I could dwell longer on the matter, but I will limit my remarks to the interest rate. It is true that anyone can personally seek information from loan companies, or from the banks to find out what the interest rate would be on a first mortgage loan. I believe that it would not be easy to obtain such a loan at less than 6 per cent. I hope that the rate will not reach 6 per cent and that it will be set between 5 and 6 per cent and even lower if possible, though I don't think that it is feasible.

It is easy perhaps to wish that the rate be set at 2 per cent. If those who advocate such a rate were in power, they would be the first to admit that it is impossible to set the interest rate much below 6 per cent. I do not question their sincerity. They want our fellow citizens to benefit from a 3 or 3¼ per cent and even 3½ per cent reduction in the interest rate. If our friends opposite want a 2 per cent interest rate there is nothing to prevent them from making representations to the authorities of their respective provinces in order to get them to undertake to pay the difference between the likely rate of 6 per cent and the 2 per cent rate suggested by the opposition. As I see it, their suggestion has no other purpose but to lure the people with bright prospects. As far as we are concerned, we have here a bill the results of which will surely be beneficial to a great number of our fellow citizens.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, I do not hesitate to give my wholehearted support to this measure. I express the hope that this government may keep on improving the situation, through a policy which is so beneficial to those who wish to become home owners. It is possible that the government may be in a position to do better in the not far distant future and I hope that they will take advantage of every opportunity to do good in all fields under their jurisdiction.

(Text):

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, at this stage in the debate there is a tendency for discussion to become somewhat repetitious. I think that is all to the good, because I feel that the subject of housing in Canada is one of the most important topics that members of this house could discuss. I say that not merely because of the debate we have had during the past three days and the inspiration derived from listening to the various speeches, but also because of a keen personal interest I have had in this topic for the past seven or eight years since the war.

My close personal interest in this subject arises first because I belong to the age category which has felt most severely the postwar pressure on housing in Canada. I remember vividly my own experience of venturing into housing in the manner to which so many young couples have had to resort these days, by subletting a few rooms in a home. The demand for a private home soon became imperative. My first investigations into the subject were carried on in 1947, when I discussed the matter with real estate men who were supposed to have an intimate knowledge of the real estate situation in Canada. Their advice was that houses were at the top level of value. They suggested that on the basis of their experience I should wait until such time as prices would level off, when I would be able to purchase housing accommodation on a more permanent basis and for a more equitable value.

That was in 1947. In 1948 the price of houses soared another $1,000. In 1949 it went up further. By the time I finally took upon myself a house I found that I could have saved some $2,000 or $3,000 had I taken advantage of the opportunity back in 1947. I found also that even though I had managed to save a fairly substantial sum of money in order to make a down payment, it was not adequate to meet the requirements of the National Housing Act at that time and I had to assume a double mortgage.

As I say, I have had a personal interest in this subject along with a large number of Canadians in the same age category as myself. I remember taking part in a discussion back in 1949, a year or so before I came to this house. We used to get together in a citizens' forum discussion group and one evening the topic discussed was "When do we get more houses?" As I have listened to this debate it seemed to me that that topic is just as pertinent today as it was in those days.

I recall carrying on an exchange of correspondence with the member who represented the old Brandon riding at that time, the late Mr. Matthews. He was interested in housing and we pursued the subject by correspondence for several weeks at the time the special amendments were being introduced, I believe in 1949. In a sense then I am merely expressing in this debate the interest and the emphasis of the members who in the past have represented the constituencies of Brandon and Souris in this House of Commons.

It has been said that, next to national defence, housing is the most important domestic problem in this country. Several hon. members have dealt with that particular aspect of the topic already during the debate, and have suggested that there are very serious social implications involved in housing. We have heard it said that if we solved our housing problem we might solve all the major social problems that are besetting the large urban communities during these complex post-war days.

I am not going to oversimplify to that extent, because I do not think there is any one cause that can explain the problems of juvenile delinquency, broken homes, divorce, mental illness and those other difficulties that have been referred to here this afternoon. I do not accept the environmentalists' theory holus-bolus, neither do I believe that there is no major contribution to social well-being to be made by the provision of adequate housing.

I would like to point out that we should not confuse the issue. Merely providing a house does not necessarily mean that you are providing a home. There is a vast difference between a home and the physical facilities that would be provided in a house. The problem of establishing a home, and by that I mean a healthful, wholesome environment in which a family can grow up, in which children can be shaped into responsible citizenship in our twentieth century civilization, involves much more than the mere provision of the physical facilities. It involves a number of subtle spiritual and psychological factors.

I shall sum up this part of my speech by stating that I agree generally with the statement made by Phyllis Burns who, speaking as secretary of the Canadian Welfare Council's family welfare division—

An hon. Member: Rabbie Burns day.

Mr. Dinsdale: And very appropriate, too. I certainly think he had something worth while to say about housing and families. But whether Miss Burns is related to Rabbie Burns I do not know. However, she was reported in the Ottawa Citizen of May 2, 1952, as follows:

> A lack of housing has become Canada's most acute social problem affecting family life, Phyllis Burns, secretary of the Canadian Welfare Council's family welfare division, said yesterday. More causes of family quarreling, desertions and juvenile delinquency have been traced to the housing scarcity than to any other cause, Miss Burns said. Her estimate was based on field reports by Canadian welfare agencies across the country.

We all highly respect the opinions of the Canadian Welfare Council because that group is very closely in touch with conditions in Canada generally so far as social problems are concerned.

The reason the housing situation in Canada has such serious social implications is that it is largely young couples, at the beginning of their family careers, who are affected. These young Canadian families from which will come the generations of the future will be moulded by the family atmosphere established in these young family groups, and that atmosphere will have a very serious bearing on the Canada of the future. Unfortunately it is these younger families who are most seriously affected, and it is they who are least able to assume the financial obligation of obtaining a home, a reasonably adequate home, either by purchase or through rental.

Looking at the local situation for a moment, the city of Brandon is not a large city, certainly not among the largest cities in Canada, but in that community alone there are 150 young veterans still waiting to obtain accommodation in the group of wartime houses established in Brandon shortly after the war. I know this to be a fact because every time one of these houses becomes vacant I get the impression that I hear from the remaining 149 who did not get the vacant house, and they ask why they with their eligibility they did not obtain the house that became available.

In addition to the problem of the young couples we have the effect of the housing shortage on the group I might call senior citizens. I believe it is the senior citizens, the older age group in Canada at the present time, along with those who are just beginning their family careers, who are suffering most. These senior citizens have become victims in a society which has undergone the rapid changes which accompanied the industrial revolution. Canada has rapidly become urbanized, with the result that fathers and mothers, the pioneers who played their part in the foundation of this country, are being very hard-pressed to find suitable accommodation. The smaller families—and I think it is recognized that the family unit tends to be smaller on an average across Canada—are not able to care for grandmothers and grandfathers as they did when the majority of families lived on the farm. There is also the problem of increasing longevity. These two groups create a very urgent demand.

As I have listened to the debate during these past three days it has seemed to me we have viewed the problem slightly out of perspective. The emphasis has been on the urgent demand of the moment, but it seemed to me as the discussion proceeded that there has always been a housing shortage in Canada right from the early pioneering days. Here we must, I believe, make a distinction between real demand and real needs, because we know human needs can become insatiable. Human beings, so far as material and physical needs are concerned, have horizons which are unlimited; and in this day and age, when we emphasize materialistic values more perhaps than in the early pioneering period of Canada's development, it seems we are not as easily satisfied as our forefathers in regard to housing. Perhaps the need is not much greater, but certainly there is a wider demand for better housing accommodation today.

The housing shortage is a problem of long standing because with the wave of immigration in the early part of this century, when 2 million people landed on Canadian shores in a relatively short period of time, hardly anything was done to provide suitable housing accommodation for the newcomers.

During the Christmas recess I read that very excellent biography of the late J. S. Woodsworth, and I was intrigued to learn that it was while he was serving in a mission in the north end of Winnipeg, and dealing with some of the housing and social difficulties created by this wave of immigrants pouring into our urban areas, that he first began to think in terms of political and economic action as a means of solving basic human problems rather than relying on religious emphasis as had formerly been the case. I do not want to oversimplify this, but it might well be that this housing crisis and the impact it had upon its founder gave rise to the C.C.F. movement in Canada. The wave of immigration, the shift of population to the urban areas, the industrial revolution, the resulting growth, and the tendency to build houses that degenerated very quickly into slums have all contributed to the confused political situation in which we find ourselves today.

There is a backlog in housing demand, not necessarily housing need, that has been estimated at anything from 100,000 to 700,000 housing units. The matter came to a head during world war II, when for a period of four or five years there was hardly any housing construction at all, with the result that in 1944 the government had to take serious steps toward grappling with the backlog of demand. Since then increasing government attention has been given to housing in Canada and I noticed, as I reviewed the situation, that unfortunately the response to government measures and the results from these measures have not always been good.

There has been a somewhat disappointing result from the legislation thus far. That statement applies even to the legislation I referred to, namely that of 1949, when enabling legislation was passed by this house making it possible for the three levels of government—federal, provincial and municipal—to deal especially with the provision of low-rental units. That legislation seemed to offer an excellent solution to this difficulty which would relieve the pressure with regard to young couples to whom I have referred and also with regard to older age groups. Unfortunately there have not been too many projects developed under this legislation. It seems to me this stalemate has resulted mainly because the legislation was only enabling legislation and its success depended on the initiative of the provincial and the municipal governments. In most cases this initiative has been lacking.

In Manitoba steps were taken in the legislature to make it possible to take advantage of the federal legislation, but that was just about as far as the matter went in our province. Individual schemes must be approved by plebiscite before the municipalities can proceed to meet the urgent need for low-cost and low-rental units. While the municipalities would like to do something about it, unfortunately they are not financially able to do so. They are hamstrung financially by a tax situation that is only too well known in this country. They cannot put up even the small percentage that is required of municipalities under section 35 of the National Housing Act. They cannot put up the money nor can they provide the serviced land necessary to deal with the situation.

As hon. members on all sides of the house are aware, the crux of this problem arises from the fact that the municipalities will never be able to cope with the situation financially until the main burden of providing for general services of health, welfare and education is shifted to the senior governments. We cannot expect taxes on property, which is the main source of municipal revenue, to handle these services. Actually municipalities can scarcely handle the demands for local services such as roads, sewers, sidewalks and so forth, let alone indulge in the luxury of providing the general services of health, welfare and education.

In reading my local paper, the Brandon Daily Sun, of last Friday, I believe it was, I was interested to note that one of the points stressed at the meeting of the Manitoba municipal association, the first major point to be stressed by the president, was this problem of the inequitable distribution of taxes and responsibilities among the three levels of government. This situation becomes especially difficult where there are no large industrial developments to supply broader tax resources for municipal purposes. This of course is true where you have an area that is made up of smaller rural communities or smaller urban areas. Unfortunately, as has been pointed out by many others who have taken part in this debate, the new legislation that we have before us will not begin to deal with this difficulty.

To bring these remarks to a conclusion and generally to appraise the legislation in the light of the observations I have already made, may I say this. Even to keep up with current demands we need some 130,000 new housing units annually. This requirement has never been met under any of the legislation put forward by the government up to the present time, and it does not appear that we are going to be much better off under the new legislation.

On the surface it would seem that the basic problems of lower down payments, more readily available mortgage funds, and a longer period of amortization are going to be met; but as various hon. members have proceeded to analyse the legislation, it seems obvious to me that all these provisions are going to be invalidated by the fact that we are still faced with high costs of construction.

This was the problem that first beset me when I began to pursue some solution for my own housing difficulties; and it is still the basic problem that will largely invalidate the effectiveness of this legislation before us. It is not going to meet the situation where the urgent need is felt, namely among the younger families who tend to be in the lower income groups because they are starting out on their careers; and certainly it is not going to deal with the problem of low-cost housing for our older age group.

Various solutions have been put forward by hon. members, and I am not going to labour that point. This is merely a discussion preliminary to the legislation going to the committee. In that committee, as it continues the discussion, I trust that something will be done to deal with this problem that seems to be the central one, namely that of the cost of housing soaring beyond the capacity of the ordinary wage earner to meet it.

We have had the "co-op" housing scheme put forward as a solution. I concur in the suggestion that this scheme could help in a real way to deal with the difficulty in the lower-income group. We have also had the suggestion that we should eliminate some of the frills on the houses sponsored by the National Housing Act, so the cost might be kept low enough to enable advantage to be taken of the improved financial terms.

In the city of Brandon one contractor has been able to put up a series of homes priced at $7,200, which is just about the level that the ordinary young family is able to meet. But unfortunately, because these units do not meet the specifications of the National Housing Act, they are not covered by this kind of financing. That difficulty is also related to the fact that serviced land is not available, and I understand that under the National Housing Act units are not approved that have no running water and depend on septic tanks and so forth for sewage disposal.

These two solutions, the co-operative housing scheme and the suggestion that we might be satisfied with a more practical form of low-cost housing at the moment, depend very much upon local community action. In fact it seems to me that most of the provisions of the National Housing Act are quite useless unless municipalities, provinces, co-operative building groups and even the local contractors are willing to take advantage of the terms of the legislation and exert some initiative at the local community level toward the solution of these difficulties.

That leads me to suggest that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation might do something by way of propaganda and publicity to try to stimulate local enthusiasm and encourage local groups to participate under the terms of the legislation. I think Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has the necessary public relations machinery to do such a job. Certainly the government has, because as we contemplated the appearance of this legislation quite a feeling of anticipation was built up. It looked as if it were going to be the summum bonum as far as our housing problems were concerned. We were all on our toes hoping to find that at last we had the answer to the riddle; and it could be that the legislation will be helpful if the provinces accept their responsibility, and if something is done about the basic difficulty of inequitable distribution of tax resources, financial resources and service responsibilities.

I saw a newspaper announcement to the effect that C.M.H.C. is opening further regional offices in order to promote the construction of houses under this legislation. Indeed, I think it is even contemplated that the facilities of the regional office in the city of Brandon may be expanded in order to make it easier for local citizens to become fully informed as to the nature of the legislation and be governed accordingly. Certainly if we are going to meet the really urgent need—and this legislation does not provide a solution because, as I have indicated, of the increasing high cost of home construction —it is going to be met not because of the initiation of this legislation by the federal parliament but by action on the local level.

This question also has broader economic significance. We are very reluctant to talk about the process of economic readjustment, as it is politely referred to, that is going on throughout the continent at the present time. No one dares to use the word "depression". We use the word "recession", and the term the economists are using today is "economic readjustment", a period of transition to a more realistic economic state of affairs, a moving away from the inflationary buoyancy that has carried the two major countries on this continent forward in an intoxicating state of artificial prosperity since world war II. If there is such an adjustment taking place, and public opinion seems to be crystallizing around the idea that there is, we should not ignore the possible impact of a stimulation in the housing construction program because the economy of every community and city throughout the country has benefited as a result of the construction activity that has gone on since the war.

I have prepared a few statistics to point up just what this means in terms of man hours. These are rough averages. If each housing unit constructed involves 2,300 man hours on the site and 3,100 man hours off-site, we have 5,400 man hours of labour per unit. Taking a full working year as 2,000 hours and the average housing production per post-war year as 80,000 units, work is provided for 92,000 men in the construction industry itself and 124,000 in the industries producing and distributing building materials, a total of 216,000 men, a significant figure indeed.

I will not have the opportunity of serving on the committee that will consider the bill, but I trust that the recommendations that have been made during this very interesting debate will be taken into consideration and that something really constructive will be done to provide through this legislation a solution to the problem of the lower-salaried, younger Canadian citizen.

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate on housing there are a few observations I wish to make. The first is that in the constituency of Middlesex East, which I have the honour to represent, there are no slums, so the minister can forget all about slum clearance. However, this fact does not relieve the authorities, municipal, provincial or federal, from taking part wherever possible in the introduction of a modern, realistic housing program to provide homes in modern communities for people who need them and are in a position to purchase them.

So far as housing is concerned, however, the truth of the matter is somewhat similar to the truth of the matter as far as markets for primary products are concerned. We have priced them out of the reach of many prospective buyers. When it is necessary to have an income of $3,800 to purchase a home under Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, that eliminates quite a large number of people, especially young people who are just getting established.

As the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) pointed out, probably no other activity pumps money into the economic bloodstream to the same extent as the construction of buildings, particularly houses. So many different things are needed in the building of a home that money spent for that purpose is scattered throughout the whole country. I have said time and again that the more people we have owning homes in Canada, the better off we as Canadians will be.

It has been mentioned that the banks are going to be guaranteed on these loans; but do not let us forget what happened in the United States not so many years ago when the banks in that country were not able to meet the demands of their depositors, and declared a bank holiday. This was brought about because the liquid assets, so-called, of those banks were tied up in real estate. We can point with pride to the ability of our banks always to be in a position to meet the demands of depositors. I am not certain that this venture into making loans on real estate is a good move so far as our banking system is concerned.

Then I would point out to prospective purchasers of houses built under Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation that they should not get the idea that because this is sponsored by that corporation it will result in dream houses for everyone. People must not permit themselves to expect that everything will be just as they might wish it to be, simply because the government is behind it. They will find out, to their sorrow, that such is not the case. True, inspections are supposed to be carried out; but those inspections are for the protection of the suppliers of capital, not for the protection of purchasers of homes. Many purchasers have found that out, to their sorrow, in years gone by. An owner will find, after moving into his house, that there are many defects; and then when he makes complaints the buck is passed around from one to another and no one seems to be able to put a finger on the real culprit.

This is a pretty serious matter, and it has been brought to my attention on more than one occasion. I have gone to see some of these homes and I have found that the purchaser has been the guy who have been left holding the bag. He is the boy who is given the runaround. I know the situation particularly well in London, Ontario. Purchasers in that area were just laughed at when some of these defects developed. I suggested to the manager at that point that some of the contractors who had not been supplying homes up to the specifications should be dropped. However, apparently they were friends of the government, because my suggestion did not appear to be feasible when I broached the subject to him.

I hope the minister will look into the situation in London. I have in mind the Hale-Trafalgar area in the east end of that city. It is a whole new area. Services were laid, levels were established, and the city did its part. But when the homes were built and the city laid the sidewalks according to the levels supplied from their engineering department, it was found that some of the homes were from 7 to 23½ inches below the level of the sidewalks. After one good rain last summer the water backed up in one of those lots until it was within half an inch of the cellar window.

When I brought this matter to the attention of the manager he just laughed about it, but it is no laughing matter so far as these purchasers are concerned. The property to which I have referred depreciated to the extent of a couple of thousand dollars, I would say, because of the condition I have described. Yet the purchaser was in no position to do anything about it. The contractor would do nothing, and neither would Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The purchaser was just left holding the bag. I know of another case where the lawn, the sidewalk and the whole driveway were under water, and this after just an ordinary summer rain. What will happen if there is a real downpour or a thaw following freezing is fairly clear; they will have water in their basements.

All this has happened in an area that is high and dry, an area with good drainage. There is no reason in the world why the building could not have been done in a proper manner. I took these problems up with the manager of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, but I was just given the royal runaround. One of these properties is at 63 Cornish street, and the other at 32 Stevenson street. If the minister does not believe what I have said he can go down there and look at it himself.

I think the people generally welcome this legislation, but no doubt they are expecting more from it than they are going to get. As the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) pointed out, I am afraid the interest rate is so high that it will discourage some of the young people from participating in the scheme.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I find myself in the same position as the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), who spoke earlier this evening. I, too, have been vitally interested in this matter over a period of many years. I was therefore happy when I heard the government was going to introduce a new measure on housing. I was immensely pleased when, upon receiving the bill, I read that according to the title it is for the purpose of the construction of new houses, the repair and modernization of existing houses and the improvement of housing and living conditions.

After reading the title of the bill, I read the bill. I was bitterly disappointed. I had expected that this would be one of the major pieces of legislation at this session of parliament, that it would introduce principles that would mean a real upsurge in house construction in Canada. I anticipated that it would introduce new principles that would meet what I think are the three basic requisites at the present time. This is not something that can be postponed for months or years; it is something which must be tackled right now.

The first of these principles would be amendments to the act, or new principles, that would result in a greater impetus in home construction, presented in a way such as to be financially acceptable to those in average and lower income groups. The second would be an effort to see that those who are not in a position now, and perhaps for some time to come will not be in a position, to start owning their own homes, would be enabled to rent homes at low rentals. The third is something which in our estimation is of the utmost importance, and that is through an upsurge of house construction to be able to meet at least in part what is undoubtedly an urgent and severe unemployment situation.

I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is possible to contradict the statement that one type of construction that can do more than any other to activate employment dominion-wide from the Atlantic to the Pacific is house construction. House construction entails the supplying of lumber, cement, sand, everything required in the kitchen, plumbing, heating and the electrical fixtures. If you analyse the requirements of house construction you will find that it affects industry, as I said, over the length and breadth of Canada, and in addition it supplies direct employment to all the services employed in construction.

Although that is a phase of employment, it is tied in with Bill No. 102, because it was my hope that there would be such sections and plans in this government bill as would take care of the unemployment situation. I am greatly disappointed that in my estimation it does not do that, and I can understand why. Today it has been made very definitely clear to hon. members and to the people of Canada that the government does not recognize the seriousness and the urgency of the unemployment situation.

Mr. Studer: More so than the socialists in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Winch: I was very definitely surprised at what I term the apathy of the government toward the situation in Canada. I think it might have been a very good lesson to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), who spoke this afternoon, and the members of the government if they had been in Hamilton over the week end and had seen the demonstration by unemployed who met a certain train carrying placards saying there were 12,500 unemployed asking either for work or cash benefits, and corralling the M.P.'s who were on that train and saying, "What are you going to do about it at Ottawa?"

It would be most interesting if the government or the Prime Minister went to our own province of British Columbia where, according to the last figures, we have over 52,000 unemployed, the highest for many years. And, Mr. Speaker, it is not seasonal, as the government would like to try to indicate.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will realize that no matter how closely unemployment or employment may be related to construction, we should discuss on this bill the construction of houses and housing conditions in Canada. The hon. member will recall that earlier his own fellow member, the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight), opened his remarks by references to unemployment, and carried on after those few remarks made "en passant" to discuss the bill. I should like to hope that the hon. member will now turn to housing and stay on the subject of housing; otherwise I shall have to intervene again, and I am sure he would not want me to do that.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, as you know I always bow to the will of the Speaker, and I hope of course that my remarks have been noted and that changes will be brought into this housing bill in principle that will help the unemployment situation.

It was my sincere hope that in this bill the government of Canada would have recognized housing needs to the extent which it is apparent, or at least should I say anticipated, that the President of the United States views the matter of housing. I am going to refer to that, Mr. Speaker, because of the recognition there and because it brings in a principle which should be included in Bill No. 102, namely the method of providing housing by low rental and by subsidy. With your permission, sir, I should like to quote from the New York Times of this morning at page C-31:

> President to ask 1 million houses.
> Thirty-five thousand would be subsidized—message today to stress aid for lower incomes.
> Washington, January 24. President Eisenhower will ask congress tomorrow to liberalize . . .

Will you note that, Mr. Speaker, and through you the government? I continue:

> . . . the government's housing programs to help Americans buy at least 1 million new homes a year.
> He will place special emphasis on helping middle and low-income families obtain better housing. Among the proposals will be an experimental program to let low-income families buy inexpensive houses with almost no down payment.

Further on it says:

> Another will be the experimental program to "finance inexpensive homes for lower income families". President Eisenhower was expected to ask for at least $5 million for this.
> The program, as outlined by the special advisory committee, would allow low-income families to buy homes costing up to $8,000 on 40-year mortgages with down payments as low as $200. It would also allow families to rent such homes with an option to buy them later if they wished.

It is my hope even yet that the minister who introduced and is directing Bill No. 102 will reconsider the principles of housing in Canada, and perhaps himself recommend to the house an expansion of the bill so as to directly or indirectly—we can discuss that in committee—subsidize low-cost housing and low-rental housing in Canada. It is in my estimation a move that is imperative at the present time if we are to meet the urgency of the housing situation.

I read the bill very carefully and tried as well as I could to understand the principles of the bill on second reading. There are without any question of doubt certain minor improvements in the bill and in its operation, but not fundamentally any basic principles as a brand new act, that is, to meet the housing problem. I fail utterly to see why the government ever brought the bill in at all.

It is only my own opinion, but to me it seems evident that one reason the government has seen fit to introduce the bill in its present form is because of a lessening of mortgage money available from the lending institutions under the previous act. The original source of money is tightening and as a last ditch effort, having some idea of the problem, the present bill is brought in with the hope that the banks of Canada will come through with some mortgage money under this new bill and the necessary amendments to the Bank Act and I presume also to the Bank of Canada Act.

If that is the intent—and I say "if" because I cannot impute motives to the minister—I am inclined to think that the money will not be available unless the interest rate is such that the average citizen, in particular the low-income citizen, who requires a loan will not possibly be able to pay it.

At the present time under the Bank Act the banks of Canada cannot make mortgage loans from their own bank funds, but I think under the trustee act they can lend trust moneys on mortgages. I know of at least one national bank that has been and is now lending millions of dollars on mortgages at 6 per cent. I cannot conceive of a bank which in the past and at the present has been and is lending trust funds on mortgages at 6 per cent accepting an interest rate, even though established by an order in council, that is less than that for loans of depositors' money. I just cannot conceive of that situation.

If we consider what the banks are getting now for lending trust funds, that is 6 per cent, it seems extremely doubtful that the government will be able to get them to advance their depositors' funds at 5¼, 5½ or 5¾ per cent. The government can lay down that rate by order in council but it is in the hands of the banks as to whether they lend the money.

This brings me to what I consider to be a very important phase, that is the matter of interest. I remember an hon. member on the government side saying last week that no hon. member on this side of the house had ever commended the government for anything. He should have checked his Hansard before he made that statement, because I remember distinctly that when I spoke in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne I commended the government and the minister who is introducing this bill on the attitude they had taken under the old act with regard to the interest rate if the money was being lent on mortgage to companies established on a non-profit basis to build houses for senior citizens or for others in the same category.

I want to thank the government again because some hon. members forget that if we had not had that kind of help—and I speak for the organization with which I am connected in British Columbia—we would not have been able to construct the number of homes we have for senior citizens and others in the same income group.

Housing is of such importance, and I am certain the minister agrees, that it is not strictly a local or provincial problem. If my information is correct, several provinces of Canada are making direct contributions as grants in aid to non-profit organizations set up under the laws of Canada as companies to construct homes on a self-supporting basis for senior citizens and others in the same category.

Over a period of years British Columbia has contributed in the neighbourhood of one-third of the capital cost. I am subject to correction, but I believe in Saskatchewan it is 20 per cent. I believe in the case of Toronto, in Ontario, they are asking for 5 per cent and I anticipate it will be raised. That is what some of the provinces are doing. Housing is not solely the responsibility of a municipality, a province or a group interested in trying to do something about it; it is a matter of major concern to the federal government.

I was hoping and I still hope that something can be put in this bill to indicate the acceptance at least in principle of direct financial responsibility by the government in the building of the type of homes I have been discussing.

On motion of Mr. Winch the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow we shall begin with the resolution having to do with salaries and indemnities. We shall follow with this debate, and then with the post office amending bill.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, January 26, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

NATURAL GAS

AVAILABILITY OF HISTORY OF DEVELOPMENT IN CANADA

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): A number of hon. members have been making inquiries for information on natural gas development in Canada. Dr. Hume, director general of scientific services in the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, has just completed a very comprehensive survey of the whole history of gas production and development in Canada, and copies are now available at the department for any hon. members interested.

STEEP ROCK IRON MINES

PROPOSED LINE TO CONNECT ATIKOKAN WITH MAIN CANADIAN PACIFIC LINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport? My question is supplementary to questions I have asked him earlier about reports that a line of railway might be built from Steep Rock across to the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Has the minister seen the report in Saturday's issue of the Fort William Daily Times Journal to the effect that the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway, of which Cyrus Eaton is the chairman of the board, has now applied for authority to build a railway in that area? Has the government any comment to make on this proposed line of railway?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I have seen the report, and I presumed that what they had in mind was a provincial line which would be operating exclusively in one province and for that reason the application was not directed to the federal government in any sense of the word. But that report is now altogether out of date because I am very pleased to be able to say, after communicating with the president of the Canadian National Railways this morning, that he has informed me that any talk of building that line is now out of the question, and that he and the officers of the Steep Rock iron ore mines have reached a complete agreement as to the method of operation in the future.

Mr. Knowles: Very good.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

CANADA COUNCIL—INQUIRY AS TO PRESENT POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is it still the intention of the government to create a Canada council? If so, can the Prime Minister inform the house as to the current situation regarding such a council?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The current situation is no different from what it was when I answered a similar question put by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) on April 23 and April 27 last. The hon. member will find the answer I made at that time at pages 4430 and 4431 of Hansard of April 27. With respect to the intentions of the government, until a decision has been made by the government there is no one who can say what are the intentions of the government. A question with the same implications was put by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre as a supplementary question, as follows:

> I take it that as soon as it is possible to secure the personnel the Prime Minister feels would do a good job in fulfilment of this recommendation, the government would be favourable to setting up the council.

I answered:

> If I continue to be responsible for public affairs I shall be only too happy to recommend to my colleagues the establishment of a council as soon as I can put before them a set-up that would appear to be the proper kind.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STATEMENT WITH RESPECT TO NUMBER OF UNEMPLOYED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): I should like to direct to the Minister of Labour a question based on recent press and radio reports that there are some 500,000 unemployed in Canada. Would the minister care to make a statement regarding this situation?

Labour Conditions

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): I want to thank my hon. friend for giving me notice of the question. I think I should say that a somewhat similar question was asked by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough). She asked whether I could give percentages as well as figures. I hope my answer will be sufficient to answer both questions.

In the first place, operational figures are regularly compiled by the national employment service offices throughout the country on the number of applications for employment. There is also a second set of figures compiled each month by the dominion bureau of statistics on the numbers looking for work. This second figure is an estimate based on a sample survey of the labour force including persons both with and without jobs. The survey makes possible an estimate not only of the number of people who are reported as without jobs and seeking work, but also those who are away from work for a variety of reasons such as bad weather and temporary plant shutdowns.

I would like to say that because these two sets of statistics differ this does not mean that the two figures contradict one another or that they are not valuable for their own purposes. As I have indicated, they are produced in quite different ways. Because it is an administrative agency the national employment service figures will always include a number of people who, after registration, have found jobs on their own and have not notified the employment office.

On the other hand, not all unemployed persons register at an employment office. In addition, the national employment service figures of job applicants have some limitations for comparative purposes over a period of years because the coverage of the Unemployment Insurance Act has been extended a number of times in recent years. Also, the number of wage and salaried workers in the country have been steadily growing so that comparisons from one year to another need to be made with these facts in mind.

The labour force survey estimate of those "without jobs and seeking work" does not include, as I have said, a number of people away from work because of bad weather, those temporarily laid off with instructions to return to work within 30 days, or those who have worked at all, even for a few hours, during the survey week. Many of these people will, of course, be eligible for and be claiming unemployment insurance and so will be included in the employment service figures. A further reason for the difference in the two figures is that some persons, when enumerated by the labour force survey, will not be reported as seeking work even though they are registered with the employment service. This can happen either because such persons do not have a very strong current attachment to the labour force, or because of difficulties in the precise classification of some individuals, such as elderly people, married women and persons with employment handicaps.

In an effort to remove as much confusion as possible between these two sets of figures, it was decided a year ago, after this whole question was considered carefully by an interdepartmental committee, to issue both of these figures at the same time with appropriate explanations of each. This release has been issued each month, jointly, by the Department of Labour and the dominion bureau of statistics, since December, 1952. Hon. members will understand that to get out these combined figures involves a great deal of work and the official figures can be released only once a month.

Now, to answer specifically the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) and the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) more specifically, I shall give the latest figures available in the case of both the labour force survey and the national employment service applications for work together with similar figures for earlier years.

Dominion Bureau of Statistics Labour Force Survey

	Without Jobs and Seeking Work	Percentage of Labour Force
December 1952	132,000	2·5
December 1953	190,000	3·6
National Employment Service	Applications for Work
December 1945	187,000	4·2
December 1949	249,000	4·8
December 1952	237,000	4·5
December 1953	338,000	6·4

In case any hon. members are not now receiving the monthly employment press release I shall be pleased to see that they get it promptly.

I hope that answers the question asked by the hon. member for Kootenay East regarding figures that have been quoted outside of this house. I have had prepared in conjunction with the Department of Trade and Commerce a more complete survey of the employment picture. I place myself in your hands, Mr. Speaker, as to whether I should present it to the house in answer to these questions.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of hon. members that the minister should give a more complete statement on the matter?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is agreed.

Mr. Gregg: As I stated, this has been prepared in close collaboration with the Department of Trade and Commerce. In considering the current employment situation I would like to point out that 1953 as a whole will stand out as one of the most prosperous years on record. The high level of economic activity during 1952 continued throughout the spring and well into the summer months of 1953.

During the last few months some industries have experienced a decline in output but there is little evidence of any basic weakness in the economy. Over-all levels of income, consumer expenditures and private and public investment have continued at very high levels. In the summer and autumn of 1952 total employment expanded significantly and remained at a relatively high level during the following winter. In the fall of 1953, on the other hand, total employment declined somewhat more than seasonally, although at the beginning of November it still remained close to the high level of the previous year.

With continued growth in the labour force, unemployment has reached a level which is higher than that which prevailed in the fall of 1952. By the 10th of December 1953 applications on file at national employment service offices totalled 338,100, an increase of about 72,000 from the previous month and about 100,000 above that of a year earlier.

There has been a tendency in some quarters to use these statistics as a basis for comparing the current employment situation with that of the winter of 1949-1950. Apart from the fact that the causal factors behind the present situation are quite different from those that prevailed at that time, such as currency devaluation and import restrictions, I would like to make clear that the national employment service statistics in themselves are not a valid means of comparison. The coverage of unemployment insurance has, for instance, been extended since 1949 to cover forestry operations, and some other adjustments in coverage have been made in the intervening years. Secondly, the paid worker group has expanded during this period by about 11 per cent. These adjustments should be made before making comparisons between the two periods.

It should also be remembered that the level of economic activity in Canada at any particular time is conditioned to a marked degree by the wide variations in climate through the year. Winter weather always results in the release of large numbers of workers from certain industries. Seasonal unemployment begins to appear with the completion of the grain harvest in the fall, it rises sharply in December and January, levels off in February and March, and then drops sharply in the spring when outdoor activity begins.

The size of this problem is not always appreciated. In the period 1947-1951 for example, construction employment declined, on the average, by over 80,000 persons between September and January. More than 60,000 persons were released from agriculture while about 45,000 workers were separated by the food and beverage industries.

Employment in sawmilling declined by about 16,000 while the cessation of inland shipping was in large part responsible for a drop of nearly 12,000 persons in water transportation. In the eight industries most susceptible to seasonable declines of this sort, the decline in employment amounted to close to 300,000 persons. The total number released because of climate and seasonal demand is probably much higher than this. However, many of these workers either retire from the labour force during the winter or find alternative employment in other activities, for varying periods, such as pulpwood logging and other winter activities. This seasonal shift in employment patterns does not, therefore, result in an equal increase in unemployment. Nevertheless, it is clear that much of the increase in winter unemployment can be traced to seasonal declines in activity of the type mentioned. Seasonal unemployment is accentuated when offsetting winter activities such as logging fail to expand and when expansion in the manufacturing sector is easing off.

The current unemployment situation is not entirely due to the seasonal factors which I have mentioned although there are indications that the amount of purely seasonal unemployment is greater than in recent years. Other kinds of employment problems do exist in some industries in the economy and these are receiving close and continuing attention. These industries are not operating at capacity employment levels for various reasons. For some, import competition has become keener. This has been particularly true in the case of the clothing, textiles and electrical appliances industries. Others, such as sawmilling, farm implements and certain base metal producers have found world markets becoming increasingly competitive. Forestry operations in eastern Canada are currently proceeding at the low levels of last winter, partly because of improved technology in forestry operations and partly because of the lumber and pulp markets. In most of these industries, there has been some accumulation of inventories at various levels of production and distribution, and employment in several industries is reflecting the consequent adjustments. The government is not ignoring the problems of these industries which are encountering difficulties in adjusting to a more competitive situation in both the domestic and foreign markets.

Nevertheless, I feel that it would be a mistake to draw a gloomy picture for the economy as a whole solely on the basis of the situation in which certain industries find themselves at the present time.

As my right hon. colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), pointed out to you a few weeks ago, 1953 was a remarkably prosperous year by any standard. Consumer expenditures were and are continuing at high levels while the level of overall investment in 1954 is expected to be at 1953 levels, a year in which the volume of construction activity surpassed all expectations. At the same time, while some inventory liquidation is taking place, the level of inventories in general is not so high as to cause undue alarm.

Aside from the difficulties experienced by some industries, there has been a tightening up in many sections of the economy and, as has been the experience of other trading nations, we have gradually moved from a seller's to a buyer's market. Such a change is bound to bring with it both increased emphasis on seasonality in operations and more concern on the part of employers with increasing efficiency. It is reassuring to note, however, that the basic economic strength of the economy continues to be unimpaired.

I would also like to point out that the extended coverage of unemployment insurance during the past few years has made it possible to treat intermittent increases in unemployment more effectively than could be done heretofore. The greater effectiveness of unemployment insurance has been particularly evident during the winter months when supplementary benefit provisions are in force. In February, 1951, for example, active claims were 83 per cent of job applications; by 1953 this proportion had risen to 92 per cent.

At the first sign of unemployment, one usually hears the suggestion that the government should begin a large scale public works program. Public works, in some circumstances, can be a useful way of alleviating unemployment, but they are by no means a cure-all. There are other, and often more effective, ways of maintaining high employment levels, by various fiscal and monetary measures. At present, it seems to me that it would be unwise to embark upon a greatly expanded public works program. The construction industry is one of the most active parts of our economy and with the rate of investment expected to continue high, construction work in 1954 will probably again be at record volume. Also, employment in our seasonal industries will be expanding again sharply in the spring so that by the time any sizeable public works program was under way, it would be competing with private construction of all kinds for skilled labour and materials.

This leaves the problem of what is being done to assist those out of work, whether seasonally unemployed or otherwise. Actually, a great deal is already being done. The extended coverage of unemployment insurance during the last few years, plus the provision of supplementary unemployment insurance benefits during the first 3½ months of each year, has done much to help ease the burden of unemployment. In the first three months of 1953 for example, a total of $63 million was paid out to workers in the form of unemployment insurance benefits. This year benefit payments will be even larger. This sum would not be offsetting income losses due to unemployment were it not for unemployment insurance. Many unemployed workers are also being assisted by family allowance payments and by old age pensions. In addition, the provincial and municipal governments are making social welfare payments which benefit those in need.

As I have said on many occasions in the past, unemployment is a problem which is the concern of all levels of government, federal, provincial and municipal. The unemployment insurance program of the federal government is carrying the major share of the burden at the moment. There is, however, a residual problem and the most effective way of solving it is through the joint efforts of the provincial and municipal governments and of the federal government.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Labour a supplementary question? Does he have any figures which would show the present situation with regard to those on temporary lay-off, and does he have any information with regard to those who are on short time?

Mr. Gregg: Yes, we have very good estimates. As my hon. friend will realize, we cannot guarantee the figures, but I would be glad to provide the figures whether in terms of the over-all figure or in regard to any special industry if my hon. friend would specify the industry.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the minister to give the over-all picture if he has it.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Labour a supplementary question arising in part out of the statement he has just made, and partly out of an item which appeared recently in Arthur Blakely's column in the Montreal Gazette and in the Winnipeg Tribune. Will the next meeting of the national council on manpower have before it a report recommending ways and means of alleviating seasonal unemployment? If so, how soon will that next meeting be held?

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Speaker, the answer to my hon. friend's question is yes. The manpower advisory committee has a subcommittee which is giving that problem very careful study. I am not able to say when they will be able to make their report to the main committee but I hope it will be before too many months. They are working on it now.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask another supplementary question. If there are worth while recommendations in that report, would the minister not agree it would be a good idea to have these recommendations brought before that council soon?

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a further supplementary question to the Minister of Labour and if he so wishes he can take note of it and answer the question at some future date. Can he give us any estimate of the number of people who are on short time in the textile industry?

Mr. Gregg: I will take note of that question, Mr. Speaker.

UNITED NATIONS

RECONVENING OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). Has the government as yet made a decision on the request of Madame Pandit on behalf of India for the reconvening of the United Nations general assembly on February 9? If so, has that decision been transmitted as yet?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker; the matter is still under consideration by the Department of External Affairs who are conferring with other governments about the advisability of having a date fixed for the reconvening of the assembly.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE SALARIES OF SPEAKERS AND DEPUTY SPEAKER, SESSIONAL ALLOWANCES OF MEMBERS, ETC.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce measures to amend

(a) the Senate and House of Commons Act to increase the salaries of the Speakers and the Deputy Speaker, the sessional allowances of members of the Senate and of the House of Commons and the annual allowances of the members occupying the recognized positions of leader of the government in the Senate, leader of the opposition in the Senate and Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons;

(b) the Salaries Act to increase the salaries of ministers mentioned in sections 4 and 5 thereof, substituting for the Minister of Resources and Development, the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources and adding thereto the Associate Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that I do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole upon this resolution?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker):

That this item be not now considered but that its consideration be postponed so that the subject matter thereof may be referred, for inquiry and report, to a royal commission to be appointed by the government.

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) that I cannot receive the motion because it is not in order at this stage.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, before you make a ruling—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The motion which is now before the house is merely a procedural motion to submit to the house the subject matter of the resolution so that the committee of the whole will consider the advisability of making the expenditure contemplated by the resolution. We are not acting on a mere fancy. We are acting on an order of the house which was made a few days ago.

A notice of resolution appeared in the Votes and Proceedings that the house would at its next sitting go into committee of the whole for the purpose of considering the advisability of making the expenditure contemplated here. The day has arrived. The government has announced that the motion will be called today, and therefore there is no other course for the house to follow than to study this matter in committee of the whole. Later, after the bill is introduced and second reading has taken place, if a committal is to take place, I would imagine that at that time it might be in order to commit the bill to a commission or to a committee. But as the matter stands now, as I look at it, I do not think that this motion is acceptable.

If the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) wishes to speak on the point of order that I have raised, I am quite prepared to hear him.

Mr. Fulton: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. For my authority I refer to Bourinot, fourth edition, page 512. I base my argument—did somebody make some comment?

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Fulton: I base my argument on the point that you have just mentioned, Mr. Speaker, that what is now before us is merely a previous decision of this house that this resolution will be considered in committee of the whole at a later stage. As I understood it, Your Honour has said that that position having been taken by the house on a previous date, the matter is not now open for further consideration.

May I say at once that I recognize that, under a ruling given by Mr. Speaker Macdonald in, I think, the last session before the election, these resolutions are not debatable with Your Honour in the chair. I am not for a moment going to suggest that the resolution is debatable. However, I am suggesting and arguing that the motion now made is susceptible of amendment and that an amendment can be put forward without debate.

I base my argument on the authority of Bourinot at the page to which I have already referred and on the similarity of this proceeding to the proceedings in connection with consideration of the bill. When a bill has been read a second time, the order then is that it be considered in committee of the whole. Your Honour then puts the motion: Is it agreed that I do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole upon the said bill? What is happening here is that Your Honour is putting the motion that Your Honour leave the chair for the house to go into committee of the whole on the said resolution. I therefore submit that the procedures in both cases are exactly similar. If you refer to page 512 of Bourinot, Your Honour will see the following passage:

> When the order of the day for committee has been reached and called in due form—

That is exactly what we have here. The order of the day for committee has been reached and called in due form.

> —the Speaker will put the question, "That I do now leave the chair".

The citation continues:

> Now is the time to move any amendment to this question. Members opposed to the bill may move that the house resolve itself into committee on the bill that day three or six months; or may propose motions adverse to the principle or policy of the measure.

I submit that Your Honour has put the question, "'That I do now leave the chair' for the house to go into committee on the resolution." It is agreed that the motion is not debatable. On the authority which I now cite, however, I submit that the motion is susceptible of amendment exactly as stated in Bourinot. Members opposed may move that the house resolve itself into committee at a later date or may propose motions adverse to the principle or policy of the measure.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) has proposed a motion that, instead of the house going into committee at this time, consideration of the resolution be postponed until the matter has been referred to a royal commission for its consideration and report back to the house. While neither this motion nor the amendment is debatable, I submit that it is clearly in order to submit such an amendment, to put it without debate, and that then Your Honour must call the question upon the amendment.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, before you make your decision may I point out that only a few days ago, when the item was called dealing with the introduction of legislation affecting the Post Office Department, a vote was asked for immediately, Your Honour permitted that vote, and a recorded vote was taken. If nothing is before the house except that we go into committee to consider what is before us, I submit that there could have been no occasion for a recorded vote at that time to decide whether we should or should not go into committee. The procedure of this house is an ever-changing form that is moulded by the decisions here from day to day. By permitting the recorded vote only a few days ago, on the motion to introduce legislation affecting the Post Office Department, Your Honour at that time accepted the proposition that something can and does happen between the calling of the item and the consideration of the resolution by the committee. On that basis I submit that it is quite proper that a motion now be presented to defer consideration of the item until a royal commission can be appointed and can make its appropriate report.

Mr. Speaker: The Leader of the Opposition will recall that at a certain period in the past these money resolutions, which had not been debatable, became debatable. That was the difficulty that confronted Mr. Speaker Macdonald when he decided that these money resolutions should not be debatable. I have here his ruling which appears in the Votes and Proceedings of March 26, 1953, and in Hansard of March 26, 1953, at pages 3293 and 3294. I should like to draw to the attention of hon. members the concluding paragraph of Mr. Speaker Macdonald's ruling, in which he said:

> Accordingly in future once the house has decided that the Speaker will leave the chair at the next sitting of the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole to consider a resolution I will put the motion when the order is called, but the motion will not be debatable—

Here I would submit to hon. members that it is a good principle of procedure that whatever is not debatable is not amendable. How can you introduce an amendment if you are not allowed to debate the question? I continue:

> —although members will have the right to vote thereon.

This is where I join with the view of the Leader of the Opposition when he says that the other day I allowed a vote. That is quite normal and exactly in accordance with the ruling I have just quoted. Whenever the order is called I put the motion: Is it agreed that I do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole upon this resolution? If an hon. member says "No" then I do exactly as I did at the request of of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre the other day. I say: "Those who are in favour of the motion will please say yea; those who are opposed will please say nay." If five members rise I then say: "Call in the members."

I am quite prepared to do so today just as I did in response to the request of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I am not acting today in any different manner from that which I adopted the last time. If the hon. member does not want the motion to be considered now he will probably reach the same objective by asking for a vote and voting against the motion. If the vote were carried in the negative the motion would not disappear from the order paper but would have to be called on some other day.

I hope I have made myself clear. The procedure relating to public bills is one that is provided for by standing orders. But when the hon. member for Kamloops contends that the procedure as to resolutions is the same as that which is to be adopted with respect to public bills I beg to disagree with him, and I should like to refer him to standing order 75 which reads as follows:

> Every public bill shall be read twice in the house before committal or amendment.

That is the rule as far as public bills are concerned, but there is no such rule with respect to resolutions. This resolution, as I say, is one that appeared in Votes and Proceedings. It was called on the orders of the day and the order of the house was that at the next sitting the house should go into committee of the whole to consider it. As hon. members know, the government may call its business as it sees fit. Standing order 17, subparagraph 2, reads as follows:

> Whenever government business has precedence, government orders may be called in such sequence as the government may think fit.

The acting leader of the house announced that this matter would be proceeded with this afternoon. The orders of the day were being called and the deputy clerk read the order. At this stage, after I put the motion that I do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole, the only proceeding which can take place is for hon. members to ask for a vote. Then I will ask for the yeas and nays and give my opinion as to whether the nays or the yeas have it. Therefore hon. members will realize that I cannot accept the amendment.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Chairman, this resolution proposes that the Senate and the House of Commons Act be amended to increase the indemnities paid to members of parliament, the salaries of the Speakers of the two houses of parliament, of the Deputy Speaker, of the leaders in the Senate and of the Leader of the Opposition, and that the Salaries Act also be amended to increase the salaries of ministers of the crown. It is intended, if the resolution is approved by the house, to introduce separate bills to amend each of the statutes concerned.

Before giving the reasons why the government decided to recommend these increases, I should like to say a word about what I think is the purpose of the parliamentary indemnity. It was never intended, and it is not now intended, that members of parliament should be salaried servants of the state. Members of parliament are representatives—that is true of members of both houses of parliament —and, to be truly representative, it is desirable that they should be drawn from a wide variety of occupations and walks of life and that they should be able to retain, while they are members of parliament, their connection with the occupation or walk of life and the area from which they were chosen to be representatives in parliament.

It is obvious, however, that if members must regularly expect to be absent from their homes or their ordinary place of residence for about six months in each year, and in some years even longer, few members can expect to derive from their normal occupations at home the income they would otherwise have.

Moreover, attendance at parliament makes it necessary for most members of parliament, those who do not habitually live in Ottawa, to provide themselves with a place to live in at Ottawa for a substantial part of each year in addition to their ordinary home residence, and with anything approaching the length of the sessions in recent years many members want to have their families with them in Ottawa and must have them with them if they are to have any family life at all. This, I happen to know, is of especial concern to members with young families and to members whose ordinary place of residence is at a long distance from Ottawa.

Then, too, it has always been considered important that members should have sufficient income to enable them and their families to live decently without having to worry about going into debt or being otherwise subject to embarrassments which might affect their objective approach to matters with which parliament has to deal in the interests of the nation. The purpose of the indemnity, therefore, seems to be to compensate members to a certain extent for the loss of ordinary income, to meet the additional and necessary expense of maintaining two places to live in and to help them to preserve their complete independence and objectivity in dealing with public affairs.

While membership in parliament should not be, and should not be regarded as being, a full-time occupation, it is essential that members should be able, without a too embarrassing loss of income, to attend the sessions of parliament for as long as sessions are necessary to meet the public needs, and at any time of the year that sessions may be really required in the public interest.

However much we may be able to improve the rules, I am sure we are all agreed that the normal annual session of parliament will in future continue to be much longer than the session extending over sixty-five days with fifty sitting days which the statute apparently contemplated and which it now provides for. It was my experience, and I am sure it was the experience of the opposition and the leaders of other groups opposite, that there are an increasing number of persons apt to make suitable and even distinguished members of this house who just cannot accept being candidates, because they feel that the present indemnities are not sufficient to enable them to support their families as they feel they can or as they feel they should support them. I know as a fact that in the last parliament, and I am sure it is also true in this one, a good many members found that even after reducing their previous standards of living quite substantially they could no longer make ends meet and they had to incur debts in spite of their modest scale of living.

Now, I cannot believe that the people of a country as great and as rich as Canada has now become really want that condition to continue, which makes it difficult for any but the fairly well to do to serve in the national parliament without having to make substantial financial sacrifices. These sacrifices sometimes amount to real hardship. Certainly such a condition would not make for truly democratic representation in parliament which the people of this country want.

My colleagues and I came to the conclusion that this problem should be tackled from two angles, and that was the reason why I stated in the national broadcast I made from Vancouver on July 9 of last year that it was our policy "to seek appropriate amendments to the rules of parliament with a view to ensuring speedier and more orderly conduct of the nation's business without any abridgement of the rights of the opposition or of any minority to give expression to its views. We believe that if men and women of ability are to continue to be attracted to public life some way must be found to reduce the length of some of the debates in parliament, and to make the conditions of membership less burdensome than they have become in recent years."

There is no question that if we can shorten the sessions, without neglecting in any way the interests of those we are sent here to represent, the burden and expense in parliament will be somewhat reduced. But I do not believe anyone seriously believes that the sessions can be sufficiently reduced in length to make the present rate of indemnity adequate to cover the purposes to which I have referred.

It is true that in 1945 provision was made by parliament for an expense allowance of $2,000 which, in the case of the members of this house except ministers and the leader of the opposition, is not subject to income tax. That allowance was, however, intended to enable members to defray the multiplicity of out of pocket costs of visiting and representing their constituencies which no member can escape if he is to perform the proper functions expected of a parliamentary representative. It is not proposed at this time to make any change in the rate of that expense allowance.

The basic indemnity for attending the sessions has not been changed for over 30 years. It was fixed at $4,000 in 1920. In that long period the indemnity of members of parliament has lost its proper relationship with almost all other forms of compensation and with prices and costs and, we must admit it, has been considerably diminished by the high levels of direct taxation which are necessary under present-day conditions. Indemnities of members of most provincial legislatures, and of the national parliaments or legislatures of most countries comparable with Canada, have been increased to a point where ours suffer very much by comparison with the ratio that existed a generation ago.

The increase now proposed will certainly not do more than restore the relative proportions that existed 30 years ago. We are recommending that the indemnity be increased from $4,000 to $8,000 and at the same time it is proposed to change the basis of payment so as to end the situation which now exists whereby it is possible for members to receive two indemnities in a single year if it happens to be necessary to have two sessions of parliament.

It is the view of the government that the new indemnity should be high enough to compensate members for attending parliament on as many occasions and for as long a time as may be necessary to look after the interests of the public. We think it is bad for the prestige of parliament to leave any room for the suggestion that additional sessions, which are sometimes necessary in the best interests of the public, are, in fact, being held to increase the remuneration of members. We know, of course, that such is not the case but it is undesirable to leave any occasion for that kind of suggestion.

After careful consideration of all the alternatives, it seemed to us that the simplest method of making this change was to provide that the indemnity should be paid in 12 monthly instalments in each year. It was represented to us that such an arrangement would meet the personal convenience of members in arranging their own budgets. For this parliament the 12-month period will start from the first day of this session, and the monthly payments will be practically the same as they are under the present law up to the end of the session. Then, instead of the unpaid balance being paid out immediately, it will be spread over the remaining months of the 12-month period. No further indemnity will start to accrue until November 12, 1954.

I want to emphasize, however, that the change in the basis of payment is not meant to change the character of the indemnity. It is still intended to be compensation to members for attending the sittings of parliament, and not a salary for being members of parliament. The provisions for the appropriate deductions for absences for other than accepted reasons will remain in effect.

I turn now to the second proposal in the resolution which is that the salaries of ministers of the crown and of the Speakers and leaders in the houses of parliament should be increased. These salaries have not been altered since 1920. This fact, in itself, is perhaps all the argument needed to explain why an increase in salaries might be justified at this time. I do not think anyone would question the statement that ministers of the crown have full-time jobs of an exacting character, with heavy responsibilities. Under our constitutional system, the same is true of the position of the leader of the official opposition.

I doubt if anyone who occupies one of these positions expects the remuneration to be comparable with the rewards open to persons of equal ability in private life, either in business or in the professions. I am sure no one expects, either, that the contrast will be too great. The increase proposed for ministers of the crown and the Leader of the Opposition is $5,000 a year. This would be provided under the bill to amend the Salaries Act, which would contain a provision that it would not come into force until the end of the present fiscal year, April 1, 1954. Since ministers will also receive sessional indemnities and the annual expense allowance for members of parliament, this will mean that their total annual remuneration will be $25,000, all of which will be subject to income tax. They will continue also to have to provide their own cars to get about and to receive $2,000 instead of having the use of car service provided by the government before 1931. This seems to be still a most modest amount compared with the salaries and earnings of most Canadians with senior executive positions in business or in the higher reaches of the professions.

There is another reason, perhaps not an important one, but still one that is worthy of some consideration, for increasing the remuneration of ministers. In the nature of things a reasonable relationship must be maintained between the remuneration of ministers and the salaries of the senior public servants. For several years past the government has been finding it increasingly difficult to provide salaries for senior public servants which will enable them to resist the inducements which are offered to many of them in other fields, and which they have been under great pressure to accept.

The recommendation also proposes that the salary of the Prime Minister shall be increased by $10,000. I must admit that I was reluctant to have that included in the suggestion that I was going to have to bring to parliament. I was reluctant to have it suggested that the differential between the remuneration of the Prime Minister and that of the other ministers should be widened, should be increased; but my colleagues were insistent that any smaller increase would not preserve a proper relationship. I am not so sure about that, because I know what my colleagues have to do, and I know what I have to do, too. Of course, these matters are not apt to be dealt with again for some time. It is 33 years or more since they were dealt with last.

It was pointed out that it would be less than fair to future holders of that office to have to make for them a change which was not felt to be the right thing to do at this time. Well, I felt I had reached an age where it was my duty to look on this matter as I would look at it if I were not the Prime Minister at the present time, and to take my share of responsibility in recommending an increase that was felt to be justified.

As I said before, these increases would not become effective until the beginning of the next fiscal year, April 1, 1954. We felt it was very desirable to have no possible suggestion that there was going to be anything retroactive in this. The starting of the new system from the first day of the session will mean that the monthly payments will be just about the same as they would be under the existing law, and that the only real difference will be postponing the paying out of the balance during any monthly instalment for the rest of the twelve-month period.

Of course, under our constitutional practice it is the exclusive responsibility of ministers of the crown to recommend expenditures, and my colleagues and I are not seeking to escape that responsibility in making these recommendations. Hon. members will appreciate, however, that these recommendations, which affect all of us in parliament personally and directly, present an unusual situation. All of us feel reluctance to do for ourselves what we would not hesitate to do for others. However, all of us have a duty to consider first what is advisable in the interest of upholding and strengthening our democratic parliamentary institutions, and I ask every hon. member on both sides of the house to put aside all personal or partisan considerations and to approach the consideration of this resolution and the consequent legislation in an objective spirit, and deal with it not because of the way in which it may affect him personally, but in the way in which he honestly believes will be in the best interests of our Canadian parliamentary institutions.

I would say to hon. members on this side of the house that if they honestly believe these increases are not in the long run to be in the best interests of our democratic institutions, they should not feel that because I am the one recommending them at this time they should submit their judgment to mine. These matters should be dealt with exclusively on the ground that the opinion expressed by each individual member will be his opinion as to what will really in the long run serve the interests of the Canadian people whom members of parliament are here to represent.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, with most of the observations that the Prime Minister has made there will be general agreement in this house. Without in any way reviewing what already has taken place, we indicated a desire to follow another course. Might I say to those who indicated some hilarity about the fact that the committee procedure was not opposed that the ruling of the Speaker was that the only question before the house then was whether the Speaker should leave the chair. The Speaker has left the chair, and in committee we are discussing a resolution which says it is expedient to introduce measures to do certain things.

The Prime Minister has reviewed these things which it is intended to deal with. He has devoted some considerable time to an analysis of the position in which members of parliament now find themselves because of the greatly increased cost of living and the greatly lengthened sessions of parliament. He has indicated his belief that it is unlikely there will be a substantial reduction in the length of the session, I am sure there is general agreement that the efficiency and the dignity of parliament, and the respect of the people of Canada for the parliament which passes the laws that affect their daily lives, do call for a recognition of the fact that it will not be possible to obtain the service of members of parliament unless the indemnity or allowance—call it what you will—has some relationship to the sacrifice that is made by their separating themselves from their ordinary place of residence, and in many instances from their families.

The Prime Minister has said that whatever indemnity or allowance is approved should not be regarded as a full-time salary. He has expressed his belief—and I think there will be agreement with the belief—that it is important that members retain their contacts with their own constituents, and that the value of their service was constantly increased and refreshed by contacts they were able to maintain with their own constituents and the people whom they serve in their own constituencies.

On the definition he has given regarding the attitude we should take toward indemnities and allowances of this kind there will not be debate. I think there will probably be agreement on the part of every member that it is most desirable that members be drawn from the widest possible variety of skills and occupations. May I say also drawn not just from a variety of those who make up the population of this country but also from the two sexes. We are doing our best on this side and we hope that the number of lady members of parliament will be increased. Possibly the recognition of the expenses to which lady members are put in the establishment of living quarters here will have some bearing on the number that may be able to offer themselves as candidates in coming elections.

There certainly will be no disagreement about the fact that members should be able to have their families with them when they are here. There certainly will be no disagreement about the fact that every hon. member of this house should be able to maintain those amenities that may be open to any hon. member. Undoubtedly the quality of service and the approach to the problems that confront us will be moulded and shaped in some substantial measure by the extent to which hon. members are able to retain their constant association with those family contacts that mean so much to every one of us. I am sure that all that is agreed upon.

Then the point is raised as to what the compensation should be. It is not a salary in the sense of a full-time salary and it is not intended to be income in the ordinary sense. There is a point that arises and a question that cannot be easily dismissed. It is a question which has engaged the attention of those who have been called upon to consider this subject on earlier occasions. Agreeing upon the definition of the payment and agreeing upon the general approach to this problem, we are all confronted with the question: What is the appropriate amount?

At that point we are compelled to ask ourselves: How are these figures arrived at? There may be perhaps a greater tendency on the other side to agree in the omniscience of the government without any supporting evidence than there would be on this side. The conviction that an indemnity or allowance should be added, the conviction that the kind of parliament that the people of Canada want may be helped greatly by payments that will attract all who would be willing to offer themselves, does not in itself answer that question.

On other occasions it was regarded as advisable that some steps be taken to find out what would be appropriate. I notice the Prime Minister referred to the words which he used in Vancouver in July of last year in regard to the intention of the government to take steps which would facilitate the procedure in this house and in that way make it possible for members of parliament to give more effective service. I did not notice any word in the quotation he mentioned which suggested that it was the intention of the government to make this increase in the indemnities or allowances. I do not think it would be desirable that anybody be under a misapprehension that the quotation which has been placed on the record was intended to place before the people that this subject was embraced by those words.

As the Prime Minister has pointed out, we have been told that it is not intended to change the $2,000 payment which was provided in 1945. May I read the words of the then prime minister, Mr. King, when he presented for second reading the bill which dealt with this subject:

> The principle of this bill is to provide an allowance of $2,000 a year to members of parliament to enable them to defray expenses incidental to their calling as members. It provides that deductions shall be made from this amount on the basis of non-attendance of members. It also provides in the case of ministers of the crown, senators, and the hon. the leader of the opposition, that the allowance shall be regarded as taxable income. That is the extent of the measure.

It will be seen that while this was not subject to income tax in the case of hon. members of the house, it was subject to taxation in the case of ministers of the crown, leaders of the opposition in the House of Commons and the Senate and of members of the Senate. That very fact indicated that this was not some reserved amount and that that decision that it should not be taxable was related to the way in which it was paid and the total amount being received. Therefore the question arises in the mind of every hon. member: If there is to be an increase in the indemnity such as is proposed, should this part be exempt from taxation in any case? There are a great many Canadians who do believe that the indemnities should be increased, who want to make sure that those who serve the public in parliament are not called upon to make too great a sacrifice, but who nevertheless would be inclined to think that it would be a very healthy thing if every cent we received were subject to taxation.

Whether that contention is right or not there are a great many people who have already indicated their opinion to the effect that those who are assuming responsibility for the taxation of the people should themselves be fully conscious of the impact of that taxation on whatever they are paid. That may or may not be sound argument, but at least it should be possible to explore this in the way any matters of that kind can be explored, and the reasons for and against fully examined and consideration given as to whether a larger payment, if it is to be provided, should not be fully taxable so that there is before every hon. member of this house and of parliament a full consciousness of the impact of taxation upon the money that is received.

At least we can say this, that it is quite certain the voters of Canada would not approve a complete exemption. If they do approve of some exemption, then at what point do they think that exemption should begin? These are things that certainly call for some consideration.

The Prime Minister has said that the basic allowance of $4,000 has not been changed for thirty years. On the one hand that would seem to be a very cogent argument in support of the contention that something be done in view of the greatly changed value of the dollar in that length of time, and the greatly increased length of the sessions of this parliament. It also suggests that, if this figure has stood for thirty years, a few weeks or a few months more will not be unreasonable in arriving at a correct and sound decision as to what should be done in this particular case.

The Prime Minister has said that the government thinks it would be bad for the prestige of parliament if there were any possibility of the suggestion that two sessions be held for the purpose of giving a higher indemnity. I am sure the Prime Minister will be the first to recall that I used this argument on an earlier occasion to express objection to the calling of special sessions which produced that result. Most certainly I agree with that statement. Most certainly I agree that whatever indemnity is paid, it should be an indemnity that is paid for a continuous session that will permit the conduct of all the public business of Canada without the possibility of some additional amount being paid under any circumstances that could bring parliament under possible suspicion of seeking to improve its own position. I was going to use another expression but I will satisfy myself with "improve its own position".

It can be said, and said very properly, that no one is taken by surprise by the introduction of this measure. Steps to increase the indemnity or allowances to members have been under consideration for some time and have been openly discussed and, shall I say, somewhat vigorously promoted. This has found its way into the press and may I say that the reports I have read have correctly interpreted the discussion that I believe has taken place. There is no surprise in regard to that. But, Mr. Chairman, I do not recall the discussion of some of these other subjects that are brought forward at this time. The discussion has related to the increase in the indemnity or allowances to members and there has been a great deal of interest shown in that subject, as members on the opposite side are well aware. I have not attempted in any way to leave the impression that there is not a general belief that indemnity and allowances should be adequate, when we decide what adequate is. That is something we should determine.

Let us remember that no hon. member can satisfy himself he is dealing with this by the same standards we would apply to ordinary legislation if he is prepared to deal with the whole subject matter of this resolution simply because he believes that the indemnity to hon. members is proper or otherwise. This resolution is a rolled-up package. This is not just a single question of indemnity to members. This rolled-up package is an interesting grab-bag and there are a number of interesting features to it. When we open the package we find that it deals with the indemnity of hon. members which has been discussed so frequently and, may I say, with a very high degree of understanding between members on both sides of the house. When I say understanding I mean understanding of the problems, because there is one point I wish to make quite clear, Mr. Chairman. There has been no consultation in regard to this measure.

The Prime Minister very properly and very frankly has stated that the government has accepted responsibility for making this decision. But there was no prior discussion as to the wisdom of this course or the procedure to be followed. Therefore, we must examine this on the basis that the government, having accepted the responsibility of presenting this resolution and proposing legislation of this kind, is placing the duty upon hon. members of considering at this time, first, whether it is expedient that the legislation be introduced, and, second, of considering at a later date how to deal with the legislation itself if this resolution is passed. The first thing that we find—

Mr. St. Laurent: I wonder if the Leader of the Opposition would just permit me to say this. I would not like him to leave any impression from his remarks that I have been discourteous either to him or to the leaders of the other parties.

Mr. Drew: No, no.

Mr. St. Laurent: I informed them of what responsibility we were taking and in doing so I did not ask them to make any kind of commitment because I realized that we had to take full responsibility for bringing the matter for decision before parliament. I did wish to do them the courtesy of telling them what responsibility we had decided to take.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, there was no suggestion on my part of any discourtesy.

Mr. St. Laurent: I know, but I would not wish anyone to think that there might be some kind of a suggestion to that effect. I know the Leader of the Opposition did not wish to make that suggestion.

Mr. Drew: There was no suggestion on my part of any discourtesy on the part of the Prime Minister, but since the point has been raised I wish to keep the record quite clear. The first I knew of this, and this is no suggestion of discourtesy, was when the Prime Minister said the government took full responsibility. The first I heard of it was the day after the government had made its decision and the Prime Minister asked me to meet him in his office just before this motion was to be presented to the house and he informed me what the government intended to do. There was no consultation either as to the method or content of this resolution, and I mention that so there will be no misunderstanding on the other side or any suggestion that we at any time, by implication or otherwise, either approved or had an opportunity to approve of the procedure that is being followed or the details that have been given to us. In fact, I again emphasize the fact that the Prime Minister did take the position he has explained. He said to me that he would not expect me to express my opinion but that he was simply informing me of the decision for which the government took full responsibility.

The second subject that we find in this rolled-up package is indemnities for members of the Senate. Are the members of the committee fully informed as to the expenses of the members of the Senate and as to the difficulty of obtaining candidates for appointment to the Senate? I confess that I have heard no suggestion of great difficulty in obtaining members of the other house, even at the figure now being paid. I only mention this point because these, after all, are things that have to be borne in mind in deciding what is appropriate.

The next subject we find in this rolled-up package is the increase to the members of the government. We have been informed that this is to be an increase of $5,000. No matter what views may be held in any other part of the house, the Prime Minister has indicated his belief in our constitutional system and has continued a long recognition of the position of the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate and the Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons and to whoever may occupy those positions from time to time has applied whatever proposal is made.

This resolution still further deals with the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker and it also provides for retroactive payments. This is quite a collection of things that we find in this rolled-up package. No; we are not just dealing with this single question of the indemnity to members. Surely no hon. member of this committee is going to go blindly ahead and make a grab for the whole thing just because he believes that part of it is right. After all in dealing with a resolution which says that it is expedient that certain things be done, as members of the House of Commons we have a responsibility to know that it is expedient. We also shall have a responsibility, when the bill is before us, to know that the contents of that bill contain figures and results which are in keeping with the situation fully examined by the measures that are provided under our parliamentary system. Therefore the modest conviction of any hon. member that he is fully entitled to the compensation provided for a member of parliament is not in itself sufficient argument to carry with it all the rest of these things unless we have convincing supporting arguments that justify so wide and sweeping a change.

In so far as parliament is concerned may I say that, while I may not have heard of the difficulty of obtaining members for the other house, I do not wish any remark I may make to convey any suggestion of reflection upon the dignity of that body. In the House of Commons on a number of occasions I have expressed my own belief that the Senate has an important place in our parliamentary system and that long ago there should have been a reform that would make it possible for it to carry out its duties. But, Mr. Chairman, this is not something that is dealt with for the first time today. It was dealt with a few years ago in Britain, where a similar system is in operation. There a select committee was set up and it conducted extended inquiries. A great deal of evidence was heard. Prior to the hearing of that evidence questionnaires had been submitted not only to the members of parliament but also to others who could give appropriate information about the cost of maintaining living quarters, transportation costs and also about some of the problems of obtaining candidates for membership in parliament itself. After extended inquiry, that select committee brought in a report in March, 1946. Its first recommendation was:

(a) The salaries of members should be increased to £1,000 a year, of which £500 should be allowed to all members as an expense allowance free of income tax.

That was the first of several recommendations. I mention that first recommendation for this reason. It will be seen that there is no arbitrary division which suggests that $2,000 would be the exactly appropriate amount in relation to the $8,000 that is payable under another provision, any more than it was a specially designated proportion of the $4,000 that had been received for some thirty years. Rightly or wrongly, in Britain it was suggested that half of the total amount received be exempt. I do not mention this by way of supporting that figure as a fraction. What I mention it for is to suggest that it indicates that there may be a good deal of difference of opinion and that this was the result of extended inquiry. After inquiry it might be that the decision would be that no part of it should be exempt from income tax. At the moment that would be my own thought as to the likely conclusion that would be reached. But when we consider the dignity of parliament, even having in mind the fact that living costs are lower in Britain, may I suggest that in Britain it has been possible to retain the dignity of parliament fairly well on what corresponds to $2,800 a year.

I am not suggesting that that is an appropriate amount. I am not suggesting that the great service performed by members of parliament in Britain is adequately taken care of by that amount. I am only saying that the dignity of parliament seems to have been well retained with an amount much smaller than that now placed before us. What I am saying at this point is that obviously the matter calls for some consideration.

It will also be recalled that in the United States a commission was appointed to consider the question of allowances to members of congress. There the tendency was the other way. There the figures recommended were far beyond what we would be likely to consider here. I merely put forward that thought again to say that there is no dogmatic rule by which you can arrive at the figure that should be paid. In fact, in considering this rolled-up package, I think we all must ask where the figures were obtained from, how they were arrived at, and just exactly how we believe that the present situation would justify a decision of this kind without the same type of examination as that upon which we would insist if we were dealing with any similar money bill.

Let those hon. members who seemed to brush aside the suggestion that the subject matter of this resolution be placed before a royal commission remember that we have had a number of money bills and measures of that kind before us and that the conviction has been fairly uniformly expressed in the house that before we decide upon measures of that kind inquiries should be made and evidence should be heard in order to assure members full knowledge before they commit themselves to such expenditures. If that is sound in the case of money bills affecting other people it is ten times as sound when it affects payments to ourselves decided by this parliament.

Again, may I point out that the Prime Minister has emphasized that it is thirty years since there was a change. Since it has been so long we urge that this measure stand and that before we proceed with it a royal commission should hear evidence and make recommendations. I suggest a royal commission instead of a select committee for a definite reason. After all, these payments embrace not only members of parliament but also members of the Senate, members of the government, the leaders of the opposition, the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker. The resolution covers a number of subjects which call for examination and which affect members personally.

I am suggesting a royal commission because a royal commission would remove the suggestion that might be made in the case of a select committee composed of members of various parties in the house, namely, that it was making its recommendations from the point of view of personal consideration. I agree with what the Prime Minister said about doing everything we can to elevate the dignity of parliament and to extend and justify the respect of our people for the institution of parliament. I submit with the utmost earnestness that this is a case where a royal commission can perform an extremely useful service. I submit that it is exactly the kind of problem where a royal commission would be desirable. Let it hear evidence from members and others and then make its recommendations as to what would be appropriate.

May I anticipate any suggestion that this would be a derogation from the responsibility of parliament by pointing out that no royal commission can legislate anything. A royal commission can simply examine the evidence and then make recommendations which would come before parliament. It would then be for parliament, on the basis of those recommendations, to reject or to adopt in whole or in part anything put forward by the royal commission. Nevertheless we would have that kind of objective examination of the problem which it might be very difficult to assure by appointing a joint committee.

What is even more important, assuming that a committee would be objective—and I would express my own belief that members of this house would approach the matter in an objective manner—nevertheless the public would be assured that, when the figures came before the house for its consideration, this was something in which members of parliament themselves had had no part.

The Prime Minister has spoken about increased expenses and the increased length of sessions of parliament. Here is a consideration that I think perhaps calls for attention. In this tremendous country of ours a question arises as to whether the financial sacrifice is not greater when people live a long distance from parliament. I am not putting this forward as an expression of what I think should be done but simply as an example of one of those things which should call for some consideration. The Prime Minister has said that if we are going to have the kind of service in the house that the people have a right to expect, and particularly from members of the government, who do carry a heavy burden, we must remember the high salaries paid to executives in business. That is undoubtedly so. We should remember that there is a general belief, and I think it is a belief largely shared by people of every occupation, that reasonably high salaries in return for highly efficient administration do provide satisfactory results for everybody, not only for the person who receives the high remuneration.

There is an increasing belief in industry that where there is a highly efficient industrial organization it is economic to pay large salaries to get the very best executives possible. But, Mr. Chairman, that proposition presupposes an efficient business organization. I do not think you will ever hear the suggestion made that you are going to make an inefficient business efficient simply by paying high salaries. I think that the two go hand in hand. At this point I would recall, without any reflection on the good faith or earnestness of those who serve in different cabinet positions, that over and over again we have urged that there be an examination of the whole organization and set-up of government so that there may be applied to the organization of government the same procedure that every business would apply from time to time if it expected to avoid bankruptcy. So far that has not been approved. We still hold the view that this is desirable.

High returns to executives in government should go hand in hand with efficient government organization just as high salaries to executives go hand in hand with efficiency in any other enterprise. Again, we have sought on different occasions to have a review of the Senate. It is so many years since the Liberal party promised reform of the Senate that they have forgotten it.

Mr. Sinclair: We did.

Mr. Drew: I hear somebody across the way saying "we did". They reformed it in the way they go about reforming anything. They made it completely subservient to their own party. But there are some people who do not think that is the way to make the Senate efficient within our constitution. In fact, I do not think the Prime Minister does or, speaking seriously, that any hon. member on the other side really does. Nevertheless these interjections sometimes do carry even beyond this house. We have urged that there be that long-delayed reform of the Senate that would make it possible for the members of the Senate to give the kind of service that I believe they want to give. I am satisfied that they, as Canadians, want to do the best they can for Canada, whether or not it was difficult to get them there. I do believe that this is long overdue, and that increased allowances to members of the Senate and the executive associated with the Senate also should be related to some of these reforms that would increase the opportunity to give effective service.

There is another point, Mr. Chairman, that I wish to make. I ask hon. members to bear this point in mind. We have taken the position over and over again, or shall I say that the government has taken the position over and over again, that it is not right for this parliament to make decisions that will increase expenditures from public funds without careful, extended and adequate consideration of all the facts. I do not need to review the number of occasions, even recently, when approval in principle was accompanied by the statement that it was essential that great responsibility be shown towards the public revenue, and that before we could justify substantial expenditure of public funds all the facts should be fully available and should be examined.

If we could justify to ourselves that explanation for delay in dealing with any other problem, then we must take sufficient time to obtain that kind of information in regard to a measure of this nature when we are going to be the beneficiaries if this bill becomes law. I repeat what was implied in the amendment I proposed earlier, but which was ruled out of order. I state my request that the government defer consideration of this measure, that it should not proceed any further at this stage or any subsequent stage without assurance that before we discuss the bill we will have an inquiry by a royal commission to go into the whole subject matter of this problem. May I add that we should have an assurance by the Prime Minister, on behalf of the government, that Senate reform will be tackled and that steps will be taken to carry out a re-organization of government along lines that have been suggested in this house from time to time. I believe this is sound business practice. When we talk about sound business practice and the recognition that you must pay the executive to do an executive job and that the return must be adequate for everyone to get the right kind of people, let us make sure we have taken the steps necessary to provide a framework within which the kind of people we want can do the kind of job the people of Canada want.

At this point, Mr. Chairman, I can only make this as a proposal. I do say I believe this is a time when great caution should be shown in doing anything that might suggest we were any less cautious in dealing with our own affairs than we were in dealing with the affairs of other people who depend upon this parliament for action of one kind or another in relation to their daily affairs. We have people hoping for action from this government along many lines. I need not discuss them now. Every hon. member knows many subjects in regard to which the people of this country are calling for action from this government. Let us be sure that no suggestion goes out from this parliament that, while we are reluctant to act in regard to the things that affect the daily lives of our people, we will act with such speed, or with little information, when our own advantage may be concerned.

There is one way that the debate can be terminated at this point for the time being, and that would be an assurance by the Prime Minister that a royal commission will be appointed to conduct the kind of inquiry that will give us the detached and objective findings on which we could subsequently act with confidence, so that the people of Canada would believe no personal interest dictated the decisions we make here.

Mr. Coldwell: The Prime Minister, in his remarks this afternoon, Mr. Chairman, suggested that members in all quarters of the house, and belonging to the various parties in the house, should decide what should be done on the basis of what is best for this institution and for this country. I believe that is the basis upon which we have to make a decision. I believe that we cannot shift the responsibility of a decision onto the shoulders of anyone else; that is, in effect, what we would be doing if we turned the matter over to any outside body. I say that immediately after the Leader of the Opposition has spoken.

This is a matter upon which I am certain there will be differences of approach and differences of opinion, not only amongst the members of the house but in the various parts, and amongst the people, of our country. What we have to consider is this: whether or not some increase in the indemnities paid members of parliament is warranted. Personally, I have long held, and I have not refrained from saying so, that some increase in the indemnities of members of parliament has been warranted for some time. I have stated that in the House of Commons on previous occasions, and I have stated it in my own constituency. In speaking to some members of this house before the general election, and one or two members of the government, concerning the possibility of an increase in the indemnities, I said I thought it would be much wiser to have the increase laid before the parliament which was dissolved last June so that they would take effect when this parliament assembled. I believe the country would have understood.

I believe candidates who were seeking election or members who were seeking re-election would have known what to expect when they got here, and would have been able to make their arrangements. However, that was not done.

The Prime Minister was good enough, as the Leader of the Opposition has indicated, in a courteous and proper manner, to ask the leaders of the opposition groups to meet him—I believe separately, for I met him separately—so that he could tell us what the government was going to propose. In doing so, he made it abundantly clear he was not asking any one of the opposition leaders to make any commitments, but he was giving us that information in order that we might think over what was to be proposed in this house. Consequently, I was able to go to my colleagues in the C.C.F. party in this house and convey to them in confidence what the Prime Minister had told me. We were, therefore, able to discuss the situation.

I want to say very clearly that most of my colleagues—and I use the word "most"—consider that some increase in the indemnity to hon. members of this house is warranted. I want to make that abundantly clear. Most of us, however, think, in discussing this, that the government's proposals this afternoon are higher than are necessary. I remember that in the parliament which was dissolved in June of last year we had six sessions. During those six sessions, which occurred in four years, those of us who were re-elected in 1949 received on an average $6,000 for the four years; that is, the total indemnities that were paid to us in the four years amounted to $24,000, which gave us $6,000 a year. In addition, of course, we got the expense money which, if added to the total, would mean that on the average hon. members received in the last parliament almost $8,000 for each of the four years we were here.

I want to say to the Prime Minister and to the government that we believe that was ample; we believe that is about what should have been proposed now. There may be differences of opinion regarding that, differences of opinion among my own friends, but most of us believe that. I say that, probably because of the experience we had over the last four years, we feel that that would have been the right amount, in other words that the total indemnity proposed should have been $6,000.

The government has decided—and I understand the reason—to maintain the $2,000 expense allowance. The reason is that we passed an amendment to the Income Tax Act, and I believe all the legislatures followed suit, making one-third of the indemnity exempt from income tax, and many of the municipal bodies in the country have followed the examples of this parliament and the legislatures. I can quite understand why the government say if this has been the generally accepted practice in public bodies in this country, then it would be difficult for this parliament to upset that practice at the present time.

I may say that I think we would have been wiser in 1945—looking back now to those days—to have increased the indemnity somewhat then and made the whole amount taxable. But we did not do that. We set a precedent; we changed the Income Tax Act, and the result is that all the legislatures and many of the municipal bodies followed suit and made part of their emoluments tax-free.

When the bill is in committee, at the proper stage, I shall try to put our ideas in this particular on the record, that the indemnity should be $6,000 plus the $2,000 expense allowance. That is what most of my colleagues think should be the solution.

I turn now to the other factors and other proposals in the resolution. I shall say this. I said it in the house once before when the residence of the prime minister was under discussion some few years ago. Regardless of the personality of the prime minister—that is not the point; the point is the position of the prime minister in this country—I think most of us feel that the emoluments of the prime minister of this country certainly should not be very much less than the emoluments of the governor of the Bank of Canada or of the president of the Canadian National Railways. If the Prime Minister's emoluments are increased now they will still be considerably less than the emoluments of the two gentlemen whom I have just named.

Of course the same considerations may apply—we have some reservations regarding this—to the ministers of the crown who surround the Prime Minister; but there is one thing we cannot approve because of the position we take regarding it. We cannot approve the proposal to increase the indemnities of the hon. gentlemen who occupy seats in the other place. We believe that today this branch of the parliamentary institution—and I will not quote the words of Shelley regarding an unreformed senate; I suppose it would not be parliamentary if I did—is archaic and unrepresentative of the country. I say we cannot support that part of the Prime Minister's proposals because we view the other place in the manner in which I have just indicated. As long as the Senate is there I am not going to say anything against the senators, because I think many of them are very fine people.

But it is an institution, unrepresentative, archaic, out-of-date, beyond the House of Lords in the powers that it now has.

A word with regard to the payment of the indemnities. All of us approve the method suggested by the Prime Minister of paying this on a 12-month basis. As to the dating of it, there may be some differences of opinion; but certainly it puts us on the basis of having no additional indemnities if parliament is called twice or indeed three times a year, and I think that is a very good thing. I never liked the two sessions. The Prime Minister may recall that on one occasion I objected to the possibility of it privately to him, but this obviates any misunderstanding that could occur across the country regarding the payment for two sessions, and that is an excellent feature of the proposals now before us.

Since the annual basis is desirable, it is desirable that the amount shall be paid in equal instalments, month by month, and paid from one election to the other. On the basis of the indemnity payable for 12 months no additional payment is possible by this house other than on a 12-month basis.

These are the principal points that I wanted to lay before the committee as the point of view of most of my colleagues of this party. Like the Prime Minister, we have considered this and we have come to conclusions in our own minds. I have placed before the committee what is the consensus of the largest group in our party regarding this very important matter.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, we have listened to the previous speakers with a good deal of interest. Before going into a general discussion of the subject may I deal with one or two things the Leader of the Opposition has said, and also one or two things the leader of the C.C.F. party has said.

In the first place, may I say that I agree with the Prime Minister and others that this is not a party matter; it is a matter that parliament as a whole must decide, and upon which each individual member must express himself. The Leader of the Opposition has recommended a royal commission, which does not strike my fancy at all; in the first place, because it does seem to me that when anything of this or of almost any similar nature arises our Conservative friends always suggest a royal commission. If I have heard that royal commission argument once over the past number of years I must have heard it a dozen times. My colleague the hon. member for Wetaskiwin whispers in my ear that perhaps this is the way the Conservative party has of solving the unemployment problem. If we went forward with all the commissions they recommend everybody would be on one.

After all, does this involve such tremendous investigation that it requires a royal commission? There are perhaps a couple of dozen salaries involved. What is involved with respect to the increase in indemnities will vary, I suppose, from about $7,000 to $12,000, but surely it would not need a royal commission to decide that. I do not think the point is well taken.

I have not consulted with all my colleagues, but I think we are in favour of the suggestion made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) in respect to the Senate. I am one who believes in the Senate. I think the Senate can be made to perform exceptionally useful functions, but there is one thing to be considered in respect to allowances for those in the other place. After all, they do not sit quite as long as we do. They do have periods of time when they can go back home and look after their businesses. On the other hand, when a session is not being held they do not have constituencies to look after. We do, and in recent years we have found that our job has become a full-time job.

Then with respect to the resolution itself, I believe the country has been given some considerable notice that this resolution was expected. I am not familiar with the words of the Prime Minister in Vancouver referred to by the Leader of the Opposition, but the press have carried various dispatches referring to this particular measure. During that time the public and the press have had considerable time to comment on the matter. Except in a few cases the editorial comments I have read have pretty well been in favour of something of this kind. I have read some criticism in respect to increases for the Senate, and in respect to tax-free expense allowances, but generally speaking the press have favoured some such move as this.

As far as actual protests from the people are concerned, I can go only by the number of protests I have received. I will tell the house how many I have received—three letters. One of them was really bad. It called me everything under the sun. I turned to my secretary and said, "That fellow is a stinker." She said, "You had better be careful. It may not be a fellow; it may be a woman." The letter was not signed. However, it was not from anybody in my constituency so I did not worry very much about it.

The other letter contained a modified protest, and the writer was quite gentlemanly in his manner of writing his letter. I was somewhat disturbed about the third letter, which came from a war veteran who was on the old age pension and receiving $20 per month by way of war veterans allowance. He wrote and said, "I am glad you are getting an increase, as I think you members of parliament are doing a pretty good job, but I do wish they would increase the war veterans allowance."

I should like to comment on that, because I fancy that the general belief among a lot of people whose incomes are very small would be something like this. Here are these members who have authority to increase their indemnities, yet we have to live on a shoestring. The psychology is bad. I do feel for them, but even though this measure were not introduced I am sure it would not mean an increase in such social services as old age pensions, war veterans allowances and the like. Of course it would not mean that.

Social services in this country run into a tremendously high figure, millions upon millions of dollars. I am sure if members of parliament were given a choice of having their allowances increased or of having an increase in social services such as old age pensions, war veterans allowances and the like, every hon. member would say, "By all means increase the old age pensions and war veterans allowances." Every one of us would do that. However, there is little relationship between the amount of money involved in this, even though it may sound like a lot, and the amount involved in increasing old age pensions, allowances and so forth by $10 or $15 a month.

There is another point which has been covered already. For the most part incomes have been practically doubled all along the line during the past number of years while our indemnities have remained the same. However, there is a feeling abroad which has been indicated in some of the editorials I have read, that while it is true others have received increases in salaries, wages and so forth, members of parliament have the power to increase their indemnities and as a result get it out of the taxpayer.

There is a misconception there. Those people do not realize when they say that, even editorially, that we are all taxpayers in one form or another. When the levels of salaries and wages are raised throughout the country it is written into the cost of production. A higher cost of living must come out of the taxpayers. The only difference is that it is not obtained through the income tax channel. It comes out of the baby's milk bottle, or out of the shoes and clothes we buy for our children. We are all taxpayers and it comes out of the taxpayer just as much as these other things do, though through a slightly different channel. I wish those who comment on these things would first make certain they have the proper picture.

There is another point that has not been considered, and that is that after all the government, which means the Canadian people or the national treasury of the country, is going to get back a pretty good slice of this in income tax. When people look at the Prime Minister's salary of, for instance, $25,000 they whistle and say, "My goodness, that is quite a chunk". Well, it is quite a chunk. I do not know how much it costs the Prime Minister to live, but even supposing it cost him $10,000—I happen to have some tax tables here—on that extra $15,000 he will pay over $5,000 in income tax. Therefore he does not get that $25,000. The same comparison can be applied relatively to the other cabinet ministers, and it applies relatively to us too.

I figured out my own income tax, and on the proposed increase I am going to pay a couple of thousand dollars. That is never considered when editorial comment is written. People see only the bold figures, forgetting that the government is going to get something back.

There is another point I would like to bring to the attention of the house, and particularly to the attention of the Minister of National Revenue. A great deal of editorial comment—I know I keep using that particular phrase, but after all if we want to get the opinion of the country we usually read the papers—stresses the fact that we get a $2,000 expense allowance tax free, and it is claimed we are the only ones in the country who get a tax-free allowance. But that is not true.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Hansell: We are not the only ones who get expense allowances free of tax. Every commercial traveller, anyone who goes out as an employee of a company, has an expense account on which he lives when he is away from home. He hands in that expense account, and he does not have to pay any tax on it. The expenses are written into the cost of the operations of the company and into the cost of production, and the taxpayer pays them. That is something that is not generally realized.

While we are in committee I would like the Minister of National Revenue to offset that opinion by telling us what categories of expense allowances are similar to ours and therefore tax free. I think the information would surprise the country. In fact I think it would be advisable if he did give the house that information.

An hon. Member: How many are there?

Mr. Hansell: I do not know, but there must be many. It is about time for me to resume my seat, but let me conclude with this. I spoke at a public meeting during the Christmas recess, and at that meeting there were gathered some farmers and labour men. During the question period someone came up with this question: "Do you expect increases to come forward this session?" I knew what was in that gentleman's mind because I knew him and he was no supporter of mine. So I said to him: "I do not know. All I can say is that the newspapers indicate that something of this sort will be brought forward." But I said: "I will tell you what I will do if you want me to comment on whether or not I will accept. I will comment in this fashion. When you people refuse to take an increase in your salaries and wages or when you people refuse to take an increase in the price of your products, then I will refuse to take an increase in mine."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hansell: That is just the way I felt about it. I will say this, to a large proportion of the people in my constituency, my income will sound big to them. As a matter of fact it sounds big to me because I do know that if I were not in public life, if I were following my profession all the year round, I know I would not get anything near what I am getting now, and my expenses would be less. I am one of the fortunate ones in being here, but I have not been able to figure out how a lawyer—and I do not want to be hard on lawyers—can come down here for $6,000 a year. All I can say is, you must be a sort of two-by-four lawyer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hansell: If I could not go out and practise law and make more than $6,000 a year I would eat my hat. The same applies to doctors, or any man in a profession, or any man with his own business. We had a man here at the last session of parliament. He did not run this time because his seat was cut out. We could have found him a seat but he said to me, "You don't need to find me a seat. My practice was worth $15,000 a year before I came here and now it is all shot to pieces. I am not coming back again." That was his comment.

All these things have to be recognized. We must also remember that some of our members have passed on and some members were defeated before the retirement allowance came into being. They were poor men—

The Deputy Chairman: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. gentleman but I have to advise him that it is five o'clock and the house will now proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

Mr. Hansell: I am through anyway, Mr. Chairman.

PRIVATE BILLS

SECOND READINGS

Bill No. 169, respecting Victorian Order of Nurses for Canada.—Mr. McIlraith.

Bill No. 170, respecting the Associated Canadian Travellers.—Mr. Hanna.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE QUORUM OF HOUSE OF COMMONS

On the order:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Knowles for the second reading of Bill No. 81, an act to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1952, with respect to the quorum of the House of Commons.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I had the honour of moving the adjournment of the debate the other day, and presumably I am not in a position to do that now. However, in view of the arrangement made with the hon. member, if someone else would do so I think it would meet the convenience of all hon. members.

On motion of Mr. McIlraith the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: The business which was to be considered during this hour devoted to private and public bills being exhausted, the house will now revert to the business which was under consideration prior to five o'clock.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE SALARIES OF SPEAKERS AND DEPUTY SPEAKER, SESSIONAL ALLOWANCES OF MEMBERS, ETC.

The house resumed consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. St. Laurent—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce measures to amend

(a) the Senate and House of Commons Act to increase the salaries of the Speakers and the Deputy Speaker, the sessional allowances of members of the Senate and of the House of Commons and the annual allowances of the members occupying the recognized positions of leader of the government in the Senate, leader of the opposition in the Senate and Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons;

(b) the Salaries Act to increase the salaries of ministers mentioned in sections 4 and 5 thereof, substituting for the Minister of Resources and Development, the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources and adding thereto the Associate Minister of National Defence.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to say a great deal, but there is one thing we can say and that is that the Prime Minister is not a coward. He does not want to pass responsibility even to a royal commission, to the Leader of the Opposition or to any other leader. He is taking full responsibility. I think we have a right to be proud that we have a Prime Minister who will face the music in this respect.

As to the increase in salary, I do not care a bit about it.

Mr. Fleming: Do not call it salary.

Mr. McIvor: I do not think I will need it any longer than 20 years, anyway, and I can get along on the little bit extra that I can earn. However, I have known members of parliament who were broke when they got through, and who lost their businesses. We must consider these people. I listened to the Leader of the Opposition, and I do not think he is opposed to this increase. I do not think the opposition group is opposed to this increase. But they say we are doing it in the wrong way. That is all I have to say.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is one of these matters which come before parliament which impose a tremendous responsibility on each and every member of the House of Commons. That was stated by the Prime Minister in his opening remarks. It is in that spirit that I rise to support the suggestion made by my leader, the Leader of the Opposition, that parliament and the country have not sufficient information upon which to act, as parliament is arbitrarily asked to act under the terms of this resolution.

Only the other day I was reading the works of the French philosopher Diderot. That philosopher said that when the artist thinks of money, he loses his sense of beauty. I think those words apply with particular force when we debate a question such as this affecting, as it does, the democratic rights in our country and the need for maintaining parliament in its amplitude so that it may truly represent and lead the Canadian people.

Someone said that a royal commission would shift responsibility. It would do nothing of the sort. Is the government shifting responsibility when it asks for the setting up of a royal commission in connection with the criminal law, in order to deal with certain amendments to be made to the Criminal Code? Nothing of the kind. I hope that is not shifting responsibility. The other day the Minister of Justice announced that a royal commission would be set up in order to secure the opinions of people generally qualified to speak with regard to certain changes to be made in the law.

Above everything else, as we discuss this matter, we dare not allow the Canadian people to come to the conclusion that parliament, because we have the power here, can become a grab-bag at the option of any of us or all of us. I believe that a royal commission would go far to enable the people of Canada and parliament to learn the facts. Certainly the Prime Minister has placed before parliament no reason why some of the increases to which reference has been made should, in fact, be made or why the figure fixed in this resolution as the increase for members of both houses of parliament should indeed be the proper figure.

The Prime Minister endeavoured to answer the possible charge that this matter was left until after the election before action was taken by parliament. On July 9 he made a radio speech which, as I heard it, gave no indication to the Canadian people that, in the first session after the election, there was to be an increase in the indemnities. We who were elected—we were not conscripted to be candidates—were elected on the basis that the indemnities we were to receive were, in fact, the ones we had been receiving. I find it difficult to understand why this measure, if it is so necessary, should have been introduced now, immediately after an election. I find it difficult to understand why it should not have been introduced last session, to be implemented after the election. In 1920, when an increase took place, it was within a few months of the expected date of the election.

One thing further I should like the Prime Minister to explain is this. If this increase is necessary, or if it is required to be made, why should it be made retroactive to November 12, the beginning of the present session? What is the reason for that?

Mr. St. Laurent: Because the amount is practically the same. Under the present law the payment for each day that parliament is in session, whether it be a sitting day or not, is $20. Under the new schedule it would be $21 and a few cents, so that it is practically the same. For purposes of accounting it will be more convenient just to have the payments go along as they are made under the present law and to have whatever remains unpaid then extended over the remaining months of the 12-month period rather than paid in a lump sum at the end of the session.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister's explanation answers the question in part, if not in full.

Mr. St. Laurent: We felt that it would be undesirable to have it retroactive in any way.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On the face of it, it had the appearance of being retroactive; but the explanation given now, coupled with what the Prime Minister said a while ago, namely that we would receive the same rate of instalments until the end of this session and then continue the instalments thereafter, in effect meets the criticism that I make. Nonetheless, the impression formed at first glance would be that it was retroactive.

I see no reason for haste in connection with this matter. A royal commission would enable a full and frank discussion to take place and evidence to be placed before the commission by those who are not interested in the results. I believe the people of Canada are not in favour of this measure as now constituted. At a time like this I think the people of Canada are asking the members of this chamber to practise a degree of self-control that is not apparent when a measure such as this is brought forward with such haste for the purpose of putting it through in the same manner.

If a royal commission should agree as to the necessity of an increase in indemnities in order to keep good men in parliament it could have no other result than to place before us information that we do not have now, and would provide a cooling-off period for the people as a whole as they became educated day by day with respect to the need for this measure. I implore the government not to push through this measure by the force of their majority.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member will of course remember that the question of a royal commission was negatived.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not hear Your Honour's remark.

The Chairman: The question of a royal commission was negatived before we went into committee.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, with profound respect, an opportunity was not afforded to negative it. It was a ruling of the Speaker that the amendment was not in order, and not having been in order he ruled it out of order. But I trust Your Honour is not making a ruling to the effect that once the Speaker rules out a matter on technical grounds, the House of Commons is not permitted thereafter to discuss that which at the moment could not technically form part of an amendment.

Not contravening Your Honour's ruling, I say that a royal commission would throw light upon many parts of this measure that are now difficult to understand. We are asked to raise the standard of parliament by an increase in indemnities. If a cure will indeed be effected by an increase in indemnities, why should parliament, in going to the medicine chest in order to improve the health of parliament, be placed in the position of having to accept, in addition to the medicine that will be good for it, additional pills that I do not believe the Canadian people want parliament to take?

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I am only going to say a very few words at this stage of the debate, largely to indicate where I stand with regard to this question. As the Prime Minister was explaining the purpose of the resolution to the committee I was struck by the thought that he must have been a very effective lawyer in court. As a matter of fact, as he explained the difficulties and hardships of members of parliament I began to feel that I had suffered quite considerably in the public interest during the last 24 years. I was afraid there was something hypnotic about his words, and I closed my eyes and began to make a rough calculation of the years of my life.

I was brought up on a farm, and on a farm you go to work pretty early in life. I have put down ten years of age as the time when I really began to work, but I am quite sure I was doing my share of the work long before that. But after that time I really worked. There was no time for school, no time for university, no time for anything except work and bearing the responsibility for running the family farm after the head of the family had passed away. From the time I was ten until I entered the House of Commons I found that there was a period of about 35 years, and I thought of the various kinds of work I did during that space of time.

I must say that I have never had it so easy as since I became a member of parliament. I do not think I have neglected my work as a member of parliament. When your home is in Vancouver you cannot go home very often on these Thursday to Tuesday week ends, and whether or not I wanted to I had to stay here. As I had to stay here I of course was working. I was on the job seven days a week. Between sessions I was helping to build a new party, and there is no part of the country with the exception of the province of Newfoundland, where I have not spoken and spent considerable time.

When I am at home people are continually coming to me about little matters. Nevertheless I must state, as I said before, that I have never had it as soft as since I came here. I believe that is true of members of parliament in general. I noted what the Leader of the Opposition said about the difficulty in finding members to serve in the other place, but even as far as the House of Commons is concerned there is no great difficulty in getting candidates.

I look across the floor and I see people who have stood for office election after election. They feel they are lucky if they are elected. New members come here, and there is a general scramble to get a seat in this house. We come here not because of the indemnity, salary, or whatever you want to call it. I must say it is going to come pretty close to a salary if the indemnity is to be put on a monthly basis. We come here because we like the work and associations, and feel that this is where we want to be.

The hon. member for Macleod said that a lawyer who would come here for $6,000 a year must be somewhat of a two-by-four lawyer in his own community. I can look around the chamber and see members who are not two-by-four lawyers either in their own or any other community. If we are going to make the size of the indemnity the reason members come here, we are not going to raise the standards of this house; we are going to lower them. The Leader of the Opposition made some reference to reasonable or satisfactory—I do not know exactly the words he used—compensation for the sacrifices made. Surely the hon. member knows that you cannot be paid for sacrifices. A sacrifice is something you make because you want to do it. If you are to be paid for it, it is not a sacrifice.

My main objection to this increase—I am not going into the figures now—is that it increases the spread between members of parliament and members of the government and the people we govern. If there is anything that history shows us has caused trouble down through the ages, it has been the economic separation of the people from the government. This has caused a great deal of the world's troubles. Every time we raise the salaries of cabinet ministers or the indemnities of members of parliament, without at the same time raising the incomes of the people in our community who need to have their incomes raised, we are separating our government from the people. That is a bad thing for any country.

I said when I began that I was not going to say much. If I do not stop soon I shall not be holding to that statement. I am opposed to this measure, first of all because of the amount of increase. I believe it is fantastic. I did not hear anyone say, throughout the whole of the election campaign, that he or she was going to Ottawa for the purpose of raising his or her indemnity at the first opportunity. From no party, Liberal, Conservative, C.C.F. or Social Credit, have I heard any suggestion that this was the first thing they were going to do. Every member I heard speak from the public platform, every member I saw reported in the newspapers, every member I heard over the radio, said he was coming here for the purpose of improving the conditions of those amongst us whose conditions need to be improved. Reference was made to old age pensioners, persons on war veterans allowance, and many on low incomes who, as one newspaper stated editorially not so long ago, never have enough to eat. This situation exists in this rich country to which the Prime Minister referred.

I, amongst others, said I was coming down here, and asked my people to send me down here, to do something for those who were unable to do something for themselves, and for those who could not come here and raise their own incomes. I am not going to support any increase in income for any member of parliament until we have made some attempt at raising the incomes of the poor in this rich country.

(Translation):

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, I would feel remiss in my duty if I did not rise to express the opinion of the people who have sent me here.

In my opinion, the resolution moved by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is very untimely because we should realize that everywhere in Canada, and more particularly in the city of Quebec, represented in the house by the right hon. the Prime Minister, as well as by myself, there are thousands and thousands of unemployed workers who have to beg their daily bread. Yet at that very moment, we in the House of Commons would take advantage of their misery and vote ourselves an increase of more than 100 per cent in our indemnity! I wonder, Mr. Chairman, how logical such a gesture would be.

Mr. Dupuis: It would be logical!

Mr. Dufresne: If that is logical in the constituency of my hon. friend from St. Mary (Mr. Dupuis), it would not be in my constituency, where there are working people who know the difference between what is logical and what is not.

Mr. Chairman, I have had the opportunity of meeting a large number of my electors in the past few weeks during which newspapers have been mentioning the proposed increase in our parliamentary indemnity. I can say that not one worker—and most of our workers earn less than $50 per week—would agree that we should not look after them at this time when there is so much misery in Canadian homes but that we should think of increasing our indemnity by 100 per cent.

Everywhere in Canada, there are old people who are getting $40 per month and who evidently cannot live decently on such a small sum, but they have to be satisfied to eke out a miserable existence.

Mr. Dupuis: When the Conservatives were in power, they did not get anything.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, I was not born 50 years ago.

Mr. Dupuis: I am not speaking of 50 years ago, but say 25 years ago.

Mr. Dufresne: I was not there. I was only a youth then. I hope that the hon. member, whom I am not even addressing, will be from now on kind enough to let me continue my remarks.

Mr. Gingras: He was saying sensible things.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, I was saying that there are everywhere in Canada old people who cannot, on $40 a month, live and meet their obligations, pay their rent, eat properly and dress decently. A great number of these old people, all across the country, are asking the government to increase their pension. We turn down their legitimate request, and yet at the same time, we members of parliament are going to vote ourselves a 100 per cent increase!

I have before me the correspondence I received today; these 151 letters have come to me from people of the working class, men with large families, who have been asking for a long time, on account of the steady increase of the cost of living and the overburden of taxation, an increase in family allowances in order to be able to meet their obligations and give a little more happiness to their families. Do you think that in the face of such a legitimate request I would feel happy to meet these people and tell them that while their request has been turned down, we have been pleased to support the Prime Minister's motion to double our indemnity.

There are at present all across Canada, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, young people, single or married, who during the last world war gave their best for the defence of Canada, their motherland.

A large number of them—and the hon. Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) could surely corroborate this—write in every day to ask whether it would not be possible to increase the pittance which they receive since it is not sufficient to enable them to meet their obligations. And yet, while these people who have risked their life for Canada are refused the pension which they are asking for we are expected to be so inconsistent as to support this motion now before us and to increase our indemnities 100 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, in the past year, every important public body in this country has been urging a reduction in income tax. There is nothing to indicate though that in his next budget the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) will bring this about. All important public bodies in this country are therefore being refused a fair request. No small increase in pensions or family allowances is being granted those who are really in need of it and yet, at the very same time, the right hon. the Prime Minister, who himself represents a district almost wholly made up of working people, is asking us to support this resolution and, as servants of the people, to vote ourselves this 100 per cent increase.

I believe this measure to be highly unpopular at the present time. The government will be the one to answer for it to the taxpayers of this country.

In spite of the statements made in and out of this house by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) and other cabinet members, there is at this time an economic recession in the offing. Thousands of workers are out of work. They are asking for employment, they are urging the government to proceed with public works so as to be in a position at least to earn a living for themselves, their wives and children. The government have done nothing to alleviate their plight.

Where can you find logic in this resolution moved by the right hon. the Prime Minister? I would have liked him to have had the opportunity, before introducing this resolution in the house, to visit his constituency, to make a tour of all the little streets in St. Roch and

St. Jean Baptiste districts. He would have seen that all these workers are sitting at home, waiting for some help to provide for their families. Had he done so, I wonder if he would have come before us today with this same resolution which he has just introduced to the members of the house.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me absolutely contrary to the principles of sound democracy to adopt this resolution as worded. I rather think it should have been submitted to the people, even before the election of August last. If only the hon. members opposite had adopted in front of the people, in front of their electors, the arrogant attitude which they are now displaying in the house toward those who do not share their opinions, I bet there would not be 50 per cent of them who would now be sitting on that side of the house this year.

We must, of course, think of the people before looking after those who claim to be their servants. When one wants to serve, one is called upon to make sacrifices; if one is not ready to make the sacrifices required of us as representatives of the people, there is only one thing to do: it is to refuse to stand for election when we are requested to do so. I shall perhaps be reminded that respect is due to the properly constituted authority. I agree with that, but if this authority which is constituted by the people for the people fails to look after the real and urgent needs of the people, here is what is going to happen. We shall have to go through the same deplorable situation now prevalent in various iron curtain countries; and we shall have to fight, even more firmly, against communism at home. If we do not want communism in this country, let us not pass resolutions which would only embitter certain people.

I believe that the motion is untimely and I very simply wish to dissociate myself from the responsibility which the government would like us to assume. Moreover, I want the country to know and especially the electors of my riding that I am against this resolution because instead of thinking of myself I want to think of those who elected me, their wives and children, who are at present in need.

I think that those few words will reflect the feelings of all my constituents and I hope that the Prime Minister will study carefully those few remarks and reconsider his decision and examine at greater length this resolution in order to determine if it should be passed or not.

(Text):

Mr. Thatcher: I should like to comment, also very briefly, on this resolution. I am pleased that the Prime Minister, the leader of this group, and others, have said that each member should express his personal views on the matter before us. Personally I must agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. I regret that I cannot support the resolution.

I do not deny that a very strong case can be made for increasing hon. members' indemnities, and the Prime Minister this afternoon introduced some strong arguments. Certainly it is true that federal members of parliament are not paid an income which compares favourably with the salaries paid to many people in private industry. It is also true that a good many hon. members have had trouble in making ends meet on their present indemnity. Notwithstanding that fact, it seems to me there are a number of reasons which make it inadvisable for members of parliament to raise their own indemnities.

I feel I should vote against this resolution in the first place, because I am sure an overwhelming number of people at home in my constituency, the people whom I represent, would wish me to vote against it. If we raise our pay from $4,000 to $8,000—or give ourselves a 100 per cent increase—there will be keen resentment throughout the country. As has been mentioned, the unemployed, some of our old age pensioners, and about 98 per cent of the taxpayers who are earning less than $10,000 a year, are going to look upon this resolution as being a selfish one. This will be particularly true when they remember that less than two years ago this parliament adopted a very generous pension scheme for members of parliament. That pension scheme was a desirable one; it was a contributory scheme, and it alleviates the financial worry of ex-members of parliament with long years of service. But as we discuss this resolution now before us, it seems to me that we should also keep in mind the fact that the greatest part of the money to pay that pension is coming from the taxpayers. To ask the taxpayer for such a substantial salary increase on top of the pension I think is expecting too much.

Senate and House of Commons

I believe the Prime Minister should make clear to parliament as we discuss this resolution what effect it will have on the pension. It has been rumoured, I do not know whether correctly, that if the indemnity is doubled, so also will be the pension. I hope this is not correct, because surely to increase the pension at this time simply could not be justified on any grounds. I hope the Prime Minister will clear up this point at the first opportunity.

An hon. Member: Do you have any other income?

Mr. Thatcher: Yes, I have. In the second place I oppose this legislation because it contemplates the same kind of raise for the Senate. Surely there are very few people in the country who will support this feature of the legislation. I am certain that if a Gallup poll were held not ·001 per cent of Canadians could be found who would go along with such a substantial increase for hon. members of the other house. Personally I should like to see the Senate abolished, but if we are going to continue it, it seems to me we should keep the salaries on a realistic basis.

In the third place, I oppose this legislation because I think it might tend to make more and more members become what has been described as "full-time" members or, by some, "professional" members. Some hon. members may feel that such a trend is desirable, but I cannot believe that the good of the country will be served if all members become full-time members. The Prime Minister said that one of the strengths of this house is the fact that when issues arise they are discussed by a cross-section of citizens. We have farmers, professional men, businessmen, lawyers, doctors and so on, to express their views on each issue as it comes up. I think this fact makes for a strong parliament. However, I do not believe we will continue to have such a wide cross-section of members if we pass this legislation, which in my opinion will mean that members will become, more and more, full-time representatives.

It is quite true, as some hon. members have pointed out, that being a federal representative has been taking more and more time. But I contend that the answer to this problem is not an increase in the indemnity; it seems to me the real answer was indicated by the Prime Minister, although he did not say it. I believe the real answer is to streamline our rules of procedure. If the committee now considering our rules would see that concrete recommendations are brought in and acted upon, I am sure it would be possible for members of parliament to get their work done more efficiently and expeditiously.

[Mr. Thatcher.]

I see no reason why parliament should have to sit for seven or eight months in the year. I may be wrong, but it seems to me that if our rules were streamlined, we could get through the work of the house in four or five months. Then if hon. members wanted to supplement their incomes they could go home and do so but not at the expense of the taxpayer.

Finally, and I am now going to sit down, I must oppose this resolution because during the years I have been here I have contended that the government should practise more and more economy in its expenditures. During the last election I promised to press for reduced expenditures and lower taxes. In my opinion voting for this resolution which will cost the taxpayers $1·5 million would not be consistent with that attitude. Therefore it is with reluctance that I repeat I am opposed to the resolution and shall vote against it.

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, I have not heard for quite a while in this house so demagogic a speech as that just made by the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne). I knew the meaning of the word demagogue, but to make sure I looked up its meaning in the Larousse dictionary. You will see that the word applies very well to the member for Quebec West. According to the dictionary, a demagogue is:

> One who pretends to defend the people's interests to gain their favour.

Mr. Chairman, if I believed that the resolution now before the house was of such a nature as to be detrimental to the small wage earners, the low-income class, I would be the first to protest and to fight its enactment with all my energy.

Like the hon. member for Quebec West, I represent people whose income is very low. In fact, the people I represent are made up in the proportion of 80 per cent of labourers. However, I do not fear to support the resolution now before the house and I do so for the following reasons: A while ago, the member for Quebec West stated that it was scandalous, under the circumstances, to double our parliamentary indemnity when old people were only drawing $40 per month, a mere pittance as an old age pension. In that connection, I took the liberty of interrupting the hon. member to say that it was still better than under the Conservative administration, when there was no social legislation of any kind to enable the government to give assistance to those who could have expected some help in their old age.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): 20 cents per day.

Mr. Dupuis: We have enacted all sorts of social legislation; however, I do not believe that any legislator ever thought for one moment that a person could live on a monthly income of $40. No legislator ever thought that an allowance of $5 to $8 per month would be sufficient to take care of children. No member of this parliament ever thought that the pension now paid to veterans would be sufficient to render them financially independent.

We have not only filled a gap but we have also helped these people to make both ends meet. Nevertheless, the duty for the children to take care of their aged parents still remains. Because we pay family allowances, it does not mean that a man must rely on the state to support his family. No, we only alleviated their burden by helping them to support their parents and their children.

Mr. Chairman, I say for the third time that I represent a labour riding. I am quite aware of the workingman's sense of justice. One does not need a lot of money to have judgment and a sense of justice. I went all through my constituency, I saw my constituents, the workers in my own riding. Most, if not all, understood that their federal member could not represent them any longer if he were to get only the parliamentary indemnity to which he is entitled at present. They understood that if they wished to be well represented, their member had to receive adequate compensation.

You may remember, Mr. Chairman, that when the matter of increasing the salaries of judges came up for consideration, I was among the first to rise in support of that measure, even though I represent a working-class district. I said then that a judge is entitled to a salary high enough to enable him to accept this position of eminence and to live in a style befitting it.

Senators may possibly be different from members of parliament. It will be generally recognized that they do not have to meet the considerable expenses which the elected representatives of the people have to put up with. The latter must contribute to all the parochial or social organizations of their constituencies, and also preserve a certain standing in their various communities. They have to meet certain expenses which most of their constituents can dispense with. We have discussed this matter. I spoke to my people and on the evidence offered, circumstances being what they are, they were quite willing to admit that their representative should be adequately paid.

There may be a difference between the one who is now speaking to you—who is not a professional man, not even a professional politician—and a lawyer who could put away a good part of the income derived from his office, and the man who might own a business and yet have to be here continually. I know that eminent lawyers on the other side of this house, as well as on the government side, have had to absent themselves quite often in order to plead in court. I do not refer only to the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), who has absented himself in the past in order to plead cases in court, for I have seen other hon. members sitting on the government side absenting themselves for the same reason, thus earning quite legitimate income. The situation as regards insurance brokers and tradesmen is different from that of professional men. I have every respect for lawyers and I want them to be numerous enough in this house, because we must of course rely on their knowledge of the law. I do not say that the house should be peopled only by members of that profession.

We welcome them because we need their advice in certain circumstances but, on the other hand, I want to differentiate between the insurance agent, the tradesman and the professional.

So I have no qualms about supporting this measure. I am in favour of it because my mentality is that of our people. My father was a worker and there were fourteen children at home. The environment in which I grew up was that of the labouring class and of family life, and I know the mentality of our people. And to think that certain demagogues tell us that these poor workers would be the first to accuse us! As for me, I know the feelings of our people, and if they were opposed to this measure I would be the first to protest against its being carried out, but they are not opposed to it. Therefore, I will not hesitate to tell my electors that in voting for this measure I was not thinking only of the increased income I would get, but that I accepted it in order to serve them well. It stands to reason that I cannot do that unless I get adequate pay. I am saying nothing new when I state that financial worries are liable to undermine the efficiency of any individual.

I repeat that I speak for the people of my own class, and I am sure that I have not misinterpreted their opinion.

Now, let us consider the question from a different angle. The right hon. the Prime Minister said—and how right he was—that the indemnity granted to the members of the house had not been increased for a very long time. He was absolutely right. I know well that members of the working class are not paid the wages they are entitled to and I shall always be the first to ask justice for them at every opportunity, whenever I have a chance to do so. However, let us compare the income which professional people and skilled workers were getting in 1925, 1928, or 1930 with what they are getting now. Expenses have been increasing for us too as well as for others and the cost of living is as high in our case as it is for others. I am therefore convinced that the rest of the population will want us to be treated with fairness.

Those are the reasons why I shall vote in favour of this measure and I shall thank the government for the manner in which it takes care of the people's representatives, who, like everybody else, are entitled to fair treatment.

(Text):

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I suppose it is inevitable that in the discussion of any proposal which involves consideration of the indemnities to be paid to members of parliament it should be a little bit embarrassing for any one of us who is actually a member to take part, because however much we may try to put it upon the plane that we are setting a level of indemnities which will preserve the dignity of and respect for parliament as an institution, the fact remains that we are nevertheless discussing what will be the level of remuneration for our own services.

Furthermore, in dealing with this matter we are in a position enjoyed by no other people in the country; we are in a position, whatever may be our decision, to vote upon it and increase the level of our remuneration at the expense of the taxpayers of Canada, a body of which, it must be admitted—and I am frank to admit it—we ourselves are also all members. But there is no one else in the country in that position; therefore it is a subject which is always a little difficult to discuss.

I do not think there is any need for any of us to hesitate to agree that there is certainly a case for some increase in the indemnities, and for the argument that the level now paid requires revision. But I for one am certainly not prepared to swallow, without discussion, the figure which is put forward by the government and which will be introduced in legislation if this resolution carries.

In discussion of matters of this sort, both here and at home with my friends, when sometimes it has been suggested that we must be foolish to be members at the present level of indemnity and so on and that we should vote ourselves increases, it has always seemed to me that we should not lose sight of the fact that we are all free, white and 21, and that no one held a pistol to the head of any one of us and said, "You have to run for parliament; you have to accept nomination and run for election". In fact in my constituency in 1949 there were three others who contested the seat and in 1953 there were also three others, all of them estimable gentlemen, any one of whom would have been delighted to come down here instead of me. We all ran on the basis of the present indemnity.

I therefore do not think one can take as a sufficient argument to support this resolution to give us this increase in indemnity that you cannot get candidates unless you accept the present proposal. I always remind myself of those other two occasions when three other gentlemen would have been extremely glad to come down here for the present indemnity if I myself had not run and been successful.

In laying the basis for a discussion of a proposal which involves an increase in indemnities, it seems to me that one should perhaps try to sort out one's thinking on why we become members of parliament, and one's thinking on the motives and on the standards for membership. It seems to me, as it has always seemed, that there are three chief considerations in the mind of anyone who offers himself for public service as a member of the House of Commons of Canada. The one which I would put first and most important is the desire to give public service. That consideration, it seems to me, is and must always be the paramount motive. I would put second the very proper desire for power; that is to say, the desire to have a say in the conduct of the affairs of the nation. I do not suppose any one of us would have offered himself for election and been anxious to come down here unless he felt that he had a contribution to make. That is what I call—and it may not be an apt phrase—the proper desire for power, or the desire to place yourself in a position where you can influence the conduct of national affairs. I would put third—and only third, after those other two motives—the financial considerations which may enter into the picture.

That being my view of the matter, I say for myself, at any rate, that I think we must be careful not to approach the subject from the point of view that the financial remuneration to a member must be such that there shall never be any element of sacrifice, because I do not think that is a sound starting point for such a discussion.

Having made those general observations, I should like to turn to a particular consideration of the resolution before us and of the discussion which has taken place so far today. As will be recalled, it has been suggested by the Leader of the Opposition, that this matter should not now be put forward for the decision of the house but rather that a royal commission should be appointed to study and report upon it so that, with the benefit of their investigation, we might be in a position to make a decision which would perhaps be a more impartial one than we are in a position to make at the present time. I am fully in accord with that suggestion.

We have already heard from other hon. members on all sides that use is being made of the same old tactics—as they say—of saying that we are doing the right thing but that we are doing it by the wrong method. Mr. Chairman, I think this matter goes a great deal further than that. I do not think it is doing the right thing to try to put this proposal through in its present form without the benefit of such a previous study. I think it is doing the wrong thing, not doing the right thing in the wrong way. I think it is the wrong thing to do in this way, for a number of reasons.

The first reason is this. There was no announcement to the people, prior to the election, that an increase in indemnities to members and senators, in the salaries of ministers and of leaders of the opposition, would be put through, when the opportunity was available to the Prime Minister and the government party to make the statement prior to the election.

I point out to you, Mr. Chairman, that prior to the increase put through in 1945 it was, in effect, stated by the then prime minister—indeed, I think it was stated in so many words—that, if returned, he would regard it as a mandate to provide an increase in the remuneration of members of parliament. That issue was clearly before the people. I therefore think there could have been no objection to the method followed in 1945, in view of the statement made by the then prime minister during the course of the election campaign. No such statement was made on this occasion. No hint was given to the people of Canada that, if returned, this government would put through, at the first session, such a substantial increase in indemnities to members of the House of Commons and of the Senate, as well as the other increases which are now before us.

In the second place, there has been no study by the membership generally—and there is to be no opportunity for study—of all the factors on which a decision might be based as to what would be the proper level of increase and whether indeed, if we are going to have the increase now proposed, the whole of the indemnity should be made subject to taxation. I point out to you, Mr. Chairman, that on the last occasion when we had before us a proposal affecting the remuneration of members of parliament, that proposal was referred to a committee of the house for special study. The proposal that there should be a retirement allowance to members of parliament was referred to the banking and commerce committee before legislation was ever introduced into the house. We were not even asked to pass upon the principle of it, to give it second reading, or to approve the resolution in 1952 until the subject matter of a scheme of pensions for members of parliament had been referred to the banking and commerce committee; and it was only after that committee had reported that a resolution was placed upon the order paper to introduce legislation based on their report.

Then another reason I think it would be wrong to accept this proposal at the present time is that we have had absolutely no assurance that that pension legislation will be amended if this resolution carries and these proposals become law. In his introductory statement this afternoon the Prime Minister did not utter one word with respect to the pension legislation. But this resolution and the legislation to be based upon it will have a very definite and immediate effect upon the question of pensions for members, inasmuch as at the present time pensions are not limited to the payment of so many dollars a year, $3,000 a year as would be the case under the present level of indemnities, but are paid on the basis of 75 per cent of the total amount of the contributions a member has made under the act. Therefore if our contributions are doubled, as they will be if the proposed legislation goes through and no change is made in the legislation providing pensions for members, the amount of our pension is automatically doubled.

Mr. Croll: In 35 years.

Mr. Fulton: I am quite certain it was not the intention of any member of parliament when approving of the pension legislation in 1952, and I am also quite certain it would not be the intention of any member of parliament in approving this resolution or the legislation to be based upon it, that he should at the same time be doubling the amount of pension which he will qualify himself to receive.

Mr. Arsenault: On a point of order, the hon. member should not give the impression that these allowances for members will be doubled. It will take—

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I am under the impression that the hon. member is not raising a point of order.

Mr. Arsenault: That is my point of order.

Mr. Fulton: I submit that if the hon. member disagrees—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Arsenault: The hon. member is giving a wrong impression.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member is rising on a point of order and I must hear what he has to say.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, let him state the point of order.

Mr. Croll: He is. Give him a chance.

Mr. Arsenault: It will take 17 years for any member now sitting in the House of Commons to reach the maximum pension. It does not follow that the pensions will automatically be doubled.

Mr. Fulton: I think the hon. member has probably said enough now for you to agree with me, Mr. Chairman, that he was not raising a point of order. The hon. member has stated the obvious. If, as I would gather from the fact that he has made this statement, he has studied the legislation providing retiring allowances for members of parliament I hope he will go on from there to take the next logical step and say that it would not be his intention that the passing of this resolution and the legislation to be based upon it should increase pensions to $6,000 a year.

[Mr. Fulton.]

The Chairman: Order. I should like to agree with the hon. member for Kamloops that the point of order was not well taken, but at the same time I do not think we should allow a discussion of pensions on a resolution dealing entirely with increases in certain remuneration.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the spirit of your remarks and I shall endeavour to observe them, but I do not think you would suggest that to point out what would be one of the effects of this proposal is out of order in a discussion of this resolution. I agree with you, and I assure you that I do not intend to get into a discussion of the details of the pension legislation, but I am stating what will be the effect on other matters affecting the position of members of parliament if this proposal should carry and no change is made in the act providing pensions for members.

Therefore I would conclude this part of my remarks by stating that for myself at any rate, if there were no other grounds of objection to proceeding with the proposal in this manner—and in my mind there are—I would not be able to support the resolution unless the Prime Minister gives us a definite assurance that after this matter is disposed of the government will introduce legislation to amend the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act so this proposal will not have the effect of doubling pensions which would be paid to members of parliament after they had made their full contribution under the pension act. Without such an assurance I certainly would not be able to support this proposal.

An hon. Member: You would not support it anyhow.

Mr. Fulton: Hon. members of all the other parties, certainly of the C.C.F. and Social Credit parties, have objected to the suggestion made by my leader that the proper way to deal with this matter is to refer it first for study by a royal commission. I suggest to you, sir, that that would be the proper course to follow in dealing with any proposal to increase indemnities and salaries of ministers and of the Leader of the Opposition, and indemnities in the other place. I do not think it is necessary to repeat the arguments which have already been made by the hon. member for Prince Albert, in which he pointed out that it is not a surrender of our responsibility as members to ask that a royal commission should first consider the matter and give us the benefit of their consideration and advice.

Various matters arise out of the proposal now before us concerning which I think the only way to arrive at a sensible and impartial decision is first to have the benefit of the impartial consideration which another body such as a royal commission could give them. What it is proposed to do here, amongst other things, is to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act to double the indemnities paid to members and to senators. I think there are a number of other considerations which arise in connection with the position of members of this house and senators under the Senate and House of Commons Act. Indeed, I believe it is time we took a good look at the whole of the Senate and House of Commons Act and at the position of members and senators under that act. I think such a study should be made; and it is time, particularly if we are now to be in receipt of an indemnity plus expense allowance amounting to $10,000, that consideration was given to certain features such as whether it is desirable in fact that members of the house or members of the Senate should be directors of companies which have substantial dealings with the government. One has only to look through—

The Chairman: Order. Surely the hon. member will agree with me that this is out of order on a resolution of this kind.

Mr. Fulton: I am sorry, sir, but it does seem to me that on a resolution of this kind, which advocates an amendment of the Senate and House of Commons Act for the purpose of increasing our indemnities very substantially, it is quite in order to draw attention to other features of the Senate and House of Commons Act which it might be desirable to amend. I think that is particularly so if members of the house and of the other place are to be placed in the position of receiving substantial indemnities or allowances for the efforts they put forth and the sacrifices they make. The position with respect to what is proper in the way of the relationship of members and senators with the government or with companies having contracts with the government is then very much in order in a discussion of that type.

I certainly think the whole matter of the relationship between members and companies having contracts or dealings with the government, and distressing incidents such as we saw here toward the close of the last session, coupled with the fact that our indemnities are now to be very substantially increased, demand that we should review the whole situation and decide whether we think the Senate and House of Commons Act should be tightened up in that respect, or whether in fact the present situation should be permitted to continue, under which members and senators hold directorships in companies having substantial dealings with the government.

After all, the Prime Minister has said that one of the objects of the indemnity is to help members to preserve their complete independence and objectivity in dealing with public business. I quite agree with him. This applies with equal force to both members and senators. But particularly when you look through the list of senators, both in the Parliamentary Guide and the directory of directors, and you see the number who have directorships in banks and life insurance companies, as well as other companies which have direct financial dealings with the government, then I think I am quite in order and very much to the point when I say that the position in that regard should be reviewed. I believe the Senate and House of Commons Act should be tightened up with respect to that relationship.

I ask you to bear in mind that under other legislation which is proposed the banks will be making loans guaranteed by a government corporation. There are large numbers of senators who hold directorships in banks, and in life insurance companies which also make guaranteed loans. I am not at all sure that situation should be allowed to continue. I believe that at a time when we are discussing our own indemnities we should take a good look at these related matters.

Then, too, I think it is appropriate to consider whether members of the cabinet should be allowed to hold directorships in corporations which have direct dealings with government departments. We should consider whether or not there should be some amendment to our legislation in that respect.

The Chairman: Order. Once more I must draw to the attention of the hon. member the fact that we are discussing a resolution, which I hope he has read, which has no bearing on the remarks the hon. member is now making.

Mr. Fulton: I do not want to engage in a controversy with the chair, because I do not like to do that. But I must say, although I have practically finished my remarks on that aspect of the subject, with respect, sir, I do not think your ruling is correct. This resolution starts out by saying:

> That it is expedient to introduce measures to amend
> (a) the Senate and House of Commons Act to increase the salaries of the Speakers and the Deputy Speaker, the sessional allowances of members of the Senate and of the House of Commons . . .

What we have under consideration is a proposal to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act. While it is true the resolution goes on to suggest specific ways in which that act should be amended, I have already advanced reasons why I think the considerations I was putting forward are pertinent to the subject being discussed. I rest my case also on the larger ground that when we consider the advisability of amending the act it is quite in order to suggest that there are other respects in which it requires amendment. Speaking for myself, I say without any hesitation that I believe the act should be amended to make it impossible for ministers to hold directorships in corporations having dealings with government departments.

These are all matters, you see, on which it is difficult for private members or members of the government to hold impartial views. In that respect, I believe a study of the matter by a royal commission would be beneficial because such a commission could say whether the moral principles, if I may call them that, which gave rise to the provisions of the Senate and House of Commons Act are applicable today, or whether they should be relaxed or tightened. I just do not think it is good enough for us to take the high moral position that the reason for increasing the indemnity is to enable us to preserve complete independence and objectivity in dealing with public business, if we are not prepared to consider also that act which lays down the code of conduct of members of the parliament.

