along and look after it properly.

The secret of the success of the Brazilian scheme lies with the Brazilian government itself. Instead of waiting for the people of Brazil to borrow money from private interests, the Brazilian treasury issued certificates which we might compare to deposit certificates. These certificates were equal to the value of the materials and labour involved in the particular housing project. We must first remember that the purpose of the whole scheme was to take care of the unemployment then prevalent in Brazil, and there was also the factor that they had such a large surplus of goods on hand which they wanted to get rid of.

These deposit certificates were handed to the chartered banks and the chartered banks loaned them to accredited contractors at a rate of 2 per cent. At the same time the savings banks were paying 7 per cent the chartered banks were lending this money to builders at the rate of 2 per cent. The builders constructed the buildings and in turn sold them to the prospective buyers who repaid the chartered banks the actual cost of the homes on a monthly basis plus a 2 per cent carrying charge. This plan put people in Brazil back to work, as it was supposed to do. It also solved the housing problem. Houses are the means whereby we stabilize the economy of the country, and if the depression that some people seem to expect should become a reality we might well consider having such a project.

In a matter of ten to fifteen years prospective Brazilian home owners had become home owners. There was no down payment involved in the scheme. It might be asked what the banks did when the loans were repaid. They sent the certificates back to the treasury which destroyed them. We find that in that instance the people of Brazil used their labour and surplus materials to excellent advantage without its costing them an exorbitant rate of interest such as the 5½ per cent rate we have today, or 6 per cent, as the case may be. I am reminded of a statement made earlier that the interest rate is not a fixed rate. I believe it should be fixed because the prospective home owner entering into negotiations should know what he is going to have to pay.

Under the Brazilian scheme 2 per cent was the cost of handling the certificates, and perhaps our banks should do the same thing in an identical fashion. We have the institutions already in existence. We need homes, and we have the materials. H. R. MacMillan, the lumber magnate of the Pacific coast, said the other day that we have no market for our lumber. I do not know whether or not everyone realizes it, but the British Columbia export business is built on a basis whereby no country takes more than 10 per cent of our export surplus for its home market. Such an amount would mean nothing as far as the market requirements of any foreign nation are concerned, and we could very easily lose such markets completely if these countries chose to reduce their imports from Canada by 10 per cent.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe I have put the case very clearly in so far as the proposal I have in mind is concerned. I would go on to summarize my ideas in this way. First and foremost, we must curb inflation in building costs. It is necessary that the price of homes stops rising, and that we keep that price at a level which everyone can afford. I should like to impress upon the minister also the need for allowing the value of the labour used in the construction of these homes to be construed as a down payment. It is necessary, too, to ascertain whether or not it is possible to reduce the interest rate from the 5 per cent or 6 per cent that is suggested to a nominal figure such as 3·5 per cent.

I know that under the insurance scheme, which I have not discussed, it is going to require 2 per cent to carry the insurance premiums, and there would be an additional 2 per cent to cover the cost of operation of the banks, so that might mean a total of 4 per cent. I believe, however, it is the purpose of the banks to look after the community and to help in the building of Canada which is so essential at this time. I would ask in all seriousness that not only the minister but everyone in this house study very closely the Brazilian method of building homes from 1933 to 1940, when they actually kept their unemployed busy and got rid of their surplus goods by monetizing the wealth of the nation.

Mr. J. E. Brown (Brantford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in support of this bill, the purpose of which is to promote the construction of new homes and improve the living conditions in this country. During the last election campaign I promised my own constituents of Brantford that I would press for new legislation of the kind that is now before us. I note that the government, in its appeal to the people for support, did not make any promises whatever along those lines but I felt a keen personal interest in the whole matter and allowed myself to go on record in favour of a new housing act.

I believe that the government is to be congratulated on bringing forward this bill so early in the session after the last election. The legislation which is before us, and which will replace the National Housing Act now in force, is breaking new ground in Canada so far as progressive legislation is concerned. In my view what we are embarking upon is a forward step, and it ought to have far-reaching and beneficial consequences. We are all agreed on one thing—at least I do not believe any member in this house doubts it—that there is still a need for more and better housing in this great country of ours. The question is, does this legislation meet our needs; and, more important still, is it sound?

Some hon. members might feel quite sincerely that the bill does not go far enough, and in particular that a flat 10 per cent down payment should have been provided on every house constructed under the act costing up to $12,000 to $15,000. Upon first consideration, I might have been of this view, but on sober second thought, Mr. Speaker, I sincerely believe that the provisions contained in the bill are sound; that the legislation is wise and ought to be supported. We are engaged in a new venture. The government is striving to place some of the available credit of the country behind the man who is embarking on that greatest endeavour of all, the founding of a home of his own. Most of us in the house, I am sure, believe that the great majority of Canadians ought to own their own homes. In my view this is of necessity a basic feature of our society.

If Canada is going to be great and strong, strong at home and abroad; if we are going to make a contribution to the world of today; then this nation of ours must be a nation of home owners. If a man can own real estate, part of the soil of Canada, and construct a house thereon under the provisions of this act, he thereupon has a genuine stake in the welfare and future of our country. This is one of the reasons this bill is so important, and why its effects may be far-reaching.

Most of the young men and women of our land need the assistance of some form of credit in order to establish themselves in life. That is what this bill provides. I do not think the majority of young men and women in Canada want handouts from the government. They need assistance in the form of loans which they can pay off. They want to own a home of their own, and to pay for that home. In this way they hope to acquire a little independence of that type which has been enjoyed by our fathers and forefathers in this country since the beginning. For this reason, Mr. Speaker, I am going to support this bill. I believe it to be a move genuinely designed to promote home ownership from one end of the country to the other.

Does this legislation go far enough? In the election campaign I suggested a 10 per cent down payment be made available. Now, that has been done in this act. If a man desires to construct a $12,000 home or a $16,000 home, would it be wise for him to borrow up to 90 per cent of that large sum? Could he afford to keep up the resultant heavy monthly payments under such a scheme? Should this government give him encouragement by providing in this bill for his doing so? I do not think so. Would it be wise for any man to assume an obligation that would take a period of more than 25 years to amortize under normal repayment terms? Should the government have encouraged him to do that? Again, I say I do not think so.

What concerns me in connection with this bill is not reducing the amount of the down payment below what is provided or extending the term of tenure of the mortgage. What is concerning me is this: will the bill result in loans becoming more available to the average citizen? That is the question which is paramount; that is the question on which this bill should stand or fall.

The trouble in the past has been, at least in my view and in my experiences from day to day in a law practice, that satisfactory loans have been too difficult to attain. The provision in this legislation to make available insured loans, through the banks, in my opinion should open the door to much greater credit facilities for the average man and woman in Canada.

I do not think the bill should be opposed simply because some of its terms do not satisfy some hon. members. Let us give the legislation before us a fair trial for, say, two years, thus giving at least an opportunity to ascertain if in practice it will have the effect we want it to have, and that we hope it will have.

If housing loans become more available to the general public than they have been in the past, then this bill will have amply fulfilled its purpose and will have justified the basic idea which prompted the government to bring in the legislation at the present time.

Like many other hon. members on this side of the house I was very much puzzled and, indeed, shocked by the speech of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), who spoke on behalf of Her Majesty's loyal opposition. I am sorry he is not in the house tonight. It is not for me to comment upon the speech of one who holds the esteem of all parties in the house, and who is a very powerful figure in the Conservative opposition. But it was impossible for me to ascertain whether he and his party were for the bill or were against it.

At any rate, it may be that he and his party have not quite made up their minds. He did utter some valuable warnings as to the possible results which might ensue from the passage of the bill, but he offered no substitute and brought forward no other proposal on behalf of his party to take the place of this legislation.

Returning to the bill, I am glad that it will make possible a better service than has ever been available before to the residents of small centres and remote communities across Canada. It is a great forward step.

Instead of having to deal by correspondence with lending companies, the people will be in a position to consult the nearest branch bank manager, and to talk over their problems with him. This will be a great convenience.

The hon. member for Eglinton thought that the banks would not co-operate; I think they will. I believe that it will be of the greatest convenience to the people who live in the remote communities and smaller centres in our country. I have in mind, in particular, my own good city of Brantford, which I am proud to represent in the House of Commons. Then, we also have people in the township of Burford, a truly splendid community in my constituency, who, I believe, will be vitally affected by the passage of this legislation. In spite of what the hon. member for Eglinton has said, it could be that they will be able to go to those two historic little villages of Burford and Scotland, and there discuss with their bank managers the vital problem of housing, which concerns all those people.

The people in these communities are in my view the very backbone of Canada. They are sure to derive lasting benefits from this legislation. I hope that when the measure reaches the committee stage the individual sections will receive careful and thorough study, particularly with respect to the provisions relating to interest rates.

I repeat that the government ought to be congratulated upon bringing forward legislation of the kind proposed in this bill. In my view it deserves and eventually will have the support of a large majority of members in the house, of whatever party, who are sincerely desirous of promoting the well-being of our country in a substantial and material way.

(Translation):

I want to conclude my remarks in the beautiful tongue of my French-Canadian colleagues, whom I have been so happy to know since my arrival in Ottawa.

In my opinion the bill now before the house should obtain the support of the majority of hon. members. I see in it a sincere effort on the part of the government to help the man who would like to start on the most important undertaking of his life, that of acquiring his own house and establishing a family.

I am confident that this measure will contribute toward increasing the possibilities open to Canadian citizens and widening their horizons.

(Text):

Mr. R. H. Small (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, when I first read the outline of the bill I was under the impression that its purpose was to promote the construction of homes as well as to improve housing and living conditions. I had been led to believe that within its framework we would find the means whereby the government would place the purchase of homes within the reach of low income families, and make it possible for them to grasp this offer of help.

This bill, heralded as a boon to ameliorate the plight of the family in the low income group, that vast host of our population in which the heads of families are receiving incomes less than $3,500 per year, does not measure up to what we had expected. Because of its many financial gyrations, the results of the bill must remain elusive.

After listening to the minister's comprehensive explanation of the proposals contained in the bill, it now becomes obvious that its paramount object and intent is to procure a greater reservoir of money to be made available for loans. It would seem that the chief concern in framing the bill has been to persuade those with funds—in this instance the banks—to enter an arena of financing from which heretofore they had been barred.

It now becomes evident that the banks were reluctant to take this step, and we now see that they are being catapulted into this service. They have been lured into an acceptance of the situation through a process of making the major proposal attractive to them through the introduction of the new feature of insuring loans on terms of a 2 per cent payment, single premium. This is payable by the purchaser and is to be included in the monthly payments, thus making the attraction more effective.

Let us now pay some attention to the individual for whom the bill was devised. I refer to the purchaser in the low income group. We see at once how he has been manoeuvred into the position where, unless the government can be induced to re-admit him to the benefits involved, he cannot enjoy the provisions planned for him.

Under the present act—and I have been unable to find anything in the new proposals that removes the frustrations that the purchaser, who is in the income group earning below $3,500 a year, has encountered—the situation is this. Take the figure the minister has given, $10,000, as the price of a house, with the down payment of 14 per cent or $1,420, with the balance of $8,580 to be borrowed and the loan processed at 5¼ per cent, amortized in 25 years. The amortization schedule for this loan is $5.96 a month per thousand, amounting to a monthy payment of $51. The rate on the same loan amortized at 30 years is $5.49 a month per thousand, or $46.70 a month.

The same figures for a $12,000 loan, which is the lowest price of a home today, works out, with the down payment of 14 per cent, at $1,680, with a balance of $10,320 at 5¼ per cent to be amortized in 25 years at $5.96 a month per thousand, or a monthly payment of $60.38. When amortized in 30 years at $5.49 a month per thousand, there is a payment of $56.50 a month. To these payments of $51 and $46.70 a month, amortized at 25 and 30 years respectively on a $10,000 home and payments of $60.38 and $56.50 a month amortized at 25 and 30 years respectively on a $12,000 home must be added the insurance charge to secure the lender's loan. There must also be added the taxes, say $180 a year, or $15 a month extra.

The house will note that these payments range from $46.70, $51, $56.50 to $60.38 per month, with $15 for taxes and 60 cents for loan insurance to be added, and are to be paid from an income below $3,500 a year or a maximum of $70 a week. This is where the frustration is brought about.

The lenders will not lend unless the purchaser has an assured income of over $4,200 a year, or $80 a week. Therefore, unless the present impediment is removed and the salary requirements are made favourable to the low income purchaser, this much-heralded bill becomes futile so far as it affects those for whom it was supposed to be designed. I will go one step further and predict that if you put a favourable salary requirement into effect for the low income group the price of the resale house will automatically come down.

Now, while I am on this phase of it I may say that I cannot see why the purchaser should be called upon to pay the single premium to insure and secure the loan advanced by the lender. I think the lending organizations would be willing to pay for the added protection. However, the amount is insignificant when spread over 25 or 30 years. Nevertheless, if you can set up a provision such as this for the lender, then the mechanics of the operation can be set up in favour of the purchaser for the same 2 per cent payment of a single premium, to be paid in the same way by the purchaser as he does for the insurance on the lender's loan. It will give a break to the one who has to carry the burden of the quarter of a century ahead in establishing a home, and it will give peace of mind to his family, keep a roof over their heads, and give added security should misfortune overtake the breadwinner.

I say this because the burden on the purchaser seems to be given the least consideration in this bill. All the other considerations are given to those who are going to benefit the most from the profit that is to be obtained from it. The man who seems to be forgotten in this bill is the one that I should like to draw to the attention of the minister, to see if something can be done to permit him to purchase a home.

As I say, the bill was originally designed to help the purchaser; but when these restrictions are placed upon him, it means that when a man goes to purchase a home he is confronted with a situation of such magnitude that he cannot possibly get loans from the lending companies. When I asked the minister questions when he first introduced this bill that was the thought that I had in mind. I was thinking of the individual who is in the low income bracket and who I hoped would secure the benefits of this bill, which have been denied to him. I should like the minister to study this matter further to see if he cannot find some way of reducing the salary requirements insisted upon by the lenders and give a prospective purchaser the advantages intended.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I regret that when I spoke in the house last fall I was unable to do as many other hon. members did, namely, to spend a few minutes speaking of the beauties of the area that I represent. One of the reasons why I was unable to speak in that vein was the policies of the government in regard to housing. My riding consists partly of hundreds and hundreds of tar paper shacks, and I lay the blame —I think fairly—on the shoulders of this government. The suburban ridings have been most harshly discriminated against in the matter of housing legislation. The housing legislation where it has helped has helped the larger centres of population.

I feel that the old policies of the government were not sufficiently aggressive, and I notice that not only do we in British Columbia feel this way but so does Quebec. I noticed in the report of the Quebec board of trade to the royal commission of inquiry into constitutional problems the following on housing:

> The home building policy of the federal government is not sufficiently aggressive and the shortage of housing units is still being felt.

We had another admission this afternoon from the minister that out of 105,000 houses that he thinks were built last year, only 40,000 used the facilities of the National Housing Act. In other words, more than one-half of the new housing units that were built in Canada were built without using the facilities of the National Housing Act.

National Housing Act

The National Housing Act was designed to make it easier for people to build houses. If it really were fulfilling this function I maintain that the percentage of houses and of housebuilders using these facilities should have been much larger.

The statement was made that for the first time we have been able to build as many new houses as new family units have been formed. That statement ignores the fact that in large areas of Canada we have now reached the stage where thousands of old houses are no longer fit for human use. That statement is subject to many qualifications. I hold in my hand an article which appeared in the January 16 issue of the British Columbian, a daily newspaper. The article says:

> While there is slightly less substandard housing in the greater Vancouver area than there was at the end of the war, the total building program has not kept pace with new family formation and the influx of new families to the area: twenty thousand units short in 1945, housing accommodation falls even farther behind local needs today, particularly for low income families.

That is the consensus of opinion of the Vancouver Housing Association, which is a Red Feather agency. There is an admission in the Vancouver Sun of January 9 that in the Vancouver area housing has reached its second lowest point since 1947. It was stated that, in the Vancouver area, of the $50 million odd that went into new construction last year only $11 million or some 23 per cent went into housing. That percentage is far too low at a time when housing is of such paramount importance. To think that upwards of $39 million should go into other building while only $11 million went into housing!

I notice that the pinch is being felt not just in the larger urban centres. Right after the war every urban centre was faced with a serious housing shortage, but now from one end of Canada to the other every little hamlet, community and village has a housing shortage. The situation has not improved, it is getting worse. This is what has happened at a time when there is such a growing social need, at a time when we need to consume more in our dominion, at a time when we have surpluses of all primary materials, of inventories; at a time when there has been a slow-down in exports and when our national production is up. We are faced with a situation where housing difficulties are becoming worse. Every policy of this government should be aimed at using up more consumer goods by filling the need for homes.

I note the statement that the old National Housing Act was successful, but I cannot agree with that. It was not successful either in the joint lending set-up or in the other sections. There was an arrangement for direct loans by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation which has been referred to in glowing terms. However, I found throughout rural British Columbia that the common complaint about these direct loans was the long delay in servicing the loans. People had to wait half a year or more before a man even came out to look at their lots. That is hardly good enough.

If the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Brown) thinks that by using the banks the people in the smaller communities will be helped he had better have another look at the bill. This bill will make loans even more subject to the approval of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

The old act contained several provisions with regard to low rental housing and there was a section devoted to research. I maintain that on the whole those sections have been miserable failures. They have not been utilized to anywhere near the extent envisaged at the time the act was introduced.

A plea has been made that there should be a two-year trial of the new legislation. I submit that if we are going to have a breakdown in housing for two years, that is two years more than the Canadian people would like to see.

Reference has been made to the effective demand for housing and considerable weight seemed to be attached to that. I hope that before this bill passes there will be a clearer definition of what is meant by effective demand. Does effective demand refer only to those people who do not need the help of the government in connection with building homes or does it refer to those who really need homes?

The contention has been made that the housing scheme worked shortly after the end of world war II and then the Korean war came along and the rate of new house construction declined. It is admitted by those who are in the housing field that there has not been the upsurge since that there should be in this industry.

I am not one of those who like to be branded as irresponsible, who are ready to advocate anything. I realize that if we are going to build the 200,000 homes per year, which we must have as a minimum, the money must be found. I maintain that the only source of money is the increased purchasing power of the Canadian people. You can talk all you like of monetizing the nation's wealth, but the only thing you can monetize is that which has been obtained after labour has been applied to raw materials and the resulting product has not been consumed. That is delayed purchasing power and it is the only money that I have any faith in.

Irrespective of the conditions that have been laid down, I feel that the government is attempting to pull out of this housing dilemma in a very odd way. They are hoping that Canadians do not know enough of this business of money to be able to lay the blame where it rightly belongs. I think they are hoping to use the chartered banks of Canada several years hence as a scapegoat and lay the blame on them for their unwillingness to do their share.

The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hahn) outlined the plan for finding money that was exercised in Brazil. I was glad to note that he did not use Venezuela as an example, which at one time was held up as a model of Socred monetary theories. We now find that that is one of the worst authoritarian regimes in existence and they have now turned to one of the neighbouring nations and are using Brazil as an example. I noted the statement that if we have a depression this government might well consider a similar method of financing housebuilding in Canada.

The C.C.F. has always maintained that, in times of depression when those who have money are refusing to invest it, it is necessary for the government to take remedial action, and we would go along with the hon. member for New Westminster in saying "if we have a depression". But I think we must admit that that time has not arrived as yet. I note that he says also that first and foremost we must curb inflation. I am very pleased to hear that said by one of the members in their ranks. I am looking forward to the time when he will be moved up to one of the front seats in that organization, nearer the centre of the house. The people in my native province are looking forward to the day when those who say that they are first and foremost in favour of curbing inflation will be recognized.

The money must be found, and that is where the responsibility of the government enters in. I maintain that our insurance, mortgage and trust companies went on a strike against meeting our housing needs some seven months ago. They have been holding a gun to the head of the government year after year; they have persuaded or influenced the government to raise the interest rates. Last year they found that they could invest their money more safely elsewhere and receive a much higher rate of return. After all, the safety of money invested in a house is contingent upon the owner of the house being steadily employed at a favourable wage rate, and so forth. Money invested in oil lines is much more secure and the rate of return, sometimes guaranteed, is very much higher, so I cannot really blame those who are administering the insurance funds for seeking other and far more profitable lines of investment.

Ever since 1935, when they did it to win an election, the government has exercised a very strict control in Canada over the issuance of currency and credit throughout the nation. The time has now arrived when this government must assume its responsibilities in directing the investment funds of the nation. They are failing to assume that responsibility and are hoping the banks will help them out. We have had the most amazing admission that the available supply of money is tending to fall short, but the truth is that it is tending to fall short only in so far as the government is unwilling to direct the flow of investment money in the nation. The supply of money is more adequate than it ever was in Canadian history. One has only to look at the figures to substantiate that. Now we have the shift of responsibility to the banks. The insurance companies are going out of the business and so other fields are being looked for.

The banks, Mr. Speaker, if they are going to be of any real help to the nation in meeting the nation's housing needs, will have to curtail credit for the ordinary commercial needs of the nation. The only alternative is the liquidation by the banks of their government securities.

That in turn will have the effect of raising still higher the rate of interest the government will have to pay on future bond issues. I repeat, the only way in which the banks can adequately help is by curtailing the ordinary commercial needs of the nation.

There has been a lot said about the ability of the banks to help out. This statement has been made not in the house but in newspapers, and it is worth having a look at. The assets of the chartered banks of Canada as given on September 30 last were $10,398 million. Two hundred thousand homes would take $2 billion worth of mortgage money. Even if the banks were able to supply this money this year, next year they would receive a refund by way of repayment of only 3 or 4 per cent. If they harmed the commercial needs of the nation to the extent of $2 billion this year where would next year's $2 billion come from? There is only one logical source of housing money and that is the investment savings of the Canadian people.

The minister made a statement to the effect that he hoped the banks would be able to apply the increase in the deposits of the nation and they would be able to take this money and use it for housing. However, looking over the annual reports of the banks of Canada we note that the banks are seriously alarmed because already the increase in commercial needs is exceeding the increase in deposits.

This new housing act, I maintain, can meet the needs of the nation only if the banks will go the limit of 10 per cent of their deposits and if the insurance companies can be persuaded to invest at least as much in housing this year as they did last year. The only alternative to that is inflation and I am sure even this government, despite the insertion in the act of the principle of making these mortgages liquid and acceptable to the Bank of Canada, will recognize that now is not the time to use that feature of the bill. If we were faced with a lack of investment funds in Canada there might be some justification for that instrument being used; but now, when our price levels are at an all-time high and when we are doing everything we possibly can to increase exports and maintain the present domestic level of prices, is not the time to resort to that method. It might be necessary by the middle of the year if the government observes the imminent bankruptcy of its good intentions.

The attitude of the nation on housing reminds me of a parallel. I was raised in Saskatchewan and I well remember the attitude of many a farmer who settled there. The first thing he needed for his wife and family was a home. He did not have very much money so up went the sod or log shack and then he bought machinery, his tools of production. If he obtained good returns and was fortunate he did not invest the money in a new house. He bought another 160 acres of land, and if he had another good year he bought another 160 acres of land. The following year good fortune hit him again and he bought more costly machinery. He added to his productive capacity year by year until, when he was old and the family had left home, only he and his wife remained. He finally realized how foolish he had been and he went ahead and built a magnificent home. But he and his wife hated it because there was no one living in the home except themselves.

That is what we are doing in our own land. We are taking our investment money and using it to add to the productive capacity of the nation rather than to meet the social needs of the nation. If I were on the other side of the house and did not believe in socialism I would exert every effort in order to curb the mad haste to expand the productive capacity of the Canadian nation now currently going on, because in our own selfish interests we should be limiting this rapid expansion. We already have a surplus of goods which we cannot sell on the markets of the world. Why add to our dilemma? I feel this is a very shortsighted policy and I hope those who have money to invest will soon realize their shortsightedness from their own point of view.

I realize that every new act is dependent for its final success on the regulations under the act, and I hope the new regulations will be improved and made a lot more acceptable to those who build homes. I hope that there will be an end to this business of forcing people who want to build on a suburban lot which they can probably buy for $500, $600, or $1,000 to buy a $3,000 lot on which to erect an $8,000 home. I think that is one of the most ridiculous features of the joint lending arrangements that we have at the present time. I know it is not the government that does it. The insurance companies have a major say in what lots they will approve and what lots they will not approve, and I know that many a person in the lower mainland of British Columbia has been forced to build an $8,000 home on a $3,000 lot when he would have loved to buy an $800 lot for his $8,000 home.

The other undesirable feature about the new housing legislation that I do not like is that by insuring mortgages and making them acceptable to the Bank of Canada we are using the people's credit, and I say it is wrong to allow anyone to make money on the use of the people's credit to meet a social need. I noticed a statement that the rate of interest should not be 6 per cent, but already the government has sold savings bonds at 3¾ per cent, and if you add 2¼ per cent to that you have a loophole ready for a 6 per cent interest rate. My forecast is that before the house meets next winter the rate of interest will be higher than 6 per cent unless there is a change in government policy.

I believe the statement was made at another session of the house that the government should not become the landlord of the Canadian people. What more sinister way is there for the government to become the landlord of the Canadian people than the roundabout one of insuring mortgages whereby, when a man cannot meet his payments, title to the property must be delivered to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation? I ask the government: What will happen in case of a slight recession? What does Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation intend to do with all the homes that will come into its hands? Is it going to make a suitable arrangement with the original purchaser of a home so that he will get something for his equity therein?

As far as the government becoming the landlord of the Canadian people is concerned, what about those who have built houses under the Veterans Land Act? All reports I have had from veterans living in such homes speak most highly of the government being in the housing business. The only regret of these veterans is that the ceiling is a bit low. It is very hard to do anything with $6,000. However, it seems to work out very well. We have the government now being a landlord to other Canadian people in making Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation direct loans to the amount of $60 million last year. We hear no complaints. What about government support given to operators of businesses? I notice that some $70 million was advanced through the industrial development bank for the expansion of business in Canada. Surely if we can spend money for that purpose we can spend money in a direct way to meet a social need of the nation.

I say, use the banks if you must for the purpose of administration, if you will not do it our way, but do not use the people's credit to earn a profit for somebody. The government seems unwilling to take a firm hand in directing the investment money of the nation, and there is plenty of it available. May I remind the house that the next election is a long way off, and I am wondering whether the hands of the government are still so severely tied to the last election that they cannot at this date undertake some courageous action.

With respect to subsidized low rental housing, I hope the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) will tell the house something of his and his father's experiences in that field. I know that many hon. members have objections to subsidized low rental housing. Even though you had it in the old act you did not believe in it enough to sell the idea to very many communities so that they would take advantage of it. If you do not believe in it, why not adopt the idea of a cash subsidy toward the capital cost of construction. This policy has been followed by the government of British Columbia for a goodly number of years now. Most of the units are in the riding of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Goode) and a few are in my own riding. A married couple with a low income can rent adequate housing for as little as $18 a month. This has been made possible by a cash subsidy toward the initial cost of construction, and there is no other subsidy involved in the operation of these units.

I am sure that the government could have come forward with a better idea than mortgage insurance. Section 40 of the old act contained a provision whereby the corporation might make arrangements with an insurance company under which, if the owner of the house should die, the balance still due would be taken care of and the family would be left with the home clear of debt. I am sure that that could have been enlarged and added to so that if a man were to become incapacitated or were to meet with some other catastrophe the unpaid balance would be taken care of and he would be left with the house. That would have been an insurance plan that would have been acceptable to the Canadian people.

I should like to remind the house that we are not dealing with small peanuts. Two hundred thousand homes means $2 billion, and each year there are $2 billion of savings of the Canadian people which can be made available for housing if the government will realize its responsibility with respect to this great social need. We are wondering just how sincere the government is in introducing this legislation. One has only to look at the latter parts of some of the sections to see that maximum allowances are inserted all over the place. If you figure out these maxima it does not add up to very many homes.

People are going to condemn the government for its unwillingness to recognize housing as a serious national problem and for failing to recognize that housing must have priority on the investment funds that are available within the nation.

Mr. B. R. Leboe (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate, I am not going to dwell on a lot of political theories nor take up the time of the house in that way. It seems we sometimes find that people think that the press gallery is fertile ground for the dissemination of political speeches. I believe the place for that is out on the hustings.

I am going to speak to you tonight for only a few minutes. I am not going to bring in a lot of figures which go in one ear and out the other and that do not mean too much. I know that the minister has access to far more statistics than most of us. It just depends upon the willingness of the government to use these statistics, so I feel there is no point in putting forth a lot of figures at this time.

There is one point I should like to bring to the attention of hon. members, and I imagine there are quite a few who will agree with me. I believe that in considering this housing bill we should pay more attention to the man with a large family. It is a well recognized fact that the larger the family the larger the house, and the larger the house the more expensive it is to build. The man who has a large family naturally has greater responsibilities in rearing those children, and I believe therefore some consideration should be given to providing these large families with an opportunity to obtain a house equal to that given to the smaller family.

The thought I have in mind is that the down payment should never exceed 10 per cent because it is going to work a hardship on the individual who has a large family. Naturally, the individual with a larger family has something else to contend with that is greater than a person with a small family. I mean that the dining room table needs more plates around it; there need to be more beds in the house and there need to be more facilities all the way through. Speaking seriously, it is easily seen that a hardship is being worked on the individual who has the greatest responsibilities. I do not think the principle is right. Before I am through someone is going to realize that I have a large family.

I was a little bit concerned, Mr. Speaker, over a press report appearing in the Montreal Gazette. I have not a copy of it with me, but I do not intend to quote from it. The press report dealt with the centralization of housing in the city of Montreal. I would certainly be disturbed if I thought our housing policy were going to have that effect. I feel that facing the possibility of a war, and we cannot say that we are not when we think of the budget that is going to be brought down, if we are going to bring our families together in centralized places we are only going to make them that much more vulnerable to attack. Coming from a rural area as I do, I would say that much consideration should be given to the possibility of allowing lumbering and mining concerns to borrow money to supply the housing needs of their employees.

One of the previous speakers mentioned these shack towns. It is those towns that I am thinking about now. We should encourage better housing in such places. Such mortgages would not cause us concern because these people are working in primary industries. It is in the primary industries that the individual is closest to the payroll. I say again, let us decentralize our housing and get more development out in the rural areas.

In closing I should like to leave this thought with you. There has been a lot of stress put on the fear of the individual who has a house with a mortgage. If the individual is able to get into the house, his only fear then should be about meeting the payments. I should like to see a provision in the bill that would make it possible for a married man with one child who moved into a small house to be able to enlarge or extend that house at a later date. If the individual happened to have a larger family and be unable to meet the payments, he should be allowed to recapitalize and bring down the payments within his reach. I should like to emphasize the fact that the rural areas have not had proper consideration in connection with housing, and coming from a rural area I can speak authoritatively on that subject.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): It is my understanding, Mr. Speaker, that the principle behind this bill is to facilitate the construction of many badly needed homes throughout the Dominion of Canada. Bearing this principle in mind, it is to be hoped that there are no inherent snags in the legislation or any extraneous factors outside the legislation which may in any way frustrate the purpose of the bill. It is my submission that there are such extraneous factors, and also certain inherent snags which may very well frustrate the purpose of the bill.

It is to be hoped if there are many new homes constructed throughout the country as a result of this legislation, those houses which are built, and which I understand are to be under the auspices of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, are different in one respect at least from the houses that have been built in the last few years under the blessing of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the Veterans Land Act. The reason I say that is that the houses that have been built have had a monotonous regularity to them. One can go down row upon row of identical houses in these housing developments, identical even to the last daub of paint. I believe these houses will remain a blight on the landscape of our country for many years to come. We shall not get rid of them very easily.

We rather hope that if this legislation is enacted this situation will not occur again. These boxes which go under the name of houses are of such bad design and architecture that no one would really want them except in case of dire necessity or if they were offered so cheaply that a person would be foolish not to take them. I should like to draw to the attention of hon. members that most of the houses which have been built under the guidance of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation or the Veterans Land Act are exceedingly expensive. In fact they are far too expensive for people in the low and medium income brackets for whom they are designed.

In addition to that, the designs of these houses, both interior and exterior, leave very much to be desired. There is little doubt but that the reason for the construction of these rows of identical houses has been the result of several factors. Houses of this type allow no room for individuality, which is something most of us look for in this country of ours. This sameness of the houses cannot help but have a levelling down effect on the people who live in them. There is a danger that the new legislation may be frustrated for the following reasons, which are outside the legislation itself. The first of these would be restrictions placed on local building codes. Local building codes have been built up over the years, and are the result of experience. They have been growing up, and they are full of old-fashioned methods and old-fashioned standards. They take into consideration not at all the fact that new types of building materials, new methods of building and new types of architecture, which have been the result of the advancement of modern science, are now available.

As hon. members know, many of these building codes grew up in the thirties, in the depression days. A great many of the restrictions were put in municipal building codes in order to create jobs. These have not been removed and they do not help to improve the housing situation at the present time.

In addition I think it might be safe to say that a great many of these Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation regulations are based on these local building codes, and suffer from some of the same deficiencies. Insufficient attention has been paid to modern advances. The younger people are making attempts to remedy this. I think the present minister should look into the possibility of making arrangements with many of the provincial governments with a view to seeing that these local building codes are altered so that new types of design in housing can be used.

So much for local building codes which may help to frustrate this bill, and so much for the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation regulations which, I submit, are not helpful, either. But is it necessary to build row upon row of identical houses at a high cost? Is that an excuse for the present situation? We know that people have to have places in which to live, whether they are attractive or unattractive. But I cannot see any reason why buildings should be built in this way. I believe, indeed, that houses could be built at costs lower than the present ones, and in addition to being built at a lower cost they would have several advantages over the present row-on-row boxes. First of all the houses could be individual in style. Then, they could be of better construction and, third, the interior design could be of much greater utility and beauty than the existing houses being constructed today under Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

These advantages, in addition to lower costs, could be effected by means of modern design and the use of modern materials which, while apparently the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will not approve, all sorts of private industry and individuals, both here and in other countries, including the United States and the United Kingdom, have been constructing for some years.

I have some information in this regard from Grant Whatmough who, for the information of hon. members, is a young Canadian in his thirties and spent some years in England. He has the following qualifications: He was the chief experimental designer for the British admiralty between 1946 and 1948. He was a member of the council for industrial design in Great Britain in 1948. He was assistant chief consultant to the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario in 1948 and 1949. He has designed over $100 million worth of construction in the United Kingdom, and in the last 19 months in this country designed and supervised the erection of $15 million worth of buildings in the Toronto area. These buildings include the new factory of the International Business Machines Company, as well as those of the Lennox Furnace Company, the Allanson Armature company, and many others.

I think hon. members and the house would agree that Mr. Whatmough's qualifications are very considerable, and that he has obviously some idea of what he is talking about. Mr. Whatmough has designed a number of homes which are very individual and very attractive. They contain four bedrooms, a bathroom, a large living room, a dining room, a utility room and a garage.

These houses, all containing this number of rooms, are of different designs and are not the identical box-like structures one sees today. They are the type of design and construction that Mr. Whatmough has utilized in the building of the many factories and other buildings he has designed, and the construction of which he has supervised. These houses can be built for $10,000—that is $8,000 for the house and $2,000 for the land. That price has been laid down by the J. R. Page company which, I understand, is one of the largest contractors in the city of Toronto. The Page company has given a specific contract price on these houses of this design.

Houses of similar area, but of much inferior quality and with a box-like appearance, sell at present for $15,500 to $16,500, and houses of design similar to the ones designed by Mr. Whatmough are of a custom-built nature and cost around $25,000.

I believe it is worth pointing out at this juncture that houses now being built with the approval of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation are of such an unattractive design that at the end of five years it has been estimated by many reliable authorities that they would probably sell in the open market for about 20 per cent less than the amount of the mortgage still existing on each house. This can hardly be described as a satisfactory or economic state of affairs.

These suggestions put forward by Mr. Whatmough sound truly incredible; and I understand that a great many of the government agencies and private concerns that have employed him thought his ideas were incredible, too. Those were their thoughts, at least, until they tried them out, and found they were not incredible.

Mr. Whatmough's designs for houses have been examined by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation which, I understand, will have to pass upon any plans for homes which will be built under this proposed legislation; and it is to be hoped that those who have the authority of approving such plans will at least consider the possibility of homes of different and new designs, so that new types of construction can be used.

It is my information that in Ontario plans for any houses constructed under the auspices of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation have to be approved by one Raymond Card, who is the chief architect for the Ontario division of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. This gentleman has absolute authority, which is not appealable, to pass on all designs and plans submitted.

I am informed that Mr. Card came to Canada from England in 1907 and originally set up as an architect. After a brief career in this field he entered the firm of the T. Eaton Company, for which, I am told, he worked as floor manager for some 17 years.* Subsequently Mr. Card became employed by the civil service, and he is now in the position of having the absolute word on the majority of new houses built in Ontario by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

In commenting upon Mr. Whatmough's proposed plans and designs for new homes, Mr. Card indicated that he was not familiar with this type of planning, because it was new to him; and in addition suggested that if houses were too attractive for working people they might develop a taste for an expensive form of living which was not good for them.

