Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Chairman, I would think the finance branch of the post office must know the average cost of carrying first-class mail. I suspect some statistical department knows the number of pieces of first-class mail which are carried. If so, it would then be only a matter of elementary division to determine the approximate cost of carrying one piece of first-class mail. We know what this figure is in the United States. The minister may recall that I mentioned that fact earlier during the debate. We know what the cost is in the United States, so why are the figures not available here?

Mr. Cote: My hon. friend will understand that there are 1,500 million pieces of mail to deal with, and on these figures alone it will be seen how difficult it would be to determine the actual cost of one piece of mail from one area to another.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): But, Mr. Chairman, I merely asked for the average cost. All that is required is to take the total cost of delivery of first-class mail, divide that by the total number of pieces of first-class mail carried, and there you have the answer. I am rather interested in knowing whether this increase is justified on the basis of the actual cost of carrying first-class mail. I think the committee is entitled to that figure.

Mr. Cote: If I understand my hon. friend correctly, he wants to know the cost on one piece of mail.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Yes, the average cost.

Mr. Cote: I can give him the breakdown which appeared in the Postmaster General's report if that is what he wants to know. But that does not apply to one simple item.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Perhaps I should phrase my question in another way. Assuming there is a costing department in the post office, can that department furnish the amount of profit made by the department through the delivery of first-class mail?

Mr. Cote: The Post Office Department operates on the total revenue. We do not operate on a subdivision of revenues. For example, we may have a surplus in one part of the department and a deficit in another part, but we have to consider, for example, rural routes which do not pay their way, and they have to be considered as part of the over-all picture.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I want to consider the parts. The minister has told us we may have a surplus in one service and a deficit in another branch of the service. That is quite likely, but I want to know whether in that department dealing with the first-class mail there was a deficit or a surplus. It seems to me incredible that the Post Office Department should not have some costing method whereby they can establish which part is making money and which is losing money. I would like to know the profit made out of the transportation of first-class mail in Canada. I appreciate that there will be a deficit here and a surplus there, but I am concerned only with the department carrying first-class mail with which this legislation is concerned. What is the profit made today in carrying first-class mail in Canada?

Mr. Cote: The revenues of first-class mail amounted to 46·9 per cent of the total cost. The cost of first-class mail is 45·2 per cent, leaving a surplus of 1·7 per cent of the total cost.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): So that the carrying of first-class mail at the present time resolves itself into a profit for the department. Is that right?

Mr. Cote: Of 1·7 per cent.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Not 1·7 per cent, surely. It would be almost double that, in view of the fact that we are dealing with something less than 50 per cent of total cost. But I know what the minister means. Can he tell us what the loss is in the department from the transportation, let us say, and the delivery of newspapers, second-class mail?

Mr. Cote: $15 million.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): We have a figure in dollars and cents of what the loss is in this one department. May I have a figure in dollars and cents of what the profit is in the carrying of first-class mail? We know the loss on second-class mail is $15 million. What in millions or in hundreds of thousands is the profit on first-class mail?

Mr. Cote: We will work that out.

Mr. Fulton: While the minister is working out that sum, I should like to go back to this extraordinary, shattering and, I might also say—

Mr. Cote: $2,110,000.

Mr. Fulton: —sweeping suggestion that the House of Commons has just received from the Postmaster General in answer to the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. We have just learned that, in addition to the increase on letter mail, there is to be a one-cent increase on all postcards. That is the first time that news has been given to the house. Not only is it the first time it has been given to the House of Commons but it is the first time that it has ever been hinted at; and the government, in the persons of the Postmaster General and the Secretary of State, adopt the extreme attitude: "Well, we have always had the power to do it under the Post Office Act so why should you be surprised that it is now being done?" Mr. Chairman, I regret to have to use strong words to so agreeable a minister but I say that what the government is doing here has not been very far short of obtaining the consent of the house to this legislation by a form of false pretences.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Cote: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member should withdraw those words.

The Chairman: I do not think they should be used.

Mr. Fulton: I said what they had been pursuing is not very far short of obtaining the consent of this house to legislation by false pretences, and there is nothing there to withdraw. I will now demonstrate the basis for my statement.

Mr. Cote: If you put it that way—

Mr. Fulton: There is nothing unparliamentary in what I have said, and what I have said is strictly accurate. I wish to proceed to show the basis for my statement.

Mr. Cote: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege, I ask that the words be withdrawn.

The Chairman: I would ask the hon. member to withdraw the words "false pretences" if he is applying them to the minister.

Mr. Fulton: Speaking on this question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I submit that there is nothing inherently unparliamentary in the words "false pretences". I was careful in what I said. I said that the government has been not very far short of obtaining the consent of this house to legislation by a species of false pretences, and there is nothing to withdraw. The statement is accurate in every respect.

Mr. Cote: I am very sorry—

Mr. Fulton: And the words not being unparliamentary in themselves, there is nothing to withdraw.

Mr. Cote: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to persist. I would not insist if my hon. friend had not implied, in his own phrasing, that we had acted under false pretences. I am very sorry to be compelled to insist that he should withdraw those words. It is unparliamentary to speak in that way and he knows very well that it is unparliamentary.

Mr. Fulton: I know perfectly well that it is not unparliamentary, and the words themselves are not unparliamentary. They are not indecent and in themselves they are not unparliamentary. I do not say that the Postmaster General has been guilty of false pretences. I thought about what I was going to say before I said it, and in what I have said there is nothing unparliamentary. Just because the Postmaster General insists, Mr. Chairman, I can assure you that I do not regard that fact as sufficient reason for withdrawing the words.

The Chairman: Order. The question is whether the hon. member has used offensive words against either the committee or any member thereof. I listened carefully to the words used by the hon. member for Kamloops. He framed his statement very carefully. But at the same time the question resolves itself at times into whether an offence has occurred. The minister has indicated that he takes it in that way. I must maintain order in the committee. In view of the manner in which this discussion has proceeded, I hope that the hon. member for Kamloops will co-operate by withdrawing the words in so far as they apply to the minister or to the committee.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the spirit in which you have put this matter before me, and I shall try to reply in the same spirit. I wonder whether I am correct in presuming, from what you have said, that you do not find the words "false pretences" in themselves to be unparliamentary but that you are suggesting that if there was any intention on my part to say that the Postmaster General personally has been guilty of false pretences, you would have to ask me to withdraw.

Mr. Cote: Or the house.

Mr. Fulton: I accept that statement, sir, and I would point out that I have not said that the Postmaster General has been guilty of false pretences. I do not consider that such a statement would be within the limits of parliamentary order and therefore I did not say that. What I said was that the government has obtained the consent of this house to the legislation by a practice which falls not very far short of false pretences. If the Postmaster General thinks that in those words I intended to imply that he personally had been guilty of false pretences, I assure you, Mr. Chairman, and him that such was not my intention.

Mr. Cote: Or the government.

Mr. Fulton: The words were used in a sense which I think should be accepted, in the strict and literal sense, by the committee and by the Postmaster General and should not be taken as imputing bad motives to one individual. I have said that the statement I made was accurate in every particular and I shall now proceed to show the basis of that statement.

The Chairman: Order. I take it that the hon. member withdraws the remark in so far as it refers either to the minister or to any member of the committee.

Mr. Fulton: Yes. I have stated quite candidly that I have no intention of implying false pretences with respect to the Postmaster General. The basis of the statement that our consent to this legislation was obtained without our appreciating what we were being asked to consent to is to be found at page 1107 of Hansard. This bill is based upon a resolution which the Postmaster General introduced for the government on January 14. The resolution said that it was expedient to amend the Post Office Act to increase the rates of postage on letters posted in Canada from the first day of April, 1954. The resolution referred exclusively and entirely to letters. Nothing was said about postcards there or any other form of mail. In explaining to the house why they were asking for approval of the resolution and of the legislation which would be based on it, the Postmaster General explained that they were anticipating a deficit of $13½ million. As reported at page 1102 of Hansard he went on to say this:

> Expected net revenues from the increase in postage rates will be approximately $14 million, leaving only $500,000 to take care of possible normal increases in the price of basic materials . . .

And so on. It is true that in those words he said: "Expected net revenues from the increase in postage rates". While I think it was only logical to expect that we would take the words as applying to the increase resulting from this bill—that is this increase —nevertheless I realize that a loophole or an escape-hatch, if you like, was left in the words used here "the increase in postage rates", not this increase.

Mr. Knowles: Read the minister's very first sentence.

Mr. Fulton: But when you read on and come to page 1107, you will find this paragraph, which I submit stands by itself. The Postmaster General had again gone over the factors which made up this anticipated deficit of $13½ million. He then said:

> Those three items alone account for $13,500,000. If we agree that those expenditures should be made, then we have to have the funds to make them. We propose to get those funds by means of this increase, as we think it is the most equitable way to do it.

"This increase" refers to the increase that would result from the resolution then before the house, which resolution was approved and on which this legislation is based. The Postmaster General told us that they needed $13,500,000 extra to cover the anticipated deficit. He told us this $13,500,000 would result from this legislation, and it was on that basis that the government asked the house to support the bill now before us. Now we are told that it is not this legislation alone that is necessary to cover the increase, that there are going to be other increases in postal rates, other increases which are not hinted at, other increases the possibility of which was at the time definitely excluded if the words of the Postmaster General are given their normal meaning. He said that "this increase" was expected to cover the anticipated deficit.

It is on that basis, sir, that I made the statement that the government obtained the consent of the house to this legislation by something which falls not very far short of false pretence. I have now shown that these words were conclusive and that my statement is thoroughly justified. Therefore I think the government must agree that it has followed a most reprehensible course in its relationship and dealings with the house so far as this legislation is concerned, and I submit without further ado that the Postmaster General should withdraw the bill and not proceed further with it at this session.

Mr. Cote: I want to calm my hon. friend. He was excited to the point where he was somewhat overeager with his words.

Mr. Fulton: Not at all. The words were strictly accurate.

Mr. Cote: May I refer my hon. friend to the statement made by the Minister of Finance on Tuesday, December 8. His statement was quite clear.

Mr. Knowles: Choicely worded.

Mr. Cote: He said, as found at page 691 of Hansard:

> A general increase of one cent per ounce over existing rates.

If my hon. friend would read again what was said at the time I think he would be satisfied. May I also say that the increase of one cent on postal cards represents a small fraction of one per cent of all revenues. The only purpose is to keep the rate on postcards in line, as we have always done in the past in the same circumstances.

Mr. Fulton: The Postmaster General has referred to the words of the Minister of Finance. The statement of the Minister of Finance was made on December 8. The Postmaster General introduced his resolution on January 14, and he did not rely on the statement of the Minister of Finance. He did not say: That is the basis of it. He did not quote it and then sit down. He gave his own explanation as to why this legislation was sought, and I am asking him about his words, not about the words of the Minister of Finance. What other interpretation can be placed upon his words—"We propose to get those funds by means of this increase"? Those are his words. It is on the basis of that statement that I say, sir, that this practice is most reprehensible, that the bill now before us should be withdrawn, and that the situation should be laid before us fully and frankly so that the house may have the advantage of all information before being asked to make up its mind on this proposal.

Mr. Cote: I think my hon. friend should know that the statement I made is absolutely in line with the discussion of the bill, and when he realizes that the increase on postcards represents, I repeat, only a very small fraction of one per cent of revenues he will understand that when I said we needed this increase in revenues I meant the whole amount of the increase necessary. What I have said today should not come as a surprise. It has always been the practice in the past that when there was an increase in the postage tariff there was an increase—

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the minister—

Mr. Cote: Will my hon. friend let me finish, please? I think his mood will become quieter in the discussion of this matter if he will look at the past history of the postal administration. He will find that every time there has been an increase we have also kept the rate of postcards in line by increasing it. This is done by virtue of the rule cited by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and I did not say anything about it on the bill because the purpose of the bill is only to increase the postal tariff.

Mr. Knowles: The minister was so eager to tell us, wasn't he?

Mr. Cote: No, no, no—

Mr. Pearkes: No, no—that is right.

Mr. Cote: It had already been said in the statement by the Minister of Finance. When we were discussing the bill some of my hon. friends on the other side went a little outside it. We did not object but we thought this discussion should be limited to the bill and we still think so. We are now discussing the clauses of the bill, and I am ready to do so. I have no objection at all to stating what we are going to do. As a matter of fact, I think I was answering a question asked by a member on the opposite side and I misunderstood the question. I said there would be a general increase. I believe he was asking me about second-class mail and I misunderstood him. If you will read Hansard you will see what I said at the time. I said there would be a general increase because that has always been done in the past. There is nothing to be surprised about.

Mr. Philpott: One point has been raised this afternoon that seems to me to require a few more words. Reference has been made to casual labour, and we have to make a decision on what basis we are going to use casual labour. I do not think the average member of parliament is competent, without more information, to say whether we would be better off to employ a whole extra permanent shift, but if we are going to have casual labour working one day a week then surely the inference that has been drawn, that students are somehow or other not as competent as other labour, is most unfair to those who are students. I know that in my part of the country, and I am certain it is the same elsewhere in Canada, there are thousands of people who are able to obtain a high school or university education only because they are able to work in their summer holidays, their Christmas holidays and part-time during the week. I for one think it would be a very happy outcome if, as a result of changing the postal law so as to grant the five-day 40-hour week to all permanent postal employees, a large number of students were enabled to obtain work and thus helped to pay for their higher education.

Mr. Knowles: Let us get back to the other question. The Postmaster General suggests that this is just a routine change that comes about automatically. If that is the case, I think it is passing strange that he did not make a routine reference to it in the course of one of the several speeches he has made on this question. He also tries to make the point that when rates on first-class letters go up rates on postcards also go up automatically. Naturally I have not had a chance, since this bombshell was exploded this afternoon, to check the history to see whether that is the case, but I draw this point to the attention of the Postmaster General. At the present time a two-cent rate applies on postcards and unsealed letters, and on Christmas cards in—

Mr. Cote: Unsealed letters are not first-class mail. It does not apply to unsealed letters.

Mr. Knowles: I am saying that at the present time the two-cent rate applies on postcards.

Mrs. Fairclough: Three cents.

Mr. Cote: Three cents.

Mr. Knowles: One of the disadvantages of the franking privilege is that we do not always remember how much these things do cost. The point I am making stands in any case.

Mr. Cote: There are two different kinds of postcards.

Mr. Knowles: There are some items that go for two cents and some for three. The three-cent postcard rate is to be moved up automatically to four cents. The Postmaster General says that is routine. But he has to do it under section 6 (d) of the Post Office Act. In other words, he has to pass a regulation which it is within his competence to do. I am glad he is not automatically making the same increase in the two-cent rate. He might have done it. Surely, if one says that one rate goes up automatically and the other does not, that is hardly being consistent.

How do we know that next December the Postmaster General will not make a regulation increasing the two-cent rate? People would then find they had to pay three cents or four cents to mail their Christmas cards. Nevertheless, that can be done by regulation under section 6 (d). The Postmaster General, with the assistance of the Minister of Finance, is trying to make a great deal out of the fact that the Minister of Finance made a covering statement on December 8, 1953. I have quoted it two or three times, so the minister did not help the Postmaster General by drawing his attention to it.

My point is that the statement did not convey to the people, in fact I doubt if it conveyed to ten people in the House of Commons outside of the cabinet, the realization that it included an increase on postcards as well as on letters. He said there would be an increase of one cent over existing rates. My point is that we were entitled to think that since the bill referred to only one matter, that is what the Minister of Finance meant by his statement of December 8.

Mr. Abbott: I did not refer to letters in my statement; I referred to first-class postage rates.

Mr. Knowles: The minister is technically correct. He could take the matter to court and prove that he did not say anything that did not cover the extent to which the government has gone in its proposals. I suggest that, even though the Minister of Finance and the government could show they were technically correct, they have not played fair with the House of Commons or the Canadian people in this whole episode.

Let me go back again. I was trying to prompt the hon. member for Kamloops when he referred to the Postmaster General's statement on January 14, 1954, at page 1102 of Hansard. This is what the minister said; these were his opening words:

> Mr. Chairman, this resolution proposes an amendment to the Post Office Act to increase the rates of postage in the way indicated in the resolution itself, namely:

Then, he quoted the resolution, and the resolution mentions nothing other than an increase in the rate on first-class letters. I read again what he said:

> . . . this resolution proposes an amendment to the Post Office Act to increase the rates of postage in the way indicated in the resolution itself, . . .

Later on in that same column, after outlining the deficit which, according to his calculation, would amount to $13,500,000, he said:

> Expected net revenues from the increase in postage rates will be approximately $14 million, . . .

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that all of us in the house had the right to assume, when the Postmaster General said he proposed to increase the rates of postage in the way indicated in the resolution itself, and when he said he proposed to raise $14 million by means of that increase, that all that was being talked about was an increase in the rates on letters.

Then, as the hon. member for Kamloops has pointed out, that statement is underlined again in the words of the Postmaster General as recorded on page 1107 of Hansard for January 14, 1954, when he said:

> We propose to get those funds by means of this increase, . . .

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that if there were any way of securing a poll of Liberal members we would get the opinion from them that all the way along the house was led to assume that what was being talked about was an increase on letters only. It is hardly playing fair with the house for the Postmaster General or the Secretary of State to say now that no reference was made to this on the resolution stage because there was no occasion for it. I have looked over the speech delivered by the Postmaster General on the motion for second reading. He went all over the lot and dealt with most of the arguments advanced on this side in considerable detail. There was ample scope for him to tell us, if he cared to do so, that along with this increase that was being made by a change in the statute, there would be this so-called automatic increase in the rate on postcards.

He did not choose to do so. I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that in the 12 years I have been here I have seen this house treated this way a good many times, but seldom have I seen a proceeding which seemed to me to be quite so unfair. The minister says it is routine; it is automatic. It is not even that. Under section 6(d) of the Post Office Act the Postmaster General has to make a regulation. I am looking at the section to see whether or not he has to obtain the approval of the cabinet. He does not even have to do that. Talk about wide powers! Where is the member for Prince Albert? The Postmaster General can simply make a regulation. It does not follow automatically because parliament has approved of this bill, if it does so against the violent protests of the opposition. It has to be done by an overt act of the Postmaster General. I submit, if he is not prepared to agree to the suggestion being made from this side of the house, that this bill should now be withdrawn, at least he and his colleagues should get together and make a categorical statement to this house that they will not exercise the powers conferred upon the Postmaster General under section 6(d) of the act to raise rates of postage on postcards.

The minister says it is only a small percentage of the total, but that does not remove the insult to this parliament nor the unfairness to the Canadian people. I think the least that should be done is for the government to say that that increase will not be made.

Mr. Cote: I should like to refer the hon. member to Hansard for January 15, 1954, page 1161. I am referring to a question asked by the hon. member for Dauphin, and I quote:

> A further question has reference to a part of the discussion to which I believe the Postmaster General has not replied, unless I missed it. The question has come up repeatedly in connection with second-class mail not being included in the proposal before us. I suppose there must be some reason why the increase is for first-class mail only. In view of the fact that it has been pointed out that we are losing money on second-class mail, from a cost accounting standpoint, while we are making a profit on first-class mail, would the Postmaster General tell us why he is not proposing an increase in the rate on second-class mail?

Then, I answered as follows:

> According to statute, parliament has to decide about any increase in the rate on first-class mail. However, we may take it for granted that it is a general increase of one cent all along the line.

Mr. Knowles: Don't stop there.

Mr. Cote: That is the end of the answer.

Mr. Knowles: No, it was not. Read on.

Mr. Cote: The point I want to make is that there is no bombshell, even in the mind of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, because if there were any bombshell he would not ask the question.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Knowles: I will leave that to the people.

Mr. Cote: You may make all the fuss you want—

Mr. Knowles: But who can stop you?

Mr. Cote: —but that information has been available since January 15. The surprise hon. members are evincing now is not justified if one refers to the answer I have just quoted. Of course, I misunderstood the question the hon. member put, but the answer is there. I thought he was asking if there had been a general increase and I was answering that question. Following my answer, the hon. member said:

> Either the Postmaster General did not understand my question or I did not understand his answer.

He was right, but I was right also in my answer to the question because I thought he was asking another question. And then I said:

> I do not understand what my hon. friend is saying. Does he ask whether we are going to increase the postage rate on newspapers?

Then the hon. member for Dauphin said:

> Anything which would fall within the definition of second-class mail.

To that I answered no. I am reminded that on January 15 in reply to a question which I understood referred to implementing a general increase, I answered yes; and it is right there in this answer. My hon. friend, whose talents I admire, is certainly today overdoing it a little. He is not so much surprised as he is claiming now, because he had an answer to the very question he is asking today.

He knew before, or he should have known on January 15, if he understood well the statement made by the Minister of Finance a long time before. The principle is that it is a general increase in the rate all along the line. We always considered that in the past. There is no surprise to be felt at these facts, because one is made by statute through a bill. The resolution is introduced only to introduce the bill, and the increase in postage is made through the rules and regulations he has just cited to the house.

I think the question is very clear, and we should be most surprised by the surprise shown by my hon. friend.

Mr. Knowles: Let us get this straight. The hon. member for Dauphin on January 15 was not asking about postcards. At one point the Postmaster General misunderstood him, and thought he was. And I give him full credit for this: he did not give a false answer; he gave a correct answer to what he thought the hon. member's question was.

I was here at the time. None of us realized that in the minister's mind the question of postcards had come up, because we knew that in the mind of the hon. member for Dauphin the whole question related to newspapers and periodicals. But immediately the hon. member for Dauphin got the Postmaster General back on the track with respect to the question then at issue, newspapers and periodicals, and the Postmaster General made it clear that there was to be no change with respect to them.

Frankly, I remember the exchange very well, and I thought it was just a case of confusion, because the Postmaster General was talking about an increase of one cent all along the line, and then said that there was no increase for newspapers. So I simply wrote off that statement that it was an increase of one cent all along the line, as being a bit of confusion in the mind of the Postmaster General.

He can now quote it to show that at no time did he give a false answer to a question. But it just shows the position, that until today there had never been a direct question specifically naming postcards and asking as to what would happen to the postage rate thereon. And when that direct question has been put to him we have an answer which I submit is something of a bombshell not only in terms of the one cent involved, but in terms of the relationship between the government and parliament.

Mr. Abbott: If my hon. friend is interested in postcards, why does he not ask about them, in this long debate.

Mr. Coldwell: I understood it is the intention of the department to carry all first-class mail by air. Is that right? Is first-class mail to be carried by air? What is the position?

Mr. Cote: Yes; where there will be an advantage in delivering, and where—

Mr. Coldwell: Then that is right?

Mr. Cote: And where the service is available, of course.

Mr. Coldwell: I understand that. And may I ask this question: is it the intention to carry postcards as well?

Mr. Cote: Yes.

Mr. Coldwell: That has not been so in the past, has it?

Mr. Cote: Yes.

Mr. Coldwell: Have postcards been carried, where delivery could be made, by air?

Mr. Cote: Christmas cards were carried by air, in tremendous volume.

Mr. Coldwell: I understood it was only letters.

Mr. Cote: No, postcards as well.

Mr. Coldwell: That is news to me.

Mrs. Fairclough: On that question: is it not true that formerly what was carried by air mail was first-class one-ounce mail?

Mr. Cote: First-class mail will be carried, not third-class.

Mrs. Fairclough: You mean the new regulations say that all first-class mail shall be carried by air, where that is deemed advantageous?

Mr. Cote: Yes.

Mrs. Fairclough: But, prior to this, what has been carried by air mail was all first-class one-ounce mail. Is that correct?

Mr. Cote: First-class mail up to an ounce, previously.

Mrs. Fairclough: Then, to go back again to the earlier deal—

Mr. Knowles: "Deal" is right—and from the bottom of the deck.

Mrs. Fairclough: Apparently I was right the first time. I am referring to postcards which go for two cents, or which carry only a greeting—I think the regulations stipulate five words or less. Is that classed as first-class mail?

Mr. Cote: Third-class.

Mrs. Fairclough: And then, I take it, all circular mail is third-class, all unsealed?

Mr. Cote: Yes.

Mrs. Fairclough: Not to be increased under these rates?

Mr. Cote: No.

Mr. Zaplitny: I wish to follow up the question which was put to the Postmaster General, since my name has been brought into the discussion. I submit he should have continued the quotation from Hansard at page 1161, because the last part is the important part. The Postmaster General quoted certain questions and his replies, but I suggest he should have gone farther. I shall put it on the record. I said:

> Would the Postmaster General explain why he is not asking for an increase in the rate on a class of material on which we are losing money, from a cost accounting standpoint, and why he asks for an increase on a class of mail on which we are now making a profit?

To this the Postmaster General replied:

> The increase we are asking will be made all along the line in first-class mail. I do not want to make a speech about the way news is spread and publicity is required by the people. That has been discussed by several members. We are not increasing the rate on newspapers. However, I shall make inquiries as to exactly what the increase will affect, and I may make a detailed report on every item. At the moment, however, I do not think there will be any increase on newspapers.

Those are his words. On January 15, replying to my question after he understood what was behind it, he undertook of his own volition to make an inquiry and to report in detail on every item. That was on January 15.

Since that time the Postmaster General has spoken on at least three or four occasions in this debate, perhaps more than that, and he has never given the house, item by item, a report on what would be affected by the proposed increase—not only what is proposed in the present bill but also the other matters which entered into the discussion.

I submit the Postmaster General had plenty of opportunity. He was not asked; he made the offer himself to make this detailed report on every item affected. He has not done that. Today the matter was brought up by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The minister tells us that he has authority to make an increase in the postage on postcards, without reference to this bill—which is correct. But certainly he should have followed out his own suggestion or his own undertaking made on January 15 to give the house every item which would be affected, so far as the increase is concerned.

I believe there is no way the minister can talk his way out of this spot. I think the gracious thing would be to admit that he has made a blunder, and to take the house into his confidence. It is not too late. Let him give the committee now a full report, item by item, of what is being contemplated, so that we will have the whole picture. I do not think it is fair to hon. members to have to wheedle out every piece of information, one piece at a time, and to have it given almost grudgingly by the Postmaster General.

In view of the fact that the Minister of Finance and the Secretary of State have also entered into this debate from time to time, I believe it is time they got together and drew up a detailed report of what is involved in this whole matter. Let them take the house into their confidence, and tell us what is involved. Otherwise there can be no other impression than that you are trying to hold back as much information as it is possible to hold back and disclose it only when you are being backed into a corner. There is no getting away from the fact that the five-cent stamp is taking an awful licking and the minister is stuck with it now.

Mr. Cote: The hon. member for Dauphin has indicated at least another time where I mentioned that there was to be an increase all along the line. He read it himself. And I repeat that the increase we are asking will be made all along the line on first-class mail. I said it previously: "However, we may take it for granted that it is a general increase of one cent all along the line". I do not think that either my hon. friend or the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre should be surprised, since it is all in Hansard. If my hon. friend was waiting for a general report, why the surprise?

Mr. Zaplitny: May I ask a general question on this point? I was not the one who indicated any surprise.

Mr. Cote: At least I am satisfied that you are not surprised.

Mr. Zaplitny: A number of hon. members have already shown surprise, and I could not improve on the language they used. Is it not a fact that on January 15 the minister did undertake, in his own words, to give a detailed report to this house item by item as to what this will involve? Had he followed out his own undertaking, which he had ample opportunity to do, he would not find himself in the position in which he is at the present time. That is the whole point. He has failed to carry out his own undertaking to inform this house as to what is involved in this increase.

Mr. Fulton: It is but right to point out that surely the Postmaster General's own words were not accurate on that occasion, as I understand them, because this increase is not being carried out all along the line. I think the Postmaster General has just said that there are some types of postcards the rates on which obviously will not be increased.

Mr. Abbott: First-class mail will be increased.

Mr. Cote: First-class mail. I think my hon. friend is a little confused by the other kind of postcards which belong to the third-class mail.

Mr. McIvor: There are two things that I have been thinking about. When this bill was being debated it was said on several occasions that the rate was being increased in Canada but not in the United States. I find in the Globe and Mail today that the United States administration are seeking an increase of $240 million in the postal rate. They are increasing the first-class mail rate by one cent, the same as we are. They are increasing the air mail rate by one cent and we are not. The other thing is this. As I listened to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre tell of his wonderful discovery in finding out that the rate on postcards was to be increased, this thought came to my mind. If it is a wonderful discovery, it is not to the discredit of the minister; it is to the discredit of the opposition that they did not find it out when they let the bill go through.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I should like to pursue a matter which I raised earlier with the minister. There may be some confusion here, but I must admit it has me baffled. He told us that the percentage of revenue for first-class mail was 46·9 per cent. He did not tell us what percentage that was of and perhaps that is the reason for the bafflement. Then he went on to tell us that the cost was 45·2 per cent, which would leave a profit of 1·7 per cent. Then he goes on and figures out that profit which would be about $2,200,000. Well, if $2,200,000 is 1·7 per cent, obviously 100 per cent would be about $130 million in revenue from first-class mail. We know that the revenue from first-class mail is certainly not $130 million. That is the total revenue of the Post Office Department. I have worked out the figures on first-class mail in one case on $2 million and in the other case on $130 million. It all depends which figures one is taking the percentage on. If the minister would give me what figures he is taking this on, then we shall know precisely what profit we have made.

Mr. Cote: I think that was done. Instead of 45 per cent it was 44·9 per cent.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I will take 45 per cent. What is that the percentage of, if I might ask? What are the figures?

Mr. Cote: The first one is the percentage of all the revenue; the second one is the percentage of the total cost.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): When my hon. friend says "of all the revenue", is that $129,268,000 or $129,268,000 plus other receipts, or the figure which is shown on the first part of his report, which is $129 million less $17 million, which is the figure my hon. friend is using?

Mr. Cote: You may take $129 million.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Then it is 46·9 per cent of $129 million and therefore 45 per cent of—

Mr. Cote: It is 44·9 per cent of the total cost.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Of $105 million.

Mr. Cote: The difference is 2 per cent. If you take 2 per cent of $129 million it gives you $2,580,000.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I can translate that 2 per cent into $5 million.

Mr. Cote: Five per cent?

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I can translate that 2 per cent into $5 million. What I have been trying to find out is, what is the profit made in the operations of that part of the post office dealing with the transport of first-class mail? I submit that the profit is about $5 million not the $2 million which was suggested.

Mr. Cote: Would my hon. friend give me his figures?

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Yes, I shall be very glad to.

Mr. Cote: It would be easier for me to follow him by looking up the figures.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Take $129 million; 47 per cent of that is roughly $60 million. Is not that right? Then we take $105 million, which is your costs, your expenses.

Mr. Cote: What is $105 million?

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): The $105 million is that which is shown on page 1 of the report of the Postmaster General under the total expenditures.

Mr. Cote: Yes; I think you are taking two different figures.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I want to find out what I am taking.

Mr. Cote: You must be taking not only the gross revenues but the net revenue. There is a little confusion there. You must not take both at the same time. You cannot take net revenues and gross receipts or vice versa.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I agree with the minister. I said that. Do I take $129 million or $129 million after the deduction of the $17 million, which would bring it down to $112 million?

Mr. Cote: You may take $112 million, but you have to follow suit.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I want it treated in the way you treat it in your report.

Mr. Cote: You may take it either way, but when you consider gross you must take gross on both sides, revenue and costs, and the same thing with net revenue and net costs.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): My hon. friend is quite right, but he must admit that I am taking it as it is shown in the report. Let us work this out. On the basis of these figures, the Post Office Department might be making a profit of $7 million or $8 million. Is that right? I want to be sure I have the right figures. I do not want to do the minister an injustice.

Mr. Cote: I do not know. You are suggesting that we must do this and that. It does not come from the air. Can my hon. friend explain where he gets this?

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): It comes from the report of my hon. friend at page 1 where he states that the receipts for the year amounted to $129 million. Is that right?

Mr. Cote: Yes; that is gross revenue.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Thereafter, in the same section, it states that certain payments were deducted amounting to $17 million, which brings it down to $112 million. Is that correct?

Mr. Cote: Yes; I follow you.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Then on the same page there is an item of expenditure, other than those paid by statutory authority, etc., totalling $105,553,000. So we take 47 per cent of $112 million and 45 per cent of $105 million, and on that basis I submit there is a profit of $5 million.

Mr. Cote: Just a moment.

Mr. Hansell: While these two gentlemen are figuring this out—they will not want to listen to me—I am going to suggest to the Postmaster General and that he and the hon. member for Winnipeg North have dinner together.

Mr. Knowles: Will you pay for it?

Mr. Hansell: I was going to say that I would be glad to accompany them. They could then get together and figure this out and the minister can tell us the result at eight o'clock. I am suggesting this because if a constituent in any part of the country read today's Hansard I am quite sure he would be completely in the woods. With so many figures being thrown about he would not know what is happening.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I have worked the figures out and I believe the profit is around $5 million. I am simply trying to find out what the profit is.

Mr. Cote: I would be glad to invite the hon. member to dinner, but before I do so I think we should get together and use the same figures. If my hon. friend will be patient I shall try to determine whether we are using the same figures.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Does the minister agree I am using the correct figures?

Mr. Cote: I cannot tell you offhand.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): If I give him his own report perhaps he can tell me.

Mr. Cote: If I understand you correctly you are using the figure of $17 million, which is also an expenditure.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): But you cannot have it both ways. You take these expenditures off revenue.

Mrs. Fairclough: If the Postmaster General will permit me, he has said that the revenue for first-class mail is approximately 47 per cent and the expenditure in connection with first-class mail is approximately 45 per cent. If you take 47 per cent of the revenue as shown on the statement and deduct 45 per cent as an expenditure, as shown on the statement, then first-class mail shows a gross profit of $13½ million and therefore a net profit of $6 million.

Mr. Cote: I do not believe—

Mrs. Fairclough: That means that on first-class mail you have a gross profit—

Mr. Cote: May I suggest that you sit with the hon. member for Winnipeg North and try to have your figures agree with his, and then I will take you both out to dinner.

Mr. Knowles: Add the two together and you will probably get the correct figure.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, in connection with these figures before us I wonder if the Postmaster General can explain why his annual report a year ago showed a revenue on first-class mail of 46 per cent with expenditures at 29 per cent, which means a profit of 17 per cent. Why in one year's time should there be such a difference? Last year he had a very interesting chart in his report which showed the revenue from each branch. If he looks at that chart he will find the figures I have mentioned. On that basis I worked out, from last year's report, a profit of $20,700,000. Could the Postmaster General comment on that?

Mr. Cote: We have to charge first-class mail with the cost of air transportation. Only first-class mail is delivered by air to distribution points.

Mr. Nicholson: In your report a year ago you show the figure of 46 per cent for revenue and 29 per cent for costs. Can you explain why in one year there is such a difference between the two figures? I might add that it is very difficult to obtain this annual report, but the Postmaster General was good enough to make it available to me in his office.

Mr. Cote: If my hon. friend will look at this chart which I am sending him—I hope he will send it back to me afterward—I think he will understand the problem.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, being a new member of this house I think it will be understandable if I express some surprise. I am amazed to find that after four days of discussion on the relative cost and revenues of first-class as against second-class mail we are still in the position that the Postmaster General, complete with his assistants, is unable to answer approximately how many millions of dollars we made on first-class mail.

However, the early part of this afternoon's discussion revealed another and to me a very serious matter. We are told this increase is necessary because of the 40-hour week. Can we take it that under the 40-hour week business will go on in an efficient manner? The minister indicated before that when business reverted to the 40-hour week it just locked up shop. There is no need to lock up shop. One business after another keeps open on this basis. When a business goes on a 40-hour week it gives the same efficient service on Saturday that it gives on Thursday. The service is equally efficient on each of the six days of the week. Is the hiring of so-called casual labour going to give us six days of efficient postal service?

What is worrying me is the type of service we are going to get. Overtime was mentioned as a possible solution. I am wondering what a unionist would think if, upon being given a 40-hour week, an employer announced at the same time, "We would like to see you work overtime." I am wondering whether this is going to be a bona fide 40-hour week.

Mr. Cote: We never said anything of the kind.

Mr. Regier: One thing that has me especially worried, and I have not yet got the answer, is whether the 40-hour week is going to mean that the post office wickets are going to be open only 40 hours a week.

The Deputy Chairman: I certainly do not want to interfere in the discussion any more than the committee feels is necessary, but I believe that only the cost of the mail service is applicable to the clause we are now dealing with. Discussion relating to rates on letters is in order, but changes in working hours or other matters affecting operation which are not necessarily a part of this question should be held over until the Postmaster General's estimates come before the house. If I may be permitted to say so, there must be other matters for discussion relating to this particular clause.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): I think the Postmaster General himself said that on account of this 40-hour week this increase in the rates was necessary.

The Deputy Chairman: I would not want the committee to think I was endeavouring to steer them away from costs in relation to the 40-hour week. I understood the questions which were raised by the hon. member were as to the salaries that would result to the workers on the implementation of the 40-hour week, a subject which I do not think is pertinent to this matter.

Mr. Cote: If I may answer my hon. friend who just spoke, I may say that there will be no restriction in the services by implementing the five-day 40-hour week.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): I just want to ask the Postmaster General a few questions. I understand that these increases are only in connection with first-class mail. Will there be any increase in connection with registering a letter? There will be, of course, with this increase from four cents to five cents, an increase of one cent but will there be anything else?

Mr. Cote: There will not be any further increase for registered letters.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): As to special delivery letters, will there be anything extra?

Mr. Cote: No.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): And as to C.O.D. parcel post or postal notes?

Mr. Cote: No.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): The minister says there will be nothing extra there. All right. There is another matter that has been brought to my attention and it is this. On account of the increase from four cents to five cents, many people are going to be rather stuck owing to the fact that with the five-cent stamp at the present time, if it is put about two feet from the average person's eyes the figure "5" on the stamp cannot be seen. That same remark applies, of course, to both the three-cent stamp and the two-cent stamp, as well as to the four-cent stamp, although the "4" is a little bit plainer. But as to the five-cent stamp, I defy anyone, from a distance of two feet, to say just what it is. I wonder whether the Postmaster General has had complaints with regard to that matter, and if so, what is going to be done about it.

Mr. Cote: I quite agree with my hon. friend. We have trouble with the stamps. If one looks at them from a distance of two feet, it will be found that they are hard to distinguish. However, I may assure my hon. friend that we are now working on new stamps and are endeavouring to provide for better stamps whose figures can be more easily seen.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): I have another question. The Postmaster General has mentioned the fact that extra help will be brought in for Saturdays. Who are employing that help? Will that be the postmasters in the various localities, or will that be done under the patronage system? I heard somebody around me here give a little snicker—

Mr. Fulton: They know the answer.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): They certainly know the answer.

Mr. Cote: Since my hon. friend has raised this matter may I say to him that we are not proceeding under any patronage system in the figurative sense or meaning of that word. As a matter of fact all the members of the House of Commons are coming to my office recommending somebody.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Oh, no.

Mr. Cote: Oh, yes.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I never have.

Mr. Cote: My hon. friend who said "no" might be one of the first who does it.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I do not.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think it will be the consensus of the committee that the matters which should be discussed are those involving cost and finances on which the rates of postage can be based. It is my opinion that the methods of appointing personnel—whether they are correct or not—are not subjects for discussion under this section of the bill.

Mr. Knowles: In other words patronage is out of order, and it is about time it was.

Mr. Pearkes: I want to ask a question and make an observation with regard to postage areas which are referred to in this bill. When the Minister of Finance was speaking he told us that the application of the so-called drop letter rate to rural routes, as is now usual in the cities, will be extended; that is, that rural routes will be placed under the same conditions as if the letters were being delivered along a walk, in so far as being posted in one post office is concerned.

Mr. Cote: That is right.

Mr. Pearkes: I am pleased to hear that. No doubt the Postmaster General will remember that I recommended that procedure just a year ago. I am pleased that he has taken this step, although I did not expect that he would raise the rate on drop letters in order to conform to the rates along the rural mail routes.

There is one anomaly which I want to bring to his attention, and it is this. In those areas adjacent to a large city, many years ago there sprang up a number of small, independent, accounting post offices. I do not refer to the sub-post office of the main post office in the city but rather to separate, independent, accounting post offices on the fringe of the large city area but outside of what has been the ordinary three-cent mail area.

Many of those post offices receive their letters for distribution from the rural mail courier, who having dropped the letter bags there then proceeds on up his route and distributes the letters in the ordinary mail boxes along the route, returning and again picking up the letters at that independent post office in order that they may be taken to the main post office for distribution. As a general practice no letter boxes in which the rural mail courier places the letters are permitted within a limited distance—a quarter of a mile—of the post office.

The situation arises that where there is one of these fringe post offices, for anybody within a radius of a quarter of a mile from that post office to receive a letter there it will have to have five cents put on it, whereas if you go on a mile or two miles further, that letter will be delivered by the same man who brought the letter out to these independent post offices. For four cents he will deliver a letter right at the door of the people living along the road. That situation does not seem quite right.

I can give you an instance in my own constituency. No doubt the officers in the minister's department will be able to look it up. I refer to the post office at Colquitz. On one side, within a quarter of a mile radius, is the city of Victoria where patrons will receive letters at their doors for four cents. On the other three sides there are rural mail routes, R.R. 3, Victoria, where the people will receive their letters for four cents. But in that small island surrounding Colquitz post office, everybody will have to pay five cents, both those who send a letter out and those who send one in. Quite obviously that is an anomaly which perhaps has not occurred to the Postmaster General and which I feel should be corrected.

I happen to know that in some of these post offices in the fringe area they issue as many as 100 two-cent postage-due stamps every month because letters have not had adequate postage placed on them.

It is a very serious problem for people living in such areas as I have described. Some of these rural routes are quite extended. In my constituency there are rural routes covering a distance of at least 20 miles. It is going to be a great benefit for people living at the end of the 20-mile route to receive their mail at the same rate. But I have other independent post offices in the fringe or suburban area who are much closer to the main post office in Victoria. They are within five miles of it.

Let me mention another post office, Royal Oak. People there will have to pay five cents, yet they are surrounded by areas where people will only pay four cents on letters posted in Victoria. I would ask the Postmaster General to consider some way by which people living in the fringe areas may receive the same benefits as those living along rural routes. If a rural mail courier carries mail and drops it at a post office, whether it is a sub-post office of the city or an independent post office in the same area, and then proceeds along his normal rural route it seems to me that the people living in what I have referred to as a five-cent island should be treated in the same way as those who live farther out along rural routes.

Mr. Cote: My hon. friend will understand that this was a concession given to the rural routes, and I presume that he agrees we did right in extending this privilege to rural routes. On the other hand, it must be admitted that there must be a line of demarcation somewhere. Otherwise there will not be any administration at all. The fact that we are allowing a four-cent rate on these rural routes does not justify us in extending the same privilege to those who have a still better service and who should pay five cents for the carrying of their letters from one independent post office to another. While I am on my feet, may I say that the estimated revenue increase on postcards is $83,000 per annum.

Mr. Pearkes: I am not satisfied with that answer, because it is not a question of extending facilities farther out. It is simply a case of taking in everybody who lives along the rural route. Privileges have been extended to people living on the rural routes at a greater distance than those living in the immediate vicinity of the small post offices. The courier goes right through the area. He is not allowed to deliver letters within a quarter of a mile of the post office. If he could deliver letters along the way right up to the post office, well and good, but there is this five-cent island.

Mr. Cote: Would my hon. friend suggest that we apply the five-cent rate to rural routes?

Mr. Pearkes: Of course not. I am suggesting the very opposite. I have already said that I recommended the granting of the same rates to rural routes as to drop mail, but these post offices on the outskirts of the city are actually on the rural routes. That is the point I want to make. The stores in which these small post offices are located are right on the rural routes. Up to a point a quarter of a mile from such stores residents along the routes will receive their mail for four cents, but within a quarter of a mile of such a local post office the people will have to pay five cents. When you go on another quarter of a mile the people again get their mail for four cents. The thing is ridiculous.

Mr. Cote: My hon. friend is basing his argument on distance. We do not charge on the basis of distance. We charge on the basis of handling. If, for instance, a letter is sent from here to Halifax there are many handlings.

Mr. Pearkes: I am not talking about Halifax.

Mr. Cote: My hon. friend will understand that there must be a place where we should stop, and if we cannot put a line of demarcation somewhere, no administration is possible. We have extended the privilege of the four-cent rate to rural routes, with which I understand my hon. friend is wholly in agreement, but he must accept the consequences of the implementation of the four-cent rate on rural routes. Again I must tell him an argument on the basis of distance is not one which we can consider. On the contrary, the matter is decided on the basis of handling the volume of mail involved.

Mr. Pearkes: The only thing I can say is that the privilege should be granted for the whole of the route. Do not leave islands along the rural route where people will have to pay five cents.

Mr. Cote: This is not part of a rural route.

Mr. Pearkes: It is a rural route. It is right on a rural route. I have given you the name of one post office and I can name half a dozen more.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Perhaps by now the minister has had a chance to refer to his figures about which I was speaking earlier, and possibly I may be able to help him. On page 2 of his report there are figures for revenue and figures for expenditure. The revenue figure is $129 million and the expenditure figure is $122 million. I take it those are the two figures to which the percentages had reference. Am I right?

Mr. Cote: I want to make the point clear. My hon. friend is drawing my attention to the year 1952, expenditure $115,629,816.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I beg your pardon; I am drawing your attention to 1953 where the expenditure is $122 million and the revenue is $129 million.

Mr. Cote: Oh, $122 million. The surplus there is $6,471,000. We do not now have that surplus, because we lost it through the abolition of the excise tax. Therefore we have to start anew. You cannot take that surplus into consideration because it has entirely disappeared through the abolition of the excise tax. To start with, I want to draw my hon. friend's attention to that point.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I would agree with the minister but I think he is in the wrong portfolio. He ought to be minister of fisheries because he is drawing so many red herrings across the trail. All I want to find out is this. The minister has given me a percentage, 46·9 per cent of the total revenue. Does the 46·9 per cent have reference to the $129 million? I am trying to find out what profit is made on first-class mail. I submit that the figure is about $5 million a year. Am I right?

Mr. Cote: The profit is of the order of 2 per cent of the gross revenues.

Mr. Argue: What is the gross?

Mr. Cote: $129 million.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): It may be in the neighbourhood of 2 per cent of the gross revenue, but when you start breaking down the percentage which the minister has given us and applying it, I still maintain that it comes to about $5 million. But at least we know there is a profit made on first-class mail. I say it is about $5 million, and the minister says it is about $3 million. The minister has said already that there is a loss on second-class mail of $15 million. My question is, why penalize the users of first-class mail another 25 per cent? Why should it be the goose who lays the golden eggs who has to take a 25 per cent increase; why not the users of second-class mail?

Mr. Cote: I understand now the point to which the hon. member is referring. Let me tell him first that I do not want to start a debate within a debate. In 1951 the rates on second-class mail were increased. In every country in the world today second-class mail is carried at a deficit. According to the arguments submitted in 1951, of which there has been some repetition during this debate, it is impossible to have second-class mail pay all the costs of its transportation and distribution.

As I have said, we have a deficit of $15 million, but if we were to make second-class mail pay its way these little publications could not last a day. The publications which could do so would use other forms of transportation and probably keep on doing business. We would then lose the amount of revenue we have from that source, and there would be no advantage to us or to the other parties.

Without going into the details or discussing the principle which has inspired all the countries of the world to disseminate culture and to publicize information, I would say that from a practical standpoint it is impossible to have second-class mail pay for itself. Some of these publications would not last a day, and others would use some other means of transportation. I think I have made myself clear on that point, and I do not want to debate it any longer.

Mr. Fulton: A remark was made in answer to the hon. member for Winnipeg North upon which I should like to comment. I want to say that this is the first time I have ever heard the Toronto Daily Star described as culture. I was not rising to deal with that point, however, as I want to deal with the matter of accounting in the Post Office Department. The minister has told us that one of the reasons we require this increase in rates is the $7·5 million loss of revenue resulting from the cancellation of excise stamps and stamps on cheques and notes. He has used the figure of $7·5 million a great number of times as the anticipated loss in a year.

I point out to him that in the introductory passage of the post office report, in the letter of transmittal from the deputy postmaster general to the minister, it is stated that the expected loss of revenue resulting from this factor may exceed $5 million before the end of the fiscal year.

Now, there is quite a difference between $5 million and $7·5 million. I am not suggesting it be tied down exactly to $5 million. The words used by the deputy postmaster general did not limit it to $5 million, but that is the figure he used and he suggested it would be in that neighbourhood before the end of the current fiscal year. The report is dated August 17, 1953. If he thought it was going to be $7 million why did he not say it was going to be $7 million? I am pointing out the substantial difference between the figure of $5 million and the figure of $7·5 million which the Postmaster General gave.

Mr. Cote: That was the end of August, 1953.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, but he says to the end of the fiscal year, which is March 31, 1954. The budget was introduced on February 19, 1953, and as I recall it stamps on cheques were eliminated immediately. The elimination of those stamps will have been in effect for a full year by the end of this fiscal year. What the deputy postmaster general is saying is that he estimates the loss of revenue within the 12-month period resulting from the cancellation of the stamps on cheques will be at least $5 million. The Postmaster General told us that the loss of revenue is expected to be $7·5 million.

What sort of accounting is there that makes it impossible to know how many stamps were sold for use on cheques in that year? In other words, do they have to wait for a year after the stamps are cancelled to ascertain how many they are not going to sell? Surely they know how many they sold in the year before and can state what the loss in revenue will be. We have a difference of $2 million now.

Mr. Cote: We have no records which would indicate what the deficit will be. We have to wait until the end of the year. In August of last year the deputy postmaster general stated it would be at least $5 million. He was right, because as time has gone by and we have learned more about the whole situation we have found that the deficit will be between $7 and $8 million.

Another aspect of the question asked by the hon. member is that no one informs us whether they are using blue excise stamps or postage stamps on cheques. We do not know. We had no records at all. If we had known we could have said so at the time the deputy postmaster general issued that report. We do not know as yet exactly what it will be, but we do know it will be at least $7·5 million.

We have to face this fact, and there is no other way out. This will at least result in a deficit of over a million dollars at the end of this year. We have to face the facts and report them as we find them. No one holds a record indicating how many people were using blue excise stamps on cheques and how many were using postage stamps. The only possibility of finding out exactly is to wait until the end of the year. So far we know we are going to lose at least $7·5 million.

Mr. Fulton: So the minister has admitted it was known at the time of the budget last year that there would be a resultant loss of revenue to the Post Office Department.

Mr. Cote: Everybody knew we would lose something, but not the extent of it.

Mr. Fulton: During the earlier discussion of this bill I invited certain of the ministers to tell us why, if it were known there would be a loss of revenue at the time the budget was introduced last February, the people were not told it would be necessary to impose an additional tax to make up for that loss in revenue. You will recall that on February 4 the Minister of Finance had just returned from a conference in Australia, and as reported on page 1792 of Hansard I said:

> . . . if he is prepared to say he did not know what the loss of revenue was going to be then we would all be glad to hear from him. I do not hear from him and therefore I assume he did know what the loss of revenue was going to be. It would be interesting to know why he did not say before the election that it would be necessary to make up for this loss of revenue after the election by the imposition of an additional tax on the users of the letter service of Canada.

I want the Postmaster General, if he will, to be kind enough to listen to this, because he may remember I asked him a question, and he said he would deal with it. I went on to say:

> I still do not hear from the minister so I assume that the only explanation that occurs to us is the correct one, namely that he did not want to tell the people of Canada before the election that this tax concession was a mere phantasy, that it was introduced for election purposes only, and that the government knew at that time that they were going to demand from the people of Canada after the election that they make good that loss of revenue which was held out to them as an additional bait in the pre-election budget which the minister himself introduced.

Then I indicated that I would be very glad to give up my position in the debate at that stage to the Minister of Finance, if he indicated any willingness or desire to offer an explanation of why the government took off a tax before the election and put it back on after. I said:

> Does the minister want to explain that?

The minister did not indicate any readiness, and the hon. member for Prince Albert pointed out that you cannot explain the unexplainable. Then I asked:

> Does the Minister of Trade and Commerce and Acting Prime Minister want to explain it?

Mr. Cote: Is my hon. friend reading or is he—

Mr. Fulton: —and the only answer I got was from the Acting Prime Minister:

> We would like you to get on with your speech.

Then I asked:

> Does the Postmaster General want to explain it?

And the Postmaster General replied:

> When I close the debate I will be glad to answer my hon. friend, and I think it will be satisfactory to him.

We have had no explanation as yet as to why the government did not tell the people of Canada why they took a tax off before the election, when they were going to put it back on after the election; and we will be glad to have that explanation from the Postmaster General as to why they did not tell the people of Canada the facts.

Mr. Cote: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is a little puzzled. Last year when the abolition of the excise tax was brought about we did not know, and I did not know, that we were going to pay $7 million for increased salaries, beginning December 1953. Last year we did not know, also, that we were going to pay $5 million to implement the five-day 40-hour week. So my hon. friend should know, and I am repeating it, that I did not know and he did not know—nobody knew at the time—that the five-day 40-hour week was to be implemented. That was not known until recently. We do not know even now if we shall be in a position to implement it on the 1st of April, if we do not receive the necessary information. But we want to do it.

This is some further evidence that these additional expenditures were not known a year ago. I know my hon. friend is trying to build up a little political case, but this is a factual case. I quoted dates for the implementation of the five-day 40-hour week, the date when the salary increase began—that is the general increase in the postal department on December 1—and certainly these additional expenditures, plus an increase to the rural carriers amounting in all to $13,500,000, have to be paid. If only we could have obtained a "paper" surplus of $6 million, which we were expecting, instead of having a deficit of $7,500,000, then we could have gone on. But eventually we would have had to pay the $13,500,000, which everybody in the house agrees we must pay.

So this repetition of the argument used by my hon. friend does not amount to anything, except that we are still facing the fact that we must pay $13,500,000.

Mr. Fulton: The point is that the minister—

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Fulton: I would like to follow this up.

Mr. Brooks: It has been followed up for a long time.

Mr. Fulton: It has been; but the explanation, I regret, has not been satisfactory yet, nor has it dealt with the actual merits of the situation; because the minister has kept on saying that one of the reasons we must have this increase in the postage rate is because we are now anticipating a loss of revenue or a reduction in revenue of $7,500,000 resulting from the elimination of the stamp tax on cheques and notes.

That is offered by the minister as one of the reasons for the necessity of increasing the postage rates. But what he has not denied is that they knew at the time of the stamp tax being taken off cheques that they would lose revenue. The minister has not denied it; he said he did know they would lose revenue.

Mr. Abbott: May I shorten this debate—

Mr. Fulton: After I have finished. He advances as one of the reasons we have an increase in postage rates the fact that the revenue was reduced by $7,500,000 owing to a concession which was made in the last budget when, at the time of the last budget, it was never indicated that that concession might have to be made good. I say that does not seem to be a valid argument in support of this increase.

Mr. Abbott: I said clearly in my last budget speech that I expected the loss of revenue from the abolition of the stamp tax on cheques would be about $12 million. We knew what that figure would be, because we knew what cheque clearances were. With all due respect to my hon. friend the Postmaster General and his competent officials, they cannot tell today how many postage stamps were used on cheques, and what their lost revenue is. They have estimated $7,500,000. My personal view is that that is high.

In any case, when the budget was brought down and the stamp tax on cheques was eliminated it was not anticipated that the Post Office Department would show a deficit.

I made it clear what the gross loss would be. Everybody knew there would be some loss of revenue to the Post Office Department in connection with the stamps used on cheques.

So far as I am concerned—and I am sure this applies also to my colleagues—there was no thought of misleading the public in connection with the abolition of the stamp tax on cheques. If it comes out of the Postmaster General's revenue, that revenue has to be made up. That in itself would not have necessitated an increase in postage rates; I am convinced of that.

Mr. Brooks: Now that this matter has been cleared up, I am sure to the satisfaction of the government but not to the satisfaction of the opposition, I would like to ask a question. I understand this increase in rates is to provide funds for the 40-hour five-day week in certain cities of this country, and also to provide funds for rural mail carriers. I think that is correct.

Mr. Abbott: Plus higher salaries.

Mr. Brooks: In listening to the questions this afternoon it was clear to me that certain cities and perhaps some towns in which industries were using the five-day 40-hour week would receive the benefit. I would like to ask the minister whether post office employees in those cities and towns that have not the five-day 40-hour week in industry will receive the same pay. That is, will the mail clerks and mail carriers in those cities where they are going to get this increase receive the same pay as those who are doing the same work in other cities and towns where the increase is not being provided for? Is there to be a discrimination between cities and towns, so far as hours of work and pay are concerned?

If such were the case it would be very unfair to have the increase in certain sections of the country and not have it in others. Would the minister answer my question?

Mr. Cote: I am a little confused by the double question asked by my hon. friend. All employees received a general increase of approximately 8 per cent beginning December 1.

Mr. Brooks: The point is that some of them will be working longer hours. Will the man who is working a six-day week, and who is not in these preferred areas, as we shall call them, get the same pay as the man working in the area where there is a five-day week?

Mr. Cote: Yes. Actually I can say that there will not be any change in the annual payment.

Mr. Brooks: Both will get the same pay?

Mr. Cote: I will not say that both will get the same pay. They might receive different pays, but there is no change in the annual salary.

Mr. Brooks: That is rank discrimination.

Mrs. Fairclough: It seems to me the Minister of Finance has really made a great contribution to this debate, because in the few words he uttered a few moments ago he merely substantiated our argument. All along the line we have maintained that the department does not know where it is. We have maintained all along that the minister does not know whether he is going to make money or lose money. They just simply pull these figures out of the air and say, "We are going to need this $7,500,000 because of the loss we have suffered through the removal of the stamp tax".

The minister does not know whether or not he will need $5 million to implement the five-day 40-hour week. He does not know what it is going to cost. He does not know whether he is going to get labour for $1 an hour or whether he will have to bring back the regular employees to work on Saturdays. He does not know where he is. We have said right along that he does not know and has no idea how much money the department is making. He does not know whether it will lose $12 million, as the Minister of Finance said in his budget speech last year when he removed the stamp tax. The minister does not know whether he will drop $44,500,000 or some other revenue in the Post Office Department, or whether he will lose $7,500,000. He does not know where he is.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, it is about time the Postmaster General withdrew this bill until we can find out exactly what the situation is in this country.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Drew: Before this item carries, Mr. Chairman, I want to deal with two points that came up because they have a bearing on the way in which this whole matter is being dealt with.

The thing that impresses me is the infinite capacity of the minister for inaccuracy. We had a perfectly clear statement as to the reason why this added charge was required, and now we have the statement of the Minister of Finance that there is nothing in it. We have the statement of the minister—

Mr. Abbott: No, no.

Mr. Drew: We have the statement of the Postmaster General—

Mr. Abbott: If the Leader of the Opposition is going to quote me, please quote me accurately.

Mr. Fulton: The Minister of Finance said it was too high.

Mr. Abbott: It is a matter of opinion. I certainly did not say that there was nothing in it.

Mr. Drew: The Minister of Finance said that the removal of the stamp tax on cheques did not justify this increase.

Mr. Abbott: Will my hon. friend be accurate? I said the increase would not have been made on that ground alone.

Mr. Drew: I submit the minister said there was nothing in that argument. So far as the statements before us are concerned the Minister of Finance has said, with deference to the Postmaster General, that he does not think he knows exactly what the figures are.

Mr. Abbott: No one can; it is obvious it can only be an estimate.

Mr. Drew: We agree with the Minister of Finance 100 per cent. We are certain that the Postmaster General does not know, and those who are advising him do not know. We have had an ample demonstration of it this afternoon; but I want to pass on to one or two other things that have been said because they have some bearing on this whole question. They simply drop figures before the house and say now, be good boys and girls and don't ask questions; just assume that this all-wise government knows what is right and pass this bill without being too much of a nuisance. That is really what the whole contention amounts to. We have had nothing more solid than that come before us since this bill was introduced.

The minister said he dealt with the statement that savings of $377,000 be made by terminating the service of the post office savings bank. He used these words: "The repeated suggestion that there would be a clear saving of $377,000." It is not the repeated suggestion; it is the positive, unqualified statement of J. D. Woods and Gordon that is placed before the house. It was not a suggestion of any member of this house; it was the unqualified statement of J. D. Woods and Gordon after reviewing the whole operation of the post office savings bank, the number of depositors, the number of inactive accounts and various suggestions as to considerations that should be borne in mind. J. D. Woods and Gordon then said:

> If it is decided to wind up the post office savings bank there would be an estimated annual saving of $377,000 per annum, and the field organization would be relieved of much detailed work.

There may be many reasons why the Postmaster General does not think the post office bank should discontinue its service. There may be good reasons why that should not be done, but I submit that the Postmaster General, neither in his own words nor in words that he finds in any other source, should place before this committee the idea that it is only a suggestion that $377,000 could be saved.

What I was pointing out, and what others have pointed out, is that before we are asked to give approval to what amounts to extensive increases in the cost of first-class mail we should know in clear and understandable terms exactly what the government propose to do in relation to these positive recommendations, and why they will or will not accept them. Certainly the suggestion made by the Postmaster General—and it is no more than a suggestion—that there is some other figure that should be borne in mind is not consistent with the findings of people who are highly regarded as accountants and business experts by this government and others.

Then may I refer to the Postmaster General's suggestion that there is nothing in the possibility that he might encourage the posting of mail in other places? Rather lightly he suggests that I engage in other reading than "Alice in Wonderland". Mr. Chairman, I will admit that "Alice in Wonderland" is much more sensible reading than anything I have heard from the minister here this afternoon. It would contribute much more to the understanding of this problem than anything we have had by way of direct answer here this afternoon. The minister knows perfectly well that I said we did not want to see a situation where anybody was mailing letters written in Canada outside of Canada. The minister, however, knows perfectly well that there is no specific law that would be offended by a Canadian posting mail in the United States, and there are thousands of Canadians doing that all the time perfectly legally.

The minister refers to one general provision in regard to international agreements. Mr. Chairman, we have not yet reached the point when a mental interpretation of some term of that kind establishes an offence which will prevent somebody doing a thing of this kind. There is no law on the statutes which directly affects this situation. All I was doing was offering an illustration of the kind of thing that can result from neglecting the ordinary economic pressures when too high a tax of any kind is imposed.

I would hope that in this case again the Minister of Finance would come to our help and point out to the Postmaster General what his experience was when he put too high a tax on cigarettes. He found that there is some point beyond which the people will not go without being encouraged to follow methods that none of us might approve, but which did avoid increased expenditures. It was in that light, and in that light alone, that I raised this possibility. I am mentioning it only because it illustrates the marked difference between two countries lying side by side, where the general economic conditions are the same. I was seeking to emphasize, and I repeat that what is now proposed places us on a higher cost basis than the United States in regard to a similar service, at the very time we are being urged from all quarters to keep costs down. The Postmaster General has repeated over and over again what it will cost, but we know he does not know, because the Minister of Finance has said so.

Mr. Abbott: I said no such thing.

Mr. Drew: I take the words of the Minister of Finance, and I am prepared to accept them as they appear in Hansard.

Mr. Abbott: Do that.

Mr. Drew: The Postmaster General knows there will be an increase, but the Minister of Finance makes it quite clear than in his opinion he does not know the exact amount and that—

Mr. Abbott: No. What I said was that I was sure he did not know the exact amount of loss of revenue from the sale of stamps for cheques.

Mr. Drew: If he does not know the amount of loss he does not know the amount he needs and consequently what the exact increase should be. If he does not know one way he does not know the other way. The fact is that if he does not know how much the loss is we should not be asked to make up an amount he does not know. That is exactly what we are being asked to do on the basis of the statement of the Minister of Finance.

The Postmaster General says there are going to be these increases, and they can only be paid for in one way. But that is not so. These increases can be met in other ways. They can be met by increased efficiency, by the introduction of new methods, and by a number of devices which are employed with success and result in great increase in revenues in other countries. If the Postmaster General would only start a policy of having the kind of stamps printed that would appeal to those who are interested in stamps, and encourage the buying of stamps for that purpose as well as for the ordinary postal services, he could find new sources of revenue.

An hon. Member: The empire games is an example.

Mr. Drew: If he would look at stamps coming from countries one-third the size of Canada and even smaller and see how they introduce attractive new issues, beside which some that have appeared in Canada recently compare very, very unfavourably, he would see ways in which encouragement can be given to new sales of stamps.

In any event, Mr. Chairman, I do not think anything has been said by the Postmaster General which would indicate that any serious attempt has been made to explore the new possibilities that are now before us. The Postmaster General says that the Toronto area accounts for one-fifth of all mail. I would like to know the percentage of mail handled in Quebec, the Montreal district, the Winnipeg district, the Regina district and the Calgary district. I would like to know the percentage in each of these cases so we may know what general effect on savings may be brought about.

Mr. Cote: Mr. Chairman, I shall not take up the time of the committee in order to deny or contradict the statements made by the Leader of the Opposition. I am doing the best I can to explain the situation to him, but he does not appear willing to accept my explanation. On January 15 he said, as reported at page 1151 of Hansard:

> There would be nothing illegal in anybody getting in an automobile and driving across the boundary and posting these several thousand pieces of mail for 3 cents apiece and sending them into Canada at the reduced rate, . . .

I told him that that would be illegal. He came back again and said it would not be illegal. I then quoted the postal act and explained to him that it was illegal, but he again insisted that this was not so. The hon. member's official called my office this morning asking about this matter and, according to information I have received from my officials, they informed him that it would be illegal.

I would advise my hon. friend to call my department before he makes any similar statements, not after.

The Leader of the Opposition has suggested that we might increase revenue by catering to philatelists. In actual fact we are already doing so. I will not pretend that we have the world's most attractive stamps, certainly not in regard to the last issue. I know it is only human to err, but you cannot hold the postal department responsible for all the mistakes made concerning the issue of stamps, particularly as regards the last issue. Philatelists already consider our stamps worthy of collecting, and we are already making money in that field. In 1952-53 we made approximately $282,000 in that way, and we are redoubling our efforts in that regard. We hope that in the near future you will see some evidence of the interest the department has displayed in this field.

The Leader of the Opposition wishes to know the varying revenues of post offices. I shall read a few. For example, Abbotsford, B.C.—

Mr. Drew: I asked for definite places.

Mr. Cote: I have the amounts here. The figure for Abbotsford is $43,416.

Mr. Drew: I asked for percentages. You gave the percentage in the case of Toronto.

An hon. Member: Abbotsford is a village.

Mr. Cote: I presume the hon. member will be able to work the percentages out for himself if I give him the totals. Amherstburg $29,290; Amos $40,580; Antigonish $47,177; Arnprior $33,007; Arvida $38,931, and I will go on—

Mr. Lennard: Mr. Chairman, the minister has not mentioned one place referred to by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Cote: Quebec city $2,482,655; Montreal $15,722,772. May I ask my hon. friend what other places he had in mind?

Mr. Drew: Yes, Winnipeg.

Mr. Cote: Winnipeg, $6,713,897.

Mr. Drew: Since the minister has given these figures, what is the figure for Toronto?

Mr. Cote: Toronto is $23,883,460.

Mr. Drew: What was the total?

Mr. Cote: For what?

Mr. Drew: For the whole of Canada.

Mr. Cote: $129 million.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Drew: Just before this is carried, Mr. Chairman, may I say this. I am not going to labour the matter beyond this, but I am going to get this point quite clear. The minister has said that someone called his office to find out what provision in the act dealt with the possibility of mail being posted in the United States, and this is what was given. This is section 5, subsection (j) of the Canada Post Office Act. It reads as follows:

> Subject to this act, the Postmaster General shall administer, superintendent and manage the Canada post office, and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing may
> (j) make and give effect to any postal agreement or arrangement with the government or postal authorities of any country or independent postal administration and pay out of postal revenue any remuneration or indemnity thereby provided;

Does the minister know of any other provision in the act that applies to this subject? That is the one he quoted in the house the other day. Is there any other one?

Mr. Cote: No. This is the section which gives the power to the Postmaster General to enter into arrangements with different countries.

Mr. Drew: Yes.

Mr. Cote: And all the countries belonging to the universal postal union make an agreement. We made this agreement. In the circumstances we would not apply the section of this agreement. The United States would. They would return the letters sent that way in bulk, or ask for an increase in the rate.

Mr. Drew: That was exactly the point I am going to make. All this agreement provides is that the postmaster may do certain things. In this case the postmaster who would have to do it would be the postmaster in the United States, and there is no such provision at the moment. I repeat what I said before, namely that at the moment, as the matter stands, this is not a specific law dealing with this subject. In view of what the Postmaster General has said, I can only say that no matter how genially he may present this subject, if his advice is that this constitutes some law that would make it an offence to follow this course, then he had better get some other advice.

Mr. Cote: No. I think my hon. friend is confused. I am very sorry to have to repeat to him that there is a signed agreement between Canada and the United States; both countries belong to the universal postal union and they have signed an agreement. That is exactly what I am trying to tell my hon. friend and have been trying to tell him since the debate first started. I am not doing it just to be disagreeable to him. It is the truth.

I am very sorry to tell him that he is in error when he says that it is not illegal. I hope I have made myself clear. It is not that I want to be disagreeable to my hon. friend. It is because we have an agreement with the United States of America. The United States is a country belonging to the universal postal union, as is Canada. Both have signed this agreement. Both having signed this agreement they must abide by its terms, which forbid exactly what my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. Drew: Unless the minister misinformed us unintentionally the other day the agreement does nothing of the kind, because he told us that the agreement deprecates this practice. That was the word he used and it is the word to which I refer. If that is all the agreement says, there is no law against this practice.

Mr. Cote: I also said "specifically provided", and explained what I said today.

Mr. Knowles: Before this section is voted on, there is one other point I should like to draw to the attention of the Postmaster General. I hope it does not take as long as the point I raised earlier this afternoon. Indeed, if the minister will assure me that he will have this matter looked into, he will be pleased to find that I will accept that assurance.

As matters stand, it seems to me that if the rate of postage goes up as is provided in this bill, certain business firms in this country are going to experience an even greater increase than the increase in the postage rate itself. It is not often that I take the time of the house in bringing to the attention of the government a point affecting business, small or large, but when something has been brought to my attention which seems to be unfair, it matters not to me who is suffering, I think that case should be brought out and any injustice corrected.

I understand that Pitney-Bowes of Canada Limited sells stamping machines to business firms of this country, small and large. The use of these machines by business firms obviously saves the Post Office Department certain costs because actual stamps do not have to be supplied. When a firm buys one of these stamping machines from Pitney-Bowes of Canada, I understand that is not the end of the story. After buying the machine the firm finds that it has to rent from Pitney-Bowes a meter; it cannot buy the meter, but it must rent it. I find further that Pitney-Bowes charges these business firms not only the rental for the meter but also 6 per cent of the amount of postage used over a certain point.

The minister can see right away what the result of the change in postage rates is going to be. For instance, here is a firm that does a certain amount of business in terms of dollars and cents at the present time. The postage rate goes up 25 per cent. That means that if they do the same amount of mailing, their costs will be 25 per cent higher as to the postage but they will pay 6 per cent more on that increase by virtue of this arrangement with Pitney-Bowes.

It has been represented to me that this arrangement has the approval of the Post Office Department. I should like to ask the Postmaster General if he will have that arrangement reviewed in the light of this increase in postage which, as I say, is going to be pyramided so far as these business firms are concerned. As I say, I am relying on information that has been brought to my attention. If the minister tells me that the Post Office Department has not approved of that arrangement, particularly of that 6 per cent charge, I suggest that the Post Office Department has a responsibility to see to it that the matter is reviewed so that a firm is not allowed to pyramid an increase for which the government is responsible. That is carrying exploitation too far.

There is one other aspect to this matter. The Postmaster General is pretty smart if he can carry on all these conversations with his officials and listen to me at the same time.

An hon. Member: Go ahead.

Mr. Knowles: There is one other aspect to this matter. Some time ago—I am not just sure how long—I understand the Post Office Department used to allow the business firms that used the stamping machines a 2 per cent reduction on the cost of postage, representing what the department saved in not having to supply the stamps. However, I am told the 2 per cent discount—and "discount" is the word I should have used previously—was discontinued a few years ago.

My point is this. If the Postmaster General is powerless to review the matter of the 6 per cent rake-off that Pitney-Bowes charges on this extra postage, the Post Office Department is certainly in a position at least to reinstate that discount to firms which use these machines and thereby effect a saving to the Post Office Department itself.

I have tried to state this briefly. My request is that the Postmaster General have the matter reviewed, but I would be pleased to have any comments he cares to make now.

Mr. Cote: I am informed that at no time have we had anything to do with the relations between Pitney-Bowes and its clients. The only thing with which we are concerned is to see that the machines are not tampered with. As far as the 2 per cent discount is concerned, it was not a saving but what was allowed to vendors as a discount on stamp sales.

Mr. Knowles: Explain.

Mr. Cote: I am informed this has been withdrawn because it would give Pitney-Bowes an advantage in selling this service, and we did not agree to that.

Mr. Knowles: As I indicated earlier, I will not take the time of the house to pursue the matter now. I realize that the Postmaster General has had to seek information from his officials rather than speak from his own knowledge. I still feel that the matter is worthy of further review, particularly in view of this increase, and remembering that the percentage this firm charges amounts to a pyramiding of the increase to a still higher amount. Rather than a negative statement from the minister telling me now that nothing can be done about it, I would prefer to have his agreement to look into the matter after the bill has been disposed of, and perhaps it can be dealt with again later in the session.

Mr. Cote: I have no objection to having another look at the matter, but these are services which are sold by a third party to a fourth party. Actually we have nothing to do with it except to see that they do not rob the department. If Pitney-Bowes wants to sell a service and somebody else wants to buy it they are entirely free to do so. However, I shall be glad to have another look at the situation.

Mr. Knowles: I thank the minister for that, and I point out that the increase in postage helps the third party and harms the fourth party.

Mrs. Fairclough: The minister says the Post Office Department has nothing to do with these postage meters, that it is a matter of agreement between second and third parties. But the Post Office Department does have regulations respecting the use of these machines. It prescribes that they may be used only in a certain way and by certain people. Therefore the relationship is not quite as remote as the impression left by the Postmaster General would convey.

Mr. Cote: Excuse me. If my hon. friend will allow me, I was talking about the matter of price as between the client and the vendor of the service. I know we have some regulations about the value of stamps sold in these meters, because we want to know what is going on; but when I was answering the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I had reference to the price of the service as between the seller and the buyer.

Mr. Knowles: Mainly with reference to the 6 per cent. That is what I want the minister to look into.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The other day I asked the minister whether or not the departmental officials had given consideration to the degree to which there might be a diminution in the use of the facilities of the post office by reason of the 25 per cent increase in the postage rates. Some years ago an increase was made from three to four cents, or an increase of 33⅓ per cent, and if my recollection is not in error the income was considerably lower than had been anticipated on the basis of the facilities being used to a similar extent. The minister said there were statistics in connection with the application of increases in postage and the degree to which the law of diminishing returns applies with respect to such increases.

I should like the minister to give in detail the experience in the past and set out the anticipated income based on like use of the facilities, and the actual income in the year immediately succeeding such increases.

Mr. Cote: There is no actual way of ascertaining that. We cannot say what is in the minds of the people. Business will have to be done as usual, and we do not expect any substantial decrease on account of the increase in the postage rates.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Of course the only way you can determine your expectation is on the basis of experience, not on the basis of hope. I asked what was the estimate on the previous occasion of the anticipated increase in revenue by reason of the increase in the postage rate, and to what degree that hope was achieved in the final results.

Mr. Cote: The only information I can give is that at the time of the last increase in 1943 the revenue before the increase was $59,175,137, and in 1944 the revenue increased to $73,004,398. I wish I could give more accurate information, but the last time there was an increase in rates revenue rose from $59 million to $73 million.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Perhaps the minister would explain it in detail so we can understand it.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Barnett: Judging by some of the discussion this afternoon, Mr. Chairman, this seems to be a day on which various members of this house are being surprised, shocked and horrified. I have to confess that I was rather horrified at some of the things I heard this afternoon, especially when the Postmaster General blandly admitted that on the one hand they were planning to introduce this five-day 40-hour week, and on the other hand they were going to sabotage it. I have to admit that I was somewhat horrified by that admission. I am referring, of course, to the suggestion that in introducing the 40-hour week, they were going to allow and encourage people to work overtime on the sixth day.

I am just wondering whether the minister realizes what a hornets' nest he is going to stir up when the news is let out that the Postmaster General is going to encourage this procedure. I am suggesting that if he does not seriously consider what I am saying, and consult with some trade unions in this country as to their opinion on this matter, the results may be serious. There are a few people in Canada who recall that the eight-hour day and the 40-hour week are matters over which blood have been shed, over which lives have been lost. They are not things to be taken lightly.

The Deputy Chairman: I should like the hon. member to believe that I have not the slightest desire to interfere with his argument if it can be helped, but as he knows the clause we are discussing deals with the rates of postage on letters and first-class mail. A discussion of the labour aspects of the Post Office Department would be in order on the Postmaster General's estimates. I would ask the hon. member to assist the Chair and the committee by connecting his remarks with the clause we are considering.

Mr. Barnett: I would respectfully suggest that it was as a result of the suggestion of the Postmaster General that postage rates are linked to the introduction of the five-day 40-hour week that the discussion took place in the committee this afternoon. This matter was raised and was discussed. I would suggest that if this 40-hour week is going to be taken lightly or brushed aside, then one of the major reasons the minister has advanced for introducing this legislation will go by the board. I wonder if he realizes the significance of the suggestion that employees who are going to receive the benefits of the 40-hour week are going to be encouraged to work overtime. I wonder if he realizes just what a hornets' nest may be stirred up by this action.

I would suggest he might ask anyone who has had experience as a chairman of a plant grievance committee or as an industrial personnel officer, as to the nature of one of the major grievances. I suggest that the answer he would receive would be that this question of overtime, and of allowing people who are on a regular 40-hour week to do overtime work, is one of the biggest headaches they have. I must admit I was greatly disturbed to hear the minister suggest that practice was going to be encouraged with the introduction of the 40-hour week in the postal service. I wonder if he is aware of the insidious sort of pressure that can be brought to bear to break down the 40-hour week once it has been established.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am going to ask the hon. member if he will, as I think the committee would desire him to, direct his remarks to the clause we are discussing. The merits and demerits of certain labour practices cannot, I submit, affect the cost of carrying first-class mail. The last thing I want to do is to restrict any fair discussion of the clause. I know our discussion has wandered far afield, but I would request the hon. member to come back to the clause we are supposed to be considering.

Mr. Barnett: It is not my desire to prolong this discussion unduly. Perhaps I have said enough along this line to indicate my views. I was going to relate my remarks to the suggestion that was made this afternoon by the hon. member for Vancouver South concerning the hiring of casual employees at what may be lesser wages than would normally be paid. This would affect the cost of operation of the post office. I should like to say that efficient administration and general economy in the post office should cause the Postmaster General to look very carefully at this idea of introducing casual employees.

The minister tried to suggest that where the 40-hour week came into effect in industry everything was shut down on Saturday, so there was no parallel there. I would suggest to the minister that he might look at a good many industries which do not do that, where they have had experience in integrating around the clock operations into the five-day 40-hour week. I suggest that industries such as mining, where the concentrator plants work around the clock, and pulp and paper plants which operate around the clock, are industries into which they do not bring casual employees for the week end. There are also the power plants across the country where the same condition applies.

I would agree that in certain limited areas, such as university towns or something of that sort, there might be merit in the suggestion of the hon. member for Vancouver South that bona fide university students be considered for casual work. I would suggest to the minister, however, that the areas where such an arrangement could be efficiently introduced are very few. I believe he should give consideration, just as most industries do when they introduce the shorter work week, to creating an integrated operation with fully qualified employees.

Mr. Winch: In rising at this stage of the discussion I want to say that in my estimation clause 1 should be opposed by all members of this house until such time as the Postmaster General shows evidence of need for an increase in the rates on first-class mail, and until he has carried into effect his own principle that those who use the mails shall pay.

I am not going to take up the time of the committee in reiterating previous arguments which have shown that millions of dollars have been lost on second-class mail, or because departments of government are not paying their share of the cost of sending their mail, which amounts to about $4,700,000. What I wish to discuss at this time is something I do not believe has been mentioned as yet in any phase of the discussion. My point is that clause 1 involves an increase in the postal rate on first-class mail, the only part of the postal operation that shows a profit; and I say that increase should not be allowed so long as the minister follows the principle he has stated, that those who use the mail should pay for it. He should not allow a condition under which some who use the mail do not pay anything at all.

The phase of the matter I should like to draw to the attention of the committee at the moment is this—and I am certain my information is correct—that under the present Post Office Act, or under the regulations, any weekly newspaper in any town of less than 10,000, throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion of Canada, can have its papers distributed by the Post Office Department completely free of charge.

I am certain that the minister, being a serious man, will recognize that this does not seem right. It is not right to ask the house to place an additional burden involving $14 million according to the minister's figures, on one part of the operation, while at the same time there are regulations allowing businesses to make use of the mails without any charge whatsoever. I think if a study were made of weekly newspapers across Canada we would find that they are in a pretty good financial position, yet we find that first-class mail must subsidize another form of postal delivery that contributes nothing toward the cost of the postal service.

Not only is that the policy of this government; it has been the policy in the past. I know from personal examination of the records that about four years ago, I believe it was, a weekly newspaper in a town with a population of more than 10,000 was charged for its deliveries. However, the postal service gave an undertaking that if when the census was taken it was shown that the town did not have a population of 10,000, this weekly newspaper would receive a refund of all the money it had paid. When the census was taken it was found that the population was less than 10,000, and a refund was made. I have the records to show it.

I am not going to repeat arguments that have been made before. But this is a brand new one, and it is completely contradictory to the so often declared principle of the Postmaster General himself that those who use the mails should pay for them. Yet in every town of under 10,000 population the Postmaster General allows use of the mails for no charge whatsoever.

Until this phase of the matter is more carefully investigated, and until the minister puts his own declared principle in operation, we must oppose clause 1 of the bill which asks for a further increase in the only profit-making endeavour of the postal service in Canada.

Mr. Coldwell: Is what the hon. member has said a correct statement?

Mr. Cote: It is in the statute; it is the law.

Mr. Coldwell: It is the law?

Mr. Cote: Yes.

Mr. Winch: Of course it is the law, and the law is laid down by parliament. It is also the law of the government. If the Postmaster General is sincere in his declaration of principle, then he should bring in an amendment to the statute and see that it is carried out. But, oh, no; he does not do that at all. He forgets second-class mail and this deficit. He forgets the use of the postal service made by these people for no charge at all. He just amends the law—and he is the man who can do it, of course. He just brings in an amendment to the law which will add a burden to first-class mail and postcards. I say it is not fair in any way whatsoever.

Mr. Zaplitny: I would ask a question for purposes of information. I notice that in clause 1 it states these rates are to apply to letters posted in Canada for delivery in Canada. Does the same rate apply to letters posted in Canada for delivery in some other country? If so would the minister place on the record those countries which come under the rate stated in this clause?

Mr. Cote: I gave that information this afternoon. This bill refers to mail posted in Canada for delivery in Canada.

Mr. Zaplitny: But some letters mailed in Canada go to other countries. For example, some go to the United States.

Mr. Cote: As I said this afternoon, this domestic rate applies to mail posted in Canada for delivery in Canada, the commonwealth, the western hemisphere and France, if I remember correctly.

Mr. Zaplitny: Is that the complete list?

Mrs. Fairclough: Do I understand that when the bill says "Canada" it means the western hemisphere and commonwealth nations?

Mr. Cote: I think I have already given that information.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am just asking it.

Mr. Cote: I repeat that this bill concerns letters posted in Canada for delivery in Canada, and letters posted to the commonwealth, the western hemisphere and France.

Mr. Winch: May I ask the Postmaster General why he is prepared to amend the law to impose an increase on this profit-making part of the service, and will not amend it in respect of the law concerning those who are not paying anything at all?

Mr. Cote: I do not amend the law; parliament does that.

Mr. Winch: I am sorry; I did not hear that.

Mr. Cote: I said that I do not personally amend the law. It is parliament which is amending the law.

Mr. Knowles: You bring in the bill.

Mr. Winch: If the Postmaster General can bring in an amendment, why does he not do it?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): If the hon. member wishes to bring in an amendment, he can do it.

Mr. Knowles: The Minister of Trade and Commerce knows that it would be out of order. It is a money matter.

Mr. Winch: On a point of order, can a private member in the House of Commons bring in an amendment which deals with revenue or expenditure?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Winch: Can I? I am asking. The Acting Prime Minister has said I can do it. This time I am asking you, Mr. Chairman, whether I as a private member have the right to bring in an amendment.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member should know that deciding points of order in advance is not within the competence of the chairman.

Mr. Ellis: I should like to ask one question. Something was said today about the five-day week. This is one matter I do not think has been cleared up satisfactorily. The minister said the intention was to get casual help to deliver the mail on Saturdays. When I first learned the five-day week was going into effect I assumed that would mean that the Post Office would hire sufficient additional personnel to rotate the staff so regular postmen would be delivering mail each day.

I think this is a very important matter because, apart from the efficiency of the service, which would not be helped by bringing in people on a casual basis, the principle here is very important, as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni pointed out. I do not want to see this situation develop in the future that when postal employees ask for adjustments in wages they are told by the Postmaster General that if they want more money all they have to do is carry mail on Saturdays and work six days. I can see that situation developing. I think the five-day week means a five-day week, and that employees who are working a five-day week should be paid adequately for this period of employment.

I do not like a principle involved under which you are going to say to postal employees who work their five-day week that if they feel they want a little extra money they can come to work on Saturdays. I believe that as a general principle when overtime is worked it should be paid for.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I have tried to make it as clear as I could to the committee that in my view the merits or the demerits of the labour practices of the Post Office Department are not within the competence of discussion under this section. In so far as they bring about increased costs they are, but the results which may ensue to labour, in so far as labour practices are concerned, are not within the competence of a section which deals entirely with the rates on first-class mail. I think the committee as a whole would agree that that is a reasonable attitude to take, and I would ask the hon. gentleman not to follow that particular line of discussion.

Mr. Ellis: You can understand what I was trying to get at, Mr. Chairman. One of the reasons advanced for the introduction of this bill had to do with the 40-hour week. Therefore I suggest that my remarks in connection with this matter are pertinent to the point under discussion. However, in deference to your ruling I shall not pursue this matter farther. But I do want to ask the Postmaster General this question and then I shall drop the matter. Is it the intention of the Post Office Department to continue indefinitely on the basis of employing casual help, or is it the intention of the Post Office Department, within a reasonable length of time, to recruit sufficient full-time personnel to institute the 40-hour week?

Mr. Cote: With deference to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, I may say to my hon. friend what I said before. This is a device that will permit every employee to have his Saturday off. The principle of the five-day 40-hour week is covered in this. Previously when people asked for it they thought that they should work only five days, 40 hours, and we are giving them exactly what they asked for; but to those who, having been granted this privilege, feel that they would like to work on Saturdays, we are not denying that opportunity.

Again I say that for the efficiency of the service it is more practical to hire some people who would work on Saturday only, because otherwise it would force every new employee to learn five, six or a dozen new walks every time. This would not be practical in the scheme I have outlined. I have already explained that the walks will be served by the same employees, except that on Saturday the employees taken on for that day will be accustomed to the walks and the efficiency of the service will not suffer.

Mr. Ellis: Is the minister not aware of the fact that the normal practice is that where an employee is working a 40-hour week the time worked in addition to 40 hours is in effect overtime and should be paid for at overtime rates of pay, time and a half?

Mr. Cote: I shall not discuss that, Mr. Chairman. This is not a question of overtime. The principle of the five-day 40-hour week is that an employee should not work more than five days, 40 hours. He deserves a rest, and we are giving him a rest. The new employees who will come on will work the time necessary to do the job. I think I have said enough for my hon. friend to understand what I mean.

Mrs. Fairclough: The Postmaster General says this is on a voluntary basis. How can you call it a voluntary basis when the postmaster himself sends out questionnaires and says to his regular letter carriers, "Will you sign the enclosed questionnaire?" The questionnaire reads something like this: "Will you work on Saturdays for four hours? Will you work on Saturdays for eight hours at $1 per hour? If you will not work on Saturday you will be on call." Then there is a covering circular which says: "If you do not volunteer to work on Saturday, then you are at the call of the postmaster, and provided time can be made available to you to make up the time which you have given as overtime you will be compensated, but if not you will be paid." Is that a voluntary system?

Mr. Cote: Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I do not think I should allow the Postmaster General to answer the question, because it does not relate to the section we are dealing with. It is a question as to the way the Post Office Department treats its employees which, as I have said so often, will be open to discussion on the Postmaster General's estimates. I submit to the hon. member that the answer could not affect the rate charged on first-class matter, which is the subject we are discussing.

Mrs. Fairclough: Nobody but the Postmaster General brought in the matter of the cost of instituting the five-day 40-hour week. The Postmaster General made a great point of the fact that this was the main reason for instituting an increase in rates. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that anything that is pertinent to the work of the employees is pertinent to this debate. And for a chairman or a Speaker to call members to order on a point which has been brought in by the Postmaster General is, in my opinion, distinctly unfair.

The Deputy Chairman: I hope I have made it clear to this committee before, and I shall endeavour to do so again, that any aspect of the 40-hour week which relates to the costs of the Post Office Department is certainly subject to discussion, but the treatment by the Post Office Department of its employees is not. I think the discussion we have had this evening and the long reply by the Postmaster General have shown to the committee that we have got a long way from the subject of increasing the cost of first-class mail.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I think you are quite right. My remarks at the resolution stage were justified, when I asked the Postmaster General whether, when the rest of the civil service was given an increase in wages and was given the five-day 40-hour week, there was an increase in the charges for other services. The answer was no, there was not. But now the Post Office Department is instituting the five-day 40-hour week, and the word "cost" comes up. Now we must increase the postal rate because the post office must pay for this. That is all right. So the post office must pay for this, eh! We listened to what the hon. member for Vancouver East said tonight; and we have seen what this debate has shown, namely that there is a hidden subsidy to the T.C.A.

Mr. Knowles: And to C.P.A.

Mrs. Fairclough: And to a good many others. There is the free postal service to departments that are dispensing all kinds of propaganda and departmental advertising to all and sundry, whether it is useful, whether it is welcome or not. Much of it finds its way immediately into the wastepaper basket, probably without even being opened. These are charges against the Post Office Department, yet the Postmaster General says that the post office must pay for this.

We said in the very first instance that the people of Canada do not expect the Post Office Department to pay for itself and in addition have to carry the huge load which it is being asked to carry, as has been shown by the debate so far.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words on this increase in the postage rates, with particular reference to the 40-hour week. The minister has based practically his whole argument for the increase in rates on the establishment of the 40-hour week, and he accepts the principle of the 40-hour week. It is hoped that the implementation of the 40-hour week will in no way impair the service; but the policy announced by the minister, and apparently agreed to by some of the critics I have listened to, is that the gap that will be caused by the establishment of the 40-hour week will be filled by casual labour or by students.

In my judgment the filling of the gap on Saturday with casual labour or with students will definitely impair the service. A survey conducted in the United States on the very same question led to the conclusion that it will take a casual employee twelve hours to do the work that is ordinarily done in eight hours by a regular employee. The object of the 40-hour week is to reduce hours, create more employment and at the same time in no way impair the efficiency of the service.

I wonder whether the minister would be prepared to do what was done in the United States under similar conditions, and what is agreed to by most of the people in the country I have heard express an opinion on this subject. That is, the post office should hire one person for every five walks there are in the postal department. After investigation in the United States this was the method they adopted to overcome the difficulty, and they found that their service was in no way impaired.

I think it is the answer to the difficulty in this country. The policy of putting in people who are not interested in the job, and who do not intend to stay there because they do not anticipate there will eventually be a place for them, will not meet the situation. On the other hand, if you hire one permanent employee for every five walks that you have across the country, a permanent employee who will be trained and will stay there, you will eliminate what I consider to be a waste of casual labour and so improve this public service.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, this will be very brief. I wish to thank the Postmaster General for the offer he made this afternoon to take another look at the question of what happens in respect of these stamping machines that are used by various business firms.

Mr. Martin: Surely we have had that. The minister said he was going to look into it.

Mr. Knowles: I have as much time as the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I was prepared to deal with this briefly, but if he wants to keep me going I shall be glad to accommodate him.

The point I wish to make, Mr. Chairman, is simply this. In my view the minister should take a look at this matter not merely because of his generous offer to do so, but because of something I have now found is in the act. On the basis of what I am going to read I believe those who drew this matter to my attention are perfectly justified in their request that the Post Office Department should pay more attention to the arrangements made between a company such as Pitney-Bowes and the firms who instal their stamping machines. In this connection I would draw to the minister's attention section 5 (i) of the Post Office Act, which reads as follows:

Subject to this act, the Postmaster General shall administer, superintend and manage the Canada post office, and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, may

(i) install or permit to be installed or erected stamp vending machines and machines for the making or printing of postage impressions;

My sole reason for rising now was to draw the Postmaster General's attention to the fact that as I read the act this matter comes under the authority of the Postmaster General and he is really obligated to take another look at the matter I raised this afternoon. I hope he will do so in the light of that obligation.

Mr. Campbell: In view of the statement made a few moments ago by the hon. member for Vancouver East I would like to ask the minister this question. Having regard to the fact that newspapers in towns with a population of 10,000 or under can send their newspapers free, what is the position of newspapers in small towns and villages which use fillers? Do they come under the same section?

Mr. Cote: Would my hon. friend please repeat his question? I am sorry, but I did not hear.

Mr. Campbell: What I want to know is if newspapers in small towns and villages, the ones which use fillers and have very little news except local items, can send their newspapers free.

Mr. Cote: I am sorry, but I do not understand what the hon. member means by "fillers". However, I may tell my hon. friend that if it is a regular newspaper with bona fide subscribers they are allowed free delivery up to 40 miles, but only when it is to a paid subscriber.

Mrs. Fairclough: May I ask the minister if that applies to weekly papers only, or does it apply to semi-weeklies?

Mr. Cote: Mr. Chairman, I think I can best answer the two hon. members who have asked questions on newspapers by quoting section 11, subsection 2, paragraph (c) which reads as follows:

(c) for those published once a week

(i) with a circulation of fifty thousand or more copies per issue, three cents for each pound weight or fraction thereof,

(ii) with a circulation of less than fifty thousand but of ten thousand or more copies per issue, two and one-half cents for each pound weight or fraction thereof, and

(iii) with a circulation of less than ten thousand copies per issue, one and one-half cents for each pound weight or fraction thereof,

[Mr. Knowles.]

Subject to the exception that two thousand five hundred copies per issue may be transmitted by mail free of postage within a distance of forty miles from its known place of publication in the case of a newspaper or periodical published in a city, town or village with a population of not more than ten thousand persons;

Mr. Lennard: Does that apply to semi-weekly or daily newspapers?

Mr. Cote: Just weekly.

Mr. Lennard: Papers subscribed for.

Mr. Cote: There must be a bona fide subscription.

Mr. Lennard: And free distribution?

Mr. Cote: Yes, up to 2,500 copies.

Mrs. Fairclough: And that applies to semi-weekly and daily newspapers?

Mr. Cote: No; weekly.

Mrs. Fairclough: That is paid subscriptions only, is it?

Mr. Cote: Yes.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I should like to return to the matter I was discussing with the minister this afternoon. He has now had some time to consider what I was driving at. Perhaps he is now in a position to give me an answer.

Mr. Martin: Did you have dinner together?

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): No. I think the minister was busy—at least I hope so—with this particular problem. You will recall that I wanted to know what the actual figures were of profit and loss in connection with first-class mail. This afternoon the minister was only able to give me percentages. Is he now in a position to give me actual figures?

Mr. Cote: I gave the percentage before dinner, namely 2 per cent. In money it would amount to approximately $2,600,000.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Chairman, I disagree with the minister's calculation. Really, if the hon. gentleman can give me a percentage he can give me the figures, because that percentage is evolved from the figures.

Mr. Cote: I gave the percentage.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I am not interested in the percentage; I want the figures. I am arguing that you are making a $5 million profit, and I am prepared to put my figures on the record. The minister says he makes $2 million profit. I ask him to put his figures on the record. May I not have the figures?

Mr. Cote: I have already answered the question. If my hon. friend is not satisfied with the answer, I am sorry. I gave him 2 per cent; and the figure in money would amount to over $2,600,000.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Chairman, this 2 per cent is related to two figures, A and B. Let us be specific. I do not know what A and B are. I ask the minister this question. What is A and what is B? A-B is 2 per cent and it comes out at $2 million. What is A and what is B?

Mr. Winch: It sounds like the Social Credit A plus B theory.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Regier: I am still looking for the reason this new tax is to be imposed on the Canadian people. We are given two supposedly good reasons. One was that the 40-hour week was to be introduced. We are now finding that it is only a Liberal 40-hour week, and has no relation to what is looked upon as a 40-hour week by those who are concerned. The other reason was that we were losing money because the post office is no longer in receipt of revenue from sales of stamps used on cheques. When the Postmaster General was asked why the house was not informed at the time the cheque tax was removed as to how much loss there would be to the Post Office Department, the answer was that they were unable to estimate the amount.

To me this situation seems odd, because we have figures available. Someone said to me there is no question that officials of our Canadian government cannot investigate and find answers to. However, leaving that point aside, we have statistics showing how many cheques are cleared through the banks each year, and we also have statistics showing the sales of regular excise tax stamps. Taking one from the other, it seems to me, should have given us a fairly accurate picture of how much money the post office was going to lose. I repeat that I cannot see an argument for this new tax.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Deputy Chairman: Those in favour—

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, in closing the debate on second reading the Postmaster General extended an invitation to me in terms which I must confess are not very clear.

Mr. Knowles: That has been true of this whole debate, as far as the government is concerned.

Mr. Fulton: I am interested in anything that might throw some light upon whether or not the Post Office Department could save money and thereby eliminate—to an extent, at any rate—the necessity for this increase. I was referring to a report made by the civil service commission some four years ago and referred to in the Woods and Gordon report. I asked the Postmaster General if he would allow me to go and look at it. I suggested that if he would not allow me to go and look at it I must conclude that the reason was that there were some things in it which the government wished to suppress.

Mr. Martin: You are entitled to your own conclusions.

Mr. Fulton: In dealing with that request, as reported at page 1848 of Hansard, the Postmaster General said this:

> I want only to answer one question which was directed to me by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). He asked me if I would extend to him the same courtesy I extended to the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace. He knows I always try and will always endeavour to extend the same courtesy to every hon. member in this house; but he will not blame me if, from now on, I am very cautious of those who come into my office with a dictaphone machine during my absence.

Now that I have the opportunity of following up that matter, I should like to know whether the Postmaster General would permit me—with or without a dictaphone—to go into his office, examine that report, make extracts from it and refer to the extracts in debate in the house.

Mr. Cote: Mr. Chairman, the house has already refused the tabling of this report for any hon. member. Therefore I do not think it would be fair, just or constitutionally legal to show this report to one member only and not to show it to all the members.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps the Postmaster General would extend an invitation to all the members of the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: The house has already refused production of the report.

An hon. Member: The temporary Postmaster General.

Mr. Lennard: Now we know where we are.

Mr. Fulton: I do not know why the Secretary of State raises that issue. I do not want to be out of order. The Secretary of State keeps raising issues which would make us get out of order. I am not asking that the report be tabled. I am asking whether I can go to the Postmaster General's office and see the report, or whether he wants to keep it secret. If the minister wants to keep it secret, I want to know why he does not want anyone else to see it.

Mr. Cote: The answer is no, because I have not the right or the power to show this report to my hon. friend.

Mr. Fulton: That is a new doctrine, Mr. Chairman. The government refused or indicated to the house that—

Mr. Martin: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: You did not speed things up last time.

Mr. Martin: The house has already ruled that this document is privileged.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend is now seeking to undo that ruling. With great respect, Mr. Chairman, I would say that he is out of order in pursuing this subject.

An hon. Member: He is pursuing the minister.

Mr. Fulton: The Minister of National Health and Welfare is a good enough lawyer, I would have thought, to be able to appreciate the difference between the two projects. What I was asking on the former occasion was that the document be tabled in the house. The government took the position that it is a privileged document. I am not seeking to have that decision reversed at this time and the government, in fact, compelled to table it. But that does not mean to say the minister in whose possession the report is cannot allow an hon. member to go into his office and look at it.

Mr. Abbott: It would be most improper for him to do so.

Mr. Fulton: That is an entirely different matter. If the minister has reasons for not allowing us to look at it in his office, I should like to know them. What is there in the report that members of parliament should not see? This report was paid for with the taxpayers' money.

Mr. Knowles: Maybe there are some horses in it.

The Deputy Chairman: The Minister of National Health and Welfare was certainly correct in raising the point of order, at least to the extent that the hon. member is reviving a subject which has been fully debated, and voted on in the house. May I point out to the committee once again that, though not unanimously, the house passed the motion for second reading of this bill, thus adopting in principle the bill which we are discussing. Clause 1 of the bill, dealing with rates of postage on certain letters, is now before the committee for discussion.

Mr. Fulton: That is exactly what I am discussing. It was laid down at the outset of the debate that anything having a bearing upon the cost of the Post Office Department, the cost of giving service, was in order in discussing the reasons for the increase in rates that we are now specifically asked to vote.

In the course of the debate a report has been tabled which indicates that there is another report which recommends certain administrative changes in the Post Office Department. The terms of the Woods and Gordon report make it quite clear that in their opinion the implementation of this other report would have the effect of saving money. What I am asking is not that the house should reverse its previous decision as to the tabling of that report. All I am asking is whether a member of parliament can see that report, because it was compiled at the expense of the people of Canada. It deals with the administration of a department supported by the taxpayers of Canada, and I want to know what is in that report that the government and the Postmaster General will not let me see, and why it is that a member of parliament representing the taxpayers should not be allowed to see the report. There is nothing in those questions which seeks to reverse a previous decision of this house.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The question having been raised as a point of order, it is my ruling, from which I would remind the hon. member that he may appeal, that the hon. member is asking for a report the production of which has been discussed and voted on at this session, and that therefore the subject is not one which can be discussed at this stage of our discussion of the act to amend the Post Office Act.

Mr. Nicholson: With respect to the matter on which the hon. member for Winnipeg North tried to get some information, I now have the charts published a year ago in the annual report. One chart showing receipts gives the revenue from ordinary letters as 46 cents out of each dollar. Another chart showing disbursements has a figure of 29 cents for ordinary letters and 10½ cents for air mail, in connection with which I note there is a loss. However, adding the figures in the chart of receipts of 46 cents for ordinary letters and 5¾ cents for air mail, I get 51¾ cents out of every dollar. If you add the disbursement figures of 29 cents and 10½ cents you get 39½ cents. That means a profit of 12¼ cents on every dollar from the handling of first-class and air mail.

I wonder if the Postmaster General would explain why there has been such a deterioration in one year in the profit on the handling of first-class mail. On the basis of the figures presented a year ago it would appear that the handling of first-class mail resulted in a profit of $14,997,148.10. I think it would be helpful if at some point the Postmaster General could explain what, if anything, was wrong with these figures presented a year ago, and why there should be such a change in the relative position of ordinary mail in one year's time.

Mr. Winch: Why is there a difference of approximately $12 million in just over one year?

Mr. Cote: If my hon. friend will consider the receipts according to the revenue and expenditure chart he will see that the 6·7 per cent revenue for air mail has now totally disappeared. It is all gone.

Mr. Nicholson: But it would appear from these figures that there was a net of 12¼ cents out of every dollar on the handling of first-class mail and air mail combined.

Mr. Cote: But we are considering now conditions in the year to come, not in the year past.

Mr. Nicholson: But why in one year's time—

Mr. Cote: Because we will not have these revenues in the chart to the right, the 6·7 per cent. Those will disappear altogether.

Mr. Nicholson: I understand that the figures the Postmaster General gave the hon. member for Winnipeg North were based on the last year available. My question involves going back one year more and taking the figures that were presented in the annual report a year ago. At that time post office first-class mail apparently earned a net profit of 12¼ cents on each dollar. The difference is about $12 million. I wish the Postmaster General could explain why the profit on handling first-class mail was reduced by $12 million in one year.

Mr. Cote: I simply cannot figure something that I do not have for the coming year and that I did have last year.

Mr. Nicholson: I am using the annual report of the Postmaster General for the year ended March 31, 1952.

Mr. Cote: That is two years ago.

Mr. Nicholson: It would appear that the net profit on first-class mail was $14,997,148.10. The figure the Postmaster General gave the hon. member for Winnipeg North apparently was something over $2 million on his basis.

Mr. Winch: Under the same circumstances.

Mr. Nicholson: Under the same circumstances.

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Nicholson: The Postmaster General is trying to get an answer.

Mr. Cote: I can only reiterate the answer I have already given. The situation of two years ago does not apply because for the coming year we are losing entirely what we had two years ago.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): How did you lose $12 million in a year on the same service? Is there something wrong with the Post Office Department that there should be a $12 million loss? I do not think so. The minister has not answered the hon. member for Mackenzie at all. The minister told me that for the past year the profit on first-class mail was $2 million. The year before it apparently was about $14 million. Why was there this drop of $12 million? We are dealing with what has happened and therefore with facts. We are not dealing with the future.

Mr. Nicholson: The annual report a year ago contained this chart of the breakdown of the Canadian postal dollar into receipts from ordinary letters, air mail, newspapers and periodicals, printed matter, parcel post both domestic and foreign, registration, money orders and others. Apparently the post office has an efficient accounting system and was able to determine two years ago how much out of every dollar of revenue was applicable to each of these categories. Likewise disbursements are divided into ordinary letters, air mail, newspapers and periodicals, printed matter, parcel post both domestic and foreign, registration, money orders, free mail and others.

I think there should be some explanation. The last annual report contains a comparison of annual financial results for the past 20 years, and in only two of those years did the post office show a deficit. When this report was published apparently the surplus was over $6 million. I think there should be some explanation of why there was this drop in one year's time. Receipts from ordinary letters apparently were 46 cents out of every dollar and disbursements were 29 cents. On that item there is quite a marked difference. With respect to air mail, the figure for receipts was 5¾ cents and for disbursements 10½ cents. But if you take the two together the figure for receipts is 51¾ cents and the figure for disbursements is 39½ cents, or a difference of 12¼ cents which is profit. I have taken the figures on the previous page showing total revenue of $122 million, and if my arithmetic is not too far out it shows a profit of $14,979,000. There should be some explanation as to why that position has deteriorated by $12 million in one year.

Mr. Cote: I believe I have some figures which should satisfy the hon. member, if he recalls the chart which he saw before the recess. He will recall that we are going to lose between 46 and 47 per cent of the $7·5 million for excise stamps, which makes $3,600,000. We are going to lose also over 6 per cent of the whole revenue by dropping air mail fees which amounts to $7,930,000, making a total of $11,530,000.

Mr. Nicholson: The Postmaster General is not discussing my point. I am considering first-class mail, not the difference in regard to excise tax.

Mr. Cote: This all belongs to first-class mail, and in the breakdown it is all included in that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I wonder if one might break in and ask the minister a question which possibly he would not have such difficulty in answering. This is one of the things that shows the advantage of such a debate. It gives the people an opportunity to ask questions. I have just received a telegram from Prince Albert which was sent at 5.59 p.m., and which reads:

Our information Prince Albert not included in 40-hour week. Please protest.

I want to vary the order of things, Mr. Chairman, by making a protest and at the same time trying to secure some information. I understand that the reason for this pronounced elevation in the price of postage is the fact that the 40-hour week is to be instituted.

That is a major matter. Why are certain communities eliminated from this proposal? I appreciate the explanation that was given this afternoon that certain cities are eliminated because of the fact that industry has not adopted the 40-hour week. But surely that is not a reason for this elimination. Is it a fact that in Prince Albert and in various other cities in western Canada, postal workers are to be denied the advantage of this 40-hour week because industry has not seen fit to introduce this measure? Surely you are not going to raise postage all over Canada in order to benefit only certain postal workers.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

I wish the minister would give a full answer to this question. It is not a difficult problem. It does not require a knowledge of complex financial tables. It is a simple question. Why should the mail carriers and other postal employees in Prince Albert be denied equality in the matter of the 40-hour week? How many cities in Saskatchewan are in this position? How many in western Canada?

Mr. Knowles: This is a chance for the Minister of Finance to extend that list.

Mr. Diefenbaker: After all, Mr. Chairman, this elevation in the rate of postage is caused, we are told, by the introduction of the 40-hour week. This is a major consideration. Why should the matter be determined on a geographical basis? I should like a full answer. It does not require any study of statistics or the manipulation of figures or a knowledge of vast amounts. It is a simple question. Is there this discrimination? If so, why; and is it going to be alleviated?

Mr. Abbott: As an expert on the five-day week, Mr. Chairman, perhaps I might be able to enlighten the hon. member. As I have had occasion to say in this house on a number of occasions when announcing the introduction of the five-day week amongst the clerical grades of the civil service, the government's policy has been to introduce that practice in communities in which it is the prevailing practice amongst private employers; that is the rule. We do not lead the way in introducing the five-day week in communities, but we follow the practice of good employers there. This practice has been followed for the clerical employees.

The civil service commission and the personnel section of the treasury board are now studying the extension of the five-day week to post office employees. I am assuming a similar principle will be followed with respect to that class of government employees as is being followed with respect to clerical employees. I do not know about Prince Albert. I am hoping that the civil service commission will have at least a preliminary list available before very long. As I said before, it is a big administrative job to work this out for the post office. I do not know as yet whether Prince Albert is in or out. The principle is very simple.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is a complete lack of principle. If labour is entitled to this, it is entitled to it everywhere in Canada. If the 40-hour week is to be established, then why should it be within the power of any board, any minister or any group to determine that it shall apply here and not there?

Mr. Abbott: The civil service commission determines. It investigates and finds out what is the practice in the community.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not care whether or not the civil service commission determines it.

Mr. Abbott: You said a minister did.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, sometimes I wonder whether some of these commissions do determine things without the assistance or connivance of a minister.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend can turn around as rapidly as anybody else.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is quite all right. I am asking the Postmaster General whether or not he adheres to this principle that the five-day week should apply only in those particular communities where it is the practice?

Mr. Cote: On the basis of prevailing practice, and as already explained by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Abbott: It applies to the post office the same as to other government employees.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am asking on behalf of those employees who are requesting information. They ask why they should be discriminated against, why should it be determined that certain ones shall have this and not others, if the principle is good? I am asking the Postmaster General—after all, he is in charge of the department—whether or not he adheres to that belief or whether he is doing anything to assure that equality will be established in his department.

Mrs. Fairclough: Is the Postmaster General going to answer the hon. member?

Mr. Cote: He has already been answered.

Mrs. Fairclough: If no further answer is forthcoming, Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few remarks arising out of the statement made by the Minister of Finance.

I can understand that the minister would feel the government should follow the practice adopted in the various centres, without feeling that is necessarily fair to all employees in the government. Nevertheless, assuming that is the principle and that the government is following the lead of industry in these centres, I think that highlights a point which we made earlier today. If the government is following the lead of industry in instituting the five-day 40-hour week in the centres in which it is the practice, then why is it the government departs from the practice of industry and proceeds to make arrangements to hire casual labour to fill in the dead spot in the six-day week? Why not follow the practice of labour and rotate the staff, giving everyone an equal opportunity under this new scheme?

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I have been feeling somewhat sorry for the Postmaster General for some time, but never so sorry as when the Minister of Finance came to his rescue. I wonder whether the Postmaster General has been saying to himself, "God preserve me from my friends", because we have been told by the minister that he must increase the postal rates, first because of the removal of the three-cent excise tax on cheques. The Minister of Finance says, "Nonsense; that has nothing to do with it."

The only other argument of the Postmaster General was as to the implementation of the 40-hour five-day week. The Minister of Finance gets up and tells us, "Nonsense; we don't know yet how far that will extend." So just what has been the basis for the Postmaster General's figures?

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Hamilton: There was another figure the Postmaster General used on February 4, when in his remarks he said:

> —in presenting this report the firm of business consultants estimated that in terms of salaries and additional staff required, increased amounts of approximately $300,000 per annum at headquarters and approximately $400,000 in the field would be required if and when the recommendations were adopted—

That represents quite a sizeable amount in the post office budget. It might have a bearing on the increase. In the report to which the Postmaster General refers I can find no reference whatsoever to these figures. I was wondering whether the hon. gentleman would enlighten us as to where he got them, because I would like to have a chance to see whether they actually are available to the public generally.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mrs. Fairclough: The hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace asked a question, and I think he is entitled to an answer. If the minister does not intend to answer him, there are several of us who have other questions to ask.

Mr. Cote: If I may have a chance I will reply.

An hon. Member: Give him a chance.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Do it yourself, without the help of the cabinet, or you will not get along very well.

Mr. Knowles: Several of the ministers over there have not helped you out yet tonight.

Mr. Cote: The J. D. Woods and Gordon report made a few recommendations. The amounts indicated are as follows:

Estimated cost (per annum)
1 Director of personnel at $10,000	$10,000
Clerical stenographer	4,000
		$14,000
8 Chief superintendents at $9,000	$72,000
Engineering clerical assistance 8 at $3,000	24,000
9 Additional superintendents at $7,000	$63,000
Building division, methods and time study division, inquiries division, motor vehicle division, verification division, statistical and office services, personnel division, employee services division, staff training division.
Clerical and stenographic assistance at $3,000	27,000
		$90,000
2 Special investigators at $6,500		13,000
Methods and time study division:
4 Time study analysts at $6,000	$24,000
8 Time study analysts at $5,000	40,000
Clerical and stenographic assistance 12 at $3,000	36,000
		$100,000
Budgets and statistics, motor vehicle, personnel development and employee services divisions
15 at $3,000	$45,000
		$358,000
Field service
60 Area superintendents at $6,000		$360,000
3 Special investigators at $6,000		18,000
10 Personnel officers at $5,000		50,000
(Other positions will be filled by existing mail transportation officers—Public relations officers and inspectors.)		$428,000
14 Increase in salaries of district directors at $1,000		14,000

If my hon. friend goes back and reads the report again he will find that these figures are quite moderate. When J. D. Woods and Gordon said that in the long run we would make economies, they also said that we would have to spend a considerable amount of money in implementing these recommendations, and that only in years to come would we be able to improve the service and possibly make some economies. I presume that these details answer the hon. member's question.

Mr. Hamilton: I have been interested in the figures submitted by the minister. Are they his own calculations drawn from the report, or is this a statement that has been submitted to him by Woods and Gordon?

Mr. Cote: I shall quote from the summary of the report of J. D. Woods and Gordon. It states:

> One of the first steps should be the appointment of a personnel director. He should be supplied with a small staff possibly borrowed from some of the other branches and immediately undertake a study of the following matters:
> (i) Personnel available for immediate appointment to the new positions.
> (ii) Personnel who, after training, would be suitable for appointment to the new positions and the training they will require.
> (iii) What positions will have to be filled from outside the department.
> The various changes in organization suggested in the report are set out below by branches with comments as to the timing.
> Operations branch
> (a) Chief superintendent—engineering—A man should be obtained from outside the service to fill this vacancy. It can be filled as soon as a suitable candidate is available. There is no need to delay any other moves in the interval.
> (b) Mechanical engineering division—This position should be filled either from outside the service or possibly by one of the engineers from the major post offices. The balance of the staff should be recruited either outside or from within the department but at least one engineer should come from one of the major post offices. This division can be organized as soon as personnel are available.
> (c) Methods and time study division.—

I could read the whole report. I think this should answer my hon. friend. I do not want to annoy my hon. friend by reading the report, but what I summarized in my report was taken from the summary of J. D. Woods and Gordon themselves. We have quoted the amounts of money according to the civil service commission schedules and proper figures for this kind of work.

If my hon. friend insists I shall keep on reading. I could read six pages—

Mr. Hamilton: I am trying, sir, to understand clearly the words the minister used on February 4 when he said that a firm of business consultants estimated something. As I understand the reply of the minister now, they included in their report certain figures. He has added them up; he has correlated them, and he estimates that this is going to be the result. If that is so, I should like to know it, because this is something which is directly opposed to what he said in his original remarks when he said that this firm made this estimate.

Mr. Cote: The firm set up the positions, as I have already mentioned. The money figures were not given by J. D. Woods and Gordon, but they are figures which correspond to the positions suggested by J. D. Woods and Gordon.

Mr. Noseworthy: Before we pass on I wonder whether the minister will answer the question raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. Has the department given consideration to hiring one full-time regular employee for every five walks instead of taking on casual help? Has that been given serious consideration, or will it be given serious consideration?

Mr. Cote: I do not know whether I am in order, but I will answer the question in this way. We always consider all sides of any question. I may add that the casual workers we are employing are giving satisfaction, and we hope we shall have satisfactory service given under the scheme of the department which we have talked about today.

Mr. Noseworthy: I am not thinking so much of the attitude of the casual employees as I am of the attitude of the regular employees. What will be their attitude toward the department? I want to tell the minister, from what I know of post office employees, that the post office is considered one of the poorest employers of labour in this country. Only a year ago the whole service was disrupted by the change in daily deliveries, and you are going to disrupt again if you are going to take on casual employees.

Mr. Cote: I am very much surprised by what my hon. friend has just said, because on second reading he complimented the Post Office Department in laudatory terms. I remember having thanked him at the time. He is saying something different now. He may rest assured that we shall not overlook any suggestion. We are considering all suggestions made, and this is one of the problems that has taken up a lot of our time. But so far we have decided to do as I have already explained today.

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Chairman, I return to my original question. I know you did not see me rise to ask one more question; but I heard the Postmaster General say that the figures are not the figures of J. D. Woods and Gordon but they correspond to those in the report. Was that what the minister said?

Mr. Cote: No, I did not say that, Mr. Chairman. I said that J. D. Woods and Gordon have indicated the positions which were to be filled. The figures are not the figures of J. D. Woods and Gordon but are figures which are mentioned which would correspond with the jobs done by people who fill these positions.

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Chairman, the Postmaster General has just repeated his statement that the figures are not the figures of J. D. Woods and Gordon but they would correspond, and so forth. In other words, when the Postmaster General made the statement that the firm of business consultants estimated those salaries and so on, we now find that that was not strictly in accord with the facts. The Post Office Department took certain information and made their own estimate, Mr. Chairman, as I understand what the Postmaster General has just told us. I should like to know whether the hon. gentleman agrees with that, that he took certain figures from J. D. Woods and Gordon and made his own estimate. That is not quite what was said on February 4, at page 1765 of Hansard.

Mr. Cote: Mr. Chairman, I cannot give my hon. friend an understanding. J. D. Woods and Gordon indicated some jobs to be implemented in the Post Office Department. To those jobs corresponding amounts of money were assigned, which would have to be paid to fill the jobs. That is what I meant when I made the statement referred to by my hon. friend.

Mr. Lennard: I have a question to ask the minister in connection with third-class circular letters. Since they have been raised from one cent to two cents what is the profit or loss on the operation? I am not going to take my seat until I get an answer.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The hon. member expects a quick answer.

Mr. Lennard: While the minister is looking for the answer he is about to give, may I say that in the 15 years that I have been a member of parliament this is the first time I have ever seen from 12 to 15 cabinet ministers backing up a minister at this stage of a bill. It must be embarrassing. I might also say that every time one of them interjects something we go on for another 15 minutes.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Noseworthy: He needs their help.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): This is the longest speech I have ever heard the hon. member make.

Mr. Lennard: If the minister stays here he might hear some more.

Mr. Knowles: There is even somebody in the Prime Minister's seat.

Mr. Lennard: I am not one of those long-winded birds, but I do speak occasionally.

Mr. Cote: I am sorry to have to tell my hon. friend that circulars are not segregated. We have only the entire amount for the whole third-class mail.

Mr. Lennard: What are these figures?

Mr. Cote: The revenues are 15½ per cent and the expenditures are 12·25 per cent.

Mrs. Fairclough: Oh, Mr. Chairman; first of all we get percentages. Then when we ask for a further explanation of percentages we get dollars and cents, and then when we try to figure out the dollars and cents and percentages we are told that we are off the beam; we cannot calculate our percentages. It goes all the way from the $13 million profit on first-class mail which I calculated on the gross to the $5 million which the hon. member for Winnipeg North mentioned, down to $2 million which the minister insisted on.

Now we are back again on percentages. Can we not get down to any kind of a reasonable medium here? The hon. member for Wentworth asked the minister how much he made when he increased the second-class mail from one cent to two cents. What does 12·7 or 15½ per cent mean? How many dollars and cents?

Mr. Pearkes: What is your grandmother's age?

Mr. Lennard: Apparently they made money right along the line. There has not been one classification which has lost money, from what I have heard today.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, clause 1 has not been carried.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Hamilton East—

Mrs. Fairclough: West, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Knowles: Go west, Mr. Chairman.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, we seem to be getting no place fast.

Mr. Cote: How right you are.

Mrs. Fairclough: In fact, there are so many tag-ends left dangling it is hard to tell exactly where we are. I suspect we are no place at all. The last answer which the minister gave to the hon. member for Wentworth is either purposely misleading, which I hesitate—

Mr. Cote: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member should withdraw the word "purposely".

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I gladly withdraw. I am becoming so used to the thin skins of government members that I would hesitate to cause them any inconvenience or worry. If my remark does not meet with the minister's approval, then I am very sorry. I withdraw it. I must say, though, it amazes me—just amazes me—the things they can dish out and the things they cannot take. It seems to me we are getting—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It's wonderful to be a woman.

Mrs. Fairclough: It seems to me we are getting to be a very namby-pamby crew. When I read some of the Hansards of a few years ago—

An hon. Member: Wait until you read tonight's Hansard.

Mrs. Fairclough: —when the speeches were enlivened by odd pungent remarks, and I reflect on more recent proceedings, it seems to me this house is losing its character, particularly when members cannot indulge in ordinary remarks which are likely to slip out in the heat of debate without being called to order. One is continually circumscribed—

An hon. Member: Carried.

Mrs. Fairclough: No, don't get excited. The last objection is just typical, Mr. Chairman. I have been called many things in the course of my life and I cannot remember ever objecting too strenuously to them. I remember a man a few years ago who invented an automobile—

An hon. Member: A what?

The Chairman: Order.

Mrs. Fairclough: —and many things were said about that automobile. People referred to it as a little "tin Lizzie" and talked about parking it under the kitchen sink; but when these many and various remarks were brought back to him he said: "Pay no attention. Every knock is a boost." I believe that is perfectly true, and I can see no reason why gentlemen who are supposed to have the necessary experience to fit them for cabinet posts in this government should be so sensitive to the odd remark passed in this house.

I have no intention of digressing further from the bill itself. Here we have a bill which sets out to substantially increase the postal rates. There has been a great deal of talk about the one cent increase, but section

10 (a) of this bill sets out the provision that for each letter for delivery within the postal area in which it is posted there will be a charge of four cents for the first ounce or fraction of an ounce, and two cents for each additional ounce or fraction of an ounce.

The old rate was three cents for the first ounce and one cent for each additional ounce, so in this instance we have an increase of 33⅓ per cent on the first ounce, and on the second ounce we have an increase of 50 per cent in the postal rate. On the third ounce for local delivery we have an increase of 60 per cent. Now, Mr. Chairman, that is a sizeable increase which no one can shrug off.

If we go on to subsection (b) of section 10 we deal with letters posted within one postal area for delivery within another postal area. The rates here have risen from four cents for the first ounce plus two cents for each additional ounce to five cents for the first ounce plus three cents for each additional ounce. On the first ounce the increase in postage is 25 per cent and on the second ounce the increase is 33⅓ per cent. On the third ounce the increase in postage is 37½ per cent.

It seems very peculiar to me, Mr. Chairman, that on a simple little postcard, ordinary souvenir mail sent by many people to their friends as a token of esteem, there should be an increase in the rates of 25 per cent.

Mr. Knowles: 33⅓ per cent.

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes, an immediate increase of 33⅓ per cent. Earlier this evening the minister many times mentioned the matter of subsidization. I think it is about time we asked ourselves quite candidly who is being subsidized. The minister stood up in this house the other evening and in virtuous tones and high-flown language decried the tendency of opposition members toward subsidization. But this evening we heard from the hon. member for Vancouver East with regard to certain classes of mail which go free of charge. We have tried hard to nail down the actual profit made on first-class mail which would, if we could discover the actual amount, disclose the subsidy which is paid in the case of second and third-class mail.

Once more I must bring to the attention of this house the subsidization of various departments of government in the matter of free mail. I have mentioned it several times, and I am sure hon. members are tired of hearing it. I am tired of saying it, but I shall have to say it so long as this debate continues. We have the subsidization of the carriers, T.C.A. in particular, yet the minister stands up and in righteous tones says we should not have a subsidized mail service.

Mr. Chairman, if there is one section of our mail which is not subsidized, it is the first-class mail. The first-class mail is paying its own way. What happens to the rest of the mail I do not know. I have not been able to discover the answer to that question, and no other member of the house has been able to discover it. The fact of the matter is, however, that the first-class mail is paying its own way. Yet the proposal of this government is to increase the charges on the first-class mail in order to make it pay for the cost to the Post Office Department of the rest of the mail, the subsidy to T.C.A. and to all the other departments of government.

A couple of years ago the department decided to curtail the delivery service on residential walks, to one a day in urban centres. This curtailment was put into effect and we waited in vain to find out what the saving was. We never did find out whether or not there was any saving. As a matter of fact, in the first year of that operation it looked very much as though the government had lost money, what with the difficulties that were encountered, the extra equipment that was purchased particularly in the way of the storage bins which, I understand from the minister's remarks earlier, were confused with garbage tins, with the consequent result that mail was posted in garbage tins instead of in postage boxes; the adjustment of residential walks and the dislocation of business; the ultimate protests which came in and the endeavours to correct the situation, and subsequently the reversion in some areas to two daily walks. We never have been able to find out whether the department saved money or lost money. It is my opinion they lost money. It is my opinion that it was a glaring example of mismanagement. These are the things that we have known about and that have been thrown in our laps for some time. Now the department comes along and says, "We must have another cent an ounce on all first-class mail in order to pay the cost of the department". Why? Why on first-class mail?

An hon. Member: Why not?

Mrs. Fairclough: The first-class mail is the only mail which is really paying its own way, yet the department say they must have an increase with regard to that mail. Until such time as the Postmaster General has proved his case, and until such time as he can give the House of Commons the answers to questions which he has studiously avoided answering, I submit that we cannot support any increase in the rates on the first-class mail which is paying its own way. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, we shall continue to oppose this bill just as we have opposed it right along.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Coming into force.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Mr. Harris: No. Was the minister not going to move an amendment?

An hon. Member: He cannot move an amendment to his own bill.

Mr. Cote: Yes. We have received an application from the periodical press association. As the act now reads, the newspaper or periodical may mail a newspaper or magazine only at the place of its publication. It has been suggested to us—and some complaints have been received—that in some circumstances it would delay the reception of the newspaper or the magazine at some centres. For instance, if a newspaper in Toronto is ready for delivery at four o'clock—I am only giving a hypothetical example—and the train leaves at six o'clock, the paper would be delivered in London, for instance, or some other place, only very late that night or even the next morning. Hence the periodicals have made representations.

The last time they came to see us they asked if we could, in some circumstances, grant the right to mail at one or more points than the place of publication. It is another possible avenue of saving because we would, in these circumstances, be spared the transportation. We have no objection to the suggestion. I have had the officials of the department look into the matter and we would agree to the proposed amendment. Section 11 of the act now reads as follows:

11. (1) A newspaper or periodical that . . .
(d) is posted by the publisher within the postal area in which the place of its office of publication is situated;

It could be amended by substituting for paragraph (d) a paragraph which would read as follows:

(d) is posted by the publisher within
(i) the postal area in which the place of its office of publication is situated, or
(ii) some other postal area approved by the Postmaster General upon his being satisfied that the posting of the newspaper or periodical within such other postal area will promote greater convenience in the distribution thereof and that the application of this section to the newspaper or periodical when so posted will not adversely affect the postal revenues; and

Of course it is my bill, but if my colleague the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration will move the amendment I shall be obliged to him. It does not involve any money at all. It is only a minor amendment. It would have the effect of speeding the delivery of newspapers and periodicals. We have no objection to it.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. Harris: I so move. Will the minister circulate copies for the convenience of the opposition?

Mr. Cote: Yes.

Mrs. Fairclough: May I ask under which clause this amendment is being made?

The Chairman: Perhaps if I read the amendment it might be clearer to hon. members.

That clause 2 of Bill No. 168 be renumbered as clause 3, and that the following clause be inserted as clause 2:

2. Paragraph (d) of subsection (1) of section 11 of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(d) is posted by the publisher within
(i) the postal area in which the place of its office of publication is situated, or
(ii) some other postal area approved by the Postmaster General upon his being satisfied that the posting of the newspaper or periodical within such other postal area will promote greater convenience in the distribution thereof and that the application of this section to the newspaper or periodical when so posted will not adversely affect the postal revenues; and"

Mr. Knowles: After the other things that have happened in the course of this legislation being put through parliament, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that it is a piece of impertinence to offer this to us at this stage. In the resolution preceding the bill we had no indication that anything like this would be included. We had no suggestion at any point in the remarks of the Postmaster General that anything like this was up the government's sleeve.

As a matter of fact, from this side of the house we have had many complaints—from the hon. member for Winnipeg North and other members of this group in particular—against the leniency, latitude and subsidizing which has been accorded by the Post Office Department to the publishers of periodicals. We have felt that if any change was to be made in section 11 of the Post Office Act it should be to reduce the extent to which the post office is subsidizing newspapers and periodicals, and subsidizing advertisers in those newspapers and periodicals.

Instead of some attention being paid by the government to the arguments that have been made on the floor of the house, the minister now stands up seven minutes before we are to quit tonight and tells us that there have been representations, not from members of parliament, not from the people's representatives, but representations behind closed doors to cabinet ministers that something be done to make it still easier for the publishers of newspapers and periodicals.

Mr. Cote: It would save us some money.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): We do not have a copy of the amendment.

Mr. Knowles: Surely the minister's statement is one we should have the right to look into. The example the minister gave might be a case where some money would be saved. The Toronto Daily Star could use its own trucks to carry its papers to London, Ontario, or somewhere else, and I suppose the minister's argument is that the amount of handling by the Post Office Department might be reduced. But the result is that the Toronto Daily Star might be able to say to the people of London, Ontario, "We are going to get our paper to you that much quicker". Therefore they will be able to increase their circulation, and there will be more copies of that paper being put through a second post office at a subsidized rate. That is the kind of thing that can happen.

I submit that these newspapers are not making this request out of their desire to save money for the government, but are making it because it is something that will be to their advantage. I submit that it is an impertinence to present this amendment to the House of Commons at this stage of the debate. Did the matter just come to the minister's attention at supper time tonight? If not, why—

Mr. Cote: It was not requested by the newspapers at all. It was requested by the periodicals. It is merely a case of facilitating the circulation and transportation of the newspaper or magazine. As far as we are concerned it may be more advantageous to the department, because we will save some money. My friend should be logical. He suggested that we should save money on second-class mail. This is one case where he should see a way to save some money on second-class mail. This is a good occasion for him to indicate that he wants to save money on such mail. As far as we are concerned, we only want to facilitate and expedite newspapers and periodicals and at the same time not lose any money on transportation.

Mr. Knowles: The Postmaster General says that this request comes not from the newspapers but from the periodicals. I think he owes it to the house to tell us what periodicals have made this request. He is still telling us that there will be a saving to the government. I repeat my assertion that I am perfectly satisfied that the newspapers or periodicals have not made this request by reason of their desire to save money for the country, but have made it because it involves an advantage to them.

The Postmaster General tries to say that because we want to save money upon this class of mail we should accept his suggestion and the suggestion of the periodical publishers that this will do it. The hon. member for Vancouver East suggested one way in which this loss could be reduced. If the Postmaster General wants a further suggestion from me, may I say that I have read the whole of section 11 of the act, which is now before us if this amendment is in order, and there are rates in that section that should be increased. I contend that we are already losing too much in terms of post office revenue because of the way we are subsidizing newspapers and periodicals and in turn subsidizing advertisers in those newspapers and periodicals.

In view of the other things that have happened in the house today, and as no attention has been paid to requests from members on this side of the house with respect to section 11 of the act, I submit it is going a little bit too far at this hour to drag in such an amendment which is presented at the request of certain periodicals.

We are, of course, in a difficult position. My colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North has pointed out that we do not even have a copy of the amendment. The leader of the Social Credit group points out that they have not received a copy. The page boy said a moment ago that the Postmaster General had only two copies, and one had to go to Hansard and one to the chairman. Did the Leader of the Opposition get one? Well, he does get favours around here sometimes. But here we are being asked to discuss an amendment when only one or two people in the house have a copy of the amendment before them.

I submit that the very least the Postmaster General should do, the very least the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration as house leader should do—I see he is agreeing with me—is to agree to allow this matter to stand over until tomorrow. Perhaps I can move that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. Harris: We appreciate the assistance of the hon. member, but I hope we are still capable of running the government and the house. Nevertheless I quite agree that it would not be fair to expect hon. members to pass on the amendment without having an opportunity to see it. Had we reached this period a little earlier in the evening, and had there been some time available to look at it during the past hour, I might have suggested that we do as we did the other day, pass it in committee on the understanding that third reading would not be called. But there is not time to do that now.