Then I believe, too, that the question of whether or not the Senate and House of Commons Act should be tightened up with respect to the arrangements made for members receiving these indemnities should be studied by a royal commission. If this bill becomes law, we are going to be placed in the position of receiving a substantial sum of money. In anyone's language $10,000 is a lot of money. In so far as we can, I think we should place ourselves in a position above reproach in respect of the receipt of that money, and indeed with respect to the receipt of our indemnity whatever it may be.

In view of some of the remarks which have appeared from time to time in the press, and having in mind, as we all have, what we know about the way in which the permissible absences from the house can sometimes be exceeded without any corresponding reduction in indemnity, I feel that while we have the Senate and House of Commons Act under consideration, while we have the matter of increasing our indemnities under consideration, we should consider also whether we should not introduce some method which would ensure that for a person to receive the indemnity, whatever it may be, he must in fact devote that attention to the business of the nation which the rules and regulations set out. It is my own view that the act itself, and the regulations in that regard, are in need of substantial overhauling.

For these reasons, amongst others, I think it desirable that we should have the benefit of the study and advice of a royal commission before the house proceeds to deal with a subject which so intimately affects every one of us. The very intimacy of the relationship makes it extremely difficult to preserve an attitude of impartiality in dealing with it.

Hon. members to my left, both in the C.C.F. and Social Credit parties, scoff at the idea of having a royal commission. They say we would be surrendering our responsibilities, Mr. Chairman. Well, for years and years now there has been talk about reforming the Senate. I am one of those who agree thoroughly with the Leader of the Opposition when he says that rather than say the senators should not get an increased indemnity, we should so reform that body as to ensure that it can discharge the functions it was originally intended to discharge. Then there would be no question but that senators would merit it.

The Chairman: Order. Surely the hon. member will agree that reform of the Senate cannot be discussed under this resolution.

Mr. Fulton: It has been referred to on a number of occasions this afternoon, and it does seem to me in order when this resolution refers to the Senate. If this resolution carries, senators are going to be in receipt of an increased indemnity. The Senate is a part of the governmental structure of Canada, which is very much before us at the present time. All I am saying is I do not think there is a single member here who would fail to agree that it would be desirable if we found some method of reform which would avoid, in the future, those criticisms which have been levelled at that body in the past. The criticism that has been made in the past is not desirable or happy from the point of view of preserving the dignity of parliament, but I am convinced it will continue—and should continue—if the present situation continues without reform.

If, as appears to be the case, it has been beyond the powers of the Liberal party, with all the ability and brains of the cabinet and all the ability and brains of the national Liberal advisory council or whatever they call it, having been in power for the last 18 years, to find some method of reforming the Senate, notwithstanding that this plank has been in their platform since time when "the memory of man runneth not back to the contrary", then I believe if it is that difficult for the government to find some method to reform the Senate this subject might well be referred to a royal commission. That being the case—

Mr. Knowles: It would be better just to abolish it.

Mr. Fulton: I do not agree with my hon. friend's point of view there. That being the case, there are, it seems to me, unanswerable arguments in favour of that method of dealing with the subject, arguments which show not only that you are not just doing the right thing the wrong way, but that you are doing the wrong thing in insisting on this resolution being carried in the house at the present time.

I might ask my hon. friends—and I am not making the suggestion for the opposition, because I am not authorized to do so—whether, if they and the government object to a royal commission, they would agree that the subject should be referred first to a special committee of the house in the same way as the pension legislation was referred to a committee of the house before it was ever introduced either officially by resolution or in any other way in this chamber?

I think I have said sufficient, Mr. Chairman, to indicate why I do not feel, in the absence of any indication from the Prime Minister that these suggestions will be accepted, that I can support the resolution.

By way of summary I would suggest that the following are matters which should and must be dealt with before this matter can come properly before the house and before the house can properly be asked to pass upon the subject. First, there is the question whether or not it is intended to introduce an amendment to the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act; second, whether or not we shall get a prior assurance and commitment that there will be any measure of reform of the Senate which will ensure that the increase in indemnity there will be justified; and third, whether or not the Prime Minister will assure us that this matter will be referred for study by a royal commission or committee of this house.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Chairman, you know very well that Winston Churchill hated to talk about his money troubles. Of course it is a delicate matter, but it is a matter which should be considered in order to decide whether or not the indemnity should be increased. Without expressing a definite opinion against the increase, hon. gentlemen of the Progressive Conservative party have suggested that the matter should be dealt with by a royal commission, without mentioning what people they would like to have on the royal commission.

Mr. Fulton: We would be ruled out of order if we did.

Mr. Pouliot: As a rule, royal commissioners are judges. Sometimes it is one judge, sometimes several judges. In other cases the royal commissioners are men of importance who do not belong to the bench. With regard to the bench, the judges should be disqualified for two reasons.

Mr. MacInnis: I know one of them already.

Mr. Pouliot: In the first place because, according to the elections act, they do not have the right to vote in federal elections. They are disqualified from voting and therefore they are by themselves a class—

Mr. MacInnis: No, they are not by themselves.

Mr. Pouliot: —which is apart and completely outside politics in order to maintain their perfect impartiality. This is the first ground for impeaching judges as royal commissioners to decide whether or not the parliamentary indemnity should be increased.

In the second place, since the judges are very busy and since they do not know anything about our problems, because those who were in politics previously are supposed to have given up their former links with political parties, they would not be in a position to decide whether members of parliament are entitled to an increase in the indemnity.

Mr. Knowles: They would probably recommend that their own salaries be raised.

Mr. Pouliot: Then there would be no objection from the opposition.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Hear, hear.

Mr. Fulton: What would the government do with that?

Mr. Pouliot: Just a minute; I did not interrupt the hon. member, although I was eager to do so.

What astounds me is that any time there is an increase suggested in the salary of a judge or a high official, anybody who is not a member of either house of parliament, it is swallowed like a gulp of water by hon. gentlemen of the opposition. I remember perfectly well that in the railways and shipping committee two years ago the Minister of Transport asked the question whether he should tell the salary paid to Mr. Donald Gordon as president of the Canadian National Railways. Without a voice of dissent it was decided by the committee, on which were some Conservative members, especially the hon. member for Kamloops, that we should not be told the amount of salary received by Donald Gordon, which is more than that received by the Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. Fulton: How do you know; have you been told?

Mr. Pouliot: Well, this question was put by the Minister of Transport: "Should I tell the committee the amount of the salary paid to Mr. Gordon"? It was decided unanimously that the answer should not go on the record. The hon. member for Kamloops is a member of the railways and shipping committee. Whether he was there I do not know, but other members of his party were sitting there and there was no objection from anyone with respect to a salary which is known to be higher than that of the first citizen of Canada, the Prime Minister. That is one point.

I am sorry that the Leader of the Opposition did not ask me for a suggestion for a text—

Mr. Drew: I did not find it necessary.

Mr. Pouliot: Just a minute—for a text for the oration which he delivered this afternoon. It would have been a Latin text from the Bible: "Piger vult et non vult." The idle —this does not apply to the hon. gentleman, who is a hard worker—is willing and he is not willing. He was willy-nilly, willing and not willing. Imagine one of his constituents from Carleton being in the gallery and listening to him speak. Afterward he would be met by someone else who would ask him, "Was the Leader of the Opposition, your member of parliament, for or against an increase in the indemnities?" The constituent would have to reply, "I have the highest consideration for my member of parliament and he was clever enough not to compromise himself on that issue. Was he for or was he against? I don't know."

An hon. Member: Barkis was willing.

Mr. Pouliot: Then what about the other legal luminaries of the opposition? I enjoy the smile of the hon. member for Prince Albert much better than his frown. Let him smile; let him beam. He will say, "royal commission". The hon. member for Kamloops was non-committal. He was for a royal commission. Was he for or against the increase? No one knows. I listened to him with joy, as I always do, to try to find out how his mind was working about it. I am sorry that his skull is not made of clear glass; I am sorry that his skull is not crystal clear to permit me to see.

Mr. Fulton: It is nice to have your admission that you are not a mind reader.

Mr. Pouliot: I am not a mind reader, but I would like to be. If the object I mentioned was crystal clear I would be in position and anyone would be in position to be a mind reader. But let us forget all that.

Imagine a royal commission composed of the Leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Prince Albert and the hon. member for Kamloops sitting together. How embarrassed they would be. They would have to decide something, and it takes them a long time to reach a decision. They have not reached it yet. Imagine the tremendous amount of work they would have to do. They take things seriously. Suppose all the members of parliament were in some great building such as the Supreme Court of Canada. We would be in those spacious halls and we would see them on the bench, but before being sworn in they would hesitate to accept.

The Chairman: I am extremely sorry to interrupt the hon. member in view of the close attention being paid to his speech, but I would ask him to co-operate with the Chair in discussing more particularly the resolution before the committee.

Mr. Pouliot: I will tell you that I do not want to be interrupted when I am in order. I hope this is the last time I am interrupted like that, because otherwise I will have something to tell the Chair.

The Chairman: I think the hon. member—

Mr. Pouliot: I withdraw. Now to continue my argument.

We are there and the royal commission is to sit. When I mention the royal commission I am mentioning a body which has been advocated by some hon. gentlemen to act in lieu of themselves to make a decision they were afraid to make themselves. We know that the Progressive Conservative party has a tradition. The Progressive Conservative party is a continuation of the Meighen and Bennett and Bracken parties which I have known. They will remember that in 1930—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pouliot: —there was an understanding—

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: It hurts.

Mr. Pouliot: —between members of parliament to increase the indemnity from $4,000 to $6,000. The reason it was not voted upon when the members of parliament were entitled to that increase was that at the last minute Mr. Bennett forbade the representative of his party, one of three who were to report to the Liberal prime minister, Mr. King, to attend the meetings with regard to the increase in the indemnity. I know very well—

An hon. Member: He was a millionaire.

Mr. Pouliot: —that if the indemnity had been increased we would have been told that the Liberal party had been defeated because of that increase in the indemnity. It is an argument that was to be used by Mr. Bennett and his followers just the same as it was, something like the speech made this afternoon by a new member who has had very little experience in politics.

There was something else. It was that same Mr. Bennett who imposed a tax of 10 per cent on all salaries, including salaries of members of parliament whose indemnity at the time was $4,000. They had to pay $400. Then Mr. Bennett and his colleagues, many of whom were millionaires, had the smart idea, the clever idea of increasing the salaries of the members of the cabinet by a $2,000 allowance in lieu of automobiles. While poor devils like myself and others had to pay $400 to the public exchequer as taxation, the millionaires who were sitting on the treasury benches were getting more than before. That was the Tory policy.

I wonder if my hon. friends would like to use that argument in an electoral campaign. What about that? Would it not be shameful? My hon. friend who has just spoken said that members of parliament should establish their case. Each member of parliament knows that his life is a life of sacrifice as well as of duty, and often it is very hard to get out of political life except when one is defeated and then sometimes it is a relief.

Mr. Fulton: Is this a prophecy?

An hon. Member: For you.

Mr. Pouliot: Louder, please.

Mr. Fulton: I was asking the hon. gentleman if he was indulging in prophecy in addition to clairvoyance.

Mr. Pouliot: Louder, please, and more distinctly.

Mr. Fulton: I have never found the hon. gentleman hard of hearing except when he prefers not to hear, so I do not think it is necessary for me to repeat what I said.

Mr. Pouliot: I am very sorry. The hon. gentleman should take his medicine.

Mr. Fulton: I am.

Mr. Pouliot: My medicine, as well as I took his. Besides that, I do not want to teach anything to my hon. colleagues. They know their own difficulties and their own troubles. They know how painstaking political life sometimes is and how our efforts are sometimes received with or without gratitude. On the other hand, we do these things as good sports. I know members of parliament today have many more problems than they had 30 years ago. All that social legislation means a great deal of work and members of parliament, even the three gentlemen of the opposition whom I mentioned not long ago, have much more work today than we had a number of years ago. Everyone goes to his member of parliament for information, and sometimes it is difficult to get sufficient information to satisfy their requirements.

My hon. friend from Macleod mentioned some press clippings with regard to the general feeling of the press about this matter. I will not mention any names, but everyone surely recollects the articles which were published in all the periodicals and dailies concerning the dependents of a colleague of ours who possessed one of the most brilliant minds in Canada. He died relatively young and left his family in dire circumstances. It was on that occasion that the press were unanimous in declaring that something should be done for the dependents of members of parliament. There was not one word of criticism; it was unanimous. Newspapers of all political parties expressed the same view.

If I were thinking of political considerations in speaking tonight I would make a demagogic appeal against the members of the opposition who have spoken. But it is beneath me to do that. I want to consider this question on its merits. Each member of parliament knows the services he renders to his constituents. It is not for him to enumerate them, but he must know what he has done for his constituents and for his country. On the other hand, his constituents know the service he renders to them, and they are grateful to their member and they know he is doing his very best to serve them.

My hon. friend spoke of a desire to serve. There is more than a desire to serve. There is the service, and service should be fulfilled to the satisfaction of the people. How many times do I regret that I have no independent means; that I cannot afford to give scholarships to bright young boys. I try to help them as best I can. I would like to have money, heaps of money, to distribute among my people. Unfortunately I have not—

Mr. Knowles: Maybe it is fortunate. Maybe that is why you are a member of parliament.

Mr. Pouliot: I will tell my hon. friend that we feel the same about it. There is nothing more pleasurable than to give when asked, and there is nothing sadder than to be unable to make a gift, a grant or give some kind of help. We do what we can, but we have very limited means.

Time does not permit me to speak much longer, but I have one example to give and it does not come from the United States where congressmen receive in indemnities, salaries, etc., more than $40,000 a year. This example comes from my native province of Quebec where the sessional indemnity has been increased from $4,000 to $6,000, as much as we receive now, and the only difference is that the Quebec sessions last two and one-half months while ours last six months.

An hon. Member: Seven months.

Mr. Pouliot: The correspondence we have to deal with today is as voluminous as that of our provincial colleagues. Therefore, sir, in concluding I say there is no reason to oppose the increase in the indemnity except for political motives, if there is one, and I think highly enough of my hon. friends opposite to presume they have no such motive in their minds. If members of parliament believe in all sincerity, in all earnestness, and in all honesty that with the present indemnity they cannot make both ends meet and they have to borrow money to live—then, sir, the only thing for them to do is to vote for the proposed indemnity or resign. There is no choice about it. If members of parliament who favour the increase decided to resign and submit the issue to their constituents, they would be re-elected by a tremendous majority; and if those who have been non-committal did likewise, they would be told by the electorate, "You, tepid; we have had enough of you".

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I always listen with great interest, and usually with great pleasure, to the hon. member for Temiscouata. I listen to him always with great pleasure when he is being witty, as he so often is. I observed that one flash of his wit tonight greatly impressed hon. members opposite particularly, when he asked what the attitude of the Leader of the Opposition was, was he for or against. It was very funny, Mr. Chairman. The only thing I want to suggest is that, like the flowers that bloom in the spring, it had nothing to do with the case.

As I understood the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon, he made it clear that he was not questioning an increase in the indemnity; and so far as I remember he made no criticism of the figure suggested by the Prime Minister for the indemnity. What the Leader of the Opposition did say was that we on this side of the chamber should not be asked to vote, without any inquiry, automatically, mechanically, and unquestioningly for this proposal just as if we were all members of the government party. He asked that there should be some inquiry whereby, in dealing with this matter, we might be furnished with information which would, I take it, have two purposes. First, it would make clearer in our own minds what we are doing. In the second place, I would hope it would make clear to the public of Canada what we are doing, so that if and when this is done, it will have been done in the best possible way. To me that seemed to be a reasonable request, and I am not without hope that it may have seemed reasonable to the Prime Minister also.

Mr. Mang: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say just a word here. I find myself in a rather peculiar position with regard to this resolution. Some years ago I was elected as a kid member in Saskatchewan. That was in 1934, when we were led to victory by the present Minister of Agriculture, the hon. member for Melville. At that time I well remember that we had a discussion on the question of indemnities, only at that time the position was reversed. That is why I am in a rather peculiar position when it comes to making a decision on this resolution. At that time, we as members decided to reduce our indemnities; that is, we were going the other way. We reduced our indemnities. I would point out that that was in 1934, when the reduction meant a considerable amount of money to us. Tonight I am confronted with having to make a decision on whether or not to help raise the indemnity. Of course if we want to raise it, and some of us do not want to retain it, I suppose we are at liberty to turn it back in.

I just wish to make one more remark in order to show my additional confusion, and it is this. Ten years afterwards, in 1944, when the C.C.F. party took over in our province, they took over just as strongly as we did in 1934. We were 50 to 5; that is, we were 50 Liberals to 5 C.C.F. In 1944 it was just the other way around. Among the first thing this group did was to raise the indemnities; they increased the number of their ministers and raised the salaries.

Out of this discussion tonight I hope that in some way I shall be able to make up my mind just what to do, but I find myself in an interesting position, and I just wanted to state it.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Chairman, it is perhaps unfortunate that I did not take more time to prepare an address for the purpose of this particular debate. It would, of course, only be necessary for me to jot down a few notes. Since I have been here—and I came in 1949—I think there has been before this house no legislation with whose aspects I am more familiar. This is one piece of legislation as to which I do not need guidance by a royal commission. I do not need a royal commission to tell me whether or not I feel that I should, in conscience, vote for an increase in the indemnity of members of parliament.

It has been said that, in taking cognizance of this legislation, a member should not be swayed by his own personal views. However, I fail to see how it would be possible for any member to vote intelligently on this question unless he gave some consideration to how it affects him—because, after all, he is the member of parliament—and the public in general. Anyone we might appoint to a royal commission would not be familiar with the various expenses of a member, the various things to which a member of parliament is expected to contribute, or just how his affairs need to be handled.

I wonder how a royal commission would proceed. Would a royal commission inquire as to the standard of living of the various members of parliament, as to what they live in when they come to Ottawa, what their occupations are at home, what they live in before coming here and so on? Just how would they determine whether a member needs additional income?

The strange thing about this matter is this. The first time I heard the matter broached in the House of Commons was by a Conservative member who, I am led to believe, is not exactly a poor man. I refer to the hon. member for Simcoe North. That was some two years ago. That is only a remark by the way, but it is an indication. For my part, I know that for the last several years the matter has been discussed amongst members and parties, in the hope that there was a general intention of making life here as a member of parliament more amicable. It is for that reason I am quite confident that it did not come as a surprise to any member of the opposition that this question would be raised following the general election of last year.

If we were to get down to cases—and I do not think it should be necessary—and if we were to consider the hours of work, for instance, as I have done as a union officer when we were making representations before management, I might point out that most members of parliament arrive at their offices here between nine and ten o'clock in the morning. It is seldom that they leave before the hour of ten; and until the last parliament, I believe it was, they remained in the building until eleven o'clock at night. That means a 14-hour day with, of course, time off for lunch and so forth; but they are more or less on duty that full time. Apart from the hours, I do not want to go into the matter of actual pay for work done, because that was not my intention when I came to this house. On that basis alone I believe there is some justification for doing something about increasing the indemnity.

I have travelled considerably with union officers who represent the people in another sphere than as members of the House of Commons. Very few of these people, and rightly so, are paid less than $6,000 a year. As happened in my own case when I was a union representative, from the time a union officer steps into a taxi at the door of his house when proceeding on any type of union work until the time he gets home he is paid his expenses. That amounts to quite a large sum of money. When a member of parliament reaches his home after leaving the house at the end of a session it is necessary for him to travel much more than a union officer, but he does so at his own expense.

In saying this, I do not want my constituents to feel that they are taking advantage of me when they ask me to go here and there throughout my riding, but I simply wish to point out that every time you step into an automobile these days and drive a few hundred miles it runs into quite a large amount of money. Those are some of the reasons I think the work we do and the amount of time we spend on it justify more than $6,000 a year.

I might mention in passing that quite a number of miners in Canada made around $6,000 last year. It is true that their work is much more arduous, but they are living at home and their expenses are certainly not commensurate with those of a member of parliament. I do not think they want their members of parliament to live in any poorer circumstances than those in which they are able to live.

Certainly when one is discussing these things one has his own personal situation to consider. So far as a young man with a family is concerned, a semi-monkish existence is no existence for him at all. It is not a good thing for him to have his family in the far west, to live here and have to maintain two homes, and it certainly is an expensive arrangement. If such a member moves his family here he runs into much more expense than is involved in living at home. No matter how you look at it there is considerable sacrifice, and unless a man is willing to live in a garret and put up with much poorer conditions than in his own home he cannot expect to carry on.

A number of hon. members on the opposition side have made reference to the fact that considerable time is spent by some members away from the house, that there is some absenteeism and so on. I think it would be unfair to point to any one member or group of members, but it may be that those with professional practices in their ridings are in a much better position financially than those of us who have to work in mines or factories, and they might be inclined to be absent from the house more than those who do not have these businesses.

I thought the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre repudiated his own people this afternoon in a manner which I would not think would be acceptable to them. My contention has always been that a member should maintain connections with his own riding and that he should not become a professional politician. I am quite confident that any young married man attempting to raise and educate a family and having to move them back and forth across this continent will not become a professional politician for the sum of $10,000. The amount will have to be considerably more before such a man will be induced to become what the hon. member has called a professional politician.

But I do believe there are some in the C.C.F. ranks who make a calling of being a member of parliament, and I am sure that if they do they should not be called professional politicians. They are making a very great sacrifice, and I certainly think they deserve all the credit we can give them. But I cannot see how they can maintain and educate a family, and look forward to further education of their families, on $6,000 a year as members of parliament.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to talk out this measure, but I have a few words to say on it. As will be indicated when the vote is taken, and as has been suggested so far by the speeches made by members of this group, we are completely democratic. We are split three ways, which indicates that members of our group are completely free. As far as I am concerned, I want to say that the Prime Minister in introducing this measure is making an honest attempt to solve a problem that has existed for some considerable time. I do not think anyone can accuse him of having any personal motives. This will probably be his last term, and to my mind he fits pretty well a definition I have seen, namely that a politician thinks in terms of elections and a statesman thinks in terms of the future generation. He is laying the groundwork for his successor.

I think it is incorrect to say that this measure requires more study, that it has not been thought of, and that it comes as a surprise. I have heard it talked about in the corridors for the past four years. I have heard it debated in the cafeteria and I have heard it psychoanalysed in the parliamentary restaurant. Therefore I do not think anyone is fooled when someone tries to kid us that we do not know one another's opinions about this matter, because we do.

With respect to the idea of a royal commission, I think the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was absolutely correct when he said that it was an attempt to shift responsibility. Royal commissions are not new things. The people in the part of the country from which I come look upon royal commissions with a great deal of suspicion, because they recall that in the past we have attempted to solve all the problems of this country by means of royal commissions. These commission reports never accomplished anything except to gather dust in the archives. The hon. member for Temiscouata is quite right when he says the commission would likely be composed of members of the judiciary. They would be barred from membership in the commission on a ground which the hon. member did not mention. They would be dealing with a matter in which they were personally concerned, because we establish their salaries and if they did not pass substantial increases for us they might not get their own salaries increased. We would have to go to some other profession to get a commission to handle this problem.

A commission was established in the United States, and hon. members are familiar with what happened there. No doubt that commission was composed of jurists, but despite the salaries which congressmen are getting the commission recommended a 100 per cent increase. You see, the members of the judiciary have rather lucrative salaries, and live rather well. They may set standards for us which are too high. There is no solution there.

Someone suggested a poll of public opinion across this country. A poll of public opinion was taken in the United States. People with good salaries and with poor salaries were canvassed. I have seen the results of that poll; as a matter of fact I have them here.

The housewife and the chap with a small millinery shop, the people with poor salaries and substantial salaries, all were canvassed, and there was not one person in that group who said the net income of a member of congress, after taxes, should be less than $20,000 per year. Many of them said it should be $25,000.

The two suggestions made by the Leader of the Opposition are not workable here. They were tried in the United States, and the opinion was that the top executives of the country, the people who pass the laws and who have the power to declare wars, to requisition your boy or girl for service, and who have to take that responsibility, were entitled to a great deal more remuneration than they are receiving now.

I am a strong believer in equal pay for equal work. If you are going to measure from that standard—and I firmly believe that is the standard that should be used—our opposite number, the congressman in the United States, receives a higher indemnity than we do. It is the philosophy of the union movement across this country to try to raise our standards to those of the United States worker for comparable work. I think we are in good company when we take that position in this house. I feel that I am worth as much, I feel every member in this house is worth as much, as the congressmen in the United States. We shall not reach their position in one jump, but it is a goal for which we should strive. I do not believe in pulling down the standards.

There has been a reference to the War Veterans Allowance Act. I know all about that act because I had the privilege of helping to write the first draft of it some time ago. I have followed its course ever since, trying to shove the allowance up as high as I could. Hon. members who use the recipients of old age pensions and war veterans allowances as an argument here are using an argument which does not belong here. I believe the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre said that the amount involved in this proposal might be $1·5 million. If you take that money and apply it to the old age pension or the war veterans allowance and other social legislation in this country, it will not mean anything by way of increase. It certainly is not an argument that can be used here.

The people in the part of the country from which I come will not need explanations about this measure. A good many times in the past they have asked me what was the matter with members of parliament. We went through a war with a $4,000 indemnity which was taxed to the hilt. We had no expense allowance, and were the only people in Canada who had to spend about half of our income in earning our income, and who did not have a tax offset for that expense. Some of my people used to ask me what was the matter with the fellows up here. They said, "How can we expect you to do something for us when you will not do something for yourselves?" They thought we were carrying a load which we should not be carrying, and that we should go after some exemptions.

I have no hesitation in saying that I see this measure as introduced by the Prime Minister as a start on something I have been thinking about for many years. Before I came to the House of Commons I viewed it as a rich man's club; but unless you had sufficient income to look after your family for 12 months you just could not afford to take a vacation for two and a half months and live on the indemnity that was paid at that time.

In my opinion the indemnity was designed at that time to be used for the purpose of keeping people out of this forum who were not in a financial position to support themselves and take a vacation until the next election came along. The main criticism in my part of the country has been that you see a member when he is seeking election, but for the remainder of the four years you never see him. When I accepted the nomination, I want to say that I did not seek it. I did not want it, and I nominated someone else at the convention and made a speech for him. The convention said that I could not decline. We ballot and if you are the nominee, you are it.

Mr. Knight: The speech did it.

Mr. Gillis: No, I spoke for the other fellow. I accepted on the ground that it was a full-time responsibility, and I did not come back into office to make money for myself and forget the people who sent me here. I have not done that. I have gone back among the people and worked for them. When this house is in session I come here and do the best I can for them. You try to carry on in that way, and ultimately it will have to be done that way; because a member of this house who strives to carry out his responsibility in the general affairs of the country, who tries to understand international problems and so on, has to do a lot of reading and thinking, and he has to spend all the money he gets in meeting the demands that are made upon him.

I know that has been my experience. I want to say this. I am not an extravagant person, and my own standards are not high. Upon each and every occasion I have come back to this house since I was first elected, I have been in debt and I am still in debt. I believe the people of this country do not want to place their member in the position he is in now. He is not able to get around and do his work. They do not want him to live in cheap rooming houses. They want him to be on a par with other executives in other organizations across the country. The average member who is trying to make this as nearly as possible a full-time job has not been in a financial position to do so for the last 12 or 14 years.

You can take the argument of cheapening things and discuss other emoluments that are lower. The school of thought I was brought up in does not think in that way. Take, for example, the position of the wage earner in this country today. Our wages are pretty high in comparison with India, Africa, Japan and other countries that we are going to have trouble with in the future in matters of trade. But the trade union movement of this country are not taking the position that they are going to lower their standards in order to compete with the low wages of those countries I have mentioned. They are organizing themselves, and they are sending men out to India, Africa, China and Japan to organize the workers, to lift the standards in those countries so they will not pull us down because of underselling us in world markets or even coming into our own country in the future.

That is the principle that is involved here. As far as I am concerned, all the money I get here enables me to do more work in this field in which I am engaged. I consider it is missionary work; I consider it is educational work; I believe that we have to get out and around, to keep in touch with our people. We are living in an uncertain world. We have to keep informed in order to do our work, and you must have ways and means of getting around.

I do not want to talk this matter out tonight. I just wanted to say what I have said. I am backing this matter from the resolution stage to third reading, and I am complimenting the Prime Minister on having the courage at this time to bring the measure into the house.

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Chairman, in rising to oppose the resolution I want to say at the outset that I have only the highest possible respect for views which may be opposed to those I express, and which may be held by other hon. members. I believe that both the Prime Minister and the leader of our group were quite right when they said that on a matter such as this each individual member should use his own best judgment rather than take it as a partisan matter. I am speaking, therefore, for myself, expressing my own personal views.

I have no hesitation in saying that I oppose this measure on the ground first of all that, in spite of what has been said here that there had been some hints or indications that something of this nature might be brought down after the election, I was neither informed, consulted, nor even heard the hint anywhere before August 10 that it was the intention of this government to bring a measure such as this before the house at this session.

I believe it is our duty to keep good faith with our electors. Had this matter been submitted to the electors of Canada previous to the election, and had the Prime Minister, when he made his radio broadcast to which he referred, in which he announced that he would press for or recommend certain changes in the rules of the house which might bring about greater efficiency, at the same time announced that the government intended to bring forth a measure to increase indemnities and salaries as contained in this resolution, then the people across Canada would have been informed and would have known of the intentions of the government. They could have discussed the matter in an open, democratic manner, as they have the habit of doing, with all the candidates in each of the ridings. I do not say they would have taken this stand or the other stand, because I do not think we know at the present time what the opinion of the people of Canada is on this issue which was not submitted to them for their consideration.

On that ground I would have to oppose the resolution, but there are other reasons. One of the reasons is that in the Prime Minister's address he made reference to the fact that the cost of living had risen rather substantially in recent years. I can remember so vividly how many times in this very house my colleagues warned the government in 1945, 1946 and years following, as did many other hon. members, that the actions they were taking or contemplating in abolishing the controls that we had—price controls—would result in a situation where there would have to be increases in salaries, wages and so forth, right across the board. The government did not heed those warnings. They brought on the situation themselves and, as a matter of fact, took a rather stubborn attitude on many occasions, as much as to say, "We do not need your advice; we know what we are doing." Now we are faced with this situation, and it is still not clear—it may be made clear before this debate is finished—as to whose request is being carried out.

Upon whose request is this measure being introduced? The Prime Minister of course said quite properly that he and the government are prepared to take full responsibility. It is a government measure. But that is not the whole story. Certainly it was not the prime minister in council who simply got the bright idea and said, "Let us suggest to the house that we raise the indemnities by $4,000 and see how the boys take it".

It must have gone further than that. The request must have come from some responsible group of persons in this country. Was it the rank and file members of the Liberal party? If that were so I believe this house should be so informed. Then we would at least know where this thing originated. As it is now, it is something put before the house and the only justification given, that I can see, with any substance behind it is the fact that the cost of living has risen and we therefore must make some provision to see that the average member of parliament may continue to do his work.

If that argument holds good for the members of this house, and the members of the Senate, members of the government, the Leader of the Opposition and all others concerned, surely the cost of living has not fallen for the rank and file wage earners, farmers, and other people across this country. They have suffered just as much at the hands of the government's decontrol policy as have the individual members of this house. Then because we happen to be in the position—I speak collectively as a whole parliament now—where we are temporarily the custodians of the people's tax money, that does not excuse us nor does it excuse the government for neglecting all those other groups and not providing something for those who are not so close to the source of supply, unless you are willing to accept the old legal proverb that possession is nine-tenths of the law.

It has been suggested that this matter be submitted to a royal commission. Obviously I would not support that suggestion, though if I were on the other side of this question, if I were in favour of an increase, I would think there might be something to that proposal because there would be something to investigate. But since I am not supporting the measure I obviously see no reasons for submitting anything to a royal commission. Our experience with royal commissions has been such that it appears to me the end result if we submitted this question to a royal commission would be that instead of adding a burden of $1,500,000 to the taxpayers we would be adding an extra $500,000 and making it $2 million, because royal commissions have to be paid also. Let us not forget that. They do not do their work for nothing. I see no reason why we should add cost upon cost.

I am speaking for myself when I say I am opposing this resolution. I repeat that I respect the views of all others who have spoken. It is quite clear that this is not a question as to whether we need an increase. It is not a question which can be decided by speaking of all the members of the house as a unit. We are not all in the same position. It is an academic question which could be debated for years. Sooner or later this parliament will decide, and naturally the majority view will have to be accepted and respected. But I shall make my stand perfectly clear, on the ground that this was not submitted to the electorate, nor was any opportunity given to us who participated in the election to submit it to our electors, or even consult with them or discuss it with them in any way. On that ground alone I find it impossible to give my support to this measure.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I want simply to clear up one or two points which have been raised, in view of the fact that there has been an obvious attempt to obscure the issue that was presented. The question was not that there was any objection to rewarding or reimbursing members in keeping with their responsibilities. It was stated clearly several times and quite emphatically that in our belief the people of this country were quite prepared to provide from public funds an adequate return to members of parliament. But that does not deal with the other problems that are raised.

The resolution before us does not deal alone with members' allowances or indemnities. As I said before, it is a rolled-up package. Members are to vote on an increase for the members of the Senate, about whom not one word has been said by way of support, by way of argument or by way of evidence. They are increasing cabinet ministers' salaries and the salaries of the leaders of the opposition in this house and the Senate by $9,000, but not one word has been said as to why that should be done. When I say "by $9,000" I mean by the $4,000 they will receive as members and the $5,000 which will also be granted to members of the government. Not one word has been put forward to explain how that figure was arrived at. Where did it come from?

I repeat what I said this afternoon. This house has been told over and over again that we must be cautious about handling public funds. There are a number of matters about which the people of this country are pressing for action, and we are told that there must be a great deal of consideration before any commitments are made. It was my hope that by suggesting a royal commission we would provide a method of inquiry into this and the other matters raised by this motion which would not leave the suggestion that while we were insistent upon the last bit of evidence to support the needs of others who depend upon parliament, we were in great haste to pass legislation—and without evidence—that would bring benefits to members of parliament themselves. It is as simple as that.

Mr. Chairman, a great deal has been said about the suggestion of a royal commission. If the Prime Minister would say that he would agree to a select committee and throw it wide open, I would say that while I favour a royal commission I would not object to that method, which was the method employed at Westminster on the last occasion a change was made there and which has been employed on similar occasions here. I say that by one method or the other, by a royal commission or a select committee, we should be in position to obtain more evidence that we have now.

We have no information as to how these figures were arrived at that are now before us. What happens in regard to the pension? Unless there is legislation that is not disclosed, the pension will be increased by this procedure. Should there be no examination of that subject? Should there be no evidence as to the actuarial problems involved and what it will cost the public treasury if that is done? We are not accepting our responsibilities as members if we agree to support a resolution which says it is expedient that this legislation be introduced unless we have evidence before us to support that contention. That is our position.

When I suggested a royal commission it was not that I was wedded to that proposal. It was simply that I was asking that we have information which we should have. It is very interesting to hear hon. members on the opposite side speak in such contemptuous terms of royal commissions. One statement that was made was that all any royal commission has done is make a report which goes to the archives to gather dust.

Was that the purpose of the royal commission on the arts, letters and sciences? Was that simply a cynical waste of public money? Was that simply an attempt to send something to the archives without any consideration? The royal commission on the arts, letters and sciences was set up under a distinguished Canadian to report on subjects of concern to Canadians. I have not heard previously the cynical suggestion that this was simply a device to avoid responsibility.

When it is suggested by the hon. member for Temiscouata that the appointment of a commission is only to avoid making a decision—

Mr. Pouliot: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: The hon. member says "hear, hear." Then I ask was that the reason the government appointed the commission on the Saskatchewan dam? Some have suggested that it was.

Mr. Fulton: Yes; no doubt about that.

Mr. Drew: May I ask him if that was the reason they appointed a royal commission in regard to certain problems in the maritime provinces? Was that the reason they appointed a royal commission on freight rates? At least there are some of us who think those commissions did provide interesting and useful information, whether or not members of the house agreed with everything that was put forward. No matter whether we agree with all this government does or with the reports of commissions, we have not gone so far as to suggest that on every occasion they have appointed a royal commission it has been with the entirely cynical purpose of simply avoiding responsibility.

It was said tonight that it was uncertain where we stand. There is no uncertainty. We have stated that we believe there should be an increase in the indemnities and allowances paid to members, based upon inquiry which will give us some information as to how the figure is arrived at. But that is no reason why we should give a blank cheque for everything else contained in this proposal. Certainly it is no reason why we should agree in this motion that it is expedient that this legislation be introduced. We have heard nothing to support any of the measures contained therein, outside of the proposal to increase the indemnity of the members.

We have not heard any convincing argument as to the need for an increased indemnity to encourage men to come forward to become members of the other house. That is the reason we are told this should be done in this case. As far as this is concerned, we cannot call for a recorded vote. However, I certainly shall oppose this motion in committee in the absence of any assurance that there is going to be an opportunity to obtain the information we should have. Certainly at the time this bill comes before us, if this resolution is passed, there will be an opportunity to deal with it in the ordinary way and register our objection in a more formal manner.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, after all we are here for the purpose of getting evidence and hearing facts. What about the question of the pension? Is that legislation going to be amended so that a double pension as compared to what we are receiving today will not be paid? Surely the Prime Minister is going to give some information.

Mr. St. Laurent: The Prime Minister is not going to make any commitments on this resolution. If it is not good enough on its merits, it should not carry.

With respect to pensions, if the hon. gentleman wishes to have the committee that considered the matter before consider what the actuarial implications will be, there can be no objection to having that matter go to the committee to have it report back to this house what information it can get in that regard.

With respect to these other matters, I am not going to make any commitment. The resolution itself merely refers to the expediency of introducing bills to increase these indemnities. The figures are not set out in the resolution. The figures will be set out in the bills. I told the house what was going to be recommended in the bills, but in debating this resolution the house is not debating the bill. The bills have to be considered and have three readings, and there will be ample opportunity then to discuss the details of the bills and obtain all the information that can be made available on the figures that will be contained in the bills. The resolution merely states:

> That it is expedient to introduce measures to amend (a) the Senate and House of Commons Act to increase the salaries of the Speakers and the Deputy Speaker, the sessional allowances of members of the Senate and of the House of Commons . . .

And:

> (b) the Salaries Act to increase the salaries of ministers mentioned . . .

And so on. There are no details in the resolution, which merely refers to the advisability of introducing amending legislation to deal with these matters. The position then is that if the resolution is adopted the bills will be introduced, they will be distributed, and they can be fully discussed in all their particulars.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Surely the Prime Minister is in a position to say whether the cabinet, having envisaged this legislation which it is now introducing, intends as well to allow the pension act to remain as it is. Or is it the intention of the cabinet—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is it the intention of the governor in council to amend the pension act so as not to permit the grants to be made, unless that act is amended?

Mr. St. Laurent: "Governor in council" is of course a slip of the tongue on the part of my hon. friend. The governor in council does not amend any legislation. Parliament amends legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. gentleman knows that that pension act was put before the house, and that it is subject to re-examination at each and every session. The government will have no objection to having it reconsidered by the banking and commerce committee and to an actuarial investigation to determine what the effect will be. When the act was introduced it was not intended that it should be any more onerous on the treasury than the obligation of equalizing the contributions made to the fund by the members of parliament themselves. It was expected, on the information we got from the actuary, that the fund would be ample to provide the pensions that are called for by the terms of the act, and the government would wish at all times to have that carefully checked because it is not intended to make that a greater charge upon the treasury than was intended at the time, namely to equalize the contributions made by the members themselves.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I rise for one purpose, namely to say that I asked whether the governor in council would make such a recommendation to the house. When the Prime Minister says the governor in council does not amend—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —does not amend statutes, then I say the government has done it on several occasions by order in council.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the hon. member for Kamloops wish to speak?

Mr. Fulton: Yes. I want to ask the Prime Minister a question, because I have not been able to understand whether he is giving a firm commitment that the legislation will be amended.

Mr. St. Laurent: He is not.

Mr. Fulton: It is all very well to say the government would have no objection to the matter being referred to the banking and commerce committee. The Prime Minister knows; you, sir, know; every member of this committee and every member of the house knows that if the government does not introduce legislation to amend the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act then it will not be amended. The act indeed says, and I am quoting from section 4:

> The Minister of Finance shall, in accordance with the regulations, credit to the account, in each fiscal year,
> (a) an amount equal to the contributions paid in that fiscal year . . .

If a member's contributions are automatically doubled then automatically, under the terms of the statute, treasury contributions are doubled. The only body that can ensure that the act will be amended is the government, and I do not yet understand that we have a commitment from the government that this legislation will be amended so the burden will not be automatically doubled as a result of this measure.

Mr. St. Laurent: I shall clear the matter up for my hon. friend. I have given no commitment that the statute will be amended.

Mr. Drew: Then just before we vote may we take it, as it stands, that the result of this, without any other evidence before us, will be to double the fund?

An hon. Member: No.

Resolution reported: Yeas, 130; nays, 37; read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. St. Laurent thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 171, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. St. Laurent thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 172, to amend the Salaries Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Drew: May I ask what the order of business will be tomorrow?

Mr. Harris: The business tomorrow is whatever hon. members themselves choose to do by way of private members' motions.

Mr. Fulton: And for Thursday what will it be? Can the minister tell us that now?

Mr. Harris: On Thursday, Mr. Speaker, we shall take up first the housing bill and second, the bill standing in the name of the Postmaster General with respect to postal rates.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, January 27, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

FURTHER STATEMENT WITH RESPECT TO NUMBER OF UNEMPLOYED

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would like to reply to the request made yesterday by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) for whatever figures are available on the number of workers who are working short time and the number who are on temporary lay-off. I think the best thing I can do is to refer to the data available in the last monthly report of the labour force survey for December 12, 1953.

The estimated number of persons, outside of agriculture, who worked less than 35 hours—here we take 35 hours as a full week—during the week ending December 12, 1953, was 369,000 in round figures, being 206,000 male and 163,000 female. Of these workers, some 59,000, or 28,000 male and 31,000 female, worked from 1 to 14 hours during the survey week while 310,000, or 178,000 male and 132,000 female, worked from 15 to 34 hours during the survey week.

I should add that there is always a substantial number of people who work on a short-time basis through choice. It is estimated that there were at least 150,000 such people at the time of the last survey.

With regard to persons on temporary lay-off, the best information available on these is the number claiming unemployment insurance due to temporary lay-offs. At the beginning of December the number of persons temporarily laid off who were claiming unemployment insurance benefits totalled 13,900.

In answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), there was no over-all estimate made based on the labour force survey of the number of people working on a short-time basis in the textile industry.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DUFRESNE—REQUEST FOR WITHDRAWAL OF UNPARLIAMENTARY EXPRESSION

Mr. J. W. Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Yesterday afternoon, after concluding my speech in the house, I had to absent myself to go to my office. The hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Dupuis), in an effort to counterbalance the statements I made, contended that the speech I had delivered in the house was a—

Mr. Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but if he wants to correct a part of his speech that has been misinterpreted by another member during the debate, he cannot do so by rising on a question of privilege. He will have the opportunity of making his views known later on, more clearly if he so desires, during the debate on second reading of the bill. That should not be done by rising on a question of privilege at this stage of the proceedings.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, it is not at all a question of correcting something I said in the house yesterday. I only want to ask the house to request that the word "demagogue" used by the hon. member for St. Mary be withdrawn.

Mr. Pouliot: When one speaks like a demagogue he is called a demagogue.

Mr. Speaker: It is unfortunate that the hon. member was not in his seat when that statement was made; he could then have raised the question of privilege. However, I might say to the hon. member, for his own satisfaction, that even if he had risen on a point of order at that time, I would probably have told him that to my knowledge the word "demagogue" is not exactly the kind of expression that could be called unparliamentary in this house; it is often used by members on both sides of the house.

Mr. Pouliot: In his case, it is not exaggerated.

(Text):

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I regret profoundly that I was not able to follow exactly what was stated in connection with the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne). If I understood you correctly you stated that the question of privilege should have been raised immediately and that the word "demagogue" in itself was not unparliamentary.

Privilege—Mr. Dufresne

May I direct your attention to the translation of the speech of the hon. member whose remarks are complained of and which appears on page 1470 of Hansard for yesterday. The hon. member went on to give the dictionary definition of the word "demagogue", in the sense in which he was applying it, as follows:

> One who pretends to defend the people's interests to gain their favour.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton: I take it from the applause from the ranks of those supporting the government that they think anyone who seeks to defend the interests of the workmen in his riding is pretending to defend their interests. If that is their attitude then their constituents will be their judge. My point is on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne), which I submit, sir, is perfectly well taken in that it is not open to any hon. member to impute to another hon. member motives which are themselves improper or would be improper for an hon. member to have in putting forward his views. As to the speech made by the hon. member, the words speak for themselves; but I think it is unquestionable that it conveys motives attributed by him, whatever may be in the minds of hon. members opposite, and therefore the expression as applied by him to the other hon. member is clearly out of order and should be withdrawn.

Mr. Speaker: I did not hear the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Dupuis) when he made his remarks.

Mr. Dupuis: I will repeat them again, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I now read in Hansard the words that are attributed to him. I said a moment ago in French that this expression "demagogue" has been one which has been used frequently on both sides of the house to my knowledge. I therefore hesitated to declare that it was unparliamentary. The expression in this case is not isolated. It is accompanied by a definition of the word "demagogue" which the hon. member for St. Mary said he found in the Larousse dictionary and which reads:

> One who pretends to defend the people's interests to gain their favour.

Does the hon. member think that because he used a definition of Larousse, the words could properly be used? I certainly want to make it clear that I am not ruling Larousse dictionary quotations out of order. I am reminded of a Shakespearean citation which was made on one occasion in the course of the debate and when I called an hon. member to order, not because he was quoting Shakespeare, but because he was out of order before he began to quote, I was reported in certain quarters as having declared that quotations by Shakespeare were out of order in this house. I want to make it quite clear this time that I am not saying it is out of order to quote definitions which appear in the Larousse dictionary. One must consider the context in which the expression was used by the hon. member for St. Mary when he said, as reported at page 1470 in yesterday's Hansard:

> I have not heard for quite a while in this house so demagogic a speech as that just made by the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne).

He then went on:

> I knew the meaning of the word demagogue, but to make sure I looked up its meaning in the Larousse dictionary. You will see that the word applies very well to the member for Quebec West. According to the dictionary a demagogue is: "One who pretends to defend the people's interests to gain their favour."

When he says: "You will see that the word applies very well to the member for Quebec West", I think he is extending the definition of the word in the dictionary and applying it to the hon. member. Therefore, I think the hon. member should correct the statement he has made. The hon. member will not, I know, insist upon arguing the point—and certainly the matter could not have been taken up until this time—but I will have to ask the member to modify his expression.

(Translation):

Mr. Hector Dupuis (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, I do not object to withdrawing that word if it offends my hon. friend from Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne), but I would like to draw the attention of this house to the definition we find in the Larousse dictionary.

(Text):

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to listen to the explanation of the hon. member. As he knows he is not supposed to make a speech. It is his duty when he is asked to do so by the chair to withdraw and this is what I am asking him to do. If he wants to give a preliminary explanation to his withdrawal I will listen to it provided it is concise.

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, I regret that so fitting an expression has to be withdrawn, but I withdraw it.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not the manner in which this expression should be withdrawn. I know the hon. member will not insist upon arguing the point and I will ask him to simply withdraw the expression without any comments.

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: To be agreeable to you, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw it.

QUESTIONS

FOREIGN PATENT ROYALTIES—WITHHOLDING TAX

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West):

1. What amount of money did Canada receive in withholding tax on royalties paid on foreign patents, during each of the years 1950 to 1953 inclusive?
2. What is the rate of this withholding tax?
3. What is the tax rate the United States and the United Kingdom governments charge Canadian residents and/or corporations who draw patent royalties from their countries?

Mr. McCann:

1. The taxation division does not maintain statistical information as to the amount of income tax withheld at the source from royalties paid to non-residents in respect of foreign patents.

2. 15 per cent.

3. While it is not the usual practice of this division to furnish information respecting taxes imposed by foreign governments, it may be said in this instance that the United States imposes a tax of 30 per cent on royalties paid by United States residents to a resident of Canada for the use in the United States of a patent. By article XI of the Canada-United States tax convention the rate of tax so charged is limited to 15 per cent.

Moreover, while paragraph 3 of article VI of the Canada-United Kingdom tax convention exempts from surtax payments made by residents of the United Kingdom to residents of Canada for the use of patents in the United Kingdom, such payments are, however, subject to the standard rate of tax which, for the taxation years 1951-52 and 1952-53, was 9/6 in the £, and, for the taxation year, 1953-54, is 9/- in the £.

SOLDIER SETTLERS

PROPOSAL TO GIVE CLEAR TITLES TO VETERANS WITH UNPAID BALANCES

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River-Camrose): moved.

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration the advisability of giving clear titles to all soldier settlers of great war I who hold land under contract with the soldier settlement board.

He said: In discussing this resolution once again I hope that on this occasion we shall have action taken by the government before the next session is called so that it will not be necessary for me to place this resolution on the order paper again.

To many of the older members of the house this is perhaps an old story, but as we have some 70 new members I think it will bear telling all over again, at least in some modified degree, perhaps.

The Soldier Settlement Act was a piece of legislation that was passed back in 1919, immediately after great war I was concluded. It was passed in a hurry without much consideration and apparently without much knowledge, on the part of those who had to do with the framing of the act, of the conditions that existed. Some 72,000 veterans of great war I wanted to settle on the land. In my opinion they did not know just what they were trying to let themselves in for. Eventually, 25,017 settlers were set up under this legislation. The total amount of money involved was $109,034,331 which meant that there was an average advance of $4,358.40 made available to each settler. To begin with the interest rate was set at 5 per cent which meant that at that rate it would take only 20 years in order to double their debt. Just as soon as those men went into arrears, the rate of interest was immediately "upped" to 7 per cent and by that very method—in fact by the method of charging them 5 per cent to begin with—the cards were immediately stacked against them.

There was another proposition that did not seem to occur to the framers of this legislation and it was this. While the debt against the soldier settler remained at a certain level, that level was much higher than it should have been because we had just finished a war and as a result had a certain amount of prosperity. But while the debt against the settler was guaranteed, there was no guarantee whatever of the prices that the farmer would receive for his products as the years went by. In this way I believe the settlers were doomed to failure regardless of their suitability for that occupation.

At the time this legislation was brought into effect teams of horses sold for as high as $500 a team. Milch cows sold for anywhere from $125 to $150 apiece. The price of wheat ranged around $3 a bushel and in some cases even higher than that. Of course, that situation was soon taken care of because when the price of wheat, according to some people's opinion, was too high we had a wheat board set up with the definite purpose of reducing and holding down the price of wheat. Before long the price of horses went to a figure as low as $50 a team. In many cases those were only what we used to call crowbait in the first years I was out in that section of the country. Milch cows went down in price to $10 apiece and after a short time we found that wheat decreased in price to a figure as low as 20 cents a bushel at the elevator.

In case anybody should have any doubt about the prices I am giving, may I say that I have here a slip of paper entitled "Authority to Sell Chattel Equipment". This document was issued by the supervisor of the soldier settlement board, Mr. Charles G. Emslie, on December 24, 1924, to a settler whom I know very well; his name is Mr. George Connon. The address here is Islay. At the present time his address is Hazeldine. I might say that Mr. Connon is one of the men who have been down here on delegations, and now, after a good many years, he owns his farm and has made a good job of arranging for a good set of buildings, fruit trees and shelter belt and all that kind of thing. The description of the chattels given here lists 8 cows. Details are given showing their colour, age and weight. In addition to the 8 cows there is one roan bull 3 years old and two yearling calves. This whole list includes the net amount of $107.50. That means that the 7 cows were listed at $10 a head, 1 at $7.50, the bull at $10 and the two yearlings at $10 each. If anybody wishes to see this document, it is here and may be inspected. There is no question whatever as to the prices I have given. It will thus be seen that the 11 head of cattle that this fellow bought at a price of anywhere from $1,500 to $1,800 was now reduced to the price of $107.50. Many people are wondering why in the world those settlers did not make good. That is one of the reasons.

From the same man I have received another paper. It is an inspection certificate for a carload of oats shipped in 1931. That is before we reached the lowest prices. The carload of oats weighed 2,417 bushels after deduction for dockage, and he received a net price of 16 cents a bushel. It probably cost him 7 or 8 cents a bushel to have that grain threshed. Then he had to pay his freight and other charges in addition, as well as taxes on the land and many other costs in connection with the growing of grain. This illustration again should show people one or perhaps several of the reasons why the farmers were not able to make good under the set-up as originally laid down in the legislation.

There is another matter here that does not look good to me, and I brought it to the attention of the house previously. It is this. In many cases, when the soldier settlement board bought land for resale later to the veterans, the agreement for sale contained the oil and mineral rights. But in 1921, I believe it was, an amendment was made to the Soldier Settlement Act. This amendment took away from the settler and vested in the crown those oil and mineral rights. I remember that about 1938 the then minister of mines and resources, who is now a recipient of some of the good things the country can produce and sits in the other end of this house of parliament, brought in legislation to have those mineral rights restored to their proper owners. The legislation went through the house here without much discussion and, when it went on to the other end of this building, it was decided there that it should be sent to the banking and commerce committee. I read the Hansard report of what took place. According to it, some of them felt that these farmers were not interested in oil or mineral rights. They said, "They are farmers, so we will just take these rights away". After the matter had been discussed in the banking and commerce committee, it was brought back to the Senate. The report of the committee stated that they should leave the legislation as it was, with the result that the men were again deprived of part of the security which they should properly have had in their agreement for sale. In my opinion, that is a steal from those fellows who went overseas and is something that cannot be forgiven by me or by anybody else who has at heart the interests of these men.

We thought some of our neighbours around the Lloydminster district had a clear-cut case. One of them discussed the matter with me; and at the same time he had a lawyer, Mr. V. U. Miner, who is the mayor of Lloydminster, working on the matter. I remember distinctly coming from Edmonton and riding on the bus with Mr. Miner one evening just before Christmas. We discussed this matter; we thought we had better get our heads together and see what we could do about it. All of the papers were clear and Mr. Miner, a public-spirited lawyer—not of the two-by-four type mentioned here yesterday—stated that he was prepared, if necessary, to give his time and to fight this case through the courts. At that time the Minister of Veterans Affairs was none other than our very good friend, the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg). I came down here, discussed the matter with him and told him what we intended to do. I thought it was only fair to do that. He said, "Fair, wait for two or three weeks and we will see what we can do." As a result of his efforts, and without any legislation of which I am aware, the oil rights that had been filched away from these soldier settlers away back in 1921 or 1922, and which had been denied them in 1938 by the gentlemen at the other end of this building, were returned to them. I believe the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen was the man mainly responsible for the action taken earlier.

These soldier settlers were not making good and, as I stated before, it was not through any fault of theirs. We remember the conditions that existed in agriculture and in many other industries during the depression years following 1929 and up to the time war again brought prosperity to us in the 1940's. In order to try to keep these debts down to a point where the men could get along without becoming too badly discouraged, the government first of all brought about a consolidation of loans. Then they decided that the interest rate was pretty high. The interest rate on arrears had been raised to 7 per cent, and the government decided they would cancel the interest charges. That was not good enough, so they decided that the price of the land was too high. To my knowledge some farms in my part of the country were sold at a price four times that obtaining in private sales.

That is one of the things that first of all got me busy on this particular matter. In 1930 there was a 30 per cent reduction in the loans, and in 1936 legislation was introduced giving these settlers the benefit of a dollar for dollar bonus when they paid any of their arrears. I believe all hon. members will recall that at that time conditions were such that people could not make a living on the land, let alone pay off their debts. That system was not working out very well, and in 1938 the legislation was abolished.

The soldier settlers were then allowed to go before the farmers' creditors arrangement board and have their debts reduced. In spite of all the things that were done, and which were considered by many to be very worth while, I want to state that these concessions did not begin to keep pace with the deteriorating condition of agriculture. During all these years these farmers, and particularly their wives and families, suffered privation and want by reason of the fact that they were unable to pay for medical, dental and hospital care. In many cases these settlers or their wives or families passed to the great beyond simply because of the conditions under which they were forced to live.

In the early thirties the price of wheat fell to 19½ cents a bushel in my part of the country. Oats went down to 6 cents a bushel, and in many cases it cost 7 or 8 cents to have oats threshed. Cattle sold for a cent a pound, and at that time the dominion government purchased a number of cattle, good, bad and indifferent, at that price. The best hogs that could be raised sold for 2½ cents a pound. When taken to market they were turned over at 2½ cents a pound. I remember very well that eggs sold at 3 cents a dozen. These prices are not hearsay. Together with the soldier settlers, many of whom were my best neighbours, I went through these conditions.

In spite of the conditions that existed, over which the settlers had absolutely no control, an ambitious director of soldier settlement operations in Ottawa, who it would appear acted without any ministerial supervision whatever, decided that he would get rid of the soldier settlers who were in debt, probably because he wanted to make a good showing and earn a promotion. They were not paying their debts but they could not do so. He embarked on a program of demanding and getting quit claim deeds to their property and kicked the settlers and their families out on the roadside. In cases where they refused to get out he served them with a thirty-day notice to vacate.

According to figures obtained from the department, in many cases these men and their families were kicked out on the roadside, and the director did not care. I do not think that is the way to treat our veterans who went overseas and offered everything they had, and who were promised that the country would look after them when they returned. But that is what happened. Then there were some of these settlers who were brave enough to enlist after world war II broke out. They decided that here was a chance for them to make a living for their wives and families. Many of them enlisted. Some of them went overseas to different theatres of war and some remained on this side of the water. Of course they could not farm their land while they were away. No provision was made for payment on their debts to the board. What happened? I should like to refer to order in council P.C. 138/1936, passed by His Excellency the Governor General in Council on the 19th March, 1941. Under the heading "Soldier Settlement" it reads as follows:

> The board has had under consideration a submission of the hon. the Minister of Mines and Resources reporting that:
> 1. A considerable number of persons who agreed to purchase farms from the soldier settlement board or from the director of soldier settlement on long term contracts have enlisted in the Canadian armed forces.
> 2. In many cases the dependents of such enlisted persons continued to occupy their farms but no provision has been made for payment of instalments in respect of their contracts or of taxes in respect of their farms.
> 3. The director of soldier settlement has no authority to carry such accounts indefinitely and it is considered desirable to provide for deduction from dependents' allowances to cover local taxes and interest due.

They were not satisfied with kicking people out on the road but decided to extract something from the allowances paid by the armed forces to the wives and dependents who were still on the land. The order in council continues:

> Accordingly the board recommend that notwithstanding any provision to the contrary contained in any of the regulations providing for payment of dependents' or marriage allowances in respect of dependents of members of the Canadian armed forces, that in all cases where the dependents of an enlisted person continue to occupy the farm for which such person is indebted to the director of soldier settlement and in respect of which the contract terms are not otherwise satisfactorily provided for, there may be deducted from the dependents' or marriage allowance amounts sufficient to provide for payment of taxes levied by the local taxing authority in respect of the property in question and interest accruing annually on indebtedness to the director of soldier settlement, such deductions to be made monthly and in no case to exceed $20 per month except with the consent of the dependents concerned.

When the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) was speaking a few days ago in the house I was wishing that it was possible for me to offset some of his fine arguments about the present government's administration by handing him a little bouquet like this. It is a beauty and I think should be preserved for all time to come. I feel that the veterans of the second world war received very good treatment compared with those of world war I. I believe that the exposure of the treatment accorded the veterans of world war I has had quite a bit to do with the treatment accorded veterans of world war II.

In the Western Producer of November 13, 1947, we find this:

> In a recent issue "The Legionary" directs attention to an interesting item of news. It points out that the Right Hon. Ian A. Mackenzie, Minister of Veterans Affairs, last month presented what he described as "a startling comparison" between land settlement operations under the Soldier Settlement Act after world war I and those under the Veterans Land Act for veterans of world war II.
> The figures concerned operations in the province of British Columbia, but it is to be assumed that similar conditions prevail elsewhere. In the year 1925 loaning operations under the Soldier Settlement Act reached their maximum in B.C., as in other provinces. By that year, Mr. Mackenzie said there had been 3,493 loans made under the Soldier Settlement Act, totalling $15,503,474. The average loan was $4,401 and the average loan payable after allowing for 10 per cent down payments was approximately $4,080.
> Turning to Veterans Land Act operations, the minister explained that as of July 31 this year there had been 3,030 loans approved under V.L.A. in British Columbia, for a total of $14,720,115. The average loan was $4,094, but the average loan repayable is only $2,027, due to the financial formula contained in the act.

I might state here that instead of the 5 per cent and 7 per cent charge under the Soldier Settlement Act, the veterans of world war II are getting a rate of interest of 3·5 per cent which, in my opinion, is still quite high.

In case I should forget it later on, I might state that there are a number of veterans of world war I who are still on the land, and some in towns, villages and cities, who are not making a very good living. Some of them have their land paid for and some have not. In some cases these men are receiving war veterans allowances. I should like to refer now to the recommendations in the brief presented by the Canadian Legion to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and his cabinet on November 10 last. Two of the recommendations in that brief are as follows:

1. That the basic rate of war veterans allowance be increased to $60 per month for a single veteran, and $120 for those who are married.

2. That the ceilings on total permissible income under war veterans allowance be increased to $1,200 per year in the case of a single recipient and $2,000 per year in the case of those married.

I hope these recommendations will be adopted because they have been advocated for many months by members on all sides of the house. I hope that the government will see to it that, in particular, the request for an increase in allowable income will be granted. I believe that request is worthy of consideration. The same remarks apply, of course, to the other request. The granting of the requests will not hurt the government, and it will not hurt many of these people to do some additional work in order that they may build up their income to give them something like a reasonable standard of living.

Time was running out, and many of these old settlers had one big problem on hand before they passed on to the great beyond. This problem was to get a clear title to the land, and be able to leave their wives and families some form of security. These men were all growing older, just as all of us are. Away back in 1936, in the Lloydminster district, a soldier settlers union was formed. Membership was drawn from several other sections of Alberta and Saskatchewan. After some vain attempts to get recognition from any quarter, this organization went out of existence.

In the early forties another organization was formed in Saskatoon under the name of Soldier Settlers Association of Canada. Mr. H. C. Baker was the president and Mr. A. J. Sibley was the secretary treasurer. These two men deserve a lot of commendation for the work they did, particularly Mr. Sibley, who has written hundreds or thousands of letters in connection with this matter. These men received good support here for their demands. I believe they made three trips to Ottawa and made representations to the cabinet and the special committee on veterans affairs. Again I want to express the thanks of the delegation for the courteous treatment they received at the hands of the cabinet and the special committee on veterans affairs. They were pressing for clear titles, and many people at home were supporting their demands.

[Mr. Fair.]

First of all, these men secured more than 12,500 signatures on a petition circulated throughout the west. They had the support of the Alberta legislature; the Saskatchewan legislature; the farmers' union of Saskatchewan; the association of rural municipalities; the Saskatchewan wheat pool; the united farmers of Canada, Saskatchewan section; united farmers of Alberta; Alberta branch of Canadian Legion; the British Columbia branch of the Legion and many other branches, including the dominion Legion command.

After making the final presentation to the special committee on veterans affairs here in June 17, 1948 the committee dealt very leniently with them and gave them a very good reception. I happened to be present. A few days after the delegation left, the committee had an opportunity of discussing this matter. This is the report turned in by the veterans affairs committee under the heading "Soldier Settlement Act".

Your committee recommends that all indebtedness of soldier settlers under the provisions of the Soldier Settlement Act, 1918, be remitted, and that they be granted clear title to their holdings.

That was the report of the special committee on veterans affairs, a committee which has done an excellent job ever since it was set up.

Mr. Brooks: What is the date of that?

Mr. Fair: June 17 the representation was made, and this report was turned in a few days later, in June, 1948. This committee was working without any skulduggery or anything of that kind. The committee must be complimented for the work done for the soldier settlers, who greatly appreciate it.

The Canadian Legion presented a brief to the veterans affairs committee on October 26, 1945, and under the heading "Soldier Settlement Act", this is what they had to say:

Therefore be it resolved that, in order to be fair to our aging veterans and to bring the old and the new settlement acts more into line the dominion government be asked to readjust the debts of the 6,153 original soldier settlers who have not paid for their lands, such readjustment to take into consideration the difference in interest rates charged under the said acts; and that following such readjustments the government be further asked to cancel the debts of those original soldier settlers whose debt has been, or may hereafter be, reduced to 25 per cent of the original purchase price or the reduced purchase price.

Later on in the discussion in the committee the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) was not quite satisfied with the limitations placed on that recommendation, and at page 315 of the evidence of the committee, October 26, 1945, he had this to say:

On page 11 of the brief there is a reference to the old soldier settlers, and the recommendation there is that clear title be given provided a soldier reduces his indebtedness to 25 per cent of the original purchase price or the reduced purchase price. I do not think that will go far enough to satisfy the organization that calls itself the Old Soldier Settlers Organization, because they are asking for a clear title for all soldier settlers of the last war. I think we must all agree that the soldiers who are in the most difficult position of all are those soldier settlers who have had no chance of reducing their indebtedness to that 25 per cent, the ones who have been up against bad luck.

Some of you may call it bad management perhaps, but we know that the situation these men went through in the depression years put them in a position where they could not get the money to buy the farm. I should like very much to see that 25 per cent taken out of your recommendation, making it wide open so that title can be given to the old soldier settlers, whether in the fortunate position of being able to reduce their indebtedness to 25 per cent or not. I wonder if Mr. Walker would comment on that?

And Mr. Walker said:

I am sure it will not hurt our feelings if you do give them clear title.

It is quite clear and definite that the people who live in that section of the country and who know the conditions are quite in favour of these people being given clear title. The government, realizing that many of those settlers were in a tough financial position, where they could not get along on their own, decided to make a certain adjustment. For some time the most needy cases were taken care of.

During the past three or four years $150,000 has been placed in the estimates each year, and with that amount of money many of these cases have been cleared up. As of January 1, 1953, the figures show that 548 soldier settlers were still in debt. At January 1, 1954, that number had been reduced to 299, or a reduction of 249 settlers. The total debt of those men as at January 1, 1953, was $572,411.32. At January 1 this year, 1954, it had been reduced to $293,310.90, which means that they are still in debt to an average of $981. During the year, and up to the first of this year, $47,965.71, representing an average of $315.56 each, had been granted by way of reductions to 152 of the settlers.

I might point out that there is still more than $100,000 out of that $150,000 voted by the house still available for the reduction of those debts, and I am suggesting that before the end of the fiscal year, at March 31, the money should be spent in an effort to get some of those fellows out in the clear, so that they can see daylight.

Someone has suggested that they should be given help before a depression hits them. Well, I cannot see any reason in the world for another depression. And if one does come it will be man-made, just as it was back in the thirties.

The government's main objection to granting clear titles is that veterans of great war II will not want to pay up. It says it will wait for perhaps 30 or 40 years, and then will have those debts done away with. In my opinion the conditions under which veterans of great war II have been settled are such that no such condition will develop. If this or any other government should permit conditions which would put those veterans in the same position as veterans of great war I, then we in the House of Commons have a job on our hands, a job of house cleaning, and we will have to do it in a hurry. So far as I am concerned, I shall be ready at any time to help in that campaign.

As I said before, the veterans of great war II have had a pretty good deal. We have yet to rectify the problems of the recipients of war veterans allowances, and should not let many weeks go by before that is done. I hope the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) will give his attention to the matter.

I believe that in Canada we have the best country in the world, and I say that without fear of successful contradiction. We have treated well those veterans of great war II, and I suggest now that we should extend the same treatment to those few remaining from great war I who have gone on the land under the terms set out by the Soldier Settlement Act. Those men have paid everything they could over a period of more than 30 years. As a result of making those payments they have caused themselves and their wives and families to suffer privation and want.

In many cases their machinery and buildings are worn out and dilapidated, and a large amount of money is required these days to replace them. Many of those settlers are doing their best to clear up the debts, but they are hoping at the same time that before they move on to the great beyond they will get clear titles to their homes.

The excessive cost of the things they have to buy today, and the diminishing returns received for farm products, should spur the government to take action before it is too late. Many people do not realize that, because of the high cost of the things farmers have to buy in relation to the prices they receive for their grain, they are getting only about 90 cents a bushel for wheat, in terms of the value of the dollar in 1939.

I am suggesting in conclusion that without further delay, we give these 299 settlers clear titles. I wish to thank hon. members in all parties for their fine co-operation in this campaign on behalf of the old soldier settlers. Incidentally I would point out that I am not one, myself. Some people seem to think that, because I have discussed this matter on many occasions, I would receive some benefit from having these debts paid off. They will understand that this is not so when I explain that I did not buy any land from the soldier settlement board.

I wish to thank the members of the cabinet and the committee on veterans affairs for the kind co-operation and consideration given by them to the delegation which came here from the Soldier Settlers Association of Canada.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take only a few moments of the time of the house to speak on this matter. As the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose (Mr. Fair) has just said, this is an old story. I remember when I was a boy at school reading the story of the battle of the Nile in which the author said: "It is an old story now, that battle of the Nile—but a brave story, and will never die of age".

The story the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose has told us over a long period of years—some 16 or 17 of them I believe—is an old one. It has also been a brave story, so far as the soldier settlers are concerned, and I hope that, like the story of the battle of the Nile, it will not die of age, but that it will be listened to.

The time has now arrived when the story should be completed. I congratulate the hon. member upon his persistence and his very clear statements of the facts. He has said that there are many new members in the house who have not heard the story about the condition of the soldier settlers, which has continued over a long period of years. It was all to the good that the hon. member should have renewed it today.

I am not going to follow him in all he has said, because I have spoken on this subject on a number of occasions previously. I would also congratulate the Legion, former ministers of veterans affairs, and also the committee on veterans affairs, all of whom have taken a keen interest in this matter.

I do not think the hon. member's efforts have been in vain. While he has not succeeded in obtaining 100 per cent of his ideal, he has received 50 per cent; and as we often say, "Half a loaf is better than no bread". It may not be as necessary to press this matter today as it was some years ago, because considerable attention has been paid to it.

As the hon. member has pointed out, while there were 25,000 who took up land under the Soldier Settlement Act some 35 years ago, today there remain only about 299. I imagine that the number will be less than that and no doubt the minister will give us the correct number when he speaks. The number has been reduced from 25,000 to that small number. These men owe considerably less than $1,000 on the average. As I said a moment ago, from 1919 to 1954 is a long time. While in the army we used to sing an old song "There's a long, long trail awinding into the land of my dreams". There certainly has been a long, long trail awinding to those who took up land under the Soldier Settlement Act. It has been a pretty rough and stony trail as far as they are concerned. The hon. member for Battle River-Camrose (Mr. Fair) has outlined many of the difficulties which they encountered.

A great deal of credit is due to those men who have paid for their farms under the most extreme difficulties over that long period of years. Others have not been able to pay in the 35 years. I will not say that there are excuses, but no doubt there are many reasons why they have not paid. Perhaps some of them were poor farmers to start with. I met many men after the first war who had a great love for the land and open spaces and who thought they would like to take up farming. They did not prove to be good farmers and as a result they did not make a success of farming and could not pay for their farms.

There were others who had large families and who located on poor farms and were thus unable to make a living. They also, over this long period of years, were unable to pay for their farms. Certain sections of the country were not well adapted to farming. I have heard hon. members from Alberta tell of men who took up land in southern Alberta and in other dried-out areas of the west. The cards were stacked against those men and in the ordinary course of events they just could not pay for their farms.

The government has been generous in the past as far as these men are concerned, but there are only a few of them left. As the hon. member stated, these men are not young. They have lived most of their lives. Their average age is around 64 to 65 years. Before they pass on to the great beyond they would like to feel that they own the farms on which they have lived for the past 35 years. They would like to hand on their farms to their children, or probably to their grandchildren, the farms upon which they had raised their children and upon which they had spent most of their working lives.

This is practically all I wish to say to the minister this afternoon. These men have worked for 35 years on these farms. I do not think that if we waited for another 35 years we could clean this up and say that the last man has paid for his farm. In the first place, these men will not live that long. I think the problem has been reduced practically to the irreducible minimum. It seems to me that there would be no better time than right now in this year 1954 for the minister to act. There is only a small amount still owing, I imagine in the vicinity of $300,000, and the minister will tell us the exact amount. I should like to see the minister get up this afternoon and tell us and these few men—I know it is absolutely hopeless for some of them to be able to pay—that the slate is going to be wiped clean.

There is no need of the minister repeating the excuse which has been used in the past that it might be considered unfair to those men who bought farms under the Veterans Land Act or to those old soldiers who have paid for their farms. There would not be one dissenting voice from the old soldiers who have paid for their farms. The men who bought land under the Veterans Land Act received so much better treatment that they would be ashamed to complain of any treatment given to these men.

This is all I have to say. As I said before, I have spoken on this matter time and time again. If the minister is not prepared to take action himself and announce it today, I hope he will take up the matter with his colleagues and before this session is over permit us to write "finis" to this long story of suffering as far as these old veterans are concerned.

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, a great deal of credit is due to the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose (Mr. Fair) for his great persistence in bringing this matter before hon. members of this house. I was present in the house from 1945 to 1949 and I can remember the hon. member persistently bringing up a resolution similar to the one we are debating today. The resolution reads:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration the advisability of giving clear titles to all soldier settlers of great war I who hold land under contract with the soldier settlement board.

There is little need for me to attempt to document the case as the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose has done this excellently. I think all members of the house will agree that the evidence which he has placed before us would indicate that it is expedient for the government to take action to bring justice to those veterans who bought land under the soldier settlement board.

I know that many times I have sat in farm homes in my constituency and listened to veterans tell of how they bought land under the soldier settlement board. Those soldiers made one realize the real problem these men had and that it is one in connection with which the government should take action.

I recall the debates which took place between 1945 and 1949 in this house and I do not recall one hon. member rising to his feet and contending that these soldier settlers had got justice. I remember on one occasion the then member for Rosthern got up and stated that while he agreed with the sentiments of the resolution he felt it would be unfair to those soldier settlers who had died and for that reason he was going to vote against the resolution.

I wish there were more members in the house this afternoon to have heard the argument of the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose. I am sure all would have agreed with him, and with those of us who are supporting the resolution, that it is time that the government took action in connection with this matter. I recall that in 1945 the number of soldier veterans who had bought farms under the Soldier Settlement Act was in the neighbourhood of 6,000. Through death, and for other reasons, that number has been reduced until as at January 1 of this year it stood at 299.

I should think that, when we have an economy which in 1953 will have produced a gross national output of over $24,000 million, this would be a matter which does not and should not be too large a job to settle.

I believe all hon. members supporting this resolution will agree it should not be talked out. It is my hope it will go to a vote this afternoon and that that vote will indicate to the government that members of this house are in full support of this resolution.

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, in supporting this resolution I want to add my voice to that of the other members who have paid tribute to the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose (Mr. Fair), who has for years championed the cause of these men against what has been recognized by those who know the story as a grave and serious injustice.

After world war II there was a recognition in this house of the wrongs, errors and mistakes that had been committed by the administration in handling the affairs of the soldier settlement board, and it was realized that these mistakes had resulted in privation and a good deal of unnecessary suffering among men who had already served their country in the theatre of war and had come back to make their homes in the rural areas of this dominion. In spite of that fact, however, many of these men continue to suffer, and many of them have lost their life's work.

I knew many of them in my own constituency and I want to tell this government of the bitterness that was felt by some of these men and their families after they had been evicted by this government following years of hard work. That bitterness remains in the hearts of many of these men and their families.

The member for Battle River-Camrose started this fight some 15 years ago. If he could have reached the ear of the government at that time a good many hundreds of veterans would have been saved, and a great deal of good could have been done. Today there is nothing left but this belated gesture which, if agreed to, will affect some 300 men. But even this gesture would be a good thing. I am sure it would have the support of every Canadian who knows the story, and the support of the vast majority of the members of this house who know the story.

I plead with the minister to make this gesture this afternoon. Surely he can give some ray of hope to the few men who remain.

The story of the soldier settlement board and the records in this house produced year after year, giving the cost of collecting the money from these men during the days of depression and hard crops, described by the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose, show that it cost the government more to administer the department than they collected from the men in these areas. These men were placed under an impossible load; under a debt that wore them out and in many cases led to the loss of their life's work.

If this gesture can be made this afternoon, as called for in this resolution, it will in part recognize the noble work of these men who are real Canadians, who suffered in the field of battle and came back to play their part as good citizens in this Canada of ours. Such a gesture would do something to restore the faith of many embittered people in the good will of the Canadian people and the Canadian government.

Mr. O. L. Jones (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I would like to express my thanks and also the thanks of the veterans in the Okanagan valley to the member for Battle River-Camrose (Mr. Fair) for bringing up this question.

We have quite a number of the 299 men who have been referred to now living in the area which I represent. I well remember the time 20 years ago when these men were placed rather hastily on unsuitable land. They had no chance to make a living but they were placed on this land presumably because the government was stuck with it and had been ill-advised enough to purchase it. Many of them quit after three, four or five years and sought work or land elsewhere. As regards the remainder, as far as the soldier settlement board was concerned, they were left with this problem on their hands. A lot of them were anxious to help and they tried to purchase the land at a lower price from the soldier settlement board. But the board wanted its pound of flesh and they forced these fellows off the land and eventually some of that land was sold to newcomers, aliens who had come to Canada, at a lower price than that offered by the returned men.

I feel these returned men have had a raw deal from the very day they bought this land and they are still getting a raw deal. They will continue in that position until we face this problem. It is not a big problem for it involves less than 300 men and they are men who are for the most part at the age of 60 or 70, or perhaps 75. They are no longer able to cope with the struggle of keeping their land and farms going. The land they hold was never any good in any case and that is why they are behind in their payments today.

I believe the country at large and veteran members of this house are wholeheartedly behind this resolution, and in implementing it we would be giving no more than justice to a group of men who helped this country out at a critical period during the first world war. I hope a vote will be taken. I hope it will be a free vote and that it will serve to indicate to the minister that the time has now arrived when his small valiant band of men should be treated right, as the Canadian people would wish to see them treated.

Mr. Ray Thomas (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I just want to add one word in support of the resolution put forward by the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose (Mr. Fair). I am sure that after the case he put up today anything I can say would be in the nature of an anticlimax. Yet I feel it is only right that I should add my voice to that of those who support these veterans in their attempt to see that they get a fair share of the things they should get out of this country.

These men sacrificed and fought during the first world war. They came back to settle themselves, make good citizens, and work for the benefit not only of themselves and their families but of their country, and in order to produce things Canadians need. They bought their land at a time of inflation and paid extremely high prices for that land, only to see the bottom drop out of everything within a very few years. These men fought against droughts, depression, and high rate of interest and they are still trying to pay for their land because they got so far behind with the interest payments during a period when they could scarcely keep their families together let alone pay the interest on their farms.

Many of these men have now paid more than the original cost of the land and they are still in debt. They are getting older. Their ability to produce is getting less all the time and I think there should be some recognition of the efforts these men made during the past 30-odd years in trying to keep up payments and raise their families while at the same time contributing to the welfare of this country.

I know the argument has been used many times that by implementing a measure such as this we would be discriminating against those who had paid up and against the veterans of world war II. I do not think there is one veteran who took land under the Veterans Land Act after the second world war, or one veteran who took land under the Soldier Settlement Act and was able to pay for it, who would raise any objection whatsoever against giving these men clear titles to their land so that they may at least have some sort of security, and have a little bit of property that they can call their own in the twilight of their lives.

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this discussion on the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose (Mr. Fair), I feel that I would be remiss in my duty as Minister of Veterans Affairs if I did not commend the hon. member for the sympathetic interest he has shown in the matter now under discussion over the last twelve or fifteen years, I believe, that he has been sitting in this house. I think he should be commended for this interest. There is no doubt that he has focused the attention of all hon. members—particularly veteran members—who are interested in the case of veterans of world war I on the situation of the soldier settlers who were settled under the 1919 act.

This matter has been debated every year for some time, and I do not think it is necessary for me to go over the history of the soldier settlement of 1919. I think it is admitted by all those who are acquainted with the subject that the scheme under which these men were settled was pretty much a haphazard one. It was one that was evolved hastily at the end of the first world war. It must be remembered that at that time the government of the day and the parliament of the day did not have any previous experience on how to handle thousands of men being demobilized in a short period of time and on how to find a proper formula to rehabilitate them into the civilian economy. Because of the haste with which the scheme was evolved and because of that lack of experience, I think there is no doubt that, under the Soldier Settlement Act, many may have been settled under conditions which proved to be too onerous for them to make a success of their endeavour. I think that fact has been recognized.

The fact that these men settled under this act had a very hard time of it during the lean years of the depression, during the twenties and the thirties, I think was recognized by the government of the day. When illustrations are given, as has been done in various instances—and as was done by the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose this afternoon —of the actual conditions experienced by some of these settlers, it must be remembered that, rightly or wrongly, that situation existed in the whole of the farming communities in this area at that time. I well remember that, during the course of a debate on a similar resolution, a former member of the house— I think he was the then member for Selkirk, Mr. Bryce—mentioned the sorry plight in which he found himself as a farmer in the area in which these settlers were located. He concluded by saying that probably many of them could not take the knocks as well as he could.

During the course of this debate it has been said that these men should have clear title because they have been paying for so many years. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that fact in itself is not a strong argument.

As we all know, representations are made continuously to have long-term contracts under various loan schemes sponsored by the government, whether in the housing field or in the farm loan field. It could be a strong argument only if the extended term is one which affects a contract whose conditions are too onerous and might be termed unjust.

I submit that debt reduction for soldier settlers has been going on for many years. In fact, it dates back to 1922. The hon. member for Battle River-Camrose will recall that originally there were, I believe, 25,017 settlers and that at that time the investment by the federal government under this scheme was slightly over $109 million. Every few years since then there has been some kind of legislative revision designed to relieve those settlers, by reducing their obligations under the terms of their original contract, by revaluation or by other adjustments of the sort. As I mentioned before, it was recognized that the terms of these contracts were too onerous under the depressed conditions of the twenties and thirties.

The first of these measures was in 1922. If I may, I think I shall take the liberty of enumerating to the members of this house what has been done since the scheme was originally enacted, because it will put the problem in its true perspective. In 1922, 21,269 settlers benefited by an interest exemption which amounted to $10,270,000.

Mr. Brooks: What was the original interest?

Mr. Lapointe: Five per cent.

Mr. Brooks: Five per cent to seven per cent?

Mr. Lapointe: Five per cent.

Mr. Quelch: Seven per cent.

Mr. Lapointe: I am not quite sure. I am sure the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose will correct me if I am wrong. After that I think it became 7 per cent on the arrears or on the interest; I am not quite sure.

Mr. Fair: That is right.

Mr. Lapointe: On the arrears. A few years afterward, in 1925, there was a reduction in the price of livestock effective as at the standard date in 1925. What is referred to as the standard date is the day on which the instalment becomes due. There was a 40 per cent reduction in the price of all livestock sold to a veteran prior to the standard date in 1920 and a 20 per cent reduction in the price of livestock sold to a veteran after that date and prior to the standard date of 1921. That reduction amounted to approximately $3 million. In 1927 there was again a new measure which took the form of land revaluation. It reduced the principal owing by veterans by $7 million and it affected some 7,043 settlers.

In 1929 a new measure, which I believe was implemented in 1930, granted a 30 per cent reduction in principal and interest amounting to $11,300,000, and aided 11,912 settlers. In 1933, three years later, a further interest remission totalled $1,310,000 and benefited some 11,612 settlers.

The next measure to alleviate the difficulties of soldier settlers was introduced in 1933, when the dollar for dollar bonus was instituted. During the period from 1933 to 1939 inclusive this measure permitted a reduction of principal payments by some $2 million and interest payments by $1,500,000, thereby helping some 8,512 settlers. In 1934, as my hon. friends know, the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act came into force, and it was applicable to soldier settlers. Under this act up to 1942 soldier settlers received a reduction in principal and interest commitments of nearly $7 million, and about 2,419 settlers were affected.

In 1942 the entire position of soldier settlement was completely reviewed by a special committee on veterans affairs. It was found that the general position of soldier settlers, as shown in the annual report for 1942, should be investigated. It was revealed that approximately 50 per cent of the settlers were in what could be termed a sound or satisfactory position, and that the other 50 per cent were in doubtful or unsatisfactory positions. To illustrate my point, a detailed analysis of the situation showed that 2,953 settlers had acquired an average equity of 67·5 per cent in their farms, and that 606 settlers had acquired an average equity of 32 per cent. Of those in what were termed doubtful or unsatisfactory positions, 1,078 settlers had acquired an average equity of only 17 per cent, and 2,723 settlers had no equity at all.

The parliamentary committee therefore focused its attention on the latter two classes, and it recommended that further relief was necessary for soldier settlers. An order in council was passed in November, 1942, being P.C. 10/472. It contained two main provisions. One was the reduction of debts of soldier settlers by the treasury board on the recommendation of the director, and the second was the extension of term agreements. The provisions of this order were pretty realistically applied by the director, his officials and the responsible officers in the various districts. For the first time in the history of soldier settlement adjustments were made to meet individual circumstances and set patterns for procedure. The basic approach was to consider the capacity of the individual settler in relation to the estimated productive value of his land.

In the three and a half years following this order in council 2,419 debt reductions went through the books, the write-off amounting to approximately $1,300,000. As the result of this procedure soldier settlers made a good response, and by March 31, 1946, 268 settlers had already repaid their loans in cash. I think that is evidence that the order in council passed in November, 1942, had proved a practical and constructive measure with respect to debt repayment for soldier settlers.

The general position of soldier settlers as of March 31, 1946, showed a total of 4,276 active settlers compared with 7,255 in 1942, at the time the order in council was passed. Their total debt was $4,960,000, with an average debt of $1,160. But the average value of their farms still held at $2,500, based on the 1941 inventory, although that was 1946. In the four-year period between March 31, 1942 and March 31, 1946 a total of 2,621 soldier settlers, or one-third of the total active settlers in 1942, repaid their loans in cash and received title to their farms.

One point I wish to make is that through the application of this order in council not only did a great number of soldier settlers repay their loans in cash and get clear titles, but settlers originally classified as being in a doubtful or unsatisfactory position were able to meet the terms, and many of them also secured clear titles to their land. In other words, the quality did not deteriorate over these years.

In 1948 the matter was again discussed in the veterans affairs committee and in the house. My predecessor, the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), introduced a new policy whereby each year an amount was voted in the departmental estimates to help reduce the debt and give clear titles to the remaining settlers. This has had the effect of reducing the present number of settlers to a very small figure. As a matter of fact, I believe the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) will recognize that the action taken by my predecessor, and which has been continued ever since 1948 has, to a great extent, had the effect which he wishes to achieve by his yearly resolution. I believe I can quote figures which will illustrate this fact.

As of October 31, 1948, when the first order in council implementing the new policy came into force, there were 2,637 active soldier settler accounts with a total indebtedness of $2,842,534.30. On December 31, 1953, that is this last December, there were 299 active accounts with a total indebtedness of $293,310.90. I venture to say that it is possible my figures are already slightly out of date, because negotiations are continuously being conducted with these settlers to get them to agree to the new arrangement.

Mr. Brooks: Might I ask the minister a question? I am sorry to interrupt, but how many of those would be British settlers under the British settlers' scheme?

Mr. Lapointe: I think they are considered separately.

Mr. Brooks: I might say that in the 1953 report of the Department of Veterans Affairs there is this paragraph on page 65:

> It might be explained that in addition to qualified soldier settlers established under the act, these figures include 74 British family settlers and 27 soldier settlers who purchased reverted properties on civilian agreements, and were eligible for debt reduction under the order in council by reason of their service in a theatre of actual war.

I was wondering about that.

Mr. Lapointe: I have some figures which may be of interest to the hon. member. In addition to the numbers I have mentioned of soldier settlers who were granted reductions, 120 settlers who were eligible to apply for benefits under the Soldier Settlement Act but purchased under the British family settlement scheme or on civilian agreements have also been granted debt reductions.

Mr. Brooks: Those 299 would not be original soldier settlers?

Mr. Lapointe: My understanding is that they are all soldier settlers. If I am not correct I shall let the hon. member have the correct information. Of the 2,637 active soldier settler accounts as of October 31, 1948, 1,599 had been granted reductions under the various orders in council. As at December 31, 1953, 1,511 had already obtained title, and 827 settlers repaid their accounts and obtained title without any reduction under the provision of the various orders. At the present time, of those 299 accounts which are left with a total indebtedness of $293,310.90 there are 88 who are already repaying the reduced indebtedness after adjustments had been made. In other words, 88 of them have come to an agreement with the director and are paying under the new conditions. This leaves 211 accounts which are not adjusted.

These 211 accounts on which no adjustment has been made as of December 31, 1953, have a total indebtedness of $205,142.26. Of those 211 accounts 41 are not eligible for a reduction for various reasons, such as the fact that the settler and his wife are both deceased or the settler has sold his farm under a private agreement and it is now impossible for the director to make an adjustment with the settler. This leaves 170 who are eligible. Of the 170, there are 36 who have refused to apply for a reduction, although they have been approached and in many cases it was felt that under the order in council they would be entitled to a reduction. These people have said they would continue under the original terms of their contract until final payment was made. However, we are continuously reviewing the cases of these settlers who have refused to accept a reduction.

There are others whose cases do not meet the terms of the order in council and who, in the estimation of the director, do not warrant a reduction now. I recall that at one time, I believe when the departmental estimates were being discussed, I quoted a case in answer to a question by the hon. member for Battle River. He thought it was a rather odd thing in that the man had refused to meet his obligations, although he was financially capable of doing so. I agreed at that time that I had possibly quoted an extreme case, but I can assure the hon. member that of the balance of 134 active accounts, the majority are settlers who are now capable of paying and who are in a financial position to do so.

I do not want to go through numerous files and name numerous cases, but I can assure the hon. member that some of these settlers are probably in a better financial position than many of their neighbours in the area. Some of them own another farm and operate two farms. They own farm machinery on which there is no debt. Some have homes in the city in addition to their farms, and spend the winter in the city. I will admit that such cases are limited in number, but the hon. member will have to admit also that the number of cases left is quite small indeed. As I say, it is now 134.

Mr. Brooks: May I ask the minister another question? I was rather interested in the 36 who refused to accept assistance. What would be their reason for refusing? Would it be because they are not able to meet the terms of the provisions laid down by the board?

Mr. Lapointe: I think the best way to answer the hon. member is to read a letter. I do not think he will ask me to quote the name, but it is from one of those settlers who was approached by the supervisor of his district because the supervisor felt the man had reached an age and the productivity of the farm had reached the stage when he should get a reduction. The letter reads as follows:

In reply to your letter—

And the number of the letter is given.

—dated April 11 I am afraid I shall not be interested in the proposal you put forward for some years, if in fact I am ever interested in it.

Firstly, it will take the next three years to catch up with the urgent dilapidation—barn, roof, eavetrough, woodshed, veranda, hydro.

Secondly, I am more interested in completing my own payments than accepting quite unnecessarily (in my case) government handouts. I am 66 years old in August, and I am told I shall get the old age pension of $40 a month when I am 70. I am in perfect health, and I intend to stay on my farm, as long as I live. So do not feel there is any need to worry about making a yearly payment of about $170.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Then he goes on to say that lambing was not good but that the calves were good. This is one of the cases. I will admit they are not numerous but, as I said before, we are dealing with only a hundred odd cases. And because of the circumstances I do feel, although I have the greatest sympathy, as has everyone else in the house, for all these soldier settlers who went through a hard period of their lives on these farms, that the matter has now reached the point where it is a question of a few individual cases. In all fairness to the other veterans and to the taxpayers of this country, I do not feel these men who now are left and who are capable of meeting their obligations should get clear title.

I am quite willing to propose to the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose (Mr. Fair), who has been such an advocate for these settlers that, now that this matter has reached such small proportions, I am willing personally to go through every one of the files of these 134 settlers who might be able to qualify for reductions and obtain clear titles under the present proposal. And I am willing, after having gone through them, to submit to him my opinion on each case, and let him discuss whether my views have merit or not. However, I regret that under present conditions it is impossible for me—and I am speaking for the government—to accept my hon. friend's resolution. I shall have to vote against it.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few remarks arising out of the statement made by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe). He has admitted that the settlers under the old Soldier Settlement Act suffered undue hardship, partly on account of the way the act was drafted at that time and also largely due to the fact that in those days we appointed a number of men who, in reality, were not qualified to act as soldier settlement supervisors. As a consequence of this many of the veterans were saddled with land at exorbitant prices. They also acquired stock of poor quality at exorbitant prices. And so, as a result of these conditions, they had two strikes against them before they started.

The hon. member for Battle River-Camrose (Mr. Fair) has referred to the difficult situation in which the soldier settler found himself during the depression. The Minister of Veterans Affairs replied that civilian farmers, also, found themselves in the same position. But let me point out to the minister that there is a vast difference. Soldier settlers, prior to the depression, had been saddled with exorbitant debts as a result of inflationary prices. Civilian farmers, on the other hand, had been benefiting from those exorbitant prices and, as a consequence, had been able to build up a reserve which helped to carry them through the depression.

So there is very little similarity between the two cases. On the one hand you have a man saddled with a heavy debt as the result of high prices, and on the other hand a man who has been able to build up a reserve as the result of those same high prices. So I suggest to the minister that there is no comparison between the two cases.

I speak with some knowledge of what I say, because I was one of those who settled under the old Soldier Settlement Act. I remember well the great difficulties in trying to carry on between 1930 and 1935. As a matter of fact, I think I could say that one of the reasons I am down here in parliament today is because I got so disgusted with the whole thing that I became somewhat hostile to the government of the day, and took a greater interest in politics than I would have done otherwise.

I do not wish to criticize unduly the supervisors of the soldier settlement board. I am frank to admit that during the years I always found them very sympathetic. But they used to point out to me that they were tied down by the rules and regulations under the act, and could not do anything about it. To the extent that they were able to do anything, I always found them most sympathetic. And my remarks about the soldier settlement supervisors of the early period do not in any way refer to the type of men who are on the job today. I know that those men we have today are, in the vast majority of cases, of a very fine order, thoroughly competent to deal with the situation.

The minister has also referred to the fact that many concessions have been made, and I agree with him that many concessions were made. But I remember only too well that those concessions invariably were too little and too late. The government waited until the arrears of interest had piled up to such a point that a settler was discouraged from trying to make any further payments. Then they would come along with a reduction, but that reduction was not sufficient to cancel all the arrears of interest.

Then again, a reduction was made in the amount owing on capital equipment. But due to the fall in prices that reduction was nowhere near the depreciation in value of that capital equipment. And so I repeat that while concessions have been made to those soldier settlers, they were always too little and too late to deal adequately with the situation.

The minister has said that the purpose of the act was to re-establish these men within a period of 20 years. That was originally its purpose. How long ago is it since these men were saddled with that debt? It is approximately 35 years. That is to say, it has required 35 years to establish many of the men who were supposed to be established, under the act, within a period of 20 years. I think we can say therefore, on that ground that as these men have not become established, due to no fault of their own, there would be every good reason for wiping out the amount of their indebtedness.

The minister has suggested that some veterans who left are capable of paying off their indebtedness, and pointed out that some of them are now living in towns. Well, I know several who are living in towns. Some years ago my attention was drawn to a couple who were living out in a drought area; I do not need to mention the name of the place. I went out there and found a family of a man, his wife and seven children, living on a farm on which no man should ever have been settled. It was nothing but a bunch of sand dunes.

I said to him, "Why do you not get out of here? You will never make a living off this farm." He said, "I am getting war veterans allowance to help me out, but they are deducting $15 a month for rent." All he had was a hovel, a two-room shack to house his wife, himself and their seven children. I suggested that he get off that farm and move to town, and that he would get the full amount of the war veterans allowance. He did go to town, and I made arrangements for him to get a small house there. When he left the farm he was able to get the full amount of the war veterans allowance, and I wish to congratulate the war veterans allowance board upon agreeing that the full amount should be paid.

I do not know what happened to the farm. It stands to reason that no one could make a living on it. No doubt it went back to the soldier settlement board and was included in the list of farms upon which soldier settlers had failed to become re-established. That man is now living in town, but no one can say that he is in good circumstances simply because his financial position has improved to the point where he can have a house in town.

There are many of these old settlers who have moved to the towns because they have become too old to carry on farming operations. They may have a cheap house in town and have rented their farms. The payments they receive from the rents are being made against the indebtedness. They are living on the war veterans allowance. These men are getting old; some of them are now 70 years of age. Surely instead of insisting that every little bit of money they can get should go to the soldier settlement board those veterans should be in position to put a little money aside to look after themselves in their old age. They have not been able to build up any reserve in many cases.

The suggestion has been made that the giving of clear titles to these veterans would create an injustice to other veterans who have paid. I do not think the minister need be worried on that score. That is not the attitude of the Legion, which has supported the idea that clear titles should be given, although they have not pressed for that. As a veteran I know that I certainly would not feel that way, and I went through a lot of hardship in the thirties. I am sure all fair-minded veterans who find themselves in the fortunate position of having been able to pay off their indebtedness and thus get into better circumstances would not for one minute object to this concession being granted at this late stage of the game. The minister should be prepared to go one step further than he suggests and wipe out the debts still owing by this small number of veterans.

Mr. T. H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, perhaps one who did not serve in the first world war should not enter into this debate. I think the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose is to be congratulated upon his persistence year after year in bringing up in the House of Commons this case of a decreasing number of elderly gentlemen. The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) has just stated that he is one of those who settled under this act. I am quite sure the hon. gentleman is not one of the 134 mentioned by the minister.

Mr. Quelch: I paid up in 1935.

Mr. Goode: Quite true; you did.

Mr. Quelch: I was one of the fortunate ones.

Mr. Goode: You might be fortunate, but I am sure the hon. member—I say this with all kindness to the 134 men—had a little more fortitude than some.

Mr. Quelch: I didn't pay it from my farm, I paid it from my indemnity.

Mr. Goode: The hon. member fulfilled his obligations. I am usually sympathetic toward cases of this kind, but I am not going to be sympathetic to this one. According to my notes, the minister told us that in 1948 there were 2,637 settler accounts to a total of $2,840,000 odd; in 1953 there were 299 active accounts to an amount of $293,300; at the present time there are 134 active accounts, and the minister mentioned some of those.

I do not suppose all those gentlemen should receive consideration from the department, although the hon. member for Acadia has made the point that some of them should be considered by the minister. The minister has said that he is willing to go through the files, and I hope he does. If he finds that there is one man who should receive consideration, then his time will be well spent.

In voting for or against this resolution I must take into consideration the taxpayers of Canada. I shall vote against the resolution for the reasons so ably stated by the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River-Camrose): Mr. Speaker, I have only a few words to say at this time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I remind hon. members that if the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose (Mr. Fair) speaks now he will conclude the debate.

Mr. Fair: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up very much time because I have taken up quite a little already. I am not sorry for doing that, because I feel that an injustice has been inflicted upon a number of people, and I consider it my duty to see that it is remedied, if at all possible.

I thank the minister for the detailed information he has given the house. He gave the amounts that were wiped out by the different processes. I went into those different items in detail. While a number of concessions were granted, they did not at any time compensate for the unnecessary load that was piled upon these settlers to begin with. That has been my objection all the way along.

I have stated before that in my particular part of the country land was sold by farmers to the government at high prices, and then resold to veterans. I know of one particular case where a man sold his farm to the government at four times the price of other land in the vicinity, and that land was sold back to the farmer's son. I bought some of that land at one-quarter the price.

The same thing may be said about the purchase of farm implements and livestock. I cited some cases and gave particulars, and I think they should satisfy the house or anybody interested that land, livestock and equipment were bought at inflationary prices.

Within a few years prices had fluctuated to such an extent that it was impossible for these farmers to make a living or to come out at the right end of the deal.

The minister has said that he will go through the files. I only wish he had been minister in 1937, when I first brought up this matter. If he had gone through the files at that time he might have prevented a lot of men from being evicted. The minister has made reference to men living in the cities or in some cases on their farms, who are able now to pay their debts. I would tell the minister that that has not been done by the settler alone. If he will investigate those cases he will find that the man's wife and his children—I shall not suggest any particular number—have been working, and after 35 years the farmer has reached the position where he can pay for his land.

I hope the minister will go through the remaining files. In order that his hands may be strengthened in dealing with these 134 people who remain I hope to call a vote.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO EXCLUDE HOLDING OF GENERAL ELECTION DURING JULY OR AUGUST

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration the advisability of amending the Canada Elections Act so as to exclude the holding of a general election during the months of July or August except in a state of emergency.

He said: Mr. Speaker, at the outset I wish to stress the last five words of this resolution, namely "in a state of emergency". By including these words the resolution specifically does not take from any government in power the essential right to call an election should an emergency exist. The purpose of the resolution is merely, under normal circumstances, to regard the hot summer months in the same way we regard the frigid winter months, as being improper times to hold a general election. If passed, the resolution is merely a recommendation to the committee which will be set up to revise the Canada Elections Act. At the outset I would ask a favourable decision of the house because I feel it would certainly be in the interests of succeeding parliaments to do as I have suggested.

The modern concept of free, democratic government depends upon two things. The first is that those chosen to represent the people in legislatures shall be elected by a free vote, and that the conditions of the franchise shall be as universal as possible. The second condition, which is equally important, is that a large percentage of the electorate shall take part in the election so that the candidates who are chosen to represent the people shall in fact be the choice of the majority.

Our system of elections provides that the candidate who obtains the largest number of votes shall be elected to the house whether or not he obtains a majority of the votes cast. All that is needed is a plurality over the other candidates individually. We have rejected—and rightly so, I think—such systems as the single transferable vote and any form of proportional representation. In the 1953 election, as I will shortly show, in a huge number of constituencies in Canada the largest number of electors were not those who voted for the member who now represents the riding in this house but those persons who in fact did not vote. In some cases those not voting actually exceeded the total vote cast for all candidates.

Anything which tends to restrict or prevent an individual vote being cast is dangerous, and the end result is bad no matter whether the steps taken to prevent the vote being cast are of a coercive nature or whether they take the form of encouraging apathy in a general election. We in Canada have been fortunate in that coercive practices have been kept to a minimum. We have not, however, been so fortunate with regard to the overcoming of apathy toward our national problems, and it is this danger which is increased by an election held in the heat of the summer and during the period when Canadians living in urban centres are, by national habit, on holidays.

Prior to the end of the 21st parliament, when the August 10 date for the election was given publicity in a newspaper which is close to the government, the question of apathy was raised in the house by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), to which the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) replied that it was more important to see that the electors were at home during the enumeration than on election day because if they were not on the list of electors they would be deprived of their votes.

This argument is both naive and spurious; naive because if a citizen is out of his electoral district on election day he obviously cannot vote no matter whether or not he has been enumerated, and spurious because if an elector is not on the list even a few days before the election he can be sworn in by the provisions of the elections act as recently revised. There was a case in my own riding of York West where the residents of a whole street had been omitted by the enumerators, but thanks to the good offices and efficiency of the chief electoral officer they were put on a special list of electors and thus enabled to cast their votes.

Mr. McIlraith: Who said that?

Mr. Adamson: It was done. A whole street was omitted but the residents were enumerated, put on the voters' list and cast their votes. We worked all day Sunday to get it done for the voting on Monday. I wish to say now that the chief electoral officer was extremely co-operative. The case involved a street running between two long streets of new houses, and neither the enumerating team on the first street nor the enumerating team on the second street took the trouble to enumerate the cross street. I think this was discovered on the Friday night. Anyway, the officials worked on Saturday and Sunday, got the list printed, and everybody on that street was entitled to vote.

Mr. Cardiff: Would that be legal?

Mr. Adamson: Oh, yes, absolutely legal. Furthermore, if enumeration takes place at a time when many people are away, the enumerators can and generally do, because it is in their interest to do so, find out the names of those persons normally resident in the house which may be vacant and add them to the lists. A family who may be holidaying when the enumerator calls on them can be placed on the election roll and enabled to vote, but if the same family is away on election day they lose their votes.

In a country as subject to the great extent of temperature and climatic variations throughout the year as Canada, climate has a very important part to play in our lives.

It is generally considered inadvisable to hold elections during the harvest period, and it would be obviously wrong to hold an election during the bitter winter months. Both of these periods would deprive large numbers of Canadians of their right to vote. The same holds true of a midsummer election in the months of July or August, particularly for the urban voter, and the results of the 1953 election were nothing short of disgraceful in this regard.

What is equally disquieting, however, is the showing for the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Manitoba, where in 1953 the vote showed that in only five constituencies in these three provinces did the elected member's vote exceed the number of citizens registered who failed to exercise their franchise, whereas in 1949, when the election was held in June before the holiday season had really got under way, 36 constituencies returned members to this house whose vote exceeded the unpolled vote.

I propose to deal with this in more detail in a minute. I have worked out for every constituency in Canada for the 1949 and 1953 general elections the number of those who did not vote and the difference between these figures and the number of votes cast for the elected members. I do not ask that these figures be placed on Hansard but I suggest that, if they could form an appendix to Votes and Proceedings and be printed later at the convenience of the printing bureau, it would show every member how his constituency voted and the trend as between 1949 and 1953. I have also worked out a summary of the figures for each province for the 1949 and 1953 elections, and I would ask permission to have these summaries placed on the record.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to place these summaries on the record?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. gentleman mean that they should be interspersed with his remarks in Hansard or that they should be an appendix to Hansard?

Mr. Martin: Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. Adamson: If I may speak to the question, the results for the individual constituencies take up several pages. I think Votes and Proceedings would be satisfactory for them, but the summaries give the story in detail.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreeable?

(For tables and summaries see appendix, pages 1517 to 1534.)

Mr. Adamson: The distribution of the Canadian electorate is approximately evenly divided between urban and rural voters. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, the city dweller takes a holiday during the summer months. This is particularly true of the industrial worker, and it has become a common practice for entire industrial plants to close down for a period of two weeks sometime during these months.

The industrial worker in Canada today generally goes on a trip or takes his family out of the hot city to a summer resort or cottage, frequently situated on one of our beautiful Canadian lakes. When he has moved his family or is on a trip he cannot be expected to return to vote, because the expense entailed in bringing his family back from the lake doubles his cost of transportation for his holiday, and this he cannot afford. Therefore, if an election is called while he is on holiday he is disfranchised. There is just no other word for it.

In my own riding the largest aircraft factory in Canada, the A. V. Roe Company, was closed during election day, and there is no doubt the huge majority of the employees were deprived of their vote. There were other industries in the same position. The result was that the vote in York West fell from 75 per cent in 1949 to 61 per cent in 1953, that is of the total electors on the list. I was elected by 25 per cent of the electors on the list in my riding, yet I obtained 42 per cent of the vote cast. This I consider to be far from satisfactory.

However, my position is substantially better than many of the other Toronto and York ridings. The members for the city of Toronto itself obtained only 26 per cent of the total votes on the lists, and in the 7 York seats only 25 per cent of the total electors. Therefore the members who represent Canada's largest city in this parliament only represent really about a quarter of the electors. In other words, there were three times as many people who either did not vote or voted for somebody else as those who voted for the members who claim to represent the various ridings in Toronto and the Yorks.

To put it another way, the unpolled vote in Toronto exceeded the total vote of all the Toronto members by 758,500 votes, or an average of 6,900 per constituency. In the Yorks the figures were 52,530 or an average of 7,500 per constituency. The unpolled vote in both Toronto and the Yorks came to the staggering figure of 337,000, over one-third of a million, and it exceeded the total votes cast for all the elected members by no less than 129,000. In 1949 the members were elected for Toronto with a majority of 4,345 over the non-voters, and in the Yorks with a majority of 1,135. Thus it can be seen that the members from Toronto and the Yorks in the 21st parliament had a majority of nearly 10,000 votes over the non-voters, whereas in 1953 this had changed to a minority of 129,000. The percentage cast in Toronto in 1949 was 71 per cent. This dropped to 57 per cent in 1953. The percentage vote cast in the Yorks in 1949 was 73 per cent, and this dropped to 60 per cent in the 1953 election.

The largest non-vote in Canada was in York South, where no less than 28,242 electors failed to vote, and the difference between the non-vote and the vote cast for the elected member was 16,026. In York South the votes cast for the elected member were less than one in five; actually only 19·6 per cent of the electors on the list voted for the member who represents the largest riding in Canada. I may say that the hon. member and I have discussed this; and while I am not speaking for him, of course, I am sure the same conditions obtained in his riding as in mine. In fact I believe the same conditions obtained in all the industrial and urban ridings in Canada.

The situation in Montreal is almost equally deplorable. In 1949 the members elected had a majority of 73,500 over the non-voters, whereas in 1953 this had changed to a minority of 36,236. In other words, in Canada's second city there was a changeover of no less than approximately 110,000 votes. The percentage of votes cast dropped from 67 per cent in 1949 to 59 per cent in 1953. The same holds true for all other Canadian cities.

This condition is particularly bad in Vancouver, where the non-voters exceeded the winners' vote by 29,000 out of a total of 146,000 registered votes. The same condition showed in Edmonton, Calgary and Saskatoon, although the member for Regina did receive a majority over the non-voters. The four Winnipeg ridings were also bad. As a matter of fact, Winnipeg North Centre with 22,000 non-voters or 9,000 more uncast votes than those who voted, showed almost the worst result in Canada. The worst, outside of Toronto and Montreal, was Winnipeg South Centre, with an 11,606 majority of uncast votes. The same situation holds true for Hamilton, Lincoln, London, Ontario county, which contains the city of Oshawa; for Timmins, for Waterloo North and for Wentworth, which is partially in Hamilton.

The province of Quebec, however, has an extremely creditable record and only two ridings outside the island of Montreal returned members with a vote less than that of the non-voters, that is rural Quebec. In Halifax, interestingly enough, the two members who were returned received an inferior vote to the number of non-voters. So far as I could ascertain that is the first time that has happened in many, many years. St. John's, Newfoundland, was in the same position.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is all I have to say on the question of the urban voter and the summer election. We know the pattern of Canadian life. The average Canadian family, whether they be industrial workers, white-collar men or professional men, take a holiday during the summer. It is a national habit. It is almost as national a habit as the wearing of an overcoat in wintertime. When these people are on holidays they cannot afford to return from the place in which they are spending their holidays to exercise their franchise. The results, compared with 1949, show that the pattern of the 1953 election was deplorable.

However, there is a further disquieting manifestation concerning three out of four of the western provinces. Only in Saskatchewan was the vote for the elected members greater than the unregistered vote.

In British Columbia in only one riding, that of Kootenay West, can a member feel that his vote exceeds that of the absentees, whereas in 1949 not a single riding in rural British Columbia returned a member without a comfortable plurality.

In Alberta only the ridings of Lethbridge, Medicine Hat and Vegreville had a plurality in 1953, whereas in 1949 nine of the ridings returned members with majorities over the absentees. The total vote cast dropped from 69 per cent to 62 per cent. The story is similar or even worse in Manitoba, where the total vote dropped from 72 per cent to 59 per cent and the vote cast for the sitting members over that of the non-voters dropped from a majority of 33,742 to a minority of 62,390, or by nearly 100,000 votes.

In making this analysis, one cannot help but be impressed by the stability of the farm vote, for in Saskatchewan, rural Ontario, rural Quebec and the maritime provinces, with the exception of Newfoundland, the vote both in 1949 and 1953 can be considered satisfactory. However, here also the figures for 1953 show a distinct drop from those of 1949. In rural Ontario, for instance, the winners' vote was greater than the non-vote by 282,000 in 1949, but this had dropped to 123,000 in 1953, or by approximately 160,000 votes. In rural Quebec it dropped from 322,000 in 1949 to 270,000 in 1953. Only in New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and rural Nova Scotia did the vote cast in 1953 compare in percentage with that in 1949. In Newfoundland in 1949 the elected members had a majority of 501 over the non-voters, whereas in 1953 this was turned into a deficit of 8,848.

I have made this rather extended study of the election because I believe it is of the utmost importance to us in Canada. Cynics have said to me, "Why do you worry? You got elected anyway." I consider that to be both a dangerous and despicable argument. To have the support, as I have, of merely one out of every four of my constituents is not a situation which can give me much comfort, yet every member from Toronto and the Yorks is in the same position, as are nearly all members from the island of Montreal, although the situation there is somewhat better than in Toronto, and all members from the larger urban centres in Ontario and British Columbia and practically every member as well from Manitoba, Alberta and British Columbia.

Therefore, to say that this parliament is truly representative of the majority of the Canadian people, or that the present government by any stretch of the imagination represents a majority, is extremely far from the facts as they are disclosed by a study of the past two elections. Whether or not the government would have been returned, or whether or not any individual would have been returned, or what the success of the various parties would be is not the question. The question is what percentage of the Canadian people do we in this sovereign parliament really represent. In my view it is a dangerously small minority. I place the blame for this largely on the summer election and the national pattern of Canadian life.

It may be said in defence of a summer election that it is easier to carry out the work of an election in the far northern parts of Canada during the summer than in the spring or fall when the break-up of the ice has to be contended with. This is no doubt true, but the number of ridings so affected would probably be only three or four, as compared with well over a hundred that are affected adversely. In this regard also it is interesting to compare the vote of the far northern ridings in 1949 and 1953. The surprising thing is that very little change is discernible in the picture for 1953, and what change there is is for the worse.

Once a country starts depriving people of their votes, even by holding an election at an awkward time, the free institutions of that country are in jeopardy.

I present this resolution to the house in absolute sincerity. We do not represent a majority of Canadians, as we should. We fail to represent them, not through any act of coercion but merely because an election was held in the summer months, in the extreme heat, when apathy toward political matters was at its height. No matter whether I would have been elected or not, no matter whether any other member would have been elected or not; that is not the problem. The problem is this. We must take such great care of our electoral franchise that when the next general election rolls around the members who sit in this chamber can say, "At least we do represent a majority of the Canadian people".

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York West asked a moment ago that certain figures be printed as an appendix to Votes and Proceedings, to which the house agreed. The Clerk now reminds me that it is difficult for him to enter such material in Votes and Proceedings.

A motion has been moved and debate is continuing thereon. An amendment, or other proceedings, may take place—but not the tabling of documents, which usually is done under the order for motions. Therefore it would be proper at this time only to have these figures printed as an appendix to Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: If that is agreeable, and if the house is prepared to change its mind, that could be done.

Mr. Martin: May we find out from the hon. member how many pages are involved? I think this is not the usual procedure, and the material he offers is not really germane to the argument he has adduced. It is interesting information; but how many pages are there?

Mr. Adamson: I should think that it would take up three or four pages of Hansard. If I may be permitted to discuss the point raised, I would say that I had merely wanted this table made available so that it could be seen by the committee when revising the Canada Elections Act, when it is set up. I am sensitive about burdening Hansard with extraneous material, and I had thought that placing it in Votes and Proceedings would be the easier way of doing it. However, if placing it in Hansard is satisfactory to the house, I shall be content.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we ought to be more sensitive about what is printed in Votes and Proceedings, because they constitute the official record of the house. Therefore I feel much happier about printing the additional material in Hansard than in Votes and Proceedings. Is it agreed?

Mr. MacInnis: Before it is agreed, we should know who prepared the figures, under what authority, and that they are correct. This should be done before it is printed in Hansard. If they come from a government source that would be all right, but I should think it would be unnecessary to place them on Hansard because that source would be available to any committee just as though they were on Hansard. I think it is important to know what authority there is for the figures.

Mr. Adamson: They were sent to me by the chief electoral officer. The figures show the difference between the non-voters and the elected member's vote. I think this is the first time that figures for non-voters have been prepared. While the figures are not as yet official, they came from the chief electoral officer. Ordinarily they would not be available until the blue book is published, but the figures I have used come from a document published by him.

Mr. MacInnis: If they are from the chief electoral officer I withdraw my objection.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Adamson: I may say that the percentages have been worked out by me on a slide rule, and there may be some slight discrepancies.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose the motion moved by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) for three reasons. The first, and I think far and away the most important one, I shall deal with last. I am one of those people who believe that there are enough rigidities in our constitution and that it is most undesirable to add any more unless the reasons are really compelling. I recognize that that is a conservative, a reactionary, perhaps even a Tory argument, but I do not hesitate to make it because in respect of the constitution I am conservative, perhaps I am reactionary, and perhaps there is some relic of the Toryism in which I was brought up.

The second reason I oppose this motion is that it seems to me there is imported into it a phrase which is generally given a technical significance—I do not know whether the hon. member intended it to have that—and I refer to the words "state of emergency". I do not want to get into the kind of debate that has taken place in this house on some other measures, as perhaps that should be left to other measures, but if by "state of emergency" he means the state of emergency contemplated by the War Measures Act of 1914, then I feel this proposal would be far too restrictive, and if there is time I shall try to show why I think that is so.

The third reason is that like the hon. member for York West I too am a member of parliament for a particular constituency. Perhaps both of us tend to look at things from rather a local point of view. I cannot go along with the hon. gentleman, as I prefer to go along with the bureau of statistics in the view that Montreal is still the largest city in Canada.

Mr. Adamson: Not since the first of the month.

Mr. Pickersgill: It seems to me that the rest of his reasoning was rather along the same lines. It was rather looking out from Toronto to the lesser breeds than looking at the rest of the country from the point of view the rest of us are apt to take.

As hon. members know, my direct personal experience with Newfoundland is not very great, but I can say that at least in 1953—I saw them myself—there were still many icebergs along the coast in June. It would not have been easy or perhaps satisfactory to have had an enumeration in that province in April. I imagine it would be almost impossible to do it properly in March or February or January.

I do not want it to be thought that my view is that the date of the election should be fixed primarily to suit the convenience of the five constituencies in Newfoundland which are not largely urban. I agree with what I think were the implications in what the hon. member for York West said, that probably there is no time for an election that works out to a better average for the whole country than the last fortnight in June, but I do not think there is any doubt that the best and safest months for an election in the five outport constituencies, if I may use that term, in Newfoundland are July and August. Then there would be the greatest certainty of having good weather.

Mr. Fleming: Good political weather?

Mr. Pickersgill: So far the political weather in Newfoundland has been sunshiny most of the time. I was referring to the kind of weather the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) keeps track of.

Mr. Fleming: Which is that? There are still two kinds.

Mr. Pickersgill: That kind of weather one year with another is apt to be best of all in the month of July, and the next best month is usually August. It may vary from season to season. I do not think there is much doubt that the slightly larger vote in Newfoundland in 1949 than in 1953 had little or nothing to do with the fact that one election was on June 27 and the other was on August 10. The election in 1949, being the first one after confederation, perhaps excited an exceptional amount of interest. If it would not be unbecoming in me to say so, I might suggest that in 1953 a good many people rather took for granted what the results of the election were going to be, and therefore there was not quite as much interest on that account.

Then the hon. gentleman, still looking from the vantage point, perhaps I should not say of Toronto but of Port Credit, referred to our national habit of taking holidays in the month of August. I have no doubt that in the metropolitan area of Toronto that has become a local habit, and there are many other parts of Canada where it has also become a local habit. But most of the people who go away from Bonavista-Twillingate in July and August do so because they have to earn their living, not because they are going on holidays. There is quite a lot of difference between conditions along Mississauga road and those in other parts of the country.

I know the hon. gentleman would at once rise to correct me if I suggested that it would not be a very great hardship to come back from Muskoka to Port Credit on a nice August day. He would say at once that he was not referring to people who can afford to go to Muskoka but to the industrial workers, especially in those plants which are shut down so that everyone may be on holidays. I think that is a problem.

This is a new problem that we did not face even in 1949. I think it is a problem which ought to be considered by the committee which I trust will be set up next year to look at the Canada Elections Act. I am just expressing here an offhand opinion and do not wish to be considered as committing the government, particularly as the government, in relation to the elections act, has never taken the same kind of position it takes in relation to most other legislation. It has always been understood that the elections act is directly the concern of both sides of the house and that the government has no special responsibility for it except to the extent that the government has on its side, generally speaking, more members than are on the other side.

It seems to me that the right way to tackle the problem is to consider ways and means of providing for somewhat wider advance polling. I know there are great difficulties in doing that, in ensuring that there would not be frauds, that there would be no possibility of double voting and that sort of thing, but I do not think it should just be dismissed on that account. It seems to me that that is a better way of going about it.

I do not agree with what the hon. gentleman said about enumeration and voting. It seems to me a great many people are much more apt to be careless about getting their names on the list than they are about voting. We all know that under the present law enumeration takes place soon after an election is called and there is not yet the degree of public interest that develops later on in a campaign. It is much more difficult to get the individual voter to take his responsibility seriously to get his name on the list, other things being equal, than it is to get him to vote. I feel it is quite as important to make as sure as we can that adequate steps are taken to have the enumeration done at a time when it will be carried out properly, and to take all the other necessary precautions to see that people are encouraged to get their names on the list and that the list is a proper and full list—not too full—as it is to get people to vote.

The hon. gentleman talked about apathy during elections. I think that is a genuinely serious problem. I do not deny it for a moment. But I might just remind the hon. gentleman that there was a municipal election held in the city of Toronto last December for the purpose of electing a mayor and council; and it seems to me, though I do not carry the precise figures in my head, that the vote was under 30 per cent. Twenty-nine per cent is the figure that runs in my mind. It may have been that there were only a few more shopping days before Christmas, or it may conceivably have been that there was not much interest in that election and that the outcome was regarded by most of the voters as a foregone conclusion.

I am afraid, human nature being what it is, that when the outcome of an election is more or less a foregone conclusion, then regardless of what you do, short of making voting compulsory, there will be fewer people voting than when the people believe there is a real contest. I believe if we look over the results—and we will be able to do that since the hon. gentleman has gone to a lot of effort, which I think we all appreciate, to produce figures which will give us a clearer picture than perhaps we had before of what happened in 1949 and 1953—and if we apply to them our knowledge of ridings where most people thought they knew what the result was going to be, and the other ridings where they felt the result was in considerable doubt, it will be found that it was in those in which the contest was lively that the vote generally speaking was higher than in those where it was rather a foregone conclusion.

If I may allude once more to the province of Newfoundland, I am not sure that of the outport ridings the vote was not a little larger in the one where I was a candidate than it was in the other four. I think the answer to that is that in the other four ridings the result was absolutely a foregone conclusion, while there might have been some people who thought that in the case of Bonavista-Twillingate the result might have been in some doubt.

Mr. Knowles: It was those cartoons which put you in.

Mr. Pickersgill: Unfortunately the cartoons obtained a wider circulation in the district represented by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) than they did in Bonavista-Twillingate. That is for me a matter of genuine regret, because I feel that if those cartoons had been circulated more widely in Bonavista-Twillingate more people would have voted, and I really have not very much doubt that if more people had voted the proportion would have been just about the same.

Mr. Martin: Did the hon. gentleman have the largest majority on the island?

Mr. Fleming: Don't make him blush.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, the hon. gentleman who represents Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter), and represents it with great distinction in this house, had the largest majority in Newfoundland and proportionately one of the largest in any part of the country. I believe nine people out of every ten who voted, voted for him. In the case of my riding, I say when I do not expect to be corrected, that it was four out of every five. In fact I worked it out, and it was 79·9 recurring per cent. That was on the last figures I was able to get from the chief electoral officer.

Mr. Fulton: What did Joey promise? I mean what did he foretell?

Mr. Pickersgill: Nothing whatever but good government, and I didn't make any promises at all.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

There is another reason I find it rather surprising that a member of the opposition should be introducing a motion of this kind, and I think it does great credit to the hon. member for York West that he should be so non-partisan as to do so. I took the trouble to look up the Parliamentary Guide to see when general elections had been held since confederation. I found that elections had been held on more days in the month of August than in any other month. In 1867 the election extended from August 7 to September 20, which means it took place in all but six days of the month of August. In 1872—they wanted to be really sure—it extended from July 20 to October 12. It included every day of August. I do not know whether they voted on Sundays in those days.

Mr. Adamson: It was an entirely different election.

Mr. Pickersgill: On both occasions, if my memory serves me right, the history books tell us the Conservatives won the elections. An election was called in January, 1874, and I have no doubt whatever the date may have had something to do with it, though not very much, and it was on that occasion that the Liberals won an election for the first time.

I skip over the others because there was no other election in either July or August until the year 1930, when an election was held on July 28. If I am not mistaken that was the last occasion on which the Conservative party was returned to office.

So, sir, this would be a self-denying ordinance, if you like, which the hon. gentleman is proposing, and perhaps we on this side of the house should welcome it except that it would tie our hands—

Mr. Fleming: Give the people a chance.

Mr. Pickersgill: —and give the people a chance to put the Conservatives in office once again.

Mr. Fleming: We would not disfranchise hundreds of thousands of people as you deliberately did.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think, sir, that the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) with his customary good humour and moderation is somewhat imprecise in his use of the term, if I may dare to be so academic as to put it that way after what was said about me the other day by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell). Nobody was disfranchised. If there are a great many Canadians who value their holidays more than their franchise that does not mean they were disfranchised. I think that kind of rather loose talk does not really do very much to improve public regard for our institutions. That is only my opinion and I am a novice in public life, as everyone knows.

Mr. Fulton: That is, in front of the curtain.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I have done much hiding behind curtains or anywhere else. No matter how embarrassing any question may ever be on which I am called upon to vote in this house, I do not think I shall ever find it necessary to be out of the house when the vote is called.

I want to come back to what I said, at the beginning of these rather disjointed remarks, was in my opinion the most serious objection to this motion. Of course, my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott)—if I may take his name in vain when he is not here—would not think this was an objection at all, because he would say that all this resolution says is that in the opinion of the house the government should take into consideration, etc. I would not object to it either, as long as we could be sure in advance that that consideration would be unfavourable. But since there are certain hon. gentlemen opposite who, when a motion has been adopted asking the government to take something into consideration, have a habit of dropping out a few of the words—and I do not say distorting them—but giving the impression to others that some decision was made rather different from the one that was actually made, I think it would be inadvisable to take this kind of risk.

What I am really coming to, Mr. Speaker, is this. If the government did consider this suggestion favourably, or if anyone else did consider it favourably—and I take it that anybody on either side of the house could introduce an amendment to the elections act; the hon. gentleman could have done so just as well as the government—and if anybody introduced such an amendment and that amendment was carried, I think it would be unfortunate. The reason I think it would be unfortunate is that, while I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that, other things being equal, the month of August is not the best month for an election—I quite agree with that suggestion—I do not think we should deny to ourselves any month of the year, because there are circumstances that are a good deal short of the kind of technical emergency envisaged in the War Measures Act when it might be extremely important to have an election.

There are some hon. members still in this house, although very few, who were here in the year 1926. Neither of those whom I have in mind happen to be in the chamber at this moment. But in the year 1926, as some hon. members who were not here then will also recall, a government was in office with a majority which, to put it mildly, was somewhat precarious. At any time in the six months between the time that parliament met early in January and the time the same parliament was dissolved on the 1st or 2nd of July, I think it was, it might have happened that that government would have been defeated in the house or that some other compelling reason would have arisen for the holding of an election.

It is true that the election did not come until September, I think it was. I have the date here and I might just as well have it right. It was September 14. I do not think September is as good a month as August for an election. But, at any rate, that election was held on September 14. If, as might easily have happened, sometime in May or June it had become necessary to have an election, I cannot think that it would have been to the advantage of the country or to anyone's advantage to have the campaign drag on for an extra month simply to let people go on their holidays.

Mr. Adamson: Surely if the government were defeated, that would be an emergency.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman did not define his emergency. If that is the kind of emergency he means, I do not see any point at all in his motion.

In the year 1944 there was a situation which some of us will never forget. There was a situation in this house—I do not want to recall any of the memories—when it might have been necessary to have an election at a time of year which would have been even more unacceptable than is the month of August. I think there might have been no choice but to do so if certain circumstances had arisen, but happily they did not arise.

I do not think we should tie our hands in that way, Mr. Speaker. I believe almost any government we are ever likely to have, almost any government the people of Canada are ever likely to return with a majority behind it in this house, is going to be sufficiently responsible that it would not unnecessarily set an election at a time when it was felt it would have the result of reducing the number of people who could vote. I mean that of hon. gentlemen opposite in all of the groups just as much as I do of the members on this side of the house. Maybe I am naive, but that is my honest opinion. I do not believe any of them would take their responsibility so lightly that they would unnecessarily set an election at a time when they felt it would have the deliberate result of reducing the number of people who could vote.

Mr. Fleming: You mean from now on?

Mr. Pickersgill: I mean at any time. Because that has nothing to do with what is before us now, I am not going to enter into a discussion of the reasons which were considered good and sufficient for having the election on August 10 of last year. But I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that while the hon. member for York West says that in many ridings more people did not vote than voted for the successful candidate, that fact does not mean that the result would have been likely to be much different even if a great many more of those people had voted. We have now had a certain amount of experience—whether they are good things or bad things is not the point—with what are called public opinion polls. We have one in this country that I believe is conducted honestly and fairly, and there has been the most extraordinary coincidence, both in the provincial and the federal fields, between their observations and the actual results of elections.

Mr. MacInnis: Six o'clock.

Mr. Knowles: Would the Secretary of State permit one question?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. Knowles: A moment ago he said—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think the hon. member should put his question now when another hon. member has asked that we call it six o'clock, because it is safe to say that the Secretary of State would not have time to answer.

Mr. Knowles: Very well.

Mr. Speaker: As it is six o'clock, this house stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2.30 o'clock in the afternoon.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Adamson: What is the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Martin: It has been announced. The bill standing in the name of the Postmaster General—

Mr. Fulton: Housing first.