It may very well be that Mr. Whatmough's plans and designs for homes to be built at such a low cost are not practicable, although the evidence would indicate that his suggestions were indeed most practicable. But even if they are not, it is a very unfortunate situation that any one person in a large government agency, such as Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, is placed in the position of either approving or disapproving absolutely, without any opportunity of appeal by those who are affected.

What we need in this country is attractive, individual, low-cost houses, and we certainly will never get them if this bill is put forward, and is to be frustrated by local building codes and the bureaucracy of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

All through history we have seen examples of people who have followed this line of thinking: "If it was good enough for grandfather, it is good enough for me." In this young and growing country, with the great changes brought about by modern science, I would hope that this attitude might be put aside, at least so far as this bill is concerned. Because we certainly do need more houses, cheap ones and individual ones.

In conclusion, if the government would enter into some arrangement with the provinces to help modernize local building codes, and could alter the regulations under which Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation houses are built, and could broaden the regulations under which designs are approved, this bill would be a very material help.

On motion of Mr. Nesbitt the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall take third reading of the bill with respect to the Northwest Territories acts; then a continuation of this debate; then the bill standing in the name of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, having to do with the boundary between Ontario and Manitoba, and the Explosives Act; then the bill standing in the name of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, having to do with the national battlefields at Quebec.

It being four minutes aften ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, January 22, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRECEDENCE OF GOVERNMENT BUSINESS ON MONDAYS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Monday, January 25, 1954, and every Monday thereafter to the end of the session, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence over all business except the introduction of bills, questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I say a brief word on this motion. When a motion such as this reaches the order paper, we realize there is no practical point in objecting to it. I should like to ask the government, however, to recall that when we gave up one of the private members' Wednesdays in December, I think it is fair to say there was general agreement that that would be remembered when the time came to take away private members' days. I hope the government will recall that understanding before it moves too quickly to take away private members' Wednesdays.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): I should like to ask a question. When private members' days come along, why is it there are so few members in the house? Why is it that the press takes so little notice of it?

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): I do not believe we can have any particular objection at this time to the motion, although we do want to go on record as supporting the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in his suggestion that Wednesdays be left open a little longer. While I am on my feet, I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that we are interested in this matter of private members' days being cut off. We like to be as accommodating as possible, but I believe in the ordinary course of parliamentary procedure we are beginning to get away from the important fact that members of parliament, no matter where they sit in this house, have equal status. Each of us represents a body of people who perhaps hold a certain body of opinion.

This is one place in the country where all members are equal. Ever since my first session here I have often deplored the differentiation in our phraseology between government and private members. We recognize, of course, that a government is that officiating body which runs the affairs of this country, but in reality a cabinet minister or even the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), who takes his seat in this house, has no more right to that seat than a backbencher. He was elected just the same as any other member. I believe that when members introduce motions, resolutions or bills they should have equal prominence with any other bill. I would suggest, therefore, although I do not suppose my suggestion will meet with any degree of approval for a long time, that private members' days should be lengthened and strengthened. They should be strengthened in the sense that any motion, resolution or bill placed on the order paper by a private member should eventually reach a place where it is voted upon. If the house votes in agreement with it, it should be the responsibility of the government to carry it through.

While we are not going to seriously object to the motion at this time, those are my sentiments at least.

Motion agreed to.

TRADE MARKS ACT

INQUIRY AS TO BRINGING MEASURE INTO FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Secretary of State when the government proposes to bring into effect the Trade Marks Act, which was adopted at the last session of parliament.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): No decision has been made as yet. The officials of my department are still engaged in drafting the rather complicated regulations. I am informed that when they have been drafted and approved by council they will propose that a proclamation be issued bringing the act into force at some later date. In this way there would be plenty of time for members of the bar, and other interested parties, to familiarize themselves with the new regulations before they come into operation.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—INQUIRY AS TO SYSTEM-WIDE LAY-OFFS—WINNIPEG WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to ask a question of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Transport. When he draws to the attention of his minister the question that was put to him yesterday by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) respecting anticipated lay-offs by the Canadian National Railways, will he ask him to give special consideration to the extent to which those lay-offs will affect the workers at Winnipeg, where I understand the largest single group, in the total number of lay-offs, will lose their jobs.

Mr. L. Langlois (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Transport): I shall be pleased to bring to the attention of the minister the representations just made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

While I am on my feet I wish to answer the question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) and which was at that time taken as a notice. His question had reference to these lay-offs by the Canadian National Railways. I have looked into this matter and I am told by the management of the railway company that railway traffic has been declining, and that consequently staff adjustments will have to be made according to actual requirements. It is hoped however that traffic levels will soon be restored to the point where the railway company will again require the services of those who may be laid off to meet the current situation.

Mr. Green: May I ask the parliamentary assistant what number are to be laid off.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): I have no official confirmation from the management with respect to that; but I have learned from other sources that the number is, as I understand it, about 800 for the country as a whole.

Mr. Knowles: And 262 of them will be at Winnipeg.

Mr. Green: Has not the department any method of avoiding such heavy lay-offs?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): Unfortunately, no.

GRAIN

DELIVERIES UNDER QUOTAS—REQUEST FOR INCREASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I have not given notice, because a request for this information just reached me by letter a few minutes ago. The question is this: Is the minister in a position to advise the extent to which present quotas at wheat delivery points have been exhausted? What is the probability, particularly in those areas where the acreage is small, of having a further increase of the wheat quota to eight or ten bushels to the acre?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the delivery quota on oats was increased yesterday by a further six bushels per acre seeded to oats. I have no information as to the progress in the deliveries of the general two-bushel quota. However, I shall be glad to make inquiries. I should think however that it would be some time before that particular quota could be increased.

If my memory serves me correctly, the minimum quota for the small producers was increased when the two-bushel quota was announced. I do not remember the exact figure, but I think the minimum is at least 1,000 bushels at the moment. Anyone can deliver 1,000 bushels of any grain. I believe that is the situation, but I shall be glad to make a check and give a statement later.

HARBOURS

REQUEST FOR FIRE BOAT AT SAINT JOHN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) or his assistant. In view of the recent serious waterfront fire in Saint John last Wednesday, January 20, has the government, through the national harbours board, or any other of its agencies, considered providing or assisting in the provision of a fire boat for Saint John harbour?

Mr. L. Langlois (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Transport): I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. Apparently the hon. member has reference to the fire which broke out on board the S.S. Mont Gaspe shortly before midnight on January 19, while the ship was docked at pier No. 7 on the west side of Saint John harbour.

This fire, which apparently was caused by a short circuit in the radio equipment, was confined to the chart room and the bridge of the ship, and did not spread to the property of the national harbours board. Since fire protection is a municipal responsibility, no fire-fighting boat is at present being considered for either the harbour at Saint John or any other harbour in Canada.

Mr. Bell: May I ask a supplementary question. Does not the national harbours board, or the government, provide a subsidy for a fire boat at Vancouver, and also allow the navy to provide a fire boat at the port of Halifax?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): It is true that the national harbours board is paying a subvention of $25,000, I believe, to the municipal authorities in Vancouver to assist them in operating the fire-fighting tug which was built there by the city. So far as Halifax is concerned, during the war the navy had two fire tugs at that point. Some years ago one of them was sent to St. John's, Newfoundland, and the other is still being operated in Halifax, but strictly by and for the use of the navy. There is no other government-owned fire boat in operation in any other harbour in Canada.

WHEAT

QUESTION AS TO FINAL PAYMENT FOR 1952-53 CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is he able to add anything to his reply to my question on January 12, as to when final payments for wheat might be made, and to say whether the wheat board accounts for 1952-53 have yet been closed, as a first step toward making final payments?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): No, the accounts have not been closed. There has been some discussion between the wheat board and my officers. The position, of course, is that the last crop of wheat is not sold in total. It is hoped that the wheat accounts can be closed early in February, and final payment made. I expect to be in Winnipeg early in the month, and at that time we will try to arrive at a decision.

Mr. Argue: Would that mean that final payments might be out at the end of February, or in March?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes, certainly not later than that.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING ELECTIONS, APPOINTMENTS TO COUNCIL, ETC.

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources) moved the third reading of Bill No. 77, to amend the acts respecting the Northwest Territories.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

SUBSTITUTION OF NEW LEGISLATION TO INSURE APPROVED LENDERS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Thursday, January 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Winters for the second reading of Bill No. 102, to promote the construction of new houses, the repair and modernization of existing houses, and the improvement of housing and living conditions.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have just a few remarks to add to what I said last night. They are as follows. In view of the tremendously high cost of building at the present time, and if this legislation is to succeed in providing low-cost housing for people of low and medium incomes, I should like to suggest that the minister might consider setting up a research department in Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to look into the possibility of finding new types of architecture and revising the present regulations of the corporation in order that new and more advanced methods may be employed in the building of houses with which the corporation is concerned, thus possibly allowing houses to be built at a lower cost.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, some of us feel that the real test of the new housing legislation now before parliament is as to whether or not it will help people to get homes who would not otherwise get them. It is our contention that the housing legislation we have had thus far has failed to meet that test. Houses have been built under the National Housing Act. There is no denying that fact. But they have been built mainly for people who would have been able to build or obtain homes anyway. They have been helped to get new homes a little earlier than would otherwise be the case, but the old National Housing Act has not helped people who were not able to help themselves.

It is our belief that the new legislation now before parliament offers little or no improvement on that score. Again, there is no question but that houses will be built under the new housing act and the minister will be able to bring figures before the house from time to time indicating that large numbers of homes have been built under this legislation. But it is our contention from a study of the act that there is no change in respect to the basic weakness to which I have already drawn attention. It is still the case that the assistance provided under this legislation will be mainly for those who would get homes or have them built anyway. It so happened that while I was at home in Winnipeg during the Christmas recess I discussed the government's housing legislation with some gentlemen whom I think it would be fair to describe as hard-headed real estate men. They are men whose support of the C.C.F. is doubtful. I imagine they support other parties than ours. Nevertheless they said to me in very clear terms, two real estate men in particular, that in their view the national housing legislation helped only those who would be able to get homes anyway. They pointed out to me that they are collecting rents from a great many people occupying rented houses in cases where the rents are greatly in excess of the monthly payments being made by some people who are buying their own homes. They pointed out to me that the new legislation will not enable those people to become home owners any more than the previous legislation did.

That, Mr. Speaker, is our chief complaint against this legislation. We have already pointed out with respect to the previous housing act that it seemed to be legislation largely designed to guarantee the position of money lenders. We contend that that criticism must be levelled against this new legislation as well. Indeed, as my colleague, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy), pointed out yesterday, it goes one step further in taking the alleged risk out of private enterprise which is supposed to be the justification for private enterprise making a profit out of such a matter as housing. As I say, those are our two main criticisms of this legislation. Those are the two main points on which it falls down. In our view it is legislation that takes the risk out of private enterprise, that underwrites and guarantees the position of the money lender, and, on the other hand, though it helps to get houses built, it helps to get them built for people who would get homes anyway.

Having made that main charge against this legislation, namely, that it will not help the people who really need help, may I indicate, even at the risk of repeating some of the points made by colleagues of mine who spoke yesterday, that in my view there are three main stumbling blocks in the government housing legislation which are the cause for it not being of any help to the little people, the people who need help.

[Mr. Knowles.]

The first stumbling block is the high interest rate. We do not know for sure just what that interest rate is going to be after this bill has been passed, but it would appear from what the minister said yesterday as though the figure would probably be 5¾ per cent. He said yesterday that 5 per cent would be a very nice rate from the borrower's point of view but that he doubted whether money would be available at that rate. On the other hand, he characterized 6 per cent as too high. He pointed out that life insurance companies have been putting their portion of money into joint loans at the rate of 5¾ per cent, so I deduce from all this that what is up the government's sleeve is a proposal of a 5¾ per cent interest rate. That is one of the main contributing factors to the high cost of home ownership. Whether you talk about homes of moderate total cost, whether you talk about homes in the bracket the minister was speaking about yesterday when he gave examples involving monthly payments in the $50 range, or whether you talk about homes of a little better quality, right down the line one of the main factors in a high monthly payment, one of the main factors in it taking 25 to 30 years to pay off a mortgage, is the high interest rate.

We of the C.C.F. contend that the government has not faced up to the seriousness of the housing problem, has not recognized it as the social responsibility it is, until it takes steps to bring down the interest rate, and we suggest that it should be reduced to 2 per cent. The hon. member for York South yesterday suggested a couple of ways in which that might be done. One way would be to use money from the Bank of Canada. Another way would be for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to lend money directly for home building and for the government, if necessary, to subsidize the interest rate so as to bring it down to 2 per cent.

There may be other ways, but the point we are making is that the challenge is facing the government, if it claims to be interested in housing, if it claims to be really concerned about housing as a social responsibility, to find some way to bring the interest rate down so that the cost of a home for the average Canadian can be brought within the means and capacity of the average Canadian. It is no use prating about the large number of homes that have been built by people who can afford them. It is no use the Liberals getting up enthusiastically and patting the government on the back for bringing in a new housing act unless they are prepared to take this basic step of finding a way to bring down the interest rate so it will be possible for people of average means, of average financial capacity, to own their own homes.

The second barrier to ordinary people being able to take any advantage of housing legislation is the question of the down payment. Of course we welcome the fact that the amount of the down payment is being reduced by the terms of this legislation, but, as the hon. member for York South pointed out yesterday, we feel that the 90 per cent loan provision should apply higher than the government proposes, that it should apply on a value of $12,000 which would bring the loan on such a house up to $10,800.

Not until something has been done to make it possible for people of ordinary average income to get started on the purchase of a home can it be said that the government or the country is really fostering on a widespread scale the idea of home ownership. I shall come later to something that I want to say about rental housing and the need for a government program that will actually provide low-rental housing, but at the moment I am talking about the home ownership aspect of a national housing policy.

With respect to the question of the down payment, I suggest to the government that it need not do any boasting about having reduced the down payment under a certain point to 10 per cent as though that was the last word in down payment legislation. I would call the attention of the government to the fact that President Eisenhower's committee of advisers on housing made a report to the President of the United States on December 15 last. That report contained quite a striking suggestion with regard to the ways and means of helping to provide housing for low income families. I have in my hand a copy of the supplement to House and Home for January, 1954, which contains comments on the report prepared by the President's committee and also the text of the recommendations. One of those recommendations contains this suggestion:

> For an experimental period of two years, the federal housing administration should be authorized to insure 40-year, 100 per cent loans up to $7,600 per dwelling unit or up to $8,600 per dwelling unit in high-cost areas as determined by the federal housing commissioner. This special mortgage insurance program, proposed as a new section 221 of the National Housing Act, is designed to meet the housing requirements of low-income families as determined by the federal housing commissioner. Purchasers under this program should be required to make a minimum cash payment of $200 including amounts to cover settlement costs and initial payments for taxes, hazard insurance and similar prepaid expenses.

In other words, there is in that recommendation the proposal for some cash down but only for the purposes indicated. So far as the basic purchase of a home is concerned, the recommendation by President Eisenhower's advisers is that under certain conditions there be a 40-year mortgage and no down payment. So I submit that we have not seen the last word in this kind of legislation, that the government is not fostering seriously and earnestly the idea of widespread ownership of homes by the Canadian people.

A few moments ago I said that in my view there were three stumbling blocks to this legislation being of any use to ordinary people, to people with average incomes.

In my view the third stumbling block is the amount or percentage of income required under this legislation before one can qualify for a National Housing Act loan. I said earlier in my remarks that I had discussed this question with hard-headed real estate men in my city during the Christmas recess. I repeat what I said a few moments ago, that two of them told me that their firms were collecting high rents of from $70 to $80 per month, and more, from people who they knew could not afford to pay those rents. But in the light of the government's legislation those same people were told that they could not afford to buy a home under the National Housing Act and pay $55 or $60 per month on the purchase of such homes. Surely that is ridiculous. These hard-headed real estate men in Winnipeg say that neither the former legislation nor the new legislation will help those people.

I have been under the impression for a long time that what my real estate friends told me was correct, but I decided—as a matter of fact I did this only an hour or so ago—to check with the dominion bureau of statistics to see if they had any figures on this question. I found that they had. I found that there will be a booklet or monograph on housing put out in a month or so which will contain many interesting figures on housing in general and on the rental of homes in particular. The officials of the dominion bureau of statistics were able to give me figures over the telephone which substantiated the point I have been making, namely, that there are a great many people in this country paying rents which are higher than what might be considered an appropriate monthly figure for the purchase of a home.

For example, I find that according to the returns of the 1951 census there were 257,225 heads of households in Canada paying rents of $50 per month or more, and there were 162,885 paying rents of $60 a month or more. The first figure represents 23·1 per cent of all renters, the second figure, 14·6 per cent. I sought the figure for my own city of Winnipeg and found that in 1951, 9,360 heads of households were paying rents of $50 a month or more, being 30·8 per cent of all renters in Winnipeg, and that 5,285 of them, or 17·4 per cent of the total, were paying rents of $60 per month or more.

Those are the figures for 1951 when the last census was taken, but the dominion bureau of statistics made another survey under date of September, 1953, from which we discover that the situation is getting worse. Unfortunately for my purposes the bureau does not have the 1953 figures for the city of Winnipeg, but it does have figures comparable to those which I just gave for 1951 for the whole of Canada and they also have them for Manitoba as a whole, both for 1951 and 1953. When those figures are studied the picture becomes quite clear.

For example, in September, 1953, for Canada as a whole the number of heads of households paying rents of $50 a month or more had gone up from 257,225 to 391,000, and the percentage had risen from 23·1 per cent to 32·9 per cent. The number of those paying rents of $60 a month or more had gone up from 162,885 to 272,000, with a percentage increase from 14·6 per cent to 22·9 per cent.

In the case of Manitoba, those paying rents of $50 per month or more stood at 12,235 in 1951 or 23·3 per cent of the total, and that figure had gone up to 17,000 or 27·7 per cent of the total by September, 1953.

In the case of Manitoba those paying $60 a month or more stood at 6,970 in 1951 or a percentage of 13·3 per cent. That figure went up to 11,000 in September, 1953, or a percentage of 18 per cent. As I said before, there are no figures as yet for Winnipeg for September, 1953, but by looking at the increases that have taken place over Canada as a whole and the increases that took place for Manitoba as a whole it is safe to assume that in the case of Winnipeg as at September, 1953, 34 or 35 per cent of the heads of households paying rent were paying $50 a month or more and 20 to 21 per cent were paying rents of $60 per month or more.

I would be the first to admit that some of these people paying these high rents are doing so by choice and for one reason or another do not wish to own their own homes. But there is no doubt in my mind, and my real estate friends back home agree with me, that great numbers of these people paying these high rents would rather be purchasing homes at monthly figures similar to the examples given to the minister yesterday.

Yesterday the minister gave examples to underline the virtues of this legislation, as he sees it, and most of the examples he gave were in the $50 bracket. But I suggest it is ridiculous that we should have legislation which provides for the purchase of a home at monthly payments in the $50 bracket while its provisions are not available to many persons who are having to pay $60, $70, $80, $90 and $100 a month rent. It is surely adding insult to injury to tell these people who are having to pay rents as high as $80 and $90 a month or more that their income is not sufficient to make it possible for them to undertake the ownership of a home at monthly payments of between $50 and $60 a month.

These three stumbling blocks in this legislation which I have presented are in my view stumbling blocks which stand in the way of this legislation being of any help to the average person, let alone to little people, in the matter of home purchasing. I would strongly urge that consideration be given by the committee that will deal with this legislation to these three stumbling blocks. Three things that must be done are: First, bring down the rate of interest; second, bring down the amount of the down payment and even consider in the case of moderate priced homes for low income families the suggestion made by President Eisenhower's committee of a program involving no down payment; and finally, reduce the amount of income one is required to have in order to become a home owner, so that we do not have the ridiculous situation whereby people paying $80 a month rent are being told they cannot afford to pay for a home at $50 or $55 per month.

I have one or two other suggestions to make as to the shortcomings in this legislation. It seems to me the time has come in this country to consider the principle of open-end mortgages whereby people who have bought homes can get additional money on a mortgage later on after it has been reduced at the same terms that originally applied for the purpose of home improvements or other necessary purchases.

Similarly, I think consideration should be given to the problem of major appliances. In a modern home the heating plant is considered to be a part of that home in this country, but the day has come when an electric stove and a refrigerator are also part of the equipment of a modern home. Many a family that is otherwise able to take on the obligations of purchasing a home under the National Housing Act finds itself strapped because it has not the money to get started with a stove, refrigerator and the other major items that are necessary at the beginning. It is possible for builders to purchase some of these articles of equipment wholesale or in large lots and get them at less than the retail price, and it seems to me that provision should be made for including some of these articles in the purchase price of a home, and that lending arrangements made in connection with that purchase price should include these essential articles.

Not until consideration is given to matters such as these, which affect ordinary people who desire home ownership, is there room for all the boasting and prating we have had in the house, particularly from the other side.

There are still other shortcomings in the government's proposals. The minister was proud of the fact that he is lengthening the amortization period, and we are glad he is doing so. I took occasion to point out during the election campaign last summer the manner in which the government seemed to be stealing parts of our housing platform. We had, in the main, adopted three points: first, the lowering of the down payment; second, the lengthening of the amortization period; and third, lowering of the interest rates. Reports were leaking out during the election campaign to the effect that the government was going to do something about lowering down payments and about lengthening the amortization period. The only complaint I had about that type of thieving, that stealing of our planks, was that the government did not steal all three of our points and decrease the interest rate as well. As someone is saying behind me, they failed to steal the most important plank in our platform.

But what I intended to say on this point was that any pride the minister has in the fact he has lengthened the amortization period is, I believe, washed out by the type of figure he was yesterday put in the position of having to give to the house. He pointed out that under the present rate of interest on joint loans of 5¼ per cent the lengthening of the amortization period to 25 years is going to save the borrower or home purchaser 73 cents per month per $1,000. That is before the rate of interest goes up from 5¼ per cent to 5¾ per cent or whatever the increase might be. It appears to me that the increased rate of interest and the increased cost of homes is going to wash out for most people any advantage that accrues from the lengthening of the amortization period so far as monthly payments are concerned.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if that is the case, and if the anticipated advantages of the government's own legislation are going to be washed out by the increased rate of interest and the increase in the cost of homes, it is high time the whole proposal was further reviewed.

I need not take much time on one or two other points which have been adequately covered by my colleagues who have already spoken, but I would like to say in passing that we in this group deplore the way in which the government is moving in respect to the provision of money for homes. For some time now we have had part I of the National Housing Act, and we have had joint loans with government money being put in along with the money of the life insurance companies or the lending institutions. That is now being taken away. In other words we are having a retreat from the idea of joint loans into a situation where private enterprise, private lending institutions, are to take over, for all practical purposes, the whole field, at least so far as individual homes are concerned. I noted with some interest that even the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), despite the fact that the Tory party declared at the start of this session that they were going to be more ardent advocates of private enterprise than in the past, also deplored the retreat of the government from the principle of joint loans.

Whatever thinking may be going on in the mind of the hon. member for Eglinton, at any rate we greatly dislike the idea of moving in that direction.

Comments have already been made by members of our group as to the idea of making use of the banks. If the government wishes to have the banks used in that way, we see no serious objection; but we point out that in effect that is giving over to private enterprise the whole field of lending for houses without any suggestion of the kind of interest rates that would make housing possible for average and middle income people. This is simply a denial on the part of the Canadian government of social responsibility in the field of housing.

We feel the same way about this business of insuring mortgages. Again the borrower is being asked to pay the shot. The borrower is having a sum added to what he must pay. Is it for his own protection? No; it is to protect the money lender against default, either by the borrower in case there is something in his own experience over which he has no control or in case there is a depression and the value of homes goes down to the point that it is less than the amount that would still be owing on a mortgage. In other words, out of this legislation the banks are getting not only a new field for investment, underwritten, guaranteed and protected at public expense, but as well they are getting insurance against a depression, to be paid for by the people who purchase these homes. Mr. Speaker, with respect to the National Housing Act as we had it before, we have said time and time again that it was not an act to get homes built for people who needed them but was primarily an act to help out the lending institutions. The leopard has not changed its spots. This legislation is just like the legislation we had before. The banks have been substituted for the insurance companies in actual practice, but it is still legislation which helps people get homes if they could have got them anyway, and it makes things bright and rosy for the banks, which are the major lending institutions under this new legislation.

The other major fault with this legislation, in our view, is that it makes no improvement in the section having to do with low-rental housing. As I have already said, we feel strongly that every encouragement should be given in this country to the idea of home ownership. I hope I have made my points in connection with that matter as strongly as possible, having regard to the importance we attach to them. But it is still true that there are many people whose occupations require them to move around. It is still true that there is needed a great deal of rental housing in this country. Most of the people who require rental housing are in average or below average income brackets. My friend the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Trainor) is interjecting to say that I have already suggested that there is too much of rental housing. That is perfectly true. I thought I had made it clear just now that our first choice is that there should be home ownership and that we want to encourage the possibility of home ownership for middle, average and even lower than average income people. But there are those whose jobs are such that they cannot be sure they will stay in one place for any extended period of time and for whom rental housing seems to be the only solution. It so happens that most of those people are also the people whose incomes are in the middle or lower than middle brackets, and the only possible solution for them is a low-rental housing program with an element of subsidy in it, to make possible decent housing for them.

I know that some of the private enterprisers in this house—and the place is full of them—who listen to what I am saying will be thinking, in their own minds, that these people over here in the C.C.F. group want public money to go into housing in the form of a subsidy; and that is something which is anathema, as I say, to many of the private enterprisers in this house. But we take the position that you mark a society's progress by the extent to which it accepts social responsibility for those things which are vital to the life and the well-being of its people. In our view housing is just as important as are education, roads and many other services which we have agreed are a public and social responsibility rather than an individual matter. With all that is in us we deplore the idea that some children are born into this world, in this country of ours, to live in poor, inadequate slum homes whereas other children, who are equally Canadians, are born to enjoy better housing. Just as we have accepted the principle that every child in this country is entitled to the best education the country can provide, we say that the time has come when every child born in this country is entitled to be born into and to live in a good home. We know of no way in which public money could be better spent than by channelling it into ways that will provide for better homes for our children. In our view, Mr. Speaker, the legislation now before us is woefully inadequate. It does not meet the tests which housing legislation in 1954 should meet for the Canadian people.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take advantage of this opportunity to say a few words with regard to housing. It is not often that I have had the opportunity of congratulating the minister. I looked through this bill carefully to see if there was not, somewhere in it, something on which I would be able to congratulate the minister, and I found one. I should not say that I found it in the bill, Mr. Speaker; I found it in the minister's quotations when he was speaking. The thing on which I think I should congratulate the minister on this occasion is that at last he has recognized the need for further development in our housing so that those people with small incomes will be able to become possessors of homes. I also think he is right in taking the view that something should be done in the field of credit expansion so that our national resource of homes may be developed without undue interference with the industrial development of this country because, in my judgment, there is room for both developments. The view is prevalent that there is a need for credit expansion in this country. If that expansion is necessary for developing more homes, then it should be provided for. I do not think that we have reached the period in our development when industrial development either has expanded to the extent that it should reach. I think the two can run along hand in hand.

After having congratulated the minister in that respect, Mr. Speaker, may I speak for a moment about the need for homes; and in this view I think the minister and I are in accord. There is a great need in Canada for homes for those people in the low income groups. Like my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I am more concerned with those people in the low-income groups than I am with those people who have a sufficiently large income to build houses of their own or to take advantage of the housing legislation as it existed in the past. In the early part of this session and in the last session I have said that people with sufficient income have no difficulty in procuring houses under the National Housing Act. Those people whose incomes are not sufficiently high to meet the requirements of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for loans are the ones who are in need of assistance.

The dominion bureau of statistics has stated that 75 per cent of the people of Canada earn less than $3,000 per year. This is an extremely low income to apply to 75 per cent of our population. If that is true, then I think I am safe in saying that about 50 per cent of our people earn less than $1,500 per year. How are people in that financial category going to be able to take advantage of the legislation as it existed last year or as it will exist under Bill No. 102? It just cannot be done.

In his speech the other day the minister stated that on a $10,000 house with a lending value of $8,000, the down payment would be $1,400. I say that if the statement of the dominion bureau of statistics is true, then only 50 per cent of the people in Canada can take advantage of that.

Mr. McIlraith: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Yes.

Mr. McIlraith: The hon. member is using the particular statistic put out by the dominion bureau of statistics as an indication that 75 per cent of the persons available for work in Canada get less than $3,000 per year. The statistic does not say that at all.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I was not referring to the unemployed at all. The hon. member is referring to people who are not available for work.

Mr. McIlraith: No; the statistic you are using includes in it all persons who earned money at any time during the year. For instance, students are included in it if they worked any part of the year.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I think that is a minor consideration because if you take the students out of it entirely the position is practically the same.

Mr. McIlraith: No, it is not.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Let us take the general, over-all picture. I am not going to argue with the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) whether their income is down or up $100. The over-all picture is the same, and that is as the dominion bureau of statistics states it.

Mr. McIlraith: That is my point: it is as the dominion bureau of statistics states it and not as the hon. member states it.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I shall let you argue that with the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters). When the minister was speaking not long ago to the appraisal institute of Canada, he made this statement. The hon. member can argue this with him. The statement appears in a press dispatch of Thursday, April 2, 1953:

> Mr. Winters said that not more than one-third of Canada's families could afford new houses—either to rent or to own.

Do you agree with that statement? The hon. member for Ottawa West makes no reply.

An hon. Member: He makes no reply because he knows the bureau of statistics statement, but not the other one.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I do not want to get the hon. member into an argument with the Minister of Public Works because I think the minister would wipe the floor with him. I agree with the minister. Then, he goes on to say:

> But if enough new houses were not found, he stated, it would affect the people at the bottom of the scale—people who were living in dilapidated and obsolescent houses.

That bears out almost word for word what the dominion bureau of statistics has said, so I take it that what the minister has said is quite correct.

Mr. McIlraith: It is.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Then, you have changed your mind in the last few seconds.

Mr. McIlraith: No, I have not. I was just trying to point out to the hon. member, as I am sure he wishes me to do, that he was not using the dominion bureau of statistics statement exactly as it was put out. If he will just read the item as it was put out, and put it on the record that way, we will be in complete agreement.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): The hon. member can put any interpretation on it he likes, but the dominion bureau of statistics statement still stands as it is.

Mr. Noseworthy: Get some houses for Ottawa instead of patting the government on the back.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): A while ago I congratulated the minister when I said I thought he recognized the problem in this country by stating that two-thirds of our families are just not in a financial position to own or rent homes. Then, let us do something about it. Perhaps the minister is in hope, I am sure he is, that this new bill will take care of that problem. I am afraid he is going to be disappointed.

When the minister was speaking the other day he indicated the number of new houses that had been built year by year. When he was speaking on December 16, I think the figures were different slightly from those in his last speech, but not materially. He said that starts in 1950 were 95,000; 1951, 74,000; 1952, 84,000. At that time, he did not have the estimates for 1953, but I think it is about 100,000. He hopes in 1954—I think I am correct in this and I am sure he will correct me if I am wrong—there will be about 105,000 new starts.

Mr. Winters: I made no prediction, Mr. Speaker. I said there were about 105,000 starts in 1953.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Then, the minister is not sure what this new legislation is going to do.

Mr. Goode: You are not, either.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): No, I am not. The only thing I am sure about is that it is not going to be any better. It probably is not going to meet the expectations of the Minister of Public Works, but it may meet your expectations. I do not know what they are. I have not heard you express them. You should get up and speak on this subject.

Mr. Goode: I will.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Then, the people of Vancouver will know you are here.

Mr. Goode: Do not mention Vancouver, say Burnaby.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Where is that? In the past I have been somewhat critical of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, but not of the individuals concerned. As I have said, it is too big a job, it is too scattered for any centralized organization in Ottawa. I have suggested a plan, and I shall repeat it later, how that can be overcome.

One of the great faults I have found with the government-built homes has been the inspection. I believe that is where the whole plan falls down. I am not blaming particular individuals in the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Probably they try to do the best they can. How is it possible for a central organization in Ottawa to scatter its work all over the Dominion of Canada and expect to have proper home inspection? It just cannot be done, and it never has been done. A few good homes have been built; I am not contradicting that for a moment. It depends entirely on the local contractor. If he is an honest fellow you will get a good house. In the last few years I have seen some good houses built under Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, but I have seen a lot of poor ones. In almost every case it comes down to poor inspection.

I am not going to go over the question of poor inspection again. I have gone over it so thoroughly on many other occasions, I am sure the minister knows exactly what I mean. I believe the federal government should get away from this attempt at trying to build houses. I shall give my alternative proposal later.

Under Bill 102 in which the minister is putting so much hope there are two main provisions. The first is that it is going to widen the group of lending institutions to include the chartered banks and the Quebec savings banks. The second is that it will abandon joint loans and substitute insured loans. Probably the minister hopes that it will result in the chartered banks extending credit—and, to a degree, it will. The minister said certain things about the principle of mortgage insurance, as reported at page 998 of Hansard—and I shall read his words now because I do not wish to misrepresent his views. This is what he said:

> Under the proposed amendments Central Mortgage will have the power to buy insured mortgages from approved lenders.

And later:

> —it is proposed to make insured mortgages eligible security for Bank of Canada advances to chartered banks, as is the present position in respect to government bonds.

In his speech he gave the impression—at least I thought he did—that the people's savings which are deposited in the chartered banks are now going to be used for home building. This cannot be true, because the banks do not lend people's savings directly.

What is going to happen? I said a while ago that this would result in the expansion of credit; and so it will. What is going to happen is that when Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation accepts these insured loans they will be accepted by the chartered banks, and then the chartered banks will use this as eligible security to deposit in the Bank of Canada, where they will be given further credit advances.

When the bank then makes a loan it is an issue of new credit; it is not using the people's savings at all. So the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) when speaking the other day was, I think, quite wrong when he suggested they were going to use the people's savings for this purpose. That will not be done; it is purely a matter of credit expansion.

One of the particular faults I find with this measure is this. If we are going to use the chartered banks for the purpose of credit expansion, why do we not avoid them and use the Bank of Canada for the same purpose? I shall show later on how I think that can be done.

There is in the bill a provision whereby the down payment will be lessened to a degree, and this may be of some assistance. But, as I said a moment ago, 50 per cent of our people receive less than $1,500 a year. According to the minister's own figures, two-thirds of the people of Canada cannot afford either to own or to rent homes.

If we are both correct—and I think we are—that means that the down payment must be brought down to a point much lower than it was under the old legislation. But that is not going to be done. The down payment of 20 per cent is going to be reduced to 10 per cent. It is to be 90 per cent of the first $8,000 and 70 per cent of the balance of the lending value. In other words, on a $10,000 house, on which the lending value is $8,000, the down payment is to be $1,400 where it used to be $2,000.

Of course, that is a fallacy; you cannot build a home for $10,000. Indeed, the minister himself recognizes that and is prepared to raise the $10,000 to $12,500 or possibly $13,000. I think that is a good thing, because you cannot build much of a home for $10,000.

On his own statement the $8,000 loan would require a down payment of $1,400, representing a reduction of $600. How many people in the bracket to which the minister referred, and to which I, too, have been referring, have the $1,400 required for a down payment? If we are going to attempt to improve housing conditions for those people to whom both of us have referred, this legislation cannot possibly do it, without some further adjustment. It just cannot be done.

The income requirements as indicated under the old act are not being changed in this one. There is no change in the 23 per cent relationship between gross income and the monthly payment. That is not being changed; it is being left as it was. And because of that these people are just not going to be able to afford that high monthly payment. In my view that payment is altogether too high.

The bill incorporates the new principle of the single insurance premium on three types of homes, namely home ownership, rentals and conversions. By issuing this insurance premium it is expected by the government that lenders will be more ready to extend loans than they were before. I do not think this will prove to be so. It may result in the chartered banks, which are being brought into the picture, making loans in addition to what was done before. Because of that factor more money will be spent on home building. It will be spent, not by the group in the low income brackets, but by those groups who are in a financial position where they can afford the down payment.

This insurance plan will entail the 2 per cent being capitalized in the mortgage loan. When the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) spoke the other day and referred to the down payment of $1,400 on the $8,000 loan he included 2 per cent of $8,000, which is $160, in the down payment, and the minister nodded his head in agreement. Later on he made a correction and stated that this would not be included in the down payment.

Mr. Winters: On a matter of privilege; I made no sign of agreement at all when the hon. member for Eglinton made that statement.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I thought you did, but I am glad you are clearing that up now. As I understand the act, that amount would be incorporated in the amortization of the loan. So the borrower would not have to pay off that $160 immediately; it would be spread over a number of years. But he still has to pay it.

What advantage is derived from this by the borrower? It is an added cost of $160. What advantage does he get? He does not get any advantage at all.

Mr. Winters: He gets mortgage money.

Mr. Knowles: At a higher price.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): If he had a good bank account of perhaps $5,000 he could get lots of mortgage money. This does not seem to be a square deal. I will give the minister credit for sincerity in what he is doing, but I would point out to him that in this instance we are trying to make houses available to those people in the low income brackets; and yet he adds $160 to that loan, right off the bat. They must pay that much more than they paid before. The only insurance is to the lenders and the banks; there is no insurance for the individual at all except that, as the minister pointed out, he will now get the loan if he can meet other requirements. Of course, the poor fellow cannot do that anyway.