My hon. friend asked one question. As I understand it, he wanted a list of the periodicals that had made representations. I believe the Postmaster General was on his feet two or three times in an effort to read them to my hon. friend, but the hon. member felt that he had other things to say in the meantime. If that is the case, I suggest that the Postmaster General might read the list for the information of hon. members, and then we could report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. Cote: Mr. Chairman, the requests were made by the periodical press association. Some of their magazines are Maclean's, New Liberty, Canadian Homes and Gardens.

Mr. Knowles: The association speaks on behalf of the whole group, does it?

Mr. Abbott: They have made representations to us for several years.

Mr. Knowles: We have been making representations on the floor of parliament for a long time.

Mr. Cote: Canadian Magazine, National Home Monthly—all the magazines which fall under the association.

Mr. Nicholson: Does it mention newspapers?

Mr. Knowles: Life, Time, Esquire?

Mr. Cote: Those are not Canadian magazines.

Mr. Abbott: They are part of the problem of Canadian magazines.

Mr. Knowles: Are we not to be given the entire list?

Mr. MacInnis: I think it would serve the purpose if the minister would have the list printed in Hansard and not read it in the house.

Mr. Cote: I will. It was the executives of the periodical association who came here. I think there were five or six of them. I could not give their names, but they were the executives of the periodical association.

Mr. MacInnis: Give us the names of the periodicals for which they were making representations.

Mr. Cote: I will.

Mr. Knowles: Let us get this clear, because we will have to deal with the matter tomorrow. These representations were on behalf of periodicals only.

Mr. Cote: Periodicals.

Mr. Abbott: This is of no value to daily newspapers at all.

Mr. Cote: The periodical press association, agricultural press, business newspapers association and magazine publishers' association.

Mr. Knowles: May I point out that the terms of the amendment would extend this privilege to newspapers as well as periodicals.

Mr. Cote: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: The Minister of Finance does not seem to realize that.

Mr. Abbott: It is of no benefit to newspapers.

Clause stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, we shall call third reading of the amendment to the Senate and House of Commons Act first tomorrow. Then we shall continue with this debate. If we have concluded it by four o'clock, we shall call the amendment to the Salaries Act. If we have not, we shall go on with the resolutions in the names of the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Fisheries, and follow the program I laid out on Friday night.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, February 9, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

TRADE

CONTINUANCE OF WEST INDIES TOKEN IMPORT PLAN

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a short announcement. I am glad to be able to announce that confirmation has been received from London that the West Indies token import plan is being continued for 1954. I also have word that a number of commodities of importance to Canadian trade are being added to those on open general licence in the West Indian colonies.

The list of commodities on open general licence will include: newsprint; kraft paper; dried, smoked, pickled and salted fish; onions; potatoes; cheese; powdered and canned milk; split peas; meats; canned fish. Animal feeds are also on the list except in British Guiana.

Several of these items were previously traded under token import plan vouchers in the colonies. They will now be unrestricted and vouchers will not be needed for them.

The West Indies token import plan is playing a valuable part in keeping Canadian brand names before the public in the colonies, and in holding a place in those markets for Canadian goods until the trade need no longer be restricted. The transfer of commodities from the plan to open general licence is an encouraging sign for the future.

Full details of these changes are being given to the trades concerned by my departmental officers.

THE ARCTIC

STATEMENT AS TO RESUPPLY OF WEATHER STATIONS

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a short statement on the Arctic weather stations.

On March 4, 1947, announcement was made in the house that the Canadian and United States governments had decided to establish weather stations in the Canadian Arctic which were to be operated jointly by the Canadian meteorological service and the United States weather bureau. It was then announced that the Canadian government would supply the required establishments and that the United States would furnish necessary water and air transportation.

That year a United States task force, sailing from Boston on July 15 and consisting of two icebreakers and a supply ship, made their way to Resolute bay on Cornwallis island and to Eureka sound on Ellesmere island. Weather stations were established at these two points. Since then three additional joint Arctic weather stations were established and have been in operation on a 24-hour day ever since. All these joint weather stations are located in the area now designated as Queen Elizabeth islands. For the first few years, the resupply of these Arctic stations was carried out from Resolute by the United States army air force but this airlift has gradually been taken over by the R.C.A.F.

With respect to transportation by sea to these Arctic outposts, Canada has been able to supplement the work of the United States task force during the last two summers. In 1952 the Department of Transport's Arctic supply ship, the C.G.S. C. D. Howe, delivered considerable supplies to Resolute; and last summer the department's new icebreaker, the C.G.S. d'Iberville, contributed greatly to the resupply of this main weather station.

It is my pleasure to be able to inform the house that this year, Canada will be able to assume full responsibility for the resupply of all but one of the joint Arctic weather stations. My department will, this summer, send up a task force consisting of two icebreakers, the department's Arctic supply ship, the C. D. Howe, a commercial dry cargo vessel and a commercial tanker.

The departmental vessels will be carrying out this special work in addition to their regular duties in Arctic and sub-Arctic waters. The icebreakers used will include the d'Iberville, N. B. McLean and Edward Cornwallis.

The C.G.S. C. D. Howe will carry out, as in previous years, the supplying of government outposts along the coasts of Baffin island, lower Ellesmere island as well as Resolute where she will rendezvous with the task force.

C.G.S. d'Iberville will be the commodore ship of the task force and will accompany the commercial dry cargo vessel and tanker to Resolute. Last year this new icebreaker opened a new R.C.M.P. post at Twin Glaciers, half-way up the eastern shore of Ellesmere island. This year, ice conditions permitting, d'Iberville is scheduled to travel up the west coast of Ellesmere to Eureka sound and will also carry out resupply work to other Arctic posts, including Craig harbour.

The joint Arctic weather station at Alert on the northernmost tip of Ellesmere island will be resupplied by the United States task force which will be servicing American establishments in Greenland.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister a question arising out of his statement? Are there any other Arctic weather stations in contemplation?

Mr. Chevrier: None other than these five.

FISHERIES

PURCHASE OF BRITISH COLUMBIA CANNED SALMON BY BRITISH GOVERNMENT

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a short statement on the sale of Canadian canned salmon to the United Kingdom. Before the war a large part of the annual British Columbia pack was sold in the United Kingdom. During the war years almost the entire pack was sent to Britain. In the post-war years, however, the British found it increasingly difficult to find the dollars necessary for such purchases and so sales declined. In 1952 the British bought no Canadian salmon, and it looked as though there would be no British purchases in 1953.

When the Right Hon. R. A. Butler, Chancellor of the Exchequer, was in Ottawa last spring, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and I raised the matter with him. He eventually agreed to allocate $4¼ million for salmon purchases, which bought 205,000 cases. At the time he expressed the hope that the fishing industry would try to buy more British goods to enable Britain to earn the dollars to finance such purchases.

I repeated his words here in the House of Commons last spring, and I am glad to say that the fisheries association of British Columbia took immediate action on this suggestion. A committee was formed which canvassed every branch of the industry to see how British purchases could be increased. By August of last year this committee had prepared an order for $4½ million of new British purchases of tin-plate, mechanical equipment for plants and boats, and fishing gear.

The committee felt that there might be more equipment available in Britain than they knew about, so early in September Mr. Kenneth Fraser, manager of the Imperial Cannery, was sent to England to visit the British manufacturers. At the end of September a trade delegation consisting of Mr. H. R. MacMillan, chairman of the board of B. C. Packers, Mr. John Buchanan, president of B. C. Packers, Mr. Roger Hager, president of the Canadian Fishing Company and myself went to London.

We found that Mr. Fraser had done a splendid job and had found a great deal of other first-class British equipment, competitive in price. Mr. MacMillan was so impressed that he wired back to Vancouver to have the purchasing agent of his logging enterprises come to Britain for a similar survey.

The delegation had wisely decided not to try to link their British purchases with any conditions for the sale of salmon, so there was no suggestion of barter or any quid pro quo arrangement. We did feel, however, that the British government should know of the way the industry was trying to help the British earn dollars. We first met the Right Hon. Lloyd George, minister of food, and found him most sympathetic. He told us that he had great demand from the British people for much more British Columbia salmon and would be happy to provide it if the dollars could be found. We next met the Right Hon. Peter Thorneycroft, president of the board of trade, who was most impressed with the action taken to increase the sale of British goods in Canada. He was pleased too that the delegation had found so wide a range of first-class equipment available at competitive prices. He felt it was the first time that a whole industry had made a deliberate effort to help the British to earn more dollars.

Finally, our high commissioner in London, Mr. Norman Robertson, and I met the chancellor. He was frankly delighted that his suggestion of the spring should have brought such positive results. He told us that, while it was not possible for him to allocate dollars for salmon purchase in the fall months because of other commitments, he would try to make dollars available in the spring.

I went on to attend the Colombo plan meetings in New Delhi, but the rest of the delegation spent another three weeks in Britain arranging for purchase of this equipment. The British press gave very favourable comment on the purpose of the mission. Perhaps I can quote one paragraph of a speech made on December 2 by the Right Hon. Derick Heathcoat-Amory, minister of state, to show the impression made on the British cabinet. He said:

> We welcomed very much a mission that came over here recently from the fishing industry of British Columbia. Here is a case where a whole Canadian industry recognized in a very practical way the value of increasing trade between our two countries. They came to see what the United Kingdom could offer in the field in which they were interested. When they went away, they seemed to be impressed with all they had seen—the wide range of goods that were of interest, from ships' chandlery to diesel engines, and they found us to be up to date and our prices competitive. They returned full of enthusiasm and important orders look like materializing which may run into several millions of dollars. Here I suggest is one more nail in the coffin of the myth that the United Kingdom only produces luxury goods at high prices. We would welcome immensely other missions of the same kind.

Two weeks ago the British government informed us that a bulk purchase of salmon would be made this month. While the amount was not made public, it is considerably larger than last year's purchase. A representative of the British ministry of food is now in Vancouver negotiating the purchase. In view of this happy outcome I can assure you that the fishing industry of British Columbia will continue to press its "Buy British" campaign.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I feel sure that all members on both sides of the house will welcome any evidence showing that trade can be increased with Britain, which has been both an exporter to Canada and a customer of ours for so many years. I also feel sure there will be many members of the house who will welcome whatever action the government has taken although it was limited in this particular case because it was primarily the industry that carried out the negotiations. Nevertheless hon. members will welcome such participation of the government as has taken place because of the fact that we have been urging for some considerable time that the government should do this very thing, and this is the first evidence we have seen that they have followed the advice we have given them.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

TABLING OF ORDER FOR RETURN RESPECTING FERTILIZER

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am tabling a return about fertilizer.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Knowles: Is that from the Liberal platform?

Mr. Fulton: I can think of no more fitting source for a return of that kind.

RIPPLE ROCK

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PROPOSED TUNNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the national research council recently received a report from the engineers who are examining the possibility of a tunnel under Ripple rock in Seymour narrows on the west coast? If so, could the minister make a statement?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the direct answer is no. However, the situation is that, as originally planned, a drill hole has been made from the shore to directly under the rock. The drill cores are now being examined by government geologists. A preliminary report merely showing the location of the drill hole has been received by the national research council. No information has been received on the results of the examination of the cores. It is expected that the examination will take the better part of two months and at that time we expect to have a report on this aspect of the problem.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

IMPLEMENTATION OF PROPOSALS RESPECTING EMPLOYABLE UNEMPLOYED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Has the government taken any steps in the present unemployment situation to implement the promise it made in August, 1945—I refer to the green book proposals—to look after employable unemployed not covered by unemployment insurance or whose unemployment insurance has been exhausted?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): The question of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway opens up a subject that has caused a great deal of discussion in days gone by. Although I was not here in 1945 I do know, as I am sure my hon. friend knows, that the proposals in the so-called green book were never incorporated in agreements between the federal and the then nine provincial governments. I am not going to discuss that topic at all. But since 1945 a great deal of water has run under the bridge with respect to this question. For instance, in my own department we have since that time improved the benefits of unemployment insurance. We established supplementary benefits. We improved those supplementary benefits, extended the period of time, and in other ways have done things to help to cope with seasonal unemployment periods such as we are now experiencing.

[Later:]

Mr. MacInnis: I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Labour. Without questioning what he has said, when he spoke here on Monday, the 26th of January, I think it was, he said that there was a residual problem and that the most effective way of solving it was through the joint efforts of the provincial and municipal governments and the federal government. Are any such efforts being made at the present time? Has the federal government taken the initiative in the matter?

Mr. Gregg: Offhand, Mr. Speaker, I can think of one which has been announced by my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and which will have the effect of helping to relieve the burden of unemployment in municipalities. I refer to his federal-provincial pension plan devised to help unemployable or disabled persons.

[Later:]

SUGGESTED PLACING OF GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS IN SURPLUS LABOUR AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Is the minister's department familiar with defence mobilization manpower policy No. 4 of the United States? If so, has any study been given to placing industrial and government contracts in areas where there is a surplus of labour, as is being done in the United States?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): The hon. member kindly sent me notice of his question. Officers of my department are familiar with defence mobilization manpower policy No. 4 of the United States, and have discussed with the officials of the office of defence mobilization of the United States the way this policy has been operating both before and after their revised policy which was issued in November, 1953.

Hon. members will appreciate that there are important differences between the defence production programs in the United States and in Canada, the extent to which the facilities for defence production are distributed throughout the country, and other factors, and there are definite limitations to the extent to which such a policy could be applied in Canada. The general question of decentralization of defence production has been raised in the house on a number of occasions, and has been discussed by my colleague, the Minister of Defence Production.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Supplementary to the question asked by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, in view of the fact that the minister feels the policy being followed in the United States cannot be implemented in this country, can the minister tell the house whether or not the government is considering extending the available unemployment insurance benefits to workers in those areas or in industries such as textiles or farm machinery where unemployment is more than seasonal in nature?

Mr. Gregg: The unemployment insurance benefits are applicable to those industries which the hon. member mentioned just now.

SHIPPING

INQUIRY AS TO SERVICE BETWEEN WEST INDIES AND CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. It arises out of his statement with reference to West Indies trade which we were very pleased to hear. Will the Canadian National Railways boats that formerly operated between the West Indies and Canadian ports be again put into operation on this trade route?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Last year or the year before we decided to withdraw the "Lady" boats, but I think it is the intention of Canadian National Railways to operate the ten or twelve cargo ships still remaining in 1954.

Mr. Brooks: The "Lady" boats are not being put on again?

Mr. Chevrier: The "Lady" boats have been sold.

WEATHER SHIPS

INQUIRY AS TO CONTINUED OPERATION OF STATION "PETER"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport arising out of the statement he made. Will Canadian weather ships maintain their operations at station "Peter" in the Pacific, although United States weather ships are reported to have withdrawn from that Pacific station?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The question which the hon. member asks me, Mr. Speaker, has nothing to do with the statement I made earlier. However, I shall be glad to answer his question. The question has to do with a weather ship in the Pacific ocean, and I was dealing with weather stations on the Queen Elizabeth islands. The answer to the question is that we have not decided to withdraw the operations at station "P" in the Pacific. On the contrary, it is our intention to carry on that operation and I think, although I speak from memory now, provision is made in the estimates for this fiscal year for the operation of that station.

ARMED FORCES

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF ALLEGED REPORT FOR REFORMING RESERVE ARMY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. L. Jones (Okanagan Boundary): Has the attention of the Minister of National Defence been drawn to a statement by Arthur Blakely in today's Montreal Gazette that a top secret report outlining methods for reforming the reserve army may eventually be made public? Can the minister inform the house as to the date on which this report will be tabled?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Yes; I have seen the statement and I can tell the hon. member and the house that it is not likely the statement to which he is referring will eventually prove to be true. This was the subject of a statement I made to the house on January 25, 1954, and a press release, to which I have nothing to add at this time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ALLEGED LACK OF CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY—STATEMENT BY PARLIAMENTARY ASSISTANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the minister of external affairs. Did the parliamentary assistant state that Canada is not possessed of full and complete sovereignty, as indicated in a report of his speech in Montreal on Friday night? If so, in what respect do we lack sovereignty?

Mr. Speaker: I do not think the hon. member should reply to questions in this house concerning statements he has made outside the house. If the question related to a statement made by a cabinet minister it might be different, but I doubt very much whether we should initiate a procedure here whereby a member is to be asked whether he made certain statements in speaking outside this house at a public meeting. If the hon. member wishes to reply, of course, I leave it up to him.

Mr. Fulton: On the point you have raised, Mr. Speaker, may I point out that it is not like asking a private member, which I agree would not be in order. This is a question directed to a parliamentary assistant to a minister in connection with a matter which touches on the responsibility of the department to whose minister he is assistant. I believe the house is entitled to information on the subject with which the parliamentary assistant was dealing.

Mr. Pouliot: The Tories have a colonial mind.

[Later:]

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, without in any way transgressing the ruling which you made a moment ago when the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) asked his question, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) whether the speech in question of his parliamentary assistant was brought to his attention, and what if anything the government intends to do in order to achieve what the parliamentary assistant described as full Canadian sovereignty.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member should look at Beauchesne's third edition, citation 295 (z) which states:

> A question, oral or written, must not refer to speeches made outside the house; but in the case of cabinet ministers it is permissible to ask Prime Minister whether such speech represents policy of government.

The hon. member is quite right in asking the question he asked, but I think he ought to put the question in a different way, and ask whether or not the policy of the government is to such and such effect.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If I may speak to the point of order, I think the rule was made before we had this system of parliamentary assistants. I can scarcely believe that it would ever have contemplated that they speak without responsibility.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member is quite right, but I suggest his question might be directed to the minister to whom the hon. member is parliamentary assistant, and that it might be in the following terms: Was the parliamentary assistant, speaking on such a date, speaking with the authority of the minister, or was he stating government policy?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I find difficulty in drafting the question properly. May I ask the minister this question. Did the parliamentary assistant to the minister speak with the authority, connivance or knowledge of the minister?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would assume that that is a quite improper question, but possibly I might reply in this way: The parliamentary assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs remains a private member, and has all the rights of a private member, and spoke as a private member in making this statement.

Mr. Pouliot: That should be interesting to the advocate of the four freedoms.

WATER POLLUTION

NORTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—ALLEGED KILLING OF FISH

Mr. A. M. Campbell (The Battlefords): Has the Minister of National Health and Welfare received a reply from the minister of public health in Alberta to the telegram which was read in the house yesterday? If so, will he indicate the nature of the reply?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The hon. member was kind enough to give me notice of his intention to ask this question. About an hour ago the deputy minister of health in Alberta acknowledged receipt of the telegram in a telephone conversation he had with the deputy minister of national health and welfare, and on behalf of the government of Alberta he expressed his appreciation of the further offer of co-operation which had been projected by the federal government. Since that time we have made arrangements to send out additional officers, notably in the chemical division of the health engineering division of the department. I may say also that I was talking to the minister of health in Saskatchewan, who expressed similar appreciation.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Is the Minister of Veterans Affairs in a position to say whether or not it is the intention of the government to set up a special committee on veterans affairs at this session of parliament?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): The matter is being considered at the present time. I hope to make an announcement in the near future.

CANCER

RESEARCH INTO RELATION BETWEEN SMOKING AND LUNG CANCER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare? My question is based on a press report published recently, a copy of which I sent to the minister, referring to Dr. Alton Ochsner's statement as to a definite association between cigarette smoking and lung cancer. Can the minister say whether his department will consider having research in Canada conducted into this question directly rather than on the side, as he indicated to me on December 16 last?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): That consideration is now under way.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

INQUIRY AS TO PROVISION IN ESTIMATES FOR COMMENCEMENT OF WORK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport? Will the minister comment on the report in the Montreal Gazette this morning to the effect that the government is making no provision in the estimates for starting work on the St. Lawrence seaway this year? I sent the minister a copy of the report.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I thank the hon. member for sending me notice of this question. I saw the report in the Montreal Gazette, and as usual, or, perhaps to be fair, as sometimes happens in the case of this reporter, it is inaccurate. In December, 1951, this parliament passed an act, the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act, authorizing the expenditure of up to $300 million. This act is not yet proclaimed, but will be proclaimed when the time comes; and the expenditure is provided there, so an item in the estimates is not required for that purpose.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE SALARIES OF SPEAKERS AND DEPUTY SPEAKER, SESSIONAL ALLOWANCES OF MEMBERS, ETC.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (for the Prime Minister) moved the third reading of Bill No. 171, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I hear expressions of impatience on the part of those members who have indicated their impatience on earlier occasions in regard to this same measure.

I rise now simply to deal with two statements which I could have dealt with on a question of privilege but which, it seems to me, might properly be dealt with at this time. Our position in regard to this measure was fully, clearly and definitely stated in the debate on second reading, where we have dealt with this subject by vote. But I do wish at this time to deal with two statements that have been made.

I read in one periodical publication a statement that prior to the presentation of this measure in parliament I had privately indicated my support of the measure. I wish to say with the utmost emphasis that the statement made in the periodical containing that statement is wholly untrue. I wish to make it definite and to say with the utmost emphasis that I have never at any time, in private conversation or by any private exchange of opinions, taken any position different from that which I took when the measure came before the house.

Then I find also it has been said that I was consulted in regard to this, and that because of certain considerations I withdrew from a position I indicated I might take. Under the rules of parliament it is difficult to deal with a statement of that kind in adequately effective terms. Nevertheless I simply wish to say again with the utmost emphasis that this statement that has been made, and has been repeated, is utterly untrue.

I thought it had been disposed of by the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) when he made it clear that the government had taken full responsibility, and that there had been no discussion of any kind in regard to this measure. I wish to place it on record very definitely that until I was informed by the Prime Minister, as a matter of courtesy, just before the motion was placed on the order paper, that it was going to be done, I had no idea what this bill contained. And I am perfectly certain that the leader of the C.C.F. party and the leader of the Social Credit party are in precisely the same position.

Mr. Coldwell: The Prime Minister said so.

Mr. Drew: The Prime Minister made that clear in the house, and made it definite; but I wish to go still further and say that I did not, either directly or indirectly, discuss this matter with the Prime Minister, with any member of the government or with anybody acting on their behalf or purporting to act on their behalf.

I hope this will dispose of the kind of smart statements that seem to be regarded as appropriate reporting by some of those who fail to take note of definite statements made in parliament with the degree of seriousness they deserve. Those statements should not be made unless these people are prepared to check the facts and to afford to both sides an opportunity to indicate what the facts really are.

I hope I have made this perfectly clear. Without reservation of any kind I wish to repeat what I said to the Prime Minister when he was here. At no time had he indicated to me in any way what the contents of this bill would be until he informed me of the general provisions just before the motion was placed on the order paper. And even at that time I did not see the bill, nor did I know the exact details it contained.

My position in this matter was stated clearly on second reading, when the principle of the measure was voted upon. I wish to point out again that at that time we were not voting merely on any one particular increase in allowances; we were voting on the principle of the increase in all the allowances contained in the measure. I made it clear that it was to that rolled-up package I objected. I still object; I still am opposed to this bill and for the reasons I have fully stated. I regret very much that the government has not seen fit to accept either of the two suggestions I made that this bill should be referred to a royal commission or to a select committee appointed for the particular purpose of dealing with this measure, which would have no power, no authority in either case, except to inquire into the facts and to make its recommendations to the government for subsequent submission to parliament.

Since I have dealt with this on principle and have stated my position, I wish to indicate that I do not feel there is any occasion to add anything further to what I hope will leave no doubt at any time about my position in regard to this measure in the way in which it has been presented to the house.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question? Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Knowles: No.

And more than five members having risen:

POST OFFICE ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE POSTAGE ON LETTERS AFTER APRIL 1, 1954

The house resumed, from Monday, February 8, consideration in committee of Bill No. 168, to amend the Post Office Act—Mr. Cote—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 2—Coming into force.

The Chairman: When the committee rose previously we were considering an amendment proposed by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I submit to you that the amendment moved by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is clearly out of order. I base my submission on two main grounds. The first one is that it contravenes the rules concerning amendments. The second ground is that, as this bill is a money bill, the amendment, which I submit will possibly result in the imposition of a charge on the Canadian people, should have been contemplated by the terms of the resolution which was considered in committee of the whole before the bill was introduced, and that the present amendment clearly exceeds the terms of the resolution which received the approval of the committee of the whole.

In connection with the first ground, Mr. Chairman, I submit that the amendment offends in three ways the rules regarding amendments. First, it offends in that it is not really an amendment; second, it is not relevant; and, third, it offends in that it raises new matter which can only be raised by a distinct motion after notice. We have not had any notice.

I would direct your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that what we are asked to do here is as follows, and I am reading from the amendment as reported at page 1902 of Hansard:

> That clause 2 of Bill No. 168 be renumbered as clause 3, and that the following clause be inserted as clause 2 . . .

Then follows the detail of that proposed clause 2. I shall not read that at the moment although I shall have occasion to do so later. I submit to you that that is not, in fact, an amendment to clause 2 at all. I think it is important for us to realize the position we are in or were in prior to the moving of this amendment. The question before the committee was "Shall clause 2 of the bill carry"? Clause 2 reads as follows:

> This act shall come into force on the 1st day of April, 1954.

That is clause 2. The question before the committee was that clause. The amendment does not seek to amend clause 2. It seeks to delete it altogether and to substitute some other proposition. In that connection I would refer you to Beauchesne, third edition, page 129, rule 48:

> When a question is under debate no question is received unless to amend it; to postpone it to a day certain; for the previous question; for reading the orders of the day; for proceeding to another order; to adjourn the debate; or for the adjournment of the house.

Then there are laid down clear rules as to what constitutes an amendment and it is stated that a mere negative does not constitute an amendment. What we are asked to do here is not to amend clause 2 of the bill in order to substitute some other date for the coming into force of this act; what we are asked to do is to delete clause 2 altogether and to substitute something else for it.

Turning to the other grounds in connection with this matter of whether or not it offends the rules with regard to amendments, Mr. Chairman, I refer you to citation 344 of Beauchesne's third edition, at page 136, which reads as follows:

> It is an imperative rule that every amendment must be relevant to the question on which the amendment is proposed. Every amendment proposed to be made either to a question or to a proposed amendment should be so framed that if agreed to by the house the question or amendment as amended would be intelligible and consistent with itself.
> The law on the relevancy of amendments is that if they are on the same subject-matter with the original motion, they are admissible, but not when foreign thereto. The exceptions to this rule are amendments on the question of going into supply or ways and means.

This not being a motion to go into supply or ways and means, that exception does not apply. I therefore submit that this amendment clearly contravenes that rule on the relevancy of amendments which says that if they are on the same subject matter with the original motion they are admissible, but not when foreign thereto. What we are asked to do here is to substitute for clause 2, which concerns the date of the coming into force of the act, a new clause which deals with the question of postal rates applicable to magazines and newspapers. There could not be anything much more foreign to the subject matter of the original proposed clause 2. It therefore seems to me that the amendment is clearly out of order on the ground of relevancy.

May I also refer you, Mr. Chairman, to citation 354 of Beauchesne's third edition, which reads as follows:

> An amendment setting forth a proposition dealing with a matter which is foreign to the proposition involved in the main motion is not relevant and cannot be moved.

Again the motion before the committee is: "Shall clause 2 carry?" The Postmaster General now asks us not to carry clause 2 dealing with the subject of the coming into force of the act but to change it altogether and to carry an amendment which deals with the question of postage rates on magazines and periodicals.

Then the third ground on which I say the amendment offends the rule regarding amendments is that it raises new matter. In the first place, I have submitted that it is not an amendment at all. In the second place, I have submitted that it is not relevant. In the third place I now come to the proposition that it raises new matter which can only be moved by a distinct motion after notice. I refer you, Mr. Chairman, to citation 355 at page 139 of Beauchesne's third edition which cites the precedent as follows:

An amendment was ruled out because it raised a new question which could only be considered on a distinct motion after notice.

Beauchesne there cites as his authority the Commons Journals, volume LXVI, pages 109-11, where the proposition was laid down in the house in February, 1929. I am not going to read the lengthy record as it appears in the Journals at pages 109 to 111, but I respectfully suggest, Mr. Chairman, that if you will refer to that authority you will see that the proposition there set forth—and, I might say, always since accepted by the house—is authority for the point that I now put forward in opposition to this amendment.

I realize that from time to time amendments have been made in this manner in committee on a bill. For instance, I recall the amendment made just recently to the Senate and House of Commons Act where a new section was included; but I point out to you, Mr. Chairman, that that was done by unanimous consent. Here unanimous consent was not asked for and I want to make it quite plain that unanimous consent is certainly not being given.

Then I should like to deal for a moment or two with the logic behind the situation. Here, for nearly a week we have been considering amendments to the Post Office Act which are confined to the question of letter mail. The reason for the rule that new matter can only be raised by a distinct motion after notice is to avoid the house's being taken by surprise and being asked to make up its mind on a question which has never been before it and about which it has had no opportunity for reflection.

That is exactly the ground on which the original authority was decided, the case I have referred to at pages 109 to 111 of the Journals of 1929. Here we were asked to consider the question of letter rates, an increase in the postage on letters. It is true that we dug out of the Postmaster General yesterday that there was also going to be an increase on postcards. But, sir, we had no indication at any time previously that the house was going to be asked to amend the Post Office Act with respect to the facilities extended to those who use the post office for posting periodicals and newspapers. There is indeed some question in the government's mind as to whether this provision will extend to newspapers.

I am dealing with the logic of the situation. We are asked to deal with a new matter which was introduced at five minutes to ten last night. The government itself does not even know what the effect of the amendment will be, as is obvious from the interchange which took place as recorded in Hansard for yesterday. I am not going to deal with that at length. I expect that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will have something to say about it. But it does establish clearly that there is disagreement between the ministers as to the effect of this amendment.

Furthermore, I can only suggest, if this matter was so late in coming to the attention of the government that they could not deal with it until five minutes to ten last night when they presented us with an amendment of which they only had two copies, with the result that the Leader of the Opposition and the Postmaster General were the only ones who had one, that nothing could establish more clearly that it not only is a contravention of the rules regarding amendments to present this to us at that time, but that it would most definitely and improperly take the house by surprise to be asked to deal with it. Apparently it was a last-minute decision on the part of the government to introduce it. They did not mind springing it on the house as a surprise, but I want to make it perfectly clear that we are fed up with the way in which this bill has been handled and the way in which we have been confronted with a constant series of surprises.

Although in some circumstances we might have been disposed to give unanimous consent to introducing this amendment at this stage, it has now been made clear that the government is exceeding the limits of all propriety, and we are going to insist that for a change the government abide by the rules which are in force for the conduct of the business of the house.

I come to the question of the second ground upon which I claim the amendment is out of order. What we have before us is a money bill, and an amendment to enlarge its terms is out of order unless it was contemplated in the terms of the resolution which preceded the bill. I am not going to go into the arguments, which are quite extensive, as to whether or not it is a money bill. I simply point out to you, Mr. Chairman, that the government has itself accepted the proposition that it is a money bill because they introduced it by way of a resolution. I accept that proposition. I point out further that a money bill is not only one which deals with ways and means but, for the purposes of this rule, is one which imposes a charge upon the people. Because this measure raises the postage rates and thus imposes a charge upon the people, I assume it was on those grounds that the government decided it was a money bill and dealt with it as a money bill. I quite agree that that was a sound decision.

This proposed amendment was not hinted at in any way, shape or form in the resolution which preceded the bill. I should like to read that resolution. It is as follows:

That it is expedient to amend the Post Office Act to increase the rates of postage on letters posted in Canada from the first day of April, 1954,

(a) on each letter for delivery within the postal area in which it is posted, from three cents to four cents for the first ounce or fraction of an ounce . . .

(b) on each letter posted within one postal area for delivery in another postal area from four cents to five cents for the first ounce . . .

The resolution is confined exclusively to the rates of postage on letters. By the terms of the resolution the government has asked us to consider the expediency of introducing a bill to increase the charges for letters. There is no reference anywhere to the question of charges to or facilities available for those who use the post office for the postage of magazines and newspapers, which is the subject of the proposed amendment now before us.

The government may have sought to cover this point in the last clause of the proposed amendment. After stating that the Postmaster General may make regulations dealing with this matter, it provides that he may do so on the following terms:

. . . that the application of this section to the newspaper or periodical when so posted will not adversely affect the postal revenues.

It might be contended that since this will not upset the balance of ways and means it is not an enlargement of the terms of the resolution; but I point out that it is quite possible that the effect of this amendment would be to increase the charges made against those who use the facilities of the post office for posting magazines or newspapers. In that respect not only does it exceed the terms of the resolution which the house passed but it contravenes the rules on dealing with money bills. Here I should like to quote the authority of Beauchesne's second edition, citation No. 791, at page 225, which reads as follows:

The committee—

The reference is to the committee of the whole, which is this committee.

—cannot agree to any clauses involving payments out of the public funds, or imposing any tax or charge upon the people unless such clauses have been previously considered by resolution in committee of the whole.

In other words, this proposed amendment should have been included as one of the subject matters in the resolution which preceded the bill and which was adopted by the committee of the whole house. I should also like to refer to Bourinot, fourth edition, which I might point out is an authority referred to throughout by Beauchesne. At page 503, after having dealt at some length with the general provisions regarding bills involving public aid or charges, he says:

The rule just cited also applies to the imposition of any state tax or charge upon the people or any class thereof.

As I have said, it is quite clear that the proposed amendment may well involve a charge upon those who use the mails for the purpose of posting magazines and newspapers. They are a class of people who would be subject to a charge, and therefore on the basis of the authority of Bourinot, page 503, the proposed amendment is clearly out of order.

There are a number of other citations which might be read in support of my submission, but I think for the time being I will let the technical case rest there. I would again like Your Honour to consider the logic and common sense of the matter. As I have said already, we have been exposed to a number of surprises in the course of our dealing with this bill, and last night this one, at five minutes to ten, was the last in a long series of surprises of the sort which the rules of the house were clearly designed to prevent. I suggest to you, sir, that in fairness to the committee, which is part of the House of Commons, the committee should not be asked to allow the government to continue to spring surprises on it in this improper manner, but that the government should now be required to abide by the rules of the house and should withdraw this amendment. Indeed, I suggest that while they are doing it it would be as well, and highly proper, if they would withdraw the whole bill, which in general has been dealt with by them in this same improper manner.

Mr. Knowles: I congratulate the hon. member for Kamloops, Mr. Chairman, on the excellent case he has made against the propriety of the amendment which was moved last night. My remarks will be much briefer than they might otherwise have been, owing to the fact that the member for Kamloops has quoted most of the citations that bear on this point. I have been checking off the ones I had, one by one, as he read them. However, there is still one important citation which he either overlooked, or perhaps out of his generous nature he left for me.

I want to say that I recognize the possibility of someone from the government side answering some of the arguments the member for Kamloops has advanced. I say this, even though I am supporting the position taken by the hon. member, not to weaken any of his arguments but to make it clear to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration or anyone who speaks from that side that an answer to one of the points or even two does not demolish the third one. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration holds up three fingers, but he cannot demolish the third one.

Mr. Cote: You are expecting demolition.

Mr. Knowles: With regard to the first point made by the member for Kamloops, I would say he is correct in stating that the amendment proposed by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is not a proper amendment to clause 2 of the bill. He made his case well, and I think it stands.

However, it is true that the government could get around that by withdrawing the amendment, as an amendment to clause 2 of the bill, and introducing it as a new clause. I believe that could be done under citation 670 of Beauchesne's third edition. I suggest that, as I say, not to weaken the case of the member for Kamloops but to let the other side know they are not going to get anywhere by trying to make anything out of that argument. Technically, the member for Kamloops is correct, but it could be done in this other way, provided the other arguments the member for Kamloops has put up were not in the way.

The second argument which the member for Kamloops has made is again one that the government will try to attack, and of course, they will be satisfied that they are attacking it successfully, but in my view they will not. I refer to his argument that this is a money bill, and that it is not proper to introduce an amendment to a money bill which goes beyond the scope of the resolution preceding the bill itself. The government will argue, as the member for Kamloops has already pointed out, that in the very words of the amendment the government proposed to put in the bill there is the suggestion that the power given to the Postmaster General shall not be exercised if it would result in an adverse effect upon the postal revenue.

I point out, however, Mr. Chairman, that it is possible, under this proposed amendment, for certain periodicals or magazines to find that the amendment's provisions are to them an advantage. As a result of that advantage they might well increase their circulation, and as a result of that draw a greater subsidy from the federal treasury. Every magazine or newspaper that is posted today is posted in part at public expense. There is an element of subsidy there. If the circulation of any newspaper or magazine is increased, a result of this subsidy is that the loss to the treasury will be increased to that extent. My contention is that even though the Postmaster General may say that this is not to result in any loss of postal revenue per unit, it could result in a loss in this other way. I submit the amendment could have the effect of upsetting the balance of ways and means of the treasury as a whole, and therefore the point the member for Kamloops made in that connection is valid. This amendment should not have been made since it goes beyond the scope of the money aspect of the resolution that preceded the bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I come to the third point raised by the member for Kamloops. I submit that on this point the government has not a leg to stand on. It has been made crystal clear in the house time and time again, especially when members of the opposition violated this point, that a bill amending one section or one part of an act does not open the whole act. What the government did in this case was to introduce a bill amending section 10 of the Post Office Act. Nothing could be clearer, because it was stated in the resolution that it was to be a bill dealing only with rates of postage on letters. When we got the bill based on the resolution, to all intents and purposes it was a bill of one clause. Clause 2 had to do with the date it comes into effect. There was just the one operative clause which amends section 10 of the Post Office Act, and nothing else.

I insist, Mr. Chairman, that by virtue of the ruling that has been made from the chair of this committee as well as from the chair of the house time and time again, the amending of one section of an act does not open the whole act. If such action does not permit members on this side of the house to discuss other sections of an act, certainly it is equally clear it does not permit the government to open up other sections of an act by an amendment of this kind. This amendment now before us does just that. It opens up section 11 of the Post Office Act, to which there was no reference in the original resolution, no reference in the bill and no reference in the speeches or announcements on this matter made by the government. I submit the amendment goes far beyond what is allowed by the rules of the house, and far beyond the rulings that have been made in this house time and time again. Whatever satisfaction the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration may get out of trying to worm around the first two points made by the member for Kamloops, he is up against it when he comes to the third one. He cannot answer it at all.

The one citation which the member for Kamloops left for me is citation 671 in Beauchesne's third edition. It is also citation 792 in Beauchesne's second edition, and follows citation 791 which the hon. member read a few minutes ago. This citation reads:

> A new clause will not be entertained if it is beyond the scope of a bill . . .

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment clearly goes beyond the scope of the bill which was laid before us, and the government has no right to introduce it in this way. The government has the right to give notice in the usual way, to announce the Governor General's approval and deal with it in a proper parliamentary way. I do not deny that for a moment. But I do deny the government's right to play fast and loose with the rules just because of their majority; I deny their right to try to do things in this way.

I shall have something more to say about the substance of the amendment if it is allowed to stand. I shall have something more to say on the kind of explanation that was made last night by the Postmaster General in the light of information I have received since, if the amendment stands. However, such an argument would be on the substance rather than on procedure. I could continue, but it seems to me that on the one main issue the case is so clear you have no alternative, Mr. Chairman, but to say to the government that the amendment goes beyond the scope of the bill. It opens up a section of the Post Office Act which was not opened up by the original resolution, or by the bill, and therefore is not in order as an amendment moved in committee of the whole in this way.

Mr. Harris: I think I could dismiss the first two reasons advanced by the hon. member for Kamloops by using the words of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles: You should agree with the member for Winnipeg North Centre on the third point, too.

Mr. Harris: Because the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre occasionally shows some sense of wisdom is no reason why I should agree with him on every occasion.

However, before I accept his argument about the first two points I should point out one difference. The hon. member for Kamloops said that a precedent, if you will, or a practice, if you will, was followed the other night by unanimous consent. It was not done by unanimous consent. I have read the record since he spoke and I see in it no reference to unanimous consent.

Mr. Fulton: What I had in mind was—perhaps I should have used the words—that there was no objection taken. Therefore is not unanimous consent automatic? It seems to me that would follow.

Mr. Harris: I would not want my hon. friend to feel that in future he could not agree with a procedure we adopt here. I hope that on many occasions he will do that. So we will just note that he did intend to say that there had been no objection taken at that time to the procedure, and assume from that that he had some reservation about it. And now he has made that known on this particular point.

But I do wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that it seems to me we have on more than one occasion done what my hon. friend has referred to. I shall not try to cite examples of it. But all of us have been here long enough to know that it has been done on several occasions, where the final clause of a bill has had to be renumbered, or where many clauses have had to be renumbered because of the insertion of one which was not there in the first instance.

If the arguments made by the two hon. members are valid, then we never should have done this at any time, on any occasion, in the manner we are now proposing here, namely to renumber subsequent clauses and introduce new ones.

Mr. Fulton: It is all right, so long as it is within the scope of the bill.

Mr. Harris: I will come to that.

The first argument therefore is, I suggest, entirely out of court for the reasons I have given.

Then, the second argument is that, this being a money bill, therefore we should not amend it and thereby, as I take it, add another burden to the public charge of Canada. That of course is a matter of opinion—as to whether the result of this bill would be a public charge. Indeed, if I remember correctly, during the course of his explanation last night, in referring to the amendment the Postmaster General said that we would save money in doing this, rather than spend it. I am paraphrasing this, because he did not add the latter part of what I have said. However, he did say that we would have a saving. I do not think he added the additional negative—that we would not spend any more. However, I think that is what he meant.

That being the case, I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that there is not an additional charge, and that it is not necessary that this should have been covered in the original resolution. Practically every bill presented to parliament has some effect with respect to a public charge. Even the cost of printing it is one, in itself.

The whole point we are to determine, of course, is how remote the charge is, and as it becomes more remote, then it does not come within the requirements of the resolution. And as both hon. members have pointed out, they have to argue that it is possible that there might be a charge, despite the care with which the amendment was drafted, to impose upon the Postmaster General certain obligations to see that a charge did not in fact occur. Now it was not entirely an oversight that this was drafted in that way—though I am not suggesting that we had in mind bringing this in at that time.

Let me make some brief references to additional material supplied by the hon. member for Kamloops about the supposed motives we might have had under these circumstances. This amendment—and I frankly confess it—was not available at the time the resolution was drafted. I do not suggest that, if it had been, it might necessarily have been included in the resolution. But we desire to put this in at this time for the very obvious reason that the Post Office Act is now being amended, and it is more convenient to do it in this manner—subject to what I shall say in a moment—and that it is proper to do so, in order to avoid duplication of debate in the house.

The question of surprise is the only one upon which I have anything to say, or concerning which I have any sympathy in respect of the arguments made by my hon. friends. You can amend bills in committee. There are ever so many citations in Beauchesne which were not read by my hon. friends. In fact, I think there is a citation which goes so far as to say that you can amend a bill to the point where it is scarcely recognizable at all, and that when you have passed that point possibly the government should withdraw it and start over again.

But there is no suggestion that it is not proper to amend in this way in committee. The only qualification is the case that has been mentioned, namely, that it is desirable, for the sake of the expedition of public business, that hon. members in the house should not be surprised or, if they are surprised, that they should be given ample opportunity to consider what position they wish to take.

Mr. Knowles: And it has to be within the scope of the bill.

Mr. Harris: I will come to that. And under these circumstances, as I pointed out last night, we were prepared to make this amendment any time clause 1 was carried, and to allow any reasonable time there might be for the consideration of it. The fact that it happened at five minutes to ten was pure coincidence. It could have happened at five minutes after eight. And if hon. members had wanted to delay it, they would have got the delay that they got at five minutes to ten.

We have now had the time since last night to consider the amendment, and it seems to me the surprise has gone. They have had ample time to consider it, if they chose to do so.

And now as to the constantly repeated request for an opinion as to whether this is within the scope of the bill. The scope of the bill is not to amend the Post Office Act generally. I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on that point. The scope of the bill deals with certain portions of the act, namely rates and the like.

Mr. Knowles: On letters.

Mr. Harris: Rates—

Mr. Knowles: On letters.

Mr. Harris: Rates and the like.

Mr. Fulton: Where does the minister get "the like"?

Mr. Harris: We will come to that. The principle involved in the bill is not violated by the amendment.

Mr. Fulton: That is your opinion.

Mr. Harris: My opinion is no better than yours in this house.

Mr. Knowles: That at least is a correct statement.

Mr. Pearson: Certainly it is no worse.

Mr. Harris: And, Mr. Chairman, it is not suggested by either speaker, except by a very remote argument, that this alters the public charge. It is stated by both of them that it is not within the scope of the bill. I submit it is. I submit there is nothing in the amendment to which my hon. friends could not now make a logical argument, if they so chose.

For that reason I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that you might consider it within the competence of the committee to consider the amendment. And if anyone wanted to quote any authority for what I have been saying, he could go over all the references that have been made and point out that they are followed by somewhat contradictory references. In particular we can start with the one numbered 347 at page 138, which says, very generally:

> Amendments may be made in every part of the bill, whether in the preamble, the clauses or the schedules;

And so on. Then we move on to the one that was referred to, namely, No. 671 on page 232, and I refer to No. 673, which reads:

> When a member intends to move an important amendment in committee of the whole to a public bill, he is not required, according to Canadian practice, to give notice of such amendment.

The rest is as I said a moment ago:

> It has been found expedient, however, in some cases, to give notice where the member desires to call special attention to his proposal.

And then, I go to citation 681, which is the one I referred to, which says that you can amend it out of all recognition of what you contemplated in the first place.

Then I come to the ruling which is found on page 568, which is rather an old one, I admit; but the headnote of it reads:

> Any amendment can be made to a bill in committee of the whole provided it is relevant to the subject matter of the bill, or pursuant to instructions.
> An amendment restrictive of the expenditure of public money is in order.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made one point when he spoke of the fact that he was not permitted to discuss other sections of the Post Office Act on the amendment. For example, when you make an amendment to section 11, you confine your discussion to section 11. That is quite true. There is nothing being done here which alters that. You may indeed discuss the section that we are proposing to amend, but that seems to me to be the limit of the discussion. I do not understand the distinction, however. Obviously, you would not want to discuss a section of the bill that was not being dealt with.

Mr. Fulton: May I reply very briefly to the minister on this point of relevancy? I do not accept the argument on all the other matters, but he was prepared to agree that the matter of relevancy, the question of whether it raises new matter outside the scope of the bill, was the point of substance, the main point. I state, sir, that he has not dealt adequately with that point. He has simply said that in his opinion the subject matter of the proposed amendment is relevant to the bill. In support of his argument he alluded to a citation in Beauchesne which says in effect that the bill could be amended almost beyond recognition. In passing he then referred to the opening words of the citation which sets out that proposition. I draw his attention and yours and also that of the committee to the fact that the minister did not read the succeeding words which are italicized. I am going to read the whole of that part of the citation because it is the nub of the matter. Citation 681 reads:

> The committee can so change the provisions of the bill that when it is reported to the house it is in substance a bill other than that which was referred. A committee can negative every clause and substitute new clauses,—

And these are the words in italics:

—if relevant to the bill as read a second time.

Mr. Harris: That is correct.

Mr. Fulton: Now, what do we have here? We have a proposed amendment to the bill with respect to section 11. Section 11 deals with matters relating to newspapers. What was the bill that was read a second time? The bill was a short bill of two clauses. Section 1 said:

> Section 10 of the Post Office Act, chapter 212 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

Then there was the new section 10 which dealt exclusively with the increase in rates of postage on letters. Clause 2 of the bill dealt with the date of coming into force. How can the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration expect you, sir, as a man of common sense, and expect this committee or any person in or out of the house, to accept the proposition that a clause dealing with the rates of postage or facilities available to people using the post office for magazines and periodicals is relevant to the bill as read the second time, which contained only the one clause dealing with letters and the other dealing with the date of coming into force?

I regret that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration did not deal more adequately with the points that were raised, but I think the reason is obvious. It is that it is not possible in this instance to advance seriously the proposition that this amendment is relevant to the bill as read the second time.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I will not take any time to discuss further the first two points that were proposed by the hon. member for Kamloops, and on which I commented later, and to which the minister replied. I do not suggest, though, that I concede that the minister's arguments on those points are valid, but we will not take any more time on them. I do submit, however, that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is really stretching logic and stretching a few other things when he suggests that it is possible to argue that by amending this bill to bring in an amendment to section 11 you thereby make in order a discussion on the things that are referred to in section 11. To begin with, section 11 is not referred to in the bill.

If it is possible by this method to propose a change in section 11 of the act, I draw your attention, sir, to the fact that there are 77 sections in the Post Office Act. Only one of them was amended by the proposed bill. If it is in order for an amendment to be moved altering sections other than section 10, then it is possible for us to go down the line and have 75 more amendments amending other sections of the Post Office Act itself.

The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration argued that the purpose of the bill—I am trying to recall the words he used—was to deal with postage rates on letters and the like. Let us not try to kid the troops that way, Mr. Chairman. There is nothing else in the bill but a reference to the rates on letters. Not only is there the exact wording to which the hon. member for Kamloops has made reference, but I draw your attention, sir, to the explanatory notes on the right-hand side of the bill which say:

> The purpose of this amendment is to increase the rate of postage on letters posted in Canada for delivery in Canada.

That is all the bill deals with. Yesterday when we got into a discussion on postcards the Postmaster General argued that that was not a matter that needed to come before the house, because it was covered by another section of the act. So far as periodicals and newspapers are concerned, they are in a section of the act that is not touched by the bill. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that if this is going to be allowed, then it is possible for the hon. member for Vancouver East to rise in his place and accept the invitation of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to move an amendment cutting out free postage for newspapers in certain instances. And it is possible for me to rise in my place and move an amendment to section 6(d) of the act.

To argue, as the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has done, that this bill deals with postage rates on letters and the like, and that this amendment is within the scope of the bill because it comes under "and the like," is really begging the question. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that we need to rest our case only on what we have delineated as the third point, namely, that this amendment goes beyond the scope of the bill. That fact is crystal clear and on that basis the amendment should not be allowed.

The Chairman: I find myself in considerable difficulty with respect to the points of order made by the hon. member for Kamloops. I am required to consider the principle of the amending bill, and I should like to refer to a ruling of Mr. Speaker Macdonald on November 14, 1949, in which he said in part:

> On the second reading of an amending bill—hon. members will notice that this is an amending bill—it is the principle of the amending bill, and not the principle of the act to be amended, which is the "business under consideration".

Similar circumstances apply here, and I am particularly concerned about the question of relevancy. I was wondering whether the minister could be of more assistance to me on that phase of the matter, and could devote some attention to the question of relevancy in an attempt to aid the Chair.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, I deprecate these lengthy arguments on points of order. I have made my submission. I do not think the house need, if I may say so with respect, take any more time on it, and I for one would be content with whatever ruling you may make, and I certainly would not appeal.

The Chairman: This bill was preceded by a resolution in the following terms:

> Resolved that it is expedient to amend the Post Office Act to increase the rates of postage on letters posted in Canada from the first day of April, 1954.

According to the bill its purpose is as follows:

> The purpose of this amendment is to increase the rate of postage on letters posted in Canada for delivery in Canada.

That purpose, it will be seen, has been carried out in clause 1 of the bill. My attention has been drawn by the hon. member for Kamloops to three points of order. I will deal only briefly with the first two, because I do not think I could possibly rule the amendment out of order with respect to them.

Citation 670 of Beauchesne's third edition reads in part as follows:

> In committee all the clauses of the bill are considered before any new clauses are brought up and added to the bill.

That procedure has not quite been followed in this case, but I rather think the procedure which has been followed is perhaps a quicker procedure and I think it would be agreeable to hon. members.

With regard to the second point, that is that the amendment should have been preceded by a resolution, I do not think I can rule thereon in view of the remarks of the Postmaster General last evening. I do not believe that particular phase of the matter has validity. However, I am considerably troubled as to whether this amendment is relevant and I cannot help but feel that it is beyond the scope of the original measure.

I would like to draw to the attention of the committee citation 671 of Beauchesne's third edition, which reads as follows:

A new clause will not be entertained if it is beyond the scope of a bill, inconsistent with clauses agreed to by the committee, or substantially the same as a clause previously negatived.

I would also like to draw to the attention of the committee citation 678 of the same edition, which reads as follows:

Amendments cannot be moved which are based on schedules or other provisions, the terms of which have not been placed before the committee.

And then in citation 679 of Beauchesne's third edition there appears the following:

Amendments are out or order if they are (a) irrelevant to the bill, or beyond its scope, governed by or dependent upon amendments already negatived;

The minister has drawn my attention to citation 681 and in his remarks he mentioned the wide powers for amendment in committee. However, a careful reading of citation 681 reveals that these wide powers can only be exercised if relevant to the bill as read a second time. Then again, we have in May's fifteenth edition at page 530, under the heading "inadmissible amendments":

(1) An amendment is out of order if irrelevant to the subject matter (a) or beyond the scope of the bill.

I have examined the amendment carefully and the amendment deals with section 11 of the Post Office Act. I cannot find that it is relevant. I do feel it is beyond the scope of the bill. I therefore must rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. Harris: As I said in advance, Mr. Chairman, I am prepared to accept your ruling. But having reached this point where we now are and where we were at five minutes to ten last night, I propose to ask hon. members opposite if, following the remarks of the hon. member for Kamloops and subject to what he said they could agree on, on a previous occasion, they would grant unanimous consent to proceed with the amendment.

Mr. Knowles: I do not know what the hon. member for Kamloops is going to do but I would not give consent. I am opposed to the substance of the proposed amendment.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, last night there was considerable confusion at the time when the minister introduced this amendment. In this regard I would refer you to the end of page 1901 of Hansard which reads as follows:

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

And it continues on page 1902:

Some hon. Members: No.
Some hon. Members: Carried.
Mr. Knowles: On division.
Clause agreed to.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot agree with this version of Hansard. I was in the house, as were a great many other hon. members, and we all shouted "no". Some of us had other remarks to make to clause 1 and it was some surprise to me that—

The Chairman: Order. Clause 1 was carried last night.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I do not like to disagree with the chairman or with Mr. Speaker, but I wish simply to put on record that I cannot agree with that version.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mrs. Fairclough: No.

Clause 2 agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mrs. Fairclough: No.

Title agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall the bill carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall I report the bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, are you not going to put the motion for third reading?

Mr. Cote moved the third reading of the bill.

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I guess I can now say what I had intended to say on the third reading of the bill.

Mr. Tustin: They cannot read the bill if you object to it.

Mr. Fulton: Yes they can.

Mrs. Fairclough: There were several matters which were discussed yesterday with reference to employment and to the manner in which the provisions of the 40-hour week would be implemented with regard to the employment of casual labour. At that time the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) remarked that the liquidation staffs which had been handling the carriage of mail during the liquidation time of the letter carriers would be absorbed into the letter sorting department.

I rather doubted that. I doubted that they could absorb these people, and I made some inquiries. So far as I can tell, from the information which is available to me, they will not be able to absorb anywhere near the number of men who have been serving on the liquidation staffs. I should like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that the maximum hourly rate now earned by letter carriers is $1.33 an hour, and that under the new regulations with respect to the 40-hour week the maximum rate earned by letter carriers will be $1.47 an hour. Yet these are the men who are being asked to volunteer to come back on Saturdays for a dollar an hour, to do their own work.

Mr. Speaker, all during this whole debate I have consistently objected to the passage of this bill, the manner in which it was brought in, and the blame which was being placed on the changed working conditions of letter carriers and others in the department. Now I must say once more that in my opinion this is a most deplorable situation, when men who have established working conditions and have established their procedure over many years are being asked, in effect, to work extra time at about three-quarters of their regular rate.

I doubt very much whether there is any industry in the country which would have the temerity to suggest to its employees that they should come in and work overtime at 75 per cent of their regular rate. I do not think the Post Office Department has any right even to make this suggestion to its employees. I think it is a despicable thing to try to undermine the working conditions of your own employees by making this suggestion, trading on the possibility that there might be a few employees, here and there, who would do practically anything to earn a few extra dollars per week. There are people who will do that; they are desperately in need of money, for one reason or another, and they will take whatever offers.

The idea of bringing in casual labour, mixing them up with the regular postal employees; the idea of saying to the postal staff that it is understood that if the occasion arises the postmaster has the authority to order any employee to work on Saturdays if he fails to volunteer, and to say further that absenteeism will not be condoned—these things practically amount to a threat, Mr. Speaker. I cannot understand the thinking in a department which will make such suggestions to its employees.

[Mrs. Fairclough.]

There are other things which should have been brought out on clause 1 of the bill, and if I was not quick enough to catch the intent of the chairman then I must accept the blame for my shortcomings. I would have liked to ask the Postmaster General some questions, but I cannot do that now on third reading. However, I understand that T.C.A. is carrying mail not only in its luggage compartments but in passenger seats. I understand that there is carriage of papers and magazines in passenger seats, and that there is some sort of arrangement between the post office and T.C.A. to do that very thing. These are matters that should have come out at the committee stage of the bill; they are matters on which I have notes and had intended to raise. That is why I was so anxious to have this matter reopened this afternoon.

We have been debating this matter for some time now, Mr. Speaker, and at no time have we ever conceded that there was any virtue in this bill. We have had a couple of amendments proposed and voted on, and we have lost them. But in the course of the debate we have heard some of the recommendations which were proposed by the Woods and Gordon company. We have not had any satisfactory answer as to which of these recommendations have been implemented or are to be implemented, or as to the savings which might reasonably be effected. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, at this time I move, seconded by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks):

That this bill be not now read a third time but that further consideration thereof be postponed until such time as the house is in a position to assess the effects of the implementation of the J. D. Woods and Gordon report.

Mr. Speaker: I doubt very much whether the amendment is in order. To me it is an expanded negative. What we are considering on the third reading of the bill is nothing else but what is in the bill. That is the difference between second reading and third reading.

In my opinion this amendment is not in order. Of course, I have not had much time to look up authorities and cite the ones which are applicable, but I know for a fact that this amendment is not in order. If I could have just a few more seconds I am fairly sure that I could put my hands on the relevant citation. I see that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has his book in front of him. Has he the proper section?

Mr. Knowles: I will find it in a moment, Mr. Speaker, but you do not expect me to help you out on this bill, do you?

Mr. Speaker: I know that I speak not only for myself but for all hon. members when I say we are interested in seeing that the rules are observed.

Mr. Harris: Citation 710.

Mr. Speaker: Citation 710 of Beauchesne's third edition reads as follows:

> The question for the third reading is put immediately after the report from the committee of the whole. All amendments which may be moved on a second reading of a bill may be moved on the third reading with the restriction that they cannot deal with any matter which is not contained in the bill.

I think this authority should be considered sufficient at this stage. Perhaps the hon. member will consider withdrawing the amendment. In any event, I am compelled to rule it out of order.

Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that you have ruled out of order the amendment just proposed by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough), on grounds which I will not discuss at this time, I wish to make a motion for the same reason which, it will have been obvious, motivated the amendment just moved, namely that the matter should not be proceeded with until the Woods and Gordon report has been implemented and until the Post Office Department itself has had time to assess the effects of that implementation and bring before us some definite figures on which to base their proposal. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks):

> That this bill be not now read a third time but that it be read a third time this day six months hence.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Those who are in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those who are opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Fulton) which was negatived on the following division:

PRIVATE BILLS

SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Mr. John Hunter (Parkdale) moved the second reading of the following bills:

Bill No. 178, for the relief of Dorothy Ann Stuart Story McKenna.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 179, for the relief of Joyce Tulloch Foley.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 180, for the relief of Ruth Annie Ricketts Perrett.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 181, for the relief of Elizabeth Harriet Wyburd Ramseger.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 182, for the relief of Warma Wilhelmiina Rantasalmi Wirtanen.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 183, for the relief of Ruth May Rowley Grundy.—Mr. Weir.

Bill No. 184, for the relief of Rodney David Themens.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 185, for the relief of Patricia Mackell Wilson.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 186, for the relief of Joseph Aurele Denault.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 187, for the relief of Arthur Ryan. —Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 188, for the relief of Mary Clenman Bernard, otherwise known as May Clenman Bernard.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 189, for the relief of Lloyd Demont Noseworthy.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 190, for the relief of Douglas Charles Fortune.—Mr. Hunter.

Private Bills

Bill No. 191, for the relief of Kenneth George Wright.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 192, for the relief of Sonia Rofman Bailis.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 193, for the relief of Bessie Livshitz Rudy.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 194, for the relief of Monika Emilija Kasputyte Janauskas.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 195, for the relief of Suzanne Marie-Therese Gens La France.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 196, for the relief of Noella Cooker Prince.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 197, for the relief of Rupert Evans Joyce.—Mr. Hunter.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, just before this motion carries I want to say a brief word. My purpose is merely to keep the record in this house straight, so that we shall know what we are doing when we put these divorce bills through. To date, as I have already made clear, we have processed 140 divorce bills.

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member permit a question? Does he think that the score-keeping he is doing is relevant to the principle of these bills?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I submit that when the house is being asked to do such an unusual thing as to pass on the principle of 20 different bills at once, at least it is appropriate that I draw attention to the fact that it is 20 bills that we are passing in this half minute.

Motion agreed to, bills read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION ACT

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO ENLARGE SCOPE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, February 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Campbell, for the second reading of Bill No. 175, to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act (protection of rivers).

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, when the debate was adjourned on Tuesday of last week I was discussing the bill sponsored by the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Campbell), and I was attempting to show at that time that what the hon. member was trying to do was to amend an act concerning navigation, over which the federal government alone has jurisdiction, by virtue of the British North America Act, to remedy the pollution of certain waters, a matter which falls normally for determination under provincial jurisdiction. I had gone on to explain that his amendment to the act together with the amendment moved by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) accentuated the position. I had summed up by casting doubt on the constitutionality of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Prince Albert.

Since then I have had the opportunity of considering the bill, together with the amendment brought forward by the hon. member for Prince Albert, and now I have no hesitation in stating unequivocally that the amendment leaves no doubt in my mind as to its invalidity. I should like to quote the words which the hon. member for Prince Albert sought to introduce to the bill proposed by the hon. member for The Battlefords. The hon. member for Prince Albert moved:

> That after the word "whatsoever" in the fifth line of section 18 in the bill the following words be added:
> "or chemicals of any kind, and without restricting the generality of the foregoing any substance which, although not deleterious or harmful to human health, causes discomfort or annoyance to users of water."

In order that there may be some sequence in the debate, and since the bill is a short one, perhaps I may read it now as it would stand amended:

> Section 18 of the Navigable Waters Protection Act, chapter 193 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, is repealed and the following substituted therefor:
> 18. No owner or tenant of any sawmill, or other industrial plant, or any workman therein or other person shall throw or cause to be thrown, or suffer or permit to be thrown any sawdust, edgings, slabs, bark or rubbish of any description whatsoever, or chemicals of any kind, and without restricting the generality of the foregoing any substance which, although not deleterious or harmful to human health, causes discomfort or annoyance to users of water.

In my understanding it now becomes quite clear that the amendment is one that has to do with the pollution of water, one that has to do with the drinking of water, and unquestionably one that has to do with health, a matter which is entirely extraneous to navigation and shipping and over which the Navigable Waters Protection Act would have no jurisdiction whatsoever.

The bill in itself is ineffective, in my opinion, to remedy the situation, unless it can be shown that these deleterious matters, or the industrial plants to which my hon. friend refers, have to do with navigation and shipping. If he can connect them up with the fact that these matters interfere with navigation and shipping, then of course there would be jurisdiction; but no one, I think, will argue that chemicals interfere with shipping. I do not think they do. Neither is it the property of a chemical to interfere with navigation, and I do not think there is any way in which you can link those chemicals or deleterious matters with navigation and shipping.

If I go a step farther and use the argument of the hon. member for The Battlefords, I think he will agree with me in this conclusion; because if one looks at Hansard for February 2, at page 1702 he will see this stated by the hon. member:

> The discussion to which the minister referred related to an amendment moved by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) to section 19 of the Navigable Waters Protection Act, and had to do with the pollution of the waters along the shore line of lake Ontario, while the case which I am arguing refers to a river running through three provinces. During that debate the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) argued that the federal government was not competent to deal with the situation, and the amendment was voted down. I believe the minister was correct, because this is a completely different situation.

But it is not. There is no difference at all between the situation to which my hon. friend refers and that argued by the hon. member for York West. The position is exactly the same. The fact that three provinces are involved does not alter the jurisdiction of the Navigable Waters Protection Act. Even if there were ten provinces it would make absolutely no difference in so far as this act is concerned. It would give no jurisdiction over navigation. It might make some difference in so far as the question of health is concerned, but that is not a matter for me to determine. As I said earlier, this matter is one which comes under navigation and shipping and I am concerned only with that aspect of it at the moment, because that is the only aspect which my hon. friend seeks to consider in his anxiety to meet the difficult position in which the people of Prince Albert and other communities along the shores of the North Saskatchewan river find themselves.

I have a great deal of sympathy for the position in which he and other hon. members find themselves at the moment, but I am sure that he and the other hon. members would not want an act to be passed which would be ultra vires; for, after all, what would be the use of passing an act if we knew in advance that it would not meet the position and would not be intra vires of the British North America Act?

That brings me to the statement made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). The leader of the C.C.F. party said at page 1705 of Hansard:

> Now, the Saskatchewan river is frequented by fish. Is it more important to protect the lives and the health of fish than the lives and the health of people who live along this river?

The answer of course is no. It is far more important to protect the lives of humans than it is to protect the lives of fish, but if we have no jurisdiction to protect the lives of humans under the Navigable Waters Protection Act, then why enact legislation when we know beforehand, as I said earlier, that the legislation would be innocuous?

Again, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar asked why we did not do something under sections 32 and 33 of the Fisheries Act. I believe the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) dealt with that matter earlier, when in answer to a question in the house he said that while under the British North America Act legislative jurisdiction over fisheries lay with the federal government, since 1930, by agreement with the provinces, they were the ones who administered their own natural resources, including fisheries. I think he made it quite clear that if some remedy were desired, perhaps the best way to seek that remedy was to consult those who had been administering the act for some years.

I conclude by reiterating what I have said already, that while there will be a great deal of concern for the problems which hon. members have spoken about in this debate and for which a remedy is sought, and while there will be a great deal of sympathy and much concern for the people themselves, I do not think the house or any hon. member in the house would want to suggest a remedy which would have no effect. I have no hesitation in saying that the amendment brought forward by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) in my humble opinion would not meet the position from a constitutional standpoint and is ultra vires.

So far as the argument of the hon. member for The Battlefords is concerned, I can see no difference whatsoever between this attempt to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act, and the attempt made by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) on an earlier occasion. I have forgotten what reasons I gave, or whether I had consulted the Department of Justice at that time, but my recollection is that I had and that the deputy minister of justice gave as his opinion that it would not be possible to make the amendment within the constitution. Again, I do not think there is any difference between what is attempted here and what was attempted on that occasion.

I remind hon. members that I am not attempting to deal with the problem as regards health. That is not a matter that concerns the navigation of ships or shipping on navigable waters. I am concerned only with the operation of that act, and I say that to attempt to deal with the matter, which is chiefly provincial, by amending this act would in my opinion be ultra vires.

Mr. Speaker: The minister has referred to an amendment moved by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). It has been brought to my attention that that amendment was ruled out of order after it was moved. For the guidance of hon. members who wish to participate in this debate I would point out that since that amendment is not before the house as it appears at page 287 of Votes and Proceedings, there is now before the house only the bill of the hon. member for The Battlefords.

Mr. F. G. Robertson (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) who is unavoidably absent because of other important government business, I would like to make a few comments on this bill.

This bill, introduced by the hon. member for The Battlefords, seeks to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act. By so doing I understand he is seeking to give the federal government authority to deal with a very disturbing problem in his area. This problem has been the subject matter of a number of questions put to the Minister of National Health and Welfare by the hon. member for The Battlefords and the hon. member for Prince Albert during the past month. The Minister of National Health and Welfare has indicated his concern over this matter, and he has pointed out that we have no jurisdiction to deal with it.

Nevertheless, he has offered the full co-operation of the department in assisting the provinces to correct this very unfortunate situation. On February 2 the hon. member for The Battlefords moved an amendment by this bill. It has been pointed out very ably by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) that this would amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act, a subject dealing with navigation over which the federal government has jurisdiction; that in fact we are being asked to remedy a situation which is a health matter, namely the pollution of the water used in those areas. In my opinion also, this matter should be dealt with in another way, and further I would state that this matter comes under the jurisdiction of the provincial government.

This problem has to deal with the dumping of industrial waste into the North Saskatchewan river which provides water for some of the cities in the hon. member's constituency, namely the cities of North Battleford and Prince Albert, and the town of Battleford. I am sure we all sympathize with the hon. member and with the people living in those areas because they are being subjected to a very disagreeable situation. As a result of these substances being dumped into the North Saskatchewan river we know that the water in the cities I have mentioned has a very objectionable odour and taste, and I am informed that this extends as far as The Pas in Manitoba.

I have seen many of the reports which have come to our department, and so far there is no report which indicates there is an associated health hazard. I would not minimize the distress which is being caused to the people in these areas, but I think that is an important point to make. On previous occasions the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) has indicated the action taken by our department. This action has been taken by the Department of National Health and Welfare in conjunction with the provinces concerned because, as I have stated and as the minister has stated on many occasions, we believe that this is a matter coming under provincial jurisdiction; and further, the provinces themselves are quite agreed that it is their responsibility.

I should like to outline what the Department of National Health and Welfare has done to correct this situation. At the request of the provincial health officers we have sent the supervising engineer of the division of public health engineering in our department to consult with officials of the various provinces concerned. He has talked with officials of the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. He has also taken part in conferences, at which industries concerned attended, and he has given to those officials the benefit of his experience.

The occupational health laboratory of our division have also been working on this problem. They have examined samples of the water taken from various cities in that locality, and are giving the provinces the benefit of their advice. We have also attempted to obtain all possible information from the United States. We have been in touch with the environmental health centre at Cincinnati, asking them to give us the benefit of their experience in dealing with such matters. We have been assured that such help will be forthcoming in the very near future. I therefore hope all hon. members will agree that our department has been extremely sympathetic in connection with the difficulty and have taken concrete steps to correct it.

[Mr. Robertson.]

I should like to point out that the solution of this problem is most complicated. We have yet been unable to identify the offending substance, or substances, or combination of substances which are related to this problem and which are the cause of this disagreeable condition, nor have we been able to say what their origin is. It will only be by intensive research that it will be possible to determine the cause. In fact there may be a number of substances involved. They made be coming from more than one source. More than one industry may be involved. The solution is not likely to be simple. It will require exhaustive studies of a highly technical and specialized kind to determine the real source of this trouble.

It might appear that the obvious solution to this problem might consist in closing down some of these industries; but I am sure that, on reflection, this would not be termed a particularly satisfactory solution. It might require the closing down of a great number of industries. In addition to the economic implications, we have no assurance that this would be a permanent solution to the problem.

While we are attempting to identify the substances concerned, temporary measures have been taken to deal with this situation. In one locality, the use of activated charcoal has been useful in clearing up this condition. I am told that laboratory tests indicate that chlorine dioxide might be useful in purifying the water. I am also informed that one locality is considering the use of this substance.

I hope I have made it clear that the solution is not to be found in jurisdictional responsibility, but that it will require the intensive efforts and the co-operation of all people concerned in order to find a satisfactory solution to this problem. If the provinces concerned—and notably the province of Alberta, where the difficulty seems to originate—will agree, the minister is prepared to make available the services of the technical officers of our department to co-operate with the provinces and the industries concerned in setting up and engaging in the co-ordinated investigation which we believe is essential.

As the minister indicated to the house a few days ago, he dispatched a telegram to the minister of health in the province of Alberta offering the full facilities of our department to the province in attempting to correct this situation. I may once again refer to the telegram which the minister read to the house on that occasion:

In view of the many questions asked respecting the pollution of the North Saskatchewan river through industrial wastes said to originate with industries in Alberta, I would like to offer the co-operation and assistance of the technical officers of this department to participate in a joint study with the technical officers of your province and of the industries to endeavour to find a solution to the problem. I appreciate that the matter is not one that is within federal responsibility but in view of its importance and the complications and technical difficulties that would appear to exist, the solution may well be one that can only be found with the full utilization of all of the technical resources that can be made available. If you feel that this is a helpful proposal I suggest that you have Dr. Somerville communicate with Dr. Cameron with a view to working out satisfactory details and arrangements for an immediate study.

The house is aware that today the Minister of National Health and Welfare informed the house that Dr. Somerville, who is deputy minister of health in the province of Alberta, telephoned Dr. Cameron, the deputy minister of our department, informing him that the province of Alberta was most anxious to co-operate in every way it could. He also expressed his appreciation of the helpful assistance which has been forthcoming from the Department of National Health and Welfare. The minister also informed the house that he was in conversation with the minister of health of the province of Saskatchewan and that he too is most anxious to co-operate in the solution of this problem.

The minister has also directed that all possible speed be taken to place the facilities of our department at the service of the provinces. Already the staffs of the public health engineering division and the occupational health division of our department are taking the necessary steps to assist the provinces with this work. It will be necessary to divert some of the staff of these two divisions from important work which they are now carrying on, but it is felt that it is most necessary in order to assist the provinces with this matter. I am also informed that it is not likely that a solution can be found in a short time. As I have indicated, it is a complex situation and it is felt that it may be some time before a definite solution is found.

I should like to emphasize that the success of any effort in dealing with this problem is dependent upon the co-operation of all of the industries that may be involved. We assume that this co-operation will be forthcoming from those industries, and that they are as anxious as anyone else to clear up the situation. The measures which may be found necessary for control, once a solution is found, and the enforcement of those measures must, of course, remain the responsibility of the provinces.

I am sure all hon. members agree that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has shown much understanding of the situation that prevails, and that he has been most helpful in co-ordinating the work of the various governments in attempting to find a solution to this very important problem.

Mr. Green: May I ask the parliamentary assistant a question? Has his department given any consideration to the possible need for amending the Criminal Code in order to meet situations of this kind?

Mr. Robertson: I cannot say that any serious consideration has been given along those lines because we feel that under the British North America Act, since it is a matter involving health it comes under the jurisdiction of the provinces. As far as I know, no serious consideration has been given by our department to dealing with this matter under the Criminal Code.

Mr. G. W. Montgomery (Victoria-Carleton): I should like to say a few words on this bill. I feel that the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Campbell) should be congratulated on introducing it. Having given it some study, I must say that I agree with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) that the bill will not bring about what the hon. member for The Battlefords is seeking. The Navigable Waters Protection Act has to do with navigation; therefore I do not think any pollution that might affect the health of people can be remedied under it.

I think it is a good thing to have this matter brought before the house. The situation in the west is serious, and is one that may arise in other parts of Canada. I believe some thought should be given to it by the Department of National Health and Welfare, the Department of Fisheries and the Department of Justice from the point of view of trying to work out some arrangements with the provinces whereby there might be a conference or some other action to take care of such situations in the future. This may be the first time this situation has arisen, but it will not be the last.

Not long ago a somewhat similar problem arose in eastern Canada, and it is not the first time we have had this trouble. It has been brought to the attention of one or two departments. I believe the Department of Fisheries knows about it. However, this case in the east is different in that it involves international waters. The river rises in Canada, flows through the state of Maine and then re-enters Canada, and the water is polluted. There is no remedy under the Navigable Waters Protection Act. Large numbers of fish were killed last summer, and the doctor in charge of health matters there said that as far as he could tell the cause was pollution of the water in the state of Maine, but there does not seem to be any way of rectifying it.

I know that is a different problem from an interprovincial one, but it does place emphasis on the question. In a large country such as ours we have interprovincial rivers and international waters. As our country develops, industrial plants are going to be built adjacent to these waters, and in my opinion it is time for some thought to be given to the working out of a convention or agreement among the provinces and the dominion government whereby machinery will be provided so these problems can be dealt with speedily, especially where the health of our people is concerned.

I am sorry I cannot say very much in favour of this particular bill as something to meet the requirements of the hon. member. I do not see much objection to what is in it, but it is not going to help meet the situation so far as health or pollution is concerned, because the material that seems to be in the waters of this western river is not material that interferes with navigation. Looking at the bill from a legal standpoint, it is not going to meet the ends the hon. member has in mind. Nevertheless he has brought a most important matter before the house, and it should receive a lot of thought and consideration so that similar situations may be met when they arise in the future. Consideration should also be given to the problem that arises when international waters are involved, because there does not seem to be any machinery to deal with such matters effectively.

Mr. Harris: On a point of order, I understand that it is the wish of the hon. member who is sponsoring the bill that he might be allowed further time to consider what might be said or done. While the government's position has been made clear by the Minister of Transport and the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, it would be our view that it might be desirable, in view of the general interest in the subject and the particular interest that the hon. member has in it, to allow the bill to stand over and not be dealt with today. If that is his wish, that is agreeable to us.

Mr. Adamson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Harris: Is the hon. member going to speak about the next bill, which is his?

Mr. Adamson: No, I am speaking on the point of order. I have no objection to the procedure suggested, but there may be some extended remarks on the next order and as it is now eight minutes to six I would hope the Speaker would call it six o'clock.

Mr. Harris: That is just what I was about to say, and I thought you might be going to speak on this particular bill.

Mr. Adamson: No.

Mr. Harris: Then I would propose the adjournment of the debate and ask you, Mr. Speaker, to call it six o'clock.

On motion of Mr. Harris the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT

CHANGE IN BASIS OF COMPENSATION IN RESPECT OF SWINE AND SHEEP

Hon. W. E. Harris (for the Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act to remove the limits on the compensation payable in respect of swine and sheep, and to provide for payment of compensation on the basis of market value.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

Mr. Charlton: Is the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture going to explain the resolution?

Mr. McCubbin: The reason for the introduction of this resolution, Mr. Chairman, upon which the bill is founded, is to compensate the owners of hogs which have been slaughtered as a result of the outbreak of hog cholera. As we all know, hog cholera is the disease which hog producers, not only in Canada but in other countries as well, fear most. Heretofore the compensation which has been paid for a hog has been $30 or any portion thereof according to the value of the hog. If a hog were worth $50 or more, as it is now when it is ready for market, the owner was compensated only to the extent of $30 if the animal were slaughtered under the terms of this act. The government felt that some increased compensation should be given to a man who was in that position, and had hogs ready or nearly ready for market which had to be slaughtered. We are introducing the resolution to compensate him more adequately.

Mr. Charlton: I do not intend to say very much at the resolution stage. I should like to say, first, that I believe this measure is long overdue. I noticed that the parliamentary assistant just mentioned hogs, but the resolution also speaks of sheep. I believe that the compensation paid for sheep in the past has been much too low, especially for purebred animals. It is extremely difficult to arrive at the real value of purebred animals, and of course we shall have to wait until we get the bill before we can ascertain the basis for fixing the value. If it is similar to the basis for cattle, then I believe it is probably fair.

In some cases the compensation is not enough because it is a stipulated amount, plus the value of the carcass where it is suitable for consumption. In the case of highly bred animals, that is not enough. We all realize that, but it is rather difficult to arrive at any hard and fast rule. We shall reserve further comments until we see the contents of the bill.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I do not want to say very much at the resolution stage, except to ask the parliamentary assistant if any consideration has been given to increasing the compensation to those who have to dispose of purebred hogs? If the government is considering an amendment to this act, has consideration been given to increasing the compensation paid to cattle breeders who suffer the loss of purebred cattle?

I should like to point out to the parliamentary assistant and the house that in the case of purebred cattle, the compensation under the act today stands at a maximum of $100. We have a ceiling, but we have not a floor on the compensation to be paid the owners of purebred stock who have to dispose of animals under this act. I should like to ask the government to give consideration to bringing the payments made to purebred breeders into line.

Today there are more and more people producing purebred cattle, just as we have farmers producing more purebred sheep and purebred hogs. I think it is time the government gave consideration to more equitable payments to the people forced to dispose of their purebred cattle. Many of us today have stock worth thousands of dollars and the loss is tremendous if, for any reason, we have stock which has to be destroyed under this Animal Contagious Diseases Act. I ask the parliamentary assistant to tell the committee if any consideration has been given to raising the ceiling on payments for purebred cattle and hogs?

Mr. Fair: We Social Crediters believe in always doing what is fair and right, and that applies in this case. I feel that this action should have been taken some time ago. Without going into too much detail, I feel that we should pay the fair market value for livestock, whether it be ordinary livestock or purebred. When I say "fair market value", that does not mean we should pay on the same basis for purebred stock that is destroyed as we do for commercial livestock. By making fair payments to those who have their livestock destroyed we would encourage farmers to report any disease that may be in their herds.

I feel that is one thing that is being overlooked, and which may prove rather expensive for the government and for the country. If farmers feel that they are not being properly compensated, then they are apt to sneak out and sell their livestock. I do not say there are many who would do that, but there is the odd one. When I say "odd", I mean just that. As a rule, farmers do not play any of those tricks. We Social Crediters are fully behind this move by the government, and we hope that in this case the payments will be generous and will fully compensate those who may be unfortunate enough to have a disease in their herd.

Mr. Charlton: Is the parliamentary assistant going to answer the questions of the hon. member for Moose Mountain?

Mr. McCubbin: I was going to wait until all had spoken.

Mr. Charlton: Is any consideration being given to the payment of compensation for animals that died previous to the diagnosis of the disease? In the case of foot-and-mouth disease in Saskatchewan, the government paid for the clean-up and burial of these animals. Is it not fair to suggest that they do the same thing for the outbreak of hog cholera in Ontario or any other part of Canada?

Mr. McCubbin: The questions which have been asked are very fair. The questions asked by the hon. member for Moose Mountain are certainly fair, but under this amendment to the act with which we are dealing cattle are not mentioned. The amendment relates to hogs and sheep. My own feeling, and I believe it is the feeling of the committee as well, is that if any consideration is given to a change in the compensation for cattle it should be done in another amendment.

The hon. member for Brant-Haldimand has mentioned the foot-and-mouth disease out in Saskatchewan, and hog cholera in Ontario. The foot-and-mouth disease is something we hope we shall not see again, and it was dealt with under special legislation. Things were done in connection with the foot-and-mouth disease—and rightly so, of course—that we might not do in other circumstances.

In connection with hog cholera, I believe Canada is one of the few countries in the world that pays compensation for losses in this connection, and that is a condition we have had for many years. In the country to the south of us no compensation whatever is paid. It is done by the farmer himself; the government does not pay for it. Then, regarding cleaning up the premises, as has been pointed out it is not the intention of the government under this legislation to do anything in that respect. The intention only is to pay the actual price of the hogs slaughtered as the result of hog cholera.

Many hon. members will be aware of the fact that much of this difficulty has developed in some of the sale barns in Ontario. At this point I should like to commend the department of agriculture at Toronto and their livestock commissioner, Mr. Watson, for putting through legislation to assist in every way possible in bringing about a condition under which these sale barns are now better supervised than they were previously.

Mr. Charlton: I wonder if the parliamentary assistant would answer my first question. I suggested that consideration should be given to paying compensation for animals that died previous to the time diagnosis was made.

Mr. McCubbin: Of course we can consider those things. However, I do not think it is the intention to pay for animals that died prior to diagnosis being made. But if a worth-while case is made, it will be considered.

Mr. Charlton: I would point out to the parliamentary assistant that hog cholera in Ontario, or in any other part of Canada, would be just as dangerous to a community as foot-and-mouth disease in cattle. I do not see the justification for saying that it is not necessary to pay for the clean-up and burial of those animals. So long as we maintain such a policy in respect to hog cholera, then it would seem just as important to do away with those animals, to see that they are properly buried and the premises are properly cleaned, as it was in connection with foot-and-mouth disease.

There was a case last spring where hog cholera was not diagnosed as quickly as it might have been. Some animals died of the disease previous to the notice that it existed in that area. So far as I know, no compensation was paid for those animals. I do not think that is fair. The hogs died from hog cholera, that is well known; and I say those hogs should have been paid for, just the same as others.

Mr. Argue: Can the parliamentary assistant tell the committee whether payments under this amendment will be retroactive and, if so, how many cases will be covered? If payments are not to be made retroactive, on what date does the government expect the legislation will be proclaimed?

Mr. McCubbin: It has been made retroactive to May 1, 1953.

Mr. Argue: Has that arisen because of an outbreak or epidemic of hog cholera? Has a great amount of slaughtering taken place, extending back to May of 1953, which has made this legislation necessary in the opinion of the government?

Mr. McCubbin: Yes.

Mr. Argue: I am pleased to note that the legislation is being made retroactive. That is an excellent provision. If circumstances have made such an amendment necessary, then it is clear that the farmers who have suffered considerable loss should be compensated adequately. I imagine that by making the legislation retroactive to May of 1953 the objective will be accomplished. The improvement in compensation will be welcomed. It will be particularly acceptable to the swine producers, because ordinary grade hogs are being sold today on the market for a good deal more than $30. Perhaps it would amount to $50 or even $60.

When I look at section 12 of the act it would appear that cattle producers now hold a privileged position as compared with hog and sheep producers. I may be interpreting the statute incorrectly, and if I am I would be glad to hear from the parliamentary assistant. It would appear that under section 12 the owner of cattle infected with contagious disease as defined by the act is paid $100 for a purebred animal and $40 for a grade animal; and if the carcass cannot be sold, then in addition to the $100 or $40 he will receive an amount equal to the value of the carcass. So if a grade cow is slaughtered the farmer receives the market value plus $40. If it is a purebred animal he receives the market value plus $100.

Even with the suggested improvement as set out in the legislation, if I read it correctly the maximum that a swine or sheep producer may receive is the market value. No consideration is given to the fact that an animal may be purebred, and that a farmer would sustain a loss greater than the market value. When one goes out to replace an animal he cannot do it for the market value. It is clear to anyone that there are other costs involved.

If I am right when I say that the maximum a hog producer can receive, even with the new legislation, will be the market value, whereas the cattle producer can receive the market value plus $100 for a purebred animal or plus $40 for a grade animal, then the government should give consideration to this apparent discrimination as between cattle producers on the one hand and hog and sheep producers on the other. When the bill is brought down something more should be added by way of compensation than would appear in the resolution. I would ask the parliamentary assistant to comment on these points.

Mr. McCubbin: I understand the significance of what the hon. member for Assiniboia has said. The statement he has made is absolutely correct. It will be understood, of course, that he was referring to the eradication of tuberculosis, a procedure for the assistance of the producers of dairy and beef cattle across Canada.

The difference is that the tuberculosis eradication is done by the farmers themselves. A petition may be circulated in a township or a county, and if two-thirds of the farmers sign the petition the provincial government takes action and sends it on to us. We go ahead and have the cattle tested. If the cattle are rejected the owners are paid $40, plus the market value.

The market value of a cattle beast may be the value that the farmer, in sending that cattle beast to an inspected slaughterhouse, is able to obtain. If the cattle beast goes to the tank, the market value is based on that action by the packinghouse and a decision is made as to what the selling price would be if the meat had been fit for human consumption.

The matter of hog cholera is different. As I said before, Canada is the only country I know of that pays any compensation for the destruction of hogs. In Canada we felt that we were going a long way—maybe we could let it go; maybe we could live with it as they do in the United States—in being willing to compensate the farmer whose hogs had to be destroyed on account of an outbreak of cholera in his own hogs or those of his neighbour.

The government feel, as I said before, that we are going a long way in helping to assist the farmer in trying to eradicate the disease. We in Canada do not want, and I am sure the farmers feel the same way as the government does, to live with hog cholera in this country. We would like to eradicate it. I think the farmer is willing to co-operate. If we will go half-way he will co-operate with us, and that is the reason we are acting in this way. Nothing else is being done along the lines mentioned by the hon. member for Assiniboia.

Mr. Charlton: Can the parliamentary assistant say that there is no price set on a hog or sheep outside of the market value?

Mr. McCubbin: No, there is not.

Mr. Charlton: In the case of cattle and horses, there is?

Mr. McCubbin: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Charlton: In the case of sheep and swine there is not?

Mr. McCubbin: There is not.

Mr. Charlton: I do not agree with that, because there are other diseases in swine besides cholera. Are you going to say that purebred swine are to be valued at only the market value of the hog?

Mr. McCubbin: That is right.

Mr. Charlton: That is the slaughter market value?

Mr. McCubbin: That is right.

Mr. Charlton: The slaughter value or the purebred replacement value?

Mr. McCubbin: No, the slaughter value.

Mr. Charlton: Just the slaughter value?

Mr. McCubbin: That is right.

Mr. Charlton: That is not fair.

Mr. Fair: I do not think the government should let this legislation go through with the present proposal. The point I made a little while ago still holds good to the effect that people owning livestock that may be diseased are not getting proper compensation, provided that the swine or sheep are purebred. I do not think it is good enough. It would cost very little more, and I think we should go whole hog on this matter. That is farmers' language, and I think the parliamentary assistant understands it perfectly well. Let us be fair all the way through with this. We are making a special privileged class for cattle and horses, and then we are going to put the lowly hog and the innocent sheep in a degraded class by themselves.

Mr. Argue: Class distinction.

Mr. Fair: Some suggested that it is perhaps shearing the sheep, and I will not say what they said about the hogs. Let us play the game and make this uniform for all grades of stock that may be affected.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Harris thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 250, to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NORTHWEST ATLANTIC FISHERIES

MEASURE TO IMPLEMENT INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to implement the international convention for the northwest Atlantic fisheries, signed in Washington on February 8, 1949, and ratified July 3, 1950, following approval by parliament.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman, this resolution will introduce a bill to give legislative effect to the northwest Atlantic fisheries convention, which was approved by this house in July, 1950.

This is one of the series of international fisheries conventions which this country has been able to arrange for the proper protection and conservation of the fisheries on the high seas adjacent to our shores. The first was the international halibut convention, signed in 1923, covering the halibut of the north Pacific, followed by the fur seal convention and the international salmon convention. Then last year a new convention for control of the north Pacific was signed by Japan, Canada and the United States.

The area covered by the convention of this resolution is the northwest Atlantic, with the Grand Banks the principal fishery concerned. The Grand Banks are still, after 400 years of fishing, the greatest single fishery in the world, but in recent years there have been signs of depletion in one or two of the banks, which gave concern to the nations which are fishing that great fishing ground. Just after the war, meetings were arranged between those nations, and as a consequence we had this convention, which was approved by parliament. The ten nations are Canada, Denmark, Iceland, Italy, France, Norway, Portugal, Spain, the United Kingdom and the United States.

[Mr. Fair.]

Since the convention was approved in this house an administrative organization has been established. I am happy to report that because of the very attractive proposals made to the new commission by the government of Nova Scotia and the governors of Dalhousie University, the permanent headquarters of this new northwest Atlantic commission have been located at Halifax on the campus of Dalhousie University. The first chairman of this commission is our own Canadian deputy minister of fisheries, Stewart Bates, who was also honoured last week by being elected the first chairman of the new north Pacific international fisheries commission.

The commission has drafted regulations to enforce conservation measures on these banks. Now we have come to parliament to give us legal power to enforce these regulations on Canadian fishermen.

Mr. Bell: Have all the countries that originally signed the agreement ratified it?

Mr. Sinclair: That is true.

Mr. Bell: With respect to this advisory committee that is mentioned in the original convention, is that the group the minister mentioned to which Dr. Bates has been appointed?

Mr. Sinclair: Dr. Bates is chairman of the full commission, which has representatives from each of the ten nations. The chairmanship will rotate among the ten countries. The pattern is exactly the same as has been successfully developed in these other international fisheries conventions. The legislation will be almost identical with the north Pacific legislation.

Mr. MacInnis: I am not criticizing; I am merely seeking information, but why has it taken so long to get the convention ready for legislation? It is pretty nearly four years since this house ratified the convention. What were the difficulties that had to be overcome before the legislation was introduced?

Mr. Sinclair: Our other fisheries conventions were arranged with the United States, and after our experience with the first one, the halibut convention, it was very easy to work out satisfactory administrative procedures with the one nation. Four or five of the ten nations in the northwest Atlantic convention, however, had never such an international fishing convention before. It has therefore taken a little longer to work out acceptable draft regulations which will be applied to the conservation and protection of these fishing grounds.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Sinclair thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 251, to implement the international convention for the northwest Atlantic fisheries.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ONTARIO-MANITOBA BOUNDARY ACT

DEFINITION OF PROVINCIAL BOUNDARIES

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved the second reading of Bill No. 79, respecting the boundary between the provinces of Ontario and Manitoba.

Mr. Knowles: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Speaker, the boundary line between Ontario and Manitoba has been completely surveyed and marked on the ground by commissioners appointed from time to time by the provinces of Ontario, Manitoba and Canada. The two provinces have requested that the parliament of Canada pass legislation confirming the boundary, and for this purpose they have themselves passed the required legislation.

The purpose of this bill, Mr. Speaker, is to confirm the boundary between the provinces of Ontario and Manitoba in compliance with their respective requests and in accordance with the British North America Act.

In these days of the rapid development of mining and other industries, particularly in the northern section of our provinces and in the territories, it is imperative that boundary lines between the provinces be as firmly and clearly established as possible. This is vitally important not only to the provinces and territories but to the private firms and private citizens who are helping to open up new areas to development and settlement. The bill before the house is a helpful step in that direction. It seeks to establish with certainty the boundary between Ontario and Manitoba.

The history of the determination of this boundary is rather long and complicated. As a measure of assistance to this house I shall attempt to summarize briefly the historical background of this particular interprovincial boundary line, the total length of which is 609 miles.

As early as 1870 in the case of Manitoba and 1889 in the case of Ontario, the boundaries of these provinces were originally defined by statutes for the respective provinces. In 1893 an unsuccessful attempt was made by the then secretary of state for Canada to arrange with the two provinces for a survey of the boundary between them on a co-operative basis. Manitoba declined the invitation at that time, as that province did not then have the ownership of its natural resources. But Ontario did accept. As a result a commission was established composed of one representative from Ontario and one from the federal authority. This commission in 1897 and 1898 surveyed and marked a portion of the boundary.

At this stage the federal deputy minister of justice was asked to advise what further steps could properly be taken to establish the boundary between Ontario and Manitoba. The advice was given in the following terms:

> The boundary line between Ontario and Manitoba, as marked on the ground by Messrs. Stewart and Saunders, can be absolutely established only by legislation. If the legislatures of Ontario and Manitoba consent, the parliament of Canada can, by the provisions of the British North America Act, 1871, pass an act declaring that line to be the boundary between the two provinces. Orders in council of the several governments accepting the line might be passed, but these would not bind the provincial legislatures or parliament of Canada.

On October 10, 1898, the two provinces were invited to accept the boundary as marked by commissioners Stewart and Saunders. Ontario accepted the invitation and passed 62 Victoria, chapter 2. It does not appear that Manitoba passed any legislation on the matter at that time. In the absence of Manitoba's consent, no legislation was passed by the federal government.

In 1921 the two provinces were again invited to join in a continuation of the boundary line survey. Manitoba declined. Accordingly, the governments of Canada and Ontario each appointed a representative and survey work was extended to the twelfth base line and reached completion in 1921-22.

In 1929 both Manitoba and Ontario passed acts of consent, accepting and confirming as the true and unalterable boundary between the two provinces the survey that had been made by the two commissioners and marked on the ground from the northwest angle of the lake of the Woods to the twelfth base line.

The parliament of Canada did not pass any legislation at that time to confirm that part of the boundary because it was thought advisable, I am informed, to wait until the boundary was completely surveyed and marked. The last part of the boundary, from the twelfth base line to the shores of Hudson bay, have since been surveyed and marked by monuments of a permanent nature under the supervision of commissioners appointed by Manitoba, Ontario and Canada.

The two provinces have expressed the wish that the boundary line thus surveyed and marked be accepted and confirmed. Both provinces have passed acts consenting to a declaration to that effect by the parliament of Canada. The purpose of this bill is to carry into legislative effect the request of Ontario and Manitoba, and it is also in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of the British North America Act, 1871.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, there is only one thing I noticed in connection with the minister's remarks, and that was that he was very careful to avoid any use of the word "dominion" in his reference to Canada. I took his words down and he said that the new boundary was the result of surveys made by representatives of the provinces of Ontario, Manitoba and Canada.

This seems to me to indicate that, far from achieving any great national sovereignty for Canada, the sole result of the elimination of the word "dominion" has been that we have reverted to provincial status. Perhaps the minister may have some explanation to offer.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Knowles: I take it from what the minister has said and from what is set out in the bill that what we are now being asked to do in the parliament of Canada is based on the provisions of section 3 of the British North America Act, 1871, which was chapter 28 of the statutes of the United Kingdom, Victoria 34-35. Section 3 reads as follows:

> The parliament of Canada may from time to time, with the consent of the legislature of any province of the said dominion, increase, diminish, or otherwise alter the limits of such province, upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed to by the said legislature, and may, with the like consent, make provision respecting the effect and operation of any such increase or diminution or alteration of territory in relation to any province affected thereby.

Section 6 of the same statute seems to have bearing on the case of Manitoba, but it does not alter what is set out in section 3, which I have just read. The question I should like to put to the minister is this. By this act are we merely making clear the line that has been recognized, or are we altering the line in any way? If so, which province is gaining a bit of territory and which is losing, and how much?

Mr. Prudham: In 1930, by astronomic calculations, a certain point was fixed indicating the point of intersection of the 89th meridian of west longitude with the south shore of Hudson bay. In 1947 and 1948 ground surveys established that the point of intersection was actually 21·4 feet west of the point that had been established in 1930. The result of the correction was an increase of some 200 acres to Ontario. There is no doubt that section 3 of the British North America Act applies to the proposed legislation.

Mr. Knowles: I am sorry that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is not here in case he is interested in this point. What is the effect of this change on the redistribution act? Those few hundred acres which the minister refers to must be in the constituency of Kenora-Rainy River, the constituency of Springfield or possibly in the constituency of Churchill.

I do not ask this question in the levity that some people may attribute to it. It could be a very real issue. If a change is being made since the last redistribution bill was put through, and if 200 acres are involved, it is a very real question as to which constituency that piece of land is in. The minister stated that one of the reasons it was necessary to delineate this boundary was the mining developments up there. In other words, it could be that this would be not just some barren wilderness. It might be a town site. Perhaps the minister could comment on this phase of the matter.

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, I do not see that that problem is related to this bill. Certainly representation is not decided on acres. It is decided on population. It is extremely unlikely that there would be anyone living in that 200 acres.

Mr. Knowles: The minister says that representation is not decided on the basis of acreage. I would remind him that constituency boundary lines are drawn on a geographical basis, and that acreage is a geographical concept. In some areas—for instance, in the minister's constituency or in my constituency—200 acres might represent a good many people. I do not think the question should be brushed off as not being relevant just because the minister makes that statement.

The fact of the matter is that in the Representation Act there is a clause which covers the situation in case a city or municipality alters its boundaries after a redistribution act has been put through. If I remember correctly, the provision is that whatever the boundary was at the time the redistribution act was put through, that boundary stays even though a municipality or a city may change its boundaries. It is more than a matter of academic interest as to what happens when the boundary between two provinces is changed.

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, I submit that my hon. friend is borrowing trouble. It has no relation to the bill before the committee.

Mr. Fulton: Can the minister tell us how many people live in those 200 acres?

Mr. Prudham: No.

Mr. Fulton: The minister does not know. Is there anyone who does know?

Mr. Prudham: I do not suppose so.

Mr. Fulton: Do any of the other ministers know?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fulton: Have the minister's departmental officials looked into the question?

Mr. Prudham: It does not concern our department.

Mr. Fulton: It does not concern the minister's department whether anyone lives there?

Mr. Prudham: No.

Mr. Fulton: Does it concern the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources?

Mr. Sinclair: No. It concerns the provinces.

Mr. Fulton: The ministers just do not care whether or not anybody is living there and is affected by this change?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Abbott: They would still be living in Canada.

Mr. McIvor: I do not think we should be too much concerned now about this boundary line, since at the lakehead there is an energetic group of people who are fighting hard for a new province up there in northern Ontario because they think they are the forgotten people. A new line may soon be drawn, but that will be some time in the future.

Mr. Knowles: I said earlier, Mr. Chairman, that there was another section in the British North America Act of 1871 which had a bearing on this matter. At that time I said I would not take time to read it, but now I think I must do so. Section 6 of the British North America Act of 1871—and that is the act of which section 3 is the authority for what is now before parliament—reads as follows:

> Except as provided by the third section of this act, it shall not be competent for the parliament of Canada to alter the provisions of the last-mentioned act—

That refers to an act having to do with Rupert's Land and the North-Western Territory.

> —of the said parliament in so far as it relates to the province of Manitoba, or of any other act hereafter establishing new provinces in the said dominion, subject always to the right of the legislature of the province of Manitoba to alter from time to time the provisions of any law respecting the qualification of electors and members of the legislative assembly, and to make laws respecting elections in the said province.

The point I have raised is a relevant and valid one. I have read that section to indicate that when the British North America Act was amended in 1871 respecting provincial boundaries, provision was made as to the right of the province of Manitoba to legislate respecting elections in that province. In other words, if Manitoba gains in territory as a result of the moving of a line, Manitoba would have a right to take that new territory into consideration in its electoral laws. If it lost territory, it could amend its laws taking cognizance of that fact.

I submit that it is a very real question as to what happens to that area of 200 acres with respect to federal representation. The minister does not know whether or not there is anybody there. Even if no people are there now, there could be people there some time. I submit that the question should be looked into. If the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys is not able to do it, I hope the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, who knows all about representation acts, or the Secretary of State, who is responsible for matters in that field, might be ready with an answer on the point when we get to the third reading stage.

EXPLOSIVES ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING IMPORTS, OFFENCES, CERTIFICATES, ETC.

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved the second reading of Bill No. 83, to amend the Explosives Act.

Explosives Act

He said: Mr. Speaker, the Explosives Act, which the bill now before the house amends in several particulars, has had a relatively recent history. The act was first introduced in parliament in 1911, and did not pass through all its stages before the session of that year concluded. The act was again introduced in 1914 and was passed that year. Proclamation of the measure was delayed on account of world war I until 1920. The original Explosives Act was based on the British North America Act of 1875. The purpose of the legislation is to provide a measure of control in the manufacture, testing, storage and importation of explosives in the interests of public safety.

The 1914 act, proclaimed, as I have said, in 1920, continued in operation until 1946. In that year it was revised because of post-war conditions. During the course of world war II a number of regulations were made under the War Measures Act in order to secure closer and more effective control over explosives. It has become advisable to recommend a number of new amendments at this time. One of these is to make clear that the Explosives Act applies to government agencies as well as to private firms and individual citizens charged with the use or control of explosives. The amendments include a broadening of the definition of "factory" to include land adjacent to the site where the manufacture of explosives is carried on, also all buildings on the said site.

The terms of licences under the act are dealt with as well as certain regulatory measures covering the importation and manufacture of explosives in order not to endanger public safety. The amendments deal with such matters as the inspection of magazines and the destruction of explosives which appear to be abandoned or in a position to be dangerous to persons and property. During the 33 years in which the act has been in force it has proved of value as a public safeguard.

Hon. members will appreciate that in the post-war period of expansion widespread use was made of various types of explosives. As a result of this act the quality and uniformity of explosives marketed in Canada have greatly improved. Although the use of explosives marketed in Canada has quadrupled since the act was first passed the number of accidents has shown a steady decline, owing to the control exercised by inspectors of explosives under this legislation. I might add that the manufacturers have also co-operated toward this end.

[Mr. Prudham.]

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Factory.

Mr. Fulton: I notice that the purpose of this clause is to enlarge the definition of "factory" to include the site on which the factory stands. The present section reads:

> "Factory" means any building, structure or premises in which the manufacture or any part of the process of manufacture of an explosive, is carried on, and any building or place . . . within a factory site in which a finished explosive is stored.

Would the minister explain to us the necessity for the amendment? I must say that on reading through the bill there are quite a number of sections for which it is difficult to understand the necessity. I appreciate that it is desirable to make certain that the Explosives Act is clearly understood and easily enforced, but I must say that I am unable to appreciate the need for some of these amending sections. They seem to me to be mere verbiage. Can the minister say why it was considered necessary to amend this particular subsection to make it clear that "factory" includes the site; because it would be my impression that in any case that would have been the interpretation given to it by the courts. Is there a case which makes this necessary?

Mr. Prudham: This amendment is based on experience under the act. I am informed that when the word "factory" was first defined it was intended to cover by the definition not only the buildings in which the manufacture or any part of the process of manufacture of explosives is carried on but also all other buildings on the site and the site itself. The definition as it now reads seems to cover only buildings in which an explosive is manufactured or stored.

In a recent case in Ontario a person was found in the boiler room of a factory. The person was charged under section 21 of the act with trespassing upon the factory. The case was heard and the accused was found not guilty. Among the reasons given in the judgment one was that the accused, not being in a building where any part of the process of manufacture of an explosive was carried on, was not guilty of the offence with which he was charged. This amendment is to clarify that section and make sure that anyone trespassing on the premises will be liable as a trespasser.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to know whether that case was appealed. It seems to me to be an extraordinary decision.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Fulton: No, Mr. Chairman. I am trying to ascertain the necessity for this amendment, and I must say that the decision in the case to which the minister referred seems to be an extraordinary one. As I understood it, the minister said that one of the reasons, the main reason this amendment is considered necessary, is that in a case in Ontario a person found in the boiler room of an explosives factory was found not guilty of the charge because it was held that the manufacture of explosives was not carried on in the boiler room.

As I say, if I have understood the minister correctly that seems to me to be such an extraordinarily poor decision that what should have been done was to appeal it, because the present definition says that "factory" means any building, structure or premises in which the manufacture or any part of the process of manufacture of an explosive is carried on. Surely the boiler room would be part of the building in which the manufacture is carried on.

I am not questioning the fact that the decision may have been given, but if it was possible to give such a decision under the present section it seems to me that the same decision could be given under the proposed new section. What should have been done was to appeal the case to a higher court where you might have got a reversal of the decision, rather than to rush in immediately with an amendment. I should like to know whether the case was appealed.

Mr. Prudham: No, I do not think the case was appealed, but if this amendment is made no appeal will be necessary.

Mr. Fulton: Certainly in my experience that is not the usual reason law officers of the crown make their recommendations as to amendments. They usually try out the validity or enforceability of a section before expressing an opinion as to the necessity for amendment. Would the minister explain to me how it is expected that the present amendment will cure any defect, real or fancied, in the legislation which resulted in that decision?

Mr. Prudham: The proposed amendment defines more clearly what is meant by "factory".

Mr. Fulton: It does not deal with the point which the minister has cited as the reason for the amendment. The minister said the reason for the amendment was that an accused was found not guilty because he happened to be in the boiler room, and it was held that the boiler room was not a place where the manufacture of explosives was carried on. Let us compare the present proposed section with the old one.

The proposed section says:

"factory" means any building, structure, premises or land in or upon which the manufacture or any part of the process of manufacture of an explosive is carried on, the site on which such building, structure or premises are situated, and all other buildings, structures, or premises within such site;

The old section reads:

"factory" means any building, structure or premises in which the manufacture or any part of the process of manufacture of an explosive, is carried on, . . .

I am unable to appreciate how the proposed subsection would have any effect in curing the supposed defect in the present legislation.

Mr. Prudham: We have had some very competent law officers drafting this amendment. It is their opinion, and the opinion of our departmental officials, that the amendment more clearly defines the meaning of "factory".

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Application of act.

Mr. Prudham: Before we deal with clause 2, I should like to propose an amendment. The Department of National Defence is obliged to use road transportation more than in former years for the movement of explosives. This transportation may be effected by the Department of National Defence or by commercial vehicles. In the case of transportation by national defence vehicles, the necessary controls over transportation can be exercised by the department itself. The same situation does not apply in respect of commercial vehicles, in which case the safety of the public would be better ensured by the application of the regulations enacted under authority of the Explosives Act.

The following situations conceivably might arise: the transportation of Department of National Defence explosives from one depot to another or the transportation of explosives from railway points to areas or depots served only by road; the transportation of Department of National Defence explosives originating in the United States for delivery to ammunition depots; the transportation of Department of National Defence explosives from a factory in Canada to storage depots. For these reasons I would ask my colleague the Associate Minister of National Defence to move the following amendment:

Strike out all the words in line 15 and substitute the following therefor;

"3. (1) Except as provided by the regulations, this act does not apply to or in respect of any . . .

Mr. Campney: I so move, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Gauthier (Nickel Belt): I should like to say a few words about the Explosives Act. I just noticed that the minister's amendment seems to give consideration to the Department of National Defence in the transportation of explosives. Can the minister tell me whether this amendment will cover also the cargoes of commercial vehicles? Will commercial vehicles be permitted to carry more tonnage than they were permitted to carry under the old act?

Those of us who have had experience with the mining industry, which probably uses the largest part of the explosives used in this country during peacetime, find that commercial vehicles are not permitted to carry sufficient tonnage. As the minister said a few minutes ago the act was first introduced about 1910, during the days of the horse and wagon. It has not been revised since. Today there are heavy commercial vehicles capable of carrying heavy loads. Can the minister tell us if some consideration is being given by the departmental officials to increasing the tonnage permitted under the act? That is a problem facing all the mining companies in the country today. I believe the maximum load now is one ton, and that was all right in the early days. I know that today this limit is not practical; it is not economically sound when applied to mining operations.

Mr. Prudham: The whole matter is being carefully studied at the present time. The provinces and municipalities also establish limits on the loads of explosives. The whole question is being studied with the various provincial governments with a view to adjusting the old limits.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Does this act prohibit a private individual from carrying dynamite in his automobile?

Mr. Prudham: Yes, without a permit.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Can the minister tell me if a private individual needs a permit today to have explosives in his possession?

Mr. Prudham: Yes, he must have a permit if the quantity exceeds 150 pounds.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): They did during the war, but after the war that provision was removed. Has it been reinstated?

Mr. Prudham: So far as I know, it has when the quantity exceeds 150 pounds.

Mr. Pearkes: It was extremely difficult at this end of the house to hear what the minister was saying. There was a certain amount of noise, and I am afraid I did not catch the exact implications of this amendment in so far as national defence vehicles were concerned. Will the minister please explain that? If he has already done so I apologize for asking him to repeat it, but I could not hear a word that was said concerning the effect this amendment will have on national defence vehicles.

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, subsection 1 of section 3 of the act exempts the Department of National Defence from control by this department. At the suggestion of the Department of National Defence we are proposing this amendment to cover explosives belonging or consigned to the Department of National Defence while they are being transported by a commercial carrier.

Mr. Fulton: In other words, the Department of National Defence is going to be bound by any regulation made under this act.

Mr. Prudham: No, that is not correct. This act will apply to explosives or ammunition owned by or consigned to the Department of National Defence while in the hands of private carriers, but not while in the hands of the Department of National Defence itself.

Mr. Fulton: As I understand it, the proposed section will now read as follows:

> Except as provided by the regulations, this act does not apply to or in respect of any explosives under the direction or control of the Minister of National Defence.

That would be the whole of the new section 3 (1), would it not? I understand that would be the reading of the new 3 (1).

Mr. Prudham: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: Therefore it seems to me that the regulations might apply to explosives under the control of the Minister of National Defence. That seems to be obvious, does it not?

Mr. Prudham: I have another amendment to section 3 which I think will clarify what my hon. friend is asking.

Mr. Balcom: Do I understand that any movements of explosives in Halifax harbour, for instance, made by naval authorities are not supervised under this provision?

Mr. Prudham: That is right; so long as they are in the hands of the Department of National Defence, we have no control over them.

Mr. Balcom: Is the minister's department undertaking to see to it that movements of explosives such as I have described are properly supervised?

Mr. Prudham: We have no control whatever over explosives in the hands of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Fulton: The minister will have control if the amendment he is now proposing is accepted. He will note that amendment says:

Except as provided by the regulations, this act does not apply to or in respect of any explosives under the direction or control of the Minister of National Defence.

Therefore surely it must follow that the minister can make regulations governing the storage, control and handling of explosives by the Department of National Defence, if this amendment carries. Is that not so?

Mr. Prudham: This amendment is intended to cover explosives of the Department of National Defence while in the hands of private carriers, but not when such explosives are in the hands of or are being transported by the Department of National Defence itself.

Mr. Fulton: That would be a matter of regulation. But the fact remains that if this amendment carries the minister can make regulations governing the handling of explosives by the Department of National Defence, within the limits of section 4, giving him power to make regulations. In other words any regulations he can make under section 4 he can now make with respect to explosives under the control of the Department of National Defence. I think probably that is a good thing; but I am just pointing out that if this amendment now proposed is accepted, that will be the situation.

Mr. Prudham: No; the Department of National Defence has always been and still is exempted from the provisions of this act. The proposed amendment deals with explosives belonging to the Department of National Defence while in the control of or being transported by private carriers.

Mr. Macdonnell: Subject to the regulations.

Mr. Fulton: Let us start at the beginning and go through it again just to see where we are. Section 3 as it now stands reads:

This act applies to the possession, storing, sale or offering for sale, making, manufacture or importation of explosives by or on behalf of Her Majesty in right of Canada or any province except explosives under the direction or control of the Minister of National Defence.

Therefore under the present section 3, explosives under the direction or control of the Minister of National Defence are exempt. The bill now before us, letter C of the Senate and Bill No. 83 of the House of Commons, starts out by saying:

Section 3 of the said act is repealed—

That is, section 3 is wiped out.

—and the following substituted therefor:

And now we have the amendment in the form of what is to be substituted for the old section 3. This is the amendment, and I am now reading it in conjunction with the rest of the words in section 3 (1) as they appear in the bill before us. Together they will read as follows:

Except as provided by the regulations, this act does not apply to or in respect of any explosives under the direction or control of the Minister of National Defence.

If, as in this instance, there is an exception, that except as provided by regulations the act shall not apply, then the effect of the new section 3 is to say that the minister may make regulations which shall apply to the Department of National Defence. Therefore all the regulations which he may make under section 4, which is the regulation-making section, it seems to me can be applied to the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Prudham: The regulations can only be made by order in council, by the governor in council, not by the minister.

Mr. Macdonnell: That does not matter.

Mr. Fulton: I had not reached the end of the act, which says when regulations have to be made. However, I think the minister is not correct in his statement.

Mr. Prudham: It has to be approved by the governor in council.

Mr. Fulton: We will accept the minister's word when he says that regulations have to be made by the governor in council. Then the governor in council may make regulations which apply to the Department of National Defence, because that provision is now specifically covered by the exception now being enacted.

Mr. Prudham: As I said before, I shall propose another amendment. I believe if I were to read it the hon. member would be satisfied. I propose to add to section 4 of the act—

Mr. Fulton: Oh, well—

Mr. Prudham: —another clause which will be known as the new subsection (o), in these words:

(o) Prescribing the circumstances in which explosives shall for the purposes of this act be deemed to be or not to be under the direction or control of the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Fulton: That is to be an additional clause in the amending bill, is it?

Mr. Prudham: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps the minister would read it again.

Mr. Prudham: The purpose is to add to clause 3 of the bill a new subclause:

Section 4 of the said act is further amended by striking out the word "and" after paragraph (m) thereof, by inserting the word "and" at the end of paragraph (n) thereof and by adding thereto the following paragraph:

(o) Prescribing the circumstances in which explosives shall for the purposes of this act be deemed to be or not to be under the direction or control of the Minister of National Defence.

I think that covers the point.

Mr. Knowles: That does not alter the position as stated by the hon. member for Kamloops. Can we not put this in laymen's language? What is being said is that this act does not apply to the Department of National Defence unless it is made to apply to that department by means of regulations. Then the minister says that section 4 of the act, which sets out the regulations, is going to be amended. And in what way is it going to be amended? It will be amended to say that the governor in council may make regulations defining under what circumstances the governor in council can, by regulation, decide that the act is to apply to the Department of National Defence.

Is not the hon. member for Kamloops perfectly right in saying that the door is being left wide open for the governor in council to decide on this matter whichever way it wishes? He is not suggesting, and neither am I, that it is not all right to do that. As a matter of fact I think it might be a good idea. But why deny it? We have heard about double negatives, but I have not figured out whether this is a triple negative or a quadruple one.

Mr. Prudham: As I said before, this amendment was proposed by the Department of National Defence. They saw the possibility of the public not being protected adequately in certain phases of departmental operations. After lengthy consultation during the last couple of weeks with officials of the Department of National Defence, the Department of Justice and my department, it was thought that, in the light of certain circumstances which they could foresee, in which explosives belonging to the Department of National Defence might be transported by private conveyances or commercial vehicles, regulations could be set up under the act to protect the public. I think it is quite in order.

I hope I have made clear to my hon. friends what is intended. I do not know why my hon. friend fears what might be done by order in council. We have two ministers of national defence in the cabinet at the present time. I am sure the interests of national defence will be adequately looked after. This department is not anxious to encroach on their territory at all, but we are anxious to protect the public. That is why we are proposing this measure.

Mr. Fulton: The minister appears to have misapprehended the point of my remarks. What I was trying to establish was what the position would be if this amendment carries. I think we have that clear now. Under this act it will be possible to make regulations governing explosives, even though they are still under the control of the Minister of National Defence. I think that is a good thing. I am not worried about encroaching on the power of the Department of National Defence. That is the effect of the amendment now before us.

Then the minister goes on and says it is subsequently proposed to introduce another amendment, I suppose laying down the conditions upon which and the limits within which those regulations making this act applicable to the Department of National Defence may be drawn up and enacted. Well, that is all right, except that I hope the authority given under the proposed amendment to section 4 will not be too widely used so as to make it almost impossible for the minister to make regulations applying to the Department of National Defence, because I observed in my reading of the debate in the Senate, where this bill originated—and it was a limited debate—that great concern was expressed there by certain honourable senators, whom I am not going to quote, as to the necessity for power to regulate the conditions under which the Department of National Defence might handle explosives.

Therefore it seems to me that the amendment to section 3 of the bill is designed to give the minister power to do that—I am glad he will have that power—yet under section 4 his power is limited. Perhaps I cannot add too much to it. I do not see the need of the amendment to section 4, personally.

Mr. Pearkes: I have one question for the minister. He referred to explosives of the Department of National Defence being carried in vehicles. What would be the position of explosives of the Department of National Defence being carried in vessels? A large quantity of ammunition is moved from the mainland of British Columbia to various magazines on Vancouver island. It is transported by commercial vessels, not by naval vessels; by steamship, by tug and barge.

Mr. Prudham: In that instance the Department of Transport would have control of explosives transported by ship.

Mr. Pearkes: Then this act does not cover the movement of explosives of the Department of National Defence by water, by vessel?

Mr. Prudham: We control only transportation by road. The Department of Transport would have jurisdiction over the shipment of explosives in civilian vessels. If it were a national defence ship the Department of National Defence would have control.

Mr. Pearkes: Does it require an act of parliament to cover that point? Would the Department of Transport not be governed by this act, as well as the minister's department?

Mr. Prudham: The governor in council makes regulations under the Canada Shipping Act to cover such circumstances as my hon. friend mentions.

Mr. Nowlan: Does the minister mean that if explosives are being transported in Halifax harbour to the magazine, and a situation develops such as developed two years ago, control of the shipment would not be covered by this amendment to the act? Surely we are not being told that we have an Explosives Act dealing with the shipment of explosives in Canada, yet when they are moved by water they come under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Transport. I am sure the Minister of Transport would be much surprised to find out that he is responsible for that.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Fulton: We are waiting for an answer.

Mr. Pearkes: We are waiting for an answer.

Mr. Prudham: I have nothing further to add. The regulations governing the carriage of explosives on vessels would come under the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Nowlan: This act has nothing to do with the transport of any explosives by water under any circumstances whatsoever?

Mr. Prudham: By ship or vessel, no.

Mr. Nowlan: By water; I do not care whether by vessel or what.

Mr. Prudham: No.

Mr. Nowlan: I am asking about the transport of explosives by water. This act has nothing to do with that?

Mr. Prudham: Not by ships or vessels. I understand we have control of shipment made by barge or small craft.

Mr. Nowlan: In other words, with a situation such as developed at the Halifax magazine more than two years ago, the matter would come under the minister rather than under the Minister of Transport? Is that correct?

Mr. Prudham: Would the hon. member mind repeating his question?

Mr. Nowlan: As I understand it, then, a situation such as occurred two years ago at Halifax, when explosives were being transported to the magazine and an explosion occurred, would come under the minister, or would it come under the control of the Minister of Transport? I said two years ago. It was longer than two years ago.

Mr. Prudham: I do not know the circumstances to which my hon. friend refers. I could not say.

Mr. Nowlan: I will tell the minister. If he does not know he should know, because he is responsible for the administration of this act and for the control of explosives. Explosives were being transported in Halifax harbour by barge. Owing to some circumstances which were investigated the explosives caught fire, and as a result there were a series of explosions which caused loss to the Department of National Defence and also to the city of Halifax. As those explosives were being transported on that particular day, would the control of that transport come under the minister who is piloting this bill through the house or would it come under the control of the Minister of Transport?

Mr. Prudham: That is a very reasonable question. I have asked the director of the explosives division to come in, and I shall get the answer.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 2 as amended carry?

Mr. Macdonnell: As I understand it, the minister has drawn this distinction. If explosives are in barges or in small craft, then they come under this act; but if they are not in barges or small craft, in other words if they are in larger vessels, then they come under the Department of Transport. Those terms seem very vague to me. Are they defined in any way? How small is "small"?

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, this department has jurisdiction over explosives used by all craft not regulated by the Canada Shipping Act.

Mr. Nowlan: What craft are regulated by the Canada Shipping Act?

Mr. Prudham: Anything over 10 tons registered.

Mr. Macdonnell: There is another thing I do not understand. The minister has used a word which puzzles me. He said explosives used by what?

Mr. Prudham: Transported by.

Mr. Macdonnell: And that applies to 10 tons and under. That is small craft. Does that apply to a barge, for example?

Mr. Prudham: It would if the tonnage happened to be less than 10 tons. If the tonnage of the craft, regardless of whether it was a barge, boat or ship, was under 10 tons this department would have jurisdiction.

Mr. Nowlan: Has the minister consulted with the Department of Transport to see if that department has regulations governing the transportation of explosives in craft over 10 tons and parallel with these regulations. What is the purpose of passing this act if it should so happen that the Department of Transport permits the movement of explosives without any parallel regulations.

Mr. Prudham: The answer is yes.

Mr. Nowlan: Are the regulations the same?

Mr. Prudham: They are not the same, but there is no conflict.

Mr. Macdonnell: Where exactly does that leave us, Mr. Chairman? They are not the same, or so we are told, but presumably they are as good. Why are we labouring over all this to ensure the safety of the public when we might find there is another act which may deal with it in an entirely different way. Can we assume it is just as good?

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, the Department of Transport has regulations under the Canada Shipping Act governing the transportation of explosives. I am sorry I do not happen to have a copy of the regulations here, but I am given to understand they are drafted and designed to protect the public safety. I would suggest that perhaps when the Minister of Transport's estimates come up hon. members might then be able to obtain the details.

Mr. Nowlan: I know very well, Mr. Chairman, that the minister should not be held responsible for the regulations of the Department of Transport. It is quite obvious we cannot expect him to answer for that department. But if there were regulations of the Department of Transport they were either not enforced or were very poorly drafted and prescribed because of what we know happened in Nova Scotia some years ago. I am wondering just what authority there is for the passing of these regulations by the Minister of Transport. Is there a section in the Canada Shipping Act with reference to the passing or making of regulations for the control of explosives? If so, why should we have this long act before us now dealing with this matter if it can be dealt with by any minister by simply passing regulations?

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause as amended carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Macdonnell: If the minister has nothing further to say to the hon. member who has just spoken, I want to ask him a question.

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, I cannot speak for the Department of Transport. The bill before us is to amend the regulations as regards explosives under the control of this department. We have the control of explosives transported by road and control over the manufacture and storage of explosives, but we do not have control over shipping in so far as the transportation of explosives is concerned, and I am sorry I cannot answer the hon. member's question.

Mr. Macdonnell: But that does not seem to make sense. If in fact what we are doing now is trying to tighten up and improve the carriage of explosives in the manner the minister has explained, and in accordance with the restrictions he has outlined, then I presume this bill was brought in because it was considered an improvement on the existing situation. If that is so, can the minister say what improvement he is making within his jurisdiction, which presumably is worth while making because we have this bill? Are we going to have a situation left in the Department of Transport where no improvement is being made, or are the improvements contained in this bill applicable to explosives being transported by sea.

Mr. Prudham: That is right. It is considered an improvement.

Mr. Macdonnell: If that is the minister's answer I will accept it for the moment.

Mr. Nowlan: The minister has told us that the amendment which he has introduced and which the chairman is asking us to agree to is being made at the instigation or suggestion of the Department of National Defence in so far as this act is concerned. What is the position of the Department of National Defence with respect to the shipping act. If there are regulations which are parallel are they being amended? If not, why not; and if not, why should this bill be brought in?

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 2 as amended carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, I have just been told that the Department of National Defence observes the rules applying to the shipment of explosives while such explosives are on vessels under the control of the Department of Transport. The Department of National Defence observes the regulations laid down under the Canada Shipping Act regarding explosives. That is as much as I can tell the hon. member.

Mr. Gauthier (Nickel Belt): Mr. Chairman, the minister said a few moments ago that this bill covers the transportation of explosives by road. Can he tell me if consideration is being given to increasing the tonnage of explosives that may be carried in respect to road transportation?

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, I answered the hon. member on that point on a previous occasion. The whole matter is being reviewed at the present time with the provincial and municipal authorities in order to determine if any increase in the load limit is justified.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3—

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I understand the minister is going to move an amendment at the end of this clause.

Mr. Prudham: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: I want to ask him this. I grant it may not be of any fundamental importance at first sight, but I am one of those people who cannot understand the necessity of amending a statute unless the necessity becomes apparent. I would ask the minister to read paragraph (b) in clause 3 carefully and compare the new subsection (b) with the present subsection (b). In the explanatory notes to the bill we find the following:

> This amendment will authorize regulations to provide for the suspension or cancellation of licences, permits and certificates, as for example, where the holder thereof fails to comply with any provision of the act, the regulations or the terms or conditions of licences, permits or certificates.

Subsection (b) now says that the governor in council may make regulations—

> (b) prescribing the form and duration of licences, permits and certificates issued under this act, the terms and conditions upon which such licences, permits and certificates shall be issued, and the fees to be paid therefor;

Surely if the governor in council has the right to prescribe the terms and conditions under which such licences will be issued, he would have the right to say that if you commit a breach of the terms or conditions or of anything else under the act or of any regulation under the act, your licence or certificate shall be cancelled. I therefore cannot see the slightest suggestion of any necessity for this amendment.

If the minister is prepared to say that some legal authority exists or some case in which he has tried to make a regulation or in which the governor in council has tried to make a regulation prescribing the conditions upon which the licence shall be cancelled, and that that regulation has not stuck, then all right; perhaps there is a need for the amendment. Otherwise it seems to me that the section in its present form gives him an absolute right to decide the terms and conditions upon which the suspension or cancellation of a licence, permit or certificate will follow. I cannot see any need for this amendment, and I think it is wasting the time of the committee to have a section presented in this form.

Mr. Prudham: I do not think the hon. gentleman should accuse me of wasting time in this chamber.

Mr. Sinclair: The minister is the last man he should accuse of that.

Mr. Prudham: This amendment is intended to clarify the powers given under that section. It gives authority to the governor in council to provide regulations for the cancellation and suspension of licences, permits and certificates. The regulations will fix the conditions under which licences, permits and certificates may be cancelled or suspended.

Mr. Fulton: You could do that now.

Mr. Prudham: The reason for cancellation or suspension will be such things as overstocking of explosives or storing initiating explosives with blasting explosives. The regulations will also provide for temporary disposition or storing of the explosives pending further action, such as the laying of a charge against a delinquent and the disposition of such charge or charges. Section 16 of the act which is repealed by this bill provides for the suspension and cancellation of such licences, permits and certificates, but only after a person has been charged with any violation of the provisions of the act or regulations. This condition makes the administration of the act very difficult, in that most of the violations of the act are committed in very remote places with the result that an unnecessary delay in the suspension might result in a very serious accident which might otherwise be avoided.

In the second amendment under clause 3 of the bill the word "conditions" has been added for obvious reasons. It is not only necessary to prescribe the manner in which explosives shall be handled and stored but also the conditions under which such explosives may be stored. Conditions vary according to circumstances. This gives the governor in council power to prescribe for conditions as they may develop.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to ask the minister this question. Has he ever issued a permit or licence prescribing that if the holder of the permit or licence commits a breach of any of the regulations made under the act or of any of the provisions of the act, his licence shall be cancelled, and had that provision in the licence questioned in the courts?

Mr. Prudham: One of the purposes of this amendment is to prescribe that the terms of the licence should apply as well as the regulations under the act. That was indefinite before.

Mr. Fulton: My point is this. The minister is now going to have the right to authorize regulations to provide for suspension or cancellation of licences, for example, where the holder fails to comply with any provision of the act or the regulations or the terms of the licence.

Mr. Prudham: Regulations or the terms of the licence.

Mr. Fulton: No; the regulations or the terms or conditions of the licence, permit or certificate. If the minister makes it a term upon which he grants the licence that any breach of the regulations or provisions of the act shall result in suspension or cancellation of the licence, it seems to me that is all the power he needs; and he has that power now, as I read the present provision. I want to know whether the minister or his predecessor ever tried to impose conditions upon the breach of which a licence would be suspended or cancelled and had it questioned in the courts or elsewhere, as to whether he has any right to impose such conditions, because it seems to me that he has the clearest right to impose such conditions at the present time.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Mr. Fulton: No.

Mr. Prudham: I am told that in certain instances in the past it was impossible to prosecute because a misdemeanor was a breach of the terms of the licence rather than of a specific regulation. We are now proposing to make the specific regulation, so that it will be possible to prosecute if necessary.

Mr. Fulton: Then there have been cases in the experience of the department—and this was my question some time ago—where it has not been possible to prosecute. We are not dealing with prosecution here. We are dealing with cancellation of a licence. As I see it, this section does not seek to confer any right of prosecution. This section merely seeks to make it possible to impose terms or conditions upon which the licence will be cancelled. Therefore the argument which is now given is not relevant to this consideration at all, namely that prosecutions could not be launched. The question is this. Could you cancel the licence? Have you ever tried to cancel a licence or to impose terms regarding the suspension of a licence which you were not able to enforce?

Mr. Prudham: My understanding is that under the act as it was previously, you had to prosecute before you could cancel a licence.

Mr. Fulton: You had to prosecute?

Mr. Prudham: You had to prosecute before you could cancel. This provision permits cancellation prior to the legal procedure.

Mr. Fulton: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but I am unable to follow the argument. I must confess that one of the disadvantages we are under here is that while this bill was apparently considered by the banking and commerce committee of the Senate, and these amendments were reported to the Senate, the discussion in the other house occupied just under one full page of Hansard. There is no detailed discussion of the amendment, and unfortunately there is no Hansard report of proceedings in the committee of the other house. There is therefore not much we can get by way of previous information about this bill.

I regret that I am unable at the moment to understand the application of the argument being made by the minister. This section does not ask for the right to prosecute. I cannot understand that on any previous occasion it would have been necessary to prosecute before you could cancel the licence, because the minister had the power to prescribe the form and duration of the licence and the terms and conditions upon which it should be issued. Therefore, if he had that power, he could have said that one of the terms upon which the licence was issued was that any breach of the regulations or other provisions of this act would result in automatic cancellation. Why would he have to prosecute? Surely he would cancel, and then the person holding the licence might bring an action questioning his right to cancel.

I am asking the minister if any such action was ever brought and whether the right to cancel has ever been questioned by the courts. I have not had an answer yet.

Mr. Prudham: I am told that our legal advisers doubted the validity of the previous clause, and this amendment will give the same powers to the terms of a licence that we now have by regulation.

Mr. Fulton: Oh, well, Mr. Chairman, it becomes a little bit problematical as to whether one should hold up this clause any further. I can only say that the minister has not satisfied me. I say, with due respect, that he has not satisfied me that he needs this amendment in order to have the power to cancel licences. I certainly do not question the good faith of his legal advisers or anybody else who is advising him, but I say in all seriousness that ministers should not bring amendments before the house without being able to give us more substantial grounds for them than are now being presented to us. Having made that comment, I shall not continue to oppose the adoption of this section.

Mr. Prudham: I should like to read the proposed amendment once again:

Add to clause 3 of the bill a new subclause as follows:

(3) Section 4 of the said act is further amended by striking out the word "and" after paragraph (m) thereof, by inserting the word "and" at the end of paragraph (n) thereof and by adding thereto the following paragraph:

(o) prescribing the circumstances in which explosives shall for the purposes of this act be deemed to be or not to be under the direction or control of the Minister of National Defence.

I would ask my colleague the Associate Minister of National Defence to so move.

Mr. Campney: I so move.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

On clause 4—Authorized explosives only.