Mr. Pickersgill: The business for tomorrow was announced yesterday.

Mr. Speaker: May I say that I wish hon. members would inquire as to the business for the next day before I say the house stands adjourned and rise to leave the house, and before the Sergeant-at-Arms has the mace on his shoulder.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, January 28, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

THE PRIME MINISTER

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT AS TO PROPOSED TRIP

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, having regard to the fact that this is the time when such a statement would be made I wonder if, in view of the statement that has been made to the press, the Prime Minister would feel this was the appropriate time to inform the house regarding the details of his proposed trip and other circumstances connected therewith. It might guide us in our discussion in the debate on external affairs tomorrow, in regard to our comments about any of these countries he will be visiting during the course of his trip.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if it is the pleasure of the house that I should make such a statement I would be glad to do so tomorrow afternoon, when I will give some of the details about what I hope will be the results of that trip and other information that may be of interest to the hon. members. I would have to have the unanimous consent of the house and if I can count upon that I will be glad to make a statement at the opening of the house tomorrow afternoon.

Mr. Drew: I feel sure there would be unanimous consent. My question was directed to the Prime Minister in view of the fact I have just learned of the statement which was given to the press earlier today.

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST AND SECOND REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEE—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. John Hunter (Parkdale) presented the first and second reports of the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills, and moved that the first report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

CURRENCY, MINT AND EXCHANGE FUND ACT

AMENDMENT TO PERMIT MINTING AND MARKETING OF GOLD COINS

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 173, to amend the Currency, Mint and Exchange Fund Act.

Mr. Knowles: Explain.

Mr. Adamson: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to allow newly minted Canadian gold to be minted in Canada into coins designated as to weight and fineness only, and during such time as a fixed parity in terms of gold is not being maintained for the Canadian dollar. It provides for the free marketing of such coins and permits them to be held, sold, imported or exported by any person.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

3. It is not the practice in either the United Kingdom, the United States or Canada to make public cease training rates for aircrew.

WHEAT BOARD ACT—FARM UNION DUES

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many resolutions and letters have been received from each of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, since the 1st day of

Questions

July, 1953, requesting that an amendment be made to the Canadian Wheat Board Act, providing for the voluntary deduction from wheat board payments of fees or dues of the provincial farmers unions?

2. Has consideration been given by the government to the introduction of such an amendment?

Mr. Dickey:

1. Saskatchewan, 79; Manitoba, 24; Alberta, 40.

2. No.

WESTERN SOCIETY FOR PHYSICAL REHABILITATION

Mr. MacDougall:

1. How much has the federal government contributed in the province of British Columbia towards the western society for physical rehabilitation in Vancouver, since the beginning of the national health program?

2. What services do the western society for physical rehabilitation provide with the assistance of federal funds?

Mr. Robertson:

1. $173,040.27.

2. With the assistance of federal funds, the western society for physical rehabilitation was given a grant for the construction of 40 additional chronic beds and floor area for an outpatient department, and for physiotherapy and occupational therapy facilities. Services were extended for the training and rehabilitation of poliomyelitis patients and to cerebral palsied children under the administration of the cerebral palsy association of British Columbia which is located on the premises of the western society for physical rehabilitation.

HOUSING—LAND ASSEMBLY

Mr. Breton:

1. How many agreements have been entered into between the federal government and the provinces in connection with those provisions of the National Housing Act, as amended, which provide that the federal government may enter into agreement with the provinces for the acquisition of land and land assembly projects for housing purposes and the building of houses for sale or rental, and under which the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation's share is 75 per cent of the cost of the projects?

2. What are the names of the municipalities which have benefited under these projects, and in each case what have been the amounts of such benefits?

Mr. Bourget:

1. Fifty-three agreements had been entered into under section 46 of the act at December 31, 1953, jointly with the provinces or agencies thereof to provide for either the acquisition of housing lands or the construction of houses, or both.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

2. Projects authorized by the above agreements in many cases are operated so as to recover for the partnership of governments the full amount of their capital costs. In such cases the principal benefit to the municipality is the addition obtained to its supply of land available for private house building, or to its stock of houses. The following are the full recovery projects authorized to the end of 1953, showing number of residential lots and houses added to municipalities, by provinces:

	Building Lots	Housing Units

In other cases, the agreements provide for rental housing to be offered to families of low income at rents according to their ability to pay, and these agreements provide for maximum annual deficits. The benefit to the municipality over and above the additional housing made available is in such cases a contribution to the lowering of the rents; of that contribution 75 per cent is provided by the federal government under the act. The following table shows the authorized benefits of this type for municipalities, by provinces, as at December 31, 1953:

—	Authorized No. of rental dwellings	Estimated average full recovery rent per dwelling	Agreed average monthly rent per dwelling	Agreed potential annual deficit

HOUSING—SLUM AREAS

Mr. Breton:

1. How many agreements have been entered into between the federal government and the provinces, in connection with those provisions of the National Housing Act, 1944-45, which provide that the federal government may grant subsidies of as much as 50 per cent of the cost of projects to municipalities wishing to modernize and rebuild slum areas, since the coming into force of the act?

2. What are the names of the municipalities which have availed themselves of these agreements, and in each case, what are the amounts of the subsidies granted to the said municipalities thus benefiting under these agreements?

Mr. Bourget:

1. One agreement has been entered into by the minister under section 22 of the act.

2. Order in council P.C. 3090 of July, 1948, authorized an agreement providing for a grant of $1,150,000 to the city of Toronto toward the cost of acquisition and clearance of the northerly portion of the Regent Park housing site. The agreement is dated February 21, 1950. Order in council P.C. 1953-30/691 of May 7, 1953, authorized an amendment to the original agreement to provide for an additional $212,000, making total authorized grants to the city of Toronto for this purpose of $1,362,000.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

IMPORTS OF POTATOES, STARCH, ETC.

Mr. MacLean:

What has been the total amount of the imports into Canada for each of the last four years of the following items: (a) potato starch and potato flour (tariff item 39 (i)); (b) starch and all preparations having the quality of starch (tariff item 39 (ii)); (c) dextrine and combinations and preparation of starch and dextrine (tariff item 39 (c)); (d) combinations or preparations of starch and dextrine with admixture of foreign material (tariff item 39 (d)); (e) potatoes as defined in tariff item 83 (a); (f) dried or dehydrated potatoes as defined in tariff item 83 (b); (g) vegetables, pickled or preserved in salt, brine, oil or in any other manner including frozen french-fried potatoes and potato chips, as defined in tariff item 90 (b); (h) glucose as defined in tariff item 139; (i) vegetable glue as defined in tariff item 232 (b); (j) cereal or starch products as defined in tariff item 232 (e); (k) mucilage and adhesive paste as defined in tariff item 232 (f)?

Mr. Dickey: Return tabled.

IMMIGRATION

DEPORTATION OF TWO REFUGEES FROM YUGOSLAVIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I should like to ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration if he is in a position to give the house some information with regard to the position and the fate of two persons who have been referred to in the press as refugees from Yugoslavia. I am not able to pronounce their names, but I told the minister that I should like to ask the question and I think he knows the cases to which I refer. Can he say whether it is established whether or not these men are genuine political refugees?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): The two gentlemen concerned are at present in detention quarters in Montreal. They are citizens of Yugoslavia. One is a married man of about 33 years of age; the other is a young man of about 22. The latter has a passport from the Yugoslavian government which, so far as we know, is valid. The former has no papers of any kind. They both left Yugoslavia last July, proceeded through Austria and Germany to a port on the North sea, stowed away on board ship and eventually were picked up in Toronto.

They were ordered deported as stowaways because that is our policy. We do not accept people who do not conform to our immigration regulations. In the course of examination they both said they had been informed in the refugee camp where they had spent a short time in Germany that there was an easy means of getting to Canada if you stowed away at a particular port on board ship. Consequently we are doing our best to prevent this from being a fact, and in particular we are deporting these people so that it may be learned that we do not accept immigrants in this way.

However, I know there are certain people who felt that in these two cases these persons might possibly suffer because of their actions should they be returned to their native country. I point out again that the one has a valid passport, so far as we know. I point out also that any deportation order we may issue would only mean that they would be taken in custody by the shipping line whence they came to Canada, and would in the normal course go back to the port in Germany from which they came. We do not make a practice of deporting people behind the iron curtain unless there are most unusual circumstances.

WATER POLLUTION

NORTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—REQUEST FOR FURTHER INFORMATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. Campbell (The Battlefords): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare or his assistant. Has the minister received a report from the supervising engineer of the public health engineering division regarding the pollution of the North Saskatchewan river?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I have nothing further to add to what I said the other day. As soon as I have any further information I shall be glad to give it to the hon. gentleman.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED THEFTS FROM CAMP WAINWRIGHT—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River-Camrose): I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence. Is the minister in a position to make a statement with regard to reported thefts from Camp Wainwright, Alberta?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I received notice of this question after 1.30 p.m., and I have not yet received a report which I have asked for. I am therefore not in a position to make a statement. If I receive information I shall be glad to give it to the hon. gentleman.

HOUSING

LOW RENTAL HOUSING UNITS—LOWREN HOUSING COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. O. Gour (Russell): Can the Minister of Public Works tell the house whether it is proposed to finance additional low rental housing units for the Lowren Housing Company of Ottawa?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): The hon. member previously gave me notice of this question, so I am able to answer it at the moment.

The president of this limited dividend company has approached Central Mortgage to finance another 316 units to be owned by Lowren Housing Company. The proposal is that 32 of these units will be for elderly persons. The remaining 284 units will be semi-detached houses and row housing in envelopes of four. The location of the new units will be on the easterly extension of Prince Albert and Queen Mary in the Overbrook area. Central Mortgage has already financed, under section 16, 158 units owned by the Lowren company and 100 units for a similar limited dividend company known as Bon Logis.

The city of Ottawa finances the 10 per cent equity requirement and waives the interest return on its investment. This, together with the 40-year amortization and 3¾ per cent interest rate under section 16 of the act, has the effect of creating rentals of $58 a month.

The proposal is now being examined, and if the plans and specifications for these units are satisfactory and the need clearly established, then I believe that financing will be available.

UNITED NATIONS

RECONVENING OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Is the Secretary of State for External Affairs in a position to say now what the position of Canada has been in connection with the request of Madame Pandit for the reconvening of the general assembly of the United Nations? If so, has he any word to give the house as to whether a sufficient number will have assented in order to assure that the meeting will take place?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I am not in a position to give the final view of the government with regard to this request at this moment. It had been expected that we would have sent our reply to New York a day or so ago but there have been last-minute developments, which we have heard about through New Delhi, which may have some effect on the request for the meeting of the assembly. We are trying to get the matter cleared up.

I will, however, be in a position to give a reply tomorrow, because tomorrow is the last day on which replies are receivable. So far as the number of countries that have accepted the proposal for reconvening the assembly is concerned, I think 15 or 16 have accepted, whereas 31 are required before there can be a meeting.

WHEAT

DECLINE IN EXPORTS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT AS TO EXPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): I wish to ask this question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the very rapid decline in wheat and flour exports during the past two months, will the minister make a statement on Canada's position and what is being done to meet the situation?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The decline in exports in December and January is perfectly normal. It happens every year. The reason is that the main outlet for Canada's wheat is closed by ice, and no way as yet has been found of breaking the ice and keeping navigation going during those months.

Just to illustrate the point, let us consider the crop year 1951-52, when there was a very active demand for wheat. Exports were as follows:

	Exports of Wheat (millions of bushels) 1951-52
August	19·1
September	19·1
October	27·6
November	35·5
January	16·0

In 1952-53, which we considered a record year for exports, with exports almost reaching the capacity of the ports, the figures were as follows:

	Exports of Wheat (millions of bushels) 1952-53
August	28·6
September	24·5
October	27·1
November	38·0
January	18·7

My hon. friend will appreciate the fact that the wheat board takes delivery of wheat at three principal marketing places, namely Fort William-Port Arthur, Vancouver and Churchill. To market the wheat from Fort William in the winter season it must be shipped by rail to Halifax or Saint John and transportation charges have to be added to the Fort William price, which puts sales from those ports somewhat out of line with those from Vancouver.

As far as Vancouver is concerned, the port is operating at capacity, and has been all autumn. Shipments in December and January from Vancouver will be just as high as they have been in any month for the past 18. But as far as eastern shipment is concerned the normal pattern is being followed, namely that grain shipments from the eastern ports will be at low level as long as the St. Lawrence river is frozen.

Mr. Drew: With respect to the statement the Minister of Trade and Commerce has just made, in view of the statement by a member of the government yesterday regarding the danger of what was described as a possible fire sale of surpluses in the United States, will the minister inform the house whether any representations have been made to the government of the United States concerning that danger and, if so, what those representations were?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It has been a rule of the department for several years that we do not discuss the marketing of wheat from the current crop. I think my hon. friend will appreciate the necessity for that. The wheat board is dealing with customers around the world, and anything I say here is reflected as being the views of the wheat board. Comments from me are not helpful to its operations.

Representations are being made to the government of the United States almost every week, just as representations are being made to us by the United States. I know of no plan for a fire sale in the United States. That country has a certain program that has dangers to Canada inherent in it if recklessly used, a program of giving assistance to foreign countries in the form of foodstuffs. We have reason to believe that it will be used with due regard to friendly countries who also have marketing problems. But, as I say, the situation is being watched carefully. Our people are in Washington and people from Washington are here frequently to discuss that particular problem, and we have every reason to believe that the United States will co-operate with Canada in order to see that the Canadian position is not damaged.

COFFEE

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO INCREASED PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice arising out of a report in this morning's press that there will be an immediate and substantial increase in the price of coffee. Will the Minister of Justice direct that an inquiry be made into this matter, as President Eisenhower has directed in the United States?

[Mr. Howe (Port Arthur).]

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I wish to thank my hon. friend for sending me notice of his question which, unfortunately, reached me only a moment or two before the house opened. However, I may say that the report which appeared in this morning's Montreal Gazette, and which is perhaps the one to which my hon. friend is referring, indicates pretty clearly on its face one of the main reasons for the increase in the price of coffee. Due to frost damage in the coffee plantations of Brazil the normal production of some 16 million bags of coffee in that country has been cut down to 14 million bags and, what is probably more serious, the frost damage to Brazil's young trees is so extensive that it appears that Brazilian production for the next several years may be severely limited, in this way reducing the world supply.

On the face of this news item, therefore, it would appear that the rise in the price of coffee is perhaps attributable to these natural causes. In the combines investigation branch we are interested in rises in the prices of things which are attributable to other than natural causes, in other words to combines and to attempts to rig prices. It is true that we watch the prices of these commodities carefully to make sure that a price rise which is under observation is not attributable to a combine, and for that reason we take an interest in such matters as the present price of coffee.

But our inquiries would seem to support another item which appears in this morning's Montreal Gazette, wherein it is stated that while Toronto importers predicted that the price of coffee would increase by about 34 cents a pound to $1.33 in the next few months, Ottawa importers did not believe the price would go that high and predicted a rise of two or three cents. Our price checks have indicated that the price rise here has been more of the order of that mentioned by the Ottawa importers.

My hon. friend asks whether we will authorize an inquiry along the lines of that authorized by President Eisenhower in the United States. According to press reports President Eisenhower instructed the federal trade commission of the United States of America to make a full-scale investigation. I would say that we would not authorize a full-scale investigation here unless it appeared, from the checks we are now making, that it was necessary. In that connection, having regard to the fact that the United States is by far the largest purchaser of coffee in the world, the price which it pays for its coffee tends to fix the price of the coffee that is bought in Canada, so the investigation by the United States, if it discloses anything at all, would probably disclose the causes or some of the causes for the increase that is taking place or will take place here.

POLIOMYELITIS

INQUIRY AS TO NEW VACCINE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The other day the hon. member for Moose Mountain (Mr. McCullough) asked a question with respect to the new vaccine, and I should now like to give further information.

Research on poliomyelitis vaccine has been carried on at the Connaught laboratories during the past two or three years, and has contributed greatly to the production of the large supplies to be used in the extensive testing of this vaccine in the United States. The value of the vaccine has not yet been established and may not be established for some time. Consideration was given by the officials of my department and by the dominion council of health to the institution of similar testing in Canada. But on the basis of the information we have and of the advice we have received from experts in this field, the department has concluded that the proper course for us for the time being is to observe the very extensive trial already launched in the United States, with the knowledge that the information resulting from the trial will be completely at our disposal and may be used as a guide in determining the need for and the nature of further action in this country.

As outlined in the reply which my parliamentary assistant gave to the house on December 2 last, the government has already undertaken to provide substantial assistance toward measures to combat poliomyelitis in Canada. I wish again to assure the house that we are prepared to play our full part in ensuring that the people of this country will enjoy the benefits of any outstanding advances in the prevention of this dread disease.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CHINA—FOREIGN REAL ESTATE FIRMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has his attention been drawn to an order of the Tientsin people's government dated November 11, 1953 which abolishes the business of representation or management of properties of third parties by foreign real estate firms and which also, in the case of principals residing outside of China, has placed a three months limit on the time within which they must adjust their affairs.

I apologize for not giving the minister notice of this question, but the matter only came to my attention a short time ago. The three months limit of course ends on the 11th of February.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): My attention has not been drawn to that report, but I shall look into the matter and see if I can produce a reply tomorrow.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REPRESENTATIONS BY CANADIAN NON-PENSIONED VETERANS WIDOWS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Has the government received representations from the dominion council of the Canadian non-pensioned veterans widows asking for an increase in the widows' allowance and for certain other changes in the War Veterans Allowance Act? Will action be taken on these matters in the near future?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): The answer to the first part of the question is yes. The answer to the second part is that the representations are receiving consideration at the present time.

DISABLED PERSONS

INQUIRY AS TO CONFERENCE WITH PROVINCIAL MINISTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): May I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare if he expects to give the house some report on the recent conference with the provincial ministers of health and welfare, or is he leaving the report until the measure is eventually introduced?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I do not now intend to make a report but I will when the bill providing for a dominion-wide system of disabled allowances is introduced in the house later this session. I can only say at this time that the conference was a most successful one, all provinces affirming the principle which it is proposed to incorporate in the federal government's legislation.

FLOODS

FRASER RIVER—STATE OF REPAIR OF DIKES ON MAIN CHANNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): I should like to direct an inquiry to the Minister of Public Works. I am informed that snow conditions at the headwaters of the Fraser river are more severe than they have been for some years and that, if there is a quick run-off, the Fraser river will be in severe flood. Will the minister make an inquiry into the state of repair of the dikes on the main channel of the Fraser river within the boundaries of the municipality of Richmond, British Columbia.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): I received this notice as I came into the house and I am, therefore, speaking from memory in saying that these dikes were turned over to the British Columbia government in the early part of 1950. In any event, their maintenance is the responsibility of the British Columbia government.

Mr. Goode: Supplementary to the minister's statement, I would point out to him that in the last three years the federal government has invested some $250,000 in these dikes.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

SUBSTITUTION OF NEW LEGISLATION TO INSURE APPROVED LENDERS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Monday, January 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Winters for the second reading of Bill No. 102, to promote the construction of new houses, the repair and modernization of existing houses, and the improvement of housing and living conditions.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, at the time of the adjournment of the debate on Bill No. 102 I was asking the minister to take under consideration the advisability and the necessity of the federal government following the lead of some of the provincial governments in either making grants in aid to non-profit organizations undertaking the construction of homes for old age pensioners or others in the low income category, or subsidizing these houses directly through the assumption of some of the interest costs. At the same time I was thanking the minister and approving of the policy of the government in that they had accepted in the past the principle that those who construct low rent housing for old age pensioners on a non-profit basis should be able to borrow money from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation at the same rate of interest as the long term borrowing rate of the federal government.

I am pleased to note, Mr. Speaker, that in paragraph (c) of clause 4 of Bill No. 102 and clause 16, the government have seen fit to carry forward the principle which they established for a number of years in the old legislation. I want to thank the minister for that. I should like to point out, however, the effect of interest rates, even if one can borrow at the same rate of interest as the long term rate for the government itself.

The organization to which I have the honour of belonging in British Columbia pioneered this kind of work. They have borrowed six times from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I am not going to speak about the sixth time, because it occurred only recently and I have not all the particulars. I want to say that we are happy to have the money, and by the end of June we will have many more houses ready for old age pensioners on a low rental basis.

I am not quite certain whether I understood the minister when he answered a question just a few moments ago concerning loans that had been made, I believe, in Quebec.

Mr. Winters: In Ottawa.

Mr. Winch: Did I understand the minister to say that, in part, the loan concerned old age pensioners, for whom houses would be built on an average rental basis of $58 per month? There we have a clear indication of the need for federal action, either by direct aid or by lowering the interest rate, because I do not know of any old age pensioners or low income groups who could pay $58 per month. We do know, because it has been proven over a period of years, that if the provincial government has an interest, and the federal government gives an interest rate through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation equal to the government's long term rate, you can supply fully modern houses to people in the low income groups for $20 or $21 per month, on a self-supporting basis. That is being done in British Columbia, and being done I point out even with the high rate which does not enable you to do as much building as you would otherwise, or give the rental that you otherwise could.

I should like, Mr. Speaker, to give the house the benefit of our accountant's report on the first five loans that we secured from the government. On project No. 1 we borrowed $10,000, amortized over 20 years, and the interest rate was 3 per cent. By the time we pay it back it will have cost us in all $13,443. On the second project we borrowed $25,000 amortized over 40 years at 3 per cent, and that is going to cost us $43,262.40. On project No. 3 we borrowed $20,000 amortized over 40 years at 3 per cent, and that will cost us $34,610 by the time it is repaid. On project No. 4 we stepped it up and borrowed $60,000 amortized over 40 years, and the government established a rate of 3·5 per cent. We shall have paid back $111,940.80 by the time the loan has been paid. On project No. 5 we borrowed $55,000 and the interest rate was up to 3¾ per cent, amortized over 40 years. This loan will cost us $106,624. In other words, borrowing through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for old age pensioners on a non-profit basis, with a provincial grant of one-third and getting the land for one dollar from the municipality, we have borrowed $170,000 and will have to pay back $309,880.20. When we have to pay back that amount of money for this amount we borrowed, under the best terms the government gives, what then is the position of the citizen who wants to build his own home and has to borrow at 5·5 or 6 per cent?

I believe it can be said without question that not only is the down payment difficult but housing costs are high. I sincerely hope the minister will tell us some time just what use has been made over a period of years of that section of the housing act which gives him almost unlimited powers of research to try to bring down housing costs in Canada. All these factors, the heavy down payment, the high cost of housing, the interest rate and so on, hold back many people from building their own homes or building low rental homes.

I feel very strongly that, in view of the urgent need for houses in Canada both for home ownership and for rental, the government would be taking a very commendable and advisable step if it would do one of two things, either directly subsidize housing by a reduction of the interest rate to 2 per cent or grant a subsidy. This would provide a stopgap for the serious unemployment situation.

If the government does not feel it is possible to reduce the interest rate, then in the interests of housing, and of employment, they should extend to those who desire to construct houses in Canada the same provisions that have been established for years in connection with other types of houses constructed by limited liability companies or non-profit organizations. This would enable people to obtain money at the long term interest rate of the federal government. It would mean at least a reduction of 1½ or 2 per cent in the interest rate; and when you are borrowing for 25, 30 or 35 years the saving would amount to a great deal and would be an encouragement to housing construction in Canada.

So, Mr. Speaker, I sincerely hope that the minister, having established a good principle some years ago on one type of construction, will carry forward that same principle in the greater field of home construction in Canada, and either make grants directly in aid of home construction or reduce the interest rate to not more than the long term borrowing rate of the government.

I suggest this would be welcomed by every member in the house and by the people of Canada generally, and would amply demonstrate that we do have a progressive government and a progressive parliament.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I believe the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Hollingworth) wishes to proceed.

Mr. A. H. Hollingworth (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the first place I should like to congratulate the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) and the government for introducing this new housing legislation which I believe is sound, progressive, and tailored to meet the needs of the Canadian people.

The two provisions which I feel will be of particular assistance in helping more people to acquire homes will be the lower down payment and the longer amortization period in which to pay back the mortgage. This means that people will have to pay less when the house is purchased, and will pay less in the monthly carrying charges.

I would also commend the government on making available loans from banks. I note this has been done in most, if not all, western countries, and it would seem to be the logical development of the Canadian banking system. Unlike my hon. friend the member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), I am not a bit worried about the novelty of the idea. It seems to have worked successfully in other countries, and undoubtedly the elasticity and ingenuity of our banking system here will permit of its being of great assistance in the further development of the Canadian economy.

I am particularly intrigued by the fact that these insured mortgages can be used as collateral to be deposited with the central bank by the chartered bank, which in return will receive credit the same as for Canadian bonds. This is indeed far-reaching, and I believe takes into consideration in a brilliant manner the need for credit expansion in an ever-growing economy.

There is one thing, however, that does disturb me at the present time in this country, and that is the fact that the little man, the clerk or the factory worker, whose annual income is less than $3,000, cannot buy a home under the National Housing Act because the carrying charges comprise more than 23 per cent of his gross income. It seems to me fundamental justice that such a man should be able to own a house as well as anyone else. Accordingly, I have gone to some trouble to ascertain what other countries have done, having particular regard for this problem.

I find that in no countries have houses been built for potential owners in the lower income brackets, and it would seem that the reason for this is that the risk of carrying a mortgage on a person with a marginal income is too great. A resultant foreclosure would not only take away a person's house but would result in the loss of his hard-earned down payment. Of course some of my friends, particularly in the C.C.F., will say, "Why not give an outright government subsidy to this man?" One answer would appear to be that in many cases an owner's income might improve to the point that the owner would not need the government subsidy; and then, of course, someone would be helped who would not need the help of the government.

I think, therefore, that subsidized government rental housing is the answer to the particular problem I have in mind, and I say that the new bill covers this in clause 36, formerly section 35 of the act. There is provision for joint development of lower cost rental housing between the provincial and federal governments. This is not pure theory; it has worked in practice. My information is that 1,562 units have been built so far under this clause, which was section 35 of the old act. The breakdown is as follows: 292 units in St. John's, Newfoundland; 161 units in Halifax; 288 units in Saint John, New Brunswick; 105 units in Saskatchewan; 224 units under construction in Vancouver, and 492 units in Ontario.

This scheme may be carried out in two ways—either by the owners buying the houses, which will cost less because no profit is being made by the developer of the lands from the installation of package disposal plants and the like, or by the appropriate government body renting the houses, which is what I am more particularly concerned with here. The dwellings may be either duplexes or row houses, such as they have in Newfoundland, or single family dwelling houses, which have been confined largely to Ontario.

The important point is this, that the dwellings in Newfoundland rent at $37 or $38 per month, and at rentals of $55 to $60 a month on a self-liquidating basis. That seems to me to be the concrete answer to this problem of providing housing for the lower income groups. However, and this is the important thing, the initiative must come from the provinces under the legislation, or more specifically those creatures of the provinces, the local municipalities.

It is all very well for people to say, "Well, why do not the municipalities do something about it?" Those members in the house who have served on municipal councils in the last few years will realize that the problems of municipal councils are tremendous, and that the greatest problem of all is to provide funds for financing local schools. Let us be frank about it. This is a provincial matter. And I might say I am pained and disturbed that my esteemed friend, the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), got to his feet and complained that the bill does nothing about providing serviced land. I am sure he said that with his tongue in his cheek. Because my hon. friend knows—

Mr. Fleming: On a point of order, Your Honour might not have heard what the hon. member said, but I would point out he has just said that an hon. member in the house—and he was referring to myself—had spoken with his tongue in his cheek. I understand that it is entirely unparliamentary to suggest insincerity on the part of a member speaking in the house. I would ask that the hon. member be compelled to withdraw that remark.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member for York Centre anything to say by way of explanation?

Mr. Hollingworth: Mr. Speaker, I certainly would not want to use the expression jocularly or facetiously, but it seemed to me that the hon. member, as a competent and esteemed lawyer, would realize that something like this clearly came under provincial jurisdiction. Consequently when that remark was made as the most important argument in his speech on the bill, surely he realized that one should not take it too seriously.

Mr. Speaker: What the hon. gentleman is complaining about is the expression which has just been used. My view is that when an hon. member feels that he should rise in his place and complain about an expression which has been used by another hon. member while he is speaking, the easiest way out for the hon. member who has used the expression is to say "I shall be glad to withdraw", and carry on with the speech.

Mr. Hollingworth: I shall be glad to withdraw. I was saying that the providing of serviced land must come on the initiative of the provinces, and I would respectfully suggest to the hon. member for Eglinton that he use his considerable influence with his provincial colleagues in Ontario to see that installation of services goes forward in the Toronto area.

Just last week several large subdivisions were rejected by the planning board of the township of North York because of the lack of services. Is the hon. member for Eglinton seriously suggesting that this bill before the house should provide services for subdivisions? Hundreds of houses cannot be built in North York at the present time, and hundreds of families cannot have homes because the provincial government in Ontario has not seen fit to galvanize into action the metropolitan council of greater Toronto to provide serviced lands. The hon. member for Eglinton knows that. Therefore I respectfully ask, why does he draw a red herring across this trail? Why does he not come out and admit that this is a sound, imaginative bill? Why does he not admit that the problem of serviced land—the No. 1 problem in our housing bottleneck—is the ultimate and direct responsibility of the provincial government?

Again in closing, Mr. Speaker, I will say that I hope the provinces, the municipalities, and the federal government will all work together vigorously under the provisions of section 36 and solve our problem regarding low-cost rental housing. I think the explanation I have cited proves it can be done, and I fervently hope that more action will be taken in the near future.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, this bill reminds me of a measure to produce babies and leave them on the street. True, it does have clauses in it which can produce the swaddling clothes and the baskets to house babies temporarily, but it does not do what I think is necessary, namely look after the growth and the life of the structures it proposes to bring into being.

I feel, and my over-all criticism of the bill is, that it does not provide sufficient precaution to see that the initial expenditure, the initial investment in the structure, is adequately protected, and I propose to enlarge on that. Today, with the extremely high cost of living, it is not so much the initial cost of a house that is causing the trouble for so many people; it is the problem of maintenance and upkeep of the house. The No. 1 problem, as I see it, is to relieve the burden, including the tax burden, which falls directly on the home owner.

The first protection which I consider the bill fails to give is a mandatory clause dealing with town planning. True, in the section dealing with housing redevelopment there is a clause making the municipality submit a proper plan for the redevelopment of blighted or slum areas. But the regulations in the section dealing with new construction and new development with regard to town planning are of a permissive nature. In my opinion, permissive is not enough. I have seen all too many housing developments start off with inadequate zoning or planning and become not actually blighted areas but areas where properties have decreased in value at a rate far more rapidly than in an area which was properly planned.

Therefore my first criticism of the bill would be that provision for town planning and zoning for all new construction should be made more mandatory, and at least require it to have the approval of the provincial authorities or the municipal board in the province of Ontario, and through them the architects of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation or the town planners that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation are using. That is the first point.

In that regard I think the remarks of the President of the United States are of some interest, because in dealing with this whole question of housing on January 26 he said that one of his provisions was this:

> First, prevention of the spread of blight into good areas of the community through strict enforcement of housing and neighbourhood standards and strict occupancy controls.

Those of us who have seen the work that has been going on in the United States in regard to new development in the major cities can appreciate the importance being put on this question of proper planning. Therefore I feel that no new housing development should be started until, through planning, the future of the investment, no matter who makes it, will be as secure as possible and that blight accelerated deterioration and the other dangerous developments which destroy the value of property will not set in.

It is all very well to have a beautiful, individually planned community; but if at some time in that planned community you are leaving it possible for somebody to come in and build a glue factory right next door, the whole value of that community will go down. In my opinion no new community should be created unless that protection is provided.

So much for town planning. The next criticism I have of the legislation—and I do not think this is so much the fault of the bill but rather the fault of the combines act—is this. If the banks, who are not knowledgeable with regard to mortgages on real estate, which is an entirely new field to them, set up a company or some kind of organization in which all the banks could pool what resources they wished, and developed their own mortgage authority, it would probably be a good thing and certainly, I believe, would make for efficiency. But I doubt very much whether they would be able to do this because of the combines act, for I believe that banks getting together to form a company or trust to provide money for housing would probably contravene that act.

However, I would ask the minister to consult, if he will, with the law officers of the crown to see if that would be so, because there will be a lot of mortgage money not available if individual banks feel that in certain cases they have to provide for the servicing of mortgages in small communities, whereas if there was an association through which all the banks could co-operate I think it would be greatly to the advantage of the scheme. The United States system called the federal national mortgage association, or "Fanny Mae" to use the colloquial term, is a joint association and I do not know enough about it, but I feel it is providing a very desirable service in the United States.

Now I come directly to the cost of upkeep. Where the housing need is greatest is in the urban and particularly suburban or growth municipalities. My own is a case in point. In Toronto township, where I live, and in the part of Etobicoke township which I represent —two of the most rapidly growing townships in all of Canada—I would say that this year the assessments on property have multiplied between five and ten times. Some people will claim that while the assessments have gone up the mill rate also will go down drastically, and that is the devout hope of the Toronto metropolitan council. While the mill rate will go down, nevertheless the assessments have gone up to such a degree that the net annual tax liability to the municipality by the home owner has in almost every case increased very substantially in the last three or four years. In most cases it has more than doubled since the end of the war, and in some cases it has not only doubled but trebled and quadrupled.

Municipal tax borne by the home owner is similar to a mortgage. You pay it or lose your property. Irrespective of your income, irrespective of your status or anything else, it is a direct liability on your prime security, that is your own home; yet the federal authorities, despite the fact that in the last budget they recognized the evils of double taxation and gave generous relief to the holders of Canadian common stocks and Canadian equities, are as yet blind to what I consider to be the most evil form of double taxation, namely taxation on the home of the Canadian citizen which must be paid but which is not considered when the individual home owner makes out his income tax form.

I have mentioned this before in this house, but I mention it again because I think it is only just that the municipal tax paid on a man's home should be a deduction from his income for the purpose of computing his income tax liability. But you will ask, "What about the man who rents? He has not that opportunity." But he has, because the landlord deducts municipal taxation and also the carrying charges, and in addition to that he amortizes over as many years as he likes the capital cost of the structure. The landlord, therefore, is by and large in a better position than the man who buys and owns. I feel that if we are going to encourage the man who buys and owns, then something along these lines must be done.

I am not going to go into the figures in detail in my own municipality, but I do want to say that the situation is definitely serious. If you undertake to construct a home on the basis of your income less the liabilities you have already undertaken, and if you have a tax liability which is constantly increasing, then your security is continually being whittled away by the continually rising costs of municipal government. I suggest that under these circumstances the first relief to the home owner should be in the matter of municipal taxation. I leave that for the moment, however, because I presume that will be one of the questions dealt with in the committee. Incidentally, I understand that municipal taxation is allowed as an income tax deduction in the United States.

My second point on the question of making it easier for a man to keep his home—and this is a problem I want to deal with—is that

I can see so easily the same conditions arising as in the thirties when a man bought a home, it deteriorated, and somebody along his street had a forced sale and sold at 50 or 60 cents on the dollar. What does that mean? It decreases the price of every single house on that street, because the forced sale regulates the price. I do not want people to be put in that position; therefore I am concentrating on making it easier to maintain the home.

Another way in which this bill is deficient is with regard to mortgage interest; not capital, but interest. In order to bring the man who owns his home into a position of equality with the man who rents, I believe that mortgage interest on a man's own home should also be allowed as a deduction from income for tax computation purposes.

Again the same thing holds true with regard to a man who builds a house and rents it. He can deduct the carrying charges. He can even amortize the capital cost, as he does. Then after the capital cost is amortized, he can sell the house and somebody else will be able to amortize the capital cost on the same house. That is the situation if he has bought for rental. I do not believe that is fair. I think encouragement must be given through the easing of the payments to keep the home. We have heard a great deal about insurance companies, banks, mortgage companies and everybody else asking so much in the way of interest and all the rest of it. The worst sinner or all is the federal government. It takes more from the income of the home owner than do all the other institutions combined. I feel that is the first place where relief should start.

The next point, of course, is the question —and I believe it should be considered as an aid to the municipalities, which aid would be passed on to the home owner in reduced taxation—of the sales tax on goods bought by the municipality. We have discussed this matter at some length, both in this house and elsewhere. I do not see why the federal government should tax the home owners of the township of Etobicoke $2,000 on a new fire engine which the township of Etobicoke bought and for which it paid $20,000 in order to provide the necessary protection for those homes.

An hon. Member: Double taxation.

Mr. Adamson: I think that is a case of double taxation. Perhaps it is small. Perhaps it is not as great as the others. Nevertheless it is a definite case of double taxation which I consider to be wrong and something adding again to the cost of owning and maintaining a home and family.

The next point I want to mention is the question of the funded debt of the municipalities. Today municipal bonds are, by and large, bought on a 4½ per cent, 5 per cent and sometimes, I presume, an even higher interest rate, possibly up to 6 per cent. I do not know of any at 6 per cent but I know of a great many at 5 per cent and 5¼ per cent.

What happens to the interest on the money that is lent to the municipality? The bonds are bought by individuals or by corporations and the interest goes to the individual or corporation. On that interest the individual or the corporation has to pay personal income tax or corporation income tax. Corporation taxation is about 47 per cent. Many people who buy municipal bonds are in the 50 per cent income tax bracket. This means that that bond yields the owner about 2 or 2½ per cent. It yields the federal government the other 2 or 2½ per cent. The home owner, however, has to pay the whole 5 per cent. Here is another case of double taxation.

The municipality must issue its debentures and its securities to yield a rate which is competitive in order that the bonds may be sold. The interest on those bonds must be paid by the home owners, through municipal taxation on property. There is only one source from which the interest on those bonds can be obtained, and that source is municipal taxation on real property. Yet the federal government, through the personal income tax and the corporation income tax, takes half the interest which the municipality must pay.

We have heard a great deal about borrowing money at 2 per cent. I do not know how it can be done in Canada, but I know how it can be done in the United States. Here again I want to make this suggestion on this whole question of housing. In the United States bonds of municipalities for improvement purposes can be and are issued free of federal taxation, so the municipal authorities in the United States can and do borrow money for from less than 2 per cent to 2¼ per cent. If a Canadian municipality were able to cut by half its cost of servicing its debentures, that is another way in which a saving could and would be passed on directly to the taxpayers, the owners of the houses in that municipality.

I should like to give an example of what is being done in the United States. That municipal debentures should be issued free of federal taxation is something which I think should certainly be considered here in Canada, because it does not violate any canon of banking that I know of; it seems to be perfectly financially sound in the United States, and it has not caused any great financial upheaval. I want to give just one example. I obtained it out of the New York Times yesterday. It is that of the city of Durham, North Carolina, borrowing $2,225,000 for a sanitary sewer system. There are three maturities. There is one at $815,000 with a 2 per cent coupon, to yield between 1·4 per cent and 2·05 per cent. The larger one of $1,250,000 has a coupon of 2¼ per cent, to yield 2·10 to 2·40 per cent. At the top of this advertisement is this notice:

Interest exempt, in the opinion of counsel, under existing laws from all federal income taxes.

The advertisement is dated January 27, 1954. We say that is a breach of our banking system. We say it is something which we have not done before, something which would be resented and objected to by the followers of the canons of sound money. I thought I was a fair advocate of sound money, but the system under which we are operating is changing. This bill envisages as great a departure in Canadian banking as the banks going into the mortgage business. Surely if the bill envisages the banks doing this we can concede that it is not fiscally unsound for the municipalities to be given some relief, possibly the relief that is given them in the United States.

I hope the bill will be a success. Other clauses of the bill have been dealt with in great detail by members far more competent than I. But there is one thing we must preserve. When the proud parents bring the new baby from the hospital we have to remember that it is going to live for probably 20 or 21 years before going out on its own, and during that time it has to be fed, clothed and educated and has to have conveniences provided for it. The same is true of a house. It has to have provision of these essential services for 20 years at least before it becomes the outright property of its original purchasers. Every dollar which can be cut from their cost adds to the security of the owners. In my opinion the double taxation caused by the federal tax structure and regulations is the greatest destroyer of that security.

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to register my very great disappointment with the housing bill now before us. I have received considerable correspondence from my constituents also expressing disappointment with the proposals contained in the bill. I know they hoped, as many of us did, that when it was brought before the house it would make it possible for our people to build much needed housing. When you consider the various angles of the situation and the desperate need for housing, I think everyone will agree with me that the government has failed miserably in introducing adequate proposals at this time. The preface to the bill reads as follows:

An act to promote the construction of new houses, the repair and modernization of existing houses, and the improvement of housing and living conditions.

In my opinion this legislation is a far cry from what is required to permit people in the various income brackets to build decent homes for themselves. I think it is a farce in that regard. The bill proposes to give the vested interests more security through the backing of the nation. At the same time people who will take advantage of it simply because of their desperate need for homes will be saddled with contracts the term of which has been extended from 20 to 25 or 30 years, and an interest rate which will be formidable. Later in my speech I want to document my statement that the cost to a home owner under this program will be fantastic.

I realize that each and every one of us has his own personal viewpoint on the matter of housing. I think the strength of the nation lies in its families and their homes. I believe the criterion of a good government is how it uses the total resources at its disposal, both taxes and natural resources, to raise the social and economic standards of the people. When we are facing a challenge throughout the world to what we call our free democratic system, I think it behooves us to give consideration to the most serious topic of adequate and decent houses for our people.

Today the ghosts of the hungry thirties are again rampant throughout the land. In some sections of our country we already have soup kitchens, and there are approximately 400,000 unemployed and jobless people. At the same time we have an abundance of lumber in our sawmills and lumber yards and adequate resources of every kind to build decent homes, but we find that provisions are not going to be made by the government of which the people needing homes will be able to take advantage.

As I say, each of us has his own ideas about what constitutes a decent housing program. In that connection I want to refer to the speech of the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne), which can be found at page 1417 of Hansard for January 25. In this speech he took some exception to the remarks of the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Jones) with respect to housing conditions in his constituency. The hon. member for Kootenay East had this to say, as appears at page 1418 of Hansard:

> In my opinion it is not any defect in the housing act that causes people to live in shacks, but rather the excessive cost of housing in our time.

Sir, this bill is going to make housing very expensive for our people, and I do not think the statement that the cost of houses is excessive will enable the government to relieve itself of responsibility with respect to the removing of restrictions on the cost of living some time after 1945. Further on the hon. member had this to say about the excessive cost of home ownership:

> When purchasing an automobile today everyone seeks a certain amount of individuality, but in the purchase of homes people are going even farther. It would seem that every home must have its own individual design to suit the taste of the purchaser. We will either have to forget this demand for individuality or be content to pay these excessive costs.

He goes on to say:

> Whether one buys a low-priced automobile or one in the $5,000 or $6,000 class he will find that, essentially, they are the same in outline, and that the differences are chiefly in the matter of colour.

First of all I want to say that I am one who does not believe it would be in the interests of our people if their houses had to be all of one type. I think it is everyone's right to have some individuality in his home.

Furthermore, in regard to automobiles, which are outside the scope of this debate, I am sure hon. members will agree that when you go into the higher priced automobiles you feel that you get more than a different colour or paint. The same holds true with regard to houses. What we are speaking of now, sir, is not the high priced home, but good homes of a decent standard for our people.

Then I should like to refer to a speech delivered by the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Dupuis) as recorded in Hansard for January 25, at page 1434. The hon. member said:

> No one can seriously imply, not even my C.C.F. friends, that there might come a time when property owners who have taken advantage of this plan will lose the money they have spent because they will no longer be able to meet their obligations.
> Now, gentlemen, that is easy to say, and it is very easy to appear to sympathize with the plight of the poor. But, as far back as I can remember, I have known that those who cannot meet their obligations unfortunately stand to lose, in many instances, what they have already paid. Such is the case for automobiles, electric refrigerators and so on. If the buyer is not in a position to meet his payments, he stands to lose what he has already paid. That is unfortunate, but he must accept his loss, as we all have to accept our woes, since we are all in a valley of tears, as it is so well put in a certain prayer.

I do not believe that is the sort of attitude we should have in the matter of houses. I do not believe we should have the proposition put before hon. members of this house that people are going to have to put themselves in this position for 25 years, which is the amortization period suggested.

As I said before, sir, the incomes of many of our people are going down. I have here a report from today's Globe and Mail quoting Mr. Howard Harper in his presidential address to the Ontario soil and crop association. He said that farm income is down 16 per cent from 1949. In addition to that we have the statement that many people are in a price squeeze. This statement appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of January 26, 1954. Mr. H. H. Hannam is reported as saying that the drop in selling prices while production has remained high has placed Canada's 600,000 farm families in a price-cost squeeze which, in all likelihood, will be continued into 1954. We have the same situation all along the line. We have the jobless people and we have our farmers receiving lower incomes under present conditions.

I have here, Mr. Speaker, statistics which have been computed from figures released by the dominion bureau of statistics for 1953. I should like to place some of these on Hansard to indicate that there are many people who are not going to be able to take advantage of this bill. I think it would be of interest for me to go through the different brackets of income. First we have the grand total of those people who made out income tax returns, taxable and non-taxable, for the year 1951, of 4,102,170. There were 14.7 per cent with incomes under $1,000; 28·1 per cent with incomes between $1,000 and 2,000; 30·4 per cent with incomes between $2,000 and $3,000; 16·1 per cent with incomes between $3,000 and $4,000; 5·2 per cent with incomes between $4,000 and $5,000; 4·3 per cent with incomes between $5,000 and $10,000; 1 per cent with incomes between $10,000 and $25,000.

We found, sir, that persons with incomes under $2,000 make up 42·8 per cent of those making income tax returns. Persons with incomes under $3,000 make up 73·2 per cent of the total number making income tax returns in 1951. One can readily see from these figures that the bulk of our people are not going to be able to take advantage of this bill under any circumstances. Suppose there are some people who, out of desperation, will try to take advantage of the legislation that is proposed. When they go to the lending company they will want to buy a house. The lender will not say, "You are going to buy two houses" but that is in effect what the prospective home owner is going to have to do by the time he has paid for the house.

Here is an example. On a house which has a $10,000 lending value, 90 per cent of the first $8,000 would be $7,200; that is the proposal made in the bill. Then 70 per cent of the remaining $2,000 would be $1,400, which would make a total of $8,600. If that were amortized over 25 years to compute the monthly payments, including insurance, it would mean a monthly payment of $56.13 or a total of $673.56 per year. Over a period of 25 years the home owner would have paid back, if he were that fortunate, a total of $16,839 or almost 100 per cent over the original amount of money which he borrowed. When you consider that, in addition, he would have paid his down payment, obtained the site for his house and furnished his house, you can see how far from the orbit of practicability the bill is now.

In conclusion I want to say that the bill strikes me as nothing short of a farce. I recall that in Biblical times the word "usurer" was often used in reference to these money-changers. At the time they did not have the backing of the treasury of a great and powerful country, but today it would seem to me that is the situation. There are many safeguards for the investor, but there is no safeguard for the prospective home owner. My opinion could be summed up by saying this bill is a conglomeration of liberal mentality concocted into a capitalist bill which is going to be foisted upon an unsuspecting public. I hope that when the bill comes back from the committee we shall have something better than we have now.

(Translation):

Mr. Georges Villeneuve (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance attached to the question of housing, more particularly by the people I represent in this house, I cannot let the debate on the housing bill end without adding my own remarks.

The first observation I wish to make has to do with the protection of the family. In fact, the most important point in this regard is to ensure, first and above all, the protection of the family and more particularly of large families. Today, large families have trouble in finding shelter, somewhat like at the time when St. Joseph was trying to find a shelter for his wife who was expecting our Saviour's birth. Large families are always turned away when they seek a dwelling and, as a result, they have to live in the slums of our large cities. Yet, in our country, as everywhere else, the family is the source of the most important asset, our human resources. I note that the present housing legislation gives private enterprise the opportunity of working in the public interest. I therefore hope that our large families will be able to take advantage of this legislation to improve their condition.

I would also like to say a word about small towns and villages. In the constituency I represent there are no large centres of population, but each locality wishes to do its share to ensure the future of our country. Until now, small towns and villages have not received all the attention they deserve. However, I note that banks will now be able to make mortgage loans and that it will now be possible to help our small towns and villages expand, develop and take a deeper interest in the country.

Our small towns and villages are more important than ever, because we still have, in our vast country, wide open spaces, practically uninhabited, while other not so distant districts are overpopulated, and this is particularly true in the province of Quebec where one-third of the population lives in the southern part, while, in the rest of the province, the population is very inadequately spread. Well, if our small towns and villages can contribute to the development of the country through home ownership, I am convinced that in the future they will play an important part in the development not only of our provinces but of the country as a whole. As a matter of fact, when home ownership is made easier for those who live in small towns and villages, the economic structure is strengthened in the locality, the district, the province, and throughout the country.

I am happy to note that, from now on, we shall be in a position to expect greater benefits for local communities. I am also happy to see that this legislation favours the co-operative movement in the housing field. If there is one movement to which I pay special attention, that is the one. There is no better way of helping our workers obtain accommodation in the most economical way possible.

Now as to aid to municipalities wishing to improve their housing possibilities, I notice that a whole subsection of the bill is devoted to this matter. The federal government is willing to incur 75 per cent of the charges involved in subsidizing rental housing projects. I hope that the Quebec government will finally grant to municipalities their freedom, so that they may, in future, take advantage of this legislation, in view of the fact that, to my mind and in the opinion of many others, provincial autonomy is not at all involved in this instance. In fact, this is a contract made up for a given period of time and I hope that the Quebec provincial government will help our workers and municipalities take advantage of the benefits of this legislation.

This bill provides for the improvement of the housing situation in three ways. It provides aid at the time of purchase, it provides for the locating of and finally for the alteration of houses or existing buildings. In this way, the door is open to prospective home owners; it is open to those who, in the past, were not interested in mortgage investments, which would have helped our low-income families to become home owners, or again those who do not wish to do so but who want, however, to live at all times in suitable housing.

Thirdly, the aim is to promote the conversion of existing houses. As a matter of fact, we can see here and there in certain communities some very nice and very large houses in which only three or four persons are living but which could shelter some twenty people if their owners had the means to convert them. Thanks to this act, our home owners will be able in the future to think about increasing the number of houses in our own communities. To me, that is a very interesting way of proceeding towards the solution of this very important problem.

What is more, under this act, the down payment on an $8,000 house will be only 10 per cent. Well, I think that is one way of helping and protecting the small wage earner. I do not know if it is possible in other districts to build a house for less than $8,000, but in my own district it is quite possible to do so. Since they will have to make a down payment of only $800, our people will be able to become home owners. It is absolutely necessary that our people remain property-minded, that is sacrifice-minded.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that this act will promote throughout the country, and particularly in my district and in my constituency, the building of a sufficient number of new houses to better help the development of the Canadian family.

(Text):

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, earlier this afternoon the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Hollingworth) made some comment respecting the motives of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). I think it might be well if, before proceeding with the remarks I wish to make, I were to place on record once again the words of the hon. member for Eglinton when he spoke in this debate on January 21, at page 1325 of Hansard. I shall quote only one paragraph from his remarks. I believe this will be sufficient to show his intentions with regard to the matter mentioned by the hon. member for York Centre.

> Let us see how this bill will attempt to meet the problem of our housing needs in Canada in relation to the various aspects I have mentioned. First, what does it do in relation to the shortage of serviced land or to meet the needs of municipalities? It does nothing new. The provisions of this bill offer no change whatever over those existing in the present act, and what is undoubtedly still the principal bottleneck in solving our housing problem today will continue. There is no provision in this bill in relation to it. This bill offers no help to the municipalities beyond such help as was offered to them under the existing legislation.

Later, this afternoon, the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) also went into the matter of help that could be offered to municipalities in an effort to lower the tax rate on homes and thus afford some measure of relief to those who are attempting to carry the burden of home ownership.

On many occasions in the past several hon. members have made suggestions ranging all the way from relief in the matter of municipal taxes, relief in the matter of sales tax on municipal purchases, and right down the line to assistance in welfare matters, particularly with regard to unemployed employables who are not covered at the present time by the Unemployment Insurance Act. All these suggestions have been made in this house with one end in sight, namely that the municipalities might be relieved of some of the burden which they are forced to assume at the present time, and consequently the tax rate on real estate might be materially lowered.

I think it is just as well, Mr. Speaker, if we take a realistic view of this phase of home costs; and I feel that the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Hollingworth) should reconsider the remarks he made this afternoon when he tried to impute insincerity to hon. members who in the main are merely trying to do their duty to the taxpayers of this country, and who are outspoken in their demands for action at the only level where some of the distress can be allayed, that is at the federal level.

With regard to this bill, it does seem to me that despite the fact that the debate which has taken place so far has brought out a variety of opinion as to the possible effect which the legislation will have on housing, and most of the speakers have attempted to narrow down the field to show those who will benefit by reason of this new legislation, we are forced to admit that the regulations, which have not yet of course come out, are going to be just as important as the bill. Of course in this regard we can only guess as to what these regulations will be, but there is the matter of the ratio limitation, which formerly was set at 23 per cent. There seems to be no indication that this rate will be changed. The interest rate, which has not yet been set, but which it would appear will not be lower than 5½ per cent, and probably more, is something else which will have to be taken into consideration. As a matter of fact, all of these matters must be taken into consideration as well as the amortization, which has already been set.

When we take into consideration the fact that the ratio limitation will probably be 23 per cent, and assume that the interest rate will be 5½ per cent, which would seem about as low as we can hope for, we find that it still requires an annual salary of $3,500 to buy a $9,000 house, and $3,850 to buy a $10,000 house. That does not take into consideration the amount which must also be included for fire insurance, the 10 per cent tax cushion required by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and mortgage insurance premium on that basis. When you take all these things into consideration it would be perfectly safe to assume that a salary requirement of something around $3,600 would be necessary for a $9,000 house and very close to $4,000 for a $10,000 house.

What does this mean to the people of Canada who would like to acquire houses? Well, it means that the wage earners in the bracket between $57.50 and $67.50 a week are going to be out, and this despite the fact that a great many of these people are now paying far more in monthly payments in rent for very inferior accommodation than the payments which are assumed to be reasonable under this scheme.

When I refer to the report of the dominion bureau of statistics on employment and payrolls I find that the average weekly wage in the city of Hamilton is $61.70. When I go down the list and take another city in another part of Canada I find that the average weekly wage in the city of Winnipeg is $52.51. When I move to the west coast and take Vancouver I find it is $60.18. When I come back to the city of Hamilton again I find that while the average is shown as $61.70, the low in industrial averages is $44.28 and the high is $72.75.

To revert to my remarks of a few moments ago and compare all these figures, it will be found that whereas a wage earner must make about $4,000 to buy a $10,000 house, the highest industrial wage earner in Hamilton is $72.75, or $3,783 a year, or a couple of hundred dollars less than the minimum requirement to purchase a $10,000 house.

Some of the charts which I have seen, which set out the various minimum salary requirements, show houses for as low as $8,000. I do not know in what city you would look for a new house for $8,000. I know you would not find one in Hamilton. I know you would be very lucky to find a house in Hamilton for $10,000; yet the minimum salary requirement to buy a $10,000 house is close to $4,000 and, as I said, the highest industrial average is at the rate of $3,783.

This reminds me of the instances I cited in this house last session with regard to the wages of postal employees. I showed that in two instances the postal workers were deemed to be undesirable risks because their salaries fell $100 or $200 short of the minimum requirements under Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the National Housing Act, despite the fact that these people were government employees. Apparently no consideration at all was given to the fact that they might reasonably expect to have permanent employment, or as permanent as one can expect in these days. But this raises the point of who will benefit, unless these regulations are altered from what one is led to believe they may well be. It appears as though only those who earn over $4,000 a year, and have not previously had sufficient cash for the 20 per cent down payment, but can reasonably expect to raise the 10 per cent down payment, will benefit.

Earlier this afternoon one of the previous speakers gave some very interesting figures with regard to the percentage of people to fall within that category. In summing up he said that 73·2 per cent of those persons who filed income tax returns have shown their income as under $3,000 a year. I had previously made a note to the effect that fully 80 per cent of our wage earners could not hope to benefit by this legislation. Using the figures already given, it looks as though my original guess was not very far out. As a matter of fact it is probably a little on the optimistic side.

After all, Mr. Speaker, legislation which is designed to furnish more homes for the people of our country should have some realistic relationship to the wages earned by the people who will require these homes, and to the prospect of their being able to avail themselves of the opportunities offered by the bill.

It seems to me there are two or three things which might well be considered very seriously in drawing up the regulations. One is the point I mentioned a few moments ago, namely, that some of these people are even now paying much more in rent than is recognized as a reasonable amount in terms of the 23 per cent limitation. Why is that? One reason is that they cannot find places in which to live without paying a great deal more than they should; another reason is, as the hon. member for York-Humber (Miss Aitken) said the other day, that two, three and four members of a family are all contributing towards the cost of their housing accommodation, whatever it may be. In the case of young married couples, very often both husband and wife are working. In the case of those who have borne a family there are probably two or three children who have now reached the age where they are employed themselves. These young people within families also contribute towards the housing accommodation which they occupy, whether it be on a rental basis or whether they are attempting to buy their own home.

I submit it is only reasonable that the circumstances under which these people live should be taken into consideration. If a wage earner is in the $3,000 category, and if his wife and/or his children are supplementing the family income, then the gross amount of their earnings should be taken into consideration, particularly if these persons will agree to assume some responsibility in the matter of making payments. I can cite several cases from my own experience in which young people not yet married, and living at home, are helping their parents to liquidate the mortgage on the home. These same parents could not possibly have hoped to carry the load of home ownership without the help of their children. In turn, when these young people set up their own homes, I know they can reasonably expect to receive assistance from their parents who will still be in the earning class.

The difference between a ratio limitation of 23, 24, 25 and 26 per cent is very marked and it raises the question of the basis on which such limitations should be set. Who thought up the 23 per cent limitation in the first place? Why is it we should say 23 per cent is the proper figure upon which to base the calculation? I suppose we can all think back to the days of our youth when our parents told us we could afford to pay one week's salary for rent per month. That was the proper rent per month we could afford to pay for housing accommodation. But those days have gone. There are very few people today who are able to find living accommodation for one week's salary; and the few who do, I venture to say, are people who were probably fortunate enough to have purchased homes many years ago when they were not as expensive as they are today. They have paid off a large portion of their mortgage, and throughout the years, when they were paying off that mortgage, they probably did not have to pay 23 per cent; otherwise they could not have established themselves. Very few now are able to live in comfortable surroundings on one week's wages per month. However, as conditions change people adjust themselves to these changed conditions. They supplement their income in other ways. They cut their coat according to the cloth.

The actual difference between 23 and 24 per cent, say, at the $10,000 level is $160 in salary requirements. When you go up to the 25 per cent limitation you benefit by another $140, and when you go up to the 26 per cent you benefit by another $135. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, if it should be said that instead of the 23 per cent limitation a proper limitation was 26 per cent, you would have the advantage of about $440, which would make quite a difference in the matter of eligibility in loans under the bill.

I hope the minister will take all these things into consideration when the regulations are drawn up, because I believe very firmly that the workability of this bill when it becomes an act, and the availability of funds for housing, will depend largely upon the requirements which are written into it. I would seriously urge the minister not to block off a large majority of the wage earners of Canada from participating in a scheme which is sorely needed in order to provide homes for our people.

Mr. F. A. Enfield (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of respect that I rise to make my contribution to the debate we have had and are having in regard to the new National Housing Act. I feel the act is a forward step in a field where the federal government is eminently suited to act, that is in the field of finance as applied to housing.

The debate has featured some criticism of the bill. We have been told that the down payments remain too high; that the monthly payments will be too high; that the proposed mortgage and salary requirements will be too high; and that even the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation standards are too high for those who wish to qualify under the bill.

With regard to these criticisms I feel and respectfully submit that certain considerations have been overlooked. First of all, all of the criticisms I have outlined basically provide for the protection of the home buyer. As to the monthly payment, based presumably on a 23 per cent ratio of the buyer's salary, it has been found, in the light of experience, and not only by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation but by all other service organizations which have occasion to study the problem, such as the social workers and so forth, that a person should not spend more than a certain proportion—23 per cent to 25 per cent—of his income on housing. This is done to protect the buyer. I have often explained this in great detail to clients whom I have faced across my desk. There is no sense of their going into that project unless there is some hope of their carrying it through. Otherwise they will lose their equity or down payment, everything they had put into the house as they proceed with the purchase of it.

It has been said by the opposition that we have no right to assume how a person will spend his money. Obviously we have no such right, but we must, of course, work on the basis of averages and we are entitled to do so in this act. I will deal with the salary requirement a little bit later.

The second point I want to make is this. There has been an assumption that the old National Housing Act, as I suppose I can now call it, has been an abject failure. Nothing could be more wrong. We should look at the operation of the old act, because the new act is obviously an attempt to extend and to better the benefits of the old act. We should look at the old act to see how it worked.

In my riding of York-Scarborough, which is part of the Toronto suburban area—I only mention it to provide an example, and it is an area which is, as the hon. member for York-Humber so aptly described it, a pulsating, growing, suburban part of Toronto—we have had an increase in population over the last year of some 18,000 people in one small area alone. Eighty per cent of the 18,000 are people who are purchasing their own homes. Of those purchasing, the vast majority have purchased homes that have been built under the National Housing Act. The National Housing Act, as it now stands, has indeed been doing a tremendous service to the home buyers of Canada and we have no right to assume that it was a failure. We have every right to expect that the extension and the betterment of the act that is contemplated will be a further boon to the prospective home buyers. Let me give a concrete example of what can happen under this act.

I act for a builder who builds in my riding. Recently, by which I mean in the late fall of 1953, he was able to produce a home which would sell for $10,050—it was a very nice masonry home—with a down payment of $2,050 and the balance of $8,000 under a National Housing Act loan. He advertised it one evening in the Toronto Daily Star. That was on a Friday. By Monday 33 houses were sold, and we had a waiting list as long as your arm for anybody who might cancel his order. That is what happened in one day or over one week end; 33 houses sold and people clamouring to purchase more.

I dare say that if, under the new act, that builder was able to produce a home for $9,000, to sell with a down payment of $2,000 and with a $7,000 National Housing Act mortgage, the prospective home buyers in the Toronto metropolitan area, of whom there are many thousands, would literally beat a path to the builder's door. I am not at all pessimistic as to the effect of the new act. There we could use a $7,000 National Housing Act loan, where the salary requirement would not be $3,860 a year but somewhere in the neighbourhood of $3,000 a year. We have no right to assume that the minimum loan under the act will be $8,000. That is not true at all. I feel that builders will have the ability to build houses to sell for less than $10,000 under the aegis of the new act, if two conditions are fulfilled. One of those conditions is, of course, that we must have a free flow of mortgage money. The second is that there must be available serviced land on which the builder can build.

As to the free flow of mortgage money, may I say this. Housing is not merely a question of putting roofs over floors, walls and cellars. It involves a complicated process of co-ordinating the efforts of the lending institutions, the banks, the municipal governments and the provincial governments to produce, in the end, and to maintain the structure in which the buyer will live. With a free flow of mortgage money the builder, instead of having to build houses in dribs and drabs of 23 or 33 at a time, will be able to plan ahead. If he can rely on a continuous and assured flow of money, naturally his planning will be more broad; he can work on a larger scale; his costs will be reduced and his efficiency will be increased. As I say, I have no doubt that, under such conditions, a builder will be able to build good houses—even in the Toronto area where we have costs which are probably as high as if not higher than those anywhere else in Canada—for at least $9,000. I feel that the banks can, must and will take advantage of the new legislation so that the builder will be assured of a continuous and free flow of mortgage money. Let us hope that will be the case.

What about the question of serviced land? I feel that here we have a much bigger problem. By services I mean of course the provision of roads, water, sewers, hydro, police and fire protection and, of course, that most costly of all services, namely schools. In a subdivision of about 200 or 300 homes you need a school that costs well-nigh half a million dollars. It is an extremely expensive proposition indeed.

How is the supply of serviced land controlled and regulated? In Ontario we have what is known as a planning act. Under the planning act a municipality has the power to declare an area to be an urban development area. If it does so, land that is affected by that declaration cannot then be subdivided until a plan of subdivision is registered against the title. The plan is drawn up and is submitted to the Ontario municipal board, which sends it out to about 13 different agencies for their approval. Then, if it is approved, it is sent to the municipality concerned and the municipality must, of course, also approve the plan. This is the procedure which the subdivider and/or the builder must carry out if he is to register his plan and commence building on the property.

What happens to that plan? I am afraid I have a particular interest in the Toronto area, and that is why I speak of it; but I think what I am saying applies generally throughout the country. The plans are presented to the municipal board and they are turned down not because it is bad planning or even unreasonable planning, or even that they do not want an area to develop in a certain direction. They are turned down because the cost of the services will raise the municipal debt to such a point that there will be too great a difference between the possible assessment on the houses and the debt itself. In other words, it is wholly a problem of municipal finance.

If we are to have sufficient serviced land on which builders may construct homes and take advantage of any free flow of mortgage money that may possibly be created by this legislation, then there has to be a frontal attack on the whole sphere of municipal finance by the provincial governments. They must try to provide a more equitable distribution of municipal taxes with respect to the provision of schools, roads, and hydro, water and other required services. Otherwise our whole effort in endeavouring to put this legislation into effect may go for nothing. With this bill we are endeavouring to set the play in motion. We are commencing an attack on the so-called housing problem. Let us hope that the other agencies involved, banks, provincial governments and municipalities, will not flinch and falter when it comes to their turn to carry the ball.

Mr. O. C. Trainor (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to participate in this debate, largely because I did not think I had any particular qualifications which would enable me to make a useful contribution. However, this does not necessarily seem to be a deterrent. As the debate progressed, it became more and more evident that the bill was unlikely to achieve the professed purpose, namely, to provide houses for the low income groups of our population. It is interesting to review the suggestions of the various parties in the house on this question. The government group quite obviously regards this legislation as the summum bonum, the acme of perfection, the apple of its eye.

I am not quite certain as to what the mechanics of legislation in this parliament are, but I suspect that the minister and his administrative assistants were probably the architects of the bill. It is probable that they then referred it to the cabinet for approval, and when approval was obtained the bill was drafted. It is to me extraordinary that there could be such unanimity of opinion about this bill among members opposite unless, of course, they had the advantage of a preview and the bill actually represents a consensus. However, I am extremely doubtful that this is the case, and I would suggest that if it is not the case this is surely a travesty of the democratic process.

With respect to our friends on the left, as might be expected they have come forward with their usual facile solution that the taxpayer should provide. They neglect to tell us, however, that the taxpayer is not only corporations, which of course are fair game, but the payer of the sales and excise taxes—in short, everybody. As a matter of fact I am astonished at the moderation of these gentlemen. When they suggested that the government lend money at 2 per cent, which incidentally is approximately half the rate the government would have to pay for it, they might just as easily have suggested that the taxpayer should provide the money completely free of interest. While they are about it, why not also suggest that principal payments be forgotten?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Why do you not suggest a practical plan?

Mr. Trainor: All right, I will. Give me a chance.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): It will be good.

Mr. Lennard: You have been here long enough not to get so hot under the collar.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I never do.

Mr. Trainor: Turning to the gentlemen farther left, they of course have their customary solution for everything. Why not print new money to build new houses?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): What do you think the bill is doing?

Mr. Hansell: Who said that?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): That is exactly what the bill is doing.

Mr. Trainor: I do not believe it is, quite. It has not gone quite that far yet.

Mr. Rowe: Paper houses.

Mr. Trainor: This is a beautifully simple solution, of course, but it has the natural objection that maybe those who are supplying the houses, both labour and material suppliers, would not be willing to accept payment in this type of depreciated currency. Incidentally, this sort of thing has been tried before. It is not new. If the hon. gentlemen are interested in a souvenir collection, I think they can still pick up for about a nickel a million marks in the legal tender of Germany of the 1920's. That shows what happens when you start to do this sort of thing.

Mr. Wylie: You are being silly.

Mr. Trainor: If we concede that the bill will not meet the objectives for which it was designed, and the debate makes this self-evident, then I suggest it is incumbent on the house to seek alterations which give promise of achieving the objectives. In the first place, I think the validity of the fundamental concept of the bill should be examined. It assumes that individual home ownership is almost a sine qua non. I would dispute this basic assumption. How many families in urban localities have grown up and made their contribution to society in homes that they themselves did not own? It will be found that hundreds of thousands of the very best that this country has produced lived and lived well in rented premises.

I think that the emphasis in the bill should perhaps be shifted from home ownership to low rental housing. Mind you, I have no objection to the principle of home ownership. I would not favour altering the bill in any respect with regard to this principle. The bill provides for home ownership for certain groups of people. There is nothing wrong with individual ownership except that it is designed for those who wish it and, more particularly, for those who can afford it.

We shall have to concede that normal investment funds are not available for low rental housing largely because the return is too low and the conditions too uncertain to attract investment capital. Therefore I submit it is necessary to seek another agency. In this regard I should like to suggest to the minister that business and industry have the necessary social consciousness and sense of social responsibility to assume the burden of providing suitable housing for their own employees at a price they can afford to pay, provided, however, that this is not added to their operating expenses and consequently reflected in the price structure.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is definitely in the interests of industry and business, because obviously the welfare of their employees must be of interest to them. The bill provides also, in a limited way, for this sort of participation by industry by specifying the industries of mining, lumbering, logging and so forth. Why not enlarge this provision to embrace all industry? There would be no particular objection that I can see to doing this. As a matter of fact, it would be a great social experiment.

I can envisage, Mr. Speaker, the emergence of a new social pattern wherein industry and business would gladly assume the responsibility for providing decent housing for its own employees. Such a development would unquestionably be in the best interests of business, and being based on self-interest it would be guaranteed a successful operation. I would suggest that these funds be lent to industry by the corporation when, in the judgment of the corporation, it is evident that the applicant possesses the financial stability to insure the servicing of the loan over a considerable period of time, and of course with adequate safeguards as to the rate of rental and so on.

I should say that this suggestion is entirely my own. I assume full responsibility for it, although I believe it is in accordance with the political principles of the official opposition. I offer it to the minister free and without expectation of any credit, because I believe I see in it the germ of a new social experiment which would provide decent homes for thousands of our people which this bill, in its present form, does not provide.

Mr. Leopold Demers (Laval): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the population of the county which it is my privilege and responsibility to represent in this house, I readily support the bill now before us, the principle of which is merely in accord with the constant desire of the government to create for the Canadian people an atmosphere of security and welfare.

The administration of public affairs is a very intricate matter. However, in studying this matter more thoroughly and more objectively one notes that the things that seemed obscure, even mysterious, become clearer and more definite. Accordingly, a government conscious of its responsibilities and anxious to provide a sound administration for the people must take into account a certain number of factors which may be summarized as follows:

1. To place upon our statute books laws which meet the highest aspirations of the people, from the moral, national, international and economic points of view and to take the necessary measures to ensure that these laws will be strictly enforced.

2. To show decency and judgment in the spending of public moneys.

In my opinion, those are the two great factors which a serious, honest and responsible administration should bear in mind. Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied that the government to which I have the honour of belonging at the present time take those factors into account, even scrupulously, whenever they make an administrative decision. Besides, the confidence shown by the Canadian people on so many occasions, was so clear, definite and unequivocal, more particularly in 1949 and 1953, that I do not feel it is necessary to comment further on the matter.

The present leader of the government, whom all men of good will in our country, and throughout the world, take pleasure in recognizing as the principal initiator of the North Atlantic pact, a pact I would qualify as "the greatest co-operative movement for peace in the whole world", once said that, in order to fight more successfully the pernicious and subversive ideas prevalent throughout the world, it was necessary for every member nation to take steps, within its own territory, to ensure more security, welfare and prosperity for all classes of society. Well, Mr. Speaker, once the hon. members of this house and of the Senate have enacted this bill, there will be a new law on our statute books, a humanitarian, social and eminently helpful piece of legislation, because the people of our own country will thus have an additional weapon with which to fight the communist doctrine, symbolic of the worst degradation of the human mind, which I still call a hideous octopus trying to infiltrate into our hearts and minds its fiendish tentacles in an effort to annihilate the best asset we possess in this country: our religious convictions, our way of thinking, our way of life, and our democratic principles. Moreover, this piece of legislation will enable a great many families to house themselves properly, a great number of Canadians to become home owners. Thus, a deeper sense of private ownership will develop in the individual, and our community spirit will grow at the same time as our love for Canada.

It is for those few reasons, Mr. Speaker, that I wholeheartedly support the principle as well as the terms of the bill before us. In conclusion, I most sincerely congratulate the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) for having taken, in 1953, the necessary steps in order that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation might make direct loans in the constituency I represent. Since then, in my constituency, hundreds of houses have been built, large families have come in and have succeeded in finding adequate housing. Thanks to the minister's efforts, I have every reason to believe that during 1954 the constituency which I have the honour to represent will continue its expansion in the field of housing.

(Text):

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to delay the house for long at this time, but I want to deal particularly with one point which I would ask the minister and the officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to look into. What I have in mind is a problem which confronts particularly the smaller municipalities which, thus far, have not been dealt with adequately. That is my main purpose in rising.

Before coming to that, however, I should like to say that I support the points made by speakers in the official opposition who have dealt with this bill, and would express the hope that the arguments and considerations they have placed before the minister and the house would receive most thoroughgoing and careful consideration.

In that connection it occurred to me that the fresh viewpoint put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Trainor) was one that arrested attention and is deserving of serious study. As I understood him, the hon. member did not question the desirability of home ownership but said he felt that not all people in Canada wanted to own their homes. He pointed out that there is a considerable group whose needs would be met quite adequately by rental housing—in fact whose needs would be met better by the provision of rental accommodation than by the provision of accommodation available only on a purchase basis.

Then, if I understood him correctly, he went on to say that he felt perhaps there was not sufficient emphasis being placed on the provision of rental accommodation, and that attention was being directed almost exclusively to the provision of accommodation for purposes of purchase and ownership. He suggested that it behooved us to devote a great deal more attention to the problems of those whose particular requirements would best be met by rental accommodation.

If I understood correctly what he said in that regard, then I support fully his point of view. I liked, too, his suggestion that, inasmuch as the returns now available from money invested in this type of accommodation were not sufficiently attractive to produce large amounts of private money for that purpose, the role of government and of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, as well as of the act, should be paramount in this field. He added that greater facilities are necessary along these lines.

I was particularly struck by his suggestion that in this field industry and business should be invited to participate, on the basis that they have a common interest and a common duty, along with the rest of the community and with the government, to see that adequate housing accommodation is furnished for those people who find employment in business and industry. I understood his suggestion to be that we might make funds available under the terms of the National Housing Act for the construction of such rental housing projects in which arrangements industry and business would participate. They would organize and take some administrative responsibility under the plan, thus making it possible to have low rental housing accommodation available for their employees. I do feel it is a matter in which business and industry should and would be willing to accept their fair share of responsibility provided, as the hon. member said—and I agree —that the cost of that program is not added to the overhead of business, thus increasing the prices of their products.

I think it would be possible to find ways under the rental accommodation provisions of the National Housing Act to work out such a program, in which the co-operation of business and industry would be invited. I support fully the hon. member's suggestion that the minister and his officials should study the problem from that point of view, to find if a program along those lines could be worked out and put into effect. The hon. member, who is a new member in the house, deserves great credit for having put forward in this, his first session, this concrete suggestion, and one which, in all its implications, is fresh. What he has said should be considered as at least a partial solution of the tremendous problem of providing housing accommodation that now confronts this nation.

There can be no doubt that the problem of providing housing is one of the most serious confronting us. I need not rehearse all that has been said in that regard. I think more particularly, as I suppose all hon. members do, of the situation in my own constituency where even at this time families are living in accommodation which was provided for other purposes, and eight or nine years ago taken over on an emergency basis. After the war people were placed in that accommodation on the assumption that it would be used only as emergency shelter. They are still there, and living under conditions which are simply not good enough for Canadian people in these days.

I am not going to go into detail. I am sure many hon. members have in their constituencies so-called emergency shelter accommodation, consisting of—well, almost tarpaper shacks—temporary huts, erected on airports or adjacent to airports or army camps. This was never intended to be used as permanent dwelling accommodation. In it there are only plywood partitions to separate one end of the building from the other and to afford some measure of privacy for the occupants. Well, those of us who served as members of the armed forces during the war lived in some of those huts with plywood partitions, and we know exactly how much privacy there can be behind a plywood wall.

When one thinks of families having to dwell under those conditions, having to share bathroom facilities designed for occupancy by a group of men, such as would be found in army barracks, and realizes that this kind of accommodation is now being shared by women and children as well, one must conclude that it just is not decent in a country having the material prosperity and the potential living standards of ours.

That is what I have in mind when I say that there is no more important problem facing the country today than the necessity of the provision of decent housing accommodation. That necessity is just as acute in the smaller centres as it is in the larger ones. I suppose it is natural that the needs of the big cities in this respect should be more emphasized in a discussion of this sort, because there are more people living in the big cities than in the smaller towns. But I am quite sure there is not a single member here from a rural area, and I doubt whether there is a member here from the cities, who would not agree with me when I say that in proportion to our population the need of housing accommodation is just as acute in the smaller centres as it is in the large ones.

I come from a riding in which there is no large city. Our biggest city, with its neighbouring municipality of North Kamloops and the immediately surrounding areas, has a population of probably 12,000 to 14,000 people. That is the biggest centre in my riding. The others are towns and villages of from about 600 to 3,000 people, and the rest of it is entirely rural. But in those smaller centres the need of accommodation is just as acute as it is in the larger centres in proportion to the population ratios that prevail between the two.

There has been brought to my attention the fact that, particularly in the smaller towns and villages, the facilities of the National Housing Act, as it stands at the present time, are not as fully available as they are in the larger centres of population. I suppose that would be natural if one considered only the facilities for inspection and the speedy arrangement of loans and so on. One could perhaps be reconciled to expecting that the processing of an application for a loan from a smaller centre would take longer than it would in a large centre where inspection and processing facilities are all immediately available. But it is not from that point of view that the criticism is directed. I am informed that in some of those smaller centres the down payment is substantially greater than what is required in the larger centres. I have figures given me from the village of Williams Lake, which is one of the typical centres of population in my riding. May I put it this way. A gentleman made a thorough study of what arrangements could be made to obtain building loans under the National Housing Act, and was informed that the minimum down payment required would be 30 per cent, not the 20 per cent which is available under the present act to those in larger centres. I am also informed that at the time this study was made 17 people indicated that they were prepared to take loans and go ahead under the National Housing Act, but when they were informed the down payment required would be 30 per cent not one of them went ahead with his application.

I understand the reason given as to why a higher down payment was required was that there was no industry located in the town in question. Well, of course, on that point I would most certainly take strong objection to that being used as a reason for requiring a higher down payment in a smaller centre. I would say that the difference in security, the risk, both moral and physical, as between property in big towns or cities and small towns, from that point of view, is so negligible that it does not form the basis of a difference in down payment of 10 per cent. In fact I would say that the moral risk is somewhat better in smaller communities than in larger ones. Certainly it is just as good, and in a good many respects the personal security involved is more satisfactory because there is not such a change in population in smaller centres, or shifts of population, as there are in the larger centres. As far as the application of any such argument to the actual village in question—Williams Lake—is concerned, I would point out that it is a very substantial distribution point, serving a large area, and that although it is true there are no heavy industries, no manufacturing industries in that area, with the exception of saw mills, its standard of income compares favourably to what it would be if the whole population were dependent upon industry itself.

I am further told, Mr. Speaker, that even the 30 per cent down payment was not quite all that these people would be expected to put up. In fact it was indicated that the home builder there would have to put down 40 per cent of the total cost, and that the nigger in the woodpile was the provision that the down payment was a minimum one, and that apparently there is some discretion to the corporation to increase that down payment in cases where it considers it necessary.

I am not familiar with all the details of the regulations and the application of the legislation, but I am putting this forward as a statement made to me by responsible people of this place after what I am satisfied was a thorough investigation. I do not know the reasons why the conditions that they report to me should exist, but I am putting it before the minister as a condition which is most serious from the point of view of smaller centres, and which places them at a very grave disadvantage in comparison with larger centres in obtaining loans under the National Housing Act.

As I said, I am quite certain that no one living in a smaller centre, and being a reasonable person, would expect them to be equal in all respects; and the difficulties of administering it in smaller centres might create some obstacles, and would be expected to make it slightly more difficult for them to obtain the same treatment as they do in larger centres. But this tremendous disparity is not justified and, I am quite certain, not necessary. Therefore I would ask the minister to take a look at the matter himself and to have the president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation take a look at the situation, because I am quite certain that it is not necessary that such discrepancy should continue. I would also ask him to take a look at the situation with regard to the inspection facilities and other facilities which it is intended to provide to smaller centres in dealing with such applications for loans as may be approved.

The minister has implied that 4,000 branches of the chartered banks of Canada may well become lending offices under the new National Housing Act, in which case of course there would be a lending office in every community where there is a branch of a bank, so that even although in the past the lending companies, which have been confined pretty well to the life insurance companies, have not made loans in smaller centres because they have not had offices there and no inspection facilities there, I suppose it might well be that if in fact the branch banks are authorized to make loans for housing purposes there will be a lending office right there. I rather doubt—and here I agree with the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming)—whether, particularly in its initial stages at any rate, the banks will authorize every one of their branches to be a lending office and to approve and process loans right there. Therefore, it seems to me, there will still be a very real need for providing adequate inspecting, lending and negotiating facilities for these smaller communities, and I would ask the minister to bear that problem in mind and, by changing the regulations under this act, or by amending the legislation itself in this connection, to eliminate this difference in the down payment required, so that, so far as is possible, reasonable, and consistent, smaller communities are placed in no less advantageous a position than big communities in getting loans for house building under the National Housing Act.

Mr. John Hunter (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I have listened for quite a long time to this debate and there are a few remarks I should like to make though I do not wish to take up very much time of the house.

I would like to remind hon. members that this housing situation over a period of approximately twenty years has gradually been shifted from the place where the legislative jurisdiction lies to the place where there is no legislative jurisdiction. The proper place for housing and exclusive legislative jurisdiction is in the province; it always has been and always will be, I presume. But gradually, because of a state of national housing emergency, the federal government has stepped into a field which is not properly its own, but which it was forced to step into because of national needs.

Housing has gradually become in the public mind synonymous with Ottawa. I might just remind hon. members that all we can do to assist in housing is to give financial assistance. We have no legislative jurisdiction over land, property or civil rights. If we had jurisdiction over property, particularly land, we would be in a very different position in regard to the former section 35 of the act relating to land assembly. Unfortunately, in my own province of Ontario the provincial government, which has that legislative jurisdiction, has taken very little interest in the problem of land assembly. I bring that up because today everyone we talk to about housing feels that this is our job, that it is Ottawa's job and the job of the federal government. I suppose we must admit that in a sense it is our job because we have taken the responsibility and have done the work.

Our expanding economy and expanding population can, I think, be compared somewhat to a small or a new company. When a new company is formed in a period of expansion it always finds itself undercapitalized. That is our situation today in Canada. We are a new nation expanding very rapidly and to an extent at least we are undercapitalized. There is really not quite enough money to go around and do all the things we are trying to do in this country and we have to make some arrangement whereby certain amounts will flow into certain fields for certain purposes and other amounts will flow into other fields.

It has become quite obvious in the last few years that in so far as housing is concerned we do not have enough money available. There was not sufficient money available for the borrowing public to build sufficient houses, though that of course is the purpose of this new act which is being introduced at the present time and which in itself is merely a compilation of the old with certain new provisions added.

It is to be hoped that by allowing the banks to enter this field under the particular circumstances designated in the bill more money will become available. It is quite obvious from the act that 25 per cent less loans will be available from the former lending institutions and it is hoped to more than make that up by loans from the money made available by the banks.

Mr. Fleming: Twenty-five per cent more per mortgage.

Mr. Hunter: Yes, which obviously means 25 per cent less loans from the former lending institutions.

Extending the terms of repayment reduces the down payment to some extent. The question as to what is the proper percentage for down payment will never be satisfactorily answered because there are very different views on that point. There always have been and probably always will be though I think views will change when the lending institutions realize that this country is able to produce a stability of economy and can keep away from these former depressions which we suffered in the past, or at least we are all hoping we can keep away from them. That in turn is bound to be of some psychological significance to the lender over a period of years. At the present time the lending institutions or the lenders still remember that we had a bad depression, and they still remember that during that depression values dropped drastically, and that unless a person had a sizeable stake in a house or a sizeable investment in his home he was very liable to say: "I have lost my investment and I will just clear out". That is what happened in many cases during the depression.

If it be true that by the expansion and contraction of credits and by maintaining our exports we are able to produce a stable economy, then it is quite obvious that this is going to have a psychological effect on lenders generally over a period of years and they may then be willing to take smaller down payments.

Many people today say that they should be able to obtain loans on much smaller down payments, say of $1,000. That may be their view, and maybe it is correct, but the point is that the people who are lending the money are not lending their own money but that of policyholders and depositors and they have to take a fairly conservative point of view.

The only other way to make money available in Canada is by additional taxation and I do not believe the public want to pay any more taxes.

I have heard a number of speeches in which hon. members have estimated the housing shortage in this country. But again I would remind hon. members, as I did last year, that these estimates are very difficult to arrive at with any accuracy. The only possible estimate is on the act as it stands at the present time. Under the law under which we are operating at the present time, what is the measuring rod by which we estimate how many real purchasers we have in this country? How many people are really in a position to buy a house under the present law? As the law is changed you may find more people in a position to buy houses, but it is quite obvious that the only possible estimate that can be considered accurate is how many people under the present situation and under the present law are in a position to go out and buy a house, and how many of them are going to buy houses. Many people might like to buy a house but they are not in a position to pay for it and therefore they cannot be considered under the head of housing shortage. They must be in a position to pay for a house and wish to buy. In regard to these estimates I have the gravest suspicion because I know how difficult it would be to get information which would be really accurate on the subject.

The question of the interest rate is something with which, I suppose, people will never be really satisfied. It is quite clear that unless you make the rate of interest reasonably attractive the lenders are not going to make loans. They will simply put their money into another field where the rate of interest is sufficiently attractive. The only way around that is to start subsidizing the lenders and as soon as you start that you are running into the question of discrimination, because those who are going to get the benefit of these loans will in effect be subsidized by taxpayers' money and obtaining a favour which has not been available to those who already are buying their own homes and are paying on an economic basis. I think that such action would cause deep resentment throughout the country and I for one would not want to see it because it would cost the taxpayers a very large sum of money. You cannot manufacture a lower rate of interest. Somebody has to pay for it. As money becomes cheap the rate of interest will go down but that will depend on whether money ever does become cheap.

Another thing I was interested in was the accusation that in this bill there was a centralization of power. I think that statement has some merit. Certainly there is a centralization of power. I do not see how you can have it otherwise. It is quite true that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation are going to have the task of administering the bill and working with the bank and they are going to have to pass judgment on the loans made by the bank, because the lender is simply going to send the application over to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for its report and valuation, and if it is accepted and the report is favourable and the borrower wishes to go ahead that would be the final valuation. The lending value would be apparent, and the administration will go on through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

So in that sense there is no question about it that there is a concentration of administration there. The whole question is this. What alternative would you have? If we are going to get the banks into this thing, it is quite clear at this point that they are not in a position to enter into the mortgage business and to establish mortgage departments on their own. Good mortgage men are extremely scarce. The banks have not had sufficient experience to enter into that field. If we forced them to do the administration of this business, we would be in the position, I am afraid, where we would get very few loans for a long time from the banks. Therefore the only logical way of doing it was to let Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation do this administrative work. That could be the subject of some criticism.

I think the main thing we have to bear in mind and which I think the officers of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will have to bear in mind—as I know they are bearing it in mind—is the efficiency of their administration. If these loans in any way get bogged down with red tape, it is going to be a source of irritation to the borrowing public, or the people seeking housing, and a tremendous source of irritation to the builders; and the builders are, generally speaking, the people who produce most of the housing. Builders have a tendency to dislike anything like Central Mortgage anyway, because Central Mortgage has a number of regulations which are made in an effort to produce good housing. No builder wants to be curtailed any more than is necessary. He naturally wants to get into the field, build as many houses as he can and sell them as quickly as he can for as much profit as possible. Any interference by Central Mortgage would naturally be resented by the builder because it might possibly diminish his profit and it might cause him to do a great many things which he might not otherwise do. But that cannot be helped. In our free enterprise, we like to keep it free but it cannot be so free that we are not getting good houses.

I think that Central Mortgage is a highly necessary organization. I think it is run efficiently. I think that is true to date and we hope it will be so in the future. If Central Mortgage is able to provide efficiency of administration for these new loans, I think we are going to see a development in the lending field such as we hardly even expect at this time. I think we will see a tremendous amount of lending for housing. I am hoping indeed that we can meet the needs of the public of this country to a much greater degree. I think that this act is a splendid step forward. It is progressive. It is going to do a task that is highly necessary. Possibly it should have come a little bit earlier. Who is to say? It is difficult to do this sort of thing because you cannot, just overnight, order people to lend money. You have to get them to agree to it. You have to have their co-operation. Until you have their co-operation, you are not able just suddenly to put something on the statute books and say, "This is the way it will go". Until you have had preliminary discussions with the banks and the lending institutions generally and have worked out some system which is agreeable to them, and which they will accept—it may not be the final system and it may not be the best system in the end but it is the one that you can put into force at the present time—you are not in a position to enter into a new field of legislation.

These agreements have been worked out. The new legislation has been introduced. I think it will do an excellent job. I do not think it is the end of this thing. I think as public opinion veers and varies, and as the lending institutions realize what is happening in this field, we shall find coming along amendments which in time may produce more and better housing yet. But under the present set-up and under the present psychology of the lending public, I think this act is a magnificent step forward. I must say that to the minister and to the president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation I extend my sincere and genuine congratulations.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part briefly in this discussion, I do so partly out of surprise that the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) should have been swept away by the vision of this new social experiment that was proposed a short time ago by the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Trainor). I can understand someone coming from a place like Winnipeg not having heard of or not knowing much about the company-town idea. But I must confess that I find it hard to understand why a native son of the province of British Columbia should allow himself to be moved by any such suggestion today. Obviously the hon. member for Winnipeg South cannot have had, as some of us have, much experience of the company-town idea as it existed in its heyday 30 or 40 years ago in British Columbia.

I happen to have had some experience of that idea, as have many other people in British Columbia. We consider that the sort of economic and social vassalage which that state of affairs brought about is something we should be moving away from. I for one would be prepared to oppose this idea most vigorously whenever—as runs the classical phrase—it rears its ugly head. I am surprised that it should exist even in the ranks of the modern Progressive Conservative party. I should like the hon. member to realize just what it means when people live in a place where their whole pay cheque goes back into the coffers of the company through their payment of rent for a company house and their payment to a company store for their groceries, food and clothes; the sort of pressure that can be brought to bear upon people to pay exorbitant prices for commodities; and the threats that have been made with regard to the security of jobs if the company facilities were not patronized 100 per cent. To put it quite frankly, I am surprised that it should be suggested that we should return to these things.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member knows very well that it was not suggested; but I do not suppose there is any use in asking him to realize that.

Mr. Barnett: Even if the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) is not aware of the fact, I would say that, by and large, in British Columbia the more enlightened industrial corporations of today are moving away from this idea of a company town.

I have given a little bit of study to the section of the act that was referred to, namely section 17 in part II, which reads as follows:

> The corporation may, with the approval of the governor in council, make a loan to a borrower engaged in the mining, lumbering, logging or fishing industry, to assist in the construction of low or moderate-cost housing projects in areas or localities that are adjacent to or connected with the operations of the borrower.

I might be moved to agree that there might be some circumstances in which provisions such as those should be implemented. Without attempting to prolong this debate to any great extent, however, I should like to express my opinion that if the provisions of that section were reversed, the situation would be more in keeping with the best interests of the people of Canada today. In other words, I feel that the time has come when, through legislation—housing legislation, if necessary—those interests in this country to whom we entrust the right to develop our natural resources, those interests which accept the responsibility for raising the capital to develop those resources, should, along with that responsibility, accept some social responsibility with respect to providing the necessary housing and other community facilities. Those funds should be considered to be something to be used under a public trust, either by an incorporated community or by some other form of democratic organization. If the bill were to propose anything along these lines it would be more in keeping with the dignities and rights of Canadian citizens. That would be the case if it made such people as are referred to in this section responsible for providing funds to, shall we say, the housing corporation rather than the provision being the other way around as in the present act.

(Translation):

Mr. J. W. Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of extending unduly this debate. However, I would not like to see it come to an end without making my modest contribution and expressing the views of the electors I have the honour to represent.

After hearing with much attention and interest the numerous arguments put forth on the subject, I have come to the conclusion that this bill will not bring any help to the humble worker or average wage earner. True, the down payment will be lowered, but the monthly payments on capital and interest will vary from $56 to $59 per month, depending whether the borrower plans to repay his loan in 25 or 30 years. When one knows that in the city of Quebec the average weekly earnings of the worker are under $50, one must come to the conclusion that the purpose of this legislation is not to help the worker, but rather those who earn $4,000 per year. That is to say that parliament is asking us to enact legislation aimed at improving the condition not of those who could profit by it, but rather of those who do not need such legislation.

There can be no question that there still exists a housing shortage in Canada. Our cities are still covered with slums which are a constant menace to public health. We must evidently find a fair and logical way of remedying the problem.

Although I am confident that the government wants to improve that alarming condition, I am compelled to state that this bill will not fulfil the aim for which it was introduced.

I know of no average wage earners like those living in my constituency, who will be in a position to benefit from this legislation and become home owners. It is not only a matter of being financially able to make the down payment and repay the capital and interest; in addition, the home owner will have to heat his house, pay municipal taxes, look after the maintenance of his property and provide for repairs that will have to be made sooner or later.

Large families living in slum conditions had hoped that the government might decide to legislate in order to enable them to move into more suitable dwellings.

They had also hoped to be able to live as true human beings. Their revenue is small, even though what they accomplish by their toil is essential to the economic prosperity of their country. They do their share generously in that field and they should be entitled to receive from the government a little more consideration, if not more decent treatment.

In this twentieth century, in a country like ours, endowed with all kinds of resources, I cannot understand this increase in slums, where large families are forced to live in cramped quarters. I know what I am saying, Mr. Speaker, because those shacks made of scraps of sheet metal and wood where people are forced to live are all too numerous in my constituency. And, during our severe Canadian winters, passing by those dreary places, I often say to myself: How these poor people must shiver with cold and suffer in their souls in these miserable quarters which people in more fortunate circumstances would not even wish to have as a kennel for their favourite dog!

In my humble opinion the legislation, in its present form, is nothing less than a gigantic farce perpetrated upon the working class. Everybody seems to agree when it comes to speaking out against communism, or loathing this pernicious philosophy but, unconsciously perhaps, we legislate in such a way as to support its propaganda.

Now that I have the opportunity, I hope I may, in a few minutes—I will only be three or four minutes and I hope the hon. members will not object—

An hon. Member: Go ahead.

Mr. Dufresne: I wish, then, to offer with regard to this bill a few suggestions which, to my mind, would be such as to correct this serious situation.

I am in favour of the immediate establishment of federal grants for building materials, in the proportion of 90 per cent. Let there be no misunderstanding in this regard: these grants would necessarily be converted into mortgages.

Middle class people having but a small amount to pay for their materials would then be in a position to carry out the building of their house with the co-operation of relatives and friends.

In the suburbs of Quebec, several workers have already taken advantage of this suggestion, so that they have been able to build themselves, for about $8,000, a most adequate duplex from which they will be able to earn fairly substantial revenue. In this way, with a lot acquired through their own sacrifices and about $1,000 down payment, a large number of workers will be able to become happy home owners, without having to assume an indebtedness of $10,000 which they would not be in a position to clear before 25 or 30 years.

Why not also provide in the act some measure of help for those who, at the present time, are bearing the burden of a heavy debt because they wanted to have a house of their own?

Would it not be possible, under this legislation, to have the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation take over certain mortgages already existing with several insurance companies or lending institutions and which have to be repaid within 10 or 15 years? Let me give an example. Here is a workingman who has saved enough money for a down payment on a house and for the land on which to build that house. However, he had to borrow $8,500 from an insurance company, and he has to repay that loan over a period of ten years. The insurance people have made him buy from them an insurance policy as security for the mortgage to the amount of $5,000, and the borrower must pay each month a $12 premium. This worker is then obliged to make monthly payments of about $107. To this must be added municipal taxes amounting to $450 per year, $200 for heating and the upkeep of the said property.

How can anyone expect that this worker will not get discouraged or that he would not be in danger, in case of illness or unemployment, of losing the savings which have cost him so much work and such heavy sacrifices.

I hope that the government whose responsibility it is to legislate for the people will consent to make, in the bill we are now asked to approve, the changes that are required if the government really cares to help those who are in need of such help. If we do this, we will then have found, as I have already said, one of the most efficient means of fighting the subversive ideas which are much too often bred in the slums and the distressed homes I mentioned earlier.

Democracy should not be an empty word nor a matter for propaganda in parliament. It must really exist. Let us legislate for the people if we want our people to have, towards our parliamentary institutions, the respect they deserve.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: I must explain that earlier the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne) had asked the house for permission to carry on after six o'clock. Since there was no objection, he was doing so with unanimous consent.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, this is the first chance I have had to discuss housing since the minister has become responsible for this important branch of government. While I plan on making some critical remarks regarding the proposal before the house, I should like to say that members of this group will be supporting the measure, because it will provide some housing. It will be better than no legislation at all. But I really do not think it is good enough for Canada in this day and generation.

I would like to express my sympathy to the minister. I feel that, being well qualified as he is in engineering, and with his vision for the future, his colleagues in the cabinet are taking advantage of his youth and his good nature by having him sponsor a bill of this type.

When one considers the performance by Canada during the war years alongside our record in housing since the war, I think he cannot be satisfied. It is just ten years ago since the well-known Curtis report was presented. That was on March 24, 1944. I think it would be well for us to remember something of the plans for the brave new world that was to dawn as soon as the war was over.

This committee summarized its findings by pointing out the following:

> Canada has lagged behind the example of European countries, of Great Britain and the United States in providing greater governmental assistance for housing as a matter of welfare and public concern. These substantial reasons put housing into the forefront of domestic post-war plans. The subcommittee believes that the provision for housing will have to include home ownership, home improvement, slum clearance, low rental projects and rural and farm housing.

And later on it says:

> It seems indicated that special attention in the advance preparation of plans should be given to low rental housing and farm housing, in which this country has had little or no experience to date; and also that home and farm improvement should be made ready the most urgently in advance, because of its immediate applicability to the first period of demobilization . . . The committee places in the forefront of all housing projects the matter of town and community planning. Town planning is essentially the matter of using land in its most efficient and socially desirable way. Many people regard town planning as a matter of parkways, arterial roads, and similar measures. But town planning should mean the utilization of all land in terms of long-range and carefully considered objectives. Obviously, this process must extend beyond the more or less arbitrary boundaries of our present cities and unite with organized rural planning wherever appropriate. The institution of at least the essentials of town planning is both preliminary and basic to housing developments. The committee, therefore, regards it as a step which must be taken at the earliest possible moment in preparation for post-war housing projects;—

And so on. The two points stressed by the committee as requiring top priority were low rental subsidized housing and rural housing. Some of my colleagues in this party have discussed the question of low rental subsidized housing, and I do not propose to go over the ground that they have covered so well. But I do wish to say that it has been a well-established principle in all countries that the community pays a very high price for maintaining run-down slum areas in our large cities. It has been a false economy for Canada through many years to fail to deal with this question.

I know we have made a start. But, again, when we compare the performance of this country during the war, when millions of our young people were in the services and when we were supplying munitions for our army as well as those of our allies, with the pitiful performance since the war in tearing down and burning these disgraceful slums found in every large centre of Canada, what we have done is not so impressive, and we cannot be satisfied with it.

I hope the minister sponsoring the bill will bring in legislation next year and every year to indicate that he is making some progress with the cabinet in getting that measure of support which would ensure that the federal government would lead the way, in co-operation with the provinces and municipalities, in the provision of low rental housing. This would be subsidized, of course, to make it possible for those people in the lower income brackets to have decent houses.

I think it is only fair that when a country is making heavy appropriations for the building of large industrial plants, at the same time adequate provision should be made to provide living quarters for the people who work in those plants.

When the debate opened a week ago today I was on my way to Uranium City and Eldorado. It was 62 degrees below zero the day we reached Eldorado, and it gave me pleasure to note that the federal crown-owned corporation did not expect the people working for it in the far north to rustle logs to build log shacks. Excellent living quarters have been provided for the people working on that northern project.

When in all parts of Canada large expenditures, into the millions, are being made to provide new equipment and plants, either the companies building the plants or some government organization, whether municipal, provincial or federal, should see that comfortable living quarters are made available for those working in the plants.

The present legislation is open to criticism therefore because it does not make adequate plans for the clearing of slums in the cities of this country. Looking through the speeches of hon. members who have taken part in the debate I have found very little comment concerning rural housing. I cannot accuse the government of ignoring the problem completely. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has issued a publication known as "Housing In Canada", which purports to be a factual summary for the third quarter of 1953. I find in it information about housing operations conducted by a number of branches of government.

For instance, I find that under the Veterans Land Act houses have been provided for some people who might be regarded as living in rural areas. Then, under the Canadian Farm Loan Act I find that loans were issued for new structures as follows:

Year	New Structures; Number of Loans
1946	57
1948	62
1949	86
1950	71
1951	64

Then, I have figures to show the building of new structures under the Farm Improvement Loans Act. They are as follows:

Year	New Structures; Number of Loans

Then there is another table setting out the number of farm units in Canada on which the gross mortgage loans on real estate have been approved by lending institutions. This information is given having relation to the type of loan. The table indicates that in 1947 the number of loans on farms stood at 1,704, while in 1948 it was 1,738. The year 1948 was the big year. Since then there has been a drop. In 1949 it was 1,579; 1950, 1,550; 1951, 1,368; and in 1952 it had fallen to 1,170. That is a start, Mr. Speaker, but certainly it is not a very impressive performance.

May I refer again to the Curtis report. It visualized a post-war housing program that would result in 100,000 farm units being built. It referred to the deplorable housing conditions on the farms in all provinces in Canada. In the report of the Curtis committee, I find there is a table giving the percentage of the farm houses of the various provinces without bathing facilities. The figures are as follows: Prince Edward Island, 93 per cent; Nova Scotia, 91·4 per cent; New Brunswick, 93·0 per cent; Quebec, 93·2 per cent; Ontario, 89·3 per cent; Manitoba, 96·8 per cent; Saskatchewan, 96·1 per cent; Alberta, 95·7 per cent; British Columbia, 76.5 per cent. Without flush toilets, 91·9 per cent of the farm homes in Canada were without these facilities in 1941, prior to the writing of the Curtis report.

Some of the suggestions made at that time should have received sympathetic consideration from the minister in charge of this department. The report says:

> The wisest course would seem to be the setting up either of a special rural division of the national housing administration, or at least a farm housing advisory committee which would include representatives from the Department of Agriculture. This procedure would not be incompatible with the existence of a rural housing committee within the Department of Agriculture, which might give special attention to housing and other farm facilities in their broader relations to agricultural efficiency.

I checked with the bureau of statistics to see whether they had information from the 1951 census on rural housing conditions according to federal constituencies, but they informed me that the information is not being compiled in that way; now it is being compiled on the census divisions. Therefore the last statistics that are available with respect to my own constituency are the 1941 census which gives interesting information. The value of the owner-occupied dwellings on the farms—these are the valuations placed by the farmer himself and by the census taker, who was a neighbour—are as follows. These are 1941 figures. The C.C.F. government in Saskatchewan does not take the credit or the blame. These are the figures: $656 for the farm and $813 for the non-farm. I am not suggesting that there are not houses that are worth a good deal more than that, but they appear to be the average values on the sample that was used when the census was being taken. Houses needing external repairs amounted to 42·2 per cent in the country and 34·4 per cent in the villages; houses that had furnace heating numbered 2·4 per cent; houses that had running water, ·1 per cent, just one out of a thousand. Apparently there were not enough flush toilets on the farms in Mackenzie to warrant an entry. There is a blank here. Number of houses with electric lights, 1·7 per cent; refrigeration, ice or mechanical, 3·8 per cent; radios, 52·3 per cent; automobiles, 25·2 per cent; telephones, 13·9 per cent; and one person out of a thousand had vacuum cleaners. It is pretty obvious that with that sort of housing available in the rural parts of Canada there is a field here in which the government of today should have been making ambitious plans, to make sure that the rural standards should be brought up to the standards found in our cities.

Reports from government agencies now indicate that we have a recession. Whether it is a major or a minor recession remains to be seen, but the number of persons unemployed in Canada at the moment apparently is higher than it has been at any time since the war. It should be pretty obvious that an ambitious housing program would be one of the finest projects that the government could undertake. If we could carry out the suggestions made in the Curtis report, that we wipe out the slums and embark on a low-rental subsidized housing program and solve the rural housing problem in Canada, there would be employment for carpenters, plumbers, tinsmiths and plasterers. There would be a market for a very large volume of building materials. That would be one way that Canada might avoid the effects of mass unemployment that we had in the 1930's. Therefore, I submit, the minister should give careful consideration to the suggestions which have come from this side of the house, and before the bill comes back for third reading incorporate these suggestions in it.

I was interested in a paragraph in the memorandum submitted to the government by the Canadian Congress of Labour on December 10. They drew attention to the fact that the speech from the throne promised:

> . . . measures to increase and broaden the supply of mortgage money so that more people with moderate incomes will be able to find facilities to enable them to build their own homes. This is welcome information, but it does not get to the root of the problem. Helping people with "moderate incomes" is no doubt desirable. But helping people with low incomes is even more desirable, and much more urgent.

I regret very much that the minister has not made provision for a housing program that would make houses available for people in the low-income brackets. In conclusion I should like to endorse the proposals presented by my colleague, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy), that the federal government should undertake to make money available for housing at 2 per cent. My neighbour, the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Trainor), was critical of this proposal, but interest rates are determined by government policies. No one can deny the fact that investment in housing for the Canadian people would be a safe investment that should not require any higher interest than 2 per cent. The amortization period should be extended to 30 years.

When my wife and I set up housekeeping some 24 years ago we built a house, and I am quite sure that that house, after it has been used for 24 years, would sell for a good deal more than it cost 24 years ago. It is of frame construction. If it had been built of brick or stone the life would be longer; but, certainly in our part of Canada, a frame house that is kept painted can be expected to last for 40 or 50 years, and still be quite liveable. Therefore, having the house amortized over a period of 30 years is not unreasonable. The loans should be 90 per cent of the lending value. That is also reasonable. There are a great many people in Canada who want to own their own homes, and they could pay for their homes if given a start. The government of this country should take a chance on giving them a loan up to 90 per cent of the maximum lending value of $12,000. The government should also have something to say on the very large quantities of building materials that are now going into theatres, bowling alleys, hotels, and other places of recreation. The building materials that are available should be used to a greater extent in providing houses for people of moderate incomes and those in the lower income brackets as well. I hope the minister will give most careful consideration to these suggestions and incorporate them in his bill.

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak at this time may I say I feel that almost everything has been said from almost every angle connected with this bill, and since I do not believe in repetition I will make my remarks very brief.

I merely rise to deal with a group of people who I feel are perhaps being overlooked and not getting the attention they deserve in connection with this bill. They are the real estate appraisers, the members of the appraisal institute of Canada and also the American institute of real estate appraisers. These people are highly skilled in their field and over the past few years have been conducting appraising and inspection for the lending bodies. During that time they have built up considerable office staff and equipment and under this bill there seems to be no place for them, because as I understand it the appraisers of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will do all the appraising that is necessary. I just want to draw this to the attention of the minister in the hope that in some fashion he will find some place for many of these skilled people who have done a really good job during the past few years.

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, the house may take some comfort from the fact that I am not going to make a speech but merely rise at this time to ask a question. It arises from the minister's statement on December 16 where he said, as reported at page 999 of Hansard:

> However, it is proposed that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation shall continue to make loans to limited dividend companies and companies engaged in primary industries—

This is the part I am concerned with.

> —and, under some circumstances, to persons who are unable to secure loans from approved lenders.

These are the people with whom, it seems to me, most of us as members come in contact, those persons who for some reason or another, perhaps on grounds of a mere technicality, may not qualify and will be unable to get their loans from approved lending institutions.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

The minister may recall that a couple of years ago when building bogged down in northern Ontario under the joint loan plan, I recommended at that time that the government proceed with the direct loan phase of the legislation, and it was some time after that that the regulations were changed, and in areas containing a population greater than 5,000 these direct loans were made. From my personal experience in the north, and I speak only from personal experience, that was the only thing which did assist in getting more houses built. I would like to ask the minister if he would tell the house the amount of loans made in 1953 under this direct loan phase, and I would like to know if it is the government's policy to expand or restrict this phase, because I certainly believe the government through the corporation should stand ready to make such direct loans in substantial volume where necessary and where the approved lending institutions fail to do so.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Lennard), I believe that nearly everything that can be said on this bill has already been said. However, since I come from a population centre of Canada where the housing situation is bad and has been bad for a long time, it might be considered strange if I did not say something in this debate.

I believe I am speaking for all the members of the C.C.F. group when I say that while we feel there are many grave shortcomings in this bill we are going to vote for it because we believe it is an effort to meet the present situation, although we believe it is not being met in the way it should be. I believe the government will have to give more attention to the building of low rental homes, because some people will never be able to get sufficient money in advance for a down payment, and these people, may I add, are paying exorbitant rents now for very inferior accommodation. But there is also the fact that in a city like Vancouver there are many people for whom the ownership of a home would be a liability. These are the people who have no steady employment in one place. They are here for a couple of months and somewhere else for the next couple of months, and then they travel somewhere else after that. Anyone can understand that a home for such people, and there are a great many people in my province in seasonal employment, even if they could afford a down payment and afford to buy a home, would be a liability. They must always be in a position where, as soon as one job finishes, they can pull up stakes and move to the locality where the next job may be.

I am therefore convinced the government will have to give more attention to the building of low rental homes because private enterprise will not provide that kind of accommodation. As a matter of fact, I was rather surprised to hear one of the members on my right criticize the government for going too far in the housing business, and to hear it claimed that the prospects should be made more attractive to private enterprise. I want to tell this house, Mr. Speaker, that private enterprise has never yet anywhere in any country provided housing for those who need housing most.

My first view of the older countries of Europe was in connection with the slums in which the working class of those countries lived, and I compared that with the splendor in which royalty and the owning class lived. That is the picture in every country in the world where governments have not concerned themselves with providing housing accommodation. In this new and rich country the growing slum conditions in every big city is proof positive that private enterprise cannot provide homes for those who need them most.

While we are going to vote for this bill we are quite satisfied it will no more meet the situation that confronts the people of Canada in the matter of housing than the various housing acts that have gone before. That is all I wish to say. I hope the genial Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) will pay attention to what I have said, not because I have said it but because it is a correct picture of things as they are.

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, a moment ago the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Garland) mentioned direct loans. There are a few small villages in my riding. In each of these villages it has been found impossible to get loans for the purpose of building homes. The lending companies will not go in there and lend these people the money with which to build. Personally I feel that something definite should be done —and I know that is the feeling of the people in these villages, in the chambers of commerce and the various councils—and that this bill which the minister is trying to put through will not be complete unless in it some provision is made whereby loans can be made to people in these small villages in order that they may build.

These villages are all growing in size; they are getting larger every day. Better houses would and could be built if direct loans could and would be given by the government. At the present time those who are building in those villages are, in most cases, people who have come from the city. They have retired and have come from the city in order to live in these villages or they are people who have been unable to build just where they wanted to build in the city and, because they wanted to get away from traffic noise, have moved to the small villages. In many cases they come back to Peterborough to work. They are people who have good positions—some of them have extremely good positions—but they cannot get these loans. When the minister speaks, in closing this debate, I wish he would give us some idea as to what is to be done with regard to these people.

(Translation):

Mr. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few remarks on the housing situation, before the end of the debate. During the discussion, some members who support the government have commented upon the housing program put into effect by the province of Quebec, particularly with regard to the various acts having to do with the housing problem.

I am pleased to remind the house that the province of Quebec benefits at present from the most generous legislation there is in respect to small homes. It is so because the province of Quebec has passed, with respect to housing, an act under which anyone who builds a house may be granted a direct loan from the provincial government in the sense that part of the interest the new owner has to pay on the mortgage is paid back to him; because of this provision, that piece of legislation is one of the most generous there is in the field of housing in the whole of Canada. The province of Quebec has lent many millions of dollars, thus contributing to lighten the new home owner's crushing burden of carrying charges.

It is all very well to say that the federal government is passing legislation in order to make it easier for small owners to obtain the credit required to build houses, but one must not forget that the main obstacle put in the path of prospective builders of houses is the excessive burden of carrying charges. The builder of a house finds that the rent is too high, that this monthly payment cannot be met.

The province of Quebec having undertaken to pay back part of the interest to the prospective owner of a small home, the owner is in a position to borrow a larger amount of money without being crushed by excessive carrying charges.

Various government members from the province of Quebec have claimed that the government of that province was putting obstacles in the way of various municipalities by failing to take advantage of loan facilities offered by the federal government in the field of municipal services, through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, thus preventing those municipalities from opening up new residential districts. Well, I must remind the house that the present rate asked by the Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation on loans to municipalities for the purpose of providing municipal services is much too high. The legislation has been a source of disappointment in the province of Quebec because most municipalities can borrow money from ordinary sources at a much lower rate of interest; that is why, in the province of Quebec, municipal authorities have refused to take advantage of this legislation.

Now, much has been made of the fact that the province of Quebec has not seen fit to take advantage of those sections of the National Housing Act that would have enabled her to do away with slums. Well, Mr. Speaker, as far as that matter is concerned, I hope that the two governments will come to an agreement. As member for the city of Three Rivers, where the most crammed housing conditions are probably to be found, where families are more huddled together than anywhere else, I believe that there is a lot of slum clearing to be done. However, I am rather disappointed when I realize that the present legislation does not bring any improvement in that respect and that it still remains practically impossible for most municipalities in Quebec to take advantage of the sections of the housing act relating to slum clearance. As a matter of fact, it is provided in the act that both the federal and the provincial governments may provide money for slum clearing purposes. Unfortunately, the municipalities are not in a position to accept those gifts from the federal and provincial governments, as their financial situation does not enable them to become real estate agents or to undertake projects of that kind.

Which means, in fact, that the real crux of the matter in so far as the housing problem is concerned is not that our municipalities have trouble getting credit, but that they are quite without the means to face their obligations.

Our municipalities are poor and each time one of them attempts to benefit in some way from the terms of the present act, it is almost immediately faced with bankruptcy and put under the obligation to appeal to the provincial municipal board in order that its debts may be guaranteed by the province.

[Mr. Balcer.]

To my mind it would be a relatively easy matter to solve these problems if each level of government—federal, provincial and municipal—had distinct and well determined sources of revenue. Our municipalities are in a deplorable financial situation and until a conference is held once more to draw a dividing line between the various federal, provincial and municipal fields of taxation, I believe that the housing problem will remain acute in this country.

It is to be regretted that in a country as rich as ours, where there is no lack of building materials and where people will go to any length to become home owners, the present government can find nothing better than to introduce, every two or three years, new legislation which, no doubt, contains a few improvements but which is no solution to the problem as a whole.

In my opinion the government could do better. The problem could be solved, if not once and for all, at least in an equitable fashion, if only the question of sources of tax revenue of the various governments were once more examined and settled on a basis of justice and fairness for all.

(Text):

Mr. H. P. Mang (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I am sure most people in Canada will realize that the government that preceded the present one did a great deal towards solving the housing problem in Canada. We see evidence of that on all sides as we pass through cities, towns and villages throughout the country. Our cities are expanding at a terrific rate, and a good deal of the housing expansion has been aided by the national housing program of the previous administration. On that evidence, I think every fair-minded person will admit that to be so.

The present administration, seeing that a wider field must be covered, has made a very serious attempt to expand this service and provide still more housing. I realize, as I think we all do, that the bill has not yet been finally hammered into shape, and that the discussion that has taken place here has been by way of offering suggestions to those members who will sit on the committee which is going to finish the job. We hope that the outcome of their work will be such that the housing situation we have had during previous years will be improved.

Having said that, I want to point out that I believe there are many areas in Canada which are in a position similar to the one in which I live. I come from an entirely rural area extending from Regina to the Manitoba boundary in the region south of Qu'Appelle river valley, and it is one of the predominantly agricultural areas of Saskatchewan. As a matter of fact, it is a pioneering area, and we have developed agriculture along all lines. We have a great cattle population, a mixed farming area, and south and west of Regina some of the finest and largest wheat fields to be found anywhere in North America. The riding is predominantly agricultural, and there is not one city in the whole area. It is served by towns, villages and hamlets, and there is a demand and need for housing in all the towns along the main line and spur lines of the C.N.R. In these towns and villages there are people who work in garages, with the implement companies, who operate service stations, teach in the schools and do all those things which service that agricultural area.

I am afraid that in these cities—I am thinking of cities all the time because my constituency extends almost up to the city of Regina—in these towns and villages, the level of earnings of these people is not such that they will fit into this scheme. While the committee is hammering the bill into its final form, perhaps it might give consideration to the lower income people who are providing these services for agriculture in my riding.

As far as the rural people are concerned, there are families with two or three sons. One son may be married, and he can get hold of some land, but he cannot build a house. After he has secured his equipment he probably does not have the down payment on a house. With the amount of the down payment being what it is now, I do not think that the bill, as it stands at the present time, will go very far in helping these people. I offer the suggestion that it would help a great deal if the down payment could be made of such a size as to cover the fees for processing the papers and take care of the insurance which is also being amortized. Perhaps that is too drastic. It will make the down payment low but it would be a great help. Many of these workers who provide these services have a hard time saving $800 or $1,000. By the time the end of the month comes their cheque is gone to the butcher, the baker, the candlestick maker and so on, and they are waiting for their next cheque.

My suggestion is that some very concentrated high-priced thinking, if I may call it that, be put to work on the question of lowering the down payment. I am not saying anything about lengthening the period of amortization. That is the way business is done, and I do not think a man who wants to have a home of his own is going to be particularly concerned about that. As long as he is investing his money in that home it will still be all right with him even if it takes him 25 years to pay off his debt. The reason why I suggest lowering the down payment is that repayment is guaranteed in any event. It is all sewed up. Under this situation the lender cannot lose. The money is there, and that is why I advocate lowering the down payment. I am just putting forward this view as a suggestion because, as I said when I began my remarks, I realize that the bill is not in its final form.

Mr. Lionel Bertrand (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take only a few minutes to praise the government for having introduced this bill, and I wish to congratulate the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) on the way in which he presented this piece of legislation.

Speaking here on November 30, I urged that small cities and rural municipalities be granted the right to benefit from the new legislation. Up to now, as everyone knows, the Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation, as well as lending companies, were reluctant to grant loans outside large centres; so much red tape was involved that the applicants, getting tired of delays and evasive answers, withdrew their claims.

In my opinion, the housing legislation must be accessible to all, wherever they may live, as long as they comply with the basic conditions and provide the necessary guarantees of repayment.

I believe the act will have good results and will attain its object only if all taxpayers can take full and equal advantage of it.

In the second place, newly-wed couples should get help under this new legislation. If a young family man wants to take advantage of the act and if his situation offers the guarantee required under the act, his application should get special attention. Young married couples are just starting in life and have long years of married life ahead of them. By helping them to become home owners not only do we make them savings-minded and provide them with the opportunity to save, but we also make them cling all the more to this land of ours and help them become better citizens.

To make home ownership available to the greatest possible number of people is a social duty, and the government is to be congratulated on the efforts it has made to that end.

As for myself, I believe this new legislation will promote the development and prosperity of Canada.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): I wish to thank all hon. members, Mr. Speaker, who have taken part in this very interesting debate. That a considerable amount of interest has developed in the subject of housing is well evidenced by the fact that some 53 speakers have participated in this debate. If one can call this a speech in rebuttal, it will make 54 speeches in all. I wish to say a word of thanks especially to those members on this side of the house who have been so generous in their commendation of this legislation, and in their support of what the government believes is a measure which will go a long way towards helping housing in Canada.

The legislation before the house now is intended to increase the number of houses built each year. We hope to provide assistance to enable Canadians in the low and moderate income brackets to acquire suitable accommodation. I may say that it is intended to improve upon legislation which, since the middle of 1945, has encouraged the construction in Canada of over 730,000 housing units, which is a record unsurpassed in any other country. This Bill No. 102 is designated as an act to promote the construction of new houses, the repair and modernization of existing houses and the improvement of housing and living conditions.

Despite what some hon. members opposite have said about this bill, it is an honest effort to improve upon legislation that now exists, and which has already seen a great record of accomplishment. In 1953 alone, there was a record number of about 105,000 starts.

Mr. Fleming: I think the minister will agree that not all were under the act.

Mr. Winters: I readily agree with that, Mr. Speaker, and I have said so. This is an effort by all Canadians who are concerned with the house building business, encouraged, aided and abetted by the government under the terms of the National Housing Act.

I should like to refer to some of the remarks made by some hon. members. Since there were over 50 speakers, I am sure hon. members will understand that I cannot reply to each one of them. I am sure hon. members, too, will agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), who said that many of the points were repetitious but were made for the purpose of emphasis. Many of the points that were brought up were raised on more than one occasion. At the outset I would particularly refer to the speech of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), which I thought was a constructive contribution to the debate. As usual, the hon. member had done his homework thoroughly and had analysed the legislation fairly well. He was not able to see it as the forward-looking legislation which the government considers it to be, but I am sure as time goes by he will realize that it is. He took some two hours, well taken, to state the views of the opposition, but some 20 other hon. members from the Progressive Conservative opposition felt that this legislation was so comprehensive it was incumbent upon them to state the views of their party before the debate wound up.

The hon. member referred to the extension of credit, which is the main purpose of this legislation. It was the fear that mortgage money would not continue to flow at the level required for the high rate of house building now attained in this country, which led to these other steps being taken. I am in complete agreement with his statement that to sustain the financial requirements of a program of 100,000 units in Canada, there must be either an expansion of direct lending or some other means found to attract mortgage funds. This is the very purpose of the bill, as was stated today by the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Enfield), in a splendid contribution to the debate.

I am sure the hon. member agrees with me that it is better to attract mortgage funds from other sources than to expand direct lending by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Regarding the maximum sales price, to which he also referred, I wish to confirm that it is the intention to continue the maximum sales price arrangement. This technique, of course, is not without its troubles. I believe the high level of loans proposed must be accompanied by this limitation. It would be most unfortunate if the increase in the amount of mortgage loans had the effect of an increase in the sales price so that the home owner required as large a down payment and ended up with more mortgage debt.

The hon. member expressed the opinion that part I of the National Housing Act has been as fruitful as any piece of legislation enacted by this parliament or which is likely to be enacted in the ordinary course of events. The principal purpose of this legislation is to ensure that part I remains effective. We are attempting to cope with the danger that, in its present form, it would become less effective under the developing circumstances. I mentioned this when introducing this legislation.

The hon. member dealt at some length with the implication of steps taken by an approved lender to claim under the insurance policy. He stated that if a mortgagee permits arrears of interest to accumulate beyond six months he is running the risk of losing the benefit of the guarantee with respect to any additional arrears. Perhaps I should clarify this condition. The bill provides that the amount paid in the insurance policy shall include interest at the mortgage rate for six months, and at the mortgage rate less 2 per cent for the ensuing 12 months. The bill also provides that when three months' instalments are in arrears the lender shall report to Central Mortgage the steps being taken. This, I think, is a prudent provision because the insurer is entitled to some indication, not only of his probable losses but also that the lender is being prudent in the administration of the account. Providing such notification is given, then the approved lender qualifies for the interest which runs from six to eighteen months.

If such notification is not given, then the interest included in the payments of the lender is limited to six months at the mortgage rate. This requirement of notification at the end of three months does not imply that foreclosure must be instituted at that time. I would think that in most cases the mortgagee would inform Central Mortgage that they were nursing the account along in the hope that the borrower would cure the default. Under the present joint lending arrangements, there is a similar requirement for notification at the end of three months. In this respect the new bill represents a change only to the extent that interest from six to eighteen months is dependent upon Central Mortgage being notified of the steps being taken by the lender. The hon. member pointed out that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation becomes the sole arbiter in respect of standards and quality of construction. To the extent that present inspections of lending institutions are checked by Central Mortgage, this is presently the case.

I appreciate the reservation of the hon. member. However, over the last few years it has been necessary to superimpose compliance inspections by Central Mortgage upon inspections carried on by lending institutions. There is a wide variation in the sufficiency of present inspections, and the new arrangement will have the benefit of uniformity. Furthermore the banks are in no position to do compliance inspections.

The hon. member then went on to deal with the possibility that progress advances will not be handled expeditiously by Central Mortgage. In the case of present lending institutions, they will make their own progress advances, and there will be no change. I do not share the hon. member's view in this respect. In support of this, I point out that houses built under the defence workers' plan in Toronto have been completed more speedily than average joint loans in that area.

The hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy), who was the official spokesman, I presume, of the C.C.F. party, made a speech which followed well the philosophy which is representative of that party. He was concerned with subsidized housing and he said that nowhere in the legislation did he see provision for subsidization. Well, I know that my hon. friend just for the moment overlooked section 35, which has been on the statute books since 1949, and which has been applied in many provinces across this country to enable the people who cannot pay economic rentals to obtain satisfactory accommodation. Perhaps he misunderstood the section in this present bill which continues to provide that three-quarters of such rent reduction fund is borne by the federal government.

Under this legislation there are already 1,562 subsidized rental units in six provinces, the average subsidy unit per month is $17.91, and the share of the federal government on such subsidies is $13.43.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) made reference to housing for elderly persons, a subject which comes up from time to time in this house. I share his favourable view upon the project to which he refers. However, he said all these projects have been made possible by cash subsidies—on the initial cost of construction—from the province, and goes on to say that there is no other subsidy involved in the operation of these units.

I would point out to the hon. member that all of these units were financed under section 9 of the National Housing Act, and I am quite sure that the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) would support me in saying that loans under the National Housing Act and, as well, subsidies from the government of British Columbia have made these units possible. In that respect I thank the hon. member for Vancouver East for the remarks he made on that subject this afternoon.

I just wish to add, in passing, that I thank the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) for the gracious manner in which he withdrew his reference to an employee of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, made at a time when he was obviously misinformed as to the qualifications and the employment of that employee.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) made a quite substantial contribution to this debate, within the confines of the socialist philosophy.

Mr. Knowles: That makes it a really worthwhile contribution.

Mr. Winters: The government, however, believes in making it possible for private enterprise to do as much of the job as possible and then—and only then—for the state to participate. The hon. member suggested that the only possible solution for those in the middle and lower income groups is a low rental housing program, with an element of subsidy in it.

May I remind him, as I did the hon. member for York South, that this legislation exists and that there is subsidized low rental housing in Canada. I am sure that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would be the first to agree that local participation is necessary. The federal government participates, as he well knows, to the extent of 75 per cent of the capital cost, and operating losses, looking to the province and/or the municipality for the remaining 25 per cent.

The hon. member will recall that a project of some 800 units in the city of Winnipeg was placed before the ratepayers last October. I would agree with him that there is need for such a project in Winnipeg; but the ratepayers decided otherwise.

All through this debate there have been inferences that the federal government can do anything in the field of housing. We have listened to some hon. members ask for lower standards of housing. We have listened to other hon. members say that the housing program is entirely too small, and that the federal government should build twice as many houses.

I would remind hon. members again—and I refer to the splendid speech made this afternoon by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Hunter)—that whereas stimulation and assistance for housing can come from the federal government, in the final analysis it is the municipality which decides the amount of housing to be built.

Then, the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) expressed the views of the Social Credit party. The hon. member brought to my attention a clause in the mortgage deed to create remedies upon default at the end of one month. The member goes on to imply that at the end of that time the owner loses all equity in his home. Let me remind him that the equity of redemption is not automatically lost by virtue of a clause in the contract. Action must be taken in the courts. It is the invariable practice of our judges to do everything in their power to protect the owner's equity of redemption.

The hon. member suggested that we make money available to municipalities and they in turn lend it to home owners. This seems to be a variation of the suggestions of socialist members who wish Central Mortgage to provide money directly to all home owners. I would remind the hon. member for Bow River that immediately after world war I exactly what he proposes was done by the federal government in lending $25 million to municipalities in Canada, with a guarantee by provincial governments. The results, which are a matter of record, were far from happy.

The hon. member for Broadview made what I believe was an extraordinary speech. He is not in the house this evening, and I am sorry for that. I hope that later on he will be here when we have an opportunity of expressing our views on this measure. Twice during the course of his remarks he termed this legislation a gigantic bluff. Then he went on to say, among other things, that there is no indication that there is going to be any more mortgage money available than is available at the present time. I think I should perhaps remind the hon. member that the purpose of authorizing the banks to extend insured loans is to make more mortgage money available. The hon. member suggested that we will all agree that the cheapest house that can be bought today, financed under the National Housing Act, is one costing $10,000. He then went on to indicate the income requirements to carry the mortgage on such a house.

I have just checked with Central Mortgage, who tell me that in 1953 approximately 25 per cent of the houses for home ownership were below $10,000 in cost. He took the example of a $10,000 house, and gave the impression that anybody with an income of less than $3,860 a year need not apply for a loan under the National Housing Act.

Mr. Speaker, some houses during the past year were built for $8,600 under the National Housing Act, which when applying the 23 per cent formula can be acquired by an individual with an income of $2,600 a year.