This is a very bad situation. The bill speaks particularly about default. If the borrower is ever in default he loses his equity in the house. Let me read the explanation appearing at page 11 of the bill, opposite section 9.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member should not refer to a particular clause in the bill.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): No, I am not referring to a clause in the bill. It reads:

> This section sets out what will be paid to an approved lender in respect of a loan that has gone into default. Under the section, in order to qualify for payment, the approved lender must secure title to the mortgaged property and convey such title to Central Mortgage.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Will the hon. member not agree with me that he is doing indirectly what he should not do directly?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): You may be right there, Mr. Speaker, because I was reading the explanation on the opposite page.

Mr. Knowles: You will find the same explanation in the minister's speech.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Yes, it was given in the minister's speech, too. But let me summarize it this way. Once a borrower becomes in default, then the lender has no alternative but to foreclose on the loan after it is in arrears for six months. The lender must do that if he is to retain the benefits of the insured loan. He has no alternative. I think that is bad. The minister may recall that on one occasion a couple of years ago I had with me in the house when making a speech a copy of the form of contract signed between Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the home owner. I think they are using the same general contract, but the minister will correct me if I am wrong. In it there is a clause stating that if the borrower falls into default for a period of only one month he loses all his equity in his home. If he has paid every insurance premium and has made every payment with the exception of the last one and then defaults on the last one he loses everything he had.

I tried to get that clause taken out of the contract but the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) got up and said: Oh well, sure it is there, but our mortgage companies would not do a thing like that. He has more faith in them than I have. If they did not intend to use it why was it put in the contract? But here we are incorporating the same thing into the act. Once a home owner is in default the lending company has no alternative, if it wants to keep its business in a sound position, but to foreclose. The man who owned the house has paid a 2 per cent insurance premium, but for what protection?

Another phase of the bill is that the interest rate is going to be raised. That is almost a certainty. Is that lessening the burden on the home owner? Is that making it possible for this two-thirds of the people of Canada to become the possessors of homes? Of course not. We are making it more difficult. The only good feature is that there will be a longer amortization period and the payments may be smaller. I think any businessman will tell you that the ordinary fellow just cannot afford to pay 5 per cent on borrowed money. I know that if you can borrow money from the bank at 5 per cent and make 10 per cent on it that is good business, but the people concerned here are not in that position. They are in the position now where they must pay more interest than they did under the old legislation. Their debt is greater.

I think that possibly some device could have been used to bring about a lower interest rate. The rate is not set by statute. It depends on the governor in council. It is possible that people may be paying more than 5¾ per cent. Before long they may be paying 6 per cent. But it does seem to me that there should be a definite figure in the bill so that members of the house and the people of Canada may know what rate of interest people are going to be required to pay. I know that when the individual will enter into a contract he will know what the rate of interest is because it will have been set by that time for that particular period.

There is one good thing about the bill, the fact that the period of amortization has been lengthened from 20 to 25 years. But I am afraid that the over-all results of the legislation are not going to meet the expectations of the minister. I know it is going to result in the building of some homes. The old legislation had that result, but not for the two-thirds of the families of Canada to whom the minister referred who just cannot afford to own their own homes. They are not going to benefit very much from this legislation.

I said that I would present a plan. I have advanced it before. It is not new but I think this is the time to present it again because the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) accused the government—here I am coming to the government's support again—of stealing some of their proposals. Let me say to the C.C.F. that they are pretty good thieves in that respect. After I had presented our Social Credit proposal last session they came down to the same rate of interest, and this session they have adopted the principle of a revolving fund. I am not criticizing them for doing so. I am glad they have been converted to a sound idea, and I trust that the government will give some consideration to it because the proposal which I intend to make is not something that is new. It is something that has been tried out and has been found to be very satisfactory.

The Social Credit proposal was and is that the federal government should set up a revolving fund. This money should be issued through the Bank of Canada. It is correct to say right off the bat that this would be an expansion of credit, but the minister cannot criticize that because that is exactly what he is doing in amending the Bank of Canada Act to permit chartered banks to expand their credit. Under my proposal the federal government would set up a revolving fund of $300 million, let us say. I do not know how much it would take. That is merely a guess. It might be $500 million, but such an amount would only equal the interest rate on our national debt for one year, so it is not a big sum.

This money would be issued by the Bank of Canada and it should be lent to the municipalities through the provinces. A while ago one of the socialist members suggested that the money should be given directly to borrowers by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I do not think that is the proper way. I think we would get into more difficulty than we are in now. I think we must have the type of set-up where the responsibility of constructing proper homes is going to be narrowed down to a smaller field than the whole of Canada. It should be narrowed down to the municipalities.

I said that this project had been tried and found very satisfactory. The Alberta government set up what they called a self-liquidating fund for the improvement of property through sewage, lighting and water works for municipalities. It lent the money to the municipalities at a rate of 2 per cent, and as the monthly payments were made the money was available to re-lend to other municipalities. The same principle could be used in the case of money lent from a revolving fund for the purpose of building homes. There is no better security, and the money would come back in monthly payments and could be lent again for other projects. When the municipalities received this money they would be in position to set up construction committees which would have the responsibility of seeing that houses were built according to plans and specifications. That is not being done under Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I was told by one of the officials that all the inspectors have to do is to see that a house is built sufficiently strong in order to insure their equity in it. They do not have to see that it is built according to the standards laid down by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I think that that is wrong.

I have looked over the standards set up by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and I think they are exceptionally good. But we should see that we have the machinery to make sure that these specifications are lived up to. As I say, when you have an organization like this spread over the whole of Canada it just becomes too big a job for any central outfit in Ottawa. The municipalities are on the spot and would be able to see that these houses were built according to specification. If the federal government is going to set up a revolving fund I see no reason why they should not have inspectors to see that the municipalities are living up to the building standards laid down by the federal government. That would not be too big a job.

These down payments of which we have been talking and about which I have been criticizing the government could be made more reasonable. I am sure that a down payment of $500 would be a good starting point and maybe it could be made smaller than that. In any event you would immediately have $500 of an equity and then as the monthly payments were made the equity would become greater. If a house is well built it is good for 25 or 30 years and there would be no possible chance of loss. That has been the experience in Alberta because they have found that under their revolving fund they have not lost any money and the money has been coming back in very satisfactorily. The amortization period could be increased from 25 to 30 years.

I see no reason why the government should not start out with a plan such as this. No doubt it would need some changes but I think the principle is basically sound. I think it will be found that when you lend money at 2 per cent for home building, the money being issued by the Bank of Canada, it will result in a greater number of homes being built for that class of people to whom the minister referred, and to whom I referred, but who are not now in a financial position either to own or to rent homes. That is what we all hope will happen under the present legislation. I am afraid it will not, but we are hopeful. I am sure that if the proposal which I have suggested is adopted the results I have mentioned will accrue.

I hope my socialist friends will read it over more carefully than they have read other proposals in the past. I hope they will go further and adopt the whole thing. After all, I do not care who adopts it. My main concern is to see that those people who are not now getting homes are put in a position whereby they can have comfortable homes in which to rear their families.

Mr. P. T. Hellyer (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say at the outset that having read this bill I believe it is an excellent bill and I think congratulations are due to all the people who are responsible for it. There are some things in it which are complicated and it may take some time to find out exactly how they will work. However, I know that the minister and the government want it to work. They want to increase the level of house building in this country and they will do everything necessary to see that it does work. It should make possible a continuation of the large house building program of last year.

Before going any further I should like to say that I think some words of commendation should be given to the particular insurance companies who did such an excellent job under the old act during the last few years. It is true that some companies did not do as much as others, but I think some of them in particular were influenced by their recognition of their public duty. I think they went perhaps farther than they otherwise might have gone under the National Housing Act as a result of their recognition of what they felt was their social obligation, and that action should be recognized.

Five companies in particular carried the ball as far as mortgage financing under part I of the act was concerned. I do not know whether I should mention them, but I think their names are widely known. The companies are Canada Life, London Life, Mutual Life, Prudential of America, and Sun Life. They have been the really strong supporters of the National Housing Act as we presently know it.

[Mr. Johnston (Bow River).]

However, their resources proved to be insufficient to provide housing for all those Canadians who needed housing accommodation and alternative sources of additional funds had to be found. I am positive the new legislation will overcome this liability and will make available sufficient mortgage funds to continue the high level of house building. The rather unique economic possibilities of the provisions of this bill will be very interesting to watch and I think that in future the beneficial effects may far exceed our fondest expectations. This is something which those of us who have the privilege of being members of the banking and commerce committee should investigate most thoroughly because I think it is one of the most important developments in this country in several decades.

There are two aspects of the housing problem which I should like to discuss in particular this afternoon, the first being land assembly. In commenting on the provisions for land assembly contained in the new bill the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) said yesterday that there was nothing new and added that "this principal bottleneck still continues". The hon. member is quite correct in saying there is no change; there does not need to be. Provision was made in the present act in December, 1949, by which provincial governments, in co-operation with the federal government, could do a great variety of things to assist in the house building program in Canada. Included in this section was provision for the assembly of land to be made available to builders or for direct construction.

Unfortunately the Ontario government has done practically nothing under this section, particularly in the Toronto area in which I have a special interest. Since December, 1949, this stubborn inaction on the part of the Ontario provincial government has cost home purchasers in the Toronto area alone at least $36 million. Recently the premier of the province of Ontario decided that in order to co-ordinate the development of that great area, the city of Toronto and suburban municipalities, he would set up a metropolitan council, an innovation in municipal government in this country. One purpose of the metropolitan council was, it was stated, to provide logical development and to end illogical development.

One of the first acts of the metropolitan council in co-operation with the Ontario provincial government, after four years of complete inaction, has been to announce that they are going to purchase 2,000 acres of land at Malvern, Ontario, subdivide it, and make it available for house building.

For those hon. members who are not familiar with the environs of Toronto let me say that Malvern is miles away from the city. The price it is proposed to pay for land in this isolated area is the same price for which they could have bought land adjacent to the city had they bought it after the section was brought into effect in 1949. It seems fantastic that the first action of a council, which was brought into being to end illogical development, should be to undertake one of the most illogical developments that has happened there in many years.

There was a statement made in the Toronto papers with regard to this proposed project, and since it is entirely erroneous I would like to say a word about it. This statement was reported in the Toronto Evening Telegram dated December 24, 1953, and reads as follows:

> Metropolitan chairman F. G. Gardiner estimates a reduction of $2,000 in the price of the lot for a house, compared with the ordinary subdivision set-up.

He is referring here to the proposed subdivision of Malvern. This estimate, Mr. Speaker, is completely misleading. The only real saving is in the price of the raw land. The services which will have to be supplied in this isolated location will cost at least as much as they would on land adjacent to the city, and perhaps more. Giving them the benefit of the doubt, the real saving might come as high as $500 a lot. If this is so, the extra cost of transportation, telephone and other facilities over the 25-year term of the mortgages on these houses would exceed any possible saving.

The hon. member for Eglinton is absolutely correct. The problem is there but the Ontario provincial government has waited four years to do anything about it and still shows very little interest, and what they have done is certainly not what could be done to assist.

The other very important feature I would like to mention is the cost of construction. An editorial in the Toronto Globe and Mail, dated January 15, 1954, entitled "Who's to stop it?" on the subject of building costs states in part:

> Why, then, is the cost of new housing "increasing every day?" Why did the cost of the average National Housing Act dwelling rise from $10,194 in the first half of 1952 to $10,788 in the first half of 1953, and why will it be well over $11,000 in the first half of 1954?

In answer to that question, Mr. Speaker, I would like first of all to say that the houses are larger. It is quite elementary that larger houses cost more money and therefore if the average size of the houses increases, if they contain greater floor area, it is certain the average cost is going to be higher, even on the same unit cost basis.

Second, the houses contain much better and more expensive equipment. This, of course, is not reflected in the statistics, which give only the average prices and which do not mention equipment such as heating, plumbing, and other items which tend to make the houses better and more liveable.

Thirdly, included in these average prices for houses is the cost of land; and the price of land, particularly in the Toronto area, has been inflated considerably in the last year or two. If you take the same size of house with the same equipment in that area, exclusive of land, it can be built for less money today than it could eighteen months ago. That saving is due entirely to an increase in productivity.

I would like to quote another paragraph from that same editorial in the Toronto Globe and Mail. It reads as follows:

> The process continues. Workers in the construction industry, and the various industries which supply it, are demanding and getting wage increases without productivity increases to justify them. So, every day, the cost of new housing increases. So, every day—regardless of what parliament does to the N.H.A.—it becomes a little more difficult, a little more dangerous, for the average Canadian to own his own home. Who's to stop it?

It is dangerous to quote statistics without adequate explanation. I think the Globe and Mail can answer its own questions. If the cost of land in Toronto today was the same as it was eighteen months ago, houses of the same size would be selling for less money. That is how it can be stopped. The Globe and Mail has considerable influence with the provincial government and I am sure if they really want to stop it they know how to go about it.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, if it makes more mortgage money available will permit the building industry to streamline its operations even further. It will allow increases in productivity due to better planning. One of the great drawbacks in the industry is that with so few mortgage commitments builders could not plan their operations more than a few weeks in advance. That makes it very difficult to achieve the economies enjoyed by other industries. With a steady stream of mortgage money which, we hope, will now be available, plans can be made months and even years in advance. Engineering and architectural costs can be amortized over a greater number of units. The product can be improved as it has been improved over the last two or three years and at the same time the increase in productivity and efficiency should make it possible to maintain prices at approximately their present level.

With reference to prices, there is just one thing I would like to add. Some hon. members in their speeches in the house yesterday indicated they would like to extend the 10 per cent down payment to higher-priced houses. I am not sure this would be a blessing at the present time, because if it did in fact bring more purchasers into the market than there were houses immediately available it would only add to the inflationary spiral and raise the price of houses and housing materials and price the industry further out of the market. I think that it might be quite an unfortunate development. Later, as the supply of housing grows and when the effective demand under the presently proposed regulations is more adequately met, would be the time to consider more lenient provisions as far as equities are concerned.

Another thing that was mentioned yesterday, in particular in the Toronto and Ontario sphere, was the shortage of schools. I think that our Ontario provincial government could make a real contribution in that regard, in making it easier for municipalities to provide the necessary facilities. From reading the newspapers during the last two or three days one would think that if they were able to streamline their department of highways, they might be able to make savings which they could then make available to assist the municipalities with the construction of new schools.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, just in a general way I should like to say that great improvement has been made in the house building industry in the last three or four years. Hon. members must keep in mind the fact that the capacity was extremely limited immediately after the war. Very few houses were built during the depression; very few had been built during the war. The availability of skilled tradesmen was hampered in view of the fact that few men had gone into the building trades during the depression and the war years. In the course of expansion the building industry was obliged to employ anyone they could get; and sometimes they were what you might call hammer and saw carpenters. However, they did a job; and they did it as best they knew how.

Some of the housing of the early post-war years was not very good. There is still some that is not very good. But as a general rule, the quality of the houses being built in Canada—and in particular those being built under the National Housing Act—is improving every year, and even from month to month. The quality of design is improving. More builders are using the services of architects. The quality of materials is improving. The planning of the location of houses and the general planning of subdivisions is improving considerably and the tendency is all in the direction of further improvement. I think it is reasonable to assume that we can expect these trends to continue.

Many provisions of the new bill are designed to accelerate the improvement that has been going on for the last several years. I think it is fair to say that the new bill will do a tremendous amount for the people in Canada who need houses. Undoubtedly its effect on rents will be reflected in the months and years that lie ahead. Rents that now in some cases are exorbitant will settle automatically as the law of supply and demand comes into effect.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should again like to congratulate the minister and his assistants and to wish them well. I think that we shall watch the bill closely in operation. I am sure that there will be some things that will have to be changed in a year or two. But I am certainly one who will go along with the bill as it now stands and will help to support any changes that might be necessary in the light of experience, in order to make it operate more satisfactorily.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, in my view this new bill is nothing but a gigantic bluff which is designed to kid the people of Canada that something is going to be done. I think it is more like a bomb that just is not going to go off. People are going to find that they are not going to get any more houses built, to any great extent, than are being built at the present time. They are also going to find that it does very little to help them buy a new house.

In the first place, Mr. Speaker, the minister is only aiming at building about 100,000 houses a year. It has been demonstrated by statements by one of the leading advisers to the government in this field, and the president of the Canadian Construction Association, that the building industry, if given a chance, can build up to 125,000 or 130,000 houses a year. But the government is aiming at building 100,000 houses a year, with a demonstrated backlog of at least half a million houses which are badly needed by the people of Canada today.

I think this bill is completely inadequate to do the job it is supposed to do, which is to help us catch up with our backlog of half a million houses. I think it is inadequate for two main reasons. First of all, it is not going to help those who need most to buy a new house, to obtain the house they need. In the second place, there is no indication that there is going to be any more mortgage money available than is available at the present time.

I should like to deal with each of those questions in turn, and I want to begin with the income which the government says a man must have before he can apply for a National Housing Act mortgage. I think we will all agree, Mr. Speaker, that the cheapest house you can buy today under the National Housing Act is one costing $10,000. Under the new act a man must be receiving an income of $3,860 a year before he can apply for an N.H.A. mortgage. The average income of all people in Canada who received salaries or wages during the past twelve months was $2,970. If a housing act is to do the job it is supposed to do, I believe it must at least make it possible for a man earning an average income to buy his own home. I therefore think that the income requirement of $3,860 must be reduced to an income requirement of $3,000, which is merely the average income received by all Canadians receiving salaries and wages during the past twelve months.

Mr. Winters: In order to make this point clear to hon. members, perhaps my hon. friend would say to what he is relating the figure of $3,860?

Mr. Hees: I should be glad to do that, Mr. Speaker, because the figures have been worked out for me by officials of the minister's own department. It works out in this way. The lending value of the house is $10,000. The down payment is $1,400. The mortgage loan is $8,600. To that would be added a premium of $172. The mortgage is actually written for $8,772 at 5¼ per cent, once again using the rate under the old legislation. If this is to be a 25-year mortgage, principal and interest amount to $52.42 a month—

Mr. Winters: $52.45 a month, is it not?

Mr. Hees: Yes, $52.45 a month is what I should have said; taxes $20 a month; fire insurance, $1.50 a month; and the note says this $1.50 is a more considered opinion than was given in the two previous examples. The total charges on this mortgage would be $73.95 per month. The income required to carry such a mortgage at the 23 per cent ratio is $3,860 per annum. Those are the government's own figures. As I say, the income requirement of $3,860 has been worked out on the basis of a man being allowed to spend 23 per cent of his income on the carrying charges of his house.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that if a man wants to spend more than 23 per cent of his income on the carrying charges of his house, that is his business. He should be allowed to do so. Who are we to tell a man how he is to spend his income? If a man wants to do without a car, or if he wants to do without a television set or the various other things that might be necessary to make it possible for him to pay considerably more than 23 per cent of his income toward the carrying charges of his home, I would say that is his decision to make. In addition to that there may easily be, and today generally are, other members of the family who are wage earners who would be glad to contribute toward the carrying charges of the house. Therefore I feel it is only reasonable and sensible to reduce the income requirement applying on Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation mortgages to $3,000 per year or $60 per week.

I feel that this change will make it possible for a great many people, who today cannot buy their own homes, to purchase homes. It will still leave more than half the people of Canada unable to buy homes. In order to overcome this problem I believe Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation must alter its building specifications to allow less costly types of construction. I do not mean that we should allow contractors to build match boxes or inferior types of houses. I have been shown plans by builders which embodied attractive two-bedroom houses with living room, dining room, kitchen and bathroom, as well as a full cellar. These contractors will be glad to sell these houses for $8,000 provided the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will alter the building specifications. These houses are no myth. They can be a reality. They are attractive. They simply do not contain some of the frills that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation now requires in houses under the National Housing Act.

These houses would not contain as much brick as Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation houses do now. They would be of good, sturdy, attractive construction. They would last for many, many years. I believe it is important for us to make houses available to the working people of this country at less than today's cost. As I say, these houses would provide for families with one, two or three children, and would allow a man to carry the charges if he were earning about $2,500 per year. This would bring into the field of potential purchasers a tremendous number of people who today want to buy their own homes and are prohibited from doing so.

National Housing Act

I believe the second requirement for us to catch up on our housing backlog is to make it possible for people to afford the down payment on a house. This bill provides for a down payment of 10 per cent on the first $8,000 loan and 30 per cent on the remainder. As I said earlier, the cheapest Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation house you can buy today costs $10,000, so the lowest down payment today would be $1,400. This is still beyond the reach of the man earning a moderate income.

Building costs are increasing steadily, and if the new act is to be effective for any length of time that down payment should be 10 per cent on all houses up to a value of $12,000. If building costs continue to increase, as they give every indication of continuing to increase, it will not be long before the cheapest house you can buy under the National Housing Act will cost $12,000.

In addition to the down payment, the amortization is a very important factor in making it possible for people with moderate incomes to buy new houses. Under this bill the amortization period has been lengthened to 25 years. I believe the amortization period should be lengthened to 30 years, because that would allow a great many more people to carry the charges on new houses than would otherwise be possible. It can be done without appreciably increasing the risk to the lender, because builders tell me that today Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation houses will last for anywhere from 50 to 70 years. If the amortization period is increased to 30 years, this will still leave the lender a generous margin of safety.

In order to show how the thinking has developed in the United States with regard to providing houses for low income groups, I should like to quote a dispatch which appeared in the Montreal Gazette of January 9, 1954, under the heading "Radical Plan for Home Owner Urged in United States". The dateline is Washington; it is an Associated Press dispatch, and reads as follows:

> Senator Homer Capehart (Republican-Indiana) today suggested a $1,000,000,000 government program to help people buy homes on 50 to 60 year mortgages with little or no down payment.
> Capehart, chairman of the Senate banking committee which will consider President Eisenhower's housing proposal advanced what he called a "radical idea" of making home owners of citizens otherwise unable to afford their own dwellings.
>
> He told a CIO housing conference he had long been worried about the plight of citizens who cannot afford either a down payment on a home or "the high rents they are forced to pay today."
> Capehart disapproved past programs under which public housing has been built with federal subsidies for rent to low income families. He said it would be better to help such families finance their own homes.

[Mr. Hees.]

I think that dispatch is particularly interesting, owing to the fact it is not the statement of any airy dreamer but is made by the chairman of the United States banking committee, the man who will be given responsibility for putting through President Eisenhower's housing program. It shows how far thinking along these lines has developed in the United States. I do not agree with the suggestions he has made, but I think it makes the suggestions I am making, and the other suggestions I am about to make, seem very moderate indeed.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, in addition to making it possible for people to buy houses, it is very important that the necessary mortgage money to finance the construction of those new houses be made available. Under the provisions of the bill, banks will be permitted to deal in housing mortgages under an insurance scheme whereby the government will guarantee the mortgage. At first sight this would seem to make sufficient additional mortgage money available, but it seems to me one important factor has been overlooked. I have talked very recently with senior officials of two of our largest banks, and they have both told me that that part of their investment portfolios which they are permitted to invest in non-government securities is almost completely taken up with investments in commerce and industry.

If we are going to close the gap between mortgage money now available and mortgage money that is needed it seems to me, as it seemed to them, that some of the money which is at present being invested in commerce and industry will have to be diverted from those fields so it can be used for housing mortgages. This, of course, is going to slow down commercial and industrial development, upon which our whole economy depends. And if that kind of slow-down, which certainly we can ill afford, is to be avoided, the government must tell the people of Canada, and particularly the banks involved—because they do not know it yet—where these additional funds are to come from. We will be listening attentively to learn this from the minister, when he decides to tell us.

Another aspect of the matter, with which I heartily disagree, is the fact that the banks are not going to carry out their own appraisals and inspections. These tasks are going to be carried out for them by officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. This will give the government control over a very large proportion of the mortgage and lending operations connected with the building industry, and will place the government in an entrenched position, so far as that industry is concerned.

After all, the government is guaranteeing these bank loans. Therefore I can see no reason at all why the banks should not be ready, willing and anxious to bear the cost of their own appraisals and inspections, just as the other lending institutions that have been participating with the government in the building of houses over the past few years have been willing to bear the cost of carrying out their own appraisals and inspections.

I believe the banks should be instructed by the government right now to begin training the staffs they will require so that, in a minimum of time, they will be ready to function. I believe the eagerness—and there can be no doubt that there has been great eagerness on the part of the government in this respect—to take over appraisals and inspections from the banks is simply another demonstration of the government's intention to go on assuming more and more control over as many as possible of the proper functions of industry.

It seems to me that this is simply another example of this government's drift toward socialism, a government which is so fond of professing its adherence to the principles of free enterprise. I sincerely hope the banks will stand up to the government and insist upon doing their own appraisals and inspections, because that is the only way we can stop this drift of the government toward getting into business. My view is that so far as possible the government must be kept out of business, and I sincerely hope the banks will not permit the government to bulldoze them any further. I hope they will stand up to the government and say, "We want to do our own inspections and appraisals."

I believe that if the government insists upon doing appraisals and inspections it will reduce almost to the vanishing point the effectiveness of the 4,000 branch banks about which the minister spoke so glibly when he dealt with the matter in the house last December. It is obvious that if appraisals and inspections have to be carried out by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, a branch bank can be only as effective as the service it can get from the nearest Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation official.

I would say that if the government insists upon doing this work, then it might just as well go whole hog. It is guaranteeing the loans anyway, so it might as well go whole hog and make the mortgages available to the people who want them for the purpose of building houses. If it did this it could make mortgage money available at 4¼ per cent. The government pays to the people of Canada a rate of 3¾ per cent. Add half of one per cent, the cost of servicing a mortgage, and you have the 4¼ per cent. It must be one thing or the other; either bring the banks in and let them do the job completely, or else stop this farce and keep the banks out, and let the government do the job. Let us have it one way or the other.

I believe, really, that the only reason the banks are being brought into the picture is that the government wants the banks to do the dirty work when people have to be evicted from their homes. It seems very clear to me that when the nice things are going to be done, such as approving a loan, the government wants to be on hand with the smiles and chuckles, saying, "Oh, yes, here is your nice home, Mr. Smith. We are very glad to give you a mortgage, and it is only going to cost you so much. Just sign on the dotted line, and don't forget to vote Liberal next time you go to the polls, because, remember, we are doing it for you."

Then when that poor, unfortunate man—and there will be some—has to default in his payments, is the government going to go to him and say, "We are sorry, Mr. Smith, but you cannot stay in your house." Oh, no, the poor old bank has to do that; it then becomes the villain in the piece. The banker is the one who is hated by the person evicted. The whole thing becomes a farce: the government does all the nice things, and the bank does all the nasty things. The government carries out all inspections, and proceeds to kid itself and the people of Canada that the branch banks will be effective. Well, the branch banks will be only as effective as their nearness to an office of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. That is why I think this whole thing is a gigantic bluff, trying to kid the people into believing that they are going to be able to get houses cheaper and easier than they did before.

So much for that. I hope the government is going to pay some attention to some of these suggestions, because I believe the very best investment we can make in good citizenship is to make it as easy as possible for a man to own his own home. The home owner has a stake in the community, and I believe we will all agree he becomes the best possible kind of citizen. That is the greatest possible bulwark we can have against the inroads of communism.

In addition to the shortage of houses a person may buy, there is also an acute shortage of rental housing. Very little is available at reasonable rentals. A few weeks ago in Toronto I went to see a house put up by the Toronto metropolitan home builders' association. This house was erected to show what the industry can do on a non-subsidized basis to provide the kind of rental housing people need at rentals they can pay.

This house is designed to meet the needs of people with one, two or three children, and earning between $2,500 and $3,500 a year. It is 18 feet wide and 23 feet deep. It has a front lawn, a back garden, two storeys and a basement. On the top floor there are two bedrooms and a three-piece bathroom. On the ground floor there is a living room, dining room and kitchen. The basement is full size with a coal furnace, hot water heater and laundry tubs.

The whole design of this house is most attractive. It gives you the impression it has been well thought out. It is well finished and very attractive to the eye. The floors throughout the house are hardwood with the exception of the bathroom and kitchen floors, which are of linoleum tile. The Toronto metropolitan home builders' association plans to rent this house at $58 a month; and on the basis of a man being allowed to spend 23 per cent of his income on shelter, this kind of accommodation can be carried by a man earning $55 a week.

During the first few days this rental unit was open for inspection more than 5,000 couples signed cards saying they were very anxious to have the opportunity of renting this kind of accommodation at $58 a month. The majority of the people who thought this type of accommodation was attractive were earning between $2,500 and $3,500 a year, and had two children. When I was there I listened to the comments made by the people going through, and they were frankly comments of amazement that such accommodation could be made available at a rental of $58 a month.

This kind of accommodation is in very sharp contrast to the single rooms in which families with four or five children are living today in Toronto, and I am sure in other centres throughout Canada, and for which they are paying as high as $60 a month rent. They are living in such accommodation simply because they cannot find anywhere else to go, and they live in constant fear that they are going to be evicted because of the children. I believe this type of project is a very good example of how the needs of people can be met by industry if industry gets down to the job, and remember that is on a non-subsidized basis. This kind of project is completely non-subsidized.

To make the project a reality the government must make available to those who will carry out the construction, money for land and construction at an interest rate of 3¾ per cent. I know the minister is going to say that money is available at that interest rate if the company is a limited dividend corporation. However, I see no reason why this interest rate should be confined to limited dividend corporations which are restricted to a return of 5 per cent on their investment, because we all know that if you have money to invest you can get better than 5 per cent today with very great security by putting your money into any good industrial common stock.

Therefore I say that if a co-operative effort like this can make available to people, in large quantities, the kind of rental housing they are anxious to obtain at a rental they are able to pay, then the government, on inspection and after satisfying themselves that the rent is fair for the accommodation which will be afforded, should make money available for construction at 3¾ per cent. It makes money available at the same rate of interest to housing projects that need a subsidy to enable them to pay their way, and it is the rate of interest which the government pays the people of Canada for the use of their money. I cannot think of any better way that money can be spent to good account.

Finally, I believe this legislation can be made effective if the following requirements are complied with. First of all, I think the income requirement to obtain an N.H.A. mortgage must be reduced to $3,000 a year. Second, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation building specifications should be eased to permit a less costly type of construction which will make low-priced houses available to people in the low income brackets. Third, the down payment should be reduced to a flat 10 per cent on all N.H.A. houses up to a value of $12,000. Fourth, the period over which the loan can be paid off should be lengthened to 30 years. Fifth, the government must make it clear, in the very near future, where the money necessary to finance additional mortgages is going to come from without depriving commerce and industry of the funds being invested in those fields at the present time. Sixth, I believe the government must make funds available at 3¾ per cent to low-rental housing projects which do not require a subsidy, and which provide the type of rental housing that people want, at rents which they can pay.

If these six conditions are complied with, this legislation can materially help us to catch up on our ever-increasing backlog of half a million houses.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): It being five o'clock, the house will proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

There being no business under private and public bills, the house will continue the business under consideration.

Mr. Claude Ellis (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be an understatement if I were to assert that this legislation will be a bitter disappointment to people throughout Canada. When the minister was making his statement on the bill the other day—and he made a very excellent job of putting forth arguments on behalf of the government—I could not help but feel that he made a very good speech on very weak material indeed. I could not help but be impressed by several of the speeches made by hon. members on the other side of the house praising the government for having brought in this legislation at this time. The only way to judge the effect of this legislation is to consider first of all the problems that it proposes to solve and then to examine very carefully the provisions of the bill to see whether or not it does in effect solve those problems.

The bill proposes to promote the construction of new houses, the repair and modernization of existing houses and the improvement of housing and living conditions. These are the broad objectives of the bill, and we must examine the proposed legislation to see whether or not it does in effect bring about these results. The housing problem of the country has been brought to the attention of the house on former occasions. The government is very fond of boasting of the number of houses that have been constructed, ignoring of course the fact that the population of our country has grown tremendously in the past number of years and that many houses have become so dilapidated that they have had to be replaced. In spite of these factors the government still feels very proud of the fact that many residential homes have been built.

I think the problem was best outlined in an article which appeared in Maclean's magazine on January 15, 1953. This was written by Sydney Margolius and he stated that on the basis of per thousand of present population the following homes were constructed in the years 1946 to 1951 in the following countries:

Sweden	41
United States	38·4
Australia	34·6
Canada	33·6
United Kingdom	20·7

He goes on to point out that the United Kingdom was busy repairing the ravages of war and replacing and repairing bombed-out dwellings during that particular period. But there is another column of figures having to do with the homes that were built to keep pace with increased population, and I think they are most significant. These are the figures of new houses per thousand of growth:

United Kingdom	897
Sweden	773
United States	417
Australia	304
Canada	282

I suggest that when we examine this matter closely we will see that in spite of the number of homes that may have been built in this country in recent years the housing problem is as serious today as at any time in our history. It is with that in mind that we have to examine this piece of legislation to see what the government proposes to do to bring about a solution of this problem.

Before going on I think I should refer to one other aspect of the housing problem. We sometimes think in terms of home construction and overlook the social aspects of housing. Sometimes we hear it said that the government cannot afford to spend money on housing, that it is the taxpayers' money, that it is subsidization or, as one hon. member suggested, that it is socialism. I think that is a very shortsighted policy. We must remember that poor housing breeds many social conditions which become a charge on and an expense to society. In going over some recent newspaper clippings in regard to this matter I was interested to read a report in the Montreal Gazette of February 27 last, as follows:

> The government inaction on housing problems was blamed last night for the increased juvenile and parental delinquency by Rev. Patrick J. Ambrose, director of the city welfare bureau, at his annual meeting. "Deplorable living conditions, lack of adequate housing, high cost of basic commodities have become in greater and greater number contributing factors to domestic and marital breakdown," he said.
> "The increase of parental and juvenile delinquency is the direct result of the deplorable housing shortage."

Independent surveys have been made from time to time, and I was interested in a survey made by Leon Gertler of a number of representative metropolitan cities in the United States. He found that although slum and and blighted districts comprise 20 per cent of the metropolitan residential area, they have:

33 per cent of population
45 per cent of major crimes
55 per cent of juvenile delinquency
50 per cent of diseases
45 per cent of city services cost
6 per cent of tax revenue

I suggest that when we consider housing we must realize that there are many social aspects to this problem which may become an expense to the taxpayers of this country, whether at the federal, provincial or municipal level. Thus when we think of housing we must consider that the creation of good housing conditions in this country will go a long way toward bringing about more desirable conditions in so far as social welfare problems are concerned.

Other aspects of this legislation have been brought to the attention of the house by some of my colleagues. I think perhaps one of the most significant aspects is the interest rate. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) pointed out this afternoon, we in the C.C.F. have long had a three point policy in respect to housing. During the last election the Liberals chose to appropriate for themselves two of those planks, but unfortunately two without the third is not an effective combination.

Simply decreasing the down payment and increasing the period of amortization are not in themselves going to bring about the most desired results. It is only when we decrease the down payment together with an extension of the amortization period and a lowering of the interest rate that we are going to get the full benefits of the policies which we have advocated.

I think all of us are only too painfully aware of the part that interest plays in the purchase of many things, such as houses, cars and so on, which may be purchased on the instalment plan. It can be most illusive. We see stores offering to sell goods for 10 per cent down while other stores will offer to sell goods with no down payment. It seems nice to be able to buy goods on that basis, but over the long run you will find that under normal circumstances of financing the goods will cost more.

Under the circumstances we realize that it is necessary in this country to provide the lowest possible down payment. As a matter of fact a great many of our people have not a down payment of any kind to make. It is also most necessary to extend the period of payment over a longer term in order to make it possible for more people to purchase homes. But unless there is a corresponding decrease in the interest rate the benefits are not going to become available to many people.

We know that a person with a mortgage of $6,170 at 5 per cent on a 20-year basis will pay a total of $9,840, or $3,670 more than his original loan. We thus see the great part played by interest in the purchase of a home. Let me put it another way. The amount one could borrow with fixed monthly payments at 5 per cent on a 20-year basis is only slightly less than the amount he could borrow at 6 per cent on a 25-year basis. In the first case the amount is $3,460 and in the second case the amount is $3,550. Put it another way. The difference between a mortgage at 5 per cent and one at 6 per cent is only slightly less than 5 years of mortgage payments. Thus we see the vital role played by interest in the financing of home purchases.

Hence any benefits under the new bill in so far as a lower down payment and increased amortization period are concerned will not bring the most desirable results if the government fails to lower the interest rate. I will grant you that under the new bill some people will be able to purchase homes who might not ordinarily have been able to do so, but it must be remembered that in many cases they are going to have to pay more as a result of the longer period of repayment on the loan.

We of the C.C.F. have always advocated a lower interest rate because we believe that it is only through a lower interest rate that we can make it possible for a great number of Canadians to undertake the purchase of their own homes. A low rate of interest is a vital part of any housing program, and the lack of that low rate is perhaps the most glaring inadequacy in the present legislation.

As regards the insurance aspects of this bill, section 40 of the old act contained an insurance feature which, although very limited in scope, was not designed to operate at the expense of the borrower. Under the new act the prospective home owner will have to pay not only what we consider to be an exorbitant rate of interest but in addition an insurance premium which in some instances, since the insurance may be capitalized into the mortgage loan and amortized accordingly, may mean an increase of two-tenths of one per cent which, of course, will be added to the already high rate of interest.