Mr. Harkness: I have two questions I should like to ask the minister on this clause. What is meant by "authorized explosive" as found in the last line of the clause? In other words, what is the difference between an authorized explosive and an unauthorized explosive? Second, what is the position under this clause, and I presume also under the foregoing clause, of a farmer who has a certain amount of dynamite on his farm for the purpose of blowing up stumps or anything else he may use it for? Is he required to have a permit or a legal form to have the dynamite in his possession?

Mr. Prudham: Supplementary to what I said earlier, no one needs a permit to buy explosives at the present time.

Mr. Harkness: Under this section apparently a man needs a permit in order to have them in his possession or to store them or to use them. That is why I want to know the position of a farmer who uses a little dynamite for ordinary purposes around his farm?

Mr. Prudham: An authorized explosive is an explosive that has been tested by the explosives division of this department and has been given authorization as a safe explosive. Any explosive that does not have that authorization is illegal.

Mr. Harkness: As I understand it, if a man has an explosive which has not been given explicit authorization by the department he is in breach of the law. How is he to know whether or not it has been given authorization?

Mr. Prudham: Only authorized explosives are manufactured in Canada.

Mr. Harkness: What about the ones that are imported?

Mr. Prudham: Imported explosives also have to have a clearance or authorization from this department.

Mr. Harkness: To come back to my question about the farmer, which the minister has not answered, the minister said that the farmer did not have to have a permit in order to purchase explosives, but what about this section that says he may not have them in his possession or store or use them?

Mr. Prudham: The section is designed to cover explosives that might be imported for purposes of experimentation. It regulates the quantity and the conditions under which such explosives may be imported.

Mr. Knowles: Ten o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 4 carry?

Mr. Harkness: In order to be sure on this point, do I understand the minister to say that a farmer can buy, keep and use explosives without a permit?

Mr. Prudham: An authorized explosive, anything that is authorized.

Clause stands.

Progress reported.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: On Thursday we shall continue with this debate. When it is concluded we shall take second reading of the bill to amend the Patent Act; then second reading of the bill respecting the Canadian forces, the bill respecting benefits for members of the Canadian forces, the bill respecting the War Service Grants Act, the bill respecting the national battlefields at Quebec, the bill with respect to the northwest Atlantic fisheries as a consequence of the resolution having passed tonight, and then second reading of the bill to amend the Telegraphs Act. It has been suggested that on Friday we might consider the Criminal Code throughout the day.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, February 10, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

QUESTIONS

AUDIENCE RESEARCH, C.B.C.

Mr. Thatcher:

1. Has the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation recently set up a bureau of audience research?

2. If so, (a) what is the purpose of such a bureau; (b) how many people are employed by the bureau; (c) what is the estimated annual cost to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation; (d) was consideration given to utilizing experienced private agencies to do this work?

Mr. McCann:

1. Yes.

2. (a) To direct and co-ordinate research to determine the size, composition and characteristics of listening and viewing audiences and to investigate the reaction and preferences of Canadians to radio and television programs. The functions of the bureau will include qualitative as well as quantitative surveys; (b) Two; (c) Only a small staff will be employed. As a director was appointed only on January 1, 1954, there has not yet been sufficient time for the corporation to establish a definite budget on a yearly basis; (d) Yes. Several private agencies have been employed in the past and it is expected that the services of such agencies will be required in the future.

WAR VETERANS PENSIONS

Mr. Nicholson:

What has been the total pensions paid to Canadian veterans of (a) world war I; (b) world war II; (c) other war service?

Mr. Bennett:

Expenditures include those to pensioners and their dependents:	Expenditures as at 31st January, 1954
(a) World war I	$1,419,681,470 22
(b) World war II	458,625,407 74*
(c) (i) Special force (Korea)	786,241 49
(ii) Northwest rebellion (supplementary, section 55)	617,011 00	approx.
(iii) South African war (supplementary, section 54)	360,117 00
(iv) Newfoundland special awards	141,471 84
Total	$1,880,211,719 29

* Includes civilian war pensions.

Expenditures for the Northwest rebellion and South African war are not available; the expenditure shown here is approximate.

SEASONAL UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Knowles:

1. Is there a subcommittee of the national council on manpower dealing with the question of seasonal unemployment?

2. If so, how long has this body been studying or investigating this matter?

3. Have any other sections or committees in the Department of Labour been studying or investigating this matter and, if so, for how long?

4. Have any recommendations yet been made with respect to the problem of alleviating seasonal unemployment?

5. If so, what are such recommendations?

6. Will any reports or recommendations on this question be dealt with during the present seasonal unemployment crisis?

Mr. Gregg:

1. Yes.

2. The national employment committee was asked by the national advisory council on manpower on December 10, 1952, to examine the question of seasonal unemployment and report back to the council.

3. The economics and research branch of the Department of Labour is assisting the national employment committee in conducting a survey of employers throughout Canada in regard to seasonal unemployment. It is also conducting statistical and other related studies on the extent and nature of seasonal unemployment in Canada.

4. A preliminary report on seasonal unemployment, including the results of the survey of Canadian employers, was considered at the last meeting of the national employment committee held in Winnipeg early this winter. This report which will contain recommendations for future action will be further considered at the next meeting of the national employment committee to be held in Ottawa on February 15, 1954.

5 and 6. See answer to No. 4.

UNEMPLOYED PERSONS, MANIWAKI, QUE.

Mr. Balcer:

1. How many persons were registered as unemployed on the lists of the unemployment insurance office at Maniwaki, Quebec, on December 1, 1953, January 1, 1954 and February 1, 1954?

2. Also on December 1, 1952, January 1, 1953 and February 1, 1953?

UNEMPLOYED PERSONS, HULL, QUE.

Mr. Balcer:

1. How many persons were registered as unemployed on the lists of the unemployment insurance office at Hull, Quebec, on December 1, 1953, January 1, 1954 and February 1, 1954?
2. Also on December 1, 1952, January 1, 1953 and February 1, 1953?

Mr. Gregg: I am answering the first parts of both these questions. If the hon. member will repeat his question with regard to February 1, I will provide the answers as soon as possible. The answer to the first question, as far as it can be given, is as follows:

1. Applications for employment: December 3, 1953, 360; December 31, 1953, 784.

2. Applications for employment: December 4, 1952, 177; December 31, 1952, 287.

The answer to the second question is as follows:

1. Applications for employment: December 3, 1953, 1,873; December 31, 1953, 2,835.

2. Applications for employment: December 4, 1952, 1,491; December 31, 1952, 2,108.

FARM LOAN BOARD COMMISSIONER

Mr. Zaplitny:

1. Who is the commissioner of the Canadian farm loan board?
2. When was he appointed to this position?
3. Were any farm organizations consulted by the government before the appointment was made? If so, what organizations?
4. Did these organizations recommend or approve the appointment?
5. What qualifications and/or past experience does the commissioner possess which would recommend him for this position?
6. Has the commissioner ever been a candidate for public office?
7. If so, when and which political party did he represent?

Mr. Benidickson:

1. Frank L. Chester.
2. January 25, 1954.
3. No.
4. Answered by No. 3.
5. Thirty years of business experience in the four western provinces.
6. Yes.
7. Winnipeg city council 1947-50.
   Manitoba legislature 1949—Liberal Progressive.
   Federal election 1953—Liberal.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

WATER POLLUTION—NORTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all letters and telegrams which have passed since the 12th of November 1953, between any department of the federal government and the provincial governments of each of the provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba, together with reports made to the federal department of health by all officials, investigators or analysts of said department, relative to the pollution of waters of the North Saskatchewan river by the alleged dumping into the river at a point near Edmonton, Alberta.

Mr. Robertson: As the hon. member has asked for copies of communications between this government and provincial governments it will of course be necessary to secure the permission of the provincial governments concerned, and steps have been taken accordingly. With respect to the reports made to the Department of National Health and Welfare by its officers, while these reports have always been considered privileged, in this instance we are pleased to bring these papers to the attention of the hon. member.

Mr. Coldwell: I rise on a question of privilege. The parliamentary assistant to the minister said that it is necessary to get the permission of the provincial governments to table these documents. Is it not a matter of courtesy rather than an obligation to get permission? As I said the other day, the practice seems to have changed over the last few years, and I think it should be straightened out.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It has always been the practice to get the consent of the provincial government before tabling documents transmitted from that government to the federal government.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the remarks made by the parliamentary assistant, this motion is carried.

UNITED NATIONS

TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE ORGANIZATION FUND—INCREASE IN CANADA'S CONTRIBUTION

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway) moved:

That in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation at this session to substantially increase Canada's contribution to the United Nations technical assistance organization fund.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is with some hesitancy that I rise to speak in support of this resolution, although I am very earnest in expressing the opinion that we should increase our contribution to the United Nations technical assistance organization fund.

Sometimes in this house we hear criticisms of the United Nations. We hear it said that there is too much talking and too little in the way of achievement. I am afraid that those who indulge in that sort of criticism fail to make a proper appraisal of the achievements of the United Nations during a difficult period. I am afraid, too, there is a tendency to forget that the United Nations itself represents a new concept in international affairs. Briefly its purpose, as I see it, is to promote co-operation amongst its members, and along with that to encourage the wealthier nations to help the poorer ones.

I think the house will agree with me that is a relatively new concept in international affairs. The United Nations has created a number of agencies in order to accomplish the purposes I mentioned, among which is the technical assistance organization fund. It is really these agencies, and not the United Nations itself, that do the work for which the United Nations was brought into being. I consider the purpose of the technical assistance fund to be of the greatest importance. I believe the government of Canada should support the fund to the limit of our ability.

I should like to say a brief word about the history of the technical assistance program. It was approved by the general assembly in November, 1949, and was created to meet the great need of the underdeveloped nations for technical aid. It was intended to be a means of implementing economic and social co-operation, a fundamental task of the United Nations as set out in article 55 of the charter. Perhaps the progress made in this endeavour has not been as great as we would have liked. The program probably has not been assisted financially by a number of nations to the extent necessary, and perhaps this is a reason why Canada's aid has not been greater than it has. Whatever the reason may be, my purpose today is to urge that Canada give greater financial support than has been the case in the past.

The program got off to a rather poor start. The amount voted for its work in 1950 only amounted to $20 million. I can recall another $20 million that was voted for a certain purpose in this country. After the general election of 1930, when unemployment was the great issue in Canada, a special session was called to deal with that problem. A sum of $20 million, which at that time was considered to be a large sum of money, was voted to resolve the problems caused by unemployment. Needless to say, the $20 million proved to be totally inadequate for that purpose. When we think of such a sum in relation to the great problems that are facing what we are pleased to call the "underdeveloped countries", we must realize how paltry it is. This $20 million was to cover a period of 18 months, and Canada's contribution was $850,000. If my memory serves me correctly, about 55 nations contributed, so that was considered to be not too bad a contribution by Canada.

For some reason our contribution in 1952 was reduced by $100,000 and was only $750,000. Probably the reason for that was that the total pledges of all countries was $19 million instead of $20 million. The economic and social council recommended a minimum of $25 million for 1953. Canada again promised to contribute $750,000, with an additional $100,000 on condition that the total of $25 million was contributed. I do not believe that the $25 million was raised, but in any case the Canadian government contributed another $50,000, bringing our total contribution for 1953 up to $800,000.

In my opinion, the expenditure under this heading should not be considered as a charitable handout. It should be considered as a part, and a very important part, of our defence program. I may refer to that again, but if there is one point I wish to get over to the house during the course of my remarks, it is that this contribution to the technical assistance fund should not be considered as a charitable handout, but what it is—that is if we make it of sufficient importance—a material factor in our program for peace. As a matter of fact, I believe government spokesmen at the United Nations agree with me in that contention. I am informed that the requests for economic and technical assistance from needy countries literally poured into United Nations headquarters in 1953, and that because of the lack of adequate financial means a large number of requests could not be met.

It seems strange to me that, although Canada's representative on the economic and social council in 1953 supported recommendations for a general increase in the United Nations budget for technical aid of approximately 31 per cent, Canada offered to increase her own share by only 13 per cent. To indicate how insignificant the total United Nations budget for technical assistance is—I have already made one comparison with the $20 million we voted for unemployment in 1930—I might state that in 1950 the city of New York spent nearly $57 million on garbage removal and street cleaning alone. The total appropriation for technical assistance during any year since the program was launched was considerably less than half of that amount.

In 1949 a committee of experts was set up by the economic and social council to investigate the problem of assisting backward countries. The report of the committee, a 108-page document, was issued in May 1951. It dealt with the question of development in the underdeveloped countries. How unrealistic is the financial aspect of the United Nations technical program becomes clear as one reads the findings of this report.

The committee estimated that in order to increase by 2 per cent the per capita national incomes in the underdeveloped areas would require an annual capital import well in excess of $10 billion. This report is well worth reading, and if hon. members can get it I am sure they would be well repaid for the time taken to read it. I think copies are difficult to get. I know I borrowed one from the Department of External Affairs.

I shall quote briefly from this report at pages 84 and 86. At page 84 under the heading "Intergovernmental Grants" I find this:

> The principle that the better off should help to pay for the education, the medical services and other public services received by the poorer classes of the community is now well established within every member nation of the United Nations. The idea that this principle should also be applied as between rich and poor countries is relatively new.

I emphasize this point, and I think it is something we must keep in mind. It is not only new for the countries that are trying to help, but it is also new for the countries that are being helped. Difficulties may arise there, in addition to the difficulty of finding enough funds from the countries that are helping. It continues:

> It has however been put into practice on several occasions. The work of UNRRA is an outstanding example of United Nations collaboration in this sphere.

Then in the paragraph before that—and I read that one first because I felt it should be in that order—the committee of experts has this to say:

> We therefore urge most strongly that some mechanism be created by transferring from the developed to the underdeveloped countries, by way of grants-in-aid, a sum of money which should increase rapidly, reaching eventually a level of about $3 billion a year. This would be equivalent to rather less than one per cent of the national incomes of western Europe, Australasia, the United States and Canada.

I imagine that the countries in this group are the ones that provide most of the funds for the purposes of the technical assistance organization. Then the committee goes on to say:

> We do not suggest that aid should be given unconditionally to underdeveloped countries. This would not be wise. Each grant should be linked to a specific function, and there should be international verification that the funds are used only for the purpose for which they have been granted.

I think everyone will agree that that is an excellent recommendation.

Then, here are some of the purposes for which the committee of experts indicated the fund could be used:

> (a) Research and education. This includes grants for agricultural extension services, technical schools, farm schools, local universities and for training technicians abroad, grants to departments of governments, research institutes or universities, wherever located, working on problems of underdeveloped countries;
> (b) Public health programs, emphasizing preventive medicine and nutrition rather than curative medicine;
> (c) Subsidization of medium- and short-term farm credit;
> (d) Improvement of rural public works. This includes grants for roads, rural water supplies, land reclamation, drainage, soil conservation, afforestation.

I am sure these are very practical purposes. There is nothing fancy, if I may use that term, in the purposes proposed by the committee of experts.

When the question of establishing a special United Nations fund for economic development was discussed by the economic and social council in October of last year, Canada's representative took the position that Canada was unable at the present time to consider contributing to a development fund, because of the heavy burden of our defence expenditures.

In discussing the proposal, Canada's representative, according to a report in the Montreal Star of October 28, 1953, made this statement:

> When sufficient progress has been made in a world-wide scheme of disarmament the Canadian government will undertake to ask the Canadian people to devote any portion of the savings thus achieved to an international fund of the United Nations.

That is to me at least very heartening information. I hope the government means to carry out what its representative asserted on that occasion.

May I say at this point that when I first drafted the resolution to which I am now speaking, it contained another paragraph which I deleted before the resolution reached Votes and Proceedings. That paragraph was pretty much along the same lines as the assertion attributed to Canada's representative at the United Nations, according to the report in the Montreal Star of October 28, 1953.

I believe it was at the same meeting, that of October 28, 1953, the Canadian representative at the United Nations announced that the Canadian government, subject to parliamentary approval, was prepared to increase its contribution to the 1954 expanded program of technical assistance up to a maximum of $1,500,000 U.S. It was stated that this increased contribution would be made if the support for the 1954 program by other countries warranted such action, and if the total of the contributions was sufficient to make a reasonable and workable program.

This may not be an exact quotation, but I took it from the monthly bulletin of the Department of External Affairs for the month of November 1953, at page 323. I regret very much however—the minister may be able to give a reason for it when he speaks—that the item in the estimates for the year 1954 is only $850,000.

As I said, the suggestion made by Canada's representative at the United Nations of increasing the amount that we contribute to technical assistance as soon as the burden of military preparedness is lessened, because of the easing of world tension, is an excellent one, and I do hope, as I know we all do, that the lessening of world tension may enable the government to act on it without delay. I really believe that a start could be made at this session. Indeed I hope—and "hope" is not too strong a word—that the government is not going to renege on that intention.

I hold in my hand the text of a statement made on November 12 by the Canadian representative at the fourth technical assistance conference, and I wish to quote from it because it meets I think in its entirety with my complete approval. It reads:

> I am sure that we all agree that the war on want is the road to peace.

If war on want is the road to peace—and may I say that I agree; I have already indicated that in what I said—then we should consider any contribution under this head not as something to aid people over a difficult period but as something to raise the standard of living of people in less favoured countries than our own, and thus build the sort of atmosphere that makes for peace rather than war.

The statement continues:

> The United Nations technical assistance program, by helping to improve standards of living and thus increasing the sense of security and brotherhood among the peoples of the world, is a considerable factor in the building of firm foundations for world peace. In another way, too, it helps in achieving this same purpose. We all know that changes in methods of production, in industrial technology and so on, are likely to hurt someone, even though in the long run the great majority may benefit from them. Our technical assistance program, by providing training and guidance where they may be most needed, can facilitate adjustment to the new ways and reduce to a minimum the temporarily harmful effects of too rapid industrial change. It is of course in the nature of a pilot plant—an experiment, but so far a successful one; . . .

May I interject here that this has been in my opinion so successful that we should not hesitate to increase our contribution to it. The statement goes on:

> —successful not least because all countries can contribute something useful to others. In fact, and from a selfish point of view, though we do not expect to be the direct recipient of technical assistance ourselves, we are sure that we, like others, shall share in the benefits of the program as a whole.

I said I was reading this because it is an excellent statement which every hon. member can approve. Before this debate on the resolution concludes I hope we shall have an expression of opinion, if not by a vote, at least by word of mouth, from those who are supporting the resolution that we do believe in this approach to this very important problem.

Mr. F. T. Fairey (Victoria, B.C.): I rise to give my unqualified support to the resolution just introduced by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis). I do so because I have had some experience in underdeveloped countries, and I can testify to the value of this particular program. In my opinion the resolution suggests a form of assistance to underdeveloped countries, particularly those in the Far East or the Asian countries, which far exceeds in effectiveness any other proposal that has ever been made.

It must be remembered that while I support this suggestion, that Canada should be generous in the amounts set aside for this particular program, she is already, in company with many other countries of the commonwealth and indeed other members of the United Nations Organization, contributing and doing much in this field. One has only to learn something of the work of such organizations or agencies as UNESCO, the world health organization, UNICEF, the international labour organization and many other agencies. All of them have done work of this kind to improve the conditions of those people who live in countries which we are describing as underdeveloped. It must be realized, too, that all of them are based upon the fundamental concept that the best form of assistance is that which helps a person or a country to stand upon its own feet, and to stimulate a desire for self-development and improvement, to the end that self-support and independence may be the final result.

It is important, too, to understand that no self-respecting nation wishes to be the spasmodic or even the constant recipient of gifts in the form of charity. It does not matter in what form those gifts may be made, unless there is a program which will stimulate the self-development of those people, then it fails just by that much. There is in all these countries the hunger for that kind of help which does no violence to individual or national pride.

It is well known that throughout all those "have not" countries there is a stirring of national consciousness and pride. This is desirable because it is accompanied by a desire to improve standards of living, which can only come about under two conditions, in my opinion: One, the absence of war and rumours of war; two, by receiving advice from those countries better developed, and continuing to give technical assistance so that the industries and resources of those countries may be developed by the use, or the implementation of suggestions leading to the use, of better techniques.

I would assert, Mr. Speaker, in fact, I know from actual experience, that assistance of the kind anticipated by this resolution is the only kind likely to achieve the thing we have in view, namely, the lifting up of our unfortunate brethren to a fuller and more satisfying life. I think Canada is especially placed in this regard and in a position to take the lead in this respect. I say frankly, and once again from actual experience, that there is no suspicion of ulterior motives attached to the name "Canada". In this we are unique. No matter how much they do or for how long other countries have been participating in these programs, there has always been a suspicion in the minds of some people: "What is the aim of this system?" No such suspicion attaches to Canada. That is why I think we are in a favoured position. We can move along and do what we can to help these people. Our ultimate objective is not questioned.

It was my good fortune in 1950-51 to represent Canada as a member of a three-man educational mission to Burma, one of the Asian countries. I spent six months in that delightful country travelling from north to south and from east to west. Our mission was educational in character. We were to investigate all aspects of the educational system of that country and make such recommendations as we thought proper for its improvement.

My own particular assignment had to do with the subject matter of the resolution which we have before us; it was in the field of technical and vocational education. It was my good fortune to see something of the conditions in India, Pakistan and Thailand from brief visits. I was also able to consult with scores of people representing varied groups, all with the same object in view—giving technical advice of one kind or another and assisting in various ways. I mention this trip of mine only to support my views as being based upon experience. In other words, I think I know what I am talking about and that is useful.

Mr. Gillis: And unusual.

Mr. Fairey: Burma is typical of other countries in that part of the world. It is a potentially rich country with most delightful people. But they are badly educated; they are wrongly educated in that their education has not fitted them to develop their own resources and to make their contribution where they live. Here we have a people with a national consciousness who feel constantly that they want to run their own show but who are frustrated because they feel unable to do it. They are rich in resources but poor in their ability to develop those resources.

I stated earlier that in my opinion the best form of assistance is one in which we take the long view. By hastening slowly we can put these people in a position, by training and education and guidance and help, to develop their own resources and to exploit them for themselves. Thus and thus only they may be able to raise their standards of living and contribute to the progress of society.

Of course the first thing they want is peace, because it is only under a condition of peace that they can obtain those skills which we hope to impart to them. You hear the cry throughout the Far East, India for the Indians, Burma for the Burmese, and so on. They do not want gifts from above unless they are given with the distinct understanding that the country is to be developed by its own people.

In my opinion it is useless to send out technicians and engineers unless they are going to institute a training program to train the people in those countries to become engineers and technicians. How can I do otherwise than urge a more generous attitude on the part of my own country when I have made certain recommendations in connection with Burma? I should like to quote some of the recommendations which I made. They are as follows:

1. That a director of technical education be appointed to serve in the department of education. That he be responsible for the over-all organization and direction of all forms of practical education.
2. That an advisory board of leaders in industry and engineering be appointed to act in a consultative capacity on technical education.
3. That at least two officials be appointed to plan and supervise actual instruction and to organize and conduct instructor-training courses.

United Nations

4. That the Insein Technical Institute be re-opened and furnished with the necessary equipment and teaching staff.

The institute was in a state of disrepair.

5. That consideration be given to the establishment of additional technical and vocational schools as soon as possible.

6. That the apprentice-training centre be re-organized in more suitable buildings.

7. That practical shop courses be planned for the secondary schools.

8. That consideration be given to the organization of mobile instruction units to instruct persons engaged in cottage industries in more efficient methods.

9. That agricultural colleges investigate the possibilities of extension work by the use of short-term courses or demonstrations by teams of competent instructors.

Perhaps I might develop one or two of those recommendations, particularly the one with respect to cottage industries. May I presume to explain to the house the conditions under which the people live in countries such as I am describing. This is an agricultural country, as most of them are, with a one-crop economy, that of rice. Between the harvesting of the crop and the planting of the new crop there is a long period of time. In most villages the people engage in cottage industries. That is to say, in their own homes they make a variety of articles. They weave silk, they make articles of apparel, ornaments and tools of various kinds.

If I may digress for a moment, I found boys and men making with very crude tools, cigarette lighters which they sold for seven rupees or $1.50 per dozen. They do very nice work in all these cottage industries; in fact they do marvellous work, but their tools are very crude and their output is limited. In other words, these people are living under substandard conditions. It is most certain they could increase their production and the saleability of their goods if they had proper instruction in more modern techniques, and particularly if they could be supplied with the proper tools and equipment. That is why one of the recommendations was that mobile units go around to give proper instruction. We felt, and I used this expression before, that we should make haste slowly.

That brings me to another point in connection with finance. I have supported the idea that Canada and other countries should be more generous in the provision of financial help to increase the ability of these people to develop their own resources. But I submit that it is not only the voting of money that will be effective. You can use only so much money at a time. We should vote sufficient money to initiate a program capable of being carried out and gradually increase it as we go along.

If I may summarize what I have said, Mr. Speaker, I would say, in conclusion, that there is a great need. There is no doubt about that. We have vast numbers of people living in conditions under which we could not survive. They are ignorant of modern methods in regard to almost anything you could mention.

I was particularly struck with the efficiency and valuable work done in this regard by the world health organization. When you see the conditions under which so many people live and eat, you are appalled that any of them are alive. I am thinking of one country in particular where the infant mortality rate is 50 per cent up to the age of 10, and that I believe is due to the fact that they are absolutely ignorant of any notion of sanitation, food preparation, food care, child care, and care of expectant mothers.

In my opinion the best organization we have in the whole gamut of world organizations is the world health organization, because unless people are living healthy lives you cannot do much for them. However, here we have a need and an urge from the people themselves. They want to develop their own country themselves. They want to be shown how to do it and then left alone. They do not want someone dominating them and telling them, "This is the way we do it in Canada and therefore you must do it in this way." In assisting these people we should recruit the type of person who understands them, their desires and aspirations and who will help them to build themselves up. It will be a slow process.

These people have a desire for peaceful development in order to become self-supporting. They have inadequate finances. In the country which I have described, the national budget was U.S. dollars $118 million, and they have an army, a navy and an air force. Perhaps I should complete the picture by stating that the total population is about 18 million people.

So far as Canada and the other western nations are concerned, it is essential that these people be persuaded that we have the very best of intentions. There is no doubt about it, Mr. Speaker, that to a program of this kind, while it has all the qualities we attach to it, among them being the idea of helping our fallen or underprivileged brethren, there attaches another practical and unquestionable value. It is no good talking to people who have very little to eat and ask them to choose between democracy and communism. They do not care two pins about that. They do not understand what we are talking about. The thing to do is to show them by example and precept that we are interested in them and that our way of life is the better way of life.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, what do we get out of it as a nation? I believe we get the satisfaction of doing with our abundance something which will help those in poorer circumstances. That is about all. But we will make friends and surely this is an opportunity not to be neglected.

Mr. Elmore Philpott (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I want to give all the support I can to the resolution moved by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis), except in regard to one or two small details. I cannot agree with his split infinitive because I do not think that would get by my editor. Apart from that I am 100 per cent in accord with this resolution, which calls for a substantial increase in the technical assistance grant.

I believe it is typical of this government that when the question first arose at the United Nations last fall, and when there was some suggestion that some of the other countries might cut down their grants for technical assistance, many people in Canada, solidly behind the United Nations, began to get nervous and make inquiries of the government, and one of the clearest-cut answers we ever got about extra spending of money by the government was that perhaps there would be extra funds forthcoming for this purpose.

I myself, Mr. Speaker, have written quite a few letters to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) on various subjects, each suggesting that perhaps a little more money could be spent on this or that, and it was like trying to get blood out of a stone. But at least we did get a little blood out of the stone in this particular respect.

Seriously speaking, though, I believe this is one of the most important matters to come before the house and before our whole generation. In connection with my own duties as a newspaper writer over the past few years I have had the great privilege and responsibility of travelling a good deal in many of the countries with which these technical assistance grants are chiefly concerned, namely those countries along the northern shores of Africa, that part of the world we call the Middle East, and out into Pakistan, India, Ceylon, and so on.

I came home from these trips, Mr. Speaker, convinced that we are living at a great turning point in history, and at the end of that three or four hundred year period of history which we know as the age of the white man's rule; although why anyone should refer to us, dirty greys or pale pinks, as whites I have never been able to figure out. However, the historical age of the white man's domination has come to an end. Those particular circumstances which existed for three or four hundred years, and under which the part of the human race which we represent happened to have a supremacy over the rest of the human family, which it never had before and will never have again, have gone. The great and fundamental question of our time is how the transition is going to be made from the age of white man's supremacy to the age of partnership and equality between all the great racial sections of the human family.

There was one minor point, perhaps of emphasis, which the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway made and with which I would slightly disagree, to this extent, that we should consider this, as I understood him to say, as part of our national defence.

I believe we have to be very careful when we begin to think of technical assistance grants in terms of our national defence. In my opinion, in countries such as India there is one thing they are afraid of more than anything else, and that is that organized benevolence from western countries is tied up with some ulterior purpose such as defence. I believe one of the terribly unfortunate consequences, for example, of the attempt to establish American bases in Pakistan and its repercussion in India arose more from that simple fact, because the nations of Asia are fearful that there may be ulterior motives in these great humanitarian purposes.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, when I came home from these crucial parts of the world I came home with the belief that we are at a great turning point in history. In countries such as, say, Egypt, or the Arab states, or any of these Moslem countries—what might be called the whole brown belt of the earth—you see these depressed and ignorant people just pushing up as it were through a thin shell, and one can see that they are determined to have a larger share of the good things of life. Surely we have a great opportunity to give them that in a new guise. As far as I could see, nothing in that part of the world has so changed the opinion of the peoples of those countries and helped to dissipate their suspicions. I would say that the greatest contribution there has ever been to a better understanding between Asia and the west is our own Colombo plan, and I would certainly hope that either in this debate or on an early occasion the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) would report on his inspection of the Colombo plan projects, because I have heard him speak on it and it is one of the finest speeches I have heard, so far as a firsthand account of what the Colombo plan means is concerned.

I think, however, there is a very real point implied in the suggestion of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis), that we should be extremely careful not to suggest to the people of these backward or so-called underdeveloped countries that we are holding out a helping hand to them only to keep them alive long enough so that they may be able to fight on our side in some future war with Soviet Russia. I think there is a very real and vital purpose involved and that we have a very real basis of self-interest in making sure that these great undecided countries of that crucial part of the world do receive effective assistance from the West in time.

I travelled through many of the countries that our Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is going to visit, and I came home from the East convinced that the peoples of these undecided countries in Africa, the Middle East and South Asia are not so ignorant that they do not realize the situation. All of them are looking to the two greatest and most populous nations of the East. The most populous nation, and potentially the greatest nation on earth, is of course China, which has gone communist. The second most populous country in the world is India, which is trying to adapt western democracy to that Asian soil. To my mind the most heartening and gigantic landmark of that area, of such great promise for the future of democracy, lies in the fact that that country, which had never known any democracy and where only a tiny fraction of the people know how to read and write, could stage its great national election and render a verdict with just as much intelligence and orderliness as has ever been rendered in our own mature democracies of the West.

That is a lesson to us. But make no mistake that all of the undecided peoples of the earth in Africa, the Middle East and South Asia are looking to the two great nations of the East. One of those nations has gone communist. One of them is trying to adapt our western form of democracy and make it survive and thrive in that Asian soil. Make no mistake, Mr. Speaker. If what is called totalitarianism, with all its suppression of freedoms and the brutal shortcuts that it takes, can deliver for the great mass of these people a better standard of living than is provided over a period of years in India, which is trying to use our western techniques and our voluntary system, then regardless of anything we say here or that is said anywhere else it is my opinion that the balance of world power is not going to fall on the side of democracy but on the side of totalitarian communism. In my opinion that would be a tragedy not only for the great undecided parts of the earth but for us.

I am heartily in accord with all the technical and similar assistance that we can promote. Finally, I would interpret the term "technical assistance" in the widest possible manner. If I were in a position of any power I would not only be sending out engineers to build big water power dams and so on, but even to both sides of the iron curtain I would be sending those who for example practise the art practised by Barbara Ann Scott in order to demonstrate to these people some of the arts, sciences and amenities of our western world. In other words, I would interpret the term in the widest possible sense in order to send to all corners of the world, but primarily to our own potential friends, all of the good things from this western land with which we can help them.

Mr. Ray Thomas (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I too rise to give my wholehearted support to the resolution in the name of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis). I do so because of the experience I had when with the Canadian delegation to the United Nations in New York last fall. I was struck by the fact that the most successful of all works carried out by the United Nations were in the social field, and more particularly in the field of aid to underdeveloped countries. As we all know, the United Nations does not legislate. It simply recommends, and it is only to the extent to which the member countries will cooperate that the work of the United Nations can be successful.

I found that in the field of assistance to underdeveloped countries the United Nations was accomplishing something concrete, that there was something going out of the United Nations which carried weight. On the other hand, I am afraid that many other branches of the work of the United Nations are not nearly as successful. So far as aid to underdeveloped countries is concerned, I think the most important field is that of technical assistance. As often as I could I attended the meetings of the committee which was dealing with this matter. I was there when all the countries were making their pledges, and I thought that the technical assistance organization was making a marvellous contribution towards the welfare of the world as a whole. I am glad to say that I am not the only one who holds that opinion. In the booklet,

"Canada and the United Nations 1952-53", published by the Department of External Affairs, I find the following on page 30:

> The most notable achievement of the United Nations in this field—

The reference is to the social field.

> —has been in the provision of technical experts, training and demonstration equipment to the underdeveloped countries.

I might give a few more figures from this report in addition to those already given by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. I continue:

> In 1950 the expanded program of technical assistance was undertaken, to finance which 55 countries pledged the equivalent of $20,070,260 for an eighteen-month period ending December 31, 1951.
> For the second period of twelve months $18,795,355 was pledged by 65 countries, and for the third period (1953) 67 governments pledged $21,278,575. Canadian contributions for each of these periods were $772,727, $750,000, and $800,000 respectively. Within the framework of the Colombo plan, Canada has also made available $400,000 each year over the past three years for technical assistance to south and southeast Asia.

I will be the first, Mr. Speaker, to say that the Canadian contribution to the United Nations for technical assistance and to the Colombo plan is to be commended. I am of the opinion, however, that it is not enough. If we look at the populations of the various countries, perhaps we can say we are doing a good job. We must consider more than the population and the size of the countries, however; we must consider the capabilities and natural wealth of the countries. If we take that into consideration, Canada is one of the wealthiest countries, and has probably about the highest potential of any country in the world. These facts have to be considered when we think about the amount of the contribution we must make to the various international organizations.

As hon. members know, the various countries, many of them not United Nations countries, gather together and pledge so much money towards the work of the technical assistance organization. This money is then spent in sending specialists, scientists and technicians into the various needy countries to discuss production problems and difficulties. I might say that these problems relate not only to production, or any one field of production, but cover communications, highway projects and so on. I feel that this is extremely important in that it does not give direct relief to these countries. It does make them more self-sufficient by giving them the knowledge to extend their own production and make them more and more self-sufficient. It gives them a greater feeling of national pride and a greater incentive to go ahead on their own.

We have found that the greatest hardships occur, as we would expect, in the most densely populated countries. Almost invariably these countries are backward in their production methods. This fact, coupled with the dense population, makes it practically impossible for them to maintain any worthwhile standard of living. We want to assist them to increase their production to the point where they can at least give the people within the country something to eat. We are making a great success of that.

There is one point, however, about which possibly the minister might make some sort of recommendation. I know that during 1953 many of the countries made pledges but contributed not one cent towards the fund. I do not know how many years that has occurred, but I can recall at least two or three countries which did not fulfil their pledge. I shall not name them in this house. This situation adds considerable weight to the burden on the shoulders of those countries that are living up to their pledges. I do not know whether the minister can give us any indication of how much of the money or assistance goes behind the iron or bamboo curtains. I am a little bit concerned about that.

I do not want the people of the communist-dominated countries to have too poor a standard of living, nor do I want them to be refused any assistance. The very terms of the Russian pledge make me ask this question. When the Russian delegate made his pledge, I think it was $2 million for the coming year, he attached a condition that this money was not to pass through the hands of the organization but was to be spent within the communist countries. In other words, the Russian pledge amounted to no pledge at all. The Russians agreed to give assistance to their own communist people, but no aid whatever to any other country. I believe the conditions attached to that pledge are a good indication of the Russian attitude throughout the United Nations. During the time I was at the United Nations I could not find any indication of a co-operative spirit on the part of Russia or its satellites. In every committee and in the general assembly, their speeches followed exactly the same lines. The Russian delegate made a speech and the satellites followed one after the other making practically the same speech.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I was told, somewhat in jest, that when anything comes up in the United Nations to be discussed either in committee or before the general assembly, the Russian research people are told to write six speeches on that particular subject. Then, the Russian delegate chooses the best one and hands out the rest of them to the satellite delegates. I do not know how much truth there is in that. As I said a moment ago, it is not only Canada's contribution that is insufficient, but the total contribution to the technical assistance organization is insufficient. I find that the Secretary General of the United Nations agrees with me wholeheartedly.

In his annual report on the work of the United Nations from July, 1952, to the end of June, 1953, he says on page 95:

> It may be that in comparative terms, the program—

That is the technical assistance program.

> —is a modest one. It may be that the total amount of assistance it has been able to render is, in relation to the needs of the underdeveloped countries, pitiably small. But whatever its scale, it is now a co-operative venture that has great appeal and motive power . . .

The indication is that the amount of assistance given under the program is pitiably small when compared to the need throughout the world. I would urge that Canada, with the wealth we have, lead the way in getting the contributing countries to build up their contributions in order to give these underdeveloped countries at least a small amount of security, and thus enable them to avoid falling into communist slavery.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful for the opportunity to take part in the discussion of this resolution; and I am also grateful, as I am sure the house is, to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis) for making that possible.

After all, this resolution deals with a subject the long-range importance of which may well be very great indeed for international co-operation, and indeed for international peace. Because, though history does not prove that a nation consisting of people with full stomachs is necessarily a peaceful nation, certainly history does prove that a nation consisting of people with empty stomachs will be a troublesome one.

This purpose of United Nations technical assistance is to improve material conditions in what, sometimes a little glibly, we call the underdeveloped countries of the world. I always like to use the expression "materially underdeveloped" when referring to these countries because, in some ways, they are quite as highly developed as we are.

I agree wholeheartedly with the thoughtful and constructive speeches which have been made by those who have spoken in the debate, especially in the importance that has been attached by the speakers to the problems and possibilities presented to us, in the western world—that west which, as Professor Toynbee has reminded us, is now surrounded by the world. These problems are particularly affected by the emerging importance of Asia into the new world of industry, and of technique, of the atom and the jet.

At the United Nations we are often reminded by Asian and African speakers that Asia and Africa are on the march, and that they will not be stopped. That of course is true; and there is no reason why we should want to stop them. But we should of course do our best to assist that march toward peaceful co-operation and free progress. And the kind of work referred to in the resolution is one way in which we can help direct that march in the right direction. That is why the subject is such an important one.

In its terms, the resolution is restricted to the United Nations technical assistance organization, and suggests that the government—> —should consider the advisability of introducing legislation at this session to substantially increase Canada's contribution to the United Nations technical assistance organization fund.

I do not myself mind the split infinitive particularly.

I would hope, in view of what I will be able to say about our contribution to that work, that it may not be necessary to divide the house on a matter concerning which I think there is such substantial and, indeed, unanimous agreement.

In the first place, we must make clear the distinction between relief, economic development, and technical assistance itself. So far as relief is concerned—and that is not mentioned in this resolution—the United Nations of course is doing important work in this field, especially at the present time in Korea, where Canada has I think played a respectable part.

Then, also, if you like, under that broad category of relief you might consider our contribution to the UN children's fund. We have also made a worth-while contribution to that.

Then there is economic development, which of course is something beyond and apart from technical assistance, and which consists of making loans through international agencies, or through a national agency, and making available credits and investment funds to other countries to help them in their capital and economic development.

The first international agency which comes to mind in that field of course is the international bank. Canada has made available to the international bank, for purposes I have just indicated—lending and re-lending—the whole of her original dollar subscription to the bank's capital, amounting to some $58 million. That is the largest subscription for this purpose of any member of the bank, except the United States. Up to this point the bank itself has advanced by way of loans and credits somewhat over $1,700 million. So something is being done through international agencies in that field.

Then there is technical assistance proper, which is the subject of the resolution before us. There are of course two kinds of technical assistance. There is technical assistance which is worked out bilaterally between the contributing government and the receiving government. There comes to mind in this connection the United States point four program, and our own commonwealth Colombo plan under which contributing governments work out plans bilaterally with the receiving government. I am sure my colleague the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) will be able to give information on this. I believe this plan is now working very satisfactorily.

Canada has contributed in the first three years of the Colombo plan something over $75 million for capital assistance and over $1 million for technical assistance. And this year the government will ask parliament to vote $25,400,000—I believe that is the amount tentatively agreed upon—of which a portion will be for technical assistance proper.

Then there are the multilateral schemes for technical assistance, one of which is referred to in the resolution before us. United Nations schemes for technical assistance can, in their turn, be divided first into the ordinary United Nations program, which comes out of the annual budget of the United Nations, and the budgets of the various specialized agencies, through which Canada has already made a pretty respectable contribution in terms of money and in terms of men. And second, there is the scheme which I think the author of the resolution has particularly in mind, that known as the United Nations expanded program for technical assistance.

That program, and the other United Nations program, is carefully organized and controlled by various international bodies. There is, first, the technical assistance committee, under the economic and social council, which represents the 18 governments on the council. It has a sort of general supervisory jurisdiction over all United Nations schemes of this kind. And then there is the technical assistance administration, the administrating body of the secretariat, which looks after particular schemes, and which now is presided over by a distinguished Canadian, Dr. Keenleyside, who has served in our external affairs service. And, finally, there is the technical assistance board, which includes representatives of the various specialized agencies, and which meets periodically to co-ordinate the work done by these various agencies and by outside agencies in order to keep overlapping and duplication to a minimum.

That is a very important function; because, as hon. members know, it is very easy in schemes of this kind, especially internationally organized and administered schemes, to duplicate and to overlap. It is very important that the various programs should be balanced, that they should be co-ordinated under wise central direction, and that business judgment should be used to the maximum extent possible in their implementation.

One thing of course that has to be determined by the supervising agencies—and this is also of importance—is the absorptive capacity of a country for technical assistance or for economic aid, so that money will not be poured into a country that cannot be productively used for particular projects, and that the applications of the various governments for help and for funds are carefully scrutinized. As Professor Frank Scott of Montreal, who was concerned with a particular technical assistance program of the United Nations in Burma, has reminded us in a pamphlet "World War Against Poverty", published by the Royal Society of Canada, it is customary for governments, being human, to ask for more than they can usefully spend in a limited time. All these things have to be considered before work can start, or else the work will not be done as effectively as it should be.

Now it is true, and it has been pointed out by previous speakers, that while this may be one of the most important aspects of United Nations work, it is not a phase of that work which gets very much publicity or very many headlines, and that is unfortunate. Too often do we interpret the United Nations in terms of political controversy and not in terms of constructive social and economic activity. It is true and it is too bad that conflicts and controversy are their own publicity agents, but very constructive, quiet social and economic work has no one to sing its praise. Those of us who have been at the United Nations know from experience that if there is a speech by Mr. Vishinsky, which is bound to be controversial, or if there is a discussion of the admission of communist China to the United Nations, the galleries will be filled, the delegates' seats will be filled, the television cameras will all be running and the headlines will appear the next day in bold form. But a meeting which may have been held in a committee room in the same building to discuss how to increase food production or eradicate malaria in some Asian or African country will not, I fear, get very much attention or very much publicity. Nonetheless this is important work and we should, I think, be proud to make our contribution to it, as we in this country are doing.

This kind of international technical assistance work and economic aid suffers from two weaknesses, or at least it gets opposition from two sides. There are those who are cynical about it, who are un-co-operative, who do not believe in throwing our money around in foreign countries for what they would call international charity—though it is not charity—and who react in the wrong way to schemes of this kind, the advantage of which is very often long-range rather than immediate. But this work sometimes suffers also from a surfeit of sentimentality and a shortage of practicality on the part of those who would pour funds into projects which would do no good to the people whom they are meant to assist, and might under certain circumstances even do them harm.

There is a danger in this field of attempting to do too much in the wrong way, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Victoria, British Columbia (Mr. Fairey); to do it our way because it is our way, not because it is necessarily the right way. Those dangers have been emphasized in a very useful and interesting publication which has been printed under the auspices of UNESCO and edited by Dr. Margaret Mead of New York, called "Cultural Patterns and Technical Change". She has this to say about the wrong approach to technical assistance:

> To introduce change effectively, it is necessary to know existing conditions. Where it involves implementation by people, it must first be accepted. Otherwise the new proposals, however simple, will be defeated. When pest control is imperative, people will nevertheless release the rats from their traps. Where immunization of cattle is necessary farmers will hide their cattle. And where land reform is introduced without accompanying measures for a reform credit system, the land will again be concentrated in the hands of a few within a few years. And since change is proposed in the interests of human welfare, it is important to see to it that it is introduced constructively or, at any rate, with a minimum of disruption and destruction of established inter-relationships and values. Basic attitudes, concepts, and values are, therefore, here considered.

Then she quotes some very interesting examples of what follows when these right principles are not applied to technical assistance and aid. I again read from her publication:

> In Burma, deep ploughing introduced by European agricultural experts broke up the hard pan that held the water in the rice fields. The weeding of rubber plantations reduced the sap. The new tomato, which the Burmese were persuaded to grow (by technical assistance experts) because it was more productive, had a flavour they did not like, (and they would not eat it). In Turkey, experts trained abroad persuaded some of the younger peasants to remove the stones from their tilled land; when the grain sprouted, the fields of the old men had a better crop, since, in that dry climate, the stones served the function of preserving moisture. In Greece, the wheat in fertilized fields did not resist the drought as well as the wheat in other fields, and the experts realized that earlier-ripening varieties should be planted if the fields were to be fertilized. Mistakes of this sort are acceptable to people who are willing to take the risk of trying the new; but they shake the faith of those who believe in tried and proven procedure alone.

Therefore, as we all agree, it is not only necessary to have the resources to do this work; it is necessary that the work should be done in the right way and on the right principles. In that connection the principles that should underlie technical assistance work were very well and impressively outlined the other day in Washington by the director of the foreign operations administration of the United States, Mr. Harold E. Stassen, when he said—and this has also been emphasized by speakers in this debate—we should not consider this activity as a form of handout or charity. Mr. Stassen said:

> Technical assistance is not a "give-away" program. To conduct it as such would be the quickest way to destroy it. Projects undertaken should therefore be co-operative in nature and every single program and project must be based on a careful study of local needs, local conditions, local resources available and desires of the host governments.
> The aim of such programs is not to subsidize, not to bolster weak spots, but to lay foundations for self-improvement through work on the elimination of debilitating diseases and the control of conditions endangering health and life; through dissemination of knowledge regarding better farm methods; through the improvement of education; through providing technical advice on matters of transportation to enable people to bring the product of their toil to market, and to break the insulation of mind and body in which so many still live.

When these right principles are applied to practical projects the experience of the United Nations already—and it is a short experience—shows that some astonishingly productive results can be achieved from small expenditures and very small changes.

A year or two ago the United Nations sent a technical assistance mission to Afghanistan. In that mission were technical experts from 14 countries covering an extensive range of skills. They were sent to help the Afghan people move toward economic and social betterment. The mission included a public administrator from France, a geologist and a nurse from the Netherlands, a plant entomologist from the United Kingdom, a sericulturalist from China, a Polish statistician, a Danish pediatrician, experts in teacher training and agricultural development from the United States, a public health adviser from India, and a Finnish obstetrician. I suppose obstetrics could be considered a form of technical assistance.

Mr. McCann: Very much so.

Mr. Pearson: One simple and inexpensive change was introduced into Afghanistan by Mr. John Dickenson, a farmer from Arkansas, who obtained great results by introducing the hitherto unheard-of common hoe. Mr. Owen, who is in charge of the UN technical assistance board, reported on this as follows:

> Traditionally the Afghan farmers have broadcast their cotton seed like wheat. But our agricultural expert proved, on his 34 demonstration plots, that if the cotton is planted in rows and if the farmer will use the hoe instead of the heavy mattock, then production will improve. In fact the first demonstration produced a yield two-and-a-half times greater than by the traditional methods, and the government promptly ordered 30,000 hoes, as well as encouraging their manufacture by local blacksmiths. By such very simple, indeed almost primitive, means as these, a small but decisive revolution is being brought about in Afghan production.

In addition to this kind of technical help, as has been pointed out already today, these people need sympathy, understanding and a knowledge of their local customs. In some respects that kind of approach and that kind of understanding are just as important as material support. Having said that, I should add that material support must follow sympathy and understanding or they cannot be effectively used. Perhaps for a moment we might look at what has been contributed by the United Nations in the way of material support.

I know that the amount has been put on the record already, and I know also that it is small indeed in terms of the astronomical figure devoted to armaments. It is also small indeed in terms of the need and necessity of these people, but it is not quite so small in terms of the practical results which can be accomplished in the early stages of this new international work. We have already had proof of that in our experience with the Colombo plan. I do not think it is wrong to say that if we had contributed twice as much to the Colombo plan in the first two years we would not have been able to effectively spend that total amount.

Having regard to those circumstances, the record shows that in the first 18 months of the expanded program of technical assistance a total of $20,070,000 was contributed by members of the United Nations. Canada contributed $850,000. In 1952 the total was $19,000,000, and our contribution was $750,000. In 1953 the total amount went up to $22,000,000 while our contribution went up to $800,000. We have been trying to keep what we think is a fair relationship between our contribution and the total amount contributed by the United Nations. While what we contribute should not necessarily be determined by what others contribute, nevertheless that is a factor which has to be taken into consideration, even if it is not the overriding consideration.

In the current year 1954, according to the latest information which we have been able to secure, and it is as of yesterday, 70 countries, partly as the result of an intensive campaign which has been put on in New York, have pledged themselves to contribute to the technical assistance fund. The amount firmly pledged is something over $24 million.

The hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Thomas) has asked whether we could not do something ourselves to ensure that these pledges are converted into payments. We have through our delegation to the United Nations played a very active part in trying to have the pledges increased. In fact in 1952 my colleague the Minister of Northern Development and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) was the chairman of the pledging committee. We also played a most active part in the pledging committee last autumn. We did what we could to get the amount up, and as an earnest of our endeavour in that regard we indicated through our representative to the United Nations, Senator McKeen, that we would increase our amount this year from $800,000 to $1,500,000. That is, we would ask parliament to increase the amount provided the support from other contributors warranted such an amount, and provided the total amount pledged was such as to keep the program at an economically sound level.

We made that offer last autumn, which represented a considerable proportionate increase, and I think it had something to do with the other countries increasing their amounts. At least I hope it had. As a result there has been pledged already this year some $24 million. It seems clear that the conditions which we have laid down in regard to the increase in our contribution are to be fulfilled, and therefore it will be the intention of the government when that is confirmed to include an amount of $700,000 in the supplementary estimates to bring our total contribution to this program up to $1,500,000.

The hon. member for Wetaskiwin asked in his speech whether I could give any information as to the expenditures from this fund behind the iron and bamboo curtains. So far as I know, and I think I have the facts, no United Nations funds contributed to the expanded program of technical assistance have been expended in those countries to which the hon. member referred. Of course they have their own schemes for technical assistance. We do get information, for instance, of Soviet help in the way of technical assistance programs in China, but that is quite apart from the United Nations program.

As was indicated, last autumn the Soviet representative made a pledge of approximately $1 million to the United Nations scheme for the current year 1953 but, as pointed out, that pledge was hedged around with certain conditions which were not satisfactory to the United Nations technical assistance administration because they violated the principles which govern technical assistance and which were laid down by the economic and social council. However, that matter is being taken up with the Soviet government by the United Nations officials in charge of this activity, and it is hoped that those conditions will be withdrawn so that this amount can be used in the way in which it should be used, without strings attached.

The Canadian contribution to technical assistance has been exceeded only by that of the United Kingdom, the United States and France in the past. If parliament votes the amount which probably will be requested this year in the main and supplementary estimates, Canada's contribution will be the third largest of the members of the United Nations. I do not think that is anything we should say boastfully, but it does at least show we are playing a respectable part in this very important effort.

We are also playing a part not only in the contribution of funds but in the contribution of experts through the United Nations. In Canada today there are 217 United Nations technical assistance trainees out of a total of 300; the rest of them come under the Colombo plan program. And there are 96 Canadian experts now serving abroad in the United Nations.

Under the Colombo plan program it has been difficult to find as many qualified people as we have been asked to provide and as we would have liked to provide because experts of the kind required are in great demand in this country. Some of them have had to make considerable sacrifices to take part in this important UN work. The training of experts, in the last analysis, is just about as important as supplying capital assistance, because eventually this kind of work has to be done by these people in their own countries. When we can get them to come here and learn our technical methods and send them back to do the work themselves, that is the kind of help that really matters.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to express my agreement with the spirit and indeed the content of this resolution, and to emphasize that we are doing something to carry out the advice contained in it. I also express the hope that it will commend itself to all hon. members in this house because, as has been said more than once, the war on want and backwardness, on deprivation and distress, is a road to peace.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few brief comments on this matter. It is, of course, terribly difficult to really arouse much interest in this chamber in matters on which we all agree. I do not know whether it is because we have a lurking suspicion that when we agree with those we have found to be wrong so often we ourselves must be wrong in agreeing; but whatever the reason, it is always difficult to arouse the kind of interest there should be.

Speaking seriously, I suppose it is obvious that when we do agree on something we have a fair chance of being right. I feel it is a pity that we get so used to living in a world of tension, a dangerous world that we inevitably have to take in our stride. In discussing a matter such as this this afternoon we are really facing a fact that we are in a world where there is a battle going on for men's minds. That sounds easy to say, but it does not really carry much conviction with anyone because we have heard it so often. But it is very true that as well as the material defences of NATO on which we spend so much and from which we hope for so much this battle for men's minds is going on and that in the long run the success or failure of our civilization is going to depend on who wins this battle.

If we look back even a few decades to our relationship with the rest of the world, or at any rate the Asian world which is now coming to bulk so enormously in international affairs, we realize that our contact with these nations was almost wholly through soldiers and missionaries. The next contact, I think it will be agreed, was through physicians. The missionaries began to find they really had to have a medical training in order to do their best work. Finally we begain to realize that the whole relationship had a material aspect, and that the have-not nations were not going to go on forever quite content to be infinitely worse off than the rest of us.

In the last few years this attitude of acquiescence, which I imagine used to amaze us because it lasted so long, has largely disappeared. I think the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was wise in the remark he made when he left Ottawa, when he described his visit to those countries in Asia which used to be just a romantic concept over the horizon. The Prime Minister said, among other things, "We will not get anywhere unless we treat them as equals".

I want to refer for just a moment to what I might call our legalistic relationship with the nations of Asia by reason of a covenant in the United Nations charter to which we are a party. I want to read articles 55 and 56. They are quite short. Article 55 reads as follows:

> With a view to the creation of conditions of stability and well-being which are necessary for peaceful and friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples, the United Nations shall promote:
> a. higher standards of living, full employment, and conditions of economic and social progress and development;
> b. solutions of international economic, social, health, and related problems; and international cultural and educational cooperation; and
> c. universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion.

And article 56 contains this sentence:

> All members pledge themselves to take joint and separate action in cooperation with the organization for the achievement of the purposes set forth in article 55.

We have formally assumed these obligations, or the government has assumed them on behalf of our country. We have all approved them, and however much we may be inclined from time to time to forget them, they are there, they are staring us in the face, and I suggest that if we neglect them we shall do so at our peril.

I would like to read a few paragraphs from a pamphlet I have here entitled "Stories of Technical Assistance". The paragraph I wish to read was written by Mr. David Owen, executive chairman, technical assistance board. Then I would like to read some rather astonishing figures bringing to your attention the situation of a country which has not been favoured as has our own, because the contrast is so dramatic.

First of all, from page 1 of "Stories of Technical Assistance" by Mr. Owen:

> At the beginning of 1952, I made a journey that could only have been made in this century. It was a long journey, about 8,000 air miles, from Geneva to Indonesia and back. But it was also an absurdly short journey, for I visited Lebanon, India, Ceylon, Burma and Thailand, and yet had returned to Geneva about 30 days after I set out. This in itself would have bewildered the imagination of a Marco Polo. But what is more revealing is that few people today would feel anything surprising about such a journey. Marco Polo's wanderings through Asia amazed his contemporaries to the point of incredulity, and they had an important influence on firing the zest of renaissance man for venturing to the corners of the world. My own journey, as a feat of transportation, amazes no one, but what amazed me and ought surely to amaze others is the disparity between the kinds of development for which mankind is responsible. For though I, as a 20th century man, was travelling about Asia at a speed inconceivable to Marco Polo, I was looking at a world in which many of the human skills and social customs that he described 700 years ago have barely changed at all. To a remarkable degree we were visiting the same human landscape.

Having said that I want to quote a word from page 39 of this same pamphlet in regard to Libya, which we heard so much about recently. I wish to draw attention particularly to the extraordinarily low economic condition of that country. At the beginning of the Christian era that country was one of the granaries of the world, but it has been allowed to deteriorate. Although governmental services are on a very modest level, it is very doubtful whether Libya can keep up even its present standards. The pamphlet goes on to say:

> Thus the Libyan economy cannot maintain even the present low standard of living, which averages in income per capita not much more than $30 a year.

I mention that to try to underline in our own minds the almost tragic contrast we find. If we are going to win this battle for men's minds it is perfectly obvious that we have to take a long view, and that we have to render assistance.

I am not going into the details. The minister has given us a good deal of information in that regard. All I wish to do is express my own view that this is a matter which we should all be regarding as of absolutely primary importance to us all, and that we should take a long and broad view. If we are to win it must be in the long run by convincing the nations of Asia that, as the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said, we are treating them as equals.

In that connection I should like to close these few remarks by reading briefly from the communique issued at the close of the conference in Australia the other day. Hon. members will recall that in the Colombo plan we in the commonwealth have been showing our recognition of the need of assisting nations in the commonwealth who have been less favoured than some of the rest of us, and I wish to read part of the concluding words of the communique, which indeed seemed to me one of the most happily expressed and impressive political documents that I have read for some time. After speaking of the commonwealth and the relations of the various parts to each other, the communique goes on to say:

> Our congress, however, does not end there. We are not a commonwealth of nations arrayed against the rest of the world. We are for the world. The free world is built upon freedom. Freedom is built upon strength.

Here is the concluding portion:

> We even venture to look forward to the day when the developed wealth of our own nations will serve all others; when trade and prosperity will know no inhuman barriers; when the raising of living standards will be the common endeavour of all; and when the friendly brotherhood which we have experienced in this conference will have become the common lot of mankind.

We should remind ourselves that in signing the United Nations charter we have pledged ourselves to a course of action exactly as described, and happily described in my opinion, in these words which I have read. For that reason it seems to me that, following the course of reason and common sense, we should be ready to go along with technical assistance which after all, if it is wisely and co-operatively done, can do perhaps as much toward the winning of the battle for men's minds as any other kind of action we can take.

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to have the opportunity of speaking in support of this resolution because I am convinced that its importance cannot be overemphasized. I am sure also we can all agree that the problem of hunger in the world is the greatest problem we have to face in this day and age. I have maintained, and still maintain, that in the last ten years it has been proved beyond any question in Canada and the United States that we are able to solve the problem of hunger. I am not going to speak about our record in Canada since, because of our small population, it is not at all relative, but I am going to use the United States as an example to prove my contention that we have solved the problem of hunger.

We are not sure just how much we can produce because we have never really tried. I sometimes think we have more agricultural land in Canada going to waste in fence corners and fence rows than is under cultivation in the whole island of Britain. As I say, we have proved beyond doubt that we have found a solution to poverty, and because we have been able to do this for ourselves we should pass on to underdeveloped areas in the world the technical advances and technical knowledge that we have brought into play to do the things that we have been able to do.

We realize what the problem is, and we know that we have a solution for it. But I think this is important. Although we know what the problem is and what the solution is, I am convinced that we have not yet reached the stage where we realize that we need to solve the problem. I do not really think the western world feels that there is as yet a need to solve the problem of poverty. A little later I shall quote from a statement that would seem to substantiate the remarks I have just made.

As yet we refuse to believe that we are living in one world. If I may use a slang expression with your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, how long is it going to be before we smarten up to the fact that we are living in one world, a very small world, and that what happens in any one part of it is immediately reflected in every other part? We must accept our responsibility to hungry people in underdeveloped areas of the world if we ourselves are to survive.

I think I can say without any worry about being challenged that foremost in the minds of men and women throughout the world today is the fear of a third world war, a war of extermination which will engulf all peoples in all lands. I believe that fear is real. We in this group at any rate believe that there is an alternative to war. We believe that we do have a choice. By accepting our responsibility and putting into effect the terms of the resolution we are now discussing, furnishing economic aid to underdeveloped areas of the world and providing them with the knowledge and assistance they need to produce food for themselves as we have been able to produce, we will be moving in the direction of peace. Certainly we will not move in that direction unless we are first of all prepared to assume a renewed conscious and moral responsibility to the underprivileged people of the world. We would do well to remember the words of Bertrand Russell when he said:

> We must banish certain ideas and substitute others. For love of domination we must substitute equality. For love of victory, we must substitute justice. For love of brutality, we must substitute intelligence. For love of competition, we must substitute co-operation.

I mentioned that we could help solve the problem of hunger because we have done it here at home. According to the food and agriculture organization of the United Nations, during the last ten years United States food production has increased by 25 per cent, while the population has increased 12 per cent. This is a startling fact that I think will surprise hon. members as it surprised me. In those 10 years the United States increased food production by twice the amount the population increased. During those 10 years the population in the United States increased faster than the population of India in the corresponding period. I feel that is significant.

It is not what we do on the land, Mr. Speaker, that in a large measure is responsible for this great production we have seen in the last 10 years; it is what we do to the land. Our food production increases have been possible because of technical advances in connection with fertilizer, crop rotation, contour farming, drainage, insecticides and soil conservation, to name only a few. These things, rather than the advancement in machinery or long hours tilling the soil, are responsible for the phenomenal increases which I have just mentioned. It is our duty to pass along this technical knowledge, in so far as we can, to the backward countries throughout the world.

I should like to quote from memory what Paul French, who is general manager of CARE, had to say when he returned to the United States after visiting 60 countries. Speaking of the inroads that communism and dictatorship have made and are making throughout the world, he said, "We are losing the race because of poverty. These people are being subjected to such economic injustices they are easy prey to dictatorships, whether of the communist variety or of the fascist variety". It is important that we should never lose sight of the fact that today the world is too small for the extremes of poverty and prosperity to live side by side, if we are to survive.

There are many people who say, why all the emphasis on food when there are other values that must be taken into consideration? I agree that there are other values, but I believe that Sir John Boyd Orr stated the problem in its true light when he mentioned that people who are hungry are more interested in four loaves of bread than they are in Roosevelt's four freedoms. I believe that is fundamental. As a matter of fact, the first law of nature is self-preservation. In our morning prayers we ask for bread before we ask for the forgiveness of our sins.

According to the FAO, one-third of the people in the world have an income of less than $1 a week; another third have an income of less than $4 per week. In other words, two-thirds of the people of this world manage on less than $120 per year. These conditions will not change if we follow the ideas expressed by Benjamin F. Fairless, president of the United States Steel Corporation, who is reported in the press to have said—and I quote from memory—that rearmament and economic prosperity for the free world can best be maintained through contributions of raw materials from the underdeveloped countries in exchange for needed American materials. In other words, Mr. Speaker, his hope is to keep these people in the underdeveloped areas in their historic role of hewers of wood and drawers of water. Surely our best interests are not served by following such a plan. Surely we can do much better than that.

The money spent in economic aid would be largely self-liquidating, and we would be making friends instead of enemies throughout the world. I will agree that food production has always been an important matter of government concern. Food has always been planned by governments, both here and abroad, in the interests of something or other. Food is planned in the interests of our foreign trade and our foreign investments. It is planned in the interests of the distributor and sometimes it is even planned in the interests of agriculture, as it was in this country some years ago. When I say that food is planned in the interests of agriculture, I mean that we were paid for not growing food. We hope that will not happen again. The results are always the same. These plans are the plans of scarcity. Food has not been planned in the interests of the people. These plans have always resulted in a limitation on food.

I sincerely believe that the only sound basis upon which to build prosperity with peace throughout the world is to support to the limit the principle laid down in the resolution we are discussing. I believe, too, we must agree with Robert Hutchins when he says that civilization is doomed unless the hearts and minds of men can be changed. Unless we can bring about a deep and drastic moral reformation throughout the world in regard to the underdeveloped areas, and unless we are prepared to sacrifice something, we shall have neither peace nor security.

Mr. Maurice Boisvert (Nicolet-Yamaska): The resolution which is before this house today, Mr. Speaker, raises a most important international question, because its aim is to promote technical aid to the underdeveloped countries, through the United Nations, in agriculture, mining, industry and commerce.

Three international bodies are dealing with this problem. The first is the international bank for reconstruction and development. The second is the Colombo plan, and the third is a body of the United Nations which provides technical assistance to underdeveloped countries. This latter body acts under the economic and social council, one of the most important committees of the United Nations. This committee has jurisdiction over several United Nations agencies concerned with labour, agriculture, scientific and cultural education, health and many other activities.

There is no doubt that civilization is no longer enclosed within one or two continents. It has become world-wide. It is more with technical assistance, maybe, than financial assistance that we will uplift the populations of these countries whose natural resources are bountiful but whose technology and technography are deficient from the state of inertia in which they have been dwelling during many centuries.

Christianity transformed the former civilizations, engendered a new faith, culture, science, and established, step by step, a world which was dominated by the great industrial and commercial powers. This was the distinctive feature of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Faith was the basis of Christian relations and a religious mind through its universal character predominated. Culture born out of the teaching of mediaeval philosophers favoured the development of letters, fine arts and scientific research, to which we owe the great inventions and material progress which were the prerogatives of these pioneering countries who conquered immense territories, acquired wealth and domination over large territories whose population realized, surprisingly late, that their future was quite promising.

In the French revolution, and even before, in the teachings of the philosophers who preceded and prepared it, we can see the germs of the rupture between the principles of the spiritual doctrine, and those of purely materialistic and realistic doctrines. Then it seemed that materialism was the victor, at least in the scientific and material domain. While science was endeavouring to find a new truth out of the physical and tangible resources, at the same time countries, deprived of freedom, were endeavouring to overthrow foreign domination. This was done in the name of a new kind of nationalism which was quite natural, but nevertheless revolutionary. Most of the countries which we call underdeveloped wished to free themselves of foreign domination by appealing to this urge of nationalism. The political organizations of those countries range from total dictatorship to the most advanced democracy, which sometimes looks like anarchy.

[Mr. Boisvert.]

We may assert that two-thirds of our world today may be considered as countries which need economic assistance in order to develop their immense resources and raise the morale of their populations. Progress and improvement in the standard of living of these populations, millions of which are nearly starving, constitute a greater international danger than the wars which we have known since the beginning of this century. We hope that finally, if we come to help them, this world will establish a stability and peace and security forever.

The western world dominated humanity by its faith, by its letters, its fine arts, and by its inventions which mastered the forces of nature. This permitted exploitation of mines, the source of industrial power, the development of hydroelectric power, the source of all these inventions which are narrowing more and more the gap in human relations by the use of the telegraph, telephone, radio, television, telecommunication, aircraft, etc.

Tremendous progress, which is ever increasing, was achieved in this field. But it seems to have been restricted to those countries which enjoyed the benefits of Christian civilization.

Our world is not divided any longer according to geographical areas but into two groups of countries, those from which derive material inventions, and those which need the same inventions to rid themselves of the shackles which have held them after centuries of neglect, carelessness and intellectual laziness which breed fatalism.

If I seem to have wandered from the subject matter, it is because I believe that the western powers, to which Canada and the United States belong, are called upon to fulfil a Christian and enlightening part which will change this world and transform it into a new community. Our civilization will survive only if it gives moral and technical assistance to those countries seeking our knowledge and our methods creative of progress.

In support of this opinion I would like to quote the Russian philosopher, Berdyaev, who said:

> The triumph of capitalism has created a total economic system and placed the economic life of each country under the domination of this system. It contributed to bring nations together to the utmost, in the economic domain, and it can be said that it has an inherent original internationalism. On the other hand, socialism soon assumed an international character, and, in the international communism, the old principle of compulsory universalism rises once more, but in a corrupted form. The fallen world of modern history, torn by bloody struggles between nations, classes and individuals, and with a disposition to suspicion and hatred, aims by all means to universalist unification, to victory over this exclusive national particularism which has led nations to their downfall and disintegration . . . Internationalism is the abject caricature of universalism. But the spirit of universalism must awaken among Christian nations, the will of a free universalism must reveal itself.

And he goes on to say:

Russia has the most universalist spirit among all nations of the world. This quality is part of the very structure of its national spirit. Working towards universal unification, towards the formation of a single spiritual cosmos, this must be the vocation of the Russian people.

Russia occupies a central position among the countries which look to the western world to obtain the necessary assistance for their recovery. Asia has a population of 1,300 million, Europe has 398 million, North and South America have 333 million, the U.S.S.R. has about 200 million, and Africa about 200 million.

From those figures it will be seen that almost half the total population of the world lives in Asia. But it happens that Russia, which belongs to both Europe and Asia, presently dominates economically the whole of Asia. The prestige of the western world will only diminish unless we can convince the Asiatic populations that we have no imperialistic ambitions, no ambitions of conquest or destruction, and that all we expect from the assistance we are willing to give them is a reciprocal exchange of commercial advantages which will integrate them into this concept of universalism, based on common comprehension and co-operation.

Our Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), before leaving for his world tour, said on January 29, as reported at page 1582 of Hansard:

Our interest in Asia has also been increased as a result of the desire of our people to assist our Asian friends to improve their social and economic conditions.

Then he went on to say:

Canada, I think, has welcomed the opportunity to share in the encouragement of freedom and economic improvement in Asia because we realize the importance of maintaining good relations between the western world and the hundreds of millions of our fellow men in these ancient nations of Asia.

I feel that we can maintain good relations with them only as long as we treat them on terms of complete equality, with respect for their older and perhaps somewhat less materialistic culture and achievements, and in a spirit of genuine understanding and co-operation. We must deal with them in the realization that while we may seem to have much to give they too have a very important contribution to make to the general welfare of the world.

May I say that what is true for Asia is also true for Africa, Indonesia and also some countries of South America. In the annual report of the secretary general on the work of the United Nations, Mr. Hammarskjold wrote:

Of the multitude of the United Nations programs in the economic and social field in which the government members have joined their efforts for their common benefit, none is more significant or less costly in the building of a better world community than the sharing in what is universally known as technical assistance.

Let us for a few minutes examine what was done by the United Nations in this respect. The economic and social council have set up a board called the technical assistance board. In 1950 an expanded program was made effective. In 1952 a full-time executive chairman of the board was appointed with the duty of supervising the program of technical assistance, and the appraisal of the activities of the participating organizations. A special account was set up, and the earmarking and allocation of funds were to be decided by the chairman after approval of the program by the technical assistance board.

In 1952 the general assembly recommended a contribution of $25 million suggested by the economic and social council. Programs were elaborated for 1953 and for 1954. Those programs are not an easy undertaking on account of the wide range of the meaning of technical assistance. It comprises economic development, industrial development, transport and communications, public finance and fiscal policy, public administration, statistics and population questions, and not the least, social welfare and development.

What were the realizations of the United Nations with respect to those items? First, with regard to the industrial development program, the United Nations have brought help to 23 governments who received advice from experts. Fellowships and scholarships were awarded in a wide range of manufacturing industries, in handicraft industries, industrial planning, in the exploration and exploitation of oil and other mineral resources, and in the field of hydroelectric development.

Second, with regard to transport and communications, a survey group in 1952 and 1953 made a critical appraisal of transportation in many countries. During the year expert advice was given to ten governments.

Third, with regard to public finance and fiscal policy, the governments of six nations received the advice of experts. A team of economic and financial experts visited Iran and Indonesia. Some comprehensive training programs in fiscal matters were developed for the benefit of those countries requesting a considerable number of fellowships and scholarships in fiscal matters.

United Nations

Fourth, with regard to public administration, training activities have continued to form the most important element of the program of technical assistance carried out under a resolution adopted by the general assembly. A course of public administration was opened in Rio de Janeiro; a public institute for Turkey and the Middle East was opened in March, 1953; a training course for government accountants began to function in Libya in March, 1953. At the end of the year there were requests from four countries for similar courses. Expert advice was given to six nations.

Fifth, with regard to statistics and population questions, the experts of the United Nations are organizing a uniform method to establish demographic statistics and also to serve on statistical assignments in 16 countries to study general statistical organization or specific subjects such as national income statistics, statistical methodology, economic, financial and fiscal statistics, import and export statistics from census operations.

Sixth, with regard to social welfare and development, the ground covered includes general social welfare questions, policy, administration and training, family, youth and child welfare, community development and social research, rehabilitation of the physically handicapped, housing, town and country planning, social defence. This is a very wide and complicated organization.

I might take one minute to say a few words about one cruel problem which comes within the framework of social welfare. It is the problem of the youth of the world. Children are the heritage of nations. They deserve consideration, and they should be taken care of at every stride of their lives. The life of children in an underdeveloped country is a sad story. There is a need for maternal and child welfare, children's hospitals and wards, school health services, clinics, laboratories, and so on; and what I could say about the need for equipment, drugs and medicines of all kinds is just out of this world.

What I have said is just a sketch of the activities of the United Nations in the field of technical assistance. Let us ask now, where does Canada stand with respect to this problem? The population of Canada is 15 million people today, and the contribution of our country has been within the reach of our possibilities, if we take into consideration our contribution in the Korean war, to the Colombo plan and to the international bank for reconstruction and development. The Canadian government is well aware of the importance of technical assistance, and the Secretary of State for External Affairs is to be commended for his participation in technical assistance to underdeveloped countries. I would like to quote from "Canada and the United Nations, 1951-1952" at page 45:

> One of the most significant developments in international affairs since the second world war has been the emergence of the idea of technical assistance to underdeveloped countries. The technical assistance activities of the United Nations, the United States "Point Four Programme" and the Colombo plan have all grown from the concept that the underdeveloped countries of the world should be helped to help themselves, that they should be able to call on the more economically advanced countries for the technical knowledge and skills which would enable them to make the best use of their own resources.

From this quotation it is evident that Canadian policy is in favour of giving assistance to underdeveloped countries. Now, let us see what was accomplished to implement this policy. The total pledged, as was said by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Thomas), by 52 countries, members of the United Nations, was equivalent to about $20 million for a period of 18 months, ending December, 1951. For the second period of 12 months a sum of about $18 million was pledged by 65 countries; and for the third period, 1953, 67 governments pledged about $21 million.

The Canadian contributions for each of these periods were $772,727, $750,000 and $800,000. I should add to this that within the framework of the Colombo plan, Canada spent $400,000 each year, over the past years, for technical assistance to south and southeast Asia. From 1950 to June 1953, Canada provided training facilities for 177 fellows and scholars under the United Nations program, and 116 under the Colombo plan. During the same period we provided almost 150 experts for United Nations technical assistance projects, and 24 under the Colombo plan.

If we consider that Canada has contributed $25 million in each of the last three fiscal years to the Colombo plan, we must admit that our share is one to be praised by all Canadians. We must also add our subscription to the international bank for reconstruction and development. Canada acquired 3,250 shares representing $325 million. This international bank is also giving technical assistance to the member countries of the organization, and also to countries which are not affiliated with this international bank. This institution is now eight years old, and in 1952 it made available 19 loans to nine countries, representing a sum of nearly $179 million. Since its origin the bank made nearly two billions of dollars of loans and 29 countries benefited. The bank has given technical assistance to many countries, especially with respect to economic development. That is not all. Canada contributed to the reconstruction of South Korea and to many other projects which could be classified as technical assistance.

I do not think it is necessary to elaborate much more. The facts I have given make it clear that the policy of Canada is in accordance with the one adopted by the United Nations. I am sure that is still the policy of the government, and in my opinion, it is the right one. Of course it would be unfair to our people, at a time when we are building up the defences of our country and establishing an organization to assure peace and security to the whole world, to increase too much our contribution to technical assistance.

We must bear in mind that industrial countries, and Canada is one, provide the biggest share of the money required by the fund to bring technical assistance to underdeveloped nations. Every citizen in Canada is in favour of it. Every citizen is well aware of his duty to people living in the underdeveloped world. Every citizen realizes that such technical assistance is a path to peace, freedom and security. There is only one restriction to our will to give more and that is a restriction which concerns ourselves—our own protection, our own development, our own security.

In conclusion may I say that I hope our prosperity will last forever, and that it will be possible soon to draw larger amounts of money from our taxpayers for these huge populations living in vast areas, which need so much when we are limited to giving so little. Let us then give what is stronger than money, the spiritual spark of an old civilization bound to survive only if we, as free men, are able to show that progress derives more from moral strength than from the bulge of capital investment.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, there used to be a saying in my childhood applied to people of my race who had a habit of talking of themselves: "Here's to ourselves. Who's like us?" As I listened to the speaker who has just taken his seat I realized that that was not entirely a Scottish characteristic. I really must decline his invitation to join in his paeans of praise about Canada's contribution to technical assistance and to the Colombo plan. I must do that because he spoke on behalf of all Canadians who I am quite sure view this with what he considered pardonable pride.

I was pleased to hear the minister of external affairs take part in the debate and also say that he considered this question one of the most important facing the world today. I think that is the only way it can be regarded. We spend a great deal of time in this chamber on matters that seem of world-shaking importance, but I have an idea that when this particular era of history is viewed in perspective the most important question will be, what did the people of North America do with regard to the situation of the vast majority of the human race?

Several reasons for taking this action have been advanced this afternoon. It has been suggested to us that it is an alternative to other and more conventional defence mechanisms. It has been suggested to us that it is a way to promote world peace. I suppose one could suggest also that it might lead to greater economic stability for us at home.

One of the troubles that face us at the present time, in the middle of the twentieth century, is the unfortunate habit we have acquired of dashing about the economic and social scene fastening neat little notices on various features of it which in our innocence we imagine explain the situation that we are labelling. We are told that this would be an excellent way in which to fight communism. It is suggested quite often that the major feature in recent years of the development in Asiatic countries has been their unfortunate tendency to swing toward totalitarian communism.

I am going to suggest that that is altogether too easy a simplification. What is about to take place in those parts of the world is a process which took place in the western world some century and a half or two centuries ago. I refer to the accumulation of capital. In fact that is a fundamental requisite for the development of anything in the nature of a high material level of civilization.

We in North America have certain rather unique responsibilities with regard to other peoples in the world who are now facing this necessity of accumulating capital. There are only two ways in which people can accumulate capital. One is by a desperately hard and bitter exploitation of the people themselves, a process which took place in Great Britain some 250 years ago and continued over a long time during one of the most brutal and bitter periods of British history. It can take the form it took in the Soviet union, which was a savage and bitter exploitation of the mass of the people; or it can take the course it took in North America, which was perhaps the most comfortable form and possibly the most comfortable example in the history of the accumulation of capital.

United Nations

Here in North America we were enabled to build up our substantial capital because of the sacrifices and the miseries of the people who had gone before us. We in North America owe a debt to those people in Great Britain who underwent the horrors of the early industrial revolution, and to those who accumulated the first stocks of capital there. We owe a further debt. We owe a debt to those people in the Asiatic countries, with whom we have been dealing here this afternoon, who in the beginning made their heavy contribution to the capital accumulations of Great Britain and western Europe. From each in turn the economies of North America were able to benefit without our people having to go through the grim and bitter period that the peoples in Asiatic countries and Great Britain had to undergo during their periods of capital accumulation.

It would appear, Mr. Speaker, that we have a very heavy moral responsibility to explore every possible avenue of technical aid and assistance to these people. The nature and magnitude of the problem are of course displayed in figures which are released from time to time by the various subsidiary organizations of the United Nations. I believe one of my colleagues here this afternoon pointed out that people in a very large part of the world have incomes of less than $100 per year. That compares with the average per capita income in Canada of $900 per year, and in the United States of $1,450 per year. Fifty-four per cent of the world's population have incomes of less than $100 per year, and the people in Indonesia have an average income of less than $25 per year.

If we look at other figures which have been released by the food and agriculture organization we can perhaps understand why these people have incomes which, expressed in monetary terms, are as meagre as those I have quoted. The food and agriculture organization informs us that in comparison with Canada, where we have a ratio of 800 acres of improved agricultural land per 100 of our population, Indonesia has a ratio of only 35 acres of improved agricultural land per 100 head of population, and in Burma the figure is only 104 acres. That I believe demonstrates as well as is possible the urgency of our problem. It indicates the work that has to be done.

The next question is what is the most effective way of tackling this problem? I was very interested in the suggestion made this afternoon by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) to the effect that there is a limit to the absorptive capacity of these countries as regards capital or technical aid. He is perfectly correct; but on the other hand I should like to quote to the house the remarks of a very distinguished Canadian, Dr. Hugh Keenleyside, director of the United Nations technical assistance program. Dr. Keenleyside, almost precisely a year ago, had this to say in the city of Victoria:

> It is at this point that I believe our present Canadian policy to be gravely inadequate. It seems to me to be unreasonable to devote $100 to direct military defence for every $1 we give to the saving of the underdeveloped areas of the world. Although Canada does more than most countries, her annual contribution to the T.A. programs of the United Nations is about equal to the cost of one bomber. Even adding the amount we are providing under the Colombo plan the total is still just about what we spend on a single destroyer.

That, Mr. Speaker, appears to me to reveal a most shocking lack of sense of proportion. While it is perfectly true, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs suggested, that we cannot hope to solve this problem merely by pouring money in by the bucketful, on the other hand I think we should not put too narrow an interpretation, as the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) suggested, upon technical assistance. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that if we are going to send someone to these areas to teach an illiterate Indonesian peasant how to read and write, then we should also be prepared to put a pen in his hand and a book on the bench beside him. Otherwise what we have done for him is useless. If we are prepared to teach a primitive agriculturist in India modern methods of agriculture, then we should also be prepared to make that teaching of some value by providing him with modern agricultural machinery.

If we adopt that interpretation of technical assistance, then I believe we will find the absorptive capacity of these people very much greater than some people imagine. In fact, Mr. Speaker, I was disappointed although not surprised when I found that the Secretary of State for External Affairs considered that an important yardstick for our contribution to this scheme should be the relationship of Canada's contribution to that of other nations. For the life of me I cannot see any reason why that should be the yardstick. The yardstick surely can only be the need and our capacity to fill that need.

This attitude on the part of the government—because I presume the minister's colleagues agree with that attitude—seems to me to savour of an all too common Canadian approach to world affairs, an approach which might be boiled down to this, that under no circumstances whatever should Canada take the risk of leading in an approach to world affairs. Always we shall take the safe course of following the policy of "me-too-ism," giving no more and no less than others.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that Canada has the capacity to play a very much more inspiring and effective role in world affairs than it is now tied to by that attitude on the part of the government. In particular, Canada can and should be, in this problem of assistance to underdeveloped areas of the world, playing one of the leading roles in the world; because, while it is true we are not the wealthiest nation in the world, we are I believe per capita the second wealthiest nation in the world. Moreover, we sometimes pride ourselves on combining our material prosperity with a more sophisticated and advanced political philosophy than is to be found in perhaps other and wealthier countries. Here surely is the place where we should be employing that sophisticated political philosophy which tells us that the path to peace, the path to security, is in aiding the people of the underdeveloped countries to emerge into the modern world. I can think of no more inspiring field for young Canadians at this juncture in world history.

A few weeks ago the national film board showed in this building a picture of the work done by the United Nations Organization in precisely these areas. As I looked at that picture this thought occurred to me. While in the past we have tended to dangle before the eyes of young people the rather meretricious prizes of military glory, here we can hold in front of their eyes a really worthwhile prize for national and individual service.

I trust that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and his cabinet colleagues will be prepared to take a rather sharp look at the $2,000 million we are going to spend on conventional defence measures, and an even sharper look at the million and a half that has been conditionally promised to be spent on technical assistance provided that it does not place Canada in an embarrassingly, conspicuously generous position.

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, this resolution would appear to be supported by members in all parts of the house and, of course, for very good reasons. I noted today that the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) made reference in his remarks to the fact that the knowledge we have of conditions in the countries of Asia and Europe has been to a great extent brought to us by missionaries and by the boys who were over there during the war. With that I agree. In my opinion our great weakness today in that respect lies in the fact that too few Canadians have firsthand knowledge of conditions in many of these countries, and for a brief period I want to refer to the experience I had in 1948, after having been chosen a delegate to the parliamentary association, of visiting several countries in Europe and, a few days before we came home, of visiting Greece.

In the short time I was in that country I got a full realization of what total war means to a country, particularly in these days of modern warfare. I travelled throughout a great part of the country and gained firsthand knowledge of conditions. We flew up to the Albanian border. At that time the guerrilla warfare was being carried on, and I saw thousands and thousands of Greek people living in American army tents on practically nothing. Thousands of their children had been stolen and taken into the mountains. I began to realize the destruction of warfare, and just what people in countries so devastated had to contend with.

The destruction in Greece in a three and a half year period cost them about 400,000 homes in a country with a population of seven or eight million. This destruction was created by bombing, by explosives of all kinds, by fire and by pillage. Churches, schools, hospitals and all other dwellings were in the same category. There was no distinction at all. There were 1,770 Greek villages which were totally destroyed, and when I say "totally destroyed" it was estimated that they were 90 per cent destroyed.

Their hydraulic developments, which meant so much in the irrigation of the land—and they have very little land to irrigate—were totally destroyed. Their telephone and telegraph cables and long distance communications were completely destroyed. Nearly all the big harbours in that great country were a total loss. When the Germans invaded Greece they came with their planes and bombed and destroyed and created all the disturbance they could. Then after the allied nations invaded the country they had the job of trying to drive the Germans out of Greece, and Greek cities were bombed and destroyed not only by the Germans but also by the allied nations.

The railway rolling stock of the country deteriorated to such an extent that when the country was liberated there was not a single train moving. The bridges were practically all destroyed. The engines and cars had been stolen and taken to Bulgaria and other countries. Their railway stations had been destroyed. The machine shops in which they repaired their rolling stock had been destroyed, and when the war was over the supply of engines and rolling stock was completely nil. There was nothing left.

Prior to the war their merchant marine fleet amounted to 2 million tons, but by the end of the war 75 per cent of the fleet had been destroyed. At the beginning of the war they had 713 sailing vessels and they lost 472, or 66 per cent. The same spirit of destruction affected the big Greek canal which joined the Aegean and Ionian seas. All the carnage of war that could be collected was dumped into the canal, and I am doubtful if it is open even at this date. The canal had been of great benefit to the people. It was practically destroyed, and will take many years to repair.

The forests of the country were also completely destroyed; in fact even the olive trees were burned for fuel. There is no coal in Greece, and it was found necessary to get fuel of some sort. For that reason everything that would make fuel was cut down and destroyed. After the war their forests were completely gone. When we were there in 1948 a few of their olive trees had begun to produce again, but it will be years and years before the production will compare with that of the pre-war period. Livestock was destroyed almost to the same extent. In fact their beasts of burden were completely annihilated. They did not have any kind of animal with which to do their plowing and till the soil.

After three and a half years of German occupation the country was liberated. When we on this continent read about liberation we get the impression that the worries of these people are over, but from my short visit to that grand country I could see that their troubles had just started. Having gone through four years of destruction, it will perhaps be fifty years before the country is restored. If more Canadians had firsthand knowledge of such conditions perhaps our feelings with respect to assistance might be different. We read, but we do not realize what these people have had to contend with. I believe that anything we can do to assist these noble people is a step in the right direction.

I have no idea how far it is possible for us to go, but I for one support the resolution introduced today, knowing that anything we do will be appreciated by the people in these countries, and will be one of the greatest steps we can take in order to bring about that feeling of respect which we hope may some day result in world peace. In my opinion the benefits that may be provided can never be reckoned in dollars and cents, and we must look forward to those benefits. I see that the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) is in his seat. He could give you a further description of the conditions we witnessed nearly five years ago.

[Mr. Stuart (Charlotte).]

Before resuming my seat I want to say again that if it were only possible for more Canadians to see the conditions under which these people are trying to survive, I believe our generosity might be greater.

Mr. F. G. Robertson (Northumberland, Ont.): I welcome this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, of speaking to the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis), namely:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation at this session to substantially increase Canada's contribution to the United Nations technical assistance organization fund.

Practically every speaker who has taken part in this debate has indicated his support of the resolution. Personally I believe that our Canadian government has a creditable record in this regard, especially when we recall the amount of money being spent on the Colombo plan as well as the various specialized agencies of the United Nations, all of which involve technical assistance to a very large degree. I believe we can say that we are playing our full part.

We all appreciate, of course, that this is an important feature of United Nations work. In fact we cannot do too much to help the underdeveloped countries of the world. I believe when we see the amount of money being spent, which in itself is not a modest amount, and when we compare it with what is being spent by other countries, then we have no reason to be ashamed of the part Canada is playing.

I listened with much interest to the speeches of all hon. members this afternoon. The speeches delivered by the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Fairey) and the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) were based largely on their own experience in the underdeveloped countries. The experience of the hon. member for Victoria, B.C., was a result of his work as an official of a technical assistance program in Burma, whereas the experience of the hon. member for Vancouver South resulted from travelling through the underdeveloped countries. I am sure we all felt they made a worth-while contribution to the debate today.

I was particularly interested in the speech made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). As usual he gave us a very able and comprehensive report. I was particularly impressed by the fact that, in stressing the need of the underdeveloped countries, he made a point of the fact that we should speak of these countries only as being materially underdeveloped. He pointed out that some of these other countries were, in many ways, as well equipped as we are. This fact was underlined for me today because I had the pleasure of having lunch with a distinguished visitor from one of our sister commonwealth nations, the deputy minister of health for India. I can assure you that he was a man of great charm, culture and high professional training. This certainly brought home to me the wisdom of the minister's remarks.

I listened also to the speech made by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell). For a moment I thought he was going to agree that the government was doing a good job. In fact I believe he almost got around to that point, and his characteristic remark that the government is doing the right thing in the wrong way was not made today. I think we can assume this resolution has the wholehearted support of the majority of the members in this house.

I had the pleasure of attending the United Nations as a member of the economic and social council in June, 1952. At that time the Canadian delegation was headed by the present Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage), who did a very able job in directing the work of that delegation. The present Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) was also a member of the delegation, attending in his capacity as assistant to the Minister of Finance. He took part in the discussions concerning the financial arrangements of the United Nations. I was greatly impressed with the work of the other delegates representing the Department of External Affairs and the Department of Finance. I think it is safe to say that the expenditures made by Canada for United Nations purposes are carefully scrutinized by the finance department. We will all agree that is as it should be, for no matter how worthy the objective may be we want to know that any money we spend is being wisely spent. I believe that is one of the characteristics of this government, they make sure that any money they appropriate is well spent.

I am one of those who believe that the United Nations is a worth-while organization and is making a real contribution to the peace of the world. In common with the hon. member representing the Social Credit group who spoke earlier, I believe that the most beneficial results of the United Nations work are in the social and welfare field. However, I am sure he would be one of the first to admit that political and military matters are most difficult to deal with. While in many instances it would appear that we are getting nowhere in military and political matters, I believe the United Nations has also made a real contribution in those fields.

I was very much impressed with the work of such specialized agencies as the world health organization, the food organization, the international bank, UNESCO, and so on. In all these agencies technical assistance plays an important part, and we are spending huge sums of money in offering technical assistance to the underdeveloped countries through these agencies.

I should like to bring to the attention of the house, Mr. Speaker, some of the remarks of the Canadian representative at the eighth session of the United Nations general assembly, parts of which were also quoted by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. I do not believe these quotations were given; if they were, I believe they are worthy of repetition. I quote from the remarks made by our representative on September 28, 1953, at the eighth session of the United Nations:

> I do not propose, in this general debate on technical assistance, to make a long speech or to go into time-consuming detail. I simply wish to reaffirm my country's belief in and continued support for the technical assistance programs. The concept of mutual aid and enlightened self-help which is the basis of all these programs—that of the United Nations, the Colombo plan sponsored by several countries of the commonwealth, and the United States bilateral arrangements—is one of the most fruitful and significant developments in international affairs since the second world war. Certainly, none gives to those peoples of the world who are still living in comparative poverty greater assurance that others more fortunate stand ready to co-operate with them in their struggle towards a future free from material want and unnecessary suffering; none gives the underdeveloped countries themselves a better opportunity to help one another by exchange of skills and training; none contributes in a more useful and constructive way to the achievement of the objectives set forth in articles 55 and 56 of the charter.

Then I should like to quote further from the remarks of the same gentleman on October 27, 1953, at the same session of the general assembly, when he said:

> Many delegations, in speaking of the contributions which their governments hope to make to the 1954 expanded program, have stressed the benefits which their own countries have derived from technical assistance and their belief that, by the further exchange of technical skills and know-how, extensive and enduring progress can be made towards prosperity and improved standards of living all over the world. The Canadian government shares this belief. Canada has been, and still is, a country which depends greatly upon the export of primary products. But our recent and rapid industrial growth has been based upon technical developments and upon the exploration of improved industrial and agricultural techniques which we have pursued in our own country and which we are ready to share with others.
> In accordance with our belief in the fundamental importance of the kind of work which is being done under the expanded program of technical assistance, I am authorized to announce that if, in our view, the support given to the 1954 program by the other contributors warrants such action, and if the total of the contributions is sufficient to make a reasonable and workable program on a sound economic basis, the Canadian government, subject to parliamentary approval, is prepared to increase its contribution to the 1954 expanded program of technical assistance from $800,000, as it was in 1953, up to a maximum of one million five hundred thousand dollars (United States). I should further add that if the total of contributions falls below what we regard as reasonable, the Canadian contribution would be reduced accordingly.

It is our hope that when the pledging conference meets in two weeks time, the response from delegations will be such as to ensure the continuance at the maximum possible efficiency of what we regard as one of the most valuable contributions the United Nations has so far made to international economic co-operation and progress.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I believe the Canadian government has already taken substantial steps in the spirit of this resolution. Subject to the approval of parliament we are proposing that we practically double our contribution to the technical assistance fund.

Technical assistance means the sharing with underdeveloped countries of the advanced knowledge and skills of the industrialized and more highly developed countries. The idea of international technical assistance on a large scale is relatively new. It was proposed first by President Truman in his inaugural address to congress in 1949. I expect to refer to this matter later in my remarks. This suggestion was quickly taken up by the United Nations, which organized an expanded program of technical assistance in 1950.

There are various arguments one might use to support technical assistance in underdeveloped countries. I think the one that comes to mind first, in fact the most important one, is on ethical and moral grounds. The rich countries should be prepared to help the countries with lower standards of living, so that their standards of living can be raised.

We have already heard in the house figures showing the difference in real income as between rich countries and very poor countries in the world. Those contrasts are indeed very striking, and they underline the necessity of being ready to help these people. I think it is also important to point out how the life expectancy in developed countries compares with that in the underdeveloped. In Canada and the United States a child may look forward to an average life of 60-plus years. In the underdeveloped countries an average life expectancy is in the neighbourhood of 30 years. By improving their living conditions we should be able greatly to increase their life expectancy.

The measure of the poverty in much of the world is best understood not by figures but by descriptions. I have read that in parts of Africa over 90 per cent of the people are infected by one or more kinds of worms. This shows a great need for modern health standards. Seven per cent of the world's people enjoy 40 per cent of the income, whereas another 54 per cent of the people enjoy only 13 per cent of the income.

More than that, there is a strong tendency for extremes of poverty and affluence to diverge. That is, rich countries, with their great capabilities, tend to get richer while poor countries, with no technical skills, tend to become even poorer. And I do believe that in many of these so-called impoverished nations there is an even greater cleavage between the classes living in those countries. We find a small minority of very rich people while the great majority live in abject misery.

I remember one of the most striking occasions at the meeting of the United Nations I attended was a speech delivered by a delegate from one of these underdeveloped countries. As I remember his remarks he said, "In our country it is not a matter of enjoying some little luxury. It is more a matter of finding a crust of bread for a starving son, or finding some simple drug to relieve the agonies of death of a loving mother".

I would stress again that the main reason for helping underdeveloped countries is the moral one. Nevertheless, political considerations do enter into the question. These, we will admit, are possibly of a selfish nature but, in our present international situation, it must be admitted that they are realistic.

On motion of Mr. Robertson the debate was adjourned.

RESEARCH

PROMOTION AND ACCELERATION OF ACTIVITIES —WITHDRAWAL OF MOTION

On the order:

Notice of motion: Mr. Murphy (Lambton West)—That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of setting up a special committee representative of all parties, with the power to call witnesses and send for documents and papers for the purpose of examining and reporting upon the advisability of providing inducements to promote and accelerate activities in the field of research.

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, before you call it six o'clock may I have the consent of the house to have my motion withdrawn from the order paper?

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to withdraw his notice of motion appearing as No. 5 under that heading? It can be withdrawn only by unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: I outlined last evening the agenda for tomorrow. Meantime the suggestion I made has been accepted, and on Friday we shall consider the Criminal Code.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

PRIVILEGE

MR. POULIOT—REFERENCE TO USE OF THE WORD "TORY"

Mr. Jean-François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, since yesterday afternoon I have been rather remorseful, and I wonder if I have not been unfair to the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), who is one of our genial colleagues, an able lawyer and a brilliant debater. We have to live together, work together and suffer together, and it is impossible for members of parliament not to observe the amenities when life is spent together. For my own punishment, I have decided not to mention a word which belongs to the king's English and is highly parliamentary. I shall not use the word "Tory" for a month.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I can only say that the testimonial from the hon. member is highly appreciated, but was entirely unsolicited. Since, however, he has imposed this penance upon himself, I shall reciprocate by refraining for a month from using the word "Grit".

Mr. Pouliot: I did it just to clear my conscience.

QUESTIONS

ARMED FORCES PENSIONERS—R.M.C. GRADUATES

Mr. Noseworthy:

How many of the 145 pensioners who were serving in the regular forces before June 1, 1944, and have been released since September 1946, with less than 20 years' service, were graduates of the Royal Military College?

Mr. Blanchette: According to the records available in the Department of National Defence, 6 of the 145 pensioners referred to are graduates of the Royal Military College, that is approximately 5 per cent, whereas the number of graduates of the Royal Military College serving as officers in the Canadian army in 1944 was 961, that is approximately 2·07 per cent of the total of 34,638.

83276—125½

CANADIAN ARSENAL, LINDSAY

Mr. Hodgson:

1. How many people are employed at present at the Canadian arsenal in Lindsay, Ontario?
2. How many employees were on the payroll in September 1951, September 1952, September 1953?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur):

1. 570.

2. September 1951, 506; September 1952, 692; September 1953, 588.

TOMATO PULP—IMPORTS FROM ITALY

Mr. Lennard:

How many pounds of tomato pulp or paste were imported into Canada from Italy in the year 1953?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Tomato pulp or paste is not separately classified and there are no records that would show the separate importations of this commodity.

SHEEP AND LAMBS

Mr. Kirk (Antigonish-Guysborough):

What was the population of sheep and lambs (a) in Canada; (b) in Nova Scotia, during each of the years 1938 to 1953, both inclusive?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The number of sheep and lambs in Nova Scotia and Canada as at June 1, 1938-1953 were as follows:

	Nova Scotia	Canada
June 1, 1938	145,500	3,046,800
June 1, 1939	142,900	2,911,400
June 1, 1940	142,600	2,886,600
June 1, 1941	138,200	2,840,100
June 1, 1942	149,000	3,196,900
June 1, 1943	161,600	3,458,600
June 1, 1944	161,300	3,725,500
June 1, 1945	160,200	3,621,800
June 1, 1946	154,200	2,941,500
June 1, 1947	138,000	2,706,900
June 1, 1948	130,700	2,246,800
June 1, 1949	123,300	2,075,400
June 1, 1950	131,600	2,015,000
June 1, 1951	95,400	1,461,200
June 1, 1952	83,700	1,588,200
June 1, 1953	95,000	1,721,300

NOTE: The estimates for 1942 to 1950 inclusive are currently being revised in line with census data for 1941 and 1951.

Questions

CANADIAN ARTISTS—GOVERNMENT GRANTS

Mr. Michener:

1. In the past 20 years have any grants, annuities or like payments been made by the Canadian government to or in aid of (a) Canadian authors, painters or other artists, and (b) theatrical, operatic or ballet companies or groups?

2. If so, what was the total amount of all such payments in each of the last 20 years?

3. Who were the individual recipients and how much was paid to each in the past five years?

Mr. Benidickson:

1. (a) Yes; (b) No.

2. $54,000.

3. $4,000 annually to the Canadian Writers' Foundation, Inc.

MALLEABLE IRON PIPE FITTINGS

Mr. Starr:

What was the total amount of malleable iron pipe fittings imported into Canada month by month, during the year 1953 and in January 1954, from (a) United States; (b) United Kingdom; (c) Japan?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Information not available. Malleable iron pipe fittings are not separately classified in Canadian import trade statistics but are included in the general item of "Pipe fittings, n.o.p.".

Canadian imports by countries under this general item during the months January to October 1953, are as follows:

Month 1953	United Kingdom $	United States $	Germany West $	Japan $	Total, all countries $
January	38,308	356,529	557	8,892	404,286
February	42,960	344,521	....	1,618	389,099
March	21,826	415,687	34	1,245	438,792
April	24,948	356,323	429	3,967	385,667
May	38,239	456,095	....	8,558	502,892

July	32,952	382,260	100	31,544	446,856
August	36,920	335,545	1,290	25,421	399,176
September	46,482	434,280	....	2,040	482,802
October	52,609	420,176	....	12,042	484,827
November	not yet available
December	not yet available
Totals	$382,926	$3,905,020	$6,557	$95,327	$4,389,830

SHIPBUILDING BOUNTY, NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Power (St. John's West):

What amounts of money were paid in Newfoundland on account of shipbuilding bounty, during each of the years 1949 to 1953?

Mr. McCann: Assuming that reference is to assistance in construction of fishing vessels of the dragger or long-liner type, no amounts have up to date been paid in Newfoundland. Five applications are pending.

TOMATO JUICE AND PULP—IMPORTS FROM U.S.

Mr. Lennard:

1. How many pounds of tomato juice were imported into Canada from the United States in the year 1953?

2. How many pounds of tomato pulp or paste were imported into Canada from the United States in the year 1953?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): 1 and 2. Tomato juice and tomato pulp or paste are not separately classified and there are no records that would show the separate importations of these commodities.

[Mr. Howe (Port Arthur).]

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

LAND SURVEYS, KIPLING, SASK.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain):

1. Did the federal authorities make any land surveys in the village of Kipling, Saskatchewan, during the years 1952 or 1953?

2. If so, what was the purpose of these surveys?

MARITIME PROVINCES—DREDGING

Mr. Nowlan:

1. How many contracts for dredging were awarded in the maritime provinces, exclusive of Newfoundland, during the calendar year 1953?

2. What was the location of each such dredging operation?

3. Which of these, if any, were awarded without tender?

4. Where tenders were called, what were the names of the firms or individuals submitting each such tender, the unit price or total amount thereof and the names of those to whom contracts were awarded?

5. What was the total amount paid to each such contractor and the quantity of dredging performed?

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Before the orders of the day are called, Mr. Speaker, I am going to disturb the tranquillity of the house for a moment by asking leave, seconded by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy), to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 31, for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the serious and mounting unemployment situation now facing this country and the urgent need for government action to prevent further economic distress.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has moved the adjournment of the house under standing order 31 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the serious and mounting unemployment situation now facing this country and the urgent need for government action to prevent further economic distress.

The hon. member was kind enough to give me notice that he was going to make this motion. Therefore, though I did not wish to take advantage of his courtesy, I had a chance to look at the authorities. While I did not know the exact terms of the motion he was to move, I realize now that according to the terms of standing order 31 a matter which is to be proposed, if the adjournment is to be granted, must be one of recent occurrence; and it must be so important that the public interest would suffer if the matter were not debated immediately.

It strikes me that from time to time, ever since this session was inaugurated, references have been made to unemployment. Questions have been asked of the minister, and he has answered them.

It seems to me therefore that this is a situation which is not of the type coming within the terms of the provision imposed by standing order 31. I agree with the hon. member that any matter concerning unemployment in this country is one which is serious, and it might be important to debate it—but not under standing order 31. It is not the kind of situation which justifies the putting aside of the important matters which were announced by the leader of the house for consideration today. I see on the order paper, for instance, that today we shall be considering the second reading of a bill respecting the Canadian forces, another bill respecting benefits for members of the Canadian forces, and so on.

As the matter is one of a general character, and not of recent occurrence, I do not think we should put aside the orders announced for today for the purpose of adjourning the house. Therefore with great regret, and with respect, I have to give it as my opinion that this does not meet the requirements of standing order 31, and I cannot allow the motion to stand.

Mr. Gillis: If I might be permitted to say this, while I am not going to quarrel with Your Honour's ruling—because that is your prerogative—I am reasonably sure that if I had an opportunity to discuss the matter I could convince even you that it was of urgent public importance and necessitated review by members of the House of Commons. However, at another time we may have a chance to do this.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if I might add a word, it is the intention on Monday to move to go into supply in respect of one or two departments. I should think that would be an occasion when the hon. member could discuss this very important subject. Then there is another point. I cannot be in the house this afternoon, and I should like to say a few words on the subject myself.

Mr. Gillis: I trust the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) will not cut in on us.

WATER POLLUTION

NORTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. Campbell (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Acting Prime Minister. My question arises partly from what has transpired in the house within the last few weeks, and partly as a result of a lengthy telegram I received last night from the mayor of Prince Albert. I shall not read it to the house, but it states that they have up-to-date facilities for the treatment of water in the city. They have tried activated carbon and chlorine dioxide since last Saturday, and there has been no improvement.

They are asking that the federal government pass a law which would cover this situation. I am asking this government, through the Acting Prime Minister, whether the government will consider the introduction of legislation immediately which would prevent any industry dumping any matter in any interprovincial river which would cause the pollution of the water in that river.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite clear as to the constitutional position, but it is my understanding, from discussions we have had in the house, that the jurisdiction is provincial. However, I shall have the matter looked into and determine whether it would be proper legislation for the government to consider.

IMMIGRATION

SUGGESTED CLOSING OF CANADIAN OFFICES IN THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. In view of the fact that some United States immigration entry offices in Canada are to be closed, does the Canadian immigration branch contemplate closing Canadian immigration entry offices in the United States?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I do not think we contemplate that. As a matter of fact, subject to correction, I do not believe we have any offices in the United States.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): I think you have one in Chicago.

VETERANS LAND ACT

ALLEGED INSTRUCTIONS TO VETERANS TO LEAVE WINTER JOBS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Has the Department of Veterans Affairs recently issued a directive to young farmers who took up land under the Veterans Land Act that they must quit jobs which they have taken for the winter as a means of helping them to get their land clear and their indebtedness paid, and get back on the land?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): The answer is no. No such directive has been issued by the administration under the Veterans Land Act.

INCOME TAX

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY FOLLOWING QUEBEC LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance. Is he in a position to make a statement as to the position of federal income tax payers in the province of Quebec as a result of the decision of the legislature in that province to levy a provincial income tax?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the only information I have concerning the proposed tax is what I have been able to glean from stories in the newspapers. However, I understand the government of the province of Quebec proposes to impose a personal income tax—

Mr. Knowles: On the minister.

Mr. Abbott: —and that it is to take the form of some percentage of federal income tax, whatever that may be. Of course, successive reductions in the federal income tax have made it possible for any province which cares to do so to enter the field, the rates now being approximately half what they were at the peak of taxation during the war.

So far as the federal income tax payer is concerned, he will be able, under the Income Tax Act, to take credit for any provincial tax paid up to 5 per cent of his federal tax liability.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INQUIRY AS TO SALE OF PRINCE RUPERT DRYDOCK AND SHIPYARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to ask the Minister of Transport. Has the Prince Rupert drydock and shipyard been put up for sale? If so, what steps have been taken to see that whoever purchases it will keep it in operation?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The hon. member was good enough to telephone my office to the effect that he was going to ask this question. The answer to the first part of it is yes, the Canadian National Railways are putting the Prince Rupert drydock up for sale. They are doing it because they find that it is being operated at a tremendous loss and, furthermore, that it would take substantial sums of money to put it into repair. It is not in good repair at the moment.

With reference to the second question my reply is that the Canadian National Railways are selling the drydock without stipulations. They are selling it in the same manner they would sell any other asset of the railways. It is hoped by the Canadian National Railways that a purchaser will be found who will be willing to operate the drydock. I think I should add here, in fairness to my colleague the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Applewhaite), that he has asked me to see a delegation to discuss this matter, and I have agreed to do so, together with two or three of my colleagues.

Mr. Green: May I ask a supplementary question? The sale is not under a condition that the drydock and shipyard must not be demolished?

Mr. Chevrier: The yard is being put up for sale by the Canadian National Railways. I have seen the terms. I have not them before me, and I would not like to give them from memory, but I should be glad to send my hon. friend a copy of the press release, together with the notice of tender. He will see there all the terms, together with the assets that are being sold.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—REQUEST FOR FURTHER STATEMENT RESPECTING LAY-OFFS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport? In view of the continuing lay-offs by the Canadian National Railways, can the minister make any statement that will allay the fears of railway workers that still further lay-offs are in prospect?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I think I have already given to the house some indication of the position. I can say at this time that these lay-offs have been necessitated because of a decline in traffic—I speak now, of course, only for the Canadian National Railways—due to a number of factors, one of them being the decline in the traffic in the United States. There are a number of connections made by the Canadian National Railways at border points with United States railways, and the traffic coming in from there has declined substantially. There is also a substantial decline in other commodities in several parts of Canada having to do with coal and grain; and there is also the factor, I am sorry to say, of dieselization, which has added to the difficulties.

I do not know what the actual figures are at the moment, but the last figures I got were in the neighbourhood of 1,500, and I have not seen the picture for this week. I know that the officers of the Canadian National Railways are most anxious to take on men just as soon as traffic conditions change. If there is any upswing in the traffic, then I am sure these men who have had to be laid off, unfortunately, will be taken on again.

Mr. Green: The minister gave a figure of the number of men who had been laid off by the Canadian National Railways. Is that figure all-inclusive, or is it in addition to the number given by his parliamentary assistant on January 22, which was 800?

Mr. Chevrier: The parliamentary assistant of course was correct as of that date. I am giving the figure I last saw which was one day last week, and it was in the neighbourhood of 1,500.

Mr. Green: That includes the 800 referred to before?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Winch: I think we had better revise the ruling with respect to urgency in the unemployment situation. The situation is deteriorating rapidly, and seems to have deteriorated seriously in the past few minutes.

FISCAL AND MONETARY MEASURES TO TAKE CARE OF UNEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Since I have not given him notice of it perhaps he would prefer to take this as notice and answer tomorrow. Can he tell the house something as to the fiscal and monetary policies which the Minister of Labour tells us are the means proposed to take care of unemployment?

NATURAL GAS

INQUIRY AS TO DECISION BY FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION ON APPLICATION OF WESTCOAST TRANSMISSION COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): May I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the government is in possession of any information which it is in a position to pass on to the house regarding the possible date when a decision might be handed down by the federal power commission of the United States on the application of Westcoast Transmission Company for a permit to export gas, and any other information the government has in its possession regarding this matter?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): The government has no official information on the point, but unofficially I have been informed both from Washington and from the office of the pipe-line company that a decision is expected early in April.

Inquiries of the Ministry

WHEAT

INQUIRY AS TO INITIATION OF FUTURES MARKET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the minister's attention been drawn to the statement made on the farm radio forum by the United States assistant secretary of agriculture to the effect that consideration is being given by Canada to initiating the futures market again for trading in wheat? Will the minister assure the wheat producers that no consideration is being given to opening the Winnipeg grain exchange for trading in wheat?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The attention of the minister was drawn to this article a few days ago by the hon. member. I had not been able to see the article, but I now have it from him. I do not think it is worded quite as strongly as is suggested in the hon. member's statement. The speaker said he understood the subject might be considered. I may say it has not been considered by myself, and as far as I know no consideration is being given to it by the government.

(Translation):

POST OFFICE

INQUIRY AS TO 40-HOUR WEEK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) one or two questions. First, at what date will the 40-hour week be implemented in the case of postal employees, and will these 40 hours extend over five consecutive days?

In the second place, when new hours are put into effect—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member might wait for an answer to his first question and then ask the second.

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. The five-day 40-hour week will be implemented on the date which has been announced and which was discussed during a recent debate; it is April 1, 1954. In regard to the second part of the question, the answer is, not necessarily.

Mr. Dufresne: When these new hours are in force, could the Postmaster General tell me whether they will apply to all postal employees throughout Canada, including those in Quebec?

[Mr. Howe (Port Arthur).]

Mr. Cote: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member wants to be patient, I believe that within a day or two the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) will make an official statement on the matter, after the civil service commission has submitted its report to the treasury board.

(Text):

Mr. Knowles: May I direct to the Minister of Finance a supplementary question on this subject? Is his own city of Montreal on the list for the five-day 40-hour week for post office workers?

Mr. Abbott: I hope so.

(Translation):

REMARKS CONCERNING THE ISSUE OF UNILINGUAL CHEQUES TO CERTAIN EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask another question of the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote). First, is the minister aware that students employed in a temporary capacity during the Christmas season at the Verdun post office were paid with unilingual cheques?

Secondly, has the minister taken steps so that the cheques printed for his department will hereafter be printed in the two official languages of the country?

Mr. Speaker: That is not a question of an urgent character. I believe that the hon. member should have it placed on the order paper.

EXPLOSIVES ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING IMPORTS, OFFENCES, CERTIFICATES, ETC.

The house resumed, from Tuesday, February 9, consideration in committee of Bill No. 83, to amend the Explosives Act—Mr. Prudham—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 4—Authorized explosives only.

The Chairman: When the committee rose on Tuesday we were considering clause 4. Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Nowlan: No.

Mr. Prudham: Shortly before ten o'clock on Tuesday, when this bill was last before the committee, the hon. member for Calgary North made inquiries about regulations applying to the purchase and use of explosives by a farmer. No permit is required to purchase explosives in any quantity, except when the purchase is made for resale. If the quantity bought exceeds 150 pounds the explosives will have to be stored in a magazine and licensed under this act. If the quantity is less than 150 pounds and is for private use it must be stored in a place and under conditions as described in the explosives regulations, part 13 of the consolidation of the Explosives Act and regulations. I have some copies of the act and the regulations here if the hon. member would like to have a copy.

The hon. member for Peterborough asked if it was lawful to carry explosives in automobiles. There is nothing in the act to prohibit a person from carrying explosives in a private automobile, but if the quantity exceeds five pounds there are certain regulations which must be observed. If the automobile is a public carrier, such as a taxi, it would be unlawful to carry explosives at all.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): The reason I asked that question is that quite often a farmer or someone may require explosives to blow up a stump, and he cannot have a public carrier transport it for him as he may have to go 20 or 30 miles to get it. He carries it in his own car. With the five-pound limit would he have to have a special place to store it?

Mr. Prudham: Yes.

Mr. Nowlan: This clause 4 repeals subsection 1 of section 5 of the act and substitutes a new subsection. The old subsection contained the words "except as provided in this act" and the new subsection contains the words "except as provided by the regulations". I do not think there is any other change in the wording of the subsection. I am wondering why the minister felt it necessary to delete the word "act" and substitute therefor the word "regulations".

I have protested against this practice before, so I shall not labour the matter at this time. This statute has been on the books for many years and it spelled out in part what was prohibited, so there must be some good reason why that should now be abolished and we should simply have the word "regulations" substituted therefor. It will be impossible now by reading the act to find out what is prohibited and what is not. We are simply having a blanket change, taking out the word "act" and substituting therefor the word "regulations".

No doubt the minister and his advisers will draw up proper regulations, but if you want to find out what is in the regulations you have to go to some back corner of the Canada Gazette. I am speaking rather feelingly now as a lawyer practising in the country, because when you have to deal with these things you like to find them in the statute. I contend that there should be something more in the statute than the blanket power to the minister to make regulations. For years the statute has prohibited certain things, and I should like to know why this change is being made. The Minister of Justice is in the chamber; he has heard me make the same complaint before. However, I am afraid it fell on deaf ears.

In my opinion this is a wrong principle against which this house should protest. There should not be a continual repealing of sections and substituting therefor of regulations. This is the most flagrant case I have ever seen, because all it does is take out the word "act" and substitute therefor the word "regulations". I do think the minister should give some logical and forceful explanation as to why this is being done. Otherwise I shall have to protest against it.

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, the main reason that "regulations" is being substituted for "act" in this subsection is that in these days of fast development in the resources field, conditions are continually changing. If all the regulations were incorporated in the act it would be most inflexible and would not meet changing conditions.

Mr. Nowlan: To use a slang expression, I will buy that to a certain extent. I realize that conditions are changing and that the minister should have power to deal with special circumstances or emergencies which require regulations. But there are basic conditions which should be governed by acts of parliament. That is what we are supposed to be here for. That is why we pass legislation.

This argument about changing conditions should apply also to the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Labour. Every minister is faced with changing conditions. If we are going to accept that argument we had better close up this place and rent it, and simply pass a blanket act to say that we are abdicating and hereafter the government can pass regulations. I do not think we want to do that. I do not think we should do that.

I am perfectly willing to admit that the minister should have the power to make regulations, and I am perfectly prepared to leave it to his good judgment; but I do not think he should have the power to substitute himself and his regulations for what heretofore has been an act of parliament.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I should like to add just a word on this subject of regulations. As the hon. member says, it is not merely this power that is given; it is given in such a way that we must object. For example, in connection with the housing bill we were not going to be able to see the regulations until the legislation was passed. In other words we were going to have to act blindly, just like a lot of half-informed children, in passing that legislation.

What the hon. member has said is only too true. We have to be sensible about this. We realize there must be some flexibility, but the great danger of legislation of this kind is that we are to have a general section in the act and then everything else goes into the regulations.

Mr. Adamson: There is a question or two I should like to ask concerning authorized explosives. First of all I should like to have some information as to the regulations governing fireworks. What is the maximum charge limit, in ounces, in fireworks? What are the limitations in connection with the composition of the explosive? What is the maximum amount of fireworks that may be transported at a time?

I mention these things because the Hand Fireworks Company is near where I live. Unfortunately there have been one or two accidents at the fireworks plant, and there have been other accidents in connection with the sale of fireworks. I believe in some of the American states fireworks are almost prohibited. I should like to know what the regulations are, and if they have been amended. Have any additional restrictions been put in force recently?

Mr. Prudham: The regulations governing fireworks will be found in part II, regulations 200 and 201. I do not think there can be any hard and fast rule, any blanket ruling covering fireworks. I was out to the new explosives laboratory near Uplands airport recently when they were testing explosives that had been sent in from Japan to see if they were safe and under what conditions they would be safe. The department decides under what conditions and in what quantities these explosives can be shipped or stored or used.

Mr. Adamson: Is there any place where the general public can see these regulations? They are being amended and changed all the time, and some consideration should be given to this phase of the matter. Any hardware store or any other store selling fireworks should have them available.

Mr. Prudham: Any explosives or fireworks manufactured by Canadian manufacturers are closely classified, and anything that is imported is also classified after testing at our laboratory. The hon. member has asked how the public would know there is a list of authorized explosives, including fireworks, issued by the department. Such a list is available to merchants and any member of the public who is interested.

Mr. Adamson: I want to ask a question about dynamite, and the storage and disposal of old explosives. Has the maximum period of storage in regard to explosives been shortened? I mention this because of a recent strike at the Hollinger gold mine, not the most recent one but one prior to that. There was a considerable amount of dynamite underground when the men went on strike, and there was some question of disposal. Special volunteers had to go underground to move the explosives because they had been stored there. Under such conditions nitroglycerin tends to concentrate, being the heaviest part of the dynamite.

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, conditions such as the hon. member has mentioned come under provincial regulations.

Mr. Adamson: I know there is a provincial mines act which takes care of that sort of thing, but under this act is the storage of dynamite or other explosives in mines considered at all?

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, this department does not regulate the storage of explosives in mines. That comes under provincial regulations. We have authority under this act to destroy explosives which have deteriorated and are unsafe, and where they constitute a danger to the public safety. I believe that in Ontario the provincial regulations are very well administered, and they are quite adequate as regards public safety; but if we have reason to doubt that we can apply the regulations under this act.

Mr. Adamson: Then this act is ultra vires of the provincial mines acts? Surely a federal government statute dealing with explosives should also deal with the major use of explosives in Canada, namely in the mining industry. It seems to me that if this act does not deal with the storage and use of explosives in mines it is rather lacking in some respects.

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, to answer my hon. friend's question more specifically I would refer him to page 2 of the regulations, chapter 7, section 2, subsection (h), paragraph (i) which reads as follows:

> (h) "magazine" means any building, storehouse, structure or place in which any explosive is kept or stored, but does not include
> (i) a place at or in and for the use of a mine or quarry in a province in which provision is made by the law of such province for the efficient inspection of mines and quarries and explosives used in connection therewith . . .

Mr. Adamson: Therefore this act has really nothing to do with the major use of explosives in Canada?

Mr. Prudham: Not when the provincial government has made provisions.

Mr. Adamson: Are there any provincial governments that do not have a mines act?

Mr. Prudham: Our department inspects mine magazines in New Brunswick and Newfoundland by invitation.

Mr. Adamson: Mr. Chairman, I want to ask one more question about the percentage of nitroglycerin or gelignite or the so-called safe explosives used especially in the coal mining industry. In that industry explosives are used which have a low concentration of nitroglycerin or a low explosive content or flash point. They are especially designed so as not to cause fire in coal mines. Can the minister say what the composition of such explosives is?

Mr. Prudham: In addition to standard explosives, certain explosives are designed for specific purposes. The hon. member has asked for percentages but I am afraid I cannot give him that, though I would be glad to pass on the information later.

Mr. Adamson: I rather wondered about that because there has been an alteration recently in the United Kingdom standards as regards underground explosives, and I wondered whether some similar action was contemplated here.

Mr. Prudham: We are really prohibited by the act from giving that kind of information. I would refer the hon. member to section 25 regarding the disclosure of confidential information, which states:

> Any person employed under this act who without due authority from the minister discloses any confidential information is guilty of an offence . . .

Mr. Adamson: But surely the content of explosives which is designated—

Mr. Prudham: Manufacturers have their own formulae.

Mr. Adamson: I realize that, but surely in this act there must be overriding regulations which limit the percentage and govern the quantity of nitroglycerin in any explosive used underground.

Mr. Prudham: Every explosive is tested on its merits. Each manufacturer would have his own formulae, which would be tested and certified on performance.

Mr. Adamson: But in this act then there is no limitation as to the concentration of the active blasting element in an explosive?

Mr. Prudham: No; each manufacturer submits his own sample. I had a man in my office a couple of weeks ago who claimed he had an entirely new formula which would revolutionize the explosives business, and we have asked him to submit samples, which he has not done as yet. He may not have any nitroglycerin in his explosive, but I do not know.

The Chairman: Shall clause 4 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Nowlan: I have one question which perhaps the minister has already dealt with but if so I did not hear him and I would like to put it again. Perhaps he dealt with it in answer to my hon. friend from York West. Two or three years ago there was a factory near Halifax engaged in the manufacture of dynamite. After it had been closed down for some years there was an explosion there. Perhaps the minister's officials would be conversant with the details. Some men were around at the time, out hunting as a matter of fact, and there was a dreadful explosion in which they were blown to pieces and everything there was shattered. Apparently there had been a certain amount of dynamite left there in storage. It had been there for years, had deteriorated and gas had generated with the result that the explosion took place. A very close personal friend of mine was killed there at that time.

I want to know whether such a matter would come under the control of this department. Was there no control in that case, or what was done to inspect such premises and thus prevent the explosion taking place?

Mr. Prudham: I understand it would come under this department. That particular case was investigated, and the report is available if the hon. member would like a copy.

Mr. Nowlan: Are inspections carried out from time to time by the minister's department in regard to factories where such explosives are stored? How long before this explosion took place had that particular factory been inspected?

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, in that particular instance the factory had not been operating since this act came into force. Had it been a factory during the life of this act we would have inspected it.

Mr. Nowlan: So no inspection had taken place at that time

Mr. Prudham: No.

The Chairman: Shall clause 4 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 5—No import without permit.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, again this is an amendment substituting one subsection for another. I think there is a rather important change here. The old section—I say the old section but I mean the one now in force—says:

> No person shall import any explosive into Canada, other than safety cartridges, without a permit issued under this section.

This new clause says:

> Except as provided by the regulations, no person shall import any explosive into Canada without a permit issued under this section.

In other words, safety cartridges are now considered to be explosives, I take it. I am thinking, for instance, of the thousands of hunters who come into the maritime provinces in the fall of the year—I refer to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick—to hunt. Many of them bring in their own rifles and their own ammunition. Under the act as it stands they can do so. I looked up the definition of safety cartridge, and that would include the ordinary commercial cartridge that you buy. I understand it is now proposed that they cannot do that.

This will be a good thing for the local merchant, the hardware man or the corner store man who is going to sell ammunition and equipment. I can see an argument that can be made for that man. But on the other hand I think a good many tourists are going to resent the fact that they cannot bring in their own ammunition. We all know what some of these follows are like. They have their own high-powered rifles and have special ammunition for them. Surely there is no danger, is there, in connection with safety cartridges; or has experience shown that there is—and if so what—and is that the reason their importation is now prohibited?

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, the change is in section 9, subsection 2, which reads as follows:

> No person shall import any explosive into Canada, other than safety cartridges, without a permit issued under this section.

The chief inspector of explosives advises that provision by regulation for safety cartridges was made to cover the case of tourists coming into Canada to hunt. It has been found that large quantities of safety cartridges—that is small arms ammunition—were brought into the country by wholesale dealers and jobbers over which the chief inspector of explosives had no control. Much of this ammunition has been found to be faulty and serious accidents have occurred. In order to prevent the recurrence of such accidents and to maintain better control over the quality of such ammunition brought into Canada it has been suggested that by regulation the quantity be limited to a reasonable amount. I do not know just exactly what that amount will be. The amount suggested to me was 2,000 rounds, which would suit almost any tourist.

This will be subject to changes based on practical experience, of course. The explosives division is equipped with the necessary machinery and is capable of carrying out proper inspection for quality on safety cartridges; and before allowing the shipment of large quantities into Canada. Samples could be obtained for inspection and analysis without hardship on anyone.

Mr. Nowlan: Then it is the intention of the minister to permit tourists to bring ammunition into Canada under the regulation?

Mr. Prudham: Yes, but not for resale.

Mr. Nowlan: I presume that at the border you will have to have inspectors, or will have to delegate to the customs officers the task of controlling that traffic. Will that be the set-up?

Mr. Prudham: The customs officers would act for us.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 6 to 10 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 11—Peace officer may arrest person committing offence.

Mr. Adamson: In connection with this clause there is a point I want to bring to the attention of the committee. It concerns a matter which is of some considerable importance, namely the clandestine transportation of explosives in baggage by air. It arises from the now famous or infamous case of the destruction of the Canadian Pacific airliner by a time bomb, by a group of assassins in Quebec.

Since those multiple murders there have been no less than seven other attempts. Some of them have succeeded in destroying the aircraft by placing explosives in baggage. I think there have been three which caused multiple fatalities and four which did not, either because the bomb did not explode or because the attempts were in other ways detected. The subject is dealt with in some detail—I say this for the benefit of hon. members who may be interested—in the New Yorker magazine of last October or November. The article deals with this crime in some detail and elaborates on the facts of the case. The story is headed—taking the words, I think, of Mr. Justice Tremblay in Quebec—"This crime has no name".

There seems to me to be an opportunity here for this sort of thing to go on. In this act there does seem to be a loophole which allows explosives to be placed clandestinely on aircraft, although it is against the law—and of course it is murder—to do so. I believe those who are responsible for the handling of freight and baggage on aircraft should be empowered under this act to inspect without warrant any baggage placed upon an aircraft which carries passengers.

I realize that this is perhaps a restriction of the privilege of shipping express and other cargo by air, but I also realize that no legitimate shipper would object to having his goods inspected. I believe there is no worse or more horrible crime than that of the mass destruction of innocent people through this method. I should therefore like to move an amendment to clause 11—it would be clause 11 (3)—in these terms:

Any air line operating in Canada may appoint one or more persons at each airport who shall be empowered under this act to inspect or open any parcel, package or other object for carriage on any aircraft carrying passengers.

I realize that we have the Criminal Code. I also realize that we have regulations. A regulation and the Criminal Code are not going to be much protection to people who may be killed in the destruction of an aircraft. I believe there should be some method under which those who are responsible for transporting air cargo or air express in a passenger-carrying aircraft are empowered to inspect the cargo or baggage before shipment.

Mr. Prudham: The hon. member has brought up a very important point, but I think perhaps the situation is fully covered by the existing regulations. I should like to read from the Department of Transport air regulations, part VIII, section 1:

Explosives and other dangerous articles, other than those necessary for the operation or navigation of the aircraft or for the safety of the personnel or passengers on board, shall not be carried in an aircraft except as may be directed by the minister.

No person shall send or take upon an aircraft any explosives without distinctly marking their nature on the outside of the package containing such explosives, and otherwise give notice thereof to the person in charge of the aircraft whose duty it is to receive such goods.

No aircraft carrying explosives shall carry a passenger other than the owner of the explosives or his accredited representatives; but this requirement does not apply to ammunition permitted for hunting or sporting purposes or as emergency equipment.

Explosives Act

Under the Explosives Act, section 17, we find the following:

There may be appointed in the manner authorized by law a chief inspector of explosives, together with such other inspectors and chemists as are necessary for carrying out the provisions of this act.

The officers of this department have discussed this very problem, and propose to consult with the enforcement officers of the Department of Transport to see if they will co-operate in the inspection of express and baggage that goes on board passenger aircraft. They could then be appointed deputy inspectors under this act by authority of the section I have just quoted.

Mr. Adamson: I am glad something is being done about it. My amendment is a preventive one. While there are regulations, and while the shipping of explosives would contravene both acts, I still feel there is no adequate method of inspection to prevent the occurrence of similar crimes to that of the Guay incident, or whatever it is called, which resulted in the death of 27 people on a Canadian Pacific airliner. The crime is so horrible, and unfortunately it has happened on other occasions, that for the safety of the travelling public I should like to see this regulation put into the act. If the minister could see his way clear to adopting my amendment, I think it would be very useful for the safety of the travelling public.

Mr. Prudham: If the hon. member will withdraw his amendment I can assure him that our department, under the authority of this act, will co-operate with the Department of Transport with a view to preventing such occurrences in so far as that is possible.

Mr. Adamson: If I have that assurance from the minister, my point is made. There is no use persisting in an amendment which, if the government opposes it, will not carry. I did want to bring out the point most seriously that there must be some method by which baggage going on board an aircraft could be examined by the officers of an air line before the aircraft became airborne. I think it is only fair to the travelling public, and I rest my case not only on the Guay crime but the seven others which have taken place since then in other parts of the world.

The Chairman: Has the hon. member leave to withdraw his amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. Nowlan: Clause 11 of the bill is new, and is one against which I want to register a protest. It says in effect that a police officer or a peace officer may arrest anyone committing an offence under this act, which may or may not be all right. I doubt if it is. It goes on to say that a man may be arrested if the officer reasonably suspects him. This leaves the door wide open to any police officer or any sort of constable to make an arrest without a warrant.

I do not believe the provisions of this act, either as amended or as originally in the act, are of such grave importance that we should grant the right of arrest on suspicion without a warrant. It is true there is that right in the Criminal Code, but even in the Criminal Code the power is restricted to a police officer who finds a person committing an offence. In most cases the penalty under this act is only a fine of a few hundred dollars, so I believe we are opening the door still wider and giving more and more control to police officers, which is a violation of the concept upon which our whole system of justice is based.

The hon. member for York West has been discussing one very heinous type of offence. While the hon. member was speaking I was rather intrigued to recall an incident a friend told me about yesterday. He suffered a terrible catastrophe while he was in an aircraft. My friend is a sober, righteous and God-fearing individual. He was flying at 25,000 feet and had a bottle of whiskey in his club bag upon which the seal had not been broken, and it exploded. I am told that will happen if the seal has not been broken. There are many around here who could have obviated that danger.

I see that the act defines "explosive" as gunpowder, blasting powder, and then goes on to say—

> . . . and every other substance made, manufactured or used with a view to produce a violent effect . . .

I am not sure but what a bottle of whisky comes within that definition. I am sure no one in this house would ever be involved in a catastrophe of that nature, but if that should happen to someone are we going to arrest him without a warrant merely because he happened to lose a bottle of whisky while flying at 25,000 feet?