In dealing with ratio of debt service to income he suggested that the individual be allowed to spend more than 23 per cent of his income on the carrying charges on his home. There is nothing to prevent that happening.

The hon. member for Broadview has apparently been somewhat mixed on this subject. The point at issue is an opinion of mortgage lenders, not only Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The mortgage risk becomes undesirable when there is a mandatory debt service in excess of 23 per cent of the income of the borrower. It is merely a modern manifestation of the old rule that a man cannot normally afford a monthly rent of more than one week's pay. I think it would be doubtful kindness on the part of the government to ask anybody to carry more of a debt burden than he could normally afford.

The hon. member suggested further that Central Mortgage alter its building specifications to allow less costly types of construction. I would suggest to the hon. member that he have a good look at the building requirements of the city of Toronto, for example, and then come to his own conclusions as to whether much could be accomplished as a result of this suggestion. He also suggests that the amortization period should be lengthened to 30 years. If he will refer again to the bill, as I am sure he has done—and, Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to see him in his seat now—he will see that for home ownership, loans may be made up to 30 years.

The hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Ellis) spoke of the Lowren Housing Company, to which I had occasion to refer earlier today. I pointed out that this project in Ottawa was made possible by loans under the limited dividend section of the act, which provides accommodation for people at reasonable rentals; and to the extent that housing is required in the city of Ottawa for families of lesser incomes within the facilities of section 35—that is section 35 of the old act—the federal-provincial arrangements are available to the province and the municipality, just as they are to the province of Quebec, to reply to the speech made by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) and earlier today by the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne).

The hon. member for Regina City said: "We are the only ones in the country to suggest subsidized housing." He then went on to say that the government chose to ignore the representations on the need for subsidized housing. I of course cannot agree with his statement because the federal government introduced section 35, which provides for subsidized housing. I am sure the hon. member does not wish to create the impression that provision for subsidized housing does not exist under the National Housing Act. As a matter of fact, it was we who suggested section 35 to the Saskatchewan government back in 1949. The main impression I gained from the speech made by the hon. member for Regina City was that he carried his philosophy to the point where he believes it is the sole responsibility of the federal government, on behalf of the taxpayers of Canada, to provide not only a home, but a brand new home for every Canadian, whether he wants it or not. That is an objective that I am sure would be viewed with great interest by the taxpayers, and especially the many who have already bought and paid for their homes. I venture to suggest that there are a number of hon. members in this chamber who have never built a house for themselves but are still adequately and comfortably housed, and I, Mr. Speaker, am one of them.

The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) opened his remarks by calling the legislation a delusion, a mockery and a snare. He concluded his remarks by saying that he could not see his way clear to vote against the bill. He referred to the requirement by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for houses of 1,150 and 1,200 square feet. No such requirement exists, Mr. Speaker. Houses are financed by Central Mortgage even below 800 square feet, always provided that room sizes meet standards. The hon. member says that he sees nothing in the world wrong, for example, with houses of 750 to 800 square feet. A man with a wife and four children might have a rather different view.

I now refer to the speech of the hon. member for Longueuil (Mr. Vincent), who also raised the question about whether or not the province of Quebec is eligible to participate under section 35. This is the section enabling the federal government and the provincial governments to participate under the 75-25 per cent partnership arrangement. I wish to assure him that Quebec will be welcomed into that arrangement at any time the government of Quebec sees fit to take such action.

The hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) referred to the slum clearance provisions of the bill and asked whether they were available in the larger cities. The hon. member cited circumstances in a city which he left unnamed, but which I presume to be Saint John, and asked whether the arrangements were available there. I refer to that simply to tell him—and I am sure he would be interested to know it—that conversations are under way with that city toward the clearance of substandard housing in the centre of the city. In fact, one of the undertakings now under discussion is the widening of Main street at the westerly approach to the new viaduct. The hon. member for Royal, I know, would join with me in welcoming the clearance of the unsatisfactory housing conditions in that area.

The hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) said that this legislation will result in putting a larger number of people under a larger amount of debt over a longer period of time. Well, Mr. Speaker, that is exactly the end result of this legislation. There is not a single member who spoke in this debate who did not ask for just that. I have always said, and I wish to remind the house, that a low down payment is not an unmixed blessing. It adds to the debt burden, and the longer period of amortization simply increases the period over which the debt must be paid. But it does have the effect of enabling people with lower incomes to get a foothold toward the acquisition of new homes.

The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron) said that the legislation was a cruel hoax. I presume he will vote against it, although his party expressed themselves as being for the legislation.

I would refer to the speech made by the honourable and gracious member for York-Humber (Miss Aitken). It was her maiden speech in the house and I wish to congratulate her on her effort. She said that no government should debar anybody from getting a house, and with that of course I agree. This government does not seek to debar anybody. This is enabling legislation designed to help people to acquire houses. And, Mr. Speaker, I do not recall many, if any, instances, in the hon. member's constituency where credit-worthy borrowers have not received loans.

The hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White) was unique in saying that the legislation was generally satisfactory. Then we come to the speech of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) and sure enough he again said that the government is probably doing the right thing, but doing it in the wrong way. He said it twice, but most pointedly at page 1419 of Hansard, where he remarked:

> Everybody has to approve of that, but of course it is possible to do the right thing in the wrong way . . .

He then expressed his great haunting fear of bureaucracy, his fear that we were by this legislation giving Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation too much power under the terms of the regulations. Well, Mr. Speaker, nobody likes a bureaucracy. But I do not think parliament would take very kindly to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation failing to implement the specific wishes of parliament. It is the government's intention to take for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation only the authorities necessary to give effect to the expressed wishes of parliament. For example, there is no use in specifying a 90 per cent loan with a 10 per cent down payment if the act is administered in such a way that lending institutions can make loans of a lesser amount and a higher down payment. There is no use in aiming at the lowest possible rate of interest if the act is so rigid as to require by legislation the charging of a higher rate than might otherwise be possible by regulation. There is no use in directing Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to see to it that a given standard is maintained for new housing in Canada unless Central Mortgage and Housing is given the powers which enable it to achieve that result. I think Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has been doing a splendid job in interpreting the government's wishes in the field of housing but it is not the government's intention to give Central Mortgage powers beyond those required to do their job.

The hon. member for Greenwood expressed some fear about Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation establishing the lending value. I thought I had dealt with that subject when I presented this legislation. The banks have no facilities for appraisal at the present moment. Moreover, it is considered by the government that Central Mortgage must be the agency to establish the lending value so as to ensure the maximum loan being made available. There has been no opposition from the banks and the life companies in this respect. The hon. member also branded this legislation as "state socialism" and said it left so little to be done by private enterprise.

I would like to generalize for a few moments, Mr. Speaker. Several hon. members have said that by insuring loans we would be protecting the lending institutions and nobody else. But, Mr. Speaker, by insuring loans the government hopes to do two essential things: (1) to ensure a continual flow of mortgage money and (2) to safeguard Canada's banking system by guaranteeing the security, liquidity, and negotiability of insured mortgages. Our banking system in this country is regarded by Canadians and by the world as being sound, and we must take the steps that are necessary to maintain that confidence. This insurance is a guarantee to the banks, and the guarantee to the lending institutions. When hon. members say, as they have said, that this is a guarantee to the banks and to nobody else, I think they are making a mistake. The potential home owner who is seeking a mortgage loan under this act is almost certain to be at the same time a depositor in one of the chartered banks of Canada. It seems to me that when the government is guaranteeing mortgage loans it is guaranteeing that fundamental requirement of confidence in our banks. At the same time there is a guarantee of the deposits of people in all income groups who are able also by virtue of this insurance provision to obtain mortgage loans under this legislation. Our concern as a government is not to insure the banks and protect them against loss as such, but rather to insure the banking system generally and consequently the hundreds of thousands of Canadians who are depositors and entrust the bank with their savings.

The socialists fear this measure as "a sell-out to capitalist exploitation". That was the theme that ran through the speeches of hon. members in that group. The hon. member for Nanaimo, you will recall, Mr. Speaker, went so far as to brand it as a "cruel hoax". The Progressive Conservatives on the other hand, led by the hon. member for Greenwood, said this was state socialism. The member for Broadview said on January 22, as reported at page 1373 of Hansard:

> It seems to me that this is simply another example of this government's drift toward socialism, a government which is so fond of professing its adherence to the principles of free enterprise.

Then later on in the same speech, and as reported at the same page, he got a little bit mixed up and said this:

> It is guaranteeing the loans anyway, so it might as well go whole hog and make the mortgages available to the people who want them for the purpose of building houses.

Which is exactly what would be done under what they call state socialism.

With the C.C.F. on the one hand saying it is a sell-out to capital exploitation, and the Progressive Conservatives asserting it is state socialism, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that once again the Liberals have found the middle-of-the-road course, the moderate course, Mr. Speaker. I know this will appeal to the majority of Canadians as being the right one.

During the course of the debate we heard about the housing accomplishments in the United States which have been substantial; in Holland which are very creditable; and in Brazil which I know less about. These hon. members gave one the impression of extolling "in enthusiastic tone, all centuries but this and every country but his own". But the situation in the United States is worth thinking about. Housing there is very different from housing in Canada. In the border states conditions are somewhat similar to ours and the type of housing required is like ours. But when one gets south of the Mason-Dixon line, there are very few basements, far less heating is required; houses are less expensive; they are easier to erect; and different types of building material can be used. Therefore, when we attempt to compare the United States' effort directly with the Canadian effort, these factors must be considered. It was pointed out during the debate that the United States target for next year under President Eisenhower's proposed legislation is to be one million units. Our production in 1953 was about 105,000 starts. Their population is eleven times ours; their gross national product is over sixteen times ours; so if their effort were related directly to ours in terms of population their production would be 1,144,000 houses, and if measured in terms of gross national product would be 1,664,000 houses. In other words our effort in this country compares very favourably with the United States. It compares very favourably with any country in the world.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like for a moment to take a look at the bill in its entirety and I want to make it clear to the hon. member for Broadview, the hon. member for Calgary North, the hon. member for Nanaimo, and the hon. member for Regina City, and all these people who have said very harsh things about the bill, just what it is they are criticizing. I would remind hon. members that this bill contains the provisions that were in the other bill. The important change is in part I, which is the major change designed to improve the legislation.

Hon. members have said there is no change. Section 7 (1) (k) is a new section to facilitate home extension. Section 14 is a re-enactment of the rental insurance with which hon. members are familiar and which has done so much to provide rental accommodation across this country. Section 16 is the limited dividend section under which Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation can and does make 90 per cent loans for a maximum of 50 years at the government borrowing rate of interest. Section 23 is the slum clearance section. Section 24 is the home improvement and home extension loans section. Section 36 is the re-enactment of old section 35, the federal-provincial partnership section. Section 38 is the defence workers section. Section 40 is the direct loans section. In reply to my friends the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Garland) and the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Fraser), I can now give them the assurance that the direct loans provision will, if parliament wishes, be re-enacted. The direct loans provision has resulted in some 6,750 home ownership loans in over 800 communities in Canada since it was enacted a few years ago.

Then we have part V of the act which was put on the statute books by parliament and which is for the purpose of housing research and community planning. The purpose of that section of the act is to raise the standard of housing in Canada. I point out that part, Mr. Speaker, because during the debate so many hon. members demanded that the government permit Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and house builders generally to build a lower standard of house than parliament has directed it to allow. The hon. member for Broadview terms this a gigantic bluff. The hon. member for Calgary North calls it a delusion, a mockery and a snare. The hon. member for Regina City terms it a bitter disappointment to which he is opposed, containing as it does subsidies sections which he loves so dearly. The hon. member for Nanaimo terms it a cruel hoax. In doing so, they must remember that they were referring to the whole bill and not just any one part of it. When they say they oppose the measure, I would point out that they are opposing those sections of the measure which seem to harmonize so closely with their own often-expressed philosophy. I presume that, when they vote against the measure, they will be prepared to bear the consequences of their vote. When the hon. member for Broadview was speaking and termed as a gigantic bluff legislation which is designed to improve upon legislation which last year achieved in this country a record of about 105,000 starts, one must wonder what language he would have used to refer to the 20,000-house effort in 1933 under a Conservative government.

[Mr. Winters.]

Mr. Speaker, I think it is well to remind ourselves again just what this legislation has done and what might be expected from this improved legislation. Stimulated by the various provisions of the legislation, Canadians, under Liberal governments, have built over 730,000 houses since the middle of 1945 and established a new record of about 105,000 starts in 1953. In its present form the bill is designed to produce still better results. It represents the best efforts of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and other government departments, the lending institutions and the banks, who have worked together well, long and hard in order to produce a mutually satisfactory arrangement that will work. I am sure that these people would not take too kindly to statements that they were participating in a gigantic bluff, a snare, a mockery, a delusion or a cruel hoax.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to interrupt the minister but, before he concludes his address, would he allow me to ask him a question at a convenient point?

Mr. Winters: Go ahead.

Mr. Fleming: This is what I want to ask the minister. He has not yet mentioned the question of interest. I wonder whether he can add anything to what he said, when speaking on second reading a week ago, about the interest rate? Has there been any development in negotiations since then? The second point is this. Will it be understood that the banking and commerce committee will have a free hand to make in the legislation whatever changes commend themselves to the committee?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member well knows, the committee is the master of its own destinies. I would hope that it will give to all members full opportunity to express their views and to make them clear to all witnesses. I can add nothing to what I have already said about the interest rate, which, under the legislation, is to be established by regulation. There is still no legislation, so there cannot be regulations; and I am unable to tell the house what the interest rate will be.

Mr. Fleming: I was referring to the negotiations that are going on. Can the minister tell us anything further about them?

Mr. Sinclair: Sit down. You have had your say.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I did not ask the permission of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) to ask a question. I asked the permission of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters).

Mr. Speaker: Order. I saw that the hon. member was seeking, from the minister who had the floor, permission to ask another question but the minister did not take his seat, thereby indicating to the hon. member that he was not accepting this question. I think the minister has the floor and should carry on.

Mr. Fleming: Without interruption by the Minister of Fisheries.

Mr. Sinclair: Do not lose your temper again.

Mr. Winters: In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that this bill may fall short of our expectations. I do not think so; at the same time it may exceed our expectations. I hope so. We do not guarantee infallibility in its administration. However, I can assure the house that this is an honest effort to make it easier for Canadians of moderate incomes to build homes. It is a sincere attempt to further the government's efforts —and I refer again to the title of the bill— to promote the construction of new houses, the repair and modernization of existing houses, and the improvement of housing and living conditions.

Mr. Speaker, I heard no clear expression of attitude toward this legislation from the members of the Progressive Conservative opposition. The hon. member for Broadview termed the entire legislation—including the slum clearance section, the limited dividend provision, the federal-provincial agreement provisions and all others—a gigantic bluff. The hon. member for Calgary North termed it a snare, a mockery and a delusion. The hon. member for Regina City called it a bitter disappointment. In view of the fact that they have used those terms and because other hon. members have said similar things about this legislation—legislation which I consider to be more comprehensive and all embracing than any similar act enacted by any other sovereign parliament in the world, I think we should know just where hon. members stand. I would therefore ask you, Mr. Speaker, if you would be kind enough, when putting the vote, to call for the yeas and the nays.

NAYS

Messrs:

Cameron (Nanaimo) Thatcher—2.

Bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: I think it is the unanimous opinion of the house, Mr. Speaker, that tomorrow we should discuss external affairs. For that purpose, we have devised a procedure which will be of this nature. After the orders of the day have been called sufficiently that hon. members have put all their questions which precede that order, the motion will be made that the house do now adjourn. By consent that motion will be debatable, and will be withdrawn when the debate is concluded so that there will be no vote on it. It will supersede the five o'clock interruption, in case the debate continues past that hour. If it is not concluded by ten o'clock, the house will adjourn as usual and the debate will automatically end at that time.

If, however, the debate ends before ten o'clock we shall proceed with the consideration of the Criminal Code in the committee of the whole.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, January 29, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. Speaker presented the first report of the special committee on procedure.

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa) moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

THE PRIME MINISTER

STATEMENT AS TO PROPOSED TRIP

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understood yesterday that I might have today the unanimous consent of the house to make a short statement about the trip to Europe and Asia upon which I am about to set out and the reasons which induced me to undertake to make that trip. I propose to leave from Ottawa on Thursday afternoon, February 4, and to be back in Ottawa on March 17. During the several weeks that I shall be away my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) will be Acting Prime Minister.

I do not need to remind anyone that as Canada has developed in the past fifteen years, and as the nations of the world have become more and more dependent upon one another, the extent of the relations of this country, not only with our immediate neighbours and with other members of the commonwealth, but with all countries, has increased at an astonishing rate. You will recall that it was as recently as 1926 that Canada named her first diplomatic representative abroad. In the intervening twenty-seven years we have established diplomatic relations with over forty countries. In addition, through our contribution in two world wars, our membership in the League of Nations, the United Nations, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and our close association with the other members of the commonwealth, we have come to play an even larger role in the councils of the world. Our external policy has acquired a growing importance in the thinking of our people, and the importance of external relations has been reflected in the debates in the house and in practically all aspects of the activities of those who are charged with the responsibilities of government. I think that fact is well illustrated by the fact that later today the unanimous consent of the house is expected to be given to a rather extraordinary debate upon external affairs.

An indication of Canada's increasing place in international affairs is to be seen also in the number of recent official visits paid to us here in Ottawa. Since the war, in addition to the royal visit of our gracious Sovereign and her consort, before her accession to the throne, we have been honoured by visits from such distinguished commonwealth leaders as Sir Winston Churchill, Mr. Nehru, the late Liaquat Ali Kahn, Mr. Attlee, Mr. Menzies and Mr. Holland. Prominent visitors from other lands have included the former president of France, Mr. Vincent Auriol; the chancellor of Germany, Mr. Konrad Adenauer; the former prime minister of Italy, Mr. de Gasperi; Crown Prince Akihito of Japan; the former president of the United States, Mr. Truman; and, at the beginning of this session of our new parliament, President Eisenhower. It is partly with a view to repaying some of these courtesies that I am making this tour.

Another purpose of my journey is to see for myself the conditions existing in other parts of the world and to assure the governments of those countries of the sincerity of our desire to co-operate with them in our own interests as well as in theirs. I am sure you will agree that it is important for us as Canadians to understand these conditions abroad and to have our own conditions understood abroad in order that we may all try to adopt the best course in our relations with each other.

Of course I do not feel that I should be absent from Canada for too long a period, especially while parliament is in session, and it will not be possible for me to make a long stay in any one country; but this is no doubt the most appropriate season to visit the East. By taking advantage of air travel I will try to make the best possible use of what time will be available. From the conversations I will have with the leaders of many countries I shall visit, I hope that I shall be able to bring back with me and also to leave behind not only useful information but perhaps a clearer picture of the problems which all of us have to face together.

Prime Minister's World Tour

I have wanted for some time to visit Australia and New Zealand, both because I should like to see those sister countries of the commonwealth with which our relations have become so close, and also because we have recently been honoured by the visit of their prime ministers. The time available, however, would have been regrettably short and my visit to Australia would have taken place at a time when Her Majesty the Queen will still be in that country. I therefore proposed to the prime ministers of Australia and New Zealand, for that reason—and I can assure the house that it is for that reason alone—that my visit to their countries be postponed, and to this they kindly agreed. But I sincerely hope that such a visit may be arranged in the not too distant future. In fact, you know, it is not very much more difficult to go by air from this continent to Australia and New Zealand than it is to go there by air from Tokyo, from which point it had been originally planned that I would set off to visit Australia and New Zealand.

Europe, which I shall visit during the first part of my tour, is faced at present with a decision of great importance. Our own future may be quite largely influenced by its outcome. The presence of our soldiers and our airmen over there is an indication of our interest in the maintenance of some efficient method of collective protection against aggression, and I think all members will feel that this method is apt to be all the more efficient if we can all participate in it.

But the main purpose of my tour is a visit to Asia. That vast continent, which contains in fact well over half the world's population, was once a vague and rather romantic concept far over the horizon for most of us in this part of the world. Today we are vitally concerned with what happens in Asia. This concern arises both from our membership in the United Nations and from our membership in the commonwealth which now includes three important Asian countries, India, Pakistan and Ceylon.

We have joined with other members of the United Nations in helping to repel aggression in Korea. Only a few months ago our troops were engaged in actual and violent fighting, which I trust will not be renewed. I look forward to visiting these troops during my brief stay in Korea and to bringing them greetings from all Canadians.

Our interest in Asia has also been increased as a result of the desire of our people to assist our Asian friends to improve their social and economic conditions. For several years we have been contributing quite substantially to United Nations efforts in this field, and for the past three years we have also been spending more than $25 million a year for this purpose through the Colombo plan. These facts give some indication of how important Asia has become in our lives. Decisions taken there, and the welfare and happiness of these peoples, have become of real concern to us.

Canada, I think, has welcomed the opportunity to share in the encouragement of freedom and economic improvement in Asia because we realize the importance of maintaining good relations between the western world and the hundreds of millions of our fellow men in these ancient nations of Asia. I feel that we can maintain good relations with them only as long as we treat them on terms of complete equality, with respect for their older and perhaps somewhat less materialistic culture and achievements, and in a spirit of genuine understanding and co-operation. We must deal with them in the realization that while we may seem to have much to give they too have a very important contribution to make to the general welfare of the world.

Wherever my travels take me I know that my fellow Canadians will want me to bear their greetings and to assure our friends that we do want to play our part in the cause of peace, freedom and social justice, in our own interest as well as in theirs. I shall be travelling in an R.C.A.F. plane directed by Group Captain J. G. Stevenson and Wing Commander H. A. Morrison. In addition to the ordinary crew made up of personnel of the R.C.A.F., they will be accompanied by Sub-inspector P. J. Vaucher of the R.C.M.P. as security officer. My own party will be made up of Mr. W. Ross Martin of the privy council office and Mr. Charles A. Ritchie and Mr. D. M. Cornett of the Department of External Affairs.

It was decided just a day or two ago that Dr. Davey of the Department of National Health and Welfare would accompany us for a twofold purpose, any medical assistance that any of us might require and also to see for himself as the chief medical adviser of the department to Canadians travelling to the East just what the conditions about which he is advising really are. For our clerical work we will have Miss Perron of my office and Miss Monet of the Department of External Affairs. My confidential messenger, Alderic Groslouis, is also coming along to assist.

A seat on the plane is being made available to a representative of the Canadian Press, and Mr. William Stewart has been selected as that representative. A seat is also being made available to one of my sons and one of my daughters who want to make sure that I will take good care of myself while I am away. Of course it goes without saying that the expenses occasioned by the presence with the party of the representative of the Canadian Press and my son and daughter will be taken care of by each of them for himself or herself.

To meet requests of the press, and there have been a lot of them, my office put out a pretty full and detailed statement, I thought, of all the stops and visits that I would be making from the time I left Ottawa until the time I returned. I do not think it would be fair to the house to impose on it the reading of that list. It has been pretty fully summarized in the press. I am sure most hon. members have seen it, and although they may not have thought that it was necessary for them to pay much attention to it they will have noticed that arrangements have been made for me to meet a great many interesting persons. I hope that when I return I can expect unanimous consent to make a report of my trip to the house.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister can be well assured that when he visits the many countries included in his itinerary he will be carrying greetings from all members of the house and from all the people of Canada to the lands which he visits. As he has said, understanding, a feeling of co-operation and a deep and close interest in the countries of Asia are today an essential part of the building of the kind of free world in which we all believe. Naturally the first concern of all of us will be the development of any closer and more effective association which may be established with the nations of the commonwealth that are found in Asia at this time. It seems to me that this has a significance far beyond the deep and important association that exists generally throughout the commonwealth.

This is the first time in all history that nations free to make their own choice have joined in a world-wide fellowship such as the commonwealth of nations is today. Anything that the Prime Minister of Canada or any Canadian can do to encourage, strengthen and foster the unity of purpose of India, Pakistan, Ceylon and the other nations and areas throughout the commonwealth will in itself be contributing to the advancement of the greatest international experiment that has ever been carried out successfully in the history of the world. Therefore, carrying a message of greeting and good will from this parliament and from Canada to all the nations he visits, undoubtedly this will have a special significance to those countries with a common concept of justice and with a similar parliamentary system. With what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has said about the importance of Canada in world affairs today, I am sure there will be general agreement. There will be complete agreement also with the desirability of extending our contacts.

I would have hoped, and may I even still express the hope, that in addition to a representative of the Department of National Health and Welfare there would be a representative of the Department of Trade and Commerce, at a time when trade is so vital to the prosperity and security of this country. I do not know what the actual details are, but I should think at this time nothing could be more important than to carry, hand in hand with the message of good will, and the greetings that are extended, a clear indication, which could be expressed by a skilled representative of that department, of the importance of trade. Such a representative, through the many contacts, could also have sought those wider associations which mean so much in the sterling area and the countries associated with it. But that is something that must essentially be decided by the arrangements that can be made.

I would be less than frank if I did not express my regret that the press is not going to be more widely represented. I recognize that the whole press gallery cannot travel on this trip, but I would have hoped that through some system of choice, by lot or some other system perhaps best known to the press gallery, the decision might be made to choose those who could have given a wider representation. I say this because it does seem to me that one of the very important aspects of this trip is not only the message we convey to other countries through the visit of the Prime Minister and those associated with him, but also the information we receive about the views expressed in those different countries and the impressions that would help us in our own deliberations. The feeling of intimacy is made more real than when impressions are conveyed by more than one mind and one typewriter, no matter how highly qualified or highly regarded the individual may be.

These are thoughts that I place before the Prime Minister in the event that there may be a reconsideration of that decision. I feel that the wider the interpretation which can be placed before the people of Canada of the impressions that are gained, and the nature of the fellowship which is found to exist, the greater will be the contribution to the wider understanding we are all seeking to establish. I leave these thoughts with the Prime Minister. I feel sure that I am expressing not only my own sentiments but those of all members when I wish him success in the undertaking, Godspeed, happy landings and safe return.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): With the last words of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), Mr. Speaker, I am sure all members will concur. I like to think of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) going on this tour, not as a salesman for Canada's produce but rather as an ambassador of good will. I think that if trade were the aim of the tour, then the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) would be the person to make the trip. We all join in expressing to the Prime Minister our best wishes for a safe journey, for the establishment of more intimate and friendly relations with the other members of the commonwealth, and indeed with all the various countries he will visit. I am sure when he returns he will be able to tell this house and the country that he has met with a cordial and friendly reception everywhere.

I believe the people of Canada will be well served by the Prime Minister as their ambassador, not representing any party and not even in the capacity, shall I say, of our Prime Minister, but rather in the capacity of a Canadian ambassador of good will making a tour of the world.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I believe I should first express thanks to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), Mr. Speaker, for taking the house so much into his confidence in letting us know as much about his prospective journey as he has. I think it is very important, and it is commendable of him to do so at this time.

May I say in the second place that he does indeed carry with him the good will of the whole house; I am satisfied of that. I am speaking more particularly for my own group, as others have spoken for theirs. I assure him he does carry with him our good will, and we want him to convey that for us to the countries he will visit. I want to assure the Prime Minister also that our hopes for the complete success of his journey go with him, and for the fulfilment of the purpose for which this journey is being undertaken. Our prayers go with him for his safe passage there, and his return.

I want him to know that we will look forward with pleasure to his return when he again takes his seat in this house.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): I should like to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) a question. After visiting these many countries and seeing their distress, and being somewhat weary coming home, would it not be a fine finish to this trip if he could have had the physical and mentally refreshing uplift of dropping down to visit that happy green island?

NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION ACT

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO ENLARGE SCOPE

Mr. A. M. Campbell (The Battlefords) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 175, to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act (protection of rivers).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Campbell: The only change concerned is the insertion in section 18 of the words "or other industrial plant", as underlined on the opposite page of the bill. It merely enlarges the scope of the original act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SURVEY OF WORLD AFFAIRS—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved:

That this house do now adjourn.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this motion is for the purpose of making it possible to have in the house a discussion on external affairs. This is the first opportunity the house has had for such a discussion at this session, and I am sure I will be expressing the views of hon. members if I begin by saying that on this occasion we will miss especially the presence of the late member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), whose constructive criticism and knowledge of international affairs has always added so much to our discussions of this subject in the past. We shall miss his contribution to the debate, as we still miss his friendly and happy personality in this house. Mr. Graydon had opponents in the house, but no enemies; and we shall long lament his loss.

Also I have a sad duty—and I hope it will not be inappropriate for me to refer to it at this time—to mention that our country has recently suffered another grievous loss, and I another close friend, in the passing of the undersecretary of state for external affairs, Mr. Hume Wrong. Of proud lineage and brilliant mind, with wise and honest judgment, Mr. Wrong had, beneath a shy, almost austere exterior, a warm and generous spirit. I think I have been possibly in as good a position as anyone in the house to appreciate the quality and worth of his service to Canada over the years.

Then, Mr. Speaker, I would also like to mention with great regret that the foreign and indeed the public service of Canada suffered a third loss recently in the death of Mr. George Patterson, a member of our delegation to the recent United Nations assembly, and our consul general in Boston. Mr. Patterson was a quiet, sincere and dedicated man, whose whole life was devoted to the service of his fellow men, for many years in the Far East as an officer of the Y.M.C.A., and later in China as our representative there. Like that of Mr. Wrong and Mr. Graydon, Mr. Patterson's life was shortened by his refusal to recognize any limitations on the energy and hours he gave to his work.

We in Canada often, and quite rightly, refer with pride to the great natural resources of our country. But greater even is Canada in its human resources, when it has men like these three to serve it.

A pleasant task, Mr. Speaker, is now to extend, if I may, my good wishes to the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), as he takes over responsibility as critic for the official opposition in matters of external affairs. In a sense I suppose that makes him my opposite number. I know that he will not spare the government or me when he thinks we have done the wrong thing, or left undone the right thing. But I know also that he will find his work the more satisfying, as I do, because on the fundamental objectives of our foreign policy, as opposed to details and methods, there is a great and fortunate degree of unity on all sides of the house.

I propose today—and I am afraid even though I shall take probably longer than I should, I shall leave many subjects untouched—to make a general and, I fear, a somewhat discursive survey of international affairs. Some subjects I shall not attempt even to touch, because they will be dealt with, at least some of them, at a later time by my friend and colleague whom I am so happy to have as my parliamentary assistant, the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Pinard).

For instance, he will refer to the recent assembly of the United Nations at which, for most of the time, if I may say so, the Canadian delegation was led with such distinction and efficiency by the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote).

The reduction of tension in Europe—and I am going to talk about European affairs first—which began a year ago, and which was mentioned in this house about that time, has been maintained. Nevertheless, the menace of Soviet imperialism remains and foreign and defence policies of our country and other countries of the free world must continue to be based on this fact. And I suppose we should also not forget that if there has been improvement—and I think there has been—it is largely due to the increased strength and unity of the free world, especially within the Atlantic alliance.

In Europe two developments have occurred since I spoke last in the house on international affairs, which I think deserve special attention. In the first place there has been a change, whatever it may portend, in the attitude and in the tactics, if not in the foreign policy, of the Soviet union since the death of Joseph Stalin. There has been some indication in the past year of a trend away from the sterile rigidity of Stalinist policies both in domestic and in foreign affairs.

Among the more interesting Soviet internal developments have been the new emphasis on collective leadership in Moscow as opposed to personal dictatorship, and the modification of Stalin's denationalizing policy as applied to the non-Russian peoples of the Soviet union. And there has been a greater stressing, I think, in their governments of practical considerations, of technical efficiency, rather than of Marxist orthodoxy. However, the outstanding domestic development in the Soviet union during this period has been in economic policy, where a program of increased production of consumer goods has been given such wide publicity that the failure of the regime to carry out its promises in this respect would, I think, cause very great disappointment among the people, and possibly even some unrest.

Agriculture in Russia has received particular attention, with an apparent reliance on greater money rewards for the peasant as the best way now to get results. The communists have not of course retreated from the principle of collectivization, but the peasant's own plot now seems to have become again a respectable part of the system; whereas previously, in recent years, it was merely a reprehensible survival of capitalism.

As for Soviet external policy, it still presents a mixed pattern of some things that are hopeful and more that remain stubbornly discouraging. There have been some minor concessions and some reassuring words. However, I suggest that nothing in all this gives us cause to believe that basic Soviet objectives in foreign policy have changed, or that Soviet leaders are in fact ready to accept reasonable solutions to major international problems. That is one reason why we are watching so closely the Berlin conference today.

The second European development which stands out in the last year is of course the remarkable, and to some people disturbing, recovery of West Germany. While this process has been under way for some time, both in the economic and the political field, the decisive electoral victory of Chancellor Adenauer last September drew special attention to the progress and the stability of the West German republic. The people of the Soviet zone of Germany, where an election such as that would never have been permitted by the occupation authorities, nevertheless managed to show their own will for freedom during June of 1953 in courageous demonstrations against the communist regime, and by so doing they exposed once and for all the hollowness of the claim that the Soviet puppet regime could speak for them at home or before the world. And that fact, Mr. Speaker, is worth keeping in mind, particularly at this moment. The Soviet delegation at the Berlin conference may once again pretend that Germany can be united in an all-German government, formed not by free elections but by merging the present east and west German governments. Well, we all know what happened to democracy in Poland and Czechoslovakia when Russian communist agents were allowed to share governmental responsibility with genuine democrats. It would be deplorable if that tragic error were repeated in Germany.

There is of course a reverse side to this medal. The very qualities of energy and discipline which have served the west Germans so well and resulted in their new strength are beginning to arouse concern among some old friends of ours who are also old neighbours of theirs, and it is easy for anyone whose knowledge of European history goes back beyond the last two or three years to understand this concern. Europe is no longer simply an east and a west, with a void left in the centre by the total collapse of Germany in 1945. Once again there is a centre. We have therefore not only the continuing danger of Soviet imperialism; there is also fear of what many Europeans and others who remember 1914 and 1939 regard as the reviving danger of German ambition and German armed strength. I think we can understand this fear without agreeing with the conclusions which are sometimes drawn from it. But let us assume that there is a basis for it, a reality to the fear. What then is the best method of removing it, to restrain a rearmed and perhaps a reunited Germany from aggression again?

[Mr. Pearson.]

Well, one method of controlling the menace of German aggressive expansion is the old unhappy one, by which the west joined with the east against an independent armed Germany in central Europe. Neither in 1914 nor in 1939 was such an alliance effective in preventing war, though that alliance later contributed enormously to Germany's defeat and punishment. The second method, which is new, and not yet tried, is to bring Germany into an alliance of west and central Europe against aggression, an alliance in which European unity can develop for other than defence purposes. And we have that, Mr. Speaker, in the European defence community.

The Canadian government has already expressed its support for EDC as a method for associating Germany with the European system and with the Atlantic community. Surely the harnessing of German rearmament to a defensive collective purpose would provide the best security for all, east as well as west, from the possible danger that Germany, isolated and with renewed strength in central Europe, might once again play off east against west and eventually be tempted once more to follow the old policy of defeat and attack, subdue and occupy.

I do not think myself that a solution of this European problem, which is also an Atlantic problem and therefore a Canadian problem, can be found in Germany's disarmament and neutralization, or indeed in Germany's rearmament and neutralization. That solution might of course and indeed does appeal to the communists for obvious reasons. It would mean the exclusion of Germany from the developing European system, and it would release her from any responsibility for sharing in collective defence against aggression. In any event, as I see it, such a solution, even if it were desirable—and it certainly has its appeal—is simply not practicable. Surely it is unrealistic to base any permanent policy on the disarmament, the control and the neutralization of 65 million Germans inside their present boundaries. Surely it is better to bind Germany, not only to the rest of Europe, but to the Atlantic community. I know it will be argued that the Russians and their satellites will simply never agree to this, and therefore will never agree to any unification of Germany on these terms. Nevertheless, this is the policy that has been accepted as best and wisest in the present circumstances by the German republic, the United States, the United Kingdom and France, by ourselves and by many other countries. It would, I think, be a great misfortune if it were abandoned now.

The establishment of the European defence community is the best and quickest way of implementing this policy. It is the only proposal now under consideration, and it came originally, we should not forget, from France itself.

But it is not, of course, the only way it could be done. West Germany could, for instance, be permitted to rearm as a member of NATO. She could also rearm outside NATO but in treaty relationship with NATO countries. But not many of those who oppose EDC would support either of these courses as a preferable solution to the problem. The EDC could be altered into an arrangement of co-operating national armies instead of a consolidated supranational European army. This weaker form of EDC could then be brought into association with a stronger, and more unified, NATO, which would have greater collective control over the national defence budgets and policies of its members. But there are also objections to this idea and it is unlikely that it would secure greater support than the present EDC proposal. However it is to be done, close and organic association with a free, strong and cohesive international community, European and Atlantic in character, with membership in the United Nations, provides I think the best guarantee that the military strength of a revived Germany will be used only for defensive purposes.

There is one thing we can be sure of. The communists will use these German and European questions as they use every other opportunity to divide and weaken the free world coalition. If the situation seems to be a little less critical now the temptation is therefore the greater to relax and indulge in the costly luxury of quarrelling among ourselves. If we yield to that temptation too often we will soon dissipate the unity and strength that have been so patiently and effectively built up, especially since the establishment of NATO.

Personally I am more than ever convinced that the continuing cohesion of all the Atlantic powers, not merely the European powers, is vitally important to the preserving and reinforcing of the peace of the world and that no security and no stability can be achieved through isolated arrangements, either in North America or in Europe. Continentalism, whether of the European or American variety, is not enough for safety.

Because of this I feel that the essential steps which are required to bring about European unity can be taken only when there are also close and continuous lifelines across the channel and indeed across the Atlantic. One of the most heartening developments of the post-war period has been the building-up of those lines which are now I think, or at least I hope, strong enough to stand the strain, psychological and otherwise, on certain European countries of including Germany in our arrangements.

Obviously that inclusion must be brought about in such a way that the fears that come from the past will be replaced by new hope for a future where Germany will be only one country in a group that will embrace more than Germany and even more than Europe.

This question naturally leads to the consideration of the meeting between the foreign ministers of the four great powers going on at Berlin at the present time, a meeting which seems to have got down to business with a minimum of argument over the agenda. We can at least take some encouragement from that. It is to be hoped that this meeting will concentrate on the Austrian and German problems and that something constructive will come from it. It seems hard to understand that in 1954 Austria, one of Hitler's first victims, should still be occupied while other countries which were his accomplices have long since had their pre-war status restored by treaties.

As for Germany, we shall soon see whether or not the Soviet union is really prepared to allow its unification on acceptable terms, namely, under a government freely elected by the whole of the German people and with freedom to make its own political arrangements, within of course the framework of the United Nations charter. I think we can express a hope for some good results from this meeting, but we should not expect too much from it.

From even this cursory survey of European affairs it is clear that there are still numerous obstacles to be overcome before the security and prosperity of the free nations of the Atlantic community can be ensured. However, I think there has been a significant advance from the fear and instability of the immediate post-war period, and for that I suggest we ought to be grateful to NATO.

NATO's work, which I think has been pretty effective in this regard, is far from finished. Indeed it is just getting under way. It has taken time for the decisions taken and the plans approved to bear fruit, and their full impact has only recently begun to be felt. For the majority of NATO countries the proportion of the total output of their economy devoted to defence is only now reaching its peak. According to General Gruenther, the present supreme commander in Europe of NATO forces, the forces under his command have approximately doubled since 1951, and the gain in their effectiveness, in their modernization and in their fighting efficiency is greater still. These NATO forces are now strong enough to make an aggressor think twice before taking them on.

But the Soviet and satellite forces are also being steadily increased in numbers and in effectiveness. That is why it is still important for the west not only to add a German contribution to the existing NATO strength but also to improve further NATO forces in equipment and in quality so that if the worst emergency should happen, these forces could act as a shield behind which the full strength of the member countries could rapidly be mobilized.

To complete this very short review of the work of NATO I should refer, if only for a moment, to the ministerial meeting of the council which was held in Paris in December last. I attended that meeting with my colleague, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), and with our permanent representative to the council, Mr. Wilgress. I think the most significant discussions which took place in Paris at that time were those relating to the international situation as it affected the various NATO countries and with the question of future NATO defence planning.

At these discussions the members of the council spoke their minds very frankly and freely. I think by doing so we brought about a better understanding between the various countries, even though, at times, there was a difference between us on some things.

It was agreed at this council meeting that the NATO countries would continue to seek three basic objectives. First, not to let down our guard. Second, to promote at the same time our economic and social development and to strengthen our political unity. Third, to seek to negotiate with the Soviet union on outstanding differences whenever and wherever possible.

The broad lines of future NATO defence planning to meet the threat of aggression over an extended period were agreed to in Paris in December. Member countries should be prepared to maintain a high level of military preparedness. We felt, however, that it would be unrealistic to expect to build up and maintain further substantial increases in our collective forces for the long haul. Therefore, the plan is to see that the NATO forces which now exist and which will be strengthened are furnished with the most modern equipment possible, including new types of weapons; that they are given adequate support and are ready to go into action rapidly. Effective local defence of this kind, plus the certainty of swift and crushing retaliation, including atomic retaliation from the air, is the defence combination upon which we now rely to deter the aggressor.

The council had before it at this meeting a report of the annual review committee for 1953. On the basis of the recommendations of this report we agreed in Paris on our NATO force goals for the next three years. The figures for 1954 were firm commitments while those of 1955 and 1956 are provisional and for planning purposes only. Following the practice established at previous ministerial meetings, the council has released no precise figures, but I can say that the aggregate forces planned for the end of this year are to be a little larger in numbers—that is, collectively—and substantially better in quality than those now in existence.

There were other activities of the ministerial council and the permanent council in Paris, apart from those concerning defence, which I will not be able to go into at this time. They included how to bring about closer parliamentary association with NATO's work; how to correlate production programs in Europe; co-ordination of civil defence plans; the preparation of emergency plans; the study of information and cultural relations questions. These matters received little or no publicity but they are an increasingly important part of the process of keeping the North Atlantic alliance together, and they are in tune with the needs of our time.

I should now like to move across the world to the Far East and to say a few words about developments in Korea. Since I last spoke in the house on this subject an armistice agreement has been signed there which ended on acceptable terms more than three years of fighting by the United Nations in resisting the unprovoked aggression launched against the republic of Korea. With that aggression repelled, the military purpose of this great collective resort to armed force has been accomplished but, of course, only at a cost to our own forces, and great cost to those of the United States and those of Korea which bore the brunt of the struggle. We remember that cost as we talk about Korea today.

This armistice marked the end of the first step toward a peaceful settlement in Korea. The next step has been to try to convert that armistice into a peace settlement through the convening of a conference. The United Nations assembly, last summer and last autumn, long and carefully considered how that conference could be brought about. As a result, as most hon. members know, when the general assembly last summer closed at the end of August it had, by formal resolution, made provision for the United Nations side of the Korean political conference. These decisions did not meet in full our own wishes but they were those of the United Nations and we accepted them and respected them as such. Moreover, we thought that those decisions, even though they were not perfect from our point of view, were good enough to provide a basis for a Korean political conference if the other side wanted such a conference.

Then, as hon. members will recall, last autumn discussions began at Panmunjom with the communist side in an effort to work out the details for this conference. Those discussions are theoretically still going on, although they have been suspended for the time being. As these discussions were taking place in December last they removed some of the pressure at the assembly, which was meeting then, from continuing its deliberations into January. As hon. members will recall, at that time a resolution was passed making provision for recall of the assembly if a majority of the members so desired if the president of the assembly, Madame Pandit,—who has been acting in that position with such skill and distinction—should decide that the time had come or should be asked by any member to recall the assembly. Such a request has now been made by the government of India. Our reply to that request has just been sent today to the Secretary General of the United Nations for transmission to the president. This reply was made after a great deal of consideration and exchange of views between ourselves and the Indian government, the British government, the United States government and other governments. Possibly I might put this reply on the record, Mr. Speaker. It is as follows:

> Please inform the secretary general as soon as possible that the Canadian government has given very sympathetic consideration to the request of the president of the general assembly that the present session be reconvened on February 9. The Canadian government appreciates the desire of the government of India to report to the United Nations general assembly on the discharge of its responsibilities as chairman and executive agent of the neutral nations repatriation commission in respect of the prisoners of war placed in its custody under the provisions of subparagraph 51 (b) of the Korean armistice agreement, but considers that in present circumstances it would be inadvisable to reconvene the general assembly for discussion of the general Korean question of which the assembly is seized. In the view of the Canadian government a session on this subject—
> That is on the general Korea question.
> —might more usefully be reconvened at a later date in March or April.

We took that position, Mr. Speaker, because of developments in Panmunjom where steps are now being taken to bring about a resumption of the talks, and we hope that these steps will be successful within the next few days; because of developments in Berlin where Far Eastern questions have been put on the agenda; and because we came to the conclusion, after the inquiries we made, that it would not be possible, if the session opened on February 9, to restrict its deliberations merely to the action of India and the neutral nations repatriation commission.

It should have been possible before now at Panmunjom to work out a satisfactory plan for the Korean political conference. Differences of viewpoint occurred at once, of course, as one would expect, between the negotiators from the two sides on this question. But on their face, none of those differences were impossible or even difficult of reconciliation. Indeed I think a solution might have been found if the communist representatives had not turned from negotiation to abuse, thus indicating that if their principals wanted a conference at all, they did not want one at that time. Hence the negotiations were suspended. As I have said, steps are being taken—which we hope will be successful—to bring about their resumption. The present situation in Korea is simply that there is no fighting, but there is no peace. Our servicemen in that area, while they remain at the alert, have for more than five months, however, been spared the tragic consequences of actual conflict. That is a blessing which we would all do well to remember.

One other issue out there has now been disposed of in the prisoners-of-war question. I do not need to go into details of that matter inasmuch as they will be familiar to most hon. members. We have taken the position as a government that the action of the United States commander in releasing and returning to civilian status the prisoners of war under his jurisdiction when they were returned to him by the neutral nations repatriation commission was not only legally correct but morally sound and quite consistent with the terms of the armistice agreement itself. It seems to us that no other course was open to the United Nations commander at that time. Our own position in regard to this matter has been, I think, quite clear and consistent from the beginning. We have not believed nor do we now believe that any prisoner should be compelled by force to return to what was once his homeland. The provisions of the commission's terms of reference were drafted to prohibit enforced repatriation, and those of us who took part in the long, complicated and difficult negotiations to that end will recall this very clearly. But that prohibition would have little meaning if the only alternative facing a prisoner was indefinite captivity. Therefore the terms of reference in the armistice agreement made clear provision for the final release of prisoners to civilian status 120 days after their being placed in the custody of the commission. In the words of General Hull—

> The plain intent of paragraph 11 of the terms of reference is to prevent either party to the agreement from frustrating the basic purpose of avoiding indefinite captivity for the prisoners.

We subscribe to that position.

Of course if there had been a different attitude taken by the communist representatives on the neutral nations repatriation commission and by the communist side in Korea it would have been, I think, quite possible, almost easy, to have arranged for the examination of these prisoners in the time allotted for it, ninety days. It was understood by those who took part in these negotiations that the ninety days meant ninety consecutive days. However, after the first examinations took place, and when it was clear to the world that the great majority of the prisoners would rather go back to captivity than to go home under communist rule, this was such a terrific blow to the prestige of communism in the Far East that the communists themselves from that time forward did everything they could to prevent further examinations. That seems to me to be a simple and pretty obvious explanation of why the examination of prisoners broke down before the end of the ninety-day period.

But even if we solve these Korean questions they are only one aspect of the more fundamental question of relations with the Far East and with Asia generally. We should ask ourselves, as I am sure we do, and it is very much in our minds now with the forthcoming visit of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to that part of the world, what should be the basis of our policy as a government, as a country, towards what I think we can call now the new Asia. I suggest we would be wise to observe the following principles in our relations with these Asian states. We must not compromise with communist military aggression in Asia or in any other place. But while, I think, it is easy to be clear on that point, that does not mean that we should assume that every anti-colonial, nationalist or revolutionary movement in Asia is Russian communist in origin or direction any more than we should assume that, with patience and sympathy, every Asian communist leader can be turned into a Tito.

Secondly, I suggest that we must convince or try to convince the Asian peoples that democracy, our kind of democracy, free democracy, can do more for the individual than communist tyranny can ever hope to do. We can do this in many ways, by constructive policies in our own countries, by plans for mutual aid, and also by avoiding giving the impression that the western allies are, in the east, associated only with regimes and societies that do not meet the desire for change of the awakening masses of that part of the world. Our policy in Asia then, if this principle is correct, must be more than a policy merely of opposition to communism. It must be constructive, and anti-communism should not be the only claim to our assistance.

We should recognize, and I think we do recognize in this country, that social, national and economic forces are at work in Asia that would have erupted in disturbing ways if there had never been a communist revolution in Moscow. We cannot reverse these forces and we ignore them at our peril. Where communism has been able to take over these new forces, as in China, we should neither, I think, blind ourselves to the dangers of the situation by wishful thinking that this is merely an agrarian revolution, nor increase these dangers by rash and provocative policies. Furthermore, as I see it, by associating counter-revolution, which can develop indigenously as the whole history of China shows, with foreign intervention and foreign assistance we may strengthen rather than weaken communist regimes.

The fate of our world, Mr. Speaker, may be decided quite as much by the direction taken by the march of Asian millions as by the failure or success of the Kremlin's plans for communist imperial domination. Canada has a special obligation and a special opportunity in these matters as a member of the commonwealth of nations, for the commonwealth is now of Asia and Africa as well as of the western world. We can, I think, be happy that our relations with the other members of the commonwealth remain close and friendly though problems, especially economic and financial problems, exist to test our co-operation. I think these relations will be even closer and even more friendly as the result of the voyage of friendship, good will and exploration which our Prime Minister is beginning at the end of next week.

We can be happy, then, that our relations with the commonwealth members remain so close and so friendly. But there is another country with which our relations must also remain close and friendly, and that is our neighbour, the United States. We have a special responsibility here too, not only because these relations are so fundamental to our joint security and prosperity but also because the United States is the leader of our free world coalition and is bearing the greatest share of the burden to maintain peace. These relations with the United States are becoming more and more important to both countries, and more varied and more complicated. That was inevitable, as the state of the world has changed, as our own progress towards economic and political strength has accelerated, and as we become more important in the scheme of things. Naturally, therefore these relations with the United States have become more important and more complicated for us. We should not be surprised or discouraged by that. We will work out these problems, these increasing problems —these problems of security against attack, security against subversion, of trade and communications, of border crossings—we will work them out with less difficulty if we keep constantly in mind how great our dependence is on each other for safety and prosperity, if we in Canada do not forget on our side the heavy burden of leadership and responsibility which the United States is carrying, and if our neighbours remember that partnership and co-operation are a two-way process and, above all—and this is a simple rule—if neither partner asks the other to do what it would not like to be asked to do itself.

One important specific problem at the moment in our relations with the United States which has been causing us a good deal of concern is that of the St. Lawrence seaway. As hon. members know, we have now reached a point where the only thing that stands in the way of the beginning of Canadian construction of that seaway is an appeal before the courts of the United States. We have just learned today that the court of appeals of the District of Columbia circuit court has delivered judgment on the appeal brought against the order of the federal power commission granting a licence to the power authority of the state of New York. The court has denied the appeal, and confirmed the order of the federal power commission. This removes the second last legal obstacle to the development of power in the international section which is an essential preliminary to the development of the seaway itself. That is the way in which we have, over the years, been able to settle our difficulties with our neighbour, and I am satisfied we will be able to settle them in the same friendly spirit in the days to come. We must certainly do our best to face and solve these complicated Canadian-United States questions, these neighbourly difficulties, with that minimum of bickering and maximum of good will which has been characteristic in this century of relations between the two countries.

If Canada and the United States cannot grow closer together in friendship, in mutual respect and in the understanding on which friendship must rest, there is not much chance for peace and stability in the rest of the world. But, Mr. Speaker, we can solve our problems with our neighbour in a reasonable manner, and there is somewhat more hope for peace and stability in the world than existed a year ago. We can take some comfort from this, as we face the numerous problems before us, and so long as we do not forget that the world still remains an unsafe place for the weak, the weary and the unwary.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I wish first to thank my hon. friend for the very kind personal reference made to me. I assure him that, at all times, I shall endeavour to follow out his admonition based on experience, that in matters of external affairs members of all parties are in agreement on the fundamentals. I want to say to the hon. member that is in keeping with the friendly attitude that was shown to me when I was one of the parliamentary observers at the United Nations conference in 1952, by him and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin).

With him I am in full agreement that in the discussion of external affairs Mr. Graydon made a contribution that was effective, worthy and wise. He expressed himself in language that the average Canadian understood, and during his lifetime did his full part to bring about a better understanding among nations.

International affairs are in large measure the creation of events elsewhere in the world. When Mr. Graydon spoke for this party he never carried the hatchet of narrow partisanship but reserved to himself his constitutional right and duty of putting forward fair criticism. I intend to follow him in that course. A non-partisan policy on international affairs cannot be conducted on a one-way street. It demands the fullest information that the government has available, within the limits of security. We, in the opposition, have the right to be heard. When any major decisions are to be made, unless of immediate moment, I believe it would be well at all times that we in the opposition have the opportunity of expressing our views before a final decision is made. Otherwise our opinions are mere afterthought.

As I listened to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) today referring to the trip he is about to embark upon, I could not but think that knowledge of the problems everywhere in the world is valuable, if not a prerequisite to an informed discussion of world affairs. On his trip around the world, the Prime Minister will have the good wishes of the Canadian people as he speaks for Canada. While abroad representing this nation, he will indeed be Mr. Canada, and we ask him to convey to the peoples he will see in all parts of the world a parliamentary message of good will.

I believe travel would also be conducive to a better informed discussion in parliament of international affairs, if made available in larger measure to the members of this house. In Britain and in the United States, both parliament and congress recognize that. From time to time representatives of the United States foreign relations and foreign affairs committees have the opportunity of visiting various parts of the world where matters of importance are arising. Recently 25 representatives from the House of Lords and the House of Commons in Britain visited France and the other NATO countries. Before the Marshall plan was introduced in the United States, some 200 members of congress visited Europe.

I am not advocating joy junkets at the expense of the country. I am informed that most of these members pay their own expenses, in whole or in part, but they have available to them opportunities of travel through using air force facilities while aircraft are engaged on official or routine training trips. I would suggest that for the betterment of Canada, in order that our constituents may know more of the serious international problems with which we are faced, in the words of the minister, if the opportunity were given to the external affairs committee to visit various NATO countries each of these members would with full knowledge be able to impress their constituents with the sombre picture of world events as was placed before the house today by the minister. For after all, we must realize that if the most the minister can say is that tensions have lessened and that the fears and the possibility of immediate war have lifted, but that a sombre future remains, parliament and the Canadian people must realize that heavy expenditures for defence will continue for a long time ahead.

The minister has stressed the need of unity among the NATO nations. I think he conveyed the idea that unity even more than men was needed—unity in action and unity in objective. We need unity in objectives internationally among the Canadian people, for it is they who carry the load of taxation upon their shoulders which our defences demand.

I shall endeavour to discharge my responsibilities as an opposition member in the discussion of foreign affairs in the manner set forth in the addendum to a report made in the United States committee on foreign relations in 1949.

It is the more important that our country's policy be right rather than bipartisan.

I prefer the word "non-partisan" instead.

Unity solely for the sake of unity may be disastrous. History is strewn with the wreckage of countries that were united but on the wrong course. Whenever the loyal opposition is silenced either by force or by its own failure to speak up, freedom is in danger.

The minister mentioned Hume Wrong in a well-deserved eulogy. I regard Mr. Hume Wrong as one whose contribution has meant much in raising the standard of Canada among the councils of the world. He served his country in war as in peace. Many of those who serve us in the field of diplomacy do so in an atmosphere of obscurity, if not anonymity. That was not Mr. Wrong's position; nevertheless often our people as a whole do not realize the importance of their service.

I was in Mexico recently. While there I had the privilege of an interview with the Hon. Luis Padilla Nervo, foreign minister of Mexico, a country that is on most friendly terms with Canada in large measure because of contributions made by men like Hume Wrong in his sphere. I might add that the contribution being made today by Mr. Jules Leger, Canada's ambassador to Mexico, is in keeping with the highest traditions of public service in foreign affairs.

Having said that, I am going to deal with a few of the changes to which the hon. member has made reference, and which indicate a recession in the aggression hitherto exhibited by the Soviet republic. We must look at the U.S.S.R. objectively. We may see red, but we must see objectively, fairly and clearly. We must not cynically turn down the proffered hand of peace, if it be that, although the minister gave no indication that he felt any assurance, in the current problems facing nations of the world, of any changed attitude on the part of the U.S.S.R. Neither dare we put away our defences.

Soviet objectives have not changed, if the events since 1945 are any indication. Tensions have lessened. The minister has stated that NATO is now so powerful that no nation dare attack it with impunity. In other words there is peace through strength which ultimately we hope, in the words of Madame Pandit, will achieve strength through peace.

The U.S.S.R. have resumed diplomatic talks. A conference of foreign ministers is taking place in Berlin, the first in five or six years; whereas there were some six conferences in a period of four years immediately after the war. The anti-communist prisoners in Korea have been released, and there is no probability of a resumption of war there. I have no hesitation in saying that I believe the attitude taken in connection with the release of the prisoners of war a few days ago was the proper one, for humanity dictated that they be given an opportunity to declare themselves for freedom. In Europe thousands of German prisoners of war have been released. Visits to Moscow by businessmen and others are no longer being discouraged. We might call it a peace offensive. The U.S.S.R. is talking about the desirability of extending and expanding trade channels. Russia has agreed to discuss the question of atomic energy and atomic control.

But certainly nothing the minister said has indicated an assured change of heart by the Kremlin or, to use the words of one columnist, that the Russian bear had indeed become a panda. The Kremlin pattern of 30 years remains. Is it the proffered hand of peace, or is it a design on the part of the U.S.S.R. to divide the United Nations within the North Atlantic community, to defeat EDC, to separate France and possibly Italy from EDC? For certainly, without France as a member of EDC, our present concept of European policy would require tremendous changes in viewpoint.

When some speak of a changed attitude by the Kremlin in the last six or seven months we think of Beria who, following the course of many others in the Kremlin after holding absolute power, met a firing squad. The press recently contained a reference that epitomized, more completely than words could, something of the tremendous challenge to constitutional government inherent in the practice of the principles of Leninism. Here is the record. Since 1917 3 out of every 5 marshals in the army of the U.S.S.R. have been shot; 9 of the 11 cabinet ministers in the 1936 cabinet have been shot; 5 of the 7 presidents of the central executive committee have met the same fate; 43 of the 53 secretaries of the communist party in the last 25 years have been shot; 15 of the 27 who wrote the constitution of freedom for the U.S.S.R. in 1936 have faced the firing squad.

That is a picture that does not indicate any vestige of freedom. Of the 80 members of the Soviet war council in the years since 1922, 70 have been shot. There was but one member of Lenin's first politburo—Stalin—who did not meet the same fate. That tremendously challenging array of statistics is most revealing.

The minister states that we must maintain our defences. That is true. He mentioned the situation in Berlin today where the foreign ministers are meeting. He spoke of it as a very hopeful sign that they had been able to agree so quickly on the agenda. The reason they agreed on the agenda with such alacrity, in the face of the truculence exhibited by Mr. Molotov, was that the agenda agreed upon was his; and that appears in large measure to be the basis of any agreement so far attained at the conference. But the world will continue to hope.

While the soviets talk of agreements for world peace they stir up trouble in China, in Morocco, in Iran and in other parts of the world. They endeavour to secure the desertion of nations from EDC. The minister was unable to tell us much of that conference, and I can understand something of the difficulty in that regard. But certainly the attitude displayed by Mr. Molotov in his opening address, in answer to the outstandingly favourable words of Mr. Eden, the brilliantly conciliatory spirit of Mr. Bidault and the searching analysis of Mr. Dulles, was simply a refusal to meet any of their arguments for peace. His only sentimental word was to compliment East Germany on the fact that it is to be the scene of some of the meetings that are to take place in the days ahead.

I am not going to trouble the house with reading excerpts from the speeches made by Mr. Eden, Mr. Bidault and Mr. Dulles at that conference, but every one of them breathes a spirit of peace, a desire to work together, a willingness to co-operate in the world of today. Molotov spurned their offers of peaceful co-operation. He did not face the situation in Europe as it is, realizing, as the minister said, that Germany, a nation of 65 million people, cannot be kept in subjugation or neutralized forever; nor that a peace treaty with Austria should be effectually brought into being at the earliest possible date, for there is no serious disagreement there. A few years ago the terms of such a treaty were agreed on in Paris, but after Mr. Vishinsky had agreed on the general terms, Molotov overruled him and Russia turned its back on the settlement.

At the foreign ministers conference the main subject for discussion, according to Soviet wishes, are not the need of disarmament, nor Germany, nor Austrian peace treaties. Molotov's whole proposition is built on the principle that the main subject to be discussed is China and its admission to the meeting of foreign ministers in Berlin with respect to which China has no interest or responsibility. In other words his desire or aim is not to deal with the problems of Europe but to endeavour to arouse the peoples of Asia to the belief that we of the free nations have no interest in their problems, that our concern is elsewhere.

I should like to refer to a statement by Mr. Bidault in his opening speech at the meeting. With high purpose and with the realization of the animosities that have prevailed between France and Germany for generations, with the knowledge of the suffering and tragedy that has come to France through German aggression in two world wars, he took a stand for world peace—one of the noblest in European history. He stood for giving Germany an opportunity within EDC to make its contribution, become a nation and return to the ranks of nations who respect international law and responsibility. Mr. Bidault asked for a free election to take place. He said:

> The peace treaty with Germany must be of such a nature as not only to provide a suitable conclusion to the war but to avoid sowing the seeds of a new conflict.

A little later on he said:

> The French government believes that the evolution of West Germany during the last few years leads to the conclusion that the fate of democracy in Germany is linked with the association of Germany with the west.

His stand is in keeping with the finest traditions of world statesmanship and, if adopted, assures a new Europe and a strong bulwark against the advance of communism.

I shall refer now to two matters in the order in which the minister referred to them. First I should like to say something in regard to the United Nations. The minister indicated his belief that world peace was dependent on the United Nations. There have been shortcomings in the United Nations, owing in part to the charter and to the parts played by some of the member nations and I mean those of the communist bloc, who have used the United Nations not as an instrument of peace but rather as an instrument for propaganda. Weighed fairly, most people will admit that the United Nations has done an outstanding job in preserving world peace, culminating in the step that was taken to meet aggression in Korea. It has stopped several potential wars. It has removed festers of suspicion in various parts of the world. It has not done everything that was hoped for, but its record has its successes.

When I hear protests of peaceful aims by Molotov being made at the Berlin meeting my mind goes back to April, 1945, at San Francisco, when I was an adviser to the Conservative representative, Mr. Graydon, one of the members of the Canadian delegation to the San Francisco conference. I was moved by Molotov's words as he pictured that new world where aggression would be no more, as those who forget the record must be moved as they listen to Vishinsky declaiming in the United Nations.

In 1955 the United Nations charter can be revised. That is an important milestone in the history of the United Nations. The charter was written in the pre-atomic age, the days before Hiroshima and Nagasaki.

What can parliament do to assist in making recommendations and suggestions for changes and amendments? Organizations with that end in view have been set up in Holland and in the United States of America. They are called commissions on charter amendments. I suggest that it would be worth the consideration of the external affairs committee to study the charter intensively so that recommendations and suggestions for amendment might be made to the government. No one can hope for the removal of the veto provisions which have emasculated the security council, but certainly provision should be made for giving the assembly a larger responsibility, if not complete responsibility, for the maintenance of peace and security. Consideration should be given to a new voting system in the assembly based on a system of weighted voting by which countries would be represented according to population and resources.

Then there are the provisions as to the admission of nations. Several are denied admission to the United Nations because of the opposition of the U.S.S.R. and its satellites. Austria, Italy, Portugal and Japan, and Germany potentially, are excluded from becoming members of the United Nations by the Soviet insistence on a package deal for the admission of their satellites.

I want to say a word in regard to NATO. I am sure that later on we will have an opportunity of hearing from the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), for certainly the views expressed by the minister did not give a clear picture of NATO or of its difficulties. I ask the minister, what are the prospects of EDC being accepted by the legislative bodies of its several member nations in Europe? So far it has been approved by West Germany and Holland, and partially by Belgium. To what degree has any arrangement been made recently whereby in the event of any future war Canada's contribution in the main will be to keep the sea lanes open? That was recently stated to be the fact in an article in the New York Times of January 27. It stated that a pronounced change had been made for Canada in the contribution she is to make to NATO. Certainly we have fallen far short of the targets set in Lisbon. I am not referring especially to Canada when I say that, for all the nations appear to be in that position.

What has the minister to say in regard to the pronouncement made recently by Mr. Dulles, one of the most striking pronouncements ever made, of retaliatory policy whereby the United States informed the U.S.S.R. that she will maintain the right to retaliate instantly at places chosen by her rather than allow the initiative to remain with the U.S.S.R. and communist countries, as has been the case? Have there been any discussions between Canada and the United States that this new policy means retaliation by atomic bombs? Was Mr. Dulles' statement to the effect that if France did not ratify EDC the United States might withdraw her troops from Europe made after consultation? And to what degree does it represent the viewpoint of the other nations within NATO? These are questions that I think deserve to be answered, for they have within them implications unusual and drastic.

To what extent was Canada consulted when that announcement of policy took place? Was there any connection between the announcement of that policy and Sir Winston Churchill's statement that if the Americans left Europe the British would, as well? These are questions which unanswered tend to disunity among the free nations. As the minister so well said, we must preserve our unity of purpose with the commonwealth and with the United States which, to use his words, is the leader of the free world.

Now a few words regarding the question of trade with the U.S.S.R. The minister has made a plea for unity. Yesterday in this house the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) was asked whether or not there was any danger of the United States selling its surpluses by fire sale. The minister is reported on page 1540 of Hansard as having said:

> I know of no plan for a fire sale in the United States. That country has a certain program that has dangers to Canada inherent in it if recklessly used, a program of giving assistance to foreign countries in the form of foodstuffs. We have reason to believe that it will be used with due regard to friendly countries who also have marketing problems. But, as I say, the situation is being watched carefully.

While the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the house was freeing the minds of the Canadian people from the fear of a fire sale of some of the $5 billion of farm products which the United States has on hand, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) was at London, and according to the Canadian Press was reported to have said this:

> . . . "fire-sale" methods of marketing "massive United States surpluses" of farm products are not in the interests of the underfed people of the world . . .
> "Movement of massive United States surpluses . . . through give-away programs or through sales at cut prices . . . are almost bound to affect ordinary exports directly or indirectly".

The question of disposal of surplus farm products by fire sale or give-away deserves the serious attention of this government. It affects the welfare of millions of Canadians. If this policy, which the Secretary of State for External Affairs pointed out would be dangerous to us, is in fact carried out, it has inherent in it disastrous effects on Canada. Having regard to the spirit displayed by the minister when he described the relationship which should prevail between the United States and Canada, namely that we should not do unto them that which we would not want done unto ourselves, I believe the government has a responsibility to bring to the attention of the government of the United States the serious consequences to our economy which may or, I think, will result should such a dumping policy be brought into effect.

After all, Canada and the United States are together. We must stand together. Things that cause cleavages must be removed. Certainly the situation internationally will not be improved if, in order to assist nations in other parts of the world, the United States of America engages in a fire sale of farm products and thereby jeopardizes our prices, to the detriment of agriculture in general. Having regard to the attitude taken recently with regard to the export of oats to the United States, I think this problem will be solved. But I ask that it receive consideration forthwith, for disunity in economic affairs inevitably leads to disunity in the larger fields of international relations.

Mr. Speaker, the minister made reference to China, and we come back to the oft-used argument that the people's government is merely communist in name but actually nationalistic in its inception and its principles. However that may be, one of the salient things being considered today by the foreign ministers in Berlin is the stand to be taken toward China. Is she to be recognized? Certainly recognition will be hard to justify, however much it may appeal legalistically to students of international law, so long as the people's government continues its program of virtual annexation of North Korea, supplying arms in Indo-China and apparently doing everything it can to spread communism and disruption in other parts of Asia. While it is impossible to say with finality that China should never be recognized, a good case has not been made for recognition. I believe that if Britain and France had had before them in 1949 the situation that we have today, and the knowledge of events that have since taken place, recognition of China would, to say the least, have been delayed.

Personally I believe that we should not recognize China at this time. To say that we will never recognize her is to look too far into the future. I think that type of pre-vision is called "stochachistics", or guessing to be left to experts. In 1945 or 1946 we might have said that we would never admit Japan to friendship, and that Germany would never again be welcomed back into the family of nations. Events change thinking, but with the world situation what it is I believe that Canada would take a retrograde step should the government feel constrained to recognize China at this time. Indeed, I am going to quote the words of Mr. Dulles in his speech in Berlin three days ago when he said:

> It is one thing to recognize evil as a fact. It is another thing to take evil to one's breast and call it good.

That would be in my opinion the interpretation placed on such action by the vast majority of the people of Canada should recognition be given at this time.

I think the house is entitled to have full information with regard to Soviet trade offers, and the strategy that is being followed by the U.S.S.R. in endeavouring to open and extend trade channels among the free nations of the world. After all, history is a good teacher if we listen to her lessons. Lenin and the other leaders have been quoted, since 1922, as predicting that depressions will destroy the capitalistic system. Yet at a time when agricultural surpluses are being built up all over the world, and in the light of the fact that in the past those surpluses have almost inevitably led to recessions in the economic world, it is strange that the U.S.S.R. is offering to buy with gold, and to trade.

In many products today the seller's market has become the buyer's market. The U.S.S.R. has always predicted that surplus production would ultimately destroy the capitalist countries; yet faced with its existence they are offering markets for surplus products and extending trade with nations willing to trade.

In the past they have never traded in benevolence. Is today's attitude—its new look, if you will—a masquerade? They are releasing their gold from its hidden coffers, and their gold supplies are second only to those amassed by the United States in Fort Knox. Many treasuries among the nations of Europe and elsewhere in the world want gold. Is it benevolence on the part of the U.S.S.R. that, when in our own country some people are predicting a depression because of these surpluses, they choose this as the vital moment to bail us out? If that be so, the new world has indeed been born.

It should be recalled that Malenkov is having difficulty within his own country because of food shortages. Last April he stated that his government would give more food and more freedom. Collective farming has failed. Food production is down. Is this offer to buy, to expand and extend trade, benevolence, or has it the nefarious purpose of separating us from the friendly countries of Europe by offering them that which they need more than anything else, a market for their products?

Certainly one cannot say that all trade should be excluded. Trade is permitted in non-strategic materials. I think the minister might explain what are non-strategic materials. The United States recently had an opportunity to sell 20,000 tons of butter to the U.S.S.R. The United States has a quarter of a billion pounds of butter on hand. The U.S.S.R. needs 150 million pounds. The explanation for not going through with the deal was that the price was not sufficient. What is Canada's attitude to this? Again I see a divergence, and again I ask for that unity among the ministers of the cabinet which we ask among the nations. On the one hand we have a press dispatch of the 4th of January to the effect that the Minister of Trade and Commerce had said that Canada is willing to increase trade with the U.S.S.R. in a limited list of commodities. On the other hand, we have the attitude displayed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs which is certainly not to the effect that there should be an expansion of trade.

The ambassador from the U.S.S.R. said some three weeks ago: "Don't worry about details at the moment; the main thing is to start trading". Certainly all of us hope for the day when trade will be universal, but do we not have to consider whether or not almost everything which we would supply would be strategic materials in the world of today when nations as a whole, not armies, are on the offensive in the war of ideas? The U.S.S.R. is taking textiles from France, selling iron and manganese to Britain, buying ships from West Germany, and has started to trade with Greece, Denmark and Norway. Australia is importing Russian canned salmon and crabmeat.

There should be an enunciation by the government of Canada's policy regarding trade with the U.S.S.R., which is not so important materially if we are to judge by the trade of the past but certainly important in that consideration must be given at all times to the fact that if we supply them what they require as directed by the state we shall indeed be playing into their hands.

I ask the minister to say whether in his opinion the expansion of trade would consolidate the Malenkov regime. Which course are we to follow? Is he in a position to say whether, in the opinion of the officials of his department and of himself, this newly acquired desire of the U.S.S.R. is a bona fide desire to expand world trade or is designed to divide the free world, eventually to dominate it and finally to destroy it?

Can the minister give any assurance that if Canada or other NATO countries enter into expanded trade with Russia we will have assurance from the U.S.S.R. that those countries in Europe contiguous to it and friendly to us will not be subjected in the days ahead to the well known practice of the U.S.S.R. in the late twenties and early thirties of dumping excess goods on European markets, thereby destroying our markets and also our trade in various countries?

In Britain the federation of British industries has gone into this matter in considerable detail, and apparently the investigations have been made with the blessing of the United Kingdom government. I am not going to read the entire release issued by the United Kingdom information office on the 14th of January last, but I will read a few excerpts which I think particularly embody the general conclusions arrived at. The report contains the following:

> . . . there is, in our opinion, no ground for thinking that east-west trade, including trade with China, can in the foreseeable future account for more than a comparatively modest proportion of the United Kingdom's total volume of trade. . . It is our view that, largely owing to the Korean war and the intensification of the strategic controls, enterprise has been discouraged and a feeling engendered that there is something wrong and unpatriotic about east-west trade, even in those items excluded by the embargoes. This is emphatically a feeling to be dispelled.

I am giving both sides at the moment. After viewing contentions on both sides of the argument, the conclusions are summarized in these words:

> (i) that trade with countries of the eastern bloc is likely permanently to offer fewer opportunities than before the war, and that trade with China has only modest scope for expansion on account of her limited capacity as an exporter and earner of sterling coupled with the reduced market for Chinese exports;
> (ii) that such opportunities of east-west trade as exist in non-strategic goods should, nevertheless, be pursued without any inhibitions arising from political considerations;
> (iii) that members of the federation in their dealings with Russia, countries of the eastern bloc, and China, should avoid channels which are likely to turn matters of commerce pure and simple to account for the purposes of communist political propaganda.

I feel the Canadian people have a right to know the attitude to be taken by the Canadian government on this important matter. Certainly the trade existent now is of no consequence. According to a recent Canadian Press dispatch, in the first ten months of 1953 we exported $406 worth of goods to the U.S.S.R. and we imported $416,000 worth, mostly furs. What is the U.S.S.R. prepared to ship us? What has she available? Is it a fact that about the only products of which she has a surplus are oil, coal and timber, in respect of which we in Canada are looking for markets?

However that may be, Canadian people in industry, agriculture and labour are looking for a statement by the government on its stand in this matter. Certainly if trade is to be expanded the definition of non-strategic materials will have to be drawn with greater care.

In conclusion, I would say that we in the opposition intend in the days ahead to follow the course which has been ours throughout the years. We intend to endeavour to secure, in our external relations, a unity of purpose, a degree of uniform policy, so that in our relationships with the countries of the world we shall be able to discharge our responsibilities in the days ahead with firm and abiding purpose and with good will to all nations who will reciprocate.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should first like to associate myself, Mr. Speaker, both with the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and with the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), in expressing the regret we all feel that Gordon Graydon was removed from us and can no longer participate in the work of this very important department. I should like to associate myself also with what the minister said about the late Hume Wrong. Like many of those in the house I have known him for a number of years and appreciate the remarkable work he did for Canada in those days when, with the minister and a group of young men brought into the department very largely by the late Mr. O. D. Skelton, the policy was pursued of building up Canada's Department of External Affairs and giving us recognition throughout the world as a self-governing nation.

I should like also to say something about Mr. Patterson, such a delightful personality. Some hon. members sitting here this afternoon had the opportunity of being associated with him at the United Nations this autumn. It came as a great shock to us to learn that, going for a week end holiday to his residence in Boston, shortly after his arrival there he died. He was a fine, Christian gentleman, with whom many of us were happy to be associated at the United Nations.

This afternoon the minister said there was unanimity in this house on the fundamental principles underlying the policies of his department. That is true. Those fundamental principles, I take it, are the principles of security and peace. But having agreed on the principles, there is plenty of room for disagreement on those aspects that many of us think should be the policies by which both security and peace may be attained.

This afternoon I shall say some things in connection with our external affairs that are said in common with progressive and anti-communist movements and parties all across the world, not only in our own commonwealth but in the Far East and in the countries of western Europe. Let no one say that because some of the communist parties have picked up some of these policies from the progressive democratic socialist parties of the world, anything I may say in this house is communist propaganda.

The debate on external affairs can, as usual, I think serve a very useful purpose at this time because it gives the minister an opportunity of discussing our relations with other countries. It gives an opportunity to members of the house to express some views concerning recent developments in the world situation, developments I may say both diplomatically and militarily. Of course these are inseparable, for if diplomatic relations improve it should be possible to reduce our vast expenditures on various phases of rearmament.

On May 5 last, as the minister said, the last extended debate on external affairs took place in this house. I remarked then that there seemed to have been a sharp change, both in Russian propaganda and in Russian tactics, in the short nine or ten weeks that had followed since the death of Joseph Stalin. I think it is generally agreed throughout the world that, in the last 11 months or so since that event, startling changes have occurred in the Soviet union. Whatever we may think are the reasons for these changes, and perhaps for events like the liquidation of Beria and his immediate associates, there has been an easing of tension in the world since the death of Stalin.

I think that as a rule mankind has breathed a sigh of relief, and countless millions pray that, however slow the process, we may be able to move toward an era in which, little by little and bit by bit, the outstanding problems between the powerful nations will be settled not by force of arms, not by making threats against one another, but by intelligent negotiation.

Within Russia, as the minister said this afternoon, there have been changes—great changes—in the economic outlook of the new government. And I say to my hon. friend from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and other members of the house that I believe one of the means of achieving peaceful understanding, of achieving peace by negotiation, is to do whatever we can to encourage trade between the nations.

Now, do not misunderstand me. I do not believe we should supply a potential aggressor with strategic materials, but I do believe that the visits of British businessmen, a large number of whom we are told are over there at the moment, or of businessmen from any of the western countries of the world, can do no less than bring about some better understanding on both sides of the iron curtain.

To contemplate war, with the frightful weapons now at hand, is I believe to contemplate universal catastrophe. Because of the dire threat which has overhung the world in recent years, nations equally fearful of such a struggle may find ways and means of resolving outstanding problems and difficulties by intelligent approach and by negotiation. And I say that the gestures made by the Russians at this time, paralleled by gestures made by the President of the United States, and certainly paralleled by several statements made recently by Sir Winston Churchill, Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, all taken together have given great hope to the world that we may be entering upon an era, perhaps very much prolonged but nevertheless productive of peaceful negotiations and ultimate understanding among the nations of the world.

I think it is wrong for any of us, at a time when there are possibilities of such understanding and negotiation, to use language or threats which may make negotiation and understanding still more difficult. In saying this I am not minimizing the dangers that exist. But those dangers of course are apparent to most of our people; and I believe they are quite apparent to most of the statesmen who have the responsibility for maintaining the security of their own countries and for promoting the peace of the world.

In the last ten months, as I have said, important changes have occurred in the attitude of Soviet leaders. Again, whether this is a new tactic or not—and these approaches may well be a new tactic—we should be prepared to welcome any such change in attitude; and at the same time we should retain the strong position we have attained. In retaining that strong position we should not, however, lose any opportunity to reach agreement on such issues, however minor they may be, as become possible of settlement through negotiation.

Let us remember that until very recently Russian leaders have said nothing that could be construed as being friendly to any of the democratic powers. Sometimes their references have been designedly insulting, making co-operation virtually impossible. And those of us who have been at the United Nations from time to time know how true that statement is. But I should say at once that leading statesmen in the democratic nations, and particularly in the United States, have at almost every opportunity denounced Russian leaders and the Soviet union in almost equally unmeasured terms.

It is I think regrettable that whenever proposals have been made by either side for co-operation, newspapers in Russia and in the United States, as well as in our own and other countries, have jumped to the conclusion immediately, depending upon which side made the proposal, of course, that such proposal should be denounced, thus making negotiation almost impossible. In Russia, the organ of the Soviet union, Pravda, has been guilty time and time again. And while that organ of the Soviet union has been more restrained recently, many leading newspapers in the United States have continued to pursue a policy which could have no other effect than to prejudice the possibility of peaceful negotiation. I think that was particularly true as we approached the meeting of the foreign ministers at Berlin. Believing as we do in a free press, we also believe that it should be a responsible press, rather than one unnecessarily provocative in its criticism, particularly concerning pending negotiations among the great powers.

Those of us who were at the United Nations last autumn shared, I think, the view that was very generally held there, that world tension had decreased somewhat. The minister himself said that this was so this afternoon. There were still evidences of truculence on the part of some of the great powers, notably on the part of the United States and the Soviet union. But there was less bitterness in debate, and a desire on the part of most of the nations represented there to arrive at solutions of some of the outstanding problems.

I should like to say that in my opinion the United Nations has been and is the greatest barrier we now have against the outbreak of war. Many minor disputes have been settled through United Nations agencies, and the forum provided for the great powers has undoubtedly prevented the outbreak of war on a world-wide scale. Certainly it has prevented the outbreak of war among some of the minor nations. In other words, in the sharp issues which have arisen in the Far East and in Europe as well as elsewhere, the United Nations has provided a forum for discussion, and to that extent has stood as a barrier against the outbreak of war.

I want to say how disturbed I have been during the past few days to see that one of our departments of education, that in the province of British Columbia, has withdrawn from circulation among the schools the United Nations association monthly bulletin. The bulletin, which has been circulated in all the provinces, including British Columbia, is now being withdrawn, according to a statement emanating from Victoria. I wonder what is happening in that province when I read in the press that the mayor of Victoria and some of his associates are actually suggesting the burning of books they dislike. I wonder how far in the direction of totalitarianism we are moving in this country when we see that kind of thing in a province like British Columbia.

I would like to see the bulletin of the United Nations association more widely read. It cannot be called a communist organization, you know, because it is headed by General Burns, whom we all know favourably in this city. We believe that while, in view of the world situation in recent years, it has been necessary to enter into arrangements for mutual defence, such as those envisaged in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, it is equally important to use every means within our power to promote the economic and social well-being of people everywhere; and again, may I say, through the United Nations agencies, and through our own Colombo plan to supplement those agencies.

In that field we believe too little has been done. When the North Atlantic Treaty Organization was established we in this party urged our government to suggest an article committing the signatories to mutual economic aid for their general welfare. Thus article 2 of the treaty became one of the most important considerations which led us to support NATO. And at every opportunity we have criticized the organization because it has failed to implement that article in the manner in which we feel it should have been implemented. I say to the government that at the present time they should be more insistent on the implementation of article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. We believe that the policy of confining aid within the organization to military aid, which has largely been done, is not only wrong but may ultimately defeat the very objective of the treaty itself.

The difficulties arising in France and in Italy, to mention two of the NATO nations, are due to the economic conditions of the people within those nations; and, particularly in the case of France, the vast military expenditures on rearmament and on the operations in Indo-China, which apparently France herself is very anxious to bring to an end by negotiation. The economic situation in those NATO associates of ours, if not relieved, may lead to the breakdown of the whole anticommunist front among the democratic powers. Therefore once again I urge our government to give leadership, both within the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and the United Nations, for greater emphasis in the economic field.

We believe that with the easing of tension and the achieving of our rearmament targets we are in a position where we can reduce our expenditures for military defence and use the relief obtained not for the reduction of income and other taxes within Canada, but to a large extent at least for the giving of more economic aid under the United Nations' technical assistance program and the Colombo plan.

Let me add that I believe Canada has a unique opportunity of giving such leadership at the present time. In saying what I am about to say I want to have it differentiated from anything in relation to trying to make trade out of the Prime Minister's departure on his tour. The Prime Minister is about to leave on a good-will tour around the world. I said earlier this afternoon that I hoped that he would act as an ambassador of good will on behalf of the Canadian people. What I said earlier I should like to repeat on behalf of my colleagues and myself. We wish him a safe, pleasant and productive journey.

I am sure that he will realize that in conveying messages of good will in the countries he visits he will be conveying the sentiments of all the Canadian people. But I am going to suggest this, that he might demonstrate our good will in a very practical way. At the moment we have vast quantities of food available to a hungry world if they had the means to purchase it. Besides this we have, for example, at least one industry in which there is considerable unemployment, but which is equipped to produce machines for the production of food in large quantity. I am not suggesting that we sell anything; I am suggesting that we give something.

On December 26 last the London Economist, which is one of the foremost papers of its kind in the world, published a report on conditions in southeast Asia. This authoritative newspaper pointed out that as a result of the cessation of hostilities in Korea and the easing of world tension, countries in southeast Asia were facing a situation which to say the least is most discouraging. The fall of prices for their products and the maintenance of high prices for capital and other equipment they need from abroad will, the Economist says, necessarily interfere with the achievement of the standards of living originally planned when, for example, the Colombo plan was adopted. The Economist says that one of two things must be done, and I am going to quote the exact words as they appeared in the paper:

> There must either be greater temporary sacrifice on the part of the people themselves . . .

And heaven knows how much more sacrifice the undernourished, underfed, underprivileged people of India, Pakistan, Ceylon and the other Far Eastern countries can undergo. I continue:

> . . . or there must be an increase in the amount of external aid which in any case has never been guaranteed as adequate to close the gap between intention and availability.

Our suggestion to the Prime Minister is that, in view of the circumstances and the need to raise the standards of living, if we are to offset communist propaganda in those areas he make the generous offer of gifts of food, particularly perhaps wheat of which we have a large quantity, and instruments of production such as farm machinery, to the governments of those countries. Those gifts—I emphasize "gifts"—would be in addition to the Colombo plan, and regarded as part of our defence budget, and marketed by the governments of the receiving countries so thc proceeds could be used in carrying forward projects designed to increase their own production and raise their standards of living.

This would not have the effect of dumping goods across the world. We believe that it would not have the effect of depressing the prices of those commodities on the world market. Why? Because the recipient countries are not in a position to purchase those supplies abroad, their external purchasing power having been reduced by the drastic fall in prices of their exports. It is not a question of replacing something they may buy from abroad, but something we might be able to give them and which they have not the means to buy abroad.

Let me say that when I suggest a reduction should be made in our expenditures on armaments, I am merely reiterating the opinion which seems to have been expressed and has been interpreted by the newspapers as having been expressed by Lord Alexander, the Minister of Defence in the United Kingdom, who is reported by the newspapers yesterday as announcing that a plan is to be introduced which:

> . . . seeks to keep Britain's defence expenditure, now more than 40 per cent of the budget or about $98 a person annually, within control.

The New York Times service, quoted by the Montreal Gazette, says this of the minister's statement:

> The new plan was interpreted by sources close to the government as a reflection of its belief that the immediate danger of war with the Soviet union has receded steadily in the last year and that time has come to re-plan defence in anticipation of a considerable period of uneasy balance between east and west.

And when we remember that President Eisenhower in his message to congress quite recently suggested a 10 per cent cut in expenditures on armaments of that country, and when according to this morning's paper the Department of National Defence of Canada is to cut the defence expenditure recommended to this parliament by more than 5 per cent, I think it underlines what I have just been saying. But it seems to me that the fact the United States can cut its expenditures by 10 per cent indicates that we should be able to cut ours probably by about the same amount, and 10 per cent of $2 billion used for economic aid in the countries where communist propaganda is prevalent and effective because of the distress conditions, poverty, misery and want that exist there, would be one of the best means of defence on behalf of the democratic nations that we could find; and I make that suggestion. I say we believe that Canada should whenever possible give a lead in promoting policies that will lead to the removal of fear of war and the deliverance of mankind from the ever-present fear of starvation and want which afflict millions of people all across the world.

Last spring President Eisenhower, both in his fireside talk in April and in his message to congress on May 5, proposed a program which met with acclaim everywhere in the world. For the first time it was proposed by the President of the United States that greater emphasis should be placed upon development of technical aid and assistance to backward areas, particularly in Asia.

Since then I am sorry to say—and my experience at the United Nations and my observation of the policy of the United States delegation lead me to think that this is so—there has been in the United States a reversion to the previous emphasis on military preparedness and the securing of bases far beyond the borders of that country. A few days ago I noted that the president of Turkey declared that his country would welcome economic aid rather than more military equipment and supplies.

Then the rumours that the United States was seeking an agreement with Pakistan for bases and the supply of armaments caused great alarm in India as well as, may I say, among the peoples and governments associated with our democratic cause. Peaceful negotiations are made more difficult when rumours of this kind go mainly or partly uncontradicted. The alarm in India was widespread and expressed by Prime Minister Nehru in no uncertain terms. Anything which drives India away from the association she now has with the West is not only dangerous but in my opinion may be disastrous to the world.

I agree with the minister and with the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), who both recognized the importance of having with us the countless millions of people who are in southeast Asia. If we lose them we have lost the bulk of the world's manhood and womanhood to the Soviet union. So I say that the proposal for the United States to take bases in Pakistan and to arm Pakistan is a suicidal policy on the part of the United States, and is equally suicidal for those of us who are associated with the United States in the democratic cause.

I say that negotiations are made more difficult with the Soviet union by such reports because to them at least they are indications of aggressive feelings on the part of the leading power among the democracies. I wonder what we would think if the Soviet union suggested to Mexico that she should establish bases in that country. I wonder what we would say if the Soviet union requested also to establish bases in Cuba or in other places and islands around us. I wonder what we would say, and I wonder how we could feel that negotiations proposed under those circumstances were sincere. I say that every effort should be made to prevent a policy of the description I have just mentioned being put into effect. Our government should take a leading part as a member of the commonwealth, as a member of the United Nations and as a close neighbour and friend of the United States, in advising the United States against such a policy whenever an opportunity occurs.

I want to say something about the release of prisoners in Korea. The minister said they had been released as civilians. The manner in which the press has treated these releases certainly has caused considerable concern to a good many people. I do not propose to discuss the protracted negotiations which failed to reach agreement concerning this matter. We know that dealing with the communists is difficult, but we also know that Canada and some other nations believed that the inclusion of India in the proposed peace conference was desirable, and that if India had been admitted it is possible the conference might have been held. We voted that way, but the United States was able to muster sufficient votes among its South American friends to prevent the two-thirds majority required for the inclusion of India, so India was left out.

We have been told that the North Koreans and Chinese communists who refused to return to their countries have been liberated, but if we can believe the press stories it is a rather strange kind of liberation. It puts the North Koreans who refused to return to North Korea in lorries and transfers them to South Korean camps for screening, and ships Chinese who refused to go back to China to Formosa for similar screening. This appears to be a method of conscription which left no opportunity to the former prisoners of war to become civilians. One is bound to ask if Canada agreed to this method of liberation. In view of this episode is it any wonder that the Chinese and the North Koreans fear that the proposed peace negotiations may be but the prelude to an attack by Syngman Rhee and Chiang Kai-shek on China proper?

These are matters which cause grave misgivings among those of us who are anxious to see peace and understanding promoted among the nations.

Then look at Berlin. At the present time the foreign ministers of the United States, the United Kingdom, France and the Soviet union are meeting in Berlin. We all hope that at least some success will be attained there, but again prior to the meeting powerful voices in the United States and large sections of the press were bitterly denouncing the calling of the conference and dooming it to failure. This, it should be said, was in the sharpest possible contrast to statements made by public men in the United Kingdom and France, where the opinions expressed were so different from those expressed by powerful and loud voices in the United States, and by sections of the press.

I say this as a friend of the United States because I think there are groups of people in that country who are making it difficult for the democratic powers to achieve their objectives in ironing out some of the difficulties existing in the world that may lead to war. It seems to us that in dealing with a nation which does not believe that the press and speech in the democracies are both free, comments made on forthcoming conferences should be thoroughly responsible.

We believe that Germany today represents what may become a festering sore in the very heart of Europe. As long as the country is divided into two sections there is little hope of building a Germany which can co-operate in promoting the peace and progress of the world. In our opinion the longer she is divided the more likely it is that former nazis in West Germany will regain much of their influence over the West German people and, on the other hand, that the communist leaders in East Germany will be more firmly entrenched, making unity of the country and peace in Europe still more difficult to achieve. May I say that I thoroughly agree that any unification of Germany, as was suggested by the minister in his speech this afternoon, cannot be a unification of two governments, or a government set up from those two governments. It can only be a unification if it is preceded by free elections held under the supervision of the United Nations. Certainly proposals for the rearmament of West Germany before unification would in our opinion—and let there be no misunderstanding; we are not following the communist line when we say this, we are expressing the views of the great socialist and labour movement in Europe and across the world—have a disastrous effect on hopes for the peaceful development of the European community.

One can understand the attitude of France, and the hesitation she has in joining EDC, because not twice but three times during the last hundred years she has been invaded by German armies, causing not only great suffering but terrible losses of life and property. On the other hand, we recognize that the western nations cannot assume all the responsibility for the defence of Germany should aggression occur. Indeed, the very rejuvenation of Germany—the very fact that her industries are now able to export vast quantities of goods, that she has been able to build homes for her people and that she has been able to put new and modern machinery in her factories—is due to the fact that none of her men have been taken out of production and put into the armed forces, that none of her industries have been engaged in the manufacture of war materials and that none of her finances have been used for military purposes which, while necessary, are wasteful.

Mr. Pearson: She has to make a large contribution to the occupation costs.

Mr. Coldwell: Yes; she has to make large contributions to the occupation costs, but even those have not been comparable to what France and the United Kingdom have been paying in their rearmament programs and in the maintenance of armies, involving loss of productive manpower, to support NATO and prevent aggression in the world.

As I say, we recognize immediately that the western nations cannot be expected to assume all the responsibility for the defence of Germany should aggression occur. Consequently, while opposed to the rearmament of Germany, we believe that after unification a disarmed, united Germany might have her neutrality guaranteed by the United Nations and particularly—by an agreement among the powers—by Russia and the western powers. But that agreement is some distance off, at least.

In our opinion, however, whatever is done to integrate German manpower into a western European defence system—and that may be necessary—neither the German armament industry nor German leadership should be permitted to revive once again the military aspirations of a new Germany. That, it seems to us, must be prevented by every possible means. Certainly we should not agree at all to any likelihood of a German army, under German command, with the old officers of the nazi regime; and what is more important, I suppose, in a way, is that the non-commissioned officers who are in close contact with the men should be carefully screened to see that they were not supporters of the old nazi regime. Any such troops should be organized under non-German military commanders and non-German staff.

This afternoon my friend the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) mentioned the point that the United States is contemplating withdrawal of her troops from Europe, in large part, and substituting new machines and new and devastating instruments of destruction as a means of defence. In his address to the general assembly of the United Nations, President Eisenhower clearly outlined the devastating effects that the use of such weapons would involve. For example —and I am going to quote him directly—he said:

> A single air group, whether afloat or land-based, can now deliver—

That is the weapons in the possession of the United States.

> —on an available target, a destructive cargo (of bombs) exceeding the power of all bombs that fell on Britain in all of world war II.

That is, whether afloat or land-based, one group of planes could deliver a destructive cargo of bombs exceeding the power of all the bombs that fell on all of Britain in all of world war II. Of the United States stockpile of atomic weapons he said something else, and I quote again. He said that it—> —exceeds by many times the explosive equivalent of the total of all bombs and all shells that came from every plane and every gun in every theatre of war through all the years of world war II.

Then President Eisenhower went on to say that the United States had no monopoly of this great power, and that while he believed in American superiority in numbers of such weapons, the facts are that the Soviet union has a growing stockpile too. He then made a proposal which I believe every human being must welcome, namely that this great destructive force can and should be developed for the benefit of all mankind. He therefore proposed that the governments principally involved—and he qualified it by "to the extent permitted by elementary prudence", and I think he was right in doing that—as he put it, should begin now and continue to make, from their stockpiles of normal uranium and fissionable materials, joint contributions to an international atomic energy agency set up under the aegis of the United Nations. This agency, he went on to say, would be charged not only with the responsibility for the storage and protection of the contributed materials, but would mobilize international experts to develop and apply atomic energy for the peaceful purposes of the world.

This, of course, I may say, is a departure, and a fundamental one, from the proposals made from time to time before the atomic energy commission of the United Nations and, in my opinion, if agreement could be reached it would represent a great step forward in the peaceful development of this great new source of energy.

As Mr. Churchill said a short time ago, the very terror of these weapons to which the President referred might be something of an insurance against their use in war; but the important thing is not only, as some suggest, to outlaw the use of such weapons —and the outlawing of such weapons, of course, may be quite problematical if a nation is faced with defeat in war—but to find ways and means of banishing war and the threat of war. That is the only insurance against war.

I repeat that in our opinion this cannot be done by threats of the use of force; nor by the building up of armies, navies and air forces, though under certain circumstances they may be necessary; nor by securing bases here and there all across the world and filling them with devastating weapons of war. In our opinion this can only be done by negotiation among the great powers and by rapidly raising the standards of living everywhere in the world. I want to emphasize again that to my mind, in the ultimate, that is the best defence that democracy has; I refer to the raising of standards of living of the underprivileged in the undeveloped areas of the world.

The foreign ministers in Berlin .are reported to be likely to discuss not only the matter of atomic weapons and the Russian proposal for outlawing them but the wider problem of disarmament. I know something of the difficulties they will face, because I was present at the United Nations in 1946 when our own Prime Minister, then our minister of external affairs, foreshadowed the organization of the Atlantic community for the first time because of the failure of the great powers to do anything in implementing that chapter of the charter which called for negotiations among their military staffs. When, at the conclusion of that assembly, disarmament was proposed, we saw the brushing aside of that proposal by Mr. Molotov and the gestures made by Sir Hartley Shawcross at the same time to the effect that Britain was prepared to give to the United Nations the keys to her factories, the right to pull up the blinds and see exactly what they were doing in order that everyone might understand the problem and come to some arrangement with regard to disarmament.

Russian proposals in the past have been unacceptable but perchance under the new regime—and I say "perchance"—more satisfactory proposals to the world might come and might be considered. We might make more satisfactory proposals also.

Mr. Stick: I do not believe it can be done.

Mr. Coldwell: May I say this to my hon. friend from Newfoundland with regard to that sort of thing. If, the moment one suggests that it might be possible to do something, there is to be the shaking of heads and the saying that it cannot be done, then it never will be done. I do not believe in that kind of thing. I do not believe, either, that as individuals or as a government we should take such an attitude.

Mr. Studer: It will never be done by the socialists.

Mr. Coldwell: My hon. friend says that it will never be done by the socialists. Let me tell him that the great act of statesmanship that brought India into the world as a nation and kept her on our side was undertaken by a socialist government. I just want to tell my hon. friend that. In any event, it is our hope that Canada will use her influence, whenever it is possible to do so, to secure the widest possible measures of disarmament.

I must conclude, because my time is nearly up. There are many other problems that could have been discussed, some of which arose at the United Nations last autumn. I hope that some of my colleagues will address themselves to some of these problems. Suffice it to say that on several occasions I wished that Canada had taken a stronger attitude regarding some of the problems before the United Nations last autumn. To mention one or two of them, there are the situations in Morocco and Tunis and the threats to human freedom in the Union of South Africa.

I think those are matters which affect not only the welfare of masses of humanity but, in the ultimate, the peace of the world. I should like to see Canada give more leadership in endeavouring to solve these problems than we have seemed inclined to give.

I want to say to the minister and the government that I appreciate the opportunity that has been afforded by setting aside this day to discuss some of these problems. I have tried to place before the house views which may not be generally shared by all hon. members, but which nonetheless are shared by millions of people throughout the world who are not communists, and I believe they are worthy of consideration.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I also feel that I should express appreciation to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) for making it possible for us to discuss today these very important matters relating to external affairs. I listened with a great deal of interest to what the minister called his general and discursive survey of world affairs. I enjoyed it. He took us on another of the tours on which he so often takes us, and while he did not get clear around the world this time at least he gave us a glimpse of what is behind the curtain of time, perhaps more than anything else, and that we do appreciate.

I want to say at once that we join with him in mourning the passing of two great Canadian servants, Mr. Hume Wrong and Mr. Patterson. The minister's department is going to suffer as a consequence of the passing of these men who in the past proved themselves to be most capable servants and made great contributions to the favourable relationships that Canada now enjoys with other countries.

I missed today the good-humoured and well-reasoned speech usually delivered by the late hon. member for Peel, who was the spokesman for the Conservative party. But I think on this very first occasion the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) has demonstrated that he is a worthy successor. Many of the things he brought before us today proved not only interesting but challenging, and I shall have something to say about a few of his comments before I am finished.

I think I would perhaps be neglecting my duty if I did not make brief comment on such important things as the question of German rearmament, NATO, and so on. Without going over all the arguments, or even introducing any further argument, I should say right away that I do not see how in the world the western world is going to be able to meet the challenge of the communist areas unless Germany is made capable of taking a very important part in her own defence and the defence of western Europe. Much as I have feared the rearmament of Germany and have wished that it could be otherwise, I do not see any other answer to the security of western Europe than to rearm Germany, take her into the European defence community, if that is possible, and see to it as far as we can that a rearmed Germany is never able to use her new-found or refound strength for aggressive purposes.

I think we also have to rebuild Austria. I believe it was a mistake in the first place to dismember the Austro-Hungarian empire, and I think the world is beginning to understand that that is so. We feel the need of Austria today and of her steadfastness and great ability in the western concert of nations.

As I listened to the minister this afternoon I wondered, as perhaps many other hon. members did, what is being done about those ethnic groups behind the iron curtain who all during the years have been opposed to totalitarianism in any form, who have been the champions of liberty, but are now held captive by the U.S.S.R. and her satellites. I wondered if anything had been done to make it possible for them to make their contribution because, after all, I think one of the greatest contributions to the downfall of imperialist communism throughout the world is going to be the work of those ethnic groups who still love their freedom and are determined to regain it. I suppose the minister could have said something about that, but naturally he could not cover the whole orbit today.

Although I have little criticism to make of the minister's speech and find little wrong with it, he did leave me without an answer to a number of important questions, questions that almost every thinking person must be asking himself at this time. The first of these would be: Has the United Nations effort in Korea served even slightly to insulate the world against a third global war, or has it served to bring such a conflict nearer? Maybe he cannot answer that. That may be an assignment that no person could possibly carry out today. But it is something that many people are asking, and I think with good reason.

A second question: Have we learned anything of real value to the human race as a consequence of the billions of dollars of material wealth spent and the many thousands of gallant lives lost in the Korean conflict? If so, what is it that we have learned and how can we make use of these lessons in the future?

A third question: Who has thus far come off victor in Korea, and why? Fourth: What hope is there that a Korean peace treaty will be agreed upon and signed? In the long negotiations ahead on that particular matter, how far will the United Nations go in yielding to communist demands and what effect will those concessions have, if they are made, in strengthening the communist part of the world and weakening the free part?

These are matters of grave concern to me because, after all, mankind today needs guideposts and iron rods to which to hold. It seems to me that if we realize anything at all we must realize that the objective of communist imperialism is to become boss of the world by any means that is available. Consequently anything that strengthens the communist part of the world will weaken our part of the world by just that much.

Our guide in determining our position on any important question, it seems to me, should be what position can we take that will strengthen the free world and contribute to the weakening of communist imperialism? We in the free nations have been blind to that guide for many years. Certainly we have not kept it clearly before us in the negotiations that have taken place or in the development of our policies. The tragic result of that neglect has been a constantly expanding and growing communist menace to the freedom, happiness and security of the world. The western nations have been too ready to grant concessions. Many of our leading men have allowed themselves to be blinded to the realities of the situation, perhaps in a measure because they have allowed their advisory councils to be packed with unfaithful, subversive people who have been guilty of perfidy and treason on some occasions.

The fifth question that is in my mind is this. What are we working for as a nation? By that I mean what is the real objective of our Canadian foreign policy? What do we want to achieve—let us give ourselves a reasonable time—say in the next 20 years? I should think that a clear-cut and forthright answer to that question alone would be refreshing, and might serve to arouse hope and faith in the Canadian people. In my judgment there was never a time when hope and faith so needed to be aroused as it does today. This, and perhaps a good many other vital questions, the minister left unanswered in his speech. I realize that, as an excuse, it can be said he did not have time to deal with everything. We did not expect him to do that. Perhaps in the course of rebuttal, if he gives any, or in the near future he may be able to deal with some of these very important matters.

Even the things the minister did say today left us, at least some of us, with a feeling that we had not made very much progress over the years. Now, I hasten to pay the minister a compliment because I do not want him to think for one moment that I am saying what I have said just to be difficult and carping. Speaking to the Canadian public relations society in Montreal on January 5 of this year, the minister had this to say about foreign policy, and I quote his words as I received them in a report of his speech:

> But in the long run, a foreign policy which has a sound moral basis will prevail over one which has not, providing we build on that base a structure of strength with freedom.

I was struck with those words, and I want to deal with them. If that is the wellspring from which our whole external policy arises, then I must admit it gives me some feeling of confidence and hope for the future. I do not think we can go very far wrong if we make absolutely certain that we do build our foreign policy on a moral basis, and one of strength and freedom. It is against the background the minister outlined that we should attempt to measure Canada's foreign policy. I think we should dig into it and find out for ourselves whether, in fact, it has a sound moral basis; whether we are, in reality, building on that moral basis a structure of strength with freedom. Perhaps we are; but if we are to know that, then the elements of our foreign policy will have to be much more clearly stated than we have heard them so far.

For almost 15 years now the world has been enveloped in war. For most of those years there has existed somewhere in the world armed conflict, which we called "hot war". For the last few years we have experienced a combination of "hot war", such as in Korea and Indo-China, and "cold war", which is the battle for men's minds in the ideological or psychological field over the whole world. People generally, I find, are yearning for peace. They are anxiously scanning every sign, every portent, to discover whether there is indeed any possibility for peace. Many people everywhere are inclined to hook on to any proposition which would seem to hold some possibility of peace in the near future. Right now it seems to be the fashion to suggest meetings with the Russians or with the Chinese or with some other communist group. Everyone seems, evidently, to think that if we can get down to a conference with the communists we can work out a basis for real peace. I have heard that for many months.

I was keenly interested, therefore, in an article which appeared in the January 29 issue of U.S. News and World Report. This article appears under the heading "Talk with the communists; 120 million words, little gain by us." I hasten to say that I have not checked these figures, and they may not be accurate. I think perhaps that even if they are proven inaccurate they do illustrate very well the point I wanted to make. There are some rather arresting facts produced in the article, which I think it might be well if hon. members would consider for just a moment.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Low: Mr. Speaker, at the dinner hour I was about to place before the house some rather arresting facts that were contained in an article which appeared in the January 29 issue of U.S. News and World Report. I made it clear, sir, that I had not checked the figures in the article; but I did say that even allowing for a substantial margin of error in them, the article would illustrate the point I wanted to make, and illustrate it very well indeed.

I should like to take just a few minutes to place these facts and figures before the house, particularly as they relate to this feeling on the part of so many people throughout the world that if they could just get down to discussions, conferences with the communists, everything could be worked out very well, and that peace would be coming soon and easily. An analysis of this article shows that in the eight post-war years more than 120 million words have been spoken in formal official talks with the communists. There has been no time in the eight years when talks were not going on in some place or another with communist countries, and the one tangible result to date has been a truce in Korea, a truce that the communists considered a victory for themselves.

Out of all this experience one rather striking conclusion has been drawn, and it is this. Few words are required if the communists are getting what they want, but words in endless profusion are required to lead to any result if the communists are not getting what they want. It is amazing to note that just before the present meeting with the Russians over the question of Germany, 525,000 words were spoken in 50 hours of talks just in an effort to decide on the spot at which the big four conference would be held. And there was no result. The Americans, British and French then submitted an offer that appeared to be much closer to the Russian terms, and after only a few dozen words were spoken everything was settled in short order.

If we go back to Yalta, it is said that it took over 220,000 words of talk in just seven sessions of conference to give Russia dominance in vast areas of the world. At Potsdam only 408,000 words were spoken. On that occasion Russia got what she wanted in Germany, and as a consequence today something like 17 million Germans are slaves to the Russian machine in that part of Germany.

In contrast to this, in an effort to bring about an Austrian peace treaty we learn that 11,900,000 words have been spoken in 378 full-dress meetings over a period of eight years, and without any agreement nor, it seems to me, the possibility of any agreement so far as can be seen now. It appears that Russia has not yet managed to get what she wants in this case, and therefore she is going to go on talking, and continue to go on talking. When we speak of trying to obtain unity for Germany, which for some time now has been divided into the east and west zones, let us remember that there have been 1,380 meetings at which 43,500,000 words have been spoken, but again with no result.

The reason appears to be that the Russian terms have not been met. I suppose if we were to soften up and make concessions, as we have done in some other places in the world, it would not take long to reach an agreement. The famous Korean negotiations involved, I am told, 575 formal meetings at which it is said that 18,100,000 words were spoken. And that does not tell us how much doodling was done in absolute silence, with one side glaring across at the other and perhaps saying nothing. These meetings were carried on over a period of nearly two years, without any progress. At the end of that time terms were fixed that apparently met the conditions laid down by the Chinese communists, and thereafter the truce came very quickly. Following the armistice, talks about peace in Korea went ahead for some time, but they have now broken down because the United States is not willing to sit there day after day, month after month, year after year and listen to debate by insult.

Our experience over the years since 1933 would indicate and should have taught us this thing that is pointed out by so many observers and writers, that, all the way along, the cheapest communist commodity has been talk, as long as the western nations were not prepared to give things away as fast and as freely as the Russians and other communist nations thought we should. The classic example of how quickly these things can be done when the western nations are prepared to give Russia what she wants was the Teheran conference in 1943. At that time Russia, we are told, wanted a second front in Europe, and more lend-lease goods. President Roosevelt agreed to both terms. Russia merely gave a few inconsequential promises and a quick agreement was effected.

Then, any hon. members who have read Mr. Churchill's recent book, "Triumph and Tragedy", will recall that at Yalta in 1945 a very great part of the world was put under the sway of Russia. Mr. Churchill states that he jotted down on a piece of paper a formula for dividing up influence in the Balkan states. He shoved it over quietly to Stalin, who very quickly put some sort of cryptic mark on it, and that is all there was to it. There was no need for long talks under such conditions as those. And Mr. Churchill said that it was all over in no more time than it takes to set it down on paper.

Then six months after Yalta, at the Potsdam conference, the United States agreed to give the Russians just about everything they wanted in eastern Germany, and also agreed to let the Russians haul out of Germany—all parts of it—into Russia, vast quantities of machinery and plants of every description.

Anyone who has taken the trouble to look at the formation of the boundaries between the eastern and western zones of Germany, as I have done, can see how cleverly every single power plant was carved out of the western zone and made to appear in the eastern zone. And when one looks at those things he will understand just how easily the Russians got what they wanted. At Potsdam the Russians really smiled and, we are told, nodded in agreement, said a few words and went home perfectly happy.

Over the past eight years 94 meetings have been held between the western and eastern powers concerning disarmament. Over three million words have been spoken on that subject, but no agreement has been reached, nor does it seem at the present time as though one is in sight.

At the United Nations general assembly, and in the security council, 35 million words have been spoken on widely varying topics—world peace, and the problems the nations face. And in this great world forum the communists have quibbled, they have thumped the tub, and have used every opportunity to proclaim their propaganda. They have denounced the western nations, and they have sometimes walked out. Even when they did stay in they conducted their debate like a bunch of rowdies, resorting almost constantly to debate by insults.

Words, I say, have been communist weapons, the best weapons they have ever used. They have used them not only in a world forum like the United Nations, but they have also used them to take over labour unions and other organizations they wanted to capture. They have used words to take over nations and to win international conferences. Right now there seems to be a period of quiet and peace on what we might call the word front. For some weeks past we have read about the sweetness and joviality and friendliness of the Russian delegates and their friends at the United Nations but we should be warned that behind all this peaceful front there must be the same old communist strategy.

The minister pointed out today how important it was that we take care that we be not divided. Well, we must beware of that, because I am satisfied that the aim of the communists, in their sweet attitude at the present time, is an effort to divide the free world, with the ultimate hope of course of strengthening their own position so they can dominate the world. As one step toward this effort at division the communists are now bidding for more trade with Europe, the United States and other nations of the world. Well, it seems to me that in over eight years of that sort of thing we should have learned something; I hope we have. For just a few minutes I should like to say something about communism, perhaps in general, and about things we ought to be doing to prevent the communists from achieving their goal of world domination.

When we earnestly seek for a solution to the very great and trying world problems it seems to me that we should adopt a principle to guide us in reaching that decision, out of the experience we have had over the years and realizing as we do how difficult—yes, wellnigh impossible—it is to negotiate with the communists on anything like satisfactory or even terms. We ought to ask ourselves as we approach the problem: will this proposed solution have the effect of strengthening the communist world; or in the alternative, will this proposed solution have the long-range effect of weakening the communist world and consequently of strengthening our own by comparison?

I say we should be guided by the truthful answers to these questions. Certainly I believe that any decision we make should never have the effect of strengthening communism and the communist world, no matter how humanitarian we might wish to be in our outlook and views. If what we are about to do or if what has been proposed will in any way tend to build up communist strength, then I say, Mr. Speaker, we should assiduously avoid that proposal.

We have given too much ground already, in my judgment. Perhaps even in Canada itself it would be well to require of anyone who would dwell in our land that he earn his privileges of citizenship. In the external field I think that rather than welcoming communist dictators and nations with open arms into our fellowship of free nations and giving them every advantage of such fellowship, we should be thinking carefully of modifying the privileges that those countries, especially the U.S.S.R., are enjoying.

I am thinking at the moment of trade. Something was said about it this afternoon by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). He did not say where he stood on the matter. More was said about it by the leader of the C.C.F. party, and he did say where they stood. I am going to say where I stand. I do not think that the communist nations should be allowed to enjoy the fruits of trade with the western world unless they are prepared to give ample evidence that they value their association with our fellowship and are prepared also to work for the betterment of the world and for its peace and security.

That is a pretty straightforward position, I would say, and I have reasons for taking that view. There are many people of course who say well, what harm would it do to let the countries of the world sell non-strategic materials to Russia or to some of the communist nations? I take the view that for the present we should not even be prepared to trade with them in non-strategic materials, because they can use them to increase production of strategic materials and weapons, and that of course would result in building up their strength at the expense of the nations against whom they are constantly working, with the objective of course of destroying us. Why should we send them goods with which they can turn around and cut us down? I do not believe that is sound under any circumstances. There should be no trade even in non-strategic materials between Russia and the fellowship of free nations until, as Mr. Eisenhower said, by deeds and not words they give evidence of a desire to work for peace and for world security, instead of disruption and world domination which seems to be their constant aim.

This of course would look very serious to Britain, because Britain appears to feel that it is necessary for her to trade with China and Russia and perhaps other countries behind the iron curtain. If Great Britain is forced to seek trade behind the iron curtain, as many people seem to think she has been, then nobody is to blame for that situation but the United States, Canada and other parts of the free world. The free world thus far has made trade impossible for Great Britain at a time when all of us should have been doing everything we possibly could to strengthen and to build her up because, Mr. Speaker, Great Britain has been for many years the fount and source of justice, equity, liberty and the rule of law, and to let her be destroyed is nothing less than a world tragedy.

I say again that the free nations of the world by their policies have forced Britain behind the iron curtain, and we have not done what we could to build her up. I was struck with these words in a letter that I received just yesterday from a former member of this house, Mr. Luchkovich, who now lives in the city of Edmonton. I commend these words to all hon. members. Some of you will remember him when he was here; he was a U.F.A. member. I quote from his letter:

> Practising our Canadianism, we must not forget the debt we owe Great Britain. In this struggle we need Great Britain, and Great Britain needs us and our relations with each other must remain intact.
> I have no brief for Great Britain by virtue of ties of blood, but I can support her by reason of common sense and national security. Thus I have no desire to twist the lion's tail nor share in the charges of decadency. The British have had the great misfortune of losing the cream and flower of their most able young people in two great world wars. That gap has not as yet been closed. But it will be; and in the meantime they should not have to worry too much so long as they keep on producing Shakespeares, Newtons, Harveys, Watts, Stevensons, Wellingtons and Churchills.
> But, being of Ukrainian origin, all I can do is to express my admiration for a people that has maintained its traditions so long, that has stood up so nobly under adversity, that has saved itself by its own efforts, and others by its own example.
> The British people have been "running too long with the hounds to be worried by their whelps." They have been the real founders of democracy as it is now understood. Hyde Park is not only a pleasure ground but a safety valve for all the cranks to let off steam. Handsome is as handsome does and names will never hurt the British so long as they do not slough off the white man's burden and discard their role as champion of human and minority rights.

That is the end of the part I wanted to quote. This gentleman of Ukrainian origin rises to the sentiments which should be guiding the whole of the commonwealth today, and we are one of the leading members of the commonwealth.

I said that if Britain has been forced behind the iron curtain to do much of her trading, then nobody can be blamed for that situation but the people of the western world, and we in Canada and the United States must bear our fair share of the blame. What have we done to help to rehabilitate Britain and the commonwealth? What have we done to make Britain's trading easier? What have we done to help that country increase the production of those things which Canada needs and wants from Great Britain?

I am not forgetting that when we were debating the speech from the throne we Social Crediters put forward an idea for trade with Great Britain that I am perfectly satisfied would have been and could now be of tremendous help in bringing that country back to the position which we need her to occupy in this world. I am satisfied that if our proposal at that time that we be prepared to accept some sterling—we did not say "all sterling"—from Britain in the course of our trade to settle some of our balances, that had we been prepared to do so five or six years ago, I am satisfied that today Britain could be supplying us with many of the things that we need and cannot get there. I am satisfied that if we had started even this year we could have done much in just a few months to help Britain back on her feet; but what was the attitude of hon. members to that proposal? No, sir, they turned it down and said that it would interfere with the determination of the powers that be to retain the dominance and the super-sanctity of the almighty dollar. That was the only reason.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I think if we will adopt realistic trade policies we can take care of Great Britain's needs and therefore not force her to trade behind the iron curtain. I believe that under such circumstances we could come nearer to the kind of unity among the countries of the western world that we need. At the present time Great Britain, because she feels the necessity for trade with China, has recognized China, and she advocates that the other free nations of the world recognize her. That is a point of division among the free nations.

Moreover, Great Britain would like to see China become a member of the United Nations largely because of the advantages which might come to her in the world of trade. When the communist world is made to understand that the free flow of trade between their countries and the free nations of the world is a valuable privilege of fellowship that comes only to those worthy of that fellowship, then I am quite certain they will be led to some worth-while introspection and perhaps into a little repentance. I think the most salutary lesson that any human being or group of human beings can learn, that is when he or they have been acting in an anti-social way, is to find some modification of his or their privileges of citizenship or fellowship, whether it is on a national or world scale.

That brings me to the question of communist China's demand for membership in the United Nations. I do not think we should be in any hurry about granting communist China entry into the United Nations. I do not mean to say that eventually she should not have full fellowship there, but what would be her reasons for wanting to become a member now? That is a question that has to be asked. Would it be because she feels she can contribute something to world peace and security? Is she prepared to fulfil and capable of fulfilling her obligations under the terms of the United Nations charter? Or is she anxious to become a member of the United Nations and is Russia anxious to have her there because she could be a support and a source of strength to the communist world and its disruptive aims by having a seat in the assembly beside the seat of Russia? In his article entitled "Don't Let Asia Split the West" as reprinted from the World of December, 1953, the minister of external affairs wrote this pungent paragraph:

> To understand the meaning of Asian communism, to place it as we should, against the background of foreign exploitation and feudal oppression, is one thing. But it does not mean that at this time we should welcome into the international community, as a state willing to abide by the principles of the United Nations charter, a regime which has committed aggression in Korea and has yet to show that it is willing to contribute to a peaceful and democratic solution of the Korean or other Asian problems.

I am in thorough agreement with those words, and I sincerely hope that Canada will stand by them. In other words, we do not want to exercise any hatred toward Asians as such. They are human beings just the same as we are, and we must be prepared to treat them in every way as equals. As the minister has so well said in other places, "We should unite against aggressors and not against Asians." That is true. But let us say to China, "When you have demonstrated by deeds and not more millions of words that you are willing and prepared to contribute to a peaceful and democratic solution of the Korean and other Asiatic problems; when you are prepared to take your full responsibilities under the terms of the United Nations charter and abide by those terms, then you will be admitted into full fellowship in the United Nations with all the valuable privileges of that fellowship, at least so far as we are concerned."

Mr. Speaker, I have not much more to say and I hope you will turn a blind eye to the clock for just a minute in order that I may complete a point which I wish to make. I am convinced in my own mind, as a matter of fact, that the United Nations would be a much better organization without Russia. There are those who think otherwise and I honour their views, but that is my belief. Russia has never yet contributed anything but frustration and despair and confusion. What hope have we that she will ever contribute anything more in the future? If, of course, she should give evidence of a real change of heart; if she should begin to demonstrate her desire to live up to her responsibilities under the United Nations charter, then of course she should not be denied full fellowship.

I am firmly convinced, however, that the organization would go along much better without Russia and without her satellites so long as they continue their present attitude and practices. We could make far better headway without her. She now uses the organization to spread her propaganda, to get her spies and subversives into this and every other country for one purpose, to undermine and destroy us. I am sure that if Russia did not have full fellowship in the United Nations there would be a much better chance of unity among those nations who are left and who are willing to undertake and discharge their responsibilities under the charter.

If the communist world were denied the privileges of membership in this fellowship of nations, and if we over the years demonstrate that we can make use of it to further and improve our collective and individual security, our standard of living and all of those worth-while things, then I say perhaps Russia and the others might decide that membership is a real privilege for which they should work and for which they should give a real demonstration of their integrity and their willingness to co-operate on a peaceful basis.

I doubt that any other action of the western world short of all-out war will teach the communist aggressors anything of lasting value. I certainly would be the last one to advocate all-out armed conflict. I know what it would mean. My organization and I are committed to strive for international peace and security. We believe that Canada and all other nations should have been striving over the years with all their might to find out what are the real sources of war, and to remove those just as quickly as possible.

We should have been doing everything in our power to remove industrial rivalry among the nations, to establish an equitable distribution of the goods and services this world can produce, and to have them distributed in all nations that are willing to co-operate. We believe that perhaps the greatest single factor leading to international conflict has been the lack of such equitable distribution of the goods and services that were produced. We are unalterably of the opinion that the establishment of sound international trade policies, such as those we have outlined on many occasions, is the best assurance of international peace and security.

At the same time we recognize only too well that there is over the whole face of the world today a conflict of ideologies that is a constant threat to peace and national security. When we realize that this conflict is going on, then we also must be realistic in recognizing the necessity of organizations such as NATO and the European defence community and that sort of thing. We recognize also the necessity of organizing our own national economy so as to provide good opportunities for economic security for all of our people, along with freedom, so we can help them to be happy and contented in their lot and save them in the struggle that is going on for men's minds.

We hear much about peace and the opportunities for peace. We hon. members are getting letters almost every day from some peace organization. Because we speak sometimes with vigour, because we advocate all-out vigilance, some of us are often understood to be belligerent. I hope there will be an intelligent differentiation between the two, as certainly there is a difference. To be vigilant is not to be belligerent. Vigilance is all we want.

Speaking of peace may I say that to us, except life itself and liberty there is probably nothing that we cherish as much as peace. Perhaps more of us do not find it because we do not understand the nature of peace. Today men and nations alike are running to and fro in search of it, some of them hoping to purchase it at a bargain—and I speak of Russia as one—some fully expecting to pay its entire price but not knowing what that price must be.

Perhaps these people have forgotten, or perhaps they never knew, that peace does not depend upon the accumulation of material things, nor upon the accident of chancing to be in one place or another on this globe, but rather that peace comes from an attitude of mind which leaves the windows of the soul open to all truth, and the will to live in accordance with that truth. This every man should know—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order. I do not like having to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I think I should point out that he has spoken for more than 40 minutes. I might mention that, with the consent of the house, he may of course conclude his remarks. I may also say that I think all our proceedings today are done by consent. I would also remind the house that, by consent, this debate is for a limited term.

Mr. Low: Very well, Mr. Speaker. I have just one sentence to finish. I want to make absolutely certain that every member of this house realizes that there is a price that must be paid for peace, and that we must be willing to pay that price. If we do not realize that, of course we have no basis upon which to seek for peace.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I say we should know that peace may be found by earnest searchers for it, and certainly not by restless journeys over the world from this country to behind the iron curtain where you can learn methods of subversion. I hope we shall make it impossible in the future for some of our so-called world citizens and fellow travellers to make such easy trips behind the iron curtain to learn the art of peace that they want to buy at an easy price.

Mr. Roch Pinard (Parliamentary Assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, although on past occasions I have had the opportunity of discussing matters concerning international affairs, this is the first chance I have had to do so as parliamentary assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). I am indeed grateful to him for this opportunity which he has given me to express certain views on this important subject.

As he suggested this afternoon, I shall deal briefly with the activities of the United Nations at the last session of the general assembly last fall. As I had occasion to attend only the latter part of that session, I must say that I had to depend upon the assistance and co-operation of the members of the Canadian delegation in order to form an opinion as to what was going on. Afterward I could follow with ease the developments that were taking place.

While Korean developments outside the United Nations itself held the spotlight of public attention, the general assembly concerned itself during its eighth session with other matters reflecting a vast range of problems of concern to the international community. The eighth session was shorter than preceding sessions. In fact it began in mid-September and lasted only until the early part of December. In spite of that fact, the agenda was quite lengthy and in every field —political, economic, social, administrative and legal—there were issues pressing for solution. The delegations applied themselves to the work of the various committees in a businesslike manner under the guidance of the chairmen of the committees, including our own Dr. George Davidson, who acted with great competence as chairman of the social committee. The various delegations carried on the work at a good pace.

Glancing back at the eighth session of the assembly, one cannot be aware of much in the way of really constructive achievement. Nonetheless there is evidence of a generally high level of progress on the varied questions with which the assembly was concerned. This session was something of a transitional one, spanning the period between the termination of the Korean conflict and the post-Korea relationships that may develop in its wake. The assembly made some progress on problems of long standing, but did not advance far on issues on which there remained, as usual, a major clash of interest.

The atmosphere of the assembly was influenced, as it generally is, by the current international climate, and particularly by the fact that some of the major problems, such as the Korea problem and the prospect of a meeting of the big four powers on Germany, were being dealt with elsewhere. Nevertheless the United Nations continued to provide a valuable meeting ground for east and west, and it kept in motion in the right direction the machinery of international co-operation.

At the beginning of the session our Secretary of State for External Affairs had to resume his function as head of the Canadian delegation after he turned over to his successor, Madame Pandit of India, the duties of president of the general assembly. I think I express a view which is shared by most members of this house when I say that our country was extremely proud to have as one of its most distinguished sons one who did such a wonderful job as president of that important international body. His sense of duty and the effective way in which he conducted the proceedings gave to the people of Canada another reason to believe that our Secretary of State for External Affairs enjoys the reputation of being not only a great diplomat but a really great Canadian.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I would be remiss in my duty were I not to congratulate the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) who was acting president of the eighth session of the general assembly during the long absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). The Postmaster General discharged these duties with ability while losing nothing of his usual geniality.

I would also like to point out the excellent work done by my colleague from Mount Royal (Mr. Macnaughton) who also happens to be my member, since I have the honour of living in his constituency. He was an assiduous participant in all discussions, as a delegate, more particularly in the legal committee to which he brought his long experience in the field of law.

(Text):

In the work of the Canadian delegation, Mr. Speaker, we were also assisted by the presence of parliamentary observers from each of the main parties represented in this house; and I feel sure that this arrangement, which is based upon the practice followed in earlier years, has fully justified itself.

As in previous sessions, several major problems which are not new played a large part in assembly discussions and will, I am afraid, continue in the future to challenge our collective resources of intelligence and good will. These arose from issues of nationalism, colonialism and racialism. We have witnessed in acute form the practical problems which arise in this world organization in seeking to reconcile the principle of the domestic jurisdiction of sovereign states over dependent peoples with the legitimate interest of the United Nations in human rights and peaceful progress towards a wider freedom for all peoples. These are not merely arid, constitutional debates. They relate to issues which, in a dynamic world, arouse strong passions and directly concern the fate of many millions of human beings.

For the most part these problems have been considered in a spirit of moderation. These great issues cannot be determined by a rigid and formal reference to the letter of the charter. I would think that the charter of the United Nations could be compared in some ways with the constitution of a nation. A constitution must have some flexibility, and must never become the master but should always remain the servant of the people. The same thing, I think, should apply to the charter of the United Nations, so that on occasion amendments should be brought forward in order to have a charter that will suit in a better way the general interests of this organization.

It must be recognized that the force of nationalism, to which I was referring, and the urge for independence are among the strongest and most explosive elements in the world today. In seeking to direct these forces toward the path of order and non-violence the United Nations has one of its most important roles to play. Such problems arose in the case of the items dealing with Morocco and Tunisia, to which the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell) referred this afternoon, and other problems relating to the development of self-government and charges of racial discrimination were also discussed.

Here delegations faced alternatives not easy to resolve or reconcile. Here were problems on which the Asian and Arab states feel particularly strongly, because to them the rights and wrongs of the case are so clearly defined. Because of this they perhaps found it difficult to understand why, in the voting in the general assembly, the Canadian delegation was not able to be always fully on their side, and at times had to oppose them. The basic reason for this is, I think, the difference of emphasis which we on the one hand, and the Arab-Asian states, on the other, place on the many factors which enter into the problem. We in the western world and the Arab and Asian states are in principle united on basic aims. It is on the choice of the best means to achieve them that we sometimes differ.

The Canadian people know too well the price to be attached to freedom of government not to be in accord with other countries which are now striving towards the same end. As citizens of a country which has gradually and peacefully transformed its status from that of a simple colony to that of a free nation, it is our duty to look with sympathy upon problems of the same nature which are facing other peoples who are also trying to attain maturity and independence. But we also have our duty to perform according to the terms of the charter of the United Nations. Our intervention in matters of that kind must not be of a kind which would endanger the peaceful relations of people in those areas.