I was very interested in the comments made in regard to free enterprise by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees). It has always interested me to hear comments by various members of the house about the virtues of free enterprise. But I have always understood that the reason the lenders were able to charge the high rate of interest was because they were lending their money at a risk. In other words, it was risk capital. If a man had money and he made it available to others then he risked that money, and was therefore entitled to a high interest rate or profit.

The situation we now face is that the government is taking away the risk and at the same time permitting lending institutions to exact the profits. Under this legislation the government is stepping in and assuming the risk at the borrower's expense, while at the same time permitting the private lending institutions to take the profit. There can be no excuse whatsoever for a provision of this nature in this legislation.

It is rather amusing at times to hear the comments made regarding paternalism and the way in which people attempt to disparage the idea of the welfare state. They take exception to members of this group asking for increases in old age pensions or family allowances. They are prone to criticize us for being paternalistic and for going out of our way to help various sections of our population. But the amazing thing is this. They are glad to help out those who in the main require no help whatsoever. I have noticed that the larger a company is in this country the more likely it is to run to the government for help any time it gets into difficulties. Many of the bigger industries in this country have for many years enjoyed some form of government protection, yet these same people see nothing wrong with that. It is all very well for private enterprise to come running to the government for assistance, but it is a different story altogether when people who want to purchase homes ask for some assistance from this government.

The hon. member for Broadview suggested that this legislation was placing more power in the hands of the government. We feel the contrary is true, and what is actually happening is that the government is getting out of the lending field and turning over to private enterprise the last interest it had in housing. The government is doing that after having guaranteed the profits of private enterprise through the insurance scheme.

I find it difficult to understand the point of view of those who claim the government is taking too much upon itself at the expense of private enterprise. On this point there is one question I would like to direct to the minister, and I hope he will be able to give the house the information when he rises to close the debate. I wonder how important this insurance feature is, and I would ask the minister to inform the house how many mortgages under the old N.H.A. went into default over the past five years. If he can demonstrate that over the past five years a large percentage of the mortgages arranged under the old N.H.A. went into default, then he may at least have some pretext for advancing this insurance feature at this time. But I am doubtful that that has been the case. Perhaps the government is worried about a recession, or perhaps it is afraid of a slump. That would seem to me to be the only logical reason for inserting this feature into the act.

We have often been accused of being a group of crepe hangers and spreaders of gloom because we dared to suggest we ought to be planning for the future and taking care we do not once again find ourselves in the position we found ourselves in before the last war. I think the government ought to take the people into its confidence. Are they afraid of a drop in real estate values? Are they afraid of a slump? Is that the reason for the insertion of this insurance feature in this bill? That seems to me to be the only logical reason for adopting that feature at this time.

It will be interesting to learn how many mortgages went into default over the past five years, because the insurance companies have invested just under 20 per cent of their assets in mortgages. Under the new provisions of this bill it is unlikely the banks will be investing more than 5 per cent of their assets in real estate mortgages. These mortgages, of course, will be accepted as security by the Bank of Canada just in the same manner as government bonds. I find it difficult to understand why the government saw fit to place this burden on those who wish to buy homes, by requiring them to pay an insurance policy to protect not their own investment but the investment of the lending institution. If these people believe in free enterprise let them take the risk. That is the test.

Mr. Harkness: At 6 per cent.

Mr. Ellis: Yes, they are lending money at slightly under 6 per cent. They cannot lose because under this new act if a mortgage goes into default they are paid 98 per cent of the outstanding principal, and they are paid interest. They cannot lose. When we go down to the bank and deposit money in a savings account we earn interest at 2 per cent, the idea being that we are not risking the money. But the lending institutions will be lending money to prospective home owners at 6 per cent, guaranteed by the government at the expense of the borrower. Surely there can be no justification for this policy.

In the final analysis the effectiveness of this act will be determined by the number of people whom it affects. Some reference was made to this matter by the last speaker. I wonder how many people in Canada will derive direct benefit under this new housing legislation. Obviously this bill is designed to meet the needs of those who have incomes of between $3,500 and $4,000 a year or more. The last speaker gave a figure of, I believe,

$3,860. This legislation is not designed to meet the needs of those who receive less than that amount.

What is the situation? I went to the last available Canada Year Book and looked up the statistics with regard to income tax returns. This is what I find in 1950, the last year for which I have figures. I may say that it is not the amount of the figures but rather the relative number in each of the categories that is pertinent to this point. In the year 1950 I find that, of those paying income tax in Canada, there were 5,450 Canadians making income tax returns with incomes of less than $1,000. What is in the new act for them? I find that there were 740,070 taxpayers reporting incomes of $1,000 and up to but not including $2,000. What is in the legislation for them? I find that there were 848,960 Canadian citizens making income tax returns and reporting incomes from $2,000 up to but not including $3,000. I find that of those earning incomes between $3,000 and $3,500 there were an additional 243,000 Canadians, making a grand total of 1,837,480 earning $3,500 or less.

That number represents a little more than 80 per cent of the population of this country. Eighty per cent of the people of this country are earning incomes of $3,500 or less. Let us go down a little bit to those earning incomes of $3,000 or less. I find that a total of 1,594,480 taxpayers reported incomes of less than $3,000 a year. In other words, 71 per cent of the people of Canada making income tax returns are earning less than $3,000 a year.

What, may I ask, is in the act for them? What is this new National Housing Act doing for 80 per cent of our people? Assuming that some of the people at the very top with regard to income will have no need to ask the government for any form of assistance, I think it will be seen that it is reasonable to propose that not more than one-fifth of the people of this country will ever be in a position to avail themselves of any opportunities or benefits under this act.

Surely the test of a good piece of legislation is that it should take care of the needs of the majority of our people, and certainly of the needs of those people who are least able to take care of themselves. But what does this act do? As other hon. members have suggested, it shows more concern for those who perhaps can do something for themselves, and shows very little concern indeed for those who can do nothing for themselves. I suggest that the minister and the government explain why they have seen fit to ignore completely the needs of the vast majority of the Canadian people in this regard.

[Mr. Ellis.]

In connection with the situation throughout Canada there are many other statistics available. I was reading a copy of a brief submitted by a welfare council in the city of Montreal just a year and a half ago, which reported that about 70 per cent of the people of Montreal were earning less than $2,000 a year. I must take that figure as being fairly accurate. I think the social welfare people, such as the Red Feather agencies, are in a position to know the situation fairly well in their respective communities. When we realize the tremendous need for housing in this country, how can we be content when we find the government getting up and patting themselves on the back because they are advancing a piece of legislation that completely ignores four-fifths of the people of this country? We have suggested that this legislation should be changed in order to take care of the needs of those people who most need help. I suggest that we are not the only ones to suggest that it is time the government took some step in this regard and was prepared to do a little bit toward subsidizing home construction, if necessary.

I was interested in going back and reading an editorial that appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of April 9 of last year. It commented on the 600 applications which had been received for the 58 units of the Lowren Housing Company in the city of Ottawa. The editorial went on to say that under this scheme rentals were to be $55 a month and that no one earning more than $3,500 a year and having less than two children under 16 years of age would be eligible for such a house. But the editorial went on to point out that families earning less than $3,000 a year could not be expected to occupy such homes because they could not afford them. The Citizen went on to state:

> Such families need to be subsidized if they are to obtain adequate accommodation.

I do not think the Citizen is a spokesman for our group but I believe it is expressing what is felt by a great many Canadian people who maintain that it is time the government faced up to the housing problem in this country. I was also interested in noting an editorial that appeared in a financial journal which reached my desk the other day, namely the Financial Times of January 22 of this year. In this editorial the writer quotes from an address given by Mr. B. S. Vanstone, president of the Bank of Toronto. I am going to quote an excerpt from this bank president's address. The editorial states as follows:

> Dealing with this subject in the course of his address to the annual meeting of the Bank of Toronto, B. S. Vanstone, president of that institution, stated that it is right and proper that the maximum number of Canadians should live in their own homes. But, he emphasized, this they can do only if construction and financing costs remain within their capacity to pay. If, he said, the need for extra houses in Canada is considered so pressing that private capital cannot be marshalled quickly enough to meet it, "then presumably public funds will have to be made available;" . . .

I do not think we are hearing from a socialist there, when he suggests that if private capital will not do the job, the government should step in and do something to correct this deplorable situation in the country.

As to this legislation, I feel that the government is looking at the entire problem of housing through the glasses of the private lending institutions and not from the viewpoint of the vast number of Canadian citizens who desire either to own their own homes or to obtain suitable rental accommodation. When the private lending institutions think of housing, what do they think of? They think of ways of increasing the flow of capital into housing, and they think in terms of increased interest rates. As a matter of fact, yesterday I was reading a little item in the Financial Post which suggested that the assumed solution to the problem of mortgage money is to increase the interest rate and to increase government guarantees.

That is precisely what this government have done in this legislation. They have given the private lending institutions a guaranteed return on their capital. They have removed all risk. Then, to add insult to injury, they have added the cost of protecting the private lending institutions to the other costs payable by the home purchaser.

We in this group have maintained throughout that we must look upon housing as a social problem and that we must get away from this feeling that the only way we can get houses built in this country is by going down on our hands and knees and begging the private lending institutions to come in with their money.

We go to the extent of guaranteeing their investments. Surely, if we consider the social implications of housing, we realize that poor housing has had a great effect on juvenile delinquency; it has had a great effect on domestic difficulties throughout the country, and it has had a great influence on our crime rate. We are told that is so by people who have made a study of these important problems. Surely the time has come for the government to consider housing from that viewpoint and be prepared, if necessary, to provide subsidized housing.

We are not the only ones in the country to suggest subsidized housing. The government chooses to ignore the representations made to it in many instances by people who would normally support the government. When the minister makes his reply at the end of the debate I wish he would tell the house why he considers that, when the government ignores the vast majority of the Canadian people, he can claim that this housing bill is any great boon to this country.

If this bill will enable one more house to be built, it is all right in so far as it goes. I suppose we should be thankful for small mercies. If it will enable one more house to go up, it is better than the old bill; it is better than nothing. But if the members of this government feel they can stick out their chests and brag about what they are doing for housing, and if this bill is what they feel will serve the needs of the Canadian people, then I suggest they are going to be in for a rude awakening.

It is all very well for some hon. members to say that people should make a down payment. I know many of my constituents, Mr. Speaker, who are living in rented dwellings. Some of them are paying $100 per month while they are earning $50 per week. How can they be expected to save money in that situation? It is all very well for some people to say they should be saving money, and perhaps 20 years from now these people might have the down payment on a home. In the meantime many of them are paying twice as much rent as they should be paying if they were buying their own homes.

So long as these people are forced to continue paying exorbitant rents, I ask in all sincerity how you can expect them to save the down payment on a home. I was talking to one gentleman some time ago and he said that it was quite true the new homes were expensive and beyond the reach of the average wage earner, but one had to remember that when people move into better homes they leave other homes for the people with lower incomes. What this man overlooked was that even if better housing is available, the time will come when a person who has the opportunity to move into better accommodation cannot afford it.

I wonder how many people who are living in tenements today, perhaps at very low rentals, are in a position to move into a suite at $85 per month if they had the chance. There are vast numbers of people in this country, as the Ottawa Citizen pointed out, on low incomes who, even if these rental dwellings at $55 a month were made available, would not be able to afford them.

I have made these comments on this bill because I believe it will be a cruel and bitter disappointment to the people of this country. It is a mirage. This measure was announced with great fanfare. When I went home for Christmas some of my constituents were saying they would now be able to build a house. When the time comes to enter into negotiations and have the lending value of the building established, these people will find out this legislation is not all it is cracked up to be. It is going to prove to be a bitter disappointment to many of our people. We are opposed to that.

I do not want to take up any more of the time of the house, but I do want to sum up by pointing out that we are disappointed with this legislation because it completely ignores the housing needs of the vast majority of the people of Canada.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): I rise at this time, Mr. Speaker, to take part in this debate. I wish to emphasize at the outset that I support the suggestion made by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) this afternoon concerning the revolving fund. I believe the suggestion is sound. The fund could be administered with a very small interest payment which, in reality, would amount to nothing more nor less than administration costs. I agree with him, and I believe that is not only one of the easiest ways of solving this problem, but it would be less expensive and less burdensome upon those who are desirous of obtaining their own homes. I support that suggestion, and I believe we shall have to keep harping on that proposal until the government sees fit to introduce some such measure.

In spite of what I may say this afternoon, I want it understood that we are desirous of doing everything possible to enable people to own their own homes. If this legislation is going to make that possible, then we are all for it. But I rather agree with many of the speakers who have preceded me that eventually the measure will result in disappointment. Once again, however, I wish to say that we are all for legislation that will enable our people to own their own homes. Personally—and I am speaking personally now—I am not so sure that that is the main objective of this bill. I have given this matter a good deal of thought, and I rather suspect there is another purpose behind this bill. I am going to explain exactly what I mean by that.

Throughout the war years and since the war there has been an inflationary trend. There has been an expansion in the money supply of this country. Of course there is bound to be a limit to which the banking institutions can go in increasing that money supply or what is usually known as the expansion of credit. Sometimes these terms are not completely understood. I would prefer, instead of using the term "expansion of credit", that the term "expansion of the money supply of Canada" should be used. There must be a certain limit to that; otherwise the expansion is going to exceed by far the total price of the production and inflation will get out of hand. There must also be a time when that inflationary trend must stop; and when that happens the reverse action is likely to take place. Instead of the inflationary period simply stopping it takes the opposite trend, and we would be in for a period of deflation which, of course, would mean a recession.

I believe the government sees that in the offing, and is coming to this conclusion. "We must be careful in this matter. Otherwise there will not be an adequate supply of money, and therefore we must do something about it". The banking institutions will say, "We have to be careful here, too. We cannot expand beyond a limit which would be dangerous for us." And so the government says simply, "Here is a way in which you can continue to expand the money supply of the country and, at the same time, be insured against losses."

I agree fully with the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Ellis), who preceded me in the debate, when he said that it is the home buyer who is going to pay for the insurance against any risk that might be involved. I believe that is one of the chief purposes behind the bill.

No one wants to see another depression; and I think by the proper application of financial policy there is no need to fear a depression. If the government persists in pursuing the policy it has been following, then of course it must do something to bolster the situation, and must attempt to stave off any possibility of depression.

Much has been said by the minister and by others who have spoken in the debate about the vast amount of savings on deposit in the banks. They have suggested that therefore the banks should be given added power to lend these savings. I rise now to refute a misconception in the minds of some in respect of that kind of argument. The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) has already said that the method behind the bill is an inflationary one, and he has pointed out that the banks do not lend their depositors' money. It is not proper to say that it is time the vast amount of savings on deposit in the banks was placed on loan, because I repeat the banks do not lend their depositors' money.

I know the opposite view is held by many people. Indeed, this is sometimes taught in our schools. Before my boys passed out of high school they used to come home and tell me that their teachers and principals had taught them that the banks lend depositors' money. It is also being taught in some universities. I have met men with bachelor of commerce degrees who have told me that the banks lend their depositors' money.

Not so long ago in this House of Commons the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Cannon), speaking in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, referred to the government's intention to introduce this bill. The rules do not permit my quoting from Hansard from a previous debate but, in substance, he said that a great pool of savings was available. I remember his use of that phrase; in fact I wrote out the quotation which, under the rules, I am not allowed to quote. I do remember, however, that he made reference to the great pool of savings in the banks, and suggested that they should be permitted to lend them.

The hon. member is not a dunce by any means. I have not looked up his—

Mr. Knowles: Pedigree.

Mr. Hansell: —his pedigree in the Parliamentary Guide. I do know, however, that he comes from a distinguished family and is a barrister of no mean repute. Yet here is a man, educated in the law, with a keen mind, who actually expounds in parliament the misconception that the banks lend their depositors' money.

Not only that, but I happened to pick up a little paper known as the Sentinel which comes to our desks. I do not know how far that paper goes, how many subscribers it may have or the extent of its mailing list.

Mr. Knowles: It comes to us free.

Mr. Hellyer: I do not think anyone would pay for it, that's for sure.

Mr. Hansell: When the editor of a newspaper breaks into print it is likely that he will be quoted as an authority.

Mr. Knowles: That is what he wants.

Mr. Hansell: Yes, that is what he wants. I will say he is not an authority on this matter.

Mr. Pearson: Don't quote him, then.

Mr. Hansell: He says:

> The banks have not the money available which the government seems to think they have. The only way they could enter the home mortgage business on a worth-while level would be by calling in existing loans.

Evidently he thinks that the banks lend their depositors' money.

I should like also to refer to the speech of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). He is not a dunce, either. I have a very high regard for him. I am not going to say that he does not know the truth of what I am saying but, if one may judge from his observations, I think he will have to be informed a little further in the matter. I notice that yesterday he made this statement, as found at page 1329 of Hansard. I am breaking into the middle of a paragraph, but I can assure hon. members that I have regard for the context. He said:

> On a recent occasion when the minister was speaking in the city of Toronto, he did hold out the hope that, without trespassing upon their existing volume of loans and investments for other purposes, the banks would have available a volume of funds arising from new deposits as the population increased.

Here he is quoting the minister himself, but I think he is quoting him with some degree of approval. A little further on in his speech he said:

> I know we can assume that the banks will co-operate; but I hope we are not going to contemplate any pressures being exerted upon the Canadian banks to put depositors' money into long-term investments on mortgages under this act . . .

I would take it from that that the hon. member believes that banks lend their depositors' money. A little further on in his speech he said:

> But let us recall, sir, that even though security is provided in that way, that in itself does not provide liquidity, because after all you can have a bank mortgage guaranteed against default, but if the mortgage goes on without default on the part of the mortgagor, the banks' funds are tied up. And they are tied up for periods up to 30 years, under the provisions of the new scheme.

I quote that because I should like to suggest to hon. members that it is not so much that depositors' money is tied up for that number of years as it is the collateral which the banks hold.

I want to refer to the minister's speech, and in doing so I am going to suggest that it is a little bit ambiguous on this point. I am saying it is ambiguous because that is the best way I can possibly give the minister some credit for, shall I be mean enough to say, knowing what he is talking about. But I am going to quote the minister, and if he means by his statement that the banks lend their depositors' money then he is wrong. If he means something else I would be happy to learn from him just what he does mean in order to clarify the situation. Let me read what the minister said, as found at page 1314 of Hansard for yesterday:

> It is quite clear that if there is to be an increase in private lending additional funds must come from somewhere other than the present sources of institutional mortgage funds. The only other source of significant size stems from that part of the personal savings of individuals which year by year flows into savings deposits with the chartered banks. It is realized that at the present time these deposits are rather fully employed in other directions but we must remember that in conditions of normal growth in Canada there should be a substantial annual increase in savings deposits. Under our present laws these funds cannot move into the housing sector because the Bank Act prohibits bank lending on the security of real estate mortgages.

That is the part that is slightly ambiguous to my mind. Does the minister mean that these savings held by the people on deposit in banks are what the banks will lend if the Bank Act is changed to permit them to do so? If that is what he means, then I think he is wrong. Let me go on with what he said and then amplify it a little bit.

> It is important to remember that the chartered banks perform in Canada a function with respect to savings that in other countries is performed not only by the banks, but also by building societies, mutual savings banks and savings and loan institutions.

This quotation indicates to me that the minister is of the opinion that the banks lend their depositors' money. I continue:

> Because of the dominant position of the chartered banks in the savings field in Canada, and because mortgage lending is prohibited by the Bank Act, the housing sector is denied access to a large part of the funds which in other countries are available to finance home building.

Once again, I say it would appear to me that the minister is suggesting that the banks actually lend their depositors' money, which is not true. But if the minister intends instead to convey the idea that the banks must increase their cash reserves with the Bank of Canada so they will be enabled to expand the money supply of Canada by way of loans, then I would agree with him. But I do not quite read that in his speech. However, he can correct me on that point if he wishes.

It is one minute to six, Mr. Speaker, and we must go; but I am going to suggest that when I return I will read from the banking and commerce committee report of 1939 some evidence on this very point given by perhaps one of the greatest authorities in Canada, none other than the governor of the Bank of Canada.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

[Mr. Hansell.]

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Speaker, before the dinner recess at six o'clock I was attempting to expound what I felt to be the object behind this measure for national housing. I had indicated that I thought the object was to retain to some extent the present inflationary trend; that the government were perhaps much concerned lest we should go into a state of recession by reason of the calling in of bank loans, and they felt one way to avoid that was to bring in a measure such as this in order to permit the banking institutions to lend money on mortgages.

In making those points I referred to several speeches that had been made in the house and to a press clipping which indicated that many were of the opinion that the chartered banks loaned their depositors' money. I referred to a little article which appeared some weeks ago in the Ottawa Sentinel, and I suggested that the editor of the Sentinel also indicated that he believed that the banks loaned their depositors' money. I quoted from that article, and after six o'clock one of my colleagues reminded me that while it was quite possible that one could get that impression from the article, at the same time the editor of the Sentinel may have realized something that was more or less hidden behind the lines of that article. May I repeat what the editor said:

> The only way they could enter the home mortgage business on a worth-while level would be by calling in existing loans.

The thought he may have intended to express was that the banks had almost reached the limit of their expansion, that is ten to one, and in order to go any further, which they were not permitted to do by the law unless they increased their cash reserve, they would have to call in some loans in order to continue their method of financial expansion. I make that possible correction because I want to be fair in my appraisals of quotations.

When we adjourned for the dinner recess it will be recalled that I had indicated I would bring to the house some authentic information which would refute any idea whatsoever that the banks loaned the savings of their depositors. I should like to refer now to evidence taken by the banking and commerce committee of this house in 1939. In the first instance I shall quote questions put to Mr. Towers, the governor of the Bank of Canada, who I think we must accept as an authority on these matters, by Mr. Jaques, who was then a member of this house. I quote from page 455 as follows, where they were talking about the banks lending the savings of the depositors:

Q. I understood you to say they could not loan what did not belong to them.—A. The banks, cannot, of course, loan the money of their depositors. What the banks have done is to make loans and investments which result in a certain sum total of deposits.

For the sake of brevity I do not think I need read any further. Then follows an expansion of that idea. The point I wanted to bring forth was that the governor of the Bank of Canada said that the banks cannot of course loan the money of their depositors. At page 398 Mr. McGeer put the following question:

Q. So that if they have got up to the point where they have got bank deposits to lend—

It would appear as though at this point the governor of the Bank of Canada sort of butted in without waiting until Mr. McGeer completed his question, because he went on to say:

A. Well, they do not lend their deposits, of course.

That is pretty specific. Then I should like to quote from page 238 where the questions are being asked by Mr. Landeryou. I might point out that with the exception of Mr. McGeer it was Social Crediters who were asking these questions. I quote:

Q. Now, if the government went to the bank with $1,000,000 in bonds there would be an increase of $1,000,000 in the amount of money in the hands of the people in the form of deposits?—A. Assuming that no other change had taken place in the bank's position at that time, yes.

Q. In other words, when the $1,000,000 worth of bonds is presented to the bank a million dollars of money or the equivalent is created?—A. Again assuming that there is no decrease in its other investments or loans.

Q. I mean at the time, at the moment.—A. Yes.

Q. It is a fact that a million dollars of new money is created?—A. That is right. Of course, governments should not always go to banks in that connection; they should sell their bonds to investors.

That is true. That is what the government was doing throughout the time of war, but the result has not been very different because when they went to the people to ask them to buy bonds, the people in turn went to the banks to borrow money and the banks took the bonds as collateral and then issued new money by way of the loans, and the credit of the country was thus expanded.

Mr. Blackmore: They created it.

Mr. Hansell: They created it out of nothing. The questions continue:

Q. Yes. Now, the same thing holds true when the municipality or the province goes to a bank?—A. Or an individual borrower.

Q. Or when a private person goes to a bank.—A. Yes.

That should settle the argument, but I doubt whether it will. I am quite certain that if the same discussion comes up at the next session somebody is bound to bob up and say that the banks lend their depositors' money. They do not; they issue freshly-created money. That is the method of expansion by the banks.

I would like to refer once again to the remarks made yesterday by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) because he made a point I thought was rather well taken in this connection, although I believe the hon. member is still under the impression that the banks lend their depositors' money. But here are the remarks of the hon. member as they appear on page 1329 of Hansard for January 21, 1954:

It is one thing, sir, to expand credit on commercial loans for a period, we will say, of nine months, but it is another thing to expand credit on mortgages having a lifetime of 25 or 30 years. In other words, it is an entirely new field so far as the banks are concerned.

The point the hon. member has made is to my mind the reason why the insurance scheme was written into the legislation. A period of 25 or 30 years is a long time to continue this expanded credit, because there is another side to this picture, namely that while the banks create new money every time they make a loan, that new money becomes the deposits of the people. These deposits, or savings if you will, in turn become a liability as far as the banks are concerned, because they have to pay that money out on demand. While it is true the banks, in making loans, release a fresh supply of money created out of nothing, these loans become deposits and automatically become liabilities to the banks. If the banks have to meet these liabilities over a period of 25 or 30 years then I personally do not blame them for saying, "If you want us to do that you had better guarantee us against loss". After all, their depositors and they themselves must be protected though, as previous speakers have emphasized, the government in providing that protection has made the prospective home owner pay the shot.

I have been dwelling on this matter of savings, and it may perhaps be presumed there are large savings deposits in the banks, but if there are I am inclined to think these savings must be in a minority of accounts. I say that because credit buying in Canada has now reached an all-time high. If saving deposits in the banks were as large as some might assume, then credit buying would become less and less all the time. Instead of that it is constantly growing, and the bill itself in a sense is an accentuation of that very situation, although I am not criticizing the bill on that account because in the final analysis it is a choice of whether one wants to pay rent or put some money into what will in time become an asset.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to reach an anticlimax in the last few minutes at my disposal, and I will therefore conclude this part of my speech by saying once again that this bill to my mind is purely a financial rather than a housing measure. It is a purely financial measure designed to perpetuate the government's present inflationary policy.

The other points I want to make are in respect of administration. I believe it is time notice was taken of certain matters of administration under this bill. I believe any contractor or anyone who undertakes to build a house for a client should be bonded in some way or other so the borrower or the person building a home will not lose his money. I am not blaming the government for this, nor is it the fault of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, but something has gone wrong in the initial administration in regard to some of these loans.

I wish to bring one case in particular to the attention of hon. members. I want to make it public not because I am blaming the minister but because other people should know what is liable to happen. I have a case here where a gentleman wanted to build a home. He got in touch with a contractor, evidently through a real estate firm, and he applied for a loan. He made a deposit of $1,330 with either the real estate firm or the contractor, I am not too clear which; but in any event either the contractor or the real estate firm in the meantime went broke and the result was that this prospective home owner lost his $1,330. I took the case up with the minister and he was good enough to look into it and inform me of the exact situation. I am sure the minister will not mind if I read his explanation into the record. This concerns the case of Mr. W. L. Blackburn and his National Housing Act loan application. This gentleman resides at Pincher Creek, Alberta. The minister's explanation was as follows:

> Mr. Blackburn's loan application (without any deposit) was filed with the Lethbridge branch of the corporation by a local real estate firm. It was not necessary to deposit any money with the application. On June 5 that office wrote to Mr. Blackburn and informed him that his application had been declined. The deposit was never under the control of Central Mortgage, nor was the real estate firm authorized to act on behalf of the corporation.
> I am very sorry that Mr. Blackburn has not been successful in having his deposit refunded and can only suggest that he consult a solicitor forthwith.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that some steps should be taken to protect a person in that situation. There must be hundreds of people who do not know exactly what the initial procedure is in regard to these things. I believe every contractor and real estate firm that has anything whatsoever to do with the National Housing Act should be bonded so that when a person undertakes a loan he will not lose any money under the bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have another couple of things I wanted to suggest but I see your keen eye on me and on the clock, so I had better stop. When this bill goes to committee I will perhaps ask the minister some questions along the lines I have indicated, and which I still wish to pursue. Let me conclude by emphasizing that I believe this bill is designed to perpetuate the present financial policy of the government.

Mr. T. H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of entering this debate until last night when my friend the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. (Regier) mentioned part of my own riding and said that it was covered with tarpaper shacks. I am trying to get a federal post office from the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) and it has been quite a hard selling job. I do not want him to think that Burnaby is a municipality of tarpaper shacks.

My hon. friend is new in the house and I want to be kind to him, but for the minister's information may I say that in 1953 the building permits in Burnaby totalled $20,697,000. There were 1,400 house permits granted to the value of over $10 million. Permits were granted for 14 apartments to the value of one-half million dollars, and permits for the extension of homes for the aged to the value of $134,000. Through you, Mr. Speaker, may I assure the minister that Burnaby is not a conglomeration of tarpaper shacks. We are extremely proud of our municipality. We believe that we have the finest residential section in British Columbia. I am quite sure the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam will take the first opportunity of retracting the remarks he made last night.

What I am concerned about in this debate are the statements made today by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) and the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston).

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Good.

Mr. Goode: Both of them were intelligent speeches, if I may say so—the hon. member for Bow River and I usually agree—but both of them suggested that the minister should consider deleting the $1,400 down payment and changing it to one of something like $500.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Does the hon. member not think that would be good?

Mr. Goode: No.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Would the hon. member raise it?

Mr. Goode: Yes, I would.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Good.

An hon. Member: Attaboy, Kingfish.

Mr. Goode: If the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. MacDougall) will allow me to proceed, I would feel much better without his help.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): He is just encouraging the hon. member. The hon. member needs some supporters over there.

Mr. Goode: I have plenty. To my mind, Mr. Speaker, the purchasing of a home is a very serious matter. I do not think the down payment is the most important thing in connection with the purchase of a home in these days.

Mr. Argue: Except if you have not got it.

Mr. Goode: Could be. I remember as a young fellow—

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): That was a long time ago.

Mr. Goode: It was; but not quite so long ago as in the case of the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If that private conversation over there is intended for me, may I say that I cannot hear it.

Mr. Argue: No interruptions from behind the curtain.

Mr. Goode: Mr. Speaker, I was proceeding with the idea—and I hope I shall be allowed to do so without too much further interruption—that a $1,400 down payment on a $10,000 home is not too much. What is the down payment on a home? What does it mean to the young people who are thinking about purchasing a new home today? In my case—and I expect the same is true in the case of every member in this house—my wife and I saved over many months and many years, perhaps depriving ourselves of some things that we needed, putting away a few dollars each month, hoping the time would arrive when we would have enough money to go into a home of our own.

Today conditions are a little different from those prevailing when the hon. member for Bow River and I were young. Most of the young married people, or at least a good percentage of them, are both working. We see that situation prevailing in the House of Commons with respect to the staff; and the situation is no different back home in British Columbia. Many of them are working. If my investigations are correct, over 90 per cent of the people purchasing homes in that locality today are under 33 years of age. They are young people.

It seems to me a good thing that the minister should hold the down payment to $1,400. If the hon. member for Bow River and the hon. member for Broadview will consider their figures again, and will take into consideration a $500 down payment and the equity that young people would have in a house at the end of a year with the monthly payments suggested in the bill, they will find that those payments including the down payment would not equal the depreciation on that home. I do not think young people should expect to purchase homes on terms of that kind. The buying of a home is something you and I do only once in our lives. It is something we live for, save for and deprive ourselves for—over a number of years. I would rather see a young couple deprive themselves of many things in order to save $1,400 than see the government make it easy for them to purchase a house with a down payment of $500. I believe the minister and the government are taking the proper attitude in maintaining that down payment at the figure they have suggested in this bill. I wanted to make these remarks—

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): The hon. member thinks that is the purpose of the down payment?

Mr. Goode: The hon. member made his speech today and he said about everything he wanted to say. Mr. Speaker, I do not appreciate too greatly the continued interruptions by the hon. member for Bow River.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I would not expect that the hon. member would.

Mr. Goode: I have said what I wanted to say. I hope the minister maintains the down payment at the present figure of $1,400. I shall support the bill, and I think the minister is to be congratulated on bringing in this legislation.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, in the early stages of these debates, particularly, I have frequently heard members say they had looked over the new bill and received it more in sorrow than in anger. I am sorry I cannot make that statement today. As a matter of fact, as I look at the bill it provokes in me feelings both of sorrow and of anger. Surely the test of any housing bill must be this. Is it going to provide more housing for the people of the country than is provided by the legislation which it replaces? On that test I do not think there is any question but that this bill will be an utter failure and that it will not supply materially more housing than has been supplied by the legislation we have on the statute books at the present time.

The scheme which the bill contains has had a good deal of publicity which has led a large number of people to think it will be easier for them to obtain housing. In other words it has given rise to a great many hopes. I am very much afraid that the hopes of most of these people are not going to be realized. I cannot see where this particular legislation is going to make it possible for many more people to secure housing than were able to secure it under the old act.

On the face of it, of course, the lowering of the down payment to 10 per cent, or the so-called lowering of it, and the increase in the amortization period to 25 years, would make it appear that a great many more people would be able to take advantage of the provisions of the National Housing Act than have been able to do so up to date. This was certainly the idea which I myself secured when the legislation was announced. Whilst I was home over the holidays a considerable number of people expressed this opinion to me, and also expressed the hope that under this new legislation they would at last be able to secure a home.

An examination of this legislation, however, as it is likely to work out in practice, has convinced me at least that a very small number of people who were not in position to take advantage of the old act will be benefited. In other words, I am sorry to say, I have to come to the conclusion that the bill is, in the words of a parliamentarian of the last century, "a delusion, a mockery and a snare."

Mr. Harris: Are you opposed to it?

Mr. Harkness: What the government is doing in this bill, Mr. Speaker, is playing what they no doubt think is smart politics. They tell the people they have given them a 10 per cent down payment house, which sounds very attractive. It is something about which a large number of people have been talking for a long time. However, the catch is that this house has to be built for $8,000, and it has to be built to the standards set by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The government knows just as well as anyone in this chamber that a house of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation standards cannot be built for $8,000, in most parts of this country at least. Thus, in effect, there is no such thing as a 10 per cent down payment.

As has been pointed out by several speakers already, on what most of us would consider to be the minimum priced house which could be built, that is $10,000, the down payment is going to be $1,400 or 14 per cent. A house costing probably closer to the average, we will say $12,000, will require a down payment of $2,000 or 16·6 per cent. In other words, there is no such thing as a 10 per cent down payment. It is a misnomer, a snare and a delusion. Whether or not it has been done by design, this bill has certainly roused false hopes in the minds of a large number of people.

I know the government defenders of this bill will say that the down payment has been considerably reduced, that on a $10,000 house it has been reduced from $2,000 to $1,400. Many more people, it is said, will then be able to buy a house because of this reduced down payment. Undoubtedly some people will benefit. A certain number of people who could not raise $2,000 will be able to raise $1,400. However, not nearly as many people will be benefited as one would imagine.

Over the Christmas recess I talked to a number of builders in Calgary, who told me that as many as 70 per cent of the people who had built houses during the past year with a $2,000 down payment had borrowed between $500 and $1,000 in order to meet that down payment. These people had gone to their relatives, friends or other sources and borrowed this money in order to get the down payment. It would seem, therefore, that a considerable number of people having less than $2,000, but having $1,400, have already been taken care of. The number who will be able to benefit by this reduction in the down payment is much less than one might otherwise expect.

The chief reason, however, that not so many people will be able to benefit from the bill is that the number who will be able to meet the monthly payment required is not greatly increased. The change in the monthly payment is more or less infinitesimal. As an example, on a $10,000 house there will be a mortgage of $8,600. If we assume that is going to be at 5·5 per cent interest, which has been rather a common assumption here although the minister said it would be between 5 and 6 per cent, the monthly payment required to amortize this over 25 years comes to $52.50. I believe this afternoon the minister said, when some such figure was quoted, that it was $52.45. The five cents is not very material.

Under the existing scheme, on a $10,000 house where a $2,000 down payment has been made, with an $8,000 mortgage amortized over 20 years at 5·25 per cent, the monthly payment is $53.66. In other words there is a difference of only $1.16 per month or $13.92 per year. That is all the man buying a minimum priced house at $10,000 will save. This means that only a small number of people who were not able to buy a house before because their monthly salary was not sufficient will now be able to do so. As a matter of fact, I would think that with the other factors to be considered there would be no difference whatever.

During this debate it has been assumed, and the minister has never said anything to the contrary, that one of the rules which will continue in effect will be that 23 per cent of income is the maximum which may be paid for housing. So far as a $10,000 house is concerned, we must add to the payment of $52.50 for amortization the amounts for taxes and fire insurance. The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) put certain figures for taxes and fire insurance on the record this afternoon. In his calculations he arrived at a yearly income of $3,860, and the minister has not disputed that. I allowed a much smaller amount for taxes and fire insurance, $16 per month.

Mr. Winters: I think I should make it clear, as I attempted to do this afternoon, that the figure of $3,860 is the figure one arrives at assuming a lending value of $12,000. Of course if the lending value is more or less than that a corresponding figure will be determined by that same formula.

Mr. Harkness: I am assuming a $10,000 house with a mortgage of $8,600, and calculating that we still get this figure of $52.50 a month, you add another $16 for taxes and insurance. I am sure the minister will say that is the absolute minimum for taxes and insurance. There are very few places where you could get them for that. The total monthly payment required is then $68.50. This should work out as being 23 per cent of $297.80, or nearly $300.00 per month, a yearly income of $3,600. Now, that is the income required to purchase a minimum priced house. No one with an income below approximately $3,600 is going to derive any advantage from this bill. I believe that has been pointed out.