I am using that illustration facetiously, but it is an example of the danger of giving the power of arrest without a warrant for offences which are really summary and which are dealt with by the imposition of fines. The offences, at the most, are quasi-criminal, and in almost every case would be the result of ignorance of the regulations or technical offences. Of course a tourist might come here and carry ammunition without a permit, or something of that kind; but I do suggest that in the ordinary case, perhaps that of a farmer who violates the act because he holds too much in the way of explosives, there is no danger of his running away. A magistrate can get him any time he wishes.

Under our system one may lay an information before a magistrate. It may be a long procedure, and we have gone a long way in abrogating it, but I do not think we should do so for minor technical offences.

Mr. McIvor: If a peace officer is convinced that someone is holding explosives, and that a danger is involved, what would happen if that peace officer had to go back to see a magistrate and get a warrant? The damage would be done before he got it.

Mr. Knowles: Despite what the hon. member for Fort William has said, I wish to support the protest made by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings. This is the same argument we had some days ago when we were discussing one of the clauses in the bill amending the Criminal Code. Perhaps we will be discussing it again tomorrow.

It does seem to me we have to be extremely careful before we agree to a provision of this kind that departs from the time-honoured principles of justice that have meant so much in this country. I have read with interest not only the section that it is proposed to enact by this clause, but also the explanatory note on the righthand page; and I suggest they do not say the same thing. If the wording of the clause went no farther than the explanatory note, it might not be so objectionable. I shall read both of them. The explanatory note says:

> This amendment authorizes peace officers to arrest without warrant a person whom they find committing or whom they reasonably suspect is committing an offence against the act.

We find in this explanatory note a provision for either one thing or another, but both are in the present. It seems to me there would be a case for a clause of that kind. However, the wording of the clause itself is as follows:

> Any peace officer may without warrant arrest any person whom he finds committing or whom he on reasonable ground suspects of having committed an offence against this act.

I can visualize a case where a peace officer might find someone in the act of committing this offence, and that might have been what was in the mind of the hon. member for Fort William. But if the event has taken place in the past, and a peace officer merely suspects that a certain person has been guilty of it, why should we not stick to the principle that the peace officer must obtain a warrant before making an arrest? I have had to say on many occasions in the house that I am not a lawyer, and that I must look at these things from the point of view of a layman. But I am interested in the principles of justice and freedom, and I do not like to see departures of this kind.

The chances of having an amendment made, if it is moved from this side of the house, are not the best. I would suggest to the minister that he consider having one of his colleagues move an amendment to delete from clause 11 certain words appearing in lines 43 and 44. I suggest the deletion of the words, "or whom he on reasonable ground suspects of having committed". If those words were taken out the clause would then read:

Any peace officer may without warrant arrest any person whom he finds committing an offence against this act.

I would ask the minister to discuss this with his colleagues; and no colleague would be better qualified than the one sitting to his left, the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Prudham: This amendment is based upon experience in administering the act. For various reasons we feel it is necessary, in the interests of protecting the public. In some cases peace officers in the provinces administer the act for us. In isolated communities in the far north we might have special inspectors or peace officers appointed, who would have to travel considerable distances to lay a charge or obtain a warrant for the arrest of a person who is endangering the safety of the public.

The officers of this department have no desire to push anyone around; but I suggest when you are dealing with explosives you cannot afford delay, especially where the safety of the public is endangered. I can think of many instances where the provisions of this clause would be necessary to protect the public.

There comes to mind an instance during the war when the Americans were constructing the Alaska highway. At that time a construction company stored a large quantity of dynamite in a shack in the centre of Dawson Creek. Fire broke out, and the resulting explosion killed several people and practically wiped out the town. If an inspector had been on the job and had seen that condition he would have had to act quickly to prevent disaster. If he had found it necessary to go to the seat of government at Pouce Coupe to obtain a warrant, he perhaps would not have been able to act quickly enough.

This is just hypothetical, but many other situations could develop where, in the interests of public safety, a peace officer should have the power to arrest without warrant. I am told that we have had at least one case in Ontario where a provincial officer would not make an arrest because he doubted his authority. In that instance the person who was breaking one of the regulations was able to make his escape, and it was not possible to apprehend him.

The suggested clause in the bill is based upon experience; and in view of the hazards which might develop in connection with the transportation or use or storage of high explosives, we think it is quite reasonable.

Mr. Nowlan: With all respect to the minister, let me say that I do not think he has made a case to meet the contentions of my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre and myself. My hon. friend stressed the fact, as I did, that the minister might ask for the power to arrest without a warrant when a person is found committing an offence. However, I did think the case to which the minister referred, in connection with the building of the Alaska highway, was a little far-fetched, because they did not have an inspector on the job. It was never inspected; therefore there was no question of an arrest being made. If there had been inspection it would not have happened. If there had been an inspector who had the right to arrest without a warrant, he could have made the arrest and prevented the disaster. Once it happens, no further lives are being risked by the fact that you have not the right to arrest a man you suspect of having done something; and of course you can use the isolated example of the peace officer up near the north pole who may have to travel 500 miles.

It is really a sad picture, but I suspect that, generally, the peace officer acts after the offence has been committed and there has been an investigation. In these circumstances he could very easily take a warrant. And, much as I respect peace officers, and much as I regret a peace officer having to make a long trip, I think it is much better as a matter of principle that you have to lay an information and take out a warrant in respect of the offence committed, once it has been committed. It is better to do that than to accept the easy explanation, "Well, this will make it harder for the peace officer". After all, the police officers who join a city force expect to make some sacrifices; they are paid for it, and they are prepared to do it.

Really, I am surprised that the minister will not accept the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, because it is a glaring case, a matter such as this, where the amendment should be made as suggested and the past tense taken out, but, of course, leaving to police officers the right to make arrests if they find an offence actually in the course of being committed.

Mr. Prudham: Let us go back to the case my hon. friend mentioned, where some saboteur might be trying to unlawfully ship explosives on an aircraft. If the law officers suspected that a certain parcel contained explosives and they opened it while the man was still there, it seems unreasonable that they should have to go and lay a charge and get a warrant and let the man escape.

Mr. Nowlan: It is a continuing offence. You could arrest him right there.

Mr. Churchill: I should like to support what has been said by hon. members on this side of the house. Surely what the minister is after in his act and regulations is to prevent accidents or damage from improper use or storage of explosives. It seems to me that the example he gave from Dawson Creek is really not applicable here. What purpose is there in arresting a man when what you want, or would have liked to do in that instance, was remove the explosives or properly store them. It seems to me the arrest is something that takes place after the damage has been done. It is much more useful to prevent the damage from the explosive. This section gives to a peace officer the power to make an arrest if he suspects someone of having committed an offence, but that is something that takes place after the offence has been committed, after the damage has been done. Surely the due process of law would be satisfactory without this special arrangement.

The suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to limit it just to allowing arrest without warrant when a person is in the act of committing an offence should be satisfactory. By that means you prevent any damage occurring, and that would be so in the case so ably presented by the hon. member for York West, where explosives might be in a parcel going on board an aeroplane. The power of arrest there would be very helpful, but much more helpful would be the discovery of the parcel that contained the explosive and its removal for the protection of the people on the aeroplane.

Mr. Prudham: My officials tell me they have had several instances where people have tried to break into explosives plants. Usually, for reasons of safety, these plants are isolated from communities. Although the people who were trying to break in were seen, the officers were not able to make an arrest because they had to go back and lay a charge and take out a warrant before any action could be taken. The result was that those people escaped.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Occasionally the department gets word from an isolated place, the Northwest Territories, perhaps, that a certain individual has abandoned some explosives. They are unsafe for use and a menace to the public. Probably the individual has left the country or is on his way out; our officer might meet him, and without a warrant would be unable to arrest him.

This amendment is based on the practical experience that we have had, and we think in the interests of safety it is necessary to take that power.

Mr. McIvor: It says "reasonable grounds".

Mr. Knowles: I am still not satisfied that the minister has made any case at all for departure from the time-honoured principle in connection with matters of this kind. I had hoped that he or his colleague the Minister of Justice would give serious consideration to the proposal I made a few minutes ago. Apparently that is not going to come from that side. This matter is of sufficient importance that we should know where the committee stands on it. I therefore move:

That clause 11 be amended by deleting from lines 43 and 44 the words "or whom he on reasonable ground suspects of having committed".

If that amendment were to carry the clause would then read:

Any peace officer may without warrant arrest any person whom he finds committing an offence against this act.

I believe that is as far as we should go. I do not like the suggestion that we are being asked to change what amounts to the basis of criminal law just to suit the convenience of peace officers. It seems that there is already in our criminal law too much of a desire to make things easier for the prosecution. I offer this amendment to clause 11.

Mr. Prudham: This act is not designed for the convenience of police officers. It is designed to protect the safety of the public. I believe that the safety of the public is of greater importance than the possible inconvenience of some individual who, in any event, will have recourse to the courts.

Mr. Adamson: I want to say just one word on this. My amendment, which I withdrew, had nothing to do with arrest. My amendment was actually a protective amendment for the purpose of inspection. I must say that I find myself in agreement with the argument raised by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings and the hon. members for Winnipeg North Centre and Winnipeg South Centre. If a man is breaking into an explosives factory he is committing an offence and can be arrested. This amendment is an abridgement of the rights of the citizen which I do not think is justified in the circumstances.

Mr. Garson: I do not want to participate in the discussion of the merits of the section unnecessarily, because it has been quite adequately covered by my colleague the hon. Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, but I wish that the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the house who have spoken on the matter would elucidate a little bit more clearly what they referred to as the time-honoured principles that we are changing by this proposed amendment. For as I read not the new code, Bill No. 7, but the existing code, it says in section 646:

Any person—

Not a peace officer, mark you, but any person.

Any person may arrest without warrant any one who is found committing any of the offences mentioned in sections—

And then there are listed about two full pages of code sections defining a great variety of offences.

Mr. Nowlan: Of specific offences.

Mr. Garson: Yes; one of which is attempt to damage by explosives. Then, if hon. members will look at section 648 of the Criminal Code they will see this:

Any peace officer may arrest, without warrant, any one whom he finds committing any criminal offence.

Next if hon. members will look at section 652 of the Criminal Code—and this is the law which my hon. friends of the opposition must have referred to as being time-honoured for it has been in the Criminal Code for a long time. I shall read the relevant portions of this section:

Any peace officer may, without a warrant, take into custody—

Which is the same thing as arrest.

—any person whom he . . . has good cause to suspect of having committed or being about to commit, any indictable offence . . .

Surely the only distinction in principle there can be in the proposed clause 11 of Bill 183 is that this clause 11 may be applicable to some offences which it is true may not be indictable. But although they may not be indictable offences they are offences dealing with a very dangerous subject matter, namely, explosives. Just to take the case cited in the excellent statement of the hon. member for York West. Let us suppose that regulations are made, making it an offence for any person to put explosives upon an aeroplane and, we will say, that a Mr. Guay of the future puts explosives upon an aeroplane; and that no person knows that it was he who put them there or for what purpose they were put there.

At that stage of the investigation what he had done would perhaps only be an offence under the Explosives Act or some other act, or regulations passed thereunder. It is only after the crown has been able to disclose evidence to establish a conspiracy or other criminal motive, to show, for example, that the explosives were so placed for the purpose of killing one particular person, that what has been done appears to be an indictable offence. My hon. friends in furtherance of these time-honoured principles upon which they lay such great stress are in effect arguing in relation to such a set of facts that if the people who were investigating the presence of the explosives upon an aeroplane saw Mr. Guay just outside the aeroplane and had reasonable grounds to suspect that he was the man who put the explosives on the aeroplane they would have to go off and get a warrant before they could arrest him, and by the time they got back of course Mr. Guay would be gone, probably for good.

Mr. Nowlan: Does that increase the public danger in any way?

Mr. Garson: I think it would. This hypothetical Mr. Guay might conceivably be guilty of one of the most dastardly crimes. We have to remember in these matters that the law-respecting and law-abiding members of the public who mind their own business and obey the laws are entitled to a little consideration too. In actual practice sections of this character are not invoked by a responsible peace officer unless there are some reasonable grounds—indeed he must have reasonable grounds—to suspect that the person has been guilty of an offence.

It would seem to me in this connection that we must bear in mind that the materials with which this legislation deals are very dangerous indeed; also that in most of these cases at that particular stage of the investigation the peace officers in charge cannot perhaps establish that the act in question is criminal in nature to the point of being indictable. It may have been committed in innocent ignorance of the law. Or it may be an offence under the Explosives Act. On the other hand, the explosives may have been put in place for a dastardly purpose. At that stage, if the peace officers have not the power to arrest under such a set of facts, they must simply stand there stupidly and let the criminal get away. If that happened, then I suppose my hon. friends of the opposition would get up and criticize the administration of justice.

Mr. Adamson: Surely you have power under the act as it now stands to arrest?

Mr. Garson: No.

Mr. Adamson: Let us take the hypothetical case of a man suspected of placing explosives on an aeroplane.

Mr. Garson: No. Section 652 of the existing Criminal Code, not the new code, Bill 7,—there is no change of substance contemplated, and this is one of the sections which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and I have been discussing and will be discussing tomorrow—says:

> Any peace officer may, without a warrant, take into custody any person . . . whom he has good cause to suspect of having committed or being about to commit, any indictable offence.

My point is that the sets of facts that come up in real life are not tailored to fit a textbook definition. At that stage of the investigation maybe no person knows whether this act in question was a dastardly crime or a less serious offence or just an innocent act. In such circumstances surely it is not unreasonable to vest some kind of discretion in the peace officer as to whether he will walk out of where the explosives are and say to the suspect: "Look, Mr. Guay, there is no need for commotion about this, but I wish you would come along with me. We will have a talk with the crown prosecutor to discuss this matter further, to clarify just what these facts are."

The hon. member for York West says that he is strongly in support of this other provision but I say to him that I do not see how he could make his suggested provision work in most cases if he supports this other provision.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

PATENT ACT

AUTHORIZATION FOR INCREASES IN STATUTORY FEES

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. 177, to amend the Patent Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that this bill has none of the dynamic or tragic possibilities of the measure which has just been passed. In fact it is a very dull one. There really is not much to be said about it other than what I said on first reading. If I may be permitted to do so I shall repeat the words I used on that occasion, which may be found in Hansard for February 2 at page 1678:

> Mr. Speaker, the sole purpose of this bill is to authorize certain increases in statutory fees provided under the Patent Act, in accordance with the policy of the government to make sure that services of this character are paid for by those to whom they are rendered, and not by the taxpayers generally.

I soon discovered, indeed the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) drew my attention to the fact shortly after I came into my present office, that there has been a deficit for some time in the operations of the patent office, and it was felt that it would not be reasonable to allow it to continue. The deficit for the last fiscal year was about $133,000, and this seems an unreasonable sum for the taxpayers to contribute to an office which, when all is said and done, exists primarily to confer upon certain individuals and corporations exclusive privileges.

I felt, sir, that whatever some hon. members opposite might feel about whether the persons who put stamps on cheques, for which they obtained no service from the government, ought to pay for the carriage of letters, posted by others who did not pay the full cost, there could be no difference of view about the notion that the person who wishes to get a patent for an invention should pay the reasonable cost of the services in that connection.

There is another reason which I believe will appeal to a good many Canadians as to why this should be so. I am informed that some 90 per cent of the patents granted by the Canadian patent office are granted to non-Canadians, who are thereby given an exclusive privilege in this country. Whatever may or may not be thought about the merits of these exclusive privileges or monopolies they thereby acquire, I believe everyone would feel that the patentees or applicants ought to pay the costs which the government of this country incurs in giving them that privilege.

On the other hand, I do not believe it would be reasonable to try to turn the patent office into a profit-making operation; and the scale of fees recommended in this bill, plus something I am going to mention in a moment, is calculated by the officers of the department to put the operation of the office on a paying basis and provide a small margin for the expansion of costs, some of which have gone up as a result of the increases in salaries made effective last December, and others of which I hope will go up, because the patent office is trying to recruit the staff it badly needs in order to deal with its work a little more rapidly.

There has been a great scarcity of the kind of people required to do patent examinations, but the officers of the department are hopeful that some good recruits will now be forthcoming and that the work of the office may be made more efficient, though at a somewhat higher cost. That higher cost, it is felt, should be covered by the fees.

Now, sir, in order not to incur what I thought was the unreasonable criticism made of my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote), and in order to make as sure as I can that there will be no postcards in this measure, I should like to point out that under the statute certain powers are conferred, and I emphasize this, by parliament upon the governor in council to fix certain other fees. It is the intention of the governor in council, when this measure becomes law, to increase one or two of these other fees as well. I would prefer, unless hon. members wish me to do it now, to give precise examples in committee. There is also the Patent Record published by the office which is not now being paid for by subscription. It is intended also to increase the subscription for the Record and to increase the price charged for printed patents.

The measure, as hon. members will note, if passed will come into force on April 1. I am no expert on this matter, but representations have been made to the effect that certain of the steps taken under this law in the filing of documents, and that sort of thing, are valid only if full fees are paid at the time. It was felt that perhaps the interval of time between the passing of the act and the time it would come into force might not be sufficient to allow every possible applicant a reasonable opportunity to be informed of the change in rates. That is why clause 2 was put into the bill. It provides that if the old scale of fees are paid, the step will be valid, provided the additional fee is subsequently paid within a reasonable period of time.

Again, sir, and in order to make as complete a disclosure as possible to the house of the intentions of the government with respect to the Patent Act, I might say now that it is the intention of the government, if the necessary legislation can be drafted in time, to introduce another measure at this session which will affect the Patent Act and which will have to do with the codification and clarification of the patent rights of public servants, which are now governed by four or five different statutes which are not in every respect consistent with one another, but this proposed measure will in no respect whatsoever change the law with respect to patents themselves.

It has also been represented to the government, both by officials having to do with the matter and by other interested persons outside, that there are other desirable amendments which should be made to this legislation. No amendment is made except one to increase the fees, and the reason for that is that it seemed to me—and in this I have the approbation of my colleagues—that the Patent Act and certain other closely related statutes were so important to the economy of the country that they should be given careful and thorough revision of a character which a layman like myself could certainly not be expected to undertake, even if he had the time to do it.

I have therefore been authorized to state today, sir, that it is the intention of the government within the next few months to establish a public inquiry under the Inquiries Act into the working of the Patent Act, the Copyright Act, the industrial design act, and other related legislation. I am not attempting to give any specific terms of reference, but merely to indicate that the general scope of the inquiry which is being undertaken is with a view to ensuring that adequate stimulus is being given to inventive and creative talent in Canada; to see that at the same time the public interest is being protected from undue exploitation of property in inventions and ideas; and to suggest amendments to the legislation which might be considered desirable to make the law more effective for these ends.

I am also pleased to be able to say that the chief justice of Nova Scotia, Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley who is well known to many hon. members here, has consented to preside over the inquiry. I am sure hon. members will feel that no better evidence could be given that it will be in competent hands.

If I might crave your indulgence for a moment, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that I recognize that although this announcement has relation to the act being amended, it has no direct relation to this bill. However, I feel that it would be helpful to me as the responsible minister, to the officials who will have to assist in the drafting of the terms of reference, and to the inquiry which is subsequently set up, if you would permit any hon. member who wishes to do so to make, quite briefly, any suggestions he wishes to make as to the scope or nature of that inquiry. The purpose is to make the legislation—about which I doubt if there is any strong partisan division in the house—as effective as possible for its purpose. I would welcome, as I know my colleagues and I am sure everyone would, all the assistance that all hon. members on either side of the house can give in this matter.

I repeat that the sole purpose of the bill is to put the patent office on a paying basis. I doubt whether there will be any difference of view about the desirability of doing that. I do not think any hon. member would seriously argue that this particular amendment to the Patent Act should be postponed until the inquiry had been held. That is the reason this bill is being offered at this time.

Mr. Speaker: The minister has indicated that perhaps hon. members would like to make suggestions as to the inquiry which he will have established at a later date. Of course this procedure would be out of order. What we have before us now is a bill to amend the Patent Act only in a few particulars. The principle of the bill is what must be discussed on second reading, and in this case the principle is the desirability of increasing the tariff of fees. If hon. members agree with the suggestion the minister has made and if that is the wish of the house, all right. I shall leave it up to them.

Mr. Fulton: No.

Mr. Speaker: If they do not agree to accede to the minister's suggestion that at this stage they give their own views on the proposed inquiry, I will have to ask that the discussion on second reading be relevant to the principle, as is provided for by the rules.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): To deal first with the point you have just mentioned, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that I should say this. We welcome the spirit in which the minister has made his suggestion. We on this side of the house do not like to turn down opportunities for discussion. But, having regard to the circumstances under which the invitation has been extended it seems to me that we are really not in a position to take advantage of it because no one of us had any idea that this subject would be raised. Certainly, speaking for myself alone—but I imagine that there are quite a number of other hon. members who are in the same position, probably the majority of them—I have not had any opportunity to marshal any thoughts on the subject.

I should therefore like to make this counter-suggestion to the minister. I hardly imagine that there is any great urgency, in the usual sense of the word, with regard to the proposed inquiry. I appreciate that the government, having decided to embark upon this inquiry, would like to get ahead with it as soon as possible, but there is no urgency in the sense that the affairs of the nation are really going to suffer if it does not get under way immediately. I would therefore suggest that possibly a more logical way to deal with the matter would be to wait until the minister's estimates are reached, at which time there would be the fullest opportunity for discussion of the matter and for the making of suggestions as to the terms of reference of the inquiry and so on. I think that would be the better way to deal with the matter.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the hon. member's suggestion is a most happy and sensible one. I am rather sorry that I was not bright enough to think of it myself. I would certainly be very happy to agree with it.

Mr. Fulton: I thank the minister for accepting the suggestion. I have just one other comment to make. The bill itself—I am now dealing with the bill, not with the other subject—is relatively simple and certainly, at the outset, appeared to be completely non-controversial. I had some doubts on that score when the minister, I thought, was in danger of both obscuring the clarity of the bill and destroying its non-controversial aspect when he appeared to be trying to drag into it stamps on cheques, whose relationship to the bill I was not able to appreciate although the motive behind the minister's method was more obvious. However, we shall not let that spoil the discussion. Being as simple as it is in purpose and in scope, I think the bill really does not require any extended remarks at this stage, although I shall have some questions to ask the minister when we go into committee.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think we all agree with the result of this discussion so far as the minister's announcement about the inquiry is concerned, and I shall concur in the suggestion that has now been made. As a matter of fact, I have in my files upstairs a few letters which may now be sent to the minister as suggestions rather than bringing them here to the floor of the house. What is good about the announcement made by the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) today is that it gives to the public advance notice that such an inquiry is to be made, and any people who are interested in the Patent Act, the Copyright Act or the Industrial Design and Union Label Act will now be in a position to forward their suggestions either to the Secretary of State or to members of parliament so they may transmit them to the Secretary of State.

I am sure we welcome the announcement that this inquiry is to be set up. We agree with the Secretary of State that it is in good hands if Mr. Ilsley is to be chairman of the inquiry. As the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) has said, the bill at first looked to us like an uncontroversial one, and like one so simple that the sponsor probably would not bother getting to his feet on second reading. I wondered for a while whether the Secretary of State wanted to get into another argument, but I gather that is not his real purpose. I congratulate him on having learned something this week, namely on having learned that it is a good idea for the government to disclose its hand. I congratulate him on assuring us that no postcards are going to turn up in the discussion of this matter, and for having told us what other steps the government plans to take if this measure goes through.

It seems to be a reasonable proposition that those who wish this service should be required to pay for it. I believe we took that position with respect to something else the other day, namely newspapers and periodicals. I had better watch out, Mr. Speaker, or I shall be as out of order as was the Secretary of State. However, we welcome the frankness of the minister today and see no reason why the bill should not be given second reading.

Mr. Ray Thomas (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I want to add, to the words of those who have already spoken, my word of thanks to the Secretary of State for giving us notice of the revision that is in prospect. That notice undoubtedly gives to members of the house and to many outside the house the opportunity to dig down into their experience and knowledge and undoubtedly to come up with some concrete suggestions.

As to the amending bill that is before the house, I heartily agree with it and the principle behind it, namely that those who use the service—after all, they are given certain privileges—are the ones who should be made to pay for those privileges. In passing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) made mention of postcards, but I am glad that at least here we have no second-class patents with which to contend.

Mr. J. T. Richard (Ottawa East): I welcome, Mr. Speaker, the many announcements made by the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) today. We heard some announcements regarding monetary changes in the bill, but there were also some very good changes to be made suggested in the Patent Act concerning inventions by public servants. This reform has been long overdue because in the past public servants have not been very well rewarded for their inventive genius. I welcomed the increased fees which will assist the work of our patent system in Canada.

I know it is an easy thing for the Secretary of State to stand in his place and say that those who want the privilege should pay for it. I want to tell the members of the house that it is not always a privilege to get a patent. Very few of the people who obtain a patent make anything out of it. What the Patent Act does do, and what it was designed for, is to confer a privilege on the public to help inventors in this and other countries to develop in their respective scientific fields. The patent is granted to a person because he has spent some time inventing something that was not known before. He gives it to the public after having benefited for seventeen years by the privilege, as some might call it, of being the exclusive owner of the right to use the invention. As I said before, the patentee very seldom benefits from the patent.

Patentees are willing to pay the higher fees. I have no objection to the fees mentioned in the schedule attached to this bill, although I believe they have reached the limit because they are as high as those charged in the United States. The patentee or inventor does expect, however, to get good service. The thing which has prevented the patent office in this country from giving the same service as patent offices in other countries is the fact that we have not been able to recruit the necessary assistance to run the patent office. What we have is very good, and the improvements over the past seven or eight years have been excellent. I am glad the present Secretary of State is taking such an interest in the Patent Act. I hope he will remain Secretary of State for some time so that we may have a minister who knows the Patent Act.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the purpose of this bill is to offset the deficit which the patent office has shown for three years. With a revenue of about $600,000 in 1949, there was a surplus of $230,000. This year, with a revenue of about $777,000, we have a deficit of $133,000. While the increase in fees would have taken care of increased salaries and things of that sort, the thing which is really responsible for the deficit is the printing of patents. I believe this should be brought to the attention of the house. The printing of patents and the Patent Record cost about $400,000 a year. The revenue from the sale of the printed patent and the Patent Record amounts to around $30,000. There is, therefore, a deficit from the operation of printing patents and the Patent Record of close to $370,000 a year. Were it not for this printing, the patent office would have a surplus of some $235,000 or $240,000 a year.

It might be of some benefit to hon. members if I traced the story of the printing of patents. I am hoping the Secretary of State will find some way whereby we can either cut the cost of printing these patents or else he will have to increase the price charged for them. As I recall it, the original report which was submitted by the commissioner of patents and his advisers in 1947 stated that printing would cost about $45,000 if done by the rotaprint method. Some further estimates were made later, and it was stated that printing would not cost more than $90,000. Since there was a surplus of $130,000 a year, it was thought the patent office would not lose any money. However, the cost has proved to be nothing like that, and has gone up from $230,000 in 1949 until today it is about $400,000. Some time ago I spoke to the Secretary of State and suggested to him that the price of these printed copies should be substantially increased. The printed copies now cost only 25 cents each. As I calculate the cost of printing, and I can only go by my figures, the cost of printing a patent is about $30. They are sold for 25 cents each.

As I have often said to the commissioner of patents, those who want printed copies will pay $1. Before printed copies were obtainable it usually cost in the neighbourhood of $4 for a typewritten copy of the patent, but those who needed them bought them. It is true that more printed copies are sold, but at a price of 25 cents, which I feel cannot be justified. I feel that the minimum charge should be 50 cents, and I would go as high as $1 for a printed copy such as is furnished by the Canadian patent office. I am a patent solicitor as well as a barrister, but my practice is mostly in patents and trade marks. I know that when I want a copy of a patent I tell my secretary to get four because they are only 25 cents each. I only need one, but I put the others on the file and give them to people asking for them. If the printed patent cost $1, I would get one or two. I would even pay $2, because that is a very small amount to pay for a copy of a patent and the drawings exactly as they are supplied in the patent office. In the past, to avoid delays, attorneys had to make a search for the patent, and then make copies themselves.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am in agreement with the purpose of this bill. Last year there were about 16,000 applications for patents, and about 10,000 allowances, so if the fee were increased by $5 the extra revenue would amount to about $130,000. This would cover the deficit, along with other increases in salary. Hon. members of this house need not cry over the increase, because, of the 16,000 applications filed in Canada, about 12,000 were filed from the United States, 1,867 from England, and only in the neighbourhood of 1,173 from Canadian sources. Even some applications in the latter group were from subsidiaries of United States corporations. In effect, we are therefore taxing foreign corporations and foreign inventors. It will not be the Canadians who will suffer. I believe, however, for the present we have reached the limit in fees for filing applications and for allowances, when we consider the services rendered. I hope that, moved by his zest and zeal, ambition and courage, our new Secretary of State will, as a result of all the good things he has in mind, and the inquiry he wishes to conduct, bring about a better Patent Act.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the Secretary of State speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I shall not speak long. I could not help rising to echo what was said by the hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Richard). I, too, hope I will remain Secretary of State for some time.

But my main purpose in rising was, being a cautious man, to enter a caveat. I said I had hoped there were no postcards in this bill. I did not say there were none. I tried my best to think of everything even remotely related to the bill that the house might wish to know. But it is possible I may not have thought of everything. If so, I hope that my having said so in advance will reduce the enormity of the oversight.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Tariff of fees.

Mr. Fulton: I wonder if the Secretary of State would answer one or two questions. I believe he said that last year there was a deficit of $130,000. Is it intended that the increase in fees resulting from the increases provided in the schedule, together with other increases the minister contemplates, and which I understand he has power to make by regulation—or that the governor in council has power to make—will make good the whole of that deficit? Or is it expected that there will still be some to make good?

Mr. Pickersgill: It is estimated that it will produce in the next fiscal year about $184,000. The deficit would almost certainly be greater this year, and probably in the next year greater still.

Mr. Fulton: Can the Secretary of State say whether the deficit is due mainly to the feature mentioned by the hon. member for Ottawa East, that it is brought about by printing costs and things of that kind, or whether the shortage of revenue as compared with expense is created mainly by increases in salaries? In other words, is it due to actual operating costs, that is, costs of materials, printing and the like, or the 40-hour week or some similar arrangement?

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that I would really be able to give an answer that would satisfy even myself. As the hon. member for Ottawa East said a moment ago, it is a question whether it is essential to have a patent printed. If it is essential, then the nice question arises as to how to spread the overhead. The printing cost is so much; and I am pleased to be able to say that, from the best evidence I have been able to get thus far, the costs per unit are steadily decreasing. Some new types of processes are being introduced which have had the effect of reducing costs steadily.

I have no doubt however that the hon. member for Ottawa East, who is very much better informed about the details surrounding this kind of thing than I can profess to be—because he deals with them constantly —will know that the main part of the deficit, if one may so describe it, arises because it costs a lot more to print the copies than the sale of those copies brings in, even adding the sale of the Patent Record.

But in my view that is not very good economics; because if patents have to be printed anyway, then it could be argued in another way that everything brought in from the sale of them was pure gain, and that the printing is an essential part of the whole process. It is the kind of question about which very high-priced cost accountants quarrel, and therefore a layman like me, who is not an accountant of any sort, really has not an opinion that is worth giving to the committee.

Mr. Fulton: What I had in mind was that there are only certain of the tariff items being increased. I believe there are seven of them. If the increases are designed to avoid a deficit which would result from increased operating costs, then I am wondering why all items were not increased proportionately.

For instance here is one:

On filing an application or petition under sections 41, 47 or 67 or 68; for each patent mentioned therein, $10.

That is the same as the old fee; there is no increase. If costs and salaries have increased, while it may be true that the physical volume of work required to fill such an application has not increased, the cost of maintaining a staff and premises certainly has. I know that all costs in connection with the land registry office have increased, and therefore all fees were increased. I am wondering what the situation is here.

Mr. Pickersgill: The fees were increased in those cases where the number of transactions was considerable and where the revenue was in substantial amounts. There are some of these items in which the revenue is so inconsiderable that I imagine it would be a nice question as to whether reprinting the tariff of fees and producing a new document, with new amounts on it, would not cost more than it would be hoped to get out of it.

Mr. Fulton: But you have to print it anyway, do you not?

Mr. Pickersgill: The whole tariff, yes. But I presume—and here I must say I am on very dangerous ground because I am theorizing about something concerning which I have no direct knowledge. But I imagine these things have to be printed in many different places. If only a very few applications come in, it may be more inconvenient to change them than not. In any case the amount of revenue produced in those cases, so I am informed, has not been very considerable.

Mr. Thomas: What increase in revenue does the minister expect this year from the increased fees? Incidentally, I noticed that the hon. member for Ottawa East took me to task for referring to the privilege granted to those who obtained patents. Possibly he did so quite properly, because I think I should have used the word "protection" instead of "privilege".

Mr. Pickersgill: The word in the statute is "monopoly".

I think I gave the figure a moment ago to the hon. member for Kamloops, when I stated that it was estimated it would produce about $184,000 in the next fiscal year. This will not come into operation until April 1.

Mr. Fulton: Does the minister feel disposed to give the committee the other changes that have been made by order in council, or by the Secretary of State on his own book?

Mr. Pickersgill: There are two items of the supplementary tariff which is established by order in council P.C. 2637 of June 10, 1948, under authority of section 75 (4) which empowers the commissioner of patents, with the approval of the governor in council, to fix the fees of any proceeding not herein provided for.

Mr. Knowles: Those are the postcards.

Mr. Pickersgill: These are the postcards. The intention is to recommend these latter two increases to the governor in council, as I said, after the bill is passed. As I said, if the bill is passed. The two items are: Completing application; the present tariff is $3; the new one will be $5. The estimated additional revenue is about $3,662. I perhaps should say, sir, that the $184,000 figure I gave included these changes to be made by regulation as well as those to be made by statute.

Supplementary disclosure; the present fee is—

Mr. Knowles: That is what you are doing now.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think mine was not supplementary but simultaneous. The present fee is $15. The new fee suggested is $20 and the additional revenue estimated—this is a very close estimate—is $395. If I had been doing it I think I would have made it $400. That illustrates the point I was making to the hon. member for Kamloops a few moments ago, that some of these things are just barely worth changing, not that I regard $400 as a very small sum.

Then, in addition to that, it is proposed to increase the price for printed copies of patents from 25 cents to 50 cents. Whether the governor in council will yield to the entreaties of the hon. member for Ottawa East and make it $1 I do not know. I should like to consider that a good deal before proposing it, because I did a little arithmetic when the hon. member was speaking. He said that he never bought one printed patent, he always bought four. Four at 25 cents each makes $1; four at 50 cents would make $2. If the price were $1 he might not even buy two. It is the kind of pricing policy that every merchant has to consider, and I will give it such consideration as I can. But I think I can assure the committee the result of my consideration will be that I shall still recommend to council that it be 50 cents. For individual copies of the patent office record the price is now 25 cents. The price for an individual copy will be 50 cents, and the annual subscription rate will be increased from $10 to $25. It is estimated that this increase in price will produce another $9,000. Of course that must depend a good deal on how many subscriptions there are.

Mr. Knowles: A good many references are being made to the printing of these documents. I believe they are printed in what is known as the patent record printing office rather than over at the printing bureau. Can the Secretary of State say whether the same scale of wages applies to those working in the patent record printing office as to those working over at the printing bureau?

Mr. Pickersgill: I wish, Mr. Chairman, that I had the same capacity for carrying in my head the encyclopaedic information that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has.

Mr. Knowles: You used to be in Winnipeg yourself.

Mr. Pickersgill: I used to be in Winnipeg and my memory was no better then than it is now. The printing bureau and the places where this printing is done, which after all is part of the printing bureau in the Canadian building, are under the jurisdiction of the queen's printer, for whose activities I am responsible in this house. I would not venture to say whether the wages paid in one place are the same as in the other, but I would think it very unlikely that they would not be. They have different processes. I presume there are different wages paid to people for different processes, but, honestly, I cannot answer the question, sir. However, I shall be glad to answer it when my estimates come up.

Mr. Fulton: Has the Secretary of State told us already for how many years the patent office has shown a deficit?

Mr. Pickersgill: My information is that there has been a deficit for the last three years; that is, prior to this year.

Mr. Fulton: Then, to be strictly accurate in connection with the minister's statement on second reading, this proposal is not in accordance with the government's policy; it is a revision of government policy designed to put it on a paying basis, but I think it is quite a sound one.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I might make a brief comment on that. There was a very large deficit in the fiscal year—I had better get it right; it always helps—

Mr. Knowles: The frankness over there today is most refreshing.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes. The year 1950-51 was the first year the printing was undertaken and the deficit was nearly a quarter of a million dollars, $244,000 and some odd. The next year it was only $79,000. I have the feeling that the printing was experimental the first year and it was very expensive. There was a hope that the process could be perfected and that the cost could be reduced to the point where there would not be a deficit. But when it was found in 1952-53 that the deficit had gone up to $133,000 and that, in spite of technological improvements which had been made to reduce the rate of deficit, it was not being reduced and that the business was growing—and as someone said in another context, if I dare refer to it, you cannot lose money on every unit and make money on the whole operation—it was felt that the time had come to follow the policy of the government, sir.

CANADIAN FORCES ACT

AMENDMENTS TO DEFENCE SERVICES PENSION ACT, NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT, CANADIAN FORCES ACT, ETC.

Hon. R. O. Campney (Associate Minister of National Defence) moved the second reading of Bill No. 80, respecting the Canadian forces.

He said: This is a bill to amend a number a statutes which affect the members of the defence forces. Speaking to the resolution preceding this bill on December 10 last, as reported in Hansard at pages 795 to 799 inclusive, I reviewed generally the scope of the bill and endeavoured to cover briefly its salient points.

The clauses of the bill are not related to each other and the bill does not deal with a single specific subject, so that I would think that the usual practice of debating the principle of a bill on second reading is hardly applicable to this bill. I would suggest, therefore, that it might expedite consideration of the bill and be more helpful to hon. members if the bill could be given second reading now, after which we might proceed in committee to consider the several clauses which make up the bill.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): When the resolution preceding this bill was before the house I called attention to the unusual character of the bill, namely, its being one of those omnibus bills, embracing a great many amendments to five different acts of parliament. I do feel that it is unfortunate that the minister persists in introducing this omnibus type of bill, because it makes it very difficult for many people to find the amendments to the various bills referred to. If the minister has found difficulty in defining the principle of this bill, I say that the principle of the bill is entirely unprincipled. With that I will have to agree with the suggestion that we deal with the bill clause by clause as we proceed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Noseworthy: Mr. Chairman, I want to raise a matter for discussion and I think perhaps it should be raised under this clause. I have discussed this with the minister and some of his officials. Under the Defence Services Pension Act as it now stands certain classes of permanent service personnel who are compulsorily pensioned for economic reasons are subject to a one-third reduction in their pension if they were in the permanent force before June, 1944. Those who became members of the permanent force after June 1944 and are compulsorily retired after ten years may receive their full pensions without any reduction.

The actual result is as follows: A member of the permanent force who joined before June, 1944, and after being twelve years in the force, with say six years overseas, was then compulsorily retired for treasury board reasons with eighteen years' service, would be subject to a one-third reduction in pension. That would wipe out entirely any pension for the six years which he had served overseas. He gets two-thirds of his pension instead of the full pension. He gets a pension equivalent to twelve years' service instead of eighteen years'. That one-third reduction just wipes out the pension for the six years he was overseas.

But take a man who joined the services after June, 1944, and who had six, four or two years overseas—because there is no fixed minimum required for that category who joined the service after 1944. This man would have served two years overseas and ten years in the permanent force. He is then compulsorily retired but receives exactly the same pension as the man with twelve years in the force plus six years overseas.

That seems to me to be unfair and I think the minister himself will consider it is a bit unfair that a man with twelve years' permanent service before the war, with six years overseas, a total of eighteen years, should draw exactly the same pension after being compulsorily retired as the man with two years overseas service and ten years in the force after 1944.

I found from discussions with the judge advocate general that no such discrimination was made in connection with those pensioned under similar circumstances after world war I. Those who had been in the forces before world war I and were compulsorily retired for treasury board reasons were permitted to count their overseas service and were not subject to any one-third reduction.

I find from returns handed down that 145 men have been affected to date by this, and that the one-third reduction has cost those 145 men something over $246,000. I do not think that this country is so poor, nor do I think that the Department of National Defence is so hard up for money, that it must save by making a one-third reduction in the pensions of men who served overseas just because they happened to be members of the permanent force before June, 1944. If they had joined the forces after June, 1944, they would be subject to no such reduction.

The only reason I have been able to get from the judge advocate general and his officials for this discrimination is that the man who was in the forces before the war was able to retire at the end of the war and count his war service for pension purposes, whereas the man who was not in the permanent service before the war had to serve ten years after the war before he could count his overseas service for pension purposes.

I see no good reason why this distinction should be made. I see no good reason why a man who joined the permanent force before the war and served for eight, ten or twelve years should not be entitled to count his war service when compulsorily retired, through no fault of his own, just the same as the man who joined the permanent forces after the war was over. I can see no advantage that accrues to the man who was a member of the permanent force before the war.

I should like the minister to tell the committee whether or not he has considered this matter and has been given reasons which justify his believing that this arrangement is fair to the men who are affected, to the 145 men who have to date suffered a loss of $246,000 in their pensions. I may say that 139 of those 145 men were promoted during service in the field; they were not military college graduates but were promoted on the field of battle.

Mr. Campney: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make one general observation before dealing with the matter specifically raised by the hon. member. The Defence Services Pension Act, like the Public Service Superannuation Act, is an act which came into being after a great deal of study by financial experts, by Mr. Finlayson, who was then superintendent of insurance, and by our own officials. In the act attempt has been made, as in the Public Service Superannuation Act, to take into consideration all factors relating to terms and conditions of service, and to produce an act taking cognizance of all relevant factors with a view to arriving at a fair and just act. I would also like to say that if the hon. member seeks to imply, and I do not believe he really does, that there has been wilful discrimination in regard to pension matters, I can assure him that such was not the case.

In regard to the class of cases to which he referred, it is my understanding that first of all the retirements in question came about by reason of the need to promote economy or efficiency in the services.

I want to emphasize that there is a responsibility in connection with any retirement before the normal period of service has been completed, and that retirements did take place with a view to promoting efficiency in the forces.

In the cases in question these officers, if I am correctly informed, had an opportunity to elect whether they would remain under the original parts I to IV of the Pension Act or come under part V. I will not attempt to go into the details of the differences between these parts as they are rather complicated and intricate; but as the hon. member knows, part V is the part under which all people now entering the services come, and it is provided in that part that if an officer retires before completing 20 years service he suffers a reduction of pension. If he retires before 20 years he suffers a deduction of one-third of his pension until he is 65. That is the general rule in cases under part V.

If the persons concerned retired under parts I to IV they would not be entitled to any pension at all. When they elected to come under part V they accepted the same rate as applies now to anyone entering the service under part V, and I think this is the root of the hon. member's criticism.

When the forces were being reorganized after world war II, I believe on the basis of a force about seven times greater than existed prior to world war II, there was a great need of senior officers highly qualified and experienced, and as an inducement to such men it was decided at that time that, notwithstanding the general provision of part V of the Pension Act, such persons taken into the services would receive full pension if they should retire after 10 years' service. This aided the recruitment of the type of people we wanted, men in their middle thirties, who under normal circumstances could not have served 20 years before reaching the compulsory retirement age. As an inducement they were given a pension after 10 years without the one-third deduction until they should attain the age of 65 years. That was done for the benefit and welfare of the services.

It was not a question of R.M.C. graduates as against other officers because, as I pointed out, of the 145 who were retired under the reorganization, 6 were R.M.C. graduates and over that whole two-year period of reorganization I believe only 20 R.M.C. graduates were enrolled. It was a question of trying to reconstitute the forces on the best basis possible having regard to the qualification of the people available and of obtaining the officers required by the services.

I would also point out that those coming into the services under part V for purposes of qualifying for pension are not permitted to count their war service. Those gentlemen who were retired with the deduction from their pensions of one-third until they reached the age of 65 were permitted to count their war service as qualifying service; so, in order to understand this problem, you have to go a little deeper into the pension set-up than I fear the hon. member has done. You cannot simply say that one particular group has more service than another in the case of people retired on grounds of economy or efficiency, or that there are benefits under parts I to IV that are not available at present under part V, because there are also benefits under part V of the act which were not available under parts I to IV.

It is a question of balancing advantages and disadvantages, and the only object of the Defence Services Pension Act and of the administrators of that act is to try and strike a fair balance. I believe that on the whole that has been done. I do not believe, from my own knowledge and from looking into the question which the hon. member has raised, and indeed from looking into the cases, that any individual has suffered hardship or been treated with unfairness. You can take any pension case and differentiate it from another, but basically I believe the administration of the act as it is now constituted has been fair. The officers to whom the hon. member referred had the right of election and, having weighed the advantages and disadvantages, what they really did was to elect to come under part V on the same basis as all others coming under that part.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to continue that argument, but there is one point with reference to it which the minister missed. He referred to the 145 officers who were retired at that time and who are now under discussion. But they were compelled to retire. They had no alternative and I believe that distinction should be made. Whether the hon. member for York South intended to imply what the minister inferred from his remarks, I do not know, but I would just like to say that as a general rule good field officers do not make good parade ground officers if there is no war on. That may have had something to do with it.

I am going to draw to the attention of the minister some grievances which I hope he has not forgotten. I have mentioned them before in relation to this pension set-up as it affects officers. While the present bill does not attempt to amend the whole National Defence Act, it has reference to this particular matter. I am referring now to superannuation pension contribution made by officers who have died while in the services, and I want to remind the minister that when we were amending the original act a few years ago, and again since then, I brought to his attention a particular case which can be repeated over and over again. Evidently, not very much attention has been paid to it because there has been no reference to it at this time. In Canada today the services are a career. They can no longer be looked upon as an organization which you go into for war purposes, your main desire being then to get out. Today service in the armed forces is being made extremely attractive. Boys are being enticed in. A great many of them are going to make a career of it. They are going into the permanent forces, and those forces are going to be permanent for some time, in my judgment.

This superannuation scheme works in this way. An officer or any other member of the personnel may die within the service. The case I brought to the attention of the minister —and it can be repeated—had to do with Captain Edward Rowe. He served ten years in the army, with four or five years' combat service. He came back and was stationed in Ottawa. During the time of his service in Ottawa he had a heart attack and died in the service. When his contributions were returned to his widow, the income tax department deducted $600 income tax assessment from his contributions while he was in the service.

He intended to make the army a career. He left a widow and three children. Despite all of the veterans legislation there is no redress for that widow under any of it. She could not get a dependents' pension because the pension commission said his death did not arise out of, nor was it connected with, war service. In the second place, the widow could not get war veterans allowance because she was too young—she was not 55—and she was not completely incapacitated. Despite the fact that she lives in an isolated part of the country and has three small children to look after, she could not qualify. She gets nothing. No burial expenses were provided. In some cases the stone is provided to mark the last resting place of one who offered his life for his country. She herself had to purchase the stone.

In view of the fact that the services are a permanent organization, and in view of the fact that we can anticipate that kind of thing happening to many more service personnel, I think the time has come—indeed it is long past—when the defence department should have an understanding with the income tax people, at least, that the return of these contributions—this widow did not get any pension—should be free from income tax assessment. In the defence committee and in the house, both to the minister and to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), I suggested that some understanding should be arrived at between the two departments in order to correct that kind of thing. Nothing was done about it. It is not a new story at all to the minister or to the deputy minister because they were both present when I waved my arms on it before at some considerable length. I just hope that even at this late date something might be done to correct the situation. I am convinced that after a man has had ten years' service, with four or five years' combat service, the widow and those small children should have been provided with some kind of pension rather than having the contributions handed back for the income tax people to take a grab at and leave them with nothing.

I am also hoping that the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe), in cases of that kind, will allow a little bit more latitude. As to a man who dies in the service of a heart attack and who has had combat service, I cannot understand how any medical doctor can make a decision that that man's death was not attributable to service. Certainly the stress and strain of war, in my judgment, had a great deal to do with it in the case to which I have referred. Nevertheless, the little widow and the three children are left to shift for themselves.

There are two other matters to which I should like to direct the minister's attention, and they are matters which are causing a great deal of anxiety to service personnel who leave the services. The first has to do again with this service pension. A young man serves for two or three years in the army, the navy or the air force and then he wants to get out. While he was in the service he was contributing to the pension fund. When he is discharged, he goes back to his own home town—it might be Windsor, Hamilton or Sydney, Nova Scotia—and he finds himself out of the service and without a job. He cannot find employment. The first thing he wants is a return of his pension contributions. There is generally a delay of anything from two to three months; and I have known some instances in which the delay was much longer than that. I cannot understand why that delay should occur. Before that man is discharged, his documents are all assembled in his military district, they are all in one file and they come in to headquarters. I cannot understand why it takes two or three months for someone in the defence department to sit down, write out a sheet of paper saying that his account is closed and send him whatever money is coming to him. He is waiting for that money and he has not a job.

Again, in that connection, there is the question of unemployment credits that accrue to a member of the forces while he is in the service. Hundreds of service personnel are coming out of the service month by month and today they are not walking out to jobs. For the last year there has not been any work for them, at least in the part of the country from which I come. When they report to the unemployment insurance officer they are told, "We cannot do anything for you by way of paying unemployment insurance until we get your credits from Ottawa". Then you have the same old story again.

When the man is discharged from the services he has three departments to contend with in dealing with unemployment insurance. He has to contend with the defence department and the Department of Veterans Affairs and, in the final analysis, the thing has to go to the Department of Labour. I have had the thing worked out for me. I have been working on this thing for some considerable time and I have had all the mechanics of it drawn up in a blueprint. In handling it as a routine matter, as is done today, the results are unsatisfactory. Unemployment is becoming a most serious proposition for service personnel. Boys are coming back from Korea. Others are coming back from Europe. There is all the time a little line of service personnel coming out. It is a rather tough proposition to tell that to a young fellow who has just come back from Korea and who has been waiting for a couple of weeks, probably, to draw unemployment insurance benefits and who has not a job. His pension contributions are tied up and he is waiting and waiting. It is no longer a routine matter. I know that with going from basket to basket, and everybody doing his little bit on it, day by day, it gets jammed up. But I believe that the defence department should allocate to some particular little group in the department the responsibility of handling that matter and that matter only, and that it should not be handled just as a sideline with a lot of other routine.

Then I think that in the Department of Veterans Affairs there should be some definite group or section with the obligation of taking care of that particular matter and clearing with the Department of Labour, just as expeditiously as possible, a release at least of the unemployment insurance. Then, of course, if it takes a little bit more time to straighten out the man's pay account, that is understandable.

This matter of establishing his unemployment insurance credits should not take very much time. It would appear to me, from the correspondence I have had and the delays there are from time to time, as though no one had been appointed in either department to do that particular job. I have been advised by the Department of National Defence that they have to go through three departments. I feel that the Department of Labour could handle the matter better once the service documents are cleared.

Those are the three grievances I wanted to bring to the attention of the minister. I hope he made notes of them and will not forget them. I hope he will do something about the case of the officer or member of the services who may die before he has served sufficient time to qualify for a pension. The present provision is not good enough. We are asking people to enter the service as a career, and it is not good enough to leave a man's family in the position of having to fight everybody in Canada in order to get a bite to eat, simply because something happened to him, in ten, twelve or fifteen years. It boils down to that now. I believe something should be done about it. I hope the minister will think about it. There are a lot of other small things with which we can deal as we go through the bill.

Mr. Campney: I well remember the first case mentioned by the hon. member. He brought it up last year, and upon making inquiries I found that under our act his estate was paid the maximum amount it could be paid. The real question is one of income tax, about which I would not volunteer an opinion. I can tell the hon. member that this type of case is again under review with the income tax people.

On the second point, having to do with the speedy return to a soldier who is demobilized of his contributions to the defence services pension fund, I agree that in the past there has been considerable delay, more delay than should be the case. I can assure the hon. member the matter has been given very serious study. We hope to make arrangements shortly which will make it possible to deal with these cases much more speedily.

With regard to the last matter the hon. member mentioned, I had not heard about it until the hon. member made his observation. I did not know of any delay on our part in respect of unemployment insurance contributions. I shall look into that.

Mr. Gillis: The roadblock may not be in the Department of National Defence, but may be in the other two departments.

Mr. Noseworthy: I want to come back to two statements made by the minister. In the first place, he says there is no discrimination. I want him to remember this. It is only those who were in the permanent forces prior to June, 1944, whose pensions are subject to that one-third reduction. If they joined the forces after June, 1944, and are compulsorily retired after they have served ten years, they are not subject to that one-third reduction; at least that is the information I was given at headquarters.

Then, the minister claims that these men were given a choice of retiring under part IV or part V. These men were compulsorily retired, and their choice was either to retire or to revert to the rank which they held before the war and continue in the service at that rank. They had either to retire or to forgo the rank to which they had been promoted during the war. The fact remains that there is this difference. A man who was in the forces before the war requires eighteen years in the service to receive the same pension as a man who joined the forces after June, 1944, who serves twelve years. There is a difference of six years between the two men.

Mr. Campney: The hon. member disagrees with me, Mr. Chairman, in my statement that, as of now, people coming into the service and retiring with less than 20 years' service get a one-third reduction on their pension until they are 65 years of age. This is so, and has been so according to my information since December 31, 1948. In the intervening period between June 1, 1944, and December 31, 1948, a period when we were seeking senior officers because of the rebuilding of the permanent forces, what the hon. member said would be true. Since December 31, 1948, all those who entered the service are in the position that I stated, namely, that if they retire with less than 20 years' service their pension is reduced by one-third until they are 65 years of age.

Dealing with the question of the right of election to revert to a different rank or be compulsorily retired, each case has to stand on its own merits. I do not think anyone could make a general statement covering all cases.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Service.

Mr. Pearkes: This clause refers to certain officer personnel who were serving on a full-time basis with the reserve forces and were then taken into the regular forces. It enables them to count the time spent in the reserve forces for pension purposes; that is my understanding of the clause. I should like to ask, when will this provision come into effect? Will officers who have in the past been serving with reserve forces and who are now with the active forces be allowed the time they have already put into the reserve army? Will this apply to any personnel who may have left the service by now, and whose pension would be increased if they were allowed to count the time which they had spent with the reserve forces under the conditions set out in the explanatory note?

Mr. Campney: This section, Mr. Chairman, has a very limited application. As a matter of fact, it is not a general provision. It is being introduced to take care of the cases of 17 air force officers who are now in the regular service, and who had been doing full-time duty with the reserve. The provision contained in the act, and with which they must comply, is that they must have served at regular rates of pay in the reserve. These 17 men met all the qualifying conditions of service, but for some reason or other their pay was slightly under the regular pay so they would be ruled out unless a remedial amendment such as this were made.

In order to obviate making amendments to meet all these special conditions, the amendment seeks also to provide that conditions of service, rates of pay and so on may be regulated and dealt with by the governor in council.

[Mr. Campney.]

Mr. Pearkes: The minister has not answered my question. I know about these air force officers, but in order to take advantage of this section must the officer in question be actually serving at this time?

Mr. Campney: As of the date of assent to this bill.

Mr. Harkness: Would the minister tell us how many officers are presently affected or will be affected by the passage of this bill, and to what extent it is retroactive?

Mr. Campney: It is my information that it will not be retroactive, and that it will now affect only 17 Royal Canadian Air Force cases.

Mr. Harkness: It does not affect any army cases at all?

Mr. Campney: I understand that it does not.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3—Regulations.

Mr. Pearkes: Would the minister explain subparagraph (b)?

Mr. Campney: As the situation stands at the present time, widows entitled to pensions must within four years pay full succession duties on the capitalized value of such pensions payable either to them or to their children. In practice this has obviously worked considerable hardship and has placed many widows and children in straitened circumstances, owing to the fact that they have had to anticipate getting the pension and in the meantime pay succession duties on it.

This clause seeks to give relief to such people by putting widows and children in practically the same position as they would be under the Public Service Superannuation Act. As I understand it, this would mean that the maximum amount of succession duties which could be paid from the pension fund would be the proportion that the value of the pension might bear to the remainder of the estate, and it would only be recovered from the widow or children, over such period of time as the pensioner might elect.

This clause if enacted would give relief to many widows and families who have experienced considerable hardship in having to anticipate their pensions by paying succession duties in advance.

Mr. Pearkes: I know there have been a great many cases where widows have suffered very severe hardship. Many have felt that these pensions, to which their husbands had contributed, should never be charged succession duties at all. While this measure will bring a certain amount of relief, I am sorry the minister has not seen fit to go to the extent of removing these from succession duties. Will any rate of interest be charged on the amounts which are not paid?

Mr. Campney: I cannot give a categorical answer to that question, because it is settled from time to time in the Department of Finance. We do not have control over it.

Mr. Gillis: I agree with the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich that, while this is a step in the right direction, it does not go far enough. I agree that the charge of succession duties against the pensions of service personnel is something that should be reconsidered, particularly in respect of the capitalized value of the pension. Could the minister tell us the capitalized value of the pension of a sergeant who has been in the service for 20 years? Could he give us some idea of what the succession duties would amount to?

Mr. Campney: I am afraid there are too many imponderables involved to give a categorical answer. It would depend upon the life expectancy of the widow and of the children, the value of the estate over and above the pension and other differentials existing between people who might even be of the same rank, but have different rates of pay because of trade qualifications and so on.

Mr. Gillis: When the Department of National Defence agreed to this kind of assessment against a pensioner, it must have worked it out on some basis. Surely there is some actuarial basis for it. Could not the minister give an average case?

Mr. Campney: I could set up a typical case, have it worked out, and give my hon. friend the results—taking certain facts as basic. If he wishes, I would be glad to have that done and give it to him.

Mr. Gillis: Thank you, sir.

Mr. Pearkes: This regulation was brought in comparatively recently. It has not been in existence ever since the pensions scheme has been in vogue. There was a time, I believe, when pensions, to which personnel throughout their service had made contributions, were not charged succession duties; is that not correct?

Mr. Campney: If it is, I am not aware of it. However, I cannot say that it was not so in the past.

Mr. Pearkes: Perhaps the minister would look into it and satisfy himself as to why this was done.

Mr. Harkness: What is the purpose of subsection 2? Is it merely to ensure that the same service will not be counted twice for a pension under different parts of the act? If not, what is the purpose?

Mr. Campney: The hon. member's understanding is correct.

Mr. White (Hastings-Frontenac): When the minister refers to succession duties under subparagraph (b), would they apply to succession duties payable to a province in which such duties are collected?

Mr. Campney: Yes.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 4—

Mr. Harkness: I do not understand the meaning of the words in line 30, "other than the forces". The clause contains these words:

—any continuous period of full-time service of six months or more in the naval, army or air forces of Her Majesty raised in Canada other than the forces—

And so on. What does this mean?

Mr. Campney: "Forces", under the interpretation section of the act, means regular forces.

Mr. Harkness: Then this refers to some sort of continuous service in the reserve forces?

Mr. Campney: That is so.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 5—Widow's pension to be resumed.

Mr. MacLean: Subsection (1a) provides that the pension of a widow who subsequently remarries shall be reinstituted after the death of her second husband. What is the position if the second husband is in receipt of disability pension? The widow in those circumstances would receive pension after the death of her second husband, on account of his war service. Would this not mean that the pension receivable on account of her first husband would be reinstituted, and in that event she would be receiving both pensions? That is how it would appear.

Mr. Campney: Under the circumstances outlined by the hon. member she might conceivably under this clause receive two pensions, one from disability, and the other the earned pension of her husband. This clause seeks merely to correct a situation where a widow has remarried and her second husband has died. She could not as the act stands resume her service pension under such circumstances. This clause would make it possible for her to do so.

Mr. Pearkes: What happens if her second husband is a serviceman? Will she be entitled to two pensions, then?

Mr. Campney: The hon. member raises a question that might be looked into. I cannot answer it now categorically.

Mr. Pearkes: This is rather serious. I am not joking. I am referring to the case where a widow of two service personnel is entitled to a pension. She is twice a widow. According to my reading of this act she would be entitled to two pensions, one for each of her former husbands.

Mr. Campney: Perhaps we will not finish this bill by six o'clock. I suggest that this section stand, as I would like to look into the observations of the hon. member.

Clause stands.

Clauses 6 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 10—Definition of "persons accompanying Canadian forces".

Mr. Mitchell (London): I should like to point out one fact which arises as a result of this new section, namely, that wives now become in fact service personnel and are subject to the provisions of the National Defence Act. By their very nature, and for very good reasons, the provisions of this act provide more severe penalties than are provided for comparable offences in ordinary civil life, and in a good many cases constitute as offences acts which are not offences in our normal civil life. One example which I might point out is under section 74 where a widow or other dependent living in accommodation which is provided, as is now the case on many stations, might refuse the lawful order of the commander of the area to leave the accommodation and thereby be subject to a term of imprisonment for life or to less punishment. The mere fact that there is a two-year limit indicates the seriousness of the punishment which she might suffer.

The second point on which I should like some information from the minister is one which raises the whole question of the position in which not only service personnel themselves but their dependents will find themselves with relation to the law of countries in which they happen to be stationed, and I have no doubt that there are different situations in different countries. Perhaps they might find themselves in one position in France. It might be quite different in Germany. What are the provisions for dealing with service personnel and their dependents by the civil and criminal courts in those countries? Those who served throughout the last war will recall that in the United Kingdom many offences were dealt with by the civil authority, and some were dealt with by military authority. However, that was not the case in Italy and Germany nor, so far as I am aware, in France. Will the minister explain what the position will be with respect to those various countries?

Mr. Campney: Perhaps it would be helpful to hon. members if I did make a short statement on the status of Canadian forces serving abroad. Let me first deal with Germany. The Canadian forces serving in Germany, their dependents and other civilians in the services of or attached to them, have, by the law of the allied high commission, the same privileges as the occupation forces of the United Kingdom, the United States and France. This being so, they are not subject to the criminal jurisdiction of the German courts.

When the arrangements come into effect whereby West Germany will regain almost complete sovereignty, the status of Canadian personnel will undergo a change. The German courts will then have jurisdiction in criminal matters, but only in cases where Canadian military tribunals have not by the law of Canada been given jurisdiction.

As regards France, Belgium and the United States, the NATO status of forces agreement now applies to our forces in these three countries. Under that agreement Canada has the primary right to exercise jurisdiction over members and civilian employees of the Canadian forces in those countries in relation to: (a) offences solely against the property or security of Canada; (b) offences solely against the person or property of another member or employee of the Canadian forces; and (c) offences arising out of any act or omission done in the performance of official duty.

Canada has no primary right to exercise jurisdiction over dependents, but may request these countries to waive their right to exercise jurisdiction, and they are bound by the agreement to give sympathetic consideration to such a request.

With respect to the United Kingdom, until the United Kingdom ratifies the NATO status of forces agreement, the status of Canadian forces in that country will be governed by the Visiting Forces (British Commonwealth) Act, 1933. Under that act Canadian service courts and authorities may exercise within the United Kingdom, in matters concerning discipline and the internal administration of the Canadian forces, all the powers conferred upon them by the law of Canada. Criminal courts of the United Kingdom have the right to try members of the Canadian forces, their dependents and other accompanying civilians for any offence against the criminal law of the United Kingdom.

As regards Japan, an agreement has been concluded recently with Japan regarding the criminal jurisdiction over United Nations forces there. The provisions of this agreement are nearly identical with the criminal jurisdiction provisions of the NATO status of forces agreement. Jurisdiction vests concurrently in the Japanese courts and in the Canadian service tribunals, Canada having the primary right to exercise jurisdiction in relation to certain offences, and the Japanese courts having the primary right in relation to others. Japan has agreed to give sympathetic consideration to Canadian requests that Japan waive its primary right to exercise jurisdiction in cases where Canada considers such waiver to be of particular importance.

If it is the wish of hon. members I can supplement this with a short statement on the purport of section 10, based on that background.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Harkness: You had better do it after six o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: We are on clause 10.

Mr. Campney: When the committee rose at six o'clock I indicated that I would like to make a short statement on clause 10 which I thought might be helpful because the subject matter is something that arises out of our attempt to keep abreast of developments in foreign countries and our relations under NATO with the jurisdictional systems of those countries.

Before I make this short statement I should like to say first that the fact of making dependents subject to the military code, as this section does to some degree, does not in any sense create a relationship in its normal sense under which a wife or a child would be obliged in any way to comply with ordinary military orders in the same sense as the husband or father would. In other words, the clause would not make a dependent achieve anything like the status of an officer or man. This clause really sets out the conditions under which persons accompanying our forces may be subject to the code of service discipline, with the exceptions I have mentioned, or the reservations I have noted.

The National Defence Act now provides in section 56 that a person who accompanies any unit or other element of the Canadian forces that is on service or active service in any place is subject to military law.

Under Canadian and also under British and American military law, civilians accompanying the armed forces when engaged in active operations have always been subject to military law. One of the reasons for this is that the forces are often operating, particularly in time of war, in areas where civil courts and authorities are non-existent or unable to act. It is obviously essential that persons accompanying the forces should be subject to some law at all times. Furthermore, the inherently dangerous nature of military activities makes it essential that close control be exercisable by the military authorities over all persons participating in those activities.

Clause 10 limits and defines the conditions under which civilians who accompany the forces are to be subject to service jurisdiction. The provisions of the clause other than those dealing with dependents out of Canada do not extend but rather limit the jurisdiction that might be exercised by the services over accompanying civilians.

Clause 10, if enacted, will make dependents who are living abroad with their husbands or fathers subject to the code of service discipline under such conditions as may be prescribed by the governor in council. It is desirable that such dependents should be made subject to the code of service discipline, as under arrangements that Canada has made with the governments of certain countries in which our forces are stationed they may thereby be wholly or partially exempted from the criminal jurisdiction of the courts of those countries.

Under the new clause such dependents must be tried by a special court presided over by a Canadian judge or member of the Canadian bar and other civilians subject to the code may be tried by this special court. It is possible to make trial by the special court mandatory for dependents because it is anticipated that dependents would not be present in a theatre of active operations. In so far as other civilians accompanying the forces are concerned, the legislation must be suitable for war conditions when it would not be practical to have a special court, and in this case such civilians would in all likelihood be tried by military courts.

It is not intended that the services will in fact exercise jurisdiction over civilians unless it is absolutely essential or in the best interests of the civilians themselves that they do so.

Within Canada the civil courts, by virtue of the National Defence Act, will continue to be supreme and have the power to supplant the jurisdiction of service courts and themselves to try persons accused of any offence against the criminal law of Canada.

This legislation is being introduced at the present time as it is important for the protection of dependents and other civilians accompanying the forces abroad that the extent to which they are subject to Canadian jurisdiction be clearly defined. In other words, we are trying to create the necessary machinery to exercise maximum jurisdiction under all existing agreements and laws that we can acquire to ourselves in regard to our people abroad.

The arrangements made by Canada with a number of the countries in which our forces are or may be stationed enable Canadian criminal law and procedures to be applied in respect of persons accompanying our forces as an alternative to having the criminal law and procedures of the country in which an alleged offence has been committed applied. In order to secure the benefits of these arrangements we must not only be in a position —I think this is the important fact about this clause—to exercise effective jurisdiction over such persons but it must also be clear to the authorities of the foreign country that we have and can exercise such jurisdiction. Clause 10 is designed to accomplish this.

Mr. Mitchell (London): Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the minister for the statement he has made. There are one or two things arising out of the statement on which I would like to have further clarification.

The first point that occurs to me is that we are primarily interested, not in the country or the inhabitants of the country in which our troops may be serving but in protecting our men and their dependents who are serving in that country. I ask the minister to consider whether or not it might be advisable to give a right of election as to the manner in which a service man or his dependents would be tried. By so doing we could ensure that our people who are suddenly thrust into a mode of living or a code of ethics which is foreign to them may be sure that the offence which they are alleged to have committed is looked upon as we would look on it here. That is the first point I would like the minister to elaborate.

The second is that having included the dependents of servicemen under our service code we must admit that the dependents in many cases will be women. Have the necessary arrangements been made so that dependents convicted of an offence may serve out whatever punishment may be meted out by our courts?

The minister has indicated that we wish to retain control over our servicemen and their dependents, and that therefore it is highly desirable that wherever possible they be dealt with by our courts and subjected to punishment meted out by our courts. For that reason I would ask him to elaborate on the statement which he has made as to the manner in which these servicemen or their dependents will be dealt with when convicted.

Mr. Campney: Mr. Chairman, dealing with the first point raised by the hon. member, I do not think it would be practical to provide a right of election for each individual who may be dealt with under this section. Except in Germany where we have assumed jurisdiction under terms governing the occupation forces, but which probably will not continue after this year, these matters are handled in accordance with such international arrangement. We have arrived at the position where we feel they would be sympathetically dealt with by these nations. It is after all a matter between governments, and if you were to transfer the right of election of every individual I do not think that would be realistic or practical.

The second question related to the problem of how we would deal with dependents who had been convicted under this procedure. May I just interject that I do not think there would be any intention of using this procedure in regard to petty offences, such as traffic offences, and so on. It would only be used in serious offences, carrying a period of imprisonment or something of that nature. I think that in such cases I am right in assuming that persons so convicted would be brought to Canada to serve their sentence.

Mr. MacLean: In that connection I was wondering what provision is contemplated in the case of the dependents of a man, for example, who might be posted from one unit to another and from one area to another. One of these dependents may be more or less an habitual offender. The serviceman, whose dependent the offender is, might be posted to a new unit. In a case of that kind what record of previous offences would be available? In other words, has provision been made for a conduct sheet for dependents, or something of that nature?

Mr. Campney: In answer to that, I would simply reiterate what I said a moment ago, that this procedure would not be utilized in the case of minor offences. If it were a serious offence and the dependent were sent back to Canada the record for that person would of course be available.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Chairman, I have two or three questions I would like to put to the minister and perhaps I can put them all at once. First, I am thinking of the case of personnel attached to the services in Canada who are not dependents. I have in mind, for example, personnel who might be attached to the services from the national research council, or the defence research board, or organizations of that sort. What is their position?

My second question is this. Would the minister be good enough to make a statement indicating the position of personnel and their dependents who might be attached to the American forces stationed at bases in Newfoundland? As the minister knows, these bases in Newfoundland were granted to the United States forces before Newfoundland entered confederation. Have we the same jurisdiction there as we would have at any other station in Canada?

My third question is this. Is there still a distinction between types of courts-martial? I notice, for example, that the bill specifies general court-martial in every case. I am wondering why that is necessary. If there are still district courts-martial why could they not deal with minor offences committed by dependents?

Mr. Campney: In answer to the hon. gentleman's first question, I would say that the act does not apply to dependents in Canada under any circumstances.

Mr. MacLean: No, not dependents; I understand that.

Mr. Campney: As regards the second question dealing with Canadians attached to American forces in Newfoundland, they would be subject to Canadian law and would be tried under Canadian law.

As regards courts-martial, there are two types. The first, known as disciplinary courts-martial, deal with lesser offences to which this section would not be applied, and the second, known as general courts-martial, deal with serious offences.

Mr. MacLean: In connection with paragraph (a), I understand that civilian personnel attached to Canadian forces may or may not be in Canada. I am not referring to dependents but employees attached to the forces.

Mr. Campney: I think the short answer to that would be that, where circumstances permit, such persons would always be tried under Canadian civil law.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I suppose the only practical experience any of us here have had of dependents accompanying the forces was in England during the last war when the wives of men serving in the forces stationed in England generally took houses in places where their husbands were stationed. These people were all dealt with under British civil law whenever any offences were committed. But what will be the situation of, for example, our air force squadrons stationed in Great Britain at the present time once this act is passed? Will it mean that in places such as Great Britain these dependents will then come under military law rather than British civil law, with of course its right to jury trial, and so forth, which they would lose if they came under military law?

Mr. Campney: Generally speaking this procedure depends on the sympathetic consideration of the other nation concerned and its agreement to grant us jurisdiction. Speaking for myself, I would not think it likely that in Great Britain, from whom we have inherited our jurisprudence, we would ask permission to put this clause in operation. As I understand it, this procedure is not set up for the purpose of acquiring jurisdiction generally but, rather, so that we can acquire it in countries where we believe, in the interests and for the protection of our own people, we should have it.

Mr. Harkness: The point I was getting at is this. Once this act is passed does it become the universal rule? I understand from what the minister has said that in Great Britain this would not be applied and dependents of servicemen would continue to be tried in the ordinary civil courts. I suppose the same would be true in places such as New Zealand and Australia and so on. But I am not quite clear from the minister's remarks whether that is going to be the case generally. I believe it is preferable that these dependents should be tried in civil courts in such places. But I am not quite clear whether, if this act is passed, it will be obligatory that they be tried before a military court.

Mr. Campney: It would not be obligatory at all. It would be necessary for us to seek jurisdiction and have an agreement to that effect, but it is likely that such jurisdiction would not be sought in the circumstances mentioned by the hon. member because of the basic similarity of our systems.

Mr. White (Hastings-Frontenac): I would like to point out to the minister that in clause 10 it states:

> . . . that dependents who are subject to the code of service discipline must be tried . . .

That would appear to contradict what the minister just said.

Mr. Campney: That wording means that if a dependent is going to be tried by military law he must be tried by a special court consisting of a Canadian judge or Canadian barrister of ten years' standing. In other words, there are certain classes, as the hon. member will notice, who must be tried—if they are going to be tried under the code of service discipline at all—by a civilian judge or barrister.

Mr. Harkness: When we come to the latter part of the clause we find that it says that these various persons are to...

. . . be tried by a general court-martial consisting of a person, designated by the minister, who is or has been a judge of a superior court in Canada, or is a barrister . . .

And so on. I presume that that person will, in most cases, be the judge advocate? Is that the intention?

Mr. Campney: No.

Mr. Harkness: Or is it intended to appoint special people?

Mr. Campney: It is intended, if it be a judge, that he would be a civilian judge, or a civilian barrister. The idea is to bring the civilian judge or barrister into cases of that category.

Mr. Harkness: In other words, the intention is to appoint special people to act as judges in those courts and not to use members of the judge advocate general's branch for the purpose?

Mr. Campney: That is correct.

Mr. Harkness: I presume that again means a considerable increase in expense or cost of handling these matters?

Mr. Campney: From such study as we have been able to make and from observations made throughout the service, we do not anticipate a great number of these cases. This is a saving clause rather than a clause under which we think there will be a vast number of cases. Under the circumstances, I would not think that the need for this type of trial would arise very often.

Mr. Mitchell (London): I have two questions arising out of the remarks made by the minister. What is the right of appeal, if any, from the decision or sentence imposed by this court? The second, and perhaps more important matter, is this use of the words "sympathetic understanding". I do not think any of us in this committee are too much worried about the understanding that we would receive from the civilian authorities in the United Kingdom or, perhaps, those in France; but we may be considerably worried about the nature of the sympathetic understanding which we would receive from some of the other continental countries who live under an entirely different code. For that reason I reiterate that something further should be done to define the rights of one of our citizens serving abroad to be tried by our courts, except perhaps for capital or similar offences.

Mr. Campney: As to the first question asked by the hon. member, an appeal would lie from any of these courts-martial to the court-martial appeal board, and, in some cases, with the final appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada.

With regard to the second question, the NATO agreement among all the constituent countries applies. These decisions have to be arrived at by agreement. One country cannot assert jurisdiction in another country unless the other country is willing to allow it to do so. This term "sympathetic understanding" in connection with these matters is a part of the NATO agreement among these countries. All have agreed on that. A country cannot assert something that it really has no legal right to assert. One can get a great deal further, I am sure, by negotiation and by following the term "sympathetic understanding" than in almost any other way. All NATO countries are in that position, trying to work with each other.

Mr. MacLean: I am still not quite clear about what is meant by the explanatory note in connection with clause 10. It says that dependents who are subject to the military code must be tried by a general court-martial and other civilians may be so tried. What power has a commanding officer, if any, to deal summarily with minor offences committed by dependents at that station, perhaps in permanent married quarters in another country, something that has no direct concern with the civilian population of the country concerned at all? To all intents and purposes it is an internal thing as far as the unit is concerned. What is the position of the commanding officer as to his powers of discipline or punishment of the dependent?

Mr. Campney: He would have no jurisdiction whatever over any dependent.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 11—False answers or false information.

Mr. Harkness: What is the reason for making this addition to this clause? In other words, why does the clause need enlargement? Has it been found that, as it stands, it has not been able to meet the need? The chief false information, of course, which is given by anyone at the time of enlistment is generally with regard to age. People state their age as being less than it is or more than it is in order to be enrolled. Is there some other sort of information which the present clause is not able to deal with and to provide punishment for offences?

Mr. Campney: This amendment is designed to provide for a case where a candidate for enrolment submits a false certificate of qualification as to trade or profession, or some document that purports to qualify him in some branch of professional life, and where such document proves to be false. I think the act, as it is drafted, without this slight amendment, would not cover that case.

Mr. Dinsdale: I notice that paragraph (b) of section 112 states: Every person who knowingly...

(b) furnishes any false information or false document in relation to his enrolment, is guilty of an offence and on conviction is liable to imprisonment for less than two years or to less punishment.

Very often this situation results from falsification of age and so forth. What sort of punishment is handed out in the case of a false statement with regard to age or false documentation with regard to age?

Mr. Campney: I would think that the punishment should fit the crime. If it were a minor thing, the punishment would be light. If it were a major matter, such as something touching the root of his attempt to join the forces, it would be more severe. I might point out that this amendment applies only to a person who knowingly makes a false certificate. It is not wide open. It is applicable only if he deliberately and knowingly presents a certificate which service authorities would have a right to rely on, in considering whether he should or should not be accepted.

Mr. Dinsdale: In that case he might be liable to two years' imprisonment?

Mr. Campney: That would take care of the worst case, where the circumstances were very serious and it would run from there to any lesser punishment that the presiding judge would think suitable for the offence.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 12—Conspiracy.

Mr. Harkness: It seems to me that this clause is going to make liable to quite a heavy term of imprisonment, namely seven years, people who have committed really very minor offences. The old section said "conspires with any person to commit any indictable offence". That phrase is removed and the clause we are now being asked to pass just says "conspires with any other person... to commit an offence under the code of service discipline". It might be simply that two or three people get together in order to cover up the absence without leave of another member of the unit, or something along that line. That is the sort of thing which frequently happens. Nevertheless, although that is a comparatively minor offence, a person would still be subject to this seven years' imprisonment. It seems to me that it might have been wiser to leave the provision in the form in which it was, rather than to make such minor things as getting a few extra rations out of the cookhouse, or a new overcoat, matters of conspiracy. Then, a man would come under this particular section.

Mr. Campney: May I correct the hon. member. The reference he made was not to the old act but to the Criminal Code. Under our code of service discipline there are no indictable offences. What this clause seeks to do is to parallel the Criminal Code. It would make the punishment as in parallel offences under the Criminal Code run from seven years down.

Mr. Harkness: The point is that the Criminal Code always applied to members of the armed forces, so you could try a man by court-martial for any infringement of the Criminal Code. While this section was part of the Criminal Code, it was still part of the code of service discipline and a man could be tried under that section for conspiracy.

Mr. Campney: But that applied only to a man conspiring to commit a civil offence. This section as it applies to the armed services extends the law to cover conspiracies to commit service offences.

Mr. Harkness: The point is that this provision of the Criminal Code is still going to be applicable. The passing of this new provision which we have in clause 12 is not going to remove this section of the Criminal Code dealing with conspiracy. It will still be an offence for which a man may be tried. In other words, you are going to have two types of conspiracy, so far as the services are concerned, for which a man might be tried.

Mr. Campney: This section, as I said, is only inserted in the bill for the purpose of dealing with conspiracies to commit service offences. The Criminal Code is not being ousted, because it deals with civilian offences. I do not think there is any clash as between the two.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 13 and 14 agreed to.

On clause 15—Restitution of property in case of conviction.

Mr. Mitchell (London): Having looked at subclause 2, it would appear that a person having been acquitted is, nevertheless, found guilty—that is until you read subclause 3. Subclause 3(a) is understandable, but I would ask the minister if he would be good enough to give us illustrations of how subclauses 3(b) and 3(c) apply.

Mr. Campney: I am informed that these two subclauses are both paraphrases of similar provisions in the Criminal Code. They have been there a long time and have worked. I cannot, offhand, give examples of each of them, but the same provisions exist in the Criminal Code, and we are trying to bring this act into line.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 16 agreed to.

On clause 17—Claims against associated states.

Mr. Mitchell (London): By clause 17 the government is accepting liabilities which, presumably, it would not otherwise have. Some arrangement must have been made with the other countries subscribing to the North Atlantic treaty. Will the minister advise us as to the terms of any such agreements, and as to whether or not the government of Canada, having accepted the liability, will be reimbursed for any amount that might be paid under this provision?

Mr. Campney: This clause is inserted in the bill to implement the NATO status of forces agreement, which has already been approved by this parliament, and thus put the crown in a position to carry out its undertaking.

In answer to the hon. member's second question, I would say that in cases of other nationals who are here in their services, the nation concerned with the national here would pay 75 per cent of the sum that might be awarded in damages, and we would pay 25 per cent. This is applicable among all the NATO nations, so the same condition would apply as between any two NATO countries. It is a general agreement under the NATO status of forces agreement.

Mr. Mitchell (London): So a Canadian soldier driving a Canadian vehicle in the United States would be covered by the same arrangement that applies to visiting forces here?

Mr. Campney: That is correct.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): If a Canadian soldier were driving a Canadian vehicle while he was not on duty, would the crown still be responsible?

[Mr. Campney.]

Mr. Campney: No; it is my understanding that if a soldier is driving a government vehicle while not acting in the course of his employment he is personally liable.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 18—Days on reserve force service not computed.

Mr. Knowles: I would suggest that clause 18, like others in this bill, underlines the point that some of us have tried to make on a number of occasions. The member for Esquimalt-Saanich tried to make it again today. Confusion does arise from this way of amending various statutes. So far today, in this one bill, we have dealt with clauses amending four different statutes. Now we have come to another. In the case of this clause it is proposed that a section of the Senate and House of Commons Act should be amended. It seems to me to be particularly inappropriate that this should be done in this way at this session, bearing in mind the fact that a few days ago we had before us another bill amending the same statute. I understand that bill went through the other place very quickly—only thirty-one minutes for the entire debate on second reading, according to reports.

However, the point I wish to make is that when the Associate Minister of National Defence suggests, in defence of this way of doing things, that it is a matter of interest to members of the defence forces to have all amendments affecting those forces in one place, that argument is set aside by this case. It is proposed by clause 18 of this bill to amend section 37 of the Senate and House of Commons Act. I have before me the Senate and House of Commons Act, and I find that section 38 also refers to members of the defence forces. When you go through these acts you find, as we have claimed on a number of occasions, that these various amendments are scattered all over the place. Whether you are an ordinary person or a lawyer looking for the law under one heading, or whether you are a defence person trying to find out what affects defence personnel, it is rather unsatisfactory to have to look all over the place.

I assume that when an office consolidation of the Senate and House of Commons Act is made, for example, it will include the changes made by Bill No. 171 and it will include changes made by the clause now before us. But it did occur to me that this was a point where one might draw the matter to the attention of the government again, with a view to suggesting that in future, when amendments are necessary in respect of these various matters affecting defence legislation, it might be done by way of amendments to the specific acts themselves, rather than by these omnibus Canadian forces acts.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to add my protest to those of the hon. members for Esquimalt-Saanich and Winnipeg North Centre. I think this is a most unsatisfactory way in which to deal with amendments to a number of acts. Even here in committee, with deference, Mr. Chairman, we pass from one act to another, without even a pause.

If we must be compelled to have a bill of this nature placed before us, then at least when we pass from part I to part II or from part III to part IV there should be a chance for us at least to turn up the other act to which we have to make reference, and also a chance for the minister to make a statement with regard to the change he is proposing.

I think this is a disorderly way of conducting business, when we have placed before us an omnibus amending bill of this nature. Having said that, I wonder if the Associate Minister of National Defence would make a statement with regard to part IV.

Mr. Campney: This amendment was introduced owing to the fact that the section dealing with military service, as affecting members of parliament, dealt only with the army and attendance at regularly organized militia camps. It was antiquated, because its application was only to the army. The purport of this particular clause is to make the same provision for the three services—the army, the navy and the air force. Secondly, the intention is to make the clause apply to any training authorized by regulation or made under the National Defence Act.

In other words, it is an attempt to cover all the services, and to modernize the terminology as to when a member of parliament may take his place in any of the services without being penalized under the Senate and House of Commons Act.

Mr. Churchill: I thank the associate minister for his statement. This constitutes an orderly approach to part IV, and has given us time to catch our breath. I notice the associate minister said that the clause is now applicable to the three services. Then he said, I believe, that it modernizes the wording as to procedure. In my opinion however this modernization is done in such a way that it makes it very convenient for a reserve officer who happens to be a member of the House of Commons to undertake service duties that might not be of great importance and yet, by virtue possibly of some minor duty, the member would find himself not obliged to report his absence from the house.

The non-modern version which the minister is replacing reads as follows:

> In the calculation of any deduction from any member's sessional allowance on account of absence, days which were spent by such member on duty with his corps in a regularly organized militia camp or in travelling between Ottawa and such camp shall not be computed.

When we look at the proposed new section we see that it reads in this way:

> In the calculation of any deduction from any member's sessional allowance on account of absence, days that were spent by such member on service as an officer or man of the reserve forces while on any training or other duty authorized by regulations or orders made under the National Defence Act shall not be computed.

I think there is a very great difference in these. Other hon. members who are with the reserve forces may have a different opinion from mine, but as a member of the reserve army I think this is giving an unusual privilege to a member of the House of Commons. I can quite understand attending a camp or organized specific training for a period of ten days or three weeks, where one's absence might be essential, for the sake of the unit to which he was attached.

However, as I read this clause it seems to open the door for claiming service for rather minor bits of duty. The expression is—> —on service as an officer or man of the reserve forces while on any training or other duty authorized by regulations or orders made under the National Defence Act—

And so on. I submit to the associate minister this problem: If I, as commanding officer of No. 108 manning depot in the city of Winnipeg, found that it was necessary for the unit to have a parade on Monday night of each week, would it be satisfactory if I left here on Friday night, attended the parade on Monday and then made my way back to Ottawa, arriving here on Wednesday?

Mr. Knowles: Or Thursday, the day the Toronto boys are leaving.

Mr. Churchill: It would make a short week of attendance in the House of Commons, and I would have to give a move of that kind very serious consideration.

I put this further problem to the associate minister: let us suppose that, according to regulations concerning training authorized by the department, as an officer in a reserve unit I might find it convenient to attend a course here in Ottawa, or to become attached to some course to which I had not been posted, or if for purposes of training I visited some other unit in the neighbourhood, or in some other province, would that constitute one of these days of permissible absence from the House of Commons?

I think the clause opens the door wide. I would not begin to set out the number of things that might occur to other people—and of course I do not mean hon. members who are now in the house. But these few matters have occurred to me at this time.

I doubt the wisdom of this modernization, as the associate minister has described it. Why not make some restriction? If it is for some course of training that is of major importance, then I think it would be perfectly satisfactory. If it permits a member of the house, who is also serving in the reserve forces, to absent himself for minor service duties, then I think it is unwise.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 19—Special provisions respecting pensions.

Mr. Pearkes: Will the minister make a statement on this part V?

Mr. Campney: A number of persons enrolled in the special force for 18 months' service. Some have now transferred, or re-enrolled in the regular force, and it is felt that such persons should be able to count their time in the special force for all purposes under the defence service pension. This would enable them to do so.

Mr. Pearkes: I think that is a wise provision. Does the service have to be continuous? Does the man concerned have to re-enlist in the regular forces immediately after his release from the Canadian forces special force?

Mr. Campney: No; there could be a hiatus.

Mr. Pearkes: Is any time limit set?

Mr. Campney: No, there is no time limit.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 5—Widow's pension to be resumed.

The Deputy Chairman: This clause was allowed to stand.

Mr. Campney: I have to pay a tribute to the discerning eye of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich in that he established the possibility that some fortunate or unfortunate widow might marry and remarry a series of servicemen and accumulate a number of pensions. I have to modify slightly my admiration of him for bringing up this point because I find on looking into the matter that in parts I to IV of the Defence Services Pension Act the governor in council has authority to meet the situation to which he refers. I should like to ask my colleague, the Minister of National Defence, to move an amendment which would make this clause conform to the parallel section in parts I to IV. The amendment I ask him to move reads as follows:

Strike out all the words in line 38 and substitute therefor the following:

"(1a) Subject to regulations made by the governor in council, where payment of any widow's pension under."

Strike out the word "shall" in line 41 and substitute therefor the word "may".

So that the subsection will now read:

Subject to regulations made by the governor in council, where payment of any widow's pension under this part has been discontinued by reason of her remarriage and she again becomes a widow, payment of that pension may, to the extent that she is otherwise entitled under this part to receive the same, be resumed.

Mr. Claxton: I move accordingly.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Pearkes: This statement covers the point that I raised. I do not want to be accused of robbing the widows, but I had genuine concern for the servicemen. I had to think of the possibility that perhaps at some future date a female Bluebeard might have married an elderly general after an elderly general in order to pile up pension after pension. It was more than I could bear.

Mr. Knowles: Why the reference to a general?

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. Knowles: Next sitting.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Next sitting of the house.

VETERANS BENEFIT ACT

PROVISION OF VARIOUS BENEFITS TO MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill No. 101, respecting benefits for members of the Canadian forces.

Mr. Brooks: Will the minister make a further statement?

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Speaker, in explaining the purpose of the proposed bill I should like to be permitted to review very briefly the action which has been taken by this parliament since the outbreak of the Korean hostilities in 1950, in order to entitle Canadians who served with the United Nations in these operations to appropriate veterans benefits and privileges.

On April 4, 1951, as hon. members will recall, I explained that the legislation which was being introduced at that time—that was the Veterans Benefit Act of 1951—would not include all the benefits given to veterans of world war II. The situation then was very far from being static, and the government felt it advisable that some degree of flexibility and elasticity in regard to benefits to members of the special force should be maintained, and that legislation in regard to certain of the benefits should not be placed permanently on the statute books until such time as we had a much clearer picture of the situation.

As I said, this statement was made on the introduction of the Veterans Benefit Act of 1951. This act was extended in 1952 and in 1953 by two short acts. The Veterans Benefit Act of 1951, as the house will recall, entitled the veterans of Korean operations to certain benefits, while as regards other benefits the act authorized the governor in council to grant entitlement by order in council. Generally speaking, this flexible arrangement followed the practice in developing veterans legislation during and after world war II.

Now, the fighting in Korea having ceased, it seems appropriate to enact legislation in a form which, if it cannot be described as final, is as much so as any veterans legislation can be. That is, it is intended to meet present needs of the veterans in these operations for rehabilitation compensation for disabilities and other social protection established as a result of experience acquired during the last two world wars.

In considering the present bill, Mr. Speaker, it should be remembered that while in 1950 a group of men was specially enlisted for the Korean operation in what was called then the special force, over the whole period of the operations the majority of those serving in Korea were men on a regular engagement; that is, members of the regular force. A large number of these remained in the service. The rehabilitation problem is in many respects different in its nature and scope from that which followed world war II.

The bill which hon. members have before them for consideration covers all the legislation pertaining to Korean veterans. That is, it re-enacts in statutory form all the legislation passed by order in council under the authority of the Veterans Benefit Act relating to Korean veterans with the exception of war veterans allowances which was made available in 1952 when the War Veterans Allowance Act itself was amended.

After world war I and world war II, cut-off dates were established for the various types of benefit after which time service did not entitle a man to the particular benefits. In connection with the Korean operations the cut-off date set for all benefits is October 31, 1953. This was announced to the house during the session of last fall. To be eligible for any benefit a serviceman must have served in or departed for a theatre of war prior to July 27, 1953, which was the date of the cease-fire, and the cut-off date is October 31, 1953. This is provided for in this bill.

As regards gratuities and re-establishment credits, under the Veterans Benefit Act, fifty cents per day is paid for each day's service in a theatre of operation, the same provision as for world war II. This forms the basic gratuity. A similar amount is available as a re-establishment credit. There has been no change in the principle of paying supplementary gratuities based on seven days' pay and allowances for 183 days of service in a theatre of operations, or a portion thereof, the same as applied during world war II.

Hon. members may be interested to note that as of December 31, 1953, gratuities in the amount of $5,165,396.11 had been paid to members of the forces who had served in Korea and to the dependents of those who died in service. Re-establishment credits in the amount of $3,283,786.50 have been set up for members of the forces with similar service. These credits average $175.67. In the same period a sum of $1,267,975.29 had been used by veterans as re-establishment credits.

The Veterans Rehabilitation Act has also been made available to Korean veterans. Entitlement to training follows the same general principles as after world war II. Training may be either vocational, undergraduate or postgraduate and an extension of the period of training normally equal to the period of service may be earned because of scholastic achievement. As of December 31, 1953, 36 veterans were taking vocational training; 45 veterans were taking university training; 73 veterans had completed vocational training; 3 had completed university training; 42 had withdrawn from vocational training; and 14 had withdrawn from university training. There is a provision in this bill for awaiting returns allowances identical with those that existed after world war II.

The provisions of the Pension Act have also been made available to Korean veterans by order in council. Hon. members may be interested in certain figures with regard to special force pensions. As at December 31, 1953, there were 823 disability pensions representing an annual liability of $298,639; there were 117 pensions being paid to dependents representing an annual liability of $147,792; this makes a total of 940 pensions representing a total annual liability of $446,431.

The bill also makes available the benefits of the Veterans Land Act to Korean veterans and also the Veterans Insurance Act under the same conditions as they were made available to veterans of world war II.

The house will recall that right from the start of Korean hostilities means were taken to provide for the reinstatement in civil employment of Korean veterans, the same privilege as was enjoyed by the veterans of world war II. These provisions have been in force since hostilities started and I am pleased to be able to say that with the co-operation of employers there has not been one complaint brought to our notice of a Korean veteran not being reinstated in his civil employment.

The benefits of the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act, which, as hon. members know, is administered by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), are also available to Korean veterans. Similarly the provisions of the Civil Service Act which give preference to veterans who have served in a theatre of operation are in effect for Korean veterans. The benefits of the superannuation act are also made available to those who have active service.

After world war II a system of unemployment assistance known as out of work allowances was in effect. This was supplemented by payments being made to the unemployment insurance fund. In the case of Korean veterans contributions are paid to the unemployment insurance fund on behalf of men who have served since July 5, 1950. If a member of the force has served for at least 91 days he is entitled to a minimum of 3 months' protection under that act. As of December 31, $1,303,254.60 had been paid into the unemployment insurance fund by the Department of Veterans Affairs on behalf of some 21,999 veterans. As I mentioned earlier, Mr. Speaker, the only remaining benefit which this act does not provide is the war veterans allowance and that is because it was made available by amendment to the War Veterans Allowance Act in 1952.

I believe I have covered the scope of this act, and in conclusion I wish to state that it is the intention of the government to bring down other veterans legislation during the course of this session, besides the two bills which now appear in my name on the order paper.

It is therefore proposed to set up a special committee on veterans affairs this session. I would suggest, and I am quite sure my suggestion will meet with the approval of hon. members, that this bill, when it has received second reading, as well as the bill which will follow, second reading of which will be moved by my parliamentary assistant, should be referred to this special committee on veterans affairs. There is as yet no notice on the order paper as regards the creation of this committee, but it should appear tomorrow in Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I very carefully followed the remarks made by the minister and I was particularly pleased with his concluding statement. I think everyone realizes that the men who served in Korea are entitled to all the benefits given to veterans who served in the second world war.

I am not going to discuss their service particularly, except to say that it was as good as the service of the men who served in both world wars, and their conditions of service were undoubtedly just as hard and as difficult as any endured in either of these two wars.

The minister has given us a review of the benefits which have already been received by Korean veterans. These, of course, were made possible by the regulations under the bill known as the Veterans Benefit Act, 1951. The new bill, which will undoubtedly go before the committee, does not seem to me to require examination at any great length here tonight. I might say though, Mr. Speaker, that the announcement made by the minister that a veterans committee will be set up must come as a surprise, and a very pleasant surprise, to most hon. members of this house. I for one welcome the minister's announcement. I do not like to be one of those who say, "I told you so", but I will say that I did tell the minister when the resolution on Bill 82 was before the house that I felt a committee should be set up and that this bill, Bill 101, and also Bill 102, should be referred to a special committee on veterans affairs. But that was not my idea only, Mr. Speaker. That procedure has been advocated by hon. members in all parts of the house, and not only once but time and time again.

I and other hon. members have not only recommended that a special committee be set up for this session; we have asked, and I think the fact that we are setting up another committee this year only adds more strength to the argument we have used in the past, that there should be a permanent veterans affairs committee set up here in this House of Commons. I do not know just how many committees we have had since the first veterans committee sat, but I am satisfied it must be in the neighbourhood of 17 or 18, and on the average we must have had a veterans committee every second year.

It is not surprising that veterans committees are necessary and veterans legislation has to be changed so often, because, when we consider that the veterans of the first world war are now old men, and that their mode of living and the conditions under which they live have changed, and when we consider that we live in a period of cold war and have garrisons in Germany and other parts of the world, it must be evident that legislation must be enacted in order to deal with these changing circumstances. Also, we had recently a hot war in Korea to which Bill 101 has direct reference as regards veterans. In addition to these factors there is the increase in the cost of living, unemployment and other matters which concern veterans and lend emphasis to the necessity for the setting up of a permanent veterans committee in this house.

I do not wish to anticipate the legislation which will be brought before this committee, but the minister has mentioned the War Veterans Allowance Act. If any act in the whole veterans charter requires amendment it is the War Veterans Allowance Act, and I am pleased the minister has suggested that possibly that act will be amended when it comes before this committee. Am I correct?

Mr. Lapointe: I am sorry to have to correct my hon. friend. I do not wish to say it will not be amended, but I did not say what he has suggested. What I said was that this bill made no reference to the War Veterans Allowance Act because the amendments in 1952 made such provisions.

Mr. Brooks: The minister, then, did not suggest that the War Veterans Allowance Act would be amended, but I suggest to him that it is one of the acts that should be amended and I hope it will be brought before this veterans committee for amendment when the committee is set up. I will not go into the reasons why I believe it should be amended.

In addition to the other things I have mentioned, veterans housing and the Canadian Legion brief should be considered by the veterans committee.

While this veterans committee is being contemplated I would also like to bring to the minister's attention the fact that we have had great difficulty in previous veterans committees, over our terms of reference. They have always been too narrow and we have always felt circumscribed when dealing with veterans affairs in committee, and we have never felt we could do justice to the matters which were brought before the committee for attention. I would suggest to the minister that the terms of reference of this committee, if and when it is set up, and I am satisfied it will be if the minister says so, should be made broad enough to include the outstanding problems of veterans at the present time.

I, Mr. Speaker, like some other hon. members, had prepared considerable material which I intended to use in discussing Bill No. 101, but I think it would only be a waste of time to discuss these matters now when they can be more thoroughly discussed in the veterans committee. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I have nothing further to say at the present time.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my first words will be to express pleasure at the announcement made by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) to the effect that the special committee on veterans affairs is to be established.

I regret that some of my colleagues, who might be chosen as members of that committee, do not happen to be here in the chamber at this particular moment. I know I speak for them and for all of us in this group when I say we are glad that at last this decision has been made. I may say that, from the way in which the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) answered the question put to him only a day or two ago by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), I dared to hope that perhaps the softening up process was having its effect and that we would get such a committee at this session.

I see a little procedural problem as to how you will handle the matter, Mr. Speaker, if second reading is concluded tonight and the Minister of Veterans Affairs then wishes to ask that the bill be referred to a committee that has not yet been appointed. But I am sure that, if anything that is proper can be proposed to deal with that situation, the house will certainly give its consent. The desirability of having this committee is clear and the desirability of referring to that committee this and other legislation like it is beyond question.

Like others, we regret that this bill is another one of these omnibus measures that sets out to amend the sections of a number of different statutes. This time the number is eight or ten. I think we are running into confusion here as we were with regard to the legislation that was before us just a little while ago. However, it is also to be noted that despite the fact that this bill amends perhaps ten different acts affecting veterans and despite the fact that there are one or two other pieces of legislation which we now know may go to the special committee on veterans affairs, there are one or two other items of veterans legislation which have not yet been mentioned by the minister but which in our view certainly must be considered by that committee.

As the minister knows, there is a strong feeling all over the house that, without further delay, something should be done with regard to the War Veterans Allowance Act. As he knows, during debate on another question that took place last week, members in all parts of the house expressed great sympathy with the burnt-out pensioners and wanted something done for them at this session. I echo the sentiments of the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) when I say I hope that the terms of reference of that committee will be broad enough to make it possible for the committee to consider the War Veterans Allowance Act with respect to increasing the amount, raising the permissible income or eliminating the means test, and so on. These are matters which are familiar to all of us.

There are times in parliament when committees are a device for shelving issues. There are committees that have performed that function. But I think it is to be said that amongst the better committees that we have had in parliament, over the years that I have been here, have been the special committees on veterans affairs. I know of one or two others which have been very good committees as well, but the veterans affairs committees have been committees which have addressed themselves directly and sympathetically, on a non-partisan basis, to the needs of our veterans and to the justice that we feel should be accorded to them. When this committee is set up, if it is given the same kind of opportunity that was given to previous committees on veterans affairs, I am satisfied that it will consider these matters sympathetically and carefully; and I am confident that it will bring back to the house recommendations that will be worth while.

I must point out, however, that the basic question will be the terms of reference. If those terms of reference are restricted or are so narrow as to deny to the members of that committee the right to discuss the Pension Act in all its aspects or the right to discuss the extremely important War Veterans Allowance Act, then the committee will not be able to do the kind of job it has done in the past.

In view of the fact that the committee on veterans affairs is to be set up, it is hardly necessary to discuss this bill at length. As I indicated with regard to the bill that we were considering previously, I should like to see some way found for dealing with necessary amendments to veterans legislation, other than this omnibus type of bill. Perhaps the committee will have a chance to discuss that matter.

On behalf of the members of this group, Mr. Speaker—those who are veterans and those of us who are not—I welcome the announcement that has been made tonight. I trust there will be no detracting from the value of that announcement by limited terms of reference but rather that they will be broad enough so that we can have the kind of veterans affairs committee that will bring back to parliament the recommendations which our veterans so definitely deserve.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is necessary for me to say very much at this stage. However, I should like to say that we in this group are glad that the benefits of the veterans charter are being made available, by statute, to the Korean veterans. It is a far more satisfactory situation than that of having to depend upon orders in council. We are also very glad to hear the minister say that a special committee on veterans affairs is to be set up. Of course, we would have been better pleased if he had been able to announce that a standing committee was going to be set up. That is something which the various veterans organizations have been asking for year after year and which a number of members in this house have also asked for.

I should also like to join with other members in pleading with the minister that, when this committee is set up, the terms of reference should be made sufficiently wide so that it can deal adequately with veterans problems. I would say that the most pressing need at this time is for amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act. As a matter of fact, I think I would say that if the terms of reference were going to be so narrow that we could not deal with the War Veterans Allowance Act, it would be better not to set the committee up at all because that would be like adding insult to injury. The main question that concerns all veterans today is the question of the War Veterans Allowance Act. Therefore, to set up that committee without allowing it to deal with that act would, in my opinion, be just a gesture. I hope the minister will be able to give assurance on that point. That is all I will say at this time.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, there is just one thought I should like to place before the members of the house and particularly before the minister. As I understand this bill, it covers only those young Canadians who had gone to Korea before July 27, 1953, the date on which fighting stopped in that country.

No help of this kind is given to the men who have gone to Korea since that time or to the men who have gone with our forces to Germany at any time. None of them are eligible for these benefits. Of course, I am not advocating that the young men who have not been in the fighting should get the same benefits as those who have actually done fighting. But here we have a situation which has never before been faced by a Canadian parliament. We have thousands of our young men being asked to go as volunteers to serve either in Europe or in Asia for quite an extended period of time. Of necessity, that means that their establishment in life or their preparations for their lifework must be interrupted.

Probably most of them have gone out of a spirit of adventure. For them there is an attraction in getting abroad and seeing other parts of the world. But the point is that most of these men are not making the navy, the army or the air force their career; that is probably particularly true of the army and the air force. I believe it would be of great value to this nation if some provision were made whereby on their discharge from the forces, these young men could get either educational assistance or assistance with vocational training.

Last year I suggested some such plan to the minister with regard to the men in Germany. His reply was that these men had not been in a theatre of war, and therefore were not entitled to any benefits. I suggest that our thinking should be a little more advanced, and that we should make provision to help these young men. A few months ago I received a letter from a young lad serving in Germany, and I should like to quote part of the letter because it clearly shows the feeling of at least some of these young Canadians. He said:

> The majority of ordinary ranks apply for release at the end of their engagements. Some just like their freedom—some like the prospect of high wages, hoping to get good jobs with more pay. Very few go back to school because it takes money, and lots to do that.
> More chaps would go to school if the government made it easy for them. In this way they would not be an unemployment problem. A lot of fellows went to university after the last war with D.V.A. help (example my elder brother—he got an engineering degree out of it). Canada will benefit in the long run.

There cannot be the slightest doubt that Canada benefited to a large extent by the training given to the young men who returned from the second world war. There never was a finer investment made by this country than the money put into helping with the training of those thousands of young Canadians. I believe that some such scheme should be started at this time for these other young Canadians who have volunteered for service outside the country, and are either with our forces in Korea or in Germany. If that provision were made, I think it would also be quite an inducement to young men to enlist, especially if they realized that when they came back they would be helped with their education. It would be helpful to the morale of those units serving away from Canada. These men must get lonesome and homesick, being away from this country for long periods during which they are serving, now without the excitement of actual fighting. I believe we would be well advised to work out some scheme now for helping them with their training when they return to Canada.

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Any apparent confusion I am showing at the moment, Mr. Speaker, is due to the confused nature of the bill in front of us. It is another one of those omnibus bills because it refers to no fewer than ten acts. As a preliminary, may I say we welcome the statement of the minister that a special committee on veterans affairs will be appointed at this session. A demand has been put forward time and time again for a committee of that nature on a permanent basis. It is welcome to hear the news that such a committee will be set up, even on a temporary basis.

There is no question in anyone's mind that in the past the committees on veterans affairs have served a useful purpose indeed. The veterans of Canada have benefited from the work of these committees. The veterans legislation, which in many respects is of such a high order, has resulted from the work of the veterans committee and this house. I am sure there will be general agreement and pleasure that the minister has seen fit to make arrangements for the appointment of such a committee at this time. We hope that when the reference is given to that committee it will be all-inclusive, and will cover all matters affecting veterans across Canada. Year after year we have brought forward some of the matters which seriously concern veterans, and unless the minister makes some provision for the committee to consider these matters, the committee will fail in the attempt that should be made in this house on behalf of the veterans. There are still many problems which require settlement, and of course the problem of those on war veterans allowance comes to mind.

This bill before us seems to me to be a confusing document. Bill No. 101, an act respecting benefits for members of the Canadian forces, undertakes to deal with ten separate acts. It deals with the War Service Grants Act; Veterans Rehabilitation Act; the Pension Act; Veterans Land Act; Veterans Insurance Act; Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act; Civil Service Act; Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act; Public Service Superannuation Act; Unemployment Insurance Act. The laws of our country are sufficiently complicated, even for those who are engaged in a day to day attempt to interpret them. As we have had pointed out by laymen looking at the Criminal Code, the laws are a bit confusing to laymen. I feel that this bill is going to add to the confusion. I am not at all clear as to how a person is going to deal quickly with some of the problems that arise if this bill becomes law.

As it stands, this bill appears to differ from the one we were considering a few moments ago, which introduced amendments to the various sections of five different acts. The bill was introduced by the Department of National Defence. Under those circumstances the sections would be amended and an office consolidation, or in time the revised statutes, would show clearly the changes that had been made. Here we have the Veterans Benefit Act, 1954, as this may be cited. It deals in ever so many paragraphs with ten separate acts. A search for information concerning, for example, the Pension Act will eventually lead you to this particular act, section 5. What reference will there be in the Pension Act to indicate to anyone that he must look further into this Veterans Benefit Act, 1954? I would think there would be some other way of dealing with this matter.

Again, as we go through this later on, is the minister going to give us information, act by act? He has not been as obliging as the Associate Minister of National Defence, who separated his recent omnibus bill into parts I to V. There are no separations into parts in this bill, and consequently consideration of it becomes extremely difficult.

[Mr. Churchill.]

Then, where do we stand in the matter of dealing with a general principle, when there are references to so many acts throughout the bill? This is another feature that makes it extremely difficult. The purpose of debate on second reading is to discuss the principle of the bill. In this instance are we to discuss ten different principles, or is there only one? It was not clear to me from the minister's statement just what the situation is in that regard.

If one can discern a principle in this peculiar bill it is that regulations are now made law. We have a suggestion that in some of these sections statutory re-enactment of regulations is taking place. This would seem to be a bit confusing in terminology. I have asked my colleagues how you can re-enact something that had never been enacted. A regulation may be published, but it is not enacted. But now it seems we are re-enacting regulations.

The bill, as I see it, generally amounts to that. In large measure it is a sort of interpretation bill, or a bill which explains the meanings of the various sections in ten different acts, and extends those meanings by way of regulations which, in times past, have been published in order that those acts might be operative.

Would it not have been better to have retained the regulations as regulations, or to have amended the pertinent sections of the ten acts dealt with? If this goes on, if we are to have bills of this nature presented to us, then I think it is going to become extraordinarily difficult for people who require to know the law to find their way about in these documents. It seems rather odd that, just after a revision of the statutes—which certainly has been very helpful—we are now piling in bills of this nature which will only add to the confusion.

I hope this will be the last time the Department of Veterans Affairs will bring forward a bill of this nature for serious consideration—because I am not treating this lightly. Serious consideration should be given to dealing with acts in the normal way in which we have dealt with other acts. Why does this particular department, and its neighbour the Department of National Defence, have to produce these omnibus bills? Are the other departments going to follow suit? Each department administers more than one act. Is this a system that is going to be adopted? If so, then it seems to me it will cause no end of difficulty. It is creating sufficient difficulty right now, and my hope is that with protests of this nature, and perhaps subsequent protests from the committee that has been proposed, in future the minister will go back to the other method of dealing with amendments to our statutes.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, as one member in the house, I am pleased with the bill. I think it indicates that there is no finality to veterans legislation. I am also pleased that the minister made the announcement that a veterans affairs committee will be set up. I think consideration should be given to making the veterans affairs committee a standing committee of the house.

As I understand the principle of the bill before us, it is merely to open up the many sections of veterans legislation for the purpose of relating the Korean forces to it, and talking about the whole matter generally. I think that is the correct approach. I agree with the hon. member who has just taken his seat, in expressing the hope that we will be able to bring about a consolidation at this time, and that we will not have any new forces to include in years to come.

There is a good deal of material in this measure that could be debated for a long time. However, in view of the fact that the bill is going to a committee, and that the committee will be in a position to call representatives of the department for questioning, it may not be necessary to discuss the matter at great length now.

It is understood that the minister is bringing in a resolution tomorrow for the purpose of setting up a committee. May I express the hope that the resolution will be broad enough in its terms of reference to enable it to discuss many matters that are not exactly spelled out in this bill. I hope the committee will not be simply a legislation examining committee, such as we had on at least one occasion. The War Veterans Allowance Act very definitely has to be examined at this session of parliament; because if there is one question all members are running into right across the country, it is the necessity for changes in the War Veterans Allowance Act. I know the minister is aware of this fact.

Then, I would like to see a full discussion in the committee with respect to veterans education. I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) that a good job was done after the last war. I do suggest however that we failed in one respect, and that was that the whole emphasis was on university training. A large percentage of the young men who came out of the services and did not have university entrance qualifications were denied education. I think any examination of the records will prove that we should have gone into an extended vocational training scheme at that time, along with our university scheme. This is something that is badly needed. I fear that if in the committee we are permitted only to examine the terms of this bill, then we may not be allowed to discuss educational matters.

I hope the minister will avoid a long discussion tomorrow, when he brings in his resolution, by making the terms of reference broad enough to prevent a discussion in the house and to permit discussions in the committee of all phases of veterans problems. I do not want to speak at greater length at this time, and I look forward to giving these matters consideration in committee.

Mr. Elmore Philpott (Vancouver South): I just want to add a word to say how glad I think all veterans of the whole country, certainly all the veteran members on both sides of this house, will be at the minister's announcement tonight that a special committee is to be appointed this year. I have a personal reason for being glad because now it gives me the answer to the 427 postcards that are lying on my desk upstairs.

What I have seen in this house so far would indicate to me that, regardless of the terms of reference, hon. members have no particular difficulty in discussing whatever they have uppermost in their minds. I know that most of us who are in close contact with what the veterans are saying and thinking know perfectly well that the one thing that is uppermost in their minds across the country today is the war veterans allowance and particularly the level of extra permissible income on that allowance.

All I should like to say, Mr. Speaker, is that in view of the fact that Canada has long had the deserved reputation all over the world of having the best and most advanced veterans welfare legislation in the whole world, I hope the terms of reference that the minister will bring down tomorrow will be very liberal indeed.

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): I certainly do not want to hold up this legislation, but I should like to have one minute to endorse what has been said by others in expressing appreciation of the fact that we now know that there will be a committee, and it is our prayer that the committee will be worth while and that the terms of reference will be wide enough to include various matters, and particularly the war veterans allowance. If that is not done I am afraid there will be a great deal of disappointment and the results will certainly not be as good as they otherwise would.

My second point is that I want to join in the protest which was made by my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill), in his statement with respect to this omnibus bill. I sent out for the Veterans Benefit Act of 1951. I was going to say that it was the present minister who was in charge of that bill, but of course it was a different minister. At that time we had the Veterans Benefit Act and we also passed three separate acts, which are now included in the omnibus bill that we have before us tonight.

I presume the minister will not have too much sympathy for those practising law in other places, but some day he may have to practise law again himself. In fact, we hope that that day will come before too long. When he does, he will have, of course, an advantage over other lawyers, because he will have sat here and he will know he has to turn up the omnibus act to find the amendments to twelve different acts. How are other lawyers across Canada who are consulted by clients, by pensioners, by war veterans and so on, to get the information? They will have to get the Pension Act and get all these other acts. They will have to look up the index and find the amendments. Then they will advise their clients, and later on they will find that because the minister did not want to spend too much time in the house and did not want to bring in eleven or twelve different acts, he tied them all up in one bundle. This is the first time it has happened with the Department of Veterans Affairs.

The Department of National Defence have done this before and they have set a bad example. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), who is sitting in front of the Minister of Veterans Affairs, must have had a bad influence upon the minister because in 1951 the Department of Veterans Affairs at least introduced separate bills. Today we find that they are bringing in one bill and including all these others. I think it is a bad principle. It is wrong; it is unfair to the veterans themselves. If this is going to be done, well, then, why does not the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) bring in an omnibus bill to deal with air transport, the Canadian National Railways, the harbours board and a dozen other things? Why does he not bundle up all the things that he has to deal with and bring them in in one bill? Tonight we are endorsing a principle which I think is wrong, and I want to express my disapproval of it.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to make one statement. I have been in this house and have heard this practice criticized again and again. To the best of my recollection I have never seen anyone bold enough to stand up and say one word in favour of it.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. Lapointe: I move that the bill be referred to a special committee on veterans affairs to be appointed at a later date.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Claxton: The time is approaching when we might adjourn. Tomorrow, as announced, we will take up the Criminal Code. If we conclude that I would hope that hon. members would agree to adjourn.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, February 12, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

HON. MEMBER FOR FORT WILLIAM—BIRTHDAY CONGRATULATIONS

Mr. H. A. MacKenzie (Lambton-Kent): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. Before parliament assembles here on Monday, the senior statesman of this house will commemorate his birthday and pass another milestone. I refer to the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) who, on Sunday the 14th, will celebrate the 81st anniversary of his birth. He is the youngest of the older men in the house, and is an example to us all of what clean living and right thinking will do for us. I am sure the members will go along with me in extending to him our heartiest congratulations and best wishes for many happy returns of this memorable occasion.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): I appreciate the courtesy and kindness very much. I do not feel old as yet, and I am going to live as long as I am living. I am sure that He who keeps His eye on the sparrow will keep His eye on "old Dan".

PRIVATE BILLS

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West) moved the first reading of Bill No. 252 (from the Senate), respecting Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. McIlraith: The purpose of this bill is to seek the authority of parliament—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. McIlraith: Some hon. members asked for an explanation, and I do not want to appear to be in the position of refusing them. I have no desire to explain it, I assure you, but I do not want to be put in the position of having appeared to refuse an explanation to members who asked for it.

Mr. Knowles: On the point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If unanimous consent of the house is not given, the explanation, no matter how succinct it may be, is not allowed. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 253, for the relief of Gloria Alphonsine Timmins Ferguson.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 254, for the relief of Adella Alice McNeil Slobosky.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 255, for the relief of Vera Marguerite Hennigar Isenring.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 256, for the relief of Sylvia Golbas Lann.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 257, for the relief of Lucy Jane Cole Judd.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 258, for the relief of Walter Hardy Willows.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 259, for the relief of Elizabeth Temple Jamieson Grier.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 260, for the relief of Herbert William Bateman-Cooke.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 261, for the relief of Rita Ann Rennie Knight.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 262, for the relief of Mavis Josephine Green Jackson.—Mr. Hunter.

CRIMINAL CODE

INQUIRY AS TO COMMENCEMENT OF WORK OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Can the Minister of Justice say, now that the other house has approved the motion to set up this committee, when it is proposed to proceed with the committee on the criminal law?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I believe, Mr. Speaker, we can proceed in the very near future, probably next week.

Mr. Fulton: I would hope it would not be delayed.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

FISCAL AND MONETARY MEASURES TO TAKE CARE OF UNEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I ask the Minister of Finance a question, of which I gave him notice yesterday. Can the minister tell the house something of the various fiscal and monetary measures which the Minister of Labour told us were the means proposed to take care of unemployment?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I listened to the hon. member's question yesterday, and I was not quite sure whether or not he expected me to elaborate upon it. However, I am very happy to do so.

The government does not believe that present conditions warrant the adoption of drastic or large-scale anti-deflationary measures. Economic activity in some lines is at present below the levels of a year ago, but industrial and economic activity as a whole in Canada is still at a very high level.

Strong inflationary pressures which were of so much concern to the government and to all hon. members a couple of years ago have subsided and, as they subsided, the government has withdrawn the various anti-inflationary measures which were adopted in 1950 and 1951. For example, the government has withdrawn the various restrictions on the expansion of credit, both through the banks and in the field of consumer credit.

The policy of the Bank of Canada has been to keep the banks in a strong cash position, and one of the consequences of this policy has been some decline in both short and long term interest rates. The federal government's budget surplus has been virtually eliminated, and in planning our expenditures for the coming year we have followed a less restrictive policy in public works. The housing act which is presently under consideration will make possible a larger flow of funds into housing construction.

These are some of the measures which the government has taken to adapt government policy to current conditions. If economic activity declines, the government is in a position to take stronger action in these and other directions, but I should like to emphasize that as I and my colleagues view the present situation there is no justification for stronger action and I have a high degree of confidence that when our winter season of normally reduced activity is past, economic activity in Canada is likely to resume its upward trend at a satisfactory rate.

Mr. Macdonnell: May I ask a supplementary question. Shall I assume that the report in the morning paper, the Gazette, is correct in saying the minister regards the winter unemployment picture as not alarming but only unpleasant?

Mr. McIlraith: Blakely is seldom correct.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

Mr. Abbott: Yes, that report is quite accurate. That is a Canadian Press report.

Mr. Knowles: Does the minister's opinion as to the accuracy of the article depend on who writes it?

COAL

SUBVENTIONS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON WORK OF COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): May I direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, based on a report in the papers some weeks ago that a committee had been set up to study the adjustment of subventions for the movement of coal? My question is, would the minister be prepared to make a statement as to what progress is being made by the committee, and when we might expect an interim report?

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): The hon. member was good enough to give me notice of his intention to ask this question. The whole matter of freight subventions is receiving very careful study at the present time. I have no interim report to make, but I do expect to make a full statement when the estimates of the dominion coal board are before the house.

WATER POLLUTION

FISHERIES ACT—SUGGESTED AMENDMENT REDEFINING POLLUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. He of course will know what I have in mind. This is the 86th day for Prince Albert in its present position. Will the government consider at once introducing in the house an amendment to the Fisheries Act, if necessary, to redefine the word "pollution" so as to make it possible to punish those who today are dumping into the river chemical products which do not come within the meaning of "pollution" because they are not toxic, and also to have the penalties in the Fisheries Act increased so that industrial concerns may not pollute our streams? If the house will allow me to say so, the situation is terribly serious—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friends say "no".

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows that he cannot add to his question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If they were living there they would know—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member may ask his question. He has done so. If he has not unanimous consent he cannot comment upon his question. The minister may answer it.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I think the hon. gentleman will realize that he is not the only one in this house who is interested in seeing that this problem is solved.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Eighty-six days.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend has said "86 days". He has acted properly in asking the government what it can do or what it proposes to do and what it is doing in co-operation with the provincial government.

Mr. Macdonnell: Is this just an answer or a speech?

Mr. Martin: But I must say that merely to say "86 days" is not contributing to the situation. I explained to the house last Monday that we had indicated to the minister of health of the province of Alberta our desire to continue the co-operative enterprise that we had already engaged in with respect to this particular matter, and with that end in view I had sent a telegram to the minister of health, the responsible authority under our constitution, asking for his reaction to the proposal that we had made.

I may say to my hon. friend that it is not clear at this moment who is responsible for this serious situation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh!

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend says "Oh!". That is the situation. The minister of health in Alberta has indicated to me that it is not clear at this moment who is the party responsible for the pollution. At one time it was thought that a particular corporation was the party, but the investigations which are now being carried on with the help of technical officers do not reveal at this moment which particular party is responsible for the pollution. The scientists, both federal and provincial, are doing their utmost to come up with an answer to this problem.

I would point out to my hon. friend that there is nothing to prevent anyone, for instance, in the city of Prince Albert from taking whatever legal steps he sees fit. There is no lack of present law to deal with this situation. What is important now is that the co-operative efforts which we are making to ascertain the cause of this thing be allowed to go on unhampered.

I am pleased to communicate to the house at this time the telegram I have received from the minister of health in Alberta who, as I say, is the responsible officer. The telegram reads:

> Thank you for the offer made in your telegram of February 8. Dr. Somerville has been in touch with Dr. Cameron and arrangements are being made for two of your industrial chemists to visit Edmonton in the very near future. Your co-operation is much appreciated.

Mr. Campbell: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Is there a laboratory in Canada capable of analysing this water?

Mr. Martin: The laboratory in Saskatchewan, as my hon. friend would agree, I am sure, is no mean one, and the laboratory in Alberta, together with our own laboratory facilities here and the facilities in Cincinnati, are all being utilized in the effort to solve this situation.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

CHANGE IN ISSUING OF CIVILIAN PAY CHEQUES AT WINNIPEG STATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence. Is the minister aware of the fact that on Monday next, February 15, civilian employees on the R.C.A.F. station at Winnipeg will not receive their regular semi-monthly pay cheques? The minister knows that this is owing to a change in pay procedure that has come about suddenly. Is there not some way in which this change can be brought about gradually so that these employees will not have to go a whole month on a half month's pay?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Associate Minister of National Defence): I was not aware of the situation to which the hon. member referred. I shall look into it and ascertain the facts.

IMMIGRATION

INQUIRY AS TO DEPORTATION OF MRS. JESSIE WILSON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. It concerns a story carried in the Calgary Herald of February 10, a copy of which I have given the minister. It has to do with the case of an Australian woman, Mrs. Jessie Wilson, mother of an Australian air force veteran now residing in Calgary—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Nickle: I should like to give a brief explanation.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member must put his question.

Mr. Nickle: I will come to the question then, sir. This woman was ordered deported after 24 hours in Canada, despite the fact that the Vancouver health authorities examined her—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Nickle: —and gave a written report that an arrested area of tuberculosis gave no grounds for deportation. The question, sir, is this. On what grounds was she deported, and will her case be re-examined by the minister to ensure that no grave injustice may be done to this woman?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): The hon. member for Calgary South was kind enough to telephone my office a few moments before we came into the house, and I have had an opportunity of getting a brief report from the department, as well as reading the newspaper clipping he sent me.

The facts are these. This mother did arrive in Vancouver and was deported because of a condition which was variously described as arrested tuberculosis, and by many similar medical terms. But the real facts, which do not appear in the newspaper report which I have read, are these. This lady applied in Australia for immigration to Canada. She was examined there. She was rejected because of her medical condition. She was informed that she ought to abandon her plans for coming to Canada. Despite that, she arrived without further notice on a ship in Vancouver and she was properly then rejected.

However, in view of the fact that her son is married and living in Canada I will have an examination made in the hope that we might have an opportunity to examine her again in Australia after a suitable interval to see if her condition has improved so that she may be admitted.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INQUIRY AS TO NUMBER OF UNEMPLOYED ON JANUARY 10, 1954

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Can the Minister of Labour give us the official figures of the number of unemployed in Canada on January 10, 1954?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Not today. I think those official figures will be released shortly.

[Mr. Nickle.]

Mr. Hamilton: I have a supplementary question. On what grounds does the government differ with the estimates recently made by two labour unions?

Mr. Gregg: I would refer my hon. friend to an attempt at explanation of that which I made in a statement not very long ago. If that is not complete, perhaps there will be an opportunity to discuss the matter at a later date.

CRIMINAL CODE

REVISION AND AMENDMENT OF EXISTING STATUTE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, January 19, consideration in committee of Bill No. 7, respecting the criminal law—Mr. Garson—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 120—Public mischief.

The Chairman: When the committee rose after its last sitting we were considering clause 120. Shall the clause carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 121—Compounding indictable offence.

Mr. Shaw: Would it be possible for the minister to move a little closer toward the centre of the chamber so that some of us may not feel so removed from him during the discussion? We would like to be closer to him.

Mr. Garson: I have no objection to doing that if you will give me a little time to move my impedimenta.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 122—Corruptly taking reward for recovery of goods.

Mr. Knowles: Had we dealt with clause 120 the last time or were we going to let it stand?

The Chairman: Clause 119 stood; 120 and 121 carried and we are now at 122.

Mr. Knowles: When was clause 120 carried, last time or just now?

Mr. Garson: Perhaps I had better put the information I have here on the record so we will know as we go along what sections have been allowed to stand and where we are, at the present time. According to my own records and those of the Clerk Assistant, the following clauses were allowed to stand: 16, 32, 33, 46, 47, 48, 50, 52, 57, 60, 61, 62, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 88, 102, 116 and 119. All of the other clauses have been carried. When the committee opened today we were at clause 120, which was being considered when we last met. Clauses 120 and 121 were called and I think in the general confusion were passed. We are now at clause 122 unless there are some observations to be made with regard to clauses 120 and 121.

Mr. Knowles: Has the minister anything further to say with regard to the suggestion we were making with regard to clause 120 when the committee rose last time?

Mr. Garson: There was some discussion by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and myself with regard to clause 120. If I understood him correctly he was afraid that a man innocent of any real criminal intent might perhaps be convicted under clause 120. I took the position that the use of the word "wilfully" indicated, as indeed the cases upon this offence show, that the crown in a prosecution must establish that the incorrect statement which the accused made was false to the knowledge of the accused and that he had made it deliberately or, as the section says, wilfully in order to mislead the police officers.

I indicated in my remarks when we were last discussing this matter that we do not think that there is any necessity to amend the wording of clause 120. All that we could do would be to spell it out and we think it is quite clear as it is. If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is willing to accept it we are quite content to leave it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: How frequently have there been prosecutions under this section?

Mr. Garson: As is indicated on the opposite page, this is a new section.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Previously it was under the common law.

Mr. Garson: Yes. When we consulted the law officers of the provinces to find out what common law offences had been dealt with during the past sixty years we were told that sometimes they charged the offence of public mischief but in almost every case it was of the nature that we are discussing, that is, it was a case where false information had been given to the police of the commission of a non-existent crime which had caused them to go off on a wild goose chase. I would not say that there were frequent charges, but there have been a considerable number of them in most provinces.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I know of one or two. In one case the man who gave the statement was himself the murderer and as a result the law officers of the crown were going back and forth across the country for weeks on end. He made the statement in an apparent desire to assist them in locating and apprehending the murderer. This case happened in Saskatchewan. There was another case in Ontario some years ago, either in the county of Grey or in the county of Bruce. A similar state of affairs prevailed.

I am wondering whether the penalty is heavy enough. Five years is given as the maximum penalty. When an individual is endeavouring to saddle someone else with a murder, I do not think the penalty is heavy enough.

Mr. Garson: Especially if it is his own crime.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes. I feel that the penalty is rather too low. As I recall the case in the province of Ontario, the penalty that was imposed there under the common law was seven years. In the case to which I have referred in the province of Saskatchewan, which occurred about 20 or 25 years ago, the actual murderer assisted the crown for a considerable time in their search for the murderer as designated by the person who in fact had committed the homicide. It is interesting to note that after this man was convicted and sentenced to a term in the Prince Albert penitentiary the crown was unable to obtain sufficient evidence to convict him of the murder even though he confessed, his confession being ruled out. On leaving Canada he went to Great Britain and there committed another murder for which he was executed three or four years ago.

I would suggest to the minister that five years' imprisonment is not a very heavy penalty to impose on one who, in order to mislead the police, and to remove the cloud of suspicion that may rest upon him, takes it upon himself to give information of a totally false nature against another, and innocent, person. I do not very often suggest that penalties under the code should be increased, but I do believe this is one penalty the minister should bring under consideration.

Mr. Knowles: I do not wish to comment on the suggestion made by the hon. member for Prince Albert as far as increasing the penalty is concerned, but it seems to me that his suggestion underlines the objection I have taken to the wording of clause 120. Even as the clause now stands the five year penalty is rather severe if the person who is guilty of an infraction according to the clause is in the position of not knowing whether an offence has been committed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does not the word "wilfully" cover that?

Mr. Knowles: That is a point that lawyers and non-lawyers can argue about, but my understanding of the wording makes me feel that the word "wilfully" does not fully cover the situation. Perhaps the best way to get my point across is to read the clause as it now stands, and for my purpose I will read subparagraph (c) of clause 120, and then I will read it as I think it should be worded.

Subparagraph (c) of clause 120 reads as follows:

> Every one who causes a peace officer to enter upon an investigation by wilfully > (c) reporting that an offence has been committed when it has not been committed, > is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for five years.

It seems to me that even with the five year penalty, let alone the higher penalty suggested by the hon. member for Prince Albert, it would be better if the clause read as follows:

> Every one who causes a peace officer to enter upon an investigation by wilfully > (c) reporting that an offence has been committed when he knows that it has not been committed, is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment . . .

—for whatever period the law might suggest. Perhaps it all turns on the different interpretation we place upon the meaning of the word "wilfully". The minister seems to feel that what I am suggesting comes under the term "wilfully", but when such cases go to court it will not be the minister's definition of the word, or my own definition, but rather the definition which the court places upon it which will be the important one.

In explaining my suggestion with regard to clause 120, I chose subparagraph (c) because that was the one I thought would better enable me to spell out the idea I had in mind; but the same wording could be incorporated into subparagraph (b), although it might perhaps require more extensive wording.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister not care to comment on the question of penalty?

Mr. Garson: The difficulty with regard to the penalty is this, that under the new code we are now considering we have adopted a certain number of penalties, five years, 10 years and so on, and in order to follow that general plan as applied to this particular case, and if we did not adhere to the penalty of five years, we would have to increase it to 10 years. I believe my hon. friend will agree that the cases in which the police are misled by a false statement to the effect that a crime has been committed when it has not been committed, as a rule do not have associated with them the almost unique circumstances of the case which he mentioned, when the person who was misleading the police was trying to do so with the distinct ulterior motive in mind of leading them on a false trail away from his own guilt. In the great majority of cases that element is not present, and I would think that when that element is not present five years is adequate in the case of a man who has misled the police. Five years in the penitentiary is quite some time out of a man's life, and for the majority of offences of this kind I would think that such a penalty would be quite adequate.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I realize the trend today is in favour of lower maximum sentences.

Mr. Garson: Yes, that is correct. We can give consideration to the hon. member's suggestion but I would be inclined to think we would probably come to the conclusion that five years is adequate under this section in relation to the people who are likely to be convicted under it.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say something on this clause along the lines taken by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The clause reads:

> Every one who causes a peace officer to enter upon an investigation by wilfully . . .

But surely anyone who goes to a police officer and asks him to make an investigation does so wilfully, unless he does it under duress, which is hardly possible. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has pointed out, a person might do such a thing wilfully and yet not do it with any evil intent. If the Minister of Justice thought something had been done and he went to a police officer and said, "I believe something has been done and I think you should investigate it," and he had no evil intention in requesting such an investigation, he is still doing it wilfully, but I do not believe he should be punished for what he has done. I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has an important point here. Like him, I am not conversant with legal terminology—

Mr. Knowles: That is to our advantage.