At each session of the United Nations we also look anxiously for concrete actions which will provide a test of the real intentions of the Soviet union and of the sincerity of the desire of Soviet leaders to reduce international tensions. With the best will in the world, it cannot be said that the eighth session has been marked by any basic change in Soviet actions. The house will be well aware of the difficulties in getting the political conference started in Korea. In other fields Soviet spokesmen and their satellites have persisted in their traditional positions as, for example, on the disarmament issue; or have continued to use the assembly as a platform for their usual propaganda lines, as in colonial questions or on the issue of charter revision.

The Soviet delegation insisted in putting on the agenda near the end of the session an item on international tension. But the way to reduce international tension is not to talk about it; it is to tackle, in a spirit of co-operation, the practical difficulties and current problems which face us. There is as yet no concrete evidence that the Soviet union is willing to act in this way.

This was especially true on the question of disarmament. When this matter was debated in plenary meeting last spring the co-operative attitude adopted by Mr. Vishinsky caused many of us to think that possibly the Soviet union had begun to think that it should not be too inflexible in its attitude. Some people began to feel some hope with respect to this very important problem so far as the attitude of the Soviet union was concerned. But the position taken by Mr. Vishinsky at the eighth session of the general assembly clearly indicated that the U.S.S.R. had no intention of giving way on any of the points on which they have insisted in the past, including a one-third reduction of armed forces. Moreover, under a Soviet resolution on international tension submitted to the assembly, which deals in part with disarmament, the implementation of a general disarmament program would be a subject reserved to the security council with the result that again the Soviet union could use its veto rights. In other words, we were faced with a return by the Soviet union to the original intransigent attitude which it has consistently followed on the disarmament problem ever since it was first considered many years ago.

On the western side Canada, together with 13 other countries which are or have been members of the disarmament commission, with the sole exception of the Soviet union, sponsored a resolution which in our view avoided any provocative or controversial language. The main purpose of this resolution was to ask the disarmament commission to continue its work and to make an earnest effort to end the deadlock which has prevented any progress in this field.

I need not emphasize here that in the present state of international relations the western world cannot afford to deprive itself of its strongest weapon before being convinced that the Soviet union is ready to accept all the implications of effective international control of atomic energy, including of course continuing supervision of national territories. Moreover, the security of the west requires that the problem of atomic weapons be considered as a part of the general problem of disarmament. Western acceptance of the prohibition of atomic weapons can only take place within the context of a balanced reduction of all armed forces and armaments, including conventional as well as atomic weapons. As yet there has been no indication that the Soviet union is prepared to meet us on these fundamental points.

In the economic field an important item on the agenda was the problem of economic development of underdeveloped countries. There has been considerable difference between the points of view of the developed and the underdeveloped countries both as to the substance of the proposals and the possibility of immediate action. But the developed countries this year took an important step by accepting in principle the desirability of the eventual establishment of an international development fund. This suggestion has been discussed for many years. Governments have been invited to submit their views on certain aspects of this question as a basis for further examination. Study of the proposals for an international finance corporation are also to continue.

Two other important items concerned the raising of funds for technical assistance and for Korean reconstruction. The United Nations expanded program of technical assistance was renewed, and pledges and contributions from member countries have reached a record total of more than $24 million. Canada was one of the 23 countries which announced their intention to increase their contributions. Subject to the approval of parliament, the Canadian contribution will be increased from $800,000 to a maximum of $1,500,000. I think it is fair to suggest that our action in making this pledge had a significant influence in encouraging other countries to promise more for this program. The exact amount to be made available by Canada can be decided when more is known about the actual contributions of other countries. The assembly decided to continue the United Nations international children's fund indefinitely, with provisions for periodic review.

On the question of a Korean reconstruction program a resolution was adopted urging those who had made pledges to make good on their commitments, and recommending that specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations furnish assistance to the United Nations Korean reconstruction agency.

In the field of social affairs, the assembly touched on various aspects of the human rights question, and dealt with two items of general political importance. These were the question of the repatriation of prisoners of war from the second world war, and the question of forced labour. It concerned itself also with the problem of refugees, and a proposed program for concerted United Nations action for progress in the social field.

In the administrative field, the assembly concerned itself again with personnel problems. It adopted certain changes in the staff regulations, clarifying in some measure the powers of the secretary general. The assembly also endorsed the secretary general's far-reaching proposals for simplifying the top structure of the secretariat, and for reducing the total staff of the secretariat by 15 per cent during the next two years. It deferred a decision on the troublesome question of the awards of compensation granted by the administrative tribunal to certain dismissed United States nationals, until it could obtain a legal opinion from the international court of justice.

No summary of the political work of the United Nations in recent weeks, however brief, would be complete without mentioning the security council's consideration of the Palestine question. On November 24 it adopted a resolution strongly censuring an attack by the armed forces of Israel on a border village of Jordan. It also reaffirmed the obligation of the parties to abide by the terms of the armistice agreement and the security council resolutions, in order to progress peacefully toward a lasting settlement of that problem.

The year 1953 witnessed the resignation of the first secretary general of the United Nations, Mr. Trygve Lie, and the appointment of his successor, Mr. Dag Hammarskjold. The task of creating, maintaining and preserving the traditions of an international public service in the climate of the critical post-war years has not been, and is not now, an easy one. The fact that our organization has come this far is a tribute to the leadership which has been given, and to the services rendered, by all who have worked faithfully in the service of the United Nations. From the new secretary general, Mr. Dag Hammarskjold, we have already come to expect, as I know we shall receive in the future, service of the highest order.

In speaking to the eighth session of the general assembly the Secretary of State for External Affairs said:

> The United Nations can still draw on a tremendous fund of world-wide support. Despite the gulf which divides the world, despite the failure of some sections of opinion to recognize the fact of interdependence and the need for unity, despite the inadequacy of our own efforts in translating aspirations into reality, there is a growing world community—spanning continents, races, languages and faiths—which follows and supports efforts towards world co-operation. By the conscientiousness and clarity of thought we bring to the tasks ahead of us, by the extent to which we make the agenda items before the eighth session the sign-posts to practical and concerted action, to this extent the United Nations will merit the continuance of this support.

Mr. Speaker, judging by this standard, I think the eighth session has confirmed the view that is shared, I am convinced, by the overwhelming majority of Canadians that the United Nations must remain a cornerstone of our policy in the modern world.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Today, for the first time during the present session, Mr. Speaker, as well as for the first time in the year 1954, a day has been set aside for the discussion of our survival. We are not talking about external affairs or the interests of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). We are talking about the hope of civilization for survival. I trust that the interest in survival is greater than might at some moments appear to be the case.

I have a sense of a feeling of unreality concerning the things that have been said, and the way in which the very ominous picture before us today has been analysed. In some ways I cannot help but feel that this is where some of us came in. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) brings back to my mind memories that are associated with the nature of the discussion today. I mention him because I have known him longer than any other member in this house except the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Ferguson). I played football with the member for Vancouver South many years ago. I played football with the member for Simcoe North still earlier.

An hon. Member: You were a wonderful kicker even then.

Mr. Drew: I remember that at that time I was doing the kicking and helping on the half line of the team at the University of Toronto. I was centre half. The right half was the son of a very well known Liberal, who was presumed to be Liberal himself. The left half was rather regarded as a left, but we were all good friends. I presume I was wrong in the assessment that was placed on his views at that time, but as I have said we were all good friends. It does not seem so long ago, unfortunately, and then it was not very long after that until we found ourselves in the same artillery brigade overseas.

I only mention that now because it brings back to my memory many of the pleasures of life in the days before the first world war; and it was a very pleasant life. It also brings back to my memory a different kind of war, a stern war, a war which we were then led to believe was a war to end war. It was, in fact, Armageddon.

It did not turn out that way. When the war was over, following the armistice signed on November 11, 1918—which significantly enough we still remember rather than the date named as the day of peace—we had dreams of a new and sensible world, where reason was going to prevail. Young men of that time, like the hon. member for Vancouver South, myself and others, many of them now in this house, having regard to the lessons of the days before the war, thought that the league of nations which was then created under a charter which was part of the treaty of Versailles had in fact set up a brave new world where the joint common sense of men and women was going to prevent a repetition of that horror which most of us had seen.

That horror was seen and shared by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) just as it was by others who are here today. The dream was not entirely visionary but the dream broke down. The dream became nothing but a dream and it became nothing but a dream because those who had created this bright vision had not been able to sufficiently impress upon those who followed them the simple and inescapable fact that words and platitudes are never a substitute for that type of joint action which would prevent aggression just in the same way that you prevent, within some reasonable measure, the complete breakdown of society within the many organized communities of the world.

Then came the last world war, a war that everyone agreed in 1939 and 1940 had actually been brought closer and closer to certainty by the appeasement which encouraged the aggressor to move one step farther every time the last step succeeded beyond his highest hopes. Look back at the newspapers of 1939 and 1940, and see how everyone who was called upon to speak at every important public forum was saying that never again would the word "appeasement" be written across the face of the world in letters of blood. That was the lesson that we said we had learned.

With that impression in the minds of men and women, and with all the limitless horrors of the last world war still fresh in their minds, representatives of most of the nations of the world gathered at San Francisco in the spring of 1945 and signed the charter of the United Nations, with the hope that the failure of the league of nations would warn them of the danger of forgetting some of the lessons of days gone by.

Who can forget the warnings of that great statesman, Jan Christiaan Smuts, the man who actually first conceived the form of the league of nations. His was the warning that if this was to become a reality, then everyone should remember that the way to peace was not to be found along the road of appeasement. And there were others there with similar memories. I think the time has come for every one of us to urge that in the name of decency and civilization we should revive those memories, and remember that when we emphasized the dangers of appeasement it was simply with the thought of seeking to emphasize the danger of war itself.

Today we have heard external affairs discussed. I would be less than frank if I said tonight that I thought the Secretary of State for External Affairs had told us anything about external affairs, other than to repeat things that we already knew, except as to the decision of the government in regard to the invitation of India for a reconvening of the United Nations. I may have missed something, but I cannot recall a single thing he told us that was not already a matter of common knowledge. And this is the first debate we have had on external affairs. If I am wrong in what I have said I would be glad to be corrected.

As the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) said today when speaking on behalf of this party, we want as much agreement as there possibly can be in regard to external affairs. To whatever extent that is possible, we want a single policy which will represent the people of Canada. Mr. Speaker, a policy of that kind can come only when external affairs are discussed in an atmosphere of reality, and when the spirit and faith and belief of the members are challenged by the feeling that we are being taken into the confidence of the government, publicly, so far as possible, and privately to whatever extent that can be justified.

Passing from the remarks of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I want to speak about certain statements that were made this afternoon by the leader of the C.C.F. party. He spoke about the immense change that has taken place in Russia within these past few months. They have; tremendous changes have taken place. Stalin died less than a year ago. At that time there was great speculation whether his successor would be Beria or Malenkov. Malenkov was the successor. The leader of the opposition and his associates were disposed of; they have a somewhat different system there.

This was no removal of some disturbing element in the country. He was disturbing only to the extent that, conceivably, he might have challenged Malenkov's position. Of course, as has been pointed out already, his was the usual fate of those who have occupied the same post. I cannot recall a single head of the secret police in Russia since the revolution who has not been disposed of in the same way. I do not know why it is still possible to fill that office.

But surely anybody must be almost unbelievably naïve who thinks that Malenkov was suddenly imbued with some high moral purpose which led him to dispose of this fiend who had murdered many people in Russia over the years. Of course he had; but that is the business of any man in that job in Russia, and it will be the business of the man who is in that job in Russia now. And it was the business of the men who did that job, when they removed Beria and his associates, as they have removed many others. Yes, there have been changes. A new ruler exercises that unlimited power. Oh, yes, there are different appearances. The gestures of friendship have been made. Well, surely our memories are not so short that we do not remember the same gestures of friendship in the years just before the last world war.

It happens that I was in Moscow at the time they were carrying out a similar political change some years ago, in fact, at the time they were disposing of Tukachevski and Yakir and a number of other Russian generals in 1937. History is simply repeating itself. At that time visitors to Russia were welcomed more than they have been since the last war. The gestures of friendship on the surface were there. It was possible to find many pleasant things; art, music—all were to be found in Moscow or Leningrad in the buildings that had been erected long before the revolution. There were pleasant things there, pleasant and deceptive things.

No, the picture has not greatly changed. But then I was struck by the words of the leader of the C.C.F. when he said we may be entering a period of peaceful negotiation. Let us not forget the Russian willingness to negotiate; let us not forget the readiness of the Russians to negotiate with nazi Germany in 1939. Let us not forget that if the Russian government had not signed an agreement with nazi Germany on August 26, 1939, while they were actually negotiating with the British and the French at the same time in Moscow, it is still uncertain whether Hitler would have dared to move at that time. They were still in advance of their schedule. Do not let anybody forget the pictures they can see in the press if they are not still clear in their minds, of Mr. Molotov, who is now in Berlin, side by side with von Ribbentrop signing that agreement in the Kremlin when they pledged themselves in a friendship that was to be everlasting.

Yes, they negotiate; they will sign anything, and the documents that have been disclosed since the war make it perfectly clear that when they signed that agreement on August 26, 1939, they had no more sincerity of purpose than had the Germans. Both of them were planning for what was going to take place at the next stage.

It was not many days after that when Germany struck in that unprovoked attack on Poland which brought the free nations into the last war. It was not because any inch of the soil of Britain, of France, of any part of the British commonwealth or of the United States was challenged at that time. It was because a great principle was challenged, and that was the right of nations to live their own lives and not be subject to unprovoked aggression such as nazi Germany committed in the attack. And then what happened? Did Russia repudiate the agreement and become indignant at this breach of the understanding? No; they went in for their share. Greatly to the distaste of the Germans they moved in and occupied the other half of Poland. When thieves fall out trouble really begins. One of the thieves has been dealt with; the other is now prepared to negotiate once again.

I am repeating only in capsule form the tragic history of those early days of the last war that we should not forget. When we talk about negotiation let us remember that those are the same people—that is, those of them who have survived—and their manner of doing business has not changed in any way.

I was disturbed, and greatly disturbed, by the remarks made by the leader of the C.C.F. party in regard to the possible establishment of Soviet bases in certain parts of the world. I was disturbed because I recognize without any reservation his complete sincerity in his approach to this problem. I was disturbed because I recognized his sincerity and the extent to which many people appear to forget some of the events of even the most recent years. He said: "I wonder what we would think if the Soviet union sought to establish bases in Cuba or in Mexico?" He asked us to think of how this would be regarded in the United States as an evident sign of aggression. He may not have intended it, but I almost heard the speech I heard Bevan make in the House of Commons in Britain when he pictured two aggressors between whom there was not very much of a choice. I hope this is not the interpretation to be placed upon those remarks; but let us take what he said: "What would we think if we found the Soviet seeking to establish bases in Mexico or in Cuba or in those other places?"

Let us remember, Mr. Speaker, that the Soviets have sought to establish bases in other places throughout the world where they could get bases, and they have been very successful. Who brought the Soviet troops into East Germany? Who brought the Soviet troops into Czechoslovakia? Who brought the Soviet troops into all of eastern Europe? Then let us go back in our memory to Spain, in the days before the last war. Did I hear someone say "Churchill"? Anyone who said "Churchill" is unworthy to sit in this house, if he was suggesting that Churchill was responsible for their going in there.

Mr. Zaplitny: I was the one who said "Churchill" and my comment was that Churchill was the one who negotiated with the Russians.

Mr. Drew: I was speaking of Spain, and the hon. member knew I was speaking of Spain. I have heard that same statement before. Now, let us be quite clear that no one saw more clearly than Churchill did what was happening in Spain. Read his speeches of that time, and let no one here suggest that Churchill did not see before the last war as clearly as any human being in the world what was happening in that area, as in other parts where the bitter signs of war were still not apparent to some who sought peace just as much as he did.

No, let us not forget the friendship of Franco for those who were opposed to the things for which we stand. But let us not forget that what brought Franco to power in Spain was the communist government under Caballero. Do not let anybody suggest that it was not a communist government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: Do not let anybody suggest that it was not a communist government. I saw in Moscow tribute being paid to representatives of the people who had put Caballero there, and who were being honoured by the communists in Moscow at that time.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Does the hon. member deny that it was the fascist and the nazi brigades that finally put Franco in power?

Mr. Drew: I know my history too well not to know perfectly well who brought Franco to power. What brought Franco to power was exactly the same thing that brought Hitler to power in Germany and Mussolini to power in Italy. It was the communists; and the people who were determined to drive out communism went to another dangerous extreme. In every case these vile dictatorships have been the spawn of communism itself. Do not let anyone to my left or elsewhere distort history today. It was the vile abuses of the communist-supported and communist government of Caballero that were condemned by Churchill and by those who knew what was taking place. But do you suppose for one minute that if Caballero had stayed there, Russia would not have continued to supply Caballero with the guns, the tanks and the weapons that they had been supplying him with? Certainly weapons were supplied on the other side, and unhappily the first round of the last world war was in some measure fought in Spain. Every one of us knows that the fascists of Italy and the nazis of Germany took one side, with the communists on the other. But do not let anyone suggest that Russia has not been willing to establish bases wherever she could.

Do not think for one moment that if Russia had succeeded in gaining control of Italy through their regime there under Togliatti they would not have supplied Italy with arms, weapons and the supplies of war today. Do not believe for one moment that if they had succeeded in their dream, in which thank God they failed, of imposing a communist government on France under Thorez they would not have supplied them with guns and tanks and weapons, and that we would have been facing a very much more dreadful picture than we do today.

No, let us not get this picture distorted in any way. The suggestion that the Russians have reason to be alarmed about the establishment of bases by the United States in different parts of the world denies one very simple fact. Russia has been the great aggressor since the last war, and has brought more human beings under that vile dictatorship than were ever brought under slavery in the same period of time in the long history of the world. In that same time not one act of aggression of any kind could be charged to the government of the United States which, thank God, is our ally in this great cause. That is something to remember.

Do not suggest that those two things are on the same basis. I was disturbed today when I heard the suggestion that the NATO forces were capable of stemming aggression. We know they are not. We know that they are not in position to stem the forces of Russia assembled in Europe today. We do know that with the immense bombing power of the United States and Britain those forces can be effective to prevent aggression; but the compelling deterrent, and never let us forget it, at this time is the immense bombing power of the United States and Britain. I repeat, "and Britain". Let us pass from that.

I have dealt with these things because it would be very unfortunate if in seeking peace we forgot any of the recent lessons of history, or were beguiled into any belief that the peaceful front presented under the new leader in the Kremlin offers any assurance of good intentions until some evidence of good intention, which has not yet been given, is offered as evidence to the world of any substantial change.

Mr. Speaker, we have heard today of the horrors of another war. I do not think anyone needs to be reminded of that. Anyone who follows the radio and reads the press knows perfectly well the unbelievable extension of the deadly power of nuclear weapons. But let us always recall that the increase in the deadliness of weapons does not change a single principle which we accepted under the charter of the United Nations at San Francisco or a single lesson we were supposed to have learned in the years between the two world wars and the ghastly tragedy that followed.

In the last few days we may well have reached a dramatic turning point in history. No one can yet say with finality what is going to emerge from the conference in Berlin. Let us see quite clearly what did emerge from the proposal made on behalf of Russia by Mr. Molotov at the beginning of that conference. He proposed that China be seated immediately as one of the big five. He went further, however, and indicated quite clearly that if this proposal were accepted, then the western powers could count on the good offices of Russia to bring about peace in Korea and Indo-China.

Mr. Speaker, whatever was intended by that statement, one thing emerged in unmistakable form. How can Russia again deny their full authority over China? How can Russia again deny that they are in a position to pull the strings? That was their bait. That was their promise. They said if we accepted communist China as one of the big five they would do what we have all said Russia could do.

That did something more. It centred international diplomacy on the willingness or otherwise of the free nations to recognize communist China, to give such further recognition and to be prepared to accept her in the United Nations. It meant nothing else. They are to be one of the big five. That means they are to be one of the five permanent members of the United Nations security council. It had no other meaning and was not intended to have any other meaning.

It is granted that certain other things have happened since then; but I think most of us will be greatly surprised if this conference ends with that position changed. I think most of us will be surprised if this conference does not end with the Russian demand still there, that the price of negotiation, the price of peace which they can enforce upon their puppets, is the recognition of communist China and the entry of communist China into the United Nations. They were called to Berlin to talk about the unification of Germany and Austria, but the focal point of international diplomacy has been carried across two oceans and this continent to China.

Mr. Speaker, all the members of this house may not have agreed from time to time with the things that have been said by Mr. Dulles. However, it may be a good thing at this time that issues are presented not in the old terms of veiled diplomacy but in direct and understandable words that ordinary human beings throughout the world can really understand. Mr. Dulles used words of that kind the day before yesterday. This is what he said:

> "But who is this Chou En-lai?" Dulles asked. "He is the leader of a regime which attained de facto power through bloody war, which liquidated millions of Chinese as the only means of maintaining power and which devotes so much of its resources to military aims that its people starve by the millions. Such is the man who, Mr. Molotov says, should sit with us. Mr. Molotov has portrayed an illusion. Our moral sense forbids us to accept him."

I hope that in this house we will say that our moral sense forbids us to accept Chou En-lai, Mao Tse-tung or any of the communist hierarchy who are murdering their countrymen in the name of communism in China today. As to the Asian communists, we hear them spoken of as though this were a denatured form of communism. Perhaps it would be well for us not to forget that a substantial part of Russia is in Asia. That fact, of course, gave them the opportunity to train, equip, finance and feed their fifth column under Mao which they organized on the borders of Russia until it was ready to invade China. Do not let anyone pretend that this was an agrarian uprising or an expression of new social consciousness of the people of China. Do not let anybody suggest that this was a Chinese revolt. It was an invasion by a Chinese communist fifth column led by Mao and under the direction of Moscow at all times, as it still is today. If we had been in any doubt about that fact, Mr. Molotov has made it plain by saying that if that puppet government is recognized and accepted in the United Nations, he will use his power to bring peace in Asia.

No, this is not some new expression of Chinese social consciousness. Neither I nor, I hope, anyone else here would suggest that conditions in China were admirable under the government which preceded the present government there, but one of the things which seems at times to be difficult to comprehend is the way in which Chiang Kai-shek suddenly became the human incarnation of evil the moment that Russian military power happened to be able to move Mao in to form a new government in Peking.

No, Chiang Kai-shek was not giving China democratic government, nor had it ever had democratic government. But let us be quite sure that China will never have democratic government under the present government there. Let us not shed any crocodile tears for the man who has succeeded Chiang Kai-shek, even if one is able suddenly to forget that not so long ago we did find it possible to express some admiration for Chiang Kai-shek because of the fortitude which was shown for many years in stemming Japanese aggression while the rest of the world was twiddling its thumbs and letting aggression take its course. Have we forgotten the report on Japanese aggression prepared by a commission of which a great Canadian jurist formed a part? Have we forgotten what we were told at that time about the possibility of stemming Japanese aggression? I hope not. But we seem to have forgotten that at that time, whatever his methods of government may have been, Chiang Kai-shek was able to lead the Chinese people in resistance to that aggression for a long time.

It was because of his long struggle against a common enemy at that time that China became one of the big five, not because it happened to occupy a particular part of the map of Asia or because of any particular tradition or background. China, under Chiang Kai-shek, became one of the big five because they had fought aggression longer than had any other nation at that time. That is something to be remembered when, too lightly, any suggestion may be made that Mao should step into Chiang's position and assume the same dignity and authority that was accorded to China at that time because of what they had done to fight aggression.

We have many Chinese in Canada, Mr. Speaker, and I have yet to meet a Chinaman in Canada who supports the present communist government in that country—not one, and I have met many of them. I do not think those who live in Vancouver will find many Chinese in Chinatown who will express any support, veiled or otherwise, of the communist government in Peking. I think that is true right across this country. It has certainly been true any place where I have met the many Chinese I have met in these past few years since the communist fifth column under Mao invaded China. No, the Chinese in this country dream of that day when this ghastly slavery will be ended and when, halting though the steps may be, once again the forward march of the Chinese people toward something of our kind of democracy may begin.

That brings us to the age-old question which applies not only in China but elsewhere. Am I my brother's keeper? I must confess some surprise that there are those who seem to be ready to accept the existence of communist governments imposed by force or threat of force as the status quo, but who are satisfied simply to bask in the sunshine of our own freedom and offer no hope of sunshine or light to those people now living in the darkness of communist slavery. I hope no one will interpret what I have said as suggesting that we can or should contemplate, or would under any conceivable circumstances think of contemplating, a military movement against the governments of any of these countries. No sensible person would even contemplate that possibility. But the least we can do is to stand firm in our own convictions and, standing firm in our own convictions, insist that Russia, which signed the charter of the United Nations in the spring of 1945, extend to those nations outside of Russia which are now enslaved and are servants of the Kremlin an opportunity to choose by a free vote their own form of government.

Is that a vague and unreasonable ideal? It is only a vague and unreasonable ideal if we did an utterly unreasonable thing in 1939 when we regarded the invasion of Poland as a challenge to the fundamental principle that every nation has a right to choose its own form of government, whether it be communist or otherwise, as long as it is their own choice. Are we going to forget the millions of people of Poland who did, for a while, have hope? Are we going to forget the millions of people of the Ukraine who, for a while, also had hope and were free?

May I interject at this point that I hope no one will suggest that the Ukraine is part of Russia. If it is, the representative of the Ukraine has no right to be sitting as a representative of an independent nation at the United Nations in New York now.

Mr. Low: He has no right anyway.

Mr. Drew: In any event, Russia itself is one country that cannot deny that the Ukraine is an independent country, because they insisted that the Ukraine be recognized as an independent country and that their representative be seated there in that capacity. No; in this case we can claim Russian support for the proposition that the Ukraine is an independent country, and I hope the time will come when that support may be extremely valuable to the people of the Ukraine and all who love freedom.

Have we forgotten the people of Czechoslovakia who, before the last war, had one of the finest democracies to be found anywhere in the world, a peaceful, peace-loving, vigorous, dynamic democracy, betrayed by communists who unhappily were brought into the government of that country in the mistaken idea that you can deal with communists? Have we forgotten the people of Hungary? Remember, Hungary is no stranger to democracy. The golden bull which declared the freedom of the people of Hungary was signed a few years before Magna Carta. That lovely parliament building on the bank of the Danube was one of the great homes of democracy in the world.

Have we forgotten the people of Bulgaria? No, I am not going to suggest that they understood the processes of democracy, but they had their form of government which was their own, and they are now under Russian control. Have we forgotten the people of Roumania, an enlightened country with a great culture and great traditions? Have we forgotten Lithuania on the Baltic, Latvia and Estonia where, before this last war, people were living in decency, comfort and democracy which was a beautiful and shining contrast to the life in Russia to the south of them? Have we forgotten the people in other parts of the world, including China, who have been brought under this slavery? I hope not.

At the moment all we can hope to do is to stand firm in our own convictions. But there is one way that we can test the good faith of Russia which does not depend upon negotiations, and it seems to me such a simple test. Let us simply place before them the charter of the United Nations, and remind them of their signature to that charter. Then we could recall to them certain provisions of that charter, and recall that in the preamble to the charter itself there was the assertion, supported by Russia as one of the big five, that every nation is equal in its right to determine its own course. Russia has brought hundreds of millions of people under as vile a form of slavery as the world has ever seen in these years since the last world war. Can anyone suggest that, if Russia were seeking entry to the United Nations today, any person who had been even moderately informed on modern history could support Russia's entry without repudiating every sanction of the United Nations itself?

Now, having said that, I recognize that Russia is a member. There are provisions for expulsion. I recognize that it would be folly, that it would be meaningless, to discuss the expulsion of Russia. She is one of the big five with veto power in the security council, so we would not get very far with that. But, Mr. Speaker, China with its puppet government is an aggressor, so declared by the United Nations in Korea, and still an active aggressor in Indo-China today. I fail to see how anyone who retains any mental integrity in their approach to the undertakings of the United Nations can suggest that, under present conditions, China could even be considered for membership in the United Nations.

Let us remember, of course, the distinction between recognition and entry into the United Nations. There seems to be confusion about that. Recognition simply means formal recognition of a government as the de facto government of the state with which we are prepared to do business. Whether or not we are prepared to do business with communist China is something still to be considered, but there is a vast difference between recognition and the entry of the government of communist China into the United Nations. What a travesty it would be if we even discussed it while countries like Portugal, Italy, Japan, West Germany, Austria, Finland, Switzerland and Spain, which we have recognized and to which we send diplomatic representatives, are not members of that organization. What a travesty it would be if we found the dictatorship of Salazar so offensive that we could not admit Portugal, our friend for so long in peace and war, and at the same time we would contemplate the entry of the government of communist China, whose hands are dripping with the blood of the people they have murdered in their rise to power.

No, Mr. Speaker, there could be too high a price to pay. In saying that, I am not suggesting for one moment that we should contemplate the possibility of the kind of terror that would be visited on the world in a modern atomic war. Let me repeat that if we meant what we said back in 1939-40, then we believed at that time—and we might have reason to believe today—that appeasement leads to war, and that the way to preserve peace is to stand firm in a common cause, not to temporize with those who have betrayed every decent undertaking to which they subscribed at a time when we were associated with them in an effort to prevent aggression during the last world war.

No, Mr. Speaker; let us have more reality in discussing this subject. Let us ask that Russia give us evidence of her good faith before we proceed with further negotiations. I repeat that evidence of good faith can easily be offered, simply by agreeing to permit a free vote in one of those countries I have mentioned as a first step toward honouring their signature to the charter of the United Nations. Let them pick Poland, the Ukraine, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Bulgaria, Roumania, Lithuania, Latvia, Estonia, China or any other country which they have occupied, including Tibet; let them display a single bit of evidence of good faith in that way. Otherwise we are simply following the age-old course to ruin.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, one of the most dramatic pictures in the Scriptures is that of the devil conveying the Saviour to a high place and offering him all the realms of the world in return for a bond under which the position of the devil would be recognized. Throughout history not only the Christians but all those who believe in the same principle have followed that example of salvation by repudiating any bargain of that kind. The road to salvation is found along other ways, not along the road to appeasement or bargains of that nature. We want peace by every device within human power. Let us prevent this supreme catastrophe but, Mr. Speaker, let our voices be raised in a way that will leave no doubt that in Canada we want no bargain with the devil.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to the agreement which had been reached, and according to which we have proceeded today, since it is now ten o'clock the house adjourns automatically.

Mr. Coldwell: Would it be possible, Mr. Speaker, for us to sit another 15 minutes to permit the minister to reply to some of the criticisms?

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Mr. Stick: No.

Mr. Speaker: I hear that there is objection to it.

Mr. Coldwell: Where?

Mr. Speaker: Some hon. members are objecting to sitting after ten o'clock. I shall ask the question again. Is the house giving its consent so the Secretary of State for External Affairs may have a few minutes in which to reply?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stick: No.

Mr. Speaker: I hear "No" again. Therefore, as it is ten o'clock—

Mr. Knowles: Who said "No"?

Mr. Stick: I did. I believe that the Secretary of State for External Affairs—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member should not give an explanation for his negative attitude. He has said "No"; therefore unanimous consent is not given.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Speaker: Will the minister announce the business for Tuesday?

Mr. Knowles: Monday.

Mr. Harris: On Monday we will consider, in turn, amendments to the Senate and House of Commons Act, amendments to the Salaries Act, amendments to the Post Office Act, and then the Criminal Code.

Mr. Green: In that order?

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, February 1, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

THE PRIME MINISTER—CONGRATULATIONS ON BIRTHDAY

Mr. Speaker: It is the practice for the Speaker to inform the house about messages that he receives. Needless to say, I am pleased to inform the house that today is the birthday of the Right Hon. the Prime Minister. I am sure I express the views of everyone when I wish him a very happy birthday and many happy returns of the day.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): May I avail myself of the privilege, with the consent of the house, of extending to the Prime Minister the warmest good wishes for many happy returns of his birthday. One of the happy incidents of service in the House of Commons is that the contacts we make with each other leave no doubt in our minds about the sincerity with which those of different political views seek to serve the common cause. With that in mind we extend our friendship and our personal contacts, but always reserving, as we always shall, the right to disagree. That is a healthy state of affairs.

I extend good wishes to the Prime Minister not only for his health and happiness on the occasion of his birthday but also for the trip ahead of him. May I remind hon. members that the Prime Minister, looking extremely well, is, after all, still a comparative youngster when one compares his age with that of the very youthful head of another government of the commonwealth with whom he will be lunching in just a few days. In extending our good wishes to him today, may I express the hope that for long years ahead his health, vigour and happiness may continue.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I wish to thank you, Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition and all my colleagues for these expressions of good wishes, the sincerity of which I find very touching. It is one of the perhaps not too many satisfactions of public life to be able to vigorously prosecute one's own opinions and ideas and still feel that one retains the esteem of those with whom one is trying to serve the state. We all welcome every opportunity to exchange warm good wishes with each other on proper occasions, and thereby to show each other that we do appreciate the sincerity of each of us in endeavouring to serve our great country to the best of our individual ability.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I do want to say that I am sure all of us, irrespective of our political views, join with the Leader of the Opposition, the Speaker and everyone else in extending our good wishes to the Prime Minister. When we say this sort of thing sometimes some people, because of our political differences, think that there is some insincerity about it, but I want to say that I am confident that there is no insincerity anywhere in the house in wishing the Prime Minister health, happiness and many happy returns of the day.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I am very glad, Mr. Speaker, that there are occasions when it is possible for us to forget our differences and emphasize the common ground on which we stand. Birthdays seem to be one of those occasions, and I am very happy to be able at this time to join the other hon. gentlemen who have spoken in extending to the Prime Minister our very warmest wishes for many happy returns of the day and to assure him that there must be many hon. members who hope that at 72 they will be as spry as the Prime Minister.

COMMONWEALTH FINANCE CONFERENCE

TABLING OF OFFICIAL COMMUNIQUE—STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, since the full text may not have been available to all hon. members, I thought I might table the official text of the communique issued at the conclusion of the meeting of commonwealth finance ministers in Australia which ended on the 15th of January. There is little I can add, or perhaps should add, to what is in the communique. As the house knows, this was the most recent of a series of meetings that have been held at fairly regular intervals since the end of the war. At these meetings the questions which have been discussed have related primarily to the commonwealth countries in the sterling area. As the house is aware, the United Kingdom acts as banker for and holds the reserves of the sterling area countries. As a result of conditions arising out of the war, sterling has been inconvertible up to the present time, and it has been necessary to impose a variety of restrictions upon trade. I have had the privilege of attending all these meetings since the end of the war. In my opinion this last meeting was, in many ways, one of the most satisfactory of any of them.

The questions reviewed were the progress made in liberalizing trade and in moving towards the goal of convertibility. The targets were set two years ago, at a time of real crisis, and they were reaffirmed at the meeting a year ago. Anyone who has watched the march of events will realize there has been a moderate but steady improvement during all that period. Today sterling is stronger than it has been at any time since the end of the war, and there has been a progressive liberalization of all these trade restrictions. I am happy to say that at the meeting in Sydney the goals of freer trade and convertibility were reaffirmed.

I have always hesitated to assume the role of prophet, and I do not presume to do so now. The time when sterling, one of the world's great trading currencies, is made convertible must of course be determined by those who are primarily responsible for that currency. But in my opinion, that goal is very much nearer than any one of us would have dared to hope even as short a time since as a year ago.

I should like to add one word, and that is to say that the arrangements made by our host, the Australian government, were admirable in every respect. The Australian Prime Minister, Mr. Menzies, who presided, did so with his usual ability and tact. The hospitality which was extended to us by our Australian friends was beyond praise. I regret that because of a minor throat affliction I was not able to participate to the extent to which I would have liked. Nevertheless, I can assure you that the hospitality was fully up to what I had always heard were Australian standards, so that all in all I found it was a most satisfactory conference.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the insistence with which we have presented requests in this house at different times, Mr. Speaker, in the form of resolutions seeking the initiative in reaching the goal of convertibility, we will naturally welcome with great enthusiasm the statement that the goal of convertibility is so much nearer. I must say that we welcome also the fact that convertibility has now become a respectable word. There was a time when ridicule was poured on the suggestion that our government might take the initiative in seeking ways to further the cause of convertibility. The Australian government, having taken the initiative, obviously has attained results which are satisfactory to the government. While we would regret that the initiative had not been taken in accordance with our resolution, we welcome this statement that the goal of convertibility is closer today than it was before.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I ask the minister whether he could make the communique available by having it printed, perhaps as an annex to Hansard or in some other convenient manner?

Mr. Abbott: If the house were willing to agree, I am sure it would be entirely satisfactory to have the document printed as an annex to today's Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that this document be printed as an addendum to Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(For text of document see appendix, pages 1671-75.)

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

STATEMENT ON AWARDING OF CONTRACTS FOR BUILDING

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): On several occasions recently, Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) has addressed questions to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) concerning the national film board, and the Prime Minister had answered, I think, on each occasion that the government was considering the awarding of a contract for the building of the headquarters and operational units. The house will recall that the Massey commission and the J. D. Woods and Gordon company, when they investigated the work of the board some years ago, both recommended that the board should be housed in one building rather than in the eight or nine places they now occupy, and in which they work under quite unsatisfactory conditions. These recommendations were passed upon by a committee of this house something less than two years ago.

In the meantime the government took steps to investigate the sites available, and a property was located in Ville St. Laurent and acquired at a price which, at the moment, has totalled about $256,000. It may cost up to $25,000 or perhaps $30,000 more to negotiate for the remaining pieces of property. At this point invitations were extended by the Department of Public Works for tenders for the buildings, and several tenders were received, the lowest being $5,230,760. With the expenditure of that amount before it, the government has been considering this question to see if that expenditure is justified, having in mind the operations of the film board and as well the acknowledged fact that private industry in the film trade in Canada has been improving in the quality and quantity of its output. We did give serious consideration to this question, and came to the conclusion that the national film board was producing films of an educational and cultural nature which were providing real advantages to the Canadian people, and that if the film board did not produce these they could not be otherwise produced in Canada.

For that reason, we have decided that this advantage should be continued, and for the benefit of the Canadian people we have authorized the awarding of a contract to the lowest tender in the amount I have mentioned. May I say, sir, that I have only been responsible for the work of the film board in parliament for the past few months. In the study we have made during that time, we have been struck by the remarkably improved efficiency of the film board in the past few years and the much improved public relations which it seems to enjoy with the Canadian taxpayer. I cannot help but take this opportunity, sir, to say that in my opinion this is due not only to the good work of the employees and the present and former commissioners, but in particular to the supervisory and administrative skill of my predecessor, the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters).

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): The statement made by the minister, Mr. Speaker, raises a point that goes far beyond the awarding of a contract. This subject has been under discussion before, and the answers that were given at that time are a matter of some importance in considering the extent to which parliament is, or should be, brought into the confidence of the government in regard to matters that are of very great public importance.

The minister has referred to the reports of the Massey commission and the J. D. Woods and Gordon company. I would remind the minister that if he will look at the report of the J. D. Woods and Gordon company—which I might say in this case was not regarded as a secret document in regard to some of its contents—it speaks of the bringing together in Ottawa—

Mr. Winters: No, it does not.

Mr. Drew: It speaks of the bringing together in Ottawa of the buildings of the film board. Now, I am not suggesting—

Mr. Winters: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Drew: I am not suggesting, Mr. Speaker, that the finding was a positive recommendation in regard to Ottawa or otherwise; but if the minister will look back at the J. D. Woods and Gordon report he will see a reference to the words "in Ottawa". The minister shakes his head, but I feel sure he will find it. The minister will recall that at the time the J. D. Woods and Gordon company were being called upon to make this investigation there was no suggestion then, so far as we were informed, other than of improved efficiency and integration of the activities of the board, and the bringing together of the functions of the board in a single unit. Now, so far as the recommendations are concerned, they did not place before the house any comparative advantages as between Ottawa and any other city. And I wish to make it abundantly clear that I am not presuming to express an opinion as to where the less desirable site would be. We simply have no information before us.

Attempts that were made by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Fraser) to get information when this item came before the house last year, on April 9, 1953, indicate just how little was available. On that occasion the hon. member for Peterborough pressed the minister responsible for information as to what was contemplated. Let us take a couple of examples just to see how little this house knew about what was then taking place. In response to a question put at that time the minister said, as reported at page 3645 of Hansard:

> I am not too sure we have completed purchase of the site.

If he was not, who would be? Then he went on to say:

> I think somebody raised that question earlier in the session and I answered that we were negotiating with two or three parties who are the owners of the site.

This, mark you, was on the occasion when these main estimates were before the house for consideration, a time when, we have been told, the house made a decision in this matter.

Then, on another occasion, when the minister was asked what he thought it would cost, he said:

> I am told that the whole project will cost approximately $5 million . . . We have not completed the purchase of the land and I would not like to give the figures I have here at this time.

That is the last time there was any opportunity for members of this house to obtain positive information. The item passed in the absence of that information.

Then an announcement was subsequently made that a decision had been taken to move this to Ville St. Laurent. That may be an excellent decision or it may not, depending upon what the reasons are; and this house surely has a right to know what reasons motivated the government in coming to that decision.

We have tried on a number of occasions, as hon. members will recall, to obtain information. Hon. members will recall that in the debate on the speech from the throne, when I spoke in opening the debate, I pointed out the absence of information on something which not only involved an expenditure of money but had very important cultural features in connection with it as embraced in the Massey commission's report, to which reference has already been made. My request at that time was denied. No steps were taken to carry out my suggestion.

Then, on January 19 of this year, I directed the attention of the Prime Minister to a press report which had just appeared respecting the national film board, which said that the government was reconsidering its decision. I asked the Prime Minister whether there would be an opportunity to discuss the matter further. His reply, as reported at page 1235 of Hansard, is as follows:

> There has been no decision reached in that matter. What is under consideration at the present time is the tenders that were submitted for the construction of a building in Montreal. They are all of a very substantial amount, and the matter that is now under consideration is as to whether or not the government will recommend the appropriations required for that large expenditure at this time.

I then asked:

> Do I understand from what the Prime Minister has said that, having regard to the amount involved, the government may actually be reconsidering whether it will or will not move the national film board from Ottawa?

To that the Prime Minister replied:

> No decision has been reached in that regard, but until the government comes to parliament with a definite recommendation for a definite amount to be expended for a building at a definite place there is always a possibility that changes in the recommendation may be made.

Now, there is both a question of propriety of procedure, and a question of the rights of parliament involved. The Prime Minister said at that time:

> . . . until the government comes to parliament with a definite recommendation for a definite amount to be expended for a building at a definite place there is always a possibility that changes in the recommendation may be made.

Let us assume he thought that changes were not going to be made. It was said that the matter would be laid before parliament before changes were made.

Then, within a few days, in fact the very next day, I read a statement in the press by Mr. Gardiner—this was not the Minister of Agriculture but, I believe, an architect in the Department of Public Works.

Mr. Winters: The chief architect.

Mr. Drew: The chief architect. He said that this matter was going to come before treasury board for recommendation. On that occasion I said:

> In the late afternoon edition of the Ottawa Journal I read that the definite recommendation in regard to the adoption of a tender for the construction of the national film board building was definitely going to the treasury board. It seems to me that these statements are inconsistent. Having regard to the general principle involved and the assurance by the Prime Minister that we would have something before us before this move was definite, it seems to me that we should know what the situation is.

To that the Prime Minister replied:

> I would hope that the house would take the statements made by the government in the house in preference to speculative reports by newspapers.

And hon. members in the house on that occasion will I am sure recall the firmness with which the Prime Minister made that statement and the hilarious applause with which his supporters in parliament greeted what was intended to be a rebuke made concerning even the very suggestion that anything contrary to what had been said on January 19 was contemplated.

I feel sure that the Prime Minister did not have the information before him when he made that statement. Then, today, we have the statement of the minister responsible for this, who blandly comes to the house and tells us this, in spite of the assurance by the Prime Minister that, "until the government comes to parliament with a definite recommendation for a definite amount to be expended for a building at a definite place, there is always a possibility that changes in the recommendation may be made".

I think this is a challenge to the rights of parliament concerning information in regard to the business of the people of Canada, and I say that a very real question of privilege arises in that members were misled—I am sure it was unintentional, because I feel sure the Prime Minister was sure that nothing had taken place at that time. But the fact is that now a statement is made by the minister in charge which confirms the announcement to which I referred earlier, made by the chief architect in the Department of Public Works, that this was going to treasury board in any event.

I recall again the words of the Prime Minister, when that was pointed out to him:

> I would hope that the house would take the statements made by the government in the house in preference to speculative reports by newspapers.

Unfortunately, those speculative reports, as they were called, turned out to be right. On the basis of the Prime Minister's statement, I submit that this house has a right to ask that the government reconsider this decision today. We do not pretend to be in a position to say where this building should go. We have been denied any information. The last time it was up for discussion we were told that the government did not have any plans, although they insisted on the item going through. We have no reasons before us why this should be done and I submit, Mr. Speaker, that both for the purpose of establishing the authority of parliament and for the purpose of doing the business of the people of Canada in an orderly manner, this should be reconsidered. It should be placed before the House of Commons, as was clearly implied by the Prime Minister in the statement on January 19.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word on this. I knew what I was talking about when I made that answer to the Leader of the Opposition here. Tenders always go to the treasury board, but the treasury board had been requested not to act upon this tender until council as a whole had reconsidered the matter. Council as a whole had not reconsidered the matter at that time. Council as a whole has since on two occasions very seriously reconsidered the matter, and the factors which led us to take the responsibility of deciding that we would come to parliament with a recommendation for the appropriation, and we will.

Mr. Drew: Then may I ask of the Prime Minister whether he will tell us what the factors are which have led to this decision?

Mr. St. Laurent: I think that all the declarations such as have been made at this time on this matter have gone just about as far as the rules and the practice of the house will allow. The recommendation to parliament will be in the estimates, and there will be a full opportunity to discuss the whole matter when that estimate is submitted to parliament for its approval or disapproval.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, may I say a word?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is entitled to speak, since it is the practice of this house, when a minister makes a statement on the orders of the day, to allow one spokesman for each opposition party to make observations. That was the practice established by my predecessor. I should like to refer hon. members to a statement which I made on November 25, 1953, with respect to a ruling of my predecessor on June 4, 1951, where he said:

> It is not customary to allow a debate on a statement made at this stage of the proceedings. I have allowed the Leader of the Opposition and the leaders of the other two groups to speak, but it is not customary to permit other hon. members to do so.

I have extended this privilege to a spokesman for each party because, as we know, sometimes an hon. member other than the leader of his party is a specialist on certain subjects. I therefore say it is fairer to establish the practice of having a spokesman for each party speak on the matter.

Later on in the same debate Mr. Speaker Macdonald had this to say:

> Of course I cannot allow a debate on it at this time. We cannot generalize.

Since a statement has been made by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) and since the Leader of the Opposition has spoken on the matter I will now see a spokesman for the C.C.F. party and also a spokesman for the Social Credit party, if one wishes to speak, and I would imagine that the matter should rest there for the moment.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I was not rising to speak on this subject, Mr. Speaker. I was rising to protest on a point of order, or on a question of privilege, whichever you would care to recognize, about this way of carrying on debate. If this question should be debated we should ask for a time to debate it so that all hon. members would have equal opportunity to express their views on it. This is not something that happened just today. It is almost a daily occurrence in this house. It often happens that the Leader of the Opposition and some minister of the crown talk across the floor on some question that should be debated by hon. members. Perhaps some of the fault today rests with the minister because of the time he chose to make his statement. I do not believe it should have been made on motions, in answer to a question. It should have been made after the questions were disposed of. If it was a question asked on the orders of the day, the answer should have been given then. But my chief contention is that no provision is made in the rules of this house for such debates as have been continually carried on in this house in the past.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway rose not to speak to the statement but on a point of order, that is different. If there are other remarks strictly directed to the point of order, I shall listen to them.

Mr. Drew: My remarks are exclusively directed to the point of order. I would recall that the practice which has developed is one which should be understood by all hon. members because it relates to the requests that have been made for some opportunity to debate things that come before the house. I would point out that under the rules, wisely or unwisely, no provision is made by which a minister has a higher right to rise and make a statement than any other hon. member. That was pointed out, and it was also pointed out that if we were to accord the courtesy to a minister to make a statement before the orders of the day, then it was only appropriate that there be an opportunity to make some observations in regard to that statement.

An hon. Member: How often do you want to do it?

Mr. Drew: I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that so far as these discussions are concerned my own recommendations some time ago were that we find a device by which, on some substantive motion, matters of the kind could be brought forward. Unfortunately, that has not been dealt with. It would only be necessary for any member to object to the minister making the statement to prevent the statement being made. We do not want to raise such an objection; we want the statement to be made. But it was pointed out at that time when this was under discussion before, and when Mr. Speaker Macdonald made the ruling, that we would be ready and willing to accord unanimous consent to the introduction of statements of this kind so long as an opportunity to make observations on them were provided in this way. It was upon that basis that the ruling was made. I submit that anything else would be really a challenge to the concept of parliament as a parliament of government and opposition.

If statements could be made by unanimous consent with no observations on the other side, we could get a steady procession of statements of this nature without any opportunity to correct or to make observations that would be related to them. That was the basis on which Mr. Speaker Macdonald made the ruling. I have no desire to see this practice changed, but I would equally point out that if the practice of ministers making statements of this sort, without a substantive motion, is to continue, then obviously the practice of giving opportunity for some reply or some observation should continue as well.

Mr. Winters: May I now state my question of privilege having to do with the interpretation placed on the use of the words "in Ottawa" in the report submitted by J. D. Woods and Gordon.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. member for Ottawa West should explain that.

Mr. Coldwell: I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Winters: My question is one of privilege. It has to do with the statement made by the Leader of the Opposition, in which he said the words were there and implied I said they were not there. Mr. Speaker, the words "in Ottawa" are in the report. The film board has operations all over this country. I well know that the author of the report intended the words to mean that the operations of the board here in Ottawa should be assembled under one roof; but he did not mean that they should be assembled under one roof in Ottawa. There is quite a difference, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar wishes to raise a point?

Mr. Coldwell: I think what is happening—

Mr. Drew: On a question of privilege, I think that answer should be amplified.

Mr. Coldwell: I think what is happening this afternoon illustrates the difficulties we are in. This has developed into a debate, and there are others who want to participate in this debate. I want to participate in this debate. While the Leader of the Opposition occupies an official place in this house, I do not think the whole discussion on matters of this sort should be confined to the Leader of the Opposition. Mr. Speaker, if I may ask the minister a question, I should like to ask him whether this contract will be let before the estimates are before the house for approval by the house. Can he tell us in any event, particularly if his answer is in the negative, what will be the total cost of this project and the removal of the staff to Montreal? Further, to what extent, if any, is Central Mortgage and Housing involved in the purchase of land for the housing of staff and employees in Ville St. Laurent?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry, but I think there comes a time when a decision must be made. I think that time has arrived. The question asked by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) is on Hansard and if unanimous consent is given the minister can answer. It is difficult for the Speaker to diagnose exactly the type of statement which my predecessor had in mind when he made his ruling. Personally I do not think that the statement made by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) today was the type of statement that Mr. Speaker Macdonald had in mind when he made his ruling. Nevertheless, had I jumped to my feet at the time to try to explain that, I am sure there would have been some objection.

Hon. members will recall that until two years ago it was an old tradition of this house that ministers were entitled to make statements about public affairs when motions were called and no replies were allowed by any member of the house to ministerial statements. Following representations that were offered, Mr. Speaker Macdonald gave the ruling I referred to, namely that when a minister makes a statement the leaders of the various groups will be allowed to reply.

Perhaps that is not the type of ruling that gives satisfaction because hon. members can always stand up and say that they have equal rights in the house. While the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), ministers of the government and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) may be considered to be in a different position under our rules, nevertheless the principal rule is that all hon. members are equal and have equal rights. Therefore, if one hon. member is allowed to speak, why should not I allow others to speak? That is why, in the light of that ruling, on the first occasion a statement was made in this house by a minister after I took office I made this statement, which I repeat, which is to be found at page 329 of Hansard of November 25, 1953:

> Before the Leader of the Opposition speaks, and since this is the first occasion that has arisen where a minister has made a statement before the orders of the day are called, I should like to remind hon. members that in the last parliament, when an important statement was made, the leaders of the three opposition parties were permitted to take part in the debate; that is, to ask questions or to make comments. I should like to refer hon. members to page 3669 of Hansard of June 4, 1951, where Mr. Speaker Macdonald said:
> "It is not customary to allow a debate on a statement at this stage of the proceedings. I have allowed the Leader of the Opposition and the leaders of the other two groups to speak, but it is not customary to permit other hon. members to do so."
> I should like this gentleman's agreement to be adhered to, if it is possible, following the statement.

And further, on a different occasion, Mr. Speaker Macdonald also ruled that a debate cannot be generalized. He said, as reported on page 411 of Hansard of December 8, 1952:

> "I think now the house is entering upon a debate on the subject."

That had to do with television. I continue to quote:

> Mr. Speaker Macdonald went on to say:
> "Of course I cannot allow a debate on it at this time. The remarks of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) should be directed strictly to the statement which has been read. We cannot generalize."
> With these previous rulings as a guide, I will ask the Leader of the Opposition to make his comments.

If I may say so, I have extended this gentleman's agreement, not only to the leaders of the three opposition parties but to the spokesman for each party. It is known that on all matters of housing, for instance, the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) might be the one called upon to speak on behalf of the Conservative party. On matters pertaining to transport, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) might be the one called upon to speak on behalf of his party. That is the limit to which I think I should go in interpreting the spirit and the letter of that ruling.

But when hon. members claim that this practice which has now been established is going too far and is detrimental to the rights of private members in this house, it may well be that the house should consider whether or not we had better revert to the old traditional practice whereby a minister made his statement and no debate was permitted from the other side of the house or on the part of any private member. I should like to leave this for the consideration of the house. Precedents are being established in two ways: First, by Mr. Speaker through his rulings and, second, by hon. members taking certain attitudes on various occasions.

We have come to a situation where, if we cannot have the gentleman's agreement adhered to, under which a minister would make a statement and a spokesman for each opposition party would reply; if that arrangement is not satisfactory, I am announcing now I shall have to consider going back to the practice which was honoured before of not allowing anyone to speak following the minister.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, before you depart from that, do you wish any comments on this? I ask, because it is an important matter. We have statements made almost every day by ministers, and as I understand it you are not making any ruling at the moment. I assume that you will accept written submissions in regard to this matter now before us.

Mr. Speaker: I do not wish to have the matter debated now. I am merely saying that the practice has developed whereby a spokesman for each party or the leader of each opposition party was allowed to make observations directly related to a statement made by the minister. I am quite willing to carry on with that arrangement, but if it is violated too often I shall have to assume the responsibility, and I so announce now, of deciding that if the gentleman's agreement is not adhered to properly we will revert to the old practice of allowing a minister to make a statement but not allowing any other member to comment upon it.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, may I now ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) what the total cost of this project will be, and the related question as to whether arrangements have been made by or with the approval of Central Mortgage for the acquisition of land for the building of homes for the employees, and if the contract will be let before the estimates come before the house for approval?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, the estimated cost of the move is of course just an estimate. There will be the cost of moving equipment from Ottawa and the cost of moving personnel. In addition to that, there will be the purchase of furniture which is not now owned by the board because of the quarters they now occupy, and it is difficult to put any firm figure on all these matters. However, it is thought that all that may run to $500,000, including furnishings. I am informed by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) that no arrangements have been made up to the present time through Central Mortgage for the housing of the employees.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

AMENDMENT TO PREVENT INCREASE IN MAXIMUM RETIRING ALLOWANCE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 176, to amend the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, when the banking and commerce committee in 1952 recommended the bill which became the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act it was drafted in such a way that if an adjustment upward or downward was made subsequently to members' indemnities their contributions to the retiring fund and the matching contributions of the government would be increased or decreased in the same proportion and so eventually would be the retiring allowances for those who ultimately became entitled to receive them.

It was felt that such proportionate adjustment in the contributions without any shortening of the period during which they were made would bring about a situation where the fund would remain actuarially sound and self-supporting, because only a small number of the many contributors were expected to ever become entitled to retiring allowances.

We have now reason to believe that that was the best kind of forecast that could be made at that time, but after all it was only a forecast and we do not think that there should be any automatic change in the contributions or ultimate possible effects at this time.

The purpose of this bill is to recommend amendments to the act to prevent any change in its operation or any increase in the maximum allowance from taking place automatically as a result of changes in the sessional indemnity proposed by Bill No. 171 now before us.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Questions

P.F.R.A.—EXTENSION TO BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Jones:

1. Has the government received a request from the provincial government of British Columbia, asking for the extension of P.F.R.A. facilities to that province? If so, when?

2. Has the government indicated its willingness to extend this service to British Columbia?

Mr. McCubbin:

1. The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act was passed in 1935 to provide for the rehabilitation of the drought and soil drifting areas in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta only. It enabled the undertaking, over a five-year period, of methods of farm practice and water development to minimize the very serious problems of drought and soil drifting that existed there at the time, in the area commonly referred to as the Palliser triangle.

An amendment in 1937 extended the activities to the withdrawal of poor lands from cultivation, and to the resettlement elsewhere, of farmers from such lands in the drought area. Provision was also made to organize those vacated lands into community pastures, and the act was further amended in 1939 removing the five-year time limitation but the pastures were confined to the drought area as above.

Representations have been made on a number of occasions in past years for the extension of the P.F.R.A. area to all of the prairie provinces as well as to British Columbia. The last request received from British Columbia was in a letter dated February 2, 1953, from Hon. R. E. Sommers, minister of lands and forests. The Minister of Agriculture replied to this letter on February 6, 1953, stating that the government has had this matter under consideration for some time and that until a decision had been reached specific problems in that province would be dealt with by special parliamentary appropriations as in the past.

In British Columbia a serious flood problem developed some years ago in the Lillooet-Pemberton district. In response to representations from the province and the district a special parliamentary appropriation was provided over a number of years for the construction of flood control works and to March 31, 1953, the total expenditure was $1,163,811. Another parliamentary appropriation for special projects in British Columbia, that has been provided for a number of years, is that for the development of irrigation projects for the rehabilitation of veterans. Expenditures to March 31, 1953, under this vote amounted to $1,574,715, and 2,797 acres on seven projects have been developed for irrigation, providing locations for 304 veterans of world war II.

3. How many applications were made by the Canadian Pacific Railway?

4. What are the names and the net revenues of the stations in Manitoba for which applications to close have been approved in the years 1952 and 1953?

Mr. Chevrier:

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

Mr. Fulton:

1. Has the attention of the responsible minister been called to a report on national film board activities appearing in the Ottawa Journal of December 26, 1953, and a confirming report in Newsweek magazine of January 18, 1954?

2. Has the national film board under active consideration the production of dramatized feature films, as distinct from the present documentary type, one of the main developments of which would be the substitution of dialogue and acting for commentary?

3. Would this program call for the employment of professional actors and actresses?

4. Does the program envisage the sale of such films in Canada and foreign markets in competition with commercial productions of this and other countries?

Mr. Harris:

1. Yes.

2. Documentary features such as "Royal Journey", "R.C.M.P. File 1365" and "Canada at the Coronation" have been highly commended and similar documentaries will be produced as occasion may arise. No other features are contemplated.

3. Answered by No. 2.

4. Answered by No. 2.

LIFE INSURANCE COMPANIES—UNCLAIMED BALANCES

Mr. Noseworthy:

1. What is the accumulated amount of unclaimed balances on the books of life insurance companies doing business in Canada at the present time resulting from: (a) unclaimed matured endowments; (b) unclaimed surrender value of policies; (c) unclaimed dividends; (d) unclaimed annuity contracts?

2. Are any such lists published periodically by either insurance companies or the office of the superintendent of insurance, as is done, for example, in the case of unclaimed bank deposits?

Mr. Benidickson:

1. Not of government record.

2. No.

CANADA HOUSE, LONDON—LETTERS OF INTRODUCTION

Mr. Pearkes:

1. Are letters of introduction issued from Canada House, London, England, to Canadian citizens travelling to certain foreign countries?

2. What fee, if any, is charged for these letters?

3. How many such letters of introduction have been issued during 1952 and 1953?

4. What is the total sum collected from the issuance of letters of introduction from Canada House during such period?

5. What disposition is made of any moneys obtained from the issuance of such letters of introduction?

6. Do any other Canadian embassies charge a fee for issuing letters of introduction? If so, what is the total amount collected during the years 1952 and 1953?

Mr. Pearson:

1. It is not the general practice of Canada House or other Canadian posts abroad to issue letters of introduction except in a few cases mainly on a personal basis for which naturally no fee is charged. It is possible the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich refers to letters to foreign authorities requesting assistance in obtaining a visa, exit permit or similar document or service. These are included among the many consular services for which, according to general international practice, there is a nominal fee.

2. Fifty cents, except in cases of government officials, servicemen and dependents, to whom such letters are issued free of charge.

3. 1952—13 with fee; 80 gratis.
1953— 2 with fee; 53 gratis.

4. 1952—$6.50.
1953— 1.00.

5. Deposited to revenue account and thus become a part of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

6. Yes. In 1952, $49.75, and in 1953, $28.00.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Dufresne:

1. Was the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration outlining certain phases of government policy on immigration in an address delivered before members of Knox Presbyterian church, St. Thomas, Ontario, on January 11, 1954?

2. Does the government intend to maintain the demographic balance between Canadians of French origin and those of British origin to the proportions which existed in 1867?

Mr. Harris:

1. Yes.

2. The purpose of immigration is to foster the growth of Canada by admitting such persons as can readily be absorbed into our national economy, and in that connection immigrants from the British Isles and France are subject to the same immigration laws.

In 1871 the number of persons in Canada of British origin was 2,110,502 or 60·5 per cent of the total population. Of French origin the number was 1,082,540 or 31·1 per cent of the total population. In 1951 the numbers and percentages were: British origin—6,709,685 or 47·9 per cent; French origin—4,319,167 or 30·8 per cent.

BEEF—SALE TO ENGLAND

Mr. LaCroix:

1. Is beef being sold to England by the Canadian government at 15 cents per pound?

2. If so, what is the cost to the Canadian government of such beef?

3. Will the government make available a quantity of beef at 15 cents per pound to relief organizations to be supplied to unemployed in various districts in the province of Quebec?

4. If not, for what reason?

Mr. McCubbin:

1. In December, 1953, a sale of approximately 8 million pounds of frozen beef was made to the British Ministry of Food at a price of approximately 15 cents per pound.

This sale disposed of the last of the beef purchased by the government for the purpose of supporting prices of cattle during the time that cattle and meat shipments to the United States were under embargo due to the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in western Canada. This was in keeping with prices paid for New Zealand beef by the British Ministry of Food.

2. The average cost of all carcass beef acquired by the government during the period of the embargo mentioned in the answer to question 1 was 45 cents per pound.

3. The government does not now own any beef which was acquired as described in the answer to question 1.

4. See answer to No. 1.

LEPROSY

Mr. Thatcher:

1. During the last fiscal year, how many patients suffering leprosy were treated in the two institutions where lepers are hospitalized?
2. What was the total cost to the government of providing this treatment?
3. How many permanent employees are engaged by the federal government in the institutions mentioned?

Mr. Robertson:

1. Eight.

2. $18,202.

3. Two permanent employees are engaged at the department's leprosarium at Bentinck island, B.C. The patients at Tracadie, N.B., are cared for at L'Hotel Dieu de Tracadie on a per diem rate basis.

BUTTER

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough):

1. How much butter produced in 1952 did the government hold on (a) September 1, 1953; (b) December 1, 1953; (c) January 1, 1954?
2. How much butter produced in 1952 and 1953 did the government hold on January 1, 1954?

Mr. McCubbin:

1. (a) August 31, 1953, 19,020,823 pounds; (b) November 30, 1953, 18,169,114 pounds; (c) December 31, 1953, 15,184,431 pounds.

2. December 31, 1953, 49,185,163 pounds.

NATIONAL HEALTH WEEK

Mr. Henry:

1. What is the nature, extent and purpose of national health week?
2. By whom is it organized?
3. To what extent does the federal government co-operate therein?

Mr. Robertson:

1 and 2. National health week has been organized and sponsored each year for the past 9 years by the Health League of Canada, a voluntary organization with headquarters in Toronto. This is a week of concentrated promotional effort directed to making Canadians more aware of the value of good health to themselves, to their families and to their communities.

The federal department of health, the provincial departments of health, churches, educational leaders, service clubs, women's and men's voluntary organizations, the press, the radio, the moving picture industry, and other commercial firms co-operate with the health league in carrying messages on many health topics to the Canadian people.

3. In addition to the annual grant of $10,000 to the Health League of Canada for the furtherance of its work which is made by the federal government the Department of National Health and Welfare supports the efforts of the league in promoting national health week by such methods as producing a special newsclip to be added to theatre newsreels during the week, providing a statement by the minister supporting the aims of the week, running a feature article in the departmental magazine "Canada's Health and Welfare", and publicizing the week in the monthly budget of national health radio notes provided to radio stations and in Canada's health column provided to weekly newspapers.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

FISH SCREENS, BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Fulton:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, memoranda or telephone calls, etc., exchanged between the minister or the Department of Fisheries and any person or organization outside the dominion government service, since December 5, 1952, concerning the installation of fish screens on rivers and streams in the Nicola valley or elsewhere in British Columbia.

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN DAM

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all correspondence and telegrams, in connection with the South Saskatchewan dam and irrigation project, that passed between any department of the federal government and the government of Saskatchewan and/or with contractors or engineers, since the 10th of August, 1953.

GOVERNMENT COMMUNICATIONS, B.C.—SALE

Mr. Winch:

For a copy of contracts made by the government of Canada with the British Columbia Telephone Company and the Canadian National Telegraphs, relative to the purchase by the said companies of the telegraph and telephone lines owned by the government of Canada in the province of British Columbia.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, there is no information available in answer to the order which my hon. friend seeks. The hon. member will probably remember that I have already stated that an offer has been accepted by the government for the sale of the assets of the government telephone and telegraph services in British Columbia, but subject to the conditions of an agreement being ironed out. That agreement is still in the course of preparation, and until it is prepared there is certainly no information I can give at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the motion be dropped?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

NORTHWEST ATLANTIC FISHERIES

MEASURE TO IMPLEMENT INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION

Hon. Robert H. Winters (for the Minister of Fisheries) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to implement the international convention for the northwest Atlantic fisheries, signed in Washington on February 8, 1949, and ratified July 3, 1950, following approval by parliament.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

THE BUDGET—THE ESTIMATES

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE OF PRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). Is the minister yet in a position to tell the house when the estimates will be tabled and also when the budget will be brought down?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I am in a position to inform the house that I expect to table the estimates by Friday next. As to when the budget will be brought down, that is still a matter for conjecture.

Mr. Knowles: It was February 19 last year, you remember.

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO PRESENT POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and ask him what is the position of the negotiations as between the dominion government and the government of Saskatchewan in regard to the question of division of responsibility for the cost of construction of the South Saskatchewan river dam and irrigation project; whether the committee is now sitting; and generally whether contractors have been approached for estimates in connection with this work.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understand there have been verbal negotiations between our own Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and representatives of the Saskatchewan government. I think, however, the hon. member may be better informed if the Minister of Agriculture answers his question.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Hon. members will recall that on April 27, 1953, as found at page 4444 of Hansard, I placed on the record a letter which had been written to the premier of Saskatchewan setting forth the government's position at that time. I do not think it is necessary for me to read the first half of the letter as it does not bear upon this particular point, but the last half does and I think I should read it again. Dealing with the report of the royal commission, it says:

The report has been tabled in the House of Commons and has given rise to very diverging views about the soundness of the project. Your government has prepared a document which is quite critical of the report and you have written the Prime Minister that your government feels the project should be proceeded with notwithstanding the report of the royal commission.

Since this is your view, the federal government is prepared to consider a definite proposal from the provincial government for co-operation in the project and I am authorized by my colleagues to discuss such a proposal with you once the question of water rights has been settled among the three prairie provinces and agreement reached that the water would be available for the project.

I may say in passing that the terms of that particular paragraph have since been met.

Any proposal put forward by the province should make it clear what contribution to the cost of the dam itself the province is prepared to make to remove any element of federal subsidy for the production of power since power development could obviously not be subsidized in one province unless the federal authorities were prepared to provide similar subsidies in all provinces and federal subsidies for power development are contrary to present government policy.

That is one of the paragraphs still under consideration, and which I presume the hon. member for Prince Albert has in mind in asking the question. I continue:

You will appreciate that any federal contribution would also have to be limited, as in the St. Mary's and Bow River projects, to works for the conservation of the water and that we could not justify the expenditure of money raised from taxes all over Canada until the provincial authorities had prepared a practical scheme for the distribution system which gave reasonable evidence that the water would actually be used for irrigation on a scale which would justify the expenditure of national funds.

The fifth paragraph reads as follows:

Any proposal would, of course, have to include some satisfactory means of determining in advance what the total cost of the project would be, and what the federal share of the cost would be. This would be essential so that there was no open-ended commitment which might result in the final costs being far greater than anything either government would regard as reasonable.

On these conditions as prerequisites the federal government is prepared to discuss the project further with the government of Saskatchewan.

As the Prime Minister has said, these matters have been discussed on one occasion since. Paragraphs 2 and 4 have been cleared in so far as the two governments are concerned, but paragraphs 3 and 5 are still the subject of consultation between them. I do not know whether I should read the two letters which I had it in mind to read as a result of the hon. member for Prince Albert asking that these letters be made available and the answer given, or whether we should get the consent of the province for the publication of the different letters. I am inclined to think, however—

Mr. Coldwell: Is the minister going to read them without the consent of the province? I have objected from time to time to getting the consent of the province, but if you obtain consent in one instance I think you have got to get consent in all instances.

Mr. Gardiner: I was just going to say that I think consent should be secured for any other letters, but in so far as these two letters are concerned I am quite sure the provincial government would not take any objection to their being published and being used to answer the question. With your consent, Mr. Prime Minister, I think I might read the letters. They are not very long.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the minister or the hon. member for Prince Albert might help me. A little while ago we passed a motion in the name of the hon. member for Prince Albert for a copy of all correspondence and telegrams in connection with the South Saskatchewan dam and irrigation project that passed between any department of the federal government and the government of Saskatchewan and/or with contractors or engineers, since the 10th of August, 1953. If that order covers the letters referred to by the minister, why not produce them with the order passed by the house instead of reading them now?

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Gardiner: I am quite satisfied to have it so decided. That was what I was suggesting a moment ago. I simply say that as far as these two letters are concerned I do not think any objection would be taken, but in view of the motion passed a few minutes ago I think your ruling is correct.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to ask a supplementary question because apparently these matters were referred to in detail in Regina the other day. Did the Saskatchewan government make an offer as to the amount that it is prepared to expend in connection with power and also with respect to irrigation, and was that offer withdrawn at the request of the government of Canada?

Mr. Speaker: May I ask the hon. member for Prince Albert what the objection is to putting this question on the order paper? It is not a matter of urgency. It seems to me these details could be obtained by a question put on the order paper and answered in the ordinary course of affairs.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there is always urgency in Saskatchewan regarding this matter.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE SALARIES OF SPEAKERS AND DEPUTY SPEAKER, SESSIONAL ALLOWANCES OF MEMBERS, ETC.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 171, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, when the resolution preceding the introduction of this bill was before the house almost a week ago I made quite a full statement of the government's reasons for recommending an increase in the indemnity payable to members of parliament, and I do not have very much to add at this time. From the debate that took place then I think there seemed to be pretty general agreement that it would be proper to have an increase in the indemnity provided at the present time at least for the members of this house of parliament. But there were diverging views as to how that should be brought about.

For instance, I gathered from the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew)—and I want to be quite fair in the summary I propose to make—that he recognized that all the factors I had mentioned as having a bearing upon the adequacy of the indemnity had been fairly stated and that it was proper that there should be an indemnity that would, in proper fashion, take care of all those factors. But apparently he felt that the question was what should be the amount of indemnity that would do that and that it would be preferable to set up a royal commission or some other forum where a factual inquiry might be made before parliament itself attempted to deal with the matter.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) pointed out that during the preceding parliament, over a period of four years, there had been six sessions for which sessional allowances had been paid. This meant, in fact, that $24,000 in allowances had been paid out, and that made an average of $6,000 per annum. He seemed to express the view that that might be sufficient. There were some hon. members who felt there should be no attempt at this time to increase these indemnities. When the question was put to a vote there were 37 votes recorded against it, but I got the impression that that was not because every one of the 37 felt that something should not be done but rather because of the suggestion by some hon. members that this was a wrapped-up package. They did not like the wrapped-up package. Now, we have these bills before us, and the exact contents are fully unwrapped. If the bill gets second reading, it has to be considered in committee.

At this time we have to consider the principle of this bill. The principle is that the time has arrived when something should be done to stabilize the sessional allowances on a yearly basis, and that yearly basis should be larger than the present allowance for a single session. The second principle is that the indemnity should be the same for the members of both houses of parliament. Then, the bill incidentally provides that the recognized officers of the houses of parliament, the Speakers and the leaders of the opposition, should receive an increase that would be proportionate to what has been done in the past when the indemnity of members themselves has been dealt with.

There is not very much I wish to add, but I should like to deal with three points. First of all, I should like to point out that it is only at rare intervals that parliament attempts to deal with this matter of the indemnity. Secondly, I should like to give some reasons why, in drawing up the bill, the government did not recommend that there be any discrimination between the amount of the indemnity paid to the members of this house and the amount of the indemnity paid to the members of the Senate. Thirdly, I would wish to suggest that we do consider that this is a problem for which it is proper for parliament to take its full responsibility, and which it is proper to deal with itself.

As to the first point, I should say there have not been many attempts since confederation to vary the indemnity provided for members of parliament. At the time of confederation the indemnity was fixed at $600. Incidentally, in all these cases the same scale has been applicable to both houses of parliament. The indemnity remained at $600 from 1867 to 1873, when it was increased from $600 to $1,000. Percentagewise, this meant an increase of 66⅔ per cent. The indemnity remained at $1,000 from 1873 to 1900.

Mr. Fleming: The sessional indemnity?

Mr. St. Laurent: The sessional indemnity.

Mr. Fleming: Not annually?

Mr. St. Laurent: No, it was a sessional indemnity. I believe this is the first time the suggestion has been made that the allowance of members of parliament for attending a session should be put on an annual basis, and that there be only one allowance in any period of 12 months even if it does become necessary for parliament to be called more than once in that period.

In 1873 the sum of $1,000 was set, and that remained the sessional allowance of the members of both houses of parliament up to the year 1900 when it was increased by 50 per cent to $1,500. In 1905 it was found that the increase from $1,000 to $1,500 had been quite insufficient, and at that time it was raised to $2,500. This sum remained the sessional allowance for the next 15 years, until 1920, when it was increased from $2,500 to $4,000. This allowance has persisted up until today, with the exception that in 1945 an expense allowance of $2,000 per annum was added.

It is not proposed to change this expense allowance in any way, but it is proposed to increase the indemnity from $4,000 to $8,000, thus making a total of $10,000 instead of $6,000. This increase percentagewise is in accord with the previous increases, about 66⅔, and it is about 33 years since the $4,000 sessional allowance was set. I suggest that it is always delicate to have to deal with this subject, and it is not one that should be under review very frequently. In the 87 years since confederation, it has been reviewed in 1873, 1900, 1905, 1920 and 1945. I think most members would feel that when the subject was dealt with it was dealt with not for themselves but for a period, as being what they thought the right thing to do for a period. If we are going to do anything at all about it, I believe it is desirable to try to do something that will endure as long as what was done by our predecessors.

The second point is, why should members of the other branch of parliament receive the same indemnity as the members of this house? Since confederation, that has always been the case. Perhaps that, in itself, is not a sufficient reason. But what does appear to me to be a sufficient reason is that the four provinces stated, as expressly set out in the British North America Act, that it was their desire to be federally united into one dominion under the crown of the United Kingdom, Great Britain and Ireland, with a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom. The parliament of the United Kingdom has been a two-chamber parliament as long as it has been a parliament, I believe—and that is for many centuries. The act itself, carrying out that principle, and that construction of the principle, provided that there shall be one parliament for Canada consisting of the queen, an upper house styled the Senate, and the House of Commons.

Now, that was the constitution that the fathers of confederation represented as being the one desired by the Canadian public. That constitution has operated now in this country for 87 years; and I, for one, feel grateful that the fathers of confederation did recommend at that time that the constitution for the parliament of this new federal dominion under the crown should be similar in principle to that of the parliament at Westminster. I think the parliament at Westminster has been the model of all successful democratic parliaments that have been established in the world since that time.

I know that questions have arisen from time to time about the portion of the work of parliament that is effectively done by the members of the Senate. Well, it must be recognized that the situations in the two houses are somewhat different and in consequence, though they both have responsibilities to the Canadian people, they have responsibilities of a different aspect concerning each of them.

We in this house are elected in our constituencies; the members in the other house are appointed. They are appointed, under the constitution, to their seats in the other house for life tenure. But because we are an elected chamber, then this chamber has the privilege, the right, the obligation and the responsibility of initiating all fiscal policies. And because we are elected it is our responsibility in this house—a responsibility that has been recognized from the earliest days of Canadian parliaments—to use this house as a forum where what takes place will help to form the opinion of the electorate of the country as to whether or not they should retain their confidence in those who constitute the government, or whether they should come to the conclusion that that government is no longer worthy of their confidence.

I think all of us will admit that a great many of the speeches made here in the house are intended for the purpose of properly informing the public in that respect, rather than because of any feeling as to the effect they will have upon the decision to be made in the house.

I am not complaining about that; I think that that is the proper working of democratic institutions. Those who support the government do so because they believe, and want their electors to believe, that the government is worthy of the public confidence. And the opposition has it as its duty to scrutinize very carefully the conduct and recommendations of the government. And I am quite sure they hope they would be able to do a better job, if they were on the government side of the house, than those who happen to be there. And, that being their belief, they try to promote that belief in the opinion of the country at large. That is the normal way in which these democratic institutions are intended to work, and the way in which they do work.

When we talk about streamlining our rules we have to keep in mind that those rules are not designed merely to get speedy disposition of the matters that come before parliament, but that they must also be designed to have matters coming before parliament dealt with in such a way that there will be this information which will assist the electors who take an interest in what is being done by those who represent them, in forming their opinions as to whether the party that happens to be in office merits the confidence of the electors and should remain there, or whether, when the next election comes along, it should be replaced by others who might attempt to do better.

I think this explains why it is inevitable that there should be much more protracted debates in this house than there are in the other house. Nevertheless everything of a legislative character has to be considered and has to be passed by both houses of parliament. And I have never heard any serious complaint from any source that the members of the other house of parliament do not give consideration and study to legislation—which could not become legislation unless it had their concurrence. Because of the different atmosphere, the character and the democratic responsibility of that chamber, it does not take them as long to do their legislative work as it takes us here. But they have to do it. And there is no way under this constitution whereby anything can become legislation until it has been approved and passed by the members in the other house.

Now, is that a good constitution? I must confess I have never felt that it was realistic to give any serious study or thought to the probability of modifying it. In order to modify it there would have to be also the concurrence of the members of the other house.

Since I have been in Ottawa I have found that there were plenty of problems that it was realistic to study and consider, because I might have some responsibility in connection with forming some opinions as to the solutions they should receive. I must confess I have never felt I was going to have in my day the responsibility of having to come to a conclusion about substantial modification as to the character of our constitution.

I have heard certain modifications suggested about the way in which appointments or summonses to the other house might be made. But quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, I have never heard one that did not seem to me to bristle with more obstacles than promises of advantage to the Canadian public.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I interrupt the Prime Minister. I think he is going into the subject of proposed reform of the Senate, or the method of appointing senators, and I should like to point out that if that trend is to be accepted we would be diverging from the principle of the bill. I offer these remarks simply as a warning.

Mr. St. Laurent: I thank you. I wish to be careful, and my intention was to deal with the principle of the bill, which provides that the same indemnity will be available for both houses of parliament, and not only for members in this house. And it is only in respect of that principle that I have ventured to make these remarks about the other place. When we adopt any measure in this house we do so because we think it is the right kind of measure to be adopted. We do not adopt it for the purpose of having it vetoed in the other house, where it has to be also considered and passed if it is to become legislation. It is because we think it is appropriate at this time to recommend these increases in indemnities that we have recommended them in the form in which they will apply to both houses of parliament and not to only one.

Now, I defer to your warning, sir, and I shall not say anything more upon that subject, but pass to the third point I wish to say something about, namely, the fact that in our view this is something which has to be dealt with by the members of parliament not in respect of their own individual interests but with the desire to do what they think is best for the vitality, proper development and proper maintenance of our parliamentary institutions.

I know that there are some hon. members who honestly believe that nothing is required to be done for that consideration. I believe it is the members of parliament themselves who are in the best position to know just exactly what the situation has been over the years with respect to the duties, obligations and possibilities of a member of parliament maintaining decent living conditions for himself and his dependents, with the length of sessions that cannot be very much shorter if we are to continue to regard this as the principal forum from which come the inspirations to the electors of the country for their proper conduct when they have to exercise their right at election time.

We may differ, as was said earlier today, but I think we all believe that each and every one of us is endeavouring to discharge his duties to the Canadian people to the best of his ability. It is in that light that hon. members should approach this question, and those who feel, as some honestly do, that no increase in indemnity is required, and any increased indemnity would be wrong, will oppose the legislation. But there are those who feel that an increase is proper and that it would be better for the future of these democratic institutions to have a situation where one does not really have to be fairly well off in order to be able to assume the responsibility of representing his fellow citizens, if he is the kind of person his fellow citizens think would make a proper representative for them in parliament. It is with that view and because I think that the future will amply justify the validity and the usefulness to the Canadian people of what is being recommended in this bill that I submit it for the consideration of my fellow members.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I concede that the problem is one of some considerable difficulty, and I agree with the Prime Minister that it is not an easy one to deal with, no matter when the subject may arise, nor how it may be dealt with.

I agree with many of the observations he has made in regard to the necessity for adequate sessional allowances to make it possible for those who would make good members of parliament to offer themselves as candidates whenever the election may come.

The Prime Minister spoke of the fact that there were some who did not think there should be any increase in sessional allowances. I may have missed some statement that was made, but I do not recall a single statement made along that line. I have been under the impression that there has been general agreement that there should be an increase in the sessional allowances paid to members of the House of Commons.

As the Prime Minister has said, the members of the House of Commons know from their own experience something of the financial and other burdens imposed upon them in respect to the responsibility of representing their constituencies wherever the constituency may be. I had thought there was general agreement that it is appropriate that there be an increase of sessional allowances to members of the House of Commons which will make it possible for those who would make good members to offer themselves, regardless of their personal financial position.

Having said that, I then point out that we are in a position which is not different from that which has existed on other occasions and in other jurisdictions when it was regarded as wise to examine the situation and consider the alternatives and to establish some figure based upon due consideration and exchange of ideas and the participation of other members from other parts of the house in the deliberations leading up to such a decision. May I point out that in this case, as is its right the government has presented to parliament a measure, or in fact two measures, dealing with extensive increases, and that has been done without any examination of which we are aware which would tell us where those figures came from.

I could not agree more about any subject that might come up for consideration in this house or discussion in this house than I do with the words of the Prime Minister when he said that we should follow the course which will assure the effectiveness, efficiency and vigour of parliament, and that in arriving at conclusions in regard to the measure now before us we should have in mind the dignity of parliament itself, and the opportunity that is afforded, by the measure of allowances made available by statute, for the very best type of men and women to come here as members. With that I agree wholeheartedly. That still does not absolve us from the responsibility for arriving at these decisions by orderly methods and applying the same tests as we would apply to any other case where substantial changes were being made and where we were asked to adopt certain figures having considerable importance in themselves to any substantial segment of the Canadian community.

[Mr. Drew.]

It seems to me that the demand for that type of information and that type of inquiry is far more exacting when our own interests are concerned. If we wish parliament to have that measure of respect which is in itself an essential factor in maintaining our system of government in these troubled days, then it is not only a case of getting the right type of candidate, it is also a case of being sure that members of parliament follow a course which will commend itself to the public when their own personal interests are concerned.

For that reason I still feel that it is extremely important that by one method or another there should be inquiry which shows us in some way the digesting processes by which a certain figure came out at the end. These figures were not simply grabbed off a rack; these figures must have come from some consideration of some kind. We have simply put forward the thought that in a matter of this importance the process should be very carefully designed.

The Prime Minister has said something that I think might well be taken as a guide by a number of his supporters in parliament. When some of them become impatient, as they listen to speeches made on this side when there is before the house some measure which they are anxious to have adopted, I would commend to them the rereading of the Prime Minister's words of a few moments ago when he said that all of us will admit that many speeches are made more for information of the public than for the effect the speech is likely to have in the house.

I doubt if there is any statement that the Prime Minister could make in this house with which I will agree more completely. Of course there are times when we are encouraged to hope that even in the house speeches may have some effect. There was the recent occasion when the minister for northern development with great courtesy very generously explained the reason for introducing an amendment to a bill which he had placed before the house as a government bill. That was a welcome sign. If any hon. members opposite noticed an increase in the amount of debate that followed, perhaps in some degree they must blame the minister for northern development for encouraging the belief that speeches do sometimes have an effect in this house.

We have had still further encouragement today. A few days ago we raised some question about the automatic application of the increase in sessional allowances to the pensions act. The hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) asked the Prime Minister if he would give the undertaking that legislation would be introduced to limit the application of that change in its operation on the pensions act. The Prime Minister was quite emphatic in saying that he could give no such undertaking. In the meantime the arguments put forth—at least I hope this is the case—have had some effect, and today we have had introduced in this house and given first reading a measure dealing with this aspect of the problem. So I would say that we have had some encouragement.

Nevertheless, I think the general proposition is correct and in large measure remarks might be directed toward the information of the public. But I still hope that remarks may also be given some consideration here in the house.

The Prime Minister has given various reasons for proceeding in the manner in which he has. He has told us that there are three points which have guided the government in presenting the legislation in this way. He has explained that it is only rarely that members deal with indemnities or allowances and that whatever decision is made should be one that will extend over a considerable number of years and be adequate to avoid the necessity of coming back here too frequently for further revision.

Then the Prime Minister also dealt with the question as to why the government did not think there should be discrimination between indemnities in the house and the Senate. He explained that he considered that this is related to our constitution. He pointed out that at the time this country became one under the British North America Act the constitution had provided for two houses.

I think most of us, perhaps not all, will agree with that system, no matter how much we may disagree with the position in which it now finds itself. The Prime Minister may well say that the people of Canada have been given the opportunity to reform the Senate in some other way. I was not aware, when the party of which he is a distinguished member, many years ago and frequently since then, promised to reform the Senate, that this was the type of reform they proposed. He has stated that he has never seriously considered the practical possibility of those kinds of amendments to the constitution which would bring about a change of this kind. He has felt that there was plenty to do in this house without embarking on that difficult course.

I can only say that this must sound strange to those who for so many years promised Senate reform. Nevertheless we have the statement of the Prime Minister today that no such reform is now contemplated by the Liberal party. Obviously the present method is to continue. I do not intend to extend my remarks for fear of challenging the ruling of the Speaker already made as to the possible consequence of that course. Nevertheless this is one subject that the Prime Minister has placed before us and one that we cannot disregard.

We know that it is a delicate subject. We know that it is one that has to be dealt with having full regard for the dignity of parliament, which embraces both houses and the members of both houses. When the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) tells us the same amount has always been allowed to the Senate and the House of Commons may I point out, without in any way reflecting upon the members of the Senate or the dignity of that house, which is an essential part of this bicameral system which came to us under our constitution, that the considerations that have been placed before us justifying an increase in allowance to the members of parliament do not apply to the members of the Senate.

I am not prepared to say there should be no increase to the Senate. It is conceivable that there may be arguments which would justify an increase in the allowance to the members of the Senate to the same amount as that paid to the members of this house. But, Mr. Speaker, if there is such an argument it has not been presented, and if there are any facts to justify that conclusion they have not been placed before us.

We were told, and I think we will agree with the proposition, that one of the reasons it is essential that there be a reconsideration of this subject at this time is the great increase in the cost of living, and above all, the increased time that members must spend in Ottawa, or at least most members. The Prime Minister pointed to the fact that it is expensive for members to keep in touch with their constituents, and in that he is entirely correct. He is also correct when he points out that this is not a task that is measured by attendance here in the house, and that an effective member of parliament is constantly in touch with his constituents interpreting their requirements and informing himself in regard to what is taking place, as well as doing a multitude of things in regard to the services of one kind and another which are offered by the government.

Then there is the subject that can be perfectly frankly discussed, and that is the cost of elections themselves. That has been indicated as a reason why we should have regard for the position in which members find themselves. In fact, some hon. members might almost smile—I perhaps should not put in the word "almost"—if they went back and read that on an earlier occasion when there was an increase, the optimistic prediction was made that election funds would no longer be necessary because the amount that was to be paid in the House of Commons would fully cover all expenses of that kind. That argument, of course, has not been made during this debate, but it was made in this house.

Whatever reasons there may be, Mr. Speaker, for increasing the allowances to members of the House of Commons, not one of those applies to members of the Senate. They are not elected, so they have no election expenses—that is, no local election expenses. They have no necessity for that measure of contact with their constituents which is referred to by the Prime Minister as an essential consideration in keeping themselves informed, nor have they as lengthy a stay here in Ottawa, nor are these stays broken by the legitimate and proper demands on members of the House of Commons to address various meetings and maintain these contacts that are essentially a proper part of our political system. If we are looking for reasons we will find they are reasons outside of any put forward to support the increase for the members of the house.

The Prime Minister made a point of the fact that he was glad we had adopted a similar form of parliament to that at Westminster, and he did that in discussing the need for an increase for the members of the Senate. Well, Mr. Speaker, with all deference I must say that I find it very difficult to follow that argument, because we do not borrow our methods in this regard from Westminster. At Westminster the lords in the second chamber do not get anything, so certainly we did not get the idea of having the same amount paid in the House of Commons as in the upper chamber from Westminster.

Whatever may have been true in days gone by, when the increases were relatively small, I do not believe that would apply today when the increase can only be regarded as substantial. The Prime Minister gave us the history of the various allowances that had been made, and gave us the years in which increases had been made. But hon. members will realize that from 1867 the increases were relatively small on each occasion until 1920, when the largest increase was made. It was then $1,500. Now we have the proposed increase of $4,000. That figure may be right, but I would point out that a commission in the United States appointed to consider congressional indemnities arrived at a very much larger figure. I think we all agree that in many respects living conditions here are similar to those in the United States, and the expense of living comparable.

My point is that we have nothing before us to tell us. In Britain a few years ago they recommended that the indemnity be increased to £1,000. In the United States they recommended that congressional indemnities be increased to more than $20,000, I believe to $27,000. These figures at least were the considered judgment of people who had examined the facts and had some supporting argument to justify the figures they presented. One may be right, the other may be right, but we are in between. Our method has no relation to the method that was employed on other occasions.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has made some point of the fact that this is a subject on which members of parliament are peculiarly qualified by their own experience. But so were the members of parliament at Westminster when they decided that an inquiry was necessary, and they did employ the method of a select committee. They did not suggest that parliament was going to deny itself any measure of responsibility. They simply said they wanted an examination of the situation to see what should be done. They got recommendations and substantially followed the recommendations that were presented to them.

I saw some suggestion when we proposed that this subject be considered by a royal commission that we would be handing over to somebody else the responsibility for doing this job. But, Mr. Speaker, how often is it necessary to point out that a royal commission can decide nothing except what it is going to recommend to parliament. No royal commission can do more than report to parliament when it has examined the facts and upon these facts it presents certain recommendations. It is, then, for parliament to assume its responsibility. Far from this being a challenge to the responsibility of parliament, this in fact helps parliament to carry out its work in a responsible manner with the kind of information that will be helpful on many occasions in reaching sound and solid conclusions. We are not suggesting that parliament should divest itself of any measure of responsibility whatever. We simply say that parliament should be responsible for the way in which it deals with this matter and, particularly with its own interests concerned, that it should deal with it very carefully.

The Prime Minister has pointed out that this is the first time there has been any suggestion of putting payment on an annual basis. That may be right, but since this is the first time perhaps it would have been well to have examined that question in some way and to have found out whether that was the right method or whether some other method would have been better. These are only some of the reasons why it seems to me that the kind of inquiry we insist upon when other measures are under consideration should have been employed in this case.

I would point out that we have before us a number of matters in the bill now under consideration, an act to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act. We have the sessional allowance of the members. It has been said in the house that this subject has been discussed publicly for some considerable time. It has been said, and correctly said, that the press and people throughout the country generally have indicated that they are ready to support appropriate allowances to members so that the business of parliament may be conducted in the most efficient manner by the very best qualified people who can be encouraged to serve in parliament.

I do not recall having seen a discussion in the press of the other matters that are included in the bill. The bill does not only provide for the increase of the sessional allowance to members, in addition to the $2,000 special allowance provided in 1945. It also provides for a similar increase to $8,000 from $4,000 for members of the Senate, in addition to the $2,000 special allowance. It provides for an increase in the payment to the Speaker of the Senate from $6,000 to $9,000. It includes provision for an increase in the allowance to the Speaker of the House of Commons from $6,000 to $9,000. It includes provision for an increase in the payment to the Deputy Speaker from $4,000 to $6,000. It includes payment to the Leader of the Opposition of the House of Commons of $15,000. It includes payment to the leader of the government in the Senate of $10,000 and payment to the leader of the opposition in the Senate of $6,000.

I do not recall these matters being discussed in the various newspaper comments that have been made. I do not know where these figures come from. They may be right or they may be wrong. I challenge any hon. member of the house to tell us by what exact process of reasoning or by what examination of expenses and otherwise those particular amounts were arrived at. Then of course there are other matters involved in the second bill. I shall anticipate any objection on that score, Mr. Speaker, by refraining from saying anything about that bill now except to point out that what I have said with respect to this measure applies substantially to the other.

I repeat, and I do not wish there to be any doubt about it, that I believe, with the standard of service required in parliament at a time when our country is assuming such increased importance and constant opportunities for still greater expansion are opening up, that we should be assured that the payments that are to be made will be in keeping with the heavily increased burden imposed upon individual members. I hope every Canadian realizes that election to parliament does not simply mean coming to Ottawa and sitting in the House of Commons. I wish there were a better understanding of the tremendous demands upon every hon. member that confront him every day. Without regard to party, I think that most of the hon. members of this house—I am speaking about those who attend fairly regularly—deserve very great credit for the manner in which they deal with the infinite variety of problems that arise and in regard to which they put forth their efforts without asking whether the person presenting the request belongs to one political party or another.

In very substantial measure, members of this house do, under our democratic system, truly become representatives of the whole constituency that they serve and all the people in it. There are great demands. No member would be able to represent his people effectively if he did not go back and visit parts of his constituency, inform himself about what is going on, and maintain contacts with various important organizations in that constituency. No member would be able to properly place before the people of his constituency the things they should know about parliament without some substantial personal expenditure from time to time in keeping them informed. These are all things that need to be borne in mind.

Allowances for members most certainly should be in keeping, but that does not justify us in following a course that we would not be prepared to follow where additional payments were being made for some other purpose and to some other people. The demands are stricter in our case. We are not asked to divest ourselves of any responsibility. Let us be sure, however, that we have had an opportunity to find out where the figures come from and how they have been arrived at.

On an earlier occasion I put forward my belief that the dignity of parliament, which the Prime Minister has emphasized, and the respect of our people for our parliament and the way it conducts its business would be increased by an assurance that we had applied the strictest tests to any measure or measures that would benefit us in any way. The Prime Minister has replied to these proposals very frankly and has dealt with the suggestion that we should have a royal commission or a select committee. He has seen fit not to adopt that suggestion.

In view of that fact I am unable to support the bill. The principle of the bill is not merely an increase in salaries. If that were so, then we might just as well say that we believe in everybody getting more money, outside of this house as well as inside. There is more than that. The principle involved in the bill now before us cannot be divorced from the way in which the changes have been arrived at and the result that is to be produced. There are many cases where details may not be satisfactory but it may be entirely proper to support a bill on second reading, particularly when there is going to be a further examination, as in the case of a bill before the house just a few days ago which was being sent to the banking and commerce committee. There are a number of cases where it is obvious that it is appropriate to criticize, to examine, and try to amend.

In this case, Mr. Speaker, I submit that the bill, as it stands, cannot be divorced from the inadequacy of the procedure by which it comes before us. I think we must have regard also to the principle that, when our interests are involved, the most precise method of arriving at the figures must be followed. This principle is not met by this measure. I propose, therefore, to vote against this bill. I propose to do so without any suggestion that there should not be an appropriate adjustment of allowances in keeping with established figures and facts, but because there should not be just an accumulation of figures put before us without any explanation as to how they were arrived at.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Although I am the first speaker for the C.C.F. party, Mr. Speaker, I am not speaking officially, if that is the proper word, for this party. I believe, however, that I am expressing the point of view of the great majority of those sitting behind me. I shall probably put that point more clearly a little later. I noticed that when the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) was stating the business of the house on Friday night he said that first we would take this measure before us; then we would go on to the post office bill for increasing postage, and then we would take up the Criminal Code. I believe that was a most appropriate sequence of the business of the house. I must congratulate the minister on having among his many other fine qualities a very nice sense of humour.

Mr. Harris: You omitted the Salaries Act.

Mr. MacInnis: I shall come to that later. I include both as if they were in the same bill. In order to please Mr. Speaker we have to discuss them separately, but so far as I am concerned they are of the same kidney.

When speaking here last Tuesday I said that I was only saying a few words to indicate where I stood in regard to the measure before us; that I was opposing the measure at the resolution stage. Everything that has elapsed since last Tuesday has confirmed me in the position I have taken. I have read the newspapers and I have heard from a great many people in the various parts of Canada. They all say about the same thing. that it is rather shameful—many of them have put it that way—that we should be taking something for ourselves before we have made provision for the thousands of people in this country who are living under deplorable conditions. I received one letter from a resident of Stettler, Alberta, a person with whom I have never communicated. who puts it this way—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the hon. member reads the letter I want him to know that under the rules he has to disclose the source, because an unsigned letter or a letter without the signature being disclosed becomes an anonymous letter, and anonymous letters should not be read into the record. I thought I should warn him of that.

Mr. MacInnis: It should not be taken for granted that the letter is anonymous. I did not say so.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member did not understand what I said. Sometimes an hon. member thinks he can read a letter he has received from a private citizen without disclosing the source. Under our rules the source must be disclosed. I thought I would warn the hon. member of that. I went on to explain that when an hon. member does not wish to give the name of the sender when reading a letter into the record he is running the risk of having the letter ruled anonymous; that is the interpretation I must put upon it. I did not say the hon. member said this letter was anonymous. I said the interpretation which I put upon a letter when the name of the sender is not given is that it is an anonymous letter, and anonymous letters must not be read into the record.

Mr. MacInnis: I have too much regard for Mr. Speaker to dispute the point with him. I believe I could do that. I do not think there is any rule that compels me to either table a letter of this kind or state the name of the sender. I am not going to hide anything. I said this letter was from Stettler, Alberta. It is not confidential, so I am quite willing to give the name of the writer. The letter is signed by Mrs. Richard E. Price. It is a very reasonable letter, and she says:

> Probably the increase is justified in that living costs are high these days, but on the other side are those who have been lining up at the soup kitchens in Calgary these cold days—surely, they need some aid, too.

Mr. Dupuis: I may be mistaken, but that is what I call demagogic.

Mr. MacInnis: I am not particularly concerned about what you call it. The letter illustrates the way people are thinking. May I quote from an editorial which appeared in one of the daily papers in my own city of Vancouver? It is from the News-Herald of January 26, 1954, and it says:

> How can our members of parliament, now in the act of practically doubling their own pay, justify their neglect of the pensioners in their present plight? If an M.P. finds it necessary to double his own salary, how much more apparent is the need of a pensioner for at least a percentage increase? As things stand today it is approaching the point where a pensioner is being expected to live for a month on what an M.P. says an M.P. requires for a day.

This editorial sets forth my whole opposition to this measure. I do not say that a reasonable increase in indemnities may not be justified, though not necessarily a 100 per cent increase or, taking the indemnity and the expense allowance, an increase to the extent of 66⅔ per cent. Certainly I do not think there is any justification for what is proposed in this bill.

When members of the official opposition spoke last week I was not quite sure where they stood in the matter, but I believe the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) has made it clear now that they will oppose the bill. However, I do wish to congratulate the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne), who spoke last Tuesday. He certainly made his position clear; and in my opinion he was speaking for the great majority of his constituents, just as I am quite satisfied I speak for the great majority of mine.

Before developing my reasons for opposing the measure, I wish to touch upon two or three points raised in the debate on the resolution. It was said that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) showed great courage in bringing the bill forward; and then those hon. members went on to say how popular the proposal was throughout the country. Well, if they think it is popular throughout the country it could not have required courage on the part of the Prime Minister.

I am not going to say whether the fact of its popularity or otherwise would influence the Prime Minister in the discharge of his duty. The Prime Minister is my Prime Minister, as well as the Prime Minister of other members in the house, and certainly I am not going to say anything that would put him in a bad light. I have too much respect for him, and I appreciate too well his reasons for coming here to do anything like that.

Then the point was made that the small amount of $1,500,000 that would be required to pay these increases would not be of any consequence in helping the old age pensioners. Even I, with my limited mental capacity, can understand that. But surely those who are talking in those terms are just playing with words. That was not the point I made when I spoke in regard to old age pensioners and persons on war veterans allowances. I believe there should be some order of priority here, and that we should proceed on the basis that those who are in greater need should be looked after first.

As a matter of fact, as a socialist I cannot agree in any way that we can raise the level of society by giving to those who already have and neglecting those who have not. We may fulfil the Scripture, but certainly we are not improving society. And it is because this bill does not harmonize with my philosophy as a socialist that I am opposing it. After all, possibly this is the silk-hat socialism the Leader of the Opposition detected on the government side of the house when he was speaking in the debate on the address. Perhaps he used the expression "top-hat"; I am not sure about that. I am in favour of the welfare state, but I believe the welfare state should include more than senators and members of the House of Commons.

Then someone else made reference to those members of the house who, after long service, passed away and left their families unprovided for. Surely that is not an unusual happening. I imagine at least half of those passing away and leaving dependents leave them unprovided for. Do my hon. friends propose that we arrange things for members of parliament so that, no matter when they leave this House of Commons or in what way, they and their families must be provided for? Well, we will have to have much larger indemnities even than those proposed, if that is the intention.

Then it was said that the indemnity should be increased because of the many handouts we have to make by way of wedding presents, presents at christenings, wreaths at times of funerals, as well as many other things. I am in the very happy position where I am not asked for such handouts. My constituents know that I am not a wealthy man and that I cannot afford such largesse. But, more than that, they do not consider these things any part of the duty of a member of parliament. They would think it highly improper for a public representative to curry favour in such a way. They elect me to parliament to put forward their views and press their needs in the House of Commons. If I did not do that I would hear from them, and in no uncertain language. Their weddings, their christenings and their funerals they can look after themselves. I am quite satisfied that that should be the case, because in my opinion these things are too intimate for a member of parliament to interfere with.

As I said, I am not saying that no increase whatever is justified; and at the proper time this party will make known its views in the matter. But as I have said, I do not believe an increase to the extent of 100 per cent is opportune at this time. Hardly a worse time could have been found for putting it forward. What do we find? In employer-employee relationships the employers are adopting a "hold-the-line" policy. That is a refusal to make any wage increases. Unemployment is increasing alarmingly all over the country. I am sure every member is receiving letters from his constituents about this. Prices of farm commodities are falling. All around us wages, salaries and incomes of all kinds are falling; and just at this moment the government introduces a measure of this kind that, as I have already said, increases the indemnity of members of parliament by 100 per cent or, if we include the expense allowance, by 66⅔ per cent. It is at times like these that people look to their representatives for help.

As I said before, every hon. member is receiving requests from old age pensioners, persons on war veterans allowances and from persons on small incomes and superannuation pensions that were given by this government at a time when our dollar was worth very much more than it is today. To every such request made there is just the one answer, no. Then to add insult to injury we raise our own indemnities by 100 per cent. I tell this house that this can have only one result; it will lessen public confidence in our parliamentary institutions. Perhaps I can do no better than read a sentence from another letter I received the other day from Oak Bay. Westerners will know where Oak Bay is. It is a wealthy suburb of the city of Victoria. The writer of the letter signs his name T. Fox-Decent. This is the part I wish to quote:

> The shameful example of grab, and the callous indifference to the plight of the burnt-out and old age pensioners, and the blind, . . .
> Commons votes billions to combat communism but is indifferent to the fact that this constant grabbing for themselves will swell the ranks of communism by many thousands.

There is no doubt in the world, if we read the press and if we take heed of the letters we get, that there is strong resentment in the hearts and the minds of the people who are being neglected while we are looking after ourselves so generously.

As I mentioned in my remarks at the resolution stage of this measure, I am opposed to increases to members of parliament and members of the other place, because they tend to separate the public representatives from the people whom they represent. I am afraid it is not recognized by members of this house that with our present income we are already in the high-income bracket. I hold in my hand the taxation statistics of the Department of National Revenue for the year 1951. It is entitled "Taxation Statistics 1953," but the figures are for 1951. With our present indemnity, members of parliament are already receiving incomes higher than 89·3 per cent of those paying income tax or making income tax returns. If the increases proposed go into effect members of parliament will be among the top 1 per cent of income receivers in Canada. I am afraid that position will make things rather difficult for some people. It is my contention that people so far removed from the trials and struggles of the average individual cannot feel those trials and struggles and will not work to remove them.

The history of all nations demonstrates that improvement never comes that way. The dynamic strength for improving social conditions has always come from the bottom and not from the top. For the benefit of my Liberal friends I should like to quote a saying by the late William Ewart Gladstone many years ago:

> I painfully reflect that in almost every political conflict of the last fifty years the leisured classes, the educated classes, the wealthy classes have been in the wrong. The common people—the toilers, the men of uncommon sense—these have been responsible for nearly all the social reform measures which the world accepts today.

If we are going to put ourselves among the top 1 per cent of income receivers in this country we will come to fear changes because things are good for us as they are. The poor get very little thought now, but they will get less then because we will not feel any of the discomforts that the poor feel.

I have not much more to say, Mr. Speaker. I want to quote from an editorial in another Vancouver paper, the Province, which appeared long before this proposal came before parliament. The Vancouver Province is a paper which has a reputation for conservatism with a small "c". For that reason we should pay some attention to it. The editorial commented on some remarks I made when I spoke on the debate on the address, and said:

> British Columbia probably has, proportionately, more of these people than any other part of Canada—

That is, more old age pensioners.

> —because of our mild climate. In Vancouver many live in poorly-heated bedrooms, attic rooms and improvised basement suites.

I want the house to note this:

> They seldom have enough proper food. Never do they have enough for the small luxuries that make life worth living.

I challenge any member of parliament here to say that he goes to bed hungry at night and that he is denied the small comforts that, as this paper says, make life worth living. But I tell you that in the city of Vancouver thousands go to bed hungry every night, and they have nothing left to buy these little comforts which make life worth living.

Mr. Dupuis: Social Credit will look after them.

Mr. MacInnis: Perhaps it will, but the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) did not give any indication of that the other day. There was no debt-free money in his speech when he spoke the other day. It was quite impossible to find money for old age pensioners, but it was easy to find money for members of the House of Commons and senators because it was only a little bit of money.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): That is not right at all.

Mr. Low: That is utter foolishness.

Mr. MacInnis: Read what the hon. member said. If you want to raise any further question about it I will read some of the things he said and indicate the only inferences that can be drawn from them. If you do not want to have it I shall not bother with it. The editorial goes on:

> There are also many who, for other reasons, find life hard. There are women trying to raise families on mothers' allowances that are hardly adequate to keep a bachelor alive.

That is important. Those women have children, and those children will be the future citizens of Canada. They are being brought up without proper food; they are being brought up without proper education, because they will have to go to work as soon as they are able to work. They will be handicapped all through life because of a lack of nourishment in their growing years and because of a lack of education. They will be the hewers of wood and the drawers of water for those who are in the higher income brackets, whose children have enough to eat and who will get an education.

I wonder why we cannot think of these things. It should be important to us as representatives of the people of Canada before we deal with anything for ourselves. After all, we are not suffering. I shall bring these remarks to an end by quoting my last words when I spoke on January 26. Regardless of what anyone else does in regard to this bill, that is going to be my decision. I should like to quote from page 1467 of Hansard as follows:

> I am not going to support any increase in income for any member of parliament until we have made some attempt at raising the incomes of the poor in this rich country.

Mr. Speaker: In order to be helpful, and I do try to be helpful, I warned the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis) before he read a letter that if he did read it he should disclose its source. I gathered that perhaps he did not understand fully my intervention. In order to assure him that I did not interrupt him without reason I should like to refer him to citation 265 of Beauchesne's third edition which reads:

> It is not in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or communications emanating from persons outside the house and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the house.

Then citation 270 of Beauchesne's third edition reads:

> An unsigned letter should not be read in the house.

The citation then goes on to give instances where the Speaker suggested that such letters should not be read into Hansard, and I quote:

> Such a letter should not be read into Hansard; all letters when read must be signed and they become part of the documents of the house.

I should like to explain what I consider to be an unsigned letter. If an hon. member reads a letter and does not disclose its source, it appears in Hansard with no source being divulged. In my opinion that is tantamount to being an unsigned or anonymous letter, and such letters must not be read. The hon. member will perhaps recall the two occasions on which I can place my finger at the present moment when my predecessor, Mr. Speaker Macdonald, ruled in identical terms. I would refer the hon. member to Hansard of December 19, 1951. On that day the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Dinsdale) was speaking and the leader of the C.C.F. party inquired whether there was a ruling that required private letters to be identified. Mr. Speaker Macdonald then said, and I quote from page 2210 of Hansard:

> I am not requiring the hon. member to disclose the source of the two letters he has just read. If that was to be done, I should have requested it earlier. However, if he intends to read other letters, he should disclose their source.

Another occasion was on November 28, 1949. The incident at that time was one with which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) may be familiar, because he was the one who was called upon to divulge the source of the letter.

I should like to make it clear that this is the reason I warned the hon. member. It may be that when an hon. member is warned before he starts to quote a letter he may decide that if he has to divulge the source he will not quote the letter. That is why I thought I was being helpful in advising the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway of the rule.

Mr. Coldwell: May I say with all due respect that for many years it was the custom in this house that if an hon. member gave assurance that a letter was signed and was not anonymous, he could give his word as a member of parliament and it was always taken. It is only in the last few years that this procedure seems to have crept into our proceedings. We used to understand that it was only when a minister was quoting from a document that he was required to table it.

Mr. Speaker: Is there not a little distinction between those two cases? If an hon. member wishes to paraphrase a private document and takes the responsibility for what is contained in it, then it becomes his own words. But when he wants to quote a letter verbatim which he says he has received, then for my guidance I have the latest rulings of my illustrious predecessor. I shall be willing to look into the matter. Perhaps the committee on procedure could look into this question also.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this matter which is now before us is one on which every member of the House of Commons should take his own stand. I would not like to think that this was a party matter in any respect, and for that reason I hope hon. members will be prepared to make their stand known, as I certainly shall.

I was not able to be here last Tuesday when the resolution was discussed, and as a consequence I did not have a chance to express my opinion on the principle of the resolution. But my colleague, the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) did so on behalf of our group, and I concur fully in what he said.

The principle of the bill now before the house is to provide increases in the indemnities and allowances to members of the House of Commons and certain salary revisions for officers of the two houses and cabinet ministers. With that principle I am in agreement and I have my reasons for being in agreement. I look upon this whole matter, not as a measure to increase the personal income which members of parliament may enjoy, but as a measure to make it possible for every member of parliament to be a better member and to serve his country and his people as they expect to be served. That is the way I look upon this bill.

I am afraid there has been too much inclination in some quarters to consider that we were simply meeting here at this time to vote ourselves an emolument that would put us into a preferred class. That is not so. I am perfectly satisfied that any increase in the indemnities of members of parliament will be reflected in better service to the people of this country. I am satisfied that that money will be spent by members in trying to serve the people who sent them here.

With that as a background I would like to deal briefly with some of the things said by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis). It seemed to me that the whole burden of the speech given this afternoon by the Leader of the Opposition was that we had been shown no justification for the figures which are presented in the bill. "What justification is there?" said the Leader of the Opposition. Well, I should think, Mr. Speaker, no one would be in a better position to answer that than the Leader of the Opposition. Statistics are the best justification I know, and he ought to be familiar with statistics for he has quoted them often enough in this house. Anyone who examines the statistics of the time, who has made any study whatsoever of increases in costs and prices since 1945, ought to realize that since that time there has been no less than a 100 per cent increase in salaries and wages generally over the country, and from 100 to 150 per cent, and more in many cases, in prices. What more justification does anyone want?

The Leader of the Opposition must know that when it is necessary for a member of parliament to visit his constituency today he is out of pocket two or perhaps three times more than formerly. For example, let him buy an automobile—not be furnished with one—and he will find that he is paying just about twice what he would have paid in 1945 and before, and he will buy one today that will hardly withstand the shocks of the road as the old one did. You can almost put your fist through one today, whereas formerly the steel gave some protection to a man. Let him buy gas and oil to visit his constituency and get around there; let him pay for his meals or transportation by train and all these things, and he will find that costs have increased by twice and in many cases more since 1945. I would think the one thing to do is to take a good look at the statistics, and he would have ample justification.

The Leader of the Opposition also referred to what happened in the United States. They did appoint a commission, as the hon. member is suggesting in this case, and that commission investigated, heard evidence, and brought down recommendations. But these recommendations went far beyond what the Prime Minister and the cabinet have decided here.

I think the Leader of the Opposition should have pointed out to the house how moderate was the position taken by the Prime Minister in the introduction of this bill. If we had had a royal commission to investigate and seek justification for certain figures, it is quite possible that such royal commission would have brought down a recommendation similar to the figures presented by the commission in the United States. Perhaps that is what the Leader of the Opposition seeks. I am not saying that, but at any rate it appears to me that we have some guide for our actions here when we reflect that in the United States it was decided to increase sessional allowances to members of congress to $25,000 a year, plus certain perquisites which I think bring the total up to something around $41,000.

An hon. Member: $40,500.

Mr. Low: Yes, I think that is it. There was a principle established in the United States a good many years ago which some of us in this house have on occasion put forward, and that was this. The members of the House of Commons ought to have assistance in research. They ought to have made available to them means by which they can get the facts and figures with respect to the problems that come before them in order that they may put forward sensible solutions, based upon facts instead of fancy. We have tried to get that introduced in this house, but the principle has never been adopted.

An hon. Member: It has never been recognized.

Mr. Low: In the United States that principle has not only been recognized but adopted, and the practice has been followed for many years; I think it was adopted as long as eight or ten years ago; certainly for as long as I have been in this house. I believe congressmen are granted something like $10,000 a year with which to secure assistance for research work. As a consequence one would expect the debate and discussions to be on a higher plane, as it would be here if members of the House of Commons had a similar allowance. We have not had the means with which to carry out this research, and I am afraid that as a consequence some of our debates have suffered.

There is this to be said also, that you cannot expect members of the House of Commons to serve their constituents as they wish to be served and still be their own research assistants on $6,000 a year. It is quite impossible when you stop to consider the increasing needs of the members from year to year. In a growing and more complicated society such as Canada, $10,000 a year will not go very far and will not more than make it possible for members of this house to enjoy a reasonable standard of living and at the same time discharge their responsibilities. Anyone who has given the slightest consideration to the facts and the statistics would never ask that question, "Where is the justification?"

When the Prime Minister said to me, as he did, "We have given this whole question of increased sessional allowances deep and earnest consideration, and we have decided to bring in a measure to make certain changes;" and then when he had the courtesy to outline what the changes were, I took it for granted that he meant that he and his colleagues had given the matter study. I believe he did.

I know this matter has been talked of around the corridors of this house for at least two years that I know of, and perhaps more; and I feel certain, knowing the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) as I do, that he and his treasury board would never consent to increased sessional allowances without giving the whole matter the most earnest consideration. I have seen his work before, and I have every respect for the manner in which he discharges his duties. Anyone who stands up in this house and says there has been no consideration, no basis on which to decide how much the increase should be, is, I believe, stretching it a little bit too far.

I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that I need to deal with that part of it any further. I recognize that there is a difference between the Senate and the House of Commons. Certainly there is a difference in the responsibilities attaching to each. I do not know, though, whether this is a proper occasion to speak of Senate reform. I will not. I will simply say this. Perhaps the Senate ought to be reformed; but, Mr. Speaker, it certainly ought not to be reformed by an annex to a bill of this kind.

That is all I am going to say. If the other place is to be made the useful body that I believe it can be under our system, then certainly the way to go at it is not the way we have been going at it here since this measure came before us. I believe there is lots of room for improvement, and maybe the government will pull something out of the hat before the twenty-second parliament is completed that will help make the other place the useful instrument that it can be in a democracy.

I have never been one to suggest that the Senate be abolished, because I believe there is a place for a bicameral legislature in Canada. I believe it is useful, and I think it is unwise for us to enter too freely into a discussion of the comparative merits of the two houses of parliament. But I will say that certainly senators have no elections to fight, and as a consequence they are not out of pocket as members of the House of Commons are. Certainly the expenses of senators are nothing like those of members of the House of Commons, and certainly it must be conceded that the Senate indemnity—I am not speaking of the senators but of the Senate indemnity—is in the nature of a pension. We have to consider that. It is in the nature of a pension, and because that is so maybe there is some difference. Maybe there should be a considerable difference between it and the sessional indemnity of a member of the House of Commons. I am not going to make that an issue; I am merely pointing it out.

On the other hand, members of the House of Commons work barehanded. They work very hard to dig out facts and figures to keep themselves informed, and I believe everyone in the country must recognize that they do a pretty fair job, carrying on as they do without staff. I say it is not possible for members of the house to do effective work without research, and I hope the government will give consideration to the introduction of some kind of research assistance for every member so he can discharge his duties and discharge them well.

Let me point out that originally the sessional indemnity for the House of Commons was based on a five-year term. In principle that is what we have now, but everybody knows that in recent years no government has dared to go the full five years. Consequently we have had an election every four years, which has made it necessary for members to go to the country and spend their money more often than they did in the days when there was really a five-year parliament. That is something that should be considered and that many people do not think about.

Then there is another point. Many members of the house, perhaps most of them, now consider that the work of a member of parliament is a full-time job. I know it has been with me. Since I came into this house it has been impossible for me to spend any time whatsoever in trying to supplement the income I have had from the House of Commons. There must be a good many hon. members in the same position. Consequently what they receive by way of indemnity has to cover their living expenses plus the cost of their service to the public, and that of course often means maintaining two home establishments. I say to hon. members that this is not commonly known, that it is a consideration, and a big one.

As I listen to people outside of the house talking about things, I gather that they believe that the work of a member is over when a session ends, and that all hon. members have to do is go home, bask in the sun for the rest of the summer and fall, go hunting and fishing and what not, and wait until another call comes to return to the house. That of course is the greatest of errors. The work of a member of parliament does not end when a session of the house closes, and that must be kept in mind. He really has to start on his hard work then. He has to get around a very large area and pay his own expenses while doing so. If he does not visit his constituents in every part of his riding, report to them, talk to them, help them to open fairs and start drives of one kind and another during the period between sessions, he is not considered to be doing his duty.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the demands on members of parliament are very great, and I am not prepared to say that members are not entitled to an indemnity of $10,000 with which to discharge their responsibilities. I certainly would not be in a position to make any such claim. I say that adequate pay to members of parliament, whatever that adequate pay may be, would make it possible for members of parliament to give their constituencies the kind of service that is required in a democracy. Let me go a step further and say something that I believe can be proved to be the case. I think an adequate sessional allowance for members of the house would be one of the greatest inducements toward better service because there would be keener competition for the job of member of parliament. That would force present members to extend themselves in giving service. There is no question about that, and if the people want good service I am satisfied that they are prepared to pay for it.

Let me come now for a moment to what was said by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis). He quoted some letters. As the leader of a party, Mr. Speaker, I have received but two letters. In the past two weeks I have had fifty times more letters about a flag than I have had with respect to the sessional indemnity. As the leader of a party I imagine that I would receive quite a number of letters if there was widespread dissatisfaction throughout the country with what parliament is doing.

I have been trying to keep my ears and eyes open, but as I say, I have received only two letters. One of them was strongly critical and the other simply said, "under the circumstances, do you not think you ought to be improving the lot of the old age pensioners and the recipients of war veterans allowances?" That is all.

Maybe the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway draws all these letters. Maybe he has received more than I have. Maybe Vancouver is a place where people feel more strongly about these things. I am giving him every benefit of the doubt, but I do not believe for one moment that the number of letters members are receiving can be very great. Otherwise I am sure my group would have received their fair share, and they have not so reported to me. In 1945 I listened to an almost identical speech made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. He made the same dire predictions he made today; not a bit of difference in the world. He told us at that time that he would vote against the $2,000 expense allowance because he was a socialist. Well, he took it just the same.

Mr. Blackmore: He is still a socialist.

Mr. Low: He is still a socialist. He is going to vote against this measure. That is his privilege. I do not want any person to have to take something he does not want, and when the bill is in committee it may be possible to make some arrangement so that such people will not be embarrassed. Maybe it can be arranged that the increase over the $4,000 now paid will have to be applied for, a system of election, much the same as we had to do in the case of the pension. In that case we had to elect. Well, I am just giving a notice that I have a little amendment that will help the situation along when the bill goes to the committee. Then we shall see just how much of this talk is on principle and how much is for political purposes.

I sat here today and listened to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway make a few rather sly remarks about the Social Credit member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell), and Social Credit governments. He was speaking about old age pensions, and that sort of thing. I want to remind him that for a good many years the Social Credit government of Alberta has been making a $10 supplementary allowance, above the $40 given by this government, to old age pensioners, while the socialist government of Saskatchewan has only been giving $2.50. If that is socialism—well! I shall go further and say that the Social Credit government of British Columbia is doing the same as the Alberta government.

I am going to let matters stand, Mr. Speaker, by saying this. I look upon this as a measure designed to make it possible for the members of this parliament to give the people the kind of service that the people deserve and want. I stand in support of the principle of the bill.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Measures such as this, Mr. Speaker, are always difficult to consider dispassionately in the house. In my remarks today I am not questioning the good faith of any member in any part of the house. I was unable to be here on Tuesday when the debate on the resolution took place, but in reading Hansard I thought the Prime Minister had ended his remarks with a very worth-while suggestion. These words are to be found on page 1454 of Hansard for January 26, 1954:

> These matters should be dealt with exclusively on the ground that the opinion expressed by each individual member will be his opinion as to what will really in the long run serve the interests of the Canadian people whom members of parliament are here to represent.

Today I propose to follow his suggestion and give my opinion. Incidentally, earlier in the same paragraph the Prime Minister intimated to his own followers that they were free to vote on this measure as they saw fit, and that the life of the government would not be in jeopardy by reason of the vote. Those words were as follows:

I would say to hon. members on this side of the house that if they honestly believe these increases are not in the long run to be in the best interests of our democratic institutions, they should not feel that because I am the one recommending them at this time they should submit their judgment to mine.

I am very much disturbed, Mr. Speaker, about this plan because I believe, in the first place, that it will weaken the prestige of parliament. Some hon. members have argued it will increase the prestige. My personal opinion is that it will do the opposite. I am disturbed also about it because I believe it will tend to bring into public life in Canada people who are more concerned about the salary than they are about the service they can render to their fellow Canadians.

I should like to place three considerations before my fellow members. The first is this. The election was fought about six months ago. The Canadian people were not told at that time of any plan to increase the indemnity. The Prime Minister in his speech the other day rather intimated that the people had been told the indemnity would be increased. Here is what he had to say, and it is found at page 1452 of Hansard for January 26, 1954:

My colleagues and I came to the conclusion that this problem should be tackled from two angles, and that was the reason why I stated in the national broadcast I made from Vancouver on July 9 of last year that it was our policy—

Then I go on to quote what he had to say in Vancouver, that part of his speech being in quotation marks in Hansard.

"to seek appropriate amendments to the rules of parliament with a view to ensuring speedier and more orderly conduct of the nation's business without any abridgement of the rights of the opposition or of any minority to give expression to its views. We believe that if men and women of ability are to continue to be attracted to public life some way must be found to reduce the length of some of the debates in parliament, and to make the conditions of membership less burdensome than they have become in recent years."

You will notice, Mr. Speaker, in that statement there was no direct reference to any increase in the indemnity. I presume the Prime Minister had that in mind when he uttered these words, "to make the conditions of membership less burdensome", but the ordinary person hearing that would think he was referring to the length of time the session lasted. If it was the intention of his party to increase the indemnity, then I think in fairness to the Canadian people a clearer statement to that effect should have been made. We get to this position, therefore, that the members of this parliament stood for election, and were elected, on the basis of the present indemnity.

The second consideration is that the Prime Minister is now bringing in a proposal which, in effect, is to increase the indemnity 100 per cent. I admit that in one or two years there were two sessions which meant, of course, a double indemnity, but I think it is fair to say this proposal means an increase of 100 per cent in the indemnity. The expense allowance was introduced and passed by the house on the basis that it was to cover expenses, and that it was not to be considered in any way as pay; of course there was a difference between the House of Commons and the Senate in so far as the $2,000 was concerned, in that the allowance to the senators was made taxable.

I do not believe the Prime Minister has said anything today that constitutes a justification for an increase of 100 per cent. Perhaps there should be some increase; I am not disputing that. But from one coast of this country to the other this increase of 100 per cent in our indemnity will start demands for increases in pay. Within the next few weeks it will be used in dozens of bargaining negotiations. We have the hint also that our high court judges are to be the next to get increases in pay. They have had two increases within a very few years. The argument is being made now that because members are having their indemnity doubled there should be an increase for the justices of the high courts.

I do not believe an increase of 100 per cent can be justified at any time, under any conditions, and certainly not at this particular time. I believe that for several reasons. In the first place, Canada has moved into a high priced economy. We have had warnings from responsible men across this country within the last few weeks that that is the position in which we now find ourselves. We are having more and more trouble selling our goods abroad because we are having trouble competing with other nations. So I say this is a time when this nation is in considerable danger because she is getting into a high priced economy. For that reason this is no time for the House of Commons to be setting an example by doubling our own pay.

Then, this is a time when unemployment is a grave threat. I hope it will not become any more serious than it is at the present time, but from one coast to the other today unemployment is extremely serious.

There is one other reason which is close to my heart, and I hope I shall not be accused of using an emotional argument. If so, I cannot help that. However, I must say that the House of Commons has failed to take into consideration recommendations made unanimously in 1952 by a special committee on veterans affairs that the ceiling on the permissive income of recipients of war veterans allowance should be increased. This is not only a case of people outside the house asking for an amendment of that kind; it was a unanimous recommendation by the special committee on veterans affairs.

These men, the great majority of whom were front-line troops, are in the position that if, for example, they reach the age of 70 years, they cannot get the full benefit of the old age security payments, because when they take those payments their war veterans allowances are cut so that the total income will not be more than $60 a month. That situation should have been remedied long ago, and in my opinion should have priority over an increase at this time in our own indemnities. Many of these men are on a starvation basis. We have hundreds of them in British Columbia. On a basis of comparative population we have more war veterans allowance recipients in that province than in any other province in Canada. There is a crying need that their problem be met before ours is dealt with.

The third consideration is this. Obviously this proposed indemnity of $8,000 plus the $2,000 for expenses is meant as pay for a full-time job. There will be monthly payments of indemnity amounting to $666.66. In addition to that there is the tax-free expense allowance of $2,000. And yet, Mr. Speaker, this is not a full-time job. No matter what hon. members may argue to the contrary, I submit it is not a full-time job, and I have as my authority for that statement the Prime Minister himself. This is what he said, as reported at page 1452 of Hansard:

> It was never intended, and it is not now intended, that members of parliament should be salaried servants of the state. Members of parliament are representatives—that is true of members of both houses of parliament—and, to be truly representative, it is desirable that they should be drawn from a wide variety of occupations and walks of life—

And I stress these words.

> —and that they should be able to retain, while they are members of parliament, their connection with the occupation or walk of life and the area from which they were chosen to be representatives in parliament.

I could not agree with any statement more thoroughly than I do with that statement of the Prime Minister. I believe it goes to the root of the democratic system. Are we to have here representatives, or are we to be paid as civil servants? Then he said at a later point in his speech:

> While membership in parliament should not be, and should not be regarded as being, a full-time occupation—

And so on. We must be in our constituencies at least half the year. Most of us are able to be, even those of us who represent constituencies on the west coast. When we are in our constituencies for that length of time, I do not know how a member could sit around and do nothing for six months. There is some political work to do, but there is opportunity for a person to earn at least something. And I think it is of great benefit to the member to get back into his own business and get right down among the people so that he may learn something about the problems they are meeting. I always consider it takes a lot of foolish ideas out of my head when I have to go back and do a little of my regular work. It is of great value that the members should resume their places in the life of the communities from which they come for at least a portion of the year. So let us not say that this $8,000 plus the $2,000 free of income tax is for a full year. It could be much more accurately described as payment for half or three-quarters of a year.