The unfortunate fact is that the majority of the citizens of this country have incomes lower than $3,600. This housing bill is not for them at all. This measure has not been designed for the lower income groups in this country. I do not know that we should even speak of them as the lower income group. It has not been designed for at least two-thirds of the citizens in this country. Surely a housing scheme which is designed for the people in the upper one-third of the income brackets of this country could hardly be fairly called a national housing scheme.

Another matter which has received a considerable amount of criticism and in respect of which the bill can be criticized is the interest rate. It has been indicated to us that an interest rate of 5½ or 6 per cent is what we are likely to have in connection with this housing scheme, and that this rate is to be allowed on what would amount to guaranteed loans. I realize the guarantee is not to the extent of 100 per cent, but it gets pretty close to that. For all practical purposes, these are guaranteed loans. It does not seem to me that a rate of 5½ or 6 per cent is justified on loans of this kind.

There has been a good deal of talk about whether it will be possible to get sufficient money from lending institutions, including the banks, to finance the building we would all like to see. I do not wish to discuss that phase of the matter at the moment, but it seems to me that with a guaranteed loan there should be a possibility of getting the money at interest rates lower than 5½ or 6 per cent. Certainly I do not know where money could be invested, with practically no risk, at anything like those rates of interest. Rates of that kind are being secured where there is a considerable amount of risk.

To sum up this phase of the matter I would say that this whole thing looks very much like one of those schemes where the government is promising a great deal, where it is doing a lot of talking about the benefits which will be secured by Canadians from this legislation, but where actually it is handing to the Canadian people a fully inflated paper bag containing practically nothing.

What the public should understand in connection with this bill—and, so far as I have been able to determine, what it does not understand—is that there are several things which make it much less attractive than it has thus far been represented. First of all, I have found that a great many people have not gone ahead to secure housing because they are waiting for this scheme to come into operation. They have been thinking that they would secure houses more easily and cheaply under this scheme than was possible before. One thing the general public should understand is that houses under this scheme will not be available for some time. I have heard from builders that it will be at least five or six months.

Then, on the average, the down payment is not much less than it was under the old scheme. On what one might call an average house costing $11,000 the down payment is only about $250 less than it was under the old scheme, and that is not a very material difference. Certainly it will not enable many more people to take advantage of housing legislation.

The third point is that the end cost of houses under this scheme is going to be considerably higher, and this is inevitable due to the 5½ per cent interest rate and the longer period of amortization.

The fourth point the general public should understand before it gives or withholds approval is that the new plan is not designed for the lower income groups. It will do them no good whatsoever.

I suggest that nothing the minister and members supporting the government have said in connection with this housing bill comes to grips with the realities of the housing situation in Canada. As I have said, the great majority of our population cannot secure homes under this or any other plan, because their incomes are too low. What does the government envisage for the majority of the people in this country in the matter of housing? It is quite evident, I suggest, that the government has no plans for them. Those people are going to be left to their own devices, and without housing. So far as the government is concerned that is all there is to it.

A housing scheme in this country should produce houses that the majority of people in the lower income groups could secure. I suggest that is by no means impossible. We have heard a considerable amount of talk about subsidized housing from members in the C.C.F. I do not think it is necessary to go into subsidized housing in order to secure homes for the middle and lower income groups. There are two ways in which cheaper houses can be produced. The first is by improved efficiency in the building of the houses, and the lowering of costs. This involves a considerable number of factors, including prefabricated houses and utilizing other building techniques. It also involves more efficient work on the part of contractors and carpenters, plumbers, bricklayers and other tradesmen who are connected with the building of houses. I do not think many people will believe, for example, that it is not possible to lay more bricks per hour or to put on more square feet of plaster per hour than has been done or is being done, on the average, in the building of houses today.

More efficient building methods and the utilization of new techniques can reduce building costs quite considerably. I suggest, too, that houses can be built at a lower cost for the lower income groups by lowering the present standards set by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. No one maintains that everybody has to have a suit of clothes worth $100 or an automobile worth $3,000. Similarly, I do not see why it should be considered that everybody should have, let us say, a $10,000 or a $12,000 house.

It is quite possible to build smaller houses than are required by present standards. They can be built without many of the costly features and at much less money. I know this is so because in Alberta we have several examples. A number of attractive small houses have been built at Devon, an area that I know is familiar to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham). I think he will agree that they are attractive. They have been sold for as low as $5,500 to the present occupants. They are not slums or shacks. Many of them are attractive, and they are well built. A few more houses of somewhat similar design have been built just west of Calgary, at Cochrane, as part of the power development.

Mr. Prudham: Would the hon. member recommend these as family houses?

Mr. Harkness: Yes, I certainly would. A large number of those houses, at any rate, are quite satisfactory for small families, and would be available at a cost which people could afford. Thousands upon thousands would be able to get out of basement suites and one-room flats, thus getting away from the very bad living conditions they have to suffer.

During the last summer I did a considerable amount of canvassing, and I was horrified by the living conditions I found right in the city of Calgary. Numbers of people were hived up in little shacks. There are in that city even now a considerable number of what we used to call homesteader shacks. They came as a sort of package deal from the T. Eaton Company and various lumber companies. They have slanting roofs and are built like chicken coops. I had not seen any of them on the prairies; they disappeared from the farms years ago. But they are still there right in the city of Calgary, and fair-sized families are living in them. Certainly houses such as have been built at Devon and various other places in Alberta are so much superior and so much better that I do not think anybody would dispute that people would be much better off living in houses of that sort.

As a matter of fact I think one of the chief reasons so many in the lower income groups cannot secure housing is the standards set by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and by municipal authorities. It seems to me that a great deal of the lack and need of housing could be met at the present time by setting aside an area just beyond where present building is taking place—I mean outside of a city—and applying to it much lower building restrictions than exist at the present time in the cities of Canada.

I see nothing in the world wrong, for example, with a house that has 750 or 800 square feet rather than the 1,150 or 1,200 required by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I see nothing whatever wrong with building houses with softwood floors, fir floors rather than hardwood floors, and there are various other things along the same lines. If that is done, and it can be done quite readily, houses can be built, as they actually have been built in Alberta, for prices ranging from $5,500 up to $7,500, houses which would be quite satisfactory to a large number of people and which they would be delighted to get.

Another matter that has arisen during the debate and about which quite a bit has been said is the shortage of serviced land.

Mr. Winters: I did not want to interrupt the hon. member while he was in the middle of a particular theme, but I should like to say to him now that the houses at Devon which he commended so highly were all financed under the National Housing Act.

Mr. Harkness: I am very glad to hear it. I did not know how they were financed, but I spoke to one of the contractors who built some of them and he told me they had sold at prices ranging from $5,500 to $7,500. I have never since been able to see any reason why the same thing could not be done on the outskirts of Edmonton, Calgary, Toronto, or any city that you wish to mention.

I had started to say something about serviced land. I think one of the chief reasons there is so little serviced land is that everybody is trying to build in a few places in or immediately adjacent to large cities. This matter is tied up with the decentralization of industry. There have been many speeches in the house urging the government to take what steps it could to bring about the decentralization of industry, but unfortunately very little has been done. As a result more and more people are rushing to Toronto, Montreal and such areas, bringing about a terrific shortage of serviced land.

There are plenty of communities throughout Canada where serviced land would not be difficult to obtain. There are plenty of communities where the people already there would be delighted to see more building, in the smaller cities and towns. I think that part of the problem could be met very readily by encouraging loans in such areas, but those are the very areas where it is difficult for people to get loans. In the smaller places it is much more difficult in most cases to get C.M.H.C. financing than in places like Toronto, Montreal, Calgary, Edmonton or Vancouver.

Perhaps I have given the impression that I think very little of the bill, and that is the case. The only reason I will vote for it is that it will help a very limited number of people, and in view of the fact that it will help a limited number of people I cannot see my way clear to vote against it. But certainly the number of people it will help is so limited that I think the government should allow the bill to be amended when it is before the banking and commerce committee in such a way that it will become of some real value.

Mr. O. L. Jones (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I listened with interest to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) refer to the tarpaper shacks in his riding. Tonight we heard the member for the adjacent riding of Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Goode) more or less denying it but apologizing for the condition. Neither of these members needs to worry at all, because you will find tarpaper shacks in every riding in this dominion. As a matter of fact I venture to say that more tarpaper shacks were built last year than all the units under Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. They continue to be built for the simple reason that while these people are not anxious to live in these shacks, they cannot meet the requirements of this bill or any government legislation that has ever existed so far as the securing of a home is concerned.

These are the people who need homes; therefore I am going to say a few words on their behalf. I do not intend to deal with the particular bill before us, a bill that I call one for the upper ten. It does not have anything to do with the group to whom I am going to refer. Hansard will disclose that several excellent speeches have been made contributing, to my mind, very valuable information which if made use of would help solve the housing problem. That applies to members of every party who have spoken.

The housing problem is a growing one, and during the last few years we have not even held our own with the housing demand. I am not blaming the government entirely. I am blaming what is commonly called free or private enterprise even more, for it has failed us. For instance, insurance companies entered the housing field when they had no other outlet for their funds. They took things over lock, stock and barrel for the purpose of investment, not as a scheme to supply homes for the people of Canada. When other more lucrative fields opened up they withdrew from the scene, and the banks will do the same thing in a few years' time.

The free or private enterprise group of builders in this country have practically left the speculative field of building entirely alone, and they are not interested in coming back to it. Neither the government nor private enterprise have given a thought to the millions of Canadians whose earnings are below the $3,600 or $3,700 mark. We in this group are particularly worried about these people, and we are not alone. There are many Liberal, Conservative and Social Credit members who are just as alarmed that nothing is being done for these people.

It may well be that after the next election several of the present members will not return to the house. They may fail at the polls or they may not be chosen. What is going to be their lot? Many of them will be entitled to the maximum pension of $3,000 a year, and after living in Ottawa for so long they will need homes. Under this scheme they will come to the government for a home under this act but every one of them will be turned down. I feel that the lending provisions should be broadened to take account of character, because I fail to see why any former member with a steady income of $3,000 who applies for a loan should be turned down. I think his character should be sufficient recompense for the lack of the $700 needed to make up the necessary income.

I have taken certain figures from the 1951 census. I find that we have 5½ million wage earners in Canada, 4 million of whom earn less than $3,000 a year, and one out of three less than $2,000 a year. Furthermore I find that in the large cities 32 per cent of all workers, married and single, earn less than $1,500 a year. Ottawa, for instance, has 24 per cent of its wage-earning heads of families receiving less than $2,000 a year. This bill does not mean a thing to them. Its language is not understood by them, and the intention of the bill is not to cover them.

[Mr. Jones.]

Yet I feel that if any particular group needs assistance it is the group with incomes of less than $3,500 a year. It is this group that needs homes. Other people can find other means to raise money to build their own homes, through the loan companies or banks, and they would do so if this scheme were not in effect. These people are the victims of economic conditions, quite often beyond their control. I will admit that sometimes it is their own fault, but generally speaking they are the victims of our present system. But they too are human; they too have feelings; they too have families; they too have children they would like to have properly housed. They would like decent homes in which to live just the same as the person getting $5,000 or $10,000 a year. That aspect has not been considered at all.

Bearing that in mind, I would suggest to the minister that after this bill is put through, as I presume it will be, he set up a commission to investigate ways and means of providing homes for this type of person who is industrious, who has a sound moral character, who is a good Canadian citizen, who was probably born in this country and who has prospects of raising a fine family. All he wants is some assistance in order to build a home.

The hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Leboe) made some reference to rural areas when he spoke. I feel the same as he does. Something should be done for the people in the rural areas who also need decent homes. All you need do is go by train or drive a car across this country, and in every province you will find evidence that what I say is absolutely true. A vast number of poorly-built houses, unpainted, sometimes covered with tarpaper, are to be found. To me they constitute a visible disgrace to a wealthy country like Canada.

Having concentrated on the urban areas, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation have neglected entirely this worth-while field. If the people in our rural areas were properly housed it would help to attract tourists to different points throughout the country where they could look at decent homes and see our citizens living under decent conditions. But today you see houses with holes in the roof, barns that are propped up in order to keep them from falling completely over. That kind of thing is not a credit to this wealthy country.

This bill will not change that at all. I am going to suggest that in addition to making a survey in connection with the low income group the minister also make a survey of the rural areas. As someone said, it is a good idea to have the people scattered instead of congested in possible slum areas. Under the old scheme the insurance companies and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation were not interested very much in the rural areas because the lack of fire protection and other facilities made their investment less safe than investment in organized centres.

But I would point out that even though there may be a lack of such facilities in the rural areas, they would find a higher moral responsibility among the people. Those people would be more likely to look after the loan they had acquired in order to build a home. They would meet their obligations on a higher moral basis than the people in organized centres. I realize I am sticking out my neck, but it is my impression that people in the country have a high standard of morality. This would compensate for the lack of fire-fighting equipment and other things. If we are going to assist these people it is essential that money be made available at not more than 2 per cent. Other speakers have dealt with this so I shall not go into any further detail.

I am almost sure it was the last Liberal government of British Columbia that paid particular attention to housing in rural areas. They reduced taxation on farm homes to a nominal amount in order to encourage the painting and improvement and enlargement of homes, as well as installing facilities such as baths and toilets inside the houses. Over the last few years those concessions have resulted in a definite improvement in the homes being built and those already built. That is quite evident as you cross the province of British Columbia today.

I suggest to the minister that he instruct the banks to be particularly helpful to the borrowers in rural areas, to reverse the treatment that these people have received during the last year or two from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Mr. Auguste Vincent (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, after looking at this bill I have the impression that I have looked at Aladdin's lamp, because it seems to me it contains magic. Some people look at the bill and say, "The banks will be taking over the mortgage business." Other people look at the bill and say, "The government is going out of the mortgage business." This afternoon I heard hon. members describe the bankers as profiteers, while others described the bankers as the men who would be dragged up and forced to tell the poor man who could not pay his mortgage money that foreclosure was his lot. Whom are we to believe?

I believe sincerely that we have a middle of the road bill. If the Canadian public were in the galleries tonight I think they would know why they had elected the Liberal party to power. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) and the government have paved the way for constructive suggestions. I do not think everything that has been said by the opposition is wrong, but on the other hand I do not think everything contained in the bill is wrong. After all, we are lawmakers and we should use common sense. To me this bill is common sense.

I understand that this bill is going to give the banks greater powers, as has been stated by some hon. members. As I have said, other hon. members have stated that these powers would be centralized in the government's hands. The reality is that the government is going to guarantee the loans and in effect will use the offices of the banks and their available liquid assets in order to make those loans. Many hon. members are businessmen and they know what it costs in the way of upkeep, etc., to run an office. I am sure that before this bill was drafted the government conferred with the banks and came to some agreement under which they would use their facilities so there would be more offices and more available assets from which to serve the Canadian people in a more efficient way.

As I said a while ago, the Minister of Public Works in bringing this legislation forward has paved the way for suggestions. As the bill is going to go to the banking and commerce committee I consider it my privilege to make a few suggestions to the government. I am sure they will be welcomed, because this is not a hush-hush bill, nor is it a camouflaged bill. The minister placed the bill before the house on December 16, just before the recess, in order that hon. members would be aware that it would be discussed after the recess. In doing so I think the government deserves to be congratulated, for it provided hon. members with an opportunity to examine the legislation presently under discussion.

Under the old act, wherever lending institutions were granting loans Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation would not compete with private enterprise. This procedure had a somewhat harmful effect in certain regions. I cannot speak for all of Canada but I can speak for my own constituency of Longueuil. About 20 per cent of the population of the constituency of Longueuil benefited under the old act, and I believe that under the present bill more people will be able to benefit by Central Mortgage and Housing loans. Under the old act the lending institutions were providing 75 per cent of the amount of a loan while the government was supplying the remaining 25 per cent. "The man who pays the piper calls the tune"; therefore the lending institutions chose the regions in which they would operate and that is one of the reasons why approximately 80 per cent of my constituents did not benefit by C.M.H.C. joint loans under the old act. This new bill alters that situation and the Canadian people now are guaranteeing the loans.

It is true we are using the banks in making these loans, but the banks in each region are well aware of people's needs. They are in daily contact with the population, with business people and ordinary individuals. They know the people and they know their credit needs. It should also be borne in mind that the government is now guaranteeing these loans and therefore should be permitted to "call the tune".

I believe this is a well balanced bill. On the one hand we have the government guaranteeing the loans and on the other hand we have the services of the banks. The banks are not merely profiteers in this regard. After all they are giving service. They supply their offices, staff, and their liquid assets—we must remember that.

I believe that this bill, once it incorporates certain suggestions made by some hon. members, will be a good bill and the Canadian people will benefit by it. I do not think it is the desire of the Canadian people that they be given homes. If that were the case they would have elected a socialist government. The Liberal party and this government are striving to look after the welfare of the Canadian people and this bill in my estimation will, when enacted, become a welfare act.

Some hon. members have discussed the possibility of building better and more attractive homes. I agree with that. I believe we must strive to improve the architectural design of the Canadian home. A man is judged by the way he talks and a country is judged largely by its habitat. In other words, people coming into Canada will judge Canadians by the outward appearance of their homes. I would suggest that the government give further consideration to this matter and encourage architects in Canada to design better and more attractive modern homes.

[Mr. Vincent]

I want to draw the attention of the government to one other point. On December 16, 1953, the Minister of Public Works stated, as reported at page 998 of Hansard:

> In addition, it is proposed to reduce the down payment from the 20 per cent now required under the National Housing Act. The amount of the loans will be 90 per cent of the first $8,000 and 70 per cent of the balance of the lending value," . . .

There is one suggestion I would like to make on this point. Would it not be possible to have the loan made in direct proportion instead of having it made in inverse proportion, because I think families who have three, four or five children would like to benefit from the long-term loan provisions of this bill. Canadians should be given the same advantage whether they require a $12,000 or $8,000 home. If the government would consider that I think it would be much appreciated by the Canadian people.

There is one other aspect I would like to touch on, and it concerns the federal-provincial scheme. I sincerely regret that the province of Quebec has not seen fit to accept the benefits of the National Housing Act. I would say it is one of the reasons we have such chaotic housing conditions in the vicinity of Montreal. In the city of Jacques Cartier we have about 30,000 people living without sewers and without the benefit of a water system. Under this act the provincial government could have assisted those people.

I would ask the government and the Minister of Public Works whether it would not be possible to approach the authorities in the province of Quebec and discuss this matter with them. By bringing this matter to their attention in a fair and frank manner the government might be able to persuade the authorities in the province of Quebec to accept the benefits of this section of the act. An agreement along these lines would relieve one of the greatest housing problems which exist in the region of Montreal. Conditions there have to be seen to be believed. I am not blaming any officials or any governments, but I would seriously urge the government to consider bringing this matter to the attention of the Quebec authorities and attempting to arrive at some arrangement whereby this area may be relieved of its housing problem.

In closing I wish to thank hon. members for having listened to me in this speech. I sincerely hope that all those concerned with the good of Canada will do their utmost—especially those who are members of the banking and commerce committee—to look into this bill and I hope that if any changes have to be made, they will be made constructively, for the benefit of all Canadians.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Longueuil (Mr. Vincent), who has just taken his seat, on the excellent speech he made. It is the first time I have heard him speak in the house, and I think perhaps it is his first speech, he being a new member. If it is, he certainly deserves great credit.

The subject we are discussing tonight is, of course, one in which we are all greatly interested, although perhaps the interest is not the same in all parts of Canada. As a matter of fact I greatly doubt whether the housing act affects us in the maritimes as much as it affects the people in Ontario or in Quebec in and around Montreal. It certainly does not affect us particularly in my own constituency, which is a rural one in which about 80 per cent of the people are interested in farming.

In our part of the country we have some vacant houses which we should be glad to have filled up by people coming in. As a matter of fact, last August when I was going through my constituency I visited a part of it in which there were a great many vacant houses, in fact over a thousand of them. It was rather sad to see so many vacant houses. At that time I thought that if only those houses were in some other part of Canada in which there is a scarcity of housing, what a great benefit it would be to some people. I am, of course, referring to the Gagetown camp training area which was taken over by the government a year ago.

It has been interesting to hear the prices mentioned for the construction of houses in this country. The thought came to me that on some of these farms there is a large house, a large barn and other buildings, but I doubt very much whether the farmer, for all his possessions—including house, land and so on—received $10,000. It seems that $10,000 is a great deal of money to pay for the building of a small house. I realize, of course, that this is a result of economic conditions, the scarcity of supplies with which to build houses, perhaps the great cost of the labour put into the house, and the high cost of serviced land on which it was built.

I am like everyone else in the house here. We are all interested in seeing that the people are properly housed. I am satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that it does not make any difference whether we are Liberal, Conservative, Social Credit or C.C.F.; we all have the same interest, namely that we want to see the people of this country properly housed. I know it makes no difference whether we live in the maritimes or in the west or what the economic situation is; we all have the same idea.

This Bill No. 102, which was explained by the minister the other day, as he told us is being substituted for the existing National Housing Act. Under that act many houses were built. I think the minister told us that some 80,000 houses were built last year. That is a large number of houses. We have heard the shortage of houses in Canada estimated by some at 200,000 and by others at 500,000. I do not think anyone really knows what the shortage of houses in Canada is today.

What this bill will do to overcome this great shortage we can only conjecture at the present time. I have my own ideas on the matter; other hon. members have theirs. It is difficult for us to say at this time just what the result will be. We will not know that result until the legislation has been in force and the activities under it have been tried out. Then only shall we be able to say what the result will be.

We expected great things of the National Housing Act. I remember when the debate took place in this house a few years ago. At that time we thought the National Housing Act was going to solve the housing problem here in the Dominion of Canada. Unfortunately it has not done so, and for that fact many reasons have been given. I have already mentioned some. We now understand that the great difficulty is the lack of money.

As I say, the object of this new bill is to build houses. This government bill proposes three things in order to carry out that purpose. The first is to reduce the down payment on a house to 10 per cent of the value and to extend the time for repayment to 25 or 30 years. We have had a great deal of comment upon this proposal. The second proposal is to put the chartered banks into the mortgage business and to have Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation insure the mortgages in order to protect the banks from loss. The premiums on this insurance are to be paid by the borrowers. The third proposal is to authorize the Bank of Canada to provide the chartered banks with cash on the security of the insured mortgages they hold.

As I said, under the National Housing Act there seemed to be no trouble raising money through the insurance companies. We were told by the minister a few days ago, I think, that the insurance companies sold government bonds to the extent of $800 million and also to the extent of $200 million more, making $1 billion that they invested in housing in this country. Of course it is the people's money which had been paid in to the insurance companies by way of premiums, but it was paid in over a long period of years. Insurance is something that you take out for 20 years or for life. It was not money that was payable on demand, and naturally the insurance companies could invest this money without feeling that those who had paid their premiums would be affected in any way.

Under this bill the money is to be obtained from the banks. Money is placed in banks, of course, under short-term arrangements, and it represents the savings of the Canadian people. The minister has told us that we shall have to change the Bank Act so it will provide for long-term investment instead of short-term lending. This is something which may not be regarded too lightly by the Canadian people. During the last few days we have heard many arguments to the effect that this proposal is not good as far as the investments of the people are concerned. The bank's first duty, of course, is to protect the savings of the depositors. The money is there to be called for at any time.

This afternoon the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) gave us an interesting lecture on the banking system. He said he was sure that certain members were not stupid, but certain statements they made to the effect that the money in the banks or lent by the banks was the depositors' money were altogether wrong. Well, I listened to the hon. member's lecture this afternoon, and I expect he will think I am stupid because I am afraid I did not derive very much benefit from it.

I am not an authority on the banking system of this country, but I do know that if a bank had no deposits—well of course that would be too ridiculous to consider, because you would not have a bank at all. It is certainly true that the smaller the bank and the fewer the deposits, the less lending that bank can do. The more deposits a bank has, of course, the more lending the bank can do and the better position it is in. As I say the deposits must, in some way, have something to do with the lending which a bank is in a position to do.

So far as the protection of the banks is concerned, the bill provides that mortgages will be given. The mortgages will protect the bank to a certain extent, and in that way the depositors will be protected also. It is true that the bill realizes that money must be deposited before it is made available, and provision has been made that will enable the banks to take the insured mortgages they hold to the Bank of Canada and get cash for them. This will not be the same kind of cash the depositors had earned and put into the banks for safekeeping. It will be cash fresh from the printing press. It will have cost the bank nothing, and will have no value except what it can absorb from the money which the people have earned and with which it will circulate.

The net upshot of the whole proceeding may be that the earned money which the people entrusted to the banks for safekeeping will have been removed and inflationary money which cost the bank nothing put in its place. This inflationary money will absorb value from the true money with which it will circulate, and everybody will find that his money has lost some of its value, though few will know how it happened.

The matter of mortgages has also been mentioned by a number of speakers. As was pointed out, the onus of foreclosing the mortgage will be placed upon the banks. Neither the government nor the government agencies will be in the position of having to carry this unpopular burden. The banks will have to bear it. I do not know what the number of foreclosures is likely to be. That is something which will be revealed in the future. I know that even people who have borrowed anything from one-half to two-thirds of the money to build a house have had to default, for different reasons, and the mortgage has been foreclosed. I am satisfied that with the granting of hundreds of thousands of mortgages there will be many which will have to be foreclosed.

I should like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that there are many reasons for the shortage of houses in Canada. The minister mentioned some the other day. People come to this country from other countries, and naturally in a cold country like Canada they need a place in which to live. Then there is the natural increase of population in this country. In addition there are other reasons. First, we have noticed that there is a movement of population from the rural areas to the towns and villages in every section of Canada. For instance, the older people used to live on the farms with their sons and daughters. Now they move into the villages and towns and take up small houses. Due to the great increase in mechanization of the farms, one or two men can run a farm which used to need three or four.

Another reason for the increased need for houses is the movement from one province to another. I can speak with knowledge of that because I know that from the three maritime provinces—perhaps I might say four without offending my good friends from Newfoundland—

Mr. Stick: The Atlantic provinces.

Mr. Brooks: We are all Atlantic provinces but there are three maritime provinces. There has been a continued exodus of people to the central part of Canada, to the large industrial centres such as Montreal, Toronto, Hamilton and other places. This has caused great congestion in these parts of Canada. It has also left vacant houses in the sections of the country from which those people came. I know young people have left my constituency to go to Toronto, and have left fairly good houses which have had to be sold at low prices. These houses would accommodate families with three, four or five children. The people have gone to Toronto or Montreal. When they return for a visit they tell you they live in one room or two rooms. It is impossible to find accommodation in the big cities.

I recall that last fall I was going through Montreal, and I met a young man whom I knew in the park in front of the Windsor hotel. He had his wife and three children with him. I asked him how he was getting along and he said that he was getting good wages but had no place to live. They were living in two rooms in a basement, and he said the only comfort they had was when they could take the children out to sit in the park.

This situation has developed in Canada as a result of our economic situation. I was pleased indeed to hear the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) suggest a solution. I think it is a solution which is linked up with the housing problem in Canada, and that is the decentralization of industry. We can accommodate two or three times the population we have in the maritimes, and we would have two or three times our population if we could retain our young people there and give them employment. I have often pressed for this in the House of Commons, and I believe we will always have an acute housing situation in Canada until there is some decentralization of industry in this country.

As the hon. member said, around Toronto and Montreal one of the great reasons housing costs so much is that you cannot get serviced land, with sewers and water and other things required for good housing. In the smaller towns and cities of the maritime provinces I am satisfied that you could get serviced land, and better land, for a third or a quarter of the cost up here in the larger centres.

I am not going to deal with this question at greater length. Of course if hon. members wanted to criticize they would say, "But you have not the facilities in the maritime provinces, especially in New Brunswick, to entice industry." This is very true. We want cheap electrical power in New Brunswick. That province has great possibilities so far as industrial development is concerned, but today we are being held back because we have not cheap electrical power, and our financial position does not merit our going into it too extensively, although the province is anxious to do so.

This is one way in which the federal government could assist the different provinces needing help. It could assist in the decentralization of industry and, in that way, relieve the housing problem. The problem is not a temporary one; it has existed since the last war, and even before that. And I am satisfied that as long as the present economic condition exists we will have these housing conditions.

I would hope that the regulations in connection with the building of houses would not be too strict. As member after member has pointed out, a man who has to earn his living by daily toil will not be in a position to buy or to build $8,000 or $10,000 houses. It is almost impossible for the working man today to build a house costing that much.

I recall that under the Veterans Land Act provision was made whereby veterans could build their own houses. Those houses were built under the supervision of the Department of Veterans Affairs. Over 10,000 of them were built by veterans in Canada, with the assistance of their friends and neighbours, bringing about a saving of about $2,000 on each house. There are thousands of men across Canada who would like to build their own homes and who, if given the opportunity, would do so. I hope the regulations will not be too strict and that every encouragement will be given prospective home owners for the construction of their own homes.

I do not think I have anything further to add. This bill will not help in any way the matter of slum clearance in our larger cities. I know of cities in which houses have been standing for a good many years. Due to the ravages of time and the fact that rentals paid have not permitted improvements, many of those houses today are in such a condition that they should be condemned. One can find this in practically every city in Canada.

Mr. Winters: This bill would help in that respect.

Mr. Brooks: The minister says the bill would help. I am thinking of a city I know better than any other, and I shall not mention it by name. The wooden houses in that city were built many years ago, and there are three or four tenants in each house. One will find whole streets of houses of that kind. Many years ago there was a fire in that city and it had to be rebuilt in a hurry. As the years have gone by the houses have become dilapidated. I doubt very much whether this bill would be of any benefit. The cost would be too great, and many other difficulties would face the builders.

I am not opposed to the bill; I do not intend to vote against it. I am one who wishes it every success, because a housing bill which will provide homes for our people is badly needed in this country. I hope this bill is the answer, but I cannot help feeling that it has many weaknesses.

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, ten minutes to ten o'clock on a Friday evening is not the most desirable time to make a speech in the House of Commons. I do not know, sir, whether you would wish me to call it ten o'clock.

Mr. Winters: Get a start, anyway.

Mr. Churchill: I want to be kind to the minister. I would not like to see the debate on such an important subject collapse at this moment, so that he would be called upon to wind up the debate when he is in an exhausted state, after having listened so patiently to the words of wisdom from this side of the house.

There can be no question about the importance of the bill before us. On its title page we find this: "An act to promote the construction of new houses, the repair and modernization of existing houses, and the improvement of housing and living conditions"—a very worthy objective indeed. Then the bill is divided into a series of parts. Part I is headed, "Insurance mortgage loans"; part II bears the heading, "Housing for rental purposes and land assembly", and part III, "Housing redevelopment", and so on.

In the last two days the attention of the house has been directed to part I, the new section. Most of the points in respect of that part have been covered most effectively by those who have preceded me in the debate. Consequently it is not my intention to indulge in any repetition with regard to these matters. I noticed that in his opening remarks yesterday the minister, with becoming modesty, said he and all of us, for that matter, are not complacent with regard to the housing situation in Canada. And he said that with good reason. There is no ground to be complacent about housing conditions in Canada.

The government has been in the housing business now for almost 20 years. As was pointed out yesterday, the Dominion Housing Act was passed in 1935 and then was superseded in 1944 by the National Housing Act, the latter act of course being the legislation we have before us now with modifications. What has happened during the 20 years? I think no scientific basis has been established for us to estimate the housing requirements of the nation. At page 1313 of Hansard for yesterday the minister said:

> The number of new housing units built in any one year must be related not only to our need for housing, but also to the effective demand by the Canadian people for housing.

I ran across the phrase "effective demand" eight years ago when I first began to investigate housing conditions in the city of Winnipeg. It is a very tricky phrase indeed. I do not know what its interpretation is, but I discovered when I was dealing with this matter that a distinction is made between need and effective demand. A married man surrounded by half a dozen children and living in two rooms may demonstrate to an investigator that he has a need for better housing conditions, but when you come to estimate his effective demand and find that he has not the money to put up for better rental premises or for the down payment on a new house, then you determine that he does not present any effective demand, and consequently does not affect the housing situation from that point of view. The minister may have a different interpretation of those words, but that was the way it was pointed out to me when I started to investigate housing.

It also seems to me, as was mentioned this afternoon, that sufficient emphasis has not been laid upon research to devise better and cheaper methods to erect houses in this country. Surely there is a great field there. In the 20 years that have elapsed, what has been done along that line? Mention has also been made of the advantage that would accrue if antiquated building restrictions were removed or modified to keep up with developments that have occurred in methods of constructing houses. That is tied in with the question of research. What is being done about that?

Scientifically, what is the backlog of housing in Canada? I think the minister used a figure of 100,000. Others say 500,000. Who knows? How do we determine it?

Why do we not know? Is there not some means of discovering not only the need but the effective demand for housing in Canada on a scientific basis?

Finally, when the minister was rewriting the act and bringing in the bill could he not have done something with parts II and III to correct their deficiencies? Have they met the need in Canada for low rental housing? Are these parts meeting the need for housing redevelopment, the so-called slum clearance?

If I have satisfied the minister with my introduction, Mr. Speaker, I should like to move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Churchill the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, on Monday we shall continue, and I hope conclude, this debate, followed by the second reading of the post office amendment act, followed then—

Mr. Knowles: Oh, no, that is enough.

An hon. Member: Stop right there.

Mr. Knowles: That is all we need for Monday.

Mr. Harris: —by those bills standing in the name of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys and in the name of the Minister of Veterans Affairs. On Tuesday we shall begin with the resolution standing in the name of the Prime Minister with respect to salaries and indemnities, followed by anything that has been named for Monday that has not been disposed of. Wednesday is private members' day. On Thursday we shall continue with any of the legislation I have already mentioned that has not been completed by that time. On Friday I understand it will be the unanimous desire of the house that we should debate external affairs. If that is the case, and if we are able to arrange a suitable formula by unanimous consent, the debate will take place throughout the afternoon of Friday and, I suppose, the evening. At any rate, we shall not name any particular business other than that debate for that day.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

ALLEGED PRICE MAINTENANCE, CHICOUTIMI—HOUSEHOLD SUPPLIES

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I now table three copies in English and three copies in French of a report concerning alleged attempted resale price maintenance in the sale of certain household supplies in Chicoutimi, lake St. John district, Quebec.

ELECTRICAL WIRE AND CABLE

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement in connection with a report under the Combines Investigation Act relating to the electrical wire and cable industry. In releasing this report in November last I stated that as soon as I had carefully examined the report and received the opinion of counsel I would make a further announcement as to the prosecution.

The matter was referred to Mr. J. D. Arnup, Q.C., of Toronto, who has advised that in his opinion the evidence justifies prosecution of some or all of the manufacturers mentioned in the report. The exact parties will be determined as the evidence is further examined in detail in course of preparation for trial. Mr. Arnup has been instructed to proceed with prosecution.

[Later:]

RUBBER GOODS—INQUIRY AS TO INVESTIGATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I should like to ask the Minister of Justice if he is in a position to tell us anything in connection with the rubber goods investigation recently concluded, information of the same nature as he gave us recently with respect to the alleged combine in electrical goods.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): In reply to my hon. friend's question, I may say that the prosecutions arising out of that report have been concluded except that the order prohibiting continuation or repetition of the offence, which was granted by the court in the mechanical rubber goods case, is under appeal to the court of appeal of Ontario. Naturally the question as to whether such an order will be granted in the other two cases, tires and tubes and accessories on the one hand and footwear on the other, was reserved by the trial judge until the judgment of the court of appeal on the application for the prohibiting order in the mechanical rubber goods case is delivered.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NESBITT—REFERENCE IN DEBATE TO ONE RAYMOND CARD

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, in my remarks last Thursday in connection with the National Housing Act I made reference during the course of my remarks to a civil servant named Raymond Card. My remarks were as follows:

> I am informed that Mr. Card came to Canada from England in 1907 and originally set up as an architect. After a brief career in this field he entered the firm of the T. Eaton Company, for which, I am told, he worked as floor manager for some 17 years.

Since that time I have received information from the minister which leads me to the conclusion that, without question, those remarks are not correct. And since I have no desire to be unfair to Mr. Card, or to misrepresent anyone in respect of his qualifications, I should like to have those remarks removed where I state that Mr. Card was an employee of the T. Eaton Company for 17 years. I am quite satisfied he was not, and that he has been an architect ever since he came here.

I might say that I believe the cause for this misinformation was that Mr. Card, who is chief architect for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, has a brother who was also an architect and who has had business with the T. Eaton Company.

MR. FLEMING—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT IN DEBATE BY MR. BROWN (BRANTFORD)

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I was not in the house on Thursday evening at the particular time the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Brown) was speaking in the housing debate. It was only upon reading the newspapers next day that I found he had attributed to me in his speech on Thursday evening a statement that the banks would not co-operate. I find, in referring to his speech at page 1344, that the hon. member for Brantford said, in referring to the speech I had made earlier the same day:

> The hon. member for Eglinton thought that the banks would not co-operate.

Mr. Speaker, you know that is the very opposite to what I did say. At page 1329 you will find what I said in my speech that afternoon. These are my words:

> I know we can assume that the banks will co-operate.