Mr. MacInnis: Well, it may be, but if you are in the clutches of the law it is better if you have a knowledge of the law. I believe an amendment to subparagraph (c) of clause 120, along the lines suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, should be considered.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, as I have already stated, it has been the law, as established by decisions in the courts, that in cases of this kind on a charge for a common law offence, the crown has to prove two ingredients, first, it has to prove that the statements which the accused made to the police officer were false; and second, that the accused made them with the wilful intent to mislead. The essence of the offence is the misleading of the police.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister mention a couple of those cases he has in which the court has so held?

Mr. Garson: One is the one which my hon. friend has mentioned, that of Rex v. Leffler. Is that the one?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. MacInnis: If this "wilful" means "wilful intent to mislead", that settles the point; that is satisfactory as far as I am concerned. However, it would mean more to me if it were in the section.

Mr. Garson: I think the only solution to the question posed by my friends the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway would be to spell this out to an extent which is not usual in a code.

Mr. Fulton: How about substituting the word "maliciously" for "wilfully"?

Mr. Garson: No. I do not think that would do it. What might be done would be to make it read as follows. When I give this wording my hon. friends will see the awkwardness which arises when one attempts to spell it out. We could make it read in this way:

> Every one who causes a peace officer to enter upon an investigation by wilfully . . .
> (c) reporting that an offence has been committed which has not been committed when he knows that it has not been committed or when he does not have reasonable grounds to believe that it has been committed.

It is true that this wording is awkward, but if we start to spell it out and do not finish the job, in my judgment it is much better to leave the clause as it now is. If we do finish the job by spelling it out to the extent which I have indicated, it sounds pretty awkward. In connection with every one of these sections—

Mr. Knowles: How about allowing it to stand?

Mr. Garson: —I think it is important that we try to evaluate and act upon every worth-while suggestion that we can get from every member of the house in order to produce as good a code as possible. Perhaps if we were to let this section stand, and if my hon. friends who have made this suggestion are sufficiently interested, I should be glad to confer with them and to try to produce a wording which would meet their approval. Then we could bring it back and see whether it met with the general approval of the committee.

Mr. Knowles: That procedure would be quite satisfactory, Mr. Chairman.

Clause 120 stands.

Clause 122 agreed to.

On clause 123—Advertising reward and immunity.

Mr. Shaw: Under subsection (a) I take it that two things must occur at one and the same time before an offence has been committed, namely that the reward has been offered and that immunity has been guaranteed. Am I correct in assuming that the mere guarantee of immunity in itself would not constitute an offence?

Mr. Garson: I should not like to say that the guarantee of immunity would not carry the penalty or constitute an offence. The principle of this clause is that of discouraging practices which may tend to the compounding of crimes between the person who is advertising and the person who has committed the crime. Of course my hon. friend is right in saying that if the crown makes a charge under section 123 (a), the crown must prove all of the ingredients of that charge as stated in the subsection. But it might be that if a person offered immunity, the other circumstances of the case were such that, although an offence could not be charged under this section, it could perhaps be charged under some other section of the code.

Mr. Shaw: May I ask one other question in connection with this matter? The section refers to advertisement. What is the situation if one were to have a letter printed in a newspaper and in that letter offered a reward and also offered immunity? Could the person be charged? The section states specifically that it must be an advertisement.

Mr. Garson: In order to support a charge under this section—in my view my hon. friend is quite right—it has to be an advertisement. If you are going to prove an offence under section 123 (a), you have to prove that the accused publicly advertised a reward and used words to indicate that no questions would be asked. You have to bring him right under that section.

Mr. Winch: It is just in view of the statement made by the minister that I rise at this moment. A few moments ago he stated that the reason the provision is in here is that you would be compounding a felony if you offered a reward with no questions asked. I can understand that you would be doing so if something had been stolen; but how do you compound a felony if you offer a reward, with no questions asked, for the return of something that is lost?

Mr. Garson: I am glad that my hon. friend has raised this point. Perhaps the infirmity of my language has misled him. I did not mean to suggest—and I was wrong if I did so, but I do not think that I did—that an offence under this clause would be the crime of compounding a felony, but that this clause was in principle like the crime of compounding a felony. In my view the essence of this clause here is that the accused deals with a criminal to relieve him of the consequence of his crime if he will just give back what he has taken. I am not suggesting that this is compounding a felony but what I am suggesting is that the crime of compounding and this crime here both have the same element of saying, in effect, to the criminal, "It is true you may have stolen this, but if I can get my money back, then we will just forget about it". That is the element actually in compounding and I think it is quite clear that it is the element in this section here.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Would a felony not be committed in certain circumstances even though an article had only been lost? Suppose, for instance, I were to pick up a $100 bill out here in front of the parliament buildings and were to shove it in my pocket. Is that an offence?

Mr. Garson: If I understand my hon. friend correctly, he is quite right in saying that this clause relates just to the advertisement. If he will look at the words in the last line of the section he will see that this is a relatively minor offence. It is punishable only upon summary conviction. The purpose is to discourage this type of advertising. The man is just brought, in a summary manner, into the magistrates court and the penalty is not very severe. However, the principle is much the same, as in the much more serious offence of compounding.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): This only takes place where advertising is concerned.

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Hansell: My question may appear to be a bit far-fetched, but would the minister care to comment on what would happen if a case of kidnapping were involved rather than stolen property. It occurs to me that, comparatively speaking, quite a bit of advertising of this sort is done in the case of kidnapping. A mother will advertise and say that no questions will be asked, which of course might be a natural thing to do. I know that the section uses the words "anything that has been stolen or lost", and perhaps kidnapping would not be involved here.

Mr. Garson: This has no relation to kidnapping at all.

Mr. Shaw: What is to be gained by having a section in which it is stated that it is an offence to do a certain thing through advertising when exactly the same thing can be done by simply putting a letter in the same newspaper? What is the reason for this clause if it is so easily circumvented? What value has it?

Mr. Fulton: No newspaper would accept such a letter.

Mr. Garson: I am afraid I do not grasp my hon. friend's meaning. As I understood him, he was referring to this lady writing a letter to the newspaper.

Mr. Shaw: I am not talking about what the hon. member for Macleod referred to. I originally brought up the question of there being no offence unless a reward and promise of immunity are contained in the advertisement in the newspaper, but the same thing can be done by means of a letter.

Mr. Garson: A letter in the paper?

Mr. Shaw: Yes.

Mr. Garson: The first question that would arise there would be as to what interpretation the magistrate was going to place upon the word "advertising."

Mr. Shaw: That is the point. Is there an interpretation?

Mr. Garson: I would think that the courts might interpret such a letter as advertising upon the ground that you do not have to pay for it in order for it to constitute advertising. But you will see the point here if you will look at paragraph (d). You will see that it is an offence to print or publish any advertisement referred to in paragraphs (a), (b) or (c). The primary purpose of the section as a whole is to prevent newspapers being used for this sort of thing by prohibiting people from making arrangements to have advertisements printed and also by prohibiting newspapers from publishing.

Mr. Hansell: What would be the effect of placing the responsibility and liability on the paper rather than on the person?

Mr. Garson: The responsibility is on the paper. "Every one who"—and then you have (a), (b), (c) and (d), and (d) is "prints or publishes any advertisements".

Clause agreed to.

Clause 124 agreed to.

On clause 125—Escape.

Mr. Regier: In the third line of subsection (c) appear the words "the proof of which lies upon him", and at the end of the section a penalty of two years is provided. In a country such as ours I can see that many situations may arise whereby a man may arrive two hours or a day late, and he may have considerable difficulty producing evidence. Is there a need for those words, "the proof of which lies upon him", in that particular section? I realize that no difficulty would be involved in an urban area because the minute the person failed to appear a warrant would be issued and he would be located. But Canada is a large country.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will read the whole clause I think he will see that its meaning is pretty self-evident. It reads:

> Every one who . . .
> (c) having been charged with a criminal offence and being at large on recognizance fails, without lawful excuse, the proof of which lies upon him, to appear in accordance with the recognizance at the proper time and place for his preliminary inquiry, to stand his trial, to receive sentence or for the hearing of an appeal, as the case may be, is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years.

This involves a man jumping his recognizance and going away. If he is caught he is guilty of this offence. I take it my hon. friend's objection is that the words "the proof of which lies upon him" involve a shifting of onus that is not fair to the accused. I see my hon. friend nodding his head in assent. If that is the point, then I would say that it is generally recognized in the law that it is not unreasonable or unfair to leave the proof upon the accused in a case like this where he is the only person who has the evidence that will discharge that onus. He is the only man who has the excuse, and if he has a lawful excuse—

Mr. Fulton: He is the only one who knows it.

Mr. Garson: Yes, he is the only one who knows it. There is no way at all that the crown can prove it. If he has an excuse all he has to do to meet the onus that is upon him is to say: "Well, Your Worship, I am sorry that I was late in turning up but the bus in which I was travelling broke down and I could not get any alternative transportation", or, "I had an airplane ticket and the planes were all grounded because of fog." This will clear him and it is no hardship to him to produce evidence like this which only he can adduce.

Mr. Fulton: That is the way this house is, quite often.

Mr. Garson: Cases of that sort arise frequently and the person involved, who is the only one who has the evidence, is asked to produce it in order to establish a lawful excuse.

Mr. MacInnis: I would agree that the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam has not got a very good case here but I am glad he brought up the point because, as we go through the bill, I think we will find other cases where the onus of proof is on the accused and where it is not so well placed as in this instance. In this case something additional is given to the accused. He is already guilty of an offence but if he can prove a reason for his non-appearance then that mitigates the offence. While I would not agree that my hon. friend has anything in this particular case, I am glad he brought up the point.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I agree with the hon. member who has just taken his seat. As one looks over these amendments, and we will come to various onus sections a little later, one would almost conclude that a number of these new onus sections had their origin in the difficulty of crown counsel in establishing their cases with that ease that crown counsel sometimes like. That observation does not apply to this section, but as I see the situation it does apply to one or two others that we will be dealing with later. As far as this section is concerned, if that provision were not there I do not know what would happen to the accused. In other words, the crown can say to an accused: You were there and you should have been here; you are guilty. Then he has an opportunity to say: The reason I was not here was that I had a lawful excuse to be where I was. Certainly there is no onus placed on the accused in this section, although a reading of it would give that appearance.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 126—Permitting escape.

Mr. Ellis: There is one question I should like to ask on this clause. I presume this provision refers to a peace officer who allows a prisoner to escape. Is it necessary to prove any intent to allow the prisoner to escape? Say a policeman, through negligence, permits a prisoner to escape: is he liable under this clause?

Mr. Garson: I believe if the hon. member will read the wording of the provision he will see the answer to his question. Clause 126 reads:

Every one who
(a) Permits a person whom he has in lawful custody to escape, by failing to perform a legal duty,

In order to make the accused liable under that clause, the crown has to prove, not only that the prisoner was permitted to escape but that the escape was the result of the accused police officer, or whoever he might be, failing to perform a legal duty.

Mr. Ellis: Then, I gather it would be possible to prove negligence on the part of the policeman?

Mr. Garson: I should like to stick to the terms of the clause. It would be by his failure to perform his legal duty, and that would be the one point which the crown would have to prove before it could get a conviction.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 127 to 129 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 130—Public place.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I should like to call to the minister's attention the definition of a "public place". It seems to me to be an extremely wide definition, and may very well affect the application of other sections of the act. I have been trying to think of some place that is not a public place within the terms of this definition, and I cannot think of one. I thought I had found it in this chamber, itself, but then I recalled that the public is occasionally invited in here. Perhaps I am reading it in a wrong manner, but it seems to me that any place to which the public has access as of right or of invitation, expressed or implied, is almost everywhere.

Mr. Garson: The purpose of this definition is, quite frankly, to overcome difficulties which have arisen as to whether stores, shops and other public places to which the public are invited by the owners, so that they can do business with them, are public places. I have argued myself, I must confess unsuccessfully, before the court of appeal of my own province, that an accused who was intoxicated in a country general store in the evening, although it was open at the time, was not intoxicated in a public place. This man worked on the railroad and was going to lose his seniority and his pension. There was not any question about his intoxication, and the only point upon which we could hope to have his conviction quashed was that this store was not a public place. The purpose of this clause is to put beyond any peradventure or argument what constitutes a public place for the purpose of part IV of the code. I believe it is a fair definition because it says:

"Public place" includes any place to which the public have access as of right or by invitation, express or implied;

Is it not true that such a place is, in fact, a public place? It is defined so there will not be any doubt about it.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): The point is, if I had the temerity, I might invite you into my house. Would it then become a public place?

Mr. Garson: No; though I am a member of the public, I am not the public.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As the minister has said, this definition was to cover a case that took place in Saskatchewan, and which for years was the authority on the question of what was, in fact, a public place. As I recall, the case was Rex v. Benson, in 1928. I was counsel for the appellant in that case. The accused was charged with disorderly conduct in a public place, namely in a restaurant. He was convicted and we launched an appeal, and on appeal it was held that a restaurant was not a public place, in that the public did not have the inherent right of access to that place. This case was followed for many years, and resulted in many guilty persons being acquitted. Some years ago, I think around 1946, the difficulties of the prosecution for some 18 years were dissolved by an amendment that was introduced to cover the situation.

It actually means, as the minister has stated, that where a person goes into a place that is open to the public, that is now a public place. Prior to the amendment in 1946, a public place was a place where the public had an inherent right of access. I would be loath to see any change in the definition, if disorderly conduct is to be punished in this country.

Mr. Dupuis: Would the minister tell me if a private garage where I store my car and for which I pay rent would be considered as a public place?

Mr. Garson: I would not think so, because it is not a place to which the public have access as of right. They can go in, but they have no right to be there. Moreover, it is not a place to which you can give the public an invitation, express or implied. You would not be inviting the public to your private garage in the same way in which you would if you opened up a shop to which you impliedly invite the public to go in order that you might do business with them, or to which you would invite them expressly if you write them a circular letter saying, "Come down to our 50-cent sale".

Mr. Fulton: I should like to be clear on the question of whether or not there is a change in the definition of public place. I have the present code and the supplement before me, and it seems to me the new definition goes beyond the present one in that there is now included the possibility of an implied invitation. I am much less concerned about the express invitation, but the implied invitation does extend that definition of a public place rather beyond what it is now. I should like the minister to comment on that.

Mr. Garson: I doubt whether I have any comments in addition to the ones I have already expressed. I thought we might save time if I indicated right away that the new definition was inserted for the purpose I indicated. That is the answer, that it is considered, as the hon. member for Prince Albert has stated in a very useful contribution to the debate today, in the part of the code which deals with public morals and disorderly conduct, to be desirable not to have an unduly narrow definition of a public place.

Mr. Fulton: So, it does go beyond the present one?

Mr. Garson: Yes, it does. The hon. member has the present code there, and he can see it is changed.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): The minister was pointing out that a public place is a place where the public is ordinarily invited, such as a clothing store, we will say. That is a public place, but does it cease to become a public place at six o'clock, the usual closing time, when the door is locked, or is it still considered a public place?

Mr. Garson: At six o'clock when the door is closed I would say that the invitation had been withdrawn. My difficulty in the case to which I referred was that this was a country general store, and they always stayed open in the evening. My task, which was an extremely difficult one, was to persuade the court that although it actually stayed open, in fact it was closed in law, but I did not succeed in persuading the court on this point.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): In the minister's case it was supposed to be closed but was not. I am wondering—

Mr. Garson: No, it was not supposed to be closed; it always stayed open.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): What I have in mind is a store such as a clothing store, or a grocery store, if you like. At six o'clock they lock the door, and then an offence is committed in that place. Is it then defined as a public place?

Mr. Garson: I would not think so, Mr. Chairman, because in most of these cases—this is not always so, but in most orderly communities there are municipal bylaws or other laws which say at what times a shop of that kind can remain open. Or, in the absence of such laws there may be a settled practice on the part of the proprietor to close his shop at six o'clock. The crown by the evidence that is available cannot establish that the place in question is a public place within the language of the section if it cannot prove that it is a place to which the public had access at that time. Well, if the public did not have access, because the door was closed, and the public were not there by invitation, because the door was locked and they had been excluded, and the public were not there by any implied invitation because the shop was actually closed—

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): It ceases to become a public place when the door is locked?

Mr. Garson: Yes, I would think so.

Mr. Power (St. John's West): Would the minister care to widen the definition of public place? "Place", to my mind, indicates some fixed portion of the surface of the globe, and I doubt whether this definition would include a moving vehicle.

Mr. Garson: Well, as we go on through the other clauses of this part of the code my hon. friend will see that in the case of which he speaks, the moving vehicle, if a person were disorderly there or committed an offence there, it might not be desirable to have them open to prosecution under this part of the code. In other words, if he will observe carefully as we go through this part IV of the code to see whether there is any other clause in which a reference is made to a public place which in his opinion should include a moving vehicle as being a public place in that clause, we might discuss then the point which he now raises.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Is this section the same as it was before, or is there a new interpretation?

Mr. Garson: No; as I indicated when I began my remarks in response to questions asked by the hon. member for Nanaimo and again in response to the hon. member for Kamloops, there is a change in the wording. The wording in the present code is as follows:

"Public place" includes any open place to which the public have or are permitted to have access and any place of public resort, . . .

Mr. Ellis: I have one point. Would a piece of property, for example, a vacant lot, be considered a public place if it were trespassed upon, that is, if the people who were on the lot were there without the owner's permission? It is private property. Those who are on that property at that time are not there with the express permission of the owner.

Mr. Garson: No; I think not, because it would not be a place to which the public have access as of right.

Mr. Fulton: Or by invitation.

Mr. Garson: Or by invitation. My hon. friend says it is a place privately owned. I do not think it should be a public place, because if a gentleman or lady wishes on occasion to be disorderly on their own property and not disturbing others—

Mr. Fulton: There is a limitation to the present definition, because although it does seem to me the new one goes beyond the old one in its reference to implied invitation, yet, if the minister is correct, a vacant lot in or near a city, upon which in fact a trespass was committed by an individual going there without consent, would not now be regarded as a public place for the purposes of the act. I think that is a limitation on the present definition which says that a public place includes any open place to which the public have or are permitted to have access. Therefore if a vacant lot near a city is one which was not fenced and it was the custom of the people to cross there, to take a short-cut, and the owner never objected, never put up a fence and made no effort to keep them out, then it seems to me the definition of that property in the present code would be a public place. I rather doubt whether, under the new one, that is so, unless we get into this business of the quite complicated matter regarding implied invitation. You would have to hold that there was there that implied invitation merely by the absence of a fence, would you not, in order to hold it a public place under the new section?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is not that situation covered by section 160 (1)? Section 160 reads:

Every one who
(a) not being in a dwelling house causes a disturbance in or near a public place,
(i) by fighting, screaming, shouting, swearing, singing or using insulting or obscene language,

[Mr. Garson.]

And so on:

is guilty of an offence . . .

The essence of the offence is not being in the public place. The essence of the offence is creating the disturbance.

Mr. Fulton: That is right.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If a disturbance were created on a vacant lot, so long as nobody was disturbed, there would be no offence. If there were a highway adjacent to the lot or a street adjacent to it where people ordinarily congregate, there would be no offence. You can howl to high heaven so long as nobody hears you. You can participate and make all the noise you may on a lot or in any other place provided there is nobody in the neighbourhood who actually overhears you, or is disturbed by what he sees or shocked by what he imagines.

Mr. Garson: Yes. In other words, as I indicated to the hon. member for St. John's West, the definition of public place here has to be read in conjunction with the sections in which that term occurs in the manner in which the hon. member for Prince Albert has just suggested.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 131 to 133 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 134—Instruction to jury.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This section is really the incorporation of the rule of procedure that has been in effect throughout the years since 1870, whereby a jury is warned that it would not be safe to convict in the type of case referred to, and in particular rape, attempted rape, and the like. Will the minister say why it was considered necessary to incorporate this section in the code as actually substantive law?

It has been in force throughout the years as a necessary and requisite course to be followed. It has occurred to me as being rather anomalous that a judge tells a jury that it is not safe for them to convict, that it is dangerous. Today under the rule of procedure the judge usually says that it is dangerous to convict of rape or attempted rape on the uncorroborated evidence of the prosecutrix, and then ends up by saying that the jury is entitled to find the accused guilty if it is satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the evidence is true.

Why was it considered necessary that such an anomalous rule of procedure be incorporated into the law? It was accepted by the courts that it was requisite, that it was necessary even though it was not part of the law.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend's question is a very good and penetrating one, if I may say so, because it does seem on the face of it that there is no particular reason for incorporating in the code what has been a well-settled practice which judges have followed. My hon. friend will recall that in the case of rape, the judge was required to warn the jury that it was not safe to convict on the uncorroborated evidence of the female victim unless they were satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that her evidence was true. Corroboration was not required in the case of rape but it was required in the case of carnal knowledge. We thought that there was no way in which we could justify the requirement of corroboration in the case of carnal knowledge when it was not required in the case of rape.

If my hon. friend will follow this as we go on he will see that what we have done here is to apply this section 134 to both rape and carnal knowledge and also remove the necessity for corroboration in the case of carnal knowledge. I think that with his experience in this branch of the law he will agree that that is proper, that if corroboration is not required in the case of rape it should not be required in the case of carnal knowledge.

Mr. Nowlan: The minister is quite right in saying that it was not required in the case of rape and it was in the case of carnal knowledge, but the courts generally had that in mind and I think they dealt with the situation on a fair basis. I am thinking of clause 142 covering incest, which involves an element of carnal knowledge. I am sure that if this had not been made statutory many judges would have drawn to the attention of the jury that it was dangerous to convict on the evidence.

I had a case last fall where it developed afterward that the girl had been threatened by her mother and made to give evidence against her father so he would be sent to the penitentiary and she could take on somebody else. The girl committed perjury and it was not too easy to break her down actually. The judge warned the jury that they should not convict on the evidence of that girl.

If you make it statutory, will we not find ourselves in a situation where the judge will look at section so and so and will say that under that section he has to give a warning? He will decide that this applies only to sections X, Y and Z, it does not apply to incest or to this particular case, and that the parliament of Canada must have decided that a warning should not be given in that particular case.

Although I follow the reasoning of the minister I think that unless it is provided for in other ways we may be creating an injustice by freezing it by statute instead of leaving it to the jurisdiction of the court as it has been heretofore.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman has raised a very pertinent point there and perhaps the minister would be able to explain.

Mr. Garson: I do not think I can give any further explanation than what I have given already.

Mr. Nowlan: What would happen under clause 142, the incest section, if that is not included in the statutory provision?

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend is of the opinion that 142 should be included, it would be a simple matter to add the figures "142" to clause 134. Will my hon. friend not agree that in all cases of the character of those we have been discussing, where the nature of the offence indicates an absence of witnesses as a rule and where therefore the accused is in a very awkward position indeed if the lady in the case has any reason to try to point to him untruthfully as the guilty person, in such a case it is her evidence against his evidence? The royal commission, the Department of Justice, the other place and the committee of this house which examined this provision during the last term of parliament all felt that by their approval of this clause 134 in all these cases, rape and carnal knowledge alike, the practice as indicated in 134 should be uniform, and that there should not be one practice for carnal knowledge and another one for rape.

If my hon. friend thinks that this provision should apply also to incest, perhaps when we come to clause 142 dealing with incest we could revert to 134 and consider including incest among the offences covered by clause 134. In my opinion, however, incest is in a somewhat different category because those who are concerned are bound together by familial connections and it would seem less likely that the accused would be falsely charged.

Mr. Nowlan: That is the very reason why I brought up this point. My experience may have been unfortunate, but I happen to be mixed up in three defences of that charge. One does not want to even suggest that there might be extenuating circumstances; but, as the minister said a moment ago, there are opportunities for pressure to be exerted in a family. As I say, I have seen a case where through intimidation a little girl went on the stand and gave evidence which was absolute perjury. Of course, this sort of thing happens in families of a rather poor type and where other elements enter into the question. In one case the woman wanted to get a divorce; in the other case the woman wanted to send her husband to the penitentiary in order to get rid of him.

I feel quite strongly that it should be included in the provision because I am afraid that otherwise the courts will say that up to now it has been the practice. Within the last few months I have heard a judge tell a jury that they should not convict, that it was dangerous to do so. But I am afraid that with this provision the judge will say, "Under the old law I would have told you not to convict, but since the parliament of Canada has expressly taken out that section, you do what you like".

Mr. Diefenbaker: In support of what my hon. friend has said, may I direct the attention of the minister to the fact that this general rule applies to all sexual offences except those that require specific corroboration. In other words, it was a requisite for a judge to warn the jury of the fact that it was unsafe to convict, that they ought not to do so, but that if they registered a conviction, the conviction was a proper one. Parliament, having chosen to apply this general principle to clauses 136 and 137, and subsections 1 and 2 of section 138, would not a judge be justified in concluding that thereby parliament in its wisdom had decided, in the case of offences covered by section 142, that such a direction was unnecessary?

I feel the department should have given consideration to the point raised, because unless consideration is given by parliament we will find ourselves in a position where the court in one province will have decided that a warning is necessary, and the courts in other provinces will decide the warning is not necessary, and before the question is determined it will finally have to go to the Supreme Court of Canada.

If we want to preserve the benefit of the rule which experience has shown is necessary in order to protect an accused who is innocent from being convicted by those who by design invent a story, which is simple to invent and difficult to rebut, surely we do not want to remove that protection which the accused who is innocent has under the rule of practice in effect today.

The Minister of Justice says, "Well, the commission did not refer to that and it was not referred to in the examination made by a committee of this house or the committee of the other place". That may be so, but it is in circumstances such as that that lawsuits are created, and certainly I do not believe parliament intends to take away that element of protection against the kind of unfounded charges frequently to be found in families when wives decide that they wish to dissociate themselves from their husbands, and, as a result of direct or indirect influence, children in that family develop antipathy toward their fathers which ultimately finds them making allegations which they swear to but which later on they regret.

I feel the minister might give consideration to the point raised by my hon. friend, for certainly I would be loath, while not desiring in any way to defend individuals who commit these terrible offences, to allow the bulwarks of the law to be broken down and an innocent man convicted because of the absence of the warning which experience over 100 years under British law has shown to be necessary and which should be thrown around the accused.

Mr. Garson: We would be very glad to consider that. There is one difficulty of course. What we have been discussing are matters which include incest, which is dealt with in clause 142. I believe my hon. friend, upon reflection, will recall that incest, at least as between adults, differs from rape and some types of carnal knowledge in that it implies consent upon the part of both parties and therefore the lady in the case, who is giving evidence against the gentleman, will be an accomplice, because in most cases the offence of incest could not be committed without her voluntary participation. The general rule would then apply that evidence of an accomplice could not be used unless it was corroborated. I think that is one of the difficulties.

Mr. Nowlan: But surely the minister is up against the same thing under clause 131, which makes statutory provisions with respect to evidence of an accomplice. It does not include incest, though I would be perfectly happy to see it included in clause 131.

Mr. Garson: Which subsection is my hon. friend referring to? Would it meet my hon. friend's wishes if clause 142 were included in clause 131?

Mr. Nowlan: I have not thought it all through, but I think it would be better that way. There is no doubt she would be an accomplice, if she were old enough, mature enough, or had reached the age of consent, but you would not have the protection you have now because it is barred under the other section.

Mr. Garson: I am quite agreeable to allowing this present section to stand. I know we would all want to have it in as good shape as possible, and if any other ideas occur to either the hon. member for Prince Albert or the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings, and they will be good enough to pass them on to me, I shall be glad to have them. I believe if incest is taken care of in clause 134, that clause will then be adequate.

The Chairman: Shall clause 134 stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

Clause stands.

On clause 135—Rape.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, the remarks I am about to make regarding this clause also apply to clauses 136 to 149 inclusive. The minister is planning to set up a royal commission to study the question of insanity, and my suggestion, which I have discussed with many other hon. members in this house, is that this same royal commission might very well make a study of the various sexual offences covered in clauses 135 to 149. My reason for making this suggestion is that when persons accused of such sexual offences come up before either the police court, the county court, or the Supreme Court of Canada, they invariably present a great problem to law enforcement officers and judges in regard to sentence.

I have had some little experience in this matter, having been connected with them in the past as a crown attorney, and repeatedly, every time anyone is charged with any of these unpleasant sexual offences, the defence has been submitted that they cannot help what they are doing; that they are really nice people who have this aberration and they cannot control themselves. I know quite well that many judges and magistrates are loath to use extreme penalties when they feel the person before them may be sick in some way. On the other hand, many other judges will, to use the vernacular, go to town on them and mete out a very heavy sentence.

I do not believe there are many hon. members in this house who know anything about this subject. It is a matter which only doctors and psychiatrists know anything about, if they do, and I believe all these clauses should be referred to this royal commission.

The royal commission would of necessity be composed of the same people, but if they are looking into the matter of insanity I believe they should at the same time look into these sexual offences which concern people who are mostly emotionally unbalanced or emotionally unstable.

I believe it would be of considerable assistance to us if we knew more about these offences. These clauses as they now stand were taken mostly from the old code which derived originally from the old ecclesiastic code of the Middle Ages.

According to reports we read in newspapers and periodicals, these sexual offences are being given a great deal of study, and it seems to me that this whole matter ought to be considered by this royal commission because we would then have more knowledge of the facts than any hon. member now possesses. These offences, which we sometimes read about in newspapers and periodicals, occur much more frequently than many hon. members are aware, and anyone who has ever been connected with law enforcement at one stage or another will agree that a great many of these offences are hushed up, or something of that nature, and do not even appear in the press. For that reason, and because of the rather offensive nature of most of these offences, I think that we ought to have a little bit clearer knowledge of what should be done about the matter. Should these people have more severe penalties in order to put them out of circulation? I fully realize that at the end of the code there is a new section which calls for preventive detention for people of this nature. But on the other hand, if these people can receive some type of medical treatment which might prevent them from committing offences like this in the future, should such treatment be prescribed by law? If they can be cured—it may not be possible; I do not know—should that course not be followed? I think the matter ought to be looked into by this royal commission. I was wondering whether the minister would take it under consideration?

Mr. Garson: I think my hon. friend's remarks might be more pertinent when we get to the section towards the latter part of the code—if I remember rightly it is section 661—which deals with criminal sexual psychopaths. From his experience I think he will agree with me that many of the cases of rape do not present any evidence at all of insanity. The accused are not criminal sexual psychopaths. They are just rapists or criminals in the ordinary sense. When we set up a royal commission to consider insanity as a defence to a charge for criminal responsibility, I would take it that we are not confining it to charges involving criminal responsibility for any specific crime but that it is criminal responsibility generally, and would include particularly charges of the nature of the one he has described. They are sexual in nature but of such a character that there is indication of more than normal sexual excess. It is excess to the point of insanity. While I think the commission would do it in any event, it would be quite worth while to follow his suggestion to make sure that the commission will consider insanity as a defence to criminal responsibility for sexual offences and in relation to sexual offences.

Mr. Winch: I completely agree with the suggestion that this entire section could very beneficially be referred for study to a royal commission or to one of the commissions or committees that have already been established. I sincerely hope that the minister will give some more thought to this matter and see whether he could not possibly do that at this time. I do not think that a great many changes have been made, and that fact at least leads me to the belief that perhaps all the thought that should be given to this most serious problem has not yet been given to it. However, in dealing in particular with section 135, as it may be a long time before we again see the Criminal Code up for amendment, I feel that we should have a thorough knowledge of each section and that, if we have any doubts, we should ask the minister to explain. I have one with respect to section 135, and I may tell the minister that I am not being facetious. The section reads:

> A male person commits rape when he has sexual intercourse with a female person who is not his wife,
> (a) without her consent, or
> (b) with her consent if the consent
> (i) is extorted by threats or fear of bodily harm, . . .

That is rape, according to the section, and the man is liable to imprisonment for life and to be whipped. May I say, Mr. Chairman—and through you to the minister—that it is rape if a man holds a gun or a knife on a woman and demands and takes sexual relations. What is it if a female holds a knife or a gun on a man and demands sexual relations? Is that also rape? If so, how is it covered? I do not see how it is covered under section 135.

I said, Mr. Chairman, that I was not being facetious, and I am not. I am very serious. I have never heard of any such incident in Canada but in the United States, within the past 12 months, there has been case after case—and in the courts the matter has come up—where a young man in a car stopped and picked up girls. I am thinking of two cases now, one where two girls were hitchhiking and one where there were three girls. One of the girls drew a gun, held the gun on him and said, "Sexual relations or we blow your head off". Those are matters of fact and of record. Is that rape? I think it is a question that should be raised here and one on which we should have some information, namely as to whether it is rape on one side and is not rape on the other. If we had—and I hope we never shall—any such crime in Canada, how would it be handled? I do not see how it could be handled under the sexual offence sections from section 135 on, because all the reference is to a male and not a female. Would the minister comment on that matter?

Mr. Garson: I can quite appreciate the fact that my hon. friend is not facetious in the matter at all. However, I must say that I have reached the years of discretion in Canada without ever having heard of such a case as this until this very minute.

An hon. Member: Oh, that kind of case is restricted to British Columbia.

Mr. Garson: I did not think this type of case had occurred in Canada. I understood the ones referred to were in the United States.

Mr. Winch: I said I did not know of any such cases in Canada, but there have been numerous newspaper reports of such cases in the United States.

Mr. Garson: If we had a case of that kind in Canada I think we might well consider amending our code. But in the meanwhile, of course, the ladies, if they had been in Canada, or doubtless even in the United States, could only have been convicted of rape if their pointing of a gun was sufficient to convince the man in the case that the benefit of sexual intercourse was the lesser of two evils; and it would not be until the intercourse itself had taken place that the offence of rape would have been committed. If it were committed and the male victim, who under the circumstances could be forgiven for not being too gallant in the matter, went and informed the police, I should think there are other sections under our code which could be invoked. For instance, the use of firearms to intimidate in that way would be an aggravated assault; and I would think that if not rape, some other offence could be charged and could be proven and that probably after the charge had been proven the court would have considerable latitude with regard to punishment for that offence. Thus if the court took quite a dark view of what had happened—and I must say that I would not blame it if it did—it could impose a fairly stiff penalty upon the accused ladies.

Mr. Knowles: Ladies?

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that, biologically, it is possible for the male to be seduced but not for him to be raped. However, to deal with the question raised by the hon. member for Oxford, I should like to quote from a book that I happened to be reading just now and which bears on this particular point. I might say to the minister that its main thesis is the deplorable tendency of centralized government to attract potential delinquents to positions of power. This is the paragraph that I think has a bearing on this suggestion:

> Since the advent of penal psychiatry, punishment as a means of dealing with delinquents has come to exist at two levels. On one hand we have the attempt to rationalize existing legal and administrative penal methods: on the other, the prisons and the courts as they are. The attempts to apply science to the prevention and cure of delinquency, so long as they are institutional and official attempts, have to be ingrafted on a system which assumes that social misconduct is the outcome of deliberate and malicious choice, and that such choice is best deterred or altered by confinement in the company of other delinquents, under conditions of squalor and idleness, and under a discipline designed to undermine self-respect and sociality.

I suggest that this broad criticism of our method of handling criminals is particularly applicable to these cases now under discussion and that we might well consider the suggestion of the hon. member for Oxford and refer the matter to the royal commission which is to deal with insanity and psychological imbalance.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 136—Punishment for rape.

Mr. Shaw: Is it proper for us to proceed with these sections that involve whipping? Was that not to be the subject of special consideration?

Mr. Garson: Yes, it is proper. With respect to all those matters that are to be considered by the joint committee of the house and the other place on the one hand, including corporal punishment, and, on the other hand, with respect to insanity as a defence to a charge involving criminal responsibility which is to be considered by the royal commission, the understanding was that we would pass the sections in the present code in order that we might have laws in effect regarding these offences. When the reports of these other bodies become available the government will take the responsibility of introducing legislation to reflect those reports or, if it does not think fit to do so, it will be open to members of the opposition to do so.

Mr. Knowles: I believe this point has been answered before but I am not too sure. Is it clear that these punishments are maximum punishments and that it is not necessary for the court to impose the full punishment in all cases?

Mr. Garson: That is quite right. That is quite an important point. They are all maximum punishments and there is no minimum so that the court has very wide discretion in all these cases.

Mr. Knowles: And where two punishments are named, for example, imprisonment for life and whipping, it is within the competence of the court to impose one without the other? The word "and" does not require that the punishment shall include both?

Mr. Garson: They are liable to either or both.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Should the word "and" not be "or"? I can see that the word "liable" leaves it to the discretion of the court, but from the way the clause is worded it does seem to me that once a life sentence is imposed it automatically carries whipping with it. The conjunction "and" certainly indicates that the court has no option.

Mr. Garson: No, I think this is the proper interpretation. They are liable to life imprisonment and they are liable to be whipped, but that liability is governed by the discretion of the court and the court can impose either life imprisonment or whipping or both.

Mr. Knowles: To come back to the other point raised a moment ago, it is understood that the committee in agreeing to these sections involving whipping is not really enacting these provisions in the normal sense. We are just carrying forward what is now the case subject to the report of the committee. Perhaps I might qualify that to some extent. Imprisonment and whipping actually represent a reduction in the punishment from what previously was in the code.

Mr. Garson: Yes. I spelled it all out very carefully when I moved second reading of the bill, and it is all on the record. I said that we would pass these sections, and then I outlined the responsibility that the government was taking in relation to the reports of the joint committee and the royal commission. My hon. friend will see the whole thing set out there in extenso.

Mr. Ellis: Would it not be more convenient to allow these sections to stand?

Mr. Garson: No. I explained that before but probably I had better do so again. When we are bringing in a consolidated code we have to repeal the existing code in order to put the new one into effect. We cannot have them both in effect and—

Mr. Knowles: You do not like leaving a vacuum.

Mr. Garson: No—if we do not continue these sections involving corporal punishment, capital punishment, lotteries and insanity in the new code after we shall have repealed the old, we shall have a lacuna. There will be a gap there. The understanding on this point was all spelled out very carefully on second reading of the bill. It was understood that we would pass Bill No. 7, including the sections dealing with these subject matters, upon the understanding that the government would bring in amending legislation based upon the reports of the royal commission and the joint committee in accordance with their recommendations and if those recommendations carry the judgment of the government. It was also understood that if we did not we would expedite consideration by the House of Commons of any legislation which members of the opposition might wish to introduce to carry these recommendations into effect.

Mr. Fulton: Or private members on the government side.

Mr. Hansell: May I ask the minister whether any particular consideration has been given under this section to the age of the person against whom the offence is committed. This section simply lumps together all those who commit the offence and says that anyone who commits rape is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to be whipped. What I have in mind is that there have been cases of the offence having been committed against children three or four years old.

An hon. Member: Clause 138.

Mr. Hansell: My point is that if the offence is committed against a child up to five or six years of age, an age where the child cannot be said to be in any way accountable, the offence to my mind is serious enough to involve hanging. Has the minister any comment to make? Would he care to increase the penalty for that particular crime?

Mr. Garson: Under the present code, rape as an offence carries the penalty of death. I believe I am right in saying that in the whole history of this country there has been only one case in which a sentence of death was imposed, and in that case the sentence was commuted.

Mr. Knowles: When was that?

Mr. Garson: Oh, it is many years ago.

Mr. Knowles: In the last century?

Mr. Garson: I think it was before the turn of the century. The sentence of death for rape has never been imposed and carried out at any time in the past no matter how grievous the circumstances were. For that reason we thought it would be better, when that sentence was not being imposed and carried out, to reflect the actual facts in the code by simply making the penalty imprisonment for life.

I offer this only as the opinion of one quite unqualified to speak, but I would think that where the offence of rape had been committed on a child of five years of age, that very fact in itself would be evidence of serious abnormality or aberration in the accused.

Mr. MacInnis: I am in agreement with the hon. member for Macleod that crimes such as he has mentioned, committed against a young person, are heinous crimes; but I believe that the purpose of all our laws is to try to prevent crime and provide a just punishment for certain crimes. My reading on matters of this kind leads me to understand that if you impose the death penalty, it is really an incitement to murder as well as rape. A person would say, "I have gone this far, and if the child lives she can inform on me." The thing to do, then, is to see that she does not live. While I agree wholeheartedly with the hon. member for Macleod as to the heinous nature of the offence, I think we should be careful we do not do something which would incite a still worse offence.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 137 agreed to.

On clause 138—Sexual intercourse with female under fourteen.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to raise a point which is involved also in the consideration of clauses 143 and 145. When one reads the new clause 138, and compares it with the old section 301; when one reads the new clause 143 and compares it with the old section 211, and when one reads the new clause 145 and compares it with the old section 213, it will be seen that in all three clauses there is what I think is called the equality of blame provision. I am reading from section 301, which is now clause 138:

> On the trial of any offence against subsection 2 of this section, the trial judge may instruct the jury that if in their view the evidence does not show that the accused is wholly or chiefly to blame for the commission of said offence, they may find a verdict of acquittal.

In other words, when the female party to the act which is the subject matter of the charge may be equally to blame with the male party to the act, then that provision covers it. I notice the provision is carried forward in clauses 138, 145 and 143. If the minister feels strongly about the matter I am prepared to wait until we get to clause 143, but in order to avoid further questions I wonder if he would say why it was kept here and dropped in the subsequent clauses. Was there some feeling that the girl was less likely to be equally blameworthy in the latter case than she is in this one?

Mr. Garson: I think if the hon. member will raise the point as we get to it, it will be better. He has no objection to clause 138 in its present form, has he?

Mr. Fulton: I shall wait until we come to that particular point, until we get to clause 143.

Mr. Garson: Is the hon. member in agreement about clause 138?

Mr. Fulton: No, I have a question about it. In subclause 2 of clause 138 the age limit is 14 years or more, but under the age of 16, whereas in clause 143 the age limit is 16 but less than 18. The question might be put in this way. Why is it considered that the girl between 14 and 16 mentioned in clause 138 (2) is no more likely to be the prime mover in the performance of the act complained of than the girl between 16 and 18 mentioned in clause 143? In other words, why is not the age limit uniform?

Mr. Garson: Well, the explanation as given by the commission when the report came along to us from it was that a subclause 3 to clause 143, corresponding to subclause 3 of clause 138—

Mr. Fulton: I am speaking of subclause 2 of clause 138.

Mr. Garson: Subclause 3, that is the portion my hon. friend is speaking about, was dropped as being inconsistent with the offence of seduction since the essence of seduction is persuasion.

Mr. Fulton: I am sorry, but the minister has gone back to my first point, which I had agreed would stand until we came to clause 143. I am now on the point involved in clause 138, subclause 2. It will be seen that clause 138 (2) (c) makes the age in question between 14 and 16 years.

Mr. Garson: That is right.

Mr. Fulton: I am pointing out that in clause 143 the age is 16 to 18 years. Why is there a lower age for this offence than for the other one, because it seems to me that the girl is just as likely to be the prime mover in one as in the other. I do not see why the age limit should not be the same.

Mr. Garson: I am afraid I do not understand the point the hon. member is attempting to make. Clause 138 (2) mentions the age of the girl as 14 years, from 14 to 16, whereas clause 143 deals with female persons who are from 16 to 18. There are two different age groups.

Mr. Fulton: The female person is the same in both.

Mr. Garson: No. If the hon. member will look at clause 138 (2) he will see that in paragraph (c) it mentions a female person who is 14 years of age and more but under 16; that is she is in the age bracket 14 to 16. If you look at clause 143, you will see the female there involved is from 16 to 18, which is a different age bracket.

Mr. Fulton: I see that, but why is it not the same age bracket in both cases?

Mr. Garson: Well, because it is regarded, rightly or wrongly, by the authorities as being a worse offence to seduce a girl between 14 and 16 than a girl between 16 and 18. In the one case it is punishable by five years, and in the other case it is punishable by two years.

Mr. Nowlan: You do not get seduction until you get in the higher age brackets.

Mr. Garson: I think it is self-evident. It is a very different thing to seduce a youngster of say 14 years than it is to seduce a young lady of 18. There presumably is more sales resistance in the latter case.

Mr. Fulton: My point is that under clause 143 the age resistance limit is 16.

Mr. Garson: No, it is 16 years or more, but less than 18. It is 14 to 16 in one case, and 16 to 18 in the other.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 139 agreed to.

On clause 140—Sexual intercourse with feeble-minded, etc.

Mr. Hansell: I do not want to appear to be advocating increases in penalties, but the offence under this section to my mind is a very serious one. This section deals with offences against feeble-minded persons, and I am concerned not only with the person herself but with what might conceivably be the result of an offence of this kind, namely the bringing into existence of an imbecile child. I am just wondering whether the penalty is high enough. Has the minister given much consideration to that?

Mr. Garson: Well, I think my hon. friend has a point there. Of course these are cases that fall short of rape, but even they are serious offences. The present penalty is four years. We have increased the penalty. In doing so we had to decide whether we should increase it to the five-year bracket or move it up to ten. Rightly or wrongly—maybe we made a mistake—we thought five was enough.

if there is a strong opinion in the house that we should make it ten I would not oppose it, I must say.

Mr. Hansell: Make it ten; it would not be too long.

Mr. Garson: As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said, these are all maximum penalties. Only once in a long while is the maximum penalty imposed, as a matter of fact. If you provided the ten-year penalty it would not necessarily follow that it would be imposed unless circumstances warranted it. If there is a general feeling that it should be ten years, I would not raise any objection at all.

Mr. Shaw: I have very much the same feeling as that expressed by the hon. member for Macleod. This is a most serious thing. Even though it falls short of rape, there is not much difference between the two, and the difference in those maximum penalties which are imposed under sections 136, 137 and 138 is too great. I for one would certainly urge the minister and the committee to give favourable consideration to the imposition of a ten-year maximum under this clause.

Mr. Garson: If either of the hon. members for Macleod or Red Deer would like to move that the penalty be increased I would certainly raise no objection; as a matter of fact I will support it. I think it is a point well taken.

Mr. Shaw: I shall gladly move that clause 140 be amended by deletion of the word "five" in line 26 and the substitution of the word "ten" therefor.

Mr. Enfield: Before this amendment passes I should like to say a word. First, under the old act the maximum penalty was four years. Do we know how often judges have imposed the maximum penalty under the old code? It might be helpful to know that. Second, does the making of the penalty longer or heavier create in the mind of a judge the implication that the crime is more serious? In other words, suppose we do make it ten; will we get any heavier sentences than those we have been getting in the past? It would be some help to know that.

Mr. Garson: I am afraid I could not give my hon. friend any reliable information. These cases are not reported in the law reports, unless some point of law is raised in connection with them. The prosecutions are all conducted by the provincial authorities. They would have the information within their possession and I could not pretend to give any accurate information.

[Mr. Garson.]

With deference, I do not think this is a case where we would need to be too much concerned with the point the hon. member has raised. I think that is a matter of opinion. My opinion is that the maximum penalty which is imposed by parliament is some indication to the judge as to how seriously parliament views the matter, and does influence him to some extent. But judges, being human beings, are affected in different ways by these provisions, and I cannot see that the increase of the penalty to ten years would do any great amount of harm in its effect upon the judge's discretion as to the seriousness of the crime. But it would give the judge a greater discretion in those cases where the crime committed was particularly heinous.

Mr. Nesbitt: I may be of a little assistance in this matter. Several years ago I had occasion to be prosecuting an offence of this nature and had to look up and try to find out what the usual penalties were. As I recall it, the average penalty handed out for this type of offence was between eighteen months and two years.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. MacInnis: I believe that those who were charged with revising and consolidating the Criminal Code did give some considerable thought to the matter of penalties. Perhaps the Minister of Justice would not agree with me on this, but I believe the consensus is that they did revise many of the penalties upward. Where there was a change I believe more were revised upward than downward. After they have given their considered, and perhaps expert, opinion to this matter, I do not think we would be wise in changing it.

I do not believe that we can lessen crimes of this kind by increasing the sentences. The person who would be guilty of a crime of this kind would not be one who would be very likely to consider the law and decide just how far he could go without incurring a penalty. I would imagine that in cases of this kind the imbecility or the lack of normal mental equipment would not differ very much as between the two parties concerned, and that we would be merely punishing a person because nature had not given him the ability to understand right from wrong. I am very much opposed to increasing this penalty.

Mr. Shaw: May I point out two points that arise from the statement of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. In the first place, I recall that as members of the committee of this house reconsidering this bill last spring, despite the fact that the bill had been in the hands of a royal commission and the other place we did make alterations in penalties. If that committee reflected any wisdom whatsoever in doing that, certainly the same wisdom would be reflected by this committee in doing the same thing.

Second, while I agree with my hon. friend that a person guilty of an offence of this kind would not likely give heed to the law prior to committing the offence, and it is also true that such a person may be suffering from a mental condition, yet this would be the best possible guarantee we could have of taking that person out of circulation for an extended period of time. I think we would thus be protecting the public from a recurrence of this kind of thing. I intend to bring this up later, but I want to say now that I am not too happy or satisfied with the facilities we have today for taking care of persons who have pronounced mental conditions and who indulge in crimes such as are referred to in these sections.

Mr. Winch: I think there should be some clarification as to what the minister intends by way of procedure. If the minister is going to take under consideration perhaps recommending that either the special committee or the royal commission make a study of this entire matter, then I do not think we should go ahead with any amendment because it may be changed after the report is received.

Mr. Garson: This is an important point which has been raised by the hon. member for Vancouver East. I do not think a matter of this kind would go to the royal commission. It is not the insanity of the accused that is involved, it is the insanity of the woman with whom he has had this sexual intercourse. He may be quite a prudent offender who feels that it is much easier to gain the consent of an imbecile than it is to take a chance by committing rape. He may do this as a matter of worldly wisdom, if that term in its worse sense may be applied. But any disposition we make of this clause will not be in any way affected by the deliberations of the royal commission, since it will be concerned with the insanity of the female victim whereas the commission will be considering the insanity of the accused.

Mr. Nowlan: I want to say that I agree entirely with what the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway has said. There are certain punishments outlined here, and I referred to some of them the other evening. Later on I hope to express my own opinion that they have been increased too severely. Under those circumstances I do not think I can vote for an increase in the penalty here.

I realize that when you read the section it sounds like a heinous offence, but these things do happen in rural communities and throughout Canada as a whole. I know this is not a new section, but who is going to determine whether there is feeble-mindedness, insanity or imbecility? I dare say there are some people who think that some of us here are feeble-minded, but we would hate to have that question determined by a stipendiary magistrate. In the older rural sections of this country there are communities where perhaps you might go in and look at the people and think possibly they were not too bright, but they probably think they are intellectual giants. Certainly there would be some who might be convicted under this section.

I think this is a pretty dangerous thing to apply. As the hon. member for Oxford has said, the usual sentence is apparently eighteen months to two years. After all, there are certain types of people who may be a little off mentally but who otherwise are physically normal. As I say, while this sounds like a very heinous offence I still think that five years is heavy enough as a maximum.

Mr. Ellis: How would you define feeble-minded, insane, idiot or imbecile? From a psychological standpoint we can measure the I.Q. of an individual and describe him as feeble-minded, insane, an idiot or an imbecile. Such designations are based on I.Q. tests. What is the legal standard? What is the measuring stick that is to be used to determine whether a person is feeble-minded, is insane, is an idiot or is an imbecile? What protection would an accused have with respect to being charged with this crime?

Mr. Garson: The hon. member for Oxford has had experience as a prosecutor and he might be able to answer that question better than I. I think he will agree with me that the accused does not need to worry too much about the points raised by the hon. member for Regina City, because in order to succeed on this charge the crown not only must prove that the accused has had sexual intercourse but that also the female was not his wife and was either feeble-minded, insane, an idiot or an imbecile. The court must be completely satisfied on this last point.

Not only must the court be satisfied, but if a conviction is registered against the accused and his counsel takes the case to the court of appeal the crown must satisfy the court of appeal that there was evidence before the court on which the court could find that the lady in question was feeble-minded, insane, an idiot or an imbecile. The whole burden is upon the crown. Even where the lady in question was in fact an imbecile the crown may have a difficult time proving it.

Mr. Nesbitt: I can recall only one case where we were able to prove that the crown's chief witness was an imbecile. That was a case where the girl was 22 years old but was still playing with three-year-old girls.

Mr. Hansell: Those who have spoken in opposition to the amendment appear to believe that an increased penalty would necessarily be imposed, but that is not so. This would be just a maximum penalty, and its imposition would be the responsibility of the presiding judge. I do not think their argument holds good in that respect, but this would impress upon the judge that parliament considers the crime to be a serious one.

I am not allowed to discuss clause 142, but I would point out that the penalty in the case of incest between a brother and sister is a maximum of 14 years. In the case of a male being responsible for the crime he is also subject to whipping. The crime covered by clause 142 is very serious because it is realized that the offspring of blood relatives may be imbecilic.

The same thing could be said in connection with clause 140 which we are now discussing. It might be argued that a man who would take advantage of an imbecilic woman was himself not altogether sane, but that just does not follow. I knew of one case in my previous work where the man was perfectly sane, he knew exactly what he was doing, but it was advantageous for him to proceed because the woman was mentally deficient. I do not feel we are doing the accused any harm, and we would be strengthening the hands of the judge and strengthening the law by providing for a maximum penalty of ten years, even though it is not imposed.

Clause stands.

Progress reported.

PRIVATE BILLS

SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that these divorce bills be taken in one motion?

Mr. Knowles: How many are there, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Nos. 199 to 249 inclusive. Fifty bills.

Mr. Knowles: Fifty-one, I believe.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed these bills be taken in one motion?

[Mr. Garson.]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. John Hunter (Parkdale) moved that the following bills be read the second time:

Bill No. 199, for the relief of Lois Helen Kutzman Caplan.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 200, for the relief of Fernand Constant Daemen.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 247, for the relief of Nancy Elizabeth Borden Sise.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 248, for the relief of Audrey Madeline Crothers Walklate.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 249, for the relief of Joyce Gowrie Kimber Kendler.—Mr. Hunter.

Motion agreed to on division and bills read the second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Public and private bills having been disposed of, the house will resume the business interrupted at five o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE

REVISION AND AMENDMENT OF EXISTING STATUTE

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 7, respecting the criminal law—Mr. Garson—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 140—Sexual intercourse with feeble-minded, etc.

The Chairman: The committee was considering clause 140. Shall the clause as amended carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Chairman: Those in favour of the amendment will please rise.

Mr. Fulton: Why is the minister rising?

Mr. Garson: I said I would accept the amendment, and I am keeping my promise.

Mr. Shaw: Mr. Chairman, I would ask that the question be put again. There seems to be a great deal of confusion.

The Chairman: On clause 140 the hon. member for Red Deer moved that the word "five" in this clause be deleted and the word "ten" be substituted therefor.

Amendment negatived: Yeas, 25; nays, 31.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall the clause carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 138—Sexual intercourse with female under fourteen.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, may I with your permission and that of the committee ask leave to revert to section 138. On an earlier occasion the minister said if there was any point not covered he would have no objection to our reverting to any particular clause. What I omitted to cover is the change in the wording of subsection 3 which also applies to clause 145. The code as it at present stands, and I am reading now from subsection 3 of section 301, which is the section corresponding to this one, reads as follows:

> 3. On the trial of any offence against subsection two of this section, the trial judge may instruct the jury that if in their view the evidence does not show that the accused is wholly or chiefly to blame for the commission of said offence, they may find a verdict of acquittal.

That provision is to some extent relatively the same in the new subsection, except that it reads:

> (2) Where an accused is charged with an offence under paragraph (b) of subsection (1), the court may find the accused not guilty if it is of opinion that the evidence does not show that, as between the accused and the female person, the accused is wholly or chiefly to blame.

Under the present provisions of the code the trial judge instructs the jury that they may acquit if they are of the opinion that there is an equality of blame, whereas under the proposed new section the court may find the accused not guilty if he is of that opinion. Why is discretion taken away from the jury and made a matter exclusively to be determined by the judge?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I think the short answer to my hon. friend's question is that if the case is tried before a jury, in effect the court is the jury. My hon. friend is familiar with the principle that where the case is being tried before a jury, the jury are the judges of all questions of fact. This is a question of fact.

Mr. Fulton: But even so, why is the change in the wording necessary? In the present code it states explicitly that the trial judge may instruct the jury. That is the only way in which it can arise, and that leaves it clearly to the jury.

Mr. Garson: I am sure my hon. friend would agree that in cases of this kind the trial judge would certainly instruct as to the provisions of section 138 (3). He would instruct the jury in all points of law.

Mr. Fulton: The minister states that the court is the jury in this case. I would be a little bit worried about that. I would have thought that "court" would clearly refer to the judge and that the jury were not specifically concerned.

Mr. Garson: If the case is being tried by a jury then it is the jury that brings in the verdict, not the judge.

Mr. Montgomery: I feel doubtful about that. Is it not the case that the court passes sentence after the jury reaches a verdict? It seems to me that raises a bit of a question as to who is the court.

Mr. Fulton: Would it not be clearer if the word "jury" were inserted instead of "court"?

Mr. Garson: No, I do not think so. Depending upon the options which the accused may have taken during the course of the case against him, he may appear before a judge without a jury. Then the term in the section applies to the judge without a jury. Alternatively he may elect a trial by jury. In this case the term applies to the court in a jury trial. In such a case, upon all matters of fact the jury are supreme, but the judge would certainly instruct them, I would think, as to the bearing of this clause 138(3).

Mr. Fulton: I wonder whether I can make one more effort to suggest a change to the minister. Why not make it "the jury or in the case of trial without a jury, the judge, may find the accused not guilty"? I think that would make it perfectly clear.

Mr. Garson: I really do not think it is necessary. This has run a pretty long gauntlet—

Mr. Fulton: I beg the minister's pardon?

Mr. Garson: This legislation has been considered at great length by a number of very capable and experienced criminal lawyers including the members of the royal commission and the members of the committee of the other place, to say nothing of the members of the House of Commons committee. This is the first time this point has been raised. I think it is fairly well taken care of.

Mr. Fulton: I am sure one can find a number of points which are first-time ones, even after the very careful consideration I know the matter has been given. After very careful consideration in two other places, the house committee found a number of points. I am not setting myself up against any of those who have already considered this matter, but I am quite sure there are a number of points which could be raised for the first time and to which it is no answer to say that the matter has been considered by previous committees, and so on. If the minister can say the point was considered and was rejected as not having any validity, then I think possibly I would be disposed to say, "All right, I accept the previous opinion". But the mere answer that the point was never raised before does not seem to me to be a valid answer to what I think is an objection of some substance.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As you know, Mr. Chairman, this provision is applied within the terms of the statute which is in effect today. The judge, after charging the jury generally with regard to the component elements of the offence, concludes by directing them that even if they come to the conclusion that the physical act itself has been committed, the jury may then, even in that event, find the accused not guilty if the evidence does not show that the accused was wholly or chiefly to blame. I find it difficult to understand the reasons that impelled the commissioners to change that section, because no definition has been given for "court". If you look up the section dealing with definitions, you will find that there is no definition for "court".

Mr. Fulton: The jury is not the court. It is not part of the court at all.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It might be argued that the court consists of the judge and the jury but I think that would be going rather far because, in the ordinary usage of the language, the court refers to the presiding judge and the jury is always referred to as the jury. I would also point out this fact. This clause would seem to indicate that the judge would have to make the finding. It reads:

> Where an accused is charged with an offence . . . the court may find the accused not guilty if it is of opinion that . . .

If you argue that the court means both the judge and the jury, then before the person could be acquitted the judge would have to say, "In my opinion the accused was not wholly or chiefly to blame" but you would also have to have the jury join with him in that finding if after having listened to all the evidence they were doubtful as to whether or not the accused was wholly or mainly to blame. I am afraid that the change in the wording of this clause is going to bring about a number of appeals. Certainly it was clear before. The section has withstood the test of years of experience and there is no doubt whatever as to its meaning:

> On the trial of any offence against paragraph (b) of this section, the trial judge may instruct the jury that if in their view the evidence does not show that the accused is wholly or chiefly to blame for the commission of said offence, they may find a verdict of acquittal.

While the section was permissive, actually in the course of years the matter became one of mandatory direction on the part of the judge. The question had to be left to the jury. Now we change all that. Although we say that the section, as far as its import is concerned, is not to be changed, we substitute a section that is subject to ambiguity.

I suggest that the minister might allow this section to stand because certainly, if you read the subsection literally, you must come to the conclusion that both elements of the court must come to the conclusion that the evidence does not show that the accused is wholly or chiefly to blame. It is difficult enough, on occasion, to get judges to properly charge the jury under the section as it now exists. If, in addition to the difficulties of today, you impose the necessity for the judge to be in agreement, you will raise difficulties that will cause many appeals.

As a matter of fact, it would almost seem that those who drafted this section had in mind the type of conclusion to which the judge must come before he makes his charge in connection with civil actions for malicious prosecution, for instance. Here the judge must come to certain conclusions, and having come to those conclusions he leaves questions for the jury to answer, after first having himself decided the absence of malice, the absence of reasonable and probable cause, or whatever the other considerations are that he must first decide have affirmatively been established.

On the face of the section as it now stands I think a serious ambiguity has been created. In my opinion it is a type of hurdle which we need not build by new draftsmanship when the old section has stood up throughout the years.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to prolong the discussion upon this section. Out of the abundance of caution I have no objection to holding it for the purpose of checking on this point. But with respect, I must say that I cannot agree with my hon. friend, for this reason. If the court is one of a judge without a jury, I think they will agree with me that no difficulty arises. If the court is made up of a judge with a jury, then I do not know how any person could interpret this section as saying that any person other than the jury could find the accused guilty because, in a court with a jury, it is only the jury that can find an accused guilty.

Mr. Fulton: Wait a minute. Surely under certain circumstances a judge might withdraw a case from a jury and make a finding.

Mr. Garson: Oh, yes.

Mr. Fulton: So the judge does have the right to enter a verdict one way or the other in certain circumstances.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He has the right only to direct a verdict. He has no right to withdraw a case from the jury once it is in their custody.

Mr. Fulton: That may be so.

Mr. Garson: I would submit that what we have here is a carefully and intelligently drawn clause which applies both to courts composed of a judge and a jury and courts consisting of only a judge. The clause clearly covers both these cases. I think it is quite clear, but we want to get the very best code we can, and we are quite willing to consider any worth-while suggestion. The suggestion is that we should reopen the section now; but would my hon. friend accept our undertaking that we will give this suggestion the most careful consideration, and if it appears to have merit we will open the section and incorporate what he has suggested.

Mr. Fulton: I will take the minister's assurance on that point, but I should like to make this further observation. Although "court" is not defined in the bill, I do not see how a jury can be held to be part of a court. It seems to me it is the court and the jury, with the court being the judge and perhaps certain executive or administrative officers, but a jury is not a part of a court.

Mr. Garson: May I ask my hon. friend this question? How can a court in a jury trial find an accused guilty except by the verdict of the jury?

Mr. Fulton: The answer is obvious. If there is a jury the court has no right to make any such finding expect by the verdict of the jury.

Mr. Garson: Then may I ask a second question?

Mr. Fulton: If the minister will excuse me—

Mr. Garson: Where under the terms of this clause "a court may find the accused not guilty" how can a court find an accused not guilty without a jury's verdict to that effect?

Mr. Fulton: My point is that the court cannot find the accused not guilty. It is the jury that finds him not guilty. That is why, as the hon. member for Prince Albert said, this section is going to cause great difficulty in its application and interpretation.

Mr. Garson: I am quite willing to consider the suggestion. I think the clause is quite good the way it is, but if my hon. friend will accept my undertaking I will have our experts give the matter very careful consideration.

The Deputy Chairman: Does clause 138 stand?

Mr. Garson: No; it is carried subject to my undertaking.

Clause agreed to.

Mr. Garson: I believe that clauses 139, 140, 141 and 142 were passed, and we are at 143.

The Deputy Chairman: The record shows that clause 139 was passed.

Clause 140 agreed to.

On clause 141—Indecent assault on female.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is another of those sections where the question arises as to whether the elimination of the requirement that the jury should be instructed that it is not safe to find the accused guilty in the absence of corroboration does not in fact remove the need for corroboration. Indecent assault is one of the easiest charges to lay and one of the most difficult to defend. If my recollection is correct, Lord Coke pointed out a long time ago that this type of charge is often laid through motives of malice, revenge, jealousy and so on. Therefore the process of British judicial wisdom through the ages has been to warn the jury that it should not convict on the uncorroborated evidence of the prosecutrix.

The common law has been eliminated under the Criminal Code as it is now constituted. The fact that under section 134 it is provided that this rule of evidence shall specifically apply to sections 136, 137 and 138 would appear to lead one to the conclusion that it is no longer to apply in the case of indecent assault. I am going to press this, because I believe that if it is not made necessary from now on anyone accused of this offence will be in dire jeopardy. No one wants to open the door to the extension of such offences, but on the other hand we in parliament must be very careful that we do not make the laying of such charges an easy way in which to punish one against whom the prosecutrix has feelings of revenge or has other motives for laying ill-founded charges.

I would ask the minister to give the most serious consideration to the question I now raise, for I believe that unless we state that the rule applies in such cases we will in fact be removing from the trial judge a formula and warning which through the years trial judges have found necessary to say in order to protect the innocent from the probable blackmailing activities of those who through the ages have invariably chosen this means to secure their revenge for wrongs done to them, imagined or actual.

Mr. Garson: The point raised by my hon. friend is an important one, and out of the abundance of caution I think we should hold this section in order that what he has said may be checked. I am inclined to think that the law as it is stated here is not changed in any respect from the present law, but as I understand it he is arguing—and I think his argument carries a good deal of force—that when we provide in clause 134 for a certain course of procedure relating to certain sections we impliedly exclude other sections from that course of procedure.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, that is a summary of it.

Clause stands.

On clause 142—Incest.

Mr. Nowlan: I take it that this clause will stand on the same basis, because I raised the same argument earlier this afternoon with respect to it.

Mr. Garson: Right.

Clause stands.

On clause 143—Seduction of female between sixteen and eighteen.

Mr. Fulton: Why was the equality of blame provision dropped from this clause, when it is retained in clauses 138 and 145? It was previously in the code with respect to the offence of seduction, that is to say, the clause we were just discussing, subsection 3 of 138. Why was it dropped from this clause?

Mr. Garson: Well, I have already indicated that what would correspond to subsection 3 of section 138 was dropped as being inconsistent with the offence of seduction, since the essence of seduction is persuasion. In clause 143 the age is 18 years. I think in modern philosophy girls of that age are supposed to be able to take care of themselves.

Mr. Fulton: This applies to girls between 16 and 18. Previously, as the minister knows, even although the girl may have to some extent consented, there may still be seduction. It was for that reason the equality of blame provision was inserted. If the jury felt that the conduct of this girl was such that she was equally blameworthy, then they might render a verdict of not guilty. It was felt proper to put that in the original code for the same offence of seduction that is now covered by clause 143. It was there up until now. I can see no change that has taken place in the offence of seduction between the time that clause was put in and now that would clearly justify its removal.

Mr. Garson: Is this not the way in which a case of this sort would work out in real life? In clause 138 the female in the case is of a tender age; in clause 145 the female may be a stepdaughter, foster daughter, female ward or woman in his employment. All these people could be influenced by the relationship of the accused to them. You make the accused liable; then you give him this protection, that the jury could find him not guilty, even if the girl's consent was obtained and intercourse took place, if it appeared from the evidence that he was not wholly or chiefly to blame.

But where you are dealing with the case of a female of 18 years and it appears from the evidence that the accused is not wholly or chiefly to blame, it is hard to see how a court these days would find beyond all reasonable doubt that there had been that persuasion on the part of the accused which constitutes seduction. In such a case there would be just a general verdict of not guilty. The saving clause is inserted in those cases in which the court would normally bear down rather heavily on the accused because of either the tender years of the female or the fact she is an employee or some person under his control.

Mr. Fulton: I agree with the minister that there is some slight difference between the two cases. Still, without going into a long argument on seduction—and I have Tremeear in front of me—I think it can fairly be said that there is a fine borderline between what is seduction and what is not. It was probably a realization of that which induced the draftsman of the original code to put in the protection of this saving clause. There might be a case in which, although the accused had gone through all the motions which would, in the case of a completely innocent girl, amount to seduction, and although technically the girl had been seduced, the jury might come to the inescapable conclusion that her own conduct, while not being such as to involve full consent, had nevertheless led on the accused to the point where he seduced her. It was for that reason the saving clause was inserted.

I cannot get over the fact that this provision has been in the code ever since 1892 in connection with the same offence of seduction as here defined in clause 143, yet the equality of blame provision is now dropped. I do not see any compelling reason for doing so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As a matter of fact, this creates a strange result. If the female is between 16 and 18 the court may find the accused not guilty if she were wholly or chiefly to blame, whereas if she is between 14 and 16, no matter whether she was wholly or mainly to blame, if she is seduced there is an offence created.

Mr. Garson: Would not the hon. member agree that where the circumstances indicate the accused was not chiefly or wholly to blame, and the lady in question was 18 years of age, no court is ever going to find there was seduction. Is this saving clause not inserted in the other clauses because the court has a strong predisposition in the case of a girl of tender years to take a dark view of the fact that intercourse was had at all? This is an indication to the courts that in a case of that sort, if it can be established that the girl was chiefly to blame, then they should let the accused off.

Although I must say I have not had anything like the experience in the practice of criminal law that the hon. member for Prince Albert has had, it does seem to me extremely unlikely, if the accused were in a position to bring himself within a saving clause like this, that the court would find him guilty of seduction in the first place in relation to a girl of 18.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why was this provision deleted? It has been in effect, as the hon. member for Kamloops says, for 60 years. When it was brought into effect originally it represented the viewpoint of the courts at the time, and the common law, and had been followed from about the year 1866. During the last 25 years it has been the instrument on a number of occasions whereby the jury has been in a position to bring in a verdict of not guilty. After all, on the basis of equality there cannot be any loaded dice as against an accused on a charge such as this.

We go back to Lord Coke's definition that these are the easiest charges to lay and the most difficult to answer. Anyone charged with them, whether he is acquitted or not, leaves the court with a stigma that does not leave him with the years. This clause was based on the experience of many years, and remains in the British common law and the criminal law as well. The provision should not be deleted from our code without the utmost frankness, on the part of those who would remove it, as to the reasons for its removal. The removal of the provision will make possible the conviction of those who should be found not guilty.

Certainly, we should not widen the scope so those who are morally innocent, though physically guilty, will thereby be convicted. If we wanted to widen the scope, then there was no justification for the addition to clause 138. If there was any justification for subsection 3 of section 138, there is every justification for the same type of subsection in section 143.

It occurred to me, Mr. Chairman, that these commissioners might have kept records when they made the examination of the sections in question, giving their reasons for the changes. I have seen nothing to indicate the reasons for these changes. I feel that the committee of this house should be fully advised; for certainly on the basis of practice in the courts changes such as these, while they may appear to be advantageous at the moment, usually have one result, namely numberless appeals in order to once more re-establish what the law is. That law, having been established over a period of 60 years, and having been dealt with by various courts, ought not seriously to be changed unless there is good reason for it.

Mr. Fulton: May I say a further word in favour of the reinsertion of this paragraph? I refer the minister to the authority of Tremeear, fifth edition, at page 206, where it is said:

> Without consent there can be no seduction.

So you do lay a charge of seduction if there has been consent; otherwise it is rape. Therefore it is obvious that there must be the possibility of blame attaching to the female party to the act. I should think it very possible that consent might be freely given, and then a change of heart take place and a charge of seduction laid. It is not easy for judges and juries to decide in these cases, because this sort of offence is not committed in public and we do not have the opportunity of knowing exactly what went on except what the parties say.

That, it seems to me, is the reason this provision was put in, that if the accused could bring outside evidence of other actions or any other evidence which would indicate that the girl was not seduced, that in fact she herself was largely responsible for the position she subsequently found herself in, that evidence would exonerate the man. That was a sensible provision in the code before, and it would be sensible to continue it in the present revision.

Mr. Barnett: I rather hesitate to interject any remarks into this discussion but on listening to it I fail to see why the protection for the accused which my learned friends are apparently seeking is not provided in section 131. I personally would like to have their views as to whether section 131 does not in fact provide the protection they are seeking.

Mr. Fulton: The explanation is very simple.

Mr. Garson: The suggestion which has been made by the last speaker is a good one. Section 131 provides:

> No person shall be convicted of an offence under section 140, 143—

That is the one we are discussing here.

> . . . upon the evidence of only one witness unless the evidence of the witness is corroborated in a material particular by evidence that implicates the accused.

What I put to the hon. member for Kamloops and the hon. member for Prince Albert is this. Where you must have the lady in the case in court testifying, and you must have corroboration; and the court is of the opinion that the evidence does not show that as between the accused and the female person the accused is wholly or chiefly to blame, the court by applying ordinary common sense will not find the accused guilty at all in those cases where the female person is of the age of 18 years.

Mr. Fulton: That is between 16 and 18.

Mr. Garson: At between 16 and 18 they have reached that age of intelligence and sophistication that it is not necessary to retain this saving clause, subparagraph 3 in relation to them, but we should retain it in these other cases under clause 138 where the female person is of more tender age and where therefore the court does not know but that she may have been imposed upon. And we also should retain it in clause 145, where the female person is in a position in which the accused might influence her because she is a stepdaughter or a foster daughter, or a female ward, or an employee, and so on.

In the other case, where the female person is not in a position to be influenced by the accused and she is of the age 16 to 18 years, and her case cannot be proven unless her evidence is corroborated, and if it appears that on evidence she is chiefly to blame for having given her consent to the intercourse which took place, why then the court would hold and should hold that it had not been proven that the accused seduced her at all, and it would acquit him. I would think that the application to such a case of clause 143 is pretty nearly self-evident.

Mr. Fulton: On the basis of the minister's argument the gentlemen who drafted the code in 1892 were pretty stupid, because they put in a saving clause for exactly the same purpose. As far as the minister's argument is concerned, section 131 is completely inapplicable. While the evidence of one witness must be corroborated in some material particular, that material particular need not relate to the question of whether or not the informant was to blame. The material particular might relate to the fact that the accused actually committed a sexual act. That is corroboration in a material particular, but that type of corroboration does not go in any sense to the question of the blame or otherwise of the informant. And it is that question that we are concerned with here.

Every argument used in justification of keeping it in sections 138 and 145 applies, it seems to me, equally strongly with respect to section 143, because the very nature of seduction, as I have already pointed out on the authority of Tremeear, requires consent. If there is no consent, then it is rape; yet even though the girl consented there still may be seduction.

Mr. Garson: May I ask my hon. friend a question. We all know that the woman's consent has to be secured or the intercourse is rape, and that where consent has been secured to the intercourse by reason of the blandishments of the accused, then the case is seduction; but surely, where the female person involved is of the age of 16 to 18 years in this present day and she does give consent, and it appears that the female person is sufficiently to blame that the court would apply subclause 3 of clause 138 or subclause 3 of clause 145, if the case were being tried under those clauses, the court in these circumstances is not going to find the accused guilty of seduction at all.

Mr. Fulton: The minister is misapplying the clause. The clause does not say the court has to be satisfied that the informant is chiefly to blame. The clause only says that if they feel the accused is not wholly or partly to blame—

Mr. Garson: No, wholly or chiefly to blame.

Mr. Fulton: If they feel that the accused is not wholly or chiefly to blame; that does not mean they have to be satisfied that the informant was wholly or chiefly to blame. What the court is asked to consider or what the jury is asked to consider is whether the whole or part of the blame lies exclusively upon the accused.

Mr. Garson: Not part of the blame. The statute says whether the accused is wholly or chiefly to blame. As a matter of ordinary common sense, I suggest to my hon. friend that where in these present days the lady in the case is from 16 to 18 years of age, if it appears from the evidence that the accused was not wholly or chiefly to blame, the court will find that the case has not been proven beyond all reasonable doubt and will acquit the accused without having to apply such a subsection at all.

But those same considerations do not apply where the female is of more tender years, nor do they apply where the female is employed by the accused or is a stepdaughter or foster daughter and therefore in a position to be influenced by him. In those cases they require this saving clause.

With all due respect to my hon. friend I cannot imagine any court which was of the opinion on the evidence that the accused was not wholly or chiefly to blame not acquitting him, whether this clause was in or not.

Mr. Fulton: That is all very well. We are each entitled to our thoughts as to what the jury would be willing to do. But we are dealing here not with the probability or possibility of what a jury might do under any given circumstances; we are trying to see under what circumstances a man will not be found guilty of seduction.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend has not stated that correctly. It is not a case of what the court will find. The section reads, "the court may find the accused not guilty." I suggest to my hon. friend that in relation to a female person of the age 16 to 18 years they probably would find him not guilty if the accused was not chiefly or wholly to blame.

Mr. Fulton: That is what they may probably do, but the fact that there was a direction by the judge to the jury that if they considered the accused was not wholly or chiefly to blame they might find a verdict of not guilty would be a most powerful influence on the jury. It would indicate to the jury that the man who was not wholly or chiefly to blame was not necessarily guilty of seduction, and the jury would act accordingly.

If we in parliament feel that a man is guilty of seduction of a girl between the ages of 16 and 18 even though he may not be wholly to blame, then I think we should put that provision in. If of course we decide that in the case of a girl from 16 to 18 the element of tender years enters in and therefore he would not be guilty or not wholly to blame provided other elements were present, we leave it out. We have to make up our minds what we think should be present in order to constitute the offence of seduction, and whether partial absolution from blame should or should not be a consideration in the minds a jury in reaching their verdict. If we think it should, then I believe we should put in a saving clause. Personally I think we should put it in.

Mr. Barnett: I was listening to this discussion from the point of view of my learned friends although I am not in that category in any sense of the word. It does appear to me that under the ordinary usage of language the word "seduction" means that a person is wholly or chiefly to blame, and that is the offence which is set forth in this section. Unless the blame is proved, there is no offence. With the saving clause in 131 I feel that the accused is adequately protected in the situation that is described.

Mr. Montgomery: I think we should decide what we are trying to do. A minute ago an hon. member brought up this point. If you are a judge holding court, what must the prosecution prove in order to make out a case? Where the male accused is 18 years of age or over—that is point one—and seduces a female of previous chaste character between the ages of 16 and 18 years, the jury could bring in a verdict of guilty when they were satisfied that those elements had been proved. Has the court any other alternative than to find the accused guilty?

Mr. Fulton: Has the jury any other alternative?

Mr. Montgomery: I am thinking of the court as the judge and the jury. Have they any other alternative?

Mr. Garson: Having regard to the fact that the essence of seduction is persuasion by the accused of the female person to have sexual intercourse with him, and that if she is willing to have it without persuasion he is not guilty, will my hon. friend tell us that in a case in which the evidence showed that the accused was not wholly or chiefly to blame there would be any likelihood of the jury finding him guilty of seduction?

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Clause 143.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to delay the committee unduly, nor indeed to depart from the principle on which we agreed when we first started consideration of this matter, which was to the effect that if any section was controversial we would ask to have it stand. However, I want to make one more effort to try to persuade the minister and the committee that there is validity in the point I am making in connection with clause 143, and that the provision regarding the equality of blame should be maintained in this section as it has been in clauses 138 and 145.

I am not going to rehearse all the arguments we went over before dinner regarding the necessity of retaining that provision on its merits, but I want to put this point to the minister now. He has said it is felt that it is not necessary to retain this provision because one of the elements of seduction is persuasion, and therefore it is advanced as a defence to a charge of seduction that the informant or seducee, if that is the right word, was partly to blame, having led the accused on, and therefore the jury would not convict the accused.

I want to put this before him, that at the present time there are three sections of the Criminal Code in which it is specifically provided that the judge may direct the jury that if they feel the accused was not wholly or chiefly to blame, then the jury may bring in an acquittal. But what happens if you take that provision out of the section dealing with seduction between the ages of 16 and 18? It is left in with respect to the girl under 14. It is left in with respect to a ward, foster child or employee; and I believe a judge could very properly tell a jury that parliament had decided, in regard to the question of the guilt or innocence of an accused on a charge of seduction, that it is no longer to be up to them to consider whether the seducee had been co-operative, or whether the seducee, informant or accusant was in any way responsible, or whether any element of blame attached to her, because parliament has taken that out of this section.

In other words, parliament has decided it will not be relevant for a jury to consider, in arriving at their verdict, whether there is any element of blame or co-operation on the part of the informing person whose seduction is alleged. I believe a judge might very properly say that to the jury, and therefore the jury would not be allowed to consider whether there was any element of responsibility attaching to the girl between the ages of 16 and 18 who was said to have been seduced, by the very fact that we removed this equality of blame provision from this section while leaving it in two other sections. We are in effect enacting a law which will make it incumbent upon judges to tell juries they do not have to consider that aspect of the matter in deciding whether an accused is innocent or guilty.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I have tried hard to see the point of view which has been expressed by the hon. member for Kamloops, but what I cannot understand is this. Where the charge is seduction, in that the accused by blandishments has secured the consent of the lady to intercourse; where the lady is between 16 and 18 years of age, and the crown is unable to prove by the evidence that the accused is wholly or chiefly to blame it cannot prove the charge of seduction and the insertion of a saving clause of this kind would therefore be of little use to the accused in such a case.

Mr. Fulton: They are not going to have to prove that in the absence of a saving clause. All they have to prove is that seduction has taken place.

Mr. Garson: One thing my hon. friend must remember is that quite apart from this saving clause he is discussing, whether a charge of seduction or any other criminal charge is laid against the accused, it is an elementary point that the crown has to prove the guilt of the accused beyond all reasonable doubt. The hon. member knows that. That is the A,B,C of criminal law.

If the crown is able to prove the accused's guilt in seducing a girl 16 to 18 years of age, then I, for my own part, cannot see of what use it would be to the accused to have in the clause of the code relating to him a subsection which provides that where the accused is charged with an offence under this heading the court may find the accused not guilty if it is of the opinion that the evidence does not show, as between the accused and the female person, that the accused is wholly or chiefly to blame.

I would point out to the hon. member that this clause is of no help to him, because if the crown cannot show that he is wholly or chiefly to blame they will not get a conviction in the first place; they will not be able to prove an offence of seduction against him beyond all reasonable doubt.

I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, to belabour this point at such great length and I would be more than glad to agree with my hon. friend if I conscientiously could, but it seems to me the commission is drawing a distinction between a case on the one hand such as we have been discussing, of a man who is charged with seducing a girl between the ages of 16 and 18, and on the other hand the case of a man charged with seducing a girl from 14 to 16 years of age, that is of more tender years, or seducing an employee, a foster child, or a ward who is under his influence. In the second case, where the accused is in a position to influence the girl because of her tender years, or because she is dependent upon him in some fashion, then the natural disposition of the court, I believe, and the natural reaction of any of us, were we on the jury, would be to deal pretty severely with an accused person. We would say, "You had no business having to do with this young girl," and we would be inclined to be unduly severe with him unless there was some saving clause in the law such as clause 138 (3) or 145 (2).

For my own part, if I were on a jury my attitude would be very different in relation to a girl between 16 and 18 years of age, if it appeared from the evidence that to use the language of these subclauses 138 (3) and 145 (2), "the accused was not wholly or chiefly to blame" and, as there are only two parties to this intercourse, if he is not chiefly or wholly to blame, then she is the one who is chiefly or wholly to blame. In that case I, for one juryman, would not convict him in the first place. My hon. friend says that he wants this clause put in to protect the accused.

Mr. Fulton: Not to protect an accused, but to protect an accused who is not wholly to blame.

Mr. Garson: All right; to protect an accused who is not wholly to blame. Let us suppose that the accused comes into court, and that it is a very doubtful case in which there is a grave question as to whether it can be proven. If I were acting for him I would rather battle it out upon the ground that the crown had not proven his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, apart altogether from this clause. But if this clause or this section is in, and if this is what my hon. friend is going to rely upon to protect the accused, then in order to bring himself within this clause, since it is in the law, he must show the court that the evidence before the court does not indicate that the accused is wholly to blame or chiefly to blame.

Suppose you start submitting such a direction to a jury whose members already are having a hard time to decide on the main issue as to whether the accused is guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. Then while they are weighing this evidence you come along and say, "In addition to this problem of having to decide whether he is guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, there is another clause which you must take into account. In the main case you have to decide whether he is guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, but under this clause you must decide whether or not the evidence shows that the accused is chiefly or wholly to blame."

In a case in which adult people are participants in this sexual intercourse, it seems to me that the addition of a clause of that kind does not clarify the issue at all. It obscures it. That was the view of the commission, and this is the clause which came from the commission. None of the committees and legislative bodies that have considered it up to the present time have seen fit to change it. For my part, I do not think it should be changed, notwithstanding the strong pleas that have been made by the hon. member for Kamloops and the hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Fulton: I will have one more go at it and that is all. What would the minister say with respect to the propriety of a judge saying this to a jury: "Seduction has been established. The age of the accused has been established as over 18. The age of the seduced person, a female of between 16 and 18, has been established. Gentlemen, it is no part of your responsibility to consider whether or not the conduct of the female person was in any way blameworthy, because parliament has taken that clause out of that section. Therefore do not direct your attention at all to what her conduct was. That is no longer relevant to the question of whether or not the offence has been committed"?

Mr. Garson: On the point that has been raised, may I say this. If my hon. friend has the volume with the Criminal Code there he will find in it the Interpretation Act, chapter 1, section 21, subsections 2 and 3:

> 2. The amendment of any act shall not be deemed to be or to involve a declaration that the law under such act was, or was considered by parliament to have been, different from the law as it has become under such act as so amended.
> 3. The repeal or amendment of any act shall not be deemed to be or to involve any declaration whatsoever as to the previous state of the law.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That does not apply there, I submit with due respect.

Mr. Garson: I suggest that it does apply.

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: With due respect, I submit that it does not apply.

Mr. Garson: The only difficulty that might arise is not with regard to what was done to the law as it previously was. My hon. friend, in relation to the law as established by Bill No. 7, might perhaps be able to emphasize that because there was a saving clause of this sort in clause 138 and in clause 145 but not in clause 143, there was no saving clause in clause 143. But what of it? The crown still has to prove the accused guilty. Moreover, I do not think the hypothetical case which he has posed has any reality. My hon. friend says that if seduction has been proven the judge will say so-and-so. My hon. friend knows that when the judge charges the jury in a case of this sort, he does not wait until they have brought in a verdict of guilty of seduction as charged. The judge charges the jury on the evidence which has been adduced and which is before the jury, and he charges them before they retire to consider their verdict.

Mr. Fulton: All right; I will change my words and say, "In considering whether or not there has been seduction, do not address your minds to whether or not the conduct of the female party was blameworthy".

Mr. Garson: I do not see how he could possibly take that attitude. As I said a moment ago, apart from this section altogether it is the responsibility of the crown—and this is the A, B, C of criminal law—to bring home to the accused his guilt as charged beyond a reasonable doubt. If there is any substantial amount of joint guilt upon the part of the lady in question, then the judge has to charge the jury in respect of that evidence.

In any case where the accused was not wholly or chiefly to blame, within the language of this clause my hon. friend is advocating, there is in my view a very small probability indeed that in these modern times the jury would ever hold the accused guilty; because they would say, "This young lady got exactly what she was looking for and we are not going to hold that, beyond a reasonable doubt, the accused is guilty of the offence of seduction".

Mr. Fulton: I think the minister is resting his case upon a hope rather than anything else.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether a lay person might express his opinion on this matter. It seems to me that, under this section, the previous character of the female is taken into consideration. The section says "of previously chaste character".

The assumption then is that there is no assistance to the other party in the act. If the judge and jury do not find the person wholly guilty of seduction, then they have to begin to weigh to what extent the other party is guilty. It seems to me that under such circumstances—if it was a matter of percentage and they said she was only 15 per cent guilty and he was 85 per cent guilty —they would not say, "We will have to find that he is guilty". What they would say is that she assisted in the act, however little, and consequently they would not find the male person guilty in that case. With my little knowledge of the law I think the character of the woman concerned must be considered; and if she was of previously good character, we cannot assume now that she was anything else.

Mr. Fulton: What about sudden impulse?

Mr. MacInnis: I do not know as much about that as the hon. member.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Fulton: On division.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 144 to 149 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 150—Obscene matter.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Fulton: Clause 150 is to stand.

Mr. Garson: I might say to the hon. member for Saskatoon that there was an understanding that certain sections in which certain members were strongly and deeply interested would be set over, and I think there was general agreement that this was one of them. I know the hon. member for Kamloops gave me notice some months ago that he wished this clause to stand.

Clause stands.

Clauses 151 to 153 inclusive stand.

Clauses 154 to 157 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 158—Indecent acts.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Chairman, I do not know if I am going to be exactly in order, but on this clause I want to speak with regard to something which took place in British Columbia, and in which either this section or the next one apparently was invoked. I am referring to the charges that were laid and the trials and convictions that took place involving the Doukhobors in British Columbia. I have here the charge as read to the accused in Jubilee labour hall on September 10, 1953:

> You are charged that on Wednesday, September 9, at Perry's Siding you unlawfully and individually did knowingly do an act likely to make a juvenile delinquent, to wit did expose your naked body in the presence of a child or children contrary to the form of statute in such case made and provided.

I gather that particular charge was laid under section 33 of the act relating to juvenile delinquents, but at the same time the prosecutor announced that a further charge was going to be laid under section 205 of the Criminal Code, which is the section we are now dealing with. I gather that it must have been laid because the penalty for an infraction of section 33 of the act relating to juvenile delinquents is only two years, and these people were given three years.

I am not even sure exactly how the presiding magistrate arrived at his authority to impose such a savage sentence because, unless the penalty has been increased, the section of the Criminal Code with which we are now dealing only entails a maximum punishment of six months on summary conviction. My legal friends can correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. Garson: I think I can clear up my hon. friend's point. I think he would find, if it were possible to examine the charge sheets, that the charges were under section 205A of the present Criminal Code, which covers parading while nude. It reads as follows:

> Every one is guilty of an offence and liable upon summary conviction to three years imprisonment who, while nude,
> (a) is found in any public place whether alone or in company with one or more other persons who are parading or have assembled with intent to parade or have paraded in such public place while nude . . .

Mr. Knowles: That would be clause 159 of the bill now before us.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I must admit that I have not seen the charge sheet, but the charge I quoted is as it was reported at the trials in Jubilee labour hall. It is quoted here as being the charge that was laid against them, and it does not indicate that it was section 205A alone that was invoked because it says quite distinctly that they unlawfully and individually did knowingly do an act likely to make a juvenile delinquent. Obviously it must have been the provisions of the act relating to juvenile delinquents that were invoked at least in part, and it is that to which I wish to draw attention.

I know quite well, of course, that it is no responsibility of the Minister of Justice, but I do think some attention should be called to what is really a distortion of the intent of an act; because I think everyone will agree that to twist the sort of nude parading that the Doukhobors have done into an act likely to contribute to juvenile delinquency is a very grave distortion of the actual intent of the legislation and certainly a distortion of the actual possible effects of that parade. I think it shows a very cavalier attitude toward legislation that such a far-fetched charge should have been laid.

I also think the magistrate who imposed these savage sentences should be subject to some rebuke from some authority. I do not know what authority is the appropriate one, but certainly it was a savage sentence to impose for a nude parade which, after all, was more or less a nuisance. That was all it was; and the very fact that the authorities have repeatedly drawn attention to these nude parades and given them a nuisance value has, I think, created this situation.

On that occasion the magistrate termed these people whom he was sentencing to three years in prison vicious enemies of society. They may be on some other count, but I submit that to call these poor, misguided and obviously psychologically unbalanced creatures vicious enemies of society because they offend against our sense—our aesthetic sense, I suppose; that is probably their greatest offence from what I have heard—is something that I think the government should take some notice of, particularly in view of the fact that there are a number of other circumstances in connection with these cases which indicate that there has been quite widespread disapproval of these court actions.

I have, for instance, a news report from Castlegar dated September 18, indicating that the Castlegar and district chamber of commerce has strongly backed the action of Mr. D. W. Waldie, member of the Doukhobor consultative committee, who resigned as a protest against what he considers this misguided action on the part of the authorities in British Columbia.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I do not want to interrupt the hon. member's argument. In so far as he is discussing the penalties and the crimes covered by the sections under discussion I would not want to restrain him in any way, but there is a rule of procedure in the house which makes it out of order to make adverse criticism of judges and persons in such positions. I think the hon. member can most likely make his point without either reading other people's criticisms or himself offering criticism of a member of the bench.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): What is the rule that prohibits adverse criticism of judges and magistrates?

[Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo).]

The Deputy Chairman: Citation 305 of Beauchesne's second edition, which reads:

> All references to judges and courts of justice and to personages of high official station, of the nature of personal attack and censure have always been considered unparliamentary, and the Speakers of the British and Canadian houses have always treated them as breaches of order.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I was making no personal attack on this magistrate. I do not know him from a bale of hay. But I am making a very determined and, I hope, vigorous attack upon his actions on the bench in this particular case.

The Deputy Chairman: That is what I am afraid the hon. member cannot do. With respect to the powers given to a magistrate or judge under this act, the hon. member certainly has full right to say that the permissible penalties are too high; but the way in which a judge exercises his discretion can, as I understand it, only be discussed in the house upon a substantive motion leading to his removal, or something of that nature.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 159 agreed to.

On clause 160—Causing disturbance.

Mr. Winch: There is a question I should like to ask in connection with this clause, Mr. Chairman. I hope the minister does not mind, but since I am not a lawyer I have to ask questions in order to understand this act. This clause says that everyone who, not being in a dwelling house, causes a disturbance in or near a public place by being drunk is guilty of an offence that is punishable on summary conviction. The fact that this provision is in the bill, I take it, means the federal government has jurisdiction in that connection.

I have seen the Ontario liquor permits, although I have not one myself, and on the opening page it is stated that it is an offence to permit drunkenness in your own home, or your room in a hotel. That rather intrigued me, so I checked up with the Ontario act, which I now have in front of me, and I find under section 88 of the liquor control act the following:

> No person shall,
> (a) permit drunkenness to take place in any house or on any premises of which he is the owner, . . .
> (b) permit or suffer any person apparently under the influence of liquor to consume any liquor in any house . . .
> (c) give any liquor to any person apparently under the influence of liquor.

I believe the minister understands my point. I should like to know where the actual jurisdiction lies, or is there a dual jurisdiction? How does it happen that there is one section in the Criminal Code creating a federal offence, and apparently the province of Ontario can deal with drunkenness in a person's own home?

Mr. Garson: The hon. member has asked a rather difficult question, not in connection with criminal law but constitutional law. I hope he will forgive me if my reply is not too comprehensive.

In our federal system the powers of government are divided between the federal government at Ottawa and the provincial governments. The British North America Act, in section 91, sets out those subject matters of legislation which are assigned to the jurisdiction of the federal parliament. In section 92, and in other sections with regard to agriculture and education, those powers which are assigned to the provincial legislatures are set forth. One of the powers assigned to the federal parliament is that of passing laws in relation to crime, and it is pursuant to that power that the federal Criminal Code, which we are now considering, is passed.

Amongst the other powers which provincial legislatures have is that of passing laws in relation to property and civil rights. Since the liquor traffic of a province has to do with property and civil rights, especially when it is under government control, the provincial legislatures have exercised that power to pass laws relating to the sale by provincial governments of spirituous liquors. The rule is that where, as sometimes happens, a conflict develops between a law passed by the federal parliament clearly pursuant to its powers on the one hand, and a law passed by a provincial legislature clearly pursuant to its powers on the other, the federal law takes precedence.

If the hon. member will examine the section he has been quoting, where the provincial liquor law says that a man shall not consume certain liquor in his own dwelling, he will see that it is liquor sold by that provincial government—

Mr. Winch: The section does not say he shall not consume liquor, but that he shall not be drunk in his own home.

Mr. Garson: I was going to deal with that. The hon. member said that he should not consume liquor under certain circumstances; and the only kind of liquor that most provincial liquor systems are interested in a man not consuming, because their business is selling liquor, is liquor which they do not sell. That would be home brew, or liquor imported from another province.

These provisions creating crimes or quasi-crimes are passed lawfully by the provincial legislatures as being ancillary to the administration of the liquor laws of the province. Where a conflict does develop of a nature which has not previously come before the courts, no person is really sure—although lawyers may have opinions—as to which of the two conflicting laws will take precedence until that particular question has been decided by the courts.

In this clause to which the hon. member is referring we have prohibited drunkenness in a public place or outside of the home. We have not prohibited drunkenness in the home, not I think because we have no power to say that drunkenness in the home would be a crime but because we have not thought it appropriate to say that a man may not be drunk in his own home. The fact that we have not so legislated is not an indication that we have not the power. It is an indication of the way in which we have exercised the power we have.

Mr. Winch: That is the very point I wanted to raise. I believe the minister has explained it, because provinces do legislate with regard to liquor and drunkenness. In view of the fact that under clause 160 of this bill we are also legislating on this subject, I was interested in knowing where the precedence lies. Under which legislation, provincial or federal, would any charges be laid?

As the minister noted, I was interested in the Ontario act. Section 88 is not particularly related to the consumption of liquor, but says that no person shall permit drunkenness to take place. There are three subsections to it. I know there is a great deal of interest in royal commissions and investigations of changes in the liquor acts of the various provinces. As we are now amending the Criminal Code I was interested in knowing just where the jurisdiction lies; and when both federal and provincial laws relate to the same thing, under which act are the charges laid.

Mr. Garson: The laws we pass in this parliament in relation to crime—that is, the Criminal Code—are all administered by the provincial authorities, because one of the subject matters of legislation which falls within their jurisdiction is that of the administration of justice, which includes the enforcement of law.

Now, while I am not very well acquainted with criminal law enforcement I would assume that when a given set of facts comes before the crown prosecutor for prosecution he would examine these points and reach an opinion as to whether it would be more appropriate to charge the accused under the Criminal Code or under some provincial statute. If he is charged under a provincial statute which is beyond the powers of, or as we say in law, is ultra vires of the provincial legislature to pass, then the accused coming into court can say in reply to the charge against him, "Apart from the question of whether my actions fall within this section of the provincial law under which you are charging me, I say that the law itself is beyond the powers of the provincial legislature to enact. It is unconstitutional and void, and therefore you cannot charge me or any man under it".

I cannot be more detailed than that because I think it would be most inappropriate for me, as the Minister of Justice for Canada, to be expressing opinions in this house with regard to any statutes of any of the provinces of Canada.

Mr. McIvor: Is there any place where it is lawful for a man to get drunk?

Mr. Nesbitt: The House of Commons.

Mr. Fulton: The House of Commons is absolutely privileged in that regard.

Mr. Winch: I have an idea that is a civil right.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Is clause 160 an old section or a new one?

Mr. Garson: No, it is not new.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Is it new in any part?

Mr. Garson: No, I do not think so.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Clause 160 reads in part:

> Everyone who
> (a) not being in a dwelling house causes a disturbance in or near a public place,
> (i) by fighting, screaming, shouting, swearing, singing, or using insulting or obscene language, > is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

I can understand how fighting, screaming, shouting, swearing and so on might cause a public disturbance. Let us take the Salvation Army. They may be singing on the street corner which may be near a public place, and in the opinion of some people that might be a disturbance. Could that come under this clause?

Mr. Garson: In reply to my hon. friend's question may I say this. First of all he wants to know the derivation of this clause, how much of it is new and so on. This present clause that we are considering combines section 222 (b) of the present code and certain provisions of the vagrancy section, 238, which properly relate to disorderly conduct. The addition of the word "fighting" has made it possible to drop the present section 100 which deals with an affray; and in view of the new definition of public place, the enumeration of the places in which the conduct covered by the section is prohibited has become unnecessary, so that this is a combination and condensation of a number of sections in the present code.

Now, with regard to the second part of my hon. friend's question, as to whether and under what circumstances singing would constitute a disturbance within the meaning of this clause, I would say that in real life the way these prosecutions start is that some person gets quite displeased and angry over a commotion of this sort. If he is angry enough he goes to the police station and says, "Does a peaceful man like myself have to put up with this sort of thing"? The police officer takes down the particulars; and if it were, as my hon. friend suggests, the Salvation Army I think probably the charge would not be laid. If on the other hand it were a party of ten or twelve gentlemen, each of whom had drunk about half a bottle of whisky, and they were singing obscene songs outside, I should imagine they probably would lay a charge.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Would that much do it?

Mr. Garson: I do not know whether it would, I am sure. The question as to whether a man has committed an offence has to be proven by the facts in each case adduced in evidence before the court.

Mr. Nesbitt: I have a question with regard to clause 160 (a) (iii) which reads:

> Every one who
> (a) Not being in a dwelling house causes a disturbance in or near a public place,
> (iii) by impeding or molesting other persons;

Then (c):

> loiters in a public place and in any way obstructs persons who are there;

Since molesting other persons seems to be very well covered by paragraph (a) (iii), which deals with impeding or molesting other persons, I am not clear with respect to paragraph (c), which deals with two types of offences. It speaks of "loiters in a public place and in any way obstructs persons who are there." In other words, is loitering in a public place an offence by itself, or do you have to loiter and obstruct persons who are there before you are guilty of an offence?

Mr. Garson: I think a careful reading of this paragraph would lead one to the view that clause 160 (c) covers loitering and obstructing. It is a different offence, really, from 160 (a) (iii).

Mr. Nesbitt: I wonder what the actual difference is between (a) (iii), impeding and molesting and (c) which is obstructing, and whether loitering by itself would be an offence as the old vagrancy charge used to be.

Mr. Garson: No, it is something more than mere loitering. A very slow window-shopping expedition is in itself just loitering, but the offence under 160 (a) is loitering and obstructing at the same time, and I would judge a more continuous offence than impeding or molesting, which could be just a single act of impeding or molesting.

Mr. Nesbitt: It is a continuing offence.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 161 — Obstructing officiating clergyman.

Mr. Knowles: Some of the wording of this clause is rather wide. I refer particularly to 161 (2) which reads:

> Every one who wilfully disturbs or interrupts an assemblage of persons met for religious worship or for a moral, social or benevolent purpose is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

I read that in association with some of the other parts of the clause, and to me it leaves it rather wide open as to what disturbs such an assemblage. The reference is not merely to a religious gathering where one may expect a certain amount of solemnity, quiet and so on. What about a political meeting or a session of the House of Commons, and so on? Does it not go rather far?

Mr. Garson: I would not say so. There is no change in this law. This clause is a combination of sections 199, 200 and 201 of the present code, and there is no change in the law. It has been on the statute books for many years, and as a matter of fact I think it is seldom invoked.

Mr. Knowles: The fact that it has been on the statute books for many years does not necessarily make it good. The minister says that it is seldom invoked. Should we retain legislation which does not seem to have any usefulness?

Mr. Garson: I would not agree that a clause that may not be invoked very often but which would be needed badly when it did have to be invoked should be done away with. We are fortunate that we do not have to invoke it, but I would think any person who disturbs or obstructs a religious meeting should be considered as doing an improper act.

Mr. Knowles: I think there is a distinction that can be drawn between religious and other meetings. This clause goes far beyond religious meetings. Subsection 3 refers to everyone who, at or near a meeting referred to in subsection 2, wilfully does anything that disturbs the order or solemnity of the meeting. It might be a political meeting held in the constituency of Marquette at which the Minister of Justice was speaking.

Mr. Garson: I thank my hon. friend for the compliment in regarding that as a moral or benevolent meeting.

Mr. Knowles: I cannot quite determine whether it would be moral, social or benevolent. In any case I hope it would not be immoral, anti-social or malevolent. If anyone at Shoal Lake or somewhere up in that part of Manitoba wilfully did anything that disturbed the order or solemnity of a meeting being addressed by the minister, he would be guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction. I confess that if I happened to be at a meeting at Shoal Lake at which the minister was speaking it would be very hard for me not to do something which would disturb the order or solemnity of the meeting, and I am sure the minister would not want to crack down on me. He would probably be glad I was there to brighten up the meeting for him.

Mr. Abbott: I am not sure that that would do it.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 162—Trespassing at night.

Mr. Fulton: I do not propose to be an expert in this particular matter, but it has been represented to me that this section, whether deliberately or by accident, does embody to some extent the old common law offence committed by peeping Toms. I have a note here to the effect that up to 1949 the offence of peeping was generally considered to be a common law offence; but then in the case of Frey v. Frederuk—I am sorry I do not have the reference—its status as a common law offence was denied.

I am told that the commission's draft, amended by the special committee of the house last year and now incorporated in this bill, just covers the common law offence of trespassing. Clause 162 created an offence very similar to trespass. It reads:

> Every one who, without lawful excuse, the proof of which lies upon him, loiters or prowls at night upon the property of another person near a dwelling house situated on that property is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

The point which my informant makes is that we should no longer just try to codify the old common law offence of peeping on the basis of trespassing, when it has been decided that peeping is not actually a common law offence and does not have any status under our Criminal Code. In other words, if I read this note correctly what is suggested is that if the offence of peeping is intended to be covered, it must be covered far more specifically than is done by this section.

Merely to introduce a section which makes it an offence to loiter or prowl does not by inference or in any other way make it an offence to carry on the act of peeping while you may be loitering or prowling. It seems to me that if it is intended to cover the offence of peeping we must be far more specific than we are in this section, particularly since the peeper may not stand on the lot on which the dwelling house into which he is peeping is situated. He may stand on a back street or another lot from which he can obtain a view, or he may stand even further off than that and use a pair of glasses or binoculars.

As I have said, I am not an expert either in the technique of committing the offence or in the law regarding it. That is the note which I have received and it seems to me to have some substance. I shall be glad if the minister will say whether it is considered that this section effectively covers the offence of peeping.

Mr. Garson: It was intended that it should, upon the view that in most cases it would not be possible for the peeping Tom to look into a window or that sort of thing unless he had come on the ground of another and was loitering or prowling there near a dwelling house. In the special committee of the House of Commons the majority, which were concerned that they should not create a new offence that would make a criminal out of every petty trespasser, said that the man had to be loitering or prowling near the dwelling house. If he simply crossed the edge of a man's farm or the corner of his lot it would not be an offence under this section.

We gave a good deal of thought to this section. I think it will cover most of the offences at which it is directed; and in those cases where it does not, one wonders whether the offence could be covered without creating more injustice than would result from the offence not being covered. The difficulty in framing a clause of this sort is that of making it apply to the man who is guilty without running the danger of implicating people who are innocent.

Mr. Fulton: What would be the difficulty in defining the offence of peeping and making it an offence rather than the act of loitering or prowling? It is the peeping, the looking in which is offensive. Trespass is something that is punishable quite separately. Surely it is the peeping that is the offence.

Mr. Garson: I am told that one practical difficulty that came up in the committee was that you cannot always get the peeping Tom in the act of peeping. One may suspect he is there for that purpose, but when one goes out to apprehend him and he hears one coming, he is just loitering when one comes up to him. If possible we want a clause that is effective and that can be administered. We have tried to draft it to apply to the likely facts, which are that one comes up to this chap and he hears a rustle or a noise of the person coming to apprehend him, and he is suddenly just there looking around, smelling the chrysanthemums.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder if the minister would comment on clause 162 on another basis. Do I interpret it correctly, that this is another case where contrary to the usual practice the onus is on the accused? The section reads:

> Every one who, without lawful excuse, the proof of which lies upon him—

Mr. Garson: That was put in to protect the accused. The committee spent an amount of time upon this short clause which was really out of proportion to its importance, in some respects, in order to cover this question of peeping Toms. We did not want to adopt a law that would be very unjust to innocent people, and we agreed we would limit its application to those lurking or prowling near a dwelling house, and that it would not even apply if the man found there had a lawful excuse.

Of course, when it comes to giving a lawful excuse the evidence of that is entirely in his possession. If we were to say that the crown had to prove what this lawful excuse was you might as well wipe out the section entirely, because the crown would have no means of proving it. All that would happen in a case of this sort, if a person were found loitering or prowling near a dwelling, he could clear himself by showing that he had a lawful excuse for being where he was.

Mr. Knowles: He would have to produce the chrysanthemums?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Hahn: I was wondering if that would not be covered in clause 159, which reads as follows:

> (1) Every one who, without lawful excuse,
> (a) is nude in a public place, or
> (b) is nude and exposed to public view while on private property, . . .

That deals with the main purpose of peeping Toms.

Mr. Garson: I believe my hon. friend has got the wrong end of the equation. It is not the peeping Tom who is nude whom he is looking for on private property.

Mr. Knowles: Apparently clause 162 is directed against the peeping Tom and clause 159 is directed against Lady Godiva herself. However, before we leave this clause I wonder if I may be permitted to ask one more question with regard to clause 161, subsection (2) which reads:

> Every one who wilfully disturbs or interrupts an assemblage of persons met for religious worship or for a moral, social or benevolent purpose is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

Is there not likely to be a conflict between that and the circumstances covered by what I believe is known as Bill No. 38, which was passed this year by the Quebec legislature? If a peace officer in the province of Quebec, under the authority of that legislation, wilfully disturbed or interrupted an assemblage of persons met for religious worship, what would happen? For example, supposing such an officer disturbed or interrupted an assemblage of Jehovah's witnesses. What would happen then?

Mr. Garson: Why would an officer be interrupting or disturbing them?

Mr. Knowles: He might be interrupting or disturbing them in pursuance of his duty under that Quebec law, and at the same time he might run foul of this clause in the Criminal Code.

Mr. Garson: I am not too familiar with the provisions of the Quebec law, but I must say that offhand I cannot think of any circumstances under which, in carrying out the Quebec law, he would find such action necessary.

Mr. Ferguson: Does this law distinctly say that an officer has no right to interfere? Is that a federal law?

Mr. Garson: Yes, this is the law we are discussing.

Mr. Ferguson: Is it a fact, if this clause is passed, that under the federal law a peace officer will not have the right to interfere with a religious organization? According to the minister's interpretation, is that right or wrong? Let me have your interpretation of the laws you are drawing up. You are making them.

Mr. Garson: I am not.

Mr. Ferguson: I am asking the Minister of Justice for an interpretation.

Mr. Garson: It is very clear from the provisions we are considering here that the application of this subsection is confined to those who wilfully disturb or interrupt. Whether I would apply that to a peace officer engaged in the discharge of his duty is another question entirely. I do not think—

Mr. Ferguson: It is this question. It is not another question.

Mr. Garson: I think I have the floor at the moment.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Garson: As I was saying, clause 161 (2) is confined in its application to those who wilfully—

The Chairman: May I remind the minister that we are discussing clause 162, not clause 161.

Mr. Garson: The question—

Mr. Knowles: Since I was allowed to go back the minister should also be allowed to do so, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Garson: The essence of this present subsection is very clear. It is a case where a person comes in and wilfully, and in a sense maliciously, tries to break up a meeting.

Mr. Knowles: There is no reference to malice here, and I would suggest that the wilful breaking up of such an assembly might very well be the result of following the Quebec law. I am wondering if there is not a conflict between the two.

Mr. Ferguson: If an officer goes into a meeting to carry out his duties under the Quebec law and he thereby wilfully disturbs a religious assembly, is it against the federal law of Canada, or will it be against the law if this clause is passed? Yes or no?

Mr. Garson: I have already expressed the view—

Mr. Ferguson: You gave your views but you did not say whether he could be prosecuted. Can he be prosecuted, according to your interpretation of this law?

Mr. Garson: I think you would have to get legal advice on that.

Mr. Ferguson: We would have to go further than the Minister of Justice in order to get it, I am sure.

Mr. Ellis: Am I correct in understanding that there is nothing new in clause 161?

Mr. Garson: That is right. Clause 161, as I indicated previously, is a re-enactment of the substance of the present sections 199, 200, and 201. If the hon. member will look at the existing Criminal Code he will see that sections 199, 200 and 201 were in the Revised Statutes of 1927, so they have been the law of this country for at least that length of time and they probably go back further than that.

Mr. Ellis: Can the minister tell us—

Mr. Garson: My assistant tells me the law in that connection goes back to 1892.

Mr. Ellis: —if there have been any prosecutions or convictions under any of these three sections, 199, 200 and 201, since the law has been in effect in Canada.

Mr. Garson: I do not suppose my hon. friend wishes to detain the committee long enough for me to recite these cases, but if he will look at Tremeear's Criminal Code he will find various cases listed there where these sections have been invoked, with full particulars in each case.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 163—Offensive volatile substance.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to apologize for bringing up a matter which has been up before this house on a number of occasions lately, for it is one which I believe deserves the immediate attention of this house. I am referring to the situation created in consequence of the pollution of the waters of the North Saskatchewan river by what is generally believed to be the actions of Canadian Celanese corporation in dumping certain products into the river. On a number of occasions this matter has been before the house—

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, might I rise on a point of order?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, yes.

Mr. Garson: I am sure we are all most sympathetic with my hon. friend in his concern about the condition of the North Saskatchewan river. However, I believe the rule of order is that when we are discussing in committee the clauses of a bill, remarks must be confined to the clause which is before the committee.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is what I am going to do.

Mr. Garson: I would suggest that there is no apparent connection or relevancy between the condition of the North Saskatchewan river and the clause we are discussing at the present time.

Mr. Ferguson: Premature opinion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It will not take long, Mr. Chairman, to bring these remarks into direct line with this particular clause and also one which I am asking leave to discuss at the same time, namely clause 165. Clause 163 reads as follows:

> Every one other than a peace officer engaged in the discharge of his duty who has in his possession in a public place or who deposits, throws or injects or causes to be deposited, thrown or injected in, into or near any place,
> (a) an offensive volatile substance that is likely to alarm, inconvenience, discommode or cause discomfort to any person or to cause damage to property, . . . is guilty of an offence . . .

That is the first portion of the clause in question. Then the other general clause with reference to nuisances is clause 165, which reads as follows:

> (1) Every one who commits a common nuisance and thereby
> (a) endangers the lives, safety or health of the public . . . is guilty of an indictable offence—

I am reading only the pertinent subsection.

> —and is liable to imprisonment for two years.
> (2) For the purposes of this section, every one commits a common nuisance who does an unlawful act or fails to discharge a legal duty and thereby
> (a) endangers the lives, safety, health, property or comfort of the public, . . .

Those are the only sections of the Criminal Code, as it now stands, which in any way can be enlarged, expanded or amended to cover the situation that prevails today along the North Saskatchewan river.

My preliminary words are directed to asking the minister to permit amendments to these sections to cover the situation that has resulted from the contamination of the Saskatchewan river, as well as the contaminations that are taking place by pollution elsewhere in this country, and in order to protect human beings against the continuance of a situation that is detrimental to their comfort if not to their health.

The government has expressed every desire to be of assistance in this matter. I therefore do not expect that my hon. friend will raise questions of order on a matter that is particularly pertinent to the section, for I am sure he would like to have any assistance that can be given in order to meet the problem which in their anxiety various ministers of the government have stated they would like to meet but which as yet, after 86 days, they have not met.

Someone might say that it is a civil matter, and that it could be met by injunction. That is not in any way an answer to the question, because the problem arises in Alberta but the effect is in Saskatchewan. There are several intervening cities and urban municipalities, a fact which denies that direct causal conclusion which is necessary before an injunction can be secured.

One does not want to inject into the discussion anything in the nature of humorous remarks, but there is no description I know of for the odour of that water; it is one which no chemical treatment has been able to obliterate. A few moments ago I sent out for Coleridge and his description, in a few words, of what 50,000 people have had to put up with in recent weeks. I submit that a slight amendment to one or two of these sections would go a long way toward meeting that condition. Coleridge's words are:

I counted two-and-seventy stenches,
All well defined, and several stinks.

That is the kind of situation with which we are met. We are met too with the argument of divided responsibility. There is no divided responsibility under the criminal law. When the sections in question—and they are unaltered—were passed, the present problems of pollution had not been felt in other parts of Canada as they are being felt today. I have only to refer hon. gentlemen to an issue of Rod and Gun of September, 1953, in which appears an article by Reg. R. Fife, who sets forth the need for the Criminal Code being made applicable to the situation created by modern industrial pollution of our streams.

He is dealing with the matter, of course, from the point of view of fishing and, in particular, sport fishing. He goes on to point out that the laws as they are now have no application to present-day conditions. The Fisheries Act does not help us. It provides for a fine of $20 and costs for the first offence and for the second offence a fine of $40 and costs. What great corporation worries about fines like that?

The Criminal Code is one instrument under which proceedings could be taken where the offence is committed, namely near the city of Edmonton. It is one of the means whereby justice can be done on behalf of the people as a whole. As a matter of fact Dr. Lowe Connell, a dentist of Prince Albert, in describing the situation says this:

Prince Albert has taken to liquor,
Our water has all gone to pot
While Edmonton pours in her garbage
And tells us it's all bally rot . . .
In the bathtub, it smells to high heaven
From the taps it's a terrible stink.
The washtub is coated with plastic
And the coffee exactly like ink.

That describes the situation we are in. We say, "Well, something is going to turn up". Mr. Chairman, I say that the only way anything will turn up is by action being taken by parliament. Action can be taken by means of a few amendments to the sections in question.

I am not going to go into a great deal of detail. I say that today, not only in Canada but in the United States, we are at a point where more and more the procedure of criminal law must be appealed to in order to place great and powerful corporations in a position where they cannot detrimentally affect the health, the comfort or the welfare of the people as a whole.

It seems to me passing strange that, after almost three months, we are still in the position we were in at the beginning, with the exception that my friend the Minister of National Health and Welfare has provided highly trained chemical technicians who have met with other, equally highly trained, technicians, but who have as yet found it impossible by analysis to determine what is wrong.

We are not asking for analyses. What we are asking for is some action. The Fisheries Act provides no deterrent that would be effective in any way with great corporations. Fish are dying on every hand, but under that act there is only a penalty of $20 for a first offence; and corporations, even individuals, do not mind that. In so far as this section is concerned, it provides for a maximum penalty of $500 or six months. In so far as section 165 is concerned I think it provides for the same penalty.

Mr. Garson: Two years' imprisonment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friend says two years' imprisonment. In no case is there a suitable penalty to meet the situation of a corporation that is offending. I would be only too happy to make suggestions, though I do not want to go into details as to suggestions for amendments unless asked. But I would submit that the law officers of the crown should immediately review these two sections and incorporate therein, without in any way interfering with the legitimate purposes of big business, such penalties as will indeed protect and preserve the rights of the individuals who live along these rivers, who are entitled to purity of water and who would have reason to expect pure water to be available to them but for the contemptuous attitude of these corporations.

I suggest that either of these sections could have words added to it to this effect: "And, without restricting the foregoing, any substances which, although not deleterious or harmful to human health, cause discomfort or annoyance to users of water."

Some say this is a provincial matter. What can the province of Saskatchewan do to protect its people with respect to water that comes from the neighbouring province of Alberta? What can the people of The Pas,

Manitoba, do to meet the situation when the water comes from a neighbouring province? Surely when a river runs through more than one province the criminal law can be utilized and should be utilized, and is the only means whereby the health and comfort of the people may be maintained. In the circumstances here the best legal opinion is that injunctions will not be effective, that the only recourse is the Fisheries Act, and I am concerned as to whether or not it can be made totally applicable.

Certainly when an offence is committed to the detriment of thousands and thousands of people, and people in urban centres are in the position that they have to travel all over the country in order to get well water, while the river that nature gave us flows by with water that was pure until its purity was destroyed as a result of the actions of a corporation, then I say we have the right to ask that the minister and the law officers of the crown should give immediate attention to the necessary amendment of one or other of these sections. I suggest that the minister allow these sections to stand and give consideration to this matter, as it is the only opportunity we will have to meet this situation.

Someone may say, why not introduce a private bill? We know how far private bills go unless they receive the support of the government. This is the one time, with the amendment of the Criminal Code before the house, that we can meet not only the situation ad hoc on the North Saskatchewan river but can also go a considerable distance toward meeting a situation that is becoming prevalent in many other parts of the country. Certainly there is no more important element in the health of the people than good water.

I want to keep my remarks within the realm of propriety, therefore I would not want to repeat some of the words that are being used daily in the cities of Prince Albert and The Battlefords with respect to the prevailing situation. It would not be parliamentary, though their clarity could be understood by all. As I see it, these sections are the only ones in the code that provide a degree of hope, which up to now has been denied the people for whom I speak on this occasion.

Mr. Garson: The statement that has just been made by the hon. member for Prince Albert has left out of consideration—I do not know whether wittingly or unwittingly—one or two points concerning the matter he discussed which I think are not without importance. As he points out, we have in clause 163, but more particularly in clause 165, provisions which could have some application to the problems of which he speaks provided, and this is a very important proviso, those whose responsibility it is to enforce the Criminal Code are in a position to prove that the condition of the water of the North Saskatchewan river is attributable to certain effluents coming into that river, and provided they can prove that these effluents are put there by certain persons or corporations.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is obvious.

Mr. Garson: I am glad my hon. friend—

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is obvious you cannot convict anybody unless they are guilty.

Mr. Garson: But it is that obvious little point that my hon. friend, not only in his remarks tonight but in every other oration he has made upon the subject since he began some several days ago, has consistently ignored. My colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare has pointed out not once but several times that the provincial authorities in Alberta and Saskatchewan, who are deeply concerned in this matter—I am sure they are deeply concerned—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, yes, they are concerned.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend would let me finish my sentence he would not need to interrupt me. They are deeply concerned. Once it has been established that the condition in Prince Albert of which he complains is due to substances which are being placed in the same river, allegedly in Edmonton, and that the phenomenon resulting comes from this cause, the cause being the effluents—once they can establish that the effluent is being placed in the river and identify who is placing it there, then they will be in a position to invoke the existing laws to protect the public.

I would state, Mr. Chairman, that there is no dearth of laws in this regard. I am not familiar, certainly not when speaking extemporaneously upon this subject which my hon. friend from Prince Albert has raised, with the statute law of Alberta or Saskatchewan in relation to it. I have some knowledge of the statute law of Manitoba, although it is some time since I have had to do with it. But I would be very much surprised indeed if there were not a provision in the statute law of Alberta and Saskatchewan which, in the clearest terms, prohibits the pollution of rivers, the waters of which are used for public drinking purposes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister allow a question?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What help would it be for a law to be on the statute books of Saskatchewan when the pollution takes place in Alberta?

Mr. Low: Does the hon. member know that pollution takes place in Alberta? He has not the slightest idea, nor has anyone else.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That indicates the type of help we are getting from Alberta.

Mr. Low: I just want to deal with the interjection. There are a good many authorities today who consider that the pollution does not result from anything that is being poured into the water in Alberta, any effluent from a factory or plant, but that it results from escaping gas from certain gas wells along the border between Alberta and Saskatchewan.

The Deputy Chairman: May I suggest that we are discussing the application of the Criminal Code to all situations, and not one particular situation in Canada.

Mr. Garson: If I may cover one or two other points that have been raised by the hon. member, Mr. Chairman, I would not want the record to indicate there has been, upon the part of any government concerned, any neglect as has been alleged; for such a charge of neglect could not be founded on facts. Surely I do not need to make this point clear to the hon. member for Prince Albert, because he is too good a criminal lawyer not to know it. You cannot prosecute anyone for causing pollution until you are able to prove that the accused person is introducing the material which causes the pollution into the river.

As I understand it, my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare is supplying the best technical personnel he has available for the purpose of investigating and establishing, if that be the fact, that the conditions in the Saskatchewan river are the result of effluent which is being introduced into the Saskatchewan river in Alberta. No matter what law he was invoking—whether it was the public health act of either of these two provinces or these sections of the Canadian Criminal Code—I would think if the hon. member for Prince Albert were crown prosecutor he would look rather silly if he rushed into court and discovered when he got there that he did not have the evidence to make his charges stick.

I suggest to him that the sensible and proper approach to this matter is that which has been taken by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, in establishing these facts first. I would suggest to the hon. member for Prince Albert, who has had such a long experience as a criminal lawyer, that the wise prosecutor is one who finds out what his facts are before he considers the charge he is going to lay. If he does not know what his facts are and lays the wrong charge, it may be that the accused will get off even although he is guilty.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You found that out by experience with the combines act. It is experience from which you are speaking.

Mr. Garson: Once the facts were established, in the present case I would be very much surprised indeed if the parties concerned would not be prepared, upon the same kind of evidence that would produce a conviction in the event of a prosecution, voluntarily to co-operate in removing this nuisance without any of the difficulty, commotion and uproar we have heard from the hon. member for Prince Albert.

He says or implies that we are derelict in some way in this matter. I suggest to him that our job in this parliament is to enact the criminal law. I suggest to him that if he reads section 92 of the British North America Act, if I remember correctly subsection 14, he will see that the administration of justice is entirely in the hands of the provinces. The task of taking whatever legal steps may be necessary in Saskatchewan or Alberta is the responsibility of the attorneys general of these provinces. In fairness I must say that I would be the last to blame these attorneys general—I am amazed that a man with my hon. friend's experience would blame them—for not rushing into court with any kind of prosecution until they know what the facts are upon which they have to rely to secure a conviction.

My information, which is up to date until the last 24 hours or so, is that it has not been established that the effluent of this concern or that concern or the next concern is the cause of the condition in the Saskatchewan river. I am not suggesting that it is escaping gas or anything of that sort. All I am suggesting is that the cause of the pollution in the Saskatchewan river has not been established. I am sure the hon. member for Prince Albert, as a lawyer, will agree that you cannot—thank goodness—in this country convict people upon hypotheses or guesses; you have to prove a case against them and here you have to show that the effluent being discharged into the river is the cause of the trouble which is being experienced in Prince Albert.

I believe we have gone about this thing in the right way. We are trying to establish these necessary facts. When they are established I think we will be able to get the matter cleared up without any necessity for a prosecution. The hon. member says there is a defect in our law because the penalty is not severe enough. If he looks at clause 165 of Bill No. 7 he will see the penalty is imprisonment for two years. If he looks at section 1035 of the present code he will see that it reads:

> Any person convicted by any magistrate under part XVI or by any court of an indictable offence punishable with imprisonment for five years or less may be fined in addition to, or in lieu of any punishment otherwise authorized, in which case the sentence may direct that in default of payment of his fine the person so convicted shall be imprisoned until such fine is paid, or for a period not exceeding five years, to commence at the end of the term of imprisonment awarded by the sentence, or forthwith as the case may require.

There is no limit to that fine.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What about corporations?

Mr. Garson: There is no limit; so all these fulminations the hon. member has inflicted upon us tonight about the inadequacy of our law and so forth are somewhat inappropriate until the facts are established and we can tell whether the existing law can be invoked to support a charge that would clear this matter up. Until these facts are established I must say that it is going to be most difficult to frame an amendment that will cover them.

Mr. Low: Is it not true that if you were seeking to convict under one of these clauses that we are speaking about at the present time you would first have to establish that some plant or some industry is pouring something into the river that does pollute the water?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Low: Is it not true that that is exactly what the provinces are trying to do now, with the assistance of the Department of National Health and Welfare? It seems to me that hon. member for Prince Albert, whose legal wisdom we admire in this house, is now using this for political purposes. I have great admiration for my hon. friend, and he has established a reputation here for wisdom in the legal field. I do not blame him for one moment for putting forward the case of his city, and perhaps other cities in the province of Saskatchewan; certainly, as he said a few moments ago, one of the most important things to people in any section of the country is a good water supply. We admit that; but my hon. friend knows full well that before he can start any type of prosecution under the Criminal Code he has to get evidence, as the minister said, and it has to be pretty well established.

Mr. Montgomery: The hon. member misses the point altogether.

Mr. Low: No, I have the point. I think the minister is quite right. If I remember correctly the statute law in Alberta does give the authorities there ample opportunity to take action to stop the pollution of the water. If it can be discovered, let us say, that one of the big industries in or around the city of Edmonton is pouring substances into the Saskatchewan river which results in the condition one finds in Prince Albert, there is enough power in the statute law of Alberta to make it possible for the authorities there to stop it. That being so—

Mr. Martin: The public health act.

Mr. Low: —I do not see why it is necessary to talk about this particular criminal law in order to get a conviction for something we do not know a thing about. I suggested a moment ago that there is an outside possibility that escaping gas from gas wells may be causing it. I do not know if that is a fact, but there is a suggestion.

Mr. Coldwell: I understand that people are drinking water from the Battle river, and the Battle river flows right through the gas fields. If it is escaping gas that is causing the trouble, why is the Battle river water all right?

Mr. Low: I do not know; all I can say is that there are certain people, some of them from Saskatchewan, who suggest that the taste and smell of the samples of water they have had from the river in Prince Albert and other places in Saskatchewan indicates escaping gas.

Mr. Coldwell: Why is the Battle river water not polluted, then?

Mr. Low: That would not necessarily follow.

The Deputy Chairman: May I suggest to the committee that the Chair would like this discussion to be as wide open as possible and keep within the rules, but I should like the committee to keep away from a technical argument as to whether a condition in a certain river is caused by gas or by some other product and stay with the shortcomings, if you like, of the Criminal Code and its application.

Mr. Low: What I was trying to do was relate the question to the Criminal Code. Before we could take anything like specific action under the Criminal Code we would have to know whether it was escaping gas which was responsible, or we would have to know if it were effluent being poured into the river deliberately, and whether upon warning from the provincial health people and those responsible the guilty party refuses to stop it or do something to divert it.

Mr. Martin: I think I should say a word or two in view of the earlier remarks of the hon. member for Prince Albert. The situation now is, as I said this afternoon, that no one can positively say what is the cause of this pollution. When the matter was first raised, the government of Alberta thought it knew the source; and after the technical officers from the Department of National Health and Welfare and the public health department in Alberta conferred with the particular corporation—and there was full co-operation given by that corporation—it later became clear from certain other evidence that there could be no certainty as to the cause. I would not rule out what my hon. friend has suggested as a possible cause, nor would I affirm that that was the cause.

Mr. Low: No one would.

Mr. Martin: The fact is that the technical people in both federal and provincial governments are co-operatively engaged in trying to ascertain the cause of this pollution, the seriousness of which no one in this house will deny, from the point of view of odour and from the point of view of taste in particular. In addition to that, co-operation has been enlisted of the public health engineering division of the United States public service, from their industrial hygiene laboratory in Cincinnati.

The Minister of Justice has indicated that the Criminal Code as it is constituted at the present time provides remedies; but in addition to that, so our perspective will be clear, I shall call the attention of the committee to the fact that in the province of Alberta, as in other provinces, legislation exists to meet this very kind of situation. The public health act, as amended by chapter 53 of 1944, in the province of Alberta provides in section 12 (1) the following:

> The provincial board shall have the general supervision of all springs, wells, ponds, lakes, streams or rivers used as a source of a public water supply, or for agricultural, domestic or industrial purposes with reference to their purity, together with the waters feeding the same, and shall examine the same from time to time when the necessity for such examination arises, and inquire what, if any, pollution exists and the causes thereof.

In subsection 2, without reading it in extenso, authority is given to the provincial board:

> . . . to inquire into and determine any complaint made by or on behalf of a riparian proprietor entitled to the use of water, that any industrial waste or any other polluting material of any kind whatsoever, which either by itself or in connection with other matter may corrupt or impair the quality of the water or may render such water unfit for accustomed or ordinary use . . .

And so on. Then in subsection 3 we find the following:

> The provincial board may make a report to the minister upon such complaint and as to what remedial measures, if any, are required in respect to any alleged injury or invasion of right as it may deem just.

Subsection 4 reads in part:

> Where the report of the provincial board recommends the removal or degree of treatment of any such polluting material, any riparian proprietor interested or the minister may apply to a judge of the supreme court or to a district court judge by way of originating notice . . .

—to deal with the situation; and this judge is empowered in subsection 5 to make:

> . . . such order upon the report of the provincial board, or upon such further evidence as he may deem meet, and on such terms and conditions as may be deemed proper.

I am satisfied from the conversations I have had over the telephone and by telegram with the responsible provincial authorities that once the facts are properly ascertained there will be no reluctance on their part to deal with this measure as effectively as this law provides.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, first I wish to say in answer to the Minister of Justice that, to use his own words in reference to myself in regard to another matter, he either deliberately or unwittingly misconceived what I placed before this committee this evening. I in no way gave him grounds for the argument that after all before you can convict you have to have a case. That would be rudimentary even to the Minister of Justice.

What I did say was that the criminal law as it is now constituted, the sections in question, do not cover a situation such as prevails in consequence of the pollution of the North Saskatchewan river. I came before this committee for the purpose of appealing to the minister to give consideration to amending the Criminal Code, the sections in question, in order to cover a situation which more and more is affecting various parts of our country and which inevitably must be met by the Criminal Code.

I suggest changes in these two sections in order to permit prosecution once it has been established—it is so obvious that it does not need to be mentioned at all—that responsibility has been placed with the individual or corporation responsible for the condition. The Minister of National Health and Welfare says the legislature of Alberta has the power to act, and he referred to certain sections. Now, after all, is there that sense of urgency that is necessary under the circumstances that have been disclosed?

One would think to listen to the Minister of Justice that this was a trivial matter. After all, the people of northern Saskatchewan and northern Manitoba may wait and hope that some day the facts will be ascertained. What I am asking for and what they are asking for is some power to act when they are established. My hon. friend says that under legislation the province of Alberta provides controls that may be exercised. True enough; but are the people of Alberta affected by this? Not at all, not one of them. They have the large industries, but we in Saskatchewan and the people in Manitoba receive the water after it has been polluted.