Then, Mr. Speaker, the doubling of the indemnity is bad enough in the case of members in the House of Commons, but this same increase for senators cannot in my opinion be justified on any ground whatsoever. As a matter of fact the Prime Minister made the argument this afternoon that they had to be treated the same. Well, they are not treated the same in the expense allowance. A difference is recognized right there. They pay income tax on their $2,000, but we do not.

I am afraid there enters into this picture the fact that the Senate has the veto on legislation passed by the House of Commons, and that they may say, "Here, we will not pass this bill at all until we get exactly the same as the members get". That is a situation that might as well be faced by hon. members of the House of Commons and by the Canadian people.

There are long periods when the house is sitting and the Senate is not. They rarely sit on Mondays or Fridays, even when they are here. And the amount of work done in the two houses, when both are in session, cannot be compared. For example, we have to deal with the estimates, but the Senate does not have any work of that kind.

Would you call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose for the dinner recess I had almost completed my remarks. If Your Honour will recall, at that time I was pointing out why I thought this doubling of the indemnity to the senators could not be justified on any grounds whatsoever. I had explained three of my reasons, and I should like to add one more. It is this. Unlike the members of the Commons, once the senators leave Ottawa their responsibilities end; for if they have any responsibilities out in the provinces it is very difficult to see what they are. They have no constituents; they have no elections to face. Their position in the constituencies is entirely different from that of the hon. members.

I do not criticize the senators as individuals. About one-third of the present Senate have served with me in the House of Commons, at one time or another, since 1935. I think they are all my friends, at least they were until today. I do not blame them individually; they are victims of a system.

At the present time all those in the Senate, with the exception of seven, are followers of the present Prime Minister. There are 15 or 16 vacancies, and I believe there have never been fewer than 12 vacancies since he became the Prime Minister of Canada. That fact in itself shows how little value he places on the Senate, and I am rather surprised that he can come into the house today and ask that they should be given the same increase as proposed for the members of the Commons. No Prime Minister has ever had a finer chance to do something about meeting the situation in the Senate; yet, instead of making any move to reform, our Prime Minister is doubling the indemnities of the senators.

For the reasons I have outlined I repeat that I believe this bill in its present form is unfair to the Canadian people. They are entitled to better leadership than is being given in this instance.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I feel that I should take part in this debate, not because I think I can throw any new light on the subject but because I have been a strong advocate of better indemnities for members of parliament. I have been in this parliament for a good many years. In that period I have talked to a good many members of parliament about their financial problems. I have known men who saw their livelihood going to pieces, who have not been able to get along on their indemnities, and they had to go back to their professions or their businesses. I have known men in this parliament who have seen themselves getting deeper and deeper into debt without any real hope of improving their position. That is not a healthy situation.

I was an employer of men before I came here, and I always considered it my business, if I thought one of my people was getting into financial difficulty, to see him and find out what the trouble was and to help straighten out his affairs. I do not believe that people who are worrying about financial problems can do their best work in this House of Commons.

I think hon. members will accept the fact that I have no personal axe to grind in this debate. I was more fortunate than most hon. members in that I was able to practise my profession for 30 years before I came to this parliament. I was fortunate in having an earning power when there were no income taxes, and later when the income taxes were not heavy. I am old-fashioned enough to think that when we are earning we should save for our old age, and I did that. The result was that when I was invited to stand for this parliament in my fiftieth year I was able to assess the situation, as most people must do when they are asked to stand for parliament, and accept the invitation.

I think every man in Canada is attracted by the thought of serving his country in the parliament of Canada, but it has been my experience that a great number have had to say "no" simply because they could not see any possibility of making both ends meet. I know I have asked a number of people to stand for parliament. Any member of the government is interested in building up the strength of the party he represents. I have had a good many people consider coming to this parliament, and many people, in fact the majority, have said: "I cannot see how I can support my family and do what you are asking me to do".

I think that most men, surveying the situation, view it in that way. I know I did. I was willing to sacrifice my earning power—that was unimportant—provided that I did not have to sacrifice the standard of living of my wife and children. I think that is a reasonable attitude. I believe a man, when he marries and is raising a family, is under obligation to do the right thing by his family. If he has built up a standard of living for them I do not think he should take on any work that means a lowering of the standard of living or a lessening of the chances of a good education for his children.

I examined the situation in that way, back in 1935, and found that I could afford to stand for parliament. I have been very happy with the remuneration I have received since then, and I would be very happy to finish my term in this parliament with the same remuneration. That is the personal position. But I suggest to this parliament that personal views should not govern. After all, is not the problem this? We are fixing the remuneration for people from coast to coast, in order to arrive at an average that will bring to this parliament the kind of people that we should have in it. You say, "How do we determine that average?" Well, I think the people most capable of determining it are the people who have had experience in living the kind of life that members of parliament are required to live.

It has been said often that there are only two classes of people who can afford to stand for parliament; people who have considerable capital, and people with no money at all. It is a well-recognized fact that if a man comes in here with a small capital, a capital that would mean a great deal if he could go on accumulating, he is bound to dissipate that capital, not in extravagant living, but for purposes that are proper for those who occupy our positions.

I have heard an hon. member say that he is not called upon to make any expenditures in the constituency. Well it has not been my experience to have that kind of constituency; I do not think it has been the experience of many people in this parliament to have that kind of constituency. I would not want to operate that way in any constituency. When I lived in Port Arthur, before I entered this house, I tried to enter into the activities of the community, to support worthy causes, and I would not want to change my position in that regard just because the people of Port Arthur have sent me to represent them in this parliament. I do not think any of us want to change our ways completely to settle down to an isolated life, to not be able to take part in community activities or in the activities of the district we represent, just because we are in this parliament.

The question is this. What is a reasonable remuneration, on the average, to compensate hon. members for the loss of income they suffer in coming to this parliament? It was said by the hon. member who spoke before me that many members can use the summer months to supplement their incomes. I think that situation varies. Professional men can do that. In fact when I entered parliament that was one of the factors I took into account, that I would spend six months at Ottawa but would have another six months in which I could practise my profession. It so happened that I was taken into the cabinet before I entered the House of Commons and was not able to do that. Perhaps you may think that cabinet ministers are very well paid, but I would exchange what I get as a minister for the privilege of having that six months in which to practise my profession.

We are determining what indemnity will attract able men to parliament, the type of men that we think the various constituencies would wish to choose to represent them in parliament. As I say, his indemnity should compensate a man for the time he loses from his own work and for the cost of maintaining two domiciles, as many members must. I take the view that if a man has a wife and five children, as I had when I ran for parliament, he should not have to leave his family at home for six months in the year. His indemnity should be sufficient so that he can provide a home and thus enable them to live with him when he is here in Ottawa. Just to look at the statistics, the increase that is proposed now does not seem unreasonable. It has been said that we should not have an increase here in this parliament because other people have not had increases. I do not know of any class of people who are working for a living, people who are willing and able to work, who have not had an increase since 1945. Since 1945 the cost of living has increased about 60 per cent, and wages and salaries have increased much more than that in proportion.

We regard our work as important. We say that we carry the responsibility for government, and so we do. I suggest to you that no successful business that I know of believes that it can succeed by holding down the salaries of its executives below the point that enables them to live in a way their occupations entitle them to live. That is not considered good business outside this house, and in my opinion it is not good business inside this house.

The people in this house are in various circumstances. As I say, a professional man can supplement his earnings in the recess. The businessman very likely has an income that goes on whether he is in parliament or whether he is in his place of business. But there are a great number of members who are neither professional men nor businessmen. They have been chosen by their electors to represent them here, and it is not easy for many hon. members to get the supplementary income necessary to supplement what they receive here.

It has been said that we should go outside this house and appoint a royal commission to determine the proper scale of parliamentary indemnity. I do not know where we could get more information about the situation than from hon. members themselves, who are experiencing the situation we are trying to remedy. I am sure that if we had a royal commission made up of business people who were getting business salaries they would recommend indemnities which the government could not recommend to this parliament. I am sure that if we had a royal commission made up of people who earn less than we are proposing we would get recommendations that would be on the scale they found adequate to maintain themselves. In my opinion either finding would be meaningless.

No one outside of this house can appreciate the conditions under which members of parliament live and carry on their work. I am sure every member of the government has had conversations with a considerable number of members; and it seems to me, therefore, that the government is in position to recommend an indemnity which is proper under the present circumstances.

It may be that if we enact this legislation, some of us will not come back to the next parliament. I know there are a number of capable young men in Port Arthur constituency who would be likely to stand for my seat if they believed they could make both ends meet while doing it. I think they should have their opportunity. Just because I was able to live and earn in a rather exceptional period and they have to contend with present scales of taxation, I do not see why I should be the man to represent Port Arthur and they should be debarred from standing for office. I daresay the same situation obtains in many constituencies, in that there are a number of able men who are not presently in a financial position to stand for office but who would be able to do so if this change in the indemnity is carried.

I think that is all to the good. I believe it tends to make for a better parliament. I believe the people of Canada will support the action we propose in this bill. I have had a good deal of experience with working on the prairies. There are many representatives from the prairies in this house. I worked there as a professional man for many years, and I never found the people of the prairies a bit reluctant to pay the salaries or compensation that the service justified. Incidentally the farm organizations pay as high salaries as any other business organization. I have never found any feeling of reluctance to pay for the service that was needed at the going rates.

I have had some experience with other classes of people. I notice that the representatives of labour here in parliament are not dissenting from this bill. Why? Labour believes in paying its officers and its representatives rates of remuneration that will allow them to live properly and carry out their functions adequately. I think that that is the real feeling of the people of Canada. They want good representation in this parliament and they are willing to pay a reasonable indemnity for that representation. Therefore I have no hesitation in supporting this bill.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all of us in the house appreciate the moderate and dispassionate manner in which the Minister of Trade and Commerce has just discussed this very important question. I want to say that I could not agree more with him than I do when he says that we should look at the issue on principle, not in terms of personal situations.

I may say further that I could not agree more than I do with the Prime Minister in the closing words of his remarks of last Tuesday. If I understood him correctly, he addressed those closing words primarily to the members on his own side of the house, but they might well have been directed to members in all parts of the house. I refer to his suggestion that members should make their own decision in respect to this matter in the light of what they feel to be best for our Canadian democratic institutions.

It is on that basis, Mr. Speaker, that I approach this question. I could do it on a personal basis. I could discuss my personal situation and that of others, but I do not propose to do so. Rather, I feel it is incumbent upon me, as I feel it is incumbent upon others, to answer this question: What is best for parliament? What is best for democracy? Is it a good thing for the Canadian parliament, for Canadian democracy, to provide for an indemnity and allowance to members of parliament totalling $10,000 a year?

I want to say right at the start and in as clear terms as I can that I do not believe it is good for parliament, for relations between this Canadian parliament and the people of this country, to pay that much and thereby create the economic difference that it will establish between members of parliament and the people whom we represent. I do not go to the other extreme. I do not suggest that it would be good for parliament to have the members of this house paid so little that they would be up against it all the time. That would be just as bad for parliament as to pay an amount of such size that it separates us too far from the people we represent.

I said a moment ago I did not believe we should go to the other extreme and pay members of this house too little. On the other hand, bearing in mind some of the arguments that have been put forward from time to time during the course of this debate, I cannot help but note it is a matter of history that when the indemnity was only $600 a session—it is true that was a long time ago, and it cost a lot less to live in those days—the fact that the indemnity was only $600 did not fail to attract to the parliament of Canada such an outstanding person as Sir John A. Macdonald. I draw attention also to the fact that when the indemnity was only $1,000 a session it did not fail to attract to the parliament of Canada such persons as Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Sir Robert Borden. In the same vein—

An hon. Member: It is not the money that attracts.

Mr. Knowles: An hon. member across the house interjects that it is not the money that attracts. That is the point I am trying to make. That is a statement with which I thoroughly agree.

An hon. Member: That is what brings you here.

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friend knows far better than that. Hon. members of this house know for a fact there have been many great Canadians across the years this parliament has been in existence who have come here because of their desire to serve the nation or because of certain principles for which they were crusading.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, if I may make a more modern reference, that I am thoroughly satisfied that when a certain gentleman by the name of Louis St. Laurent back in 1941 was approached to enter parliament, it was not the money which attracted him here at all. Neither was it the money which attracted a certain C. D. Howe back in 1935. My plea is that hon. members should not promote the idea that we have to have a sizeable indemnity in order to attract good men to parliament. The record of the Canadian parliament is a splendid one, and good men have been attracted to it across the years because of a desire to serve the nation, or because of a crusading spirit which has brought many outstanding men and women to this House of Commons.

I simply wanted to make it clear, Mr. Speaker, that I do not believe we should pay too little, nor should we pay too much. It seems to me the problem that faces us is one of degree; one of finding an amount that will make it possible for men to fill this position and carry out the duties of a member of parliament without having so much that they are too far removed from the ordinary people of this country.

It is all right to quote statistics about the rise in the cost of living; it is all right to quote statistics about the increase in the levels of wages and salaries, but everyone in this house knows that the great bulk of the people in this country today, both salaried people and wage earners, are in the bracket between $2,000 and $3,000 a year. Also bearing in mind, as so many hon. members have stressed, the large number of old age pensioners and people on war veterans allowances who are down in the economic cellar, I suggest we should consider seriously the distance $10,000 a year removes us from the people we represent. I think that amount is too much, for the good of the parliament of Canada.

My leader has already mentioned, and the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway pointed out this afternoon, that we recognize that a case can be made for some increase over the amount which is provided in the statute at the present time. We will indicate again, as has already been done, what we think would be a reasonable amount when we go into committee on the bill, if the bill receives second reading. At this stage, when the government is proposing a total figure of $10,000 a year, most of us in this group believe—and we are all free in this group to have our views on this question—that it is not the best thing for the parliament of Canada and it is not the best thing for democracy to remove us that far from the great mass of the Canadian people by paying ourselves that much money. That is the reason we are voting against this bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister in his remarks today—and he, like the Minister of Trade and Commerce just now, dealt with the matter very dispassionately and in very moderate tones—did suggest that perhaps one of the reasons some hon. members voted against the resolution last Tuesday was that it was a package proposition. I think that is probably true with respect to the reason for the vote against the resolution on the part of some hon. members.

But may I draw to the Prime Minister's attention the fact that what we have before us in this present bill is still quite a package. There are still quite a number of items in it, so it is not just the one question of increasing our own indemnities in this house which is now before us; it also includes the same increase for the members of the other house of this parliament. In addition there is the provision for an increase in the salaries that are to be paid to various officials—the Leader of the Opposition in this house, the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition in the other house; the Speakers of both houses, and the Deputy Speaker of this house. I am not going to take time to deal with all these various increases; but I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that back in 1947 when it was first proposed that there be any salary at all for the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate—in addition to their regular indemnities—we took very strong exception to that proposal and voted against it, and in taking that position we had the support of most if not all the members of the Progressive Conservative party and I believe most, if not all, the members of the Social Credit party at that time.

That is still our view. We feel that the total emoluments being paid to these gentlemen are adequate for the job they are doing, and that just because other increases are being provided—and they share in these other increases—there should not be these additional increases in their salaries as well.

So far as the Senate as a whole is concerned, my views on that question are so well known that I do not need to take much time to develop them at this point. I was a little surprised this afternoon when the Prime Minister said he was not concerned even about any modification of the Senate. I would not have been surprised if he had said he did not agree with those of us who favour abolition of the Senate, but he did not even use that word. He just referred to modifying or reforming the Senate in any way, and he said there were other matters which were of more immediate concern to him.

I am interested in the fact that no less a person than George V. Ferguson, who knows a good deal of what is going on in the Liberal party, in a book that he wrote a short while ago entitled "It's Our Business" had something to say about this matter. He said:

> Nevertheless, Senate reform has been a plank of one or more Canadian political party platforms for more than thirty years. It made its appearance first in the Liberal platform of 1919, doubtless because the Liberals were looking forward to power and feared what a Conservative Senate might do to its legislation. The plank is still there, but nobody does anything about it.

Mr. Pouliot: May I ask a question of the hon. gentleman?

Mr. Knowles: Certainly.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Pouliot: Why does he give more importance to the views of an outsider than to those of his Liberal colleagues in the house?

Mr. Knowles: I was merely quoting an outsider to support my statement that it is the general belief in this country that the Liberal party has stood for Senate reform since 1919. We now find in the words of the Prime Minister today that what George Ferguson said is perfectly true. The plank is still there but nobody does anything about it. Apparently it is the intention of the Prime Minister not to do anything about it as long as he is Prime Minister.

But it does seem to me that at a time like this, when we are being asked to increase the amount of money paid to those who serve in the other place, it is appropriate for some of us who feel strongly about it to say again that we believe there is no need in the Canadian parliament for a second house, particularly one as unrepresentative of the Canadian people as is the Canadian Senate. Therefore if we are opposed to a Senate at all, we are by virtue of that belief opposed to increasing the indemnities paid to members of the other place.

I draw the Prime Minister's attention to the fact that a great many people and a great many newspapers in this country who do not share our view that the Senate should be abolished are nevertheless shocked at the proposal to increase the indemnities of senators to the figure proposed in this legislation. I hope that even yet—I dared to hope it particularly this afternoon, when I thought the Prime Minister was not too sure of his case on this point—consideration will be given to leaving the indemnities paid to members of the other place where they are at the present time.

There are one or two other matters in connection with the bill before us about which I feel I should say a word. The Prime Minister has detailed the history of the Senate and House of Commons Act in respect of the changes that have been made from time to time in the indemnity. I have not gone back to 1867 to check the point about which I am now going to say a word, but I have checked back through two or three of the changes and I find that when the indemnity stood at $2,500 a session the provision with respect to the amount of money that a member would lose for lost time, that is absence in excess of 15 sitting days in a session, was $15 per day. When the indemnity was increased to $4,000 the figure of $15 per day was raised to $25. Again in 1945, when the $2,000 expense allowance was added, it was provided that for every $25 lost in respect of the indemnity there would be a loss of $12.50 a day with respect to the expense allowance. In other words the total loss for days absent in excess of the 15 per session that are allowed was raised to $37.50 per day.

My point is that on each of the last few occasions when there has been a bill like this before the house amending the Senate and House of Commons Act for the purpose of increasing the amount paid to members, a corresponding increase was made in the amount to be deducted for days lost in excess of 15 per session. But I look in vain for any such change in the bill now before us. It seems to me that the Prime Minister should follow suit, and just as on each of the previous occasions to which I have referred the penalty for lost time was increased, so the penalty should now be increased.

The figures I have given, $15 per day when the indemnity was $2,500, $25 per day when the indemnity was $4,000, and $37.50 per day as it is now, are all roughly proportionate. They are not exactly the same. On the basis of the same proportion the amount should now be either $60 or $62.50 per day. I suggest that when we get into committee the Prime Minister should consider putting another section in the bill to change the appropriate section of the Senate and House of Commons Act that deals with the question of lost time.

I may say that I believe the government should go a great deal further. I think the whole question of attendance in the house should be reviewed, perhaps by a committee of the house, and some more satisfactory means should be found of keeping a record of the attendance of members and of making sure that indemnities are not drawn unless members really perform the service for which they are elected to the House of Commons.

As a matter of fact there are two or three other changes of that kind that it seems to me should be made at a time like this, but I shall leave them until we get into committee on this bill or on the bill that is to follow amending the Salaries Act. The Prime Minister no doubt knows some of the things I have in mind. I have before me a memorandum prepared some years ago by Mr. Watson Sellar, the auditor general. The whole point I am making is that things that need to be tidied up in the Senate and House of Commons Act and in the Salaries Act do not get attended to in the periods between the major changes that are made. Therefore now is the time to make changes with respect to these ancillary matters, or we all know they will not be made at all.

I shall not take the time of the house to deal with details of that kind now but will do so when the appropriate time comes. In the meantime I hope that hon. members generally throughout the house will agree with the Prime Minister, with the Minister of Trade and Commerce and with me that it is up to each one of us to make our decision with respect to the bill now before us on the basis of what we think to be best for parliament, best for our democratic institutions, and best for the relationship between us and the people of Canada whom we were elected to represent. On that basis I shall vote against the bill.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Moose Mountain has risen on several occasions to get the floor. Therefore I feel it is time that he should be given a chance.

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise and make my position quite clear on this matter. Stated quite simply, it is that I am not in favour of any increase as suggested in the bill.

I might say that the right hon. Prime Minister did a fair thing, and should be highly commended for the manner in which he introduced this bill. He should be commended particularly for the statement he made at the conclusion of his remarks. What I have to say and the position I take on this matter do not and should not, I think, reflect on any member in this house. I believe it is our responsibility to come to our own conclusions, in conformity with what the Prime Minister said during his introduction of this bill.

I should like to read that to the house, as reported on page 1454 of Hansard of January 26, 1954:

> I would say to hon. members on this side of the house that if they honestly believe these increases are not in the long run to be in the best interests of our democratic institutions, they should not feel that because I am the one recommending them at this time they should submit their judgment to mine. These matters should be dealt with exclusively on the ground that the opinion expressed by each individual member will be his opinion as to what will really in the long run serve the interests of the Canadian people whom members of parliament are here to represent.

I heartily agree with the sentiments expressed by the Prime Minister, and it is entirely on that basis that I have come to the conclusion not to support any increase at this time. I know that every hon. member in the house will readily agree with me when I say that there are members in this house who are here for no other purpose than public service. This is certainly true in the case of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), as well as other members. We do know that in the introduction of this bill they have no personal axe to grind. They are doing it because they believe it is in the interests of parliament and the country that such a bill should be passed at this time.

I think I can speak with some degree of authority on my own position at least, because I am not a new member in the house, having represented the old constituency of Assiniboia from 1945 to 1949. I appreciate the difficulties, of course, that some of us have to face in being members of this parliament. I accepted the nomination as a great honour. At that time I was a registered Canadian seed grower and a producer of registered Hereford cattle. Having a specialized farm, I know some of the things that can happen to a member when he spends 75 per cent or more of his time in the business of representing his people. I do appreciate the financial position of some hon. members.

Again in the last election the people came and persuaded me to accept the nomination to represent them. I accepted it knowing full well that there might be financial considerations and perhaps certain sacrifices to make. I did this, sir, without any knowledge whatever of any intention on the part of the government to increase the indemnity. At this time I do not know what my constituents would think, except that I have had statements from one or two against accepting any increase. It is on my own responsibility, however, after giving great consideration to the matter, that I have decided not to vote for it.

In the first instance, this party is on record as being against the Senate. This in no way reflects on the members of the other place. I know some of those members personally, and I know that they are honourable members. We just do not believe the Senate is a necessary component of parliament, and it costs the Canadian taxpayer well over a million dollars a year. I do not consider it in the best interests of parliament to increase their sessional indemnity.

I want to say that when coming down here I felt there were a great many things that should be done. We still have these recipients of war veterans allowance; we still have our old age pensioners; we still have our superannuated civil servants, who by no stretch of the imagination can be said to be receiving fair treatment from the Canadian government.

[Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain).]

Then I should like to refer to the statement made just before the dinner recess by the leader of the Social Credit party, who said it would be very easy to determine the increase necessary for members of parliament on the basis of statistics. This may be true, but I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) when he said he did not think it was in the best interests of parliament that members of parliament should be too far removed from the people of Canada.

I have a sessional return dated January 29, 1954, which contains the answers to certain questions concerning the incomes of our Canadian people. According to this paper there are 452,427 who earn less than $500; 443,140 who earn between $500 and $999; 601,652 who earn between $1,000 and $1,499; 690,792 who earn between $1,500 and $1,999. In other words, there are 750,889 wage earners who, according to the latest statistics I can find for 1951, earned between $2,000 and $2,499.

Another figure which I have here, Mr. Speaker, shows what sort of bracket hon. members of the House of Commons will be in if the increase is granted. I find that, according to taxation statistics, 1953, from the Department of National Revenue, which outline the position for the 1951 taxation year, there were only 1·2 per cent of the Canadian people earning $10,000 or more.

So far as I am concerned, I cannot favour the increase. I do not think it would be in the interests of the people. There are some other things which should be done, which I have mentioned, before we would be in a position to support this measure.

In conclusion I might say that if I needed any further argument to encourage me to vote against this measure, I received a letter just the other day from my wife. I had written her saying that there was some movement on foot to increase our indemnity. In her reply she said that I was sent to Ottawa to represent the people and get something better for our farmers who were caught in the price squeeze today. She did mention the old age pensioners, too. I believe, Mr. Speaker, on that ground I must take the position I have outlined.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wish to take a very few minutes of the time of the house, Mr. Speaker, to explain why I shall vote against the motion for second reading of this bill. I hope I am not taking myself too seriously in this but I should like to make a brief explanation. I shall not vote against second reading because I am against an increased indemnity. On the contrary, like my leader I believe there should be an increase in the indemnity. I shall say frankly that if this measure becomes law I shall not refuse the increase.

An hon. Member: Nor will anybody else.

Mr. Croll: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Macdonnell: Yes.

Mr. Croll: Will the hon. member say how it is he is in favour of the increased indemnity and yet will vote against the motion for second reading?

Mr. Macdonnell: I am going to try to explain that, and whether or not I shall be successful the hon. member may judge. There have been many good reasons given for raising the indemnity, and I shall mention only one; it was mentioned earlier this evening by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. That is the fact that we often fail to get the kind of candidates we want because they just feel they cannot come here, with the indemnity as it is. That is, I think, a very good reason for being in favour of it, and I am in favour of it.

But my vote is a protest vote. It is a protest against the manner in which this has been carried out. I submit that if this had been carried out properly there might have been no need of my being in the position I am in now.

I wish to compare this situation with one or two other things that have been done. In this case the government, for reasons I do not understand, seems to have behaved in a manner entirely different from that which it adopted when the pensions were introduced. At the time of the pensions there was a consultation with the different parties before the measure was brought to the house. We had a chance of making our contribution, for whatever it was worth. Then there was a committee which studied the matter for a long time, and a great many things were brought to the attention of that committee.

While I admit that pensions are in a somewhat special category, and while I admit that in the long run we do have to be the judges of this thing—because there can be no other final judges—I do submit that by setting up a committee we would be in a better position to reach the conclusion we have to reach. I wish to support what I am saying by pointing out that in a similar situation in Great Britain—entirely similar, so far as I can see—they did appoint a committee; and I wish to read briefly from British Hansard of May 29, 1946, quoting from a speech of Mr. Dalton, who said at page 1233, 5th series, 1946:

> We felt it would be very much better for a committee of the members of the house to look into the question quite frankly without any direct lead from the government as to what was desirable. Therefore, on 15th November last a select committee was appointed, and it issued its report on 6th March. On 30th April, with the authority of the cabinet, I made a statement in the house of the government's proposals, which in substance and on the great majority of points at issue, follow the recommendations of the select committee.
> We are very grateful to the select committee for their work, and I am glad that the report of the select committee was unanimous. Upon the select committee there served some members of considerable experience of the house, and also some young members who brought to the discussions the freshness which is appropriate to new arrivals, and between them they agreed on a number of proposals.

I feel that the Canadian people were entitled to a better method of having this done. I feel that if this is passed without any committee being set up—because I do not think the committee of the whole house is the place to have the kind of intimate discussion we need in this instance—and if this is passed without any further means afforded for study and consideration, then when I go back to my constituency I shall be in a very awkward position. I shall be asked, "You increased your indemnity?" "Yes". "To $10,000?" "Yes". "On what basis did you do it?"—and I feel that I may be in a very awkward position, because I really just have to say, "I don't know." At the moment we are in the position of the children who play that game: "Take any number; double it; divide by two", etc. I do not know how these figures are arrived at. I feel that we should have an opportunity to do what we did—and with good effect, I thought—at the time of the pensions.

There are one or two other points I wish to make before taking my seat. This has been said already, but I think I must repeat that it is in the highest degree unfortunate that this increase was never mentioned until recently. And I wish to draw attention to what was done in 1945, at the time the expense allowance was given. I quote from page 3414 of Hansard, from the speech of Mr. Mackenzie King, where he said:

> I had not intended to speak on the resolution but since others have made some comments perhaps I should say a word as to the obligation I have felt in the matter of introducing this resolution. I speak now more particularly to hon. members who have come into the house since the last session, the last parliament in fact. Hon. members who were present at that time will remember that before the end of the session I stated that I thought the allowance paid to members of parliament was wholly inadequate, having regard to their increased obligations, the changed situation in the world, and the corresponding enlargement of their duties since the allowance had been previously fixed.

I think it was unfortunate that that was not done in this instance. It is unfortunate that there was no consultation with other parties. It is unfortunate that this matter is brought in on a take it or leave it basis and that no committee has been set up, following what seemed to be a sound and wise course taken two years ago.

For that reason, though unwillingly, I shall vote against second reading; though I still hope, even at this late hour, that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) may see his way clear to follow the procedure of two years ago and let us have a committee. Because I repeat, it seems to me that the Canadian people are entitled to have this matter dealt with in a better way than is being done on this occasion.

Let me say again I fully realize the truth of what has been said, that in the last analysis we have to be the judges. But in my opinion the last analysis ought not to be until we have done the best we can to inform ourselves, that is, by considering what has been done elsewhere, so that we may have in ourselves—what I have not at the moment—a knowledge of the facts so that I can go to my constituents and justify the particular figures that are decided on.

Mr. Hector Dupuis (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, I shall not take up much time in this debate, because I have spoken on the matter already. At that time I gave my reasons for being in favour of the bill we are now studying.

I prefer being in favour everywhere I go, instead of being in the position of some members in the house who speak for, when behind the curtain, and speak against when they are in the chamber. I am not going to mention anyone, but I am just making this observation so hon. members will know that I am not talking one way outside the house and another way inside.

I listened with great interest this afternoon to the Leader of the Opposition, who said that while there might be reasons members in this chamber should be entitled to an increase, he did not feel the same applied to members of the Senate. He placed some figures on record in which he showed that members of congress in the United States were receiving $27,000, although it is proposed that we receive only $10,000 here. He said it would be hard for us to explain why we give the same treatment to senators as that given to members of the House of Commons.

In the city of Montreal the council is composed of three classes, namely class A, class B and class C. Class A councillors represent the landlords; class B represent the non-proprietors, and class C represent the people sent to council by different organizations. I believe there are 11 of them, among others the board of trade, the chamber of commerce, the University of Montreal, and other organizations of the like.

All three different classes of councillors are given the same treatment. However, the class C councillors are not elected by the people, but are named to council by their own organizations. In the class C group, if one is a member of the executive committee he will receive $7,000 a year, just the same as any other member of the executive who must be elected. Indeed, we find that the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace (Mr. Hamilton) is in class C, in the city of Montreal; and as such he is paid the same amount that is paid to the members who are elected by the people. If anybody thought that we were creating a precedent by giving people who are not elected the same indemnity as people who are elected, then may I say here is a good example. A city of a million and a half people has given the same treatment to non-elected representatives as they gave to the elected representatives.

I shall take my seat after this. I just wanted to give the reasons why I shall support the policy of giving an increase to the Senate. This afternoon reference was made to the poor people, to the people who are on old age pensions, to those receiving blind allowances and all those other social allowances that we give. Well, if for one moment I thought—and I say this because I represent a constituency composed of working class people to the extent of 80 per cent—they would be harmed by the action we are taking here or would be deprived of having more done for them, then I would be the first one to oppose the measure.

I shall not use the word I used the other day, Mr. Speaker; I was told we must not use that kind of language, but it is not right to say that we have no use for the poor people or that we do not care for them because we are giving ourselves an increase. If you took your pencil you would not have to calculate very long to arrive at what this will cost the people of this country. It will cost every citizen of this country about ten cents a year to give fair treatment to their representatives.

I do not know if there is anybody in this parliament who does not need an increase. I would be inclined to vote for an amendment of the nature suggested by the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low) when he spoke this afternoon. If any hon. members feel that they do not need the increase there may be an opportunity for them to say whether they want the increase or do not.

So far as I am personally concerned I am not ashamed to say that after my experience I wonder if I can afford for long the luxury of being a representative of this chamber at the indemnity we are receiving now, namely $6,000 a year. In my last speech I gave the reasons for that. Without hesitation I say I know the mentality of my people, and I am sure they would certainly understand why their representative in this parliament has not been afraid to take his responsibility and give fair treatment to parliamentary representatives, not only for himself, not only for this parliament but for those who will succeed us.

Before taking my seat I want to say that if I thought the action we take here would mean that the poor people would have to endure worse treatment or more hardship than they are going through now, I would be the first one to oppose the measure.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, what I have to say will be very brief. It is good to have the opportunity to speak one's own mind on this particular question. We of this party, and I expect of the other parties, too, have that liberty because, while we should not discuss personal affairs or our own economic position or that sort of thing—we all have our own troubles—that I think is a purely personal matter. In so far as I am concerned this is a matter of principle.

We should leave personalities out. I do wish the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) had not suggested, after the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway had spoken, that anyone in this party, and I assume he meant the hon. member who had just spoken, was speaking for political purposes.

Mr. Low: May I at once on a question of privilege disabuse my hon. friend's mind. I indicated no one whatsoever in what I said.

Mr. Knight: I am very glad, Mr. Speaker, to withdraw that implication. I am sure the hon. member for Peace River would agree with me that if there is any man in this house who would refuse to abandon his convictions for political considerations that man is the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. He has proved that time and time again.

I was sorry to hear the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne), when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre mentioned money, say, "That is what you come here for". I would suggest that if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre were sitting on the other side of the house no remarks of that sort would be made about him. I fancy that the hon. members on the other side would rather welcome the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on that side of the house if he could be persuaded to cross this floor, a contingency which I would say is not apt to happen. With respect to his ability or his earning power, if anyone wishes to sneer at the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre as one of those who has come to parliament in order to make his living, I would say that a just-minded man on the opposite side of the house, including the Minister of Finance whom I have heard express himself in this regard, would be the first to say that there is nothing in that.

Since I am speaking of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, may I say that he often puts us on this side of the house in a rather unfortunate position, particularly if we have to speak after him, because when he has finished he has said in as precise a manner as can be just about everything that can be said. I had jotted down an occasional note which I wished to develop myself, but I find myself in the position that he has developed those jottings much more adequately than I could have done it myself. Therefore my object in rising tonight is simply to put myself on record as being totally opposed to this bill.

My reasons for taking this position are of course several. The Senate has been mentioned. I cannot see how anyone can consistently vote for an increase in the salaries of a group of men, no matter how excellent these men may be personally—and they are excellent men; I am not criticizing them at all—when he has spoken time and again in favour of that body's total abolition.

There is one thing, and perhaps it is the only thing new that I may mention, and I think it is fair to draw it to the attention of the house. While the indemnity at the present moment is $4,000 on a sessional basis, owing to the fact that it is on a sessional basis and owing to the fact that during the last parliament of four years there were two special sessions, that gave the members of parliament an extra $8,000. If that is spread over four years we find that an extra $2,000 a year has been received—I almost allowed myself to use the words "take-home pay", which is language that I deplore.

What it amounts to is this, that over the last four years each hon. member has received not $4,000 but actually $6,000. If the Prime Minister's bill had proposed an increase in the indemnity from $4,000 to $6,000 I should have found myself in support of that, not because it constitutes an actual increase, since it would not be an actual increase, but because it would simply put upon an annual and a secure basis which one could expect to receive each year the amount of money which hon. members have been receiving over the last four years.

I think perhaps that would have been more reasonable. I could have voted for it, but I am not prepared to vote for an increase in the indemnity to $8,000. I can see the point that is raised that this would not give an actual increase of $4,000 but that it is really an increase of $2,000 in the amount that each hon. member would receive.

I was interested in hearing the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway expound the theory of economic determinism. I do not agree with some of my hon. friend's statements, but I do agree with that. I believe all of us, whether we know it or whether we do not know it, are influenced in our thinking by our own economic position. I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway has a point when he says that if our own position is too far removed from the economic position of the vast majority of those whom we represent, we might not have the same understanding or sympathy for those who are less well off than ourselves. I believe that point is well taken.

I know that the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) and many of my hon. friends who are older members on all sides of this house would not be so influenced. But I believe there is a danger in the indemnity or total take, if I may call it that, which is now proposed, in that we might attract to this house a group of people who were very interested in that higher indemnity; young men who have not had the opportunity, as some of us older people have, of suffering some of the hardships which many of us did during the thirties. I consider that the most valuable education I ever received, either at school, at university or anywhere else, was the one winter when I spent a total of $18 on my keep, a total which was supplemented by the rabbits I was able to catch in the woods. It is not an experience that I would recommend to my hon. friends except as a source of education.

I said I was not going to mention personal things, but perhaps hon. members will excuse that little personal story. I do believe there is something in the theory of economic determinism in that we have to suffer, we have to experience, we have to live, and not always in a sphere of life far removed from the troubles of the people whom we were sent here to represent.

I do not think anyone is going to be accused of being purely political during this debate. I know I am not going to criticize any hon. members or their opinions. We have all been sent here because our constituents thought it was a good thing to send us here. I am sure that whatever our indemnity may be we will continue to serve this country and the people who sent us here to the best of our ability. I shall vote against this bill.

Mr. H. P. Mang (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, there is only one reason I rise tonight and that is because my neighbour to the south, the hon. member for Moose Mountain (Mr. McCullough), spoke before the last speaker. There have been a number of angles raised in this debate, but there is one point that strikes me and I shall come to it directly because we have not very much time.

Considerable emphasis has been laid upon pensioners and people who get only $2,000 or $3,000 a year, and it has been contended that before we do anything in this house with regard to raising the indemnity we should consider them. I give credit to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway for lofty motives in what he has said.

There is one point which has not been mentioned during this debate. There is another class of people ranging from Victoria to St. John's, Newfoundland, who spend billions, not just millions, upon beer, wine and whisky. In Saskatchewan last year $40 million was spent on liquor. The hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Dupuis) has said that this increase in the indemnity will represent only ten cents for every person in Canada. That is just one glass of beer.

Let us get a proper perspective of this bill. When any nation can spend that amount of money upon liquor—I am not saying anything against it because we have had this sort of thing going on since the time of Noah when the ark got stuck on Mount Ararat and they celebrated for three days—when any nation considers the liquor industry as being worth more to the people than its House of Commons, then there is something wrong with the perspective of the nation.

We are called upon to do a great many things in our constituencies as members. If we are going to fulfil our duties properly we should have the wherewithal with which to do it. This is going to help us a little; not altogether, but a little. The hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Thatcher) is increasing his hardware empire throughout the entire area of western Canada, and he probably does not need it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. An hon. member must not make reference to personal activities outside this house of another hon. member.

Mr. Mang: I withdraw, I am new here. I am sorry. What I am trying to point out is that at one time the people of Saskatchewan elected a government which reduced the indemnity of its members, and we got no credit for it. Then in 1944 the people of Saskatchewan elected a C.C.F. government which has from time to time increased the indemnities, has increased the number of cabinet ministers and increased their salaries. I find it very difficult to understand some of the people who represent that party here tonight.

I am going to support the motion. I think I can defend it in my particular constituency and in the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I realize that at this hour any hon. member who is opposing this legislation is not likely to win friends or influence people, but I feel that the point of view which I propose to advance should be expressed. I do not mind admitting that I make mistakes from time to time. When I was here in 1945, when the last increase was proposed, I supported it. I have been sorry since that I did not stand by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway in opposing it.

I think there may be very good reasons for giving members of parliament some allowance for expenses, but that increase came at a time when we had successfully held the price line through some very critical years. Every organization in the country was pressing for increases in prices. They wanted to increase the price of steel, the price of farm implements and so on. Workers wanted increases in their wages. What was a perfectly legitimate piece of legislation to make provision for expenses was understood by the people of this country to be an increase of 50 per cent in our indemnity. There was a tremendous reaction against that throughout the country, and by the time things settled down we realized that $6,000 was not any better than $4,000.

On this question I believe our public relations have not been too good. As recently as a week ago a well-known writer, John A. Stevenson, in his "Ottawa Letter" published in Saturday Night not only made some critical remarks about the $2,000, but gave us an extra $1,000. I must admit I have never been able to locate it. He mentions reduced rates for staying at the Chateau Laurier; mentions that we get a very good meal in the parliamentary restaurant for $1, and that we do not have to pay our stenographers. As a farmer I was never required to hire a stenographer. My wife never charged me $1 per meal, and I find that though the Chateau Laurier gives a reduced rate of $5.50, there is not one of the 23 members of this group who takes advantage of it.

Mr. Nowlan: Who gets it?

Mr. Nicholson: I understand you pay that rate if you stay for the entire session.

Mr. Nowlan: You are wrong.

Mr. Nicholson: Well, some of the people who have that information ought to put Mr. Stevenson right.

An hon. Member: We have already done so.

Mr. Nicholson: I think it is unfortunate that a well-known correspondent such as Mr. Stevenson, who has the advantage of many privileges in this house, should write in that fashion. His paper is the only one I know of which sends a canvasser around from room to room in this house to secure subscriptions for this paper. He has made three visits to my room without obtaining a subscription, and he does not even ask whether or not it is convenient for me to see him. I suggest a paper that takes that sort of advantage of the good nature of the members here should not accuse us of getting $1,000 which none of us ever get.

Before returning to the House of Commons I was one of those fortunate farmers who was in the happy position of being able to pay income tax. I say that sincerely, because I am sure more farmers are worried about not having to pay income tax than about paying income tax. I found when I made out my returns that I was entitled to include expenses. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) supplied us with a very helpful book wherein he gave the financial statement of an unnamed farmer who had a total income of $9,906, but he had expenses of $6,714. It makes a good deal of difference if you take these expenses into account before paying your income tax. If you paid income tax on that gross amount you would have to pay $1,952, but if you took your expenses into account you would pay only $201. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that members of all political parties have expenses which should be taken into account before paying income tax. However, that is water under the bridge.

Less than six months ago there were 900 candidates in Canada who wanted to come here very badly, but only 265 came. In my constituency there were five candidates, and I am sure if I decided tonight I could not continue to represent the people of Mackenzie for the present amount of $6,000 a year any one of the four would be glad to take my position.

The Leader of the Opposition did not make quite clear whether he wanted the sort of commission which investigated congressional indemnities in the United States. On investigation I found that their commission took five months to consider the kind of complicated question we are apparently going to settle in the next day or two. The commission issued a report with some interesting comments. They said the average congressman spends $3,000 a year more than his $12,500 salary; that many congressmen have to return to private life after a few years to recoup. However, they recommended an increase in the salaries of congressmen and district judges from the figure of $12,500 to $27,500. The Leader of the Opposition said that our two countries are somewhat similar, and that the cost of living is similar in both countries. But he did not finish up the point and say whether he considered the United States recommendations to be fair or unreasonable.

I for one have made some inquiries as to how members are treated in different countries around the world, and apparently there are a great many unreasonable demands on congressmen in the United States. I considered the position in the United Kingdom, New Zealand, Sweden, France and the United States. In the United States members are paid $12,500, but there is rent for office accommodation in your constituency; you are allowed 12,000 words for telegrams, and 30 hours in long distance telephone service from Washington to anywhere in the United States. Many services like that bring the total to up around $40,000.

However, I cannot help but remind myself, as a member of the C.C.F. party, that if I lived in the United States I could not be a member of congress. It is almost impossible for a member of a third party in that enlightened country to ever get a seat in congress or the Senate. At any rate, it has not happened for a long time and apparently it is not going to happen in the foreseeable future. In the other countries mentioned members of parliament, prime ministers and cabinet ministers receive much less than in Canada.

I appreciate the point emphasized by hon. members on all sides of the house regarding the contribution the present Prime Minister has made. I am told the return we gave him for coming here was probably less than a third of the amount he enjoyed as an outstanding lawyer. But there have been compensations. The Prime Minister is about to embark on a world tour. I believe there are men in Canada who would give a million dollars if they could exchange places with the Prime Minister just long enough to make this tour around the world. But a million dollars will not buy that sort of experience; and the Prime Minister did not wait to come here before interesting himself in public service and endeavouring to serve his fellow men. What I said of the Prime Minister could be said of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I am sure of all members of the cabinet. I am proud of the fact that although the salaries paid to cabinet ministers during the war years were very small compared with the returns that went to some of the people doing business with cabinet ministers, we did not have any scandal in Canada during that period. Such a scandal would have weakened faith in democracy, and I am glad members of the opposition have not been able to uncover any scandal of any great proportion in connection with Canada's war effort.

I do not care whether I am accused of being a hypocrite by some hon. members opposite. I am prepared to let the people of Mackenzie decide that question. I want to suggest that life is a bit too short to place ourselves in the position that this move is going to place us in. In my opinion the net effect is not going to be nearly as attractive as some of those who are voting for this measure think.

I know the advice I gave to some of my friends on all sides of the house when I was here before was not taken too seriously. I suggested they go back home and get some of their supporters to put some money into their political party every year. The Liberal party, the Conservative party, the Social Credit party and the C.C.F. party—that is the only one I worried about—would all do much better if every person would select some party and support that party as generously as his financial position permitted.

I am in the happy position of having been a candidate on five occasions. I was elected three times and twice defeated, but on every occasion there were at least dozens of people in my constituency who put up more money for election expenses than I did. The net cost for me was very little whether we won or lost. I would prefer to continue my relations with my people on the basis that as a member of parliament I was not in as favourable a position as some of them have been who have operated farms or businesses during these more lucrative years.

I must also say that I do not see how in this day and age we can support an increase for the members of the other place. Surely a cheque of $500 a month for life for people who do as little as the members of the other place—I do not wish to reflect on any of them personally; many of them are friends of mine, although they probably will not be now—is quite an ample amount, and the proposal to increase their pay by $333 a month is something I cannot support.

Then there is a final point that is important to me. I represent a constituency that has within it a very large number of people unable to pay any income tax. When I spoke on housing the other night I gave figures as to the value of housing in my constituency in 1941. I doubt that there is any constituency in the country with a lower average value for housing. I simply cannot go back to my people and say that I could not get along on $6,000 a year and had to have an increase. Therefore my position will be that I cannot support any increase.

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): I should like to take a few minutes of the time of the house to place some of my views on the record. There would seem to be a feeling among some members, in fact it has been expressed tonight, that there is doubt as to the sincerity of certain hon. members who have taken part in this debate. They may wonder how that suspicion arises. As far as I am concerned it comes about from having followed the speeches made by members in the house in the nine years I have been here. During those nine years I have seen members stand up and vote for increases to all civil servants. That was done without any hesitation. They have also suggested increases in family allowances, old age pensions and every other social service with which the house has to deal.

Knowing that they do not have the responsibility for financing such increases, I wonder if they would have taken the same attitude if they had been in the position of the government. It is very easy to suggest increases for others when you are not responsible for finding the cash to take care of those increases. If you look at the order paper, and the same is true in any session of parliament, you will find that it contains resolutions which if they were all carried out would increase the cost of government by hundreds of millions of dollars. These resolutions are brought forward each year. We listen to them being discussed in the house day after day. Are these resolutions sponsored by irresponsible people or are they really sincere in saying what they have said on the floor of the house?

I have had members come to me in the last six months—this was also mentioned by another member a few moments ago—and ask me what I had heard about an increase in the indemnity; and I can say, without any fear of contradiction, that they used a different tone outside the house than inside the house. I am one who is firmly convinced—

Mr. Nicholson: On a question of privilege, a reference has been made which would imply that members who have spoken as I have spoken have spoken otherwise outside the house. I want it clearly understood that no member can say that I have spoken outside the house in a different way than I have spoken tonight.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): That is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Nicholson: No member can make that sort of reference without naming the member involved.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I have made that sort of reference and I am not naming the members involved. I have made it, and I am standing on that ground because they have come to me and asked me.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has made a blanket declaration that members who have spoken in the debate along a certain line have expressed different views outside the house. His statement might imply that most or all of those who have spoken are considered by the hon. member as being of that calibre. I do not think he should make that kind of implication. I do not think he needs to do so for the purpose of his argument.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I did not have any intention of accusing them all. I said some.

An hon. Member: Give names.

Mr. Nicholson: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Nicholson: No hon. member can accuse other members of the house of speaking one way in the house and otherwise outside the house without naming the members involved and giving those who are under a cloud a chance to defend themselves.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member who is speaking does not mention any names there is no reason for another hon. member to rise on a question of privilege. Why should the hon. member think he is being singled out particularly? His name has not been mentioned. Realizing that perhaps a dozen or more members have taken part in the debate, and since the remarks of the hon. member for Charlotte were general in character as if he were implying that all those who had participated in the debate on second reading of the bill were speaking one way in the house and another way outside, I have asked him not to carry on in this vein, and he has explained that if he did cast any implication it was certainly unintentional. I think that is sufficient. I would imagine that the question of privilege raised by the hon. member is now settled.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): There is another question that worries me somewhat. Many speakers have referred to the Senate. If the Senate had a majority of Conservative members today I wonder if those members of the Conservative party in the house who have spoken would use the same tone they have used in this debate. If there were a majority of C.C.F. members in the Senate I wonder if C.C.F. members of the house would use the same tone they have used in this debate. I am very doubtful that they would. Because there is a Liberal majority in the Senate they have taken advantage of that fact to speak as they have, but I feel quite sure in my own mind, although I have no way of proving it, that if things were reversed they would adopt a different attitude.

Another thought I have in my mind is that this legislation was perhaps designed to keep the good members we have in the house. Let me say at the outset that I do not class myself as a good member. I would say that the legislation was designed to keep the good members and at the same time induce more able and efficient businessmen to enter public life. In the back of my mind there is the thought that some members of the house may be worried about the results of the next conventions. From the discussion that has taken place here it would seem that they fear there may be a little more competition when the next election rolls around. I for one am convinced in my own mind that, with the indemnity increased to $10,000, I will have to fight to get the nomination in my own riding. There are plenty of citizens there who can do a better job than I am doing. The increase in the indemnity will induce them to come out, and if they can do a better job this is the place for them. If that is the case I want to see them win the convention when election time rolls around again.

Mr. Rowe: That is good.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Comparisons are made in the house as to prices, wages and a hundred other different things. We usually make use of the conduct of the socialists for purposes of comparison. The member who spoke before me mentioned the indemnity paid to congressmen in the United States. Surely he is convinced that they are receiving a much greater indemnity than we are. He mentioned some of the services with which they are provided by way of supplementing their indemnity. Again this is something we do not have in this house. There is no comparison between the indemnity that is paid to United States congressmen and that received by members of this house.

Another fact that has never been brought to light in this debate is that if a member—I speak now for myself—receives the increase of $4,000 his income tax will be increased by anywhere from $1,600 to $2,000. That is as close as I can calculate it at the moment, but perhaps the minister could help me with the calculation. This would give me an indemnity of about $6,400. I believe that if you took all the members of the House of Commons and the members of the Senate and calculated what they would pay in income tax, you would find that instead of $10,000 they would receive a whole lot less. When the income tax is deducted it goes back into the government pot, so it is not $10,000 the people of this country will be paying to each member of parliament and each member of the Senate.

In 1905 the indemnity received by members of parliament was $2,500. In 1920 this indemnity was increased to $4,000 by a Conservative government. I believe you will all agree with me that in 1920 conditions were not too good. I can remember that year very well, and conditions were not good; but the Conservative government saw fit to increase the indemnity from $2,500 to $4,000. If the figures I am about to give are not correct, I should be glad to have them corrected. I believe that prior to 1939 the average total revenue of this country was about $600 million; that is what this parliament had to deal with. It has grown until today the revenue is over $4 billion. In other words you have seven times the revenue to deal with today that you had even 15 years ago. Surely that means longer hours and more work for members of parliament.

I should like to speak for a moment now about my own case, and then I shall resume my seat. When I was nominated in 1945 I was working for the civil service. At the age of 65 I could have taken superannuation which would have provided for my family and myself. I came here in 1945, and I have been here nearly nine years. If I were defeated in the next election, I would be over 50 years of age. No one in industry today wants to employ a man 50 years of age or over. The only hope I might have of finding employment would be through the sympathy of a friend, and that is exactly the position in which I would be placed.

An hon. Member: A night watchman.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): A night watchman might be a very good description of the position. I can assure you that since I came here nine years ago I have been able to get by, but I have had to live very carefully. I do not believe the citizens of the county I represent want me to live that way.

Hon. members who have spoken previously in opposition to this legislation have given me the impression that they are placing price tags upon themselves. I have no quarrel with that, but I do not want them to put a price tag on me. If anyone is going to put a price tag on me I want the electors of the county of Charlotte to do that. When the next election rolls around they will have an opportunity to decide if I am worth $10,000 or whether they would rather have someone else represent them.

Those are my views. I feel that the majority of the members in this house will support the increase in the indemnity before this debate is finished. There may be some who will change their minds and support this legislation. Again I want to say that if there is any member here who does not want to accept the increase, I do not believe he will be forced to do so. If he is happy with the $6,000 he is receiving, and is sincere in what he has said in this debate, I believe the Red Cross or some other charity would be happy to receive the $4,000 he does not need. I can use it, and I am going to support the legislation.

If I have said anything during this debate to leave the implication that members have not been sincere, those statements were based on the facts I have produced. It would appear to me that these members are willing to spend hundreds of millions of dollars for everyone else. We all agree there are more civil servants than there are members of parliament; there are more old age pensioners and there are more receiving family allowances, so it would appear to me as though they might be playing politics with this measure.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Previous speakers have already referred to the fact that this is a package bill, and package bills are generally difficult to deal with. It is always a question whether we shall support the bill because of the sections in it which we can support, or whether we shall vote against it because there are sections in it which we cannot support. I believe we had an excellent example of that in the housing bill upon which we voted last week. There were a great many members in this house who criticized sections of that bill, but all of them voted in favour of it on the assumption that they should vote for that part of the bill which they could support rather than against it because of the parts to which they were opposed.

I believe we have to decide how we are going to vote on this bill. I do not think we can escape that responsibility by suggesting that we hand over the decision to some outside group. The Leader of the Opposition seemed to feel it was necessary to set up a royal commission to discover whether the Leader of the Opposition in this parliament should be paid $15,000 in addition to his sessional indemnity. I certainly do not need a royal commission to decide whether my indemnity should remain at $6,000 or whether it should be raised to $8,000 or $10,000. I fail to see why 265 members of parliament should require a royal commission to enable them to decide what their indemnity should be.

I am going to support this bill, notwithstanding the fact that there are some things in it of which I do not entirely approve. I cannot support the increase proposed for senators, since the party to which I belong and to whose policy I subscribe is pledged to the abolition of the Senate. The only advantage I can see for the interests of Canada in the proposal to increase the sessional indemnity of senators is that it may hasten the day when the country will demand the abolition of that institution. I presume that if we were to pass this bill providing an increase in indemnity for members of parliament but no increase for the members of the Senate, the bill might be sent back to us. I am not sure that would not be a good thing. I think it would do a good deal to arouse public opinion in support of the idea which this party has supported.

I am supporting the bill in so far as increases for members of the House of Commons are concerned. I am supporting it on the ground that I have every reason to believe my constituents feel I am worth as much in the House of Commons, as a member of parliament, as I would be back in my own constituency, in the classroom of a collegiate. The position I vacated to come here in 1942 now pays a salary of $8,000 a year. That $8,000 would be worth much more to me as a teacher in that school than the $10,000 will be to me as a member of the House of Commons.

I think most of us are agreed that it is in the best interests of Canada, that, since parliament legislates for all classes of Canadians, all classes of Canadians should be represented in it. I am not satisfied that it would be in the best interests of Canada that we should have a House of Commons made up of 265 members from any particular class in Canada, whether it be industrial workers, farmers, or any professional or business group. Of course if there is any one profession that would be entitled to send 265 members here, and to provide a good parliament, that profession would be the teaching profession.

Since in a sense every Canadian is a shareholder in this parliament, I think it is in the best interests of Canada that all classes of citizens should be represented. If all classes are to be represented, then there are some to whom this must of necessity be a full-time job. To name only one profession, no school teacher in this country could undertake to come to Ottawa as a member of parliament and at the same time maintain connections with his profession. For him it must become a full-time job. I doubt whether any labour man working at his trade or in a shop could come here as a member of parliament and retain his former job. It must be for a labour man, as it has become for my hon. friend from Vancouver-Kingsway, a full-time job; and the indemnity must take that into consideration.

It is unquestionably advantageous that those who come here from business, from the professions or from the farms should be able to maintain contact with their businesses, their professions or their farms. I think there is an argument that members of parliament who belong to those groups can keep themselves better informed and in closer touch with the problems of those whom they represent by so doing.

However, I do not agree with those who maintain that the length of our sessions or the number of times we are called together should be determined by the class of private businesses or professions in which those particular members are engaged. I am convinced that every member who comes here should make his position as a member of parliament his primary job, his most important job, his first job; and that any association he may have with his profession, business or farm should take second place to his position as a member of parliament. Consequently he should be available for any sitting, no matter how long, if the business of parliament requires that he be here for that length of time. He should be in a position to be here as often as the business of the country requires.

Taking that into consideration, I can well understand how those who come here from business, the professions or even from the farms make a considerable sacrifice. I can well understand that if we are to have successful professional men, businessmen and outstanding farmers to serve as members of parliament, then of necessity we must be prepared to pay an indemnity that will help to make up for any sacrifice they may have to make.

On motion of Mr. Noseworthy the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow we shall continue this debate, and when we have disposed of it we will take up the Salaries Act amendment, and then the Post Office Act amendment.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

COMMONWEALTH FINANCE MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

SYDNEY — JANUARY, 1954

COMMUNIQUE

We have met as the financial representatives of the United Kingdom, including its colonial territories, Canada, Australia, South Africa, New Zealand, India, Pakistan, Ceylon and the new Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland.

We represent not only peoples and governments devoted to the full spiritual life of the individual, but also between us, the greatest mass of resources, developed or potential, in the world.

We have discussed many matters of supreme financial and economic importance. We have carried on the work of the London conferences, reviewing the policies we then adopted and reporting to each other the progress made under those policies. We have been informed of the discussions between the United Kingdom, representing us, and the western European nations, and the United States of America. The relevant facts have been faced and future trends estimated. We have envisaged the development of our commonwealth, and have found ourselves confident of its strength and sure of its high destiny. The matters which we have to report may seem prosaic. But we ourselves have seen in them great possibilities and widening vistas for our own countries, for the commonwealth of nations, and for the world.

Great edifices must be built upon solid foundations, patiently constructed. We do not expect the complete building in a few months; but we have met in a spirit of self-reliance and of determination that success will be achieved.

In that spirit, we look with friendship at the other great nations, and invite them to be our collaborators in problems which may appear technical, but which are in reality the common problems of peace and prosperity.

We now state the considerations which we have had in mind, and the conclusions which we have reached.

1. The object of our present meeting was to consolidate the economic progress made by the sterling area and the commonwealth during the last twelve months to seek means to accelerate that progress and to ensure that they make their full contribution to world prosperity.

2. During the last year the sterling area countries of the commonwealth have made great strides towards the objectives which they set for themselves in January, 1952, and confirmed and amplified in December, 1952. The commonwealth countries rejected then, and we reject now, the view that any solution of our problems can be found in the creation of a closed system of discriminatory arrangements, which could lead only to chronic restrictions and recurring crises. We therefore reaffirm our agreed objectives, which are to strengthen the position of each country and of sterling as a currency, and to establish with other countries a wider and freer system of trade and finance in which convertibility of sterling is an essential part. Thus we shall serve the best interests of all, not only in our own countries but in the world as a whole.

The Outlook for World Trade

3. We have considered the outlook for world trade. The commonwealth is responsible for about one-third of that trade. We are conscious of the vital importance which the actions and policies of our countries could have when, as must be the case from time to time, there is some uncertainty about the future.

4. Our first resolve is to ensure that our own actions and policies will be such as to inspire confidence. We stand prepared to take appropriate steps, both individually and in concert with each other, to sustain production and trade and the sound development of resources, and to ensure that temporary economic fluctuations are not permitted to interfere with our progress towards our long-term objectives. We are also ready to co-operate with other countries and international institutions to this end.

Commonwealth Finance Conference

5. In this co-operation the United States of America and Europe have a special part to play because, with the commonwealth and sterling area, they are responsible for three-quarters of world trade.

6. We were therefore encouraged by the recent message from President Eisenhower to the United States congress in which he said:

> This administration is determined to keep our economy strong and to keep it growing.
> At this moment, we are in transition from a wartime to a peacetime economy. I am confident that we can complete this transition without serious interruption in our economic growth. But we shall not leave this vital matter to chance. Economic preparedness is fully as important to the nation as military preparedness.

7. The chancellor of the exchequer reported to the conference developments during the last year in Europe and in the organization for European economic co-operation, and called attention to the expansion of production and the strengthening of the position of European countries generally.

8. We also noted that the international monetary fund, in its report to the economic and social council of the United Nations, stated that—> —in order to prevent small depressions from growing into large ones, such supplementary reserves (i.e. international reserves in the international monetary fund) should be supplied early, on liberal terms and in adequate amounts . . . But primary reliance for the avoidance and cure of depressions must be placed upon appropriate measures at the national level, especially in industrial countries.

9. The sound economic policies pursued by the commonwealth countries, the publicly expressed resolve of the United States government to keep the economy of the United States strong and growing, the expansion of production in Europe, and the substantial increase in monetary reserves outside the dollar area provide, in our judgment, solid grounds for confidence.

Progress in the Short-Term

10. The conference then discussed current policies, namely:—

(a) the maintenance of a strong balance of payments position and the strengthening of the central gold and dollar reserves;

(b) sound internal policies and the need to restrain inflation;

(c) economic development of resources.

11. Considerable progress has been made in the application of these policies during the past twelve months, a period when, despite weakness in certain commodity prices, economic conditions have been generally favourable. In the result the over-all deficit in the sterling area balance of payments in 1951-52 was turned into a surplus in 1952-53, the position of sterling in the world has been strengthened and the central reserves have steadily increased. But we realize that much still remains to be done.

Short-Term Balance of Payments

12. The policies adopted since the meeting of commonwealth finance ministers in January, 1952, have been at the base of the remarkable change in the balance of payments of the sterling area. In the year ending 30th June, 1953, the sterling area had a surplus of over £400 million in transactions with the outside world, compared with a deficit of nearly £1,000 million in the year ended 30th June, 1952. This marked improvement in the fortunes of the sterling area, to which all members have contributed, brought with it an increase of about £250 million in the central reserves of gold and dollars. These reserves have continued to increase, although rather more slowly, in the second half of 1953, and at the end of the year stood at £900 million. Throughout the period sterling has gained strength.

13. The conference reviewed the prospects for the coming year. We agreed that the sterling area as a whole would seek to maintain a substantial surplus in its payments with the rest of the world. Earlier the main emphasis was placed on dollar earnings. Although the dollar situation has improved, we should not relax our efforts to achieve a dollar surplus; but it is just as important today that we should earn a substantial surplus in other non-sterling currencies. We recognize that success in these aims will depend in part on the level of world trade, but we emphasize that the primary task of all sterling area countries in the forthcoming year is to increase their earnings by intensive efforts over the whole field of exports.

14. In this task we must show ingenuity, increased efficiency and competitive strength. We cannot afford to disregard any market, and we must develop our exports wherever we can. While we must continue to expand our traditional major exports, we must also expand our exports of the immense variety of other products which in the aggregate form so large a proportion of the total earnings of the sterling area.

15. The communique of the commonwealth economic conference in December, 1952, referred to the extensive restrictions which some countries of the sterling commonwealth had needed to impose upon imports from the United Kingdom and other commonwealth sources. There was agreement at that time that these restrictions should be relaxed as the external financial position of these countries improved. We note with satisfaction the progress in this matter which has since been made by several sterling area countries and the prospects of further progress made possible by continuing improvement in their balances of payments.

Internal Policies

16. We have reviewed the internal policies of our countries and have observed that considerable improvement has been made during the past year. But more remains to be done and the importance of this part of our task cannot be over-emphasized. On the application of sound economic policies depends the purchasing power of money, the cost of living and the ability to sell exports in increasingly competitive world markets. Shortcomings in the internal policies of any one member affect the external fortunes of the whole sterling area by creating excessive demand for imports, diverting resources from export industries and throwing the balance of payments out of equilibrium. Our governments will continue to follow the policies which have served satisfactorily in the past year. Where necessary they will be adjusted so as to encourage increased production for export and to stimulate savings, upon which the development of the commonwealth substantially depends.

Development

17. The commonwealth has great resources, natural, human and industrial. The need for their development is urgent, and indeed, vital. The aim of all sterling area commonwealth countries is to concentrate on the development of those resources which, directly or indirectly, contribute on an economic basis towards improving the balance of payments of the sterling area. In some countries of the area, however, development plans have been made to provide for some basic improvement in the standards of living, which is a necessary foundation for further economic development.

18. The outstanding impression given by the reports made to us by our colleagues is of the immense variety and intensity of the efforts which are being made to turn to productive use the many resources, both large and small, of the commonwealth countries.

19. It is impossible to describe briefly all these activities. The following are examples. The development of food production has been intensified throughout the commonwealth. This has called for irrigation and other schemes for bringing more land under cultivation, technical improvements, mechanization and training. The production of such commodities as cotton, jute, wool, wood pulp, timber, tobacco and sisal has been maintained. There has been continued development of the mineral resources of the commonwealth, in particular, uranium, gold, copper, nickel, chrome, asbestos, coal, iron ore and bauxite. The production of some commodities, such as tin and rubber, has been affected by fluctuations in world demand. In a number of countries the search for oil and the development of oil and production of natural gas are in progress. The development of heavy industries continues to have an important place. The expansion of iron and steel production and the production of aluminium are proceeding in a number of countries. A great variety of other industrial development is also taking place. Efforts to improve and extend transport facilities have continued and there has been considerable expenditure on road, railways and harbour works. Substantial programs for increasing electric generating capacity, both thermal and hydroelectric, are in progress. Schemes for improvement of housing, education and health services are under way.

20. There is much evidence that development has everywhere gone ahead more smoothly and economically as inflation has been checked and excessive competition for resources has been materially lessened. This makes it clear that sound internal policies are just as important to economic growth as they are to a healthy balance of payments.

21. We have reviewed the factors which affect the scope and pace of development. Supplies of goods for development have much improved. But in most cases finance is still the major factor limiting development. Each of our governments will continue policies designed to secure the highest possible level of internal savings. However most individual countries and the sterling area as a whole still need additional financial resources from outside.

22. At the commonwealth economic conference of December, 1952, the United Kingdom government undertook to make a special effort to provide additional capital for commonwealth development, in the knowledge that this required an adequate level of internal savings and an adequate surplus in its overseas accounts. In 1953 the United Kingdom government authorized loans and grants totalling £120 million for development in the sterling commonwealth, including the colonial territories for which the United Kingdom has a special responsibility. The loans were made through a number of channels, including the London market, the export credits guarantee department and the colonial development corporation. Grants were made to the colonial territories from colonial development and welfare funds. The United Kingdom government will continue this policy in 1954, and will make special efforts to develop its own resources. While this involves burdens and risks, the United Kingdom government has consciously undertaken the task in the faith that sound development is the basis of the future prosperity of Britain and the commonwealth, that such development is needed in bad times as in good, and that the provision of finance from the United Kingdom will substantially help its own exports.

23. Finance from the United Kingdom for commonwealth development flows through many channels. Two new channels were opened up in 1953. The Commonwealth Development Finance Company has started operations, its role being primarily to help the financing of development undertaken by private enterprise. A beginning has also been made in the use of the sterling which the United Kingdom made available for lending through the international bank for reconstruction and development. There are cases however which international bank finance does not fully cover, for example, where development consists of large self-contained projects combined with a mass of small items involving over-all a high proportion of local expenditure. Commonwealth governments may now approach the London market after consultation with the United Kingdom government, not only in relation to particular projects, but also in support of general programs of development, provided the necessary conditions have been fulfilled. In view of the many claims upon this market, including provision for development in the United Kingdom, access has to be limited. The United Kingdom government will therefore wish to be sure, first, that the programs as a whole are in conformity with the general policy of concentrating on the improvement of the sterling area's balance of payments, and secondly, that the country concerned is making an adequate contribution from its own resources. It is also necessary in the general interest for the timing of any such borrowing to be carefully regulated.

24. We have reaffirmed our determination to press on with development, in conformity with our general policy, to the limit of available resources. In some of our countries private enterprise is making a large contribution to development. Governments will be concerned to promote balanced development, whether public or private, to pursue policies designed to increase the flow of savings, and to encourage private investment from both internal and external sources.

The Collective Approach to Freer Trade and Payments

25. We reaffirm our support for the proposals, shortly referred to as the collective approach, which emerged from the commonwealth economic conference of December, 1952. These proposals, which are set out in full in paragraphs 17 to 22 of the communique of that conference, are designed in general to bring about the widest possible system of multilateral trade and payments, the reduction and progressive elimination of import restrictions, and the convertibility of sterling and other important currencies. They are based on collective action, by debtor and creditor countries, to bring about a balance in the world economy on the basis of "trade not aid".

26. The growing confidence in sterling and the increasing strength and flexibility of the economies of the sterling area countries have enabled them to make progress in the move towards expanding trade and freeing currencies. But decisive action must be related to the fulfilment of the conditions indicated in the communique of the commonwealth economic conference. These conditions are:—

(a) The continuing success of internal policies of sterling commonwealth countries;

(b) The prospect that trading nations will adopt trade policies which are conducive to the expansion of world trade;

(c) The availability of adequate financial support, through the international monetary fund or otherwise.

27. We have noted with great satisfaction the passage in President Eisenhower's recent message to congress in which he referred to the creation of a healthier and freer system of trade and payments in which others could earn their own living and the United States economy could continue to flourish. All commonwealth countries await with interest the detailed recommendations which the President will make to congress after the joint commission on the foreign economic policy of the United States has made its report. While stressing the importance of the policies, external and internal, which our own countries should pursue, we believe that the forthcoming declaration of United States policies will have a profound significance for the free world.

28. We reaffirm the intention of our governments to work as far as possible through existing international organizations dealing with trade and finance.

29. The functions which the GATT and the IMF perform will become even more important when moves to freer trade and currencies are concerted; their rules, procedures and organization need close examination and review in some respects if they are to play a full and effective part. We note the forthcoming review of the GATT and agree that there should be prior consultation among commonwealth countries about this in the light of the circumstances then existing.

30. The sterling area has a close interest in the European payments union through the membership of the United Kingdom in that union and the use of sterling in it. We will follow with interest the studies now proceeding in the OEEC on convertibility and how a transition can be best effected from the EPU to a wider system of trade and payments.

31. We conclude by saying something about great, though intangible, matters. We come from the ends of the earth. We represent nations, varying in language, religion, and in tradition, developed or underdeveloped, divided physically by the mountains or by the waste of seas. But we have met not as strangers but as friends. We have not met to discover how we can strengthen each of us himself at the expense of the other, but ourselves as a family of nations. For we have faith in ourselves, and in our future, and in our enduring company, one with another. Our congress, however, does not end there. We are not a commonwealth of nations, arrayed against the rest of the world. We are for the world. The free world is built upon freedom. Freedom is built upon strength.

32. The underlying element of thought and feeling at our meeting has been our deep and united faith that the strength of our commonwealth is the strength of freedom; that the freer exchange of currencies and trade can be best assisted by the strength of our own currency and the expansion of our own trade and commerce.

33. We avow ourselves, and the nations which it is our honour to represent, the friends of peace, the advocates of peaceful trade, the apostles of understanding. We even venture to look forward to the day when the developed wealth of our own nations will serve all others; when trade and prosperity will know no inhuman barriers; when the raising of living standards will be the common endeavour of all; and when the friendly brotherhood which we have experienced in this conference will have become the common lot of mankind.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, February 2, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HAMILTON—REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE BY MR. DUPUIS

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. Last night, speaking in this house, the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Dupuis) rather left the impression that as a member of the council of the city of Montreal I was making more than I am per year. He said, as reported at page 1662 of Hansard for February 1, 1954:

> In the class C group, if one is a member of the executive committee he will receive $7,000 a year, just the same as any other member of the executive who must be elected. Indeed, we find that the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace (Mr. Hamilton) is in class C in the city of Montreal . . .

I should like to inform the house that as a class C member I am making only $1,500 per year, and not $7,000, although sometimes I feel as though I do $7,000 worth of work.

MR. MACINNIS—CHANGE IN REPORT BY MR. LOW

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I wish to rise on a question of special privilege. At the adjournment of the house last night a member of the press gallery called me on the telephone and told me that when the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) was speaking in the house yesterday afternoon he said that in 1945, when the expense allowance was proposed, I had stated that I would refuse to take it. Then, the hon. member said, I did take it.

I waited until I saw Hansard this morning, and I found that was not the way it appeared in Hansard. I went to the Hansard office to see the typewritten report. This is how the report read, and it was changed:

> He told us at that time that he would refuse the $2,000 expense allowance because he was a socialist. Well, he took it just the same.

In the Hansard report as it appears today the word "refuse" was deleted and the words "vote against" were inserted. I am not objecting to any member making small corrections in Hansard. We all do it. But the change the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) made was not a small correction. At the time he made the statement, he either knew what I said in 1945 or he did not know. If he did not know he should not have attributed to me words that I did not use.

I have looked up the words which I used, as they appear in volume III of Hansard for December 14, 1945, page 3482:

> Mr. Lennard: Will the hon. member permit a question?
> Mr. MacInnis: Certainly.
> Mr. Lennard: Will he accept the additional $2,000 if it is offered to him?
> Mr. MacInnis: The $2,000 is not offered to me. If this house approves this bill, then it becomes law—
> Mr. Lennard: Will the hon. member accept it?
> Mr. MacInnis: Then it becomes the law of the land, and I will accept the $2,000—

Before the hon. member for Peace River made an allegation such as he made yesterday, and which is particularly strange coming from a man who asserts his Christianity every time he speaks in this house—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. MacInnis: —he should have consulted the record and ascertained exactly what I said.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member should not go beyond stating his question of privilege.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Speaking to the question of privilege, may I say that it is correct that I made a correction in Hansard yesterday. When I was leaving this house in the afternoon one of the members of the C.C.F. party drew my attention to the fact that he gathered from what I said that the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis) was reputed to have said he would refuse the $2,000 expense allowance in 1945. I told this gentleman that it was not my intention at all to impute to the hon. member anything that was wrong. I said that if upon examining the Hansard record I discovered that was the way it was worded I would certainly make a change, because that was not what I meant. Often, in speaking without notes in debates in this house, even the hon. member has made statements which he has later changed. I leave it to the hon. member himself to say whether he has made any changes. I made the change because I knew that was the correct thing and I would not, Mr. Speaker, impute to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway anything that he did not say or did not do.

Mr. MacInnis: I must say that I am not finding fault with the member for making the correction in Hansard. We all do it. But if the hon. member for Peace River found out that he had made a mistake of that magnitude in this house, a mistake which went out to the press, then it was his duty to make the correction in the house before the evening was over.

Mr. Low: Well, Mr. Speaker, I have not been given any chance whatever, so may I take this opportunity to say that yesterday in the debate I did make a statement which later, having found it was incorrect, I corrected in Hansard. I correct it now and say to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway that I would not, under any circumstances, try to put on the record something about him that was not true.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. David A. Croll (Spadina) presented the first report of the standing committee on banking and commerce, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

PATENT ACT

AUTHORIZATION FOR INCREASES IN STATUTORY FEES

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 177, to amend the Patent Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, the sole purpose of this bill is to authorize certain increases in statutory fees provided under the Patent Act, in accordance with the policy of the government to make sure that services of this character are paid for by those to whom they are rendered, and not by the taxpayers generally.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TRADE

BRITISH-JAPANESE AGREEMENT—EFFECT ON CANADIAN INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the minister's attention been drawn to a press dispatch on the question of the British-Japanese agreement to allow Japanese goods into British and colonial markets? Can the minister tell the house what effect if any this might have upon Canadian industry, with particular reference to textiles?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I read in this morning's paper an account of the debate in the British House of Commons. I would point out, however, that the agreement in question touches only the United Kingdom and its colonies. It would have no material effect on Canada that I know of.

GRAIN

INTERIM SPRING PAYMENT—FINAL PAYMENT ON 1952 WHEAT CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Irvin Studer (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the possibility that there may be no additional quotas on grain announced before the opening of the great lakes shipping season, would the minister be in a position to comment on the prospects of the producers receiving an interim spring payment on the 1953 crop, and has he any further comment to make regarding the final payment on the 1952 wheat crop?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I cannot give any definite information at this time. It is my intention, the week end after next, to visit Winnipeg and confer on these matters with the wheat board and with certain officials of my own department who will accompany me. When I return from there I hope to be able to make a statement in the house; but I can say in the meantime that a payment will be made, of some sort or from some source, before next seeding.

ESKIMOS

DELIVERY OF FOOD TO PERRY RIVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in the absence of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources I sent him notice of a question. Perhaps he can answer it today. In view of the press reports that a Royal Canadian Air Force Dakota had been held up in its attempt to bring food to a number of starving Eskimos near Perry River, can the minister give the house any information as to whether that food has yet been delivered?

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. Perry River is an isolated community on the west of Queen Maud gulf. It is one of the more inaccessible parts of the Arctic area. It is on the mainland, but the closest R.C.M.P. post is at Cambridge Bay on Victoria island.

The report I received on Monday morning, January 25, stated that the caribou on which these people largely depend had moved out of that area during the winter, and that fish also had been comparatively scarce during the fall. The report further stated that some of the Eskimos had lost their dogs and had had to walk to the post in order to obtain food. The remaining dogs were in poor condition, and in order to save them dog feed was urgently required.

It will be noted from what I have just said that no Eskimos were starving, as the hon. member has just said in his question. Dogs, huskies, were starving. This was on Monday last, January 25, and it was the first intimation the department in Ottawa had about this situation.

The trading post at Perry River is operated by an Eskimo named Angulalik, who has a radio receiver but no transmitter. The area is patrolled twice a year by the R.C.M.P. detachment at Cambridge Bay, and it was while on his regular semi-annual patrol that Constable Ferguson became aware of this situation. Ordinarily he would have advised headquarters of "G" division of the R.C.M.P. here in Ottawa. However, in view of the urgency the constable apparently radioed the subdivision headquarters at Fort Smith. The inspector there immediately conferred with our district administrator at Fort Smith, and together they arranged with the R.C.A.F. command headquarters at Edmonton to make a plane available to take relief supplies immediately to Perry River. As a result, 2,400 pounds of buffalo meat from the buffalo slaughter at Wood Buffalo park have been sent.

As a matter of fact the R.C.A.F. plane tried to land at Perry River on Monday morning, the 25th, but could not locate the settlement. It will be realized that at this time of the year, with the exception of a few hours of twilight in the morning, it is pitch dark in the Arctic. A radio message was then broadcast on Monday last to Angulalik, asking him to light flares on the following morning. But then the plane was kept to the ground at Yellowknife because of bad weather. It was later on Tuesday that the plane could fly to Cambridge Bay, where it waited for the weather to clear, and landed later on the 27th, at Perry River, with supplies, which it unloaded.

I believe that one has to be very careful with sweeping conclusions with respect to starving Eskimos. I am informed that both the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and officers of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources are doing the very difficult job of patrolling these barren lands for thousands of miles. I am informed that there has been no Eskimo who has starved. A few huskies have starved, but the Eskimos went to the post of Angulalik and were fed; and as soon as we were made aware of the situation a plane was flown in with the necessary supplies for the huskies. It might be, of course, that the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) has got something from Farley Mowat's book. Maybe the sweeping conclusions in the book, based upon false information, are contagious.

And, by the way, I have looked into the matter of Farley Mowat's book, which was mentioned the other day by the hon. member. I have looked at the book and I have had some of the affirmations of Mr. Mowat checked. I have no time to recount everything that is said in the book, but I think that one of the stories is worth mentioning here. Mr. Mowat says at one point that there was slaughter of caribou—

Mr. Speaker: Is what the minister is now about to read directly connected with the question of the hon. member for Saskatoon? If it is not, I do not think he can proceed with that statement at this time.

Mr. Lesage: I will not insist, but there is a relation.

Mr. Speaker: It is not in order at this time.

Mr. Knight: I have had a very full and lengthy answer, but I want to ask a supplementary question. Did the report which the minister received mention any cases of sickness or death in that particular tribe before or after the food was received? Secondly, was the food that was sent fit for human consumption as well as for dogs?

Mr. Lesage: Both, Mr. Speaker, but there were no Eskimos starving. According to our information, there was no sickness and no deaths among the Eskimos themselves.

Mr. Knight: My supplementary question has not been answered. I asked whether the food that was sent in the particular cargo was fit for human consumption as well as for canine consumption.

Mr. Lesage: I have answered already, for both.

Inquiries of the Ministry

BUTTER

MEASURES TO PROTECT DAIRY INDUSTRY AGAINST OVERPRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Breton (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Is he aware of representations made by the Quebec farmers' associations, and particularly by the dairy farmers' association of Canada, concerning the overproduction of butter this year? If so, are measures to be taken to protect the dairy industry?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me a copy of his question yesterday, which gave me an opportunity of checking in the department with regard to the statements which are made.

The first part of the question asked whether I was aware of representations made by the Quebec farmers' associations. My answer to that, of course, would be yes. I have had some of these representations made to me directly, and particularly by the dairy farmers' association of Canada. I have read the discussions which took place in Hamilton, and those which took place in London recently with regard to the matter. The question then goes on and says, "concerning the overproduction of butter this year", and then asks whether some measures are to be taken to protect the dairy industry. In answer to that I would say that we took the actions that we thought were necessary six years ago when we set up the system under which butter is handled in Canada at the present time.

We had in mind at that time two objectives. The first was to maintain a reasonable return to producers in the summer months. Hon. members will recall that prior to that time there was a margin of 10 cents to 12 cents a pound on butter as between the price paid in the summertime and the price at which it was sold in the winter. Therefore we took the action we did six years ago in order to overcome that difficulty; and, in the second place, to assure a reasonable cost to consumers in the winter months.

The present position is that a story is being circulated that we shall have 43 million pounds of butter on May 1 next. Well, our records do not indicate that. Our records indicate that we may have around 30 million pounds, and that is not an amount which would give any difficulties to those who are handling butter in this country, the reason being there are about 1 million people more in the country now eating butter than there were a few years ago. Therefore the amount of butter which has to be in the pipe line in order to assure distribution is somewhat greater than it was at that time.

It was then rated at about 10 million pounds. It is now found that with the wider distribution of settlement it takes something over 12 million pounds in order to keep the pipe line supplied, so that even 30 million pounds of butter is not an amount which would create any great difficulty. The chief reason why it is up 5 million or 6 million pounds above last year is that we were not able to sell any dairy cows in the United States during 1952, and the fact that those dairy cows were still here in 1953 brought about a greater production of milk, and therefore a greater production of butter last year than we otherwise would have had. But at the present time not only are we again selling dairy cows in the United States, but in 1953 we sold 40,000. In the four years before 1952 we sold 47,000, so that last year we were only 7,000 below the four years preceding 1952.

That sale of 40,000 cows into the United States has been supplemented by a very large sale of female stock for slaughter in this country during recent months, so that from now down until the end of the year we do not expect that the production will be so great as to cause any great difficulty here. We require at least 25 million pounds of butter in this country on May 1 in order to make sure that the consumer in Canada is going to be served with butter at a price which is not out of line in the winter months. In order to assure hon. members that that is true this year, butter has sold all this winter at a cent a pound wholesale lower than it did last year. It is selling this year at 61 cents a pound; it sold last year at 62 cents. This is because we have enough butter to supply the trade adequately until May 1.

Therefore the objectives which we have in mind, one, of assuring the farmer a payment on the basis of 58 cents a pound throughout the whole year, and the other of assuring the consumer that in the costly months of the winter he does not have to pay on a basis higher than 61 cents, are being achieved, and we do not think there is any necessity for changing the policy at the present time in any way whatsoever. We think it is succeeding. It has succeeded in the interests of both the producer and the consumer.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

INQUIRY AS TO CLOSING OF SAVINGS BANK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I wish to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Is the government contemplating closing the post office savings banks? My question is occasioned by a letter which I received from a correspondent who uses the facilities of the post office savings bank and has heard a rumour to that effect.

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General): I shall be glad to communicate with my hon. friend. I shall check on the information contained in the letter. If the hon. member wishes to give me the letter I shall inquire about it.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CHINA—FOREIGN REAL ESTATE FIRMS

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): On January 28 the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes) addressed a question to me regarding a reported ordinance of the Tientsin people's government, dated November 11, 1953, which is said to abolish the business of representation or management of properties of third parties by foreign real estate firms.

We have no specific information on this particular ordinance but we have received general reports on the state of foreign business in communist China. From these reports it would appear that the Peking government is moving in a direction which will make the continued operation of many foreign business concerns in mainland China so difficult that they would be compelled to withdraw. This is not surprising because western residents and western interests have been progressively ousted by the communist regime since it came to power four years ago.

The ordinance to which the hon. member referred would appear to be a local implementation in Tientsin of this general policy of the communist government.

We are making further inquiries concerning this case and I will let the hon. member know if any additional information is received.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MICHAL KRYCUN—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION ON PLEA FOR POLITICAL ASYLUM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. C. Trainor (Winnipeg South): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Does the government intend to grant political asylum to Michal Krycun, one-time consul of Poland in Winnipeg? If not, would he kindly explain why not?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I did not receive notice of this question, which deals with a very complicated matter on which there has been a good deal of correspondence. I would be glad to communicate with the hon. member and give him all the facts involved, which I think will show him that no question of political asylum is involved.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE SALARIES OF SPEAKERS AND DEPUTY SPEAKER, SESSIONAL ALLOWANCES OF MEMBERS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Monday, February 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for the second reading of Bill No. 171, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, when the debate was adjourned last night I had pointed out certain reasons why I supported the increase in the sessional indemnity of members of parliament proposed in this bill. I had pointed out that in my opinion such increase was in the best interests of parliament itself. I had pointed out that in my opinion it was in the best interests of good government in this country that the House of Commons should be representative of a broad cross-section of the Canadian public.

I had pointed out that with the length of our parliamentary sessions running from six to eight months and the additional time required for work in and on behalf of our constituencies very little time was left for any hon. member to devote to his private business or profession. Furthermore I had pointed out that in my opinion it was not in the interests of good government that members of this house should be forced by economic necessity to neglect the business of this house, to shorten its sessions or to limit the number of those sessions because of the necessity of attending to their private business or profession.

Furthermore, I had pointed out that if we are to get representation from trade unions, from workers and from certain professions, those representatives must accept this as a full-time job. There just is no opportunity for certain classes of people who come here for six or eight months in the year as members of parliament to go back and participate in their former jobs or occupations.

The question comes up of course as to just what is an equitable or fair increase. I have no doubt whatever that we could find in this country 265 representatives who would come here even for $4,000. I think probably we could get 265 members to come here for as little as $3,000 if we set that as the limit. I think we could easily get 265 representatives across Canada who had never earned $3,000 a year in their lives and who would be glad to come here. But I do not think that that would make a good House of Commons.

On the other hand, I am quite confident that we could get 265 members to come here who had reached the age or degree of economic security where they were no longer dependent in any way upon the amount of sessional indemnity that would be paid. They could come here financially independent. But I do not think that that would make for a good representative parliament.

If we are to draw from a broad cross-section of the Canadian public, if we are to draw from all ranks of the Canadian public men and women who have demonstrated their abilities in their own chosen fields, then in my opinion we must be prepared to pay an indemnity that will relieve them of financial worry, that will leave them free to spend whatever time is required by public business in this house, and to devote their time and energies to the interests of their constituencies.

There are in the chamber those who have indicated that they consider the $10,000 figure too high and would like to settle for $8,000. I indicated last night that in my opinion the $10,000 indemnity is not too high. It is not out of line with the salaries that the Canadian taxpayer and Canadian consumer are paying to men and women holding positions of comparable responsibilities. I gave one example. We have only to look over the field of executives and managers in business and industry and compare their responsibilities with those of members of parliament to discover that commerce and industry pay their executives salaries of $10,000 and more.

What we are sometimes apt to forget is that every dollar paid to managers and directors of industry and commerce is paid by the Canadian consumer just as truly as if those dollars were collected in taxes. There are some of us who are inclined to differentiate between money paid to managers and directors of private enterprise and that which is paid to managers and directors and representatives of publicly-owned industries and institutions. It is the Canadian consumer who in the final analysis pays those salaries to private enterprise just as truly as it is the Canadian taxpayer and consumer who pays the indemnities of members of parliament.

The province of Ontario now pays the members of its legislative assembly $4,000 for a six-weeks session. I have heard no great uproar of public opinion in Ontario against that indemnity. If members of the Ontario legislature require $4,000 for a six-weeks session, then I submit there is every reason to believe that we in this house with a six or eight months session are entitled to at least $10,000.

Objection has been raised that the $10,000 indemnity is going to separate us from the great mass of people whom we represent. The suggestion is made that because the income level of the majority of Canadian people is below the income level that we would be in, we would thus be separated from our constituents. In my opinion the amount of income received by the individual representative is not a main or major factor in separating him from his constituents. If the people of Canada had wanted to send to Ottawa at the last general election members who came within their own income group, that is in the $2,000, $3,000 or $4,000 bracket, they had ample opportunity to do so. In nearly every constituency across this country there were C.C.F. candidates standing for office who were in the same low income bracket as the majority of those whom they sought to represent.

The Canadian public gave no demonstration of their desire to send to parliament the representatives who belonged to their own income group. I have had some experience with the Canadian voter and I have found the voter is much more interested in voting for someone who has made good in his own profession or business and who has raised himself above the general economic level of the people he is seeking to represent than he is in sending someone who belongs entirely to his own income group. I believe the idea that $10,000 in indemnities is going to cut us off from association with, interest in, or sympathy for our constituents is fear and nothing more than fear.

We have heard a great deal about the needs of old age pension recipients and those in receipt of veterans allowances, and how we should first attend to them. I hear from a great many people on old age pensions. As a matter of fact, I went through my files last night and I found something in the neighbourhood of 50 letters from old age pensioners in my own riding, all of which were written since my arrival back here on January 12.

Most of these 50 letters from old age pensioners have been addressed to me since this subject we are now discussing became publicized in our newspapers. In not one single instance has any one of them indicated in any shape or form that he considered it would be reprehensible for me to accept an increase in my indemnity until I had secured an increase in their old age pension. They asked for an increase in their pensions; they pointed out their need; but not one has suggested that my acceptance of an increase in my indemnity is going to deprive them of any increase in their pension.

If the government feel they could not increase old age pensions because they are called upon to give members of parliament and the Senate an increase in their indemnities, but could do so were such members to forgo that increase, I do not think there is a member in this house who would object to forgoing this increase until the old age pension was increased. The fact is, there is very little relation between the proposed increases in indemnities and the amount paid to old age pensioners.

Much more could be done for old age pensioners by the provincial governments of the provinces in which they live, if these governments were so inclined to consider it.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Noseworthy: As a matter of fact, I am delighted to find that the government considers there are no difficulties in the way of providing us with these increases, and that there is sufficient income in the treasury for that purpose. I am sure the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) would not sanction these increases for cabinet ministers, members of parliament and the Senate if he did not feel there was going to be something in the treasury for our old age pensioners and those in receipt of veterans allowances. If I thought for one moment that the acceptance of this increased indemnity would delay an increase in old age pensions or veterans allowances I would forgo that increase, and I am confident every member in this house would be willing to do the same.

Certainly, there is a crying need for increases in old age pensions and veterans allowances. One of the ways to achieve that increase is to send to this parliament men and women who will show a greater interest in these older citizens and veterans. I do not think they will get that opportunity simply by keeping us on an economic level where year in, year out, we have to borrow and go into debt in order to remain here. That, Mr. Speaker, has been my experience every year since I first came to Ottawa in 1942.

Senate and House of Commons

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, at the resolution stage of this debate I spoke, as usual, without notes and I omitted some matters which I had intended to mention with respect to members of the other place.

Our constitutional system provides for an upper and lower house, and as long as we continue to conduct the nation's affairs in that manner members of the upper house should not be, I believe, on a lower plane than members of the House of Commons. The official opposition has intimated that they do not wish to abolish the Senate. But what do they intend that we should do? Do they want to starve members of the upper house and force them out of the positions as public servants, or are they prepared to offer some constructive measure whereby these members can remain on a level similar to that of members of the House of Commons?

I do not want to be a member of this house and yet feel that I can look upon the members of the upper house with perhaps less respect than I would accord to our protective staff in this chamber. That will be the result if we do not determine that we are going to maintain a proper balance without discrimination.

There are perhaps a few matters which should be brought to the attention of the house at this time with respect to this question of increases in indemnities for members of parliament. As I said the other day, the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Ferguson) was the first member of parliament in my time to broach this question of the inadequacies of the rates of pay and conditions under which members live here in Ottawa. This makes me reflect for a moment. Taking note of the debate in this house, may I say that if I were again in the position of choosing a bargaining committee I certainly would know where to go in this house; it would be to those people who believe that a man is worthy of his hire.

The hon. member for Simcoe North, speaking in the debate on May 1, 1952, had some extremely interesting comments to make relative to this matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member may not quote from a previous debate in the same session.

Mr. Knowles: It was not in this session; it was last year or two years ago.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry. If it is last year, that is a different matter.

Mr. Byrne: It is 1952. Certainly the quotation is relevant. The date of the debate is May 1, 1952. I quote from the speech of the hon. member for Simcoe North as reported at page 1774 of Hansard of that year:

> What can the people of Canada expect when their representatives, who are supposed to hold one of the highest offices in Canada, are shown the lack of consideration which they are receiving from this government.

He was speaking, of course, of the government in power. Then again:

> Let me say this to the members of the House of Commons. If the people of Canada want in parliament the men they need, $4,000 a year or a session is far too little to attract such men. It is far too little to bring into parliament the type of men the people of Canada need.

May I say that if ever a party needed a shot in the arm, it is the one to which the hon. member belongs. Again I quote:

> The labour unions of this country would consider it an insult to offer their leaders the stipend which is offered to the makers of the laws of this country, the men who appoint the judiciary of this country, namely $4,000 a year with $2,000 expenses.

He continues:

> I do not know of a member of parliament who does not know, when he comes here at that remuneration, that he is compelled to live in a room on the third floor of a rooming house in Ottawa.

A day or two ago, in my speech I said that a member should not be expected to live in a garret when he was in Ottawa representing his constituency. I said that I spoke without notes the other evening, but one would almost imagine that I was reading from the speech made by the hon. member for Simcoe North, whose party at this point does not seem to be anxious to make the suggestions that he then saw fit to make. I quote further from his speech:

> He cannot afford to live in proper quarters such as the Chateau Laurier unless he takes the money from his own pocket.

I now quote further from the speech; there is here also a relevant matter, Mr. Speaker, that I am leaving out, as it is not as outstanding as are these portions which I choose to quote. I quote again:

> If he is the right kind of man he knows of these responsibilities when he offers himself for election. But the members of this government, which has the people of Canada under its thumb, in the length of time they have sat in office have not been men enough to come forward and raise the salaries of the representatives of the people to an amount which is somewhere near what it ought to be.

And this is the crowning statement:

> It is a disgraceful situation.

It is infamous, I would say. I quote further:

> How can we conscientiously feel that we, as a body, are responsible for appointing judges at $8,000 a year, how can we feel responsible for the making of the laws to be administered by those judges, at this disgraceful and insulting remuneration of $4,000 a year?

[Mr. Byrne.]

If it is that bad, it is worthy of a 100 per cent increase, in my estimation. I quote again:

> Surely you are not afraid to stand on your feet and tell your constituents that you believe you are worth greater compensation for your efforts.

I pause here for a moment, Mr. Speaker, to point out that some hon. members have been called to order because they have inferred that the position taken by some of the members may have a political bias. I therefore go on to prove that the hon. member for Simcoe North had that feeling himself. He said:

> If the people do not think so, at election time they will tell you so, me included. Most of the members feel as I do, but they sit back and say, "I don't think it is good politics to mention that."

But the hon. member goes on further to say:

> I am not built that way. I am sent here to mention matters which I believe are of vital importance to the people of Canada, whether it means my defeat or my re-election. At the end of my term the voters will decide.

When making their estimates of the debate and of the manner in which we vote on this question, I hope the voters will decide as the hon. member for Simcoe North suggested they should.

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): In rising at this time, Mr. Speaker, I do so merely in order to make my position quite clear. I am not one of those members of parliament who say one thing to their constituents and then either say or do something else when they arrive here in Ottawa. In voting against this bill at this time, I am doing so only because I do not approve of the method being adopted. I feel that the matter should have some study by a special committee before being finally decided upon. However, I want it to be distinctly understood that I approve of the principle of the bill.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lennard: That is all right. I feel that an increase in the indemnity of members is long overdue and I speak from some experience. I feel that in this debate things have been said against this bill that never should have been said. For the benefit of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) and some others, I wish again to emphasize that, while voting against this bill at this time because I feel it should have been approached in a different manner, I am not against increased indemnities for members.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I appreciated the last remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) when he was introducing the resolution foreshadowing this bill, wherein he said it would be up to each member of parliament, himself or herself, to decide whether to support the resolution or to support the bills that would follow, based on the resolution.

During the last year, both in the election campaign and since then, I have endeavoured to be honest with my constituents and with myself in discussing this particular subject. I said then—and I repeat it now—that as far as I was concerned, if the indemnity was to be placed on an annual basis, there would have to be some revision upwards. I said to them—and I repeat it now—that as far as I was concerned the income of members of parliament was quite satisfactory in the last four years but that if the basis upon which that indemnity is paid should be changed and if, as a result of that change, the indemnity should drop, I for one would feel that the result would not provide an indemnity sufficient to enable the average member of parliament to give his best service to his constituents.

When the leader of this group moves in committee that the $8,000 indemnity figure be reduced to $6,000, thus making the total $8,000 instead of $10,000—I shall be pleased to support that amendment. I cannot support second reading of this bill since it provides a total pay of $10,000 to members of the other place. I believe those hon. gentlemen in the other place are receiving now a reasonable remuneration in keeping with the services they render to the people of Canada.

I should like to see a further provision dealing with absenteeism which would make it impossible for any member of the house, even though no member of the house might do it, to be absent from this house for all of a session and still collect a large part of the pay involved. I have heard speeches for this bill and against it. I doubt if there are many in this house who really believe that the pay members of parliament have received over the last four years has been too much. My opposition to this bill is based, therefore, on the provision that the pay of members shall be increased over what it has been. I do not think that is necessary. I do not think it is desirable.

A great many speeches have been made during this debate to the effect that members of parliament must have a sufficient income in order to faithfully discharge their many duties, and that the remuneration of members must be sufficient to attract outstanding men to the house. I believe that the income members have received over the last four years has been sufficient to accomplish all of these desired objectives. When I look around the house I find that there are many extremely able members, and so far as I am concerned none of them has been attracted here because of the pay. I believe, rather, they have been attracted here because they believe that by coming here they can provide a service to the people of Canada. I believe that if changes were made in this bill now to provide for members in the next four years the same pay as they received during the last four years, such a bill would pass unanimously or with very few dissenting votes.

I believe the pay members have received has been sufficient in recent years. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) stated that the problem with which we are dealing, wherein members have to come to Ottawa for long periods and have not too much time to spend in their regular professions, must be dealt with in two ways. The first way, he said, would be by shortening the length of the sessions, and the second way by increasing the sessional indemnity of members to $8,000. I say that if we are successful in reducing the length of the sessions—and I believe that is what the committee which has been set up will likely accomplish—then an increase to $10,000 becomes that much less necessary. I have worked out on a monthly basis what $10,000 will mean. Of course the whole sum is not to be paid on a monthly basis but for the purpose of this calculation I have assumed that it is. A married man would then receive $713 per month after having paid all his income taxes and his deductions to the pension fund. I believe that $713 per month is a very large sum of money, an unnecessarily large sum of money.

On the other hand, if the indemnity were made $6,000, along with the expense allowance of $2,000, for a married man that would work out at $583 per month after income tax and pension fund deductions. Speaking for myself, I believe members of parliament can get along on approximately $583 per month, as in recent years. I believe they could provide reasonable and suitable housing accommodation for their families in Ottawa, then could go back to their constituents for the remaining six months and perform a reasonable job for their constituents. I feel that $10,000 total pay for members is unnecessary. It has been said by some that if you put members in the $10,000 category, they will begin to think differently and they may lose, at least to some extent, contact with their constituents. It is said that will condition their thinking and make them look at problems in a different light.

This may or may not be true. I rather doubt that it would change the opinion or attitude of most members of parliament. I do believe, however, that if you pay members a very high salary you will change the attitude of the electors to their representatives. The people whom the member represents will believe that there is such a disparity between incomes, they will feel far removed from their representative, and that will make it more difficult for the member to perform the functions of a representative.

The Prime Minister pointed out that the sessional indemnity has not been altered since 1920. He went on to say that rising costs since that time made an upward adjustment necessary, and this is the upward adjustment the government felt was necessary. If you look at the cost of living back in 1920, you will find the consumer price index for Canada stood at 90·5; for 1953 the cost of living index stood at 116. In other words, there has been a 29 per cent increase in the cost of living since 1920, when the last increase in the sessional indemnity took place. I honestly feel that a 100 per cent increase in the indemnity at this time is too much. When I consider that there is a $2,000 tax-free allowance included in the $10,000, which means an increase of 150 per cent over 1920, I feel that the provisions of this bill are not at all necessary.

I naturally think of the position of my constituents in the agricultural industry. I have calculated the index for farm products in 1920 at 254; that was the level of farm prices. During 1953, and today, the level of farm prices has been well under that of 1920. According to the official statistics of the dominion bureau of statistics, the agricultural industry is in a worse position now than it was in 1920, yet members of parliament are to be put in a much better position by a 150 per cent increase in their remuneration.

As I have said, I believe the pay members of parliament have been receiving for the last few years is sufficient. Members would on that basis receive $583 a month take-home pay. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has said an effort will be made to shorten hours, and that would make the burden of members of parliament somewhat less. And if a representative in the House of Commons is elected three times, he can retire then at the end of eight years on a pension of $120 a month for life. Not all members will qualify for pension. But if after having received $583 a month, on the basis of our income for the last four years, a member is defeated in an election, he will have a nest egg in the pension fund which will permit him to withdraw $960. If he is here for two parliaments and is then defeated, that nest egg will amount to $1,920.

I submit that if the pay of members of parliament is to be placed on an annual basis it should be on a basis which will not reduce the income of those members as compared with the level in the last preceding parliament.

I hope the government will reconsider the measure, and will take steps to reduce the amount of the indemnity in line with the suggestion made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell).

Mr. Hector Dupuis (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace (Mr. Hamilton) said that I made an erroneous statement yesterday concerning him. I must say that the hon. member has not taken much trouble to read what I said at that time with respect to the councillors in the city of Montreal.

What I said yesterday appears at page 1662 of Hansard, and it is in these words:

> All three different classes of councillors are given the same treatment. However, the class C councillors are not elected by the people, but are named to council by their own organizations. In the class C group, if one is a member of the executive committee he will receive $7,000 a year, just the same as any other member of the executive who must be elected. Indeed, we find that the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace (Mr. Hamilton) is in class C, in the city of Montreal; and as such he is paid the same amount that is paid to the members who are elected by the people.

As anyone can see, I never said that the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace was a member of the Montreal city executive, and hence receiving $7,000 a year. I note that the hon. member is not a member of the city executive in Montreal, and I never said the contrary. I know also that his pay is $1,500 per annum and no more. I hope that in future the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace will read my remarks in this chamber more carefully, and avoid rising on questions of privilege when there is no ground for that procedure.

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, yesterday while speaking to Bill No. 171 the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), leader of the Social Credit group, made two or three statements to which I think I should make reference at this time.

In the first place he stressed the fact that it was his conviction this issue is not one of a party character. Certainly I agree with that. I think it should be considered in any other sense but a party sense. He stressed the fact also that the issue is one upon which every member should take his own stand. I agree absolutely; and I trust that when the vote is called each and every member of the House of Commons will stay in the house and take his stand. I trust we shall not have to witness a rush of humans to the lobbies.

Certainly I am fully prepared to take my stand. I listened with a great deal of interest to the observations of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). I was rather surprised to hear him use the expression "take-home pay" in such a loose fashion. After all, his party claims to have the ear of labour. Certainly no member of a labour organization would make the declaration that a member of parliament would have take-home pay of $583 a month. Certainly my hon. friend took into account the income tax, and he took into account the deductions under the members' retirement plan. But certainly he gave every evidence of having ignored such things as driving one's automobile 15,000 or 20,000 miles every year, and not being able to allow depreciation, or one cent of cost of operation, when filing income tax returns.

Certainly, he did not take into consideration the cost of remaining in Ottawa for as many as eight or nine months in a given year—and some of us have done this for the past fourteen years. Certainly he did not take into account at the same time the cost of maintaining a home and one's family elsewhere. Certainly, sir, there were a number of other things, too, which were not taken into account.

I challenge the statement that there has been any such sum, or any sum even remotely resembling $583 a month. Some of us have been here for quite some time. Although I have been a member for only fourteen years, I believe this is my nineteenth session of parliament; and I have had sufficient experience during that time to talk with some slight degree of authority.

Secondly, I find myself exasperated when I pick up newspaper after newspaper and see reference made to a proposed indemnity of $10,000. Certainly it is not that, and it will not be that, even if this bill is given approval. It is an indemnity of $8,000. As all members know, we are not allowed to make any deductions because of being away from home when, necessarily, we are away. We cannot make deductions on that account, as do the railwaymen and many other groups of employees. My understanding is that the $2,000 is to compensate in part—and it compensates only in part—for our being away during those weeks and months, not only during sessions of parliament but during the twelve months of the year.

I become exasperated when I read, too, the inferences left for the public to draw, that once a session of parliament is prorogued the members have finished their work until the next session begins. Anyone who has done his duty as a member, and certainly anyone who has had experience in parliament, realizes the fallaciousness of that argument.

This position is becoming more and more demanding all the time. Not only is it more demanding on one's time, but it is also more demanding on one's finances. And when one leaves this House of Commons at the end of a session it is to just take up another phase of his work, which costs him money, which requires a great deal of time and involves, I would go so far as to say, innumerable headaches.

While the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) made it perfectly clear that he was expressing his own views, I can assure him that he expressed mine, and I can also assure him that it is my conviction he expressed the views of the majority of the members of this House of Commons. I have listened with a good deal of interest to the arguments which have been advanced in opposition to Bill No. 171. I can do no other than characterize a good number of those arguments as being utterly fantastic.

It annoys me, Mr. Speaker, no end to have some hon. members create the impression—I do not know whether it is by design or otherwise; I am probably not competent to judge—that the passage of this bill will take something away from old age pensioners, or that it will take something away from our war veterans. That is utter nonsense. Not only is it untrue that it takes something away, but it is equally untrue that it would prevent them from securing more in the days to come.

Last week the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) made it abundantly clear that if he felt that by supporting this measure it would prevent our securing more for our old age pensioners or for our war veterans allowance recipients, then he would oppose it. Well, I am sure that we would all oppose it. In this connection I was rather surprised to see an extract or two from the Vancouver Province. On January 28, on the front page of the Vancouver Province, under the heading "C.C.F. plans battle on old age pensions", it stated:

> Several members referred to pensioners during the debate on parliamentary indemnities, but took the attitude, directly or indirectly, that whether or not M.P.'s salaries were increased it would be economically impossible to boost pensions.
> E. G. Hansell (Social Credit, Macleod) for instance, said he was sure that if it were a question of raising M.P.'s salaries or pensions that "every hon. member would say, by all means increase the old age pensions and war veterans' allowances."

Yet on the editorial page of that same issue, Mr. Speaker, reference is made to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis) and he is quoted in this way:

> He would not support any increase—

Incidentally, this is not a verbatim quotation; only part of it is verbatim. I continue:

> He would not support any increase until parliament "made some attempt at raising the incomes of the poor people of this rich country."

Here is what the editorial goes on to say:

> He was the one member who spoke up for the old age pensioners.

How an editor of a paper could write such an editorial in the light of the news item which appeared on the front page of the same issue is more than I can understand. I criticize and condemn any attempt on the part of any newspaper to try to create the impression that there are certain members in this House of Commons who would take an increase in indemnity, knowing that our pensioners and our war veterans would suffer as a consequence.

As I say, I condemn any attempt of that kind. I repeat my conviction, and I think it is the conviction of most of us here, that adequate compensation to members of the House of Commons takes nothing away from these people or from other people whom I have mentioned. It will not lessen in any sense whatsoever our will and our determination to press for more adequate compensation for those groups of people. In fact, this could easily provide means for more concerted pressure on behalf of those people. If this argument that has been advanced, this argument that I have condemned, has any merit, then we would not be justified as a House of Commons in making any move whatever on behalf of any group of people in this country until we were prepared to act similarly on behalf of all people countrywide. We would not be justified under any guaranteed floor price set-up to pay any producer of this country a cent more than he is getting simply because, if what is said is true, it would be most unfair to all other groups within the country. It is a fantastic argument.

I was amazed also to hear it said in this house that adequate compensation for members of parliament would separate us from the people whom we represent. Whoever makes a declaration of that kind is the very one who would say, if put under pressure: "It will separate you, but it will not separate me." I believe under pressure that is what would be said. I am amazed that any hon. member in this house would state that adequate compensation could offer the least threat of separating him from his people. I am amazed also at the suggestion that that hon. member's relationship with his constituency is governed by dollars and cents. I would suggest that such a declaration does in effect condemn all those members of parliament who had, when they came into this house, means which might have set them economically above some of the people in the country; but I would not be a party to any such condemnation, because I have known members of parliament of this house too well and too long to make any such assertion.

If any member of parliament, by virtue of the fact that he receives adequate compensation, is separated from his constituents as a consequence thereof, then I am certain that when the next election comes along the electors will take care of him. I doubt whether it is a matter that we should concern ourselves with. It has no validity in fact.

I have heard references to letters, Mr. Speaker. One would almost conclude that half a dozen letters represents the general opinion of probably 50,000 people in a constituency or 14 million people across this country. Probably I am as close to the people whom I represent as are other hon. members. I have not received a single solitary letter condemning members of parliament for accepting this contemplated increase, not one single solitary letter, and I know there are over 50,000 people in my constituency. In fact, the only references that have been made to it have been made just as an aside in another letter, and in every case they have expressed gratification that we were going to be adequately compensated, Mr. Speaker.

I am one of those persons who have never hesitated to keep their electors informed with respect to their financial problems, and probably because of the fact that I have kept them informed they see this thing in the light in which it should be seen. In glancing at newspaper editorials I have noticed general agreement with the idea of adequately compensated members of parliament. In fact I have seen the figure of $10,000 at the head of more than one editorial.

One or two ideas have been expressed. One was relative to the other house and others were relative to the $2,000 tax-free allowance. However, by and large the newspaper editorials have supported the type of compensation for members of parliament envisaged in the bill now before us. In fact, I am absolutely convinced that it meets with the approval of the majority of the people from coast to coast.

Someone referred to a Gallup poll. If I could take a Gallup poll and make sure that I "galluped" the right people I could probably get a majority of them to agree that the indemnity should be cut by 50 per cent. I do not put too much stock in that kind of so-called evidence.

I have no desire to take up too much time but I was interested in some of the observations of the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy). It so happens that he and I were members of the same profession. It also happens that this is one of those cases where when you are chosen as a member of parliament you must give up the work you are doing. How in the world could one carry on as a school teacher when the house from time to time is in session from September to December and from late January until June? It would be utterly fantastic.

It is not up to this House of Commons to say whether I should or should not devote all my time to my work as a member of parliament. That is up to the electors in my constituency to decide. During each of the last four elections I have told them that there was one thing they could be certain of: that if I were elected I intended to devote my full time to what I considered to be a full-time job. They made their decision as to whether I should be their member of parliament or whether somebody else should be their member. I am not saying that they made their decision entirely on that basis, but certainly they have come to realize that it is a twelve-month job. Even if someone is in another type of profession or occupation or business and is able to carry on, the fact is that some of them certainly have not been able to do so completely. In fact, some have been ruined as a consequence of having served as members of parliament. They have been ruined as far as their private businesses are concerned. It is too much of a sacrifice even for those who are desirous of making sacrifices to be called upon to make.

I have heard a great deal of reference to this figure of $8,000 as an indemnity. I agree with the hon. member for Peace River and am absolutely confident that the government and the treasury board did not say "eeny, meeny, miny, mo" and pick a figure out of some hat. They must have given long and earnest consideration to this. It is the easiest thing in the world to say that $8,000 is too much and that $6,000 is enough. It is easy enough to say a good many of the things that have been said here, but I do not intend to be swayed too much by that kind of argument.

I am confident that the people I represent desire that a job should be done by their member. They are willing to pay what is required in order that that job might be done in the way they want it done. I have no hesitation whatsoever in saying to this House of Commons that the proposal contained in this bill represents nothing more than what to me appears adequate at this time under current conditions. We do not live in anything but a moderate fashion.

I say without hesitation that it is most difficult for a member of parliament who is called upon to do certain things on behalf of the people he represents to find that he must curtail his activities on their behalf because he simply has not the money to do it or because he realizes that he would have to go into debt to do it. I would have no hesitation in opening my financial accounts to the membership of this house after having been a member for fourteen years. I am not ashamed of them, because I think they would be a reflection of the conditions which have faced a good many members of this house.

I notice that it is not only here that these matters are being considered. Provincial governments have considered this matter from time to time and have made adjustments in the indemnities payable to their members. It has already been pointed out that in one province at least they receive more than we do now in the way of actual indemnity and that in the province in which we find ourselves now they receive an equal amount.

I am not complaining about that, but I do contend that there is something wrong in the relationship that exists between the two. For example, I find that in some provinces they are considering paying pensions to their cabinet ministers. I am not criticizing that. I have a Canadian Press clipping here which appeared in a local paper on Saturday which states:

> A plan to provide pensions to Saskatchewan cabinet members may be considered by the government before the legislature opens February 11, it was reported Friday. Only one provincial government, Nova Scotia, now has a pension plan for cabinet members.

I am not criticizing that; in fact I would be the first one to say that when a man has served in a provincial cabinet for a period of years, when he gives his full time to that service, he should receive a pension. I simply remind the house that these matters are being considered, even pensions for cabinet ministers, by certain provinces, Saskatchewan in particular. I do not refer to this in any critical way because I believe it should be done in every province across Canada.

Mr. Coldwell: I agree with that.

Mr. Shaw: Having said that, perhaps I have said enough. I think I have given the house a pretty clear picture of where I stand. I have not asked my colleagues, but I think if I took a vote right now I would have them with me on this matter.

Mr. J. H. Harrison (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put my position briefly on the record. I believe the house should feel indebted to the hon. member who has just spoken for answering the rather specious argument which has been made with regard to the $583 take-home pay by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). If I had not had any previous experience about members' remuneration, or if I knew nothing about it, I would gather from the hon. member for Assiniboia that he had no expenses at all at home or elsewhere. I would gather that he was making no coverage whatsoever of his riding.

I would assume also from his speech that all ridings in Canada are alike and that the expenses in connection with one are the same as the expenses in connection with all others. Let me say to him that there would be a difference of at least $3,000 a year between providing an adequate coverage for his riding and for my own.

My riding is one of the largest in Canada, occupying as it does a geographical position in the northern part of Saskatchewan. It covers 40 per cent of the physical area of that province. The people are scattered in many remote areas. Some hon. members might say that they did not need to see their member, that they did not need the same service as other people; but that is not my attitude toward my constituents. I feel that the person in the most remote part of my constituency is entitled to see me at least once a year. That is what has always happened as far as I am concerned, and that is what is going to continue to happen—he is going to see me at least once a year.

Ninety per cent of the area of my riding must be covered by plane. As hon. members know, we are away from here for only a few months in the summer and that means that it must be covered by pontoon-equipped planes. It costs a minimum of $35 an hour for such a plane to fly a short distance, and if you require to fly in the northern areas a plane will cost $70 an hour. I do not want to say to members of this house that you pay for every hour you have a plane. You do it in terms of flying hours and, depending on the type of plane, they have a minimum which they charge per day. To adequately cover my own riding, and it takes from ten to twelve days to cover the remote parts, on the basis of $50 an hour on an average, it costs $3,000 a year to cover the northern area.

I do not believe my constituents are going to suggest they do not want that service, and I do not think they are going to suggest that I pay for it. They do know that in the past I paid a portion of it, and I was able to do so out of the conduct of my own business.

I take the same stand as the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy), who I think did a very remarkable job in this debate in telling the house and the people of Canada that he is actually worse off by being a member of this house, and that he would be far better off in his profession of teaching where he would get a higher salary. I think the argument that we are getting $10,000 does not hold. Even if we made $25,000 it would not make any more difference, if our expenses ran to $20,000, than if we received a salary of $10,000, and the expenses ran to $5,000. The net result is the same.

It is rather odd to find the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) stating that we have take-home pay of $583 a month. No such pay is obtainable or will be obtainable even if we get $10,000 a year.

I made my position clear in my own riding on many occasions before I ever came down here in 1949, and certainly in this last election campaign. I said then that this very situation might arise, and that definitely I was going to support higher pay for members. In Ottawa here, I am 2,100 miles from home. I found it impossible to continue the business that I carried on until a year ago, and I had to dispose of it. In that position, I am like the hon. member for York South, and the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw), who has just spoken.

I believe this is a full-time job as far as giving full representation to the people we represent is concerned. I have so told my constituents, and I have been elected twice on that very ground, or at least that was part of the reason people voted for me at that time. Certainly I did not hide the light under a bushel. I made it plain to them I would cover all parts of the riding and would regard the job as a full-time job.

If, as an uninitiated member, I accepted the remarks of the hon. member for Assiniboia I would conclude that as soon as the house rose I would be immediately free to go on holidays. That is not the case. That is when I do my travelling in my own riding, and during that time I cover no less than 20,000 miles. The hon. member for Red Deer mentioned his car and the depreciation on it. I do not believe our constituents expect us to pay these expenses, because we would not travel these distances if we were not members.

The C.C.F. government in the province of Saskatchewan saw fit to raise the pay of provincial members. I have no argument with that. I do not believe they are overpaid. But my own constituency covers the major part of five provincial ridings. They cover that area with provincial members at a cost of $15,000 a year; yet I understand that they sit for only six weeks in the year. Certainly some of them give additional time to covering their own areas, but there is no comparison whatsoever with our position.

If you consider our $10,000 a year on the basis of what the hon. member for Assiniboia said, you earn it during the time here and then you are off on holidays. These provincial members receive $15,000 a year and work for a period of six weeks. We are here seven or eight months, and we will receive $10,000 if the house passes this proposed increase.

I think these remarks set forth my position. Even with the increases now forecast I would definitely be better off in the business I previously had, as far as actual money left over is concerned. I have pointed out that it takes about $3,000 per year for plane travel in my riding. There is at least another $1,000 to cover travel and depreciation on a motor vehicle. The Minister of National Revenue is interested in another couple of thousand dollars, and various other organizations in my riding are interested in small portions which I am pleased to give. If I have a minimum of about $3,500 of actual take-home pay I think I am doing fairly well.

The $10,000 does not mean anything at all. I am interested only in the $3,500, and I would suggest that on the basis of the pay we have been getting here and the services we give to the people of Canada, most of us are making great sacrifices in order to carry out our duties. Certainly I am prepared to go back to the people of the constituency of Meadow Lake and put it to them as to whether they think $10,000 a year is too much for me, and whether they believe I am telling the truth in outlining my expenses as far as they are concerned. If they do not think so, and if they believe the services I render are not adequate for the money expended, I have no doubt they will dispose of me in the usual and traditional manner.

Mr. Elmore Philpott (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to deal with one or two points in connection with this bill. As a new member I would not presume to pass any opinion on how much it costs members to stay here and survive, but I think we have heard obviously sincere speeches in this house on this question, even from the members of the group opposite me.

We had one obviously sincere speech from the veteran member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis), who had his own ideas. I thought the most effective speech I heard in the whole debate was that from the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), who told a calm unvarnished tale of just what happens to a private member without any backing when he comes into this house.

I will say very frankly that I might have had some reservations about this bill, but they vanished yesterday when it was made very clear that the increased indemnity did not include any increase in members' pensions. Beyond that, I find myself in complete agreement with the principle of this bill. I think that anyone in an executive position on a newspaper, in any business, or in any job in this Dominion of Canada who was asked to rate members' duties and responsibilities in comparison with any similar responsibilities in Canada would say that an indemnity of $8,000 a year was not too much.

While I myself during the course of my life have occasionally taken a crack or two at the place sometimes referred to in this chamber as "the other place", let me say that I for one have no sympathy whatever with the argument I heard within the past few days that since we are going to have the other place we should somehow or other starve them into slow disappearance or strangulation so that perhaps, as in the kids' game, "let the old cat die out".

I believe, on the contrary, the upper chamber is an integral part of this parliament of Canada, and the question is: Do we want our House of Commons to be an efficient and effective organization to serve the people of Canada, and do we want the Senate or upper chamber to be an effective instrument to serve the people of Canada? I would submit just one question, Mr. Speaker, and it is this.

Would it contribute to a strong Senate or a weaker Senate if we were to leave the Senate indemnity as it is and raise the House of Commons indemnity 100 per cent?

I think the answer is self-evident. I rise, however, to speak in this debate on one simple point. If I were asked to vote for or against this bill on the ground of whether or not the old age pensioners and those on war veterans allowance were or were not going to get a better deal, then I would certainly stand with those on war veterans allowance and the old age pensioners. As the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) said the other day, if that were the only choice in this house, we would get a 100 per cent vote on that question. If I were asked to name the one thing which I think would be most desirable in this Canada of ours, in order to make it a happier and more prosperous place for all of us, at the head of the list I personally would place more generous allowances for those on war veterans allowance and on old age pensions.

Here in my hand I have clippings from all three Vancouver newspapers of all different stripes of politics. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I do not intend to read them at any length. By and large, over a period of months, all three papers of all political stripes have urged the necessity for having the indemnity of members of parliament fixed at a level which will assure the perpetuation of this House of Commons on an efficient basis. I find that all three papers in Vancouver now take much the same line. All of them take the same line. They say that if it is true that our members of parliament require more of indemnity, they should be more receptive to the arguments about the people who are in a much more desperate plight than is anyone in this house, namely the people who are trying to eke out an existence on $40 a month and are living in a state of almost slow or semi-starvation. One paper asks:

> How can our members of parliament now in the act of practically doubling their own pay justify their neglect of the pensioners in their present plight?

That is the Vancouver News-Herald. The Vancouver Province, which sometimes supports the Conservative party, says: "M.P.'s should remember O.A.P.'s", and the editorial ends up in this way:

> The M.P.'s generous stipend and the pensioners' pittance come from the same purse. Why is one so handsome? Why is the other so mean?

The paper which writes the most intelligent comment of all, namely the Vancouver Sun, in a very lucid editorial says that there should be a streamlining of all the welfare payments in Canada, that we should have a dominion-provincial conference to get some kind of order and to tidy up the loose ends of all these things like assistance grants, war veterans allowances, pensions for the blind; and it goes on to show the wide discrepancy there is between the various groups. The editorial is headed "Equalize Payments to Needy, Then Increase Them All".

My point is quite simple, Mr. Speaker. In this vote we are not called on to vote either for a modest and, I think, reasonable increase in the indemnity for members of parliament as against and as a substitute for a more generous outlook towards old age pensions and war veterans allowances. On the contrary, we are asked to decide a very simple question: Is the member of parliament worthy of an indemnity which enables him to stay here and to survive? When the majority of this house votes a decisive yes, I submit that by that decisive yes vote they are establishing a principle that if the member of parliament is worthy of a survival indemnity, then that same principle applies to all other elements in Canada, this great country of ours; and instead of its being a less generous outlook toward old age pensioners and those on war veterans allowance, I submit it is an indication of better things to come as soon as this country can afford it.

Mr. T. H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to take long. In fact, my remarks will be concluded within five minutes. Most members from British Columbia have spoken, and the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis), in his usual honest manner, has made his stand. Because I am a Liberal member from British Columbia who represents more C.C.F. supporters than does anyone else on this side of the house, I think I too should take my stand because there will be some discussion at home with regard to this matter.

I think the honest point of view with regard to a member of parliament is that he should say what he has to say here and nowhere else. I am going to support this bill, and I am going to do so on one premise perhaps more than on any other. In his speech yesterday the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) brought to the attention of this house the dignity of a member of parliament; and in doing that he did not refer to the dignity of a member of parliament only during a session of parliament but rather to the dignity of a member of parliament for twelve months of the year. My riding demands a twelve-month service. Not only am I serving here but when I go home I have an office in my home to which anyone can come at any time and tell me his problems. As I understand it, the method of payment under this bill will be one by which we shall secure the money every thirty days. I think that is only right and proper.

One other thing I wish to mention is the fact that some members of the C.C.F. party—as represented by the speech of the leader of the party who, I am glad to see, is in the house at the moment—tell me that they are going to support a $2,000 increase. I wonder how much the viewpoint of the leader of the C.C.F. is reflected in that $2,000 increase. I believe that this matter has been considered by their caucus or by some meeting and that this is a compromise between consciences. I point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that there has been no denial from the party when I said that. I quite understand the position.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to comment on a supposition or rumours as to what occurred in our party. It would not be proper for me to do so any more than it would be proper for a member of the Liberal party to comment on any discussion they have within their party.

Mr. Castleden: Maybe this bill is a compromise.

Mr. Goode: Then may I say it is a compromise of the C.C.F. consciences in the house.

Mr. Castleden: I think the bill is a Liberal compromise.

Mr. Goode: That may be. Not only do I believe that this bill ought to be supported by every member of the house, but I believe it will be supported by my people at home. I make no apologies for voting for it. I think a good member of parliament is worth this kind of money, just as any executive is worth this kind of money. I will vote for the bill when the question is put.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Before the question is put, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say one word. Once again I think there has been a considerable amount of confusion with regard to this matter. When the division is called and we are voting, what are we voting on? We are voting on the principle of the bill. We are not voting on the details of that bill. There may be disagreement among us with regard to the details, but are we or are we not in favour of a principle, namely, shall the indemnities of members of parliament be increased?

I have no hesitation in saying that I am going to vote for the principle of this bill. I have felt—and I have said so for a good many years—that members of parliament whom I have known in this house have made personal sacrifices that should not be expected of members of parliament who represent any constituencies in Canada.

A great deal has been said about what is being said in the country, and so on and so forth. I am going to say this. Yesterday, by fortuitous circumstance, I saw in the gallery an outstanding farmer who lives just across the border of my constituency. I saw him listening intently to the debate all afternoon. I went up into the gallery about half past five and asked him what he thought about this. He said, "Well, it is about time members of parliament had something of this sort done for them." Last evening I met two other outstanding farmers from my province, one of them from my own constituency. They occupy important positions in the agricultural organizations of which they are members. I asked them the same question, and I got precisely the same answer.

I know that, so far as the executive in my own constituency are concerned, they know exactly what membership in this house involves. They know that the proposal to increase indemnities is warranted by the circumstances under which we have operated in this house. I have no hesitation in voting for the principle of this bill. As I said in my address the other day, I am not in agreement with some of the details of this bill and I shall say so when the time comes. This is not the time. If any hon. member in this house believes that the indemnity should be increased, that hon. member should rise in his place and support the bill. My hon. friends of the official opposition say they are going to oppose this bill.

Last Friday evening we had before us a motion for second reading of a bill in connection with the housing act. There was bitter opposition to the details of that bill from this side of the house. When the vote was called all of us on this side of the house, with two exceptions, voted for that bill. We did not vote for the details of the bill. I did not like some of the details. I rose in my place and voted for that bill because I believed in the principle of the bill.

I say to my hon. friends that exactly the same situation faces the house at this moment. If we are going to vote we shall vote for the principle and not the details, just as last Friday evening when members who had bitterly criticized the housing bill rose in their places and supported the principle of that bill. Members of this house who believe, as I think most hon. members do believe, that there should be an increase in this indemnity should get up and show where they stand by voting for the bill.

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary South): I should like briefly to put my personal position on the record, Mr. Speaker, with regard to this matter. First of all I may say, sir, that I support the general objective of this bill, that objective being to so improve the financial aspect of service in this parliament that the government of Canada may be served better by attracting men of talent across this nation to serve in parliament. However, I am voting against this bill because I disagree with the method, and I do not like the contents of the act as it will stand if this bill is passed in its present form.

Before listing three of the objections I have, may I say that as a comparative newcomer to this house with service of something over a year at the time of the last general election, I had to make a decision as to whether or not I could afford to continue in parliament should it be the desire of the people of Calgary South to re-elect me. After a fairly careful study of the situation I found that during my first term in parliament I was a subsidized member. I was subsidized by myself and by my business to the extent that for every single dollar I drew as a member of parliament I had to take from my personal assets or my business more than $3.

In the light of those circumstances I feel quite firm in my conviction that the present indemnity is far from adequate. I do not think any of us in this house should be required to draw heavily upon our personal resources, nor should we be forced into the position of having our business subsidize us in our service to the public of Canada.

However, sir, I come now to the three points which I feel would be wrong in the Senate and House of Commons Act should this particular bill pass in its present form. My first objection is to the tax-free expense allowance. I believe, sir, that all payments received by members of parliament should be taxable income. I believe that our earnings as members should be treated in exactly the same way as the earnings of other citizens in this country. I believe there should be provision for a deduction from income tax for a member's legitimate expenses in carrying out his duties.

Then, sir, I do not like the loose rules covering attendance. I believe that in any general revision of the Senate and House of Commons Act steps should be taken to tighten up the rules which are now honoured in some degree more in the breach than in the observance. I might say that I have been absent on a number of occasions during my two years in Ottawa. I have not yet drawn a full sessional indemnity. In my own rather strict interpretation of these rules I have believed that my time devoted to travel back home on matters not entirely related to my work as a member is time for which I should not charge the public of Canada. This is one phase of the subsidy which my business pays toward keeping me here.