I hope the hon. member will be more accurate in his statements in future.

PATENTS OUTSIDE CANADA—PAYMENTS

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West):

What was the total estimated amount of money paid by Canadian citizens, Canadian corporations and government agencies for use of patents issued outside of Canada, for each of the years 1950 to 1953 inclusive?

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if I may take this question and the five following and deal with them now. These questions have been discussed with the hon. member for Lambton West and I understand from the discussion that the hon. gentleman is agreeable to dropping the words "Canadian citizens, Canadian corporations and" in the first question, and with that amendment to have it made an order for return. Then the next question should be made an order for return as it stands; then the words "Canadian citizens or Canadian corporations including" should be dropped from the next question and it would then become an order for return. It is really impossible for the government to answer the next question from its records, and it should be dropped entirely. The next question should be made an order for return, and the one after that should be dropped.

Mr. Speaker: I understand there is an agreement between the hon. member for Lambton West and the minister that these questions are to be considered as either being dropped in certain instances, or, subject to modification in other instances, answered or made orders for returns.

4. If by contract, (a) who submitted tenders and what was the amount of each tender; (b) who was the contractor?

5. If the work was done by day labour, who was the foreman?

Mr. Bourget:

Referring to the red ensign which is hoisted daily on the tower of this building and the arms or ensigns armorial tierced in fesse, what is the height and length in inches and the heraldic signification of

2. a lion rampant within a double tressure flory-counter-flory gules;

3. azure a harp or stringed argent;

4. azure three fleurs-de-lis, or;

5. argent three maple leaves conjoined on one stem proper;

6. a royal helmet mantled argent doubled gules the crest, that is to say, on a wreath of the colours argent, and

10. Referring to No. 1, what is the official translation of "gules three lions passant guardant in pale or"?

11. Referring to No. 9, why does the union flag fly to the dexter and why does the banner azure charged with three fleurs-de-lis or fly to the sinister?

12. Is there any difference between (a) a lion rampant, (b) a lion passant and, (c) a lion passant guardant, and, if so, what is it?

13. At what date were the armorial bearings of the Dominion of Canada assigned by royal proclamation?

14. Who were the cabinet ministers of Canada at that time and what departments were they heading?

Mr. Pickersgill: This question would in the normal course of events be made an order for return, since it affects more than one department. The statistical material which is asked for in a number of the parts of the question is being furnished by the Department of Public Works, and I am tabling it as a part of the return. I am also tabling a list of the cabinet ministers asked for in part 14 of the question. The answer to part 13 is the 21st day of November, 1921. The answer to all the other parts of the question will be found in a publication put out by my department and printed by the queen's printer. I understand it can be secured for 25 cents. I have copies in both official languages which I intend to present to the hon. member for Temiscouata.

There is one part of the question, however, which I think I should refer to in the house, and that is the part asking for the official translation of the phrase "gules three lions passant guardant in pale or". The translation given in the proclamation is: "de gueules, à trois léopards d'or, l'un sur l'autre."

Now, sir, I am grateful to the hon. member for Temiscouata, and I am sure everyone else in the house will be, for letting us know that a French leopard can change its spots and become an English lion.

Mr. Pouliot: Because those leopards are spotless.

Mr. Pickersgill:

Department of Public Works:

The red ensign used daily on the peace tower is 12 feet by 5 feet 9 inches.

The space occupied by the shield is 23 inches long and 17¼ inches wide.

1. Gules three lions passant guardant in pale or, occupy 8½ inches in width and 7 inches in length.

The lions themselves are 6¼ inches high.

2. A lion rampant within a double tressure flory-counter-flory gules, occupies a space 8¾ inches wide and 7 inches long. The lion itself is 4⅜ inches long and 4¼ inches wide.

Each tressure is ¾ inches wide.

3. Azure a harp or stringed argent, occupies a space 7 inches wide and 5¾ inches long. The harp itself is 4½ inches wide and 5¾ inches long.

4. Azure three fleurs-de-lis, or, occupy space 6⅜ inches wide with ¾ of an inch between the top two and the bottom one, which is 2⅜ inches wide by 3 inches long.

5. Argent three maple leaves conjoined on one stem proper, occupy a space 9 inches long and 9¼ inches wide. From tip to tip they measure 9¼ inches and from the centre tip to bottom of stem 6¼ inches.

6 to 14. Not for this department.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

POINTE AUX OUTARDES—PROTECTION WALL

Mr. Dufresne:

For a copy of payrolls and lists of materials purchased, in connection with the construction of a protection wall at Pointe aux Outardes, Saguenay county, in 1952.

KURT MEYER

Mr. Drew:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, cablegrams, recorded telephone or other conversations between the government of Canada and any other government authority, person or persons and all documents in the government's possession relating to the trial, death sentence, commuting to a sentence of life imprisonment, the removal from the Canadian prison at Dorchester, New Brunswick, and the further commuting of sentence to imprisonment for fourteen years of Major General Kurt Meyer.

Mr. Claxton: This motion relates to several departments and I have been asked to state the government's position.

Parliament is not the place to try or retry criminal cases of any class and this has always been recognized in the past. Motions for the production of papers relating to trials and remissions of all kinds have not been allowed, as not being in accord with practice or the public interest.

As I stated in the house a few days ago, mixed consultative boards were set up to review sentences of all war criminals still in custody in western Germany. The British high commissioner set up the board to review the cases of all war criminals in custody in the British zone. Meyer and Neitz were among those in custody in the British zone and the Canadian government agreed that they should not be excluded from the review.

The government appointed an outstanding lawyer and a distinguished soldier, Brigadier Sherwood Lett, as observer during the proceedings and to advise the government.

The board recommended that the sentence be reduced to fourteen years. The recommendation was unanimous and it was supported by Brigadier Lett.

So far as is known, every recommendation of every board in every zone has been accepted by the government concerned.

In this case the Canadian government could either reject or accept the recommendation made by the board and supported by the observer appointed for the purpose. The government of Canada accepted the recommendation. I now table the orders in council giving effect to this decision, dated January 15, 1954, being P.C. 1954/74 and 75. The orders speak for themselves. Of course the government does, as it must, accept full responsibility for them.

For the reasons stated the government is opposing the motion.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that this motion might have been accepted by the government because there is no suggestion in this case of a retrial. The circumstances here are not the ordinary circumstances relating to the reconsideration of the punishment due to any convicted member of the armed forces or those who served at one time a former enemy.

Kurt Meyer was found guilty and sentenced to death. Subsequently other steps were taken. We are unaware of the details. Kurt Meyer was transferred from this country under circumstances which left a great deal to the imagination, particularly so far as members of this parliament are concerned. We suddenly found that Kurt Meyer had departed and we did not know whether there had been any previous arrangement. It will be recalled that the suggestion was then made that the spiriting of Kurt Meyer out of Canada at the time was simply preliminary to his subsequent release at an early date. The fears thus expressed have been confirmed by what has taken place.

If there are circumstances which would be disclosed by the material now called for justifying any other decision, then I think we should know of such circumstances. I think it is altogether right and proper, if Kurt Meyer was wrongly dealt with, that his name should be cleared. But a distinction must be drawn between the case of Kurt Meyer and the other cases that were under review.

Those who carry rifles or handle other weapons in the field of battle are entitled to have consideration given to the fact that they are under orders and must obey orders. Officers in command of armies are called upon to interpret the political decisions of governments and there have been cases where that has been given due consideration in dealing with army commanders, even though the conduct of the troops under them may have seemed outrageous and atrocious.

But when an officer in command of fighting troops is found to be guilty of the responsibility, as in this case, extending to the death of young Canadian men in uniform taken prisoner on the field of battle, that officer must be held responsible for such an act, or the rules of war will be disregarded at will in the future. At any rate there will be encouragement to follow such a course.

Kurt Meyer either was responsible for the death of young Canadians contrary to the rules of war or he was not. If he was not, then his name should be cleared. If he was, then the procedure that has been followed is not consistent with the best interests of the recognized practices of armies in the field. I submit that this parliament, as the supreme authority in this country, should have the opportunity of examining the exchanges that took place.

I submit that we should know whether there was in fact any prior understanding at the time Kurt Meyer left Canada with the authority and assistance and approval of this government. I submit that we should know whether there was in fact anything in the exchange of correspondence that suggested that a wrong was being righted. I think we should know also, and the parents of young Canadians should know, whether that was the case, or whether a man serving a terrible system was in fact guilty but has been brought almost to the door of freedom for purposes which have not yet been disclosed to this parliament or to the people of Canada.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Speaker, only a word, the occasion for which arises out of what the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) has said. I think it is evident from what he did say that the purpose for which he is calling for the production of these papers is precisely the purpose for which I suggested that such papers should not be produced. There is no question of the guilt or responsibility of Kurt Meyer involved; that was determined by the court martial. He was found guilty on three out of five counts.

The only question involved subsequent to that was what sentence was proper to be imposed on him. The court martial imposed a sentence of death. That sentence was not valid until it had been confirmed and the death sentence was never confirmed. The confirming officer, acting independently on his own authority, Major General Chris Vokes —a fighting soldier if ever there was one— confirmed the sentence with the sentence of life imprisonment.

Kurt Meyer was transferred to Canada to serve his sentence. With the development of events after he had been here some six years it was apparent that he was the only single war criminal convicted of an offence committed in Germany and punished after trial in Germany who was serving his sentence outside of Germany. It was not in order to treat him separately and differently from anyone else that he was transferred back to Germany but in order that his case might be treated precisely the same as every other case of a man sentenced by a similar tribunal and receiving a similar punishment.

On that account he was dealt with just the same way as all other cases were dealt with by the British, French and American authorities in respect of similar cases. Now a tribunal set up by the British authorities in virtue of authority they have and agreed to by us has acted in precisely the same way as tribunals set up by the American and French authorities. In every case, so far as is known to us, the recommendation of the mixed consultative board has been carried out, accepted and acted upon by the government concerned.

Are we in this case going to be the only country to make an exception in respect of this case and treat Kurt Meyer separately and differently from every other war criminal?

Mr. Coldwell: May I say just this word.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Coldwell: I think the issue has been obscured. We are not asking the right to judge—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Coldwell: —a man, we are asking the right to see papers.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Hon. members will understand that under the provisions of standing order 51 hon. members may put this type of motion on the order paper. If a motion is inscribed under "Notices of Motions for Production of Papers" with an asterisk it is supposed to be disposed of without debate. After the minister had explained why he did not want to allow the motion to go through he made a statement and I allowed the mover of the motion to make his observations.

Hon. members will realize that if I were to show more leniency from now on I might as well consider this as a debatable motion. This is not the time to discuss a notice of motion, which would come later. When an hon. member wishes to have a certain matter debated he has it inscribed, not under "Notices of Motions for Production of Papers" but under "Notices of Motions." When the order "Notices of Motions" is called it would be debatable. Standing order 51 reads:

> Notices of motion for the production of papers which the member asking for the same intends to move without discussion, shall be marked by him with an asterisk—

If hon. members will look at the order paper they will see that this motion is marked with an asterisk.

> —and shall be placed by the Clerk on the order paper above "Notices of Motions," under the heading "Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers."

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Drew) which was negatived on the following division:

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT FROM GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. What steps is the government taking to deal with the serious unemployment situation now facing this country?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The government is not forgetting that in 1950 there was supposed to be a very serious unemployment situation which, as the season advanced, gradually disappeared. There are at this time more applications for jobs than there were at that time but a substantial portion of those applications are from people who are already employed but who would like to improve their employment conditions. Nothing is being done now except the increased endeavours of the various employment agencies throughout the country to find employment for those who have registered with them.

WATER POLLUTION

NORTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, bringing to his attention again the emergent situation, in Prince Albert and also in North Battleford, which is becoming more serious rather than better. In an editorial I have here in my hand I see a description of conditions of the water at Prince Albert. Those who speak with authority describe it as "water comparable to low grade swamp wash laced with crude oil".

In view of the fact that this situation has continued for a considerable period of time, I would ask the minister what stand the federal government is taking with reference to this matter and the removal of this nuisance, or at least to give assistance in that direction. I would also ask whether, under all the circumstances, regardless of federal responsibility or otherwise, he would make available and send out to Prince Albert one or two of his officials to see what they can do to solve the problem there and to preserve the health of the people. The situation is serious.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): My hon. friend does not now deal with the question of competence. That was dealt with in the question which he put to me the other day. He now asks me if we would be prepared to send out to the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan officials of our own department who are technically qualified to assist in this matter. I am happy to be able to inform my hon. friend that not only will we be able to do so but that we have already done so. Last Friday the supervising engineer of the public health engineering division of our department attended a meeting in Edmonton with the representative of the company and the department of health, and the matter was fully reviewed. The technical officers, including our own officials, are now engaged in determining the precise cause of the pollution. The supervising engineer has also been in touch with the officials of the department of health in Regina. My hon. friend may be assured that, without in any way begging the question of competence, the federal government will do all it can do to assist the provincial authorities to carry out their constitutional responsibility.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thank the minister for his reply, and I should like to ask a supplementary question. The other day I asked him to ascertain the responsibility of the federal government in connection with rivers that traverse two or more provinces. Has he had any legal opinion on that matter? Is it not a fact that, under the situation disclosed here, there is a distinct responsibility federally to look into this matter and to act?

Mr. Martin: I do not believe I can add anything to what I said in answer to the supplementary question put to me by my hon. friend about four or five days ago.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RESERVE ARMY—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF KENNEDY REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): May I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Will he table the Kennedy report on reorganization of the reserve army or, failing that, will he make a statement as to the findings of that committee?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): The hon. member gave me notice of the question. The report referred to is a report of a board of officers consisting of Major General Howard Kennedy, Major General E. J. Renaud and Major General H. F. G. Letson, which was appointed with my concurrence by the chief of the general staff to advise him regarding certain matters relating to the reserve army. The report has been made to the chief of the general staff. It is naturally a confidential document intended for his information in order that he may advise me. The report is being given consideration, and I hope to tell the house at a very early date what measures are being taken to implement it. Anticipating this I may say that we hope it will be possible to carry out the great majority of the recommendations of the report, which is a most constructive and helpful document.

[Later:]

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): With respect to the question asked by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich and the reply of the Minister of National Defence, may I ask the minister if copies of the report on the reorganization of the reserve forces to which he has referred will be available to the officers attending the conference of defence associations, or at least the senior officers of the different component associations, before that conference meets in Ottawa.

Mr. Claxton: The conference met on Thursday, Friday and Saturday of last week. I do not think copies were made available, but the main lines of the recommendations were gone over and considered by them with the result that they authorized a press release, in which I concurred, in which they said that they accepted the recommendations of the report in principle.

POLIOMYELITIS

INQUIRY AS TO NEW VACCINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare arising out of a report appearing in the Winnipeg Free Press of January 18 headed "Manitoba Won't Get Vaccine". If the statement attributed to Dr. Elliott, deputy minister of health, is true, will the minister inform the house why Canada will not get some of the new vaccine from the Connaught laboratories?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I think I have already dealt with this question. The story in the Winnipeg paper is of course not in harmony with what I said when I replied to the question about ten days ago in the house. The vaccine referred to is being examined and research in connection with its production is taking place at the Connaught laboratories in Toronto. Much of the funds to make this research project possible have been provided by the federal government under the national health program. What my hon. friend has in mind is whether or not tests of the vaccine will take place in Canada as well as in the United States. We are following the tests in the United States before deciding to use a vaccine, not yet a certain remedy, on people in Canada. But my hon. friend may be assured that the medical scientists who are advising us, and who have charge of this matter, are satisfied that we are following a sensible course.

GRAIN

DELIVERIES UNDER QUOTAS—REQUEST FOR INCREASE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): On Friday last the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker)

asked for certain information about delivery quotas on prairie grain. I gave a partial answer at that time, and I can now give more complete data. The over-all quota is five bushels per cultivated acre with the proviso that every producer is entitled to deliver a minimum of 1,000 bushels of grain. There is a supplementary quota on oats of twelve bushels per acre seeded to oats. Special quotas on malting barley can be obtained on application. They are being issued freely. Of course there is no quota on flax or Durum wheat and these grains can be delivered in unlimited quantities.

It is estimated that the five bushel quota with the minimum of 1,000 bushels represents 391 million bushels of grain. Deliveries up to Saturday last had totalled 356 million bushels of grain but of that amount some 40 million bushels were delivered ex five bushel quota, so that deliveries against the five bushel quota were 314 million bushels. While it is probable that the present quota may be reached before the opening of navigation, it is unlikely that any additional quota will be authorized until the opening of navigation and until there is space to take further deliveries at Fort William.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In effect, there is no possibility until the opening of navigation of any increase to eight or any larger quota in the light of present anticipated deliveries and capacity. Is that correct?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I would prefer to say that there is no probability although special quotas may be opened except for supplementary quotas such as the special six bushel quota on oats which was opened only last week. The over-all quota of five bushels per acre will probably not be exceeded until the opening of navigation.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if the minister can tell us when navigation may open with relation to normal practice.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: I saw a press report the other day which said that this year navigation would in all probability, irrespective of ice conditions, open at a later date than it has for a number of years. It said that recent practice has been to use every available day for navigation and that that practice would probably be discontinued and the season shortened. Does the minister know anything about it?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): All I can say is that based on my experience extending over some 40 years, navigation opens just about a week before the ice goes out.

National Housing Act

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

SUBSTITUTION OF NEW LEGISLATION TO INSURE APPROVED LENDERS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Friday, January 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Winters for the second reading of Bill No. 102, to promote the construction of new houses, the repair and modernization of existing houses, and the improvement of housing and living conditions.

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, at a rather late hour on Friday night I rose with the intention of adjourning this debate but was encouraged by the minister to make a start. It occurred to me that perhaps he had entertained the hope that I would make a start then and finish and not prolong the agony over the week end. However, on reflection I decided that was a rather cynical point of view, and I was a bit surprised to see that I had already succumbed to the atmosphere of Ottawa. The more charitable interpretation which I have adopted is that the minister really wanted to hear what I had to say and was just impatient on that occasion.

On Friday I was discussing some of the matters pertaining to this bill, and I indicated that I would not deal at any length with part I or attempt to repeat any of the arguments in that connection but would give some attention to parts II and III. The minister mentioned parts II and III in the course of his remarks earlier but did not elaborate upon them and did not point out any greatly needed changes with regard to these particular parts of the bill. I judged from this that the purpose for which parts II and III were designed is being fulfilled, and that nothing further need be done concerning those particular sections of the bill. It is obvious that in any extension of part I, by the filtering down process, which will result in increasing the number of new homes constructed, some benefit will accrue to those people who at present are unable to get rental accommodation or the home ownership accommodation they require. Nevertheless the filtering down process, as we know, works very slowly, and it is measures such as those outlined in parts II and III which are considered necessary, if we are to cope with some of the other problems connected with housing.

I appreciate the fact that difficulty is experienced by some people in understanding the housing situation. On occasion there is an obvious reluctance on the part of certain public bodies to face up to the housing problem, and this is understandable. Time and again I have had people remark to me, "How can there possibly be a housing shortage when we see all these new developments?" One sees those developments everywhere in Canada. They say, "Why is there still a shortage of houses?"

Of course the reason is twofold. In the first instance, as has been pointed out, family formations have kept pace with the construction of new homes, to a very large extent. Then there is that backlog which has been mentioned by other hon. members—and which I mentioned on Friday night—of anywhere from 100,000 to 500,000 homes, which is not being reduced appreciably by the construction of new homes. Therefore the housing shortage continues, despite the new construction we see all around us.

We are in a transitional period in our civilization. Pioneer days are still a vivid memory, and the adjustment to a more highly organized industrial condition of life is being made slowly. For some people it is difficult, on that account, to appreciate the present problem in the matter of housing. In earlier years the task for many was simply the elementary one of physical labour. I have talked to people who constructed sod houses on the prairies. Anyone who is willing to work could construct that type of accommodation for himself. Similarly a log house could be constructed with little more effort. From that to the frame house was a step depending upon increased income from developed farms.

Governmental assistance and planning was unknown and unexpected. I appreciate the attitude taken by people of the pioneer generation, and by others, who have endured with courage and patience the difficult living conditions they have known. I appreciate the fact that they are not prone to view with enthusiasm any plans that, at first glance, appear merely to afford an easy means of producing luxuries unknown in the earlier period. They realize that life is possible, without all the newfangled gadgets and amenities of modern urban communities.

It is quite true that existence is possible for human beings under primitive conditions. At the same time it is true that bad living conditions exact a heavy toll in disease, in suffering and in reduced expectancy of life. The price paid by earlier generations was the price of a shorter span of life, more suffering from disease and an abnormally high rate of infant mortality.

This leads me to a consideration briefly of the effect of housing on health. As we know, housing is not the only factor that makes for better living or for the improvement of the health of a nation. But it is certainly an important factor, and there is plenty of evidence that this is so. In a book published by Edith E. Wood entitled "Housing" she has this to say:

> The two nations with the lowest general and infant death rates in the world are Holland and New Zealand. One is old, densely populated, highly urbanized and industrialized; the other is new, sparsely settled and predominantly agricultural. Both have been outstanding in their attention to housing conditions since the turn of the century.

I have not had the pleasure of seeing New Zealand, but a great part of Holland is rather familiar territory. It is a thickly populated country. The houses in the towns and cities are close together, but so far as I could see there are no slums in Holland. There may be, but I could not find them—and I looked for them in the years when I was over there. I looked for them in places that are familiar to many hon. members—Tilburg, Breda, Hertogenbosch, Nijmegen, Apeldoorn. I found no slums, but I did find well-built, substantial homes, even for the poorer classes.

I talked about housing in Holland with a wealthy grain merchant in Tilburg, whose offices we occupied for military purposes. Incidentally he is, or was, an importer of Canadian wheat and an enthusiast for Manitoba No. 1 hard. He informed me, with pride, that not one of his employees was badly housed, and showed me where many of them lived. I visited some of those homes of the working people and found them to be not pretentious dwellings but sturdy brick houses of good appearance, of reasonable size, of obvious comfort and, in typical Dutch fashion, of perfect cleanliness.

In a desire to learn how this had come about, I investigated a little further and gained the information that Holland had embarked upon a housing program as far back as 1901, and had dealt with these matters basically. It was the first attempt on the part of Holland to provide for and to regulate housing in general. Under the legislation then introduced over 10 per cent of the houses in Holland were built by municipalities and public housing societies. Organizations and tenants were permitted to borrow 100 per cent of the cost of their buildings, the buildings to be paid for in 50 years and the land in 75 years.

I have not had the opportunity to investigate further to learn the financial details in this connection, but I simply record these facts as evidence of something I had the pleasure of seeing; and my observations were confirmed by this gentleman in Tilburg, who understood the situation.

Sometimes we are prone to think that Canadians have the highest standard of living in the world. I have never been quite able to understand that phrase, because I do not know how one would go about estimating a standard of living, unless it were merely by a process of counting automobiles, vacuum cleaners, bathtubs, or something like that. If you use the yardstick of housing, Canada has little to boast about and a very great deal to learn. I well recall how surprised Canadian soldiers were when they entered Holland and saw the living conditions of the people in places where the war had not caused destruction.

Again, on the question of housing and its effect on health, I had occasion to delve closely into the book published by Mr. Abrams called "The Future of Housing". He was dealing with the situation in New York city and with the situation in other cities in the United States. The subject that he was discussing was the effect of slums with regard to social evils. May I give a quotation from that book, which is as follows:

> That slums breed juvenile delinquency and crime has long been contended. They provide the physical, and encourage the social environment that nourishes growth from truant to juvenile delinquent to felon. The prevalence of a high delinquency rate in slum areas has been established by many authorities and studies . . . In one Chicago slum area one out of every four boys between 10 and 17 years appeared in juvenile court in a single year. In Hartford slums, delinquencies were twice as high as in the rest of the city. In Cleveland the rate was three times as high. In Washington, D.C., more than 72 per cent of all juvenile probationers were said to come from overcrowded dwellings . . .

Mr. Abrams investigated the problem of what happens when you rehouse slum dwellers; that is, when the effects of this bill are put into force and slums are cleared away, what happens? Well, the evidence, according to his investigation, was: Fires per 1,000 houses in the new area where the slum had been cleared away and new buildings erected were 2 per 1,000. In an old adjacent slum area similar to the one which had been cleared away, the fires per 1,000 dwellings were 180. Deaths from pneumonia were 2 as contrasted with 14 per 1,000 people, comparing the new cleared area with the old adjacent slum area. Tuberculosis deaths were three times as great in the adjacent slum area. Infant mortality was 2 per 1,000 in the new cleared area as compared to 10 per 1,000 in the old slum area. He then goes on to deal with the excessive costs of public services with regard to those blighted areas and points out in respect to Atlanta, Georgia:

> The slum areas of the city contributed 5½ per cent of the city's tax revenues from real estate, but cost the city 53 per cent of its police, fire, health department and other service costs.

It is possible to multiply these examples and draw upon the experience of other countries, but there is no need to go far afield, which I think is unfortunate. We have had surveys in Canada which indicate things somewhat along the same lines. For example, in the city of Winnipeg, and I am quoting from the Winnipeg Tribune of October 24, 1953, we read:

> That poor housing is costly to Winnipeg taxpayers and is responsible for higher rates of disease, delinquency and other welfare problems, is shown by a study conducted by the late Mrs. R. F. McWilliams, when she was an alderman in Winnipeg in 1935.
> It was found that in two crowded downtown areas scarlet fever and diphtheria cases were 13·6 and 15·7 annually for 1,000 of child population as compared with 7·5 for the rest of the city.
>
> Deaths from tuberculosis were 4·6 and 7·9 annually per 10,000 of population as compared with 2·9 for the rest of the city.
> Juvenile court cases were 16·9 and 23·7 per 1,000 pupils as compared with 11·5 for the rest of the city. The excess cost to the city for seven municipal services in these two areas was computed by the deputy city treasurer as being $450,000 annually.

I give the example of Winnipeg merely because it is where I live. I understand and have seen some of the living conditions of the people in that city. I do not think the situation in Winnipeg differs materially from that in other cities across the country.

Those matters of slum clearance and so on are supposed to be dealt with in part III of the bill. Part II of the bill deals with the question of providing rental housing. I have been interested in this for a number of years. It was the first object of interest for me when I returned from overseas in 1946 and entered the Manitoba legislature. At that time I investigated the situation for veterans as far as wartime housing was concerned, and I found that the need for wartime housing exceeded the number available by well over 1,000. The qualifications, you will remember, were: married; overseas service; two or more children. Then, three months ago I inquired again with regard to the wartime housing in Winnipeg and I was informed by those who are responsible that the waiting list at that time was 1,300, a longer waiting list than prevailed in 1946.

I took an interest in emergency shelters in the city of Winnipeg from 1946 on, and became perfectly familiar with emergency shelters that had been set up in the city. There are still emergency shelters in the city of Winnipeg in 1954. According to the report given to the Winnipeg city council not so long ago there are 199 families living in emergency shelters at the present time, and during the course of the year 1953, 932 families applied for emergency accommodation.

Just to indicate the situation I quote two paragraphs from the Winnipeg Tribune of January 14, 1954:

> Drafting of a new by-law to enforce higher standards of housing and curb the growth of slums in Winnipeg was recommended today in a report prepared by William Courage, city's emergency housing supervisor.
> Mr. Courage reported that living conditions of low-income families with children are more acute now than when the city first set up its housing committee in 1933.

I will show in a minute, Mr. Speaker, why I am drawing attention to these matters of the need of rental housing and the need of slum clearance. But let us consider what the effect of housing is on those who are most seriously concerned. It is interesting to note that in the remarks that were made last week on the question of housing we spoke about—what?—people; about family formation. The number of houses required has a close relation to family formation in the country, and it brings us then of course to a point of interest in that part of our national organization that is most important, and that is the family. We fully agree with and recognize the fact that it is groups of families that form our community and in turn support the superstructure of government on all levels. Unless the family unit is sound all else suffers, and of course the family unit is more concerned with housing than with almost any other problem. Because of faulty housing of families in some areas we are compelled to devote millions of money toward supporting mental institutions, health services, penal institutions and law enforcement services. We lament the growth of delinquency, the increase in divorce, the mounting toll of mental ill-health and the ravages of disease, yet we fail to take adequate measures to counteract the environmental factors that are partly responsible for these social troubles.

That environment contributes to social ills has been proved without shadow of doubt. That adequate housing can assist in preventing the development of these social ills has been clearly demonstrated. If the family unit can be strengthened and maintained under proper circumstances in suitable homes, the children have an opportunity for healthful development.

The nurture and care of children is of prime importance. In their turn they become the working element of the population and provide for and protect the older generation. If the older generation is wise it will ensure that the younger generation is healthy in body and mind. Adequate housing in the interests of the family unit and of the children in particular is sufficient ground for government planning.

We realize that the problem of housing is a difficult one to solve, but to what extent should we urge a solution? I am quite sure that at this point the minister will be prepared to say that the government is perfectly willing to play a part in doing those things which are being advocated to provide rental accommodation and slum clearance and that parts II and III of the act are in the bill for that express purpose. Those parts have been operative for some time. I ask the minister: Why is it, if those parts are satisfactory, that we still have these problems of the lack of rental accommodation and the development of slums?

I was discouraged to read that William Courage had reported to the city of Winnipeg that some action must be taken to curb the growth of slums. I had hoped that at this stage we would have come sufficiently to grips with the problem that there would be no further growth of slum conditions.

I suggest to the minister that when he was rewriting the parts of this bill he should have given more attention to parts II and III. I think we should have a picture given to us of how these parts have operated in the past and what effect they are producing. We should have indicated to us why they are not measuring up to our expectations.

The burden is not solely with the dominion government as the provinces and municipalities have to play their part. I wonder if the problem does not arise because of the situation in which the municipalities have been placed. When the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) was speaking the other day he quoted from a statement by the minister in which it was indicated that one of the great bottlenecks, perhaps the largest in connection with the problem of housing, was the provision of serviced land, that it was the inability of municipalities to provide serviced land that helped to create the bottleneck. Then the hon. member for Eglinton made a comment which I think deserves repetition and I quote from page 1321 of Hansard of January 21:

> The municipalities of this country, sir, are functioning today with virtually the same tax base that was given to them at the time of confederation. And, with the rapidly soaring costs of providing municipal services, demanded by all residents, it has become beyond the power of municipalities to meet the responsibilities they are now expected to discharge under existing legislation.

My observation of municipal government is that it does set a very good example in this country of efficiency and economy, but it has been pointed out time and time again in this house that in recent years the municipalities have been curbed because of their lack of financial strength. Should not the minister give some attention to this? If the municipalities are unable to meet the fairly generous offers contained in parts II and III of the bill, then a review of the situation should be considered. Let us make it possible for the municipalities to deal with these problems which are affecting them adversely in so many ways.

I would conclude with one remark. In so far as rental accommodation is not provided to meet the needs of our people, in so far as slum clearance is not proceeded with vigorously and with dispatch, to that extent the present bill falls far short of what is desired.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I intend to speak but briefly on this bill. While I was sitting here thinking of what I might say when I got up, and making a note or two upon which I might base what I had to say, I had interjected into my thinking a statement by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) a few minutes ago when he said that he did not intend to initiate any move at the moment to combat unemployment for the reasons which he stated. I have no doubt that he was sincere in stating those reasons. One reason given was that it was merely a temporary condition. I do not think that this new bill in regard to housing will have much effect upon the unemployment situation. I sincerely do not think that it will result in the building of many more houses than would have been built under the original act.

I wish the government would show some bold imagination in this connection. In spite of the fact that you might have called me to order on my first sentence, I do submit that there is some connection between the two subjects of housing and unemployment. If we had a bold imaginative program for subsidized rental housing, if we had a government scheme instead of the government retreating from housing; if they would get into it wholeheartedly; if they would set some of these unemployed people to work; if they would give them employment with the hope that they would earn sufficient money to get into a house on any terms; then I think the government would be doing something worth while.

I must say that I think that up to now the government has been bankrupt of ideas in regard to both unemployment and housing. That may be rough criticism, but that is what I think. As long as this government is in power I do not think that we will have our people properly and sufficiently housed. I am a great believer in the ownership of homes. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) has referred to the necessity of having a good environment for children. Needless to say I am entirely in agreement with that statement.

I have shown some interest in this house in young people, in their education and in their health. I feel quite convinced that those two things affect the rising generation. It is the same with a home. Let every man sit under his own fig tree. I hope he can. But if he cannot have a fig tree of his own, I hope he can at least find a fig tree. In other words, if it is impossible for him to own a house then it should be possible for him to rent one according to what the economic condition of the country allows him to pay.

In my own city of Saskatoon we are getting along reasonably well with housing. Some hon. members may know that we have various housing schemes under the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation which are going along all right, except that some of my friends who are in the contracting business claim they are not getting enough of them. But they can fight that out with the minister.

We are being helped too in the matter of rental housing by the fact that one or two outside firms are coming into the city and will begin extensive building this spring. That will help to ease the situation but there are still many people, in spite of the fact that, as I believe, living conditions there are as good as any in Canada, who are still living in quarters where three and four families are using the same bathroom. These are the so-called suites. I need not tell hon. members that some of these suites that are available to rent usually comprise a room with something that I think some would call a kitchenette, but which you and I would call a clothes closet, with one electric burner or unit on which perhaps you could fry an egg if you were lucky.

There is one matter I wish to draw to the attention of the minister which arises out of various complaints I have received. Many people have approached me, young men, who have gone into Central Mortgage housing schemes and they have discovered after being in the houses weeks or perhaps a few months, after putting money into them, that there were faults in the houses such as cracks in the basement, and badly fitting doors or something wrong with the construction. They try to do something about it and are told that once the contractor has been paid out there is really nothing that can be done about it. "You should have spoken earlier", is the answer they get.

I would suggest it takes time and a certain amount of living in a house to discover whether it meets your expectations or not.

I would also suggest that this matter needs some attention, because I feel these people have a just cause for complaint. I believe there should be a fairly substantial reserve laid aside which would be payable to a contractor when and if the house proved to be satisfactory.

As regards the bill itself, on the face of it it looks to me like a plan which, whatever its intention may be, will result in putting a larger number of people into a larger amount of debt over a longer period of time. That may result in the building of more houses. I hope it will. Some hon. members have expressed the view that it will not.

This bill does not set out a definite rate of interest. We have been given to understand that the rate of interest will probably be 5¾ per cent. I would submit that in any contract, particularly one that covers a long period of time as this one is likely to do, the rate of interest is the crux of the whole matter.

I had some experience myself in paying for a house and I finally managed it just before I came to this house, but I certainly realize now what I let myself in for when I signed an agreement at 7 per cent. It was later reduced to 6 per cent. I have not worked it out but I am quite sure that a 1 per cent difference in the rate of interest over a period of years could quite easily mean a difference of $1,000 in the final cost of the house.

Unfortunately, people are apt to overlook the interest rate. My experience has been that the immediate problem of those desperate young people to whom I have talked and who have talked to me is to get into a house. When you have a wife and three children naturally your immediate problem is to get them out of such-and-such an hotel and get them into a place of your own. When agreements are presented to them under such conditions I am afraid they do not scrutinize very closely the rate of interest. The important thing to them at that moment is the down payment and when they do find themselves in a house under a 25-year contract the result is that they have a long, long time —as I myself found—to think over their recklessness in accepting that particular kind of proposition.

I think the interest rate is the crux of this whole measure and I believe that interest rate should be lowered. Someone has mentioned a rate of 2 per cent. I am well aware that that would entail a subsidization on the part of the government. I am well aware that the government is getting or can get its money at 3¾ per cent, and that there is a difference of 1¾ per cent that would have to be made up by someone. I am not foolish enough to believe houses can be built out of thin air. It would mean subsidization, but I think that is justified if you admit that housing is a national and social problem and if you agree that housing like health is to a certain extent at least a matter of government responsibility.

Under this bill the government is not shouldering its housing responsibilities. It is evading them and getting out of the housing business. I look upon this bill not as a housing bill at all but as a financial bill, and one which guarantees the lenders against any loss. The bill writes into law an insurance protection, but for whom? For the people who are putting money into it. And at whose expense? At the expense of the people who will live in and perhaps pay for the houses, namely the borrowers. There is not much risk in the furnishing of this so-called risk capital. In the event of a real depression or even a recession the lenders will not have to suffer the economic consequences. The government will then be left to wrestle with that problem, the idea being I suppose that the insurance which is to be written into the amortization scheme in the first place will cover the necessary losses.

I cannot see any reason for that insurance scheme unless it is based on the fear that there will be a depression. I suggest that if a depression does come the government may find itself in some difficulty with a great many defaults arising out of the fact that the people who originally bought the houses will not be able to pay for them. That is perhaps preaching blue ruin of which we are often accused so I shall not indulge in it any further.

Many of the people who are not able to build houses under the present act will not be able to build them under the new act. They have been considered poor risks. This may have been mentioned before but I know that many of these people who have been considered poor risks are at the present moment paying much more money on rent per month than they would have to pay under the proposed scheme. I simply cannot understand how these people of low income can be expected to accumulate sufficient money for a down payment when their rents are so high and take such a large percentage of their weekly or monthly income. Along with that steady and heavy drain they have to buy food and clothing and this takes up the remainder of their income.