No one in Alberta is affected by this. The first pollution is below the city of Edmonton. There is no sense of urgency there, however desirable the government is of action being taken. As far as Manitoba is concerned, the Minister of Justice says that there are laws there. They too are in the same position; they can do nothing. What can they do by legislative action in Manitoba to protect their people against the pollution of the streams that bring water to them in the ordinary course of nature?

There is only one thing that can meet the situation, and that is federal action in co-operation, if you will, with the provinces. There is only one means of federal action as I see it outside of the Fisheries Act, which is not too applicable to the situation here, and that is through the medium of criminal law which would make it a public nuisance when the comfort, health and welfare of the people in general are interfered with and disturbed as a result of the conduct of any group of individuals, a corporation or anyone else.

What I was asking for was simply evidence of some change being made in the criminal law to cover a situation such as this. My hon. friend surprisingly enough says that I speak for political purposes. Let me tell him—

An hon. Member: Oh, no.

An hon. Member: Never.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I wish the people in northern Saskatchewan could hear my hon. friends opposite jeering on a matter that affects every one of them. Jeering is their answer to the cry of the people in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Chevrier: There is no jeering.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Quite apart—

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

An hon. Member: We are protesting against you—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I say this—

Mr. Martin: I am sure the hon. gentleman, who is very fair in this matter, would not want to give the impression that hon. members of this house, from members of the government down, do not share with him and others their concern over this situation. I am sure he would want to state that unequivocally.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will state immediately that my hon. friend is in the position in which he has just placed himself as a result of his statement, but there were others behind him who jeered at this situation.

Mr. Garson: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I wanted—

Mr. Garson: On a question of privilege, there was no jeering on this side of the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What was it?

Mr. Garson: Any person who states there was jeering is not being accurate in his statement. There was some explanation—

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not privilege.

Mr. Garson: There was—

The Deputy Chairman: Will the Minister of Justice please state his question of privilege, after which the hon. member for Prince Albert will have an opportunity to reply.

Mr. Fulton: There is no question of privilege; he is just using—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fulton: I submit to you, sir, it is quite obvious that the minister is seeking to use a question of privilege to raise—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fulton: —something which is not a question of privilege at all.

The Deputy Chairman: It is quite impossible for the chairman to decide whether or not it is a question of privilege before he hears it. I would ask the Minister of Justice to state his question of privilege.

Mr. Fulton: He has already said something that—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Garson: The hon. member for Prince Albert was pointing his outstretched arm at the members on this side of the chamber and accusing them of jeering at him. I say that is an inaccurate statement and that his reference is to expressions of protest by us at his unwarranted remarks.

Mr. Fulton: That is not privilege.

Mr. Garson: What we were doing was expressing our disapproval of the inappropriate remarks he was making concerning the hon. member for Peace River.

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now.

The Deputy Chairman: In view of the statement that has just been made by the Minister of Justice I am sure the committee would wish to hear anything the hon. member for Prince Albert has to say, as long as it does not take us much beyond ten o'clock.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If it was not jeers, it was sneers. I still repeat that to my inexperienced ears—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —the noise that emanated from over there consisted of jeers.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the hon. member repeat what he said earlier?

Clause stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: On Monday we shall move third reading of three bills: Bill No. 79, respecting the boundary between the provinces of Ontario and Manitoba; Bill No. 177, to amend the Patent Act; Bill No. 80, respecting the Canadian forces. We shall then move to go into supply and if that motion is carried we will call two departments, public works and veterans affairs, when the items called will stand. Finally, if we reach the stage of legislation, we shall take it up in the following order: first, the War Service Grants Act; next the Telegraphs Act; and third, the fisheries convention.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, February 15, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

THE LATE MISS AGNES MACPHAIL

TRIBUTES TO FORMER MEMBER FOR SOUTHEAST GREY

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, it is fitting that mention should be made today of the passing from the Canadian scene of one of Canada's most beloved and colourful individuals, one who held a unique position in public life. Agnes Campbell Macphail came into this house in 1921, the year of the first general election which extended universal adult suffrage. A candidate for the United Farmers of Ontario, her entry into parliament at the youthful age of 30 saw her well embarked upon a parliamentary career which lasted for 19 years in this house and subsequently for two terms in the legislature of the province of Ontario.

Agnes Macphail was an example and an inspiration to all women whose interest lies in public affairs, and the record which she established has paved the way undoubtedly for those women who sit in this house and in the other place. Indeed, I think it is no exaggeration to say that her example made it possible for many women to take their places in elective offices at all levels of government. Her keen wit, coupled with her sympathetic nature, made her a formidable ally of all those causes which aroused her interest. Her memory will long be green in the hearts of those who were privileged to know her, and the name of Agnes Macphail will go down in Canadian history as an honest and courageous public figure who lent colour and substance to Canadian politics.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I want to express my appreciation to the hon. member for Hamilton West for enabling us to pay tribute to the late Agnes Macphail. The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) spoke to me and suggested it might be done, but I thought perhaps it might not be in accordance with our usual procedure. I am glad indeed that the opportunity was provided.

All I wish to say is that those of us in this house, regardless of party, who were associated with Miss Agnes Macphail came to have an affection for her and a very high regard for her sincerity of purpose. I think she will long be remembered as an outstanding member of this house who was largely responsible for promoting the idea of penitentiary reform. And those of us who sat with her here will always remember her keen interest in the welfare of those who were incarcerated in our prisons and penitentiaries.

In her passing, as has already been said, Canada has lost a famous woman and an outstanding citizen, one who served her country well. Often many people disagreed with her point of view, but none will withhold from her that admiration and respect which she earned by her work for the public generally and particularly for the women of Canada.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I agree that on occasion the practice and custom of the house might be departed from, and particularly when we are paying tribute to the first woman elected to the House of Commons. Miss Macphail was proud of that, not on her own account but rather because she looked upon her election to the house as the beginning of what she hoped would be reform in the public life of Canada so that women would take a more active part in political discussion and in the elective offices.

I know that on occasion she thought that perhaps she had not succeeded. Well, the fact of the matter is that even if it is only in this parliament that we have had a fair representation from the ladies, it is a fact that in all political parties there are far more women taking part today than was the case when she entered this house.

Miss Macphail was, as everyone knows, my predecessor in Southeast Grey and in Grey-Bruce. I had known her for a good many years, and had a deep admiration for her qualities of intelligence, her sincerity and her desire to speak on behalf of the person who perhaps did not have the facilities to do so himself. She was an outstanding advocate of causes which needed an advocate, and I am sure that she and many others who shared similar views are responsible for a good deal of the progress which has been made in this country in the past thirty years. I wish to pay this tribute to her not only in a public sense, because anyone who serves in the House of Commons for 19 years, and then in the legislature of Ontario for a further five years, undoubtedly has contributed much to the welfare of the Canadian people. But I cannot help adding what is well known in Grey-Bruce, namely, that she looked upon her public service as a means of contributing toward helping those persons who showed promise, but whose circumstances precluded the developing of that promise.

In many ways she was charitable to a degree in her private life, and this will be especially remembered in Grey-Bruce, where she will be buried tomorrow with genuine expressions of sorrow and regret at the passing of a distinguished Canadian.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

CHANGE IN ISSUING OF CIVILIAN PAY CHEQUES AT WINNIPEG STATION

Hon. R. O. Campney (Associate Minister of National Defence): On Friday last the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) asked the following question:

Is the minister aware of the fact that on Monday next, February 15, civilian employees on the R.C.A.F. station at Winnipeg will not receive their regular semi-monthly pay cheques?

I would reply to the question as follows: In the first place, the classified civilian employees at that station are and will continue to be paid on the 15th and 30th of the month as usual, so that the question as asked in regard to that class of employees is in error.

With regard to the prevailing rates employees, except in the case of messmen and cooks, such employees have always been paid on the 10th and 25th of the month. They are not therefore being paid on the 15th, so that the inference of fact in regard to them is also wrong. They are not supposed to be paid on the 15th of the month.

With regard to messmen and cooks, and this may be the root of the hon. member's question although it is not clear from the way he has worded it, these employees have heretofore been paid on the 15th and at the end of each month. As they are in fact prevailing rates employees they will hereafter be paid on the 10th and 25th in line with other prevailing rates employees. As I understand it, they are therefore being paid today, and will hereafter be paid on the 25th of this month and on the 10th and 25th of succeeding months.

CRIMINAL CODE

CHANGE IN WORDING OF MOTION OF REFERENCE

Mr. W. G. Weir (Parliamentary Assistant to the Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on January 12, 1954, as recorded on page 155 of Votes and Proceedings, it was resolved that a joint committee of both houses of parliament be appointed to inquire into and report upon the questions whether the criminal law of Canada relating to (a) capital punishment, (b) corporal punishment or (c) lotteries should be amended in any respect and, if so, in what manner and to what extent.

It was provided further that 17 members of the House of Commons, to be designated by the house at a later date, be members of the joint committee. Accordingly, on February 3, 1954, I presented a motion listing the members selected to act on the said committee. The motion was adopted by the house and is recorded at page 261 of Votes and Proceedings. It read in part as follows:

That the following members be appointed to act on the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons as provided in the motion of the Minister of Justice, passed by this house on January 12, 1954, having to do with a revision of the Criminal Code.

And then followed the names of the members of the committee.

The house will note that the wording of my motion describing the work of the committee is not strictly in line with the wording of the original motion.

In order to prevent ambiguity I am requesting leave of the house to have a change made in the records so that the same wording be used in both cases in respect of the work of the committee. The amended motion would then read as follows:

That the following members act on behalf of this house on the joint committee of both houses of parliament as provided in the motion of the Minister of Justice on January 12, 1954, and appointed to inquire into and report upon the questions whether the criminal law of Canada relating to (a) capital punishment, (b) corporal punishment or (c) lotteries should be amended in any respect and, if so, in what manner and to what extent:

Then the names of the members of the committee follow. This amendment affects in no way the terms of the reference to or the membership of the committee. If I may have the leave of the house in accepting this change I would request that the motion as amended be printed as a corrigendum to the Votes and Proceedings of this day.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

RED DEER RIVER PROJECT—SOIL SURVEY

Mr. Quelch:

1. Is a soil survey of the land that may be irrigated under the Red Deer river diversion project being carried out at the present time?

2. If so, is it being carried out as a joint undertaking between the government of Alberta and the federal government, or by the federal government alone?

3. What is the name of the person in charge of this survey?
4. How are the costs of the survey being apportioned between the two governments?
5. What has the cost of the survey been to date?
6. How many acres have been surveyed?
7. When is it expected to complete the survey?

Mr. Gardiner:

1. Survey of areas in this district requested by joint committee of Alberta department of agriculture and the P.F.R.A. was completed in 1953.

2. Survey carried out by federal government employees attached to the Alberta soil survey, which is a joint undertaking between the federal government, the provincial government, and the University of Alberta.

3. Mr. W. E. Bower, chief federal soil surveyor in Alberta.

4. The federal government provided field staff and defrayed their travelling and maintenance expenses. The University of Alberta provided office and laboratory facilities.

5. Not available as this area was included in the soil survey projects carried out in the province of Alberta from 1950 to 1953.

6. 831,000 acres.

7. Answered by No. 1.

INCOME TAX, CALGARY—INFORMATION REQUESTED

Mr. Harkness:

1. Was a letter sent out to farmers in the Calgary income tax area requiring all record books, vouchers and receipts pertaining to the income and expenses for several years back, bank pass books or ledger sheets for both current and savings accounts, and cancelled cheques, in addition to a large amount of other information?
2. If so, to how many farmers?
3. Were similar letters sent to any other class of income taxpayers?
4. If so, how many of these letters were sent out in each of the provinces?
5. If this letter was sent out, what was the purpose of same?
6. What benefit to the farmers is envisaged?

Mr. McCann:

1. Yes.

2. Approximately 500.

3. No.

4. Answered by No. 3.

5. To arrange a meeting with each farmer, at a time and place convenient to him, at which his income tax returns for specified years could be reviewed and reference made, where necessary, to his books and records supporting the figures shown on the tax returns.

6. An opportunity is afforded the farmers to clarify, with the aid of factual data, all points in their returns requiring explanation and to discuss, in general, income tax matters of interest to them.

LOSS-LEADER ADVERTISING

Mr. Diefenbaker:

Has the government given consideration to the need of bringing in legislation at the present session of parliament, in connection with loss-leader advertising practices?

Mr. Garson: The MacQuarrie committee, while it thought that the practice of loss-leader selling did not present any immediate danger, recommended that a study should be made of this practice with a view to determining its prevalence and effects, and recommending suitable amendment, if necessary, of the Combines Investigation Act. Also, during the debate on the resale price maintenance legislation, the Prime Minister stated that the government wished to give close and constant attention to any practices contrary to the public interest and that, in the event that a development was disclosed which could not be dealt with under existing legislation, the government would give serious consideration to what other legislative action it might be appropriate to recommend to parliament.

Accordingly, a study of loss-leader selling was undertaken by the director under the Combines Investigation Act, and I am informed that this study is well advanced. When a report reaches me, the government will be in a position to decide whether or not legislation should be introduced to deal with this practice. I am unable to say whether the report will be received and the necessary consideration given to it before the close of the present session, but every effort is being made to deal with the matter expeditiously.

NAVAL OFFICERS RELEASED, 1945-46

Mr. Pearkes:

1. How many officers of the Royal Canadian Navy (P.F.) were released from service between October 1, 1945 and October 1, 1946?
2. How many so released did not have sufficient service to qualify for (a) any pension; (b) maximum pension according to rank held at the time of their release?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. 42.

2. (a) 13; (b) 25.

GRAIN STORED IN BOATS AT LAKEHEAD

Mr. Hodgson:

1. Are any boats loaded with grain at the head of the great lakes to facilitate storage?
2. If so, how many and how many bushels are so stored?

Mr. Dickey: Perhaps I could answer this question orally. The answer to the first part would be "yes". The answer to the second part is "one". Then as to the number of bushels, it would be 195,073. I understand that the purpose of this question may have been to secure information with regard to the number of boats loaded at the head of the lakes which are wintering in various ports on the lakes with their loads aboard. In order to give that information I shall pass the question as an order for return and put in the information as a supplementary return.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS LAY-OFFS

Mr. Monteith:

1. How many lay-offs have taken place in the Canadian National Railways system, during the last six months?
2. How many employees have been involved in each lay-off?
3. How many employees in the Stratford division have been involved in each lay-off?
4. Are any further lay-offs contemplated in the Stratford division in the next six months?
5. Is it contemplated that any former employees will be rehired in the next six months?
6. Has the Canadian National Railways management any plans for the use in other capacities of employees no longer required because of the gradual dieselization of the system?
7. Has the management of the Canadian National Railways system any long term plans for the full utilization of the locomotive shops in Stratford?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. There was a reduction in staff at main shops in October-November 1953, and another reduction in January 1954.

2. The first reduction involved 708 employees and the second involved 784.

3. Of the above 112 were from Stratford shop in the first reduction and 75 in the second.

4. Staff requirements are affected by traffic conditions.

5. See answer to No. 4.

6. Within the provisions of wage agreements, and subject to business requirements, an endeavour is made to utilize the services of employees displaced by dieselization.

7. The locomotive shops at Stratford consist of partly old and partly modern buildings and equipment. While excellent for steam locomotive maintenance, their use for other railway purposes is limited, but is under study.

AUTOMOBILE PARTS AND ACCESSORIES

Mr. Harkness:

1. Has any investigation been made under the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act to ascertain whether automobile manufacturers, oil companies, etc., exert pressure on their dealers compelling them to purchase parts and accessories exclusively from the manufacturers or their wholesale outlets?
2. If so, with what result?

[Mr. Hodgson.]

Mr. Garson:

1. As the hon. member will recall, section 42 of the Combines Investigation Act, which was enacted in 1952, provides for the carrying out of general studies by the director and the restrictive trade practices commission. Pursuant to this section, a number of such studies have been undertaken by the director. Among these is one into distributive arrangements relating to what are generally described as automotive accessories and the like, but it is not possible to give any details at this time in view of its preliminary nature.

2. See answer to No. 1.

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES—CITIZENSHIP

Mr. Fulton:

1. How many persons are engaged in the service of the dominion government either as government employees or in a representative capacity (but not including temporary clerical employees, manual workers or artisans, employed as such by Canadian diplomatic, trade and military establishments abroad) who (a) are not Canadian citizens, or (b) hold the nationality or citizenship of some other country in addition to Canadian citizenship?
2. What are the names of any persons covered by (a) or (b) above respectively, indicating (i) the name of the country other than Canada of which he or she is a citizen or national, and (ii) the nature of such employment or service?

He said: If I have the consent of the house, I would ask that this question be dropped in order that it may be reworded.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Question dropped.

FROZEN AND CANNED HAMS IMPORTED

Mr. Ross:

1. How many pounds of frozen hams were imported into Canada in the year 1953, and what was the price paid?
2. How many came from continental Europe and how many from Northern Ireland and Eire?
3. How many canned hams were imported into Canada from continental Europe, Northern Ireland and Eire in 1953?
4. How many canned hams were exported from Canada to the United States in 1953, and what was the price received?

Mr. Dickey:

1 and 2. Frozen hams are not separately classified in Canadian import trade statistics. The imports of pork, fresh, frozen or cured, from all countries during the period January 1 to November 30, 1953, amounted to 404,415 pounds valued at $185,747. Imports of these products from the United Kingdom (including Northern Ireland) amounted to 2,449 pounds valued at $1,047. Imports from Eire amounted to 294,948 pounds valued at $150,946. There were no imports of these products from continental Europe.

3. Canned hams are not separately classified in Canadian import trade statistics but are included in a general item of "Canned meats, n.o.p.". During the period January 1 to November 30, 1953, imports under this item from the United Kingdom (including Northern Ireland) amounted to 241,461 pounds valued at $55,459 and from continental Europe 70,513 pounds valued at $46,178. There were no imports of these products from Eire.

4. Canadian exports of canned hams to the United States during the calendar year 1953 amounted to 16,939,209 pounds valued at $14,337,093.

TREASURY BOARD—ESTIMATES

Mr. Fulton:

1. With reference to the preparation of the estimates, are the discussions of treasury board confidential?

2. Are the decisions arrived at generally available for release for general information before the estimates are tabled in the house?

3. If in a particular case it were felt desirable to release information for publication before the estimates are presented to the house, by what process would a decision as to its release be made, who would decide the question, what general principles would govern the decision, and by whom would such information normally be released?

Mr. Benidickson:

1. Yes.

2. Each decision is judged on its merits.

3. The minister of the department concerned would make the decision and its release would be made by him or at his direction. It is not possible to state any general reasons as to the release of information as these would vary from case to case.

TRADE WITH RUSSIA

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. What restrictions are placed upon exports from Canada to the U.S.S.R.?

2. What commodities can be traded under present regulations between Canada and the U.S.S.R.?

3. What are the main classes of commodities which are regarded as being comprised within the term of "strategic materials"?

4. Are (a) wheat; (b) agricultural products in general, controlled or banned commodities for export to the U.S.S.R.?

Mr. Dickey:

1. No goods may be exported from Canada to the U.S.S.R. without an export permit.

2. Any commodities of purely Canadian origin which are not classified as strategic material and which are not in short supply.

3. Those types of commodities which are classified as strategic include: arms, ammunitions and implements of war and such commodities as steels, ferrous and non-ferrous metals, minerals and chemicals, and manufactured products which have a significant usage in defence industries.

4. (a) Exports of wheat are controlled but would be licensed;

(b) Exports of agricultural products in general are controlled but would be licensed.

CANNED FRUIT IMPORTS

Mr. Lennard:

How many pounds of (a) canned peaches; (b) canned fruits other than peaches, were imported into Canada from the United States during the year 1953?

Mr. Dickey:

During the period January 1 to November 30, 1953 (latest figures available), imports from the United States were as follows:—(a) Canned peaches and apricots, 8,499,929 pounds; (b) Canned fruits other than peaches and apricots, 30,359,492 pounds.

Separate figures not available.

VERDUN POST OFFICE—CHEQUES

Mr. Dufresne:

1. Is the Postmaster General aware that students employed in a temporary capacity during the Christmas season at the Verdun post office were paid with unilingual cheques?

2. Has the Postmaster General taken steps so that the cheques printed for his department will hereafter be printed in the two official languages of this country?

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare):

1 and 2. I am informed that some unilingual cheques were used at Christmas to get rid of a small stock on hand. This supply has now been disposed of and bilingual cheque forms will be available from now on.

T.C.A. FILM "NO BARRIERS"

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Did Trans-Canada Air Lines have a film produced entitled "No Barriers," since the 1st of January, 1953?

2. If so, what company produced it?

3. What was the cost?

4. Why were the facilities of the national film board not utilized?

Mr. Dickey:

1. Yes.

2. Lew Parry Film Productions of Vancouver.

3. $24,000.

4. In this case the national film board made the master print from the production negative. Another firm was used for the production, as T.C.A. was following its normal practice of distributing its business geographically within Canada as widely as possible, wherever no cost penalty is involved thereby. Both the national film board and other Canadian film producers have made films for T.C.A. in the past, and it has been found that differences in technique between producing firms bring about a desirable variety in the character of the films and the treatment of the subject of civil aviation in Canada.

BUTTER PRODUCTION AND CONSUMPTION, QUEBEC

Mr. Boisvert:

1. How many pounds of butter were produced in the province of Quebec in each of the years 1950, 1951, 1952, 1953?

2. How many pounds were consumed in the same province during each of these years?

Mr. Dickey:

1. Butter production in the province of Quebec from 1950 to 1953 (exclusive of dairy and whey butter) was as follows:

	pounds
1950	87,488,000
1951	91,363,000
1952	102,346,000
1953	112,179,000

2. Information on interprovincial shipments of butter is not sufficiently complete to calculate consumption by provinces.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

BENGOUGH-STUART ANODIZING PROCESS

Mr. Winch:

1. Did the department of reconstruction and supply, or any other government department, receive the sum of approximately $7,000 on or about January 6, 1947 from Boeing Aircraft of Canada Limited, of Vancouver, specifically designated as being moneys for transfer of royalty payments to Captain E. Windsor Bowen for his patented process being known as the Bengough and Stuart chromic acid anodizing proprietary process, and made mandatory by the department for certain specific purposes in aircraft construction, such process being covered by patent No. 265,968 and under authority of crown copyright specification DTD910? If so, has this money been paid to Captain E. Windsor Bowen, and if not, for what reason?

2. Did the department of reconstruction and supply, or any other government department, receive the sum of $4,057.04, on or about January 6, 1947 from Canadian Vickers Limited of Montreal as having been received as royalties payable to Captain E. Windsor Bowen for the use in 1942 of the Bengough-Stuart process covered under a pre-war contract made with Canadian Vickers Limited and signed by its president, and under the corporate seal of the company? If so, has this money been paid to Captain E. Windsor Bowen, and if not, for what reason?

3. Have any payments been received by any government department on Canadian patent Nos. 265,968 and 291,633 for Canadair Limited whilst it was either owned or operated by the government of Canada, and if so, what are the amounts and to whom paid?

4. Did the department of reconstruction and supply receive a request from Canadian Car and Foundry Company Limited of Montreal in the year 1947-48 that authorization be given for payment to Captain E. Windsor Bowen for its use of the anodizing process utilized in the installation of certain anodizing equipment built pursuant to communications that passed between Mr. D. A. Loucks, purchasing agent, and Mr. A. D. Neale, vice-president of the company, directly with Captain E. Windsor Bowen of London, England?

5. If so, what action was taken?

Mr. Dickey: In part 3, line 2, of this question the word "for" appears after the figure "291,633". I have discussed this with the hon. member and he informs me that this word should be "from". With that amendment it will stand as an order for return.

CROWN ASSETS DISPOSAL CORPORATION—COOEY RIFLES

Mr. Thatcher:

1. Were the 3,439 Cooey rifles, which were sold for $6,018.25, according to page 24 of the ninth annual report of the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, new or used?

2. What was the original price paid by the government for these ·22 rifles?

3. For what reasons were they declared surplus?

4. To how many companies were invitations for offers sent, in connection with the sale of these assets?

CROWN ASSETS DISPOSAL CORPORATION—MACK TRUCKS

Mr. Thatcher:

1. Were the two six-ton Mack trucks with crane, which were sold for $2,625, according to page 22 of the ninth annual report of the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, new or used?

2. What was the original price paid by the government for these trucks?

3. For what reasons were they declared surplus?

4. To how many companies were invitations for offers sent, in connection with the sale of these assets?

5. If these were used goods, on what date were they originally purchased by the department?

GRAIN STORED IN BOATS AT LAKEHEAD

Mr. Hodgson:

1. Are any boats loaded with grain at the head of the great lakes to facilitate storage?

2. If so, how many and how many bushels are so stored?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

WINNIPEG NORTH SUB-POST OFFICES

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North):

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, memoranda and other documents exchanged between any person or persons and the Post Office Department, since January 1, 1949, concerning sub-post offices in the federal constituency of Winnipeg North. Also a statement showing the locations of all sub-post offices in the federal constituency of North Winnipeg at December 31, 1953, and a copy of post office regulations in connection therewith.

FLIN FLON-NIPAWIN HIGHWAY

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all letters and telegrams which have passed between the provincial governments of Manitoba and Saskatchewan and the dominion government, since the first day of January 1954 regarding federal contribution or assistance in the building and completion of the highway between Flin Flon, Manitoba and Nipawin, Saskatchewan.

Mr. Prudham: The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources is unavoidably absent and he has asked me to request that this motion be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Motion stands.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING CO-ORDINATION ACT

AUTHORITY TO ENTER INTO AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES, CHANGES IN ADMINISTRATION, ETC.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act to meet present day requirements for defence and other purposes, including authority to enter into agreements with the provinces to grant assistance for rehabilitation training of disabled persons; also to provide for an increase in the number of members on the vocational training advisory council, for a per diem allowance for members of the council; and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

THE CONSTITUTION

INQUIRY AS TO RECONVENING OF DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): May I ask the Minister of Justice whether the government is considering the reconvening at an early date of the dominion-provincial conference on the constitution, which last met in Quebec in September 1950?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Not at an early date, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the Minister of Justice a supplementary question? Can we take it from the answer he gave a moment ago that the government has decided that the fact that our constitution cannot be amended in Canada no longer constitutes a derogation from Canadian sovereignty of such a nature as to call for early action?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, I would prefer to answer a question of that character after meditating on it for about 24 hours.

Mr. Fulton: It was not necessary to meditate when you called the conference.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

JUDGMENT ON APPLICATION FOR RATE INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I understand a judgment has been rendered today in regard to an application for certain increases in rates by the Canadian Pacific Railway. Can the minister table the judgment or give some information to the house as to its scope and contents?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have the judgment here. The application with which it deals was one by the railway association of Canada, and more particularly the Canadian Pacific Railway, in which they asked for a number of things, chief of which was an increase of freight rates of 9 per cent, the fixing of 6½ per cent as a fair rate of return on a rate base, and the consideration of net investment as the rate base. It is a long judgment having to do with the various aspects of determining a permissive level of earnings. It grants the application of Canadian Pacific to determine the net investment of the company in rail operations. For the application before it, the board adopts the amount—for use as one of the "end" tests, in considering the reasonableness of a permissive level of rates—as $1,140 million as at December 31, 1951.

In so far as the other matters I have referred to are concerned, the board of transport commissioners dismisses the application. In other words, it dismisses the application for the 9 per cent increase in freight rates. The board declined to make a declaration that a return of not less than 6½ per cent is a fair return on the net investment of the C.P.R., and it does not accept the rate base. The rate of return method proposed by the C.P.R., within the meaning of the application, would be the sole method of determining the rates.

The judgment is a 100-page document, copies of which I can have distributed to members, although not immediately, because copies will not be available for another week or ten days.

WHEAT

QUESTION AS TO FINAL PAYMENT FOR 1952-53 CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister say, as a result of his recent trip to Winnipeg, whether the 1952-53 wheat account has now been closed and whether the final payment for 1952 wheat will be made by the end of this month, in accordance with a suggestion in the Leader-Post last Thursday?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, as a result of my conversations in Winnipeg, I am of the opinion that I will get a report from the wheat board shortly. I shall consider the report and make recommendations to the governor in council. If the governor in council agrees with me I shall make an announcement in the house.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

INQUIRY AS TO CHANGE IN WEDGE CAP INSIGNIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has any change been made in the R.C.A.F. wedge cap insignia? If so, what is the nature of the change and for what reason has it been made?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I shall look into the matter and let the hon. member know.

POWER

PASSAMAQUODDY PROJECT—INQUIRY AS TO PARTICIPATION IN ECONOMIC FEASIBILITY SURVEY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which I intended asking the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), but I shall direct it to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the United States government has decided to investigate the feasibility of the development of the Passamaquoddy power project, is it the intention of the government to join in that investigation?

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very glad to call the attention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to that question. I am sure he will be glad to answer it when he gets back.

Mr. Brooks: If the Secretary of State for External Affairs is to be away for ten days I suggest—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

POST OFFICE

FIVE-DAY 40-HOUR WEEK—LIST OF LOCALITIES CONCERNED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) or to his parliamentary assistant (Mr. Kirk) or to the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) or to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott)? Will a list of the localities where the five-day 40-hour week will come into effect for Post Office employees be published soon?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I am waiting impatiently myself, Mr. Speaker, and I believe it will.

Mr. Knowles: Will it be tabled in the house when it is published?

Mr. Abbott: Undoubtedly.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

THE HON. MEMBER FOR VEGREVILLE—WELCOME BACK TO HOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, it comes as a great thrill when an hon. member who has been seriously ill returns to this house. On behalf of my associates I have great pleasure in welcoming back to the house the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

ONTARIO-MANITOBA BOUNDARY ACT

DEFINITION OF PROVINCIAL BOUNDARIES

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved the third reading of Bill No. 79, respecting the boundary between the provinces of Ontario and Manitoba.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when we were in committee of the whole on this bill I asked certain questions which the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys was not able at that time to answer. I do not intend to take up the time of the house on this matter now, but I just wish to say I have figured the matter out for myself and even though the minister did not have the answer I can say that the line which is confirmed by this bill was the line which was actually in existence and accepted prior to the last redistribution bill. This means that although we have lost 200 acres of good Manitoba territory to the province of Ontario there is no change as to the boundary between the federal constituencies of Churchill and Kenora-Rainy River so far as this bill is concerned.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

PATENT ACT

AUTHORIZATION FOR INCREASES IN STATUTORY FEES

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State) moved the third reading of Bill No. 177, to amend the Patent Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN FORCES ACT

AMENDMENTS TO DEFENCE SERVICES PENSION ACT, NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT, CANADIAN FORCES ACT, ETC.

Hon. R. O. Campney (Associate Minister of National Defence) moved the third reading of Bill No. 80, respecting the Canadian forces.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

UNEMPLOYMENT—MOTION FOR EXAMINATION BY COMMITTEE ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon it is my intention to move, on behalf of the official opposition, an amendment having to do with the question of unemployment. This is the first opportunity afforded us, since the house reconvened after the Christmas recess, to have a discussion of this particular problem. We believe that the time has now come for parliament, as distinguished from the cabinet, to take a hand in giving consideration to this important question.

Proposed Committee on Unemployment

For many weeks now, from many of the constituencies represented in this house, there have been reports of unemployment. Then when the Labour Gazette for the month of December, 1953, appeared we found there, dealing with this question, a statement which gave some concern. It is under the heading "Manpower Situation in Local Areas" and reads as follows:

> Further declines in industrial activity during November resulted in a considerable increase in the number of idle workers.

Then further in the article we find this paragraph:

> A great deal of the increase in unemployment was the usual result of the oncoming winter; but comparison with last year indicates a marked non-seasonal element in this increase. It is evident, in fact, that employment expansion in manufacturing and other industries this fall has not been sufficient to absorb the additions to the labour force during the year.

Subsequently from time to time questions were asked in the house and on January 26 the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) made quite a lengthy statement outlining the position of the government. That statement will be found commencing at page 1446 of Hansard for January 26. The minister pointed out that there are two sets of figures having to do with the extent of the unemployment problem. First of all, there are the figures kept by the national employment service showing the numbers of those who have applied for work. Then there are the figures issued by the bureau of statistics based on a survey of those without jobs and seeking work.

He gave some of the figures. For example, those without jobs and seeking work as of December 12—I think that was the date—amounted to 190,000. That figure was up from 132,000 the year previous; in other words, there was an increase from 2·5 per cent of the labour force to 3·6 per cent. He also gave the figures of those listed with the national employment service as looking for work. As of December 12, 1953, that figure was 338,000, up from December of 1952 when the figure was 237,000. In other words, there was an increase of over 100,000 in numbers and also an increase in the percentage, from 4·5 per cent to 6·4 per cent of the labour force.

The minister went on to explain that there was always a certain amount of seasonal unemployment in Canada; that is a fact which, of course, we all admit. But then he listed the types of industry in which unemployment was becoming a problem. For example, he said:

For some, import competition has become keener. This has been particularly true in the case of clothing, textiles and electrical appliances industries. Others, such as sawmilling, farm implements and certain base metal producers have found world markets becoming increasingly competitive. Forestry operations in eastern Canada are currently proceeding at the low levels of last winter, partly because of improved technology in forestry operations, and partly because of softer lumber and pulp markets.

He also said this:

Aside from the difficulties experienced by some industries, there has been a tightening up in many sections of the economy and, as has been the experience of other trading nations, we have gradually moved from a seller's to a buyer's market.

Then the Minister of Labour went on to deal with the action that could be taken by the government and he mentioned first the commencement of a public works program. That idea did not seem to appeal to him greatly because with regard to it he said:

At present, it seems to me that it would be unwise to embark upon a greatly expanded public works program.

He pointed out that the unemployment insurance fund was carrying the load or the burden of unemployment but he also referred to family allowances and old age pensions. Just what they had to do with it I never could quite see, but here is what the minister said:

Many unemployed workers are also being assisted by family allowance payments and by old age pensions. In addition, the provincial and municipal governments are making social welfare payments which benefit those in need.

By that I presume he meant that relief was being paid out to some of those Canadians who were unable to get work. He ended the statement with these words:

There is, however, a residual problem and the most effective way of solving it is through the joint efforts of the provincial and municipal governments and of the federal government.

That was on January 26. On February 9 the Canadian Congress of Labour met in my home city of Vancouver, and I believe similar action was taken in some of the other cities in this country. We find their meeting reported in the press as follows on February 10, under the heading of "Rising Unemployment Creating Concern":

The growing spectre of unemployment is causing increasing concern among Vancouver labour leaders.

A suggestion that the Union of Unemployed Workers—grim reminder of depression days—be re-activated was called for Tuesday night by the Greater Vancouver and Lower Mainland Labour Council (CCL).

"There were 100,000 more Canadians unemployed in December than the same month in 1952," said secretary-treasurer Vic Forster.

[Mr. Green.]

"Vancouver now has the second highest unemployment population in the country."

Council recommended holding a joint meeting with the B.C. Trade Union Congress and the B.C. Federation of Labour on the subject.

On the following day, February 10, the Bank of Canada issued their report for the year 1953 and we find the governor of the bank referring to the seriousness of this unemployment problem. At page 4 of the report he has this to say:

Employment during 1953 averaged about 2 per cent above 1952. About one-half of the increase occurred in manufacturing industries and the remainder largely in trade and services. Unemployment for most of the year was slightly lower than in 1952.

Then here are the striking words in his report:

But in the latter part of 1953 employment did not keep pace with the annual increase in the labour force and in December the number of persons without jobs and seeking work was estimated at 190,000 as compared with 132,000 in December 1952.

The governor was obviously referring there to the figures issued by the bureau of statistics and not to the numbers who had applications for work on file with the national employment service. On the same day, February 10, a delegation met members of the cabinet, and we have a press report of what happened at that meeting which is really quite striking. The heading of the article is "Warns labour pricing itself out of jobs". The first paragraph reads:

Labour this morning was firmly lectured by Acting Prime Minister Howe to face the cold economic facts of life.

Apparently the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) wound up his lecture to these labour representatives with the following statement:

Flatly, he informed them he saw no immediate improvement in the prospects of their industry or their employment and that they had better hunt jobs in other than the farm implement plants.

That seems a rather dictatorial attitude for the Acting Prime Minister of this country to take. However, there you have the lecture which was delivered by the right hon. gentleman less than a week ago. The following day, February 11, a joint submission was made to the cabinet by the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada and the Canadian Congress of Labour. These organizations were represented by four very distinguished Canadians, the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada by Percy R. Bengough, president, and Gordon G. Cushing, general secretary-treasurer, and the Canadian Congress of Labour by A. R. Mosher, president, and Donald MacDonald, secretary-treasurer. These men are all well known from coast to coast for their sane and reasonable approach to public problems. I have known Mr. Bengough for many years. He came here from Vancouver some years ago to head the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, and the west coast has not had a finer citizen than Mr. Bengough. When he takes a stand he does so because he sincerely believes in the policy he is advocating and is looking toward the best interests of the nation.

In making this submission on unemployment these men represented about 955,000 Canadians. They spoke for nearly one million of our fellow Canadians. The very fact that the submission was a joint one indicates its importance, because these two great bodies have not made a joint submission for several years. I have their submission here and I propose to quote from the first part of it because I think it sets out the problem in a very clear way. It opens in this way:

> The joint delegation appearing before you today represents the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada and the Canadian Congress of Labour. We do so to discuss with you the serious current unemployment situation and to place before you certain recommendations and suggestions which we believe will relieve it.

Then we have the first heading: "How much unemployment is there?" The submission continues:

> At the middle of December, there were 338,066 unplaced applicants at N.E.S. offices.

That of course was the approximate figure given by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) in the house on January 26. The submission continues:

> These figures are now nearly two months old. What has been happening since? Between mid-December, 1952, and mid-February, 1953, the number of unplaced applicants rose by over 69 per cent. If the same thing has happened this year—and worse may have happened—the number now must be over 550,000. This means that about one worker in every seven is unemployed.
> Economists generally agree that, even under conditions of full employment, when there are enough jobs to go around, at any given moment there will be from 3 to 5 per cent of the workers unemployed because they have just left one job and not yet got another. This is what the economists call "frictional" unemployment.

I emphasize these words that follow:

> Plainly, however, our present unemployment in Canada is far too big to be shrugged off as merely "frictional". Nor can it be merely "seasonal". The mid-December figure was 42·5 per cent above the year before.

Then the submission goes on to explain and point out where the unemployment is to be found, and it sums up the matter in this way:

> For every region, the real percentage of workers unemployed is well above normal even for this time of year.

I was interested to note that they break down the situation into metropolitan areas, major industrial areas, major agricultural areas and minor areas. Here is what the report says with respect to the different areas:

> Of the metropolitan areas, three, Vancouver-New Westminster, Quebec-Levis and St. John's, Newfoundland were in "substantial surplus"—

The reference is to substantial surplus of labour.

> —five, Montreal, Winnipeg, Hamilton, Calgary and Edmonton, in "moderate surplus", and only two, Toronto and Ottawa-Hull, in "approximate balance". For these areas, "substantial surplus" means over 9·9 per cent unemployed, and "moderate surplus" 5·9 to 9·9 per cent.
> Of the major industrial areas, twelve, including Saint John, Moncton, Three Rivers, Lake St. John, Brantford, Cornwall and New Glasgow, were in "substantial surplus", and seventeen, including Halifax, Windsor, Oshawa, London, Sudbury, Sydney and the Niagara peninsula were in "moderate surplus". Only one, Guelph, was in "approximate balance". For these areas "substantial surplus" means over 11·9 per cent unemployed, and "moderate surplus" 6·9 to 11·9 per cent.

I would remind hon. members that these are not January or February figures but go back to December. I continue:

> Of the major agricultural areas, two, Charlottetown and Riviere du Loup, were in "substantial surplus", over 13·9 per cent unemployed, seven were in "moderate surplus", 6·9 to 13·9 per cent unemployed, and five in "approximate balance".
> Of the minor areas, twenty-one were in "substantial surplus", twenty-four in "moderate surplus", 6·9 to 13·9 per cent, and twelve in "approximate balance".

The submission indicates that this unemployment was not in a small group but in a wide variety of industries in Canada. Then the submission quotes from the Labour Gazette for January as follows:

> During the last few months, the expansionary trend in output and employment in the Canadian economy has lost some of its momentum.

These labour leaders conclude the first part of their submission with these words:

> But the number of workers hasn't. The growth of employment is not keeping pace with the growth of the labour force. The result, inevitably, is increasing unemployment. Present unemployment is far beyond "frictional" or "seasonal". It is neither localized in particular industries nor in particular geographical areas. Whatever the causes of this alarming situation, it is clear that something drastic is happening to the Canadian economy and that something must be done about it.

One would have thought that a submission of that kind made by these responsible Canadian leaders would have been taken very seriously. Mind you, some of the members of the cabinet may have treated it in that light, but we find again that even these leaders were given a lecture. This time the lecturer was not the Acting Prime Minister but the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). He undertook to show these labour leaders where they were off the rails. I have the press dispatch of February 11 appearing in the Montreal Gazette, as follows:

Jobless Increase Alarming—Labour.
Abbott Takes Sharp Issue
With Unions' Figure of 580,000 Idle

And the dispatch goes on to say:

Spokesmen for the federal cabinet and for Canada's two largest labour congresses today came into sharp disagreement on the seriousness of the country's current unemployment.

A joint brief from the congresses described the situation as "alarming", but Finance Minister Abbott suggested the labour groups' jobless figures are wrong and said the winter unemployment picture is only "unpleasant."

Union officials claimed, in a submission to cabinet members, that unemployment now stands around 580,000, which would be a post-war peak.

Mr. Abbott held it was much lower, and he cautioned labour against taking a "too gloomy" outlook on the ground that this could slow down business expansion.

Apparently the highest post-war figure was 434,000 unemployed in 1949.

On the following day, February 12, these labour leaders issued a statement as a result of their interview with the cabinet. I received a copy and I presume every other member in the house was furnished with one. To my mind it is a most impressive document, and opens with these words:

Yesterday afternoon the enclosed joint submission on unemployment was presented to the Minister of Labour and other members of the cabinet.

It reviews the present unemployment situation in Canada as seen by the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada and the Canadian Congress of Labour and proposes certain remedies to relieve the present serious situation.

We regret the attitude of ministers in attendance was to regard the present high number of unemployed as not being a serious situation. It was suggested that as responsible labour leaders in Canada our organizations should not propagate an attitude of gloom which might have a retarding effect on plans for the coming year. Nevertheless we presented to the government the picture as we see it.

When reports start appearing in the daily press of soup kitchens being opened, bread lines being formed, unemployed workers rebelling at low unemployment insurance payments, families being evicted from their homes, all because of insecurity and unemployment, it is time to take this problem seriously.

On that same afternoon of Friday, February 12, the Minister of Finance was questioned in the house, and on that occasion he did not seem to take the situation any more seriously than he had done before. His statement, as reported at page 2026 of Hansard, is as follows:

These are some of the measures which the government has taken to adapt government policy to current conditions. If economic activity declines, the government is in a position to take stronger action in these and other directions, but I should like to emphasize that as I and my colleagues view the present situation there is no justification for stronger action—

[Mr. Green.]

The following day a report was issued by the bureau of statistics showing that unemployment insurance benefits in December of 1953 totalled $16,882,000 as compared with $10,926,000 a year earlier and $10,172,000 for the month of November, 1953. It shows that compensation was paid for 5,413,000 days of idleness as against 3,586,000 in December of 1952 and that there were increases in December in the number of initial and renewal claims in all the provinces, as compared with the same time last year.

I have gone to some length in giving these figures and reading these statements because they lay the groundwork for the amendment I am going to move. We believe this problem of unemployment is important and that it is serious. We are not trying to frighten the Canadian people or to upset plans for the development of the country. But we are convinced that the unemployment question is now serious, and that it should be faced at this time, rather than weeks or months hence.

The submission of the labour leaders, in its closing paragraph, says this:

When unemployment reaches the proportions now being experienced in Canada, it has more than economic effects. It carries with it social problems and political potentials which cannot be ignored.

Unemployed workers and their families must be relieved of their hardship and suffering. But equally important, we must create and maintain a stable Canada, economically, socially and politically.

I believe there is great value in acting on this problem without delay. It is obvious that there are wide differences between the situation as portrayed by the labour leaders and the picture given by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), by the Minister of Finance and, presumably, by other members in the cabinet. Frankly, there is not very much hope in the statements of any of these ministers that this problem is going to be dealt with effectively or at an early date.

In any event we believe that parliament, as distinct from the cabinet, has a responsibility in this matter. The private member of parliament, attending here as a representative of thousands of his fellow Canadians, has a direct responsibility to do something about the question. Parliament must be supreme in this land. For too long now parliament has sat back and allowed the cabinet to do everything. Parliament has been brushed aside by the cabinet ever since war broke out in 1939. It is time that sort of thing stopped. Parliament must no longer be pushed into the background; and it is the responsibility of private members of parliament to see that we have an accurate picture with regard to unemployment today, and that they have an opportunity to make recommendations as to what should be done to meet it.

There is only one way in which parliament can get at the problem, and that is by setting up a special committee—and setting it up at once. We believe there should be such a committee, and that its first job should be to examine the unemployment situation and find out just exactly what the figures are. Either side may be wrong: perhaps the labour leaders are too high; the cabinet is probably much too low. But let members of the House of Commons find out for themselves what the actual unemployment situation in Canada today is. And, having done this, let them recommend to the house and the government the steps which could be taken to meet the situation, both the short-term and the long-term problem. Let such a committee bring in worth-while recommendations which, I believe, would be of great help to the nation.

And so, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker):

That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"whereas the facts respecting unemployment recently presented to the government by Canada's two largest labour organizations are widely at variance with the statements issued by the government,

Now, therefore, be it resolved that this house is of the opinion that a select committee should be appointed immediately for the purpose of examining into and reporting upon the actual unemployment situation throughout Canada and for the purpose of making recommendations to this house as to short-term and long-term methods for dealing effectively with this problem".

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have listened attentively to the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra in moving his amendment. I do not propose to refer specifically to the amendment at this time because in the course of my own remarks there may be some that will have reference to it indirectly and I hope will answer some of the questions that are in the minds of hon. members.

My reason for entering the debate at this juncture is that I felt, before it had gone too far, it would be helpful to give to hon. members information we now have available from the last labour force survey and national employment service survey for January as to the numbers about which my hon. friend spoke. The information which I will give will be contained in the regular monthly press statement which will be released very shortly. My reason for jumping the gun on it and giving totals here is that I felt that if this debate came up today it would be much better to have up to date totals for discussion rather than discuss figures a month old. The press statement of course will contain fuller details. Incidentally, I should like to express my thanks to some of the hard-working officials of the dominion bureau of statistics, the unemployment insurance commission, and the Department of Labour, for sacrificing some of their week end to make this possible.

I will touch first upon the survey of the dominion bureau of statistics. The total number of people estimated to be in our Canadian civilian working force during the week ended January 23, 1954, was 5,242,000 persons. This represents an increase of some 32,000 persons over the estimate of approximately the same date one year ago. Out of that total labour force of 5,242,000 persons there were 4,465,000 persons working full time during the survey week ended January 23, 1954. For purposes of this discussion and this reckoning, full-time employment is defined as 35 hours or more of work per week. It is estimated that at January 23, 357,000 people worked fewer than 35 hours; another 139,000 had jobs but did no work during the survey week, owing to temporary lay-offs, illness, labour disputes, bad weather and a number of other miscellaneous reasons; while there were 280,000 persons who were, to quote the phrase of the dominion bureau of statistics, "without jobs and seeking work".

Mr. Green: Are those figures on the same basis as the figure of 190,000 which the minister gave in his statement in January?

Mr. Gregg: For the previous month, at the 12th of December, 1953, yes. A year earlier, in the month of January, 1953, the estimated number working 35 hours or more was 4,533,000; the number who worked fewer than 35 hours was 321,000 in January, 1953, and those with jobs but not at work numbered 169,000. At the same time there were 187,000 persons "without jobs and seeking work".

I will now turn to the information available from the national employment service operations of the unemployment insurance commission. The number of applications for jobs listed with the national employment service offices across Canada—there are about 220 of them—on January 21, 1954, was 524,000. This figure represents an increase of 140,000 over the total on the corresponding date of 1953; that is January, 1953. As I indicated to the house last month, these two sets of figures—which the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra referred to—are the product of two quite different types of operations.

They do not contradict each other, and each is, I think, valuable for its own purposes, and one supplements the other. I know that hon. members will realize that there are many complications involved in trying to find the measure of those who are unemployed.

Mr. Green: Before the minister goes on will he tell me whether the figure of 524,000 who applied for work is on the same basis as the figure which he gave on January 26 of 338,000 in January?

Mr. Gregg: I have not that figure before me immediately, but the figure of 524,000 which I gave just now is the figure for those who applied for jobs and were listed by the national employment service on January 23, 1954. I think the figure my hon. friend has is the correct one for December 12, 1953.

Mr. Green: In December, 1953, it was only 338,000.

Mr. Gregg: I think that is the correct figure.

One approach that may assist us to place the situation in better perspective is to try and break down those who are unemployed in two or three broad categories, and even those categories may overlap one upon the other. One group includes those workers who are idle owing to constantly occurring shifts of workers between jobs, or who are idle owing to temporary plant shut-down, resulting from break-downs or fires, labour management disputes and so on. A certain amount of this kind of unemployment is not only unavoidable but essential, since it is a necessary part of labour mobility in the kind of changing economy we have in Canada.

Now, this kind of unemployment is referred to by the economists as "frictional" unemployment, as it was referred to in the brief presented by the joint committee of the two labour congresses the other day.

The second kind of unemployment with which we are all familiar—I do not need to talk about it—is that which occurs regularly each year as a result of normal climate changes or other annual recurring changes affecting production and employment. This will be referred to as seasonal unemployment and it is usually met with during our very cold winters, with which everyone is familiar.

Frictional unemployment and seasonal unemployment make up by far the largest proportion of our current unemployment. The remainder results mainly from adjustments in production in response to such factors as shifts in consumer demand, high inventories or keener international competition. These broad distinctions of those unemployed help us to put the unemployment problem which faces Canada today into some kind of perspective. It helps the public to consider more intelligently the kind of action needed.

My hon. friend referred to the statement which I made to the house last month. I think it is fair to say that it would be wasteful and ineffective to undertake a public works program to deal with unemployment that is frictional in nature or even largely seasonal. This is what I had in mind in my earlier statement to the house when I suggested that a special public works program would not be effective in dealing with our current unemployment problem this winter.

Of course, public works or national projects increase the sum total of employment, but I was thinking of the seasonal unemployment situation in 1954. In the case of what I have called frictional unemployment 220 local offices of the national employment service in all parts of Canada help people to make shifts between jobs as quickly and as easily as possible. During the month of December, that is two months ago, these offices made some 63,000 placements. That was made at a time when seasonal unemployment was closing in. This figure is actually not very much lower than the figure for December, 1952, during which some 73,000 placements were made.

In addition to these local placement activities our national employment service endeavours to bring workers and jobs together over great distances, either on an individual basis or through the organized movement of large numbers of workers. Some of these movements are regularly undertaken in co-operation with the provinces.

There is a minimum amount of this type of frictional unemployment always present in Canada. This is indicated by the fact that even during the high employment months of last summer, and they were high, the number of persons registered for jobs with the national employment service did not fall below 161,000. Seasonal unemployment in our Canadian economy is always high during the winter of course and it reaches a peak in the late months of the winter or during the early spring.

During the years of general manpower shortage during world war II the volume of seasonal unemployment was at a low level. During the post-war years, as economic pressures gradually eased, the volume of seasonal unemployment has increased year by year. The number employed in the country's seasonal industries has also grown year by year.

Another factor is that the woods industry which used to employ large numbers of persons in the winter months has through mechanization and an increase in its activities during the summer reduced the number of additional workers taken on during the winter months and also has reduced the length of their period of employment.

In my statement to the house last month I pointed out that the industries which contributed most to seasonal unemployment during the winter are construction, the retail trade, fruit and vegetable preserving, water transportation, saw and planing mills, hotels and restaurants, meat and fish products and pulp and paper mills. The decline in employment on the average each winter in these industries amounts to around 300,000 persons. The total number affected by the reduction in employment in all industries reducing their activities during the winter months is a good deal higher than this total of 300,000, although many of those laid off withdraw temporarily from the labour force.

In many cases the most practical approach to reducing the extent of seasonal unemployment is constructive action taken by both management and organized labour. There are, however, in addition to what the workers and employers can do, some steps being taken by the government. In the case of the federal government the local employment offices have been encouraging both large and small employers in their areas to plan their work so that as many jobs as possible are done during the relatively slack winter months. I would like to pay a compliment in this connection to the representatives of both management and labour as well as to public-spirited citizens generally for the assistance they have given to the work of our local offices in this and other ways through the local, regional and national employment committees.

As I said earlier in the house, an inquiry is being made into seasonal unemployment by the national employment committee at the request of the national advisory council on manpower. In addition the Department of Labour has undertaken in its economics and research branch some basic studies of seasonal unemployment. These studies are directed at determining the pattern of seasonal swings in employment in each of the major seasonal industries and discovering practical ways in which seasonal variations in employment can be reduced. This work, it will be fully appreciated, cannot yield direct results overnight, but I am convinced that this type of fundamental research will in time produce, in co-operation with industry, some valuable suggestions for further action.

I might mention here that important technical developments have occurred in such industries as construction which are helping to extend employment throughout the winter months.

I have tried to deal with frictional and seasonal unemployment at some length. I know that the house will not want me to try to deal with each of these industries that have been discussed here, but I should like to say just a word with regard to the coal mining industry in both the maritimes and the west.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister permit a question before he proceeds? Can he indicate to the house what proportion of the present unemployment is due to piled-up inventories and the like, to which he made reference, or to changes in requirements and production? What is the proportion estimated by his officials?

Mr. Gregg: I could say what I think it is, but my guess would not be any better than that of my hon. friend. I did state a little while ago that this task of producing statistics on unemployment is at best only a very good estimate. It would be impossible for me to make an estimate as to the proportions he asks for that would be any good to my hon. friend.

The decline in the coal industry has resulted from a combination of factors such as the substitution of oil for coal in domestic and industrial use, the increased efficiency of coal-burning equipment, and in the Cape Breton industry the mechanization of some of the Dominion Coal Company's mines in an effort to improve the competitive position of the product through increased output per man.

The unemployment situation has been aggravated in such areas as Minto—the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) will recognize reference to the Minto and Chipman areas—because the other main industries of lumbering and logging are operating considerably below normal levels. At the present time, however, there is every indication from the maritimes area that employment in most mines will not fall further at least over the course of the next few months. I would like to express my satisfaction in regard to the fact that my colleague the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) has not only visited the area himself with members of the coal board but has also instructed an expert in the use of coal, in the person of Professor Christie, to visit the area next week.

Mr. Brooks: I would like to ask the minister a question. Could he tell me whether the reduction in the consumption of coal by the Canadian National Railways from Minto has been made in favour of coal mined in some other part of Canada?

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Speaker, I can only speak offhand, but in the maritime region, to which I believe my hon. friend is referring, my opinion is that it has been reduced slightly so far owing to dieselization, but not I believe by competition from coal from other areas.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra referred to the delegations which visited Ottawa last week. Members of the government have been meeting a good many delegations during the past week or so on this matter of unemployment. The hon. member referred particularly to meetings with the joint delegation of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada and the Canadian Congress of Labour which came to meet members of the government last Thursday. We discussed, in the presence of many members of this house from all parties, many of the problems connected with the present unemployment situation. Hon. members know the tenor of the discussions, and I do not think any hon. members present could say that anyone gave anyone else a lecture. I certainly did not. They did not give us a lecture and I am certain the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) did not attempt to give them a lecture. I did state, as reported, that I felt in discussing this question of statistics that while everyone was entitled to his own opinion, our national employment service estimate of this year, listed in our 220 offices across Canada, as regards the number of those seeking work was greater than those who were actually out of work. I believe some of those present did not agree with that, though I think each of us recognizes that we are all entitled to our own opinion.

The close interest which the delegates demonstrated, evidence of which is found in the brief from which the hon. member quoted, is appreciated by me as Minister of Labour and by the government. It is our desire, as it is theirs, that human hardship be lessened as much as it can possibly be.

Some of the proposals laid before the government in their joint representation at that time are already being implemented. For example, an increase in grants to countries that have not the same opportunities for development as Canada. The other representations that they made will be given careful study.

There is no doubt some of the industries I have mentioned are experiencing difficulties, but offsetting these there are many which are in excellent condition, even in midwinter. I shall not review these today because I hope some of my colleagues may wish to speak later on in this debate on these matters. I would like to say that in so far as training can assist workers who have been laid off in industries where production has declined, the Department of Labour is prepared to make its facilities fully available. While that may only take care of a small part of the problem, it means that every unskilled worker who can be made into a skilled or semi-skilled worker is almost automatically assured of employment on a year-round basis.

Today there are very few skilled workers without work. Wherever workers are willing to enter other fields of employment, the Department of Labour in co-operation with the provincial governments is prepared to help them acquire greater skills under the Canadian vocational training program. Over the years since world war II some 408 thousand persons have been trained under this program, apart from those trained in vocational schools. It is impossible to assess how much the development of Canada, by this means, is due to the training received by nearly half a million young people, included in which figure, of course, is the great body of young men and women who came out of the services and took up vocational training. At least an equal number have received training in these vocational schools with assistance under our federal-provincial training agreement. This total includes, in a number of provinces, persons who were unemployed at the time their training commenced. Such people are given an allowance for board and lodging in addition to their training, provided jointly by the federal and provincial governments.

I might also point out that the federal government is doing a great deal to provide support to those who are unemployed. The present unemployment insurance program covers 78 per cent of our wage and salary workers at the present time. This coverage has increased since 1945, as the figures I am now about to give will demonstrate.

On November 1, 1945, the total number of wage and salary earners, in round numbers, was 3,083,000. The number covered by unemployment insurance amounted to 2,101,000; the percentage covered by unemployment insurance amounted to 68 per cent. On November 1, 1949, these figures were, 3,688,000 workers, 2,569,000 were covered by insurance, or 70 per cent. On November 1, 1953, the total number of workers amounted to 4,107,000 and the number covered by unemployment insurance was 3,219,000, or 78 per cent.

In the calendar year 1953 over $148 million was paid out in unemployment insurance benefits, as well as supplementary benefits paid to workers whose benefit rights expired between January 1 and April 15.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra indicated that such things as family allowances and old age security payments had nothing to do with unemployment. But, Mr. Speaker, if they did not come from the taxpayer by way of the federal government to these people, the workers of Canada, through some channel, would have to be provided with these moneys, otherwise their standard of living would be very much lower.

As my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), pointed out recently, the anticipated expenditure by the federal government for 1953-54 on family allowances will amount to $349 million, $345 million for old age security and $22 million for this government's share of old age assistance, in addition to which there are expenditures over the whole range of government activity covering every department which is helping to maintain employment for many hundreds of thousands in Canada.

I might add that one of the most important factors at the moment is what the government is doing during this session in extending the National Housing Act in order to make available a larger amount of money for housing construction and for employment in the construction of houses. I think every hon. member will agree the government has done much to bring about a favourable climate under which employment opportunities have greatly extended in Canada throughout the past year. The high level of employment has been such that, as far as we know at any rate, there has been little call on the resources of any of the ten provincial governments. As I said when I began, Mr. Speaker, my object in speaking at this time is only to try to give the house some of the facts concerning this situation. I think it is important that we should quietly and sanely look at the facts and, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) said, maintain a sane approach to this problem and not attempt to put it on any other ground than a desire to resist hardship that may face any of our fellow Canadians.

Not in this house but outside of it I have lately heard such expressions as "a national catastrophe". What a remark for anyone to make about a nation such as ours, when we have all been talking with the greatest of gusto about our great national resources and about the great enterprise of our people; and I think we have been talking that way with truth. Such an expression is, I think, not only untrue but is one which reflects upon our faith in an economy in which we can take a good deal of justifiable pride.

I am going to admit right away that to those families whose breadwinners have been thrown out of work—and I can speak, for example, of my own town of Marysville—it is an extremely serious situation. I might refer also to Dominion, the town of my friend the hon. member for Cape Breton South. Those families and others like them elsewhere in Canada have our deepest sympathy. It might become much more serious for those families if nothing whatever stood between them and outright want.

The provinces have responsibilities to help guard their people against hardship. I for one have no reason to believe other than that the provinces are effectively helping this winter if and where they find it necessary.

As I have stated, the federal government has assumed responsibilities in this combined effort to guard Canadians against the hardships of unemployment. It has a duty to sponsor national policies that will encourage a high level of employment. This the federal government has done and will continue to do. The number of people in productive work in Canada today at mid-winter indicates that. There are just about 5 million now working out of our 15 million total population of men, women and children.

The federal government—in fact, my department—has a definite duty to assist in the maintenance of industrial peace in those industries which are national in scope and which come under federal jurisdiction. Industrial peace is, of course, one of the greatest defences against unemployment. A strike not only causes hardship to the families of the workers on strike, but in our closely-knit economy it often causes hardship to those engaged in dependent and related production processes. Owing to the good will and co-operation of labour and management in those industries coming under the federal labour laws, I am glad to say that there have been only three strikes with not more than 2,000 workers involved during the past year, and there are no strikes at the present time within the federal field.

The federal government has a duty, which I have defined, to help find jobs for workers who lose their jobs and to administer benefits, under the unemployment insurance principle, to workers while seeking jobs. We are carrying out those duties, as I have tried to outline. In 1953 our national employment service placed 993,000 workers. Even in the month of December 63,000 workers were placed. As to insurance benefits, at the beginning of this year over 200,000 persons were in receipt of regular insurance benefits. You will say that a good many of those benefits will run out before the winter is through. That is true. But last winter—which is the latest year for which we have the full record of supplementary benefits—between January 1 and April 15, supplementary benefits were paid to 136,000 workers. This year, of course, the number will be greater.

As I have noted, in the calendar year 1953 a grand total of $148 million was paid out in unemployment insurance benefits. Of that total 80 per cent came from the employers and employees but 20 per cent came from federal taxpayers.

Let me remind the house also that it is to the families of the workers in Canada both insured and non-insured that the $349 million in family allowances this year will go. The workers of Canada would have had to find some other way through private, municipal or provincial channels to provide the $367 million which went last year to the aged citizens of this country, had it not been paid by the federal government through the federal government taxpayers.

These are only some of the main items to indicate the direct action which the federal government has taken within the realm of its responsibility. An impressive story is available on the part that various federal departments play in sponsoring activities which have a vital impact upon Canadian employment opportunities, and I hope it will be discussed during this debate. Just as I have welcomed the constructive suggestions and criticisms of the great national unions and those put forward by the mover of this resolution today, so will I listen attentively to any suggestions that may be put forward as this debate proceeds this afternoon.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I am glad I tried to raise this question last Thursday as a matter of urgency. I at least directed the thoughts of other people to the matter, but apparently did not make any great impression. This question of unemployment is not going to find a solution in the appointment of a committee of the House of Commons. It is a question that demands action. In the experience of most members of this house, the appointment of a committee is merely a convenient way of shelving a question and one which the people who want to send it to a committee have of getting rid of it for the time being. I am therefore disappointed—

Mr. Fulton: That was not the case with the old age security committee, as the hon. member himself will recall.

Mr. Gillis: I am disappointed with the approach of the official opposition.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the hon. member a question? Did he not support the setting up of a committee to inquire into the matter of old age security, and would he not agree that that committee produced useful results?

[Mr. Gregg.]

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Speaker, my learned friend apparently does not understand the matter which is before the house. The matter of social security is a long-range program; it can go on for a long time and there is no finality to it. This question is one of urgency. What I said a moment ago still stands. You are dealing here with the bread and butter of people. It is a matter that should not require much study either by the government or by the members of the house. It is a matter that we have been faced with since 1914. It is a matter of war, false prosperity, depression and another war. Most members of this house have gone through all that. It should not be difficult for us to recognize the symptoms again. Unemployment is just a symptom of a disease. Once a good doctor recognizes the early symptoms of a disease, he will go to work and do what medical science tells him he should do in order to prevent the patient from going through all the agony of the disease and then succumbing to it. In the light of conditions in the world, unemployment as we have it today is a symptom of depression. I am going to call on a couple of good doctors as witnesses on the subject, and may I say that this is not a case of the C.C.F. crying "wolf, wolf". I have in my hand a clipping from the Montreal Gazette of December 4, 1952, which reads as follows:

> Fear of a world depression, perhaps within the next two years, was expressed today by the Canadian Importers and Traders Association, embracing about 400 Canadian import firms.

That view was expressed in 1952, and the prediction is that we could be in the first stages of a depression in 1954. The second clipping I have is taken from a source which should be an authority. It is from the Globe and Mail of May 7, 1953, and reads as follows:

> Thomas Oakley, past president of the association, said that there are signs of slackening in defence spending among western countries. This would result in a falling off of world trade, the basic cause of depressions.

I approach this matter, as do other members of this group, not from the point of view of straight unemployment but in the light of the ultimate result of unemployment if something is not done about it. I have in my hand another newspaper clipping of recent date from an Ottawa paper. It is a report of a statement made by Monsignor Coady of St. Francis Xavier University when speaking to the co-operative consumers' association of Kansas City in February of this year. He said, among other things:

> Hot and cold wars have been brought about through the fierce competition between powerful industrial interests, with little prospect of their ever achieving finality. Indeed, it now appears that a state of war, or a continuing threat of war, is a necessary prop to the economy which unbridled capitalism has built up.

That analysis is not made by the C.C.F. but by a very sane and sensible person.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gillis: I suppose that members of the C.C.F. are not considered sane and sensible. As a matter of fact, Monsignor Coady went to the United Nations to lecture to the economic and social organizations of that body. In the face of statements from such people, and looking at the present picture in an unbiased way, I think we can agree that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) stated the matter very tamely and offered no recommendation. While the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), in so far as his office permits him, has done a fairly good job of rationalizing the problem, he has offered no solution, and let me say that it is immaterial whether the number of unemployed today amounts to 300,000 or 600,000. It is a serious matter in any case. It would be serious if only one person were involved. That is clearly emphasized in a report appearing in an Ottawa paper on Saturday. It is headed: "Happy in apartment until their bills piled up", and deals with a young man who was evicted from his home and shot his landlady. He is unemployed. Only one person was involved in that instance but it is a serious matter. It is serious whether it involves one person, 300,000 or 600,000 who have to get up in the morning not knowing where their breakfast is coming from.

In his statement the Minister of Labour indicated to us that his department is watching the problem and keeping track of it. But the problem goes much deeper than the Minister of Labour is prepared to admit or his advisers are prepared to go in putting the story on paper and pointing it up for him. I have a dispatch from Washington indicating that United States jobless now total 2½ million and another one from the maritimes to the effect that about 10 per cent of the labour force are unemployed today. Someone will say: What has the United States got to do with the matter? It has a lot to do with it because whatever happens economically in that country is automatically going to spill over into our country whether or not we like it. We are geared pretty tightly to their economy today, and when ten or eleven per cent of our working force are unemployed it is serious.

When the United Nations economic committee summarized the problem last year they decided that when you have over 5 per cent of your total labour force unemployed you have got to do something about it, not just appoint a committee or rationalize the question on the basis of figures but do something to cut down the percentage of unemployed and put purchasing power in their hands. Otherwise you are going to be in trouble before very long.

I think what most of us perhaps realize but do not like to say is that what we are now going through in Canada and the United States is the second phase of the cold war, and it is aimed directly at the North American continent. After 1945, when our former allies decided that they were not going to play ball and that world conquest was their only goal, they mapped out a program which they put into effect. Their program was to promote national revolution and lead us into a defence spending spree that would raise standards and create a lot of employment. They have succeeded in that purpose. What is the next step? It is to knock all that down, and that is being done today through the trade war with which we are confronted. Unless we are realistic we are liable to be caught napping, and I say this without fear of contradiction by those whom we look upon as employers in this country. I think it is also safe to say that it is true of the British today that they are going to sell where they can do so most easily and buy where they can buy more cheaply whether or not it means unemployment in another section of the world. I think that statement is borne out very clearly by a clipping I have which is headed, "Russia offers billion dollar sales to visiting British export group".

That particular group of thirty British businessmen, who went to Russia to find new trade channels, are not concerned about maintaining employment in Canada or the United States, or in Britain as far as that is concerned. If they can make a deal with Russia and can sell commodities on the world market and compete with others in other sections of the world they are going to do so. They are doing so.

When we look at our own unemployment problem we see what we are up against. For instance, our textile industry is pretty nearly out of business today and it is not a seasonal problem. The competition is not coming from Japan but largely from the United States, where standards are high and where wages are much higher than in Canada. Through mass production methods the commodity can be put on the market that much cheaper, with the result that our textile industry is going out of business. And it might be interesting to find out just how many of the textile operators in Canada are linked up with the textile industry of the United States. I think if anyone will chase them down he will find that most of them are pretty closely linked up. The result is that they may not be very much concerned about maintaining a plant in Canada, if by folding it up they can leave the market open for the textile industry in the United States, in which they are financially interested.

That angle should be checked; and I think it is being checked by the government. So, you see, there are all kinds and types of unemployment; they can be put into all kinds of classifications. But they all add up to the same thing: unemployment. And I think members of this house are going to have to sit down and be realistic about the matter. They must realize that as soon as possible something has to be done in Canada to head off mounting unemployment.

And this unemployment is not confined to textiles. You have it in the coal mines; you have it in the steel industry; you have it in textiles, in lumber, in the fisheries. We have it all over. And we want to be prepared to take a look at it for what it really is. It is the second phase in the cold war. Russia today has put on a trade offensive right around the world. She has dumped her gold reserves on the world market. She has embarked upon that offensive, and has provided the money wherewith her goods might be bought. As a result this North American continent is the target, so far as that offensive is concerned.

We want to be realistic, and recognize the situation for what it really is. If the employers in this country are concerned about maintaining democratic institutions, then they must not sit down and force the government, or sit back and depend upon some mysterious thing coming out of all those slogans to find a solution for them. It is up to the employers of Canada to sit down together and to realize that they are the people who have the most to lose. In addition to that, they are the people who can do something about this question of unemployment. While the government can take certain measures to help, very definitely employers across this country must co-operate with the government 100 per cent if this developing unemployment situation is to be overcome.

A few days ago the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe)—and the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) made reference to this—in talking to a delegation of workers representing the workers in implement plants told them, according to press reports, that they were pricing themselves out of the market. Well, there is something in that; but the Acting Prime Minister did not go back far enough. I agree that perhaps the farm implement industry to some extent has priced itself out of the market; but what is the reason for that? Let us see who started this business of price increases in Canada. In so far as farm implements are concerned, we know that early in 1946, right after the close of the war, an appeal came to the House of Commons asking for an increase to the extent of $5 a ton in the price of raw steel produced by the steel manufacturers of Canada. That meant about $14 or $15 a ton increase in fabricated steel. And we know that steel is basic to the whole economy of our country: when steel goes up, everything else goes up.

We argued against and fought that increase here in the house on the ground that it was a first step toward breaking price controls and setting up the spiral of inflation. But we know the steel industry got that $5 a ton increase. Then it was only a few weeks or months later when farm implements, and everything else in this country, went up in price in proportion to the increased costs.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): May I ask my hon. friend if he is not forgetting the first stage. I think the first stage was the demand from the steel workers to break the wage ceilings.

Mr. Blackmore: That was the second stage.

Mr. Gillis: Yes, that was the second stage. The Acting Prime Minister will recall what happened, I am sure, because we were both members of the committee on industrial relations and listened to the whole steel dispute. One of the main arguments used by representatives of the steel workers before that committee was that there was no reference to the point as to whether a certain proportion of that increase would be used to increase wages. The government allocated the increase, and how it was to be used.

The first round was when the steel industry demanded that increase. Then, on top of that came the demand for increased wages—a very modest demand in comparison with what the manufacturers were looking for. And that is where it all started. From there on it went up, up, up. We tried to hold the line in the House of Commons. Our argument was that in the aftermath of war, if price controls were ever necessary, then most certainly they were necessary for at least three or four years in that period of time when we were getting back to peacetime conditions. We know of course that a lot of exploitation takes place in a period of that kind.

Nevertheless that was when the spiral began. So that the Acting Prime Minister cannot very well contest that point. It is all right to make the statement, but the fact is that the responsibility does not rest with those men who work for wages in plants. And further, I think the employers in steel did not play ball; a later examination of their books discloses that they did not need that increase. They wanted to gouge the people while they were still war-minded and not paying very much attention to money. It is catching up on us now.

I just wanted to say that because I know the Acting Prime Minister wants to be and generally is fair. There is no one who could carry all that stuff in his head or who would be able to meet everything that came up and be absolutely accurate about it. I say those people in the house who pressured the government to remove price controls back in 1946, 1947 and 1948 are equally responsible with the government and with others outside the house who wanted controls off. "A free economy", they said "and you will have prosperity in Canada." All I have ever seen out of that so-called theory of a free economy is that you are free to go barefooted if you do not have shoes, or free to go hungry if you cannot get something to eat.

The only time during my lifetime when the economy has worked properly was during a period of war, when the government accepts responsibility to some extent for the management of the economy, and the allocation of manpower and materials in those directions where they will make the greatest contribution in a given situation. If a certain amount of that procedure were carried on in the post-war period I do not think we would be in this situation at all today.

We might as well be frank and face up to it, that so far as the mechanics of society is concerned, there is only one alternative to depression and unemployment, and that is war. And there is nothing wrong right now that a little war would not fix up. We do not want to forget that, and we want to be honest in facing it and do those things that are necessary to prevent this business of unemployment.

Some may say that it is all right to criticize, but I would tell them that I have all kinds of facts and figures to support what I say. I would turn, for instance, to an article by Clifford Scotton, a co-operative press association representative, who has made a very good analysis and certain recommendations. I shall not take the time of the house to read it. Then I also have a factual summing up by the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada and the Canadian Congress of Labour, in which certain recommendations are made. I imagine we have all that sort of thing we need on the record.

Proposed Committee on Unemployment

My colleagues and I have asked several questions in an effort to get the background of the government's thinking on this question of meeting unemployment. I wanted to know, for example, whether the government was doing any thinking or planning along the lines of what they are doing in the United States today under their defence manpower policy No. 4. They have a dozen of these policies, but this one deals with surveying the country in regions, and when unemployment reaches a certain figure in a certain region the United States government declares that a special region. Only last week Detroit was declared a special region. The government then begin to put any contracts they have to do with in that region, to direct contracts there. They will look at the industrial expansion of the country, and if it is necessary to put an industry in that region to overcome unemployment they will do it.

We are not doing that in Canada. The maritimes is one place where you might try to do something. The highest percentage of unemployment in the Dominion of Canada today is found in the maritime provinces. It tops the list. That is the official position taken by the minister's department in a recent statement I saw. That is a place where something could be done, and that is something the department should think about.

The government can take steps. The first thing the government has to understand is that it must accept some responsibility for talking to the people who are managing the economy of this country today. As a start, let us take the textile industry. I do not believe that any industry located in a town such as Marysville, New Brunswick, with 520 employees, with all kinds of institutions built around that particular industry over a long period of time, should be permitted to close its doors and wipe out the whole economic future of that community. It should not be permitted by either the federal or the provincial government. It is all right for an industry like that to come into a community, set up business and entice all kinds of investments around it, and stay there so long as it is making money; but as soon as the balance sheet is affected the wrong way it takes no social responsibilities. It closes its doors and walks out. That is true also of the coal industry.

The government has to enact some kind of laws that will prevent an economic upset of a whole community without any greater justification than that they are not making enough money.

What can you do? Well, I am going to make these few recommendations. The government should first act by undertaking the general economic planning required to take up the slack in Canadian industrial and business activities. This can be done by a combination of altered fiscal policies, expansion of our aid to underdeveloped countries through the Colombo plan and United Nations agencies, and through direct government intervention to stimulate industrial development and raise the standards of living of the Canadian people.

My hon. friends to my right will say right away "economic planning". They will say those are terrible words. You should not be afraid of that. What you are afraid of is what someone has told you. That is what they are doing in the United States. This business of surveying the country and deciding that when unemployment reaches a certain figure in a region they are going to do something about it, are going to put in an industry there, are going to allocate contracts, is economic planning. Nothing is being done about it here. We did it during the last war, and that is what I mean; that is what we mean by economic planning. The minister has told us that in other fields they are doing something. There is no doubt that family allowances, unemployment insurance, veterans' pensions and all these other things are a stimulus to the economy and create purchasing power. The situation would be much worse today if we did not have them, but they do not take the place of employment.

My second recommendation is that we should take specific action to cope with the problem of seasonal unemployment. This must be joint action between government and industry to ensure that production schedules are so staggered throughout the year and that off-season work is so planned that the seasonal fluctuation in unemployment is reduced to the barest minimum. This was done successfully during wartime and there is no reason why it cannot be done again.

The minister has stated that this is the biggest drain on unemployment insurance. The former deputy minister of labour, Mr. Arthur MacNamara, who retired after many years of valuable service, said when speaking at Montreal a month or two ago that he did not think all was being done that could be done in the matter of seasonal unemployment. But there again the government cannot do anything about it unless they have the co-operation of those who control the economy of the country. The Minister of Labour and his staff cannot do anything. They are hard-working; they know what should be done, but they cannot do very much about it unless the employer will sit down with them and plan his operations so that seasonal unemployment can be overcome in the area in which he operates. Nobody else can do anything about it under present circumstances, unless the full co-operation of the employer is secured.

My third recommendation is that there should be special assistance to relieve the hardship and suffering of families hit by what the government calls regional unemployment. A special commission for exploring the possibility of establishing additional or alternative industries in the areas concerned must be appointed. If such measures give no hope of fully meeting the unemployment problems in a given community, ways and means must be provided to assist the people in the area concerned.

I think we are going through a new industrial revolution so far as the coal mines and steel are concerned. It is technological unemployment, and it is permanent. It is here to stay. Something has to be done to meet that technological upset in different parts of Canada, in the regions that are badly affected. The maritimes are affected by both coal and steel. More than 3,000 men have gone out of the coal industry in the last six or eight months. Some 1,600 went out of the steel plant because of modernization within the past couple of months. That region has been badly upset. The government should make a special study there because power is necessary to overcome the difficulties of that centre.

An expert is being sent in to look into thermal power. That is a long-range program. I was in hopes that the minister or the Acting Prime Minister, who is an engineer and very farsighted, might set up a little pilot plant on atomic energy in that region. That is the logical place to do the first experiment in Canada. I notice that in Ontario they are going to put in a pilot plant, no doubt with the co-operation of Chalk River. That is being done in a province that is spending hundreds of millions of dollars for hydroelectric power. Why not put a little pilot plant in the maritimes where the lack of power is our greatest difficulty? I suggest that the Acting Prime Minister do some thinking about it.

My fourth proposal would be that sharp increases be made in the benefit rates for unemployment insurance. The present amounts are pitifully inadequate. That is borne out by a lot of evidence. That fund has reached almost a billion dollars today. The rates are low. It is not hard to understand the feeling of a person who is making $60, $70 or $80 a week, who suddenly finds himself unemployed and having to get along on $24 a week. In some parts of this province $24 a week would just about pay the rent, and would leave nothing for food, fuel or the other things that are necessary. I suggest that the minister should give some consideration to stepping that right up. The second thing he should do, and do immediately, is extend the unemployment insurance benefits until there is work available for those who are now unemployed because of technological and other reasons.

There are a lot of people today whose benefits have run out. The supplementary benefits have helped them and will help them until about April 15, but after April 15 there will be nothing for them. I heard many people say during the discussion of external affairs that there is a struggle in the world today for the minds of men. If that is true, what do hon. members think of the state of mind of a man who has seen two world wars, who took part in one and who sent his children to the second? Those world wars were to end war, to make a new world and all that kind of thing. All of a sudden, eight years after the last war, he finds himself without employment, he finds himself looking into the glass right back to 1939.

It is all right to give aid to countries outside of Canada. That is all to the good; but the first minds that we should take care of are the minds of the Canadian workers and the Canadian people generally. Many of these men see their unemployment insurance benefits running out. When a man is in that position his mind is not going to be too receptive to slogans about democracy and freedom. He will ask you "Where is my freedom?"

I submit that there should be an extension of these benefits to guarantee to those men, who have been displaced because of many reasons, that they are going to have something to support their families until gainful employment is found. Responsibility should be assumed for those who are eligible for unemployment insurance and have exhausted their benefits.

There are a number of people in this country who are unemployable because of handicaps of one kind or another. Many of them live in parts of the country where there is no available employment. I submit that the minister and the government should get together with the provinces in order to iron out the question of jurisdiction over these unemployables, these people who cannot be employed because of some slight handicap. I believe that if these steps were taken immediately and you advertised what you were going to do, there would be some hope for these people, who could then begin to look forward. As it is now they are pretty discouraged.

Proposed Committee on Unemployment

The official opposition has suggested setting up a committee of the House of Commons as we did in connection with price maintenance, prices and all those things, but that offers no hope. What we want is action, and we want it now. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy):

> That all the words of the amendment after the words "this house is of the opinion that" to the end of the amendment be deleted and that the following words be substituted therefor:
> "the serious and mounting unemployment situation now facing this country calls for immediate action by the federal government to prevent further economic distress."

I am reasonably sure that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) will vote for this subamendment. He is always so fair and reasonable. We are very good friends and I am sure that after sober reflection he will realize that with the little time he had to think about the subject, setting up a committee is not the action that should be taken. I know that he is a man of action. He wants action. He always demands action. In this case I think he should say, "I am quite willing to let the amendment I moved go by the board, and I will back the member for Cape Breton South."

I ask the government to adopt this subamendment without further delay and get busy and show us some action in connection with this whole question of unemployment.

Mr. Speaker: Before I read the amendment to the amendment I should like to ask the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) if he would not correct his own amendment so that instead of asking for the creation of a select committee, the standing committee on industrial relations be called upon to examine into and report upon the actual unemployment situation throughout Canada. I do not want to appear to be splitting hairs but, as hon. members know, it has been the practice to refer matters pertaining to labour, unemployment and employment to the standing committee on industrial relations. According to citation 604 of Beauchesne's second edition a standing committee is described as follows:

> A committee which is appointed beforehand, for the consideration of all subjects of a particular class, arising in the course of the session, is denominated a "standing" committee.

If the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, and the seconder, the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), do not object I would suggest that the amendment should read as follows, with the preamble remaining as it is:

> Now, therefore, be it resolved that this house is of the opinion that the standing committee on industrial relations should immediately examine into and report upon the actual unemployment situation throughout Canada and present recommendations to this house as to short term and long term methods for dealing effectively with this problem.

Mr. Green: That is perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the co-operation of the hon. member. Therefore we will consider that the amendment as moved by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and seconded by the hon. member for Prince Albert is corrected in the way I have indicated.

An amendment has been moved by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), seconded by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy), as follows:

That all the words of the amendment after the words "this house is of the opinion that" to the end of the amendment be deleted and that the following words be substituted therefor:

"the serious and mounting unemployment situation now facing this country calls for immediate action by the federal government to prevent further economic distress."

The only reference I should like to read now in connection with the amendment to the amendment is citation 371 of Beauchesne's third edition. I am not making a ruling; I simply want to submit this at the moment. The citation reads:

A subamendment which proposed an alternative to the original amendment is in order provided it is relevant to the question.

Mr. Ambrose Holowach (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I intend to keep my remarks brief and as much to the point as possible in dealing with the unpleasant situation which has been created by "seasonal and sectional" unemployment. I think all of us are very interested in trying to solve the problem posed by the unhealthy employment situation existing in Canada and other parts of the world, resulting from various reasons.

First, it seems to me that our first responsibility as members of parliament should be to all the Canadian people who have sent us here for the purpose of charting the course of our national life, not only to secure our nation from outside forces but to eliminate also economic injustices which endanger the well-being of our nation. I believe every member of parliament should remember that although the Canadian people have grave responsibilities which in the past they have discharged magnificently, they also have definite privileges not the least of which is the right and heritage of every Canadian to find conditions within our country which will enable him or her, if willing and able, to work and find reward for their labour or investment in order to provide for their families and share in the abundance of this God-given land.

The unemployment situation, as far as I am concerned, is perhaps not in the full sense of the word a serious crisis; but it is closely related to the unemployment situation in the United States, as well as in the other nations of the free world. To my mind the unemployment picture in Canada is a danger signal, related very closely to the unemployment picture in every country of the western world, and it is the consequence of a slowly developing but far-reaching policy on the part of those who are determined to wreck our way of life. Let us not make any mistake about that.

The exact number of unemployed in Canada is not, I think, important in this debate; nor would it be possible, I believe, to determine the exact figures. The figures released by the government a few moments ago do not tell the whole story, because the unemployment insurance commission as well as the census bureau can give us only a partial picture. There are many jobless workers who are not covered by unemployment insurance, and many who have exhausted their unemployment benefits. The real figures, in any event, are far greater than those given to us by the government spokesman; and I think, for practical reasons, in viewing this unemployment picture in Canada we should consider the hundreds of thousands of people who are dependent upon the unemployed in this country.

The unemployment situation in Canada is very serious. Every single hon. member in this house, I am sure, will admit that unemployment is already a serious problem in his own constituency. I know it is a serious problem in the constituency of Edmonton East, which I represent. We know the agricultural industry is in distress, although the government has often stimulated the entire industry artificially. The coal industry has been in distress for many years. There has been repeated mention in the press and over the radio of large lay-offs in the textile industry, the shipping industry, and in the railway industry. I believe if an examination is made of the number of business failures it will reveal quite clearly that the unemployment situation demands the immediate attention of the government. Whatever the exact unemployment figure may be, I believe, if we view it in the light of the limited population in Canada and the total labour force we will see that it represents a very serious percentage.

I would like to get to the meat of this matter, for the people of Canada are listening very carefully to interpretations placed upon this unemployment situation by labour leaders, the government and by business. They are listening patiently, because it is not an easy matter for them to discern what is truth and what is fiction in much of the double-talk which is going on. It is suggested we should not talk about unemployment because it may create adverse conditions and spoil plans for the future. We would like to know just what these plans for the future are, but more precisely my people are interested in knowing about the plans for the present. Perhaps if we heard of these plans from the government the people might be comforted and accept the belief that the unemployment situation is not serious.

If we were told there are great investments to be made in 1954 I should like to remind those who point to such predictions that prophecy alone will never provide prosperity. If we are to be told of the untold opportunities which exist in Canada I should also like to say that the potential of our land in the economic sense means nothing unless development of that potential takes place.

The government has told us that the present unemployment situation in Canada is an unpleasant seasonal repercussion due to adjustments in our economic life. Let us look at some of the facts as presented by people who are familiar with the situation. I have in my hand a clipping from the Globe and Mail dated January 21, 1954. The heading reads "338,066 Seeking Work; Peak Since Wartime." The article reads:

> Canadian unemployment is the highest since the war and is still climbing.
>
> Labour leaders, looking at post-war peak figures, predicted the jobless figure will rise to 500,000 by the end of this month.
> Two widely varying sets of figures were issued by the government today in its periodic survey of employment. One—from the labour department—showed 338,066 persons looking for work through national employment service at December 10. This compared with the previous post-war high of 312,000 in the late winter of 1950.

Then I have a little clipping here taken from the Edmonton Journal dated February 10, which carries the heading "List 12,000 in area seeking work." The report states:

> The number of persons looking for work in the Edmonton district exceeded 12,000 last week, officials of the national employment service in Edmonton said Monday.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this is a serious matter. I do not know why the government dismisses it in the manner in which it has done. I for one have never heard of a fire being put out by ignoring it, or a public enemy No. 1 being arrested through the indifference of those charged with the responsibility of capturing him. I believe the Canadian people at this time are calling on the government to create the freedom and conditions which will enable unemployment to be ended in Canada.

I say this because it seems to me there has been a disgracefully false accent placed on the responsibility for unemployment. We have read of the battle being waged between leaders of industry and labour leaders. Each blames the other for responsibility in this situation. While they are blaming one another, there is a third party, the political expedient, standing on the side and playing one against the other for the sole purpose of acquiring political advantage. I believe that until such time as both labour and business realize their prosperity is indivisible then so long will stoop-shouldered workers be no different from weary and stoop-shouldered businessmen.

At this point I should like to read a statement of great significance which was made by Dave Beck, executive vice-president of the international brotherhood of teamsters, chauffeurs, warehousemen and helpers of America, in an address which he delivered before the Commonwealth Club of California, at San Francisco:

> We of American labour believe in our free enterprise system. We do not believe in it simply because it benefits those who have money invested in business upon which they may make profits. Not at all. We believe in free enterprise because we know that it has preserved our liberty and at the same time has given us the highest standard of living and opportunity the world has ever known.
> Free enterprise, as opposed to communism and socialism, is in the interests of the vast, overwhelming majority of the people who toil for their living, both here and in other countries. I believe in free enterprise because it inspires initiative within men and women. It provides them with opportunities to rise above their environment and to attain any high place which their ability and intelligence will permit them to achieve. I contend that no system in the history of the world has ever made possible such progress for the working men and women, as free enterprise has accomplished for the American people. I have travelled somewhat around over the world and I do not know of a single solitary country where the working man lives under as fine conditions as he does in this land of free enterprise.

I think that fairly well sums up the case as far as free enterprise goes. Yet certainly nobody in this parliament will condemn or not appreciate or approve the demands which labour is making. I think we would all approve a statement which was recently made by James P. Mitchell, Secretary of Labour, United States, delivered at the convention of the Congress of Industrial Organizations at Cleveland, Ohio, on November 18, 1953 in which he made reference to President Eisenhower's attitude toward union and labour as well. He said:

> Amidst all the speculation here and at other labour meetings over what is President Eisenhower's attitude towards unions, my advice to you is to keep clearly in mind the President's own words:
>
> "I pledge that I will support and strengthen, not weaken, the laws that protect the American worker. I will defend him against any action to destroy his union or his rights. I will enlist every resource—of private industry and of the federal government—to protect him against the awful consequences of depression and joblessness.
> "I will work unceasingly to build an economy that will maintain for him a high level of wages with steady purchasing power so he and his family can share fully in the comforts of American living . . ."

I think that fairly well sums up the point of view which we as Social Crediters hold. I believe that labour and business must remain happily married for good or both will become poorer, and that fair wages are just as important as are fair profits. Any politician who endeavours to drive those two enterprises asunder is remiss in his contribution to the economic life of this nation. If both labour and business realize this fact I believe it will provide the necessary background for an improved free enterprise system, which is the only way of maintaining our people in a manner to withstand the coming onslaught on our economic life which is already being engineered in the matter of world trade.

I think it is about time both labour and business united and pointed their index finger at the real source of the trouble, namely the impotent and unenlightened fiscal policy of this government, which is endangering our private enterprise system and putting us deeper and deeper into socialistic measures. That policy is a tax policy which harasses business and workers. The credit policies of this government discourage private investment and encourage government spending.

We believe that both labour and business should make a frontal attack on those policies, for they have resulted in the dwindling purchasing power of the earned dollar. The government policies are geared for ever-increasing interference with the normal development of business, and have failed to implement steps leading to convertibility of currency in international trade. The jungle of every kind of tax conceivable has psychologically destroyed and is rapidly destroying the initiative of business for further investment. I believe that those policies are closely related to the unemployment situation in Canada.

[Mr. Holowach.]

In passing I should like to emphasize the fact that a little bit of blame should be laid on the press of this country. I believe that there exists no better instrument for defending democracy than our free press; but they have failed to draw the attention of the public of Canada to discrepancies in the matter of government fiscal policies, thereby discouraging the one force that could call a halt to this situation.

As Social Crediters, Mr. Speaker, we have always championed the cause of private enterprise, and we make no distinction between business and labour. We have repeatedly championed the removal of the ridiculous fiscal policies and agreements on international trade which have shackled our export business. We are the only ones who have a clear-cut and simple method of supplementary purchasing power without further taxation which would further cripple the incentive of our people. We have advanced these things not only because they are economically right but because they are morally right.

I should like to ask the government what is its policy with regard to alleviating the present scandalous situation in the matter of unemployment; what thought is being given to an immediate start on a vast public works program to absorb the growing number of unemployed; what inducement is being given for an immediate start on the St. Lawrence seaway, the trans-Canada pipe line, the building of a trans-Canada highway from Winnipeg through Saskatoon, Edmonton, Edson, Jasper and the Yellowhead route; what thought has the government given to a thorough revision of the whole Canadian taxation structure in order to eliminate all those taxes which are restrictive to productive enterprise as a further stimulus for reinvestment, and what encouragement is being given to the Canadian people to share in the home and export markets created by the products of our farms, factories and mines?

I believe that the outstanding feature at this time—and unemployment is only one of the symptoms—is a situation where we have idle merchants standing side by side with unemployed workers and, at the same time, ever-mounting inventories of goods and services which the people need and have produced but cannot acquire because they have no purchasing power.

In conclusion I say that the problem of unemployment is clearly one of an economic nature, and that the dangerous situation of this period is the taxation structure which presently exists. Unless unemployment is immediately halted, I think there can be a chain reaction which might be even more devastating than the atom bomb.

On behalf of my constituents I should like to say to the government that their real responsibility is not only to provide work for the unemployed, but to guarantee that Canadians now and in the next generation shall enjoy the benefits of freedom also in the economic sense of the word. One of the ways this can be done is by immediately reducing the tremendous tax burden which the people of Canada have to bear at this time, for it seems to me that cancer is gnawing away at the vitals of our free democratic way of life. Unemployment is certainly only one of the symptoms.

The Canadian people, from my knowledge of them, are a very patient lot. On August 10 they gave a vote of confidence to the Liberal administration. But it seems to me that confidence is not without limits and it may be, if the government persists in its taxation policies and is unable to solve the unemployment problem, that the time is not distant when a vast change in their mentality may take place, and they will ask for new brooms to sweep clean.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, the debate so far has justified the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), the purpose of which is to bring before the house and the country a situation that is becoming more serious with the passing days and deserves the attention of the house. It was in that spirit that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra was launched, to provide parliament an opportunity of placing before the government, through a committee, recommendations to meet the present situation. We are not political sadists who get any satisfaction out of the existing state of affairs, but we do believe the time has come to secure action on the part of parliament, too conveniently delayed for too long by the government.

Indeed, as one goes back over the years one can see that there was a similar situation in 1929, when conditions such as we face existed; but the government of that day failed to act, with a resulting depression within our country that took years to repair, if indeed it has ever been repaired. In 1929, when people throughout the country were asking for action, the speech from the throne read in part as follows:

> The unprecedented prosperity which is apparent throughout the dominion affords cause for the deepest satisfaction. Never in the history of Canada has there been such industrial and commercial expansion as that which has taken place during the past twelve months. The industry and enterprise of our people have been rewarded under Providence with an abundant harvest. In the production of agricultural and other basic industries all previous records have been surpassed. New records have also been established in the volume of construction and in the volume of foreign trade. Employment has been maintained at a high level and all indications point to a continuance throughout the country of the present favourable conditions. A notable feature of industrial development has been the continued advance and prosperity of the mining industry in almost every part of the dominion.

That was in 1929, Mr. Speaker, and those are the arguments now being used under similar circumstances. We have placed our amendment before the house in order that a select committee may be set up. The amendment to the amendment of the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) simply deletes a number of words and states that the serious and mounting unemployment situation now facing this country calls for immediate action by the federal government to prevent further economic distress.

There is nothing of socialism in that sub-amendment. I listened to my hon. friend place his plan before the house, and with the exception of an addition to the present unemployment insurance payments and the like, the purpose of everything in it would be to bring into effect a national planning scheme whereby all business in Canada would be in the strait-jacket of economic socialism.

As I listened to him asking that a law should be passed whereby when an industry finds itself losing money, when profits can no longer be made, the state should step in and cause that business to continue to operate, I thought of the government businesses established in the province of Saskatchewan within the last ten years. I thought of boots and tanneries, of woollen factories and the like. Those industries paid no taxes. They paid no interest on the moneys used by them; yet, unable to make profits, found it necessary to close down.

My hon. friend's general plan is simply an indication that those who have an "appetite for novelty and the passion of envy" believe that everything can be achieved through state action and state control. In the province of Saskatchewan power has proven an effective antidote to the influence of sentimental propaganda regarding the operation of of business. The dreamland of theory disappeared in that province in the light of cold experience.

What we are trying to do is meet a situation that is becoming more serious with the passing days. We do not predict the oncoming of a depression. We hope the days will not again return when unemployment will be rampant not only in our own country but everywhere in the world, in both free enterprise and socialist countries. We realize that with conditions becoming worse and worse the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) had little to offer except the hope that what had been done under unemployment insurance and other social legislation had more or less cushioned the impact of unemployment.

But what does he admit? On the 26th of January he placed before the house certain figures indicating that in December, 1953, there were 338,000 applications for work. If I took down his figures correctly, today that figure is about 520,000, an increase from 6·4 per cent to 9·9 per cent of the labour force, an increase in one month of 50 per cent in those who come within that category. That type of statistic constitutes its own warning, and it demands action on the part of parliament.

I do not want to look back, but you will remember, Mr. Speaker, that during the election campaign only six months ago any suggestion of the probability of there being unemployment, any expression of the view that we had not sufficient markets for Canadian wheat, that agricultural markets were being lost, that our trade situation in different parts of the world was unsatisfactory in its implications, was met by ridicule. What are the conditions six months later? We of the official opposition have no desire to arouse the people in any way to apprehend that there is a hastening economic disaster, but the facts should be stated. We realize now, as we pointed out last summer, that our international trade, upon which 24 per cent of the people of Canada are dependent, is in a serious situation. Production has caught up with demand, in many businesses. Layoffs are continuing.

What of the world trade situation? Does parliament know anything about it? A few months ago, during the election campaign, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) said in effect, when we spoke of convertibility, that it could not be achieved, that it was just a fantasy and a dream on the part of the opposition. We contended that 50 per cent of the world trade within the sterling bloc was lost because this government did not see fit to call a conference in an endeavour to secure convertibility so that trade in that area could be established.

Six months ago they said it could not be done. Ten days ago the minister said in effect, "We are closer than would have been expected a matter of a year ago". Why all the silence regarding the Sydney conference? What happened there? What was decided there? Only tonight I read an editorial in the Ottawa Journal which asks the reason for all this silence about Sydney. It mentions the communique issued at the conclusion of the conference, and quotes from the London Economist which termed that communique "a jumble of careful contradictions, in eight pages of double-talk and bad grammar". What was decided there? What is going to be done to meet the situation regarding trade? What is the hope for the future? Unemployment will necessarily continue to mount unless something is done to open the channels of trade.

And what is to be done about taxation? A few short months ago, during the election campaign, I recall again that we pointed out the dangers of the dead weight of taxation, which was squeezing Canadian trade out of world markets. What is going to be done about it? Are we being priced out of world markets in part because of taxation which is being imposed unnecessarily by this government?

Those were our views a few months ago. Those views were ridiculed. Now we find officials of great banks in our country indicating that one of the main reasons we are being priced out of trade today that previously we held is the fact that taxation and other costs are making it impossible for us to meet competition. I have before me a summary of a speech delivered by Mr. Muir, president of the Royal Bank of Canada, which says:

> Some evidence of a buyer's market after years of inflationary pressure should not be regarded as an unmixed evil. The three economic stimulants available are tax reductions, price reductions and easy credit. Tax reductions are always helpful, of course.

And then in detail are set out some of the needs in the present situation. What could we find out in a committee? What attitude does the government take with regard to world trade conditions?

In a recent speech the president of the Banque Canadienne Nationale refers to the dangers inherent in loss of trade internationally. In my opinion equally serious is the present improvident trade balance as between Canada and the United States, which cannot but have a detrimental effect upon full employment in Canada. He says:

> The export trade of Canada contributed to the national income to the extent of some 24 per cent. As our country increases the exploitation of its natural resources and develops its means of production, it should enlarge its markets abroad. However, far from achieving this purpose, it has suffered an appreciable decline in its exports during the past year.

Parliament sits. Does it get any information about what is going to be done by the government, or what its trade policy will be to meet the situation? Nothing but the silence we have had since Sydney. The president continues:

> Preliminary reports show that, during the first ten months of 1953, the foreign trade of Canada, up by $265 million in comparison with the corresponding period of 1952, was valued at $7,157 million. This considerable figure ranks our country third among the great trading nations of the world. But this progress results solely from the increase in our imports, which have risen by $379 million, whereas our exports decreased by $114 million. Thus, from one year to another, a favourable trade balance of $249 million has given way to an unfavourable balance of $246 million.

I quote this because it is a summary of the situation as the president of the Banque Canadienne Nationale sees it, and I adopt its content. Palliatives will not meet the situation. International trade alone can restore a large proportion of employment in this country. The bank president goes on to say:

> Statistics reveal a decrease in our sales in all countries, except the United States, Japan, Holland and Switzerland, a decline reaching $97 million in the British commonwealth, $74 million of which is in the United Kingdom alone, $82 million in continental Europe and $65 million in Latin America.

Mr. Speaker, do you not remember the pilgrimage made last year, when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) went down to South America? I sometimes wonder whether he was able to teach those dictators something. The success of the pilgrimage was measured by a reduction last year to the extent of $65 million in our trade in Latin American countries.

To quote further from the remarks of the bank president:

> If our shipments of animals and derived products, of non-metallic minerals and of chemicals show some progress, there has been a curtailment in all the other groups: agricultural products, fibres and textiles, wood and paper, iron and its products and non-ferrous metals. The causes for this contraction in exports are many and varied.

There is a summary of our trade situation, summed up in a succinct, capsule-like form. Yet was there anything in the speech of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) to indicate that the situation would be met by some aggressive trade policy? No; nothing but an explanation that some of the unemployment figures were fictional. And then, when I asked him a question about the degree of unemployment due to a loss of markets—the diminishing markets to which I have just referred—the answer of the minister, with all the force behind him of his department, his economists, and the like, was, in effect, "It would be impossible to hazard a guess".

What parliament has a right to know is this. What is going to be done? Certainly in the Colombo plan there is no solution of the problem of disposing of the billion bushels of wheat piled up in this country, or the other agricultural products. The time has come for parliament to know what is going to be done to expand trade and win back some of the trade that in considerable measure was lost last year because Canada and Canadian production, through taxation, has been priced out of the market. Taxation must be reduced. Canada will spend $5 billion this year, the largest amount in history. I realize that the election last year did not teach the government any lesson in the need for tax reduction.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It did not teach the opposition much either.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friend says it did not teach the opposition. Let me say this. The level of taxation today is considerably responsible for the fact that we are losing our trade.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Inconsequential; that is not exactly pertinent to your statement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is inconsequential, the minister says. Is that the sort of attitude we should have from a responsible minister, that high taxation is inconsequential. I am going to refer in a moment to the Regina Leader-Post.

Mr. Abbott: Make your own speech.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The hon. member is reading a lot of editorials lately.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is all right. I have heard the minister read editorials at times when they were laudatory.

Mr. Abbott: Not very often.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have heard the Regina Leader-Post quoted as a newspaper of reputation and capacity, and it is in the spirit of their own definition, sir, that I read this editorial which says in part—and I am going to pick out some of the non-controversial portions, Mr. Speaker—

> Ottawa spending spree continues.
> Peace, even though a troubled one, prevails. For our continued prosperity we are dependent upon trade in a highly competitive world. Because of high wages and heavy taxation, ours is one of the highest cost economies in the world. This places our industries at a tremendous disadvantage, particularly our manufacturers, in trying to compete for sales on the world market. Our chief competitors, for instance, do not have a 10 per cent sales tax which enters into the cost of all Canadian-manufactured goods.

Sir, there is a move the government might make, the removal or reduction of the sales tax that in considerable measure acts as a detriment to the expansion of trade through competition. There is something the government could do, and without being bereft of necessary income. All of us know well that at the end of the year the surplus suddenly vanishes, Mr. Speaker, but for nine long months Canadians last year were overtaxed to the extent of $260 million.

The editorial goes on:

> The tabling of the estimates coincided with the presentation of a brief by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce which contended that tax levels are too high, particularly for a developing country such as Canada where personal incentive and corporate efficiency are the mainsprings of the economy. But it is apparent from the estimates that the government has no intention of following it.

That is a reduction of personal income and excise taxes, which would provide the means to permit of increased competition at home and abroad. That is something that could be done. That is something that must be done; for taxation is squeezing Canada out of world markets.

Ministers of the crown used to say that taxes would be reduced when defence requirements went down. This year defence requirements have been very considerably reduced. I have not the exact figures before me, but it is well over $100 million; yet at this very time the estimates for non-defence items are being increased. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation are asking for an increased amount. The amount they are to receive is increased from $8,634,000 to $23,644,000. That is being asked for in a year when we are being taxed out of trade markets of the world by our heavy taxation. Surely that is a staggering amount to pay to the radio corporation in a year such as this.

There are many other items one could refer to. While we were promised that reductions in taxation would come when defence needs were reduced, the estimates that were tabled the other day show that the government intends to continue not a drive for greater economy and tax easement but continuance of high taxation that has placed Canada in very considerable measure in a unenviable trading position in various parts of the world.

A word as to agriculture. Today the farmer finds his farm income going down and the costs of the things he buys going up. The farmer finds himself caught between the squeeze of diminishing returns and rising costs. The demand for farm machinery and other things that would be purchased naturally decreases.

What is going to be done in regard to farm markets? As our farm markets disappear the unemployment situation will inevitably worsen as the days go by. What is the attitude of this government in regard to securing markets for our bacon, coarse grains, meats, etc.? Today the Danes are expanding their markets; the Poles are endeavouring to expand their markets. Russia has its coarse grains; Australia and the Argentine have their wheat and their meat. Surely we have a right to know what is to be done. What is the government doing to meet the farmers' plight? The hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) says "nothing". If they are doing anything, no one in parliament has been given any information on it.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce was in the west the other day and made a speech in Winnipeg. Even to read the speech in cold print shows one the affability with which it was delivered. He said that western farmers can expect to market their surplus of wheat at reasonable prices despite the decline in overseas markets which has created a change for the worse in the marketing situation. Western farmers would like to hear what is being done in regard to securing markets. Is the Canadian wheat farmer in the position that at present prices Canada cannot dispose of her wheat? Are we to continue to rely on the government, as its ministers go from place to place, sir, and speak outside the house and make those optimistic statements? Now is the opportunity—this debate provides it—to show what is going to be done by the government in the days ahead to meet the present unemployment and market situation.

In 1929 the same warning beacons were in the sky. When unemployment started it was referred to as seasonal, not frictional, because they did not have frictional unemployment in those days. They said then it was merely transitory, that it would not last. No action was taken, and depression followed. Unemployment insurance payments are not enough. They are but a palliative, but do not meet the essential problem. I suggest that the ministers of this government let this country know what is to be done and what are the trade prospects.

Where are the possibilities of extending trade? What will be done to remove the tremendous surpluses of agricultural products, of wheat particularly? Our experience and that of the United States has been that whenever there are surpluses of agricultural products, because markets have been lost, a cycle begins which follows a course regular and direct. The cycle starts with reduced farm demands for manufactured commodities; and a reduction in demand for those things is followed by a reduction in the labour force, and unemployment results.

A committee set up to study and report on unemployment would hear evidence of those who are warning this government and the country of the need for action now. It would also give members of parliament an opportunity to discharge a responsibility. After all, we are $10,000 a year men and women now, and would welcome all the worth-while work we can get to do. A committee such as this would make a sphere of endeavour available to members that could not but be advantageous, that could not but bring forth suggestions which the government might find helpful to meet a situation which is becoming worse.

We are not trying to build up fears that will bring on a depression. What we are trying to do is have parliament make a contribution now, to the end that we shall be able as a nation to compete in the markets of the world and thereby assure employment to Canadians in Canada. That is the purpose of this amendment, and it was in that spirit we moved it.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, now that the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) has delivered his election speech we can get back to the subject of unemployment. I should like first to say that any suggestion that the government does not take the unemployment situation seriously is entirely mistaken. I agree with the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) that one unemployed person represents a situation that is of concern to the government, and certainly when the number gets up to its present size it is a matter of great concern to the government. The problem is what should the government do to bring about opportunities for employment, and a return to a high level of employment throughout the country.

I would say that the measure of success of a government is its ability to bring about and maintain a high level of employment. As far as this government is concerned, that is its main objective. Anything it does is directed toward giving satisfactory employment to its people and stability that will encourage growth of its industry.

In assessing the problem the first thing to do is measure it. My colleague the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) has given you the facts, but perhaps you would permit me to run over the ground again. There have been numerous reports of late to the effect that unemployment in Canada is running in excess of half a million persons. Presumably these reports refer to figures for job applications on hand at national employment offices.

It is true that since about the middle of January this figure has exceeded half a million. However, it should be made absolutely clear that this figure does not constitute the number of unemployed. As my colleague the Minister of Labour has pointed out to this house, this is simply a figure which becomes available through the operation of the employment service in carrying out its task of helping to place people in jobs. As such, the figure includes people who after registration find jobs on their own while failing to notify the employment office, and also people who have jobs but are not working or are working part-time but can qualify for benefits under the unemployment insurance regulations.

On the other hand, there are some unemployed persons who do not register at employment offices but will attempt to find jobs through other means. The fact that such discrepancies exist means that these figures cannot be accepted as an adequate measure of the numbers of unemployed, even though they are very useful as an indication of general trends and also of the relative position of different localities.

The dominion bureau of statistics instituted in 1945 a survey designed to provide on a current basis essential information on Canada's labour force. This survey is presently conducted each month on a sample basis in accordance with proven sampling methods. The latest available results from this survey show that for the week ending January 23, 1954, there were 280,000 persons out of work and seeking work. In addition there were 24,000 persons who for the full week in question were temporarily laid off. Also there were 65,000 persons on short time or laid off for part of the week.

However, these three figures are not to be added up and referred to as the number of unemployed. Those involuntarily on short time, though partially unemployed, should not each be counted as an unemployed person; moreover, those subject to temporary lay-off can hardly be classed with those having no jobs in sight. These distinctions simply serve to indicate the difficulty of trying to gauge in one simple aggregate the many varied situations encompassed within the term unemployment.

As previously stated, the number of persons without jobs and seeking work as of January 23 numbered 280,000. This represents an increase of 93,000 or 50 per cent above the corresponding figure in January 1953. In other words the increase in unemployment now over what prevailed in a generally buoyant market situation one year ago amounts to roughly 2 per cent of the labour force.

This comparison is not made in any attempt to minimize the extent of the unemployment situation. It does, however, serve to point up the rather narrow margin between a strong labour market situation and what some persons are now attempting to describe as a serious recession. It also should be pointed out that the January figure of those out of work and seeking work is below that reached in early March of 1950, when the figure totalled 308,000 persons.

In fact there is much similarity between conditions prevailing then and now. Largely reflecting a down-turn in output in the United States and a contraction of overseas markets, the tempo of business in Canada experienced some slowdown in that year which coincided with our seasonal slack period. As a result unemployment climbed to a level higher than had prevailed in any previous post-war year. Immediately the alarmists among us began to clamour for measures to offset a pending depression. The government did take action to extend unemployment insurance benefits, but no major anti-recessionary program was put into operation. Nevertheless, by June 1 the number of persons without jobs and seeking work had declined to 139,000 and this, as you will recall, was prior to the outbreak of hostilities in Korea. Had the government acted promptly to bolster demand at that time, such measures would have served simply to add fuel to the inflationary pressures which were dominant before the end of that year.

This experience shows that it is important to remember that economic conditions are always fluctuating, but many of these fluctuations are minor and largely self-liquidating in character. Any attempt on the part of government to smooth out every minor bump and trough in the trend of business may simply aggravate rather than lessen the extent of fluctuations in the economy.

What then is the nature of the economic climate in which we now find ourselves? Is it a relatively minor adjustment or, as some would apparently have us believe, is it the beginning of a major decline? No one, of course, can answer this question categorically or with complete certainty of being right. This, however, does not mean that we should not look over the evidence systematically and make as sound judgment as possible.

Toward the latter part of 1953 those indicators which gauge the over-all level of activity in the economy began to level off, and in a few cases have declined slightly. This change in trend reflects largely a reduction in the pressure of demand rather than any decline in over-all volume. In other words requirements, which in the past two or three years have been mounting rapidly, are now simply not expanding at the same rate. This applies to expenditures for defence and for other government requirements, purchases by consumers and also outlays for investment. In each of these instances the rate of expansion has slowed down. The important exception is exports, which are now running moderately below the levels of one year ago.

This levelling off in demand, taken in conjunction with the moderate decline in activity in the United States economy, has brought a change in the tempo of business activity in Canada. This type of situation is invariably accompanied by a hesitancy on the part of business in placing orders, more hand-to-mouth buying, and a tendency to reduce inventories. This causes a temporary slowdown in the pace of business which in the present instance has coincided with the seasonally slack period in the economy.

Such a situation admittedly gives rise to a good deal of anxiety and, I think, has been prematurely interpreted by many as the beginning of a recessionary trend. Before coming to any such conclusion it is necessary to look carefully at the more basic determinants of the level of economic activity.

In this connection current and prospective levels of investment spending are of utmost importance. At the beginning of each year a survey is made of the amount of capital expenditures planned for the ensuing year by business, institutions and governments and also for housing. Compilation of the returns from the 1954 survey are now complete, and a report embodying the results will be tabled as soon as copies can be printed.

The survey indicates a capital expenditure program for 1954 of $5·8 billion, roughly 3 per cent above the previous record achieved last year. Expenditures for new construction are estimated at $3,865 million, an increase of 6 per cent, while outlays for new machinery and equipment are expected to be 3 per cent lower. With spending on defence construction now past its peak, the federal capital expenditure program, as presently planned, is a little lower than in 1953. Reports from provincial governments indicate their programs to be roughly unchanged, while capital outlays of municipalities should show a moderate increase. Capital outlays of federal, provincial and municipal governments, taken as a group, are expected to remain about the same as last year. Non-government capital spending will be up by roughly 4 per cent and non-government outlays on new construction are expected to increase by 6 per cent.

This projected volume of capital spending has far-reaching significance for the trend of economic activity in 1954. Expenditures on new capital goods account for about 23 per cent of total production in the economy. Prospects of a further increase in the capital expenditure programs mean that in over-all terms this important sector of demand will be more than maintained.

In addition, investment plans tell us a good deal about the state of business confidence. While the foregoing expenditure estimates cover total outlays for new capital goods, including replacement, a major portion of the program represents net additions to capacity. Yet no one builds new capacity except on the expectation that markets will be available for the additional goods or services to be produced. It should be borne in mind also that these investment intentions have been recently submitted, and therefore can be assumed to take into account the uncertainties which have prevailed in recent months, particularly in respect to the future trend of economic activity in the United States.

In these circumstances one can only conclude that, notwithstanding these uncertainties, the collective view of Canadian business enterprise is on the side of continued growth and prosperity in our economy.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, before the dinner recess I was discussing the prospect for capital investment during the year 1954. I stated that the survey of business intentions which has just been completed indicates that capital investment this year will be about 3 per cent greater than it was last year, which was itself an all-time record representing as it did about 23 per cent of the gross national product of Canada.

I might say that these preliminary estimates are made with great care. Each year in the past we have found that our January estimate was overly conservative. A check is made in July. In every case we have had to revise our estimates upward when the July survey is completed.

The next important factor is the prospect for exports. There again I believe we can look for another good year. The final figures for 1953 show a decrease of 3 per cent in value of exports but, as a matter of fact, in volume the last year was a record year for exports, being even greater than 1952. The reason for the lower dollar value of exports during 1953 was, of course, the drop in prices of many important commodities that are represented in our list of exports. For example in the metals, in 1952 we were exporting zinc at 19 cents a pound; last year we were exporting zinc at 10 cents a pound; we were exporting lead at 21 cents a pound in 1952, and at 13 cents a pound in 1953. There was a sharp drop in the price of lumber included in the exports for 1953.

I believe that our prices have stabilized and that the pricing of our exports for 1954 will not be much different from the pricing in 1953. Our principal export is wheat. The volume of exports to date is not as great as last year owing, as I have explained on several occasions, to exceptionally good crops in many of our principal markets, and also owing to the fact that the war threat has receded to a point where many governments have been using their war stocks of wheat for civilian purposes.

In other directions export prospects have improved. A few days ago I mentioned the opening up of markets in the West Indies, a fact which is important. The return of trading from governments to private hands in the United Kingdom has been helpful to Canada. As that trend proceeds I think we can expect even better markets in the United Kingdom than we have had in the past.

Today I was reminded that our sales to South America are off, and it was suggested that my trip may be the reason. May I say that the reason I went to South America was that our markets at that time were abnormally high. Since then dollar difficulties in several of the South American countries, particularly Brazil, have caused restrictions of exports from dollar countries. However, I am happy to say that today we received confirmation of a large sale of wheat to Brazil. We have not sold wheat to Brazil for several months. I think there are indications that the South American market is finding it possible to use dollars to a greater extent, which will, I am sure, mean greater purchases from Canada.

An hon. Member: You did not trade wheat for coffee?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): If Brazil sells coffee at good prices they are apt to buy wheat at our prices. The other factor, of course, is consumer buying. Consumer buying in Canada is at a high level and there is every reason for thinking that a high level of purchasing should continue. I believe those are the three elements that we look to for a forecast of the level of the Canadian economy during 1954, and in those several directions there seems to be no indication of any serious recession in the year 1954.

It is said that we have not taken any special steps. We have not panicked and rushed out in all directions to take emergency measures to deal with the present situation. We have been reminded that our government expenditures are high. Again they are high because the government foresaw that this would be a difficult year. The transition from a seller's market to a buyer's market is always difficult. Certainly the worst way in which to meet a transition of that kind is to curtail government investment. That is the old theory that did not work so well back in 1931, that when things get tough the government should stop spending and start squeezing its pocketbook. That is not the time to cut government spending. There were important investments that the government needed to make and, in the light of the general situation, it was decided that this would be a year to loosen the purse strings and step up our public works program, now that military construction is less active. That has been the policy of the government for 1954.

In the investment field our economy will be reinforced by two large projects. One is the St. Lawrence waterway project, which we fully expect to be under construction before the end of the year. The other is the longest pipe line that has ever been built anywhere, namely the gas pipe line from Alberta to Ontario and Quebec. I therefore think we can look for a continuing high level of investment in Canada not only in 1954 but well into the future.

How do we explain the discrepancy in the figures which are given us? The applications at the labour office suggest that some 520,000 people are seeking employment. That situation comes about in a very simple way. In the last year or two the list of insurable occupations has been enlarged to include a good many seasonal occupations. I know something about the forest industries business at the lakehead where I reside when I am at home, which is not often. That business has not changed over the years. The men go in the forests in the fall and work there during the cutting season. They mostly work on a piece-work basis; that is, so many cords of wood return a certain wage to the cutter. Since the introduction of the power saw it does not take nearly as long to do the winter cutting as it did in the old days. When the cutting is finished the men return to town, and most of them go back to the little farms they have in the vicinity of Port Arthur. Before doing so, however, they stop at the employment office, register as unemployed and request their unemployment benefits. It is quite proper that they should do so. Then when the drive comes on in the early spring, when the rivers start to open, they return to the forests and take care of the hauling and driving of the timber down the river. By that time the construction season has started and they return to their summer work of construction. That has been their program, and it has been going on for a good many years.

I recall an incident that occurred when I was there about a year ago. A man I knew from my construction days approached me and said that he had just arrived in town from a lumber camp. He wanted to know if I knew where he could get a job. I said, "Do you really want a job?" He said, "I will take a job." I said, "Have you registered for unemployment insurance?" He said, "No; do you think I would stand in line for $24 a week?" That was his attitude. I said, "How much money have you in your pocket?" I will not name the sum, but it was such as to lead me to believe that he was not very anxious to get employment. That situation applies in many parts of Canada. It applies to a good many jobs that are seasonal and always have been seasonal.

Over the past three or four years there has been such a demand for manpower that many seasonal workers have been working during periods in which they do not normally work. That pressure is off. The urgency for the carrying on of construction work throughout the winter has disappeared. The urgency has eased off in many other directions, and there is little off-season employment for men who are normally only employed seasonally. This has caused a great number of applications for employment that really do not represent men out of work. I think we all have confidence in the dominion bureau of statistics. We accept their figures on most matters, and I am prepared to accept their figures on employment. I think they are correct.

In reading a brief presented by the labour leaders who called on my colleagues two or three days ago I noticed that they mentioned figures with respect to frictional employment. They used a figure of 3 to 5 per cent of the labour force, and I thought they were very generous in that respect. Five per cent of the present labour force is about 260,000 men, which is greater than the number unemployed at the present time. I would put the frictional figure at something under 3 per cent. Added to the frictional figure are the people who are unable to find work, and they come largely from particular industries. Ocean seamen are on shore now and looking for work. Training courses are being provided for them to fit them for other occupations. The textile workers are having a difficult time. There is widespread unemployment in the textile industry. The third industry that is having difficulty so far as employment is concerned is the agricultural implement industry.

These three industries are feeling the effect of the present situation. I stated to a group of agricultural implement workers, as has been said in the house, that I had noticed that the industries in trouble are those that have had the greatest proportional increase in wages from 1945 up to the present time. I put the seamen first, because in 1945 an able seaman was getting about $45 a month, and up until recently he was getting something over $200 a month. The textile workers come next so far as the proportional increase in their wages is concerned. In 1945 and 1946 agricultural implement workers were regarded as being in a rather low paid industry, but today they are higher paid than the automobile workers whom we always consider the aristocrats of labour.

I simply mention these things to indicate that both employers and employees have their responsibility in this transitional period. I always tell employers that this is the period that separates the men from the boys. This is the time when good management is going to pull an industry through and when bad management is going to result in its being in difficulty. In just the same way the workers have a responsibility. This is no time to go out and try to greatly improve working conditions. They have had three or four years of constantly improving conditions, and this is a year in which they should join with industry and all others who are trying to bring about a sound transition from the Korean period to a normal peacetime period.

Certain of our products have been priced out of the market. We found we could not operate deep-sea ships any more unless there is a subsidy of $100,000 per annum per ship. We think that is evidence that we cannot compete in deep-sea shipping. We are not the only people who have felt the competition of southern United States textiles. Many mills in New England are closing down, and one or two have closed in Canada. But this is the competition of our highly organized labour with the unorganized labour of the southern states. That is a situation which presents serious difficulties for the industry and requires very careful handling indeed if our textile industry is to be stabilized.

That is the situation as I see it. I can assure the house that the government is doing everything it believes can be done to improve the situation. We are not panicking. We believe that we have the situation in hand. In January of 1950 there was very serious unemployment, more serious than today, while in June of 1950 there was practically full employment, and we believe that the pattern of 1950 will be repeated in 1954. I believe that as the season opens up we can expect a return to the employment conditions that we have had for the last several years and that we must have if Canada is to be a prosperous country.

Mr. Fulton: Would the minister permit one question before he finishes his speech? He used the figure of $100,000 per ship as the suggested subsidy to keep the merchant marine in operation. Is the government satisfied that that figure is reasonably accurate? Is it a figure that may be accepted as a basis of discussion, or does the minister think there would be any wide variation?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It was brought to us as an analysis of the labour and sustenance cost of a ship under the Canadian flag compared with a ship under the British flag. The figures seemed to be accurate and complete. I think it can be taken as a reasonable differential.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, about this time two weeks ago we were discussing the problems of another group of Canadians who were in distress. It appeared to me throughout that discussion that the distress was a little synthetic or, for want of a better term, a little phony; but there is nothing phony about the distress of the people whose plight we are discussing tonight.

I find myself in the very difficult position that I cannot agree with the reasonable and unconcerned picture of the situation that has been painted by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg). I do not like not to do so, because all the cabinet ministers are nice, friendly fellows and I do not like to disagree with them. Someone said that if you are not a great man yourself, the next best thing is to say that you know a great man. So I get quite a lift when I am talking to my election committee back in Vancouver-Kingsway and I can tell them that I am on such intimate terms with the Minister of Trade and Commerce that I can call him "C.D." when we meet.

Mr. Knowles: What do they call him?

Mr. MacInnis: Or when I meet the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate—oh, excuse me, I should say the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill)—in the corridors I call him Jack. Yes; when you are a little fellow like myself it gives you quite a lift. So I feel quite badly in having to bring some of the facts of life to the ministers' attention.

Now let us see what the situation is. It is admitted that there is some unemployment in Canada, but there is a question of how much. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said, very generously, that we should be concerned about even one person who is unemployed. But I can assure him that one person unemployed could not get anywhere, because he could not squawk loudly enough. The more unemployed there are, the more likely something will be done for them because of the greater noise they will make. In the world we are living in today, if you cannot make a noise you are in a bad way; your case is a bad one indeed.

As I said, there is agreement that there is some unemployment. The Minister of Trade and Commerce as well as the Minister of Labour have said, "But wait; the possibilities for investment this year are real good. Some time before the year is out we will start the St. Lawrence waterway. That should be under way before the end of next year." That is what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said just a moment ago.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The end of this year.

Mr. MacInnis: And he says to the unemployed, "Now, if you fellows can hold on until next December you will have a job, maybe." They both agree on that, that everything will be all right if the unemployed can only hold on. Spring will come to the rescue. Korea came to the rescue in 1950. I hope we will not have another Korea in 1954.

The ball is then thrown over to the official opposition. They go over the situation and find that there is considerable unemployment, that it is quite serious indeed. But what do they want to do? They want to refer it to a committee; and by the time the committee is finished it is spring again, and the unemployed are in just the same position under the Conservative amendment as they were before. The situation will be just the same as far as the unemployed are concerned, whether it is left to a committee or left with the government. They say that spring is coming, when things will begin to show up; and that is the talk we are handing out to the unemployed all across Canada.

I tell you that kind of policy will not provide bread, will not provide shelter, will not provide jobs. Surely we have had enough experience with the sort of conditions that existed when my hon. friends took over in 1936, or in late 1935. Surely they have learned something from the conditions they found, until the war rescued us in 1939 and 1940, that they should have been ready now with some concrete proposals the unemployed could get their teeth into. But they are not. We are just as Micawber-like as we were in the 1930's.

Then, as usual, the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) went over the whole gamut of items—the government in industry in Saskatchewan, the dead weight of taxation, the wheat surplus, the estimates, last year's election, the sales tax, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and a number of other things. He said that these are some of the things that could be discussed in the committee—that is what we are going to have the committee for—to go all over the issues that were discussed during the election last July and August. Let me tell the official opposition again that that, any more than the government's do-nothing policy, will not feed and clothe and shelter the unemployed.

Probably one of the strangest things said during this debate was by my good friend the Minister of Labour. It is said that the human being can rationalize his behaviour in the most unsocial or anti-social circumstances. There is nothing so vile he can do but, given the opportunity, he can prove to you that it was done for somebody else's good. The Minister of Labour went over pretty much the same ground as the Minister of Trade and Commerce. As reported at page 1447 of Hansard he said:

> The current unemployment situation is not entirely due to the seasonal factors which I have mentioned although there are indications that the amount of purely seasonal unemployment is greater than in recent years . . . These industries are not operating at capacity employment levels for various reasons. For some, import competition has become keener. This has been particularly true in the case of clothing, textiles and electrical appliance industries. Others, such as sawmilling, farm implements and certain base metal producers have found world markets becoming increasingly competitive. Forestry operations in eastern Canada are currently proceeding at the low levels of last winter, partly because of improved technology in forestry operations and partly because of softer lumber and pulp markets. In most of these industries, there has been some accumulation of inventories at various levels of production and distribution, and employment in several industries is reflecting the consequent adjustments.

Then he went on to say this:

> The government is not ignoring the problems of these industries which are encountering difficulties in adjusting to a more competitive situation in both the domestic and foreign markets.

In effect what is the Minister of Labour saying there? Only this, that there is an accumulation of goods on the market—overproduction, if you like—and because there is overproduction, the people who produced the goods, or at least some of them, must go hungry until that is cleared off the market. That is all it means. I would like to know if the government is not ignoring the problem of those industries which are encountering difficulties in adjusting to a more competitive situation in both the domestic and foreign markets. What are they doing? In these circumstances what is the government doing that is of value to those people who are now unemployed?

Then the minister said:

> Nevertheless, I feel that it would be a mistake to draw a gloomy picture for the economy as a whole solely on the basis of the situation in which certain industries find themselves at the present time.

And then I find my genial friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) reported in the Montreal Gazette of February 12 in respect of an interview following joint representations by the executive of the Canadian Congress of Labour and the executive of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada. The newspaper article states:

> "While we should not bury our heads in the sand and say everything is fine," Mr. Abbott declared, "we should be careful and not paint too gloomy a picture, because I do not think it is justified.
> "The plans of people with regard to business can be affected by too much talk of rising unemployment and a possible recession.
> "I think we should be a little careful about taking too gloomy a view about the prospects".

At this point Mr. Bengough, president of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, butted in and said:

> "I think there are 530,000 out of work. The situation is serious".

To this the Minister of Finance replied:

> "I would not say the situation is serious. I would say it is unpleasant. There certainly is higher unemployment than we would like to see."

Whether the situation is serious or unpleasant depends entirely on where you are situated; whether you are at the gate of a factory looking in, or sitting in your living room with a glass with something to drink in it and a pipe and a book in your hand.

Mr. Abbott: I said exactly the same thing to Mr. Bengough. I said that for the man who is out of work it is always serious.

Mr. MacInnis: Well, the Gazette, as usual, did not print it all.

Mr. Abbott: That sometimes happens in these periodicals.

Mr. MacInnis: That is the situation. If these people who are unemployed do not draw attention to that situation nothing is going to be done for them. It is only to the extent that they holler, that we holler and everyone they can get in contact with can be made to holler that this government or any other government will take steps to relieve their distress.

Let me continue with what the Minister of Labour says. At page 1448 of Hansard he is reported to have said this:

> This leaves the problem of what is being done to assist those out of work, whether seasonally unemployed or otherwise. Actually, a great deal is already being done. The extended coverage of unemployment insurance during the last few years, plus the provision of supplementary unemployment insurance benefits during the first three and a half months of each year, has done much to help ease the burden of unemployment.

But we were doing all that three, four and five years ago. Unemployment insurance came into operation in 1941, and this is 1954. But at the moment we are dealing with a situation that has come about in 1954, and what we are asking is, what is being done to meet that situation? The minister went on:

> This year benefit payments will be even larger.

The benefits will be larger because there are more unemployed. I continue:

> This sum would not be offsetting income losses due to unemployment were it not for unemployment insurance. Many unemployed workers are also being assisted by family allowance payments and by old age pensions. In addition, the provincial and municipal governments are making social welfare payments which benefit those in need.

I never heard such quibbling with facts. The minister speaks of family allowances. Those people were receiving family allowances when they were employed, and the people who are employed today are receiving family allowances just the same as those who are unemployed. It was never intended that family allowances were to be put into effect to help the unemployed; they were put into effect because even with full time employment their incomes were not sufficient to give them a reasonable standard of living. How can it help them, or to what extent can it help them, when they are unemployed and have to live on either the unemployment insurance at $24 a week or nothing at all? The old age pension was not provided for people who are unemployed. They are unemployed, of course, because they are not employed in the sense that they are no longer able to work. Let us not try to throw sand in people's faces in regard to this problem. It is far too serious for that.

Then the minister goes on to say that the provincial and municipal governments are making social welfare payments which benefit those in need. I believe one of the reasons the problem is so serious is that during the period of good employment the federal government stopped assisting municipalities with the employable unemployed. They are left on the hands of the municipalities and the provincial government.

I hold in my hand a letter which I received from the Vancouver presbytery of the United Church of Canada, dated November 27. It enclosed a resolution, and this is the prayer of that resolution:

> The Vancouver presbytery of United Church of Canada urges that appropriate steps be taken by federal and provincial governments to implement in principle the recommendations of the policy statement on social assistance adopted by the governors of Canadian Welfare Council in their meeting of December 13, 1952, that provision be made for the payment of social assistance to indigent employable unemployed persons.

This is one of the difficult problems of the municipalities. They just have not the means to meet this situation that has been aggravated tremendously by the increased number of unemployed.

I hold in my hand a news item which appeared in the Vancouver Province of February 5, ten days ago. It reads:

> Deputy police chief, Gordon Ambrose, today blamed unemployment—which is far worse than most people realize—for the recent minor wave of burglaries, safecracking and armed holdups.
> Chief Ambrose said that the people police are arresting for these crimes "are not newcomers". But criminal types unable to find employment are "hungry" and thus become more active.

I can tell this house that hunger is a very potent urge, and hungry people—and there are many of them today—are going to get the means to buy what they need even if they have to commit crimes in order to do so. As a matter of fact I was reading in a Montreal paper a few days ago that in that city people were committing crimes so they would be put in jail where they could get food and shelter.

I suggest to this government that they should have known this situation was coming, because the conditions which we are meeting now are as old as the industrial system itself. We have had to deal with it periodically for the last two hundred years. There is nothing new in it; there is nothing strange about it. But it appears that we have not learned how to deal with it. If the government were to be ready for this situation, I suggest they should have been preparing not now but ten months or a year ago. There are, however, a great many things the government could do to help the unemployed if they would only take the trouble to find out about them. They could be doing these things while they are getting ready a program of public works in case the investments which they have been telling us about do not materialize.