Finally, sir, I do not believe that, despite the many fine men who have served and are still serving in the Senate, the duties and functions of the Senate justify treating the members on the same financial basis as the members of the House of Commons.

With these objections in mind, sir, I trust the government will reconsider its decision and withdraw this bill for further, independent study to determine what complete and detailed amendments to the Senate and House of Commons Act might best be submitted to this parliament in order to achieve, on a sounder basis, the general objectives involved in Bill No. 171.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) speaks now he will close the debate.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief, because much of what I intended to say was said a few minutes ago by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell).

We are considering a motion for the second reading of this bill, when it is the principle of the bill that is submitted for approval or disapproval, and when it does not mean that those who vote for the bill are voting for everything the bill contains. As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar clearly indicated, that was illustrated in the conduct of hon. members in this house no longer ago than last week when after, I think, four days of critical debate of the contents of the housing bill, one amending the housing act and making further provision to encourage housing, that bill was approved by the vote of all but two members of the house. It was a vote in which not all those who had spoken took part; but very many of those who had been critical of the bill did vote in favour of second reading.

That is the situation here. A vote for the second reading of the bill will be a vote to confirm a principle that many have declared their intention of voting against, although one they agree with, namely that there should be some increase, some revision upward of the indemnity of members of this house. One would gather from the tone in which they expressed their intention to vote negatively on second reading that, notwithstanding, they do expect that second reading will be passed, and that their vote will not mean the end of the bill.

There is one other point that I do wish to mention again. Our constitutional system being what it is, the government felt it should not come to parliament recommending a bill that would provide for a more substantial indemnity for members of this house than for members of the other house. It is quite true that in all the reasons we have given in attempting to justify an increase in the indemnities or allowances of members of this house, we have given reasons that apply to members of this house and do not apply to the same extent—I am free to confess it—to members of the other house.

This bill, if and when it is passed by this house, will go to the other house; and if the members of the other house were themselves to say that, taking into consideration the reasons that motivated the increase here, and the fact that many of them do not apply to their situation, they would not feel it proper to have the same indemnity provided for them, I am sure if it came back in that shape to this house, this house would agree.

But I am not asking this house, nor am I suggesting that this house should take the position, that it will not agree to a similar indemnity being provided for all members of parliament. And members of the other house are members of parliament, just as we are. I am not suggesting that this house would not agree to their being treated in the same way.

Now, that is the situation. I repeat that I am not asking any member of this house, on whichever side he may sit, to vote yes on this motion because I make the motion and because the government recommends this bill. Again I think it is the responsibility of each one of us to express his own honest conviction as to whether or not there should be an increase.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. St. Laurent) which was agreed to on the following division:

Bill read the second time.

Mr. Speaker: As it is five o'clock, the house will now consider private and public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

CATHERINE MILLER MARY HARRIS DAWSON COUTTS

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 12, for the relief of Catherine Miller Mary Harris Dawson Coutts.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members will notice that there are several divorce bills to be considered in committee of the whole. Is it agreeable that the one motion should cover their being sent to the committee of the whole?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Knowles: Just before clause 1 is carried I want the record kept straight as to what we are doing. I have agreed already, and I stand by that agreement, that so long as the question as to how we are to handle divorce bills is on the agenda of the special committee on procedure I for one do not wish to take up the time of the house to deal with these bills individually. However, I think the record should be straight as to what we are doing. In about 30 seconds on January 12 we gave second reading to some 60 divorce bills. In another 30 seconds on January 15 we gave second reading to another 80 divorce bills. We now have before us those two batches or a total of 140 divorce bills which apparently the committee is prepared to process through the committee of the whole in very short order.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

GREAT LAKES REINSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. J. T. Richard (Ottawa East) moved the second reading of Bill No. 174, respecting the Great Lakes Reinsurance Company.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this company was incorporated by the Statutes of Canada, 1951, chapter 69, with a capitalization of $500,000. The bill is for the sole purpose of increasing the capitalization to $2 million.

The company is licensed by the dominion insurance department and the provincial insurance department to carry on the business of reinsuring received from other insurance companies.

There is a relationship between the company's capital and the amount of business which it can safely and reasonably do, and owing to the increased demands of further business it is necessary to increase the capitalization.

The dominion superintendent of insurance is satisfied, so far as he is concerned, that the company should be permitted to increase its capitalization; and, of course, will appear before the committee to whom the bill is referred, as is his usual practice.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION ACT

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO ENLARGE SCOPE

Mr. A. M. Campbell (The Battlefords) moved the second reading of Bill No. 175, to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act (protection of rivers).

He said: Mr. Speaker, never have I stood in the House of Commons to discuss a matter which has affected me more or given me more concern than the matter I propose to discuss at the present time.

I expect most people know the value of water to health, but perhaps some people do not know what it is to do without a good drink of water. Perhaps some people do not know what it means to have to go without water and to be really thirsty. I know from experience that one of the greatest discomforts anyone can have is to be without a proper supply of water. I once travelled over the western plains and went without a good drink of water for as long as two weeks, and when we came across a spring the whole caravan I was travelling with stopped, lay down and put their heads in that stream, took their fill and then went back time and again to enjoy that pure water.

In my constituency today thousands of people have no decent water to drink. The people mostly affected are in the town of Battleford and in the mental hospital in the city of North Battleford. Something has happened to the water supply in the North Saskatchewan river at the present time, and no one seems to know what it is.

The hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) has brought this matter up on a number of occasions and had asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) several questions along these lines. Up to date we have no knowledge of what has happened to the water of the North Saskatchewan river, but we do know that it is in such a state that the people living along that river in the city of North Battleford, in the town of Battleford, in Prince Albert, and again in The Pas are unable to get a decent drink of water unless they bring it in from outside.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that this is a horrible situation. I say it is time this parliament did something about it. I want to put on record some of the things that are happening in the town of Battleford. I have here a long letter I received from a housewife telling me of the conditions in that town. She writes:

> After all the conferences and correspondence and travelling back and forth the latest thing to be announced is that Premier Douglas has written a personal letter to Premier Manning telling him Alberta is responsible for the pollution.

Some industries in the province of Alberta have been dumping some sort of element into this water which is poisoning the water or making it unfit for human use. This lady's letter continues:

> Meanwhile the water situation here is worse if anything. In the past two weeks several children had to be taken home from school when they became ill after drinking the water while many older persons have had gastro-intestinal trouble and have been advised by the doctor not to drink the water. Most people are boiling the water but that doesn't solve the problem in the schools where children are bound to get thirsty and what are they to do?

Now, Mr. Speaker, if we are to have healthy children they must have an adequate supply of good, pure water. Those hon. members who have raised families can all remember how many times their children would go over to the tap or to the water pail to quench their thirst. Here we have the situation that the children in these towns are unable to get a good drink of water.

The letter goes on:

> The people in town and at the Saskatchewan hospital—those who live on the grounds that is—are getting their water in containers either from friends in the country, North Battleford or the irrigation hospital where the water supply is taken from the Battle river. The mayor and the local doctor, J. E. Nunn, both told me they can't and won't drink the water.

I want to draw attention to the fact that patients in the mental hospital are unable to obtain a supply of fresh water. The attendants and members of the staff are able to get in their cars and drive out into the country where they can obtain good water, but the patients, these people who are ill, these people who cannot understand why the water does not taste good, are being subjected to bad psychological effects which will certainly retard their recovery from their present ailments.

This letter I have already quoted from goes on to relate how a couple of high school boys have been operating a small laboratory for some time past. They took some of this water and distilled it and after distillation all that was left was a yellowish residue. The letter continues:

> The water supply at North Battleford has not been affected yet but in checking with F. Holliday, the water engineer, I was told they felt it was only a matter of time until North Battleford would have the same trouble. You see their wells are situated far enough back from the river that when the water level drops down and when it freezes over, no water flows through the back channel to get into the wells.

I might say in this connection, Mr. Speaker, that the water level of the Saskatchewan river is extremely low at the present time. I do not know how long this rubbish, or whatever it is, has been dumped into the river at the city of Edmonton, but obviously it has been going on for a year or more, and it is quite possible that with the water at a high level whatever was put into the river was diluted sufficiently so that it did not cause the trouble which has now developed.

I quote again from this letter:

> The one place which has had the most trouble and of which barely anything has been said, is the provincial hospital across the river.

That is the mental hospital. The writer of the letter goes on to say something of what the patients in that mental hospital have to put up with. They cannot get a drink of water without being nauseated and made ill in many cases. The letter goes on:

> I have checked with Dr. Nunn and he said the incidence of gastro-intestinal trouble in Battleford has definitely risen in the past month. My own ten year old son was brought home last week from school. He has been drinking only boiled water and was warned against drinking water at school. He became so thirsty one morning, however, that he simply had to have a drink and little more than an hour later, he was brought home, sick to his stomach and with severe abdominal cramps. That's the way it affects you, apparently. Many people thought they had stomach flu' and it also causes dysentry, I am told. I heard of a case yesterday where a small child of a provincial hospital employee is in hospital. Apparently she has an allergy to whatever the element in the water is and every time she drinks it she breaks out in a terrible rash and her face swells up. All these things seem to be rather trivial but I feel very strongly that the human element is the one thing that must not be overlooked in this controversy.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when the matter was put to the Minister of National Health and Welfare several times during the session he stated the federal government was not competent to do anything about the matter.

I shall now deal with my proposed amendment to the bill. As the bill states, this is an act to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act which is for the protection of rivers. Section 18 of the act, as it is at present, reads as follows:

> No owner or tenant of any saw-mill, or any workman therein or other person shall throw or cause to be thrown, or suffer or permit to be thrown any sawdust, edgings, slabs, bark or rubbish of any description whatsoever into any river, stream or other water, any part of which is navigable or which flows into any navigable water.

There is no doubt that this act was passed many years ago, before industrial plants were built on rivers. I want to direct attention to the fact that the city of Edmonton in particular, in common with many other parts of Canada, is becoming highly industrialized. I can remember driving not many miles north of the city of Ottawa when I passed a plant, and I was hardly past it until I noticed a stream of whitish-looking liquid running away from the plant, under the highway and into the Gatineau river.

This matter of dumping this sort of stuff into rivers is becoming of great concern to many of our people. When the government built the Chalk River plant I notice that they took care to see to it that a ditch was dug and that the residue from that plant was taken away from the river into a swamp not far from the plant.

The situation has changed. The present navigable waters act is a federal act which gives this government jurisdiction over any navigable waters in Canada, and prohibits a saw mill from throwing rubbish of any description whatsoever into any river, stream or other water, any part of which is navigable or which flows into any navigable water. I have looked up the definition of "rubbish" in the large Oxford dictionary. "Rubbish" is defined as waste or refuse material, debris, litter, refuse; rejected and useless matter of any kind.

The first point I wish to make tonight is that this government is competent to prevent the dumping by saw mills of rubbish into navigable streams. The act discriminates against saw mills. A saw mill is the only industry which, under the act, is prohibited from dumping rubbish into a river. Any other industry can build on river banks and dump all its rubbish or all its refuse into a navigable river without any hindrance from this government. My amendment to this act would expand the scope of the act to the extent of adding the words "or other industrial plant". Section 18 would then read:

No owner or tenant of any saw-mill, or other industrial plant, or any workman therein or other person shall throw or cause to be thrown, or suffer or permit to be thrown any sawdust, edgings, slabs, bark or rubbish of any description whatsoever into any river, stream or other water, any part of which is navigable or which flows into any navigable water.

On January 19 the hon. member for Prince Albert asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare what action the federal government intends to take to preserve from pollution the waters of rivers that flow through two or more provinces. In his reply, as reported at page 1235 of Hansard, the minister stated:

The responsibility for remedying the situation is recognized by both provinces as not coming within the competence of the federal government.

He went on further to say:

Indeed, whether or not there was that acknowledgment I would have to submit that would have to be the situation as far as the federal government is concerned, for this is clearly a matter that does not come within the competence of the federal government.

I cannot understand the attitude taken by the minister. Here we have a terrible situation where thousands of people are concerned. Water is of primary importance to the health of our people, and we have a situation where one or more industries are dumping their refuse and rubbish into the Saskatchewan river at Edmonton in the province of Alberta. Pollution of the Saskatchewan river in the province of Alberta does not affect the people of Alberta directly, because no water is used out of the river below Edmonton until it gets to Battleford and North Battleford in Saskatchewan. The citizens of the town of Battleford use the river as their sole water supply. The mental institution in North Battleford, housing some 2,000 patients besides the staff, depends on this water for human consumption. The river then continues on till it comes to Prince Albert, a city of some 6,000 or 7,000 people. Again these people have to put up with a terrible situation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Twenty thousand.

Mr. Campbell: I stand corrected. I understand from the hon. member for Prince Albert that the population of the city of Prince Albert is 20,000. That emphasizes my case, Mr. Speaker. From there the river runs on into Manitoba, through The Pas and into Hudson bay.

I would point out that this matter which is put into rivers does not respect provincial boundaries. This river runs through three provinces, and the minister says the federal government has no jurisdiction or is not competent to deal with the matter. Surely it is time this parliament took action to stop the dumping of whatever element it is that is being dumped into the river at Edmonton. I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare why it should not come within the competence of the federal government, if the federal government expects that a conference is going to have to be held after damage has been done to a river which may take years to clear up. It may take years to clear the situation up because of the fact that the water is very low and this matter, whatever it is, is no doubt soaking and working itself down into the silt; it may take only months or it might take years before this river is able to clear itself. We should have legislation in our federal statutes so these rivers can be policed to make sure that no industry will be allowed, under federal law, to dump its refuse into navigable waters or streams that are being used or might some day be used for human consumption.

In the question asked by the hon. member for Prince Albert on January 19 he stated that he had brought this matter to the attention of the department some three weeks previously, so the department would know of the situation on or about December 20. On January 25 the hon. member for Prince Albert, as reported at page 1407 of Hansard, asked the following question:

I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, bringing to his attention again the emergent situation, in Prince Albert and also in North Battleford, which is becoming more serious rather than better. In an editorial I have here in my hand I see a description of conditions of the water at Prince Albert. Those who speak with authority describe it as "water comparable to low grade swamp wash laced with crude oil."

In view of the fact that this situation has continued for a considerable period of time, I would ask the minister what stand the federal government is taking with reference to this matter and the removal of this nuisance, or at least to give assistance in that direction. I would also ask whether, under all the circumstances, regardless of federal responsibility or otherwise, he would make available and send out to Prince Albert one or two of his officials to see what they can do to solve the problem there and to preserve the health of the people. The situation is serious.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare replied as follows:

My hon. friend does not now deal with the question of competence. That was dealt with in the question which he put to me the other day. He now asks me if we would be prepared to send out to the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan officials of our own department who are technically qualified to assist in this matter. I am happy to be able to inform my hon. friend that not only will we be able to do so but that we have already done so. Last Friday the supervising engineer of the public health engineering division of our department attended a meeting in Edmonton with the representative of the company and the department of health, and the matter was fully reviewed. The technical officers, including our own officials, are now engaged in determining the precise cause of the pollution. The supervising engineer has also been in touch with the officials of the department of health in Regina. My hon. friend may be assured that, without in any way begging the question of competence, the federal government will do all it can do to assist the provincial authorities to carry out their constitutional responsibility.

The hon. member for Prince Albert replied to the minister as follows:

I thank the minister for his reply, and I should like to ask a supplementary question. The other day I asked him to ascertain the responsibility of the federal government in connection with rivers that traverse two or more provinces. Has he had any legal opinion on that matter? Is it not a fact that, under the situation disclosed here, there is a distinct responsibility federally to look into this matter and to act?

The minister replied:

I do not believe I can add anything to what I said in answer to the supplementary question put to me by my hon. friend about four or five days ago.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare, in reply to the question of the hon. member for Prince Albert on January 19, stated, as reported at page 1235 of Hansard for that date:

My hon. friend will find that this matter—I do not mean this particular situation but the principles involved—was fully discussed in the house in 1949, and the discussion can be found at page 571 of Hansard of October 6 of that year.

The discussion to which the minister referred related to an amendment moved by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) to section 19 of the Navigable Waters Protection Act, and had to do with the pollution of the waters along the shore line of lake Ontario, while the case which I am arguing refers to a river running through three provinces. During that debate the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) argued that the federal government was not competent to deal with the situation, and the amendment was voted down. I believe the minister was correct, because this is a completely different situation.

Again on January 28 the minister referred to the matter of competence in reply to a question of mine as to whether or not he had received a report from the supervising engineer of the public health engineering division concerning the pollution of the North Saskatchewan river. At the time the minister said he had nothing to add to the reply he had made to the hon. member for Prince Albert a few days previously.

In a press report received from Prince Albert a few days ago it was stated that this condition has been continuing since November 15 last. Surely it is time this federal government accepted the responsibility of looking after the health of our people, and corrected this situation which has been known since last November.

Another press report states that health minister Cross of Alberta stated last Tuesday that a dam on the North Saskatchewan river 100 miles west of Edmonton had been mentioned as a possible solution to the pollution of the river waters. It was estimated this dam would cost between $3 and $4 million. I should like to ask this house who would pay for a dam of that description? Would the people of Canada be asked to put up between $3 and $4 million in order to avoid the pollution of the river by some industries? I am sure that this condition is not limited to Saskatchewan, but that industries are doing the same thing in other parts of the country.

Health minister Cross goes on to suggest that such a dam would permit control of the river level in winter periods of low water when there is greater risk of pollution. If we had a federal law that would prevent the cause of pollution there would be no necessity for building dams or forcing our people to drink such horrible water. Another press report from Prince Albert reads as follows:

Local water drinkers can expect to have tasteless water again in approximately one week, it was reported at Monday night's meeting of city council. The North Saskatchewan river, from which this city draws its drinking water, has been polluted by industrial wastes from Alberta since early last November.

A report by J. G. Schaeffer, chief sanitation officer to the provincial health department, revealed that the addition of chlorine dioxide to the water would remove the taste and smell. The chemical treatment was discovered after extensive tests were made on samples of river water taken right at the site of the Edmonton factory blamed for the nuisance.

Here we are going to have another horrible element added to the water in an effort to counteract the elements that are causing the pollution. This sort of thing has been going on in the United States for many years. They have arrived at the point where most of their rivers are polluted to such an extent that the water is not fit for human consumption. The estimated cost of the treatment of industrial wastes from major industries contributing to the pollution of surface water in the United States is $694 million. The source of my information is a pamphlet entitled "Water Pollution in the United States", pages 31, 53 and 54.

Because of the rapid expansion of industry in Canada, especially in the province of Alberta, this problem will become more and more aggravated unless this parliament agrees to take action to stop the pollution of our rivers at the source. The problem will not be solved permanently by building dams or by adding more and more chemicals to the polluted waters.

I hope the government will agree that the time has come to take definite action. If they are not prepared to support this bill, and if they have a better method of tackling the problem, I hope they will reveal it to the house now. Surely it is the duty of this parliament to make sure our people are not subjected to possible sickness or disease merely because parliament has refused to face up to the problem.

I have informed the house what the problem is, Mr. Speaker, and I have made suggestions. I hope the Minister of Transport or some other minister will either agree to accept this bill or come forward with a better proposition.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): First I wish to congratulate the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Campbell) upon having introduced this amendment. Few members in this house have any realization of the situation which prevails in the cities of North Battleford and Prince Albert, and in the town of The Pas.

The people in the city of Prince Albert were the first to have this problem. As a result of the dumping of deleterious substances into the river below Edmonton, 50,000 people in Saskatchewan are indirectly affected and 30,000 people are in the position that they cannot drink the water which flows in the Saskatchewan river. "Water, water, everywhere, nor any drop to drink"; that is the position of these people. As the hon. member has pointed out, this has become a national emergency. If not met as a national emergency, it will become a permanent problem for the people along the northern Saskatchewan. There is no description of the bad odour of the water that is more fitting than the words of Shakespeare when he said:

> The rankest compound of villainous smell that ever offended nostril.

That is what we are putting up with on the northern Saskatchewan. Everyone seems to contend that someone else must accept the constitutional responsibility. We in Prince Albert were the first to suffer. My hon. friend's city of North Battleford and town of Battleford did not come into the picture for several weeks because of the location of the water intake in these two urban municipalities. Prince Albert has experienced this situation since November 12. An appeal was made to the provincial government of Saskatchewan and the stand was in effect that it was not a provincial problem.

The inception of it is in Alberta. The department of health in Alberta has taken a benevolent interest in the subject, and says in effect "This is not our problem". Recently the province of Manitoba has made representations because the problem has finally reached The Pas. Certainly this is a national problem, and something must be done to meet it.

I am not going to quote newspaper references extensively, but while my hon. friend was speaking I sent to the library to secure the Prince Albert Daily Herald so I could give the house something of the picture, and in a few minutes show the conditions prevailing there. I find that in the issue of January 29 this newspaper states:

> Manitoba and Alberta have asked federal aid in ridding North Saskatchewan river of pollution. Request from Manitoba came to federal government when The Pas appealed to Manitoba government for aid in clearing up a water condition similar to one prevalent in Prince Albert.
> In letter to city council from Hon. Paul Martin, federal minister of health, it was stated that results of tests on water from the river are not yet available.
> The federal health minister has twice stated in the House of Commons that solution of water problem is not responsibility of federal government.

Prince Albert is asking for some action. On the 28th of January officials from the federal and provincial authorities met there. The heading of the article on that date is "Officials Here to Talk Water." They talked water, and while they talked the people thirsted. And that has been the condition that has continued for a period of almost two and a half months.

I could go back day by day in this newspaper file, and find each day a reference to the situation. Someone says, "Why do not these cities do something to meet the situation themselves?" The city of Prince Albert has made some investigation into the question and has found that it would be financially impracticable for the city to handle this problem alone, as was pointed out by the superintendent of utilities. He said it would cost the city at least $60 a day to meet a problem that results from a condition of affairs outside of and beyond the city, and also beyond the province of Saskatchewan.

Day by day the city council of Prince Albert has been asking for action, and the health authorities and representatives of the various western provinces have been discussing the matter. The people of Prince Albert depend for their water supply upon what can be obtained from wells in the neighbourhood. I wonder at the self-restraint that has been shown in trying to get action.

The answer by the federal authorities has been in effect: Are we, in effect, our brother's keeper, under the legislative distribution of powers in this dominion? Certainly it is not the government of Saskatchewan that is alone responsible, nor is it the government of Alberta, and the government of Manitoba has no direct responsibility.

I make an appeal to the minister to brush aside for the moment some of these constitutional difficulties that can be raised on every occasion and on every matter in respect of the distributed powers of legislative authority. Give us assistance. I repeat that the hon. member for The Battlefords deserves high commendation for offering this amendment. I am wondering, though, whether it would actually cover the situation. The section as amended would read:

> No owner or tenant of any saw-mill, or other industrial plant, or any workman therein or other person shall throw or cause to be thrown, or suffer or permit to be thrown any sawdust, edgings, slabs, bark or rubbish of any description whatsoever into any river, stream or other water, any part of which is navigable or which flows into any navigable water.

This section would create a new offence. As it is today I do not think there is any offence under the law covering the problem I have described; for certainly what is being dumped into the river is not sawdust, edgings, slabs, bark or rubbish of any description. And those latter words would be interpreted, I would say, in their relationship to the words preceding them.

If this amendment were carried, I think there would still be no offence created to cover the prevalent situation. Having that in mind, and subject to my hon. friend's agreement, I suggest that these further words be added to section 18 in question, the additional words to begin after the word "whatsoever" in the fifth line of section 18. Those words would be, "or chemicals of any kind, and without restricting the generality of the foregoing any substance which, although not deleterious or harmful to human health, causes discomfort or annoyance to users of water".

This would make it an offence which would cover the situation in question, the one we face. I am not going to talk this bill out, although I could say a great deal more. This problem has continued since November 12. Anything I have done in bringing it to the attention of the house has not been done in any critical attitude. I have tried to get the co-operation of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), and the minister has promised co-operation and has sent representatives. But while the representatives meet the problem intensifies and becomes worse.

Mr. Knight: They used imported water while they were staying there.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, and in Prince Albert we are reaching the position that is found in Mexico city, where one cannot drink the water available but has to have bottled water. Surely our health authorities in this country are not going to permit the existence of a condition like that in rivers where the water should be pure, rivers upon which cities dependent on the purity of these waters are located.

I make this appeal, and join with the hon. member in asking action. Also, in order to assist him in what he has done in bringing this amendment before the house, may I move, seconded by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks):

> That after the word "whatsoever" in the fifth line of section 18 in the bill the following words be added:
> "or chemicals of any kind, and without restricting the generality of the foregoing any substance which, although not deleterious or harmful to human health, causes discomfort or annoyance to users of water".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Before the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) speaks, may I point out that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) I am afraid is not in order at this stage. Although I realize the bill before us is a one-section bill, nevertheless the motion before the house is that the bill be read a second time. I am of the opinion that the amendment should be moved when we are considering the section in committee.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I was going to draw attention to that fact. However, I was going to add—and I do not want to talk the bill out—that I agree with all that was said by the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Campbell) and the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker).

I think there is some federal responsibility, and that if the federal authorities wanted to find authority for action they could find it, as a matter of fact, in the Fisheries Act. Anyone who will look at section 33 (2) of the Fisheries Act will find this:

> (2) No person shall cause or knowingly permit to pass into, or put or knowingly permit to be put, lime, chemical substances or drugs, poisonous matter, dead or decaying fish, or remnants thereof, mill rubbish or sawdust or any other deleterious substance or thing, whether the same is of a like character to the substances named in this section or not, in any water frequented by fish, or that flows into such water, nor on ice over either such waters.

Now, the Saskatchewan river is frequented by fish. Is it more important to protect the lives and the health of fish than the lives and the health of people who live along this river? I am not a lawyer, of course. There are strange quirks in the law. It seems to me that if we can protect the fish in that river—and there are goldeyes in it; there are sturgeon in it; there are lots of fish in it—and if we cannot protect the people of Prince Albert, the Battlefords and The Pas, then I suggest that you make some attempt to look after the poor fish in that river and relieve human beings too.

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): I was a guest in Prince Albert on January 21 and January 22. I want to endorse everything that was said by the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Campbell) and the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker).

During my lifetime I have been forced to live in quite a number of places on the prairies where we were dependent on sloughs, rivers and lakes for our water supply. I have had my share of water that really was not fit for human consumption, but never in my life did I encounter any water quite as unpleasant as the water in Prince Albert. My hosts wondered whether I would try tea or coffee. I tried both. I am not too hard to please, but it was impossible to drink a cup of either tea or coffee. I was about to have a shower. My friend suggested that one would be sufficient. After a very brief pause under the shower I came to the conclusion that I would be better off to stay without a shower than to have one. It would be difficult to exaggerate the condition of the water that is used in Prince Albert.

As the leader of this party suggests, since we could make some changes to protect the fish, the good people living in The Battlefords, North Battleford, The Pas and Prince Albert should be considered, and the federal government should give them the necessary protection.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the bill which my hon. friend has been discussing the last few minutes was moved for the first time, I believe, on Friday of last week. At that time it was given first reading, and it comes up now for a discussion of the principle on second reading.

I have not had an opportunity of studying the bill as carefully as I should have liked, but on the other hand, this is not the first time since I have been in the Department of Transport that efforts have been made to amend this act for the purpose which the hon. member for The Battlefords has in mind now. I am not at this moment discussing the laudable attitude of the hon. member in seeking to rid the locality in which he lives of the pollution of waters and in raising the question which he does. Naturally I have, as I am sure most hon. members in this house have, a great deal of sympathy for the position in which he and the hon. member for Prince Albert find themselves. But I am sure he would not want either myself or any other minister of the crown to consent to an amendment to an act which, if it were tested in the courts, would be found to be unconstitutional or ultra vires.

As I understand my responsibility with respect to the Navigable Waters Protection Act, it is clearly set out in part II, which defines the minister as being the Minister of Transport. It describes "owner" as the owner of any wreck, obstruction or obstacle as referred to in subsequent sections, and also gives a definition of "vessel". That part deals with obstructions to navigation, and all one has to do is to read the marginal notes against the different sections to ascertain for himself what the meaning and the intention of parliament was when all these sections—and that includes section 18—in part II of the act were enacted.

There is no doubt that section 18, and all the other sections in that part, have to do with obstructions to navigation. That is the intent of the act, and that is why this particular part of the act has been placed under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Transport, because I am charged with the responsibility of seeing to it that navigation or navigable waters are not obstructed.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) raised an excellent point when he queried whether or not this is the act under which the hon. member should seek the redress he wants.

Mr. Coldwell: I think you have the authority to make the redress right under the Fisheries Act.

Mr. Chevrier: I intend to deal with that at a little later stage, if I have an opportunity. But I do want to make it clear, as I have on more than one occasion in this house with reference to other proposed amendments to this section, that part II relates to navigation and shipping, for which responsibility, under section 92(10) of the British North America Act, lies with the federal government alone.

What my hon. friend is seeking to do is to amend an act dealing with navigation—over which we in this parliament have jurisdiction—to remedy a pollution problem, a health matter, which under normal conditions comes under provincial jurisdiction.

The amendment which the hon. member for Prince Albert brings in only accentuates that point, because he clearly sets out that the matter to be remedied is one having to do with health. I have not the amendment before me, but there was mention of chemicals of every kind and deleterious substances which affect health. Normally these are provincial matters.

I have in mind a matter exactly the same as that, which I discussed with the crown attorney of a constituency in the province of Ontario where a deleterious matter was being dumped into a river by an industrial plant and was not only killing the fish but was affecting bathers, who could not even go in the water because their bathing suits would be soiled. After a discussion with him on the suggestion to amend the navigable waters act in an attempt to remedy the situation, he came to the conclusion that the thing to do was to consult the provincial authorities, which he did.

On motion of Mr. Chevrier the debate was adjourned.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): I am sorry to interrupt the minister, but it is six o'clock. At eight o'clock the house will resume the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: The house will now revert to the business that was being considered at five o'clock.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE SALARIES OF SPEAKERS AND DEPUTY SPEAKER, SESSIONAL ALLOWANCES OF MEMBERS, ETC.

Hon. W. E. Harris (for the Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 171, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Salaries of Speakers and Deputy Speaker.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Knowles: There is just one word I should like to say, and I do this at the request of the one member of our group who is not able to be here at the present time because of illness. The hon. member for Kootenay West asked that it be placed on record that had he been able to be here today he would have voted against the second reading of this bill.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Sessional allowance.

Mr. Coldwell: When we were discussing the resolution I suggested that we might move some amendments during the discussion of the bill clause by clause. Therefore I move:

That section 2 of Bill 171 be amended by deleting from line 20 the words "eight thousand" and by substituting therefor the words "six thousand".

I am not going to speak at any length because I did so before. The experience of the last four years has probably shown us that $6,000 would be sufficient to meet the needs of most hon. members. We have as a group discussed this pretty thoroughly, and those of us who believe in the increase in the indemnity, with some exceptions, in the main agree that this is the amount that should be in the bill.

Mr. Drew: I should like to make it quite clear that my remarks about the procedure apply as much to the attempt to fix the amount in this way as to any part of the act. To indicate how wise it would be if this whole subject were approached in a quiet, orderly manner of examination, I cannot help placing before the committee certain comments made yesterday by one hon. member which indicate what heady meat we are dealing with in this case. I find evidence that the hon. member for Nickel Belt was not pleased with the reception he received at the opening at the airport at Sudbury.

He is quoted as saying:

"And I intend to continue being a good citizen, despite the insults and injustices."

"Tomorrow," he shouted, "I will be a $10,000-a-year-man—"

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Gauthier (Nickel Belt): Let him go on.

The Deputy Chairman: If the hon. member is proposing to read a reference to the conduct of a member outside the house I should think he was not in order.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, naturally this subject is one of interest and the impact it has on those who are discussing it is a subject of interest. Without referring to any specific statements that might have been made in the last 24 hours one can well understand that there are those who take very much to heart the impact of this proposal upon their own personal affairs.

I only hope that the reason this provision is being made for the other house has no relationship to the suggestion that it is tactically wise in order to promote the passage of the bill. Certainly as yet I have heard no argument put forward which indicates a single reason why one figure or another would be a satisfactory figure. I pointed out yesterday that when the Prime Minister had suggested that with our respect for the constitution at Westminster we should remember their success with a parliament of two houses, we might also remember that Westminster offers no suggestion to us that the salaries should be the same because at Westminster the upper house receives nothing.

Mr. Abbott: Just a title.

Mr. Drew: The title gets them in there; they do not get the title because they are there. They receive nothing. Members of parliament have had their indemnities increased without any suggestion that there be some provision of this kind so the House of Lords would deal satisfactorily with the measure before them.

While I do not think that there is any evidence before us that the members of the Senate should receive this amount, I say with equal force that there is no evidence before us to show what they should receive. I for one believe that the whole method is wrong, and that we should not be attempting to deal with this without further information than has been placed before us.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. MacInnis: Just a moment, please; you will get your increase in indemnity in due time. There is no reason why we should not proceed properly despite your hurry.

Mr. Abbott: You will get it, Angus.

Mr. MacInnis: If I were in such a hurry I would be wise enough not to let the public see it. The haste of my friends opposite is absolutely indecent. Mr. Chairman, if you are making the ruling that something said by a member outside this house cannot be repeated in the house I should like to know the citation covering that. My experience has been that what members say outside the house is quoted here every day.

I am going to vote for this amendment, although I am opposed to any increase. If we are going through with it I would rather have a smaller increase than is in the bill. For that reason I am going to vote for the amendment.

Yesterday I said that these increases would separate members from their constituents, it would make a difference each would feel. I did not think we would have an example of that so soon. Apparently the hon. member for Nickel Belt thinks the bill will have royal assent by tomorrow, because he is reported as saying that tomorrow he will be a $10,000 a year man and he is not going to be pushed around by any $50 a week penpusher.

There you have it. I do not require to say any more.

Mr. Castleden: Mr. Chairman, I would just like to say a few words on this amendment, to point out something which has not been mentioned in this particular part of the debate, namely that the cause of this demand for an increase stems from the fact that it costs so much for members of this house to live, and that the cost of living applies not only to the members of this house but to people all across Canada.

For years this group in this house has urged that the cost of living be kept down, that the old price controls be kept on in order to prevent this kind of thing, but the cost of living has continued to rise. The official opposition opposed the attempts of this group to maintain price controls in order to keep down the cost of living. You sowed the seeds ten years ago and you are now reaping the harvest. The whole question is related entirely to the cost of living.

What position are we going to be in as members of parliament if the cost of living goes down? The cost of living index today stands at a level of around 184 based on the 1935-39 index of 100. If the cost of living goes down within the next five or ten years —and it probably will—this proposed $10,000 indemnity will buy $17,000 worth of goods. Then when the rest of the people of Canada are down in the depths, with low wages and low salaries, and with hundreds of thousands of unemployed, members of parliament will be in a very preferred position.

This question is related to the cost of living, and the government must face the fact they are responsible for the cost of living in Canada and for the costs which members have to bear in living in Ottawa today.

Mr. Studer: They are responsible for prosperity, too.

Mr. Castleden: There is no reason why members of parliament should be placed in a preferred position in relation to the rest of the people in this country. It is for that reason we are trying to bring to the attention of the government that this bill is not sound, and that in principle it is wrong. We oppose it. We are now trying to amend it to keep our indemnity somewhere within the realm of reason so that our position can bear some comparison to that of the people who have to pay high rent and who have to spend what little money they have, whether from old age pensions or war veterans allowances, in getting the things they need.

While these people are still in that position we maintain it is morally wrong for members of this house to vote themselves this amount of money. We want the amount brought within reason. Some hon. members here said, "Oh, yes; the people of Canada can judge this at the next election, and if they do not like what we have done they can throw us out". It would be what a lot of members deserve. An opportunity existed for the government at the last general election to ask the people of Canada what they thought of an increase, or at least to officially inform them that six months after the calling of the new parliament members' indemnities would be doubled.

Mr. Studer: Did they do that in Saskatchewan?

Mr. Castleden: Will the hon. member repeat his question?

An hon. Member: He is only worth $1,000.

Mr. Studer: Did they do that in Saskatchewan?

Mr. Castleden: I am glad the hon. member brought that matter up. As soon as the C.C.F. government of Saskatchewan came into power the members of the cabinet reduced their salaries by $1,000. The cost of living had then dropped slightly, but ever since it has been up in Saskatchewan as it has been up everywhere else.

An hon. Member: So have the taxes in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Castleden: Of course the cost of living is going to go up. The ten legislatures across Canada will be facing exactly the same problem we face today, and they will want to increase their indemnities. The cost of living has gone up for the legislatures, but it has also gone up for the people. Why did the government not indicate to the people of Canada that they were going to do this, so the people would have an opportunity to indicate what they thought about it?

For these reasons we are opposing this measure. This government are responsible for the high cost of living. They are responsible for the very conditions which have created this demand—and it is a natural demand—and they must bear the blame for it. What of the situation we find ourselves in today with regard to the rank and file of the people who have no opportunity to raise their own salaries? We protest that this is morally wrong, and we are going to continue our protests all the way through.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Coldwell) negatived: Yeas, 15; nays, 96.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, while we are still on clause 2 there is another aspect of the matter which I wish to ask the house to consider. As hon. members are aware, the clause now before us provides for the proposed increase to be made available to senators and to members of the House of Commons. I am aware of the position the Prime Minister has taken with respect to this matter, namely that he feels the Senate is here to stay as part of our constitutional set-up and that so long as this is the case they should be treated on a basis of equality with the members of the House of Commons.

I do not agree with that position. As a matter of fact, I might point out that even in terms of dollars and cents the respective positions have not been equal since 1945. When Mr. King first brought in a resolution regarding expense allowances, if my memory serves me correctly, these allowances were to be provided only for the members of the House of Commons. Later, after newspaper reports to the effect the Senate would not agree to the proposition if it were passed in that form, Mr. King withdrew the resolution and placed another one on the order paper. It provided for the expense allowance to be paid to members of both houses but made a distinction or a difference, namely that in the case of members of the House of Commons, except cabinet ministers and the Leader of the Opposition, that $2,000 would be tax free but in the case of senators it was to be taxable. Hence in terms of actual dollars and cents there is a difference already, and I suggest that fact invalidates the argument that we have to be kept on a basis of equality.

It has also been pointed out that, in so far as the Prime Minister contends that the parliament at Westminster is a model for us to pay some attention to, the members of the House of Lords serve without any indemnity paid directly from the exchequer of that country. Most of us feel that there is a tremendous difference between the amount of work that has to be done by members of the House of Commons and the amount of work that has to be done by members of the other place. I think it is significant that in the editorial columns of the newspapers of this country during the past week or so considerable opposition has been expressed —indeed, from quite unexpected sources— against this increase being given to Their Honours in the other place.

I am sure the Prime Minister was not surprised this afternoon when the house smiled somewhat at his suggestion that we send the bill over to them with the increase for members of both houses written into it, and leave it to them to reduce it if they saw fit. The number of amendments which Their Honours make to important bills is not great; and the likelihood of their proposing such an amendment is, I suggest, somewhat remote. But whether or not that is the case, it seems to me that we in this chamber have a responsibility to decide whether, as a matter of public policy, an increase to a total of $10,000 should be made with regard to the members of the other house at the same time it is being made with respect to members of the House of Commons. Although it may be the Prime Minister's view that this should be done, it seems to me that the House of Commons should have an opportunity to decide whether or not, in our judgment, that is good public policy.

In order to give this committee an opportunity to decide whether or not this increase should be made with respect to members of both houses, I propose to move an amendment to clause 2 of the bill. I direct your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the wording of this amendment because, of necessity, one has to draft it in such a manner as to fit into the clause which is before us. My amendment is:

That section 2 of Bill No. 171 be amended by deleting from line 19 the word "and" and by substituting therefor the words "a sessional allowance at the rate of four thousand dollars per annum and to every member of the".

That is the end of the amendment, but it would be only fair for me to read the subsection as it would appear as amended, so that it will make sense not only to persons who may read Hansard but to members who are listening to me at the present time. The subsection as amended would then read as follows:

For the sessions of each parliament there shall be paid to every member of the Senate a sessional allowance at the rate of four thousand dollars per annum and to every member of the House of Commons a sessional allowance at the rate of eight thousand dollars per annum.

I wish to make it clear, Mr. Chairman, that with respect to the latter figure—I refer to the figure of $8,000 per annum for members of the House of Commons—that is not the figure that I think should be there, but that figure has now been decided by two votes of the members of the House of Commons. So far as the former figure is concerned—and I refer to the figure of $4,000 per annum as a sessional allowance for members of the Senate—again I am not picking that figure out of a hat. That is their allowance at the present time. Therefore the effect of my amendment is to provide that Their Honours in the other place be not given the increase which this bill provides for members of the House of Commons.

The Chairman: I may say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that I am in some doubt whether the amendment is in order. I would refer him to citation 684, third edition of Beauchesne, which reads in part as follows:

The chairman stated that, though the committee had full power to amend, even to the extent of nullifying the provisions of the bill, they could not insert a clause which reversed the principle which the bill, as read a second time, sought to affirm.

In one view of this amendment, it would reverse a principle which was agreed to on second reading. However, I am not going to labour the matter. I express the doubt, but I think I would be inclined to allow the amendment.

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, since you have said that you are not going to make a ruling, there is no necessity to discuss the matter; but as it has been recorded in Hansard I do not think the matter should be left there without comment.

The Prime Minister this afternoon made some point about the figures not being involved in the principle. If that argument was correct, then most certainly the decision on second reading could not have any bearing on any figure that is contained in this measure. My own belief is that the principle was much more than just the decision that there should be an increase, and that it involved the whole method.

I simply want to repeat that what I said before applies to the present suggestion. I do not believe we have the necessary information before us. We have not the information before us on which we would be justified in supporting this payment for the members of the Senate, nor have we any evidence before us to indicate why the members of the Senate should remain in exactly the same position while these increases are being made for the members of the House of Commons. There may be some intermediate figure or there may not be; at least, the matter should be a subject for inquiry.

For that reason, Mr. Chairman, I would oppose this amendment; and the remarks I now make apply to every clause of this bill. What is now being done merely indicates the extent to which we are proceeding without the kind of information that we would or should demand with regard to any measure coming before us when public funds are involved.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is an extremely interesting question, Mr. Chairman. This afternoon the Prime Minister got as far as the opposite pole from the stand taken by his predecessor in office when, over the years, he spoke long, lustily and with tremendous effect to the electors on the question of Senate reform. I can still remember those eloquent speeches of 1925 and 1926—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —and the tremendous reforms that were going to be effected.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member will recall that His Honour has expressed the view that the question of Senate reform is out of order in this debate.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right, Mr. Chairman. I will just say that this is a new form of reformation by an additional allowance, and leave the matter there. I could not help but recall those former days, Mr. Chairman.

The Leader of the Opposition has said that the increase in the indemnities of both houses to the same extent cannot have the support of the reasons advanced by the Prime Minister. The reasons for this precipitate haste in increasing our emoluments, no one has yet put forward. Certainly, Mr. Chairman, I doubt whether any of us would have been returned had we had this measure before us in April last, and voted for it. Courage after an election is scarcely in keeping with the principle of giving leadership to public opinion.

I say no more about the precipitate haste. Some have said the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition that there should be a full investigation received no support. Public opinion does not want this increase, Mr. Chairman. Regarding the public's attitude towards the increase of our indemnity, someone has said that Gallup polls mean nothing. They are quoted at every election.

Mr. Sinclair: Against the Tories.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Sinclair: And rightly.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, quoted against us; and what does the Gallup poll say now? A Gallup poll conducted the other day concerning this increase showed—

Mr. McCann: Where?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, could you call for order?

The Chairman: Order. At the same time I am calling for order I want to remind the hon. member that we are discussing clause 2 of this bill, and not the Gallup poll.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, there is an amendment before the committee, and I am discussing the question of whether or not that amendment should receive the support of this committee. I am advancing arguments in support of the stand I take, and I say that public opinion in this country is usually explained as the reason parliament cannot act. We must first educate public opinion. According to the last Gallup poll, public opinion was 64 per cent against this increase.

Mr. McCann: In Toronto.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Leader of the Opposition said that something should be done by way of investigation, but that suggestion was not accepted. Certainly the reasons why our indemnity should be increased have no application in their entirety to similar increases for members of the Senate. I am going to quote from the Leader-Post, a Liberal paper published in Regina. The editorial is entitled "Enough is Enough". After dealing with the tremendous increases asked for in our indemnities, the editorial goes on to say:

> Even more open to question is the proposal for senators also receiving an increase in their indemnities which, with the $2,000 taxable allowance, will bring their annual pay to $10,000. They do not have to go to the expense of fighting elections. Their less onerous duties keep them sitting only a portion of the time that the House of Commons requires. Generally speaking, a senatorial appointment is a help and not a handicap to senators in carrying on their private affairs.

The arguments that have been advanced with such power and eloquence in support of our increases certainly do not apply to the adoption of a similar rate for the other place. As the Leader of the Opposition has said, much is said of the British system, but members of the House of Lords receive no indemnities. It is for that reason the Regina Leader-Post ended this editorial by saying:

There is, however, merit in the proposal that it be placed before a parliamentary committee for thorough consideration instead of being railroaded through parliament.

This is the comment of a Liberal newspaper which, while disagreeing with the question of a royal commission, supports in general the stand taken by my leader. Give public opinion a chance. A few days ago the pension privileges would not have been dealt with had strong opposition not been taken by us on this side of the house. Public opinion was aroused. A few nights ago the Prime Minister would give almost no consideration to the question. Then public opinion was aroused, and public opinion still rules in this country.

I say to you, sir, that even now the setting up of a committee such as is suggested in that editorial would give an opportunity for the Canadian people to speak. This time parliamentary action is so far ahead of public opinion that it has never been equalled during the period I have been here. In other words in a matter such as this we hasten, but when other questions come before the house the answer is so often that we must wait for public opinion.

Certainly the arguments that were made as to the detrimental effect upon the high standard of the House of Commons if there is no increase in indemnity have no application to the other place. I suggest once more a reconsideration of the proposition advanced by the Leader of the Opposition, which at least would give public opinion an opportunity to be heard. The public would have an opportunity of voicing its disapproval, as the public's disapproval was voiced when it was generally understood that the pension act was not to be amended.

Amendment (Mr. Knowles) negatived: Yeas, 20; nays, 122.

Mr. Hansell: Yesterday when the leader of this group was speaking to this measure he stated that when the proper time came he would propose an amendment, and indicated what kind of amendment this would be. It appears that the time has now arrived, and that the amendment can be moved on this section of the bill. We are sorry the leader of this group is unable to be here this evening, having another rather important speaking engagement.

I confess that I was somewhat disturbed and I am still somewhat disturbed, as I think all must be, when members oppose a measure of this kind, which they may think is unpopular, yet at the same time accept the advantages of the legislation. This leads me to say that I do not know whether it is popular or unpopular. I can only go by the correspondence I have personally received; and I stated when I spoke on the resolution that my correspondence would indicate that there was not too great opposition to it.

If there is any unpopularity in the country in reference to the measure, those who favour it would take the chance of being unpopular; yet those who may oppose it, thinking they will become popular, are in a position where they can take advantage of it at the expense of those who are in favour of it. That disturbs me.

The hon. member for Yorkton in his speech a few moments ago stated that the cost of living had risen in this country and that there were many people, particularly those on pensions and receiving other social service benefits, who found it extremely hard to get through. I know that. We all know that. And as I said before, if it were a choice between our receiving this increase and that part of the population receiving an additional amount, then I think we would all oppose it, and we would let them have it.

But that is not the case. It is not going to make any difference to them whatsoever. The hon. member for Yorkton on that basis said that it was morally wrong to adopt it. Let me say to him that in my opinion it is morally wrong to oppose it, and then accept it. One hon. member this afternoon, referring to the measure brought down some years ago granting a tax-free allowance, said that when asked if he would accept it he said he would, for the simple reason that it became law, and that he had a perfect right to what was law. I am not going to argue that point at all; I think perhaps he is right there. And I would not say anyone would hide behind the law; I do not think they would.

But I believe there is a way of expressing this in law so that members can refuse to take the additional amount, and yet be within the law. If this measure goes through, as in all probability it will, those who oppose it can use the same argument: "Well, it became law, and I am entitled to it". Yes, that is so. But it is a law which those who oppose it will be able to take advantage of. We think those who oppose the measure should be in a position to show by their actions that they conscientiously oppose it, by being within the law in their active opposition.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I move the following amendment:

That clause 2, section 33 (1), be amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

Except that for the sessions of the twenty-second parliament there shall be paid to every member of the Senate and House of Commons a sessional allowance at the rate of four thousand dollars per annum, plus such portion of an additional four thousand dollars per annum as he may elect to apply for in writing to the treasury officer not later than thirty days after this act comes into force.

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the great levity with which this amendment is regarded in the house, and I submit that is the only way in which it could be regarded; because in the six sessions of parliament I have attended I have never heard anything so childish expressed in the form of a motion. Certainly the hon. member cannot be serious in moving such an amendment.

An hon. Member: Don't talk about it; vote against it.

Mr. Zaplitny: I submit the time will come when we will know who are the wrong-way Corrigans. I think they are all on the other side of the house.

In the first place, for those who oppose the increase in the indemnity this motion of course means nothing at all, because if we are voting against an increase, then we have already expressed our opinion as to what the law should be. Therefore this does not enter into the situation at all. For those who are in favour of the increase, however, there might be something in it, because I am sure they are going to think about it and they will change their minds before very long.

However, to speak more seriously on the matter, let me point out, sir, that if there is any logic at all behind this motion, then certainly the same argument and the same logic could be applied to every vote that we take in this house. The hon. member for Macleod prefaced his argument by saying that this measure may be unpopular. He did not know whether it was or not, but he felt that some hon. members may be opposing it because it is unpopular. That same argument could be made on every motion that is put forward in this house, and that is just the grand over-all way of imputing motives to every hon. member who votes on this motion.

In the first place, I do not believe it is the duty of any hon. member, or that it is even the privilege of any hon. member, to doubt the sincerity of any other hon. member in this house; and certainly this motion in the way it is phrased, and the speech that was made in connection with it, were designed to create doubt in the minds of people as to the sincerity of hon. members who have taken a stand on this matter.

My stand, sir, is perfectly clear. I spoke at the resolution stage. My vote is already on the record on second reading of this bill. I am opposed to this measure, and I am opposed to it as a member of this house expressing my best judgment as to what is best for this parliament and for the country as a whole; and I will not have anyone imputing motives on an occasion of this kind, trying to create any doubt in anyone's mind as to the sincerity of hon. members. I have too much respect for hon. members who are on both sides of this question to accept this kind of childish motion.

I will go this far with the hon. member for Macleod. He apparently wants to throw out a challenge. I am willing to take up the glove, and I will give him this deal. If he is willing to accept his increase for which he voted in Social Credit scrip I will be glad to take nothing at all.

Mr. Michener: It seems to me that the last hon. member who spoke misconstrued the amendment. It is an amendment which to my mind makes as much sense as most of the doctrines of the Social Credit party which I have had expounded to me in the past. It seems to me that probably we shall have difficulty in refraining from supporting this amendment. The only thing is that it will produce the odd result of having two scales of pay for hon. members, one for the government and one for the opposition, which might seem a little incongruous in all parts of the country except in those constituencies represented by Social Credit members. Of course it would be an interesting thing if we could carry this a little further, so that when it comes to tax laws only those members who vote for taxes will have to pay them.

Mr. Castleden: Mr. Chairman, since my name has been mentioned by the mover of this amendment, and since it casts some reflection on my honesty and integrity with respect to what I said, I shall be very glad to say to him here and to the rest of the house that I was elected to come to this house on an indemnity of $4,000 a session with $2,000 expenses. I expected nothing else, and if this amendment carries I shall be pleased to put my name to such a document. I throw that in the mover's teeth.

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Chairman, I have hesitated to speak in this debate. I have been in this house a long time. On many occasions I have felt that it was almost impossible for me to remain because of the smallness of the indemnity. I remember that when I entered municipal council I got $60 a year.

Mr. Sinclair: You were overpaid.

Mr. Rowe: Some of my Grit friends thought I was overpaid; but, Mr. Chairman, I am not going to review what has happened over the years of my public service. Something more than indemnity and salary, so-called, is in issue here. I am not going to go back to the logic that prompted the Prime Minister and his government to propose and support this measure. Probably I would be misunderstood. Certainly it would not be appreciated by some of my hungry friends who I see gazing at this increased indemnity. Perhaps they were not worth more than they are now receiving.

Personally I think this law should have been amended long ago. Members of the House of Commons should receive more than they are receiving. I am very sorry for members of all parties in the house, but I am sorrier for the Conservatives than I am for those on the other side. I know what goes through the minds of hon. members. They are away from their families and their small children. They are paying taxes and insurance and all that is involved in raising a family. I have been through all that. No hon. member in the house, except the hon. member for Quebec South and the hon. member for Temiscouata and a couple of others, has been here as long as I have. We realize what the younger members have to go through. I realize now that I am probably in the twilight of my political career.

Mr. Sinclair: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rowe: The hon. member is probably in the morning of his, but the twilight will come. In fact before the hon. member reaches the twilight of his career he will be in a twilight sleep, I expect.

Mr. Knowles: You meant the morning after.

Mr. Rowe: What has been suggested by the hon. member for Macleod? There never has been a time in this house when hon. members should be good sportsmen and accept each other's point of view on this issue which involves themselves more than at this time.

Mr. Harris: That is what we thought.

Mr. Rowe: The hon. members to my left with whose doctrine I have never been in full agreement have now put forward this amendment. I was rather impressed with the leader of the party to our immediate left and his right bower who sits to his left, who are diametrically opposed to each other on this issue. It shows they must be sincere. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, to whom I rarely if ever pay a compliment—and I hesitate to do it now unless it is wrapped up in a brick or something—has evidenced a certain sincerity. He is a man who started from the grass roots of endeavour in this country, and anyone who listened to his speech—and I have listened to him on other occasions—must admit that he has shown integrity of purpose and sincerity in his expression of opinion no matter whether you agree with him or not. I must say that he spoke most sincerely, and he needs the money as badly as any of us.

The hon. member for Macleod, one of those great social reformers down to the far left, suggests tonight that we should have two social classes in this parliament. He would go further than my friends to my immediate left would venture. I do not think they will ever go that far. He would go so far as the whole communist doctrine which would say that we shall serve according to our ability and accept according to our needs. Of all the ridiculous doctrines I have ever heard this is the most ridiculous.

I do not mind telling you that I have heard people on the sideroads say that in some respects the Social Crediters have some of the sound virtues of the Conservative party. When I listened to them tonight I could realize why the Speaker sat them so far to the left. They are even farther to the left than the C.C.F. when they would suggest two social classes in this parliament. Why, these same gentlemen, Mr. Chairman, have pleaded almost with crocodile tears in this house that we must not have a means test for the old age pensions. They said, "Oh, don't make these old age pensioners ever have to take a means test." I am not so sure, speaking personally and independently of my party, that that was too sound. I am not quite that old yet. On numerous occasions I had to pass a means test, when I went to my banker in order to keep my children in university while I was serving in this house. That means test embarrassed me, as between my banker and myself. I always looked over my shoulder to see that some Grit financier was not laughing at me. My hon. friends to my left and the hon. member for Macleod would suggest that we have a means test for members of parliament.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Rowe: He would establish a principle by which some of the rich grain growers of western Canada could say, "I will go to Ottawa and I will not charge the public taxpayer anything. I will go there for nothing because I will meet a lot of friends, and I might get my own out of it some way or another". That is no reflection on any hon. member here from the Prime Minister down, and including his predecessors in this parliament; for during the many years I have been here I have sat in clubs, I have sat in Conservative circles and in other gatherings and have told people that those who believe that men come to this parliament to make money are wrong.

The Liberals have been in power during the greatest time of my regime here, and that is a compliment to them. But it is only human nature. I would not need the fingers of one hand nor even two fingers of one hand, to count the number of men who have come to the Canadian parliament in the last quarter of a century that I personally know have benefited by crooked misrepresentation or taking advantage of contracts. I say that advisedly. I know something of the regime, though I do not know it all; and I know something of how campaign funds come along. They seem to have flowed in a little more rapidly lately. I cannot keep track of them, especially when I think of my younger and more tolerant years. The present government benefited or were able to get campaign funds such as I never dreamed of, maybe because they are able to do it better than I could.

But I do want to say that I believe in the integrity of hon. members. I believe we have as fine a membership as any similar group. To my mind this House of Commons is the highest type of club we have in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. Pouliot: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rowe: The hon. member for Temiscouata has been here for a long time and he says, "Hear, hear". I know he agrees with me.

Mr. Brooks: He is a charter member.

Mr. Rowe: He is an hon. member.

Mr. Pouliot: I agree sometimes with Dufferin-Simcoe but never with Royal.

Mr. Brooks: You are never right.

Mr. Rowe: I am not going to enlarge upon this; I simply say, do not let us for one moment make ourselves ridiculous in the eyes of the Canadian taxpayers. Do not let us make ourselves ridiculous. I want to compliment the Prime Minister. He and I have something in common because we are both in the twilight of our political careers. The only difference is that his is much more distinguished than mine.

Mr. Sinclair: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Rowe: You are young and probably in time you may assume the role you have in view in your own ambitions. The Prime Minister has contributed a great deal to the public service of Canada.

Mr. Sinclair: Another 20 years.

[Mr. Rowe.]

Mr. Rowe: Some of your friends think it may take you 30 years.

The Chairman: I wonder if the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe would co-operate with the Chair by addressing himself more particularly to the amendment before the committee.

An hon. Member: It is a good show.

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Chairman, I have keen respect for your judgment, but I thought that was what I was talking about. However, perhaps with your responsibilities you have not been listening as closely as the Prime Minister.

Mr. Chairman, I am not fooling on this issue. This is an important matter. This is an issue that involves the integrity and purpose of every hon. member in this house. Keep in mind that it is all very well to laugh and to propose some foolish amendment such as has been proposed, but there are those who would venture to oppose a hundred per cent increase in their salaries. Perhaps that may be needed; I know more is needed than is now being received—and I am not so sure that there are not hon. members of the other house who do not run elections.

However, as the hon. member for Dauphin has so well said, I am not so sure that those hon. gentlemen need an increased indemnity. I certainly would hesitate to be a party to paying them an increased indemnity if they did not need it, for the sake of making sure that I got an increased indemnity.

Mr. St. Laurent: That has just been disposed of.

Mr. Rowe: The right hon. Prime Minister says that has just been disposed of, but it is not disposed of in my mind. Perhaps they would support it just the same if you gave them what they earned. The taxpayers of this country have a right to be considered. This matter should be considered by a more or less independent tribunal, by a royal commission or by a committee of this house.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Chairman: Order. That matter has been disposed of. As I said, we have before us an amendment moved by the hon. member for Macleod, and I would ask the hon. member to co-operate with the Chair by addressing his remarks to the amendment.

Mr. Rowe: The amendment proposes that we establish two social classes in this house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Rowe: Oh, yes. I am satisfied that the people of Dufferin-Simcoe whom I represent would be disappointed, embarrassed and insulted if they thought I was not worth as much as the hon. member for Macleod. I am not going to go any further. I will say that if it becomes the law of this country that hon. members of this house are to receive 100 per cent more for their services, despite the fact that I and several others have sat for weeks and weeks and weeks with representatives of labour in this country telling them that they could not have more than a 3½ per cent increase in their wages—

An hon. Member: In one year.

Mr. Rowe: In one year. If this is not in one year, why did you not do it the year before the election? This is an increase for one year. You went into the election and told everybody that everything was O.K. You told the country that you were satisfied. Yet you have raised your indemnities 100 per cent.

Mr. McCann: That was to save you getting trimmed.

Mr. Rowe: I never thought the minister was so much concerned about me any more than I was concerned about him. I am not going to enlarge upon it, except to say that as members of Her Majesty's loyal opposition we have tried to show that this matter should have been given more study. We have not opposed the principle of increased indemnities as such in order to encourage better men than you or I to enter politics and come to this house. We have not opposed that. We have not opposed the general principle; we believe there should have been an increase.

Some of those who heckle the most should understand that as far as the taxpayers of Canada are concerned they do not measure their ability by their anxiety to have a larger indemnity. Some of those who have seldom risen in the house are the most vociferous about getting a larger indemnity. They are probably the members who never made as much money at anything else in their life.

I shall conclude, Mr. Speaker, by saying that our motive should not be ill-considered. Our motives have been sound. We have pressed for a study of this problem. I will say in all fairness that this has been a difficult problem for the Prime Minister. It has been equally difficult for the Leader of the Opposition, and a difficult problem for every member of the house because it involves ourselves. We are now working on our own salaries. In doing so we give the lead to every civil servant in Canada; we give the lead to every employee in Canada; and we are giving the lead to every labour union in Canada. Even though we say that we should have lower costs of production we are increasing our indemnities 100 per cent.

If the majority overrules our efforts to have a more thorough study of this proposal, will the people agree and will the taxpayer agree that we are entitled to at least as much salary as those of you who have been civil servants? Some of you might be overpaid, and probably if the $10,000 indemnity is instituted you may see a great change and a group of better men in this parliament.

I will say in conclusion that I think it is a bold step on the part of the government, but I think it is ill-conceived, hastily planned and unwisely presented to this country. I believe the repercussions to this attempt on our part to increase our indemnities will make a sad story. I might also say to the hon. member for Macleod that with this increase in indemnity we do not wish to start a form of social distinction in this house, and I would say to him again that the people of my riding believe I am worth as much as he is.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, may I first thank the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe for his very kind words in regard to myself. I never thought I would see the day when the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe would express his opinion of me in that way, but he has done so and I thank him most sincerely.

This is a new and strange principle in law, but if the government wishes to accept it then it is all right with me. It is not going to hurt me one little bit. But it is strange that an amendment of this kind should be put forward by the hon. member for Macleod, who made a speech the other day pointing out that members of this house were worthy of this increase. He did not differentiate between one hon. member and another, and he included me in his list. If I were worthy of the increase the day before yesterday I am worthy of the increase today. Let me quote the words of the hon. member from Macleod as to his own attitude with regard to this matter. Speaking on January 26 he said, as reported at page 1464 of Hansard:

During the question period—

This was at one of his meetings.

—someone came up with this question: "Do you expect increases to come forward this session?" I knew what was in that gentleman's mind because I know him and he was no supporter of mine. So I said to him; "I do not know. All I can say is that the newspapers indicate that something of this sort will be brought forward." But I said: "I will tell you what I will do if you want me to comment on whether or not I will accept. I will comment in this fashion. When you people refuse to take an increase in your salaries and wages or when you people refuse to take an increase in the price of your products, then I will refuse to take an increase in mine."

When the hon. member for Macleod refuses to take an increase in his indemnity then I will refuse to take an increase in mine. He should be satisfied with that. Unfortunately, Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to cast reflection or ascribe ulterior motives to those who have opposed it.

Mr. Hansell: Oh, no.

Mr. MacInnis: But the hon. member said so. Let me quote another example of the view of the hon. member for Macleod, and then perhaps we can see whose motives are subject to question. Further down the same page he is reported as follows:

As a matter of fact it sounds big to me—

That is the amount of the increase.

—because I do know that if I were not in public life, if I were following my profession all the year round, I know I would not get anything near what I am getting now, and my expenses would be less. I am one of the fortunate ones in being here, but I have not been able to figure out how a lawyer—and I do not want to be hard on lawyers—can come down here for $6,000 a year.

Which means, in other words, that if the hon. member for Macleod could make more money than he is making here by preaching and attempting to save souls, he would not be here. That is his view on the matter, and the words are from his own mouth.

If I were not a member of this house I believe I could make a better living somewhere else. As a matter of fact I sometimes feel, like Cardinal Wolsey, that if I had served other interests as well as I have served parliament and the people of Canada it would be better for myself. But I am satisfied. I have not a complaint or worry in the world. As a matter of fact I even like the members of parliament.

I am now in my 31st year representing the people of Vancouver. For the first two years of that period I did the job without any pay at all attached to it. I was a member of the school board and I was also earning my living by working as a conductor on the street cars in Vancouver at a wage of something like 32 cents an hour. After school board meetings, which we sometimes carried on until one o'clock in the morning, I had to be up again to take my car out at five. I felt that the work I was doing was worth while. I liked the people I was working with and the cause I was working for.

But I want to tell the hon. member for Macleod that if he or anyone else thinks he is going to scare me with a piffling amendment of this kind, which only a mind such as his could adopt, or attempt to adopt, or the theories of social credit could concoct, then he is wrong. The amendment is just silly. The amendment is in your laps. Do whatever you like with it. It does not scare me one little bit.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe suggested that this whole matter was embarrassing for me and for the Leader of the Opposition. I wish to assert that I feel no embarrassment whatsoever. I shall endeavour not to cause any embarrassment by saying nothing at this time with regard to the amendment now before the committee. I will say, however, that I do not think this amendment should be accepted.

We are all here trying to enact the kind of legislation we believe will be wholesome for the parliamentary institutions of this country. I do not think the amendment would ornament the kind of legislation we want to have for the health of the parliamentary institutions of this country. It is not a matter of what I want or of what any other member of parliament wants. As far as I am concerned, it is a matter of what we think is the right thing for this chamber of elected representatives of the people of Canada. If the measure that we are recommending is unsatisfactory, it should not be passed. If it is passed, it should be passed because we consider it to be satisfactory treatment to accord to anyone who is a member of parliament.

Amendment (Mr. Hansell) negatived: Yeas, 8; nays, 148.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3—Repeal.

Mr. Knowles: Before you proceed with clause 3, or perhaps it might be regarded as on clause 3, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister. You will see in a moment, Mr. Chairman, why I raise the point at this juncture. Clause 3 of the bill provides for the repeal of sections 39 and 40 of the act. The desirability of repealing those sections is obvious in view of the change to an annual basis.

My question at this point is this. In between section 35 of the Senate and House of Commons Act which we have amended by a previous clause of this bill, and section 39 of the Senate and House of Commons Act which it is now proposed should be repealed, there is section 36 of the Senate and House of Commons Act. I made a few remarks on this question last night and I do not intend to develop them at any length at this point. However, I should like to add just one or two facts to what I stated last night. The other day the Prime Minister pointed out that the question of the total payment made to members has been before parliament on a number of occasions. There was the statute in 1867 which set the first figure. It has been changed five times since then. This will be the sixth occasion on which the total amount paid to members of parliament has been changed since it was first established in 1867.

My point is this, Mr. Chairman. On every one of those previous occasions when a change has been made in the total amount of money paid to members of parliament, a corresponding change has been made in the amount that a member might lose per day for absence in excess of whatever period of time was considered to be permissible. For a long time now that allowable period of absence has been 15 days per session, but it has been the law of the land right back to 1867 that absence in excess of what is permitted should result in the loss of some portion of the member's total pay. Originally the deduction was only $5 per day. Since then it has been raised to $8, then to $10, $15, $25 and in 1945 to $37.50.

The question I now put to the Prime Minister is, I think, an obvious one. Why is it that on this occasion, when another change is being made in the amount of the indemnity, that corresponding change which has been made every other time seems to have been omitted?

Mr. St. Laurent: The matter was considered, and we did not come to a conclusion to make any recommendation of an amendment. However, if an amendment is suggested I do not think it should go so far as was suggested by the hon. member when he spoke on a previous occasion. Any change made in the $25 brings about an automatic change in the other deduction that is made from the expense allowance. That is why it is now $37.50 instead of being $25 as expressed in section 36.

Mr. Knowles: The other deduction is 50 per cent of whatever is provided in this section of the act.

Mr. St. Laurent: It is 50 per cent of whatever is deducted under section 36. Serious consideration was given to whether we should recommend that there be any stricter measures in order to ensure perhaps closer attendance in the house. There were many who were of the opinion that this was something that was the concern of the electors of each individual member; that when the member was away attending some function in his constituency while parliament was sitting, his electors knew that he was not present in parliament; and that there were many occasions when they felt that he was performing, as they wished him to perform them, his duties as their representative by attending functions in his constituency. Nevertheless, the principle is that there is a deduction to be made; and in fact over the years there have been many occasions—I think almost every year since I have been here—when in the supplementary estimates there was a special vote to enable payment to be made to members who, for one reason or another, had exceeded the number of absences provided for in the statute.

The conclusion we came to was that we would have to be much more careful now in recommending supplementary estimates to make up for the deductions that would be made for absences from the house. I have no personal views as to whether the figure should remain at $25. If we want to have it just about in the same proportion as it was before, I think something like $40 instead of $25 in section 36 would make it $60 over-all, and that figure would be just about in the same proportion as that in existence since confederation.

I am not going to suggest an amendment. As a matter of fact I may not do so as it is my own bill. It would not be in order for me to submit an amendment to my own bill, even if I felt so inclined. But if any hon. member feels that section 36 should be amended to provide some increase in the penalty by way of deduction for being out of the house more than 15 days during the session, I think this is the time and place when it would be appropriate to submit that kind of amendment.

I shall add also that there is in section 41 of the Senate and House of Commons Act a provision whereby the Senate or the House of Commons may respectively make regulations from time to time, by rule or by order, rendering more stringent upon its own members the provisions of this act that relate to the attendance of members or to deductions to be made from the sessional allowance. The question was raised as to whether or not there should be some daily record of the attendance of members. We felt that was not something that should be dealt with by statute. In the other place, I presume it must be by some rule made under section 41, a record is kept in Votes and Proceedings of the daily attendance of members.

There is a committee of members sitting with His Honour the Speaker at the present time dealing with the rules of the house. It is rather difficult to say that one should determine for the electors of a constituency how they want their representative to represent them. The matter could be dealt with by a rule of the house providing some method whereby a record of attendance would be kept; that is something the house itself should consider. However, if the rate of deduction is to be more than $37.50, there will have to be an amendment to section 36. I believe the figure that would bring the deduction into proportion with the increase in the indemnity might be $40 instead of $25, because that would in reality amount to a deduction of $60.

Mr. Knowles: I wish to thank the Prime Minister for the manner in which he has discussed this matter, Mr. Chairman, and to say at once that I agree with him that making a final decision about what to do in this matter in committee of the whole does present some difficulties. May I say at this time, too, that our thinking is perhaps closer together than he realized. When I was suggesting a certain figure last night, namely $60 or $62.50, I was suggesting that in relation to the present $37.50. In other words I was proposing an over-all figure. I indicated that in my view perhaps the amount might be higher, but I put that forward as being proportionate to the deduction now made.

What the Prime Minister now suggests, namely that the present figure of $25 as a deduction from the indemnity might be raised to $40, has the actual effect of making the loss per day $60 because the other section increases that deduction by 50 per cent with respect to the expense allowance. I did not draft an amendment with respect to this matter. One of my friends in the party to the right tells me he attempted to draft one, but certain difficulties presented themselves to his mind as well. It does seem to me that this bill should not be rushed through, certainly not through its final stage, without some further thought being given to this matter. Since the subject has been raised, it may be that some comments will be made which might give a lead to the government, on the basis of which a section might be put into the bill before it is given third reading.

I agree with the suggestion made by the Prime Minister that the committee on rules might well take certain steps under the provisions of section 41 of the Senate and House of Commons Act to recommend more stringent regulations respecting attendance, and also with respect to keeping a record of attendance. But as the Prime Minister has just said, and I think I am quoting him correctly, if anything were to be done concerning the deductions from our pay in terms of dollars, that would have to be by way of amendment to section 36 of the Senate and House of Commons Act. It has been suggested to me that an amendment of that kind could come later, but our experience around here generally is that once a bill, particularly a bill that is such a problem as this one, has been disposed of, the government does not like to reopen it to make other amendments.

I am sure the Prime Minister will not be asking for third reading of this bill tonight, even if we get through the committee stage. After all, it received second reading today and it cannot have third reading today without unanimous consent. I would hope that he and his colleagues would consider the desirability of proposing another clause for Bill No. 171 which would go in between clause 2 and clause 3, and would have the effect of amending section 36 of the Senate and House of Commons Act. I want to say quite frankly that I believe the figure should be a lot higher than the one I suggested last night. I think it should be higher than the figure proposed by the Prime Minister, but at least I would go as far as he is going and support that figure as better than the one that now exists.

The reason I would suggest the figure being higher is that even if the total loss to a member for days absent in excess of 15 is put at $60, it is still possible for a member to be absent from the house—let us take the extreme case which I trust does not happen—a full session and receive a pretty fair remuneration. The average length of a session is around 115 sitting days. A member could be absent the whole of the 115 days, and since 15 of them are allowable he would suffer a deduction for only 100 days. Assuming he reports all those days as being absent, if the loss is $60 a day, 100 times $60 is $6,000, which would mean he could still draw $4,000 for not having attended a session at all during that year. Now, my case is hypothetical, and it is based on that number of sitting days per year. If the number of sitting days is more or less the result will vary, but I do not think the hypothesis is too far from reality.

I suggest that example merely to point out that we are not being unreasonable in suggesting a loss of $60 per day. This would be the result if the Prime Minister introduced an amendment to section 36 so that the $25 would read $40, for an additional $20 would be deducted under the later section. I am one of those who feel that other changes should be made in respect to attendance, but I am inclined to think the Prime Minister's suggestion is a good one. I believe that sort of thing can be best dealt with in the committee on procedure. Since I am a member of that committee, I shall have the opportunity to state my views there. I do urge the Prime Minister to consider the possibility of introducing a clause amending section 36, along the lines we have discussed just now, before this bill receives third reading.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to say a word or two on this subject. I agree in general with the approach indicated by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The amount of the increase in indemnity is now a fact, so there is no point in discussing that further. It is a substantial sum that members are now to receive, and I urge upon the Prime Minister and the members of the house generally that in so far as we can do it we should ensure that the opportunities for the receipt of that amount of money by a member are made above reproach. In so far as we can do it, and only in so far as we can do it, we should eliminate the possibility that unpleasant incidents will arise where the attention of the public is drawn to the fact that so-and-so has received his remuneration as a member when, in fact, he did not attend in the House of Commons for the length of time for which, in accordance with the spirit of the act, he should have attended if he were to receive that amount of money.

I think there are ways in which that result can be accomplished. I do think we should give consideration to the question of how we can better ensure attendance in Ottawa and at the sittings of the house, in order to qualify members so they may receive indemnities. I do not mean that they have to be sitting in the chamber all day; but they would have to be here in Ottawa, where they are attending their parliamentary duties.

At the same time, while I agree that the matter can be taken care of in section 41, to which the Prime Minister referred, through having that section reviewed by the committee on procedure, I do not think it is inconsistent with what I have said with respect to tightening up the regulations when I make the suggestion that if we are going to tighten them we will have to make sure that they are reasonable, and that they conform to the obligations of a member to go back to his constituency occasionally.

I would suggest that the present allowable absence of 15 days, which is statutory, and therefore cannot be reviewed by the rules committee, should therefore be reviewed here. I believe it should be reviewed because it is a provision which has been in existence for a long time. I do not know how long, but certainly since 1927. I would assume that it was there for some considerable number of years before that.

I think I am correct when I say that the length of sessions has very considerably increased since the 15 days was stipulated. So my approach to the subject is to suggest that possibly the allowable number of days of absence should be increased to perhaps three weeks or 21 days, or whatever length of time might be felt reasonable, and that the requirements for the attendance of members on other days should be tightened up by the rules committee. But inasmuch as the allowable days of absence is statutory I would like the Prime Minister to consult with his colleagues to see whether it is reasonable to suggest that under the circumstances that length of time might be increased, particularly if we are going to take the other step—as I hope we will—of tightening up the regulation regarding attendance in Ottawa.

Mr. St. Laurent: I had heard the suggestion that it would be desirable perhaps to have this period of 15 days extended to 21 days, as the hon. member has suggested, in view of the fact that sessions normally are now longer than was the case when this period of time was fixed.

I hesitate in this connection to bring something in as a recommendation of the government. We members of the government are concerned, as members of the House of Commons, with the attendance of members, so that the business of the house can be regularly, normally and properly conducted. I think we will see if perhaps even a little more flexibility could not be provided for under section 41, so that this would be a matter which would be dealt with in the standing orders of the house, and from time to time could be reviewed by the members of the house.

I do not think it will be possible to have final disposition of the bill tonight, and when passing clause 3 perhaps it might be understood that this will not prevent us coming in with something that would come before clause 3, and we might renumber the sections.

Mr. Knowles: Then the Prime Minister and his colleagues will consider it in the meantime?

Mr. St. Laurent: The Prime Minister and his colleagues, as colleagues in the House of Commons, would consider it, taking into account the views of all members of the House of Commons as such.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 4—Allowance to Leader of Opposition.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: If I may meet part way the wishes of hon. members, who are honouring me by shouting my first name, I would say that I do not propose moving any amendment to clause 4, but I do urge the House of Commons to vote against it.

My main reason for urging opposition to clause 4 has to do with what is provided in that part of it that amends section 43 of the Senate and House of Commons Act. I had thought of confining my opposition to this clause to that part that amends section 43 of the Senate and House of Commons Act; but in view of the remarks that have been made throughout the course of this debate by the Leader of the Opposition I am sure he will agree with me that one should not distinguish, but that one should oppose the whole clause.

After all, I am sure the present Leader of the Opposition does not want his annual allowance raised to $15,000 until the matter has been referred to a royal commission. However, it was not that part of the clause that bothered me most. I am concerned about the increases proposed for the leader of the government and the leader of the opposition in the Senate. Hon. members who have been here for a number of years will recall that back in 1947, when it was first proposed that there be any salaries at all for the two leaders in the other house—that is, salaries in addition to their indemnities as senators—we opposed that action.

I had occasion within the last day or so to look back over the debates of that occasion, debates which waxed rather warm. As a matter of fact the rules of the other house were broken a bit in that when the bill got over there they had something to say about some of the things that had been said in this house. Nevertheless we made it clear at that time, as I make it clear again now, that this is not a matter which relates to the particular persons who happen at any time to be occupying those positions. We in this group feel, however, that, our opposition to the move in 1947 having been overruled, the salaries provided for the two leaders in the other place, in addition to their indemnities, are quite adequate.

The section with regard to the indemnities for senators and members of the House of Commons has now been passed, and that amount will be $10,000 a year. The salary for the leader of the government in the other place, provided he is not in receipt of a salary under the Salaries Act—which happens to be the case at this time—is $7,000 a year at the present time. That is, if we defeat this clause the total emolument for the leader of the government in the Senate, provided that is all he is, would be $10,000 indemnity as a senator, plus $7,000 salary. The leader of the opposition in the Senate at the present time would get $10,000 indemnity and $4,000 salary.

We do not think it is necessary to increase the salary of the leader of the government in the other place from $7,000 to $10,000, making his total emolument $20,000; neither do we think it is necessary to increase the salary of the leader of the opposition in the other place from $4,000 to $6,000, thus making his total emolument $16,000. I repeat that this has no relationship to the present or any future incumbents of those positions. It has no relation to their political connections. It has no relation to the number of followers they may have. It is just as a matter of principle; and in the light of the amount of work that has to be done, bearing in mind also that persons who occupy those positions receive something more than money—they have the dignity and the honour that goes with them—I think the emoluments they will receive under the $10,000 indemnity, plus the salaries they are now receiving, are adequate. A great many people in this country will feel that they are too much.

In any case, the holders of these positions are getting an increase of $4,000 a year by virtue of the increased indemnity. I feel, particularly because of what is involved in the change in section 43 of the Senate and House of Commons Act by virtue of clause 4 of this bill, that this house should now turn down clause 4.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, since the position of Leader of the Opposition in this house has been mentioned in connection with this, I wish to make it quite clear that the observations I have made in regard to every other section apply to this section. I do not believe there is anything before us to indicate how these figures are arrived at. We are not dealing with the particular amount payable to any individual. The amounts are payable to those who occupy positions in parliament and should be regarded in that light. I oppose this section as I have opposed the other sections of this bill.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Knowles: No.

Clause agreed to: Yeas, 93; nays, 32.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, I think it would be the wish of most hon. members, if not all, to dispose of the committee stage, if possible, tonight. In view of the discussion that has just occurred between the Prime Minister and hon. members opposite who spoke of certain suggested amendments, I have at the request of the Prime Minister a suggestion to make. It is in the form of a suggestion, sir, and reads:

That clauses 3 and 4 of the bill be renumbered 4 and 5 respectively; that there be inserted then as clause 3 the following:

Section 36 is amended by substituting the word "forty" for the word "twenty-five" as it appears in the first line thereof and that the word "twenty-one" be substituted for the word "fifteen" as it appears in the other parts of the section.

—and that these amendments be properly drafted by the law clerk of the house. I should add and by way of explanation, Mr. Chairman, that it is not the intention of the government to call the bill for third reading until hon. members have had an opportunity to see the printed bill in its new form.

The Chairman: Hon. members have heard the amendment suggested by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Is it agreed to?

Amendment agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRECEDENCE OF GOVERNMENT BUSINESS ON WEDNESDAYS

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, for the Prime Minister I move:

That on Wednesday, February 3, 1954, and every Wednesday thereafter to the end of the session, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence over all business except the introduction of bills, questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

I should say by way of explanation that this has completed private members' days, so that—

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Before the minister proceeds to discuss the substance of the motion I raise the point as to whether or not it is proper for this motion to be made at this time. I would call Your Honour's attention to citations 132 and 135 in Beauchesne's third edition. Citation 132 is as follows:

The proceedings of the house must be taken up in accordance with the order of business given in the order paper.

And citation 135 states:

The rule which requires a strict adherence to the order paper is absolutely necessary to prevent surprise.

The motion the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) is seeking to move on behalf of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is found at page 17 of the order paper for today under the heading of government notices of motions, which is a category away at the back of today's order paper.

Today's order of business has already been provided by the rules of the house, and I submit it is not proper to bring this motion forward, ahead of its proper position, and try to move it under the order for motions. I recognize that this has been done on some previous occasions, but it must also be recognized that on some of those occasions I have objected to that course being followed.

Another reference to which I would draw Your Honour's attention is standing order 17 at page 61 of Beauchesne's third edition which reads:

17 (1) All items standing on the orders of the day (except government orders) shall be taken up according to the precedence assigned to each on the order paper.

(2) Whenever government business has precedence, government orders may be called in such sequence as the government may think fit.

It is quite clear, Mr. Speaker, that part (1) of standing order 17 gives the government leeway as to the order in which it calls its orders when the category of government orders is properly before the house. This is reinforced by part (2) of that same standing order which makes it clear that the government has that right to choose the order of its own business, but only when government business has precedence.

If notice of this motion had been given a day or two earlier so that it could have been proposed yesterday, that would have been quite proper, and the house would have considered the matter on its merits. In view of the fact that notice was not given until Monday, it comes on today's order paper in the class which I have indicated, and since this is the first time that this issue has arisen in this parliament it should be settled in the proper manner at this time.

Apart altogether from references to citations and precedents that all of us can give —and some hon. members think I am adept at doing that—it seems to me that plain common sense makes it clear that it is unfair, the order of business for the day having been set out in the order paper, for it to be possible on that day for the government to change the day's order paper by trying to bring forward a motion of this kind. Despite the fact that on some occasions this has been done, and in my view done improperly, I submit it should not be done at this time.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, it had been my intention to raise this point but I had assumed that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration recognized the difficulty and was about to explain how he proposed to bring this motion forward. I believe that a very important consideration is raised and that the motion cannot be heard, except by unanimous consent, at this stage of the proceedings. The list of orders is clearly set out in the order paper for today as follows:

Questions; Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers; Notices of Motions; Public Bills and Orders; Government Notices of Motions; Government Orders.

This does not come under "notices of motions". This comes under the clear definition of "government notices of motions", which is the last but one on the order paper today. Questions are set forth; motions for the production of papers are set forth; and then on page 10 we have "notices of motions", which are obviously referred to in the next item in the order of precedence. Then we have "government notices of motions", then following that "public bills and orders", and after that "government notices of motions"—that is, the heading under which this motion is now presented.

The time or the day on which this notice of motion was entered has nothing to do with the question now before us. It appears in its proper place as a government notice of motion not because of the time it was entered with the Clerk but because this is private members' day. It will be seen that in the order of precedence the questions are questions of private members; the notices of motions for the production of papers are notices of private members; the notices of motions are notices by private members; public bills and orders are public bills and orders presented by private members. Only after all the business of the private members has been dealt with do we come to government notices of motions, and under the heading "government notices of motions" on page 17 of the order paper we find one motion, and that is the one now before us.

I submit that the rules are clear, Mr. Speaker, and the practice is clear on the basis of the status of private members' business in this house and without unanimous consent this motion cannot be called for consideration until the orders appearing before it on the order paper for today have been called and dealt with.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If hon. members feel that it is necessary to carry on the debate on the point of order I will let them proceed, but I can assure hon. members that I have enough material to give a ruling.

If those hon. members who have participated in the debate have been consistent in opposing a motion of this kind being made in the manner that is being done today, I perhaps might be consistent with my predecessor's ruling on the same point. No one will deny that the government has a right to move a motion affecting the business of the house. What they are required to do is to put a notice in Votes and Proceedings in compliance with standing order 45, which reads:

45. Forty-eight hours' notice shall be given of a motion for leave to present a bill, resolution or address, for the appointment of any committee, or for placing a question on the order paper; . . .

I checked with the Clerk and I have Votes and Proceedings of Monday last before me, and I see that on Monday, February 1, 1954, there stands a notice under "notices of motions and questions", as follows:

The Prime Minister—On Wednesday next—That on Wednesday, February 3, 1954, and every Wednesday thereafter to the end of the session, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence over all business except the introduction of bills, questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

Now, so far I think that no rules have been violated.

Mr. Fulton: Would you permit, sir—

Mr. Speaker: If I may conclude, then I will hear the hon. member. Hon. members seem to question the propriety of the motion being made under "motions". The very citation that the hon. member read, citation 132, is the one that Mr. Speaker Macdonald had to deal with, when on Monday, September 4, 1950, a similar motion was moved by the Prime Minister. I am reading now from the Journals of that day.

A point of order was raised by Mr. Drew, that, as this motion appeared under "government notices of motions" on page 9 of the "order paper", it should not properly come forward for consideration at this time.

He developed this same argument today. Here is the ruling of Mr. Speaker Macdonald:

I may say to the Leader of the Opposition that last year I considered this same question, and it then seemed to me, as he says, that such a motion should be considered at a later time. But under citation 132 in Beauchesne's second edition I notice the following:

"The motions allowed on routine proceedings are motions relating to the business of the house and for the discussion of reports from committees".

This motion definitely relates to the business of the house and should therefore be considered at this time. I think the misunderstanding arises from the fact that such motions generally appear under "government notices of motions". Actually, however, they are not "government notices of motions" in the usual sense.

In view of the citation which I have mentioned in Beauchesne's second edition and of the practice which has been established, I think the motion should be considered now.

Later in 1951 a similar situation arose and Mr. Speaker Macdonald ruled—and I am quoting from page 290 of the Journals of Monday, December 10, 1951—

Mr. Speaker ruled that, as the proposed motion dealt with the business of the house and was not a "government notice of motion" in the usual sense, it was in order at this time and that he had previously so ruled on Monday, September 4, 1950, when a similar point of order had been raised.

This I would say is a proper view of the situation. I do not think there could be any argument that would make me change my decision to accept the previous rulings of Mr. Speaker Macdonald on the point which I think are very sound.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, a member rising after such a clear indication of Your Honour's present opinion must appear to have a certain amount of temerity; nevertheless, since you have issued a cordial invitation, may I take a moment or two to express a different view.

I start, sir, with this premise, which I would ask you to consider carefully. I think it was yesterday, or it may have been the day before, that you indicated to the house you would be prepared under certain circumstances to undertake a review of a ruling made by a previous Speaker in connection with the rights of members or leaders of parties to ask questions or to make statements after statements made by ministers.

I draw attention to that fact only to ask you, if when you are prepared to review a ruling of a former Speaker on one matter, whether you should consider also the possibility of reviewing, and if necessary revising, a ruling by a former Speaker on another matter. I say that because I admit at the outset that the ruling of Mr. Speaker Macdonald, if accepted, would be a clear precedent against the point of view I now put forward.

I admit that in fact we are asking you to review that ruling, but I submit that there are good grounds upon which that request can be made. I shall not rehearse the grounds covered by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) or by my leader, but I would ask you to consider whether the substance of the matter is not this: While routine motions may be taken up at this stage, what we have here is not a routine motion. We are now in that part of the daily proceedings, under routine proceedings, which embraces the presenting of reports by standing and select committees, and motions. Clearly a minister or a chairman of a committee can make at this time a motion which would be a routine motion. For instance, there could be a motion for the concurrence in the report of a committee presented to the house, or there could be statements on public matters.

Liberty is taken there, it is true; but by and large they are made under the heading of motions, because if the minister had wished he could make a formal or routine motion and then make his statement under that heading. I do not see how it is possible for anyone to argue that this is a routine motion. This is a motion which would upset the routine. It is a motion which seeks to change the order of proceedings.

I think I know what is in Your Honour's mind. This is a motion dealing with the routine of the house, dealing with the business of the house. I think it is straining the meaning of language to say that it is a routine motion in the sense that the word "routine" is used under routine proceedings. It is a most exceptional motion. It is made once a session at a time when the government considers it to be appropriate. It is not part of the routine business of the house or of the business of government.

It is on that part that I rest my case and ask you to reconsider Mr. Speaker Macdonald's ruling. This is a government notice of motion, it is true, but it is not a routine motion. As a government notice of motion, it can, I submit, under the rules which regulate the conduct of business on Wednesday, be moved only after routine proceedings including routine motions have been disposed of and when the order of precedence covering government notices of motions has been reached. I submit that the argument is sufficiently clear and sufficiently important to ask you to review the previous ruling which you have cited to us.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, may I make just one suggestion. You are asked to reconsider a former Speaker's ruling. I think that is a good suggestion. May I say that in order that you may have time to reconsider the ruling, in the light of all the circumstances, the minister should ask the house this afternoon to give unanimous consent. I think I can say that as far as we are concerned we are prepared to do that. That would give you the opportunity of taking some time to review the question.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I might put the minds of hon. members at rest by saying that I gave some time to the matter before coming into the house. I considered the ruling of Mr. Speaker Macdonald and also the methods which have been followed in the past with respect to motions presented under routine motions. Motions affecting the business of the house are moved under "motions", which in turn is under routine proceedings.

I have come to the conclusion that the ruling by Mr. Speaker Macdonald was a sound one. That is why I was prepared to give it so quickly and why I had before me the authorities which I cited, namely, the two former rulings of Mr. Speaker Macdonald. Hon. members can rest assured that had I not given it my full consideration I would have been very pleased to delay consideration of it and perhaps give a ruling at a later stage. Every day before the house meets I try to do my homework.

The hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) and other hon. members must realize that I do not feel bound by the rulings of my predecessors. I do not feel absolutely bound to accept all the rulings which have been made by my predecessors. If I find that in my opinion a ruling is not a sound one I shall be glad to consult with my experienced colleagues in the house and change the ruling if in my opinion it is not a sound one for the conduct of the affairs of the house.

I am sorry to say to those who do not accept my view that I have considered the matter and I think the ruling is sound. Rulings of a Speaker are not supposed to be debatable. I allowed the hon. member for Kamloops to speak because I invited him to do so, and I also allowed the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar to speak. I thank them for their observations but I think we should now consider the matter settled.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, before we proceed—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: —from this point—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: —may I suggest to the minister that before he proceeds with his motion there is one consideration that might be borne in mind and that is that the views to be expressed may take so long this afternoon that the object he seeks to attain might not be fulfilled.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I should read the motion. It is moved by Mr. Harris, seconded by Mr. McCann:

> That on Wednesday, February 3, 1954, and every Wednesday thereafter to the end of the session, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence over all business except the introduction of bills, questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

Mr. Drew: It may be too late now, but I made a suggestion in good faith which I think would have saved the time of the house. It had been my intention to appeal and I ask, with all deference, that you allow an appeal to be made, because of the strong views held that this practice is not consistent with what would be in the best interests of this house. I would hope that the fact that I had made a suggestion to the minister, whereupon your remarks came in, will not deny us the right to appeal which we certainly intended to do if the minister proposed to proceed with this motion.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might say a word—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Knowles: —on the request made by the Leader of the Opposition. In my view his request that there be an appeal comes too late although Your Honour's generosity may prompt you to consider it. I suggest to the house that if there are some of us who feel strongly about the motion itself we could have a vote on that motion rather than a vote on an appeal from your ruling. I disagree with Your Honour's ruling, but in view of the fair and generous way in which you have handled this whole matter I hope there will not be an appeal.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member concludes his remarks by saying "I hope there will not be an appeal". On the other hand, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) asks that there should be an appeal from my ruling.

It seems clear to me that it may not be so much the ruling that would be appealed on this occasion, but rather that the ruling would be taken as a pretext to have a vote on the merits of the resolution itself. I want to say that—

Mr. Drew: No.

Mr. Speaker: —although I could perhaps revert to the former position and say I will allow the appeal, because of certain views being expressed to the effect that there should not be an appeal, I do not think I should allow it. It is not that I am against my rulings being appealed, although there is, as hon. members know, a distinction to be made when it comes to an appeal.

The standing order which deals with an appeal against the Speaker's ruling is two-fold. It states that when the Speaker decides on a point of order his ruling is subject to appeal, but not when he decides on a point of practice. It is my view that we are dealing much more with the practice of the house at the moment than with a point of order.

For example, hon. members will recall that when the Speaker decides that in his opinion a motion for adjournment under standing order 31 should not be allowed, his ruling is not subject to appeal. This was the view of Speakers Rhodes, Fauteux and Macdonald. They decided that when it was a question of practice and not one of order they would refuse the appeal.

I would imagine hon. members would be satisfied at this moment, now that the motion is being put, to discuss the merits of the question. That is where we now stand and I do not think I should revert to the former position.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, permit me, if I may, to place on record the fact that, with deference, I do not agree. I had asked for an appeal from your ruling and it relates not to the time but to the fact—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has asked too late and at this moment his remarks must be relevant to the motion which is now before the house.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, in speaking to the motion I quite realize that hon. members, particularly hon. members opposite, may feel that it is preventing them from bringing before the house during the session the motions which are on the order paper in their names; but that does not mean that they cannot discuss the particular subject on which they have given notice to the house, because I fancy there is hardly one subject that cannot be raised on the estimates at one time or another. For that reason there is not, in my opinion, a tremendous cause for concern that their opportunities are being curtailed. As a matter of fact, sir, I have been looking at the records since 1949 and I find that in that year there were 6 private members' days; in 1950 there were 9; in the special session of 1950-51 there were none; in 1951 there were 7; in the second session of that year there were none; in 1952 there were 8; in the past session there were 6; and we have had 7 so far in this session. Therefore, I feel we are not in any way departing from what has been the practice in the past.

May I add by way of information that, as hon. members know, there are about 18 bills and motions of one kind or another on the government side of the order paper. There are in various stages of preparation about 30 additional bills which will be brought before the house, and the house is quite aware of the fact that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) will be introducing amendments to the Bank Act for special consideration by the banking and commerce committee. There will be other bills of a similar nature that will go to that committee and we have a good deal of business before us now. It does seem to the government that if there is any purpose at all in meeting here in November it is that we should complete the session some time before July 1, or at some such date, as has been usual in the past.

For this reason, and bearing in mind the business which will still have to be dealt with by parliament, we are suggestiing this would be the best course to follow under the circumstances.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we now have before us the motion which, of course, we can discuss and on which we can explain the reasons why we approve or do not approve. I do not intend to refer to any of the comments that have been made in regard to the precedure itself. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that much more is involved in this motion than is ordinarily the case.

We have been discussing in this house for some days the importance of making it possible for private members to give full and unrestrained service, and the argument which has been presented in support of the substantial increases, not only for the hon. members of this house but for others as well, is that there should be no restriction on the opportunities open to hon. members to serve in this house their constituents and the people of Canada.

There are on the order paper a number of very important motions, motions which represent the one right, the one opportunity, which many private members will have at any time to place before this house subjects they believe should be given consideration. Unless we are to receive the cynical reply that arguments do not mean anything anyway, and that there is no use placing motions or private bills before this house—which I hope will never be said—then in that case it must be assumed that the government as well as hon. members on the other side are prepared to give consideration to motions or bills placed by private members on the order paper.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that when so many arguments are being made in regard to the important services rendered by private members, which call for such an increase in the allowances, this is the very time when these private members who have supported these increases should stand up in this house and vote against the motion which denies private members their rights.

The issue in this motion is not an issue merely of the surrender of private members' rights this afternoon. It means the end of any regular debating day on private members' motions and bills, which it has been accorded to have been the practice for some considerable time.

The minister who has spoken in respect of this motion has said that in the last session there were 6 private members' days, and that this year there have already been 7. Mr. Speaker, the fact that the government used the axe so early last year is no argument in favour of hon. members permitting that axe to be used now when these hon. members have emphasized their own importance as private members in this house in the way they did by the vote yesterday.

I repeat that the members who should vote against the axe on private members' rights are those who by their vote have sought to place such high importance on the position of private members in this house. This is a chance for private members who believe in the rights of private members to assert their position and to say that whatever may have been the practice in the past, that will not be the practice now, when members are being provided with allowances which more adequately, at any rate, will compensate them for the time they spend here. If it should take a few days longer—and there can be no suggestion that it would be more than a few days longer, because this is only a part day—still that would be simply a slight justification for the speed with which so many members were prepared to deal with this subject already under discussion without the kind of inquiry some of us thought should be made.

Mr. Speaker, I rose to make a suggestion to the minister, and your ruling has in no way precluded my right to repeat that suggestion.

[Mr. Drew.]

There are various proposals the minister can make if, for any reason, he attaches special importance to this debate proceeding this afternoon. He can do that without passing this resolution which does away with private members' rights on Wednesday for the rest of the session. I do not want to pick out particular motions or bills without admitting immediately that all motions and bills put forward by private members deserve equal consideration. However, I will say that amongst the private members' motions which have been on the order paper for some time, and in regard to which there has been no opportunity for a debate, is that by the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy) which appears as item No. 6 under notices of motions. That motion dealing with the extremely important subject of research and the encouragement of research has received editorial support from one side of the country to the other and from speakers not of any one political party but from those associated with business and other activities of various kinds; there has been active and vigorous support for this motion.

I submit that this is the kind of motion that private members should be permitted to bring before the house, and that it is the kind of motion the government should welcome so that they could hear arguments by men and women who have been studying a subject of this kind and as a result, out of the suggestions made, possibly formulate plans which might not otherwise have been considered.

I hope the government will not suggest to us that private members can make no useful suggestions which they themselves have not already thought of. If they were to take that position it would surely be strangely inconsistent with the arguments which have been made in support of other measures still before this house for consideration. No; the government must, in view of the argument they have been making, support the argument that they believe that private members have an important place here and that private members have much to contribute. They have been urging that private members have plenty of time to devote to the study of problems and, presumably, to the making of suggestions here in this house which will help the government. These motions, the private bills or the public bills are not put forward merely for the personal satisfaction of any individual member. They are put forward here as part of the legitimate and proper business of this house.

No matter what number of days have been permitted in the past before the axe fell, with the arguments now being made as to the importance of private members, this is the time to change the trend and to get back to a position where private members in this house are afforded the opportunity to assist the government by placing before parliament suggestions which are in keeping with the status of members as emphasized by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in his remarks in this house on at least two occasions.

When the minister says that any subject matter that is on the order paper can be dealt with on a motion by way of amendment when there is a motion that Your Honour leave the chair when we are going into committee of supply, may I point out to the minister and to hon. members just what that argument implies. That argument implies that these notices of motions, public bills and orders do not really mean much anyway. It implies that this is just so much eyewash and that if anybody has anything to present to this house he might just as well wait until we are going into supply when an amendment can be presented.

Mr. Speaker, that does not meet the situation. Hon. members of this house know perfectly well that while a number of motions may be made by way of amendment as we go into supply, it is not possible to present the number of motions that would correspond to the number of notices of motions, public bills and orders that are put on the order paper of this house. If the argument of the minister means anything at all, it means that private members' proceedings are really very unimportant anyway; that, once we have gone through the motions, we had better dispose of them as soon as possible and let the government, in its might, majesty and power, proceed to steam-roller the business of the house; and that we should then just seek the crumbs that are offered by way of amendments at some later time.

Mr. Speaker, I am using words that I hope will leave no doubt about my belief that what is now being done is utterly inconsistent with every argument made in this house in support of measures that have been presented to this house, one of which was voted on yesterday. I think it would be highly desirable that the minister should not proceed with this motion. There are before us notices of motions on important subjects. There are before us notices of motions that will call for useful debate. There are public bills and orders to be dealt with. Those can be dealt with if we proceed. But, Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance that many of the hon. members attach to this issue, it might well be that we could not proceed with anything this afternoon if it were sought to press this argument that we should not have an opportunity of this kind.

I hope that no suggestion will be made that the private members have not recognized the importance of these notices of motions, public bills and orders because there have been occasions when, in the last hour of the afternoon, that whole hour has not been taken up by discussion either of notices of motions or of public bills and orders. Members of the government know perfectly well that the reason there have been occasions when the whole hour was not taken up is that there have been understandings between ministers and certain private members in whose names these motions or bills stand.

Mr. Harris: You are only referring to bills, not notices of motion.

Mr. Drew: So far as bills or notices of motions that have come up earlier in the session are concerned, there have been certain occasions when the whole hour at the end of the afternoon was not taken because there was an understanding with some members of the government that for reasons of public policy it was not desirable at that point to proceed with either the notice of motion or the bill. I do not need to identify the motions or bills because the government is well aware of those to which I refer.

I do believe that this is a subject with which we can deal in a manner that will be satisfactory to everyone. The bill that will be discussed, if this motion passes, is one presented by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). I can well understand why members of the government would wish the Prime Minister to be here while that measure is under discussion. There is a way that can be done, namely, to treat the motion before us simply as a motion to deal with government business this afternoon and not deal with any other Wednesday hereafter. I have not been able to consult the other hon. members of my own party but I personally believe that there would be every willingness and desire to deal with this matter by way of a special procedure this afternoon, when the Prime Minister will still be here, as long as the motion is not one which ends private members' days on Wednesdays. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe):

That the motion be amended by striking out the words "and every Wednesday thereafter to the end of the session."

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief in what I have to say. Although I am sorry the motion has been brought forward at this time, I do not think I would have anything to say if it were not for the arguments used by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) in support of the motion.

There is another reason I rise at this time; that is to protest the seeming impatience of private members on the government side of the house to finish the business of the house and get away from here as quickly as possible. Apparently what we did yesterday, and what I have no doubt we will finish in a few moments, has not made any difference in the world to them. All the time they spend here is spent against their will. They are impatient and everything that members on this side try to say is met with boos and jeers in an attempt to shut us off. It is time that private members on the other side of the house were set aright by someone in authority in the government.

The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration said that there was hardly an item in the name of a private member under notices of motions that could not be discussed on other occasions. If that is a valid argument, then surely it is a valid argument against having any private members' days at all. Why have any private members' days if we can discuss these matters on other occasions? There are other occasions on which we can discuss such items. One such occasion is on a motion to go into supply, but opportunities on such occasions are weighted very much in favour of the official opposition. Perhaps there should be some weight in that regard so far as the discussion of grievances and introduction of amendments on a motion to go into supply is concerned.

Take the notices of motions on the order paper today, which we would be debating if this motion were not before us. The first three items are in the names of members of the Social Credit group. I am sure that it is unlikely they would get very many chances during the session to discuss these matters on a motion to go into supply, but a notice of motion gives them an equal chance with the other parties.

The minister also said that we were going to try to finish our business so that we could get away from here some time before the first of July, or early in July. That was the old story before we were made $10,000-a-year men, before we were put on a monthly salary basis. From July to October is a period of four months, which is a pretty long vacation. That is one of the fringe benefits that members of parliament receive, but it is out of line altogether with any of the fringe benefits that trade unions get.

I believe we are setting a bad example when we ask for such a fringe benefit for ourselves. There are a great many other fringe benefits which we get, but I will not touch on them today because this is not the time to do so. I regret that I did not refer to them before. As a matter of fact some members have the fringe benefit of non-attendance and still get their indemnity, or whatever you want to call it.

For these reasons I do not think the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has offered any valid argument for dispensing with private members' day. I realize it is desirable that the house should proceed with the business on the order paper in the Prime Minister's name, and if a request for that by unanimous consent had been made I certainly would have agreed. But that has not been done. The motion was moved, and in my opinion the minister has not supported it by any valid argument.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I do not minimize the importance of private members' days, but I must say that I was extremely disappointed the other day because I was prepared to speak on two questions that I thought were coming up. You, Mr. Speaker, called the whole list but not a private member rose to speak. As a result we reverted to government business. I know that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) has given a partial answer for this, but I do not see how cabinet ministers can get in touch with every private member who has a resolution on the order paper. As I say, I was disappointed because I thought that private members who had such resolutions on the order paper were making light of private members' day.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I do not blame you for seeing the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) because we always know that he is to be regarded as a one-minute man. But may I say that, according to the ethics of our procedure in the house, we of this group usually follow our friends of the C.C.F.

We are opposed to this motion, Mr. Speaker. I agree with what the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis) has said in respect of members now being on a little different basis. I do not know whether government business that is on the order paper is particularly urgent. Some of it may be. Some of it they may want to have passed at this session, so that we can wind up at the end of May or June. But much government business is not particularly urgent for a month or two months, or even a year. And I do not see that private members should be crowded out.

Then, there is another principle that has disturbed me for many years. Are we to regard private members' resolutions and bills, and the sort of thing that we consider on private members' days, as merely formalities, merely an opportunity for us to expound as we wish on some resolution? Is that all it is? If that is all, then we might as well dispense altogether with private members' days.

The government may say, "Well, we have certain business that must be done. It is important to us." But what is introduced by private members is just as important to them as government business is to the government.

I do not believe private members' days should be withdrawn at all. However, we like to be accommodating, and if the government wishes to consult with these members in whose names notices of motions stand—and I am referring to Mr. Low, Mr. Quelch, Mr. Hahn, Mr. MacInnis, Mr. Anderson, and so on—and suggest to them that perhaps they might very well withdraw their resolutions, we would like to be as accommodating as we can. If the motion before us is one of accommodation, we are not going to stand in the way of it. But on a matter of principle, we do not believe private members' days should be withdrawn.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to speak just for a moment to the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: In order to follow the order of rotation, I believe the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) should now be permitted to speak. I will then recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we are in danger of drifting into a very unfortunate position. As I understand it the situation is this. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) has fully recognized the desire of the government to deal with certain business this afternoon. None of us wishes to inconvenience the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) or the government unnecessarily, and to that end the Leader of the Opposition made a proposal a short time ago which, to me at any rate, seemed constructive and co-operative. I was glad that he made it.

But it seems to me there must be two sides in co-operation, and it does appear that what is happening now is simply a case of "heads I win, tails you lose". We have made a proposal. If it is an impossible one, then surely the reasons for its being impossible might have been outlined. I did not hear them outlined; I understood they were just tacitly refused.

As I say, we wish to help. On the other hand, when I read these notices of motions—and I shall not detain the house to read them in detail, although I have looked through them—it does seem to me that many of them are matters of importance, not only to those who put them forward but to all kinds of people in Canada. And unless some sign of co-operation is shown, it seems to me we are now left—and I am putting it mildly—with precious little opportunity for these to be presented.

The leader of the house has suggested that they might be presented in bits and pieces, here and there, on other occasions, but not on the occasions which we are now asked to give up. I feel very strongly that this is an occasion where sensible men ought to be able to find a reasonable method of co-operation, and I do feel that my leader has made a suggestion which seemed to me to be a reasonable one, but which has not met with response.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to say a word on the amendment of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and in doing so to make a suggestion to the government which I hope will receive favourable consideration.

At the moment we have before us, in the motion and the amendment, two extremes that are quite wide apart. The motion would call for the abolition of all private members' Wednesdays, starting today, and the amendment suggested the possibility that no other private members' days be taken away, with the exception of today.

The suggestion I offer for the consideration of the government, by way of a compromise and as an alternative to the one proposed by the Leader of the Opposition, is that today be made a government day, but that private members be given, let us say, the next two Wednesdays. Maybe the government will beat me down to one, but even that would be a compromise. Someone has suggested that I have to ask for two in order to get one.

It seems to me something like that should be considered by the government. I listened with interest to the statistics adduced by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris). I too was doing my homework before I came in here today, and I knew that those were precisely the statistics he would bring in. But what does it prove? He states that in certain sessions we had only a certain number of private members' days. In the years when I first came here there were sessions when we did not have any private members' days at all.

But surely the situation has changed. It might be well for us to look back into the early days of our parliamentary history—away back into the last century, when private members' days continued much longer in the sessions than has been the case in the twentieth century, so far as this parliament is concerned.

I respect the Prime Minister's desire to have today as a government day. He no doubt knows I will vote against the measures that will probably be brought on if this becomes a government day. That being the case it is not my desire to facilitate the bringing on of those measures. On the other hand I respect his desire to have those measures dealt with while he is still here. They stand in his name, and there is a certain amount of responsibility that goes with them. It appears to me that he does not want to go off on his world tour leaving to someone else the responsibility of piloting his legislation through the House of Commons, particularly because of the nature of it.

Therefore because I respect the Prime Minister's sense of responsibility in connection with these bills, even though I am opposed to them, I for one am prepared to accommodate the government so that this would be a government day. However, I do ask that the government consider letting us have another couple of Wednesdays as private members' days.

At the moment I am not saying how I will vote on the amendment offered by the Leader of the Opposition, because I hope that my conciliatory proposal might lead to a suggestion from the government side which would be generally acceptable to the house.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is the minister going to close the debate?

Mr. Harris: No, I am speaking on the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: A suggestion has been made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and I imagine the house would be interested to find out whether or not the government is accepting the proposal.

Mr. Harris: In any event I would not be closing the debate. Before I say anything about the proposal made by both the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, may I just briefly comment on some parts of the speech of the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: The Leader of the Opposition would be right in raising his point of order because the minister cannot speak twice on this motion.

Mr. Knowles: There is an amendment before the house.

Mr. Speaker: Yes; I am sorry. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has just brought to my attention the fact that the minister would be now speaking to the amendment and therefore has the right to speak. I am sorry; I wish to apologize.

Mr. Harris: In any event, my comments are not going to be controversial, I hope. But the Leader of the Opposition did, I think, unwittingly, I am sure, leave the impression that the government had in some way taken advantage at this time of those hon. members who had made other arrangements on bills by allowing them to stand in the past. In other words, because of the action of hon. members in making accommodations—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to interrupt, but if the minister will recall, I made it quite clear that I was not suggesting the government took an advantage but I was anticipating the argument which was actually presented that hon. members have not taken advantage of some time which was available in those hours at the end of the day. I was merely pointing out that the reason it had not been occupied was that different arrangements had been made. I was not suggesting that any advantage had been taken. I happen to know what the arrangements were and I think they were entirely right. One of them was with the Minister of Labour. The subjects were very important and there were very important reasons why the debate should not proceed on the subject matter about which there was an agreement.

Mr. Harris: That is precisely what I was going on to say, Mr. Speaker. The Leader of the Opposition apparently is not aware of the fact that notices of motions do not get called between five and six o'clock on either Tuesday or Friday, and that the arrangements that he is speaking about were arrangements for bills which are not being affected by this motion in any form. It is only the notices of motions which are not going to be called as a result of this, and the orders—

Mr. Fulton: Bills could come on quite readily on Wednesday.

Mr. Harris: Quite so. That is another matter.

Mr. Drew: They could and probably would come on today.

Mr. Harris: However, that is a matter of detail. I want to be sure that the house does not get the impression that we have in any way violated any of the understandings that have been made in the past, or by the presentation of this motion.

In view of the suggestions that have been made, Mr. Speaker, the government is prepared to withdraw the motion at this time and present it again to take effect two weeks from today. In other words, this would continue as a private members' day; next Wednesday would also be a private members' day; but sometime in the interval we would present the motion again so that two weeks from today would become a government day, should the motion carry.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreeable?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: In these circumstances, does the Leader of the Opposition withdraw his amendment?

Mr. Drew: In these circumstances I readily withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to withdraw?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the motion carry?

Mr. Drew: No.

Mr. Speaker: The minister wishes to withdraw the motion as well?

Mr. Harris: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to withdraw the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

CRIMINAL CODE

JOINT COMMITTEE—APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS TO ACT ON BEHALF OF COMMONS

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa) moved:

*That the following members be appointed to act on the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons as provided in the motion of the Minister of Justice, passed by this house on January 12, 1954, having to do with a revision of the Criminal Code: Messrs. Boisvert, Brown (Essex West), Brown (Brantford), Cameron (High Park), Decore, Dupuis, Fairey, Fulton, Garson, Lusby, Mitchell (London), Montgomery, Murphy (Westmorland), Shaw, Thatcher, Valois and Winch; and

That a message be sent to the Senate to inform Their Honours that the foregoing members have been appointed to act on behalf of the Commons on the said joint committee of both houses.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

COLLAPSE OF NAVAL BUILDING AT HALIFAX

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): Since this is the period in our proceedings when ministers are in the habit of making statements, may I ask whether the Associate Minister of National Defence can give the house any information concerning the cause of and losses connected with the collapse of the new naval building at Halifax?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Hon. members will realize that today we will not reach that period where they may ask oral questions of the ministers. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich has indicated that perhaps under motions where ministers make statements he might get an answer to his question. I think it would be establishing a very bad precedent. I do not think the hon. member wishes me to allow his question to stand.

QUESTIONS

GRAIN DELIVERIES

Mr. Argue:

1. What was the total quantity of deliverable wheat, oats and barley under the three-bushel quota, for the crop year 1953-54?

2. How much grain was delivered under the quota as at December 31, 1953?

3. How much wheat, oats and barley were delivered against quotas as at December 31, in the crop years 1951-1952, 1952-1953, 1953-1954?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur):

1. Approximately 246 million bushels.

2. Owing to concurrent quotas and special authorizations for the delivery of malting barley and limited quantities of oats, it is impossible to state specifically the quantities of grain delivered under the three-bushel quota. Likewise, producers for reasons of their own may not have taken full advantage of the quota. Deliveries of wheat, oats and barley under all quotas and special authorizations to December 31, 1953 were approximately 291 million bushels. This compares with total deliveries of approximately 340 million bushels of all grains between August 1, 1953 and December 1, 1953, including Durum wheat, rye and flax, and including those grains delivered under the open quotas which prevailed from August 1 to August 15, 1953. This total would include approximately 165 million bushels of wheat (except Durum) delivered under the three-bushel quota from

*See also page 2074.

August 17 to December 12, 1953 at which time the initial three-bushel quota was increased to 5 bushels per specified acre.

3. Open quotas prevailed at various times for different grades and grains and at a number of different marketing points prior to December 31, 1951. Total deliveries of all grains under both restricted and open quotas amounted to approximately 340 million bushels from August 1 to December 31, 1951.

Approximately 364 million bushels as at December 31, 1952. Total deliveries of all grains under both restricted and open quotas amounted to approximately 395 million bushels from August 1 to December 31, 1952.

Approximately 291 million bushels as at December 31, 1953. Total deliveries of all grains under both restricted and open quotas amounted to approximately 340 million bushels from August 1 to December 31, 1953.

GOVERNMENT COMMUNICATIONS, B.C.—PHYSICAL ASSETS

Mr. Fulton:

1. Was a survey made of the physical assets of the government telegraph and telephone system in British Columbia and the Yukon to determine its value in connection with the sale now proposed?
2. If so, when and by whom?
3. What values were arrived at as a result of such survey and on what accounting principle is the valuation based?

Mr. Chevrier:

1. Yes, exclusive of the Yukon where government telegraph and telephone service operations ceased in 1952.

2. (a) 1952. (b) Department of Transport, Canadian National Telegraphs, British Columbia Telephone Company.

3. (a) Department of Transport, $4,436,556; Canadian National Telegraphs, $3,776,346; British Columbia Telephone Company, $2,357,298. The telephone company's valuation covers a portion of the system only. (b) The valuation was based on the appraised replacement cost of the system depreciated as of June, 1952.

R.C.M.P., REGINA—BUTTER AND MARGARINE

Mr. Diefenbaker:

How many pounds of (a) butter; (b) margarine, have been purchased for use in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police barracks in Regina, month by month since the 1st of January, 1953?

Mr. Garson: I should like to answer this question orally. The provisioning of messes in Regina and the selection of individual items of food is a joint responsibility of the mess committees, elected by dining members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and a dietitian. Food purchases are paid for from mess funds. Based on the average cost of meals, a rate is struck from time to time and the mess funds are reimbursed from public funds. In turn, members taking meals in messes are charged a standard rate which applies generally throughout the country, and the amounts involved are stopped from pay and deposited as a refund to consolidated revenue.

Under these circumstances, I wonder whether my hon. friend wishes to press his question about the statistics that he requires?

Mr. Diefenbaker: In view of the fact that the purchases are paid for with government funds furnished by the people of Canada, this information should be available. Certainly we should know whether or not margarine is being purchased for use there when we have so much dairy butter on hand.

Mr. Speaker: The question is answered?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Does the question stand or is it to be considered as answered?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Hodgson:

What number of persons were being paid unemployment insurance, on (a) December 31, 1952; (b) December 31, 1953?

Mr. Gregg: The number of persons who were paid unemployment insurance benefits during the last week of December, 1952—164,000 and during the same period for December, 1953—218,000.

FUR IMPORTS FROM RUSSIA

Mr. Diefenbaker:

What is the value of fur imports from U.S.S.R., in each of the years 1953 and 1954 to date?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Imports from U.S.S.R. of raw furs during the ten months' period ended October 31, 1953 (latest figures available) were as follows:

Persian lamb, undressed	$319,521
Mink, undressed	14,221
Squirrel, undressed	71,291
Fur skins, undressed, n.o.p.	342,066
Total	747,099

2. At how many marketing points was the three-bushel quota not fully delivered as at December 31, 1953, and as at the latest date available?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur):

1. According to the records of the Canadian wheat board and as accurately as can be determined, space was provided for full delivery of the three-bushel quota at 2,002 marketing points as at December 31, 1953 and 2,058 marketing points as at January 23, 1954.

2. According to the records of the Canadian wheat board and as accurately as can be determined, space was still required to be provided for full delivery of the three-bushel quota at 68 marketing points as at December 31, 1953 and at 12 marketing points as at January 23, 1954.

3. How many miles are paved?

4. What is the total mileage under construction by the provinces?

5. What is the total cost to date to the dominion government?

Mr. Bourget:

GRAIN

ADVANCES ON GRAIN IN APPROVED FARM STORAGE

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration the advisability of enacting legislation at this session of parliament to provide for a system of approved farm storage under which the wheat board may make advances to farmers on grain held on the farm.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I with the consent of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the house have a moment to offer a suggestion. I found some difficulty in understanding why the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) did not accept the amendment which would have permitted us to proceed today with government business with the Prime Minister here and particularly the bill standing in his name.

It is possible that the minister may have felt that if that motion were passed with the amendment it would in some way interfere with the subsequent introduction of the motion in the same form. If that were the thought may I say most emphatically that I for one, and I believe I am expressing the general feeling, am willing to afford every courtesy to the Prime Minister to have the business standing in his name proceeded with. I would certainly urge unanimous consent to let us proceed, if that is the reason the minister did not feel like going ahead with the amendment. We could then proceed to deal with that bill.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I am certainly very obliged for the courtesies that are always extended to me by members of the house, but the bill that had been announced to be taken up today if this became a government day is just an ordinary bill and should not get any special treatment in this house over any other item of public business. For that reason I do not wish to have any exception made for that particular piece of legislation because it happens to stand in my name. I do not want the impression to be held by anyone that this bill was considered to be of more importance than any other item of public business on the order paper.

It is for that reason that I felt that the fact that the view had been expressed that there had not been a reasonable amount of time devoted to private members' notices of motions, or as has been suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that there should be two more Wednesdays devoted to that business, the business on the order paper as government orders should proceed in the normal course without any special place being assigned to any item that stood in my name.

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Speaker, in moving this motion I am not advocating that farmers should be paid storage for grain stored on the farm; I am merely suggesting that loans should be made to farmers against grain that is stored on the farm. I mention that fact because there seems to be some misunderstanding in the minds of hon. members regarding what is meant by the terms of the resolution.

It is interesting to note that the subject matter of this motion has been supported by a number of western farm organizations. In order that there may be no misunderstanding on that point I should like to quote from a memorandum submitted by the interprovincial farm union council to the government in November, 1953, as follows:

We would therefore recommend that immediate consideration be given for arranging, through the Canadian wheat board, for cash advances on farm-stored grain.

The recommendation then goes into further details with regard to interest. I might point out that the interprovincial farm union council represents farm unions in British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. Then there is also a recommendation made by the Saskatchewan wheat pool delegates in annual meeting. I quote one recommendation as follows:

To bring into effect a plan of interim farm financing which will enable farmers unable to deliver grain at country elevators to secure cash advances against grain in store on the farm.

I find it necessary to quote from those statements by those farm organizations because I know there is an impression in the minds of some hon. members that farm organizations in western Canada are not favouring the subject matter of this resolution. No doubt that arose in part from a certain letter written to hon. members by Mr. Marler. However, I think Mr. Marler made it quite clear at the annual convention of the association in Alberta that he is not opposed to farm loans being made if the situation should arise where they were necessary. I should like to quote from an address he made to the convention as appearing in the Alberta Wheat Pool Budget of December, 1953, as follows:

> At the present time the federation is not asking the government to back loans on this grain but if the wheat board payments presently being distributed, deliveries which farmers are unable to make and normal credit facilities do not meet the needs of the farmers, the federation is prepared to pursue the matter.

That shows quite clearly that he has quite an open mind on the matter. If the occasion should arise when they consider that farmers do need this assistance, they would be prepared to support it.

I am going to confine my remarks on this matter to four points. First, are the grain growers of western Canada in need of this assistance? Second, is the wheat board the best agency to handle it? Third, is the present situation merely a temporary one, something that may clear up in the near future? Fourth, the need for a long-term farm production program which, if adopted, would require action of this kind.

Coming back to the first point, whether or not the farmers are in need of the type of assistance proposed by this motion, I am not suggesting for one minute that there is a crisis. I admit quite frankly that in my opinion the majority of farmers in western Canada are not in need of assistance. I am speaking mainly about Alberta; I am not in a position to speak about Saskatchewan.

The reason they are not in need of assistance is that there have been three large crops. As a result of having harvested the first two crops they have been able to build up a reserve and are able to use that reserve at the present time to meet the cost of their farm operations. But while I say that, I would also stress the fact that there are at least two groups of farmers who are not in that fortunate position and who represent a considerable number of farmers.

In the first group are those farmers who have suffered one or two crop failures in the past three years. As most hon. members from the west know, there have been some areas which have been heavily hailed during the past three years. The farmer who suffered a crop failure in 1951-52 or in 1952-53 has had to use any reserve he had in order to meet his obligation. Hence he has not those reserves available to help meet the cost of operating his farm at the present time. For that reason he is in need of more money, money that would be available if he were able to sell his whole crop.

In the second group I would place what might be called the new farmers, those who have been in operation only since the end of the second world war. Among those I would place returned soldier veterans who have settled under the Veterans Land Act. I think most hon. members are aware that the veteran who settled under that act was able to get only $6,000. He might have had $1,000 or $2,000 of his own, so at the best he would not have more than $8,000.

I think we all agree that to start farming today is quite an expensive operation. A good half-section of land will cost in the neighbourhood of $12,000, or a three-quarter section not quite so good will cost around the same amount. In order to equip that land with a modest line of machinery you would need in the neighbourhood of $8,000. So to start operations on a farm today requires a $20,000 investment.

Under the Veterans Land Act people can get only $6,000. Therefore a man is placed in the position that he has to go into debt to various institutions in order to acquire the machinery he needs for the farm and in order to increase his land holdings. Consequently, when farmers do have a good crop they have to use the return on that crop in order to repay some of their obligations, or for the purpose of investing in the farm. Men in that position are hit very hard when they suffer a crop failure or when we have a situation such as exists today, where they are not able to sell the whole of their crop.

In addition to the farmers I have mentioned we have the small businessmen who, in many of the smaller towns, act as the farmer's banker. They help to finance his farm operations; they allow him to build up a store bill; they allow him machinery repairs on time, and they allow him to charge his fuel. Consequently, when farmers are unable to sell their crops these men in many cases have to carry these debts on their books for a considerable period of time, and in some cases it puts them in a very difficult position.

On the other hand, I am not suggesting for one moment that the farmers who do not need this assistance would apply for it. The only farmers in need of assistance would be the type I have referred to.

On the second point, as to whether or not the wheat board is the best agency to handle advances of the type I have mentioned, it is interesting to note that the interprovincial farmers' union has suggested that the wheat board would be the logical organization to handle them. There are a number of reasons why I feel the wheat board would be the best agency to handle a policy of that kind. In the first place it will be remembered that the wheat board has agents at all delivery points. At many of these delivery points there are no banks. In many cases you will find delivery points 40 and 50 miles from the nearest bank. Therefore the local elevator agent has a far better understanding and knowledge of a farmer's circumstances, the amount of crop he may have harvested, or the amount of crop he will have on his farm, than would a banker who might be 40 or 50 miles away.

Another point it is well to remember is that prior to the time we had the wheat board, it was a common practice in western Canada for the local elevator agents to make advances or loans to the farmer against grain which he had in storage in the elevator. Let us go further and suggest that these advances and loans could and should be made against grain held in storage not in the elevator but on the farm, provided it is a suitable type of storage.

I am not suggesting that loans should be made against grain piled in heaps in the fields. That might mean a substantial loss, although I understand no such loss has been suffered in the past. The reason I use the term "approved farm storage" is that if a motion of this kind were adopted then it would be the wheat board which would lay down specifically the type of granaries in which grain could be housed and on which loans could be made. It would only mean specifying the type of building which would be required to protect the grain from the elements, from livestock, and to a certain extent from theft.

The next point I would like to refer to is the fact that all commercial wheat has to be marketed under permit. Therefore the wheat board agent would be in a position to make deductions against deliveries of grain as they came in for the purpose of repayment of loans. For that reason I would point out that there would be very little danger of the wheat board suffering any loss under a proposal of this kind. There is no comparison between this proposal and the policy we had in operation a year or so ago, when loans were made against wheat standing in the fields. There was a great deal of risk in that. No one knew whether a crop standing in the fields and which had to go through the winter would ever be harvested, and many people I believe were surprised that losses were not greater. In so far as this motion is concerned I would say there is practically no danger of any loss being suffered providing the local agent exercises his right to demand that early deliveries of wheat be used for repaying loans.

In the motion I have not suggested what the amount of the loan should be. I believe that should be left to the discretion of the wheat board. I notice that in a brief submitted by the interprovincial farmers' union they suggest $1 a bushel, on 15 bushels to the acre. That in my opinion would not be altogether satisfactory because in some districts the total yield might be only 15 bushels an acre or less, and I feel that as a safeguard it would be better to say, using the figure of $1, $1 a bushel up to a certain percentage of the total yield. That would allow for any error in estimating what the total crop had yielded. Therefore instead of saying 15 bushels per acre I think it would be far better to say a certain percentage of the yield per acre.

It is interesting to note that in the United States a policy along these lines has been in operation for a number of years. I believe in the United States it is called sealed storage, but at any rate under this policy advances or loans are made against grain held on the farm in sealed storage. That matter has been brought to my attention on many occasions by farmers in western Canada, who wanted to know why if this was considered sound in the United States where the policy had been followed without causing any heavy loss, a similar policy could not be carried on in this country. I told them that personally I thought it could be carried out here, but it was a question of government policy.

On the third point I would like to pose the question whether the present situation is merely temporary, one that will disappear as soon as we have one or two crop failures. My answer to that question would be that the present situation definitely cannot be considered a temporary one, but rather a recurring one. Perhaps if we had a crop failure next year or the year after these surpluses would disappear, but it is almost just as certain that we are going to have big crops in the future; and while this congestion of today may disappear in two years it is quite possible it may recur four or five years from now.

I can recall many occasions during the past 30 years when we have had congestion at local elevators, and many occasions when farmers have not been able to sell their wheat. This is what happened when local elevator agents received two or three cars at the shipping point. The elevators would open one bin, but of course they could not mix the wheat in that bin. The elevator companies might decide to only take No. 3, with the result that those farmers who had No. 1 and No. 2 wheat and who desired to sell that wheat would have to take No. 3 grade, or not be able to sell it at all. That is what happened in western Canada every time there was congestion under a system of this kind.

Under this proposal, instead of a farmer having to sell No. 1 or No. 2 for a lower grade he would be able to get advances against his grain, and hold it until there was room in the elevator for his type of grain. That would unquestionably be of great assistance to the farmer.

Another reason I believe the present situation cannot be regarded merely as temporary is, as the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) pointed out some time ago, that owing to the great improvement in our farming operations a dry year will not reduce farm yield to as great an extent as in the past. If we go back 20 or 30 years, when most of us were farming with horses, we find that most of our summerfallowing was done with a plow. In those years it would be the end of July before we got through with summerfallowing. By that time there would be a heavy growth of weeds. A lot of the moisture would have been lost. When those weeds were turned over in the loose open furrow the land dried out. Unless we had an excessive amount of moisture the following year we were almost certain to have a crop failure. As a matter of fact, in circumstances of that kind a farmer would be lucky to get his seed back.

That is not the situation today. With the mechanization of farming and the utilization of large surface cultivators, the one-way disc, the rod weeder and other machines, it has been possible for a majority of farmers to get over their summerfallow early in June, thereby preventing the growth of weeds and also conserving the moisture. I therefore do not think there is as great a danger of the kind of crop failures we have had in the past. There will, of course, be short crops, but they will not be nearly as prevalent in the future as they have been in the past. There has also been a greater utilization of fertilizer.