The situation of course is being aggravated by what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was pleased to call "this temporary unemployment". I hope this unemployment is temporary. I do not like to see soup kitchens being established in Canada again. It is a long time now since we heard of anything like that. I see that such action was taken in the city of Calgary the other day and I am sure the unemployment situation there is certainly not any worse than in many other cities in Canada.

I think it was the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) who quoted what I thought was a rather startling assertion by the minister. I was surprised the minister made it, but since he did I can only assume it is correct.

The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) quoted the minister as having said that two-thirds of the people of our country cannot afford either to buy or to rent a home. What a commentary that is upon this country of ours! What a commentary that is upon the economic system under which we live! What a commentary it is on a country which is holding its head up—and rightly so—and is asserting itself to be one of the wealthiest and most prosperous countries in the world, a country which has an immense supply of natural resources and materials—including those materials, may I say, which are needed for the building of homes—such as minerals, timber and the rest. Yet we are bound to admit, as does this bill, that we have a proportion of our people in slums.

I shall, of course, be told that a proportion of our people will always be in slums; I shall be told that the poor are ever with us. But, with my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill), I suggest that we can get away from slums by giving to the people who live in slums a decent environment in which to grow up. Then they will not be slum dwellers. I think he certainly made a good point when he made that remark. I know the effect of environment on young people. I know the effect on them of living in crowded tenements. We must get away from it, and I hope that we shall. As I said, I think the government should be prepared to stay in housing until its responsibilities to the people of this country have been fulfilled.

I was in England two or three months ago and saw some of what are there called subsidized rental housing. I would be delighted to live in one of the houses that I happened to see. In this particular village, which was a nice village on the south coast of England, I saw houses that were built in duplex form. Each duplex was built in its own grounds, with plenty of space for a garden and plenty of room in which children could play. Those houses were modern, new, clean and well painted. I inspected them as best I knew how and found them to be well built. To the people who were going to occupy them the day after I was there they were available at 18 shillings a week.

I am well aware that the comparison is not a fair one when one considers that the wages over there are a good deal lower than they are here, and that the material is a good deal cheaper. But even at the rate of exchange, if you will translate 18 shillings a week into its equivalent in our money, and if you will take the shilling to have a value of 15 cents—I think that is approximately correct—one can do the arithmetic and find out what it comes to. I made it to be $2.70 a week or, allowing 31 days to the month, $12.15 a month. I would be proud at the moment if I lived in one of those homes. I do not think the people who go in there—even people from what are now called slum dwellings—are going to abuse those places. I think they are going to take care of them and take a pride in them. I think they are going to start gardens, build playhouses for their children and that sort of thing. They are living in a beautiful environment of quite expensive homes, and I think they are on their way to their economic salvation so far as a home is concerned.

Mr. Speaker, I think I have covered most of the points that I should like to make at this time.

Mr. Ambrose Holowach (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take part in this debate on the new housing legislation which was recently introduced by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters). I do so for several reasons. This legislation is an attempt to make provision for what is commonly admitted to be perhaps the most glaring and serious need of the people of this country. This problem has contributed, perhaps more than any other, to many of the negative repercussions of this cocktail age in which you and I live. For this reason I believe this measure is one of the most important ones which have come before this session of parliament and certainly deserves the widest of discussion. Anything I may say is said in good faith and is certainly not meant to detract in any way from the efforts of the minister, incomplete as they are, to alleviate the situation.

I have the honour of representing in this house a constituency in a city which, on a per capita basis, has one of the highest figures for construction of any city on the North American continent. When over 50 per cent of the construction permits issued in that city were for the purpose of building homes, it stands to reason that this matter is one which is of great concern to me because it affects the well-being of the people I represent. In order that it may serve as a background to anything further which I may have to say on this matter, I should like to read what I consider to be an extremely interesting report that appeared in the Financial Times of January 22, 1954. It is entitled, "Growth of Edmonton Shows Top Building Rate Per Capita" and reads in part as follows:

> At the beginning of its fiftieth anniversary year, Edmonton stands in a class by itself among the larger cities of North America . . .
> Computed on a per capita basis, construction in Edmonton last year was much greater than in any other city on the continent . . .
>
> Though many millions of dollars are being spent on industrial construction in Edmonton, it is encouraging to the city's increasing population that nearly half of the total building permits issued during 1953 were for housing construction.
>
> All signs point to another record year in this direction in 1954. This is essential if the city is to keep pace with its rapid growth.
> Edmonton is now estimated to have a population of 193,000. At its present rate of growth of 8 per cent, this figure will be very close to 200,000 by early summer. Moreover, if this rate of gain is maintained, the city will reach 300,000 by 1959.

This matter of housing legislation, Mr. Speaker, involves more than just bricks and the materials going into the construction of a home. It involves shelter in the full meaning of that word. We know that homes are crucial for the well-being of any nation. Homes means greater population. Homes mean a happy people; and a happy people means an unconquerable nation. The unhappiness, delinquency and crime which this housing situation have brought about in our country cannot be measured. In the press and in past parliaments there has been a great deal of discussion of the necessity for encouraging cultural growth in our great country. I maintain there is a definite community of interest between family life—the home—and further cultural growth. It seems strange to me, as a new member, that at a time such as this we should be spending millions for guns, bombs and tanks and yet permit the deplorable situation in housing to exist. I should like to say that I have no quarrel with defence. In the face of what we see in the world today we have no alternative. But it does seem strange that we are able to solve the problem of defence and are not able to apply the same maximum effort in matters which have to do with internal conditions. While we have been vigilant on the military front, we have at the same time been absolutely negligent with respect to something that is just as important, the internal front.

[Mr. Holowach.]

The history of nations in recent years shows us quite vividly that countries with tremendous defence set-ups have fallen to negative moral forces because their governments had failed to pay any attention to the crippling and demoralizing economic and social injustices in their lands. I think this should be remembered when this legislation goes before the banking and commerce committee. I think that the key to an understanding of the problem facing us can be found by comparison. During the depression years we needed homes badly. We had the skills and materials and unemployed men who were ready to do the job, but one thing was basically lacking. The people did not have the money. Today we have an equivalent situation. We need homes desperately. We have the skills and materials and better techniques. We have unemployment, and yet people today lack the basic purchasing power necessary to acquire the things that they need.

In order to verify what I have just stated I should like to quote a most revealing bit of information from the Ottawa Journal of January 19. The article is headed, "Credit Buying Hit New High September" and reads in part as follows:

> Another boost in instalment-plan buying pushed Canada's consumer credit bill to a new high of $1,772 million on September 30 . . . The major share of the increase was in finance company dealings. Their outstanding credit rose to $544 million on September 30 from $516 million on June 30. Instalment credit by retail dealers increased by $5 million to $248 million from $243 million.

It seems to me that is a very good indication that, so far as the people are concerned, what is most lacking today is the purchasing power to take advantage of the scheme that the government has presented. For the past few days we have listened to a dissection of this legislation, and what does the autopsy show? I think it would be quite right to say that it is the same old body dressed up in the same old suit. The only difference is that there are a few patches which I do not think will give any amount of comfort or aid in securing the basic needs of the people today with respect to housing legislation.

It is admitted that in the bill there are several new features which are commendable. The banks will be induced and encouraged to enter the mortgage business, and payments will be spread over a longer period. But there seems to be no provision or inducement to reduce interest rates and construction costs. There is no provision to protect the equity of a defaulter, and I do not quite understand how anyone earning less than $3,000 can take advantage of the plan now presented. I believe that the Canada Year Book indicates that for the year 1950 three-quarters of a million people in Canada fell within that income tax bracket. I think we should bear this in mind when we are considering this legislation.

During the past few days most of the criticism of the bill has come from members of the opposition, and I should like to hear some of the government members express their views with respect to it. As grown-up men and women we should realize that patting one another on the back and following party lines in matters of this kind will not bring about betterment. I know of no progressive legislation that has not been brought about by a united protest. This matter is of the greatest importance to the Canadian people. As a matter of fact, I think it has a most serious implication. It places parliament on trial. Our ability to solve the housing problem in Canada will strengthen the faith of the people of Canada in the ability of parliament to get down to business and tackle a serious problem. It will strengthen the faith of our people in democracy and set a shining example for those who condemn it. I think our failure to do so will strengthen the hand and the voice of those who say that democracy cannot bring about improvement and must be replaced by some form of "ism."

Various suggestions have been made. In the first place, I believe that the interest rate is far too high. What is wrong with lowering the interest rate to 3½ per cent for those who earn less than $3,000 a year? At the present time banking institutions pay 2 per cent on depositors' money. It seems to me that what is sauce for the goose should certainly be sauce for the gander. Nobody has any criticism of the important part our banking institutions play. They have a most important function to perform, but I think that they, as well as every other agency, should realize that this is the zero hour from the point of view of making sacrifices and that their sacrifice so far as profits are concerned should be just as great as the sacrifice of people who now have to suffer the discomforts of not having a home.

As a new member I have watched and studied with a great deal of interest the activities of the various cabinet ministers and have listened to them with great interest when they have been in action on the floor of the house. From where I sit the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) strikes me as being a very capable, sincere young man. I do not know too much about his political past, but I would say that, having been in politics but a short while, he certainly has not become hardened or indifferent to the needs of the people. I submit to him that when this matter comes before the banking and commerce committee he should use his good offices to see that the interest rate is lowered, that some inducement in the form of lower income tax is offered to people who have to carry the extra burden of paying for a home, and that some attempt is made to lower the terrifically high construction costs.

I think this could be done by the declaration of a definite building target for 1954. It would certainly contribute to stabilizing employment. It would enable the various construction firms to make definite plans for the future and would eliminate the valley of ups and downs so far as employment is concerned. Here is an opportunity for the minister to really take a bold and broad step forward in meeting the needs of the people. It is an opportunity for him to be marked in Canadian history as one who has done much.

One thing further I would say and it has not been said before in the debate. As a matter of fact certain inferences have been drawn which are not true so far as the Canadian people are concerned. One of their most prominent characteristics, it seems to me, is a spirit of independence and a willingness to assume responsibility. They do not seek any form of handout, because they know there is no such animal. In any event they would have to pay the price for it. But they do insist that we, as their representatives, understand the financial situation confronting them and that we bear in mind the fact that this legislation, as in respect of all other legislation dealing with the well-being of the people, must be geared to assist those who are not now in a position to afford homes, rather than make it easier for those who are. Unless this is done, then it would seem that the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) was right on Friday night when he said that this legislation is only another step to perpetuate this government's moth-eaten financial policy.

In conclusion, I would like to see justice and fair play for the Canadian people, and an effort to make available, particularly to the low income groups, the homes which are so sorely needed. While this legislation in its present form may be expedient from a political standpoint, it is certainly not right in principle and does not answer the demand the people are making upon parliament today.

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, speaking in this debate on January 22, the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Jones) said:

—these people are not anxious to live in these shacks, they cannot meet the requirements of this bill or any government legislation that has ever existed so far as the securing of a home is concerned.

In my opinion it is not any defect in the housing act that causes people to live in shacks, but rather the excessive cost of housing in our time. The National Housing Act cannot be blamed for the fact that housing is as costly as it is today.

Speaking in the debate on January 21 the minister said:

> The period of amortization for home ownership loans, including co-operative housing associations and rural housing, will be 25 years as a minimum and 30 years as a maximum. However, the borrower will be able to arrange for a shorter term if he so indicates in writing.

Earlier he stated:

> It will be recalled that at the present time the maximum loan is $10,000 for home ownership. In setting the limit of loan one consideration will be that the present cost of residential construction is about 25 per cent higher than it was when the $10,000 was set.

If my memory serves me correctly it was in 1950 or 1951 that the $10,000 figure was set, so this means an increase of 25 per cent in the cost of housing since that time. When we speak of the high cost of living at this particular period and compare it with the pre-war period we say that our dollar is worth 56 cents. Others say that it is worth less than 50 cents. For the purposes of my argument, however, I shall say that it has 50 per cent of its 1939 value, or that it is worth 50 cents.

An automobile that cost about $1,300 in 1939 will now sell for about $2,600, or an increase of 100 per cent. I have actual figures for the cost of houses in 1939, but for purposes of simplicity I shall use round figures and say that a house which then cost $2,500 would cost between $8,000 and $9,000 today. This is almost four times the cost of the pre-war article.

When purchasing an automobile today everyone seeks a certain amount of individuality, but in the purchase of homes people are going even farther. It would seem that every home must have its own individual design to suit the taste of the purchaser. We will either have to forget this demand for individuality or be content to pay these excessive costs. Whether one buys a low priced automobile or one in the $5,000 or $6,000 class he will find that, essentially, they are the same in outline, and that the differences are chiefly in the matter of colour. One's individuality is given scope in his choice of paint, or in the chrome used. I believe that in a home one's individuality could be shown in the upkeep of the home or in the condition in which the yard is kept. It is not necessary that every house be different in appearance.

If there is a continuation of this demand for individuality it will be impossible to use the prefabricated article, which is so desirable at the moment. Great quantities of lumber are available in British Columbia which would be quite suitable for prefabricated homes. Insulation when applied to frame houses makes them acceptable, and I think it is within reason to believe that prefabricated homes can be built at costs lower than those quoted today.

I believe it is essential that the government take the lead in an effort to find ways and means to have the builders and the unions sit down with government officials to work out some policy whereby homes may be provided at prices within the ability of average wage earners to pay. If necessary a royal commission could be set up to go into this serious matter and ascertain why the cost of housing has got so far out of line when compared with the cost of other commodities.

If a man earning $2,500 to $3,000 attempts to purchase a home with a capital cost of $10,000 to $12,000, and undertakes to pay the normal interest charges for adequate financing, he will be in slavery for well over a third of his natural working life. That is a very unhealthy situation, and I believe something should be done. It is not only necessary to make provision for more capital, because capital is merely a measure of the goods themselves, and more capital does not mean that we are going to have more houses until the prices of houses are brought more nearly in line with the salary of the average wage earner today.

While we are doing an excellent job, I am sure there is not going to be any appreciable difference in the number of houses that will be built within the next year. I predict that owing to the greater amount, as we hope, of capital becoming available there will be throughout the year a greater increase in the cost of these houses.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, it requires a certain amount of hardihood to enter a debate on the third day, even a debate of the importance of the one we are engaged in now. I think I should not have that hardihood except that I believe the bill before us invites us to confer powers so broad, so far-reaching, and above all so permanent on this government institution that I still cling to the hope that it may be possible to achieve the end desired, and which of course is eminently desired by us all, without the necessity of having recourse to the tremendous powers which are given. These powers incidentally seem to relegate private enterprise, which is nailed to the mast, so to speak, of our party, and which I think the government would say is also nailed to their mast, to the position of a mere machine which is going to be used by this government organization. There will be precious little freedom left in the house-building and the house-investing industry, so far as I can see, if this bill passes unchanged.

Let me make one thing perfectly clear. There is nobody who can possibly be anything but favourable to the declared purpose of the bill, which I will read:

An act to promote the construction of new houses, the repair and modernization of existing houses, and the improvement of housing and living conditions.

Everybody has to approve of that, but of course it is possible to do the right thing in the wrong way, and I thoroughly believe that in some respects this is the wrong way.

I am not going to get involved in many details which have been dealt with admirably by my colleagues in this house, but there are certain general points that I do wish to discuss. The first thing that strikes me about this is that the government gave themselves every chance, it seems to me, to go the wrong way; because so far as any of us know this plan was worked out in splendid isolation in one of the government's ivory towers. Those people who have so fully and effectively co-operated with the government in making house loans for a good many years—I refer to the lending institutions—were not consulted. The institutions who it is hoped are going to take up the load, or a good part of the load from now on, namely the banks, were not consulted.

Now, as I reflect, I wonder whether perhaps the only people who may have been consulted at all are people outside the country. This plan, I take it, is modelled very largely on the position in the United States, and it may be, though we do not know, that there was consultation there. There is no point in my asking at length why there has been no discussion. There are of course governments who do not believe in discussion. We think of the totalitarian governments, and we know that to expect them to discuss is just silly. They do not discuss things, but it is surprising that it should happen here.

I have asked myself why it has happened. I have reminded myself that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), when he has a public enterprise under his control, thinks of it as very much his own enterprise. Whether the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters), who is still early in his official career, has already caught up with the Minister of Trade and Commerce and has come to regard these institutions as his own, I do not know. He does not convey that impression, of course. He tries to make us feel that our opinion is of value, that we are being consulted, but there are the facts, such as they are.

Of course we all do admit that there are cases where obviously governments cannot consult. We do not expect the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) to come and consult with us at the last moment as to just what changes he is going to make in the income tax, and incidentally I doubt whether the minister is going to consult very much with this house in future in any event, because of a certain unfortunate experience that he did have.

Mr. Winters: I wonder whether the hon. member is aware of the great many consultations that have taken place between Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the various institutions which will operate under this legislation, and between the Minister of Finance and those same institutions, and between me and those same institutions.

Mr. Macdonnell: I know that numerous consultations have been held since last October. I realize that; nevertheless, when the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) made his statement last October the chief decisions had been made. I do realize that there have been discussions since. Indeed I was going on to say that it seemed to me the attitude of the government up to last October was somewhat like that of a patient who might go to his doctor and say to him, "Now, doctor, I am not well, and I want you to prescribe for me A, B and C.". The doctor, if he were a man of proper standing in his profession, would refuse to do that. He would say, "No, I will prescribe for you what I think I should prescribe." I imagine that since October last there has been, as the minister has very truly said, a good deal of discussion, and possibly it has even been necessary to pay more attention to the opinions of those who were not consulted before.

Mr. Winters: Very valued opinions, too.

Mr. Macdonnell: Oh, yes, I am sure they were, but as I say it was a delay-action consultation.

Now, there is another thing that handicaps us a bit at the moment, and I hope it will be set right before we get too far into the committee. It is that this bill has another unfortunate—what shall I say—feature that so many bills have. That is, just as you are getting to something very important you find, "The governor in council will make regulations to cover this." The regulations of course are not public. On the other hand they are not entirely secret, either. They sort of leak out from time to time. But I do hope that when we come to the committee we shall have the regulations and we shall not have to approve the bill without the regulations before us. In other words, we shall not have to go to the play with Hamlet left out.

Now a word as to the public reception of the bill. I would never deny that the government publicity is always good. I think there was the usual built-up enthusiasm which we are so accustomed to seeing, at the very first announcement; but as people had time to look at it a rather different attitude sprang up. People felt that they would be wise to "stop, look and listen." I refer very briefly to some words from the Regina Leader-Post of December 22, which bear that out. They are as follows:

> Glib references to a ten per cent down payment are likely to conjure up images that anyone who wants and needs a house will be able to buy one by going through somewhat the same procedure as plunking down $25 on a $250 refrigerator which in a matter of hours is ensconced in the family kitchen.
> Reginans who have been dreaming of the yet unattainable cosy home might as well face the fact now, as they inevitably may have to do later, that no such alluring prospect may be in store for them.

Just a word as to the history of this thing. As it has been covered before I shall not do more than mention it. I think it was in 1935 that the first legislation was passed, just before the change of government. That was followed by legislation put through by Mr. Dunning, and under the National Housing Act there has been a successful partnership which worked pretty well on the basis of an 80 per cent loan, 25 per cent participation by the government and 75 per cent by the lending institutions.

The figures for last year are very important. The results achieved in 11 months of 1953 showed $239 million as the amount put out in joint loans, and I believe $51 million by Central Mortgage alone. On the basis of $239 million for 11 months I take it to work out to something in the nature of $260 million for the year.

As I said a moment ago, this was changed without any warning. Notice was given by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on October 1 that this was going to be changed. It was felt that enough money was not likely to be forthcoming this year; therefore the change with which we are familiar was proposed.

As I have said, there are many points of criticism which have been carefully made and which I have no desire to repeat. But there is one thing that I do desire to repeat, because I believe it is so important. I think it is unfortunate, and it seems to me that it perhaps is a necessary characteristic of bureaucracy, but it just shows how much one loses when one is forced away from ordinary human dealings between man and man and gets into the hands of a bureaucracy. I am not saying that with disrespect, as I have great respect for the president of Central Mortgage, I am only saying that there are certain things a huge bureaucracy cannot do, and I refer to them in this manner.

We are bringing in borrowers, purchasers of houses who are going to pay for them on the instalment plan. As the president of the Royal Bank of Canada said the other day, we have become a pretty high-cost economy. I will not dwell on the fact, which I have mentioned before and may mention again, that that is not at all unrelated to the easy money policies which were followed by this government and which were nice and easy for those who get the easy money but which become more and more difficult for those who do not share in the easy money.

That helped to raise prices. We all know that the rise in building costs was very much above the average. So these prices, to which I shall not refer at length, have gone up. I had hoped incidentally that suggestions which have been made as to the possibility of much lower prices even though not on exactly the same standards of construction, might be seriously considered by the minister.

I come back now to these borrowers. If they are just human beings like the rest of us the chances are they will have some other instalment payments to make beyond the payments on their houses. They may very well be making payments on a car, on a radio or what you will. What I am coming to is this. In all probability a good many of these people will be under strain in making their payments.

When an individual borrows from a good lender—I shall try to explain in a moment what I think a good lender is, and on this subject I have some experience—he knows that the last thing in the world that lender wants to do is to take his property. That is not from any high or altruistic motives, though I would say that there have been far more good relations between borrower and lender throughout this country than sometimes people like to admit. However, I just put it on the ground of good business. No lender wants to take over the property of a private borrower who has lived up to the character which the lender believed he had and who is doing his best to work out his loan.

Let us see what is going to happen here, because here is where bureaucracy comes in. It has been pointed out, and I do not intend to refer to it at great length, that there is an escape clause; but the genius of this act is that the lender, who is being guaranteed, has to be right on the job and not leave any opening so it can be said that he was slack in pressing for his money. If that is what we are led to understand from, shall I say, unofficial reports of the regulations, he may easily get into difficulty. So I just want to make this point—

Mr. Pickersgill: As I understand the hon. member, he referred to regulations leaking out on one occasion, and he now refers to unofficial reports of regulations. Does the hon. gentleman not know that by a law enacted by this parliament all regulations having the force of law have to be published and have to be tabled in this house?

Mr. Macdonnell: It is a question of timing. I do not think at the present time the regulations are supposed to be available to any except those who have been called into consultation.

Mr. Pickersgill: There cannot be any regulations until—

Mr. Fulton: You have to make them first.

Mr. Macdonnell: It is quite nice to have someone try to keep us on a high intellectual level but I am afraid the minister will always be disappointed in me because I am only a reformed lawyer and I shall never be able to attain the level which I can see he is going to try to set for us.

Mr. Fleming: And for his colleagues.

Mr. Macdonnell: I accept whatever proper word I should have used about regulations. If I am wrong again the minister no doubt will correct me again. I just want to stress the great importance in my mind of what I understand is in these particular regulations.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Macdonnell: What I understand to be in them—of course the sections of the act are pretty stiff too—is that the lender, unless there are unusual circumstances, will have to give practically no leeway. He will have to go ahead and enforce his security. I point out that this is one of the difficulties with a huge bureaucracy. You are faced with the dilemma of it either being ridden with politics, which none of us want but which could happen, or it has to act in a rigid and unyielding manner. I do not think we shall be able to blame them. I think Central Mortgage will have duties laid on them which will compel them to do this. Therefore I am making the point that to me one of the most unfortunate things about this is that the lender will not be able to put off the foreclosure even for years if he believes the borrower is doing his best and that he is not only honourable but capable.

I have said that there was a fruitful partnership between the lending institutions and Central Mortgage, but that the form in which it worked it is being done away with and that Central Mortgage is proposing to withdraw from the 25-75 relationship. We are all aware of how that is to be taken care of. Central Mortgage will still be able to make loans itself, but as regards the others they will be dealt with by insurance policies. The money is supposed to come from private institutions and is to be guaranteed. How much money will be needed is anyone's guess. I gave the figures a moment ago to indicate that last year the total amounts put out jointly by the lending institutions and Central Mortgage were somewhere in the neighbourhood of $260 million. Central Mortgage will not now supply its 25 per cent of that, and it is expected that the lending institutions will not be able to supply quite so much. I suppose a fair guess might be that there may be something like $100 million or more needed. I put that forward purely as a rough guess.

A word about the availability of funds. The banks of course have declared their readiness to co-operate and on this point there has been some interesting comments, some by the Bank of Canada and some at the annual meetings of the banks themselves, indicating their approach. Bank loans are very high, and they have increased by some $600 million their ordinary commercial loans in the last year. In a manner of speaking it has been customary to say that the banks are "fully loaned" but I think it is a dangerous phrase to use, because after all, in spite of the fact that a year ago the banks were pretty well loaned up, last year loans were increased by the very substantial amount I have mentioned. The question then arises as to the banks' reserves and I will refer to that in a moment.

On the question of liquidity—a word I think has almost fallen out of use in our vocabulary, at least as far as money matters are concerned, and which I think we should recognize as of great importance—it is interesting to point out that within the last few days there appeared in the press a reference to the reserves of the chartered banks. That reference contains the following, and I am quoting from the Montreal Gazette of January 22, 1954:

A broad change in the mechanics of credit control by the Bank of Canada is under study by the government and may be translated into legislation.

A proposal, which follows upon the decision of the government to permit banks to lend on new residential construction is that the cash ratio chartered banks must maintain against deposit liabilities shall be variable and shall be altered by the Bank of Canada according to the position of the economy.

The statutory position now, substantially unchanged since the Bank of Canada came into existence in 1935, is that the chartered banks must maintain with the Bank of Canada not less than 5 per cent of their deposit liabilities. In practice this has been generally conceded to be unrealistic and the ratio has been kept in the neighbourhood of 10 per cent.

What is likely to happen, if present plans mature, is that the Bank of Canada will from time to time set a minimum ratio that may vary from 8 per cent to 12 per cent according to circumstances.

As you will observe, Mr. Speaker, that is really following what has actually been the practice. In other words the banks have not been content to maintain the legal minimum of 5 per cent, but practice has fixed it at about 10 per cent. Indeed, 10 per cent is used as almost a legislative figure. That 10 per cent is the amount by which the banks may increase credit facilities as they increase cash. In other words, they apply the 10 per cent figure and not the 5 per cent figure.

I want to draw attention to a recent comment by a banker, because on the one hand I think we can take it for granted that the banks will co-operate to the best of their ability, and on the other hand I think we should bear in mind that it is not just a question of looking at the amount of deposits in a bank and saying there is a lot of money there and they can lend hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars. I am reading from a report in the Toronto Globe and Mail dated January 21, 1954, part of which is the Globe's own comment and part of which contains the words of Mr. Vanstone, president of the Bank of Toronto. The first part is the Globe's summary of what Mr. Vanstone said, and when I come to Mr. Vanstone's own words I will indicate them:

Mr. Vanstone agrees that it is right and proper for the maximum number of Canadians to live in their own houses. To do that construction and financing costs must remain within their capacity to pay. If public funds are to be considered essential to add to private funds to aid in financing house buying, dwelling units should be of the most economical type of construction consistent with durability, sanitation and propriety. Hitherto life insurance, mortgage and trust companies and private investors have been the traditional sources of mortgage funds. House mortgages were made a lawful investment for trust funds and practically everything had been done to put them in a preferred position to attract funds for which immediate liquidity was not necessary.

The need for liquidity had dominated banking since before confederation.

Now I come to Mr. Vanstone's own words:

Depositors in Canada's chartered banks consider that they are placing their money on demand.

It is true that savings accounts have legally a 10 day delay, but no bank would ever dream of invoking that delay. Mr. Vanstone continues:

Only by in turn placing their depositors' money in constantly maturing, short-term loans to business or in sound marketable public securities, can the banks be certain of not disappointing them.

That is the depositors.

Inasmuch as there is a hard core of savings deposits which in effect form personal reserves likely to be called for only in personal emergency, it may be that the banks can without undue risk depart from total short-term liquidity to place some small portion of these funds in well-secured mortgages and thereby be in a position to perform a public service by filling such gaps in the market for housing capital as existing financial agencies may not quite cover. Obviously the extent to which this can be done will depend on the degree of liquidity that the government is willing to make available if and when necessary, and it is only to a moderate extent that it would be prudent to tie up the funds of Canadian depositors in long-term fixed investments.

The banks must keep themselves in a position to take care of demands from depositors and fully look after the requirements of trade and commerce.

Now, in the light of this let us look at the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) which started this discussion last October. I read briefly from his speech as reported in the Ottawa Journal of October 1, 1953:

The government does not believe that it would be sound under present conditions to fill the gap—

That is the gap caused by the expected inability of the lending institutions to provide all the money.

—by direct government lending.

If that were done the government would become the direct mortgagee or landlord of a large number of Canadian families.

The Prime Minister continued:

The government feels that the proper solution is to enlarge and broaden the supply of mortgage money by making mortgages more attractive and a more liquid form of investment than they have been up to now.

I wish to comment briefly on the Prime Minister's statement. He does not think it would be sound under present conditions "to fill the gap by direct government lending". That does not seem to me to be a very realistic statement because the government is actually the person responsible, though in the background. When you consider that the government is behind Central Mortgage, and that Central Mortgage is guaranteeing the loans, it seems to me that it is a distinction very largely without a difference.

The Prime Minister then went on to say that it is not the government's wish to "become the direct mortgagee or landlord of a large number of Canadian families". He considers it very undesirable, and so do I. Nevertheless, if in fact Central Mortgage is going to assume that position I do not see that it is any great comfort to us. You will observe, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister uses the word "landlord" as well as "mortgagee", by which I assume he means that by reason of defaults there is a possibility of properties having to be taken over.

I want to deal now briefly with the question of liquidity. Liquidity, as I said a moment ago, has nothing to do with the temperance act. It has to do with the availability of money on depositors' demand. Commenting on the Prime Minister's statement about mortgages being made more liquid, Saturday's edition of the Montreal Gazette has the following to say:

> Graham Towers, governor of the Bank of Canada, said the bank probably will be allowed loans up to 100 per cent of the value of mortgages, but in practice this is not done. Their borrowing from the central bank was only for moderately small amounts and for short periods.

The period is indeed short enough, because under the Bank of Canada Act, section 18, loans are supposed to be for six months. That would not open the door very wide though, as a matter of fact, I suppose in actual practice if the banks went to the Bank of Canada for additional money they would probably use as their first line of defence not their mortgages but government of Canada bonds and other securities which they have.

In passing I want to point out that I think this whole plan is based largely on the practice followed by United States banks. I further point out that it was done there in the midst of the depression. It was a depression measure. It seems to me to be unfortunate if we have to follow somewhat slavishly, in a time which is certainly not a time of depression, what the Americans did at a time of depression.

I want to digress just for a moment further on the question of the amount available. That is a matter that is going to be undoubtedly in the discretion of the Bank of Canada. I think that is clear. It will depend upon how much further cash they are prepared to provide the chartered banks so the chartered banks may turn around and make these mortgage loans. As I said, it is interesting that at the very moment this matter comes up, there is a suggestion of increasing the percentage of reserves required.

May I spend just a moment on the question of liquidity. The banks take deposits, and of course their only means of earning is to make those deposits work. They lend those deposits out, and they have to judge the likely requirements or the likely demands of depositors. Of course it is fatal to any bank if they are ever caught without enough money to satisfy the demands of depositors. It is important to distinguish between security and liquidity. In the crash in the United States in 1932 there were banks which had plenty of assets with which to pay all the depositors but which could not be realized on demand. It is no good to tell a depositor who wants his money today that you have a loan coming in next week, next month or next year. If you cannot pay upon demand, your doors close. There were many banks at that time whose doors closed, though eventually they were able to pay off in full.

It will be obvious to hon. members that, as you might say, the three lines of defence a bank has are, first, its cash reserves; second, government bonds and other quickly realizable securities; and third, commercial paper and that kind of thing which represents money lent on short terms and which is being repaid day by day.

At the outset I complained about this bill which erects this huge bureaucracy and which leaves so little to be done by private enterprise. I want to quote briefly from words used by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) which I think are worth repeating. Speaking of the powers of the bill, as reported at page 1333 of Hansard he said:

> The powers are so vast that those of us who do not trust power in the hands of the government will not feel that powers of this nature, powers which are so wide, so sweeping and so inclusive are needed.

There is one point that I should like to make here and it is this. We have had many cases where there have been sweeping emergency powers, with regard to foreign exchange control and other matters, where we have differed—where there have been different feelings—as to how long they should last. But I think I am correct in saying that in those cases there was always or almost always agreement among us that the power in question was for an emergency, for a special purpose, and that the time would come when it would disappear. With respect to this bill it seems to me that the situation is exactly the opposite. There is no reason to believe that it will disappear. Quite the contrary; I think it will become more and more deeply embedded, and that it will exercise more and more authority in this part of the lending industry which, after all, is a large area of our whole economy. As time goes on, I think the approved lending institutions may find that it is almost a waste of time for them to keep up the organizations which they have at the present time and which have been so active, as the minister knows, in arriving at sound valuations.

The best information I can get in connection with the similar practice in the United States is that the approved lending institutions there still take the responsibility of making the valuations, though they may be checked up—as indeed our own valuations have been checked up—to some extent by the public body.

But as the situation stands, as the minister well knows, every approved lending institution must await the nod from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation before it acts. If it is a building loan, there must be a detailed, meticulous report and approval by Central Mortgage; and let anyone beware of disregarding the slightest wish of Central Mortgage because, as we all know, guarantees are tricky things and his guarantee might be called in question.

As I said a moment ago, the only place where initiative is still left to the lender is in the dirty job of foreclosing loans. He is not only left with that job but he is forced to do it, even though it may be entirely against his own better judgment.

I said at the outset that nobody can read the legend on the outside of this bill without approving it, but I wish to say that I still hope that in committee it may not be found necessary to go nearly the length of these wide, inclusive, meticulous and permanent powers. I want to say here that to me, despite everything that may have been intended, this is a great step forward into state socialism. What we are having here is the part played by private enterprise—which up to the present has been great—really being played down. Private enterprise is going to be just the agent of this new institution.

I wish to make a few comments on that matter, because to me it is striking at the very root of what I believe to be the motive power of our economic life. Most of us in this chamber differ from the socialists on that matter. I would think the socialists would find this legislation extremely palatable. If they do not, I shall have lost confidence in their judgment. After all, it is going along the line they themselves so often advocate.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

I want to draw attention to the fact that in England there has obviously been a revulsion of feeling. I drew this to the attention of the house before. At the Margate convention again and again measures to further public enterprise were voted down. I refer to the trade union congress at Margate.

I often find that the socialists seem to regard wealth as if it were a fixed amount and it were only a question of dividing it up.

I have been greatly interested to find the extent to which leading socialists apparently have turned their faces in a different direction. I have here a book the title of which will not immediately commend itself to hon. gentlemen opposite because it is called "The Conservative Mind". But I should like to make two comments with regard to that book. One is that the "c" is a small "c", and the other is that it was strongly recommended to me by one of the best-known gentlemen who sit opposite in this house. In it there are two or three short quotations I should like to read because they indicate such a great change of attitude. One is this:

> Finding that the majority of men seem to lack motive for performing their duties in society, now that the ordinary rewards for ordinary integrity have been abolished or diminished, the socialists are dismayed; they begin to wonder whether their theory of human nature can be at fault. Professor G. D. H. Cole says that "socialism is an unworkable system without a new social drive such as the communists have managed to give it" . . .

It is a curious thing that here is one of the leading socialists in Britain who practically says it is no good unless they can import something of the communist attitude. On the other hand you get a man like Gordon Walker, who was a member of the last cabinet, and he is all in favour of more and more regimentation. He says:

> Since the state is the main organ of authority in society, one of the natural ends of the new state will be to secure the increased quantum of authority necessary for the increased output of social energy . . . In large part . . . it will achieve this end by an extension of its positive functions: there will not be a village, a street or a house into which the new state does not enter, exacting respect for regulations, requiring information and rational action.

Mr. Gillis: What is the name of the book?

Mr. Macdonnell: The name of the book is "The Conservative Mind".

Mr. Gillis: Who is the author of the book?

Mr. Macdonnell: Let us imagine that by some magic we came back here tomorrow and found that there was a C.C.F. government in power.

Mr. Fleming: That would be black magic.

Mr. Macdonnell: Let us imagine that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was minister of trade and commerce. I want to imagine him bringing in some of the measures that he would like to bring in and with which we are so familiar. I want to imagine what he would say if this bill had become law. Would he not say—

Mr. Gillis: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Macdonnell: As long as it does not use up my time.

Mr. Gillis: He gave us the name of the book, "The Conservative Mind", and it certainly is, but would he mind giving us the name of the author?

Mr. MacDougall: Jim Macdonnell.

Mr. Macdonnell: The author's name is Russell Kirk. I understand he is quite a respectable person in the United States. With this state I have asked you to imagine, the C.C.F. being in power, I think they could say to us: "You have given these overwhelming powers, the kind of powers we socialists like, in the house building industry. Why do you stop there? If houses are socially desirable so are a lot of other things. Refrigerators are socially desirable. Stoves are socially desirable. Motor cars are socially desirable." In the situation I have asked you to imagine I suggest that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would think that he was going along perfectly within the four corners of this measure we have before us now.