This situation of falling markets and increasing unemployment is not something that is confined to this country alone. It is taking place in almost all industrial countries, and it is sort of contagious. When it develops in one country it makes it difficult for that country to trade with other countries, and so unemployment goes from one country to another as smallpox might go.

I say it is the proper function of government at a time like this to do these things for the people which the people individually are not able to do for themselves. One of the things which the people individually are not able to do for themselves is to provide employment. That will have to be the function of the government, and while they are preparing work programs they should provide adequate maintenance. We should get busy and help out the municipalities and the provinces in providing reasonable standards of food, clothing and shelter for the unemployed until employment can be found. The longer we delay, the more trouble we are building up for ourselves. We ought to get that clear in our minds, and get to work at once.

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed very much the pleasant discourse of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis). I concur in his realistic view that this is a problem of today and not one of the distant future. However, I find myself in the paradoxical position of also agreeing with the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) in so far as I also consider this to be a problem covering a period of years, a seasonal problem, and that therefore a committee to consider the whole thing may be most desirable.

Coming now to the particular remarks of the right hon. Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe), I was pleased to hear that we had sold some wheat to Brazil for the first time in several months. It will certainly help the prairie farmers to a considerable degree. A loosening of the purse strings in connection with investment is a most desirable feature, instead of continual defence spending, although we probably cannot forgo the latter because we may need defence spending in the not too distant future. The construction of the St. Lawrence seaway is indicated to commence later in the year, but it will not assist us today.

There is one feature of this debate which I found very amusing. I refer to the fact that many of those who have spoken from time to time have complained that the newspapers were quite frequently at fault, that they were being misquoted, that things were not being said in the newspapers as they should be said. However, I noticed that nearly everyone quoted from the newspapers at some length in order to indicate the justice of his particular remarks.

Coming to the problem itself, I would say that it is a three-way problem. It is an immediate seasonal problem; it is a long-range seasonal problem, and it is an in-season problem. Speaking to the first, the immediate seasonal problem, this calls for the immediate support of the subamendment we have before us at the present time. The long-range seasonal problem would call for the setting up of a committee along the lines proposed by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra in order to alleviate the situation at another time. The in-season problem is one that is usually of a calamitous type and therefore will give us a great deal of difficulty if our seasonal problem is not rectified immediately.

I appreciate the fact that the Minister of Labour gave us the statistics which had been compiled by the Department of Labour. I do not think we can blame the unemployment insurance commission or the national employment office for the unemployment that exists at the present time. It certainly is not of their doing. The men and women who are doing such an excellent job in his department are to be congratulated.

According to the figures quoted by the Acting Prime Minister there are over half a million unemployed. The Minister of Labour indicated that there are over 357,000 who worked less than 35 hours a week and 139,000 who have jobs but who did not work during the survey week. That gives us a total of approximately 496,000 who either had no work or worked less than 35 hours a week.

Using the figure that was quoted as the number of employables, which was 5,242,000, the ratio would appear to be 9·46 per cent of our eligible labour force which was wholly or partly unemployed. This is a most unfortunate situation. Comparatively speaking the 280,000 without jobs, who were seeking work, can be compared with the 190,000 who were mentioned a year ago as looking for employment. It is a most aggravated situation when we find an additional 50 per cent unemployed over what we had a year ago. I say that it is not seasonal when there is an increase of 50 per cent in the number of unemployed; it is definitely in-season.

As the Acting Prime Minister indicated, frictional unemployment might be a little less than 3 per cent. He was rather surprised at the figures given by the congress of labour, of from 3 to 5 per cent. I think he will agree when I say that the 3 per cent is possibly indicative of this particular time of the year, when seasonal employment happens to be at its lowest. The 5 per cent comes about when people find it very easy to get jobs, and they are more apt to leave their own jobs. A total of 150,000 then are out of work in Canada at all times. That would mean that the difference between 150,000 and 550,000, or about 400,000, are unemployed largely because of seasonal unemployment.

On checking the figures a little more closely we find that these may be grouped into three categorical divisions. There are those who are in a slump during the winter months; there are those whose slump is about over in January or February, and there are those who are unemployed during the summer months because of the seasonal period.

In the first group, those in connection with whom the seasonal slump is in full swing during this particular time, we find building construction with a 24·3 per cent variation; highway department work with a 60·6 per cent variation; meat, 17 per cent; logging, 60·3 per cent. The next group happens to be one that should be coming out of the slump, as its lowest point of seasonal employment is either in January or early February; I refer to motor vehicles, where the figure is 4·7 per cent. Then we have wood products, 11·3 per cent; pulp and paper, 9·9; distilled and malted liquors, 8·4 per cent.

In the next group employment should be at the absolute peak today, and I refer to the agricultural implement and textile industries. However, if you were to travel across the country I think you would find that the textile workers are practically out of business at this time. They are not seasonally unemployed. Because our wheat has not been moving, because the agricultural market has been rather stagnant in the past several months, agricultural employment has not been as high. These are not seasonal workers such as those mentioned earlier.

The cause of unemployment is twofold. It is either the fault of management, the fault of the workers or it is a combination of both. In connection with management it might be bad administration and planning. Possibly there are material shortages or delays in the arrival of the necessary material. It might be a case of bad management as regards machinery maintenance which leads to breakdowns through lack of replacements, or it might be a lack of storage facilities in businesses such as the lumber trade, where they have to store lumber and have a backlog of logs. It might also be an inadequate knowledge of marketing conditions, because certain departments do not look after these things as they should. It might also be a misdirection of shipments such as we had listed in farming periodicals, where it is sometimes related a carload of grain is shipped to one port and then has to be sent off to another.

On the other hand, the workman may sometimes be equally wrong. I was rather surprised in this connection to hear the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) say it was wrong for an industry to shut down. I am wondering whether it is not just as wrong sometimes for labour to force the shutdown of a plant and thereby affect the whole economy of the country. Mind you, I do not say it is wrong, but I am wondering if the same code does not apply to labour as to management in that particular regard.

The effect of unemployment on business, whether it be caused by strikes or by management or anything else, is already clear. The businessman is affected in so far as he is afraid to invest more capital in his business. We often face this argument as to which group is right, and that was illustrated in a newspaper very recently when we had an argument between labour leaders and the government as to the actual figure regarding the number of unemployed.

Statements on this question are sometimes considered to be radical in nature, and I sometimes wonder whether the people who are trying to correct this labour situation should not stop and ask themselves this question. What would you do if you were affected? Suppose, for example, you came to the government and said you wanted help, and they said you had better get a job elsewhere, as there were no jobs in your locality. Just what would you do? A man comes along then and says: If you come into our union group we will look after your interests. Whether they are communist-led or not is immaterial. The important thing is that they have a leader. They have someone to lead them, someone who will make representation on their behalf to the government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, you can talk to some people but you cannot talk reasonably to a man with an empty stomach. He has a right to live. It has often been said that hungry people are very dangerous people, and that hungry people often start wars. It is the "have-nots" who want what the "haves" possess. I therefore submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that it is the responsibility of this government to see to it that we do not have this hungry element among us. We are just breeding a communistic group of people so long as we allow this condition to continue.

I contend it is the business of the government to regulate the economy of our country so that the absolute minimum number of people are deprived of the privilege of working. These people do not expect the government to find jobs for them, but they do expect the opportunity of finding jobs if they wish to apply for them. We must find the means of getting a job to them.

Labour claims that $24 or under per week is too little to live on. I think every hon. member in this house realizes that if a home owner buys one of these national housing homes we propose to build he is going to require practically that entire sum to meet payments in the form of rents, taxes, water and light. It is not sufficient to keep him alive. We have a reserve of $900 million or more in the unemployment insurance fund, and if we were to divide that among these people on the basis of a living wage it probably would not last for more than a year and a half.

What can we do, then? This problem which faces us at the present time is one to which we must find the answer; otherwise it is going to swallow us all up.

And what about the man who has not worked long enough for benefits? He has to live. You cannot tell him, Well, move along, bub. We will build you a soup kitchen and let you have some food. They do not want bread alone. They do not want a canopy of words put around them. They want enough to live on, and you have to give it to them. Perhaps I should not say "give it to them", for I do not believe people want anyone to give them anything. All they want is the means of obtaining it, unless this communistic idea is so instilled in them that they think of these things as theirs by right.

We also have the question of requiring the building industry to process its own raw materials, a sort of Canada-first policy. Here is another dangerous feature in their demands, for they want us to build industries and they want a guaranteed wage. This also is a part of their Canada-first policy; and yet if we told them we were going to bring in electric equipment from Japan or Germany or from somewhere else they again claim it should be Canada-first and the equipment should be built here in order to provide jobs.

The problem has to be solved in such a way that we can regulate employment, do away with unemployment and do our trading in such a way that we can get rid of our surpluses. I know the government will probably say: "You have put your finger upon the problem we are up against, young man." I am fully aware of that, and I am quite certain in my own mind that there is an answer, provided we are ready to look around and find the answer as so many other countries must at the present time. We can have another war, but that would be a very hasty answer. It might be the quickest cure, but it is certainly not the one any hon. member in this house would advocate. Certainly I would be the last one to suggest it.

It is claimed we do not require foreign capital. I happened to discuss that matter with a group the other day, and they claimed we should not have foreign and United States capital coming into Canada. I am rather amazed that so many people should insist upon that, especially people who call themselves socialists, for we find on page 2 of the Financial Times of February 5 the following advertisement:

> Department of Mineral Resources, Province of Saskatchewan
> Public Notice
> Petroleum and Natural Gas Leases (receiving sealed bids).

Whom do they want to sell them to? Anyone who will buy them, including buyers from the United States. And now, Mr. Speaker, the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterway has been a long time in coming. More than twenty-odd years ago I gave a short address on this subject. The project is a practical reality, but it is not going to solve the unemployment problem facing us at the present moment. That is a problem we must solve now. The 100,000 homes which will be built over the coming year is not going to put 400,000 men back at work immediately. That will be a slow process. The building of sport fields and cultural institutions, schools and hospitals and all the other public facilities we require so badly in this country is also something for the future, but it is not the answer to the problem facing us today.

If we are going to have the small businessman continue in existence, if we are going to encourage capital to continue in this country, as is so earnestly desired, we have to solve this problem at the present time. The men and women we are discussing want work. They do not want anything else. They are interested only in solving the problem now, not at the next session of this house. I think if we are to be in the position that we consider we should be in, as men who call ourselves parliamentarians we should find the answer to that question.

I have just one or two words here in conclusion, Mr. Speaker. There is a real reason for unemployment. First it must be understood. From what I have heard various men say in this house from time to time, I am sure that private enterprise has solved the problem of production. As mute evidence of that fact we have a surplus of butter, of machinery, a stockpiling of textiles, salmon, canned meats, cheese and other products. The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) the other day suggested to us that the British Columbia fishermen solved their own problem to a degree by sending a trade mission to Britain to see whether or not they could buy some British goods and possibly, in the course of so doing, sell our Canadian canned salmon. They did an excellent job, as only British Columbians can. They went to Britain and bought fishing nets, trawlers and the various paraphernalia they need in the fishing industry, and they induced the Britishers, in turn, to take canned salmon. It was not a barter deal. However, it might almost be suggested that it developed as a barter deal.

I do not think it is the responsibility of the wheat growers of Saskatchewan, the fishermen of British Columbia or the fruit growers of any area, no matter which it might be, to go on a trading trip to any other nation in the world. That is what this government has been elected to do. We are supposed to find markets for these products, not to send small individual groups to do it. I respect the fishermen for what they did. I respect any group for trying to sell its own goods abroad. But every time they do that they are taking dollars and cents from their own group, money which rightfully belongs to the people in that particular area. The farmers, the ranchers, the lumbermen and the various industries that might be involved should not, in my opinion, be obliged to look after the selling of their own goods. It is a problem that should devolve on the government of this country.

The government should take action now for the alleviation of a situation that has grown into an unhappy one in this country. We therefore support the subamendment that was proposed by the hon. member for Cape Breton South.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to quote labour leaders and what they have found. I am not going to quote editorials and what they have reported. I am just going to speak of what I know. I know something about Fort William. I know what causes any unemployment that we have there. When the freeze-up comes, it certainly freezes certain sources of employment. Navigation ceases. Therefore those who are working on the freighters or on passenger boats and who have their homes in Fort William are obliged to seek other jobs. Elevator work becomes a little bit scarcer. Dredging is shut down. Some railway workers are laid off. Road work is scarcer. Sometimes pulp and paper workers are laid off. Certainly in connection with contractors who are engaged in the construction of houses and outside work, there is some unemployment.

However, I have noticed that we in Fort William have some men who are engaged in seasonal work and who are never unemployed because they have initiative and, like some hon. members, they would not be out of work; if they became unemployed in one job, they would get another. I know that in Fort William we have some unemployment at the present time. But from the report I received on Friday from a young businessman who visited me, the unemployment situation there is not serious. In fact, according to his report employment is on the up trend. While Canadian Car laid off a considerable group of men a while ago, they have taken them back again. That is a sign in the other direction.

I have a friend who is a building inspector. He says the best source of employment is the building trades because there are so many industries connected with them. As the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) has said, the construction of houses will be on the increase. Therefore employment from that source should be on the increase. I expect that in Fort William by the end of March there will be less unemployment; and by June I doubt that we shall have anybody unemployed there.

I appreciate the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He did not mention Fort William, but I mention Port Arthur. We are very much alike. As far as we are concerned, it is seasonal unemployment. I should like to see any government on earth that can change the seasons and bring about all year round work. I have known of only one case where the sun was caused to stand still. That was in the case of Joshua. As long as we have lake Superior and the lakehead, we are going to have seasonal unemployment. Any government that can cure that situation is, in my opinion, certainly a sweet government. We shall continue to have seasonal unemployment. There are, however, certain men who, as I have said, when they lose one job and become unemployed, go and get another one. If they do not earn as big pay, they earn enough to keep the pot boiling.

I appreciate the work our trades and labour council in Fort William are doing. They are second to none in helping the men to get jobs.

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I suppose there is no other problem in Canada that affects as many people as this question of unemployment. Because of the far-reaching consequences I felt that I should take part in this debate, because quite a large percentage of the people whom I have the honour to represent are working people in the London area.

The first indication we had of the approaching problem—and it was pointed out by our party quite some time ago—was the loss of the primary markets for agricultural products. We are now reaping some of the results of those lost markets; and, on top of that, we are piling up surpluses of many farm products. Just while I am mentioning that fact, may I say that I hold in my hand an editorial from tonight's Ottawa Journal. I am going to ask the house to bear with me while I read a couple of paragraphs from it. It is entitled "Skeletons of the Farm" and reads in part as follows:

> The Hamilton convention of the Ontario federation of labour, CIO-CCL, heard Mr. Douglas McEntee of the united automobile workers explain that a reduction in implement sales was due to farmers being unable to buy because of a 22 per cent drop in their own income in the last fifteen months. Thus there is evidence that labour leaders are taking a more realistic approach in examining the causes of unemployment.

Further on there is the following:

> In 1953 the average weekly earnings of Canadian workers in manufacturing rose by 4 per cent in real income, but the farmer in many cases had no income gain for the year and in several instances he had less.

That indicates pretty clearly why farm implement manufacturers are not able to sell their products, and why the employees are finding themselves idle. Another indication of the trend of events is the report of the Bank of Canada mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, and I couple with that the annual statements of the chartered banks. I have examined them carefully. I think without exception they approach this problem cautiously, but they indicate that the loss of markets cannot help but have one result, a decrease in employment in Canada. Our banks are fairly conservative in their outlook, and I think they have soft-pedalled this question. Because of the danger that the impression might be created in the minds of many people that times are tougher than they actually are, they have approached the question with some caution. After all, markets are the keys to employment. We have lost markets and consequently we have lost the keys to employment.

There is another cause which I have mentioned before, inflation, which was aided and abetted through all the years from the beginning of the war until the last year or two. Inflation has resulted in our pricing ourselves out of world markets, and consequently we have unemployment. Then there is the increasing danger of competition from Europe and Asia, particularly from Germany and Japan. There again they are able to out-produce and out-sell us, and that is one of the big problems that we as Canadians must face.

I come back again to the drop in purchasing power of those engaged in agriculture, which is now being felt not only with respect to agricultural implements but in all segments of our economy. Another thing that worries agriculture is the fact that while farmers are taking a 22 per cent cut in the prices of the things they sell, very little if any of that reduction is reflected in the prices the consumer pays. In fact the last report of the dominion bureau of statistics actually indicates that the cost of living has gone up. Certainly it is fractional, but the reduction in farm prices is not indicated in the cost of living.

According to the minister there are 524,000 people seeking employment. But that does not indicate how many firms are operating on short time, two, three or four days a week, or on shortened hours of work. It does not indicate the number of people who are out of jobs but do not go to the unemployment insurance offices and report for work. They search for work themselves and try to find jobs.

I had an experience along that line a week ago Saturday when I returned home. I was waiting on the street near the station for my family to pick me up with the car. An elderly gentleman came along and I passed the time of day with him. I said, "What are you doing?" He said, "I have just come from the unemployment insurance office, where I have been collecting my unemployment insurance." He said, "This is the first time in my life I have ever had to collect unemployment insurance. Never before when I was out of a job was I unable to go around and find another job. If the worst came to the worst I could always go out to the farming country and get a job, but they do not want men today. They are equipped with farm machinery, and they do not want transient help. They are not hiring anybody. Consequently I am walking the street looking for a job and collecting my unemployment insurance."

I think the Acting Prime Minister handed out rather cold comfort to the unemployed when he suggested that they go and find different jobs, in view of the fact that at the present time there are some 500,000 men who cannot find work.

Another rather disturbing angle is our trade position. We have an unfavourable trade balance after many good years. Actually what is happening is that we are employing people abroad to produce and do things that many of our Canadian people could do for themselves and do as well or better. But the goods that are produced by these people abroad are priced lower because of the lower cost of labour and the lower standards of living in these countries. Therefore we have become dependent on many foreign countries for things that we could produce ourselves.

I do not need to go over the list of such goods, but some of them are Canadian farm products that are being replaced by foreign goods. So far the government have evinced no desire whatever to change their trade, economic and fiscal policies to meet the changing conditions of the times.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) blamed unbridled capitalism for some of our troubles, but there are many people throughout the country who blame unbridled inflation for the difficulties in which we find ourselves. Prices have chased wages and wages have chased prices up and up into an unreal price world. As we look around this Canada of ours we see that there are thousands and thousands of things that can be done. Yet there seem to be so many dollars to do other things and so few dollars to do the things that could and should be done. So far the government has only indicated a fervent hope that things will get better. They are waiting for something to turn up.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I should explain why I intend at this moment to alter the order of rotation. I should like to tell the hon. member for Winnipeg North that I was informed that it would be most convenient if the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond could be allowed to speak now. Considering that the hon. member for Fort William only spoke for a few minutes and that the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond is not going to speak for any more than 20 or 25 minutes, I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North will agree that it would be a nice gesture if he would allow the hon. member to proceed now. Then he may proceed.

Mr. A. J. MacEachen (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate on unemployment I am conscious of the concern any degree of unemployment causes hon. members in the house and the people of Canada generally. I am very happy to follow my good friend from Cape Breton South in this debate because his constituents, like my own in Inverness-Richmond, are exposed in varying degrees to the current uncertainty in the coal industry. This uncertainty arises from a painful readjustment to the competition of fuel substitutes, and a program of mechanization which is expected to permit the largest producers of coal to compete more favourably in the future.

Without turning this debate on unemployment into a discussion of the coal industry itself, I might say in passing that the problems of the small coal operators are even more acute. For example, I have in my own constituency the town of Inverness, a coal town whose history has been one of uncertain development because the producers of coal have been unable to find access to coal markets, except in the depth of the winter. But while I am necessarily conscious of the problems of the coal industry, I would prefer to make a few comments on the general problem of unemployment as it exists in Canada as a whole.

Sir William Beveridge, who contributed so much to our understanding of this problem, made the comment that the greatest evil of unemployment is not physical but moral; not the want which it may bring, but the hatred and fear which it breeds. Unemployment is a great evil; but because of the contribution made by Sir William Beveridge and others we can conduct this discussion in an atmosphere entirely changed from that which prevailed in the thirties, and in periods earlier than that.

The prevailing opinion then was that there were certain natural and necessary forces within the economy which automatically created a momentum toward full employment of all resources. Any evidence of unemployment was simply taken as proof that the economy was not being allowed to operate freely. Fortunately that view is no longer respectable. Lord Keynes and his disciples created a revolution in economic thinking by proving the simple proposition, which the layman had long suspected to be true, that the economy, on its own, did not naturally gravitate toward full employment, and that at certain times it rested at a level lower than full employment. Because of these changes in the thinking of economists, we have at present certain established and recognized measures by which assistance can be given to the economy in its momentum toward full employment.

I refer particularly to public investment, stabilization of purchasing power, social security payments and, finally, the use of the budget and financial policy as methods of maintaining full employment. I am sure it was this line of thinking that prompted the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) in his recent statement to say that the government was embarking upon a less restrictive policy of public works expenditures, and was attempting to make available greater funds for residential construction. Both of these are obviously anti-unemployment measures.

I belong personally to the school of thought which affirms that with our new understanding of the causes of depression there will not occur in Canada in the future the kind of depression that afflicted us in the thirties. Hon. members who read mystery stories know how valuable is the axiom "cherchez la femme" in discovering the culprit. Likewise the axiom "cherchez le placement" is a powerful ally to an economist who is interested in finding out how deep-seated the unemployment situation is. The movements of investment are a powerful ally, especially in the private sector of the economy, because investment is the most volatile segment in the volume of national output.

If there are evidences that private investment is decreasing, and if there is evidence that private investors are unwilling to invest further, then there are bound to be warning signals in the rest of the economy. In his summary for the year 1953 the economist for the Bank of Nova Scotia has this to say:

> As the year 1953 draws to a close it is abundantly clear that new records have again been set in Canadian employment, production and income. Industrial activity has been considerably greater than in 1952, construction has continued buoyant, and the country has been favoured with the third exceptional harvest in succession. Though the cash income of farmers will not be quite as large as in 1952, average weekly earnings of industrial workers have continued to rise.

He further states that the main impetus to economic activity in 1953 has come from increases in consumer spending and capital investment outlays. In fact the capital investment outlay for 1953 was in excess of $4 billion. At present in Canada there is no real evidence of weakening in the desire of Canadians to invest capital in the development of our natural resources.

While the figures on unemployment are disquieting, there are at the same time other reassuring evidences of stability. Private investment is one of these, and I mention it particularly because when any economist wishes to find out what is really happening, just as the good detective story reader will look for "la femme" in the story, the economist will look at investment. And at the present time, no Canadian has grounds to be concerned about the readiness of both Canadians and others to invest in the future of this country.

A great deal of importance is currently attached to public investment as a method of reducing employment, and of course the chief form of public investment is public works. I think it should be pointed out that public works, as an effective anti-unemployment measure, is a mixed blessing. I say this because of the diminishing amount of manpower being used in all public works projects. It is not sufficient simply to approve of public works without at the same time knowing the manpower content of any public work under consideration.

May I give an example. The great engineering project now under way in Nova Scotia, the construction of the Canso causeway, while costing approximately $21 million, is making no substantial contribution to the unemployment problem in that area because of the low ratio of labour to capital equipment. At present about 150 to 200 persons are employed there.

So in considering the impact of public works as an anti-unemployment measure, one must take into account the only important aspect of it for that purpose, namely the volume of manpower required in any particular situation. Furthermore the completion of the Canso causeway will have a very detrimental effect on three communities of the area because of the displacement of personnel.

This example of the Canso causeway is a very apt one for my purposes because, first of all, it allows me to make my point about public works, namely the relationship between labour content and capital equipment. At the same time it provides me an opportunity to draw to the attention of this house the unemployment problem which will be created in three communities, namely Mulgrave, Port Hawkesbury and Point Tupper, when the personnel now employed in carrying traffic by ferry and rail across the strait of Canso will be permanently unemployed. I am sure the residents of the area, in the solution to their problem, will have the active and considered assistance of the government of Canada.

Mr. Castleden: How many people will be affected?

Mr. MacEachen: The estimate varies. It may be from 200 to 400 or less; it is hard to predict.

I simply want to make one final point, Mr. Speaker, in commenting upon some of the remarks that have been made this afternoon and this evening. The comment is that no longer can any country exclusively control the movements of its own economy. This is particularly true of Canada because of its vulnerability to changes in world markets. For that reason one of the chief ingredients of a full employment policy for Canada is an increasing willingness to take part in all forms of international economic co-operation.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I can quite honestly congratulate the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. MacEachen) on a very distinguished maiden speech in this house. It certainly showed that before he came down here to speak he had studied his subject very carefully. I think we can also draw from his remarks the feeling that the government say to themselves, "We are all Keynesians now," but they are about 25 years too late. I do not think what J. M. Keynes suggested can at any time provide a solution to the perpetual problem of unemployment under the capitalist system.

I do not know whether or not the Conservatives recognized that this afternoon when they moved their amendment suggesting we should have a committee—I am not sure for what; to consider how the unemployed became so, or how we get unemployment—but I remember very vividly a few years ago when we in the C.C.F. were asking, at the time of rising prices, that there should be price control, and the then prime minister of Canada, Mr. Mackenzie King, offered to the house his solution, another parliamentary committee to consider how prices got where they were. I remember the then member for Cariboo, Mr. William Irvine, rising in this house and saying to the then prime minister, "If my right hon. friend saw a man drowning in a pool he would appoint a royal commission to find out how the devil the water got there"; and that was about the value of the committee, as it happened.

I do not think the Conservatives have any solution to the unemployment problem as it now exists. Obviously, from what we have heard from the government side, neither have they. They are both believers in the capitalist system of economics, and unemployment has been endemic under capitalism ever since we have known that system. They have never managed to find a solution except in time of war. I say there can be no solution under a capitalist system as long as the function of the system is to give the making of profit precedence over the rights of the great majority of the people.

One of the rights which I consider to be inalienable in any democratic society today is the right of a man to employment at reasonable rates of wages, and that fundamental human right is being denied in this country. When we bring unemployment to the attention of the government we get no answer, at least in the sense that the government has no solution to offer.

This afternoon the Minister of Labour gave an objective statement of the situation. He said that committees had been appointed, and he hoped we might get some valuable suggestions. While the government is hoping, men are going without work and still more are becoming unemployed. While the government is hoping, rents are unpaid or home owners are going behind in their mortgages. We need something more than hope; we need something more than a desire to have suggestions come out of committees. We need some action, and it would be a pleasant thing indeed if a member of the government would get up in this house and tell us what they intended to do.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce for once departed from his usual Pollyanna attitude that all was for the best in the best of all best possible worlds. He said he was anxious, and he had every reason to show anxiety. He agreed tentatively that there were 524,000 applicants for jobs. Then hurriedly he went on to say that this number cannot be accepted as right. Well, what is right and what is not right? We are told by the Minister of Labour that there are 524,000 applicants for jobs, and then the Minister of Trade and Commerce begins to tear that figure down.

Let us take for instance the figure of 280,000 men without jobs, seeking work. Even if only 280,000 are seeking work the fact remains that there are 280,000 personal tragedies in Canada. Where a man is unemployed you have a home in which there is fear, in which there is worry; and as we saw during the thirties, when you have those anxieties in a home you have the possibility of a home breaking up. But there are far more than 280,000 unemployed. The figure is nearly double that mark.

Then the Acting Prime Minister said that the increase in unemployment is only 2 per cent of the working force. I have been troubled before with ministers who deal in percentages and who do not deal in figures. The increase may be only 2 per cent of the working force but, Mr. Speaker, translate that into numbers and the increase is 100,000; and 100,000 is something vastly more frightening than 2 per cent.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce did not seem to be unduly worried at the idea of a 2 per cent increase, but he should be worried at the idea of a 100,000 increase. Yet as he said, "we have not panicked." Not only has the government not panicked; it has not done anything. The government has no solution to this problem, and they tell us, like Mr. Asquith, well, let us wait and see. We will hope that something will turn up.

We have over on the other side of the house the greatest group of Micawbers that Canada has ever been afflicted with. They are always hoping for something to turn up. Then the Minister of Trade and Commerce went on to say that there is much similarity to 1950, when there were hundreds of thousands unemployed. When we asked the government what proposals they had to set before the country to alleviate the situation, there was no answer from any minister. Well, once again the government was extraordinarily lucky. At that time it was Stalin who took them out of the hole. In 1939 it was Adolf Hitler who solved the problem of unemployment for them.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Something has happened to the predictions of my hon. friend each year for the last 15 years. They have not worked out as my hon. friend expected. Is that not so?

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Our predictions have worked out remarkably well. We have told the government they have no plans for unemployment, and it has been proved to be so.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): My hon. friend has been predicting that the government would meet disaster every year, and we have not had that.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I think a very large number of Canadians are coming to believe that to have a Liberal government is a disaster, but you may as well make the best of it while you can.

The minister told us, as I said, that 1950 was different, and that had we adopted the ideas of the opposition we would have gone through an inflationary process. That might well have been so, but it was only avoided because of the advent of war. The fact remains, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway pointed out today, and as the workers of Canada are realizing more and more, that under the capitalist system the more wealth there is produced, the more insecurity there is for all concerned. That is a fat-headed system if there ever was one.

We have to get away from the concept that unemployment is simply a mass of figures or certain percentages. We have to realize that every case of unemployment, as I said earlier, is a personal tragedy. Unemployment is a waste of human resources, an unforgivable waste of the capital of the nation. I can well imagine what any businessman, what any chamber of commerce or board of trade would say if machinery was seen lying idle and rusty. They would object and expostulate at the waste of capital, and rightly so. But they seem to forget that when workers are not working and producing they also are rusting, they also are idle. The capital of the worker is his ability and his time, and when he sees those things deteriorating or disappearing in front of his eyes he loses that which is of vital importance to him.

Yet when the workers in the farm implement industry appeared before the cabinet the other day and pointed out how acute their problem was they were told in part that they had priced themselves out of the market —a point which I shall deal with later—or, on the other hand, that they ought to move on to other areas where there was work.

The fact remains that today a worker who has been stationed in an area for some time with his wife and family in all probability has an equity in a home. He has established his family life in that area, and now he is being asked to break it up, to move to some other area with no guarantee that he will get what he paid for his house or even part of it, and with no guarantee at all that there will be housing available in the area to which he may go. Perhaps he and the rest of his family will have to live apart for many months. That is not an answer to the problem.

The most important thing about the brief presented by the steel workers and the united automobile workers on behalf of those engaged in the farm implement industry was the realization that labour in the city and the worker on the farm are interdependent. The more the farmer gets in income the more he is able to buy of that which the city worker produces. In reverse it is exactly the same. The higher wages the city worker gets the more he is going to buy from the farmer. The city worker and the farm worker are completely interdependent despite all the ideas of those who try to drive a wedge between the two, to split them up and keep them separate. Their fundamental interests are the same, yet the government has no answer except to tell the city worker that wages are too high and he has priced himself out of the market.

What are the facts? They were given in the brief submitted by the workers in the farm implement industry. In 1946 there were 51 plants in the farm implement industry; in 1951 there were 81 plants. In 1946 there were 11,548 wage earners; in 1951 there were 14,078. There had been an increase of 22 per cent in the number of wage earners. In 1946 the wages paid amounted to $20,038,000; in 1951 the wages paid amounted to $41,490,000, an increase of 107 per cent.

The gross value of production in that industry in 1946 was $63,239,000; in 1951 the gross value of production had risen to $171,172,000, an increase of 170 per cent. Or to put it another way, in 1946 the average worker earned $1,735 and produced $5,476 worth of goods whereas in 1951 he earned an average of $2,947 and produced $12,159 worth of goods.

I would say that in the face of such figures those who maintain that the workers are pricing themselves out of jobs do not know the facts of the situation. Earlier in the debate the minister said that those industries in which there was the greatest proportionate increase in wages were the ones which were affected most. I do not think that applies in this industry. It is not without significance to note that the profits of this industry increased by 224 per cent between 1946 and 1951.

The workers in that industry know very well that they are interdependent with the farmer. They know very well that if the farmers are well off they are going to have employment. They know that if the farmers are up against it, then the workers in the city will be up against it. They pointed out in this brief that between 1950 and 1951 the net income of farmers fell by 11 per cent or $240 million. When you compare the price index of agricultural products of July, 1951, and August, 1953, you find that it fell from 308 to 240, or 22 per cent.

All this brings home once again the fact that if the primary producers in this country are beginning to find the economic going rough, then the rest of us are going to suffer. In no small measure prosperity in this country depends upon the well-being of our primary producers. What then can we do to help them in such a way that it will reflect favourably on the employment figures of this country?

I have a suggestion to offer. We have in this country one of the greatest surpluses of wheat ever known. We have in the world two-thirds of the population going to bed hungry. We have suggested on more than one occasion that 200 million bushels of wheat should be given to those who need food today and cannot get it. From the selfish point of view it would pay us hand over fist; from the humanitarian point of view it would do more to win the cold war than anything else I can think of.

I may be asked where the money is going to come from. The government already has the money. There is a fund—I will not call it a slush fund; it is not that—a very tidy little hidden reserve tucked away in the Department of National Defence amounting to some $300 million which is still unexpended. In the economic cold war there would be no greater protection for Canada than to use that money to buy wheat to send to those who need food. It would be a good thing from every point of view. It would put purchasing power into the hands of our farmers, and that purchasing power in turn would be reflected in the industrial economy of this country.

Proposed Committee on Unemployment

It is an idea which I suggest to the government. It is one which I commend to the government. I am perfectly certain that they will not act upon any idea which comes from this side, but I think it is one thing which would help to restore what the Acting Prime Minister called an economic atmosphere conducive to a high level of employment. The minister speaks about it, but I have yet to see the government doing anything about it.

Mr. B. R. Leboe (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, as one who spent 20 years working in industry, and who for some 15 years has had men working for me, I intend tonight to touch on a different phase of the unemployment situation. I should like to follow along the lines adopted tonight by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Holowach). What I would like to say tonight has to do with management-labour relations.

I am not concerned at the moment with the figures in respect to unemployment. These statistics mean very little to us unless we are thoroughly familiar with all the matters connected with them. What I am concerned with today is the relationship that exists between management and labour. I do not believe either management or labour are justified in all the things they do. The employer is as dependent upon labour as labour is dependent on the employer. And, as the hon. member for Edmonton East said, we must perpetuate that marriage, and we must encourage the attitude of partnership.

In connection with the unemployment situation today, and in past years, I believe it will be found that much of it has resulted because of the wedge which has been driven between management and labour. That is one of the greatest causes for alarm in any country; and the lack of proper relationship between those who are to perform the work and those who are outlining the work to be performed must always constitute a serious problem to any country.

In that regard I would like to touch upon the problem of strikes, and in this matter I can speak with some knowledge, for we just went through a 101-day strike in the Prince George area. During that strike we found children going to school without butter or jam or anything else between their slices of bread, and other children at the schools had to share with the children of those who were unfortunate enough to be caught in that strike.

A strike does not only affect the strikers, but also other people who are connected with the particular industry involved, and who perhaps themselves were not in favour of the strike. That was the case at Prince George. Prior to the strike we had three trains per day hauling lumber out of that town, but after the strike had been on for some little time these trains were entirely cut off. The railroad men depending on the lumber industry suffered because of the relationship that existed between management and labour at Prince George.

In any investigation the government might conduct into this matter I hope that is one of the phases of our industrial life which will be investigated at the same time, because harmonious relationships between management and labour will aid in any development of our natural resources and in the construction of irrigation and power projects so badly needed in this country.

There is one particular aspect we should all remember, and that is that any worker who works in a plant, regardless of its size and monetary value, is making a living out of the fixed assets that are there. The operator naturally expects to operate at a profit; but we must not forget, as workers, that we have all this equipment in our hands with which to make our living. I recall that when I was employed in the sawmill industry I would often look at the machines there and reflect that I had nothing to do with the actual investment, but that I certainly had a chance to produce and make a living with the machines which were provided.

Management is dependent on labour and labour is dependent on management. If they cannot get along together we cannot solve our production problems. Once we develop harmonious relations between management and labour, and I say this sincerely, I do not think we need to fear communism in this country. Those people who would sow distrust and hatred and drive a wedge between management and labour are the ones who are going to be our undoing in the long run if this situation is allowed to continue. We must make every effort to bring management and labour closer together.

On motion of Mr. Leboe the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall continue this debate, and if it is concluded we shall take up the amendments to the Salaries Act; amendments to the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act; and the resolution with respect to the Export Credits Insurance Act.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, February 16, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, February 12, 1954

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Honourable Thibaudeau Rinfret, Chief Justice of Canada, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber on Tuesday, the 16th February, at 9.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
sir,
Your obedient servant,
J. F. Delaute,
Secretary to the Governor General, (Administrative)

PRIVILEGE

MR. FULTON—INQUIRY AS TO COMPLETENESS OF RETURN

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I have to bring to your attention and to the attention of the house a matter concerning the completeness of a return which was ordered by this house on February 1. On that date the house adopted a motion of mine as follows:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, memoranda or telephone calls, etc., exchanged between the minister or the Department of Fisheries and any person or organization outside the dominion government service, since December 5, 1952, concerning the installation of fish screens on rivers and streams in the Nicola valley or elsewhere in British Columbia.

This return was tabled yesterday but apparently there is an omission from it, in that not all the correspondence has been produced. I have here a clipping from the Kamloops paper dated January 20, which was some ten days before the return was ordered, which indicates that the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) had written a letter on this matter to Mr. Kenneth W. Houghton, living in my constituency. I may say that Mr. Houghton was the defeated Liberal candidate in the last general election. That letter is not included in the return and I would be grateful if you would have a further order of the house issued to the department to make certain that all correspondence relevant to this matter is produced.

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): It is not my intention, nor would it be my intention, to include my personal correspondence in an official return.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will understand that, an order having been issued by the house, I have no power to change the order that was made nor to give an order to the house myself. The order was made and the return was produced. The hon. member is perfectly right in raising the question at this time because in his view the return is not complete. However, he has the explanation from the minister. He may not agree with it, but I imagine that this is where the matter should rest.

Mr. Fulton: It will rest there for the time being—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fulton: —but I should like it to be perfectly clear that the minister has stated that that was personal correspondence.

An hon. Member: He said that.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INTRODUCTION OF FIVE-DAY 40-HOUR WEEK IN VARIOUS DEPARTMENTS

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I should like to make a statement with respect to the introduction of the five-day 40-hour week. I announced on December 8 last that the government had decided that the policy of readjusting the working week of the operating staffs in the post office, customs and various other operating branches of the public service to the five-day 40-hour week would be put into effect on April 1 next. This, of course, was to be done where the five-day 40-hour week was the prevailing practice in the locality.

As I mentioned a few days ago in the house, the staffs of the civil service commission and the treasury board have been examining available statistics which show the extent to which the five-day 40-hour week is in effect in business and industry throughout the country. The civil service commission has made a report based on these figures and the treasury board has approved its recommendations that the five-day 40-hour week be put into effect in the locations listed below for operating employees. In these locations the five-day 40-hour week is also approved for clerical employees. As local conditions change and the five-day week becomes the common practice in additional centres, it will, of course, be extended to civil servants in these localities and further announcements will be made.

I should point out to you that, although the principle followed has been to conform to the local practice with respect to hours of work, some exceptions have been made for the sake of administrative convenience and over-all efficiency and it has been decided to place the operating employees on the five-day 40-hour week wherever clerical employees are on the five-day week and vice versa.

I would like to draw to your attention, also, a further principle underlying the decision to extend the five-day 40-hour week to coincide with local practice. It has always been understood, and the civil service commission's recommendations bear out, that even where the five-day 40-hour week is a common local practice, it does not apply in certain types of employment, for example:

Hospitals, convalescent institutions, health centres and nursing stations; establishments and services maintained by departments to furnish living accommodation and/or to provide messing facilities for civil servants, military personnel, detainees or transient guests; firefighting and fire protection services; services used in the operation and maintenance of penitentiaries and the guarding of persons in detention; security and watchman services; the operating services on farms, fish hatcheries, national parks and historic sites; lightkeeping services; heating staffs.

The five-day 40-hour week, therefore, cannot be put into effect for these civil service classes. The places listed come to some 180-odd, and I assume the house will give consent that they should be printed without being read.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed this list be printed without being read?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) arising out of his statement as to the application to 100 communities of the five-day 40-hour week.

Mr. Abbott: About 180 communities.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right; about 180 communities. In the case of areas in which the prevailing practice is, generally speaking, the five-day 40-hour week and which have not been included within the purview of the table that was placed before the house, will the minister say how frequently it will be reviewed and what evidence would be required in order to have added as an addendum an area which is not now included in the present list?

Mr. Abbott: My understanding is that the civil service commission are making a continuous inquiry. It would only be hearsay for me to tell my hon. friend what evidence they accept as to whether or not the 40-hour week is the prevailing practice. I assume they survey existing industries, offices, et cetera. My information is that the policy is that where more than 50 per cent of the industries or office workers are on the five-day 40-hour week, they then certify that area as being one in which it is the prevailing practice. The same practice would apply with respect to the civil service.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I direct a question to the Minister of Finance, supplementary to the one asked by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). Must the government always follow in this matter? Could the government not lead the way once in a while?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Inquiries of the Ministry

REPORTS AND PAPERS

PROCEDURE TO BE FOLLOWED IN TABLING RETURNS

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, as required by law, I am tabling the annual report to parliament of the civil service commission regarding the positions excluded from the operation of the Civil Service Act during the year 1953.

I am also tabling a parliamentary return in regard to cost plus contracts.

Mr. Lennard: Whose return? Who asked for it?

[Later:]

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State. I noticed when he tabled a return a few moments ago that he did not follow the usual practice and say who had asked for the return. It is the usual procedure in tabling returns not only to inform hon. members of the subject matter, but also to give the name of the hon. member who asked for it. I would suggest that the usual practice be followed in this matter.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I understood these returns were orders of the house and I did not realize it was the duty of a minister to go behind an order of the house and give the name of the hon. member who had moved for the return; but if it is the general wish that that be done I shall certainly be glad to comply.

WATER POLLUTION

NORTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is he prepared to give a statement setting forth the degree of success that has been achieved as the result of the co-operation between his officials and the health officials of the government of Alberta in connection with the pollution of the North Saskatchewan river?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member has just noted, the matter he brings to my attention is receiving the consideration of the federal government in co-operation with the responsible government under the constitution in the province of Alberta. I may say, however, that our own laboratory in Ottawa and the laboratories of the department of health in Edmonton, as well as the laboratories of the industries concerned, are all participating in the current investigation with regard to the pollution of the North Saskatchewan river.

Samples are being taken regularly from 14 river points extending from above Edmonton through to The Pas in Manitoba. The industrial effluents as they flow into the river are also being analysed to detect the substances or combination of substances which are causing the objectionable taste and odour. This work is being headed up in Edmonton by a chemist from the Department of National Health and Welfare assisted by another chemist from the same department and two of our engineers, also from the department. In addition to this technical staff the chiefs of the public health engineering division and the occupational health engineering division are still in Edmonton and will remain there until their services are no longer required by the proper authorities in Alberta.

The results of the investigation by our officers, however, to date still leave a doubt as to the real underlying source of the nuisance. This is due to the extremely complex nature of the discharges and to the very real possibility of new compounds being formed after the mixture of the effluents in the river.

While this is going on, the industries themselves are doing everything they can to cooperate with the provincial and other authorities in this particular matter.

I might add that Dr. C. J. Mackenzie, latterly head of the research council in Canada, who has had some experience in these matters, happens to be in the west at the present time, and his services in a consultative capacity are also being enlisted in order to see if he can in some way give assistance.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has the department as yet made an analysis of the water in the city of Prince Albert, and if so, what does that analysis reveal?

Mr. Martin: We had an analysis of the water from the city of Prince Albert at least two weeks ago, but my hon. friend would not expect me to give a technical answer. I can say, however, that the odour from the water is not what one normally would expect or hope for.

Mr. A. M. Campbell (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question? Has it been determined which plant in Edmonton is responsible for the pollution, because I have word today that one plant in particular is responsible?

Mr. Martin: I can only say what I said a moment ago, that that has not been determined.

[Mr. Martin.]

FEDERAL PURCHASES OF CHEMICALS FROM EDMONTON COMPANIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. Campbell (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister a question? Is the federal government purchasing chemicals for jet fuel, or chemicals for any purpose, from any company in Edmonton, Alberta? If so, will the minister find out whether such government purchases are being made from any company which may be polluting the North Saskatchewan river?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, I can report only for the department for which I am responsible, namely the Department of Defence Production. The answer to the hon. member's question is that we buy jet fuel but we do not buy any chemicals from the plants in question. In other words, fuels are bought as a complete store or product. Regarding chemicals for any other purpose, the general purchasing division of my department has not bought any in the Edmonton area.

NATURAL GAS

PROPOSED PIPE LINE TO SERVE TORONTO AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister relative to an advertisement which appeared in today's issue of the Toronto Globe and Mail and which was inserted by the Consumers' Gas Company. In view of the fact that Toronto cannot be served with natural gas from Alberta in less than three years, contrasted with service from—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will kindly put his question.

Mr. Nickle: This advertisement states—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. member put his question?

Mr. Nickle: Will the minister advise us of his government's views on the Niagara gas transmission project, and how soon the Niagara bill may be considered by parliament?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government has no views on the subject. As far as the bill by the applicant is concerned, it is now before parliament going through the normal parliamentary procedure. I have heard nothing about it since it was introduced in the other place. However, I presume it will come here in due course, and I suggest that my hon. friend can do his own digging as to when that will be.

HEALTH INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the minister received a copy of a resolution from the Retired Citizens' Association of his own city of Windsor respectfully urging the Hon. Paul Martin to speak out in parliament in favour of a national health insurance plan? If so, does the minister intend to implement this resolution at an early date?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the citizens of Windsor would be the first to tell the hon. gentleman that there is no one who speaks out more clearly than I on this particular matter.

Mr. Knowles: That is not the way the resolution reads.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

IGOR GOUZENKO—RELEASE OF TESTIMONY BEFORE UNITED STATES REPRESENTATIVES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ambrose Holowach (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called may I ask a question of the parliamentary assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in the minister's absence, notice of which I gave last Friday together with a clipping, headed "U.S. Shows No Desire to Free Igor Evidence", which was taken from the Toronto Globe and Mail dated February 9. My question is this. Owing to the considerable publicity which has been given as to the release of the Gouzenko evidence, will the parliamentary assistant make a statement to the house with respect to all of the testimony given the United States subcommittee by Igor Gouzenko several weeks ago?

Mr. Roch Pinard (Parliamentary Assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank my hon. friend for having informed me of the nature of his question.

As hon. members will recall from previous statements made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), the Canadian government, following a request from the United States government, informed that government that it was prepared to make arrangements for a meeting at which Mr. Gouzenko could be interviewed by representatives of the United States government. This offer was subsequently accepted. In accordance with these arrangements a meeting was held on January 4, 1954, at which representatives of the United States government interviewed Mr. Gouzenko. The United States government was represented by the United States ambassador to Canada, Senator William E. Jenner, Senator Pat McCarran and Mr. J. G. Sourwine. I should like to emphasize that Mr. Gouzenko was interviewed by representatives of the United States government and not by a committee of the United States Senate.

After the meeting the Canadian authorities examined the transcript of the proceedings in order to determine whether there was any reference either in the questions or in the answers, publication of which in this context might jeopardize Canadian security investigations or might prejudice unfairly the reputation of individuals or organizations in Canada or might be open to question on grounds of international propriety, as relating primarily to the interests of a friendly third country. With the exception of a few words in the transcript—in fact, there were about two or three sentences comprising about 30 or 35 words—which fell within one or other of these categories, the Canadian government saw no objection from its point of view to making the transcript public if the United States government so wished. The Canadian government did not, however, consider that it would be appropriate to make the transcript public unless the United States government requested that this action be taken, since the inquiry related directly to names of persons in the United States or to the internal security of the United States.

The Canadian government therefore informed the United States government in the latter part of January that it was prepared to make public the transcript with or without any further deletions, if the United States government wished this done. Up to the present time no further word has been received from the United States government on this question.

THE CONSTITUTION

INQUIRY AS TO RECONVENING OF DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in reply to a question asked of me by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), I said that the government was not considering reconvening at an early date the federal-provincial conference on constitutional amendment which last met, not in September, 1950, as the hon. member for Kamloops stated, but in December of 1950.

The hon. member then asked me a supplementary question which it would have been misleading for me to answer either with "yes" or "no". In this supplementary question he ignored the fact that the Canadian constitution can already be amended in Canada in purely provincial matters and in purely federal matters. There are, however, no means by which legislative authorities responsible to the people of Canada can make such amendments as may from time to time be required in the third area of the Canadian constitution, namely that part of it which is of concern to both provincial and federal authorities. This, therefore, I take it, is the point to which the hon. member's question referred. On this point the position of the government was stated in a speech delivered in Vancouver on July 9, 1953, by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in the following words:

> My third subject is the Canadian constitution itself. Because of our action after the last election, the parliament of Canada now has the right to amend the constitution of Canada, by itself, in all matters which are exclusively of federal concern. But Canada today is the only important nation which does not have the power to amend its constitution in all respects. We Liberals believe that there should be a method of amending the constitution in all respects here at home, whenever amendments are desired. But such a method must be worked out in co-operation with the provincial governments. I hope the day will soon come when the authorized spokesmen of all the provinces will be able to agree on a method of amending the constitution here in Canada which will give full protection to provincial autonomy, because I do not believe any rights given to the provinces by the constitution can or should be taken from them without the consent of the appropriate provincial authorities.
> And it is the policy of the Liberal party, in working out a scheme for amending the constitution here at home, to make sure the utmost legal protection is given to our sacred constitutional rights with respect to education and the use of the English and French languages.

To this statement I have nothing to add at the present time.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): With reference to his answer, may I ask the Minister of Justice whether, since the conference last met in December of 1950, there have been any indications from the provincial governments or other sources that it would not be possible to arrive at a common agreement as to the method of amending the constitution in those fields to which he has referred?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, I would have preferred it if my hon. friend's question had been a little bit differently worded, in which case I would answer that since that time, to the best of my knowledge, no requests have been made by any of the provincial authorities for a reconvening of the conference in question. That does not answer my hon. friend in the precise terms in which he asks his question but I think it conveys the information that he wants.

SUPPLY

UNEMPLOYMENT—MOTION FOR EXAMINATION BY COMMITTEE ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

The house resumed, from Monday, February 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Green, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Gillis.

Mr. B. R. Leboe (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, you will recall that last evening I was discussing certain aspects of the unemployment situation, particularly management relations as they affect unemployment. At that time I mentioned that the purpose of plants and plant equipment is not only for management or operators to make money and make a profit but also so that people working in the particular industry can make a living.

Before I proceed with the next part of my address, I should like to make one thing perfectly clear. As a member of parliament I consider it my duty to represent all groups and no particular group to the disadvantage of some other group within an area, a province or the Dominion of Canada. I will admit that in doing so it becomes a little difficult at times to consider matters from the viewpoint of how they concern each and every individual. However, that is my stand, and this question must be dealt with fairly and squarely as it relates to everybody, whether they be workers in an industry, whether they be associated with it in some way or whether they be the managers.

As employment increases production increases, and people in the community all become better off provided there is distribution of the goods that are produced. It seems to me that so far we in Canada have not solved the problem of the distribution of the goods we produce. I hope to deal with that matter a little later, but in passing let me say that we should continue producing even if in the long run it means assisting those who are not as fortunate as ourselves and giving of our substance to those who are in need. We cannot blame workers for continually clamouring for higher wages and better conditions. The only way they have by which to increase their purchasing power is to ask for higher wages. Unfortunately, in looking back over the years and considering the fights that have been carried on for increased wages and salaries and the increases obtained, we find that in spite of such increases purchasing power is almost exactly where it was a good number of years ago.

I can well recall that when people were getting 40 cents an hour they could buy butter for 17 or 18 cents a pound. Today we find that butter costs three times as much and that the average wage is three times as much or a little better. Therefore we have not come very far in that respect. But we find that labour, in its attempt to increase its purchasing power and its standard of living, is continually asking for higher wages, and so it must under our present financial and economic system. It is the only way in which purchasing power is brought into the hands of consumers.

It is very important that labour should have and strive toward good leadership of its unions. In that respect I should like to refer to a letter in the Prince George Citizen of February 8 which reads as follows:

> While we are out hunting for subversive literature, let us not forget the subversion of the far right. Anyone opposed to unionism as a means of bringing the voice of labour to bear upon the problems of management is subversive or fascist. To say down with unionism is equal to saying down with democracy. Constructive criticism of the union's methods of achieving their desired ends is democratic and desirable. Criticism aimed at permanently destroying unionism is fascist and unhealthy.

That brings me back again to the point with which I started my speech, management-labour relations. We find that a great deal of the trouble leading to unemployment stems from labour-management relations which are not conducive to good employment. I think management can play an effective role in bringing labour and management together. Where there are unions I think management should assist and encourage those working in the plants in the obtaining of good leadership. In my opinion much can be done in that regard. In many parts of the country there is a need from time to time for recreational facilities and other projects which could be undertaken jointly by management and labour for the benefit of all concerned. If we had more vision concerning such matters and put forth greater efforts towards getting something done in this regard I think we would find a higher level of employment and increased production, and therefore a higher standard of living for all.

Many times both sides, management and labour, fail to present a true picture of their problems. I believe that heads of labour unions and those in management positions could well look into this matter from the point of view of getting people to present facts and not dodge issues. We find that in many cases union papers, the organs of organized labour, are blasting management, and management through the press is blasting labour and labour unions. In my view a great deal can be accomplished by union and management representatives sitting around a table and talking things over on a sound and sensible basis. I think that our efforts as members of parliament and the efforts of the government should be directed toward bringing about a realization of this responsibility.

Personally, I am opposed to the professional bargainer. I think it is wrong in principle, because the very existence of the professional bargainer depends on the animosity between the employer and the employee. I will agree that expert advice is desirable. I think we should have expert advice, but I believe it is wrong in principle for people to set themselves up in business as professional bargainers, because their livelihood depends on the animosity between the employer and employee. As soon as good will is created between the employer and the employee the professional bargainer is out of a job.

I feel that we would be better off and have a higher level of employment if bargaining were conducted on a local level as much as possible. I do not say that is always possible, but I think it is most desirable wherever it is possible. We would thereby avoid long lay-offs and unemployment due to strikes. As I said before, that is a very unhealthy situation. I do not think there ever was a strike in which labour was not caught in the squeeze. Labour is bound to be caught in the squeeze either way, whether they strike or whether they do not. The only way to avoid strikes is to get better relationships between employers and employees. I think we, as a government, could do a lot in that regard, as I shall mention a little later.

The other day we read a slogan which said, "Young Canada has a right to a job." I agree with that. I agree also that if young Canada has a right to a job, that means just what it says. I disagree heartily with the idea that people may not be allowed to work if they desire to work. If we are going to adopt the position that young Canada has a right to a job, then I think we must stay with it all the way down the line and not bar people from working if they so desire. During a strike we often find that people are barred from working, and unemployment rises continually in the strike area. I realize that the strike weapon is the only weapon labour really has, but on the other hand I believe that if labour overplays that weapon they will find the effectiveness of it will be reduced.

Labour must take a sane and sensible approach to strikes. The further we get away from harmony between management and labour, the more likely it is that a condition will arise which will result in a strike. Strikes always mean a loss of time, not only to those who are in the industry concerned but to those in associated industry. It is not always true either that when a strike is over the industry starts rolling again. I should like to quote again from the Prince George Citizen, in which there appeared an article under the heading "Strike Hangover cuts Mill Output". It reads:

> Fort George forest district mills cut the smallest December post-war sawlog scale on record in the first month of the present B.C. forest branch year, statistics disclosed today.
> Observers in the industry blame the low December cut on a "strike hangover" and soft market prices.
> The "strike hangover" they say will likely affect production during the first three months of the present forest branch year.

When the strike is over we do not always find full employment is possible. In the case of our forest industry we know that is true. A few years ago we had a strike in that industry, but when the men were ready to go back other factors stepped in and made it impossible for them to go back to work. There are forest closures and so on. Then, during that winter, it was found that the snow was so deep on the mountain slopes that work was impossible, so it became a difficult time for the workers in that area.

Mention has been made of projects to take up the slack of unemployment. In this connection we should bear in mind that money for these projects comes out of the taxpayer's pocket. Naturally, I feel they are desirable; but there is a way that the object could be accomplished without digging too deeply into the taxpayer's pocket. Under our present system, that is where the money comes from to meet these demands. As a result of our defence program we have an enormous production of non-consumer goods, which releases purchasing power in an increased volume.

It seems as though we are now entering a period in which credit buying is at an all-time high. People are trying to stretch their dollars. I was told, and I believe it is true, that one store in this city is offering television sets, without a down payment, for as low as $2.75 per week. Business is trying to keep going with a deficiency in purchasing power. We are entering a phase now where credit buying has almost reached the point that it can no longer be continued. People are starting to pull back. This will mean lay-offs, cutting down in consumer purchasing power, and unless something is done to arrest it we will find ourselves in a depression. It is common knowledge that the new housing legislation was brought forth, primarily, not to build houses but to put more money into circulation with which people could buy goods and services. In other words, it was designed to release credit to the people. I say there is not a better method than housing to accomplish this purpose and reach the various industries throughout the country which would participate in such a scheme. But at the same time we feel that we must look farther afield and get into a position where we recognize the real root of the problem; and in my estimation that is a deficiency in purchasing power. The amount lost through this deficiency in purchasing power must reach the hands of the people through channels other than those of production. It must be supplemented. Many economists know—and this is not contradicted—that production does not release enough purchasing power to buy back that which is produced. If this is true, then it means that we must have purchasing power released into the hands of the people through means other than normal channels of production.

If our defence spending is to be curtailed, and that amount of energy is to be put into peacetime production, we are going to have a national credit of goods for which there is no purchasing power. But if we have that national credit, we also have a national debit in the form of our senior citizens, crippled children, the blind, veterans and so on. All social services constitute a national debit. If we have a national credit, then let us transfer some of that credit into the hands of those people who are struggling along on $40 a month.

If these are recognized facts in our economy—and I think they are—then let us move toward that goal by distributing purchasing power among those people, making that distribution against the national credit that we have. We could go farther and take up the slack of unemployment by going into the production, on a national scale, of highways, irrigation projects, power projects and so on.

I shall not discuss this point further, because I see the time at my disposal is slipping along. But for those who constantly refer to free enterprise as the bugbear in the present economic situation I should like to read some excerpts from Time magazine of February 15 dealing with the revolution in industry that took place in Germany in the last few years. This undoubtedly will give our government some food for thought in respect of our problems here in Canada.

These excerpts are as follows:

West Germany throbs with its fabulous recovery while the East Germans under Soviet rule are on the brink of starvation . . . In the Ruhr, bomb-shattered steel mills glow once more through the long winter nights. Germans who were once glad to sell their prized possessions for a few packs of cigarettes now have one of Europe's strongest currencies in their pockets. Shops are loaded with consumer goods and crowded with substantial-looking buyers.

Germany's rebirth is the kind of economic miracle Americans can understand. At a time when other European nations were leaning towards socialism, Germany plumped for free enterprise . . . "Turn the people and the money loose, and they will make the country strong." As a result, the free world is now blessed, on the one hand, by its strongest European bulwark against communism—and confronted, on the other, with a new trade competitor who has come up so fast that nobody knows quite what to do about it.

Believing that "labour and management must be unified into one big group that depends on the same success," Nordhoff called a meeting of his shabby work force. "I'm afraid I gave them a stiff shock," says he. "I told them their working methods and production were miserable. It was taking us 400 man-hours to produce one car. I told them we would cut this to 100 hours. They laughed at me. But today we do that."

To make the economy grow, economics minister Erhard ended rationing, removed controls, gave industry tax concessions to permit rebuilding and expansion . . .

Last year gross national output hit a new high of $35 billion, 40 per cent above the 1936 figure for all of Germany. Items: Chemical output up 102 per cent over 1936; electrical equipment up 238 per cent; coal up 20 per cent; shipyards are now building 633,904 gross tons, second only to Britain's.

While West Germany has had to absorb 10 million refugees and expellees, unemployment is relatively low (1,000,000 last week), and the government has hopes of creating some 250,000 new jobs this year.

Anyone who says that free enterprise is the cause of the trouble in our economic situation should look at what has been done in Germany under a free enterprise system. Our problem here is one of distribution; and I think that as time goes on people across this country are going to wake up to the fact that there is a way out, and a way in which our goods can be distributed. They will realize there is a way to maintain our freedom as well as the distribution of our goods. And they will be looking to those of us sitting in this corner of the chamber, the Social Credit group, to lead the way.

Mr. Jean-François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is very optimistic when he says that the people will look to Social Credit policies to relieve unemployment in this country.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member used to sit over in that corner, himself.

Mr. Pouliot: Oh, yes, but it was under different circumstances. It is not the place where one sits that counts; it is what is said from that seat.

Everyone has expressed his opinion about unemployment, a very sad thing and deplored by all. What is necessary is to offer the true facts as they are and to offer as well the best suggestions to improve labour conditions in this country. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) and the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) have told the house how much concerned the government is about labour problems. They have said that they missed no opportunity to see to it that all those who are capable of working and willing to work should earn their living at all times of the year in this country. There is one thing that surprised me in the remarks of the hon. member who sponsored the amendment. He based his speech upon a memorandum or joint submission on unemployment to the government of Canada by the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada and the Canadian Congress of Labour. The representatives of those large unions came to Ottawa to make representations to the government. If I were to express my opinion about that memorandum I would use the following biblical phrase:

And why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye?

They see the mote in their neighbour's eye, and they do not see the beam in their own. Then there is another quotation:

Thou hypocrite, first cast out the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye.

My contention is that the labour unions must assume great responsibility in matters of unemployment. Very often there are men who are unable to work because of the dictates of union leaders. There are several occurrences of this nature of which I have knowledge. Very often I have had to fight the unions in order to protect union members.

During the railway strike in 1949 or 1950 there was a meeting of the railwaymen in my home town. I said to them what I have just said here. One man came to me after and said, "That is right, Jean-François; it is true; you were right." I would have preferred to be wrong, but I had to fight the union leaders for the protection of the men. I remember saying once to the former minister of labour, Mr. Mitchell, that it was often important and sometimes necessary to speak to the members of the union over the heads of their leaders because in that way we were often better understood.

Proposed Committee on Unemployment

Quite often the union leaders are most undemocratic. They do not consult the members of their unions about the course to be followed. They impose their own views upon the men and the men have to suffer because of the decisions made by a small number of men who receive large salaries and who try to exploit human credulity to its limit.

This occurred recently in Noranda, in Quebec, which offers a typical case. In August last year a strike was decided upon. I am told from a reliable source that the company was ready to deal with the men, but it was a question of check-off. The company did not want to hear any suggestions with regard to the check-off and then a strike was decided upon. It was impossible according to the labour regulations to make an offer to the men at the time, but the men knew that the company was well disposed toward them and it would have been easy for them to get what they wanted.

The union insisted on calling a strike in August. A citizens' committee was formed and it met with representatives of the company. During the week end we heard with great satisfaction that the strike had been settled and the men were to resume their work. But what happened in the meantime? The men who belonged to the union have had to spend the money they had saved over several years in order to live. They did not suffer from hunger because they had received fair wages, but they had to take from the bank the money that they used to receive in the form of cheques. It will now take them many years to build up their savings to where they were when the strike was decided upon by the union leaders.

The men gained nothing. The increase they have obtained could have been obtained in the summer. They were without salaries and wages for many months, for more than half a year. They had nothing except a small pittance from the union. I hope that as a lesson that small amount of money paid by the union to the men to help them exist will not be paid back. What is the result? The union leaders had to show their so-called usefulness to the men. The only thing they have done is to cause them trouble and make them suffer for many months.

They were unemployed but that was not the fault of the government. It was the fault of the union. In this case the unions were to blame. In my own town of Riviere du Loup there is a pulpmill employing 40 to 50 people. The men working there decided to ask for an increase of so much per hour but the company explained that they could not give it to them, that they had to decrease their salaries to a small extent in order to be able to sell their product at a price that would be acceptable on the world market. The company had in prospect some fine contracts in England and in other parts of Europe, and they were awaiting the decision of the men in order to start production.

However, the union decided that the men should have more instead of less and, as a result, they have been unemployed now for a long time. The two union leaders were able to obtain jobs elsewhere and they did not suffer from the strike. They were well looked after because they had jobs elsewhere, but the other poor fellows had to live on their unemployment benefits. This is very sad and those unemployment conditions were created by union leaders and the men suffer because of them. Every other week in my home town I hear of notices of meetings of the so-called union to discuss the matter, which has been discussed for many months. The men are not working now and that is what happened. Of course, all these facts have not been mentioned in the memorandum that has been sent to the government.

There is another mill in my constituency which has been closed for the winter, and this very important mill has been closed because of the exacting propositions submitted by union leaders. There they were asking for more all the time and finally the owner said: "Well, if you ask so much for your wages, then it is impossible for me to sell my products on the markets of the world. The only thing for me to do is to close the mill for the winter." He closed it and the men have unemployment benefits.

It is a very sad situation but it was created by the union leaders, some of whom come from various parts of the country. We have some visitors from Quebec city who are talking all the time and who try to influence the men in order that they may ask for more all the time so that they may demonstrate the importance of their jobs and continue to receive the salaries they get by causing trouble.

I had to discuss the question of seniority with the leaders of the labour union, and the general chairmen of the Canadian National Railways in Moncton refused to give the men the seniority rights they were entitled to. I had to fight with them; I had to put them to shame. I had to get in touch with an important officer of the union in Montreal, and with Mr. Bengough in Ottawa and Mr. George Meany in Washington, and finally I got it. I had to put to shame the general chairmen of the union in Moncton. They wanted to protect their in-laws, their friends and relatives, at the expense of other men who had seniority rights over them. That has been my experience with the union. I had to fight with them. The trouble is, sir, that these same people never represent the mentality of the men in the union. Most of the time the men are willing to work if they are allowed to go back to their jobs, but they cannot. There is a protest from the union leaders. They encourage them to continue their strike and they promise them the moon. We cannot go on like that. The high cost of living has been created by the exacting requests of the labour unions and they are not sensible and it is impossible to discuss the matter with them. My suggestion is that we should take every opportunity to appeal to the common sense of the men by speaking over the heads of the leaders of their union.

I am not shocked at all to hear any hon. member of parliament speaking about unemployment. Other hon. members have problems in their constituencies, as I have in mine, and I sympathize with those who are unemployed. On the other hand, if the union leaders from the general chairman down were more sensible we would have less unemployment in this country.

If we figure out the total amount of unemployment in this country, we must consider that many men were engaged in lumbering operations who did not receive unemployment insurance benefits before, and it is due to representation made by the hon. members of the constituencies in which there are forestry operations, from Newfoundland, north of the St. Lawrence, eastern Quebec, northern Ontario, and northern Quebec, that these men received unemployment insurance benefits.

These hon. members made representation to the former minister of labour—the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) was at the Department of Veterans Affairs at that time—in order to have unemployment insurance benefits for these men engaged in lumbering operations. At that time there was a crisis in the sale of lumber and we succeeded with the help of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour at that time, now Mr. Justice Cote, in securing unemployment benefits for the men who had paid no dues to the commission, contrary to what is required by the law. There was an exception made for the first year, but that large body of men are now on the list of unemployed. They are securing unemployment benefits which they did not receive before. The law was changed in order to give them an opportunity similar to that accorded to other workers and this was done through the efforts of hon. members in the constituencies in which there are forests. They did that to help the men. That assistance was suggested by my parliamentary colleagues but it was never suggested by any union. It was done by members of parliament and was implemented by the then minister of labour in the Liberal government at that time. That was very important.

Today, if there are 500,000 unemployed, there may be a large number of men who were engaged in lumbering operations and whose names are recorded amongst those of the unemployed, because lumber operations were shorter last fall than was usual. On account of what? On account of weather conditions. We had no snow until the middle of December in our part of the country and lumbering operations were therefore much less important than they are normally.

On the other hand, we must remember the government has done everything it possibly can to give assistance to the unemployed by giving all the work it was possible to do by encouraging private and public corporations to give them that work, and also by coming to their assistance with family allowances and pensions such as are paid to the older people. Not only that, there are the invalids who are dependent on the unemployed. This year it was with joy that I heard the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) say that the government was to come to their rescue by giving them a pension.

Mr. Martin: The hon. member had been urging that for some time.

Mr. Pouliot: I had been urging that but I was not the only one. I remember that there were motions in the names of many members for many years; there was the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard), the hon. member for Compton-Frontenac (Mr. Blanchette), the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Bertrand) and I do not know how many others.

Mr. Martin: The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor).

Mr. Pouliot: Yes; our dean, the hon. member for Fort William. We had made representations to the government in order to obtain that result which is most satisfactory. I was delighted to hear that the provinces had agreed to the scheme.

Mr. Martin: No. They have agreed in principle.

Mr. Pouliot: I thank the minister. They have agreed in principle. But there were conferences between federal and provincial representatives here in Ottawa in order to bring the matter to a conclusion. This is something. We hear the unions suggest more pensions, more money, higher rates for unemployment insurance benefits. That pamphlet has several pages, and in it you do not see two words which I would have expected from well-educated men that they are, namely "Thank you". I am surprised that those gentlemen did not thank the leader of the government and all his colleagues, including the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), for what has been done for the Canadian people by this government. We have to take the situation as we find it. They blame everybody for their own mistakes. The government is asked to improve conditions which have been made worse by those very people. The situation is unfortunate.

I do not want to dwell on the matter at any length. We all share the concern which has been expressed so eloquently by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). We all know that he is sincere. He is one of the best debaters in the house and is listened to with attention when he speaks in debate. He said he was sorry when some of our fellow citizens were unemployed. We are all sorry. But the government has made things much easier for all those people. Just imagine, Mr. Speaker, what conditions would be like in Canada if we had to rely on social credit coming to the help of the unemployed. What would we do if everything were nationalized and we had not the revenue with which to pay them in good money all the benefits that are now given to them by the government? What would be the condition of affairs if the hon. gentlemen of the Progressive Conservative party were in power?

I remember when Mr. Bennett was the leader of the government. Before he came to that position he himself created unemployment, and for a good reason. He and his chief organizer in 1929—the year that has been referred to by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker)—each subscribed $350,000 to the electoral funds and they invested that money in brokers' offices. The leader of the Conservative party—it was not progressive at that time—used to say "Conditions are bad; we have unemployment, but I will cure that". Every time he spoke of unemployment and said that conditions were bad in this country, the stocks were getting lower and lower and he was making more money because he was speculating on the fall in price. Finally, when he had realized an amount which was as much as his investment, he succeeded. He used that money to win the election. Afterwards he had to face the unemployment matter and he was not able to cure it. It was worse than ever. Let my friend the hon. member for Prince Albert be careful and not mention 1929 because I was in the house then and I remember what occurred at that time. I could tell him much more. If he were here in the house I would tell him much more about the policies of his own party at that time. But now there is no question of that.

We may have some unemployment to some degree at the present time but it is far from being as bad as it was then. There are compensations, inaugurated by the Liberal government, which the workers did not have at that time. Conditions therefore are not as bad now as they were then. I do not intend to make a political speech about the matter. I just wanted to remind the union leaders that they must be extremely careful in their dealings with the men, whether they are miners or are men engaged in other occupations. If there is more co-operation from the labour unions, and if they act in accordance with the democratic principle of consulting the members of their union before making pronouncements and giving orders, we shall have much more stability in employment in this country.

Mr. W. G. Blair (Lanark): Mr. Speaker, I am in full agreement with the necessity for a debate on unemployment. I am glad that this matter has been brought before the house by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). There is no doubt about the emergency, and I congratulate the hon. member on his action in placing this matter before the house.

I should say that this is a matter that is of vital importance to the constituency which I have the honour to represent. In my riding there are twelve textile mills and one large manufacturer of farm implements, namely Cockshutt, Frost and Wood Company at Smiths Falls. Unemployment is really bad in my riding. With two industries affected, I consider the matter one of extreme importance. I consider it to be a matter which should be discussed in this house.

Last Wednesday we had a delegation from the works men in the Canadian farm implement industry who met with the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) and the cabinet with regard to the serious situation faced by that industry. There were also present delegates representative of the farm implement industry from sections such as Toronto, Hamilton, Brantford and Smiths Falls. It may be that there are 10,000 or more people affected. The fact that so many people are unemployed at the present time makes it a serious situation in these industrial areas.

Various causes were given for the unemployment but to my mind one of the most important was the fact that diminishing farm income was the cause of the decline of farm machinery sales. It is my belief that the present uncertain condition in the dairy industry has much to do with and is one of the main causes of this situation. As far back as April, 1952, I brought this matter to the attention of the House of Commons. At that time, speaking on the dairy industry, I made the following statement, as found at page 1594 of Hansard for April 25 of that year:

> The situation today constitutes an emergency, the root causes of which are not confined to the dairy industry. If the cheese production branch is unable to market their product at a satisfactory price, then the whole industry will be affected. Something must be done to secure a market for surplus cheese at a fair price. Any loss in price will not only affect our dairy farmers but will have an effect on the whole Canadian economy. A satisfactory floor price below which prices will not be allowed to fall, thereby virtually destroying this essential industry, must be assured to producers now.
> Even this is only a partial answer. There must as well be an all-out sales effort by the dairy trade and the government. Not only is a satisfactory floor price necessary, but some means must be found to dispose of surplus production. Failure to do so will give rise to a feeling of uncertainty which cannot help but spread to other related industries and in turn will reflect itself in unemployment in this country resulting from a lack of orders for farm machinery and other manufactured products.

I again point out that I gave this warning in the House of Commons in April, 1952. Now many of the things which I said then have come to pass. The dairy industry has now reached a critical position, and it is becoming more apparent that the decline in farm machinery sales on the domestic market is due to lack of buying power among the farmers. If it is true that farm incomes have declined 22 per cent in fifteen months, then, sir, it is inevitable that farmers will buy less and that fewer people will be employed in the farm machinery industry.

There is one fact that must be clearly faced by the public, the fact that while there has been a decline in farm income there has been no decline in the cost of consumer goods to the farmer. Everyone is looking for cheaper food costs, and almost every person believes that agricultural products should be bought in a cheap market—and by agricultural products I mean food—without realizing that the farmer is faced not only with higher production costs but higher costs for all the commodities which he buys.

The production of food might well be considered a manufacturing process, and it is subject to the same economic conditions as in every other industry. It is not a business in which labour can produce cheaply, buy in a high cost market, and sell at a price which people think they should give. It must be fully realized that any situation of falling farm prices will be reflected in farm buying.

It cannot be expected that farmers can provide cheaper food without curtailing the amount of money which they spend. In the ten-year period, 1941 to 1951, the number of Canadian farmers dropped by 110,000. Competition is becoming keen throughout the world in the production of foodstuffs. In one year, 1953, the average weekly earnings of Canadian workers in industry rose by 4 per cent in income, but there was no income gain in that year so far as farmers were concerned.

There are 455,000 dairy farmers in Canada. This means a large domestic market for manufactured goods. One in every six Canadians, or about two and a half million, are dependent upon the dairy industry for their livelihood. Over 70 per cent of Canadian farms have some form of dairy production. There is a tendency among the urban population not to realize the importance of this large industry, or to realize the importance of those engaged in the dairy industry as consumers of the products of labour. Farmers buy not only farm equipment and machines and tractors but they buy fertilizers, shoes, electrical appliances and, in fact, all the commodities which are necessary in life.

If one-sixth of our population is dependent on the dairy industry, one must fully realize that this one-sixth of our population is a large market for the products of industry manufactured and produced by the other five-sixths. The dairy industry and other manufacturing industries are closely allied, and if there should be a failure of any kind in one branch it is almost certain to be reflected in other branches of the industry.

I do not believe that anyone can say that the dairy farmer can buy the things he needs and yet sell his milk at a price below the cost of production. Now that some alarm is being shown regarding the number of men laid off in the plants manufacturing farm machinery, it is becoming very apparent that unless the gap between the cost of producing farm products and the income received by the farmer is closed the situation will tend to become worse and will continue to extend to other things besides the manufacturing of farm machinery. In a broadcast President Eisenhower made recently he stated:

> We are one family made up of millions of families with the same hope for a happy life. We must not become a nation divided into factions and groups. Any real injustices in this business of living penalize all of us.

There is another threat to the dairy industry made by the pressures on our domestic market of imported vegetable oils. Half of this importation comes into the country free of duty. This competition has lowered the per capita consumption of butter by about eight pounds. The production of creamery butter in Canada amounted to 21 million pounds last year, more than in 1952. On the first of January of this year stocks of creamery butter totalled 71 million pounds. This amounts to 30 per cent more than on the first of January, 1953, and 58 per cent more than the stocks held two years previously. The national dairy council estimates that on the first of May, 1954, butter stocks will be 35 million pounds greater than the domestic needs, and this at the beginning of the production season of butter. The total amount of butter consumption has dropped 45 million pounds in the past five years, and no doubt a great deal of this is due to dairy substitutes such as edible oils. The per capita consumption of butter dropped 23 per cent during the same period.

Consideration of these figures will give some idea of the uncertainty existing in the dairy industry at the present time and hence some reason for the attitude of farmers towards new equipment and farm machinery. Nor is the domestic market the only cause of the present unemployment situation in the farm implement branch. While there is a decline in the amount of buying on the domestic market, yet the amount of farm machinery exported has dropped.

I was impressed by the brief presented by the Canadian farm implement workers regarding exports of farm machinery from Canada. I am not going to attempt to place on record all the figures that they gave except to point out that the Canadian farm machinery industry has lost $29 million or over 29 per cent of the export business it had in 1952. In November, 1953, farm machinery exports had barely more than a third of the value of those for a year ago. To summarize, I would say the major causes of the decline have been falling domestic farm income and the loss of export markets for implements and machinery.

When this session of parliament opened I dealt with the position of the textile industry during the debate on the speech from the throne. The textile industry was one of the first industries in the Ottawa valley. In my constituency at the present time this textile industry is going through a period in which mills are closing down or working two or three days a week. I again remind you that in my riding there are twelve textile mills.

I cannot agree with the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) that the competition in the cotton branch of the industry between the northern and southern sections of the United States is the cause of all our troubles in the textile industry. The Canadian industry is subjected to competition from such countries as Britain, Belgium and Japan. I should like to point out that this industry is responsible for the livelihood of over 100,000 Canadian citizens. It is not my intention to delve into the whole story of the textile industry, but I should like to point out that in whole areas there is marked unemployment, without any apparent hope in the future that things may be better.

The difficulty here would seem to be that the Canadian manufacturers are forced to compete with other countries with lower wage standards and cheaper production costs. Textile imports from these countries are constantly increasing, making it almost impossible for the Canadian industry to survive. In the towns in the Ottawa valley where the textile industry is one of our most important sources of employment, the situation has not improved and under present conditions shows little likelihood of becoming better. It is not sufficient to say that the people who were formerly employed in these industries can seek work in other areas and in other industries. Many people have been trained in both the industries I have mentioned, and have spent their lives in becoming skilled workmen turning out excellent products. They own their homes in the area in which they have been employed, and to attempt to shift the whole population would entail many difficulties. Workmen could not be expected to sell their homes to advantage in a depressed area, nor to attempt to begin all over again by buying a house in another area.

It might be argued that these two industries cannot meet competition, but to my mind they both are necessary to the economy of Canada. It is too much to expect that skilled workmen should change their lifework in such a situation. This unemployment cannot be classified as seasonal, certainly not in my constituency of Lanark. With living costs at their present level much distress exists in the affected area. The rise in wages of Canadian workmen is not the only cause of higher production costs. The workman is constantly being squeezed by high living costs and high taxes. You cannot blame him for asking for more money, although it is a fact that this does create a spiral. When a workman is faced with this squeeze between high living costs and taxes, the only solution which he can find is to ask for more money.

Diversification of industry might be an answer in some affected areas. The Canadian textile industry will still remain a part of our defence plans, necessary in war but an important part of the Canadian economy. Canadian consumers have the right to insist on the savings made possible by fair competition, but it is doubtful whether the Canadian consumer would value the small amount he saves if he knew that such a saving meant the loss of a job of a fellow Canadian workman. Canadian textile mills are dependent on the domestic market. In 1952 they only exported $28 million worth of goods out of an $800 million output. Competition on the domestic market by cheaper foreign imports has caused a greater part of the difficulty.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce has talked in optimistic terms of future high investment, and so on. I hope this is true, but the segment of our population caught in the areas of unemployment have received cold comfort. No suggestion is made except that they get out of such areas and seek employment elsewhere. The situation cannot be passed over by simply referring to these industries as "soft spots" in our economy. It is the right of these workers to live and work in the industry for which they have been trained. One purpose of this debate is to bring before the government the urgent necessity of dealing with unemployment in such areas. Today, confronted as we are with the swelling rolls of the unemployed, the government's answer as expressed by responsible ministers yesterday has been that these are merely "soft spots", and such people who are unemployed must move elsewhere. These answers are wholly inadequate. If either the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the Minister of Labour feels that such an answer is adequate, I suggest he review the situation in the twelve textile mills of my area or in the farm machinery factory in the town of Smiths Falls.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): I should like to say a few words in this debate, Mr. Speaker. First I must comment on the speech which we recently heard from the member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). I am sure that the house was surprised, and certainly we in this group were shocked to hear the anti-labour tinge of his remarks. I believe the minister or some Liberal member, at the first opportunity, should rise and say whether or not this represents new Liberal trade union policy. I hope it does not.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I believe that one of the fundamental duties of the federal government is to adopt policies which will provide reasonably full employment in this country. It seems to me that, in a nation which has so much wealth and so many natural resources, there is no need for widespread unemployment at any time. In this debate there has been a good deal of argument as to how many people are unemployed at the moment. However, all members have agreed that the number is substantial. As for myself, I am quite prepared to take the word of the Minister of Labour when he said, as reported in Hansard for February 15, 1954, page 2085:

> The number of applications for jobs listed with the national employment service offices across Canada—there are about 220 of them—on January 21, 1954, was 524,000.

I suggest that number is alarming, and should cause concern to all members in this house. I feel it is our urgent duty, today and in the future, to examine the causes of this situation and see what we, as parliamentarians, can do about it. What has caused this unemployment? I suppose all of us have different views. Some may think the reasons are seasonal; others may think it is because of competition in our export trade; and others may feel that it is because of government policies. There are, of course, a number of contributing factors. This afternoon, I should like to deal with only one of those, and that is government policies.

In my opinion one of the major factors causing unemployment today is the short-sighted, and I believe oppressive, taxation policy of this government. This year the government is going to spend approximately $5 billion, according to the estimates which were tabled in the house a short time ago. What does that mean? It means that in 1954 out of every dollar which the average Canadian earns he is going to have to pay roughly 21 cents to the federal government. It means in the second place that this year every man, woman and child in this country is going to be taxed by the federal government at the average rate of $335. Every household will be taxed at the average rate of $1,340. In my opinion the effects of such savage taxation are now being felt in our labour markets across the country.

In the first place high taxes are adversely affecting consumer purchasing power in our domestic markets. Very substantial funds, which ordinarily might be used to build houses, to buy motor cars, farm machinery or textiles, are being siphoned off by the government in the form of taxes. And that reduced demand for goods must reflect itself, as I see it, in a reduced demand for labour.

I think in the second place that even the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) would admit that the high rate of taxation in Canada today is harmful to the nation's investment program in new plant and new equipment. Our population and labour force are growing considerably each year. We must depend upon expanding industry and business to provide jobs for many of those people. Yet our tax rate today is hindering individual and corporate savings at a time when vast new amounts of capital are needed for development and replacement purposes. I think we would have been in trouble some time ago, had it not been for the influx of American capital. To the extent that high taxes prevent individuals and companies from expanding, in my opinion the creation of new jobs is jeopardized.

In the third place, I believe that high taxation today is discouraging initiative. I think it is blunting incentive. I have said that, I must admit, for a number of years in the house. But if an individual risks expansion today in Canada he must be a brave man, because there are so many storm warnings out. If he is successful in his expansion, then the Minister of Finance will take a good deal, if not the most substantial part, of his profits. If on the other hand a man expands his business and is not successful, his whole operation may be jeopardized.

Thus I think many businessmen today in Canada are taking this attitude: "Perhaps a recession is coming; perhaps it is time for us to consolidate; with the tax rate so high, it might be safer for us to buy bonds". I suggest that such an attitude adversely affects employment.

Finally I believe that the high tax rate in Canada today is helping to force Canadian prices up and up. We have a 10 per cent sales tax on most manufactured articles. We have a 15 per cent luxury tax on dozens of the necessities of life. We have customs duties and tariffs which are very high. Those taxes and others help to make Canadian prices among the highest in the world.

I understand that at the present time the automobile industry is having certain difficulties. I have seen figures put out by that industry, showing that on the cheapest automobile manufactured in Canada today there are federal taxes amounting to hundreds of dollars. Small wonder that so many working people are finding it difficult to buy cars.

Mr. Studer: It is $100 in Saskatchewan alone.

Mr. Thatcher: But $700 federally. The same is true of many other products. High taxes are contributing to high prices. High prices are contributing to decreased demand. And whether we like to admit it or not, decreased demand today is contributing to additional unemployment. Not only are high prices hurting us in the domestic market, but I suggest that they are playing havoc with our products on the export market. I would remind the house that indirectly and directly three out of every eight of our working people depend upon export trade for their livelihood.

On the world market, nations everywhere must compete. Canadians cannot set prices on that market. We have to meet them or we do not sell. In recent years we have seen Japan and Germany experiencing a trade revival, and we have seen similar trade recoveries in other countries. As a result Canadian products are meeting ever stiffening competition. In many cases we are actually being undersold.

As I see it, one of the reasons we are being undersold is the many federal taxes imposed on the manufacturer and producer. In 1953 Canadian exports were down $363 million from 1952. Such industries as the automobile industry, the farm machinery industry and the textile industry have run into difficulty. One of the results of that difficulty has been a lay-off of employees.

For these reasons I believe that one of the first steps this government should logically take, if it is sincere in wanting to deal with the unemployment problem—and I think it is—would be to reduce the burden of taxation on the Canadian people in the coming budget. I think excise taxes, which are forcing prices up, should be reduced. I think the income tax, particularly for those in lower income groups, should be lowered in order to restore purchasing power. And I think the government should act more realistically with Canadian industry, so that business may continue to expand.

In my opinion high taxes are not inevitable; they can be lowered. But they can be lowered only if the government is prepared to cut expenditures. Perhaps the time has come for this parliament to give consideration to cutting sharply armament expenditures. Certainly the United States and Great Britain have already given us such an example.

Finally I should like to comment on an announcement made last evening at the Russian embassy to the effect that a special attaché is to be posted to Canada to try to promote Russian-Canadian trade. I think the Russian ambassador mentioned his country would be prepared to buy, among other things, textiles, meat, ships, butter, wheat and other commodities. If that offer is genuine, if there are no strings attached, and if no strategic materials are involved, then I for one hope the government will do something to try to take up his offer. Aside from the fact that such trade could serve to strengthen mutual understanding and friendly relations between our two countries, it could be one more step toward helping to solve our unemployment problem.

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, so far in this debate we have heard from all sides of the house an explanation of conditions which could be found today among those employed in industry. I think the story has been pretty well told.

But, as usual, those primary producers who must look out for themselves have so far been completely ignored. I fully realize that those employed in the textile industry and in many other industries of this country are most unhappy with the unemployment situation as it exists today. I have every sympathy for those people and I only hope that conditions will improve in the near future to a point where employment may be found to take care of the entire group.

I have discussed this problem with the government officials since I came to Ottawa. I have placed before them the position of those in my own county, and I am convinced they are making every effort to improve conditions in the textile and other industries which find the going a little tough at the present time.

The subject introduced by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) is, I believe, of great interest to every member in this chamber. Employment in Charlotte county comes from the textile industry, the woodworking industry, and to some extent the fish canning industry. The majority of the labourers affected would be employed in the three industries I have mentioned. I have every hope that conditions may improve in connection with all three. However, I have in mind at the present time a group in my county and on the Atlantic coast line who have faced several seasons which have not been too good. These men find themselves without financial assistance of any kind. The fishermen to whom I refer do not qualify for unemployment insurance benefits, and that is why I want to emphasize the conditions in this industry for just a few minutes.

Those who are employed at the present time in the textile and other industries, or who are employed part-time, have the benefit of unemployment insurance. The fishermen of whom I speak are paying indirectly into the federal fund which supports unemployment insurance with no hope of ever receiving any benefits. To me that is a situation that should be rectified. I feel that this particular group should receive the same benefits from unemployment insurance that others in Canada are receiving at the present time. I see no reason why they should be asked to make contributions without any hope of receiving any benefits.

It has been suggested by some who have spoken previously that these payments should be increased. Again I believe every member in the house would have that same feeling. They would want it to be done if it were possible to do so. Unemployment insurance has been in effect for only 12 or 13 years, and I consider it one of the greatest protections the working people of this country could hope for. Of course the idea was initiated by a Liberal government and put into effect by a Liberal government. The benefits which the working people of this country are receiving today are, I believe, of great assistance, even in the present amounts.

I hope that the day will come when the primary producers of this country will be placed in the same category. When I refer to primary producers I mean that group who are self-employed, who must go out with their two hands to make a living for themselves. When the going is tough they just buckle in their belts a little tighter and continue to try to produce and sell. I feel that this group has been neglected, and I submit that it should be given some consideration. For that reason I suggest that some way must be found to include them with those who receive the benefits of unemployment insurance.

In the county of Charlotte which I have the honour to represent the time is rapidly approaching when these fishermen will be getting ready for spring fishing. There are types of fishing that are carried on the year round. There are hundreds of fishermen down there on the water trying to gain a livelihood. The necessary materials to repair the equipment needed in their fishing will have to be found within the next two or three months. In some cases it will be necessary to replace engines within that time if these men are to be able to carry on in 1954.

In so far as sardine fishing is concerned, the materials needed can be purchased during the winter months more cheaply than in the summer. Many of the men who would like to go back in the industry this year have not the necessary materials, and they have not the cash to buy those materials. Those who have always been most kind and considerate in furnishing credit have gone as far as they can. It has now reached the point where, if they are to continue, some sort of financial assistance must be provided.

I know these fishermen well because I have worked with them for over 20 years. They are not asking for a handout; they are not that type. They pay their bills when they can make the necessary money. They have had three or four poor seasons, and the reason I am particularly interested in them today is that it looks as though 1954 might be a good year in the fishing business. I say that for these reasons. We find today that the supplies of canned fish are practically depleted, and the demand is good. The price should be more than fair. If these men could be put in the position where they could repair their structures or buy the necessary engines and other equipment they could carry on this year and would once more be established in this industry, and would face a much brighter future.

Whatever assistance is given will have to be provided within a few weeks, or the materials that would permit them to carry on this year will not be available. I brought this matter to the attention of the government on one previous occasion since we met last November, and again I want to suggest that some way must be found. It is most necessary that this particular branch of the fishing industry, this particular group of primary producers, must be in position where they can carry on with their work, the only work they know anything about. Because of the lack of equipment which I have mentioned, these men may lose a very good season this year.

In the nine years that I have been in this House of Commons I have noticed that it has always been possible to find some way to provide assistance for other primary producers. I am not speaking in a critical sense, but I remember a couple of years ago listening to a debate in this house which went on for three or four days in connection with the wheat producers of western Canada whose wheat was out under the snow. I have every sympathy in the world for those primary producers. We listened to their story for some three or four days and it was decided that assistance must be provided. If I remember correctly an amount of $20 million was voted by the government to take care of that situation. When seeding time came the following spring it was found that only $700,000 of that enormous amount had been taken up. In other words someone had been crying before he was hurt.

There have been other cases I could refer to, and again I am not speaking in a critical way. There was the time when $65 million or more was given to the western farmers. I stood in my place and voted for that because I am one who believes that all primary producers should be placed in the same category. We cannot make fish of one and fowl of another. I believe that the primary producers to whom I have referred today have every right to expect not gifts but financial assistance in the way of loans from this government. As I said previously, they are not the type who ask for a handout. They are the type of individuals who pay their bills and, with a little assistance at this critical time, they will be able to carry on this year. I only hope it will be the type of season I feel it will, because if it is I believe it will enable these individuals to get back on their feet once more, pay their bills, and look the whole world in the face.

I have letters daily from good friends of mine who are not complaining too much, though I feel they have every right to complain. They are not suggesting to me that these services which have been provided for others should also be provided for them. I know these services have been provided for others. I have supported them in every case and I am prepared to support them again because, in my humble opinion, the economy of our whole country is in the hands of those primary producers. There are only three places from which you can get wealth. You have got to dig it out of the sea, the land, or the forest and it is those men who dig that wealth out of the land, sea, and forest who are responsible for the standard of living we enjoy in this country of ours. I feel they are the type of people who should have first consideration.

In this debate thus far I have not heard them mentioned by any hon. member. That may simply be neglect on the part of some hon. members who have spoken. Perhaps they do not realize the conditions under which some of our primary producers live. I do, and I feel they must be assisted; and as long as I represent that particular group I am going to continue to emphasize in every possible way the importance of this group to the economy of our country and to the Atlantic provinces, because that old-established industry means much to those provinces.

We were very much encouraged by a recent statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) to the effect that once more we may be able to get our share of the West Indies trade, which has always meant so much to the maritime provinces. But before I leave this particular subject I want to emphasize once more the necessity at the present time of providing assistance for this particular group of men. I am referring not to one particular branch of this industry but to the entire industry in the Atlantic provinces. I do not know much about conditions on the Pacific coast, but I do know these men must be given some financial assistance.

This is what I would recommend be done. I see no reason why small loans through our local banks, guaranteed by this government, would not solve the problem. I believe that is the manner in which it could be solved in a very short time. But there should be very little delay. The loans could be small, because no fisherman requires a great amount of cash, only sufficient to provide the necessities that will keep him alive during 1954. I want to see such fishermen have that assistance, and I hope the government will see fit to provide it as soon as possible in order that they may once more be established in that industry which they love, doing once more the type of work they know how to do best.

When the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) spoke in this house yesterday he suggested that we in this country might be pricing ourselves out of world markets. I wish to go on record as supporting that statement 100 per cent. I feel that is one of our great problems in this country today. The hon. member also made another statement with which I heartily agree. He suggested that the economy of this country was closely allied with the economy of the country to the south, and that whether we liked it or not, whatever might happen to that economy to the south of us will have a serious effect on the economy of this country.

We who live on the international border have known the truth in that statement for a great many years. Any disturbance that might take place in the economy of the United States will immediately affect the economy of Canada. Each and every day we read about overproduction. Many feel that overproduction might be the cause of the unemployment we are experiencing in this country. To my mind this is the greatest fairy tale that has ever been told, because in my opinion since this old world was made there has never been overproduction in anything. The only thing that is wrong is the price tag. In western Canada we have millions of bushels of wheat which we say is surplus due to overproduction. If you turn that page over you will see on the next page that 70 per cent of the people in this world are underfed. There never was overproduction of anything. The whole trouble lies in the distribution, and to a great extent the source of that trouble may be found in the price tag.

Speaking in Rome a few weeks ago the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) had this to say:

> I do not think there is a country in the world today which can afford to buy some of our products at the prices our farmers must charge if they are to make a living.

I believe that statement would be endorsed by every hon. member in this house. That is one of our great problems. We have priced ourselves pretty much out of the domestic market and to a greater extent out of foreign markets. There is no one in this house who would rather see a high standard of living in this country than I, but I believe we have reached the point where the price tag cannot be ignored by consumers in this country, and there has to be a reduction somewhere.

When that reduction is made we shall all have to tighten our belts a little. When that proposition is put to labour it does not appeal to them. I am not criticizing them for the stand they take, but we all have to get down to earth and make up our minds that we have to export. This country of ours can never be in a position where the standard of living is such that we can say we do not require to export a good portion of what we produce, and we will never be able to export unless we can get prices down so they compare favourably with exports from other countries.

In 1953 we found markets in the United States for about 60 per cent of our exports. At a meeting in Washington in December, 1953, government and business leaders agreed that 1954 would see a drop in the level of U.S. business activity which might well result in unemployment in that country reaching a total of 3,500,000. I have read forecasts claiming that it might amount to 4 million. If that should happen in the United States the economy of this country will certainly feel the effect in a very short time.

The incomes of primary producers in Canada have been dropping steadily for the past two or three years. There is no question about that. I would say they have dropped to a greater extent on the Atlantic coast line than in the central provinces. During the same period the workers in industry increased their earnings from a previous average of $2,856 per annum to $3,117. That increase took place in 1953. It seems to me there are seeds of trouble in a situation where the primary producers are obliged to take decreases year after year and at the same time increase the wages of labour. As I have stated previously, I am one who believes that the labourer should be paid for what he does and I have every sympathy with him, as I myself have done plenty of hard work. But I believe you can get to the point where there is too much of a variation between the cut the primary producer must take and the increase the labourer insists that he have. It must be more evenly balanced if we are to have a stable economy in this country.

Exports and primary producers' incomes have been falling off. Imports and unemployment are rising. However, labour incomes have established an all-time record. I wonder whether many hon. members in the house have stopped to realize that in 1953, the year just past, the labour income in this country was $9,700 million. It hit a new high. It was nearly 10 per cent higher than it was in the previous year, when it was $8,800 million.

I for one am greatly disturbed by the fact that wages continue to increase while there is a decrease in the incomes of that group who, as I have said, are the very backbone of the country. That is why I feel that in this debate, as in most of these debates that take place in the House of Commons, that particular group are the forgotten people. Those are the people who produce the real wealth of your country. In nine cases out of ten they are the ones who are forgotten. If wages continue to increase—and apparently every union is asking for increases—we shall find that we have not only priced ourselves completely out of foreign markets but that we have come to the place where people at home will refuse to buy in the domestic market.

As I stated a few moments ago, the first fairy tale we hear is that of overproduction. May I say that in the best years this country or this continent has ever seen there are thousands and thousands of Canadians who would like to own cars but who do not own them; they cannot afford to buy them. There are today thousands and thousands of Canadians who would like to have television sets but they cannot afford to buy them. The price tag just says no. There are many homes in this country in which they have not even a radio. Is it because there is overproduction of radios that they have not radios in those homes? No. The only reason that they have no radios is that they cannot afford to pay the price on the price tag that is hung on the radios.

I could go into this matter in a great deal more detail and I hope to do so at some later date, when again I shall take the time of this house to put a few prices on the record. These prices will be the authentic price in the United States of America as compared with that of exactly the same article manufactured in Canada. I collect that sort of data nearly every week, and I have quite a bit that I want to put on the record. One of the biggest problems that we have to contend with in this country is the fact that that price tag, in many cases, is 50 per cent, 60 per cent or 75 per cent higher than the price tag that hangs on the same article across the border.

That is one of the big problems we have to contend with. Some way must be found to bring these prices more into line. Sometimes when I see such terribly great variations I wonder why the people in this country have not exploded long before this time. People living back from the border do not have the same opportunity to watch these glaring examples of robbing the people of this country. When I am home I see it every day, and it is brought to my attention every week. I refer to this discrepancy as between United States prices and the prices the Canadian people are asked to pay today. That is another subject all its own which it would take a long time to deal with. At some future time I hope to have the opportunity to bring that matter to the attention of this house.

There are many things along this line that should be discussed openly in the house in the hope that some day we may convince the manufacturers in this country that we have subsidized industry long enough. When you mention "subsidy" in the House of Commons you find that by a great many members it is looked upon with a great deal of suspicion. "Subsidy" is a word they do not like. But when I see a company in the United States, with a subsidiary in Canada under the same name, which is charging $300 in the United States for an article that costs me $600 in Canada, there is a lot of subsidy connected with it somewhere. Some may call it tariff protection. Some may have other names for it. To me, however, it is the subsidization of industry by the Canadian people.

Mr. Adamson: Would the hon. member name the article?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Since the question has been asked by the hon. member to my left, I shall do so. I am sorry I did not bring the documents down to my desk. Just a few weeks ago advertisements were sent to me from two papers. One is printed in Windsor, Ontario and the other is printed just across that little bridge in Detroit, Michigan. On the same day two advertisements appeared in the two papers. They are advertisements by the Westinghouse people. They have to do with an automatic washer and drier. In the United States on that particular day the price was $369.90 and in Windsor it was $689. Yet only a few days ago my friend the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) rose in his place in the house and said he hoped that when the government was looking into this matter of dumping in Canada, they would give every consideration to those who manufactured electrical appliances.

If the hon. member would like to see the advertisement it is in my office, and I should be pleased to show it to him. It had to do with articles which were exactly the same, manufactured by the same company and advertised on the same day. Yet the price was $369 in Detroit and $689 in Windsor. I wonder just how long the people of this country are going to stand by and see examples such as that which I have just mentioned. Day after day they see them. I wonder just when they are going to rebel.

That is the great problem we have to face in this country. The price tag is all out of reason. We have to get down to earth. We can manufacture a great deal more cheaply than we are manufacturing at present, but just so long as these industries are subsidized they will still take that amount from the Canadian people without any hesitation.

Hon. members will recall, without my bringing it to their attention, what was found in every case where the Combines Investigation Act was applied and where investigations were made. What do we find? On different occasions I stood up in this house and told about the great monopoly that we had to deal with in so far as the rubber industry was concerned. I brought that matter to the attention of this house on many occasions. To me it was a combine. To me it was a monopoly. When the matter was investigated, what did we find? We found just exactly what I knew would be found. If many more industries in this country were subjected to the same type of examination I am sure the investigators would come up with the same answer. It would be found that the combines and the monopolies are setting the prices, and that the Canadian people are paying through the nose.

In so far as unemployment is concerned, and in so far as overproduction is concerned, the whole problem lies right on their doorstep. It is the price tag and nothing else. When we in this country decide to give the citizens of Canada a break and bring prices more in line with those to the south of us we will find less unemployment and many more happy people.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West) moved the second reading of Bill No. 252, respecting Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. Knowles: Let us have an explanation.

Mr. McIlraith: I thank the hon. member for drawing my attention to the fact that he would like an explanation. I am very happy to give him one. The purpose of the bill is to grant authority to the Canadian Pacific Railway to build a branch line some 15 miles in length from the divisional point at Havelock, Ontario, to Nephton, Ontario. Havelock, as hon. members know, is a divisional point about halfway between Smiths Falls and Toronto on the main line of the C.P.R. Nephton is the site of the operations of American Nepheline Limited, a mining company controlled by Ventures Limited. It employs some 150 persons at the mine at Nephton and the operation involves the production of nepheline syenite, a product described to me as being made from igneous rock somewhat resembling granite in texture, hardness and general appearance.

The product is used in the manufacture of glass and pottery. About 75 per cent of the production is exported to the United States, about 22 or 23 per cent is used in Canada, and the rest is exported to other countries. The product has been transported by truck from the mine to Lakefield, Ontario, a distance of some 24 miles over a secondary road wholly maintained by the company. The branch railway line will enable the company to do away with the truck haul and will be a more economical operation.

The proposed railway line is being financed by the company and the C.P.R. There is no question of public funds being involved in any way. There is an agreement, which can be produced in committee if any members are interested in it, as to the financing of the construction. It is estimated that the construction will cost about $1,500,000, and it would be the intention, if authority is granted by parliament to construct the line, to start construction immediately the operation can be got under way this spring. It should be wholly completed within about nine months from the start.

Reserves of ore indicated at the present time at the mine, although a survey of the reserves is not complete, would indicate sufficient ore to warrant at least 20 years production out of known reserves.

I do not know that there is much more that I can usefully add. I might say that under the Railway Act the authority of parliament is required before any branch line more than six miles in length can be constructed. If there are other questions hon. members want to ask I shall be glad to get the information for them or arrange to have it provided at the committee stage.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder if the hon. member would answer one question. I take it from his explanation that Havelock is the nearest railway point to Nephton at the present time.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes.

Mr. G. S. White (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I want so say a word or two in support of the bill. I am well acquainted with the company and the location of the mine, and I should like to add a few remarks to those of the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith). He mentioned that at the present time the nepheline was being trucked over a secondary road to Lakefield, where there is a small mill. My information is that when the new 17-mile railway line is completed a new, large, modern mill will be constructed right at the mine and production and output will be greatly increased.

It may be of interest to hon. members to know that to my knowledge this particular mineral, which is used for glass and pottery clay, is only found in eastern Ontario in the county of Peterborough and behind the iron curtain in Russia, from where it is not available to the western world. I am sure all hon. members will be in favour of the bill because it will not only increase employment, a subject that is before the house today, but will assist greatly in developing another mineral industry in eastern Ontario.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There are several divorce bills, Nos. 253 to 262 inclusive, to be considered. Is it agreed that they will be entertained in one motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa) moved that the following bills be read the second time:

Bill No. 253, for the relief of Gloria Alphonsine Timmins Ferguson.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 254, for the relief of Adella Alice McNeil Slobosky.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 255, for the relief of Vera Marguerite Hennigar Isenring.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 256, for the relief of Sylvia Golbas Lann.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 257, for the relief of Lucy Jane Cole Judd.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 258, for the relief of Walter Hardy Willows.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 259, for the relief of Elizabeth Temple Jamieson Grier.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 260, for the relief of Herbert William Bateman-Cooke.—Mr. Hunter.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before the motion covering these ten divorce bills is carried may I draw attention to what I believe is a slight error in Hansard with respect to the last time we had divorce bills before us. On page 2046 of Hansard for February 12, 1954, the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Hunter) is indicated as having moved the second reading of the divorce bills which were before the house on that occasion. I certainly would accept correction from the hon. member if I am mistaken, but I believe he was not in the chamber at the time and if that is correct someone else must have moved second reading of the bills for him on that occasion.

Motion agreed to and bills read the second time.

CURRENCY, MINT AND EXCHANGE FUND ACT

AMENDMENT TO PERMIT MINTING AND MARKETING OF GOLD COINS

The house resumed, from Friday, February 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Adamson for the second reading of Bill No. 173, to amend the Currency, Mint and Exchange Fund Act.

Mr. Armand Dumas (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of Bill No. 173, an act to amend the Currency, Mint and Exchange Fund Act, is to allow Canadian gold to be sold freely in Canada and thereby restore gold as a prime medium of exchange within the boundaries of a country not practising exchange control or other currency restrictions, thereby establishing a price for gold which can be maintained in a free economy upon which an eventual return to a gold parity may be established. By allowing individual Canadians to hold gold freely, it provides a means by which they may protect themselves from further inflation.

Another purpose of the bill, as stated by the hon. member who introduced it, is to try to save money for the Canadian people. The precarious situation of the gold mining industry and the communities dependent upon it is well known to all hon. members in this house.

In participating in this debate it is not my intention to enumerate once again all the difficulties encountered by gold producers, or the hardships facing the people living in the gold mining communities. There will be ample opportunity for me to do so later when discussing other legislation now on the order paper. A great number of people, both here and in the United States, as well as in other parts of the world, have good reason to believe that an increase in the price of gold is a probability in the near future. It is believed that powerful economic forces will eventually compel the United States to agree to an increase in the official price of gold, after other efforts have failed to check severe declines in prices and production and employment throughout the world. The expectation of a high price is an incentive which encourages the mines to continue operations and to prepare for the better days which it is believed are ahead.

However, such an increase in price may take longer to come about than we would like. Until such time as this increase is a reality, official assistance is essential. During the past six years the gold policy of the Canadian government has been found to be both just and fair. Most of the proposals put forward by those interested in the welfare of the industry, and of the mining communities dependent upon it, have been implemented. If all the proposals did not receive legislative sanction, it was not through any lack of sympathy on the part of the government.

Late in 1952, when it was made clear by the then secretary of the United States treasury that his government's policy was that there would be no increase in the official price of gold it was recommended by the Canadian metal mining association, by provincial associations and by the mining communities that the Canadian government should initiate action along the following lines. The marketing of fine gold should be permitted and encouraged by the following means. First, producers electing to sell on the premium market should be allowed to sell fine gold instead of the debased product. Second, fine gold should be minted in Canada for general purchase and sale in a form suitable to the market at a price to be freely determined between the buyer and seller.

In so far as the first recommendation is concerned, Mr. Speaker, we must remember that in the autumn of 1951 the Canadian government granted gold mines permission to sell on the premium market. In doing this the government of Canada was following the lead of South Africa, but with some important differences. No restriction was placed on the amount of gold which a mine could dispose of on the premium market, whereas in South Africa the gold mines restricted themselves to marketing no more than 40 per cent of their annual production in this way. In South Africa, also, the gold had to be debased to 20 carats or less. Since January 1, 1954, the Canadian gold mines have been permitted to sell fine gold on the premium market. This is in line with the first recommendation I mentioned. I am told there has been no sale of fine gold in bullion form on the premium market since permission has been granted.

The second part of the recommendation that fine gold should be minted in Canada for general purchase and sale is fully covered by the proposed amendment suggested in Bill No. 173. However, even if we are anxious to have legislation adopted which we feel might be beneficial to the gold producers or the gold mining communities, it is our duty to make sure such legislation would have no adverse effects.

I must say that in listening to the remarks made by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) when he was moving the second reading of Bill No. 173, I was greatly interested in some of his arguments. I was particularly impressed by his remarks on how we would know what the price of gold would be. He asked whether the price would be greater or less than the present $35, and then went on to say that the price for which gold would be sold was unimportant.

I say, Mr. Speaker, if Canada is going to take the initiative in sponsoring another way of disposing of our newly mined gold as suggested in this bill, that is by the minting of one ounce beavers, then the price of those beavers on the open market is of prime importance to the straight gold producers. This is especially true if we are to surrender other forms of assistance such as the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act in favour of this new method of disposing of our newly mined gold. We want to be reasonably sure that the price established by this means is at least as high as that received by the mines through the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

In each and every brief presented to the Canadian government in the past by the Canadian metal mining association, provincial associations or by the Canadian municipalities, it was always mentioned that the answer to the problem confronting the industry was the price of gold. In a submission to the federal cabinet in December, 1950, by the mining association of British Columbia, the mid-west metal mining association, the western Quebec mining association and the Canadian metal mining association we read the following at page 9:

> For the gold mines, the crux of the problem is the price of gold.
>
> It is fully appreciated that this is a highly complex subject, bound up with many international and economic intricacies, and one concerning which the Canadian government is not in a position to take entirely independent action.
> We would however point out that as a result of the controlled and planned fixation of currencies and the price of gold, the gold producing countries of the British commonwealth have carried the major part of the burden entailed.

As the price of gold is the crux of the problem, we would urge that attention be focussed on this crucial point in the hope that the Canadian government can help to set in motion action which will result in a price for gold which is (a), more commensurate with the cost of producing it and, (b), more commensurate with the greatly increased prices of all other commodities.

In another brief submitted to the government of Canada in October of 1952 by the Canadian metal mining association we find this at page 2:

We reaffirm our belief, previously presented to the government of Canada, that an increase in the official price of gold is a necessary step towards the permanent improvement in the conditions of world trade and offers the most effective solution of the problems which confront the Canadian gold mining industry.

And in another submission to the government on November 10 by the gold mining communities of the provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Manitoba and British Columbia, as well as of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, we read this at page 10:

We have now come to our last suggestion,—

It will be understood that those who were representing the municipalities in those provinces had made other suggestions.

We have now come to our last suggestion, the only one which would be a permanent answer to the actual crisis: the devaluation of the dollar, or in other words the increase in the official price of gold from $35 to at least $45 per fine ounce.

If I quote at length from these briefs it is because I want to make it clear that in the opinion of those who are most interested and who, I presume, are best qualified to express an opinion, the only permanent answer to the present difficulties is a substantial increase in the price of gold.

The question asked by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) is this. Would the price be greater or less than $35? I say this question is well put. The dominating feature of the market for gold since 1934 has been the willingness of the United States government to buy it in unlimited quantities at the price of $35. Unfortunately it is too low a price for my liking. If gold were to be treated as an ordinary commodity, subject to the day to day influence of the market, I am told—and I so believe—there is a great danger that from a long-term standpoint the stable, monetary demand for it may be undermined, and that the United States and other nations may cease to look upon it as a monetary metal.

I agree with the hon. member when he says it is unlikely the United States would sell their present stock of gold at prices below $35 an ounce. But there is always the possibility that they would refuse to accept newly mined gold, or that they might sell what stock they do have when the price starts to rise above $35. This of course would entirely destroy the premium market.

Ever since the Canadian government decided to permit the mines to sell their gold on the so-called free market the premium on such sales has steadily dwindled, so much so that there is no premium now for bar gold. It is true that there is still a premium of approximately $2.50 an ounce for gold coins. But a recent Swiss court decision and the disappearance of premium markets for gold bars will have the effect of increasing the supply of coins at a rapid rate. There is also the cost of minting these coins, which has to be taken into consideration.

So the premium paid does not altogether accrue to the original producer of the gold. It is interesting to note that the total coins put into circulation during the entire time they were minted in Canada amounted to $3,480,000 in $10 gold pieces, $1,388,000 in $5 gold pieces and $3,139,000 in sovereigns, which were figured at approximately $5 each. This total was of course issued over many years, both good and bad; and even allowing for the inflation of prices in the meantime one could expect nothing like that amount to be sold in the space of, let us say, a few months or, at the most, one year.

At the moment conditions are prosperous. Faith in our currency is strong, and there are many alternative ways of holding earning assets. There is the further problem of issuing coins—these beavers—with a face value of an ounce, I understand. But, after all, people will understand that this face value is perhaps $35, and that the price would necessarily fluctuate. I am afraid that some people may buy those beavers at $37 or $38 and want to sell them, only to find that they receive only $35. In those circumstances they may blame the Canadian government for the drop in price. Under those conditions the premiums to be obtained, if at all, either in Canada or abroad, would not compare with the $3.90 an ounce given to the mine under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. Unless there is a further outbreak of inflation or some unforeseen development in the world situation it would not appear that a free market for gold pieces would add much to the revenue of the mines. Unless the United States attitude were to change or other developments were to take place in the world gold market, I am afraid this proposal might indeed have adverse effects upon the gold mines, more particularly those with a high cost of production.

We are all very anxious to do something to help the industry. The subject is of major concern to the principal gold producing provinces, but I repeat that in a more general way the welfare of an industry which has played so great a part in opening northern Canada and building up our national economy is a matter of interest and concern to all Canadians. It would certainly be a calamity if the wealth created by gold were to disappear without economic measures being taken to protect it pending an increase in the official price.

Mr. Karl A. Eyre (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, representing as I do a constituency which produces a large quantity of Canada's gold and within which are two or three communities dependent upon the production of gold for their economic existence, directly or indirectly, to the extent of about 90 per cent of their well-being, I am naturally greatly interested in the private member's bill now under discussion.

I am well aware that this bill presents many difficulties because of existing legislation, especially the present operations of the monetary fund. However, our gold mines are now operating under the monetary fund and the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act with modifications, and I cannot see any reason why other modifications could not be implemented with the thought in mind that any new approach to our problem might bear fruit.

If the bill now before us were put into operation to allow those mines which have chosen to do so to sell their product on the semi-free market, and other mines if they desired to do so, it would help them to obtain a better price for their product. If a mine chooses to have gold coins minted and marketed there is every reason to believe that large quantities of those token coins would be purchased for a number of reasons. An interest in gold coins might be the forerunner of the gold mining industry once again being on a self-supporting basis.

Since the inauguration of the monetary fund the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and his colleagues have seen fit from time to time to press for and have modifications extended to Canada. The first was the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, which was a good act. The second was the sale of gold on the semi-free market on a restricted basis. The third was the debasing changes in the refining of gold for sale on the semi-free market.

I am sure that if the Minister of Finance and his colleagues could be convinced that the minting of gold coins would help the industry they would give every consideration to requesting further concessions for Canada from the monetary fund. What makes me confused and unable to comprehend the situation is that the House of Rothschild can purchase our gold and have gold coins minted and offered for sale. It must be a profitable enterprise or they would not be in the business. Therefore I suggest that we try the experiment of minting gold coins in connection with the mines that want to use that process, and which could operate under the bill before us.

Mrs. Ann Shipley (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to crave your indulgence for a moment and take this opportunity of thanking hon. members for their kind reception. I feel that I must speak on any bill that might bring about an improvement in the conditions affecting the gold mining industry. I also have the honour of representing a riding which is almost entirely dependent upon this industry.

I think it was on November 30 that the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) made certain statements respecting this industry which I believe were quite misleading and which did not give a true picture. I intend to answer him in some considerable detail at a more opportune time, either during the budget debate or when the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act is before the house.

I should like to say a few words about the state of the gold mining industry, and I intend to quote from an analysis presented by the gold mining association to the provincial ministers of mines at Niagara Falls last September. This is a national problem, of course, but I do have some figures relating to my own province. Incidentally Ontario produces 64 per cent of the gold produced by all lode gold mines in Canada. During the period 1941 to 1951, 35 per cent of the operating gold mines in Ontario discontinued operations; 74 per cent of the profits of the industry have been wiped out, and there are 40 per cent fewer men employed. I am sure that is typical of the situation in other provinces where gold mining is carried on.

The people in the gold mining areas do not like subsidies any better than you like voting them. We are a proud people. We feel that we have earned the right to be proud. The people in the gold mining areas pioneered that part of the country and opened it up. They have had to pass through some rather tough periods, but we have created great new wealth for this country. Our prospectors did something that was invaluable for the country. In their search for gold they found almost every base metal mine that has been discovered in Canada. That is something you need badly, even though at the moment gold does not seem to be such a vital metal.

Grateful as we may be for the subsidy—and do not think we are not grateful—we would prefer not to have a handout. Therefore the industry and those dependent upon it are searching constantly for some method within the national economy whereby we can get off the dole. So they present various proposals to the government from time to time, and I should like to review briefly the situation affecting gold.

Gold is different from any metal produced in Canada. It is the only commodity universally accepted as money. It is a monetary metal, and thereby is a major factor in the national economy.

In 1931 the government of Canada asked the gold producers to send all their gold to the mint, and in 1932 the Gold Export Act was passed making compliance with this regulation compulsory. This was at the time Britain went off the gold standard, and the price of gold then was just over $20 per ounce. During the period from 1930 to 1933 the average price increased each year until it reached the rate of $28.60 in 1933. In January, 1934, the United States government proclaimed the price of $35 per ounce. This was the maximum Canadian producers could obtain, regardless of supply and demand, for gold on the world market.

These measures—and I hope those of you who are not too sympathetic to our problems will note this—were taken in the national interest, and not at the request of the industry. A short time ago a limited sale of gold was permitted on the so-called premium market. The premium has disappeared, so the measure is of no further assistance.

At the time the price of gold was fixed at $35 per ounce it was adequate for the sound development of the industry and also to enable the payment of top wages, as the record will prove we did pay at that time. Today we do not receive even $35 in Canadian funds, and in the meantime everyone knows how the cost of producing anything has soared. The mining industry is certainly no exception. Gold is caught in the web of a new system of controlled currencies designed to benefit the masses, but unfortunately a relatively small group is bearing the entire load.

When I first came to Ottawa I read of various proposals made by most if not all the mining associations in Canada. I read that they were proposing such a measure as is contained in the bill before the house today. At the earliest opportunity I discussed the proposal with some of the ministers concerned, and other officers in various departments whose knowledge on the subject is great. It appears that once again the implementation of this bill would conflict with the national interest and/or with international agreements; so that if the bill cannot be adopted in the national interest, it appears we still have to be dependent for our very existence on the good will of this government.

I do not know what is the answer to this problem. I am not an economist. But I do beseech this government to continue to explore every possible avenue with vigour and determination, so that once again the gold mining industry and the people dependent thereon may stand on their own feet and continue to explore and develop the otherwise waste lands of this great country as we have done in the past.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I waited to see if any other hon. members wished to speak in connection with this bill, but I see they do not. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the speeches made by the mover of this bill and those who followed him. I am not going to take up the time of the house to deal with statements made by the mover concerning the genesis of the international monetary fund. I believe on reflection the hon. member will agree it was not communist-inspired. The people who were responsible for entering into the fund agreement were actuated by a desire to provide for stability in international exchanges, and also to provide a code of international conduct with respect to the prevention of such objectionable practices as the competitive depreciation of currencies.

One might argue that the methods adopted were wrong, but I hope hon. members will agree that none of those, including myself and my predecessor, who took part in the formulation of that agreement were either inspired or influenced by communists.

Incidentally, it is rather ironic that in this debate reference was made to Mr. Harry Dexter White as being one of those who inspired it. I am not going to refer to Mr. White. I shall leave that to the people in the country of which he was a citizen. But it is rather interesting to note that if Lord Keynes had had his way gold would have been pretty well out of the picture so far as the international monetary fund agreement was concerned. However, I am not going to take up the time of the house to discuss that. I merely wish to reiterate what I said the other day, that I profoundly disagree with the suggestions made by the hon. member for York West.

The purpose of this bill, I believe hon. members will agree, is to enable gold to be prepared in such a form that it will be acquired and hoarded by residents of Canada. It is for that reason that I, as Minister of Finance, and the government feel bound to oppose any such measure.

One can view gold, as did my friend the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas) in his excellent and thoughtful speech, either as a commodity or as an essential monetary metal whose purpose is to serve in the settlement of international balances. The view of the Canadian government, of the government of the United Kingdom, of the United States and of every other great trading country is that the main purpose of gold is to serve as a monetary metal for the facilitating of international exchanges. It has, of course, important subsidiary uses in the arts; but if it were not for the fact that gold is acceptable to the great trading nations of the world in settlement of these international balances, I believe we would find that the market for gold would shrink rather drastically.

Historically, it has maintained its position as a monetary metal because it has had a fixed price, and because the treasuries all over the world have been willing to take it in unlimited quantities at a fixed price in settlement of trade balances. It is for that reason that the Canadian government has felt that a policy which would destroy the position of gold in that respect would be inimical to the interests of the gold mining industry itself. Canada is, of course, as we all know, a great trading country and we have a great many things which we want to export and sell. Conversely, we have to import and pay for a great many things which are necessary for the operation of our economy. We believe therefore that gold which is mined in Canada should not be kept and hoarded by individual Canadian citizens, but should be available for the settlement of Canada's international trading balances. If it is not available for that purpose, then so far as I am concerned it ceases to have any economic justification.

It is true that under international agreements we have with other countries, and according to practices which we have agreed upon with other countries, the domestic hoarding of gold is prohibited. It is prohibited in the United States, it is prohibited here, and it is prohibited in the United Kingdom.

The measure proposed by the hon. member would in my opinion be of no real help to the gold mining industry in Canada, and were it adopted it would obviously be quite impossible for the government to continue to assist the gold mining industry to the extent of $15 million per year, as we shall be doing this year. If a policy of this kind were adopted I do not think we could possibly justify to the taxpayers of Canada the continuance of such a policy.

I have always felt that the greatest danger to the continuance of the gold mining industry in Canada was that countries such as the United States and other great trading nations would decide that they no longer wished to exchange for gold United States automobiles, United States steel or United States what-have-you or British steel or British what-have-you. I think it is extremely important, in the interests of the Canadian economy as a whole, that we should frame our gold policy in such a way that we run no risk of incurring that highly undesirable result.

For reasons which I have mentioned, Mr. Speaker, I would have to oppose the adoption of this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Adamson: No. May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Abbott: Go ahead. The hon. member can finish in ten minutes. He has already spoken for 40 minutes. He can finish in ten minutes, can he not?

Mr. Knowles: He can speak for ten minutes now and speak further next time, if he wishes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): If the hon. member speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to put on the record certain points showing wherein I disagree with the Minister of Finance, and I think I will deal with them in the six minutes I have left, before going on with the rest of my argument as to the usefulness of gold.

While I agree with the minister with regard to Lord Keynes and gold, I certainly do not agree with him when he said that Lord Keynes was in agreement with the policy that was adopted. I want to quote just one paragraph from Professor Harrod's book, "The Life of John Maynard Keynes". The paragraph is headed "The Last Phase", and it deals with the agreement. It reads as follows:

He—

That is Lord Keynes.

—fought hard and bitterly, but it was in vain. The American view was predetermined, and this fact was the bitterest of all. It seemed clear to him that, if the voting by nations had been truly free, as befitted an international organization, he would have obtained a majority for his principal points; but at that juncture almost all the nations were prospective applicants for benefit of some kind from the United States. Rebellion was out of the question. The Americans were "railroading" their decisions through the conference.

Mr. Abbott: Keynes only quarrelled with the important role that gold was to play in the fund agreement.

Mr. Adamson: So much for the agreement, Mr. Speaker. The book is full of disagreements between Keynes, White and others. May I also say that I did not suggest that those who went down to form this international monetary fund, the people sent from the various nations, were communists. What I suggested and I now repeat was that the officers in the international monetary fund and the people who wrote the policy were certainly communists.

Mr. Abbott: I repeat that that is not true.

Mr. Adamson: I have this evidence to give, Mr. Speaker. I wish to quote from the interim report of the United States committee on government operations, made by its Senate permanent subcommittee on investigations, subcommittee on government operations abroad, dated December 15, 1953.

Mr. Abbott: Are we going into all the United States senatorial investigations?

Mr. Adamson: No; there are just two paragraphs in my present evidence.

Mr. Blackmore: Just listen to this quotation.

Mr. Adamson: This is an official United States document.

Mr. Abbott: The hon. member has Social Credit support.

Mr. Adamson: At page 11 of this report we find the following:

It is a matter of public information that Harry Dexter White transferred from his position as assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury to the position of executive director for the United States in the international monetary fund on January 23, 1946. Shortly prior thereto, V. Frank Coe transferred from his position in the foreign economic administration, to the treasury department as director of the division of monetary research, formerly held by White. White became the first executive director for the United States of the international monetary fund and was responsible in framing a great portion of its policies and procedures. Coe succeeded White as executive director for the United States of the international monetary fund.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Brownell gave all this in his speech.

Mr. Adamson: Will the minister please contain himself?

Mr. Abbott: Oh, I shall contain myself.

Mr. Adamson: To continue with the quotation:

Here was a crisscross of the operations of the Soviet espionage ring whereby both of these men were placed in new positions whereby they could become indoctrinated in other policies and procedures and carry with them the experience and information gleaned in the old. It was in effect a continued schooling and an expansion of the Soviet position of influence through its espionage ring without surrendering the old positions of advantage.

Then in the recommendations of the Senate committee, recommendation No. 2 is as follows:

It is recommended that as a precautionary measure, an appropriate committee of congress should make a study of the transactions engaged in by international monetary fund, while Harry Dexter White and Virginus Frank Coe were connected with it in influential capacities, to determine whether actions were taken injurious to the best interests of the United States which can now be corrected in view of the conspiratorial connections of these two faithless Americans.

I wanted to put that on the record as an official document of the United States Senate, an official United States government document published by the government printing office in Washington, D.C.

May I now call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): At eight o'clock the house will resume the business interrupted at five o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY

UNEMPLOYMENT—MOTION FOR EXAMINATION BY COMMITTEE ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Green, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Gillis.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. According to a report in the Ottawa Citizen, the purpose of our being summoned to the other place at 9.45 tonight is mainly to receive royal assent to the bill providing increases in parliamentary indemnities. May I ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), who, I take it, is leading the house, if he would consider having that matter postponed—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Can the hon. member tell me how he can see a question of privilege in what he has just stated?

Mr. Knowles: My question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, is that I think it is inappropriate and unfair to the house to interrupt a debate on unemployment for a purpose such as this; and I should like to ask the Minister of Labour—

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is not a question of privilege at all. I do not think that the hon. member can rise on a question of privilege and ask why we are going to the Senate when we have received notice that the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General is going to be present in order to give royal assent to bills. When royal assent is to take place and we have received notice to that effect, then any bill that has been passed by this house and the other house has to be given royal assent, no matter which one it is. Royal assent is not given when the house is not in session, and when we are summoned for that purpose there must necessarily be an interruption in the debate that is taking place in the house.

Therefore I do not think I would consider establishing a precedent to the effect that whenever a similar incident takes place an hon. member can rise on a question of privilege, if he happens to consider assent to a certain bill not important enough to interrupt the debate, and ask the leader of the house to advise the cancellation or the postponement of the royal assent ceremony. I know the hon. member understands that. Therefore I would ask him not to pursue his question of privilege at this time.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, so far in this debate we have had the pleasure of hearing a great many very interesting and scholarly addresses on the subject at issue, unemployment. You have also had the advantage of hearing a great many economic theories put forward which have been attributed to prominent economists of the past and the present. In some instances I think these theories were a little oversimplified; nevertheless they have been put forward. I should like to say that I think all the views that have been presented so far are noteworthy indeed, but I cannot help feeling that a somewhat fragmentary aspect of the whole picture has been presented. In order to look at the problem of unemployment properly we have to approach it in a logical and orderly way.

First of all, is there unemployment in Canada? If there is, does it exist on a scale sufficient to cause concern? Is it increasing or is it decreasing? Clearly there is unemployment in Canada, and it apparently involves somewhere between 300,000 and 500,000 people, although no one seems to know exactly how many are involved. Even the figures given by the minister are apparently subject to certain reservations, as are any statistical data, and the figure of 524,000 persons seeking jobs evidently does not mean that by any means all of these people are out of work. However, the minister did say that in the same month of last year there were 338,000 people seeking jobs.

Does unemployment exist on a scale sufficient to cause concern? Again I think the answer is yes. We have heard that unemployment is always high in January, as it is seasonal; but this year it seems, to put it mildly, to be more seasonal than usual. In a country with a population of 14 million, over half a million seeking jobs is a very high percentage. I believe it works out to almost one person in seven of the available labour force. It would also appear that unemployment is on the increase. Comparing the figures for January, 1953, with those for January, 1954, there is an increase of 186,000 in the number of persons seeking jobs. There has also been a steep rise in the number of those seeking jobs from 338,000 in December, 1953, to 524,000 in January, 1954.

I might point out that in December, 1952, a year ago last December, 237,000 people were seeking jobs, and accordingly approximately 100,000 more people were seeking jobs in December, 1953, than in December, 1952. I think it can be safely said that it is fairly clear that there is unemployment, that it is on a scale sufficient to cause concern, and that it is clearly increasing.

Second, having established that the problem exists, what are we going to do about it? This again brings up several considerations. Is unemployment more prevalent in certain industries or is it general throughout the country? What is the cause? This of course is by far the most important consideration, because if you do not know the cause it is very difficult to find a cure. Having arrived at the cause or causes, are these likely to continue? If so, will the cause or causes be aggravated in the future so as to accentuate the unemployment problem, or will they automatically clear up?

In this regard it would seem that, while the government does not admit there is any serious unemployment at the present time, the causes that have been given so far are rather vague. It also seems to be the fond hope of the government that whatever the causes may be they will right themselves automatically.

If the causes can be determined, and if it is decided that they will not right themselves automatically, then what is the cure? In other words, what can parliament do to cure the unemployment situation that exists. I cannot agree with the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) who suggests that the government do something about unemployment right away. Unless you know what you are doing there is no point in jumping wildly in and doing a great deal. It would seem to me that the only way to find out what to do, to find out what the causes are, in what industries unemployment is more prevalent and so on, is to have the standing committee on industrial relations examine these questions at once, as has been suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), because everybody admits that if an unemployment situation exists, as it does, it must be looked after at once.

It will not do any good to ask the government to pass a lot of laws if they do not know why they are passing them. It would be like a squirrel in a cage running around on a wheel or, as the old expression goes, "I don't know where I'm going, but I'm on my way". It would be impossible to expect the government to do something unless it had some opportunity to look into all the facts and see what should be done. I should like for a moment to suggest a few things that the standing committee on industrial relations might consider if it had the opportunity of so doing.

First of all it might consider this point. While the submission on unemployment by the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada and the Canadian Congress of Labour indicates that unemployment is general and not confined to particular industries, nevertheless from information I have received I cannot help feeling that certain industries have been hit by unemployment more than others. I refer to the farm implement industry and the textile and shipping industries. While many textile workers are not unemployed, a great many are working on short time, and I know this is the situation in a number of textile plants in my riding.

In this regard I think it would be rather pertinent if it is found that more unemployment does exist in certain industries than in others, because I believe it would give the committee on industrial relations a possible clue as to one of the more important causes of the present unemployment problem in Canada.

During this debate we have heard the economic doctrines of numerous economists put forward. We have been told the application of their various theories would cure the situation. We have heard about the effect of Lord Keynes' savings investment principle, we have heard about the effect of his equation MV-PT, which is the amount of money in the country times the velocity of money equals the price level times the number of transactions. We have heard some Marxist doctrine out of "Das Kapital", about the rich getting richer and the poor getting poorer. We have heard some reference to business cycles, which I suppose is related to Mr. Hawtrey's theories on business cycles.