It may amuse hon. members, but it has been suggested here that if we are going to guarantee those who lend money we ought to guarantee those who borrow money. That has been suggested. I thought first of all that it was a joke, but apparently it was not a joke.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that I am coming very near to the end of my time. I wish that somehow I could convince hon. members who are going to sit on this committee, and the people of Canada, that these extraordinary powers are not all necessary. I feel that what is needed is not a further extension of socialist powers, government powers, but the effort to bring freedom and private enterprise more into action as I think could have been done here if the attempt had been made.

I quoted what the hon. member for Eglinton said last week, and I should like to quote one or two more things from this book by Mr. Russell Kirk. In my opinion we should try to assess these things very carefully and not merely take some easy way to get an immediate result if in fact we are disregarding what we really believe are the principles that we should follow. At page 414 Mr. Kirk says:

> During the remaining half of the present century, the principal endeavour of intelligent conservatives is likely to be resistant to the idea of a planned society, through restoration of an order which will make the planned society unnecessary and impracticable.

He goes on to say:

> If, by the year 1984, justice, liberty and hope still are general characteristics of western social thought, the credit for this conservation of traditional values may belong to the school of genuinely reformatory and critical conservatism which is a growing influence in America and Britain . . .

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order. I do not like to interrupt the hon. member, but it is my duty to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Macdonnell: If I may have 30 seconds, I should like to finish reading what he says. He goes on to say:

> The mass of men must find status and hope within society: true family, respect for the past, responsibility for the future, private property, duty as well as right . . .

Referring to what he calls the problem of economic stability he says:

> But it does mean the establishment of a rational relationship between endeavour and reward.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that these considerations, to which I have tried, very inadequately, to address our minds, should not be disregarded, and I hope they will not be disregarded when the bill gets to the committee.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, in the first place I am at a loss to understand why the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) is apparently unable to comprehend a writer of the clarity of G. D. H. Cole and why he draws such strange deductions from his words. I am also surprised that the hon. member finds fault with this bill on the grounds that it is a bill which would appeal to socialists.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: I hope he realizes that I was quoting Cole.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I know the hon. member was, and I will come back to that in a moment. I know that the hon. member was quoting from Cole, and when I heard him quoting Cole I realized how useless it was for socialist writers to expect to be understood.

Mr. Fleming: Not only socialist writers. How about socialist speakers?

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I am at a loss to understand why he should think the bill would appeal to socialists, and equally at a loss to understand why he objects to it so strenuously from the corner in which he sits. Here we have a bill apparently designed to do nothing but protect the interests of the lending institutions, with which I have always understood my hon. friend had connections.

Let us see what the purposes of the government were in introducing the legislation. They are stated as being the promotion of the construction of new houses, the repair and modernization of existing houses and the improvement of housing and living conditions. They are worthy motives, but I wonder whether, after a year of operation of this legislation, the minister will not find himself perhaps murmuring the old tag, "How doth desire outrun performance".

I am giving him the credit, of course, of thinking that he has the desire to see houses built for the people of Canada. Let us take his own figures. An individual who is going to build an $8,000 house first of all has to find $800 for his down payment. He then has to buy a lot. I presume he will pay at least $200 for his lot. This is of course, Mr. Speaker, always assuming that today one can build a house for $8,000.

Here is our prospective buyer who now has to find a total of $1,000. Where will we find him in the population of Canada? I have the taxation statistics of the Department of National Revenue for 1953 covering the income brackets of all those taxable and non-taxable persons in Canada who filed income tax returns. We have those persons with incomes of under $1,000 who amount to 14·7 per cent of the total. I think the minister will agree with me that a person with an income of under $1,000 is not going to be able to find $1,000 for a down payment. So they are wiped out. The next group is persons with incomes between $1,000 and $2,000, and they amount to 28·1 per cent of our total population. Again I think the minister will agree with me when I say it is very dubious whether people with incomes of $2,000 or less are going to be able to find $1,000 for a down payment. Then we come to persons with incomes between $2,000 and $3,000. These amount to 30·4 per cent of the population.

This makes a total of 73 per cent of our population with incomes of less than $3,000 a year. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that anyone with an income of $3,000 or less is not going to be able to take advantage of this act. Someone has suggested that perhaps they are not eligible, that perhaps they do not fall into that quaint category the minister mentioned the other day when he referred to credit-worthy individuals. It struck me at the time that that was a rather curious form of worthiness.

Just to show how impractical is the suggestion that people of modest income are going to be able to build houses under the terms of this legislation, I should like to tell the house of what I saw in the state of California only a few months ago. In September I visited the peninsula south of San Francisco, probably one of the richest areas in North America. It is one vast garden all the way down from that city. All along the skyline boulevard highway private building developments are in progress. One may see large billboards advertising the terms upon which people may take advantage of what these builders have to offer. They are advertising houses to a value of $16,000 which can be obtained with a down payment of $400.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that that is a practical realization on the part of these private building contractors that the average family that aims to live in even a $16,000 house has very little cash to make a down payment. I have yet to hear any convincing argument which satisfies me as to the necessity for this down payment at all. We are told, of course, that it creates an interest in the property, and unless a down payment is made the purchaser will not care for the property after he gets it.

That seems to be a dubious argument. I believe that persons who are putting aside each month regular sums in the hope that they will own their homes some day will look after them whether down payments are made or not. The down payment requirement in this legislation makes it of practically no use to the people of Canada.

One of the great shortcomings in the bill is that there is no real provision for low rental housing to meet the needs of those people who cannot afford to pay the rentals charged today. There is of course a provision to aid private contractors in the building of multiple dwelling units, but this will not meet the needs of those in the low income brackets. It will meet the requirements of those in the middle and higher income brackets. I recall the sad experience many people had in Vancouver shortly after the war in dealing with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. At that time apartment houses were erected, designed to accommodate veterans with children. First of all the rents were to run between $40 and $50 a month. Those rents gradually crept up until they reached $60 or $70 a month.

That appears to be the situation in Ontario today. This past week end I was in Toronto visiting a young couple who are living in an apartment house constructed under the guarantee of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. They rent a small basement suite with a total floor area of between 600 and 700 square feet and pay $81 a month for this accommodation, and they have been told that when their lease expires the rent will increase to $100 a month.

These are conditions people in Canada are facing today. I might add that the young man in the case I have mentioned makes a weekly wage of just over $70. He told me when he went to that apartment he was obliged to pay three months' rent in advance. I presume this was to be a form of insurance against damage that can be done to an apartment. It is clearly just another racket; that is all it is, because there are terms in the lease saying that the owner can expend the whole of the advance to redecorate the apartment when the tenant moves out. In order to make this down payment of three months' rental at $81 a month this young man was obliged to go to a bank and sign a note to borrow the money. They are not a particularly extravagant couple, and have two small children. It is obvious that $70 a week is not enough to provide the thousand dollars required to take advantage of this legislation.

I am wondering what the purpose of this legislation is. The government has brought it in with a fine fanfare, stating that it is to promote the construction of new houses, the repair and modernization of existing houses and the improvement of housing and living conditions. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is nothing more or less than a cruel hoax being perpetrated upon the people of Canada by this government.

Miss Margaret Aitken (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak my first few words in parliament inspired by the tremendous importance of this legislation and, particularly, its importance to my own constituency. York-Humber is a pulsating, growing suburban part of Toronto. Residential sections seem to spring up almost overnight. Young people are pouring in and, as in so many other urban parts of Canada, housing has become of vital importance to us.

This bill provides some relief, some assistance, to potential home owners; but there are thousands of people who will find no relief in it whatsoever. For instance, in my riding there are hundreds of young couples living under conditions of two and three families in a house, or living with their in-laws and in a shockingly overcrowded state. They have had to do this, not because they are unemployed or are incapable of maintaining homes. In many cases the wife as well as the husband is working, and each is drawing a quite reasonable salary; but they simply cannot make this down payment that must be made in the purchase of these houses. They cannot set aside that percentage of income required to secure a loan under the National Housing Act.

As I said, the wives as well as the husbands are working. I understand that under the regulations it is not possible to use their combined salaries; yet it seems to me that where a husband and wife are both working toward a common goal, the purchase of a home, they are really a better risk than is a husband with a higher salary whose wife is at home, with plenty of time on her hands to spend his money.

This bill will do nothing for the young people in the riding I represent. The attitude, which amounts almost to scorn, that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation seems to show for the small-salaried worker, and the even greater scorn it shows for a wife's earning capacity, makes it quite impossible for these young people to benefit by this legislation.

As the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) said last Friday, under this new measure a prospective home owner must be receiving an income of $3,860 a year before he can apply for a National Housing Act loan. Well, there are many thousands of prospective home owners in my constituency who are certainly not earning even $3,000 a year. Among some of those couples, as I mentioned previously, the wives are also wage earners and their combined incomes would qualify them for a loan. I submit, sir, that wives' earnings, or at least a part of them, should be included in the amount that qualifies for a loan.

There is no doubt about it, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is one of the government's most successful arms of bureaucracy. I understand the losses under C.M.H.C. are practically nil, but so are the chances the corporation takes. Bureaucracy can always be successful because it takes no chances. I say, Mr. Speaker, that that is not the way this country was built, and at this stage in our growth it seems to me that such regimentation as is shown in this bill could stultify any further growth. Central Mortgage sits in its ivory tower here in Ottawa laying down the rules without any regard for the drive and initiative of the individual.

What I find suspect in this bill is the fact that there is one rule, and that one rule debars the small wage earner and also the average wage earner; so that while promising so much on the surface, in reality this bill could strangle housing for the majority of the people.

We all know the important part that Canadian banks played in building the Canadian west. In those days, unlike bureaucracy, the banks did take chances on the human element as well as on cold, hard cash. During the early days of this twentieth century, Canadian banks sent young men out to the prairies and over the Rockies to open up new branches for them. They were men of vision and imagination, and they were given much more power than bankers seem to have today. They were permitted to judge a man by his character as much as by the security he could offer when he was seeking a loan. Sometimes the borrowers on the prairie, the farmers, would have to borrow three times before they could pay back the amount. They would come again and again to the bank manager with a story of a bad crop, and then a bumper crop would come along and they would pay off the whole loan. If those prairie farmers had to show that they earned $3,000 a year before they were allowed a loan, well, the prairies would still be pretty arid and the west a bit of wilderness.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, this country has been built by men of vision and imagination, and not by bureaucrats in Ottawa who lay down one rule and take no chances whatever on human drive and initiative. I suggest that this bill should be expanded so it will give assistance to the average Canadian who wants a home of his own. The percentage of income required is too high.

I agree with one hon. member who asked why the government should say, in a country that is free, that a man has to have so much and spend so much on the maintenance of his home. Some people want to spend more on their homes than others. The down payments are too high, and in that regard I was interested in listening to the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron) pointing out to us what private enterprise can do in San Francisco where they can build houses to sell for $16,000 and ask only a down payment of $400. I do not see why private enterprise could not do that here in Canada also.

A great Conservative prime minister, Benjamin Disraeli, once said that the social happiness of the millions should be the chief concern of a statesman. Well, I believe the home is the greatest of all social happiness. The very word "home" is a beautiful one to our Canadian ears, and I say that no government should debar the average or the small-salaried Canadian from owning his own home.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): I want to compliment the hon. member who has just taken her seat on her very able and relaxed effort in her first address in this house. With much of what she had to say I agree, but there is a spot or two where we might disagree with her. However, at this time I am not going to do it, not until she has had a better chance of looking over this forum and perhaps revising her opinion.

I would just like to say that the great difficulty in the part of the country from which I come—and it is still operated, mind you, under the free enterprise system—is not getting homes at the present time but keeping the people in the homes they have established over the years. That is our main problem. I want to suggest that the cure for lack of housing in Canada is not slogans.

I was rather disappointed in the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell). He is always very fair and inclined to be factual; but when he gets up in the house, takes a book and reads the title, and judging by what he quoted from it, it was very appropriate, and pulls a few sentences out of their context—and you know how prone the Americans are at this time to eulogize anything going on in Britain—and give it to the house as the opinion of G. D. H. Cole on a certain subject, all I can say is that I am reasonably sure that if the whole article by Cole were quoted the house would get an entirely different impression. However, that is by the way.

As I see this question, Mr. Speaker, it is tied up with a lot of other matters to which we have to give consideration. Since 1945 this world has been going through a process of change. In my judgment it is a complete revolution that affects the whole world. There are no guideposts to lead us along the way. It is one world today. We have been going through this cold war process. In the cold war, in my opinion, the thing that stands out to a greater extent than developing armies and guns has been the advice we have received from time to time from people who were in a position to give us that advice: that the social and economic conditions of North America particularly are more important to us than the development of armies.

The system in North America is on trial as far as China, Africa and other countries we refer to as backward are concerned. They look to us, and they judge the system that we represent on the basis of how we do our housekeeping and how we take care of the people who live under that system. In the social and economic structure of this country the thing that stands out in my judgment as a first and must is the housing of our people.

If we are successful in preventing a shooting war, and it looks as though we will be, then the thing we have to do is develop an objective in this country toward which we can take our people. We united ourselves during the war. We had a common objective in defeating fascism. The people got behind us to help win that war and we now have to answer the questions asked, not only by the men who were in the services but by those who were in the plants and factories. They ask, what were we fighting for? They contend that they were fighting for the right to retain what they had and to go forward into something better. There are hundreds of thousands of those veterans who do not forget the slogans on which we fought the last war.

As I said, one of the first things is housing our people. I do not think you can develop good citizenship in any country until you give the individual citizen a stake in that country, a piece of land, a home which he owns, the right to say, "This little bit of Canada is mine; I have something to fight for." If we said now that we were going to declare war on slums, that we were going to give our people the right to own homes in so far as their ability will enable them to do so; if we made that an objective for the Canadian people and told them that we were going to spend some money in the future in that way as we have been spending it on war, then I think we would at least be living up to some of the promises made during the days of the shooting war when the world was threatened, and when we felt we were fighting for something better.

The Chinaman, the African and people in other backward countries are looking to North America as the last bastion of democracy as we know it. We had better smarten up and try to fix it up in order to give them an incentive to strive in their own countries for something similar to what we have in Canada.

I am disappointed in the bill, and for this reason. In 1945 the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) tabled a white paper in this house. One of the things stressed on several pages—if anyone wants to have a look at it I would refer them to pages 3, 10 and 11—was housing. That was one of the things pointed out definitely by the white paper. There was going to be a program managed by the government that would enable returning service personnel to get homes of their own. The people of Canada were going to get housing generally better than it was previous to the war.

In that white paper the government outlined what their future policy was in regard to the whole development of Canada. Step by step they pointed out that free enterprise would have the right to develop the country and work on the resources, but they also gave a warning that where free enterprise failed to fill the bill the government would step in and supplement their efforts. That is what the government has failed to do in the matter of housing particularly.

The hon. member who spoke just before me made reference to the fact that in the United States free enterprise had been able to build houses for a certain figure, as indicated by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron). She wanted to know why Canada could not do the same thing. If the hon. member takes a look at the whole picture she will find that United States capital is doing a lot of things in Canada that you cannot get Canadian capital to do. I would refer to the development of our iron ore and so forth. United States capital is coming into this country and working on our resources because Canadians who have capital apparently either have not the initiative or the courage to put their money into any project that is all-Canadian. The Americans are gamblers. They are ready to get out and do things, and that is why you can get houses in the United States much easier and at cheaper rates than in Canada. Apparently our people who have money are afraid to spend it, or they have not much confidence in the future of Canada.

My No. 1 disagreement is that the government announced a very good policy in 1945 in their white paper with particular reference to housing. The bill which the minister has brought in falls far short of living up to the announcement made at that time that where free enterprise failed—and it has failed completely in providing the Canadian people with homes—the government would step in and see that they were provided with homes. This bill does not do that.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Speaker, when we recessed for dinner I was making a few observations on Bill No. 102 amending the National Housing Act, and I was emphasizing that the policy and philosophy of the government, as laid down in their white paper in 1945, was not being followed in so far as housing is concerned. They laid down a very good policy at that time, but unfortunately they have not followed their own program. In that document tabled in April, 1945, they said that in the National Housing Act, as in all other matters affecting the economic future of Canada, they would depend on the system of free enterprise to do the job, but that where free enterprise fell down the government would step in and supplement what they were not able to do. In the matter of housing that has not happened.

There is no doubt that since 1945 the people of Canada have not been provided with houses under the system of free enterprise. From 1945 on, previous to the amendments, the National Housing Act was largely in the hands of the insurance companies in Canada. They had a lot of money invested, but they certainly did not provide the Canadian people with homes. In fact if you check the figures closely you will find that the backlog of housing that existed seven or eight years ago has not yet been caught up with. We have to a large extent met the demand created since that time, but I believe I am safe in saying there is a backlog of housing in Canada today of around 400,000 family units. That still has to be taken care of; and if you take the natural increase we can expect, and couple that with the fact that the Minister of Immigration and Citizenship (Mr. Harris) announced a few weeks ago that the government planned in 1954 to bring into Canada an additional 168,000 new citizens who will have to find themselves places to live, then the mechanics of this new bill are, in my judgment, not going to meet the need.

To begin with let us have a look at the drawbacks. The bill itself may provide housing for those in the higher income brackets and for some in the middle class, but it definitely will not provide housing for those on average incomes in Canada. There is one group who are not going to be able to get houses on a home ownership basis under this bill. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), when he brought down his last budget, in discussing the tax rates told us in this house that there were 137,000 families in Canada on incomes below the taxable level. That was families, mind you, and families require houses. That group below the income tax level will not be able to build or rent houses under the arrangements provided in the amendments to the National Housing Act. They are out.

Second, those on average incomes—and the average is under $3,000 for the majority of wage and salary earners in Canada—will also be unable to take advantage of this bill. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation determine what they call an "economic unit" which is around $10,080 with a lending value of $12,000, and they also insist on an income of around $3,800 a year. There is no point in the average wage earner, earning under $3,000 or around that figure per year, applying for a loan under this bill. He cannot meet income requirements and therefore he is out. You can add that large group to the 137,000 families with incomes under the income tax level.

Looking at the bill on that basis you are not going to provide houses for 10 per cent of the people of this country. The test of income and the "economic unit" as defined by the bill at the present time automatically disqualify them. So we are just wasting our time if we think this bill is going to provide homes for average Canadians.

Mr. Dupuis: Is there any good in the bill at all?

Mr. Gillis: It is not my job to point out the good in it. That is the job of my hon. friend and the members on that side of the house. My job is to pull it apart. If there is anything good in it you tell us what it is, and I would like you to analyse the position of the groups I have just mentioned.

Mr. Dupuis: I will do that.

Mr. Gillis: And how they are going to get homes under the act.

Mr. Dupuis: I will do that.

Mr. Gillis: Another matter the government was lax in supervising, not only the federal government but the provincial and municipal governments also, was that of land speculation, which is one of the main stumbling blocks today in the provision of homes.

Take any city or town across Canada of any size and take a look at values of land back in 1945 and beyond that, then take a look at what you have to pay for a lot in these towns and cities today, and you will find that the average person on an average income cannot even afford to buy a lot. I am told, though I would not swear to this, that there are lots in this city today that cost around $8,000. People who were smart, anticipating what is happening today, namely that the government would take some responsibility in the matter of housing, got hold of land in and around towns and cities across Canada and they are now holding on to it. Today they are holding a gun to the heads of those who need houses, and in that way we are left with the major problem of finding land for the average person who may want to own a house in or around a town or city of any size in the Dominion of Canada.

I think something should have been done a long time ago, though I believe perhaps we are too late now, with regard to people holding land for speculative purposes. Theirs, I think, was a very unpatriotic act.

A load has been dumped on the municipalities. If one undertakes a housing development in any of the municipalities and towns across Canada today, we find the town is left with the responsibility of servicing the land, and most of the towns and cities today are pretty well up against it in the matter of finances. The larger cities, of course, where they have a lot of property, are not quite so badly off but in most of the smaller towns the situation is not quite so good regarding the servicing of land.

Under the present bill the rate of interest has not been fixed, but the minister did suggest the other day it might run around 6 per cent.

Mr. Winters: I said it would likely be less than that.

Mr. Knowles: Yes; 5·9 per cent.

Mr. Gillis: I would not quibble over a fraction. I suggested around 6 per cent. The banks are going to be protected. They are going to benefit by that interest rate. They are going to be insured. They are not taking any chances. That is not free enterprise. There is no risk capital there. The taxpayers of Canada are guaranteeing it.

Under this act everybody is protected except the man who purchases a home. They are guaranteed by the taxpayers of Canada against any loss of any kind; but under the insurance scheme laid down by the act the purchaser of a home has no protection whatsoever. A man who undertakes to make the down payment obligates himself for the amount of the mortgage. He may continue to make his regular instalments for ten years, and may get some equity in the property. Then he may take sick or lose his job and be obliged to move to another part of the country. He is not able to handle the payments on that property any longer, or maybe he is not permitted to live in the house. He has to get out and find other ways and means of providing that he may eat. The bank is insured. It is not going to lose anything. But for the property holder, who has perhaps put $2,000, $3,000 or $4,000 into the property, there is no insurance whatever.

Mr. Enfield: He could buy it.

Mr. Gillis: Most of those people would be in a nice position to buy it, if they could not make their payments. That is why the man has to get out, or why he has to go to some other part of the country. He has no insurance whatsoever. Whatever equity he has in that property is gone, but the poor little bank is to be protected to the extent of about 90 per cent by the taxpayers of Canada. That is not right. It is immoral, in my judgment, and is something that should be corrected.

We are not asking the government to go into the housing business in Canada for the purpose of stimulating the profits of either the insurance companies or the banks. That is not the objective. The objective is or should be that of getting homes for the people of this country so they may become citizens of the country with a stake in it and be able to say with pride, "I own something in this country besides a place in which to bury me when I pass away". If you are looking for initiative, incentive or that kind of thing, may I say that I think some of the guarantees and protection given to the moneylenders should be given to the purchaser of the property who is endeavouring to make a contribution to the country and to obtain citizenship status.

I think perhaps the interest rate is the biggest stumbling block in connection with the whole matter. My own personal view is that we shall never provide houses for the people of this country on the basis on which we are attempting to do it at the present time. As I said a moment ago, that group of 137,000 families is out as far as this act is concerned, and the large percentage of salaried workers across Canada earning an income of about $3,000 are also out. They are not going to get any housing under this particular act in the form in which we are discussing it at the present time. In their last presentation to the government on December 10, 1953 the Canadian Congress of Labour placed the emphasis where it belonged, in my opinion; because the average person in Canada today, at present prices, cannot afford to become a home owner under the National Housing Act. In a memorandum to the government the Canadian Congress of Labour touched on the whole question of housing and in their final summing up they had this to say:

> . . . very few Canadian workers can afford to build their own homes.
> Assuming, as conservative expert opinion does, that a wage earner should not buy a home costing more than 2¼ times his annual income, and taking eight heavy industries (coal mining, metal mining, pulp and paper mills, heavy electrical apparatus, primary iron and steel, motor vehicles, non-ferrous metal smelting and refining, and products of petroleum and coal) in which most of the workers are full-grown men, we find that in only one of the eight are wage earners now getting enough to buy even the cheapest type of N.H.A. house. And these are the high-wage industries.

The most urgent need is for low-rental housing. This means subsidized public housing. The government has provided for this, in section 35 of the act. But it is doing little or nothing to make the section known, let alone promote it, in the local communities which have to take the initiative in bringing it into operation.

I think the Canadian Congress of Labour, who have their finger on the pulse of the industrial workers of this country anyway, stressed the essential point under present circumstances when they pinpointed the question of low rental housing. As they point out in their memorandum, section 35 of the National Housing Act does now make provision, in co-operation with provincial governments, for the application of low-rental housing.

In what position are the provincial governments to take advantage of that section of the act? Some of them may be in a position to do so. Ontario may be in a position to take advantage of it, and Quebec to some extent, and British Columbia; but the maritime provinces are not in this position. Where the federal government offers either to match dollar for dollar with them, as in connection with the health grants, or even on the 75-25 per cent basis, the provincial governments with low incomes are not in a position to embark on any kind of program that means any large outlay of capital which is to be tied up for any considerable period of time. They could not take advantage of it.

I agree with the criticism made by the congress of labour in that memorandum, to the effect that this section of the act has never been stressed, has never been pushed as it should have been, that the use that could have been made of it has not been made, and that it is not a solution. As indicated in the memorandum of the Canadian Congress of Labour, the scheme might have to be subsidized; and money should be made available to the municipalities which have to service the land, at a rate of interest not greater than 2 per cent. A special fund should be set up to be administered by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and the money should be made available directly to the municipalities, cutting out all the middlemen in between, in order that the municipalities which are in a position to do so may be able to embark upon a housing program designed by themselves to take care of their own needs in accordance with the planning they may have done for expansion, the building of their towns and the servicing of their land. That is not a new suggestion. That was done back in the twenties. I can show you groups of houses that were built under a plan similar to that back in the twenties after the first war. They were good, substantial houses. I never heard about any trouble in getting the rents. They were all paid for. Those who went into those houses on a rental plan ultimately became owners of those properties. They are all owned privately now, but in the first place they were built by the municipalities in that way. In my judgment the Canadian government is not going to be able to fulfil its obligation to the Canadian people, with present prices and circumstances, in any other way.

Then I do not think the federal government has done enough advertising with respect to the assistance that can be had by co-operative organizations in the building of homes, and their recognition in the act as lending institutions. In Nova Scotia we have a provincial co-operative housing act. It has been in effect for some considerable time and I think it is one of the best acts of its kind in Canada. The only drawback has been that funds have not been available to make it work. If the minister could arrive at an arrangement under this legislation—

Mr. Winters: We have done so.

Mr. Gillis: —whereby funds could be made available—

Mr. Winters: We have done that.

Mr. Gillis: —directly to these co-operative housing groups at a lower rate of interest, not at the present rate but at a rate of approximately 2 per cent, he would not hear any more about housing from that part of the country. The people would look after their own problem. But the difficulty arises when complicated machinery is set up involving either banks or insurance companies. A person has to make application to some central office in Toronto or Montreal, and the economic experts of these companies, who have never seen the part of the country concerned but who take their opinions from economic analyses made by banks and so on, put a red pencil mark around that part of the country and say that its economic future is not sufficiently promising to warrant spending any money on housing. That is the kind of deal you will get in many districts across Canada.

Some person may say that this plan is going to be a wonderful thing because the local bank manager who knows the needs of the people is going to be able to sit down in his own town, his own community, and determine whether or not John Jones should get a loan for housing. That is a fallacy. All the local bank manager will be in a position to do will be to spend a couple of weeks taking applications and determining what security and income the applicants have and what the future of the community is. After he has compiled that information he will send the applications to the head office in Montreal, and they will be sent back with a red pencil mark through them. Head office will say that the economic future of that part of the country is not good enough to warrant the investment of any of their money over a period of 25 or 30 years.

Mr. Dupuis: There is no such place in Montreal.

Mr. Gillis: There is such a place as "Jesse James" street down there. We have to overcome the complicated, mysterious, administrative roadblocks that have caused trouble in housing since at least 1945.

The minister comes from Nova Scotia. I suggest to him that money should be made available at a reasonable rate of interest directly to co-operative groups under the Nova Scotia housing act. Their legislation is properly administered, and they are easy people to talk to. They have done a lot of building so far, and there has never been a suggestion that anyone has ever defaulted on payments. There has never been any trouble, and they have provided many good substantial homes at reasonable rates. If you can cut out the red tape of the banks and the insurance companies and make money available to these co-operative groups at proper rates of interest you will not have any trouble in that area with regard to housing.

Mr. Winters: I wonder if the hon. member would mind my interrupting to tell him that last year the Nova Scotia government made their legislation complementary to what was then section 35 of our National Housing Act so we could co-operate with them under an arrangement whereby we would provide 75 per cent of the funds for that very purpose.

Mr. Gillis: I am very glad to hear that. That is a step forward. The next thing you will have to do is lower the rate of interest, and when you have done that you will have solved the problem. I seriously suggest to the minister that the rate of interest must be dropped. I believe the amount of the down payment should be lowered. With the stereotyped administrative machinery of the banks, I do not think as good a job will be done in providing houses this year as was done under the old act last year, even with the insurance companies. I think less money is going to be available. The banks will administer things on a much more conservative basis, and we are going to wind up at the end of 1954 with a much bigger backlog in housing than we have at the present time.

I think it was a proper step to make section 35 complementary to the Nova Scotia co-operative housing act, and the only thing wrong now is the rate of interest. If you can succeed in lowering it and make money available throughout the provinces of Canada to provide low rental housing you are going to take care of a large group of wage and salary earners who will never get houses under the National Housing Act by applying to the banks. You will also help to provide low rental housing for the 137,000 families mentioned by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) who live on incomes below the income tax level. In my judgment the solution is low rental housing handled directly through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in co-operation with municipalities and co-operative organizations in the local communities.

(Translation):

Mr. Hector Dupuis (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, the bill now before the house has given us once more the opportunity of hearing the sempiternal jeremiads, criticisms and lamentations of the opposition. The way our Conservative friends speak, one would think that they have the monopoly of kindness towards the people! It is so true that were we not conversant with their past, their extremely revealing past, we might be led to believe them when they seem to take an interest in the low wage earners. But we know that the government can never do anything to please Her Majesty's loyal opposition. If we gave them the moon, I believe they would ask for Mars, if not Venus, and would want still more.

It is quite easy to criticize a party in power. But one should make worth-while suggestions to improve the situation.

Some C.C.F. members, and in particular, I believe, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) suggested that the rate of interest should be 2 per cent with amortization spread over a 40-year period. Well, why not go further and ask the government to pay a premium to all who wish to become home owners? We must take a realistic view of the situation and recognize what the government has done for housing up to now.

Going back to the years where no help of that kind was to be expected from the government, the best mortgage a prospective home owner could hope for was 50 per cent of the amount he was ready to invest. Today the amount has been raised to 90 per cent, 80 per cent of the first $8,000 and 70 per cent of the amount above $8,000, which means that with a down payment of $1,400, one can build a $10,000 house, thanks to the government. I do not bring any new facts. I am just reviewing the main sections of the bill before making my own deductions.

Really I wonder if in ordinary business today you could obtain an $8,600 loan on a $10,000 property? That is impossible. You might have the greatest reputation in the world but nobody in business would be willing to transact anything on that basis. So that is one step better than what the government has so far given us.

The opposition has made much of the fact that to take advantage of this legislation a man had to earn between $3,500 and $3,860 a year. I know, of course, that those who have no special skills do not at present earn this salary but I do not think I am wrong in saying that all skilled tradesmen earn at least $3,500 a year, if not more, so that a large number of those whose revenue is $3,500 or more are in a position to benefit from this offer on the government's part.

Now, you will say that the government should have given more thought to those whose revenue is less than $3,500. Of course one can always do better and the more the government will do to encourage home ownership, the more they will deserve the praise of the interested parties. Still, while I feel sorry for those whose earnings are less than $3,500 a year, I do feel, Mr. Speaker, that I am in a very good position to deal with this matter. As it is, the people in my constituency are workers, and, for the most part, skilled craftsmen, the rest being what are commonly called helpers, or day labourers.

I would like each of them to own a house. I would like all of them to benefit from other generosities of the government and own a house. But we cannot do everything at once. However, it is possible that we may be advancing toward the goal desired by each and every one of us. It has been said—it is not I who said it, and I do not rejoice at the thought—that, unfortunately, there will always be poor people among us. There will always be people who will not be able to afford to own a house; there were such people in the past, and it will be the same in the future. It is inevitable. It is a situation that we must accept, but we must try to improve it for the working classes, those who earn less than $3,500. They are protected by unemployment insurance, by family allowances and in various other ways, but we ought to study their case in order that they may benefit from the facilities which are being provided under this bill.

Formerly, when the small wage earner wished to become a home owner, every member of the family would get together in order to contribute to a common fund, and the savings of everyone would be sufficient for a down payment on a house. Well, I fail to see how things are different today, for it is still possible to achieve the same result through the same means. Every member of the family can help the head of that family, who has made great sacrifices, who has saved quite a bit, not only to make both ends meet but also to make his dream come true, that is to own a house of his own. Well, I would imagine that by saving wisely, one can make such a dream come true even today!

Mr. Speaker, there are some who think they are furthering the interests of the country when they claim that our citizens cannot benefit from the proposed legislation because their income is too low. Our provincial governments and our municipalities also have responsibilities in that field; they must accept them and use the facilities which the proposed legislation will offer as they could use in the past the facilities offered under the existing act, which enabled our municipalities and our provinces to build dwellings to replace existing slums and unhealthy houses. There is a provision in another act for that purpose, which was underlined by the minister in the following words:

> . . . Or where a municipality and a province feel there is need for rental accommodation with subsidized rentals for families of low income, the federal government will participate to the extent of 75 per cent of the capital investment and subsequent operating losses. Where slum clearance and housing redevelopment are desirable, federal participation is available for 50 per cent of the cost of the slum clearance.

Those who have complained about the scarcity of houses have never hoped that one day everyone would own his own house, but all have wished that conditions might become such that families could house themselves without having to crowd into dwellings that are too small. When we succeed, through this bill, in increasing the number of houses available in the country, we will enable people who now have to share housing accommodation to occupy premises vacated by the owners of new houses. Again I say that everyone cannot become a home owner.

As I stated before, one must remember that provincial and municipal governments also have their share of responsibility in that field. Besides, provincial governments now have sufficient revenues. For instance, if we examine the budget of the province of Quebec, we find that it now stands at $308 million, while between 1930 and 1934 its revenue was approximately $52 million. I believe it might be possible to take advantage of this plan to undertake a housing program of dwellings suitable for two or three people only. Here again another great problem arises. It is not simply a matter of building five or six-room dwellings, as in the case of those who would avail themselves of this plan to build $6,000 or $8,000 houses. I am wondering how we shall proceed when the provincial government decides to embark on a large-scale building program to supply homes for those who have none. Houses will have to be built for the large number of families who are today living in hovels that are detrimental to the moral as well as the physical well-being of our fellow citizens.

Well, that legislation will enable us to lay the foundations for such a program and I hope that it will be implemented in the near future for the benefit of the whole population.

Now, some hon. members have contended that the monthly payments to be met by the home owner under this program are too high. I have always understood, and those who have kept themselves somewhat informed about economic conditions in this country have always thought that a month's rent should be the equivalent of a week's earnings. Well, on the basis of the revenue of a home owner taking advantage of this plan, we see that his monthly rent will not exceed his weekly earnings, as the amortization of his debt, spread over a period of 25 or 30 years, will entail payments of only $58 to $60 per month.

Those payments are by no means excessive. The government are not acting with undue haste but they are going along slowly and wisely, meeting new situations as they arise in this country. That is what we must look forward to. There is no need for us to be ashamed as we rise to support a measure such as that which is being introduced here at this time by the government. They are not rushing into this madly, they are not losing their heads over the situation but are wisely looking over matters.

No one can seriously imply, not even my C.C.F. friends, that there might come a time when property owners who have taken advantage of this plan will lose the money they have spent because they will no longer be able to meet their obligations.

Now, gentlemen, that is easy to say, and it is very easy to appear to sympathize with the plight of the poor. But, as far back as I can remember, I have known that those who cannot meet their obligations unfortunately stand to lose, in many instances, what they have already paid. Such is the case for automobiles, electric refrigerators and so on. If the buyer is not in a position to meet his payments, he stands to lose what he has already paid. That is unfortunate, but he must accept his loss, as we all have to accept our woes, since we are all in a valley of tears, as it is so well put in a certain prayer.

The government has made things easier, perhaps not for everybody, but at least for 90 per cent of those who will now wish to become home owners, and I am sure that they will all be in a position to meet their obligations. Even if the prospective homeowner under one of those plans became so ill as to lose his job, the remainder of his family would still be there, able to come to his help. I hope that enough of the old family spirit has survived to inspire them to do their share to avert the disaster, even at the price of great sacrifices. I dare hope that our fellow Canadians have kept enough of that family spirit to come to the help of their parents, in such circumstances. There should not be too many cases of foreclosure of mortgages, and I hope that such cases will never arise.

Some have tried to minimize the advantages from which people will benefit now that banks are allowed to grant mortgage loans. I know very well that the humble manager of the branch around the corner will not have authority to make a decision in all cases but his influence will make itself felt in the main office. Here I am thinking especially of the city of Montreal and the surrounding district. Now at the same time this will put an end to a situation that was truly deplorable for certain citizens of our metropolis, more particularly in certain districts east and southwest of Montreal where lending companies refused to lend money pretending that it was economically unsound to do so in that part of the country, because the security factor prevented them from lending money in the districts I have just mentioned. Well, banks having branches in the various parts of our city and wishing to do business throughout the city of Montreal will be able at any time to recommend to their head office the loans requested in their respective districts, so that all parts of Montreal will be on an equal footing.

Now, it has been said that it is quite probable that no more than 100,000 dwellings can be built. I am no expert in the matter, but I am wondering, Mr. Speaker, whether we have sufficient manpower and skilled labour to build more than 100,000 houses in the same year. Like everyone else, we hope that the housing crisis will soon end. However, one must not be too optimistic about the possible results of the bill now before the house. I hope that it may enable us to remedy the situation as soon as possible. If I said that we can find in the country sufficient labour to remedy the situation in one year, my colleagues might be tempted to take my remarks jokingly. It will undoubtedly take some years before that can be done. But legislation of this kind will enable a large proportion of our people to become home owners, to build houses of their own.