The standing committee should take these various theories of the economists into consideration. I think they would be very helpful. I believe the committee should bear in mind the fact that nearly all economic theories about which we have heard are predicated upon a closed economy, or in other words, a mythical kingdom or workers' state, whichever you like, that has no connection with outside countries so far as international economics are concerned. It is also assumed to start with that the country's economic policies are solely for reasons of economics.

These assumptions, as everyone here realizes, are based upon a false premise so far as the direct, practical application of these theories to human society is concerned. In our world we have the land areas divided by man-made political boundaries into various economic as well as political units. Some of these have a great many resources and some have none. Some are suited to producing wheat, and others because of natural resources are suited to be manufacturing countries. Climate, soil and resources, all influence the economics of the different countries of the world.

In this mythical country of the economists, the part of the country best suited to produce wheat produces wheat; the part best suited to manufacturing does just that. As we all know, this is popularly known as the principle of natural advantage. It would be unthinkable in this mythical economic country for someone to try to do anything as uneconomic as growing grapes in a hothouse in Iceland when they could be grown naturally in Spain. But this is not what takes place in our world. Because of fear of war, national pride, mistaken economic thinking such as the nineteenth century doctrine of mercantilism and so on, all countries produce goods that are basically uneconomic for them to produce.

They do so sincerely because, in our present world, one has to do things however uneconomic for national protection, and so on.

As a result we all know that such things as tariffs are set up, monetary restrictions develop, and the flow of goods from place to place in the world is slowed down and sometimes even halted. There are great differences in the cost of labour because some countries, like Japan, have few resources and a large population, while other countries like Canada have huge resources and few people. There is also the question of different sociological viewpoints in the various countries. For instance, in this country now we feel that everyone should have as large a share in the national income as possible. It is no longer considered "nice" to think there should be the very rich people away up at the top, and the very poor people at the bottom. This sociological thinking makes a difference in wage rates in the different countries which, of course, further complicates the whole picture of the world economy.

At this point I should like to interject that we do not know whether Adam Smith's free enterprise, Karl Marx's communism, the Fabian socialism, Keynes' or any other theories would work, because all these theories are predicated upon a closed economy and not an economy such as we have today. It may be that all these theories would work very well in a closed economy, but we do not know because we have not tried it. We have no way of trying it out under present conditions.

Accordingly I should like to suggest that the committee on industrial relations should look to the broad international economic situation when searching out the main causes of unemployment. I believe that here lies the answer to the principal causes. For example, the sterling-dollar dilemma has cut down the sale of our farm products and cut down farm income. This has prevented farmers from buying a lot of new agricultural implements. Another example would be the heavy United States investment in Canada. I do not mean purchases; I am thinking of investment such as the buying of a lot of municipal bonds and securities. This has forced the Canadian dollar up to a premium of about 3¾ cents. When the Canadian dollar becomes that expensive to buy, people are going to purchase goods in countries other than Canada. It is quite clear that in the long run a heavy investment of foreign capital in this country will lead to heavy exports in the future of dividends, interest and so on. These are things worth considering when the committee is looking into this question. The practical aspect of this foreign investment situation will be to create in effect a large external debt which will have to be contended with in the future.

For reasons of national security I think we have to have a textile industry. However, because of the differential between wage costs in Japan and wage costs in Canada, it is almost impossible for the textile industry in Canada to compete with Japan's textile industry. Some people may say that is too bad, but on the other hand it would be equally unthinkable to remove the tariffs completely and throw out of employment the two hundred thousand textile workers in Canada. It would dislocate our whole economy, so I think you will agree that we have to have a textile industry, if only from the point of view of national defence. What would we do if war broke out tomorrow and we had no textile industry?

The same principle applies in a more limited way to the shipping industry. These are but a few examples. Again I say that we should appoint a committee, because the whole problem is extremely complicated. It cannot be dealt with by asking the government to pass a law tomorrow with respect to unemployment. The whole problem has to be investigated very carefully by the standing committee on industrial relations.

If steps are taken in this regard without very careful consideration you are likely to have a further dislocation of the economy. I think you might safely compare the economy of a country to a pile of bricks; if you pull one brick out to move it you shift every brick in the pile. It is for this reason that any study of the problem on an international scale, which also results in a finding that some of the causes of unemployment are related to things within the country and are not on an international scale, must be conducted carefully. Any steps taken must be carefully considered before they are taken.

In closing there is one suggestion I should like to make to this committee which I hope will consider this subject. My suggestion is related to an alteration in the Income Tax Act. Other members have already said, and I am sure more will say it before this debate is over, that high taxation is probably one of the principal causes of pricing ourselves out of world markets. This is quite apart from anything else, such as the high price of the dollar. I suggest, and I hope the minister will listen to this, that there should be a change in the Income Tax Act to permit a farmer to increase the rate of depreciation on farm implements. At the present time most farmers use the straight-line method of depreciation, which allows a rate of 10 or 15 per cent a year on motor-driven vehicles. I would suggest that this be increased to 25 per cent a year for non-power-driven vehicles and up to 33⅓ per cent for power-driven motor vehicles.

I think there is little doubt that this would help the home market. It would stimulate this market so far as the farm implement business is concerned, and certainly that is one of the industries that have been hit hardest at the present time. I cannot see that it would make a great deal of difference to the economy of the country as a whole, and certainly I think it would help sell in the home market and help this industry along. Also, of course, since most farmers use the straight-line method of depreciation, if they could sell their old machines and make a little money on them from their depreciated value such amounts would not be taxable from the capital gains point of view.

In closing let me say that in my opinion the main cause of the present unemployment situation in Canada is international economic factors, not so much home factors at all. The only way we can deal successfully with a highly complicated problem such as this is to have a standing committee of the house on industrial relations which would carefully examine the causes, and do it as quickly as possible. But I do think it would be most unwise for the government to go off on a tangent and pass laws without a proper consideration of this matter. That is why I feel the house should support the amendment of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, as the representative in the House of Commons of the constituency of Vancouver East I am keenly interested in all that has been said in this discussion of the problem of unemployment as we now see it in Canada. I have no desire to repeat the arguments and presentations already made; but I do feel there are certain aspects that have not yet been put before the house. That is my reason for speaking.

The question of unemployment is most serious to all the people of Canada, but in particular to those who are unemployed. I feel that at times the viewpoint of a member can best be put forward in a word picture. In the last two days I have been trying to find the ways and means of putting before members of this honourable house a word picture of the unemployment situation. I did not find that word picture until yesterday. Indeed I did not find it until the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) spoke. But immediately he had finished I had the word picture. I regret very much that the Acting Prime Minister, because of pressure of other business, is unable to be in his seat at this time. However, I want to give that word picture.

In order to do so I have to go back to June of 1924. In that month I graduated from high school. I did not have the funds to go to university and so, for two months, I served as a hod carrier for a bricklayer. Let me say that that bricklayer was one of the best in Canada, my own father. After that two months I became an apprentice in the trade of an inside wireman electrician. In the following five years, with the exception of about three jobs, I worked on the electrical construction connected with the building of wheat elevators. When I heard the Acting Prime Minister yesterday it suddenly came to my mind that on nearly every job on which I worked in the five years after 1924 the blueprints were signed by C. D. Howe, the consulting engineer in charge of the drafting and construction of a majority of the wheat elevators in British Columbia.

That brought to my mind an experience. I do not know exactly how many members understand the method of construction of a wheat elevator. I might explain that when you start pouring the concrete on the bins the concrete is poured continuously, and the forms are movable. Those forms are only about four or five feet long, and are operated by jacks. Once you start to pour you must keep right on going, 24 hours each day, until you hit the top of the bins, which is known as the bin floor.

I was working on one of the largest elevators in British Columbia. Again the consulting engineer was this man named C. D. Howe. On this particular job we had reached the bin floor. When you have reached that point you had to pour the bin floor slab, and this was still on a 24-hour basis. I was on the graveyard shift on the night the bin floor was poured. I believe there were about 50 of us on shift that night, including carpenters, electricians, labourers and rodmen. At about 12.30 in the morning, as the bin floor was being poured, the central bin began to collapse. We had warning because we saw the concrete on the central bin starting to sag. As it collapsed other bins started collapsing. As I say, the 50 workers on that graveyard shift had a warning. I leaped for the side and got hold of the jacks and the movable form.

We were very fortunate that night. Had it collapsed all of a sudden the 50 of us would have died. If we had not taken heed of the warning when the first bin started to collapse we would have died. Had the whole floor gone down, there would have been the same result. Those 50 construction workers took the warning when they saw the first sign of collapse. What happened after that? Well, the entire floor did not go. Did the engineer in charge of the job go down a couple of hundred feet and start to work up? No; he took the solid foundation on the side, put heavy beams across from the top and brought the slab timber back into position.

I think that is a perfect analogy to the present unemployment situation in Canada; and the man who was the consulting engineer on that job back in the twenties is the Acting Prime Minister of Canada in the House of Commons today. What I am asking is that he and the government learn a lesson from that job. Today in Canada it is not a case of a floor collapsing on a wheat elevator construction job. We have evidence from all sides of this house that the security floor is collapsing under over 500,000 of the working people of the Dominion of Canada.

In the collapse of that centre bin the workers were reaching for security. The unemployed today are reaching out because the security floor has collapsed. If they are eligible they get unemployment insurance, but at a rate that will permit no family to live on a respectable scale. It is just like that jack which I reached for over 20 years ago. But there are those under whom the security floor has collapsed who have absolutely nowhere to turn, because Liberal governments have failed to keep the promises made in August, 1945. I shall come to that in a few minutes.

There is one point I should like to make, and if I could not make any other I would be satisfied. Can we take a warning when we see it and do something about it, or do we have a government which wants to see the entire security floor collapse before they will do anything about it? I have been absolutely amazed at the speeches I have heard from the government side of the house. They have refused to take any notice of this warning of collapse and do anything about it. I am not any prophet of gloom—

An hon. Member: Oh, no.

Mr. Winch: —but I say that when the government sees and recognizes the fact, according to the figures of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), that there are 524,000 applying for employment, that should be a warning. Mr. Speaker, when you have a warning it is time to act. We should not take a chance on a major collapse. Put the beams across from the top as they did on the job I spoke about a few moments ago.

I do not think any one of us wants to see a return of the hungry 1930's; but I do say to the government that having been given the warning which it has now of over half a million unemployed, if the government does not move and the trend continues, then its callous indifference to the situation will be an indication that it has not learned the lesson of 1929 to 1939. I know something about it.

I have listened to members of the government and have heard the way they approach this problem of unemployment. I think the best thing that could happen would be for members of the government to have to live on unemployment insurance, or to have to live for a period of time as those who are not eligible for unemployment insurance and cannot get jobs have to live. They should have lived during the depression from 1929 to 1939.

In that time we had Liberal and Conservative governments. The people of Canada were anxious and willing to work. Their only desire was to be productive and respected members of the community. But they were condemned by the free enterprise governments to a life of too little to live on and too much to die on. The youth of this country were condemned to travel back and forth across the country, not wanted and not needed. They were the derelicts of the economic system and the maladministration of the government. Because the government of those days would not take any warning as to unemployment, what was the result? We saw in our Canadian democracy the use of tear gas and police batons, and we heard Liberal mayors reading the riot act. I know. I was there.

I do not think it is right in discussing this question of unemployment that we should hear government speakers, and in particular cabinet ministers, tell the house and thereby the people of Canada that 524,000 people asking for jobs at this time is only seasonal. We are being told something which really sticks in my craw. It is unpleasant. It is not unpleasant for the government, it is not unpleasant for the cabinet ministers, it is not unpleasant for any one of us who after tonight will be receiving $10,000 a year less expenses, but it is very unpleasant, even if it amounts to only 2 per cent of our working population, for the more than 500,000 unemployed in Canada. They represent not just 500,000 unemployed; there are also their wives and kiddies. If we have any sense of responsibility whatsoever we will place ourselves in the unpleasant position of those half million unemployed and their families.

The government very definitely has a responsibility which in my mind goes back to August of 1945, at least. In August, 1945, a dominion-provincial conference was held here in Ottawa which was called because the federal government of that day desired to rent from the provinces certain taxation fields, in return for which they would be given an annual subsidy on a certain basis. Although that conference was called for the nominal purpose of reaching a dominion-provincial agreement on the rental of provincial taxational rights, as far as the provinces of Canada were concerned they met the government in August, 1945, on the government's own proposals to the effect that they had plans for full employment and high standards of living in the Dominion of Canada.

I want to refer to the report of the plenary conference discussions held between August 6 and 10, 1945, in order to demonstrate to hon. members and to you, Mr. Speaker, that the provinces did come here with the thought that the government in 1945 had a plan for full employment, and that the government itself admitted that that was the primary purpose of the conference, not taxation agreements. In the report of the plenary conference discussions we find on page 30 a statement by Hon. John Hart, the premier of British Columbia. He made the point very clear, and I would like to quote a passage from his remarks:

> We believe that all Canadians are looking to this conference with expectancy. Events, since the frustrating days of the last depression, have greatly influenced opinions previously held on the proper role of government in the national economy. The success which has attended the management of Canada's war economy has, we believe, persuaded thoughtful citizens everywhere that much can be done in times of peace to control the effects of a disturbed business cycle; to banish the fear of unemployment and social insecurity; to maintain a high level of employment and income; and to achieve an ever-rising standard of living.

That was presented at the first plenary session by the Liberal premier of British Columbia, and I agree with his opening remarks. That was not only the viewpoint of the premier of British Columbia, but also of the premiers of the other provinces. The questions before that conference were those concerning plans for stabilization of full employment and a high standard of living, and these plans were uppermost in the minds of the federal government itself. On page 83 of the same report the Minister of Trade and Commerce had this to say:

> The dominion further proposes to pay a specific grant of 20 per cent of the cost of provincial and municipal public investment projects if
> (a) they have been accepted and registered by the dominion authority as fully planned projects prior to the time of execution;
>
> (b) they are executed in a period designated by the dominion authority.

Further on he said:

> In the timing of projects the dominion would concern itself only with employment considerations . . .

I would like to give one more quotation from this report, from a statement made by the then minister of labour, the late Mr. Humphrey Mitchell. He said this, as reported at page 102 of the same report:

> The dominion government in its statement on employment and income announced that the maintenance of a high level of employment and income was "a primary object of policy". The people of Canada and the provincial and municipal governments are thus assured of an active dominion policy to avoid and combat unemployment.

May I just repeat that last sentence from this statement at the plenary session of the conference between the federal government and the provinces of Canada in regard to the purpose of the conference, and what the federal government would do. I quote again:

> The people of Canada and the provincial and municipal governments are thus assured of an active dominion policy to avoid and combat unemployment.

These words were uttered, Mr. Speaker, between the 6th and 10th of August, 1945. Today we have 524,000 recognized unemployed in the Dominion of Canada. The implied policies of the federal government have never been put into effect. Let me remind hon. members—and I know what I am talking about because I was a member of the provincial legislature at that time—that when the Liberal premier came back and introduced a bill on the taxation rental agreement his speech indicated, although it was not in the contract before the legislature, that these policies enunciated by the then prime minister, the late Mr. Mackenzie King, the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) and the late Mr. Humphrey Mitchell, on behalf of the federal government, would be implemented.

Today, sir, the federal government has not yet put forward any plan or assumed any responsibility for the care of the employable unemployed, outside of the regulations on unemployment insurance. If I am incorrect I hope I shall be corrected, but I have yet to hear of the government having made an attempt to carry through its own proposals in co-operation with the provincial governments for laying out plans which could be used in times of unemployment, and on a timing established by the federal government, upon which they would pay 20 per cent of the capital cost.

Due to the failure of the government since 1945, this parliament now finds itself unprepared to deal with a serious situation. It is serious. We have heard some rather remarkable statements on the floor of this house in regard to the situation. I was amazed to hear the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) condemning the leaders of the trade union movement and placing on their shoulders the responsibility for the present situation in Canada.

We have read in the newspapers and heard on the floor of this house statements by the Acting Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) to the effect that some employees are pricing themselves out of the market, and that they had better start looking elsewhere for jobs. From the cabinet benches we have heard statements to the effect that the unemployment problem is only seasonal. Mr. Speaker, the unemployment problem is not "only seasonal". I am not going to repeat the statements already made in this debate which conclusively throw back into the teeth of the cabinet ministers the statements they have made and prove that it is not seasonal. The industries they named are not seasonal industries. There is therefore something more to the problem than the seasonal factor with respect to unemployment.

The government express the pious hope that things may pick up in the spring. Mr. Speaker, a pious hope that things may pick up in the spring does not feed the stomachs of those who are unemployed today; not at all. Moreover, I do not think the government themselves really believe that statement. If so, they are more naive than I ever thought any of them were, especially a hard-headed engineer and businessman like the one who is Acting Prime Minister at the present time.

Mr. Speaker, it is no answer to say that the trade unions are to blame and that they, because of their wages and wage demands, are pricing themselves out of the market. It is no answer for the employers to say that taxes and the trade unions are pricing them out of the market. It is no answer to the unemployment situation when the government, for reasons known only to themselves, refuse to face the facts; and, Mr. Speaker, in the speeches they have made so far yesterday and today, the government are completely refusing to face the facts.

In British Columbia, within the last twelve months, the British Columbia Electric Railway Company had occasion to call for tenders for a major high-tension power line and for the supplying of the towers. Canadian companies and companies throughout the world put in bids on the supplying of these towers. The lowest Canadian tender was in the neighbourhood of $1,600,000. The contract went to Italy at a price well below $1 million. No one can say that it is the cost of wages that did that, because if the Canadian workers had given their services entirely free of charge no Canadian company could have touched that Italian tender.

That is not the only example that can be given. It is a situation that is increasing in frequency. Some three weeks ago I had the opportunity of speaking for about an hour with the president of a big manufacturing concern in Ontario. His firm employs over 12,000 workers. The president of this firm told me that recently he bid on a Canadian contract and that the firm had lost it. It went to a company in England. I understand the need for trade. But, Mr. Speaker, the president of this firm which employs over 12,000 workers told me this about that contract. He said, "If our firm had given completely free the use of our factory and machinery, the costs of administration and the raw material required, we could not have matched the price of the English firm, who are up against a 20 per cent tariff when they come into Canada on that contract". He said, "We could not have matched it". That job meant approximately 300,000 man-hours of work. If they threw in the material, the machinery and the administration they still could not touch the price quoted by the English firm.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Why not? What does the rest of the expense consist of?

Mr. Winch: That is the very question I am asking. Why not?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): What other expenses were there?

Mr. Winch: I mentioned the previous experience in British Columbia. Even if they had thrown in their wages free they could not have touched the price of the Italian firm. That is the reason I am saying to the Acting Prime Minister that it is not just a matter of charging the trade unions with the responsibility because of their wages and their standards of living. It is a matter that cannot be decided by charging any single aspect of our economy, the worker, the employer or the government. It is a matter that is mighty serious. It comes into our own individual lives, our own provinces, our own industries; and it is tied up with what is happening internationally.

What is happening internationally? Are the governments outside of Canada now at a point where, in an endeavour to get Canadian dollars, they are doing something with which we cannot compete? They must be doing something to be able to bid on tenders in Canada at prices that could not even be touched, in one case if the workers made no charge and in the other case if the employer made no charge for his factory, raw materials, machinery or administration.

In my estimation, Mr. Speaker, it not only shows the complexity of the situation but also the seriousness of it. It also shows the need for something being done in Canada now that has never been done before, namely the placing of the cards on the table. It is no good damning the trade unions offhand in a press report if they have a delegation down here. The government has a responsibility.

I would say this to hon. members. You believe in free enterprise. Yes, all of you do, except our own group here. I do not believe you can solve this problem under your free enterprise system. But we are living under it, whether we like it or not; and we are in parliament where we have a free enterprise government, whether we like it or not. Whether or not I believe in something new and different, on the floor of this house we have a responsibility to our constituents and to our country. What is that responsibility? It is to see that every family has the ham and eggs on the table tomorrow morning.

You believe in this system and you say it can be made to work, but it is not working when there are half a million unemployed. That is your first warning; and if you are sincere, if you believe the system can be made to work, then the way to make it work is to do something which has not been done before. It is not good enough to say, as was said by the Acting Prime Minister, that one union at least has priced itself out of the market and that the workers had better find other jobs. It is not good enough for employers to say that they are priced out of the market because of government taxes and because of the standard of living of their employees. The government has a grave responsibility.

Trade unionists are sensible men and women. They know it is useless to have a union agreement providing for payment of $2, $2.50 or $3 an hour if they have not a job at which to work. The employer cannot function if he does not have workers on the job, and the government cannot get its $4½ billion of revenue if the workers are not on the job in the industries of Canada. In my estimation there is only one sensible thing that can be done under this system and under this government. Cut out all the shadow-boxing, cut out all the flim-flam, cut out all the wishful thinking, face the situation as it is now with its warning, and get together and talk things over.

[Mr. Winch.]

You may think the trade unionists are wrong, but give them an opportunity to present their case and not have them come here to meet the cabinet for just an hour and a half. Let leaders of the trade union movement, representatives of the employers and representatives of the government, which has over-all control over what is going on in the country, sit down together, consider the case, deal with facts and see what will come out of such discussion. When I began I referred to a consulting engineering job by the Acting Prime Minister on which I worked back in the twenties. When the bin floor collapsed the engineers started from the top to repair it.

Mr. Argue: C. D. never collapses.

Mr. Winch: The security of over half a million people has already collapsed. Let us start from the top to lay plans and try to check the situation. What is the top in Canada? The top is the parliament of Canada, and unfortunately parliament is under the control of the government. The government should take action now from the top. Since 1945 they have never kept their promises.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to inform the hon. member that his time expired at 9.04.

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a question of privilege? I leave it to you to say whether it is a question of privilege. There are many things I could say about the speech that has just been made, but there is one point against which I must protest. Neither the acting leader of the government, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, nor the Minister of Labour damned the highly respected leaders of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada and the Canadian Congress of Labour the other day, or the members of their unions.

Mr. Winch: I did not mention the Acting Prime Minister. I referred to the statement made by the hon. member for Temiscouata.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Red Deer.

Mr. Winch: May I finish my sentence?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member has the unanimous consent of the house he may do so. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Some hon. members say no.

Mr. Winch: All I want, Mr. Speaker, is to finish my sentence. Let the government take—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Argue: Listen to the democrats howling.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I should say again that when I rose on the first occasion it was to inform the hon. member that his time had expired at 9.04. It was then past 9.06. He had already enjoyed two minutes over his 40-minute limit, and that was unanimously agreed to because no one rose on a point of order.

Mr. Winch: I appreciate your indulgence.

Mr. Speaker: When the Speaker is on his feet hon. members should not rise even to address the Chair. The hon. member asked for permission to carry on. I asked hon. members if they would give their consent and the answer was no. I should like to point out that when that answer is given the hon. member is not entitled to rise and try to finish a sentence anyway. Let us have agreement on this.

Now the hon. member for Red Deer may proceed.

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, for the past two days the unemployment problem in Canada has occupied the attention of members of the house. That fact would indicate that at least a good many hon. members look upon the problem as one which has taken on very serious proportions. It occurs to me, therefore, that a duty rests upon the shoulders of each and every member of the house.

I have been somewhat amazed at certain attitudes that have been expressed with respect to this current problem. I have to ask the government a question. Just how serious must a problem of this character become before the government will characterize it as a serious problem? True, the Minister of Labour did indicate that in so far as we have one unemployed person the problem is serious as far as that individual is concerned. I agree. But looking at the matter from a national point of view I ask just how serious must the problem become before the government will consider it as one of serious proportions?

Obviously when there are from 300,000 to 500,000 unemployed in Canada it does place before parliament a problem which parliament should undertake to solve. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) tells the Canadian people day after day in literature issued by his department that they should watch for first symptoms and take action. Doctors tell you that, dentists tell you that, eye specialists tell you that. I would say that the Liberal party should do the same thing with respect to a problem of this character involving our economic ills.

I well recall, sir, that it was February of 1950 when we last debated this problem as we have been debating it for the past few days. At that time I quoted statements from the late prime minister, Right Hon. Mackenzie King, speaking in this house in the spring of 1935, at which time Canada had only 400,000 registered unemployed. The language used by the late prime minister in describing that situation was almost out of this world. I quoted it in February of 1950, but I shall not quote it again tonight. I agreed at that time with what had been said. I stated that those arguments applied with equal force in February, 1950; and I underline my conviction that they apply with even greater force today.

During this debate we have heard spokesmen for the government categorize at least part of this unemployment as being seasonal. I was rather interested in the observation of the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) when he said "seasonal, yes, but apparently more seasonal than usual." Some of the unemployment has been characterized as frictional. I would have to say in this case, yes, but undoubtedly more frictional than usual. The Acting Prime Minister referred to another apparent cause for this vast army of unemployed. He referred to a slowdown in the pace of business. In my opinion that is where we should be casting our eyes at this time.

It is true that certain seasonal unemployment is normal and to be expected. It is true also that a certain amount of what we call frictional unemployment is normal and to be expected, that is at certain times of the year. But when the minister referred to an apparent slowdown in the pace of business, then I began to do some thinking. Is that slowdown in the pace of business temporary? Is it seasonal? I should like to have answers to those questions. Is it taking on certain permanent aspects which may be extremely dangerous? I have read numerous reports of late which referred to statements of men who operate or manage secondary industries in Canada. Some of their assertions have not been too encouraging. To what extent have their inventories been built up as a consequence, in part, of the Canadian people being unable to buy, thanks to heavy taxation and thanks to the heavy cost of just normal living?

I should like to see a survey of business inventories across this country. It was only two or three days ago that I was told of a certain individual who was discharged from his employment after having been with a firm for 15 years. The firm manufactured stoves. He was not fired because of incompetency. He was not fired because of unwillingness to work. He was let out—perhaps that is a better term—because the firm had a supply of stoves which it was estimated would meet all the demands at the present rate for a period of five or six years. I wonder to what extent that sort of thing is happening across this country.

The situation today, Mr. Speaker, is to a degree parallel to the situation we had in 1950, although not in its entirety. In 1950 we faced a situation which had developed five years after the cessation of hostilities. By 1950 people's wartime savings were largely depleted. There was a very marked decline in United States purchases in Canada under the Marshall plan. There were extremely high taxes, the highest the people of this nation had ever encountered. Business had already met, in the main, the backlog of effective consumer demand for those commodities which the consumers had not been able to purchase during the war years. By February of 1950 inventories had been built up to the point where manufacturers were definitely beginning to worry.

The problem of unemployment in February, 1950, was not, in my estimation, as serious as it is today. One of the ministers, I believe it was the Acting Prime Minister, stated in this house yesterday that in March, 1950, we had 308,000 unemployed. I cannot just say offhand whether or not those were registered unemployed, but I believe that is what they would be. Three months later that figure had fallen to 129,000. I presume the Acting Prime Minister was trying to read a moral or a lesson into what happened then. Let me remind hon. members of this house that a very unusual situation developed during the late spring months of 1950. Developments in the Far East, in Korea to be specific, occurred and by June of that year war—I know some hate to call it war—broke out in Korea. Immediately the wheels of industry began to hum, particularly industry engaged—

Mr. Philpott: Will the hon. member permit a question? The figures he has just given show that the decline in registered unemployed was from 308,000 in March to 139,000 in June, one month before the Korean war broke out.

Mr. Shaw: I realize that. It was 129,000, not 139,000—

Mr. Philpott: No, it was 139,000.

Mr. Shaw: Well, it does not matter, but that was three months later. By June, 1950, it became completely obvious to all thinking persons as to what was going to happen the next day, two days later, a week later, or a month later.

Mr. Philpott: It was a surprise to President Truman.

Mr. Shaw: The fact is this. We did become involved in what I am pleased to call a war. Some others call it a police action. We did become involved in an armed conflict as a part of the United Nations. The wheels of industry began to hum. Men were invited to join the armed services, and their wages became an effective demand on consumer goods. The wages of those who were engaged in war industry became an effective demand on consumer goods. Once more our economy began to move on a more stable, yet I would argue very uncertain, basis.

We are faced with a situation today more serious economically than it was in February of 1950. I hope no one is thinking or has been compelled to think in terms of the only solution being the solution that faced us in June of 1950. Heaven forbid. But I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the house that it is quite conceivable nothing short of that sort of tragedy will restore equilibrium to the economy of this country.

Sometimes I am amazed at the way some persons toy with the expression "stable economy of today". In my estimation the facts prove only one thing, and that is that it is a most unstable one. Today the situation is not entirely parallel with that of 1950. However, the attitude of the government is similar; and I am fearful that unless there is a change in that attitude, difficulties of an extremely serious nature may confront the nation within a reasonably short period of time. I am not one who becomes unduly pessimistic, yet I cannot be one who is foolishly optimistic. Naturally we hope for the best, but we must face up to the issues realistically.

Very recently the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) referred to a feeling of optimism based upon what he called investment plans in Canada. Well, it is true that so far as can be ascertained investment plans for the coming year are on a par with those of 1953. But let us not forget that those are nothing more than plans. Any serious economic slip, a move in the direction of recession, could almost automatically cause a change in those plans. Let us not forget that. This may not be necessarily so in respect of government investment, but it is most certainly true so far as private investment is concerned.

It is true that we have our Unemployment Insurance Act. It is also true one of the ministers has said that last year $148 million was paid out in benefits to the employable unemployed. Later on in the season I understand it also applied to the unemployable unemployed. But no one would argue, I am confident, that payments made under the Unemployment Insurance Act offer any solution to the major problem, nor would they argue that those payments did more than offer an extremely low standard of existence to the recipients.

But even more important than that, let us not forget that there were thousands who became unemployed who, for one reason or another, could not qualify for a single, solitary cent of benefit under the Unemployment Insurance Act. It occurs to me that probably the time has come when the government should give consideration to extending the coverage under that act. It also occurs to me that probably the time has come to increase the benefits payable under the act and to ease conditions of eligibility. I readily recognize the fact that in a prolonged period of unemployment the fund that has been built up under the act would become exhausted. I understand, subject always to correction, that the amount in the fund stands at about $900 million. But I am sure the Minister of Labour would be one of the first to agree that no unemployment fund could stand up over a long period of time with a heavy demand being made upon it from month to month.

I am not criticizing the Unemployment Insurance Act. I have supported it. I say it has brought help to a great many people, but it does not constitute a solution to the unemployment problem. Reference was made by the minister to the $349 million paid out last year in family allowances. True, we have supported family allowances; but no one would suggest for a moment that the amount received by the average family would even buy the bread and butter for the household, if the head of the home became unemployed. It helps, but it is not a solution. Unemployment insurance and family allowances are certainly not in themselves guarantees against recession or against serious unemployment. Many of the unemployed do not receive family allowances. Many of them have dependents. As I said a moment ago, with few exceptions the amounts paid out through family allowances are very small.

During the debate repeated references have been made to industry. I have always looked upon industry as having one specific function, namely the production of goods of the best quality it is able to produce. In my estimation industry bears no responsibility or—and perhaps I should put it this way—is not under a duty to employ people. The trend over the years both in secondary and primary industry is to utilize the most modern types of machinery, and this has had the result of causing unemployment. Industry does employ; but industry must be able to sell its product before it can employ, or if it is going to continue to employ.

Sometimes I develop a hostile frame of mind when someone undertakes to create the impression that it is the duty of industry to solve the unemployment problem. I am sure no one here would say, for example, that a farmer should be compelled to go back to the old threshing machine, or go back to the stooking of his grain, or get rid of his combine, even though the combine has displaced many men in agriculture. Industry will continue to produce, industry will continue to employ and industry will continue to sell only so long as an effective demand exists for its products.

It has been said on the one hand that a decline in trade has reduced the effective demand for our production. Let us assume that it has. Perhaps that has been as a result of the trade policies and practices of this government. Let us assume for a moment that we cannot devise a trade policy which is going to create a sufficiently effective demand to enable us to sell our real surpluses. When that situation develops employment is going to fall off, as it is doing; effective demand for production is going to decline, and a vicious cycle will have been started. I ask the government, if you cannot, through the establishment of the best trade policies which you can devise; if you cannot through the starting of national projects take up the employable unemployed and put them to work, then what are you going to do?

If the situation arises again that in the midst of the vast production of this country and our staggering productive potentiality we have several hundred thousand unemployed, then I say that trouble is going to develop. If we allow that strange paradox of poverty in the midst of plenty to prevail in this country, as it did during the 1930's, then I warn you we will be faced with a serious problem. If we are going to allow that situation to develop we may just as well throw our doors wide open and say to the communists, "Here it is; come and take it." That is just the type of invitation which in effect will be issued.

As far as I am concerned much of the responsibility rests squarely upon the shoulders of this government. After all, the problem should not be beyond their ability to solve, because it was only last summer that they assured the Canadian people that their safety—yes, their security; yes, their happiness—could be assured only with a Liberal government in office in Ottawa. I say to you, "You led them to believe that; the responsibility therefore is yours to deliver the goods." We realize that there is a problem. You knew there was a problem last year when you told the Canadian public what you did. As I say, we the Canadian people expect you to deliver the goods.

I should like to make brief reference to the amendment and the subamendment. The amendment calls for the convening of the standing committee on industrial relations for the purpose of examining into and reporting upon the actual unemployment situation throughout Canada, and for the purpose of making recommendations to this house as to short-term and long-term methods for dealing effectively with this problem.

I take no strong exception to that amendment, although I think it fails to deal with the problem before us and to deal with it right now. We know how long it will more than likely take a committee to act. If I were indicating a long-term plan I would say, "Yes, by all means let us call the industrial relations committee; let us place this problem before it; let them go ahead and study it, call witnesses, call members of the cabinet, call representatives of labour, and go into this problem."

At the same time it is not difficult to agree with the subamendment which states that there is a serious and mounting unemployment situation now facing this country which calls for immediate action by the federal government to prevent further economic distress. We are able to support that subamendment because we agree that it expresses the fact. When that is disposed of, if it is defeated then certainly we would support the setting up of a committee. In fact if it were possible I would not mind seeing the two carried at one and the same time. Let us have the committee, but let us also let the government assume its full responsibility and meet this problem now, even though their solution may not necessarily be a long-term solution. We might get that from the committee.

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, this debate has certainly served to show, if any proof were needed, the concern shared by members of the government and by all members of this house in the matter of maintaining the highest possible level of employment and a high level of industrial and economic activity in Canada. The spectre of unemployment is not a pleasant thought, not only to members of this house but to Canadians generally. The memory of that period which has come to be known as the hungry 1930's is too vivid to permit anyone to underestimate or talk down the seriousness of unemployment. There is a saying that time heals all wounds, but the memories of those years are still sufficiently green in the minds of the people of this country to make "unemployment" and "depression" terms of great seriousness.

It is therefore not unreasonable to realize that the appearance of unemployment in our economy over the last few months should create concern in this house, among labour unions and throughout the public generally. However, there is another cause for our surprise and consternation. For the past few years we have been accustomed to an unbroken rise in all indices of industrial activity in this country; and when one of those indices, the employment index, seems to falter a bit it is so unusual that we are inclined to give it more importance than would otherwise be the case.

The position today has been carefully considered in the speeches that have been made during this debate by members on both sides of the house. There is a recognition that the first essential in considering a problem of this kind is to get the facts. Without the facts it is impossible to make a reasoned and clear judgment of the problem. There has been some dispute both inside and outside the house as to the exact extent of unemployment in Canada at the present time.

I submit that a very capable and thorough summary of the facts was given in this debate by the Minister of Labour in his speech yesterday afternoon, and also by the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce in his contributions to the debate later in the day. These summaries constitute what I believe to be an accurate picture of the situation as it actually exists. They are the result of a study of the situation not made hurriedly but as a matter of routine by government agencies set up to make these studies continuously, and to report from time to time. The dominion bureau of statistics keeps a continuous check on conditions of employment in Canada.

I have not heard anyone during this debate suggest that in the past these figures have been proven to be materially wrong, and the figures that have been prepared on the same basis as that of past surveys, which experience has proven to have been right, indicate that there are some 280,000 unemployed persons in this country today. The facilities of the Department of Labour have been used to look into the situation, and the minister has reported on this situation as it is viewed by that department.

The figure of 280,000 unemployed is, however, Mr. Speaker, an important figure and is one that no hon. member of this house would wish for a moment to minimize or underestimate. Many hon. members, including the Minister of Labour, speaking in this debate have properly called attention to the fact that the figure of the number of unemployed is not merely a statistic, but that it may represent real hardship and difficulty. That is fully appreciated and is a matter which is recognized by all hon. members in this house.

However, the figure itself must be placed in perspective. As was pointed out yesterday, it is very close to the percentage of the working force recognized by the labour unions and by economists as the percentage of unemployed that can be accepted as normally "frictional" unemployment.

Mr. Speaker: May I ask the hon. member to interrupt his speech at the moment, because we are about to receive a message from the Senate.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, as a matter of curiosity may I ask why the business of the house has been suspended when there has been no knock as yet on the door of the House of Commons?

An hon. Member: There will be.

Mr. Speaker: I should perhaps explain to the hon. member that at times we delay the messenger, and at other times, the messenger delays us.

QUESTIONS

EDSON, ALTA., PUBLIC BUILDING

Mr. Yuill:

1. What steps are being taken to proceed with the construction of the public building at Edson, Alberta, for which an appropriation of $150,000 was voted in the 1953 session?

2. Have tenders been called for this work?

3. If so, has a contract been let?

4. If not, how soon is it anticipated that a contract will be let?

Mr. Bourget: 1 to 4. It is anticipated that tenders will be called and a contract awarded for the construction of the public building at Edson, Alberta, early in the next fiscal year.

GRAIN ELEVATORS, ALBERTA

Mr. Hansell:

1. How many grain elevators are in each of the following Alberta towns: Vulcan, Champion, Milo, Three Hills, Innisfail?

2. What is the total elevator space in each town?

3. How many box cars were delivered to each of these towns in August, September and October, 1953, inclusive?

Mr. Dickey:

1. Numbers of grain elevators in each of the Alberta towns shown below are as follows: Vulcan, eleven (ten of which are licensed and one is not operating); Champion, six; Milo, six; Three Hills, eight; Innisfail, eight.

2. Storage capacity in bushels is as follows: Vulcan, 1,518,000 (47,000 bushels of which is in building which is not operating); Champion, 903,500; Milo, 440,000; Three Hills, 836,000; Innisfail, 741,500.

NO. 1 NORTHERN WHEAT PRICES

Mr. Thatcher:

1. According to the government's information, at which price was No. 1 northern wheat sold on the Liverpool grain exchange last February 1?

2. On the same date, what price was the Canadian wheat board offering to sell No. 1 northern wheat f.o.b. Fort William.

3. What is the total per bushel cost of shipping wheat from Fort William to Liverpool?

Mr. Dickey:

1. According to the best information of the Canadian wheat board, no No. 1 Manitoba northern wheat was traded on the Liverpool futures market on February 1, 1954.

[Mr. Dickey.]

2. On February 1, 1954, the Canadian wheat board was offering No. 1 Manitoba northern wheat at $1.88 per bushel basis in store Fort William/Port Arthur.

3. The cost of shipping wheat to Liverpool from in store Fort William/Port Arthur via lake and rail through eastern Canadian seaboard ports (basis currently quoted ocean freight rates) exclusive of exporter's margin, insurance costs and financing charges, is 41·547 cents per bushel.

WHEAT DRIED, 1952-53

Mr. Argue:

1. How many bushels of wheat in each grade from No. 1 northern to feed, both tough and damp, were artificially dried in the crop year 1952-53?

2. What was the total gross weight of the above grain before drying?

3. What were the total net bushels as shown by adjusted warehouse receipts after drying?

Mr. Dickey:

1. The following number of bushels of wheat grading from tough No. 1 Manitoba northern to feed, and from damp No. 1 Manitoba northern to feed, were dried artificially during 1952-53 crop year:

Grade	Bushels
Tf. No. 1 Nor.	nil
Tf. No. 2 Nor.	nil
Tf. No. 3 Nor.	1,415,643
Tf. No. 4 Nor.	647,457
Tf. No. 5	274,442
Tf. No. 6	nil
Tf. Feed	nil
Tf. No. 3 Nor. heating	34,990
Tf. No. 4 Nor. heating	2,614
Tf. No. 5 heating	4,202
Tf. No. 6 heating	2,387
Damp No. 1 Nor.	nil
Damp No. 2 Nor.	7,345
Damp No. 3 Nor.	14,993
Damp No. 4 Nor.	32,243
Damp No. 5	57,117
Damp No. 6	30,375
Damp Feed	8,687
Damp No. 3 Nor. heating	1,474

2. 152,038,140 pounds.

3. 2,478,909 bushels.

NOVA SCOTIA COAL—SUBVENTIONS

Mr. Balcom:

1. For the year ending March 31, 1953, at which ports on the St. Lawrence river was Nova Scotia coal landed, on which subvention assistance was paid?

2. What tonnage was landed at each port and how much subvention assistance was paid in each case?

3. How much Nova Scotia coal was moved by rail to the provinces of Quebec and Ontario under subvention assistance and how much was paid on rail-borne coal?

4. Was further subvention assistance paid on water-borne coal for transshipment to other points? If so, what were the total payments in respect of this assistance?

Mr. Prudham:

1. Montreal, Quebec, Three Rivers, Port Alfred, Chicoutimi, Chandler.

2.

	Tons	Subvention paid
Montreal	735,201	$1,859,001
Quebec, Three Rivers	367,406	887,972
Port Alfred, Chicoutimi, Chandler	255,228	637,658
	1,357,835	$3,384,631

Note: Due to delay in receiving monthly accounts, the subvention assistance paid does not quite relate to the tonnage landed at each port.

3.

	Tons	Subvention paid
Quebec	281,352	$601,412
Ontario	2,128	4,915
	283,480	$606,327

4. Yes, and total subvention payments on the transshipped water-borne coal amounted to $361,124.

Questions

IMPORTS OF TOMATO PRODUCTS

Mr. Lennard:

1. How many pounds of tomato products were imported into Canada during the year 1953 from (a) the United States of America; (b) Italy?

2. What was the value of such imports from each of the countries mentioned?

Mr. Dickey: 1 and 2. There is no breakdown of tomato products in external trade statistics. The Canadian imports by countries of canned tomatoes during the period January 1 to November 30, 1953, were as follows:

Country	Lbs.	Value
Italy	3,842,840	$ 538,537
United States	3,735,525	462,446
Totals	7,578,365	$1,000,983

Note: The item of canned tomatoes includes: Tomato paste and puree, tomato pulp and tomatoes other canned, but does not include tomato juice for which there are no separate figures.

FEDERAL GRANTS, ALBERTA

Mr. Hanna:

How much has the province of Alberta received in the last five years in federal grants under the following headings: (a) hospital construction; (b) tuberculosis control; (c) cancer control; (d) mental health; (e) crippled children; (f) other health services?

Mr. Robertson:

GOVERNMENT PRINTING—UNION LABEL

Mr. Knowles:

1. Has consideration been given, at any time since June 18, 1952, to the placing of all government printing in shops entitled to the use of the union label?

2. If so, what is the result of such consideration?

3. Has consideration been given, at any time since June 18, 1952, to the use of the union label on government printing when such printing is done in union shops?

4. If so, what is the result of such consideration?

Mr. Pickersgill:

1. Yes.

2. It is the view that no properly equipped printing shop having the demonstrated skill required for the work in hand should be excluded from tendering on government work.

3 and 4. Yes. As indicated in answer given in the House of Commons on June 18, 1952.

Questions

WAR SAVINGS CERTIFICATES

Mr. Cavers:

1. What is the amount of war savings certificates which remains unclaimed at the present time?
2. Has the office of the inspector of war savings certificates a list of the holders thereof?
3. What attempts are being made to call in the certificates which are passed due and have not been cashed?

Mr. Benidickson:

1. The amount of unpaid matured war savings certificates outstanding on February 14, 1954, was $16,360,080.

2. The registrar of war savings certificates has a record of the registered owners of all war savings certificates.

3. As the last maturity date of war savings certificates is April 15, 1954, no action has been taken as yet to advise the holders of unredeemed certificates that they should present their certificates for redemption. As a large proportion of the certificates was sold on the payroll deduction plan the registrar has no record of the addresses of the registered holders of certificates purchased in this manner. Consideration will be given shortly after April 15, 1954, to some method of informing holders that all certificates have matured and should be presented for redemption.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE

Mr. Balcom:

1. What is the number of veterans in each province who are in receipt of war veterans allowance?
2. What is the number of widows in each province who are in receipt of war veterans allowance?
3. What is the annual liability of veterans allowance, by provinces?
4. What is the annual liability of widows' allowance, by provinces?

Mr. Bennett:

Return at December 31, 1953:

Statistics are maintained by districts of the Department of Veterans Affairs. The following table shows the location of the 18 district offices in Canada.

1, 2, 3 and 4.

FARM LOANS—MARKET GARDENERS

Mr. Knowles:

1. Are market gardeners eligible to obtain loans from the Canadian farm loan board?

2. If so, under what conditions, and to what extent?

3. If not, for what reason?

4. Has consideration been given to amending the legislation to make such loans possible?

5. If so, what is the result of such consideration?

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Benidickson:

1. Yes.

2. Under the conditions and to the extent set out in the Canadian Farm Loan Act.

3, 4 and 5. Answered by No. 1.

BUTTER HELD BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough):

What was the total poundage of 1952 butter held by the government on January 30, 1954?

Mr. McCubbin: 9,140,792 pounds.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD VACANCY

Mr. Argue:

1. Have any farm organizations or officials been asked to recommend a person or persons to fill the vacancy existing on the Canadian wheat board?
2. If so, what was the nature of such recommendations?
3. When will the vacancy be filled?

Mr. Dickey:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Government policy will be announced at an appropriate time.

TAX RENTAL AGREEMENT, PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. Kickham:

How much money was paid by the federal government to the province of Prince Edward Island in connection with the federal provincial tax rental agreement, each year since the coming into force of the agreement?

Mr. Benidickson:

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

ADVERTISING

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West):

1. What amount of money, if any, was paid for advertising by (a) the Bank of Canada; (b) Trans-Canada Air Lines; (c) the Canadian National Railways, during each of the years 1950, 1951, 1952 and 1953?
2. What advertising firms handled same?
3. What amount was paid to each firm for each of the above-mentioned years?

Mr. Pickersgill: Return tabled.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

FLIN FLON-NIPAWIN HIGHWAY

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all letters and telegrams which have passed between the provincial governments of Manitoba and Saskatchewan and the dominion government, since the 1st day of January, 1954, regarding federal contribution or assistance in the building and completion of the highway between Flin Flon, Manitoba and Nipawin, Saskatchewan.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Speaker, there has been no correspondence nor have there been any telegrams since that date.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the motion be dropped?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

EMERGENCY ASSISTANCE TO FARMERS, MANITOBA

Mr. Zaplitny:

For a copy of all letters, memoranda, telegrams and other communications exchanged between the government of Manitoba and the government of Canada, concerning: (a) the Prairie Farm Assistance Act; (b) emergency assistance to farmers who suffered flood losses, from June 1, 1953 to date.

Mr. Gardiner: Subject to our receiving the consent of the government of Manitoba, the motion is agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed to, subject to the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture.

TRADE

REFERENCE TO NEGOTIATIONS SUGGESTED BY RUSSIAN AMBASSADOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, in the light of the statement made in this city yesterday by the Russian ambassador, may I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) what comment the government is prepared to make as to its own position in relation to his suggestion that negotiations take place between Canada and Russia for closer trade relations?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Trade between Canada and any country behind the iron curtain is carried on subject to permit. In other words, a permit must be issued by my department for any transaction concerning exports to those countries. There has never been any prohibition against trade in certain commodities, while there is a definite prohibition against trade in commodities that are on the restricted list. I refer to strategic materials. Subject to that reservation, if any Canadian merchant can arrange trade with Soviet Russia, his application will be considered by the department.

Mr. Fleming: Then from what the minister has said am I to take it that the government as such has no particular interest in the suggestion made by the Russian ambassador but will leave the matter to Canadian merchants?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the minister a supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the hon. member for Eglinton wish to ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Fleming: Yes, Mr. Speaker; because my question was not answered.

An hon. Member: There was no question.

Mr. Fleming: I was asking the minister as to the government's position in this matter in relation to the Russian ambassador's suggestion of expanding trade between the two countries. Is it the decision of the government, in the light of what the minister said, to leave this matter to the merchants?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister wishes to answer, all right.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The government is interested in the expansion of any trade provided it does not conflict with government policy, but the government does not enter into trade directly. As I say, if there are facilities for carrying on the trade and if private Canadians wish to develop trade with Russia, the government will be glad to consider the nature of the transaction and either to issue a permit or not do so, as the circumstances warrant.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask, as a supplementary question, whether the facilities of the export credits insurance corporation will be made available for the purpose of expanding trade with Russia?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That depends on the view of the insurance company in the particular transaction. It usually requires security from the government of the country receiving the goods. Whether it would approve a request for insurance is a matter for decision based on a particular application.

Mr. Fulton: The government would not issue any over-all directive to them in that connection?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, the government does not tell the insurance company what to do. The insurance company has its own board of directors. It is supposed to operate as a self-contained unit. While the insurance company tells the government what it will or will not do, the government does not attempt to tell the insurance company what it should do.

PRIVILEGE

MR. POULIOT—REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE ON FEBRUARY 16

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jean-François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I have to rise on a double question of privilege, and I will do so in the mildest possible manner. In the first place, the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Thatcher), at the opening of his remarks yesterday said this, as reported at page 2135 of Hansard:

> First I must comment on the speech which we recently heard from the member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). I am sure that the house was surprised, and certainly we in this group were shocked to hear the anti-labour tinge of his remarks.

Et cetera. I will tell my honourable and capitalist friend that there was no anti-labour tinge in my remarks because I have been pro-labour.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pouliot: It is most unfair to make an insinuation of that kind just as it is unfair to growl when I protest against it. In the second place, what I am extremely sorry for is that the words of the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre were taken seriously by another gentleman who in his remarks, as reported at page 2156 of Hansard, said this:

> It is no good damning the trade unions offhand in a press report if they have a delegation down here. The government has a responsibility.

This so far did not apply to the member for Temiscouata; and after the legitimate protest of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) in his behalf, as well as in behalf of the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe), the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) spoke as follows:

I did not mention the Acting Prime Minister. I referred to the statement made by the hon. member for Temiscouata.

There is no correlation between the first sentence and the second. On the other hand I will tell the hon. member that I have never been damning the trade unions, and when I have a legitimate ground for complaint against the union leaders, I take the opportunity to make it. The hon. member, who is just as brilliant as a meteor, should realize that it is very dangerous sometimes because one may vanish like a flying saucer.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Winch: The hon. member ought to read his whole speech in Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Hon. members sometimes rise on questions of privilege which in Beauchesne's third edition are termed "so-called questions of privilege". I do not want to address my remarks to the hon. member for Temiscouata particularly because I think that the rule in this respect is violated by members on both sides of the house.

Whenever a member feels that his remarks have been misinterpreted to the extent that it is necessary to give long explanations in order to re-establish the facts, and particularly when the debate that is going on is to be on the same subject as that on which he has already spoken and when there are amendments moved to the main motion and he may therefore find perhaps another opportunity of making another speech, I would suggest that he might perhaps wait for that opportunity and speak at length on the matter. When an hon. member is explaining a point which has been misinterpreted in one speech, it is always difficult for the Speaker to assess where the question of privilege starts and where it ends. Especially if it is a so-called question of privilege, an hon. member is not supposed to add anything to what he considers to be necessary to make his correction.

I would therefore ask hon. members not to abuse the rules by rising on what I consider to be so-called questions of privilege.

Mr. Pouliot: If you will permit me to say so, Mr. Speaker, it was not my fault if the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver East was winding and tortuous.

Inquiries of the Ministry

DRUGS

VITAMIN PREPARATIONS—INQUIRY AS TO STRENGTH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. What assurance is there that vitamin preparations on the market are up to labelled strength?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The hon. gentleman was kind enough to give me notice of this question. I am not now in a position to give a reply. I wonder if I might give one tomorrow.

FLOODS

SUGGESTED CONSTRUCTION OF DAMS ON THAMES RIVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works, or in his absence to his parliamentary assistant. I regret that I was not able to give the minister notice of this question as I received the information just before coming into the house. The question is as follows. In view of the severe flooding conditions in the city of Woodstock on the Thames river, has the Minister of Public Works taken into consideration the question of whether or not the building of projected dams on the upper Thames river and Cedar creek should be proceeded with as soon as possible?

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Public Works): I am not aware of the situation. I am taking notice of my hon. friend's question.

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY AS TO ANNUAL REPORT OF BOARD OF GRAIN COMMISSIONERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the minister received the annual report of the board of grain commissioners, and when will it be tabled in the house?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The answer to the first part of the question is yes. The answer to the second part is when it is printed.

Mr. Argue: When will that be?

Mr. Abbott: Ask the queen's printer.

Inquiries of the Ministry

PUBLIC SERVICE

FORT WILLIAM AND PORT ARTHUR—INTRODUCTION OF FIVE-DAY 40-HOUR WEEK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): On a question of real privilege, I wish to thank the Minister of Finance for including Fort William and Port Arthur in the preferred list of places where the 40-hour week will be in operation. I should like to ask the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member now asking a question?

Mr. McIvor: I should like to ask the minister a question. Has he noticed that the parliament of Great Britain expects to increase the salaries of its members by £500 a year?

Mr. Rowe: What privilege is that of yours?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I noticed that, Mr. Speaker.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

CLASSIFICATION OF CANNED MIXED FRUIT AS PEACHES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance? Perhaps it should be addressed to the Minister of National Revenue, but in his absence I shall put it to the Minister of Finance. It is based on a press report by Victor Mackie in the Winnipeg Free Press.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Knowles: Have departmental officials decided that mixed fruit is peaches for purposes of the customs tariff and thereby raised the tariff on the importation of tins of mixed fruit? If so, by what authority was this done?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): If I may say so, I think this is a question which most certainly should be put on the order paper. It requires examining the tariff schedule, it is not urgent, and I suggest that it be put on the order paper.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: I suggest that when it is brought to the attention of members that the Department of National Revenue has altered the effect of the tariff schedule by a departmental ruling, we have a right to get an explanation.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: He is making a speech.

Mr. Abbott: Order paper.

Mr. Knowles: We have the right to get an explanation of that on the floor of the house.

Mr. Speaker: I did not hear the hon. member's remarks. How can I decide if I cannot hear what is said?

Mr. Knowles: The point I was trying to make was—

Mr. Speaker: I heard the first part.

Mr. Knowles: —that when changes are made by departmental rulings affecting decisions that have been made by parliament we have a right to have an explanation from the responsible minister on the floor of the house.

Mr. Chevrier: You should not abuse the privileges of the house.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may ask a question, but if it is of such a technical character or involves such a lengthy reply that the minister cannot give an answer on the spur of the moment, the minister has the right not to give an answer immediately. Who is to decide? The hon. member says that it is an urgent question and should be answered immediately because a department has issued directives, but I do not think that should be taken as a barometer for deciding as to urgency. Urgency may exist in the mind of the hon. member but may not exist in the mind of the minister who has to answer the question.

Mr. Chevrier: All his questions are urgent.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has advanced various reasons on the point of urgency, but I do not think the public interest will suffer if the hon. member puts his question on the order paper.

Mr. Abbott: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: I shall do that, Mr. Speaker, but I shall put an asterisk beside the question.

SUPPLY

UNEMPLOYMENT—MOTION FOR EXAMINATION BY COMMITTEE ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

The house resumed, from Tuesday, February 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Green, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Gillis.

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, when this debate was interrupted last evening I had been trying to show the dangers of underestimating or minimizing the extent of unemployment which is facing this country at the present time. I said that even though it appeared on the figures prepared by the departments concerned that the extent of unemployment was very close to the proportion of the working force that has been put forward in the submission of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada and the Canadian Congress of Labour as a percentage which might be regarded as normal frictional unemployment.

In pointing out the danger of minimizing this problem, I think it is also fair to point out the equal danger of exaggerating the extent of the problem. Exaggeration of this situation can, I believe, contribute materially to a worsening of it. The question of confidence in the state of our economy is one which not only affects business but affects consumers and many other aspects of our economic life. Not only are investors cautious in making their decisions about investment in the future of this country, as was pointed out by several speakers in the debate last evening, but also the working people, the consumers of the country, are inclined to look to the future in making their plans about purchasing the things that they may need.

If the people of Canada have confidence in the future of the economy, if they believe that they have a reasonable chance of continuing to earn decent wages and continuing to have money to pay their bills, they are going to plan to buy the things that they need, the things that other people in this country are paid to produce. So talk of depression and economic difficulties which is not justified not only undermines business confidence but undermines the confidence of consumers and has a contracting effect upon the economy as a whole.

I believe that one of the great elements in the progress that Canada has made since the war has been the confidence that not only our own investors and investors outside of the country have had in our progress and our future but also the underlying confidence that ordinary Canadians have had in their ability within this economy to make a living and to better their lot. I think that anything that is said in the house that would undermine that confidence unnecessarily does a disservice to the advancement and progress of the nation.

This debate has arisen on an amendment to the motion to go into supply moved by the official opposition and amended by the C.C.F. group. By their amendment the official opposition call for examination of the present situation by a parliamentary committee. This suggestion certainly has not been welcomed by their neighbours on their left, the C.C.F. group. While I would not agree with some of the statements that have been made by members of the C.C.F. group regarding the appropriateness of a parliamentary committee to deal with this sort of subject, I do think that in the present circumstances it is obviously not a practical or immediate solution to any problem that may exist. After all, Mr. Speaker, the job a parliamentary committee would do would be a fact-finding job. On the basis of the facts established, the committee would make certain recommendations.

If the unemployment situation which gives rise to this suggestion of study by a parliamentary committee is as serious as hon. members opposite have suggested, if there are 530,000 Canadians unemployed, ready for work and willing to work but unable to find work, then I think if they are satisfied those are the facts, we do not need a parliamentary committee but the situation calls for specific suggestions from them as to what the government should do immediately about it. If the facts are, as submitted from this side of the house, that the problem is one of 280,000 unemployed from our labour force, then I think all a committee would succeed in doing would be to prove the opposition was wrong. I do not think on those figures a parliamentary committee would be justified or would be likely to bring in a recommendation that the government should panic at this situation and introduce extreme measures to remedy the position. In other words, I submit that the suggestion that has been made by the official opposition is either too little or it is not needed at all.

Mr. Fleming: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Dickey: Yes.

Mr. Fleming: What harm could there be in having this problem studied by a committee of this house?

Mr. Dickey: That is exactly the point, no harm at all. I am submitting that the situation is either one which calls for particular action or it is one that does not require study by a parliamentary committee. These committees have other things to do which would be more valuable and would bring a better result.

Mr. Fleming: If the hon. member will permit, what other things has this committee to do at present? It has never been called to meet at this session.

Mr. Dickey: It has not been called, I think, for the very reasons which I have been stating. I admit that the hon. member does not agree because he is one of those who are supporting the suggestion, and that is simply the disagreement between him and those who do not agree with him.

So far as finding the facts is concerned, Mr. Speaker, as I submitted last night, I believe that the facts put before the house by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) and by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) are very close to an accurate summary of the situation. In addition to that, I would be rather inclined to depend upon the members of this house, who after all represent constituencies right across this country, to give the facts during this debate as they have received them from their own constituencies. A number of members from various parts of the country have spoken, but with the exception of the members who, quite properly, have brought before the house the particular difficulties being faced now by two or three specific industries, I have yet to hear a member rise and say that in his own constituency there is a general, over-all situation of unemployment that is giving him special and particular concern.

I feel that if we were faced with a general problem of unemployment there would be at least some members who would have already risen in their places and stated that as a fact.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): Where did the 500,000 come from?

Mr. Dickey: The fact is that the hon. members who are interrupting at the moment have had the opportunity of bringing this situation before the government. Those members who have spoken with respect to the farm implement industry, the textile industry and the coal mining industry have brought specific problems before the house. There has not yet been any suggestion that those specific problems are not receiving attention and consideration by parliament. So far as the textile industry is concerned, the first business to which this house addressed itself at the opening of this session was legislation which had been requested to meet that particular situation.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, there has been no substantiation from their own experience in their own constituencies by hon. members opposite of the kind of figures they have been putting forward. I believe that if these situations exist they would have been brought before the house. I would hope that no members are keeping information of this kind back in order to give it to a parliamentary committee.

[Mr. Fleming.]

The subamendment proposed by the C.C.F. group does take a more practical approach to the problem. It calls for action on the part of the government to meet this situation. The amendment and the speeches that have been made by members of that group are not very specific about the particular kinds of action they wish to have taken. I was particularly impressed with the speech of the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Thatcher) yesterday afternoon. The hon. member opened his remarks by a reference to the speech that had been made by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), and that reference has been dealt with by the hon. member for Temiscouata earlier today. The hon. member asked the government whether or not the member for Temiscouata was expressing government policy in what he had said. Well, I should like to ask the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre if he was expressing the policy of the C.C.F. group in the remarks he made on this subamendment.

The hon. member started out by suggesting that there was a responsibility on the government to provide full employment. He put forward his own view as to how that should be done. I recall a speech made some years ago, as a matter of fact it was made at the university of Dalhousie in 1948 by the Right Hon. C. D. Howe, who was then minister of reconstruction and development. I believe in that speech he expressed, as succinctly and as completely as I have ever heard it expressed, the responsibility of government with respect to economic problems and the principles which have guided this government and the Liberal party in facing the economic problems of this country. I should like to put on the record what the minister said at that time. He said:

> Canada is a free enterprise economy, and the initiative for industrial expansion rests with private individuals and firms. The government will endeavour, through its policies, to create a climate within which private initiative thrives and industrial expansion is encouraged. The government will take the initiative and do what it can to co-ordinate the efforts of governmental, business and other interested groups in achieving full and effective utilization of industrial expansion in the interests of all citizens in the country. If industrial expansion and economic development is hampered by the lack of initiative the government, where the national interest demands, will take appropriate action.

I submit that that is a statement of principle and policy that is very much more in keeping with the wishes of the majority of the people of this country than some of the things that were said in this debate by the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre and other members of his group.

Then the hon. member left the question of full employment and turned his attention to a subject that we all realize is dear to his heart. That is the subject of high taxation. He made the point that high expenditures mean high taxation; and he made what I thought was a rather extraordinary statement, that all these taxes—I think he said it was 21 cents out of every dollar earned by Canadians—were being siphoned off, and left the impression that by some mysterious means those funds disappeared, and left the economy altogether. Because he said that all this money goes out of consumption, that it is taken out of the hands of the people who would use it; and he left the impression that this was a net loss to the economy.

Well, of course, the fact that a person who earns an income has to pay some to the government means that he does not himself spend that money on consumer goods, on investments or some other purpose he might have in mind. But the point the hon. member apparently wishes either to ignore or to forget is that the money that goes to any government—federal, provincial or municipal—in taxes, and which is withdrawn from the taxpayer for governmental purposes, does not disappear. It does not go out of the economy. It has got to be used by the government that gets the money to meet its expenditures. And those expenditures are the buying of supplies, the paying of wages, and the paying of the bills for all the things governments require. And certainly in the case of the federal government many hundreds of millions of dollars of that tax money go directly back to the consumers in the form of pensions, family allowances, unemployment insurance and all that sort of thing. It goes into the ordinary stream of the economy, just as if it had never left the hands of private individuals.

My point is simply this, that when the hon. member complains about high taxation, and the fact that people who have high incomes have to pay high taxes, he is offering a perfectly valid argument, because nobody would defend high taxes as such. Certainly the government and its supporters would be the last people to want to maintain high taxes or to maintain taxation at any level higher than required.

Mr. Fleming: But that is what they have done.

Mr. Dickey: But to try to argue that the money collected in taxes somehow or another mysteriously disappears, and does not have the effect of continuing demand in the country, and that it is completely lost, is, I suggest, absolutely incorrect. It is not a matter that has any relevancy in this debate or to the underlying causes of the unemployment situation with which we are faced.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the hon. member permit a question? Is he, in effect, advocating high taxes as a cure for unemployment?

Mr. Dickey: No; I was just coming to that. I was dealing with a particular argument, one which I presume the hon. member who has just asked the question heard, and with which he either agrees or disagrees. But the point the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre was trying to make was that high expenditures requiring high taxation were bad for us at this time, and that they were contributing to unemployment.

The question of high expenditures was dealt with by the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) the other evening.

Mr. Rowe: Before the hon. member leaves that part of his speech would he permit me a question?

Mr. Dickey: Yes, certainly.

Mr. Rowe: Does the hon. member imply that the government can spend money they take from the people as efficiently as private individuals can spend it?

Mr. Dickey: Well, Mr. Speaker, it depends upon the individual.

Mr. Rowe: And it depends upon the government, too.

Mr. Dickey: And the government, yes. And I think the hon. member will admit that the government's record in expenditures has been—

Mr. Fleming: Profligate.

Mr. Dickey: —exceptionally good. The hon. member does not support expenditures on family allowances for example, as we do; but we believe in them.

Then the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) asked me if I thought high taxation was the answer to unemployment. I certainly would not for one moment try to suggest that it is. But I do think that government expenditures are and can be a partial palliative to unemployment; and if the hon. member does not agree that government expenditures are useful in that regard, then I presume he would suggest that the way to meet unemployment would be to reduce government expenditures. Well, that of course was the solution that was tried early in the thirties by the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, and I think we all know the extraordinary success that it met with at that time!

Proposed Committee on Unemployment

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rowe: I don't interrupt very often.

Mr. Dickey: Is it a question?

Mr. Rowe: A question of privilege; and I do not interrupt very much. But when you do not answer my question I do not propose to let you put my question. I did not suggest that you cut down all these expenditures that you are talking about. I only asked if you thought the government could spend the money more efficiently than private individuals.

Mr. Dickey: And I answered it. I answered the hon. member's question. And then I turned to the question that had been asked by the hon. member for Greenwood—but apparently the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) was not listening at that time.

Mr. Rowe: I was listening. I would not have missed much if I had not, though.

Mr. Dickey: The question is as to what action should and can be taken by a government to meet a situation of this kind. The action being taken by the government has been indicated clearly by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) and the Acting Prime Minister. They pointed out the steps under way. For example, in the recommendations made by the Trades and Labour Congress and the Canadian Congress of Labour they say that a greater encouragement to home building would provide a considerable number of new jobs. That is an excellent suggestion. The fact is, as hon. members know, that early in this session the government brought in legislation designed to encourage house building. We had a long debate in this house on it. We heard a great deal of criticism of it; but when it came to a vote very few hon. members did not support it.

Mr. Knowles: Order.

Mr. Dickey: The two congresses of labour should be congratulated on the constructive suggestions that they made in their recommendations as to what should be done. They dealt first of all with the Unemployment Insurance Act. That was approved and extended in 1950 when we were faced with a situation similar to the one we are faced with now. Since that time it has been further extended. If the facts of the situation indicate to the government that further amendments are required, I am sure there will be no hesitation in taking such action.

Then they asked for a nation-wide program of public assistance. In his remarks in this debate the other night the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) pointed out that in considering the estimates for this year the government thought that this was a time when a little more money should be spent on civilian projects, and the evidence of that is in the estimates which are before hon. members, and which they can read.

Then they asked that the public works program be speeded up, which is in the same field. They asked for an encouragement of house building. I have already indicated how that is being attended to.

Then they make a far-reaching and statesmanlike suggestion when they say that consideration should be given to increasing aid to underdeveloped countries. Some hon. members may not agree that that is a direct way in which to try to meet economic difficulties and solve any unemployment problems we may have in this country. But the fact is that that kind of assistance which creates better economic conditions in other parts of the world creates new consumers who will not only be purchasers of goods and farm products produced in Canada but who will also in return send to us the kind of things that they can best produce. These expenditures are definitely the kind of expanding expenditures that are being undertaken at this time and will bring about good results.

In accordance with the principles that this government has been following, the basic solution of this problem is the expansion of trade, both internal and external.

Mr. McIvor: May I ask the hon. member a question? Does the hon. member know of the cure for unemployment in depression times that was found and practised by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in his own office when he told his own workers to come in although there was no work for them and none in sight. He told them that their salaries would be paid as usual. Does the hon. member not think that that is a good cure?

Mr. Rowe: It is a good question, anyway.

Mr. Dickey: I think it is an excellent cure. As I was saying, the fundamental cure for these problems is an expanding economy, bigger and better external trade, better internal trade and a high level of investment. The policies of this government have been designed to bring about all those three things. Perfect success cannot be expected, and nobody would consider it impossible for some reverses to be experienced; but that is the program and that is the way in which this government believes that these problems can and should be solved.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should simply like to refer to the analogy that was employed last evening by the hon. member for Vancouver East when he referred to the manner in which the present Minister of Trade and Commerce had solved particular difficulties that had arisen at one time in construction work. He paid what I thought was a very fine tribute to the abilities and the skill of the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe), as an engineer, and then he said he hoped that the Acting Prime Minister would apply those lessons that he has learned to the solution of the problems that we have facing us today. All I can say, Mr. Speaker, is that it is my impression that few people have learned the lessons of their experience and know better how to apply them than the Acting Prime Minister in this house. I can assure the hon. member that it does not require his suggestion to have the Minister of Trade and Commerce and his colleagues apply to the solution of this problem and the other serious problems that from time to time face the people of Canada and the government of Canada the experiences and the knowledge and the abilities that they have found from their long and useful life in this country in many fields, and not the least their contribution to the public life of this country as members of the government.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped this afternoon when the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) rose that it was for the purpose of explaining that he had been gravely in the wrong yesterday and that he was asking to have expunged from the record the statement which should never have been made by any hon. member at any time in this house. The hon. member for Temiscouata rose on a question of privilege, and objected to a statement that had been made in this house which represented nothing more than a debatable point of view but left untouched and still on the record the most shameless, unjustified and improper statement that has been made in this house since confederation. Let me read what the hon. member said, as reported at page 2132 of Hansard:

> I remember when Mr. Bennett was the leader of the government. Before he came to that position he himself created unemployment, and for a good reason. He and his chief organizer in 1929—the year that has been referred to by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker)—each subscribed $350,000 to the electoral funds and they invested that money in brokers' offices. The leader of the Conservative party—it was not progressive at that time—used to say: "Conditions are bad; we have unemployment, but I will cure that." Every time he spoke of unemployment and said that conditions were bad in this country, the stocks were getting lower and lower and he was making more money because he was speculating on the fall in price. Finally, when he had realized an amount which was as much as his investment, he succeeded. He used that money to win the election.

Mr. Rowe: Shame!

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, it is difficult within moderate terms to refer to a statement of that kind reflecting on an earlier prime minister of Canada. That is a gross, untrue and malicious suggestion, without an atom of foundation, against a former prime minister and an associate of his who was a member of the other house of the Canadian parliament.

It is one of the great, cherished and priceless possessions of this democracy of ours that we can disagree in political affairs and yet respect the position of prime minister, which is the highest office in the gift of the people of Canada. If there was an inappropriate time for those malicious, unfounded and untrue remarks to be made, it was at a time when we have so recently been reminded of the extent to which the members of this house are prepared to go in wholehearted sincerity in paying their tribute, without any difference of party, to the office of prime minister, which is an office occupied by a man chosen by the people of Canada in a free vote.

Here in this very chamber, within recent days, we have seen an expression of that uniform respect for the high office of prime minister by which we not only indicated our respect for the institution, but also sought to extend to other countries a clearer understanding of our concept of a decent democracy.

Certainly there were disagreements with the views held by the prime minister of that time, as there are differences and very great differences of opinion as to the views held by the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). But, Mr. Speaker, it has been customary to have some regard to the fact that allegations that would not have been made while a person is alive will not be made when that person is no longer here to answer them and deal with them. If the hon. member had displayed the courtesy and the courage to make statements of that kind when these men were alive and to leave the implication which he left, then I am not in any doubt about the way in which that would have been dealt with if the man against whom these allegations were made had been here in this house to deal with them. Nor am I in any doubt about the way they would have been dealt with by the member of the other house of this parliament if those statements had been made outside, where they were not under the protection of this House of Commons.

The implication contained in these words is an implication that the prime minister of Canada and a close associate of his were deliberately affecting the Canadian stock market for the purpose of making money. There was the implication that he used his high office without reference to the agony which was being suffered by so many people in this country, and that he was making personal profits for his own advantage out of that agony and through the use of his high office in reference to it.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I was not here, but a friend of mine told me the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) was making a great speech. I do not know to whom he is referring but he is looking at me with a great frown, and I wonder if he is addressing me through the Chair.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member, I am sure, is well aware that I am referring to the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), whose words I quoted a few moments ago.

Mr. Pouliot: Well, now, sir, I rise on a question of privilege. I have known Mr. Bennett much better than his successor has ever known him and—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, on this occasion I must insist that the hon. member's remarks be directed to a question of privilege and not an interjection of something that is only interfering with what I am saying on this occasion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): I have risen to hear a question of privilege. Will the hon. member please state his question of privilege as briefly as possible so it may be dealt with.

Mr. Pouliot: I have two facts to put to you, sir. In the first place, when I said I had known Mr. Bennett better than the present leader of the Progressive Conservative party ever did—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Pouliot: Just a minute. Please sit down.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, on this occasion I must insist on the hon. member's remarks being—

Mr. Pouliot: But Mr. Speaker,—

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): I would like the house to assist the Chair in deciding whether a question of privilege has been raised. I have not yet been able to hear the hon. member complete his first sentence. I shall do my best within my limited powers to hold him to his question of privilege, but I would like him to be given the opportunity to state it.

Mr. Pouliot: Thank you, sir. You are acting in accordance with the finest British traditions which you and I know, and which are ignored by some people of great importance. Now, Mr. Speaker, history is the science of the past and in order to refer to some historical facts, one must necessarily turn back to the past.

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order. I am sorry, but I am not of the opinion that a review of historical facts, or even the accuracy of arguments which may be advanced from either side of this house, constitute a question of privilege and I would ask the Leader of the Opposition to continue his remarks.

Mr. Pouliot: No, sir, excuse me. I rise on a question of privilege and I am explaining it to you. What I am referring to, sir,—

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): I have given the hon. member two opportunities to state his question of privilege.

Mr. Pouliot: I have not had a chance to say anything, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): In my opinion the hon. member's remarks do not refer to a question of privilege and I am asking the Leader of the Opposition to continue his remarks.

Mr. Pouliot: Well, it is most unfair.

Mr. Rowe: So were you.

Mr. Drew: I am unaware of any occasion when the hon. member for Temiscouata has made the allegations he made here yesterday while Mr. Bennett was in this house, and I am unable to find any occasion where he made the same allegations in regard to either of these two men whose names he mentioned in the speech from which I have quoted this afternoon.

Mr. Pouliot: I have said it in his lifetime here in this house.

Mr. Rowe: No, you did not. I have been here during that time and you never said it in your life. You were afraid.

Mr. Pouliot: You were never here.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order.

Mr. Drew: I would point out that Lord Bennett had not only sat in this house as prime minister of Canada, but had held other positions, and continued to serve in many capacities until the time of his death in 1947.

Senator McRae was a member of the other house of parliament until 1946 when he also died. This is an extremely late occasion to be making allegations of this kind. There is, however, something more that should be remembered when allegations of this kind are made. Only within the past few days we were told how important it was in these difficult days, when our democratic system is under challenge, that respect for our institutions be preserved by everything we do. The present Prime Minister, who was here then, used that argument in dealing with certain matters then before the house. He pointed out how careful we should be to do nothing that would reflect upon the members of the house, the dignity of the institution of parliament or the manner in which the affairs of either house of parliament might be conducted.

This is a statement that two men, sitting as members of parliament, one in each house and both in this parliament at the time, played upon the public feelings, created fear by speaking of unemployment and, in doing so, affected the stock market for their own personal advantage. There was a place where statements of that kind were made in the lifetime of those two gentlemen who are no longer with us. They were made by the communists in 1930. The communists made those statements reflecting on the integrity of the man who was leader of the opposition and then prime minister of Canada. They made those statements about Senator McRae. They are not expected to have any regard for the truth. Above all, they were not sitting as members of this house, with some direct sense of responsibility for what takes place in this house.

I have already expressed my regret that when the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot)—with whom I have had such cordial relations and whose genial personality sometimes excuses his irrelevancies—rose on a question of privilege at the beginning of the sitting this afternoon, he did not ask to have these offensive remarks expunged from the record but instead of that, on a question of privilege, sought to justify these untrue and improper remarks.

This statement was made yesterday in the House of Commons with regard to a man who was a former prime minister of Canada. Here in this house we have recently been emphasizing our own respect for our traditions and for the office of prime minister. I ask the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) here now to show some measure of consistency with regard to what was said so short a time ago and to dissociate himself and the government from these improper, offensive and disgraceful remarks that now stand on the record.

Mr. Fulton: And they are untrue.

Mr. Drew: They are untrue. They are an offence to parliament. They are an offence to the memory of two great men. Whatever difference of opinion there may be with regard to the political views of the man who was then prime minister of this country during extremely difficult years, let us make it perfectly clear that he did not create the depression. Even if anyone must stray so far from the facts as to make statements of this kind, let him at least keep the surrounding facts in some sort of proportion. The charge is not only improper. It is fantastically ridiculous. Just imagine, Mr. Speaker, the full implications of the unintentional tribute that has been paid by the member for Temiscouata to the man who was prime minister of Canada. According to the member for Temiscouata, so great was the impact of his words that, the moment he spoke, the stock exchange of New York responded to the effect of what he said, apparently long before he said it. No, Mr. Speaker, it was not in 1930 that the depression came. When the member for Temiscouata today rises and tries to leave the impression that there was even some colour of accuracy to the remarks he made, and when we are reminded that this suggestion is being made once again that Mr. Bennett brought on the depression, may I quote a man who has not usually been regarded as an extreme Tory. I refer to Mr. Bruce Hutchison. I am quoting from page 149 of "The Incredible Canadian". I might say it is under the heading "A Spell of Blindness". I quote from page 149:

> King maintained his former policies and floated with the golden tide. He was deceived by the general deception. It is perhaps the most incredible fact of his life that he accepted the mythology of the great boom. The student of history and economics, the rebel against capitalism, the Liberal heretic who had long foreseen where his law of competing standards would lead went temporarily blind. The Conservative prediction of disaster had proved so absurd, the "whispers of death" had been so drowned in the rattle of the tickers that, for the moment, King seemed to imagine that the good society of his dream already was coming to life . . .

Mr. Rowe: They are following the same blindness today.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, since these inaccurate statements are made may I remind you that the words I have quoted are the words of a man who wrote the life of Mr. King and who, whatever disagreement there may be with some of his statements, has certainly not been guilty of being too critical of the Liberal party. Those are his words, not mine.

The economic disaster that preceded world-wide unemployment came to this country while a Liberal government was in power. The stock market crash came in October of 1929. That was not the beginning of the economic storm. That storm began in this country three years previously, with the accumulation in western Canada of the surplus which had not been disposed of. This was a progressive problem which had been examined and discussed, and those who were so critical in those days of the warnings that were given were the men who right up to the break on the stock market in October of 1929 were talking of unending prosperity in this country. No, Mr. Speaker, I leave that statement of the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) there, but I leave it there in the hope that he will reconsider his position, that he will recall the number of occasions on which he has indicated his respect for the institution of parliament, and that he will on second thought decide to ask unanimous consent to expunge from the record words that can only be a reflection on his own place here in parliament and which certainly should be disavowed without any hesitation by the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) in view of the uniform respect we all demonstrated so short a time ago for the great office of prime minister of Canada, whoever may occupy it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, while the Acting Prime Minister is temporarily absent from the house, there are other ministers here. Whether or not they care to take the course open to them, they can at least convey these remarks to the Acting Prime Minister.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. gentleman if he is through with that part of his speech?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, it will be quite clear when I have concluded the remarks I propose to make.

Mr. Pouliot: I rise on a question of privilege. According to the British parliamentary tradition, no member of parliament is supposed to be abused by anyone else. I was not here when the hon. member started his speech and a friend of mine told me that he was lecturing me about what I said yesterday. Sir, I must not make a long speech—

Mr. Drew: You are not allowed to make a speech at all.

[Mr. Drew.]

Mr. Pouliot: —but I must defend my position. The hon. gentleman challenged me—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Rowe: He is making a speech.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has not chosen the right time to defend his position. The Leader of the Opposition now has the floor. If the hon. member wishes to ask him a question and he agrees he shows his agreement by resuming his seat. Then the hon. member may ask his question. The hon. member for Temiscouata proceeded to ask the Leader of the Opposition a question. The Leader of the Opposition did not give his consent, and then the hon. member for Temiscouata rose on a question of privilege. From what he has said so far I gather that what the hon. member wants to do is to defend his position, and this the hon. member must do later. If by defending his position the hon. member means that he wants to correct a misinterpretation by the Leader of the Opposition of certain statements that the hon. member made when speaking yesterday, I am afraid he will have to wait until the Leader of the Opposition has concluded his remarks or until the amendment to the amendment is disposed of. He can then take advantage of his right to speak on the amendment, or perhaps later on the main motion, whenever he wishes, but at the moment he cannot interrupt the speech of the Leader of the Opposition on a question of privilege so as to defend his position. He will have to do that at a later stage.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I would point out that the hon. member was in the house earlier and that if he was absent during any part of my remarks it is most certainly not my responsibility. He has been in the house during the major part of my remarks and is fully informed as to the import of what I have been saying.

Mr. Pouliot: That is why I want to answer you right away by telling the truth.

Mr. Brooks: That will be an experience for you.

Mr. Pouliot: I have always spoken the truth.

An hon. Member: Dirty Tories.

Mr. Pouliot: No, Progressive Conservatives.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Since the hon. member was not allowed to intervene in the debate at this time may I suggest that no reference should be made to the fact that he was not able to do so.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, it must be remembered that the remarks to which I have taken exception were directed to a situation in this country which is causing a great deal of concern in the minds of many of our people, no matter what the attitude of members of the government and its supporters may be. One of the very disturbing aspects of the kind of statement made by the hon. member for Temiscouata is the extent to which it demonstrated an hon. member may be prepared to go to divert attention from the real subject that is before us for consideration. Only this morning I heard a report over the radio from a station in the United States as to the great concern that is now felt there as a result of the fact that more than 3 million people are unemployed. They regard that as a serious situation. I must say there is no evidence that their government is brushing the matter aside and trying to dismiss it as something that does not exist.

On the contrary, the president of the United States appointed a commission to inquire into the situation and to make recommendations both for a short-term and long-term solution of these difficulties as well as to recommend any immediate steps that should be taken. It was not suggested there that this was a means of shelving the issue. The commission was welcomed as evidence of the fact that they were really tackling the problem, and already certain recommendations have been made. I would point out, however, that on a proportionate basis 3 million unemployed in the United States would mean less than 300,000 here. From the earlier figures of the Department of Labour we already know that our figures of unemployment are much higher than that, so that even on the last figures presented to us by the government unemployment in Canada is substantially higher proportionately than in the United States. If there is cause for concern in the United States, there is still greater cause for concern here.

Mr. Dickey: Would the hon. member permit a question? Is he aware that the figure given in the house as the number of unemployed in Canada at the present time is 280,000?

Mr. Drew: I am well aware that during the course of this debate members of the house for the first time heard a figure of 524,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: Not unemployed.

Mr. Drew: Members of the house were told that there were 524,000 applications with the government agencies.

Mr. Rowe: There are 528,000 now. They have gone up by 4,000.

Mr. Drew: If it is 528,000, that is accepting the upward correction, this government needs to correct itself every day. Apparently there has been an increase in the last few days. We are indebted to the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) for the information. The figure is now 528,000, according to the Secretary of State.

It is not sufficient, Mr. Speaker, to make a general statement such as the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) has made, to suggest that the figure really does not represent unemployed. The minister knows quite well that there are many unemployed whose names are not included in the 528,000. The minister is well aware that some of those people who until recently were working in the textile mills in his constituency probably will not be found on the list at the employment agency in Fredericton. The reason for that is obvious. Many people, when they become unemployed, start out on their own to seek employment in a way that people in this country can do. No; if we had no reason for asking for an inquiry that would give us the facts, it has been furnished to us by the production of these figures during the course of this debate.

These are not the only figures which cannot be lightly dismissed. They serve to confirm in substantial measure the figures given by representatives of the Trades and Labour Congress and the Canadian Congress of Labour in Ottawa last week. Our position is one which should be acceptable to the government. We say to the government, and to the supporters of the government, your figures are at variance with those presented by the representatives of the two largest groups of organized labour in Canada. We want to know what the facts are. While the debate on this motion is under way the Minister of Labour confirms the fact that we have a great deal of information to obtain, because he tells us that the figure is in excess of 500,000. This afternoon the Secretary of State told us the figure was 528,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I made no such statement whatever.

Mr. Drew: That voice, Mr. Speaker, had a strange similarity to the voice which so often interjects remarks delivered by a man who does not yet seem to realize that he is down on the floor of the house and not in the gallery.

Mr. Abbott: Toujours la politique.

Proposed Committee on Unemployment

Mr. Drew: We certainly heard the interjection from one of the front row seats or close to the front row seats, giving the figure of 528,000. If that is not correct, then all the more reason we should have this inquiry to find out what the figure is. At any rate, apart from the argument as to who made the statement, the fact remains that the Minister of Labour has told us there are over 500,000 applications.

Unfortunately we have found we cannot rely entirely on all the statements that are made. For that reason the examination by a committee would be highly desirable. We find, for instance, that in this debate on February 15 the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) said, at page 2105 of Hansard for that day:

> The next important factor is the prospect for exports. There again I believe we can look for another good year. The final figures for 1953 show a decrease of 3 per cent in value of exports but, as a matter of fact, in volume the last year was a record year for exports, being even greater than 1952.

Just a few days ago we received the annual report of the Bank of Canada, and page 15 shows the figure for both price and volume was down not 3 per cent but 2 per cent to 98. The Minister of Trade and Commerce could have turned to another statistical report prepared by his own department. We find in a report of the dominion bureau of statistics dated February 5 the statement that lower average prices and reduced volume both contributed to the decline in value of 1953 exports.

I point out that the Acting Prime Minister naturally might make a mistake of that kind. It does not substantially affect some parts of his argument, but since we find this inconsistency between his statements and those of the Bank of Canada and the dominion bureau of statistics, it does indicate why there should be an inquiry under the ordinary parliamentary practices to ascertain what the facts actually are.

One of the difficulties with which we are all confronted is the similarity of the appeals that are now being made not to discuss these facts because they might disturb the public mind. The fact is that the government supporters do not want to have the facts really disclosed to the public. We want the facts out in the open. I submit, Mr. Speaker, it is the duty of members to get those facts before them, and not try to brush off this situation or dispose of it in any way. Will the Minister of Labour tell us that unemployment is unreal in Fredericton today? Will the Minister of Labour go to Fredericton and tell the people who no longer have employment in the textile plants that they had better move to places other than Fredericton to get work? That is the answer the textile workers have received when this question has been brought up.

We do not ask that anyone jump to any conclusions. We simply ask that a well-established procedure be followed to obtain the facts. What we are concerned about is the state of mind represented by the speech made here this afternoon by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Dickey). Everything in the garden is lovely, according to him. Apparently people who are out of employment are only imagining it. Apparently the difficulties some industries are now encountering are really nothing but a passing inconvenience. Apparently the impact of surpluses of wheat and other foodstuffs is really not something that should be talked about, except of course when the Acting Prime Minister goes to Winnipeg. It is improper for anyone else to talk about it, because somebody might get concerned. That was the attitude of the Liberal government that was in power when economic disaster hit this country.

As a matter of interest, because it illustrates so clearly that state of mind we do not wish to see perpetuated, may I read a few words from the speech from the throne delivered on February 20, 1930, while a Liberal government was in power. These were the words spoken by the governor general of that day; and remember, this was after the economic storm had broken. This was after that great depression, as we have heard it described, had actually begun, and during the time a Liberal government was in power. Let me read those words of the governor general on February 20, 1930. This is what he said:

> It affords me much pleasure to greet you at the commencement of another session of parliament, and to be able to congratulate you upon the continued prosperity of the country. The year 1929 was the most productive year in the history of Canada. In industries, other than agriculture, employment reached the highest point on record; new construction was the largest known. Mining production was of unequalled value. Manufacturing production surpassed all previous records. There was vast increase in the development of hydro-electric power. The products of our fields and our herds reached higher standards of excellence and quality than at any previous time. The dominion is already recovering from the seasonal slackness evident at the end of the year, and it is not to be forgotten that the bulk of the 1929 wheat crop still remains in Canadian hands for final disposition.

Now, Mr. Speaker, these words are not taken from any recent speech; these were words prepared by the Liberal government of that day, to be read by the governor general.

Mr. Rowe: They must have copied it this year.

Mr. Drew: I had not been previously aware of the place from which some of the words we have been hearing recently had been taken. Remember, these words were put in the mouth of the governor general at the time the economic storm had already hit this country.

Mr. Rowe: There had been several suicides, too.

Mr. Drew: But again we have the appropriate words of Bruce Hutchison: "There was a spell of blindness". All we are trying to do is take off the blinkers. All we are trying to do is use a parliamentary device which can be used by the government, if the government wants it to work; that is, to set up a committee which will really get the facts. And I submit that every member in this house should insist that we get those facts. The trouble is that the government, instead of facing the facts, is trying to make a little molehill out of a mountain. We are anxious simply to get—

Mr. Abbott: Well, I can't figure that one out.

Mr. Fulton: We will explain it later.

Mr. Drew: When, as he says, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) cannot figure it out, I am sure it is entirely consistent with his approach to public affairs in the House of Commons that he would not be able to do so.

Mr. Abbott: I think you have something there; I agree with you.

Mr. Drew: We have before us an amendment presented by the C.C.F. party. Mr. Speaker, that amendment to the amendment deals with the problem without specifically indicating the manner in which anything is to be done. The amendment moved by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) and seconded by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) strikes out all the early words of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) and substitutes therefor these words:

> the serious and mounting unemployment situation now facing this country calls for immediate action by the federal government to prevent further economic distress.

Mr. Speaker, it is apparent from some of the statements which have been made that views as to the manner in which immediate action should be taken may differ. But so far as this amendment to the amendment is concerned, I welcome this evidence that the C.C.F. party is now supporting us in the demand for immediate action that we have been making for the last two years.

We have introduced resolution after resolution calling for immediate action to bring about increased employment by reopening markets in Great Britain, the commonwealth and the sterling area. The government has been extremely dilatory in that respect; and the first evidence we received that they recognize the correctness of our position was a few days ago when the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) indicated that, in a limited measure, the government had exercised its good offices in the sale of some of the salmon pack to be disposed of this year to Great Britain.

We have been urging immediate action. Whatever doctrinaire point of view may have been expressed by any member of the C.C.F. party as to what immediate action is, we welcome any demand for such immediate action; therefore I have no hesitation in voting for the subamendment calling for immediate action.

But, Mr. Speaker, when that has been disposed of we will then have another amendment calling for an inquiry by a committee, to get the facts. I hope every member who has followed the varying figures presented to us by the government before this debate opened, and since it began, will join with us in asking that this useful mechanism of parliament be employed, so we may have a chance to find out what the facts actually are, and so short-term and long-term plans may be adopted without any delay, on the sound foundation of reality.

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, in speaking on a problem of this kind I think we should not forget the fact that any time we have had unemployment in Canada it has been a symptom of serious trouble in the Canadian economy. One can scarcely blame the Canadian people for being concerned when they remember the experiences of unemployment periods which they have gone through in the past, at times when Canada was not on a wartime footing and not preparing for war. And even beyond the confines of Canada, turning to the international field, those who are aware of trends in the world today know that the enemies of western democracies are not all of a military character. They would like to see Canadians unemployed.

Today, as never before, therefore, unemployment is tragic. It is like a cancer, growing and feeding upon itself. And, like cancer, it must have two things, the first of which is an early diagnosis, and the second, effective treatment. It is because we believe the government thus far has neither made the diagnosis nor applied effective treatment that we urge parliament, and particularly the government, to realize the seriousness of the situation and take effective action.

Symptoms of the problem are apparent in every province of Canada. Anyone who read the speeches delivered in the debate on the speech from the throne could not help being struck by the similarity of the stories told by members coming from different parts of Canada. We heard from the fishermen of Newfoundland and the fishermen of the maritime provinces both east and west, as well as the agriculturists in New Brunswick. We heard about the unemployment among the pulp workers and the textile workers in Quebec and Ontario, and the implement and machinery workers in Ontario. From implement machinery in Ontario to the vast surpluses of farm products that existed in western Canada the story was the same. The same problem existed in the coal and lumber industries. From coast to coast there were signs of serious trouble.

These were indications that should have been noted earlier by the government and I believe should have been referred to with more emphasis in the speech from the throne. The government itself made sort of casual references that there were soft spots appearing here and there, and that there were some dollar shortages that were causing some concern to Canadian exporters. It is only because we see that today Canada is heading into something very serious that we urge the government to take immediate action, something more immediate and more effective than they have presented so far.

These are symptoms of real trouble. Worst of all is the fact that we are having difficulties with trade. It was reported in the press the other day that in talking to a group of unemployed from the farm machinery and implement industry the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) reminded them of the fact that they had helped to price themselves out of the market, and that their demands for increased wages were one of the main contributing causes. He ended by suggesting to these men that he saw very little hope for them in that industry at the present time, and that they had better seek work elsewhere. I wonder whether it occurred to the minister at that time that the demand for higher wages comes about because people find it difficult to buy the things they need for a decent living; because there is difficulty in buying food and clothing and paying high rentals. I think the cost of living was the main contributing factor, and it was because of these costs that the workers demanded higher wages.

It would have been a good thing for Canada if there had not been an increase in the cost of production and in the cost of living. Then Canadian goods could have gone into competition with those of other countries on the world markets. We in this party urged in this house five or six years ago that the line be held on the cost of living and that wages and prices be controlled so that Canadian commodities could continue to compete. Even the government will admit that the lifeblood of a nation is mainly its trade.

I was pleased this afternoon to hear the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) talk about the seriousness of this situation and see his awareness of the problem, also his warning to the government that what they did prior to the last trouble in Canada, when unemployment appeared, would not be sufficient this time. The fact is that apparently the government was not aware at that time of the seriousness of the situation. I am not going to say that I think the Conservative party presented a much better solution to the problem, because I can remember that the government of this country was turned out of office largely because of the unemployment issue. The people returned the Conservative party to power because the leader of that party at that time told the Canadian people that he would blast his way into the markets of the world.

An hon. Member: And he tried.

Mr. Castleden: And they tried, but you do not blast your way into markets; you put your goods down in competition with the commodities of other countries.

We have a particularly big problem in Canada today because we cannot get our goods in a position where they will compete with the high cost of living in the country. Drastic measures will have to be taken. The Canadian people in large measure have given this government their confidence. We urge that the government take action today to prevent further economic distress. Half a million unemployed are in desperate circumstances though not yet as desperate as they were in the late 1920's and 1930's. Thank heavens we have almost a billion dollars in unemployment insurance funds. But in the storm that appears to be coming to Canada that amount will be wiped out in a very short period of time if unemployment increases. You cannot get markets back in a month or two.

In the matter of trade we have a serious problem. The Canadian government should recognize the basic rights of the Canadian people. Canadian people should not be unemployed so long as there is in this land a need for food, clothing and housing. The rights of people who know how to work, manufacture and develop the resources of this great land should be recognized. It is part of the basic rights of a human being today that he have the opportunity to work. I am going to remind this house again of article 23 of the declaration of human rights which was endorsed and adopted by the United Nations general assembly about five years ago. It reads:

(1) Everyone has the right to work, to free choice of employment, to just and favourable conditions of work and to protection against unemployment.

(2) Everyone, without any discrimination, has the right to equal pay for equal work.

(3) Everyone who works has the right to just and favourable remuneration, ensuring for himself and his family an existence worthy of human dignity and supplemented, if necessary, by other means of social protection.

(4) Everyone has the right to form and to join trade unions for the protection of his interests.

Surely that declaration of right should be part of the rights of the Canadian people. Surely that is not too far off the definition of 1953 Liberalism. The hard fact remains that Canadian goods have been priced out of the world markets. The Canadian government had an opportunity to prevent this increase in the cost of Canadian goods by holding the line. They failed to do so. Canadian goods have to get into the position where they will be at a price level in the markets of the world which will make them competitive. Trade and foreign markets can be held.

The government in power in Canada today must accept its responsibility, and the Canadian people are looking to the government to solve this problem. They are responsible in the first place. Canada has to meet this challenge somehow. Import and export trade have to be restored if there is going to be any long-term solution to the problem facing us today, and that problem is not going to be overcome until we restore our trade. The mere fact that trade is being endangered and our goods cannot be sold is a sign that more trouble is brewing.

This I believe is the biggest problem that has faced this government in its whole term of office. Our economic industries must be maintained in production. It is only through continued employment, when the people are taking home pay envelopes, that you maintain prosperity. Only when the primary producers, the farmers, the fishermen, the coal miners and the lumbermen are working will there be prosperity in Canada.

This problem is going to require drastic action on the part of Canada. The fate of this government depends upon a solution—not only the fate of this government but that of the Canadian people, who today are looking to this parliament for action. If they do not get action not only will the government suffer, the Canadian people will suffer as well. The situation is so serious that I suggest the government ought to declare war on poverty, unemployment and want in Canada. I do not believe their proposal to undertake expenditures on public works will solve the problem, though it might be a temporary, partial palliative.

I would like to pay a compliment to the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. MacEachen), who in a very scholarly speech the other evening presented some facts to the government, most of which concerned the public works program and were most significant. During his speech the hon. member referred to the expenditure of some $21 million on the building of the Canso causeway linking Cape Breton island with the mainland of Nova Scotia. He told us that this expenditure meant employment for only some 150 to 200 men.

It is surely a sign of progress that due to mechanization only about that number of men were required in the building of that causeway. Of course that is not the entire number of men who are employed there, because there are other jobs to be done in connection with the project such as the construction of machinery in factories, and so on. However, it does point to this very important fact, that $21 million in public works does not solve the problem of unemployment for a very large number of people. If the government were to attempt to create employment for about 520,000 people they would have to make an expenditure of about $67 billion in such projects.

As it is now, as soon as the causeway is completed there will be an additional 200 to 400 men unemployed. These men who are now earning a living because of the operations of the ferry at Port Hawkesbury will also be looking for work elsewhere.

A public works program is not enough. Basically we have got to get down to the question of trade, and we have to get back to that position where we can manufacture goods which will be exchanged for the goods of other countries, which will keep our construction projects and factories working. If this government will declare war on poverty, want and unemployment, they will find that the Canadian people will not permit the things which happen in a military war, such as cost plus contracts; and the people will be mighty watchful in regard to profiteering. The cost of living has to be lowered in this country in order to put Canadian goods in a comparable position with goods from other countries.

The immediate program will have to be one which will take regard of the position of the 500,000 people who are today unemployed, and something more will have to be done for these people than is being done now. We will have to have something more to say to them than, "Well, you had better go and look elsewhere for work." These people have established homes in their own little corners. In any community which is built around one industry these are mostly people who have gone into home building under government housing. It is not going to be very much of an encouragement to those who want to buy houses if they feel their plant may be closed down and they may be informed, "You had better look somewhere else for work." That will not encourage housing in Canada.

There should be established in Canada that type of government which will say to the old and disabled who cannot work, "There shall be assistance," and to every person who is willing and able to work, "There is a job for you." I do not believe we should be responsible for those who are able yet unwilling to work. But for those who are able and willing to work the Canadian people should be able to say that there is employment.

If we are to do this we shall have to do it now, because even a year from now the problem will have grown like a rolling snowball, to such an extent that it will be almost impossible for any government to deal with it. We have to gear Canadian production into a program which will provide gainful and useful employment for Canada's people and supply commodities that will meet competition in the world markets. That is the biggest order ever thrown to the government. I do not know whether they will be able to meet the challenge.

I believe that at the present time the Canadian people are willing to work. They are willing to go where there is work. I would say to the government that the Canadian people know we live in a land where there is an abundance of goods. We know the Canadian people are all trained or can be trained in the know-how. They will not stand very long for any administration which will permit unemployment and want.

The experience of the Canadian people with provincial and federal governments in the past has not been happy. There has been a change in my own province, the province of Saskatchewan. We lived and worked with the people who went through those sad days of unemployment and want in the west. So tightly were the government's hands bound during that period women and children hungered for bread in a land where the elevators were bursting with wheat. I want to emphasize that so long as the present government in Saskatchewan remains in power there will be no hunger while elevators are filled with wheat.

If this government solves the problem that faces it this time, it will gain the confidence and respect of the Canadian people. If it does not it will be replaced by a government which will. But it will be a sad day for the Canadian people if they do not meet and overcome the present situation.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe I can be charged with monopolizing the time of this house; therefore I feel I am not imposing on hon. members by rising to take part in this debate.

Recently we have been discussing, and rightly so, some of the responsibilities we have to the people of other nations. Our world, which used to be so vast, has now seemingly become comparatively small. Those individuals who used to be so far away from us are now actually our next door neighbours. I recognize the fact that we have a responsibility to them and that we must discharge that responsibility.

However, since we have been debating these particular problems it has seemed to me that we must come to the point where we give serious attention to the problem that confronts us now right here in our own country. We are considering a problem of a very serious nature which faces us at the present time. It may be that some of us will try to justify the fact that a considerable percentage of the unemployment existing at the present time is more or less seasonal. We may try to delude ourselves into believing that the situation is not as serious as some may think. But I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it is a serious proposition when there is one man who is unable to find employment and thereby meet the needs of himself and his family. It would be a serious matter if I were that individual. But when we multiply that by hundreds of thousands it seems to me that it becomes not only a serious matter but a tragic one. Those who are charged with the responsibility of giving leadership in government to the great Canadian people should set themselves to search out the causes of the problem and apply themselves to the task of finding a solution.

We have been listening to a great many figures. Personally I do not know which are right. I do not know whether anyone else knows, either. We have had figures given by the bureau of statistics. We have had some presented to us by the national employment service. The leaders in the field of labour have given us their opinion concerning unemployment figures. We have had some from the Minister of Labour. Then, as they have taken part in the debate, various hon. members have given their particular interpretations.

I personally am not too greatly concerned as to whether the figure is 100,000, 300,000 or 500,000. It seems to me the thing that does and should concern us is the trend that is evidenced and the pattern of developments that is taking place in the Canadian economy. We find that the problem does present itself. I have here a clipping taken from the Globe and Mail headed "338,066 Seeking Work, Peak Since Wartime"; another one, "See 400,000 Drawing Jobless Benefits Soon"; "Lay Off 565 in Windsor"; "Say Unemployed Total 500,000" and so on. No matter which figures we take, it would seem to be evident that the problem exists and is here presented to us.

Moreover, we find the problem affects not only one particular industry but many. The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Defence Production said that individual members have not presented figures substantiating the unemployment figures in their particular riding. I do not think that is absolutely necessary. If we are thinking just of our own particular ridings that criticism may be justified. But it would seem to me that we are facing a national problem. It therefore seems to me that we should take a look at the national picture. So, I am concerned not just about those who are idle in my particular riding of Fraser Valley; I am concerned about the fact that right across Canada men are out of work and are unable to obtain the necessities of life.

I have here a clipping from the Financial Times of February 12 headed, "Figures Show Another Bad Year Canadian Cotton Mills in 1953". We have been reminded about the delegation that waited upon the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) representing the laid-off implement workers. I have here another clipping from the Globe and Mail of February 12 headed, "Lay-off of 1,500 by C.N.R. Laid to Traffic Drop". I have other quotations with respect to the textile industry and so on. I mention these to show that it is not just one particular industry that is affected but workers in every section of our country.

Mr. Stuart Armour, economic adviser to the president of the Steel Company of Canada, speaking to the Kiwanis club of Hamilton on Tuesday, January 26, 1954, said this:

> What, then, is the labour situation with which we Canadians are confronted today; and what are the economic implications of that situation? The situation appears at this juncture to be somewhat obscure. On the one hand, the top brass of the organized labour movement in Canada apparently foresees a gloomier 1954 than do most business and government economists. On the other hand, some important labour unions, ignoring the warnings of their national presidents, appear to be framing demands which could only be acceptable if business was to be at a far higher level this year than in 1953.

And he referred to the words of Mr. Bengough:

> . . . unemployment and underemployment are already serious in some industries and are on the increase throughout the whole of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me the picture is presented to us, and we must face the fact that in Canada today there is a serious unemployment situation. To refer again to the speech made by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Defence Production, he spoke of the danger of overemphasizing the problem because it may aggravate the situation. In other words it would seem as though we would say to the man who is hungry, "Do not tell anybody else about it, do not speak about it, because you might cause further discontent and further distress". Then the parliamentary assistant went on to say that he had listened in vain to the speeches from the opposition side for any suggestion of solutions to the problem.

I am a new member in the House of Commons, Mr. Speaker, or at least I was last fall. I may be misjudging the present government. Perhaps I am doing so. But so far I have not been able to see any inclination on their part to accept any suggestion from this side. Were anyone to get up and present a concrete proposal, I should just like to ask if it would be accepted and put into operation by the present government.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Let us hear it anyway.

Mr. Patterson: I think possibly this is a problem for the government to take under advisement and solve. As I have said, I cannot see where they have been prone to accept any suggestions from anyone on this side of the house up to the present time.

Mr. Studer: Make a good one.

Mr. Patterson: I realize, Mr. Speaker, that we should not become hysterical over the situation that faces us. But when we have reference made to soup kitchens being established—and some members have made that reference—in order to meet emergencies, it reminds us of those years not so very long ago. I do not believe any one of us wants to see a repetition of those years, even members on the government side. We do not want to see a repetition of those past days.

During some of those years at least I was in the grocery business. I remember mothers and fathers bringing in and placing on the counter a slip of paper authorizing us to give them $2 or $3 worth of groceries for the week. I well remember how often the clerks, when we were discussing the matter among ourselves, mentioned the fact that it was a serious situation when such conditions prevailed. Instead of asking for butter, or even for margarine, they would put down one or two pounds of beef dripping, which was to be spread on the bread for the children's lunches.

The problem exists right at the present time, and I was glad to hear the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Dickey) at least acknowledge that fact. We have been discussing it from the viewpoint of its effect on the economic structure of our country, but I suggest that there is an even greater effect upon the life, character and morale of the people of Canada when they are subjected to such conditions. The problem exists, and we may as well face it; we may as well acknowledge it.

I believe we must look at it from two aspects. First of all there must be some immediate alleviation of the condition. A few days ago I received a letter from a section of my riding with respect to a young man who is unemployed at the present time. He had been working, but because of his domestic situation and marital problems—I guess he is not the only one with those, though I am not saying that I have any—

Mr. Argue: We are all employed that way.

Mr. Patterson: —and because of the fact that he had to attend to business in connection with his V.L.A. holding, he had to leave his place of employment and return to that holding. Weeks went by, months went by. He made application for unemployment insurance, but he has not received it and apparently cannot. I have already written asking for a report on the case, but have not received one yet. According to the letter this young man has had to dispose of some of his furnishings in order to meet his expenses.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we must find a solution for the problem immediately. Not only must we do that; we must also, it seems to me, lay down long-range policies to eliminate the possibility of a return to such conditions in the future. It has been said that where there is no vision the people perish. I suppose we had a pretty fair example of that in the 1930's. It would seem that there has not been any fundamental change in our approach to the economic problems that confront us, and we can only conclude that history is going to repeat itself and such conditions are going to return.

I think the following cycle is worthy of consideration. It has been said that periodic lack of purchasing power results in a lack of markets for goods produced, which causes unemployment. This brings on a depression from which international frictions arise leading to war, which inevitably causes increased borrowing, debt and inflation, and to meet these things pyramiding taxation is necessary. Then there is peace, and later a recurrence of the cycle. This has been the history of the past and, as I have already said, in spite of the fond hopes we may cherish, in spite of glib prophecies and statements to the contrary, I am afraid that history is going to repeat itself unless the government takes the steps necessary to solve the problem and see to it that adequate purchasing power is placed in the hands of the people to enable them to buy the products of factories and farms and in order to contribute to further production of the essentials of life.

The situation is there; the problem exists. I submit that something should be done immediately, and that long-term policies should be laid down in order to forestall a recurrence of these unsatisfactory conditions.

Mr. Elmore Philpott (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation whatever in taking part in this debate, although I had not intended to do so until today. The other day the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) was good enough to tell the house that he and I were very old friends. He recalled our days at university, our days of war service, and used an expression which I will use now—this is where I came in. My memory is long enough to remember the great stock market crash of 1929 and the great depression from 1930 to 1935.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacInnis: 1939 and 1940.

Mr. Philpott: Let me say that if my hon. friends opposite who moved the subamendment thought there was any chance whatever that the government would be overthrown and a Conservative government take its place they would be in a terrific state of panic. Instead of all the trade unions which support them sending a delegation to see the government they would be sending a delegation here to tell them to pipe down, because the people of this country remember very well what happened in the 1930's. I had the honour to run for parliament first in the constituency of Hamilton West, now so gracefully represented by the hon. lady opposite.

That was in the year 1931, when there was a Conservative government in Ontario and a Conservative government in this house.

At that time I was considered to be a great radical or red, if you please. Why? Because I was running on the terrifically radical program of a 44-hour week and, worse still, unemployment insurance. When we look back at the history of the past 20 or 23 years we can chalk up some assets and liabilities to every government we have had during that time. I am not one who indiscriminately criticizes the late Lord Bennett or any other prime minister we have ever had, because I think they did their best according to their ability. Nor would I be one who would be so ill-advised as to suggest that the Conservatives were entirely responsible for the depression of the 1930's.

As a matter of fact I have never held that view in my life and do not hold it now. I think there is a lot in this theory of the stars, astrology or whatever it may be. I do not know whether the Conservatives turn up before a depression or whether the depression turns up before the Conservatives, but you find they arrive at almost the same time in this country. Perhaps it is because the United States conservatives arrive just a little while before the Canadian Conservatives do. Our Conservatives on this side of the line are always one or two steps behind.

If we were to go back into history, it might be worth while to recall that one reason we had the great stock crash in 1929 and the depression of the thirties was the unwise and reactionary policies chiefly put in by a Conservative administration in the United States. If we were writing a brief outline of the history of this country for the past 20 or 25 years, one thing that would be unchallengeable would be the important position of labour or the increased recognition of labour in this country. I venture to say that whatever sins of omission or commission can be charged against this government, one thing that is to their eternal credit is that labour has won a position of respect in Canada which it never had before. This administration is not perfect and never has been perfect, but it happens to be the best government we have had in Canada during my lifetime, and I am pretty old.

I am not now talking only of the things for which Liberals fought for many years before they came in, and which Liberals enacted, such as unemployment insurance, family allowances, old age pensions and the long list of items which go to make up what is now called the welfare state. These things have changed the whole economic picture in this country. I, for one, am not afraid of the gibe or the criticism of some people who might call us on this side "silk hat socialists", especially if "silk hat socialist" means the welfare state without regimentation. If that is so, then I think this government and this party should be very proud of their record.

No one can deny that the status of organized labour in this country has improved under a Liberal administration. Ordinarily the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) sits to my right. I will tell you about the first time I went to the riding of the hon. member for Kootenay East. It was in the dark days of that depression when we had another type of administration in this country. I went to give a lecture in the riding he now represents. On the night I arrived in town to give the lecture the representative of a trade union arrived to try to organize a union in that great industrial city. He arrived in a car, and 15 minutes after he got out of it his car was allowed to roll over the hill. That man was out of town almost before you could say "Jack Robinson", because in those days it was almost as much as your life was worth to try to organize a trade union in this great and free Dominion of Canada. Things are different now, Mr. Speaker, because we have, and have had for many years past, a Liberal administration that really believes in the rights of labour.

I did not intend to take any part in this debate if it simply settled down into a purely "if" question, such as the degree of unemployment we have now. Make no mistake, there is no one in this whole Dominion of Canada, and certainly no one in this House of Commons whom I have encountered yet, who does not treat with the utmost gravity the degree of unemployment there is in Canada now. It is a very grave thing, and it is of the deepest concern to this party and to this government. I submit that on its own record this government deserves the continued confidence of this house and the continued confidence of the Canadian people because of the things it has done, and its treatment of the unemployment problem is one of them.

During the debate the last few days, for instance, we have had a most loose, careless statement and misuse of facts. We have heard the numbers of unemployed quoted as varying from 200,000 to 300,000, if you please, completely ignoring the fact that according to the government's own official statement there are 280,000 registered unemployed in Canada today. This, of course, is very serious because it represents an increase of 93,000 over the same period in the previous year.

As the Acting Prime Minister so clearly pointed out the other night, on its own record this government is entitled to carry on its present policy, which is to wait and see what the world situation is with which we are faced. Is this purely another seasonal upset such as we had in 1950, when in the same period, January, we had 300,000 registered unemployed? By June 1, 1950, the number had been cut down to 139,000 or by something like 66 per cent. I thought the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) was most unfair and inaccurate last night in suggesting that Canada had only been pulled out of the unemployment situation that existed in 1950 because of the Korean war. As you will notice, those figures were for June 1. In other words, the number was down to 139,000 almost a month before the Korean war broke out.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that on its record; its long record of the most statesmanlike regard for the legitimate rights of labour; its record of having encouraged the legitimate operation and recognition of trade unions, this government is worthy of our confidence and our support. This afternoon the Leader of the Opposition referred to what he heard on the radio this morning, that President Eisenhower had appointed a commission to study unemployment because there were now 3 million registered unemployed in the United States. I would point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that this administration appointed that same kind of commission, not this year but in the year 1944-45. All the basic thinking was done then which will enable us, if the need ever arises, to grapple with a really major world dislocation which would require drastic measures on the part of this particular government.

I think members of this house are well aware—I hope they are, anyway—that for well over 20 or 25 years I have stood for the right of full employment. If a country like Canada can send her sons to fight in a world war, if she can say to her sons that it is their duty to go out and die if necessary in times of war because the interests of the country are at stake, then I believe it is the right of every Canadian to say to that country in a time of peace, "I demand my right to earn my living under our system of society." There is nothing whatever in the record of this government that would allow any member in the house even to imagine that, if the need ever arose for really serious and drastic measures on the part of the government, this would not be the best government we could get to face the situation.

I sometimes think that Canadians have not a good enough opinion of themselves. I often think of the difference between going to a Canadian moving picture theatre and one in the United States. When one visits a United States theatre and sees the picture of the president flashed on the screen, everyone in the theatre applauds. Then I think of those many occasions in my lifetime when I have gone to theatres in Canada, and only once in all that time have I ever seen a Canadian audience applaud when the picture of a Canadian prime minister has been shown.

We do not think highly enough of our leaders. Perhaps we do not have a high enough esteem of our own achievements. And I say to my hon. friends that there is not a single one of those sitting immediately opposite who is not well aware that the record of this Liberal administration is the finest in the entire world in dealing with the problem we are now talking about. We know perfectly well that when the nations met at San Francisco in 1945 to frame that document which came to be known as the charter of the United Nations, the Canadian delegation upon arrival in that city pointed to a great weakness in the charter, showing that it was inadequate on the economic side. All the delegates at that assembly—and I think at that time there was something like 48 national delegations—paid Canada a tremendous tribute by asking the Canadian delegation to write an entire section on economic affairs. Our delegation did this; and any hon. member who will reread the charter will see that one of the sections inserted by the Canadian delegation, representative not only of this government but of members on the other side of the house, placed at the top of the list the subject of full employment.

When we talk about full employment perhaps we are not discussing it in 100 per cent terms as did the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Patterson), who suggested, and quite rightly, that if there is even one unemployed man in Canada, it is a misfortune for that man. Of course it is. But let us not become confused between what is a personal misfortune and what is of major national concern. In my opinion this government has every right to carry out now exactly the same policy it did in 1950; that is to wait and get the true facts of what we are faced with in the world situation today. If and when the true facts disclose that the situation is serious, one of major capacity, then I for one would want to sit behind no more competent team than that represented by the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) on the front benches today.

I think no finer tribute could have been paid to this side of the house than that at the close of the speech delivered last night by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch), my old and good friend. He told of how, when working on one of the projects on which the present Acting Prime Minister had been the consulting engineer, following the building of a great many excellent elevators, something had gone slightly wrong with the result that some of the workers had to scramble for their lives. And then he told us —and the whole point of his story was in the last couple of paragraphs—that when the emergency came to the fore the engineers did not tackle the emergency as people less expert would have done, but chose to wait to get the facts and then took the necessary steps. The result was that the elevator was stronger than it would have been in the beginning.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, the vigour of these discussions on the amendments, even though at times they are heated, indicates that there are a great many members in all parts of the house who have a genuine sympathy for those unfortunate persons who now find themselves unemployed. I am sure the sentiments expressed by those who have taken part in the debate are shared by all hon. members, and I think it is a good thing that from time to time members in this chamber should have an opportunity to express their concern over the less fortunate in our community.

The expressions of sympathy and good will, however, will hardly be enough to remedy the problem of unemployment. It was for that reason the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra moved the amendment to have the whole matter further studied. In times of uncertainty like the present we are all inclined to accept reports that appear to support those things we are most anxious to believe and, conversely, we tend to minimize those factors pointing in the opposite direction.

I am prepared to accept the statement that the present unemployment is very largely, in the main, seasonal; and I intend to devote my remarks to the causes, as I see them, of that seasonal unemployment. I shall offer one or two suggestions as to how something may be done to remedy the situation. Perhaps it might not be done at the moment, because if helpful action is to be taken it will have to be done at once; and the government surely should have had plans to deal with any immediate action required.

Unemployment is seasonal and recurring. I think we should examine why this seasonal unemployment recurs year after year. This phenomenon should be studied; and I can think of no better study which the committee on industrial relations could undertake than into the reasons behind seasonal unemployment.

The fact that in Canada under normal conditions there is always seasonal unemployment has been obscured in recent years by the conditions which have existed during those years; because since 1950 our economy has been supported by war expenditures, and industrial and agricultural production has been extremely high. There has been relatively little unemployment. When men, owing to changes in the seasons, have become unemployed they have had opportunities of engaging in temporary work of another nature in the off-season period.

But we are told the peak has been reached, and it is obvious why that is so. The armistice in Korea has brought about a lessening in the urgency of producing equipment for that theatre. The build-up in the forces of NATO to prevent aggression has eased the general situation so far as defence production is concerned. There is still a great number of men working at the present time, but unemployment figures are apparently increasing. This seasonal unemployment therefore is becoming noticeable.

This seasonal unemployment in those industries which are important in my constituency, namely logging and fishing, is brought about partly by excellent government regulations for the conservation of our forests and our fisheries. But the fact that government regulations of necessity have had to be introduced in order to ensure perpetual yield and that the forests are not cut down in a comparatively short time, and international regulations to conserve our fishing industries, have forced those men who are employed in those industries to work at selective seasons of the year. At other seasons of the year, partly on account of the conservation methods, partly on account of climate, partly on account of the movement of fish, the men find that they cannot have full employment. It seems to me that when this committee is considering the matter, consideration should be given to measures which could be introduced to offset seasonal unemployment.

Take for instance the forest industries of British Columbia. The cut is restricted in order to maintain the yield. As the Acting Prime Minister said a couple of days ago, modern methods such as the power saw, the bulldozer, heavy trucks and so forth have made it possible to cut down that number of trees which may be felled during any one season in a much shorter time than was necessary a few years ago. Therefore we find that the camps are actually closed down.

The seasons of the year vary in different parts of the country. On Vancouver island the camps are closed down now because on the hills and mountains there is a heavy fall of snow. They will be opened again in the spring, only to be closed down in the summer when the fire hazard is high; but during the period the camps are open no great difficulty is presented in cutting sufficient logs, which can be sent down to the ocean and boomed and held ready for the mills, to maintain reasonably steady employment in the mills the season round. It is true, as the Acting Prime Minister says, that many of the men who are employed in the woods return to their homes. They have their small farms, and they are able to find some other employment during the seasons when the camps are closed.

But I should like to call attention to this fact—and it is a fact, as I know from personal experience—that it is the senior men who have those homes and who are able to find other employment. The youngster who has just gone into the woods, the young unmarried man, has not established that security which the older men have had. His wages in the woods are not as high as the experienced man's, and he has not had the opportunity to build up reserves of unemployment insurance. So frequently when the camps are shut down he finds that he is in very difficult circumstances. I do feel that special attention should be paid to these younger men who are working in the forest industries. Those are young lives that should be saved and not soured by being forced to move into queues for assistance at soup kitchens and so forth.

Then, when we come to the question of fish, conservation limits the catch. Nobody is going to quarrel with that. It is absolutely essential that there should be restrictions on the amount of British Columbia salmon which may be caught. These restrictions are the result of extensive international agreements. With them we have improvements in the equipment which the fisherman now has, equipment which in some instances helps to locate the shoals of fish, bigger vessels, and so on. When he spoke in Vancouver not very long ago the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) said, as reported in the press, that the day of the small gill netter was over. That may be correct or not, but the trend is certainly to lead the industry into bigger vessels and better equipment than have been utilized before. Up to the present the gill netter has accounted for about two-thirds of the men engaged in the salmon fishing industry.

Fishermen do not draw any unemployment insurance. That is owing very largely to the fact that their occupation is seasonal. If you were to pay them unemployment insurance for those seasons when they were not working it would be in the nature of a subsidy to that particular industry. Whether in the future something could be worked out to provide some special form of unemployment insurance for seasonal workers such as fishermen, I do not know; but I offer that as a possible suggestion to assist in unemployment in those particular industries.

I wish to say a word regarding the services. Men are now coming back from overseas, time-expired. They may have served their three years in the army or five years, we shall say, in the navy. Press reports of the last few days indicated that two battalions will be coming back from Korea very shortly. Approximately 50 per cent of the time-expired men take their discharge. They have done their period of service. Some feel that they would like to take on army service as a permanent career. Others feel that they have done their duty by serving for the period of their contract, and they take their discharge.

I should like to throw out the suggestion that some arrangement should be made whereby men are not released during these periods when there is the greatest seasonal unemployment. It seems to me it would not be very difficult for the services to provide some system of, shall we say, vocational training, to tide over that period when a man upon release will go out only to find that owing to this seasonal unemployment there is no prospect of finding a job.

I remember in pre-war days there were schemes under which during the last six months of their army service men were conditioned prior to re-entering civilian life. I am not at all certain that if discharges were to take place at times when there was considerable unemployment, would it not be well worth while considering some such scheme whereby men may be held in the services a little longer and be conditioned, while still in the armed services, to take their place in civilian life?

As far as the present situation is concerned, I feel it is too late for any immediate action to be taken. Despite the snowstorms at Ottawa, spring is just around the corner. Terrible as it may be to tell a man who is unemployed that he must still wait a few more weeks, at the same time there is some hope because snow melts on the hills and the camps will be opened up again. Unless the government has some steps in mind which will bring immediate relief to the present unemployment situation, then I fear it is too late. But I shall be really disappointed in my hon. friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), who I know was an excellent soldier, if he has not thought far enough ahead to have some plans ready in case there is an extension of the emergency which is now upon us in a mild form. I believe the government should have available some schemes for the immediate future to cope with the situation as it exists today.

When I commenced speaking I stressed the point, and I repeat that this is a recurring problem of seasonal unemployment. That being the case, should we not now start to consider what steps can be taken in order to meet that unemployment which is inevitable next winter? There will be some unemployment during the summer season, when the camps have to close down on account of the fire hazard, but usually that period of unemployment adjusts itself. But next winter there is no doubt we shall be faced with this same problem of seasonal unemployment again.

Earlier this session I called attention to the fact that there was a shortage of reserves for our armed forces. In my speech last December I quoted at some length statements made by General Gruenther, supreme commander of NATO forces. I am not going to repeat his statements again except to quote a few lines from a speech made by General Gruenther at Copenhagen, when he was addressing United Nations commanders. He said:

> The creation of adequate reserve forces means that a large proportion of NATO manpower will have to devote a considerable time each year to reserve training. That is inconvenient for the individual concerned and of course it tends to create economic strains.

It is inconvenient to the individual concerned if he has to do his reserve army or naval training at a time when he is fully employed, but it is not such a great inconvenience to him if his reserve training can take place at a time when he is not employed, owing to the seasonal nature of his employment.

I think it would be worth while exploring that situation. Canada, as a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, has, as part of her military objectives, the provision of reserves. This is not the place to emphasize the importance of these reserve forces, as that will be done in other debates; and indeed the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) and others have repeatedly emphasized it. In fact so concerned was the minister that last summer a committee of three distinguished ex-officers was appointed to consider how best they could build up the reserve forces of this country.

Proposed Committee on Unemployment

I would suggest that those men who are periodically laid off because of the seasonal nature of their employment, and who have not become established with the security of their own homes to which they can go when unemployed, might be provided with army and navy training at that time.

Take the fishing industry, for example. Might it not be worth while considering the reorganization and revitalizing of the fishermen's reserve of the navy, which used to provide opportunities for fishermen, during the off-season, to take their training with naval vessels at various stations on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts? I presume that something along the same lines existed on the Atlantic coast, where there is also seasonal unemployment. When this fishermen's reserve was active in pre-war days the fishermen, because of their familiarity with the sea, were excused certain elementary training which was given the usual reservists for the navy, and those fishermen were permitted to complete their courses in the various trades.

Today there are many more trades than there used to be, and these men have found that the instruction they received there not only qualified them as naval reserves, but also helped them become more efficient in their own particular trades. I would suggest that the extension of reserve naval training for fishermen is a line which might well be investigated by the Minister of Labour or by the committee on industrial relations when they consider this question of seasonal unemployment.

The same sort of thing applies with regard to young men who are employed in the logging camps. On several occasions in the past I have suggested that, in order to build up the reserve forces of this country, we should not insist too much upon those who are prepared to take military training having to join definite units of the reserve army. I feel that we should take advantage of the system of training which was developed during the war in the basic training camps. If we could take that as a model and take advantage of our experience in pre-war days, when schools were conducted throughout the country during the winter time; if we could also gain such information as is available, with regard to citizen training camps which were in existence in the United States in the period between the first and the second wars, there is a possibility of instituting some form of citizen training camps located at convenient places, with courses conducted at times of seasonal unemployment.

Proposed Committee on Unemployment

I definitely suggest that those men who volunteer to take that sort of training should naturally receive the same pay as the men in the reserve army. There should be no question of men not getting adequate pay. The pay of the reserve army and that of the regular forces is the same.

As I said, I have mentioned this idea to several people from time to time. I was rather surprised to find an editorial appearing in the Cowichan Leader, a weekly paper whose circulation is almost entirely in the forest area of the Cowichan valley. There are probably more lumber camps there than anywhere else in British Columbia. This editorial, which is dated February 4 of this year, is written with regard to two letters which correspondents had sent to the paper. It starts off in this way:

> Two readers have this week contributed excellent ideas, both of which contain the seeds of progress for sowing in widely-separated fields.

There is no need for me to discuss the first question because it is not pertinent to this debate. The editorial continues:

> The second idea comes from Caycuse camp, Cowichan lake, and like the first, is probably borne of the lengthy period of enforced idleness for loggers and camp staffs generally.

Then it goes on to say this:

> Our correspondent suggests a system of reserve army training during the lay-off period.

This is a suggestion coming from a correspondent in a lumber camp. The editorial continues:

> "Because of the type of work the men are accustomed to—falling, bucking, road and bridge construction, operating heavy machinery and vehicles—they would be best suited as Royal Canadian Engineer reserves," he writes.

The editorial continues:

> He lays down several conditions for his plan. The defence department would send instructors to the camps. The course of lectures would have to be attractive enough to hold the single men in the camps. The pay for attending the course would have to exceed unemployment insurance benefits. Arrangements would be made to use company bunkhouses and cookhouses.
>
> At present there are reported to be some 15,000 men idle on Vancouver island alone, the great majority owing to the heavy snow.

That is snow in the hills which prevented logging operations.

> There is thus certainly a golden opportunity for instruction of some kind to be given to many of these men.

I just throw out that suggestion along with others I have made in these remarks. May I repeat them. I suggest that great care should be exercised in the releasing of men from the regular forces at a time when there is considerable unemployment. If possible, steps should be taken to see that large numbers of men—and several hundreds are being discharged every month; in fact I think I would be safe in saying that the number runs into thousands in some months—are not discharged from the forces at such a time. When I refer to men being discharged from the forces, I refer not to men being thrown out but to men who go out voluntarily, men who have served their time and who voluntarily go out. That is my first suggestion.

My second suggestion is that consideration be given to providing some special form of unemployment insurance for fishermen, something which cannot be considered as a subsidy to these fishermen but which will take care of seasonal unemployment which is forced upon them owing to conservation measures.

My third suggestion is that consideration should be given to the possibility of reviving a fishermen's reserve in the Royal Canadian Navy, or some other form of reserve training which would appeal to the fishermen.

My fourth suggestion is that consideration should be given to providing these young men from the logging camps with an opportunity to do some military service which would be useful to them in their own profession and would also assist to build up the reserves which, if required, will need men who are well trained. There will be little time for the training of these men if we are ever faced with another war. They will be urgently required to back up our active forces. I suggest that an opportunity for that training should be given them without too much emphasis being placed upon the necessity for joining units of the reserve forces. I have made these suggestions because it is my opinion that this situation may develop and become extremely grave. I am concerned for the welfare of our young Canadians who may find themselves out of jobs. I feel that this question of trying to find a solution for the unemployment problem is one that transcends party considerations.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy that we have had this opportunity to fully discuss this matter of unemployment. First of all, I am happy because it has led to a good discussion and to the smoking out, if we might call it that, of the intentions of the government if and when Canada should be faced with a period of unemployment.

As many of us have suspected for many years now, the government has no plan. It has consistently informed the people they can rest assured that when the time comes for action they will not be disappointed because they placed their confidence in the Liberal party. I think it has been made very clear over the past two days that the people will be let down by the Liberal party in respect to unemployment in 1954 just as much as they were let down by the same party in 1929 and 1930.

I was very interested in a statement made by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott). He referred to the Liberal government having plans with respect to the unemployed or the underprivileged of the nation. I am not sure just what he did say, but I know he said that their record was the finest in the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Regier: That statement can definitely be challenged. I think we have very slowly begun to adopt the lessons that have been taught us by the northern European nations in the matter of unemployment and social security. In fact I am not even sure that we have a finer record than our good neighbour to the south of us. I have reason to believe that our record compared with theirs leaves very much to be desired.

Mr. Philpott: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Regier: Yes, certainly.

Mr. Philpott: Surely the hon. member is aware that our neighbours to the south of us have no family allowances and no old age security without a means test.

Mr. Regier: If the hon. member for Vancouver South will look at the payments to old people south of the border I think he will find that they are much larger than ours, and that these larger payments were made at an earlier date. I am also not sure that it is so very sound to eliminate the means test, from the point of view of helping those who need help. I admit that it may be a good policy to eliminate the means test, but not so far as helping those who need help is concerned.

The statement was also made that the speaker was quite content to allow the government to wait to get the true facts. I can remember a prime minister of Canada speaking over the radio a number of times when I was a young man and was very much concerned about the matter of employment. He was always referring to this thing called prosperity around the corner. I used to wonder in what kind of merry circle he was leading us, and what kind of round corner it was.

When I hear repeated statements that with the warm sunshine everything will be all right, I begin to wonder how that is going to put food on the dinner table for the people of Canada now. I come from a riding that is especially vulnerable to unemployment. On either side are the two large industrial cities of British Columbia, and whenever these industries have reason to shut their doors the people in the municipalities in my riding are affected immediately. I should like to point out particularly at this time that if we should again have a period of unemployment I hope more definite help will be forthcoming to those who are charged with the responsibility of municipal government. When you have a municipality where 90 per cent of the people are wage earners and those people are unemployed and cannot pay their taxes, the municipality is faced with sometimes insurmountable difficulties. I hope something will be done to make sure that municipalities will not be again placed in the position in which many of them found themselves during the period of the hungry thirties.

I noticed also that a considerable attempt was made to justify the government's attitude towards unemployment by referring to so-called labour leaders supporting the government. I am going to leave unsaid the things the working people of Canada would say to former writers of labour's charter of human rights and to labour leaders who never belonged, but pretended to belong, to labour's organized political party and who are now actively supporting the government.

I had thought, and I believe most Canadian people thought, that since 1929 we had arrived at a period in Canadian history when the government of Canada had assumed a great measure of responsibility with respect to unemployment. The attitude now seems to be reversed. It would seem that the government does not assume responsibility for unemployment. In fact I think a statement made on another subject can be aptly applied here, namely that the government has no views on unemployment.

I know the people of Canada returned the government at the last election, and that they have a big majority in the house. However, I should like to remind them that the high and mighty attitude that has been so evident on their part during the past week or so, the attitude that they can do what they like in the house, has led to the downfall of many a government in Canadian history, and may well wipe out the fortunes of the Liberal party in Canada once and for all at the next election.

On motion of Mr. Regier the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow we shall consider second reading of the bill to amend the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, then the resolution with respect to the Export Credits Insurance Act, then the fisheries bill, then the Telegraphs Act, then the national battlefields at Quebec bill, and then the Animal Contagious Diseases Act amendments.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.