On the other point, the need for a long-term production program, the reason I am dealing with this matter is that I feel that if a program of this sort is adopted the need for the motion I have moved will become immediately evident. We all know that successful farming today requires that a farmer produce the largest yield he can of the highest possible quality of grain. For a number of years, as a matter of fact, ever since 1945, the United Nations Organization has been urging that all those nations that are able to expand their production of food should do so. I think all members of this house will agree that the farmers have answered that challenge in a magnificent way until today, as a result of good farming operations, they have built up quite a substantial reserve of food in the form of wheat and many other commodities.

While the United Nations Organization has been urging an expansion of the production of food, unfortunately they have not, at the same time, provided the machinery for getting that surplus food to the nations that need it. Hence today we have people in many places, some holding quite responsible positions, bewailing the fact that we have built up a large surplus of wheat and suggesting that it should be sold at fire-sale prices.

Let me quote just one man as an example. I may say many times I have heard statements similar to this. In the Ottawa Journal, under dateline of November 18, appears a statement by Mr. H. A. Stevenson, the president of Barclays bank, speaking at the annual meeting in Montreal. The article reads in part:

> He urged every possible effort be made to dispose of Canada's balance of 800 million bushels of wheat available for export, "even if it means, as it probably will, a big sacrifice in the price".

As I say, that statement could be duplicated many times. I would say that these people cannot have it both ways. They cannot, on the one hand, urge the farmers to maintain their production of food at a high level to feed the starving masses of mankind, and then almost in the same breath suggest that, when they have accomplished that purpose, they should be prepared to make heavy sacrifices as a result of it. It seems to me that argument is entirely illogical.

I therefore feel that it is high time the government announced what is their policy in this regard. Is it the desire of the government that the farmers should produce to meet that great potential market represented by the starving people in many parts of the world, or is it the desire of the government that the farmers should limit their production to meet the restricted market, namely that market represented by those nations that are able to pay for their imports in dollars?

I think that is an important point, and one that should be made clear to the farmers before their seeding operations start. If the first is to be the objective, then I think the farmers have a right to expect a guaranteed price. In other words they have a right to expect that the government will not allow that increased production to force the price down. On the other hand, if the farmers are to be advised to produce to satisfy the restricted market, then the farmers in this country would be fully justified in reducing their production in the same way as in the United States. During the last year the farmers there were given the option of maintaining their production at the high present level and having a drop in the support price down to, I think, 50 or 60 per cent of parity, or of restricting their acreage by 25 per cent and receiving 90 per cent of parity. I think everyone will agree that the farmers did the sensible thing. They agreed to reduce their production in order to get a satisfactory price.

I would say that if in this country the government is going to say to the farmers, "you have to produce for the restricted market, otherwise your price will be made subject to the law of supply and demand", then the only sensible thing for the farmers would be to do as was done by the farmers in the United States and reduce their production. But let me point out that we in this group are not suggesting that this is a policy that should be followed. We argue that just so long as hunger exists in any part of the world we have an obligation, along with all other nations which have the ability to maintain production at a high level, to do so in order to help feed those starving people. Otherwise the result well may be revolution.

On the other hand, until the United Nations Organization has provided the international machinery by which the surplus food can be gotten to the people who need it, it looks as though the responsibility will have to rest upon each individual government. I notice that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), speaking before the FAO conference at Rome, said that in so far as Canada was concerned the government intended to carry the surplus partly in the interest of the farmers and partly in the interest of the people of all nations. That being the case, I do not think we are justified in trying to put too much of the burden upon the farmers because they have done the very thing they were asked to do.

I believe that there are ways in which we can help that situation. I do not want to get into that point too deeply because perhaps I would be getting out of order. However, I would remind the house that some years ago the Canadian Federation of Agriculture made a recommendation which was endorsed by the international federation of agricultural producers, and that based upon that recommendation, the FAO council produced a plan which was known as an international commodity clearinghouse. Unfortunately that plan was turned down.

It is interesting to note that one of the main provisions of the international commodity clearinghouse was that the currency of the importing nation would be accepted in payment for the exports of food. That is what we have been advocating in this house on various occasions, namely that we should be prepared to accept sterling in payment of our wheat sold abroad. I am satisfied that procedure would make it possible to export more of our grain to Europe and other parts of the world.

I want to stress the fact that when we advocated the acceptance of sterling, we were not advocating the acceptance of convertible sterling. If you are going to insist that it must be convertible you might just about as well insist on payment in dollars, because the intention would no doubt be to immediately convert the sterling into dollars. What we suggested was the acceptance of non-convertible sterling to be used either for the purchase of goods in those countries concerned or for investment in those countries. If that action were taken it would hasten the day of convertibility, because by investing the sterling in a country you would make it possible for the country concerned to balance its payments with other nations.

I am not going to get into that point because I realize that perhaps it might be considered outside the bounds of this motion. Nevertheless I mention it for this reason. If in the future we intend to adopt a policy of maintaining our production at a high level to help satisfy the needs of people in other countries, then the logical thing to do would be to try to build up a reserve to be held in this country in order to offset the danger of a crop failure.

If it is to be the policy to build up a substantial reserve so that in the event of a crop failure we will have food to ship to other nations, then it is only fair to say that the cost of maintaining that reserve should not be placed entirely upon the farmers. If any of that reserve has to be held on the farms because there is not room in the elevators, then at least a system such as that proposed in the resolution could well be adopted, whereby advances could be made against such grain provided it was properly stored. If we are not going to take action of that kind it seems to me that farmers may be forced to curtail production against their will.

That has been pointed out by all the farm organizations. It has been emphasized at some length by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, and if we do adopt a policy of reducing production then I say we are making a mockery of the principles to which we agreed at the United Nations.

We blame Russia to a large extent for our failure to achieve peace, but I do not think we can blame Russia for our failure to provide machinery by which surplus goods can be supplied to people who need them. Therefore the policy of this group is that we should maintain our production at a high level, that we should provide the machinery by which our surplus production can be made available to the people who need it, and that to the extent that any of these surpluses have to be stored on the farms advances should be made against food so stored so the farmers will not be financially embarrassed.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, speaking very briefly, I should like to support this resolution. I am not going to take very much time in doing so because the major portion of my remarks in the speech from the throne debate consisted of arguments in favour of some form of assistance to farmers who are in need of cash and who are, have been and for some time to come are likely to be unable to deliver the major portion of their crop. The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) spoke of the percentage of farmers who are in need of some assistance of the type envisaged in the resolution, and he referred to certain classes.

When this matter was the subject of debate previously the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and others expressed the opinion that the great majority of the farmers of western Canada had enjoyed quite a profitable number of years during and since the war and were not in need of any great assistance. As the hon. member for Acadia pointed out, that is true in a large proportion of cases; nevertheless a considerable percentage of the farmers of western Canada have had difficulty in their farming operations in recent years. They have had bad luck in the way of hail, drought or other misfortunes. I do not know what the percentage may be of farmers in western Canada who are not in a position to continue to finance themselves, pay their store bills, feed and clothe their families and finance their next year's farming operations without some form of loans or cash advances, but I would think it would run upwards of 25 per cent. It may be more than that, but I think that might be a fair estimate of the number of farmers who need assistance of this kind.

As was pointed out on numerous occasions before Christmas, the situation is quite bad. The amount of grain that may be delivered was initially three bushels to the acre and is now five bushels, and the minimum was of course 500 bushels for a small farm, now increased, I believe, to 1,000 bushels. Such an amount of grain does not by any means provide sufficient money for the farmer to finance himself, carry on his normal operations and put in his next year's crop. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) said not long ago that he could not indicate how soon an increase in the quota will be put into effect, but I do not think it is going to be very soon. The indications are that no increase will take place for some time, and that by the time the next crop begins to come on there will still be a great deal of grain from last year's crop remaining on the farms.

Without any question there are over 300 million bushels of wheat and hundreds of millions of bushels of oats and barley from last year's crop still in the farmers' hands which they have been unable to deliver to the elevators. With the best possible luck in selling these grains either locally in Canada for feed purposes or abroad for human consumption or for animal feeding, we are not going to be able to sell that amount of grain as far as we can foresee. In other words, when the harvesting of the crop commences next fall there is still going to be a considerable amount of last year's crop in the hands of the farmers. Therefore it looks very much as though it will not be possible to have any delivery quota in many places so far as this year's crop is concerned.

Under these circumstances I think it is absolutely essential that some measure such as is envisaged in the resolution be put into effect so that cash can be provided to farmers who need it in order to meet their current living expenses and carry on their operations.

In addition to a method of this sort, I suggested another method in the speech from the throne debate, which I am not going to revive. Guaranteed loans on the part of the government were suggested as another method. I do not need to point out to the house that the resolution does not involve the house voting government funds for the relief of western farmers or anything along that line. The resolution reads:

> . . . the government should take into consideration the advisability of enacting legislation at this session of parliament to provide for a system of approved farm storage under which the wheat board may make advances to farmers on grain held on the farms.

In other words the money out of which loans or advances would be made would be the farmers' own money. I get quite tired of hearing certain members who come from other parts of Canada say, either in the house or in the corridors, "You are asking for another handout to the western farmers". Every time any legislation of this type is sought that cry goes up. I should like to make it quite clear that the resolution involves no demand for any handout from anybody to the western farmers. It is a matter of legislation to enable the wheat board, which is handling the farmers' own money, to use that money in a certain way to relieve distress which I think it is quite apparent is going to exist next fall in the case of a considerable number of western farmers, which exists to some extent at the present time and will certainly be very much aggravated a few months from now.

Mr. Tucker: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I wish to add my voice to those who have spoken in support of this measure.

Mr. Tucker: I suggest that the hon. member let the Speaker say who has the floor. He is taking it for granted that he has it.

Mr. Argue: I stood up, I did not see the hon. member, and I began to speak.

Mr. Tucker: I am not so small that I cannot be seen.

Mr. Argue: I was not looking at the hon. member. I am sure I might have seen him.

Mr. Harkness: You are not fading physically.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Rosthern.

Mr. W. A. Tucker (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I thought there would be no harm in my getting the floor once because we have had to listen to members opposite hour after hour repeating the same thing over and over again. I felt that for once there would be nothing out of place in somebody being heard from this side of the house. I thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Harkness.]

I do not desire to delay the house very long on this matter. I wish to support what the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) has just pointed out, that in this resolution the government is asked to take action which may cost the farmers a lot of money. It is not going to cost the taxpayers much money. It is going to cost the farmers money because if handled by the wheat board the cost will be taken out of the money for which their wheat is sold.

Two years ago I was inclined to agree with the arguments of the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), that this method of giving farmers advances on wheat stored on their farms, through the wheat board, was perhaps a very easy way of handling the problem then existing. But it has been pointed out to me since that time by many people that there are large numbers of farmers who have grave doubts whether the wheat board, which is a grain marketing organization, should be asked to handle a system under which farmers who did not want to borrow money would have to pay the losses in respect of those who did borrow, where there were losses. They think the wheat board should be kept as a grain marketing organization and not turned into one to finance farmers in western Canada.

People who took that view took the attitude that the legislation passed by the government in 1951 to guarantee loans through the banks was actually more favourable to the farmers because it guaranteed the advances, and if there were any losses they would be met by the people of the country as a whole, the taxpayers of Canada, and not by the farmers. In the event of a calamity such as we had two years ago it is pointed out that it was fair that the taxpayers should bear their fair share of the risk and the loss, rather than loading it all upon the farmers.

It is not generally realized that the cost of financing the wheat board, the cost of storing our wheat, even the cost of carrying it so it will be available when needed, is taken out of the sale price of the wheat, and is carried by the farmers themselves.

The question is as to how far we should go in loading the cost of any measure which may be desirable on the farmers themselves. I refer to a measure such as financing farmers when they cannot sell their grains. How far should we expect the government to go in shouldering part of that responsibility? So far as I am concerned, as I listened to these arguments I developed some doubt as to whether we should ask the wheat board to enter this field. It was pointed out to me that to have a system like this would cost a great deal of money for purposes of administration. I am told that in the United States, where they have a system of this kind, the cost of administering the plan, involving inspectors who go around to make sure the grain is still in existence and that it is not deteriorating by reason of being attacked by mites and the like, is very considerable indeed. I am also told that there are great losses through grain being stolen, and disappearing. And of course under a system administered by the wheat board the farmers who were ready to get along in the ordinary way would have to help pay these administrative costs, and would also have to help pay for these losses.

I must admit I am beginning to be very doubtful of the wisdom of putting that burden upon the wheat board, because it has the job of marketing our grain and then paying out what is received from the sale. It is very doubtful if we should place further obligations upon it as a result of which it might lose money, and then people would be in a position to say, "Well, perhaps it is not as successful an organization as it should be". In this way the very existence of the wheat board might be endangered.

This is an argument which has been put forward to me by those who have opposed the measure now advocated by the hon. member for Acadia. I believe the wheat board has done such a good job in the marketing of our grain that its existence should not be threatened. It has saved our farmers hundreds of millions of dollars. I am quite satisfied that two years ago, when we had so much low-grade wheat, had that wheat been pressed upon the market, with no buyers in sight, and had there not been an organization such as the wheat board to buy and hold that wheat until it could be disposed of, the results would have been disastrous. At that time the head of the Saskatchewan wheat pool said that instead of our getting $1 for our wheat we probably would have had to sell it for around 40 cents.

I believe that in this way the wheat board at that time saved the producers of western Canada about a hundred million dollars. And I am satisfied that under present conditions, with an oversupply of wheat on hand, were it not for the co-operation between the wheat board in Canada, the commodity credit corporation in the United States, and the wheat board in Australia, enabling wheat marketing to be done in an orderly fashion, the price would have sunk to a very low level. Past history shows this to be so.

This is a matter of great concern not only to the farmers in Canada but to everybody else, because we know that the first thing leading to the great slump in the thirties was the fall in the prices of primary products. Once the primary products fell in price, farmers and other primary producers lost their purchasing power; and then of course those people who made things to sell to the primary producers were thrown out of work, and we were in the midst of a depression.

So I think anything that in any way endangers the wheat board, any extra obligation placed upon it when it is doing such valuable work not only for the farmers but for all people in Canada, should be looked at very carefully. We should ask ourselves, "Are we asking the wheat board and the farmers to finance and carry an obligation that should be carried by the country as a whole"?

Faced with these arguments, as it was the farmers' own money that was being spent I wondered about the propriety of members of parliament, who were elected to act on behalf of the country as a whole, undertaking to spend the farmers' money. That is exactly what is proposed here. If we passed this resolution and the government decided to set up a system of this kind, conceivably we could run our farmers into terrific losses. If a situation is to be developed under which there may be tremendous administrative costs, and ultimately losses, then it should be carried by the people of Canada as a whole, and not by the farmers alone.

If the farmers decide they wish to run that risk, then that is another matter. I have heard so many differing views on the question that, so far as I am concerned, I do not think I should undertake to say what I believe the farmers really want in the matter. Some say they want it, while others say that on no account do they want it. I have wondered how the government could handle this problem, when it has set up a board to handle farmers' products and everything done by that board is paid for by the farmers. I have wondered to what extent the government should decide everything, according to the decisions of parliament, when the producers who pay the shot have but a very small proportion of the representation. Is there not some other way for the government to ascertain the wishes of the farmers? If their wishes are made clear then I believe that our government, being a Liberal government, would want to carry out the wishes of the people whose money they are administering.

Mr. Blackmore: I guess we all would.

Mr. Tucker: Well, I am speaking for myself.

Mr. Blackmore: You are speaking for us, too.

Mr. Tucker: I have no doubt that other hon. members will agree with that basic idea, but I do not want to undertake to speak for them. It reminds me of the argument for responsible government. There used to be the idea abroad that people could be sent out to govern other people, and they would make wiser decisions than the people would make themselves. Well, it was found that that did not work with human beings. They wanted to have the right to run their own affairs. They might make the same decision as the irresponsible governor might make, but they would not be satisfied unless it was their decision.

In the long run, if this wheat board is going to continue to operate satisfactorily and not be subjected to attack for making some decision which a large group of producers might not agree with, some way should be found to leave the decision in the hands of the producers themselves, letting the government take the attitude: "We are handling your money; we are handling your product; we want to do exactly what you people wish". If the government could take that attitude it would put the responsibility right upon the people who may pay, and they are the people who should have the responsibility.

It would lead to this situation, Mr. Speaker. If any decision was pressed upon the government there would not be the feeling that if we got this through we would be getting something out of the government. There would be the feeling and the knowledge that if anything was decided that might cost money, they would pay it themselves. It would lead to a greater feeling of responsibility and a greater feeling that it was their board and that they should take all necessary steps to protect it. Farmers would be very alert as to the effect of any decision taken.

If the government, say in a matter like this, were prepared to leave it to the holders of permit books whether or not they wanted a system such as this set up, then they would understand that if they voted for it, it might lead to the setting up of an expensive administrative system. It might lead to tremendous losses; it might lead to the wheat board getting into difficulty on account of the propriety of losing all this money realized from the sale of grain. Then if the government could say to the farmers: "You are the ones who are going to pay for this; you are the ones who should now decide it. We are ready to handle this as you want it handled", the debate would go on amongst the farmers: Is this good, or not?

The farmers are just as anxious to have the wheat board succeed, to preserve it and have it go on and do good work in the future as it has done in the past, as anybody else. They would be very careful about asking it to do anything that in any way might endanger its sound functioning and the successful carrying on of their business.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the hon. member permit a question? How would he ascertain the wishes of the farmers, by referendum?

Mr. Tucker: I was coming to that. I think the idea should be adopted, in matters where the government is not going to have to spend any of the people's money, that the people who pay should decide; and as I understand it that is the basis of the resolution of the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore) asking the wheat board to deduct money to pay dues to farm organizations. There again the wheat board is being asked to do something other than market wheat, and it should be left to the farmers to decide whether they want it to go into that field of activity. The farmers should decide. If it were left to them they would be very careful to make the decision they thought was in the best interests of the wheat board.

I suggest to the hon. member who moved this resolution that it would have been much better to suggest to the house that we approve the idea of asking parliament to ask the government to consider the advisability of empowering the wheat board to conduct a mail ballot of the grain producers holding permits to ascertain the wishes of such producers in regard to setting up a system such as this, or in regard to paying farm storage, where the same argument would apply. Many believe that to pay for farm storage when grain cannot be delivered is a good thing. I think it is a good thing to pay for farm storage when the wheat board is not ready to take the grain, provided the board is given the right to stop paying it when they want the grain delivered. Those who disagree say it would mean that the small farmer would be paying tremendous storage charges to the big farmer and it would work out unfairly in many other ways. Again I ask; why not leave it to the farmers to decide these things? Let them debate it and decide it among themselves, and then give their views to the government.

I am quite aware of the fact that farm organizations at times think they know for sure what the wishes of the farmers are in such matters. Perhaps they do; but we have recognized, by having a system of secret ballot, that the sure way of finding out what people want is to let them cast a secret vote as to what they do want. On an important matter such as this, which is perhaps a new departure in regard to the handling of our grain, it should be left to the farmers, by secret ballot, to decide what they want.

Just as an example, I might recall to the house what happened in regard to the handling of oats and barley from Manitoba by the wheat board. It was said by certain farm organizations that the farmers of Manitoba were against the wheat board handling oats and barley. Other people said the farmers were favourable to it. Nobody knew for sure what the farmers really did want. Some of us were rather alarmed when the government of Manitoba decided to hold a plebiscite on the matter, because the position then was that unless all the provinces came into the scheme the wheat board would not handle oats and barley for any of them. We wondered whether the people who said that the Manitoba farmers were against the wheat board handling oats and barley really knew what they were talking about.

You, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members will recall that when the plebiscite was held most people were astonished at the strength of the vote for the wheat board handling oats and barley. I think none of the farm leaders expected such an overwhelming vote in favour of the wheat board handling oats and barley. That was an example of the farmers having certain definite opinions and being glad to express those opinions when they got the chance.

I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to consider how much surer the government must have felt in going ahead with that plan, when they knew that the overwhelming majority of the farmers wanted them to go into that field. There could be no doubt about farmers wanting them to go into that field, for undoubtedly an even greater proportion of the farmers of Saskatchewan and Alberta wanted them to go into that field than did the farmers of Manitoba. Therefore when the government moved it knew that it had the farmers solidly behind it in the matter.

Similarly, in regard to any of these other matters such as the recognizing of voluntary requisitions, the question of paying for farm storage and an approved system of advances by the wheat board, the government through the wheat board could take a mail ballot of the producers of grain who are going to pay, asking, "Are you favourable to this or not?" If they decide that they are favourable the government can proceed then and feel that if there is any loss the producers have definitely asked for it and they have no right to blame the government in any way. On the other hand, if the producers say "No, we do not want it", the government is not made to appear to go against the wishes of the people.

Therefore I suggest we should make sure we do what the farmers really want us to do. I do urge the government to consider this idea in regard to the activities of the wheat board. The system I am suggesting would be very useful and would be more certain to lay a solid foundation for the future successful functioning of the wheat board than any system of an advisory board or anything else that could be set up. By this means you would be getting the decision of the farmers themselves. If the farmers themselves felt they were running their own wheat board they would be behind it even stronger than ever.

I feel that the wheat board has proved such a success in putting a solid foundation under western agriculture, in introducing a measure of stability into our western farming operations, that I should like to see the most solid foundation possible put under it. I do not think a more solid foundation could possibly be put under it than to base it upon decisions which are made always in line with the wishes of the people themselves. I would ask that this be considered in regard to this resolution, along with the other suggestions I have mentioned.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like first of all to congratulate the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) upon having proposed a resolution dealing with what I believe is a most timely question. I shall certainly not talk out the motion, because I hope it will come to a vote. I hope members of the government party will not talk out the motion but will allow the house to vote on this important question.

I was interested in hearing the remarks of the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker). It seemed to me that during most of his remarks he failed to say whether he was for this motion or whether he was against it. I do not really know, because he left me at a loss. He stated at one point that he doubted the propriety of members of parliament discussing a matter such as this.

Mr. Tucker: On a question of privilege, I did not say that I doubted the propriety of members discussing it. I said that I doubted the propriety of our deciding how the farmers' money should be spent.

Mr. Argue: It is just about the same thing. Finally the hon. member for Rosthern got around to saying what he wanted to suggest, that parliament should ask the government to ask the wheat board to take a referendum to see if the farmers would bear the cost involved in the proposal of the hon. member for Acadia. That is not my suggestion as to the best method of dealing with this problem.

I feel that the problem of large surpluses of grain, together with a shortage of ready cash in western Canada, is going to bring about an economic crisis for many farmers on the prairies this coming spring, even though the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), the hon. member for Rosthern, or any hon. member may stand up in this house and say that the marketing situation is fine, that prices are good, that everything is all right in western Canada, that we do not need advance payments, and that we do not need to adopt some policy of getting more money into the hands of the farmers.

When I was home for the Christmas recess I made a survey of businessmen in my neighbourhood. I asked them this question: "How much have you on your books now owed to you by farmers, and how much did you have at this time a year ago?" I would say from the answers I got to that question that today the oil dealers, the implement dealers and the garage operators in that part of Saskatchewan have 50 per cent more credit on their books in their localities than they had one year ago. Many of those merchants are being put on a thirty-day credit basis. I think I would be safe in saying that most of them are being put on a one-week or ten-day credit basis.

Whether we like it or not the operation of farms in western Canada is dependent upon the farmer being able to go to his local oil dealer, his local garage operator or his local implement dealer and obtain credit with which to carry on his farming operations. A large part of that credit which normally would be available will be frozen this spring unless the government does something about it. I suggest that to ask the government to ask the wheat board to conduct a referendum among the farmers, to see whether the farmers are prepared to accept the whole burden of such a problem, is not a sound suggestion.

Representing as I do an agricultural constituency, I am quite prepared to say what my ideas are in regard to this question, and I believe I can speak for the majority of the farmers whom I represent. I do not agree with those who have said that this is not a problem facing the majority of farmers, that the need for cash is a problem facing only 25 per cent of the farmers or the few farmers who have had bad luck. I do not agree with that at all. I say that the matter of getting additional money into the pockets of farmers within the next twelve months is an important problem to the whole agricultural industry.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce quotes all kinds of figures and makes optimistic pronouncements in an attempt to overlook the real problem that exists. Whether you want to believe it or not, we have a huge surplus of grain in Canada now. We are not going to have a harvest until next August; yet compared to a year ago, as the weeks and months go by those surpluses become greater and greater. So far in this crop year our markets overseas are falling.

How many hon. members of this house realize that from August 1, 1953 until the end of December, or until January 13, the date of the latest figures available, we have lost as compared to last year 30 per cent of our overseas markets for wheat. Instead of the trend improving it is getting worse. I have here the dominion bureau of statistics figures covering Canadian exports of wheat and wheat flour, and I should like to give the comparative figures month by month.

In August, 1952, Canada exported 40 million bushels of wheat; in August, 1953, we exported 34 million bushels, or 85 per cent of the year before. In September, 1952, Canada exported 27 million bushels of wheat; in September of the present crop year we exported 22 million bushels, a drop of 5 million bushels or again 85 per cent of the previous year. In October, 1952, we exported nearly 36 million bushels of wheat; in October of this year we exported 30 million bushels of wheat. Again there was a drop of 6 million bushels or 85 per cent of the market of the previous year. Then we come to November, 1952, when Canada exported 36 million bushels of wheat. In November, 1953, we exported 24 million bushels of wheat, just two-thirds of the amount exported in the same month of the previous year. In December, 1952, Canada exported 44 million bushels of wheat; in December, 1953, Canada exported 23 million bushels of wheat. In December of this year we exported just 52 per cent of the quantity exported a year ago.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Is it a lost market if the customer happens to have a large domestic crop and does not need wheat? I would point out to my hon. friend that he is comparing this year's statistics with the statistics of the biggest year we ever had, a year when there were shortages in a great many countries and when there were crop failures in a great many countries in Europe. To talk about lost markets is talking nonsense, of course.

Mr. Argue: The minister can call it nonsense when in a five-month period Canada's exports fell by 52 million bushels, but the farmers do not call that nonsense. This trend which began in August of this year has been getting worse each and every month as the months have gone by.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I do not want to start an argument—I have no right to do that—but I merely wish to point out that Canada shipped a greater proportion of world wheat this year than last year. In other words, our proportion of the total wheat trade of the world this year is bigger than last year.

Mr. Argue: I am not suggesting the wheat board is not doing as good a selling job as it is possible for any organization handling wheat in Canada to do at the present time.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): You are talking about lost markets.

Mr. Argue: The markets are gone as compared with a year ago. That might be because of larger crops abroad, or because of greater competition from other countries, or it might be for a variety of reasons; but Canada's exports of wheat in that period dropped by 52 million bushels and farmers are noticing that loss of exports in their pocketbooks.

The minister has not yet announced the final payment for the 1952 crop. A year ago the final payment for the previous wheat crop had been made weeks before, and the minister was announcing an interim payment for the following year's crop. The wheat board has apparently not sold all of its 1952 wheat. The account has not yet been closed. In other words it will be a long time, unless some other action is taken by the government, before the wheat board can make an interim payment on 1953 wheat because the wheat board, according to its accounts, has not yet started to sell 1953 wheat. Wheat markets and wheat exports are going down at a very alarming rate.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is what the hon. member says.

Mr. Argue: Yes, I do. The minister says "No". The minister thinks that anything said about a 52 million bushel drop is nonsense. I say it is not. I say it is important. The price for wheat is satisfactory. I have no complaint—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is the only time I have ever heard my hon. friend admit anything was good.

Mr. Argue: If that is correct then I have been patterning myself after the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). I have yet to hear him admit any of the many mistakes the government has made. I do not intend to advance a one-sided argument, and then ask the minister how often he thinks I am wrong. If the minister can refute these facts I am placing before the house I and other hon. members and the wheat producers of Canada will be very glad to hear from him.

Wheat prices have been reasonably satisfactory. The price of class II wheat is down, but the price of I.W.A. wheat as compared with a year ago is up. But in considering prices for wheat it should be remembered that the prices are being averaged out back to 1945. For the first time since 1945, the last time when the wheat producers had an increase in the price of wheat, the purchasing power of a bushel of wheat, according to the economics department of the University of Saskatchewan, has dropped 40 per cent. What is keeping the farmer going? What is maintaining the prosperity that has prevailed in western Canada in terms of the prices farmers have received in relation to the cost of production? Nothing but a series of greater than average crops.

What is happening to the price of barley? That is a story in itself. I am sure the wheat board is doing the very best possible job under the circumstances. I believe members of parliament are unanimous in their support of the Canadian wheat board. However, according to the weekly statistics of the Department of Trade and Commerce—and I am referring to the issue dated January 13, 1954—the wheat board's initial price for No. 1 feed barley, the most important grade of barley grain in western Canada, is 87 cents and the wheat board's selling price is 90 cents. That is a 3-cent margin. Even a marvellous organization such as the wheat board cannot operate on a 3-cent margin.

What does that mean? It means that the farmers who in the past have expected an interim payment of around 15 cents a bushel and perhaps a final payment of another 15 or 20 cents a bushel cannot hope to obtain them if these prices prevail for the rest of the year. They cannot even hope to obtain an interim payment, much less a final one. There will be little or no payment at all for barley other than the 65 or 70 cents a bushel farmers receive when they haul barley to the local elevator. I say that the loss of—

Mr. Tucker: What do you suggest the wheat board should do?

Mr. Argue: Don't worry; I will come to that and I will put my suggestion against the referendum suggested by my hon. friend.

Mr. Tucker: You do not believe in democracy, of course. I know that.

Grain

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to rule on the interjection made by the hon. member for Rosthern, and I would ask you to request the hon. member to withdraw his statement. I think it is unparliamentary for him to say that I do not believe in democracy.

Mr. Tucker: The hon. member says he will put his idea against my idea of the referendum. Such a referendum would enable the people to decide. If he does not believe in the people deciding, he is not in favour of democracy. That is my conclusion.

Mr. Argue: I believe the hon. member should withdraw his assertion that I do not believe in democracy. I think it is an assertion that should not be made by any hon. member of any other hon. member of this house; and I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to make a ruling on that point.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have taken into consideration the hon. member's point of order, but under the circumstances I do not think I can possibly rule on the matter.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, if the remark of the hon. member for Rosthern that I do not believe in democracy is parliamentary we shall have a very interesting Hansard of this debate today, and we shall continue the debate outside of this house among the people and the producers whom we represent.

The hon. member for Rosthern asked me what my solution to this problem is. I said I would come to it soon, and I will suggest that even the hon. member for Rosthern, if he has any judgment whatsoever—which is very doubtful—will have to admit it is very much better than his escapist solution. His is no solution at all. He talks around the question. He has great ambitions, Mr. Speaker, which are well-known to members of this house—

An hon. Member: No, he hasn't.

Mr. Argue: Well, he did have on a provincial basis, but now he has them on a federal basis. The hon. member is very envious of certain hon. members or a certain hon. member in this house, so he would not dare suggest anything to the government that really amounted to anything; so he says, "Well, now, please consider conducting a referendum amongst the producers of western Canada, because I would not dare to suggest any ideas of my own on this question."

Mr. Tucker: But, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I remind hon. members that the hon. member who has the floor cannot be interrupted unless with his consent.

[Mr. Tucker.]

Mr. Tucker: But, Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member has said I would not dare suggest anything to the government unless I thought they would be ready to accept it. I say that what the hon. member is suggesting is quite untrue and it is known by him to be untrue, when he says that. I do not care whether he withdraws it or not, I am telling him it is untrue and he knows it to be untrue.

Mr. Argue: That statement is a good measure of the stature of the hon. member for Rosthern and explains far more adequately than I can why the hon. member for Rosthern is here instead of being the premier of the province of Saskatchewan.

As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, I believe this is a very important problem, and something will have to be done soon if the farmers and the agricultural industry are to avoid a real crisis in western Canada. The wheat market is down by 52 million bushels, and the final payment for 1952 wheat has not yet been made. The wheat board has not yet started to sell 1953 wheat. There cannot be an interim payment soon because apparently there is not one dollar in the 1953-54 wheat account. They have not yet sold any wheat for that account. The barley price is down near the wheat board's initial price. The farmers will not likely get cheques this spring for a interim payment on barley. They will not be getting soon, as they have in the past, a substantial interim payment for wheat.

Of course the government always gets around to big payments just before an election. Just before the 1949 election there was a payment on wheat of 20 cents a bushel. The supporters of the government went around western Canada saying, "Return us; from the wheat board there is going to be another substantial payment". They did not say how much. We got back here and found there was 3·8 cents a bushel in the fund.

They did not do it in quite the same way before the last election. They again provided an interim payment, but this time they took off the quotas. In the dying weeks of the election they said to the farmers, "Go a hundred miles, if you can afford it, find a truck and plug every cubic foot of space in every elevator in western Canada". They said, "We will do that in order to make it look as though there is a market for wheat and there is not going to be a problem until after the election; then we will let them know that the elevators really are plugged, that there is really not a shortage of box cars but that there is just no room at the lakehead".

When the minister answered my question the other day I think he gave me a very good reply—he caught me off base—about the opening of the navigation season; he said he could not forecast when the ice would go out. But with the terminals at Montreal and Halifax full of ships in the harbours loaded with grain, ready for the ice to go out, they will not need to hurry up—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): What harbours?

Mr. Argue: Montreal.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): There are no ships in Montreal.

Mr. Argue: The minister can say that. He has interrupted me so often, so many times, with statements that later were proved to be wrong, that I do not think that statement of his even requires a reply from me. They have put the wheat quotas on a different basis. The wheat quota now is five bushels per cultivated acre. I am willing to forecast—and no member of parliament should do so because usually we are wrong, but I am willing to take a chance—that on July 31, the end of this crop year, there will not be a wheat quota, all of which farmers can deliver, greater than eight bushels per acre. I say that on a quota of eight bushels an acre there are going to be tens of millions of bushels of wheat and other grains that farmers will not be able to market. The farmer is greatly disappointed, naturally, when the weather has been bad—

Mr. Gardiner: Just so we will understand the situation, will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Argue: Yes, surely.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend means eight bushels on a cultivated acreage basis?

Mr. Argue: That is exactly what I said. I said the quota now is based differently on a cultivated acreage basis. But let us go into the Regina plains and look at a farmer who is farming there; or let us go up to Melfort or Tisdale, in the area where they have the greatest yields and where they usually crop two-thirds of their acreage. An eight-bushel quota will mean about 12 bushels per seeded acre, when many of those farmers have threshed 30 bushels, 35 bushels and 45 bushels per acre, on an average basis.

Mr. Studer: They are lucky.

Mr. Argue: The quota works best down in my hon. friend's constituency of Swift Current-Maple Creek, so that when there is no crop failure you have a chance. But that kind of quota has its drawbacks for farmers who ordinarily farm smaller units because their land is more productive. Hence there is going to be just oceans of wheat on farms in western Canada this year.

I was saying that farmers feel badly, naturally, when they do not get a crop because of bad weather, drought, rust, grasshoppers, sawfly, hail or the hundred and one other things that can happen to a crop in western Canada; they feel badly about it, but they do not blame anybody. They know that next year the weather may be better and that if they go on, year after year, the weather will improve and the crops will come. But nothing angers a farmer more, in my judgment, than to have grain on the farm, and his pockets empty of money, and be unable to market any of that grain which he has on the farm. More and more farmers are coming into that kind of position all of the time.

Mr. Speaker, I think we as a nation should be mighty glad that we have such a large quantity of wheat, namely 713 million bushels, available over and above domestic requirements, for export and for carryover as of December, 1953. We should be pleased that we have those large stocks of grain at a stage in the world's history when two-thirds of humanity go to bed hungry most of the time. I say we should be doing something as a nation to see that fellow human beings in other parts of the world are properly fed. With the huge carryover of wheat looming ahead and the fact that when other nations see that this wheat will be available for export it cannot help having a deterrent effect on the price, I suggest that the government should establish a strategic reserve of wheat, let us say 300 million bushels, that could be taken out of the ordinary market channels. That reserve should be maintained for export to countries when people are hungry and starvation is rampant; and that reserve should be there in case of the drought that is bound to occur at some time in Canada's future.

I suggest that the government should finance that reserve and not the farmers, as was suggested by the hon. member for Rosthern. The government, the people of Canada, should finance this strategic reserve, which is a reserve in the arsenal of democracy for all Canadians and all the people who believe in our way of life.

I have a further suggestion as to how the benefit of that program can be brought down to the farmers on the farm. If the Minister of Trade and Commerce stands up and says the farmers do not want a loan such as that which he provided for them in 1951, I would say to him, "You are right". If the Minister of Trade and Commerce says there is no great destitution and no great hardship, in the sense that people are going without clothes, are starving and so on, I will agree with him again. But I think a producer of food in the world in 1954 should have the right to be able to dispose of that food at a fair value. I say that by an amendment to the Canadian Wheat Board Act, the farmers of western Canada should be given the right, not to get loans—for which they go cap in hand to somebody—on grain they have in storage on their farms, but the right to sell the grain they have in storage on their farms and to keep that grain, if necessary, on the farm.

I think the machinery for that kind of program is already in existence. We have the wheat board. All over western Canada we have elevator agents—thousands of them, who are good operators, working for elevator companies, pool companies and line companies—acting as agents for the wheat board. I say the farmer should have the right to go to his local elevator agent and to say to him something like this: "Look, John, I have a 1,000-bushel bin of wheat at home. You have no room to enable you to put it in your elevator, so I want to sell it to the wheat board through you, acting as the agent. I should like you to come out, survey that granary, grade it, test it for dockage, and give me my advance payment". Then there could be a further provision that when the elevator agent ordered the grain hauled out, if there should be a shortage or overage as to amount, dockage and so on, that small variation could then be adjusted. I believe the cost of financing such a program, of making provision for farmers to sell grain on their farms, should be borne by all the people of Canada, because I believe that such a policy is in the interests of the people of this nation.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is leaving tomorrow on a world tour, and I want to join with those who have wished him bon voyage. We wish him happy landings; we wish him success in his important trip; we hope that he will have a safe return to Canada and will be able to give us an interesting and valuable account of his world tour. But, with such a strategic reserve of wheat now in existence, I should like to see the Prime Minister placed in such a position by parliament that when he goes and sees the manner in which people live in the various countries of the world he visits, when he himself sees the hunger, he would be able to say to the governments of these countries that when he returned to Canada he would recommend to his colleagues and to the House of Commons that we take steps to help alleviate that hunger. If Canada would take such a lead I believe we would make a magnificent contribution to world peace, and it might go down as the greatest single act of statesmanship in 1954.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to speak at length, because I do not wish to talk out this measure. I am sure the house is very anxious to hear the reaction of the minister to the resolution before us, and is also looking forward to an opportunity to vote on this most important question.

Certainly the storage problem has become very serious. There are several hundred million bushels of grain on hand today, and in view of the fact that the storage problem will be a continuing one in the days ahead it becomes necessary to consider whether or not the government should consider the advisability of enacting legislation at this session of parliament to provide for a system of approved farm storage under which the wheat board may make advances to farmers on grain held on farms.

Certainly the storage problem today is a costly one. Recently I asked a question in the house for the purpose of ascertaining what it was costing to store Canada's wheat. The answer given by the Department of Trade and Commerce was that the amount paid by the wheat board for storage of wheat from the 1st of January to the 31st of December, 1952, was $17,043,000 and that during the period from the 1st of January, 1953 to the 31st of July, 1953, the amount was $12,733,000; or, taking the entire period, over $50,000 a day. That amount is increasing and has increased at an accelerated rate during recent years, compared with the amounts paid previously.

Even on the present basis elevator companies are apparently asking for an increase in storage rates. The minister indicates that is not so, but I have a press dispatch here from Regina which reads as follows:

> J. H. Wesson, president of the Saskatchewan wheat pool, said it is essential that handling and storage charges on grain be brought into line with actual operating costs. He told the pool's annual meeting here that handling charges have changed little since 1938, but cost of labour and operating expenses have increased greatly. Under average production with lower volume, present rates would result in a deficit.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): There is no change in the rates this year.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister says there will be no change in the rates this year, but nonetheless it is apparent that there will be an endeavour shortly to obtain an increase in these rates. Certainly storage facilities have been taxed to the utmost. The plan envisaged in the resolution before us is the only one I can conceive of which can meet the situation. I do not go as far as to say that storage should be paid on all wheat on all farms; but certainly, subject to reasonable limitations on the total amount of wheat to be stored on a farm, there should be provision for something in the nature of storage payments to be made. Certainly the problem we face is not one for a period of only a few months. Our accumulating surpluses are such that they demand either one of two things, the provision of storage facilities or, alternatively and more satisfactorily, the security of markets for our wheat.

I think the minister might well place before the house something of what is being done to secure markets. I understand that representatives are now or have been in the Far East, and also in Central America and Washington, whose purpose is to endeavour to secure markets. That is a laudable purpose. Is the minister in a position to say whether or not the price at which we hold Canadian wheat today is such as will deny us within the days and months ahead, within the next year or so, sales that otherwise might be available to us?

That brings up a suggestion on which I endeavoured to secure an answer the other day during the course of the debate on foreign affairs. It has to do with markets in the U.S.S.R. What is being done to that end? Is wheat considered a strategic material? Is the minister in a position to say anything more than he said on the 4th or 5th of January, when he was reported to have stated that larger and more extensive trade with the U.S.S.R. was being contemplated? Certainly the Canadian farmer is concerned.

The minister says we are not losing any markets. He says the fact that other countries are growing wheat in excess of their previous production, thereby denying us sales, is not to be considered as a loss of markets. What else is it? We are speaking of markets, the opportunity of selling at a reasonable price, and however that loss is caused it is nonetheless a loss of markets.

I suggest to the minister that he place before the house and country something of the nature of the negotiations that are taking place today. We read about them in the newspapers. In today's Ottawa Journal we read that the British Chancellor of the Exchequer said in their House of Commons that the finance ministers of the commonwealth countries have decided to take advantage of trade with the communist bloc whenever possible. He was reporting to the House of Commons yesterday on the finance ministers' conference at Sydney, Australia. He went on to say:

> It was agreed that restrictions on trade with China were stricter than those on the Soviet bloc. The finance ministers saw the advantage of extending east-west trade and decided to take advantage of it wherever possible.

Is the minister in a position to say whether, if there is going to be trade, that trade will include wheat and other agricultural products? Those are things the people of Canada want to know. Those are the larger issues that today face the Canadian people in the marketing of their wheat, and in the piling up of these surpluses which are becoming colossal in extent and which must necessarily have a detrimental effect upon prices in the days ahead.

The hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) says, in so far as this problem of storage is concerned let us have a referendum. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that meets the situation. I think members from western Canada have found everywhere in rural constituencies a demand that something be done to compensate farmers for providing suitable storage facilities for the wheat lying on the farms. If the farmer markets it, then storage is paid to the elevator companies, so the situation is no different whatsoever in so far as the final amount the farmer will receive is concerned.

Farm unions have asked that something be done along the lines of what is asked in this resolution. Certainly in those parts of western Canada—northern Saskatchewan, for instance—where there are small farms, there is a pronounced demand even today for something in the nature of loans by the wheat board on wheat in properly accredited storage bins. This debate has made it possible for the minister to give the house facts rather than roseate pictures, and I ask him when he speaks to let the country know what is being actually done in connection with the securing of markets for this surplus.

The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) says, let us give it away and provide assistance to underdeveloped countries. Well, that has its dangers. Today we are fearful that the United States of America is going to dump hundreds of millions of dollars worth of farm products at fire-sale prices in various parts of the world. We want a certain course followed here in order to dispose of our surplus, and at the same time we view with the greatest possible alarm the fact that the United States will do that which some hon. members so glibly advocate as a solution for our problem.

Certainly there is something to be said for elevating living standards in other parts of the world. I saw that three years ago when I was in the south Pacific. At that time I came back and advocated assistance under the Colombo plan, and I have heard about it ever since. I believe that a reasonable extension of the amount being expended under the Colombo plan—certainly a doubling of the amount that is being expended today—would not be a very heavy load for Canada to carry. That would make $50 million altogether, which would go a long way toward raising the standards in those countries to which the Colombo plan applies.

There are arguments on both sides. I know that Paul Hoffman, the American administrator, said very recently that if between 1942 and 1945 we had expended $500 million by way of assistance to China in agricultural products and the like, China might never have become communist. On the other hand we must realize that we live in the world of today; and if we in Canada, in order to get rid of our surpluses, embark upon such a policy as some advocate, a policy of gifts or of selling at reduced prices in order to assist countries in other parts of the world, we will find ourselves criticized in the United States to the same extent that we in our own country today fear the danger of the United States doing that very thing.

I would like the minister to explain what is being done. We have learned from Mr. Butler, the Chancellor of the Exchequer in Great Britain, what is being done over there. We know something of what is being done about surpluses in Australia. We ask our minister to let the house know the policy of the government with respect to east-west trade, and to what extent, if any, the tremendous surpluses we have in Canada will ultimately find markets, either through east-west trade or through trading with other countries of the world.

Mr. Irvin Studer (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I should like to be permitted a few minutes in this debate on the subject of advances on farm-stored grain. I can assure the house that I shall not take more time than was taken by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), who is so anxious to have a vote on the matter. I shall try to discuss it within the same time limit, and also from the point of view which I suggest holds the greatest interest of farmers in western Canada.

I refer to the effect of advances on farm-stored grain, or the effect of any other measures that may be proposed in connection with farm operations or farm financing upon ultimate wheat board operations in western Canada. I refer to the effect it would have upon an organization the farmers in western Canada have spent almost all their lives in building up and bringing to the point where it has become the selling agency for the grain produced by those farmers.

I have been farming since 1916; and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the farmers I know are not going to be parties to any arrangement that would have a detrimental effect upon the wheat board. And I say that if any other member in the house does not take the same stand, then he is doing a disservice to western Canadian farmers. We are not going to spend all our lives building up an institution that has been of such great benefit, as the wheat board has been, and then proceed to enact some measure which will have the effect of destroying it.

Mr. Argue: Do you not trust your government?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): You don't apparently.

Mr. Studer: We have been operating under the wheat board for a number of years. It has done a magnificent job as a selling agency, the most magnificent of any similar agency anywhere in the world. It has done the job under difficult conditions. We have to export more of our grain than any other country in the world. In other words we in Canada, with 1 per cent of the world's population, are producing 7 per cent of the world's supply of wheat. If anyone knows of any other country carrying on with the same success, then I have not heard about it thus far.

Our wheat board has been selling wheat. We now are faced with a situation in which the government is asked to provide that the wheat board can lend the farmers' own money back to them by way of advances on approved storage. Those with approved storage facilities would be eligible for advances. What about it if any losses should be sustained? Are the farmers going to be asked to pay them? I do not know very many farmers who are going to be willing to accept losses caused by some other farmer's inability to repay the advances.

In that connection we have had the experience of the British wheat agreement, and we have had the experience of the $65 million wheat payment to western farmers. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if the people of this country are going to be called upon to pay any losses in connection with western wheat through the operations of the wheat board, then that will be the end of the wheat board. I believe I am correct in saying that.

Why do I say that? I say it because not more than 7 per cent of the people of Canada want the wheat board. Are we living in a democracy, or are we not? If we are, then we are dependent upon the rest of the people of Canada; we are dependent upon how they advise their members to vote. If we are only 7 per cent of the people of Canada who want the wheat board, then we are in this position. After all, it is only the farmers of Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta who want it, and not all those farmers. I do not know of anyone in British Columbia that wants the wheat board. I do not know of many east of the great lakes that want the wheat board. I do know of a large number of people who might be satisfied to have no wheat board.

I say that not more than 7 per cent of the people of Canada want the wheat board. But our socialist friends ignore that entirely. They say that the government should operate this system irrespective of the wishes of the rest of the people of Canada. I would tell every person in Canada that the Liberal members of parliament over the years have been protecting that wheat board and have made it operative.

Mr. Zaplitny: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Studer: What is worrying you?

Mr. Zaplitny: Is the hon. member in favour of the coal subsidies?

Mr. Studer: Well, what has that to do with an organization that has been set up on behalf of the western wheat growers?

Mr. Argue: What has your speech got to do with it?

Mr. Studer: The coal subsidy is not a permanent affair. In any event, I am saying that the overwhelming proportion of the people of Canada are, to say the least, uninterested in the wheat board of this country. Perhaps it is our duty to subsidize the coal miners and even the gold miners. Saskatchewan has a few subsidies, but I have not time to go into that now.

In any event, those things are temporary. We are supposed to be on a permanent basis in connection with our wheat operation. That was the argument when the British wheat agreement was discussed in this house. Everyone in this House of Commons agreed with that wheat agreement. Was not that the basis upon which the wheat agreement was discussed? All hon. members in the house were in favour of it.

Then, after the wheat agreement with the "have regard to" clause in it was not kept, in our estimation, what was the story in this House of Commons? It was not the same at all. None of us was satisfied with the British wheat agreement and particularly our socialist friends, although at the beginning they were in favour of the agreement. Therefore when there were no results, or no payments under the "have regard to" clause, our socialist friends asked the people of Canada to pay $325 million on account of the fact that their socialist friends in Britain would give no consideration to the "have regard to" clause. That was what they asked us to do, and the talk was that the people over in Britain, the socialist government, were telling us here in Canada that our wheat growers were better off than the farmers in Britain, and why should they be taxed to pay us, who were better off? It may be good socialist theory, but it works both ways.

While I am at it I should like to say this. We hear socialist advocates—these give-away gentlemen, some of whom have never produced anything to give away, but who are always willing to give away someone else's production—suggest that we should give away our production. Our socialist friends are so generous with other people's money. They say we should feed the underprivileged people of the world. I agree with them. I do not like to see starvation anywhere. But I should like to point out that if production in this world in the past years had depended upon the socialist system we would not be able to feed the underprivileged people of the world; we would not have enough to feed ourselves, because the socialist system cannot produce. The socialist system is non-productive.

With respect to feeding the underprivileged people of the world, I think the government would be prepared to make an agreement with the socialists and say we would double what they might give; we would give two bushels for every one they give to the underprivileged people on earth. We will match them. Let them give us an example of what the socialist countries have been doing to feed the underprivileged people of the world, and we will match them. In other words we will outdo them. We will give so generously in proportion to what these socialist countries do that they will be put to shame.

I should like to have time to say a few words more about Saskatchewan and about the attempts to alleviate the crisis of wheat under the snow. We have heard about crises in Saskatchewan. We have had the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) make the same speech, with the odd change in a word here and there, in 1949, in 1950 and 1951. I think 1950 or 1951 was the year the wheat was under the snow. I never heard anything quite so sad as a speech that was made by that hon. member in that year. According to him the people of Saskatchewan were starving. This government made some provision for them by guaranteeing the banks. Of course the socialists held up their hands in horror when the banks were mentioned. Don't forget, the farmers are going to have to pay interest on the advances from the wheat board, because the wheat board has to borrow that money somewhere and has to pay that interest. That interest will be paid by the wheat board and charged back to the farmers.

I do not know whether it is against socialist theory to have advances. I am glad to get advances made by anyone. I have had quite enough to do with advances, I can tell you that. My trouble has been that I have always had so many cash advances that I have not been in a position later on to cover them. I do not say that all the farmers are in that position, because most farmers are good farmers, but I would not care to say that of myself.

Under the snow cash advances were provided for to the extent of $20 million. Of that $20 million some $635,000 was used to eliminate the crisis that existed out in Saskatchewan at that time. Then along came the foot-and-mouth disease crisis, and we are still feeling the effects of it. The argument of the hon. member for Assiniboia at that time was that the poor farmers out there had lost their herds of cattle through foot-and-mouth disease and the government refused to pay them, or the government would not give them sufficient to cover their losses.

The government, as it always does, took care of those crises as they arose from time to time. At least this government does that. Therefore the government paid these farmers who had losses through foot-and-mouth disease, and I have not heard a complaint from a single one of them. In fact I understand that most of them were tickled to death because they received more for the herds that were lost through foot-and-mouth disease than the market would have given them later on. Then the hon. member for Assiniboia said, "The reason the government paid you is that an election was coming along". Elections are the only things the hon. member for Assiniboia ever thinks of. That is the only thing he is thinking of now. That is all he ever does. That is exactly what happens. From day to day in this House of Commons he refers to elections.

The government met its commitments under all causes and under all circumstances. Then they talk about the loss of markets. Well, what are the socialists going to do about this? What I should like to know is, what are they going to do about it? They have the standard remedy for everything—give it away. Well, if you took all the wheat that ever grew in this country and gave it to the underprivileged, who comprise about two-thirds of the people of the world, would that be a permanent solution? Would it eliminate communism? It is said that hunger causes communism. I want to know what causes socialism.

Mr. Knowles: Go and look in the mirror.

Mr. Studer: It is suggested that payments should be made on approved farm storage. Who is going to approve it? These socialists are always arguing against too many government inspectors, too many people going around the country in the pay of the government investigating other people's business and disturbing them. There are quite a few disturbed people in this House of Commons. I have never attended here without hearing someone saying that he is disturbed. In any event they will continue with that point of view, that while the purpose might be good there would be too many inspectors.

In any event it is not the approved people who need help, I think it is the people who have their grain in places which even the socialists would not approve who need help. In the southwestern section of Saskatchewan there have not been sufficient crops over the years to permit the building up of permanent storage space. As has been mentioned in the house before, I think by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras), out of every 100 bushels stored outside on the grass of the prairies there would be a loss of 8 bushels.

Working that out on the basis that over the years in southwestern Saskatchewan at least half the time we do not have any crops, we would have to build substantial structures to conform to these requirements, and it is just a little bit doubtful whether it would be a paying proposition. The same thing applies to machinery. You do not hear the university people in western Canada advocating the building of elaborate structures to house machinery, because the investment in those buildings would be greater than the deterioration of the machinery over a period of years. There would be only a few people in southwestern Saskatchewan who would come within this category. They would have to depend on that storage for the advances that would be made, and therefore they would not be helped. Those are the people I want to help, the people who need it.

I think perhaps some solutions have been offered here today that would fit in. The hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) has made some suggestions. There has been criticism, ridicule and all the rest of it, but we are used to that in Saskatchewan. There is merit in what he said. We used to have the Saskatchewan farm loan board in that province, but that was taken over by the dominion. It was a good thing regardless of what happened to it. The province of Saskatchewan had that board to meet the farm crisis, but it was not continued by the socialists. I am suggesting it was a pretty good farm loan board. The Liberals operated it for quite a number of years.

I would not suggest the setting up of a provincial farm loan board. I suggest that they set up a provincial wheat loan board and make some effort by means of guarantees to the banks through the municipalities, as was done when advances were made during previous years. The municipality was guaranteed by the province, which in turn was guaranteed by the federal government. They operated in western Canada, and over those years about $118 million was distributed.

Perhaps some system could be worked out to provide assistance to those people who could not obtain the approval of any board or any organization or any people. Perhaps we could work out machinery whereby the municipalities could give consideration to applications by farmers, because no one knows the farmers better than the municipal officials. The advances could be made to the farmers on behalf of the provincial government through the banks. After all the farmers have to pay the interest anyway, under any system, and most of these needy people could be helped.

As I was saying a minute ago, in southwestern Saskatchewan it is not the surplus of wheat that causes the crisis, it is the lack of wheat that has been the cause of most of the crises in our country. If we have had crises they have been crop failures. If we are going to have any kind of crisis, I would like to have this kind, with too much wheat. If I had to make a choice, I would like to have a wheat crisis.

If we could have had that kind of crisis throughout all our history in southwestern Saskatchewan then we would be in the same category as the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), who is always talking about the unbearable burden of income tax payments in Saskatchewan. We hear about a group of Saskatchewan farmers who are paying more income taxes than all the people in any other province in Canada, and we are told that those poor people who are paying income taxes should not be paying them. I do not think the hon. member's figures are correct in respect to that. I doubt whether many of his figures are correct.

Mr. Argue: Are you for it or against it?

Mr. Studer: I have not much political acumen—whatever that word means; I did not go to school for very long, so I have not the vocabulary of some of these university graduates who went to university to study socialism. If I had it I would say that that kind of crisis is the one that can best be overcome. I think we would suffer less from that type of crisis than from any other that I know of.

When I hear talk about these income tax payments by the farmers of Saskatchewan the only thing I object to is that I am not in the same category. I would like to be in that same group. If all the people of Saskatchewan, including those who could not obtain these approved loans, were in the position of having to pay income tax, many more people in Saskatchewan would be happier than they are. I do not particularly like the income tax situation, but I think the government is trying to make it as fair as it is possible to make that situation. I think if you make a study of it and obtain the actual facts you will have to admit that it is fair.

An hon. Member: Are you for or against it?

Mr. Studer: It is not one policy for one province and another policy for another province, as was the case with the socialists in Saskatchewan. I have been trying to suggest how we can overcome or circumvent this crisis. I have been suggesting that if there is a crisis—the socialists always have one—the solution should be on the basis of the protection of our wheat board.

As I mentioned at the beginning, every one of us should be doing a service to our people in protecting that wheat board. We should not allow it to get in a position where the other 93 per cent of the people of Canada may say, "The farmers of western Canada do not want this organization". The Liberals of western Canada over a period of many years have done a magnificent job in convincing the other 93 per cent of the people who may be uninterested in the wheat board that it is a good organization.

Mr. Knowles: This Liberal is trying to talk the motion out.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): I would direct the attention of the hon. member to the fact that it is six o'clock.

Mr. Studer: I still have not spoken for as long as the hon. member for Assiniboia.

THE PRIME MINISTER

EXPRESSION OF GOOD WISHES ON IMPENDING TRIP

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) will not be in the house tomorrow and will not be here for some time, I think it might be appropriate before we leave the house this afternoon to wish him every success on the trip he is making and to repeat what has already been said in this house, that in the good will and friendly sentiments which he will be conveying to the other nations of the commonweath and other countries he will be carrying a message of unanimous good will and understanding from every member of this parliament and from all the people of Canada.

Later this week he will be lunching with the Prime Minister of Great Britain, and I know it will be the wish of many of us that he convey a message of good will to him. Also later, when he goes to France, I know it will be the wish of all of us that with that special aptitude he has for speaking to the people of that great country he assure them of our common concern for the great causes that they are serving at this time.

In every other country he will be speaking, in his expressions of good will, for all the people of Canada; and we wish him well on his trip.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), and on behalf of the members of this group, I wish to join with the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) in saying bon voyage to the Prime Minister and in expressing our very best wishes to him for a happy and useful trip. We are indeed glad to know he is going as Canada's ambassador of good will. We shall follow his trip with interest and await with keen anticipation his report on his return.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I was not in the chamber at the moment the Leader of the Opposition rose to express best wishes on behalf of his party to the Prime Minister. I happened to be out recording a broadcast, and it might be of interest to the Prime Minister to learn that the member of parliament who was recording a broadcast before I arrived—a member of the opposition, incidentally—was telling of the Prime Minister's proposed trip. He did it quite delightfully and concluded by trusting the people of Canada would follow the Prime Minister on his trip.

He might well have added that all the people of Canada wish him the very best of luck. Such is the expression of our democracy. I am sure the members of this group join with other hon. members who have spoken and wish the Prime Minister the very best the Lord God in heaven can give him on this trip. May that include his protection, much pleasure, usefulness, and a glorious and safe return.

(Translation):

Mr. J. W. Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I was not in the house last Monday when good wishes were extended to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on the occasion of the round-the-world trip he will be starting on tomorrow.

However, I did send to him, this very day, a personal letter in which I said that, although we sometimes take divergent views, the member for Quebec West has nevertheless much respect and admiration for the first citizen of this country. On this occasion when he is setting out on a tour around the world, during which he will certainly know how to put clearly the Canadian viewpoint and show other countries how we practise true democracy here in Canada, I want to extend to him, in my own name as well as in the name of the electors I have the honour to represent, my most sincere wishes for a good journey and a happy return. I ask Divine Providence to protect the right hon. Prime Minister, my famous neighbour, from any untoward incident, so that he may come back to continue the work he has so valiantly begun.

(Text):

Mr. Jean-François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Liberal rank and file—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pouliot: —I convey our best wishes to the Prime Minister. May I say bon voyage, good success in his diplomatic mission which is of the highest importance, and a safe return to his Canadian friends and fellow men.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do wish to express very sincere thanks to the Leader of the Opposition, the spokesmen for the other groups, the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne) and to the hon. member for the county where I had the advantage of spending some delightful weeks during the summer a year ago, for the good wishes they have expressed. I confess I do feel that I have the good wishes of all the people of Canada in undertaking this visit to several countries where, I can assure you, I shall be very proud to be received as an ambassador of Canadian good will.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): May I just add that I feel had Mr. Speaker been in the chair at this moment he would have seen fit from the chair here in this chamber to endorse the expressions of good will which have been expressed from all sides of the house to the Prime Minister.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow we shall take the amendment to the Post Office Act, and then continue with the Criminal Code.

It being seven minutes after six the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, February 4, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

ARMED FORCES

NUMBER OF ENLISTMENTS WITH PRIOR SERVICE AS CADETS

Hon. R. O. Campney (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, further to the answer given to a question asked by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness), which appears at page 1188 of Hansard of January 18, 1954, I can now give from additional information received the approximate figures of the number of former cadets joining the armed forces during the calendar year 1953. These are: Royal Canadian Navy, 353; army, 564; Royal Canadian Air Force, 700; total, 1,617. These figures are, of course, subject to final revision.

PRIVATE BILL

REFERENCE OF PETITION TO COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS

Mr. John Hunter (Parkdale) moved:

That the petition for divorce of Annie Bray Hodgson, presented on February 3, 1954, together with the report made thereon by the clerk of petitions on February 4, 1954, be referred to the standing committee on standing orders for such recommendations as may be deemed advisable.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

FEDERAL PIPE LINES—PROVINCIAL LIENS

Mr. Fulton:

In connection with the case of Campbell-Bennett Limited, v. Comstock Midwestern Limited and Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company, heard recently by the Supreme Court of Canada, and in particular in connection with the question of whether a provincial statute creates a lien on a pipe line falling under federal jurisdiction:—

1. Was the Attorney General of Canada represented by counsel at the hearing of this case?

2. If so, what instructions were given to counsel, and what position did he take as a result of such instructions?

Mr. Garson: I wish to answer this question orally. The answer to the first portion of it is yes. In reply to the second part, I have arranged with the hon. member for Kamloops to send across to him the brief filed on behalf of the Attorney General of Canada in this case.

Mr. Speaker: Answered.

BREAD FLOUR

Mr. Dinsdale:

1. What substances are added to bread flour as improvers by milling companies?

2. What quantity of these improvers was used for domestic consumption, during each of the past three years in Canada?

3. Is bone meal added to bread flour? If so, in what quantities and for what purpose?

4. What protein content is required for different grades of bread flour under the Food and Drugs Act?

Mr. Robertson:

1. The term "improvers" as used in the milling industry has meant bleaching agents and maturing agents. The term is no longer accepted by the department because its use is deemed to be misleading. Instead, millers are required to label flour in which bleaching agents have been employed, as "bleached". If maturing agents have been used, the statement "maturing agents added" must appear on the labels. These bleaching and maturing agents are permitted in all wheat flours. Some chemicals such as chlorine, chlorine dioxide and nitrosyl chloride are both a bleaching agent and a maturing agent at the same time, while potassium bromate, for example, is a bleaching agent only and ammonium persulphate is a maturing agent only. Section B.13.003 of the regulations under the Food and Drugs Act lists those substances which are considered to be bleaching and/or maturing agents, as follows:

(g) oxides of nitrogen,
(h) chlorine,
(i) chlorine dioxide,
(j) nitrosyl chloride,
(k) benzoyl peroxide mixed with not more than six parts by weight of one or a mixture of two or more of
(i) calcium carbonate,
(ii) calcium sulphate,
(iii) dicalcium phosphate,
(iv) magnesium carbonate,
(v) potassium aluminium sulphate,
(vi) sodium aluminium sulphate,
(vii) starch, and
(viii) tricalcium phosphate, in an amount not exceeding 100 parts of benzoyl peroxide for each 1 million parts of flour,

(l) potassium bromate in an amount not exceeding 50 parts for each 1 million parts of flour, and

(m) ammonium persulphate in an amount not exceeding 250 parts for each 1 million parts of flour.

It will be noted that limits are stated only for (k), (l) and (m) above; no limits are stated for the other substances since the amount of these latter chemicals that can be used is self-limiting at a very low level.

2. There is no way of estimating the quantity of the ingredients which have been used for domestic consumption in Canada. Since the amounts of some are self-limiting and of others are limited by regulations, it is reasonable to assume that the total amount of these ingredients is very small in relation to the amount of flour produced. Generally, millers do not use more than one bleaching agent and one maturing agent in any flour and frequently one compound performs both functions.

3. Under section B.13.004 of the regulations under the Food and Drugs Act calcium carbonate or edible bone meal in an amount that will provide in one pound of enriched flour not less than 500 milligrams and not more than 650 milligrams of calcium is a permitted addition. This addition is not compulsory. The addition of edible bone meal is required in Newfoundland. This is the only province in which such a law exists and it is designed to correct a local dietary condition. Enriched flour, supplied in the rest of Canada, does not contain edible bone meal or calcium carbonate, to the best of our knowledge.

4. The regulations under the Food and Drugs Act do not specify the protein content for flour. This is considered to be regulated by the fact that "cleaned milling grades of wheat" are stipulated as the starting point for the manufacture of all types of wheat flour.

CLARKE STEAMSHIP COMPANY

Mr. Thatcher:

1. During the last fiscal year, what federal steamship subventions, if any, were paid to the Clarke Steamship Company for their service between Quebec, Natashquan and Harrington, Quebec?

2. How many ships were used by the Clarke Steamship Company to provide this service?

3. How many passengers were carried during the period mentioned in (1)?

4. What freight cargo, if any, was carried during the same period?

[Mr. Robertson.]

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe):

1. Fiscal year 1952-53, $520,000.

2. Four—(two passenger cargo vessels and two cargo vessels).

3. 9,289 passengers.

4. 40,055 tons, 20 head of livestock, 14,025 bags of mail.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

COLLAPSE OF NAVAL BUILDING AT HALIFAX

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): May I ask the Associate Minister of National Defence the question which inadvertently I asked on motions yesterday, when you pointed out very kindly, Mr. Speaker, that that was not the right place to ask it? Has the minister any statement to make regarding the causes of and the losses resulting from the collapse of the new naval building at Halifax?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter relating to Defence Construction Limited. Early reports indicate that part of the roof structure and three walls of the storage and maintenance garage at H.M.C.S. Shearwater, Dartmouth, collapsed on Tuesday morning, February 2. A bus and several other vehicles were damaged. No personnel were seriously injured.

The cause of the collapse is not known. An investigation is being carried out by Mr. K. E. Whitman, consulting engineer of Halifax, who is a specialist in structural design of many years' standing. Officers of Defence Construction Limited and of the navy engineering division are collaborating with him in the investigation. The contract originally was for $279,000, I believe. The building is in two sections. One section is quite intact, that is, the section containing the machine shop. The storage section has collapsed apparently through the falling of one of the trusses. No one knows why it fell or what happened, but that is being ascertained by engineers.

The fact that the building was taken over by the navy almost on the day the truss collapsed is not material, because the contractor has guaranteed the structure for one year. It was a structure designed by the contractor who was both the engineer and the contractor on the job. I am stressing that the damage can be made good without loss to the crown. I may say that Defence Construction Limited, the organization that handled this contract for the government, has handled $512 million worth of construction which already has been completed, and this is the first accident of the kind that I know of in the course of that program.

Mr. Pearkes: What was the type of construction; wood, brick or stone?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Reinforced concrete walls and laminated wooden trusses. The design of the trusses was approved here in Ottawa. I am quite certain that the truss itself was not defective. My own theory, which is only a theory without having any data as to the collapse, is that there must have been a defect in the fastening between the truss itself and the walls. However, that will be determined and the damage made good.

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): May I ask a supplementary question? Has the contractor who was responsible for the construction of this building since been awarded a contract for another building for the navy and, if so, has that contract been held up pending investigation?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No, sir, it has not. This contractor is well-known and, as I say, has carried out five or six million dollars worth of work for Defence Construction Limited. The erection of the trusses was sublet to an Ontario firm, which is also a responsible organization. As far as the main contractor is concerned, the firm has always been good for its liabilities and I am sure it will be for this. There is no reason to question their integrity.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): May I ask a supplementary question? Is it a fact that during the course of the construction of the building in question representations were received from an engineering organization or association calling into question the particular method being used in connection with this laminated wood process?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Not to my knowledge. Laminated wood trusses are widely used throughout Canada. They were used with success during the last war, and they are used, not only in government construction but in private construction. As I say, the firm that designed and built the trusses and was responsible for their erection is well-known in Ontario. I know of no representations of that type having been made.

Inquiries of the Ministry

SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

SUGGESTED JOINT REFERENCE OF PROVINCIAL STATUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May I ask the Minister of Justice if he will approach the appropriate authority in the province of Quebec with a proposal to submit jointly to the Supreme Court of Canada an act of that legislature which, according to the press, has been finally passed and which is known as the freedom of worship act, to determine whether or not the act is an amendment to criminal law and therefore of doubtful validity as a provincial statute? Will the minister endeavour to secure the co-operation of the provincial government of Quebec with a view to obtaining the opinion of the Supreme Court of Canada?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I wish to thank my hon. friend for having given me notice of his question. In reply to both portions of it I may say that the Supreme Court of Canada does not have jurisdiction to determine whether or not a provincial statute is of doubtful validity on a submission made jointly by the governor in council and the appropriate authority in the province.

Mr. Coldwell: What was done several years ago in the case of the Alberta legislation which was referred to the Supreme Court of Canada? Was that not done through a co-operative arrangement between the two governments?

Mr. Garson: I am afraid I cannot answer my hon. friend's question from my own off-hand memory. There may have been correspondence, but the point I am making now is that there is no authority in the Supreme Court Act for the two governments to act jointly in submitting a reference.

Mr. Coldwell: The federal government may direct one.

DUMPING

REQUEST FOR ACTION IN CONNECTION WITH JAPANESE PIPE FITTINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Michael Starr (Ontario): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister, the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the conditions now prevailing in industries producing malleable castings, where serious unemployment exists and a reduction in the hours of employment is taking place, caused by Japan dumping pipe fittings into Canada, will the government give consideration to using the powers under the recent anti-dumping legislation to meet this situation?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I submit that that is a statement rather than a question. I have asked our people to let me know what the Japanese imports amounted to, and I find that from January to September, 1953, they totalled $83,000 as against imports of $3,480,000 from the United States and $330,000 from the United Kingdom. On the basis of those figures there is certainly no evidence that anti-dumping legislation is required. If it is anti-dumping legislation that is sought, the appropriate place to apply is the Department of National Revenue. If the hon. gentleman wishes to ask a question rather than to make statements, the place for it is on the order paper.

Mr. Green: Could the minister get the figures for the period following the end of September last year?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): They could be obtained direct from the ports of entry. I was using the figures available from the bureau of statistics. If the hon. member will put his question on the order paper, then it can be answered. It is not a question to be asked on the orders of the day. What is the urgency of it?

POST OFFICE

WINNIPEG—IMPLEMENTATION OF 40-HOUR WEEK FOR MANIPULATIVE STAFFS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General based upon a telegram from the Winnipeg branch of the Canadian postal employees' association, the text of which I have sent to him. Will the manipulative staffs of the Winnipeg post office be included when the 40-hour five-day week is implemented?

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. friend for giving me notice of his question, and also the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Viau) who asked a similar question. I am sorry to have to say in reply to both questions that I cannot give an answer because so far we have received no complete information from the civil service commission. It is quite understandable that they do not want to handle this on a piecemeal or hypothetical basis. I am sure that when they have set up the whole pattern for the implementation of the 40-hour five-day week we will be duly informed and then I shall be glad to give the information to the house.

WATER POLLUTION

NORTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—REQUEST FOR FURTHER INFORMATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Would he tell the house something of the actions of his representatives in the meetings they have had with representatives of the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan in relation to the pollution of the North Saskatchewan and also whether or not, in view of the dispute as to the responsibility being federal or provincial, his government has given consideration to amending the Criminal Code in order to cover a situation such as this, as a means of arriving at a permanent solution?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. As I told him and the house the other day, the chief of the public health engineering division of the Department of National Health and Welfare went to western Canada to confer with the appropriate authorities in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. I may say also that he has conferred with health authorities regarding the same problem in the province of Manitoba.

He advises that due to the complexity of the wastes being discharged into the North Saskatchewan river near Edmonton and the very small amounts of the various pollutants it has not been possible to determine the particular material or materials which are causing taste and odour problems in downstream water supplies. The low flow in the river at this time and the fact that the river is covered with ice are factors which are probably contributing to present conditions. The ice cover prevents oxidation of the pollutants.

The hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Weaver) had asked privately regarding the situation at The Pas in Manitoba. I can say that the use of activated carbon at The Pas appears to have corrected the taste and odour problem. Lack of equipment and treatment facilities have prevented a similar solution at water treatment plants between The Pas and Edmonton. The city of Prince Albert has made arrangements to treat its water with fluorine chlorine dioxide. Laboratory experiments have indicated that this treatment is effective in removing the objectionable tastes and odours.

With regard to my hon. friend's use of the word "dispute" as to jurisdiction, I must say that what I said the other day with regard to the competence of the particular authority in question does not, in so far as our relations with the provinces are concerned, justify, to the best of my knowledge, the use of the word "dispute". There is no suggestion on the part of the provincial authorities that the matter is not one within their jurisdiction. However, the matter is receiving continuous study on the part of the industries, the provinces and other interested parties and we have assured the provinces that we will be glad, within our constitutional authority, to continue to collaborate in the matter of providing whatever technical skill we have at our command.

Mr. Coldwell: And the legislation required?

Mr. Martin: What I have said covers the interjection which my hon. friend has just made.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. I wish to thank the minister very much for his statement. I know his department is co-operating, but certainly action of the most drastic nature should be taken. The minister's answer to my last question scarcely covers the matter. My question is, in view of the fact that it is admitted by the provincial governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan that this is a matter of provincial responsibility, has consideration been given by way of a permanent solution to the amendment of the Criminal Code in order to cover situations such as this?

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend knows that whatever responsibility the dominion government might have in this or like matters would come under the head of navigation. I suppose theoretically it would be possible, under the guise of criminal law, to deal with the situation. However, that is a matter which, as I indicated the other day, is being explored by the law officers of the crown and I do not think I would desire or be expected to comment on that at this time, and in any event this is a matter of policy.

Mr. Coldwell: The government has power to care for the health of fish in these rivers. What about the care of human beings, who are a great deal more important?

Mr. Martin: As my hon. friend knows, to the full extent of the authority given the federal parliament and the federal government under our constitution this government has not been remiss in meeting its obligations.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, to the fish.

Mr. A. M. Campbell (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, I intended asking the minister a question similar to that asked by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). What action if any does the government propose to take to prevent this pollution of Canadian rivers running through two or three provinces?

Mr. Martin: I thank my hon. friend for giving me notice of his question but, as he has just observed, it has already been asked. As a matter of fact, this very question was raised by the hon. member for Prince Albert on January 19, and on that occasion I made a careful and fairly extensive reply. That reply may be found at page 1234 of Hansard and I commend to my hon. friend what I said then.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

INQUIRY AS TO AWARDING OF CONTRACTS FOR BUILDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) regarding the removal of the film board to Montreal. The question, similar to one I asked the other day, is this. Will the contract be let before the house has had an opportunity of considering the estimates that will be necessary for the removal of the film board? That was the one part of my question which remained unanswered the other day.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I am not certain what procedure the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) has in his department for letting contracts, so I am not prepared to answer until I consult with him.

Mr. Coldwell: Then may I ask the Minister of Public Works if he will give the answer?

Mr. Harris: He is not here.

Mr. Coldwell: Will he consider it at the first opportunity?

TRADE AND COMMERCE—DEFENCE PRODUCTION

INQUIRY AS TO MERGING OF DEPARTMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe).

Would the minister care to comment on a report which appeared in the press a few days ago, to the effect that his two departments are likely to be merged into one department called the department of trade and production?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have not heard that rumour, but I can assure the hon. member that that will not happen.

POST OFFICE ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE POSTAGE ON LETTERS AFTER APRIL 1, 1954

Hon. Alcide Coté (Postmaster General) moved the second reading of Bill No. 168, to amend the Post Office Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in the debate on the resolution introducing this bill I have already stated the reasons for readjusting the postal tariff, and I have also answered criticisms directed against such a readjustment. However, I think it is necessary at this stage to again present the problem objectively and refute once more the arguments repeated over and over again by members of the opposition. I cannot refrain from observing that there will be a certain amount of repetition, but I shall endeavour to summarize fairly and as briefly and concisely as possible.

There is at least one point on which we all agree; that is that in the coming fiscal year 1954-55 the Post Office Department must pay additional expenditures amounting to a minimum of $13½ million. Not one hon. member in this house objects to the payment of increases to postal employees and mail contractors, nor to the additional costs to implement the five-day 40-hour week in the Post Office Department.

I have already told hon. members of this house that the aforementioned three items alone will cost the Post Office Department $13½ million yearly itemized as follows:

General salary increase	$ 7,000,000
Five-day 40-hour week	5,000,000
Increased remuneration to mail contractors	1,500,000
	$13,500,000

Indeed, it is self-evident that the hours of duty cannot be decreased by one-eleventh, or slightly more than 9 per cent, and pay cannot be increased by more than 8 per cent, without adding greatly to the $81¼ million per annum which the department pays to its employees. I am sure I need not labour that point; it is self-evident.

Everyone agrees that these additional expenditures amounting to $13½ million must be paid. Now, there are two ways of obtaining money to pay these necessary and additional expenditures; first, by readjustment of the postal tariff, and second, by general taxation.

We think the readjustment of the postal tariff, increasing the postage rate, is the most equitable arrangement to obtain the necessary money to pay the additional expenditures. With such an arrangement, the cost of service is borne by the users, and those who do not use the post office are not called upon to pay for those who use it. I repeat that I do not think it is fair to ask the office girl, the worker or the little man to pay for the stamps of the big firms like Eaton's, Morgan's, Simpson's, Dupuis Freres, etc.

All those who have criticized this bill which proposes the readjustment and increase of the postal tariff, whether they said it plainly or not, have supported the other way of obtaining money to pay the additional expenditures, that is by general taxation. In any event, all the criticism made by members of the opposition may be classified under one of the following proposals. First, we can take it out of general taxes; second, we can live off past surpluses; third, efficient administration will permit us to make enough savings to meet the added cost; and fourth, if we cancel subsidies such as franking, etc., we will not require added revenue.

I now plan to deal with these four main proposals of the opposition one by one. Their first main proposal is: "We can take it out of general taxes". As I said in the debate on the resolution, if we adopt the principle that postal revenue need not meet expenditures but that the revenues of the department should be supplemented by tax money, then we should have a truly subsidized service.

This raises the question of just at what point we stop subsidizing. Do we subsidize at a 10 per cent rate, a 15 per cent rate or a 20 per cent rate, and do we gradually allow ourselves to drift into deficit positions until we reach a point comparable to that of the United States, which they are trying so desperately to remedy? Their deficit reaches the staggering figure of $770 million in one year. A comparable figure in relation to the Canadian service would be somewhere in the neighbourhood of $50 million annually.

The adoption of such a policy would, as has been previously stated, mean that the small merchant, the little retailer, would be seeing his tax money go to subsidize a below-cost service to his mail order competitors. I am sure he would not relish the idea. It would also mean that the individual user of the mail, the person who writes a few letters each year, would see his tax money go to subsidize the big user—to give a simple illustration, the stockbroker who floods the country with material regarding mining or oil developments. The government has rejected—and I think for good and sufficient reason—this idea that the post office will live off the taxpayer and that we do not need to pay any more attention to balancing our books. This would tend to remove the incentive for careful management.

The second main proposal of the opposition is: "We can live off past surpluses". This point is an interesting one. Even if we could recover from the public treasury the amount turned into it during, say, the past 20 years, we should still find ourselves in the position that these alleged surpluses do not exist in fact.

The financial statements in the Postmaster General's report follow the statutory provisions of the Post Office Act. The statements have been prepared for years along the same lines, and naturally are for comparison purposes. They do not furnish a financial picture on the lines usually provided in connection with commercial or industrial undertakings. They do not take into account the services rendered by the department for which no financial recompense is received, nor do they charge the Post Office Department with the cost of services rendered by other departments of the government—to mention only one at this time, the public works department.

We do, however, maintain for our own guidance office estimates of what these various services amount to; and if we take them all into account, both debits and credits, the estimated total surpluses over the past 20 years would amount to slightly more than $20 million or approximately $1 million per annum. In recent years, however, these statements showed deficits, not surpluses.

Let me also make it clear that in arriving at these estimated figures of an average surplus over a 20-year period of approximately $1 million annually, we have not calculated nor taken into account the value of the services rendered to the department by the civil service commission with regard to recruiting, examination and other personnel matters, or by the Department of Finance in connection with the salary accounts of post office employees, the writing of cheques and the material and equipment utilized for that purpose. Neither do these estimates take cognizance of the fact that the Auditor General provides a free audit service. If these latter items were computed and taken into consideration the so-called surpluses over this long period would almost entirely disappear.

As I have said, it has been the policy of the department throughout the years to endeavour to live within its revenues. Political history will show that there have been occasions when Conservative governments were in power and that during such periods there was no attempt to change that policy. It might not be inappropriate at this point to quote a statement which is made in the January 18 Canadian edition of Time. This magazine, summarizing the President's message on the state of the union, mentions the following with regard to the post office department:

> To enable the mail to pay its own way, the President recommended approval of the bill now pending in the house to raise postal rates, including an increase in the regular inter-city letter rate from 3 to 4 cents.

This makes it clear that the United States government is abandoning the policy which the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) suggests we should follow. This second suggestion of the opposition, that we can live off past surpluses, is simply illogical.

The third main proposal of the opposition is: "efficient administration will permit us to make enough savings to meet the added cost". This brings up the subject of the report submitted by J. D. Woods and Gordon Limited, an incomplete account of which has already been given to the house but which, with the tabling of that report, can now be examined in its true perspective.

Let me first state that in presenting this report the firm of business consultants estimated that in terms of salaries and additional staff required, increased amounts of approximately $300,000 per annum at headquarters and approximately $400,000 in the field would be required if and when the recommendations were adopted, or a total of $700,000 per annum. Will those hon. members of the house who have been so critical of the administration of the Post Office Department and who have repeatedly demanded reduced administrative costs, please bear this increase in mind.

Before dealing further with this report, may I say that it is a strange attitude for the opposition to take that there is something wrong in consulting experts, and that when experts have something to suggest to improve the administration, this is in itself a clear indication of lax management. If such were the case, then there are many business firms in Canada guilty of the same laxity because business, in fact the better kind of business, makes use of consultative services such as those provided by the officials and staff of J. D. Woods and Gordon Limited.

Let me repeat here that it was upon the advice of the officials at headquarters of the department that my predecessor obtained the services of a firm of outside consultants. The postal officials recognized that with the growth of the service a greater measure of decentralization was desirable and that they had not sufficient time to devote to the task of making a survey of the organization and procedure without leaving undone some of the many daily tasks which require their personal attention.

I wish to make it crystal clear, beyond any possible misinterpretation, that there never was any question of maladministration or even of complacency on the part of the administrative officials. It was not any investigation of any wrongdoing or any lack of interest, but simply a request for a managerial report, a desire on the part of these administrative officials to ascertain if their ideas of development and decentralization were along sound business lines and in conformity with up to date practices. They wished to take advantage of the knowledge and experience and progressive methods possessed by outstanding business consultants as a consequence of their constant study and experience.

The fact is, as the report repeatedly states, that the department is well administered and departmental officers have vigorously pursued a program of efficient operation over the years. What better evidence of this is required than the fact that during the past 20 years the volume of mail has increased by 178 per cent whereas the increase in total staff approximated 100 per cent? It is simply by good, hard-fisted administration, by scrupulous attention to every detail, that this has been made possible.

What is the reaction of my friends in the opposition to this unquestionably efficient administration? The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) states he has nothing but praise and commendation for the way in which those who are carrying out their daily routine of mail service have been performing their functions. He pointedly remarks that his criticism is directed to the administration of the department. Other members of the opposition refer to the need for a housecleaning of these officials, and make other similar unjustifiable comments. Is it not strange, however, that during the same debate, in fact on the same day, still other members of the opposition were most complimentary in their references to the efficiency of the postal department?

The Woods and Gordon company do make a number of recommendations. I shall deal with them in detail later, but before doing so let me stress that the report states that many of the suggestions originated with the administrative officers at headquarters. Let me give you just one simple illustration of what was done by the departmental officials in the past, years before the survey was made. In the financial branch, on their own initiative and without any outside help, the officials replaced the old system of handling money order accounts which had been in effect for many years—incidentally, under both Conservative and Liberal administrations—by the new type of money order which effected not savings of hundreds of dollars, not even the $30,000 stressed by the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace (Mr. Hamilton), but over $350,000 annually. Many other such developments had taken place long before the Woods and Gordon company were called in.

The department has developed the mechanical handling of mail to a degree which is not even approached by many other first-rank postal administrations. We are now undertaking research to take care of the sortation and letter distribution problems of tomorrow by the utilization of electronics. It will be some little time before the complete machine is built, but it is another indication of the efficiency and progressiveness of the postal officials. It was by this kind of administration that we were able through all these years to more or less balance our books and not come to parliament asking for rate increases when practically every other business in Canada was imposing increased charges as a matter of course.

As I have already mentioned, payments to transportation companies have increased some 72 per cent. The salaries of employees have increased 100 per cent. During that time the increase in postal rates, applied to the whole range of charges to the public, had been approximately 22 per cent. The hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) gave a clear indication of what is being done when he referred to the fact that many years ago the revenue at Brandon was $110,600, with 44 employees. Now, with revenue of $217,120, there are only 41 employees. Like comparisons can be made in other offices. It was this close attention to routine administration and improvements in procedure that made the savings possible.

It was this same close attention to administrative details which occupied the time of departmental officials to such an extent that they could not look around to explore every field of potential future savings. Is this a crime? On the contrary, I think it is indeed a solid tribute to the zeal, energy and capacity of those men who have given devoted and efficient service over the years, and whose ability and loyalty to their duties some members of the opposition attempt to depreciate. May I again read what the Woods and Gordon company state on this point:

> We have been impressed by the over-all efficiency of the department and the basic soundness of its organization and administration. Many of the proposals incorporated in this report were brought forward by them. A number of important steps have been taken in recent years to improve both the organization and the administration. Further improvements are under active consideration by your senior officials and some are in course of implementation.

The summing up in the report is to the effect that departmental officials, if given more help, can free themselves from a lot of routine and they, and they alone, can make the savings which the report holds out, not as an immediate possible benefit but one to be derived in future years. May I again emphasize that they do not at any point in the report, or in any conversations I have had with them, indicate that these savings are to be realized immediately. What they say is that we must be prepared to spend more money at headquarters and in the field to achieve returns in the way of good service and possible economies in later years.

For my convenience Woods and Gordon Limited prepared a brief summary of the organizational and administrative items in their report, with some related observations. With the same reservation I made concerning the tabling of the main report, I am tabling the summary now, as it is much easier to follow than the lengthy main report.

Mr. Knowles: Are there enough copies available for hon. members?

Mr. Cote: This is the copy which was sent to me on the 17th of December, and which I am prepared to table.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Is it the intention of the minister that the document should be printed as part of Hansard?

Mr. Cote: I have absolutely no objection. If I may have the unanimous consent of the house I will agree to that.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask whether the summary is prepared by Woods and Gordon?

Mr. Cote: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: It is not the minister's summary?

Mr. Cote: No, this is a copy of the summary prepared by Woods and Gordon, which was sent to me on the 17th of December.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Is it the unanimous opinion of the house that this document should be printed as an appendix?

Mr. Knowles: As an appendix, yes.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Then it will be printed as an appendix to Hansard.

Mr. Cote: Now, Mr. Speaker, referring to the report, it is true that 73 major and minor recommendations have been made. But to say only this is unfair and incomplete, as I have already indicated, because the whole truth is that of these 73 major and minor recommendations 59 have already been implemented in whole or in part, nine are still under study, four have been rejected as offering no economy or improvement, and one is a matter of government policy.

In some instances it will take several months before the changes are finally completed. In addition, there are recommendations which require further study before they can be adopted as a matter of general practice because, while commendable in their conception, they are questionable from the standpoint of practical application. We do not, however, discard any of these recommendations until we have examined them thoroughly. Thus the sweeping statements to the effect that efficient administration will permit us to make enough savings to meet the added cost are swept away by the facts.

The fourth main proposal of the opposition is that if we cancel subsidies such as franking, etc., we will not require added revenue. Before dealing with the abolition of franking may I briefly refer to subsidies, which I dealt with rather fully earlier. The opposition suggest doing away with the franking subsidies and, in the same breath, suggest that we should have kept the excise tax which was in itself a subsidy to the Post Office Department. They cannot be serious in this suggestion, because they are so inconsistent. Surely this inconsistency shows that they are both for and against subsidies. They want to have their cake and eat it too.

Dealing now with the suggested abolition of franking, may I say that even if this were done the revenues obtained in that way would cover only a small fraction of the total additional expenditures of $13,500,000. Hence this is another futile suggestion, which brings no remedy to the situation. Moreover, the opposition is only presenting one side of the picture. The principle of franking is to give free mail communication to those seeking, as well as to those supplying, administrative information. The franking privilege is given so that free mail communication may be established between the Canadian public, the ministers and members of parliament.

If we abolish franking in one direction, it is only logical to expect it to be abolished in the other direction. Otherwise one group could very easily place the other in an untenable position, and thus the flow of information could well become a trickle in one direction and a river in the other. In order to obtain free administrative information, franking must be maintained in both directions. If, on the other hand, the opposition want to abolish franking in one direction, they must expect it to be abolished in both directions. It is a two-way street.

Thus, while the opposition suggest that the franking privilege be abolished, they neglect to show that the Canadian public will then have to pay for all mail communications sent to their elected representatives. The members of the opposition, therefore, while appearing to oppose a necessary increase in postage rate, are themselves at the same time proposing a further increase in mailing cost to the public.

I shall now deal with some of the statements made by my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition. I am following this procedure because it will also answer many of the questions asked by other members of the opposition. The Leader of the Opposition makes comparisons with the rates paid in other countries. He points out that the rate in the United States is 3 cents, but he does not mention that the authorities in that country, as I have already indicated, are endeavouring to increase their letter postage rates and that there is under study a measure very similar to that which forms the basis for the present bill. This has already been covered by my reference to the message from the President quoted in Time. Neither does the hon. member draw to the attention of the house the fact that during the last fiscal year the United States post office department had a deficit of $770 million.

In making his reference to postage rates in the United Kingdom he compares the rates paid there on the basis of exchange rates, rather than in relation to the United Kingdom economy. A rate of 2½ pence in relation to the British economy is practically the same as 5 cents in relation to the Canadian economy.

Mr. Drew: For how many ounces?

Mr. Cote: I am coming to that now. He mentions that this rate is for 2 ounces, but overlooks the fact that the maximum distance which a letter travels in the United Kingdom is not more than 500 miles whereas in Canada it may travel three or four thousand miles, a large part of which is by air transport with no additional charge to the mailer. A fairer comparison would be the rate paid in Australia, where conditions in so far as distance is concerned more closely approximate those in Canada. In that country the rate is 3½ pence, which in relation to the Canadian economy is 7 cents.

Moreover, the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell) said in the house that the rate paid on postcards in Poland is 6 cents and on postcards in Czechoslovakia, 5 cents. In addition, he said that the rates were much higher in Portugal, Egypt, and India. The figures I have for the United Kingdom and Australia, and the figures given by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert, show very clearly the inaccuracy of the statement by the Leader of the Opposition "that we will have the highest postage rates in the world."

He also makes reference, as did previous speakers, to the penny postage introduced by Sir William Mulock. He fails, however, to make reference to the increase introduced by the Conservatives in 1915 or to the increase from 2 cents to 3 cents made by the Right Hon. Mr. Bennett in 1931, and this at a time when the country was suffering from a depression.

The Leader of the Opposition indicated that it would be quite reasonable for anyone close to the United States to carry their letters, which would normally be posted in Canada and deposit them in the United States post office, in order to take advantage of lower rates of postage. He even went so far as to say that there would be nothing illegal in this. I must issue a warning to those persons who might take seriously the suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition. International postal regulations, to which every postal administration is signatory, expressly deprecate such a practice and specifically provide that the administration in which the letters are posted may either return the items in question to the country of origin or impose a surcharge equal to the amount of its internal rates.

The Leader of the Opposition made the statement that the government knew quite well when the excise tax on notes and cheques was removed that an increase in postage rates was to follow. I am rather surprised that my hon. friend would so disregard the facts. The first intimation of the discontinuance of the excise tax on notes and cheques was in February, 1953. The civil service commission did not commence the salary adjustment until sometime in the fall of 1953, and the first list of revised salary rates was published on or about the 1st of December, 1953. Furthermore, no decision was given by the government in regard to the general adoption of the five-day 40-hour week in the operating service of the Post Office Department until sometime in September, 1953. The bill authorizing a readjustment of the rates for rural mail couriers did not become law until the 14th May, 1953.

I am, therefore, completely at a loss to know on what grounds the Leader of the Opposition could possibly justify the statement made by himself, and other members of the opposition, when items which occasion the additional expenditures were not even contemplated at the time the excise tax on notes and cheques was removed.

The hon. member states according to page 1152 of Hansard for January 15, 1954:

> Surely we are not going to be told that there was no difference in the cost of the operation in the handling of the $7,500,000 worth of stamps.

Certainly there is a difference in the cost of operation, but not to the extent which the Leader of the Opposition endeavours to indicate. The actual cost of the stamps would be in the neighbourhood of $20,000, and the reduction in operating and distributing costs might be as high as $10,000, making a total of $30,000, which is somewhat far removed from the $7,500,000 which the post office has lost in the removal of this excise tax.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have again placed before the house most objectively the position of the government in regard to this bill. I have also answered all the major criticisms and many of the less pertinent comments of the opposition. I feel that this further constructive presentation shows without any doubt the soundness of the position of the government, and destroys alleged objections put forth by the opposition. I must say that the elementary principle that one thing cannot at the same time be white and black applies to everyone, and I am sorry to say that some members on the opposite side have sinned against this principle.

Mrs. Fairclough: Who is without sin?

Mr. Cote: I shall not look at you.

May I give still another typical example of this contradictory attitude by referring to the speech made by the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace (Mr. Hamilton) the other day, when, after having repeated for almost 40 minutes that the postal department should cut its expenditures, he concluded by asking that the same postal department spend $4 or $5 million more to give the service of a second delivery a day in residential areas. You cannot have it both ways. That is why I say that some of my friends on the opposite side have sinned against the principle that nothing can be white and black at the same time.

As I said a few minutes ago, we are all agreed that the additional expenditures of $13,500,000 are essential. There are two ways of obtaining the money to meet these additional and essential expenditures. One is by an increase in the postal rates; the other is by general taxation. So far I have not received from anyone in the house any other suggestion. We prefer the former. We feel that the cost of the service should be borne by the users and not by the taxpayers generally. We think this is an equitable arrangement. The opposition prefers the latter. They want to subsidize the service, with all the illogical and dangerous consequences to which I have already drawn attention.

The present issue is a clear-cut one. Foreseeable additional expenditures to carry out decisions already made total $13,500,000. The additional expense can be met either by taking it out of the general tax or by increasing postage rates. I recommend the straightforward approach so that the public will know exactly where they stand. I am of the opinion, as I have already indicated earlier, that the persons who use the service should pay for it, rather than that we should becloud the issue by subterfuge.

I know the measure is not a popular one in some quarters, but it is at least honest, and I am sure it will appeal to those members of the public who desire to pay their way rather than throw their burden on someone else.

Mr. Knowles: This is sin out in the open.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, with one statement and one statement alone of the Postmaster General I should think there would be agreement at this time, and that is that this problem should be discussed frankly. The speech we have just heard has followed the convenient practice—that is, convenient to some people—of attributing to members of the opposition statements they did not make, and then on that false foundation presenting an argument which had no relation to anything that had been said in this house in this discussion.

The minister has just read a tawdry political statement. It has been a review of political considerations which had no relationship to the immediate matter now before us. In fact, some of his statements reminded me very much of a quotation from "Alice in Wonderland" which I am sure he will recall:

When I use a word, it means just what I choose it to mean—neither more nor less.

The minister said that the opposition has suggested subsidies. Where has he found that? When the minister talks with horror of subsidies, will he explain to us how on the one hand he has such horror of something that was not suggested, while at the same time he conveniently overlooks the fact that the method he is proposing means a subsidy on a large scale to Trans-Canada Air Lines? The merits of that may be subject to debate on other occasions, but let the minister not suggest for one moment in this house that the proposal he is making is not a straight subsidy to T.C.A.

The minister has shed crocodile tears about the little man whom he is going to serve, as against the interests of the big man and the big business. He is doing the very opposite. What he is doing is charging the little man more than the big man who can use air mail, and get air mail service without paying for an air mail stamp. That is what he is doing. That really is exactly along the lines of the statement in "Alice in Wonderland" to which I have referred.

But, Mr. Speaker, there are other points that I should like to mention before I pass on to some of the subjects the minister discussed. He says that things cannot be black and white at the same time, and that it would be well if that elementary proposition were recognized. It would indeed. I want to speak about that. In tabling the memorandum prepared for him in December by J. D. Woods and Gordon the minister told us that he made it available to the house under the same terms as he made available the confidential report of J. D. Woods and Gordon.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have here the interesting question of when a report becomes confidential. I hold in my hand the report which has been under discussion, and I have not been able to find outside, back or front or inside, the words "personal, confidential" or anything that suggests that it is such. Again this bears repetition, because we see it in the words of the Postmaster General. What he tells us is that when he uses a word it means just what he chooses it to mean, neither more nor less. We do not need to attribute that to "Alice in Wonderland"; that is what the Postmaster General says. He says it is confidential; therefore it is. J. D. Woods and Gordon did not think of putting that covering restriction on it.

Again I express some surprise, Mr. Speaker, that what the minister regarded as a confidential report should have been so freely referred to in the statement made on behalf of the department, where it appeared it would be helpful to refer to it. Surely this is an elementary proposition, to use the term the minister used. If you use part of a document to support your argument, the whole document must become available. I know he will agree with me immediately in regard to that proposition. Therefore when the department sees fit to support its statement by partial reference to the document which was not marked "confidential", but which he says is, then we may ask ourselves, how are we to tell just which pages are confidential, which paragraphs, and so on?

The fact is that it is not confidential. It is part of the business of this house; it is part of the business which is to be attended to by the hon. members who are now able to devote more time to the business of the house or who will be able to as a result of the decision of a majority of the members within the past few days.

May I repeat that documents referring to administration which do not in some way affect security, or which do not in some way deal with matters that are subject to limitations of secrecy, are not in any way the private property of this government. One of the statements the minister made when he was setting up the false proposition was that we had criticized the appointment of this firm of specialists. I do not know where any such criticism was made. On the contrary, we have been urging that specialists in many lines be permitted to examine the organization of government and improve its efficiency, as we are confident could be done in many directions.

The minister made another statement that I should like to deal with before I pass on to something else. He referred to my remark about the invitation that this would offer in cities along the international boundary to firms and individuals to take their very large daily mailings across the boundary and buy stamps in the United States for 3 cents, which would perform the same service to any part of Canada as the 5-cent stamp would here after this bill passes. He said I had overlooked a provision in the departmental instructions where it is suggested that the department deprecates such a practice. Oh, we not only must abide by the law; we must abide even by the wish of this government. If the government deprecates, then nobody must do it. If the government deprecates, then that is enough to stop anybody doing it.

Mr. Cote: I just want to clarify that point. I was talking about the universal postal union.

Mr. Drew: I hope the people of this country will abide by the laws of Canada. The statement that somebody has deprecated a practice does not in any way affect the legality or propriety of anybody availing himself of such facilities as are presented in a perfectly legal manner. I would think most of us would regret if it became necessary or even desirable for anyone to go out of this country to get a service at 60 per cent of the cost he would pay for the same service here in Canada. This government are telling us about the need for continental integration, and surely they will recognize how readily it would fit into the picture of continental integration in business, in a very simple manner right across the border, if they invite this to be done.

I indicated quite clearly before that I did not think that would be a desirable situation. I repeat that there is no law against it. I also repeat, however, that if a service of that kind is available along the border it should be available everywhere else in Canada. It is not something that should be available to the few; and in this case it is not something that would be available to the little man about whom the minister professes to express such concern. It is something that would be available to the big organization which would find it useful and valuable where they were handling mail on a sufficiently large scale.

No, it is not big business or the person with lots of money who is affected adversely by this. It is the little man. Let me give an example, and I am ready to name the man who writes this letter, which is one of many that have come to me on this subject. It is written by a man named Harris.

Mr. Knowles: Of Grey-Bruce?

Mr. Drew: Not of Grey-Bruce; of Aylmer West. I shall simply read the first paragraph, which tells the story of the letter, and which is as follows:

> Dear Sir:
> I am a shut-in and very short of cash and I write a bit which is all I can do to put in time and a 5 cent postage means more cash and I have only $65 per month plus $2.50 interest to spend on household and the M.P.'s are increasing pay.

That is a comment by just one of the little men about whom the minister is expressing such concern. I submit that this expresses in simple terms the attitude of a great many little men in regard to the proposition now before us.

This is not just something effecting an increase of 1 cent in the cost of postage; this is something that increases the cost of mailing generally, particularly to those people who find the mail a very useful means for the exchange of ideas. Again may I remind the minister that the little man cannot use the telephone and the telegraph as readily as big business or the person of substantial income, nor can he use it in the free and easy way in which the government does. The postal service is the means of communication of the little man, and the result of this change becomes a substantial total when every penny must be watched over the year in which letters are written.

The minister says that we have put forward four different propositions: One, that we take it out of general taxes; two, that we live off past surpluses; three, that there be an increase in administrative efficiency; four, that there be subsidies.

Only one of those is correct; only one of those even moderately resembles the arguments that have been made. We have urged that administrative efficiency be increased and that new methods be employed to seek a wider kind of service which would in itself increase revenue. The minister, in referring to Sir William Mulock, whose name has been mentioned on different occasions, pointed out that since that time increases have been made. That is true. However, he should recall that when Sir William Mulock decreased the cost of postage stamps it was not because of a decrease in the cost of living or in wages or salaries. He believed that there would be increased revenue which would make this possible, through the increased use of the mail as a result of the lower stamp charge. That in fact was the whole history of the use of postage stamps from the time they were inaugurated during the last century.

This is something that might well be considered now because of the fact that the department has cut out deliveries and has made the usefulness of the mail service much less apparent. There is a greater reliance on the telegraph and the telephone by those who can afford to pay for it, particularly by the government or contractors operating on a cost-plus basis.

We believe there can be an increased administrative efficiency. We believe that the J. D. Woods and Gordon report makes that perfectly clear. While pointing out quite frankly and most satisfactorily from the point of everyone that they found a commendable measure of efficiency in the general administration, at the same time they pointed out many things that could be done and many specific things that would effect very substantial savings in themselves.

Just to deal with the four points that have been made, I do not recall the suggestion that it would become necessary to take this out of general taxes, if proper methods were employed. Then so far as living off past surpluses is concerned, my impression was that when the surpluses were referred to it was to emphasize that there had been deficits before and that following those deficits there were again surpluses for varying reasons, we will hope either because of new methods, increased efficiency or the increased use of the mail service.

Certainly my contention in pointing out the very large surpluses which had been accumulated was to suggest that when those accumulated surpluses became a deficit in a single year on this occasion, it should not cause any more concern than the deficits which had occurred twice in the past 30 years and which were followed immediately by substantial surpluses. My own conviction is that if the department will put into effect the recommendations of the J. D. Woods and Gordon report and will seek to supply a wider and more frequent mail service by many devices not yet employed but which are available elsewhere, in the immediate future that deficit might well be followed by surpluses once again. We believe there is no necessity to suddenly jump at this large increase because of the immediate increase in expenditures, without first testing other methods of meeting that cost.

The minister has said everyone agrees that the additional $13,500,000 must be paid in this way. Everyone does not agree. I do not agree; I do not believe most hon. members on this side agree, and I am inclined to think many hon. members on the other side do not agree either that this is necessary. Of course that $13,500,000, if that is the correct figure, will have to be met, as other increases will have to be met from time to time. But what we suggest is that there are different ways in which this can be done.

Let us see what some of the points are that might well be given consideration. The J. D. Woods and Gordon report was, after all, simply dealing with administration, and suggests methods of improving that administration. It did not come within the terms of their reference to make suggestions regarding policy. That is something which seems to have been overlooked by the minister. When they did not suggest changes in policy, that does not mean they did not think there might not be changes in policy. If they had been asked to recommend changes in policy doubtless they could have suggested certain changes.

They simply made passing reference to possible consideration of the fact that other departments are not paying for their services. When we begin to examine the subject we learn that the Post Office Department gives free service to other departments amounting to $4,700,000. But these other departments pay for their telegrams, and pay their telephone bills. They pay for other services they obtain. It would seem to me that good government accounting would suggest it would be advisable that these other departments pay for their postal service. After all, the public in the end is going to pay for this one way or another, and it would leave the actual departmental costs on a much more realistic basis. At any rate, there should be an examination of that fact before there is any suggestion that we simply go right ahead and meet that $13,500,000 by increased postage rates.

There is another figure that has been under consideration. The minister said we claimed that the stamp tax should not have been taken off. I do not recall when that was argued. What was suggested, and what I repeat, is that unless the government is even more inefficient in every department than we believe it is—and we certainly believe it is very inefficient in many—then it certainly knew when it took off the stamp tax what that would mean in loss of revenue to the postal department. That was what we said. What we pointed out was that at the time they took that tax off they claimed the credit for doing so, but offered no indication to the people that this would have to be paid for in the way it is now being paid for.

An election intervened. They told the public what they were doing, but they neglected to tell them they were going to claim later on that they would have to meet the cost in some other way. Do not let the minister suggest that the postal department was not aware of this. That would be an infinitely more serious indictment than anything yet put forward in this house. It would mean a complete lack of realism in their approach to the examination of their revenues. No, Mr. Speaker; the proper method would have been to indicate that this was going to have that effect and to have made the adjustment at that particular time within the Post Office Department to compensate for it.

I also pointed out that this $7,500,000 is not all lost revenue. Let us see just what that proposition means. That $7,500,000 represents the sale of stamps that would have gone on cheques if the law had remained as it was. Does the minister suggest that his department is so organized that it can sell $7,500,000 more stamps without any extra cost? To put it the other way, does he believe that the selling of $7,500,000 less in stamps means no saving in the cost of operation? That surely would be an indictment of the organization within his department. I do not believe anything of the kind, and I do not think he does. We have had no figure yet of what the net result would be, but that is a balancing saving which could be put against that amount.

Then, Mr. Speaker, there are the specific recommendations in the J. D. Woods and Gordon report. With all the complimentary—and properly complimentary—things said, the report states this:

On the basis of extensive tests we believe that the addition of staffs trained in time and motion study and in the design of equipment should result in improved operating methods and substantial savings in costs.

The minister says it has not been possible to introduce some of the new machinery, but let us hope that this will become available during the current year. Certainly the present increase in postage rates, which would be inclined to become permanent now, should not pay for a temporary situation which can be changed by the acceptance of that recommendation and the savings that would result.

I am not going to deal with the recommendations into research and planning and various things of that kind, all of which have their impact upon operations, but another recommendation in the J. D. Woods and Gordon report is this:

The operations of the post office savings bank should be discontinued or restricted in the interests of economy. The bank was established originally to meet certain needs of the public which can now be taken care of by other institutions.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is an interesting and well-known history in regard to this. In the early days of this type of post office savings bank there was not the general service of banks that we have today. When this system was introduced in England with exactly the same name it was to meet the absence of local services. In a large measure the same arguments prevailed here. Today there is hardly a little community that has not satisfactory banking services; and certainly with the increase in the number of automobiles and buses and better transportation facilities of that kind, banking services are within the reach of everyone who wishes to use them. Here is a recommendation which would make a positive and definite saving if it were carried out. The report states:

If it is decided to wind up the post office savings bank there would be an estimated annual saving of $377,000 per annum and the field organization would be relieved of much detailed work.

That amount of $377,000, Mr. Speaker, is not very much to this government which has symbolized or epitomized its view on that subject by the classic expression, "what's a million, anyway?" Nevertheless $377,000 is just one item.

I come now to the specific references to the departments:

The department—

That is the Post Office Department.

—is required to bear the cost of mailing privileges granted to other government departments and of carrying out government policy in connection with the subsidization of transportation—

Oh, that horrible word; that word which so alarms the minister when he thinks somebody else used it, although he did not. To continue the quotation:

—the transportation of certain classes of mail at rates which are below cost and the operation of various services such as the post office savings bank.

Then another quotation; and may I say that these are only samples of some of the recommendations.

Primary sortation is the first division of unsorted mail into a number of different groups. While this plan will require further development there is an indicated annual saving in the forward letter section of the Toronto post office alone of approximately $200,000 per annum.

Then the next one I should like to read is this:

It is apparent that one of the major fields for economy and improvement in service open to the department lies in modification of the transportation facilities and methods used for distribution to the areas surrounding the larger cities.

What that merely means is this. Let the post office keep up with the times. Let the post office recognize that conditions are changing and that there are many means by which distribution and collection can be facilitated which they have not even tried or attempted to try, so far as anyone knows.

Then let me give one other quotation:

While these suggested revisions in the organization structure of the transportation branch do not materially change the administration functions, they strike at the primary weakness—the lack of future policy and program regarding the extent and nature of transportation services.

Then from appendix "A" may I read these words:

The saving of $850 a day or, say, $250,000 a year would appear to be a conservative estimate.

May I say that is a small "c", Mr. Speaker; nevertheless it is obviously not the estimate put forward by this department. Going still further, and placing it on a still more conservative basis, the report says:

> Although no detailed costs are available, it would not be unreasonable to expect that the initial capital outlay would be paid for within a year and thereafter there would be an annual saving of $200,000 a year.

Mr. Speaker, these are only some of the recommendations, and these figures I have been referring to have been directed to only one area and to one municipality with regard to increased efficiency. They could be extended right across the country. We do not know what the possible total would be; but, Mr. Speaker, there is enough before us to suggest that before this house approves of placing the burden for higher-cost mail on the little man in this way, we should receive from the department some positive statement of the things they are prepared to put before us by way of recommendations.

I want to deal with the reservation made with regard to the tabling of this report because I think there should be no doubt and no uncertainty left on the record which would mislead anyone outside this house, now or in future years, as to what took place on this occasion. The hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace (Mr. Hamilton) asked if he could see this report. He did see it. The minister knew he was examining it. The minister knew perfectly well that a stenographer had been taken in there.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Are we not now embarking upon a matter which was dealt with previously? I think what the hon. gentleman is now trying to allude to is perhaps a matter with which we dealt previously, and which to my recollection has been settled, although perhaps not in a satisfactory manner. I merely want to point this out to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Drew: No, Mr. Speaker. I am dealing with a statement made today by the minister, that in tabling the summary he is doing so under the same terms as those applying to the report which was made available to us. For that reason we must examine those terms and the justification for any restraint on the full use of those documents and their availability under any circumstances. It is the minister who has raised this subject once again by simply saying, "You can place under what I said about the report, which I regard as confidential but which is not so marked, the statement that this reservation applies also to the summary." It is for that reason that I wish to refer to the matter, because these are the reservations.

In presenting the report—and this is the reservation which now applies to the summary which we have not seen—the minister said that in tabling it he was not creating a precedent. Then he referred to the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), and I quote the words of the minister as recorded at page 1280 of Hansard:

> After pointing out that it was not the practice to table such documents and that there was no obligation to do so, the Prime Minister said that a minister could of course table such documents if he felt it was desirable, and he asked me if I had any objection to doing so. I would not wish to do anything to alter the general practice or to create a precedent which would have a bad effect on the proper administration of government.

I want to make it clear, Mr. Speaker, that when the minister tables a summary today, it is no bad precedent or no bad practice. It is a practice which should be followed without any demand. This is the business of the people of Canada. This is something which is paid for with the people's money. The members of this house should know, and should have known all along, what is in this report. They certainly should know, as they now will, what is in this summary. Why should we not know that this firm of experts, paid from public funds, had made these specific recommendations which would result in substantial savings? Of course we should.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that in this case there has been no hint of any breach of the confidential relationship between a member and a minister or between a member and a document shown to him. The hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace had a perfect right to do what he did; and may I say that, in doing what he did, he offered to every member of this house an example as to how information should be placed before the house. When the opportunity was presented, he accepted it; and we are indebted to him for this information having become available to us, as it is today.

Then again, Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that there would be many reasons why the Post Office Department should explore the possibility of increasing the number of mail services, and of employing some automatic devices. The minister laughs. I regret to say, Mr. Speaker, that I think that exactly measures the approach of the minister to this problem.

Mr. Sinclair: Oh, be fair.

Mr. Drew: I am being perfectly fair.

Mr. Sinclair: You are not being fair at all.

Mr. Lapointe: Just because he does not look surly all the time—

Mr. Cote: I am sorry to say I was not even listening to my hon. friend. I would not like to impute to him ideas or thoughts that he does not have, and I think it is only fair for him to act in the same way toward me.

Mr. Drew: If the minister was not listening to me, and of course I take his word, then that indicates he is not interested in the subject we are discussing.

Mr. Cote: Mr. Speaker, I think this time I should be the one to tell my hon. friend that he is not fair. I may discuss things with my parliamentary assistant, which are interesting to me and which I must know, without telling my hon. friend what I am talking about. I think he should show me as much courtesy as I on my part would want to show him.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, if the story told the minister by the hon. member now sitting next to him was as funny as that—

Mr. Cote: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to say that there was no story, and I am very sorry to see that my hon. friend does not act as he should.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps we would make better progress if we were to discuss second reading of the bill. I do not think it is reasonable to say that a member, especially if he is a minister piloting a measure, is not interested in it because he happens at one moment during a sitting of an hour and a half to have a conversation with his neighbour, and perhaps has indicated that the remarks were appreciated by smiling. Hon. members know that some hon. members never laugh and others perhaps laugh all the time. They have a happy manner about them, and I think that is so with the congenial Postmaster General. I know there is no intention to offend anyone, and I would suggest that we simply carry on with the debate on second reading of the bill.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, now that the minister is in a position to follow the debate I shall proceed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Cote: Mr. Speaker, I shall not say what I think because if I did I would have to withdraw.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The minister has not said anything, but I do not think it was necessary on his part to even indicate that he has in mind some expression—

Mr. Cote: Inspired by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Speaker: —which he would have to withdraw. It amounts to the same thing. I think the matter should rest there. After all, are we going to dispute about something which really should not delay the house in its proceedings? I invite the Leader of the Opposition to carry on with his speech.

Mr. Cote: Mr. Speaker, I shall withdraw what I did not say.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, now that it is convenient I am directing my remarks to the minister. I was pointing out that there are many ways in which mail delivery could be stepped up by the employment of modern devices which are becoming available in increasing numbers and variety, and which are employed with such satisfactory results in many large industrial units whose plants are spread over wide areas. Devices useful in one area might not be useful in another, but certainly consideration should be given to some of these things.

The minister has quite incorrectly attributed to the opposition suggestions they never made. I am not going to comment on that or even say what I think about it. I am simply pointing out that the minister has suggested a number of propositions which were not put forward. Let him deal specifically with the points that have been made. Let him indicate to us how far he is prepared to go in examining new methods for the speeding up of delivery by mechanical and other devices now available.

The history of postal service has been a history of improved service in most organized communities. In some of the larger cities of the world today there are several deliveries every day. Many people in these larger communities seldom think about using a telegram within their communities, because in some cases a reply may even be received by mail the same day. That has been the history of the development of efficiency and the encouragement of the use of postal service. It does not increase the desire to use the mail for business and other purposes, if other methods are open, when the service is cut to once a day. The fact that mail is only picked up once a day and only delivered once a day often has the effect of delaying for two days mail that otherwise would have been received within 24 hours.

No one is more anxious than I am to see that genial smile on the face of the minister who is presenting this bill, but may I suggest that if smiles are to be found on both sides of the house he should not in future attribute to members of the opposition motives or statements such as were contained in the presentation he read to us this afternoon, and which I believe on re-examination he will agree do not correctly interpret the statements made by myself or other members of the opposition.

We are dealing with something that is related to our whole society. We are dealing with the oldest form of communication. The life of people throughout the whole of recorded history is set out in letters that have been preserved. There you find frank and uncensored opinions. You find the attitude of the people of the time with respect to both sides of a question. We find not only inspiration but much of the history of Christianity itself in the letters of St. Paul. We find the other attitude, the other side of the story, in the letters of the emperors and officials of the time who were opposing the expansion of Christianity. Right throughout we find the way people thought and acted disclosed in their letters. We find many of those little things that indicate how life carries one along some path. In looking for a quotation that I might use to deal with the situation, I happened to find a quotation from Pliny the Younger. Obviously, he had not been getting as many letters as he thought he should, and Pliny the Younger said in a letter addressed to his son:

> There is nothing to write about, you say. Well, then, write and let me know just this,—that there is nothing to write about;

From letters we can find how little life changes, and sometimes how little boys change, no matter how greatly the surrounding circumstances may change. That very wise, but not always acceptable writer, Voltaire, said that the post is the consolation of life. The old man who wrote the letter from which I quoted today was implying the same thing. Then, I recall the words of William James: "So long as there are postmen, life will have zest."

I do not suppose there is a single home where the arrival of the postman is not an exciting point in the day. I do not suppose there is a family where the arrival of the postman does not offer encouragement, and some news of their friends or relatives which is greatly enjoyed. An increase in that service is not only to be desired from the point of view of encouraging the use of the mail, but it is part of our society. I believe, on the one hand, we would be serving our people well by trying that out and by returning to multiple services. We would also be following ordinary business methods by encouraging more business, and in that way getting more revenue.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that this is a case that we should look at from the point of view of business, and the point of view of the relationship of the postal service to society itself. Before we are asked to impose this burden on the little man, for the benefit of those who will get free air mail service, I believe, on the one hand, we would be serving our people well by trying that out and by returning to multiple services. We would also be following ordinary business methods by encouraging more business, and in that way getting more revenue.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that this is a case that we should look at from the point of view of business, and the point of view of the relationship of the postal service to society itself. Before we are asked to impose this burden on the little man, for the benefit of those who will get free air mail service, I suggest we should have much more information before us than we have. Without any more information than we have before us now, it is certainly my intention to oppose this bill.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Obviously, the minister is going to have a rather rough time with this bill. He is suffering, of course, for the sins of his colleagues, and he understands that. He grieved publicly in his first few words when he said that the arguments of the opposition had been repeated over and over again. He is quite right. We have repeated them over and over again, but how can we possibly get them to enter into the heads of hon. gentlemen opposite unless we do? We have been singularly unsuccessful. I have a feeling that the minister takes the position that since he has made up his own mind, he is now quite prepared to listen to reason. For the next few minutes I hope to speak in terms of reason as to why we are going to oppose this legislation.

We have already made it clear that we are going to do so. The minister has not advanced as yet an adequate case which would lead us to support it, nor has he given us reasons which we think are valid. The position that has been taken is that the principal cause of the deficit in the postal department this year is the advent of the five-day 40-hour week, the increase in salaries and the increases to contractors. I think it is specious reasoning.

Why is it that the employees of an organization must always be blamed for any increase in costs? Is there not another reason behind it? Is it not the fact that before the election this government removed a tax which resulted in a substantial loss of revenue to the post office? Is it not a fact that after the election the same government is imposing the tax, but in another area? Had that tax not been removed originally, there would have been no reason for the minister coming here today with this bill.

The minister maintains that a public service should pay its way. I do not think there is consistency in that position as between the minister and his colleagues. After all, why should the post office be the only department which is expected to pay its way? It is true it is providing a service, and that service must be paid for somehow or other. I think, for instance, of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), who has a department which provides a very important service to the people of this country. It is a service which is called upon frequently. It is used widely, and yet those who use it are not asked to pay the costs of the Department of Labour.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has a department whose services are used throughout the country, and rightly so. Those who use the services of that department are not expected to see that the departmental books are balanced at the end of each year. The minister states that the people who use the service should pay for it, and he regards it as a principle. Is he suggesting he is the only principled member of the cabinet? Is he suggesting the Minister of Labour is unprincipled because his department does not pay its way? Is the Minister of Trade and Commerce unprincipled because he does not make his department pay on the basis of public service?

What about the Minister of Public Works? He is in charge of a development which provides a service to the people of Canada, a means of communication, the trans-Canada highway. Are the users of it the only ones who shall be expected to pay for this service? Is there a principle there, or is the Minister of Public Works again one of my hon. friend's unprincipled colleagues? The minister stands above and far beyond any of them on the basis of his own arguments concerning principles.

Perhaps there is another reason for the deficit. Again, I am going to bring up this dreadful word "subsidies". The fact is that the imposition of this tax is going to penalize those who use the first-class mails of this country, and none other. There are deficits occurring in the post office because of hidden subsidies. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) pointed out when he spoke that there is a hidden subsidy to the newspapers in this country in the form of mailing privileges. As he argued, and as I argue, why should that subsidy be borne by the post office? Why should that subsidy not come out of the consolidated revenues of the country, instead of asking one group in Canada, the users of the first-class mails, to pay for it?

The minister used the word "equitable" in this respect, and he considers this legislation is equitable. He said the cost of the service should be borne by the users. The fact is, however, that the cost is not being borne by the users; the cost is being borne by only that particular group using the first-class mails. That is not equity, and that is not fair. Were the cost to be spread across the whole population, then perhaps there would be a different approach to this subject. One of the newspapers which, of course, benefits from this hidden subsidy is one which a person would expect would protest most loudly against it. In Winnipeg, we have the Winnipeg Free Press which, on past occasions, has opposed all manner of subsidy to anyone else, but of course not to itself. I see no reason why I, as an occasional user of first-class mail—I say "occasional" because most frequently I use the frank—should have to help subsidize the Winnipeg Free Press. I agree that it might be unfair to ask the small storekeeper to subsidize the large operator of the mail order system, but any subsidy in the Post Office Department should come out of the consolidated revenues and not be charged against one particular group.

In this particular respect I should like to know, and perhaps the minister can enlighten us later, what is the actual cost of delivering a letter which goes by first-class mail. I know that in the United States the cost is a little over 3 cents. It would be very interesting to know what the cost is in this country. We should then be in a position to find out how much the users of first-class mails are going to subsidize other users of the postal system in this country.

There is another matter which I should like to bring up. It concerns a type of inefficiency which we find in the post office organization. It is not an inefficiency amongst employees; it is not an inefficiency in the staff anywhere. I, in common with all others, receive my mail; be it rain or shine, be it 40 below or 100 above, I get my mail. I have no complaint in that regard; I have written to the postmaster in Winnipeg asking him to thank the staff for the help they have given. But there is still inefficiency in the post office, and there always will be inefficiency as long as the post office is used as the medium of political patronage. That is happening today. And when you get politics interfering with the administration of the post office, there, I fear, you are going to get unwarranted expenditures at the cost of course of the public.

There is a situation which exists just now in Winnipeg, and if the government would capitalize on it they could perhaps get some revenue, but I suggest it would be revenue taken in a most iniquitous way. This is actually what happens, and this is what leads to inefficiency in the post office. I have already taken the matter up with the department. This particular case will not be new. There is a drug store at Inkster and Main in north Winnipeg which has been a sub-post office for over 40 years. As an institution people know it is there. They are well looked after; the service is good.

One of the prominent members of the Liberal party in Winnipeg went to this drug store some months ago and said to the druggist: "You realize this drug store has been here for a long time and there is some rumour that there may be a change." I should say there had been a change in the ownership of the drug store. The new owner was an ex-serviceman who had fought for his country, and when he came back he bought the drug store and of course got the sub-post office, after the department had approved of the change. Since he was somewhat worried, the druggist, Mr. Chapman, went to see this prominent gentleman who had approached him and said: "What exactly do you mean, sir?" He was told that it was an expensive thing carrying on a political party. The Liberal said: "We need money; you have had the drug store for a long time. There might be a change, but I think the change could be averted if you could pay us the sum of $500." I am not saying that in north Winnipeg $500 is the usual price. There are some who pay only $200, but I imagine it ranges from $200 to $500 for the right to have a sub-post office. Is that the right way and the efficient way to go about creating a public service?

I have been approached, and I am sure other hon. members have as well, to assist somebody in getting a sub-post office. I do not know why they would possibly want it. I can conceive of it as being nothing but a headache, but they want it. I have said: "The department itself must decide, but I would suggest to you that you put in your store forms of petition asking people who come in to sign to the effect that they would like to have a sub-post office there. Then when you have enough names, send them in to the department and let it decide." Surely that is the reasonable way of going about it, because the department must know better than anyone else whether or not there should be a sub-post office in that location. But it does not happen that way.

During the election a druggist quite near to my committee room came to me and said that the post office had taken away his sub-post office. I found out the reasons why. They were perfectly proper. There was a change of ownership, and the post office naturally closed down the sub-office so that an audit could be made and an accounting could be taken. This man wanted a sub-post office and he approached me. I telephoned about his case to the head of the postal department in Winnipeg. A day or two later, knowing that it would not be an infraction of the law in any sense whatever, I took into this drug store a couple of C.C.F. window cards. The druggist put them in his window; that was all. The next day I went around and I found that the cards had disappeared and Liberal cards were in their place. Being somewhat intrigued I went to find out why and I was told that my Liberal opponent had gone into that drug store and had said: "Now, look here, do you want to get the sub-post office back? If you do, take the C.C.F. cards out and put Liberal cards in their place." I was not prepared to argue. The whole business was utterly absurd but it was the culminating act of many. That day, or the day after, I sat down and dictated a letter to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), a letter which I never sent for the simple reason that on the day I dictated it the sub-post office was granted. This is what I had to say. Since I was prepared to send it, I think I should be prepared to read it. It is dated July 22, 1953, and reads as follows:

The Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent, P.C.
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Dear Mr. St. Laurent:

I have already complained to the Postmaster General of cases of unmitigated blackmail on the part of some of your supporters in Winnipeg.

I consider it blackmail when a person has to pay to render a public service. I continue with the letter:

There has been no action yet that I know of.

A Winnipeg man has applied for a sub-post office in his drug store at Mountain and Main in this city. Money has already been demanded from him by members of the Liberal party for the favour. The public need apparently does not enter into the picture.

The druggist had one of my election cards in his window. My Liberal opponent went into the drug store this morning and insisted that my card be removed immediately and his substituted. The druggist was warned that if he did not do so, the recommendation for the sub-post office would be cancelled.

I call this blackmail. It is a form of venality which has no place in public life in Canada and I would like to know within the next few days what is going to happen to this man's application for a sub-post office if he keeps my card in his window.

I cannot see for the life of me how the post office can assert its efficiency when certain areas are so dependent upon political pressure. The sooner that type of pressure is taken off the department the sooner will it be the efficient vehicle which we hope it can become. We in the C.C.F. are dissatisfied. We are dissatisfied with the measure which is before us. We cannot agree with the suggestion which has been made that there should be an increase in rates, because we see no justification for the increase either in reason or in logic. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Thatcher):

That Bill No. 168 be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house a parliamentary committee should be established for the purpose of making an inquiry into the organization and operation of the Post Office Department and the postal services of this country.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Knowles: There is an amendment.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, I was interrupted in my listening to the hon. member's speech. Before I read the amendment I should like to tell the hon. member that, prior to the moment when someone came to the chair to speak to me, I had been listening to him intently and I was wondering whether he was not drifting away from the principle of the bill.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I had suggested an alternative form of revenue which is quite iniquitous.

Mr. Speaker: It may be I was particularly attracted to the little story that he was telling the house, and that was the one which I felt was not precisely in order.

Miss Margaret Aitken (York-Humber): In the few brief months that I have been in this house it seems to me that one chief topic of debate has been increases. Here, there and everywhere, we are talking about increases for the unfortunate taxpayers.

Since this bill came forward I have had a good many letters from people in my constituency. They have not been letters from angry taxpayers, and they have not been anti-government letters, but I have found them pitiable and bewildering letters. Most of them are from old age pensioners. They tell me that when you have to live on $40 a month this extra penny becomes a real burden.

The minister told us today that the government does not believe that the Post Office Department should live off general taxation because that would mean that those who do not use the mails would be paying for those who do. I agree with that viewpoint, but I go further. Surely there are other ways of increasing postal revenues. This general increase certainly hits what the minister calls the little man far more than it does those who can afford it. As my leader said earlier, the little man is subsidizing the carrying of air mail more cheaply for the big man.

I suggest that one way in which revenue could be raised is to put the stamps back on cheques. Those who can afford to write cheques can certainly afford to buy stamps, whereas those who have to live on $40 a month simply cannot stand this extra burden. I would suggest that the seven-cent air mail postage be maintained. Those who want speedy delivery of their mail can afford to pay for the privilege.

The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) has called this a back-handed subsidy to the T.C.A. Why should those who cannot afford the luxury of the T.C.A. be asked to pay this subsidy? Let those who want speed pay for it.

Truth to tell, I view with some skepticism the worthiness of the claim of speed and efficiency in our air mail service in Canada. In increasing the postal rates the minister offers us something of a sop when he says that he is decreasing air mail rates. I must say that he presented this sop in a most beguiling way. He told us that the air mail rate would go down to five cents and that, wherever it was expedient to do so, letters would be carried air mail whether they were so designated or not.

I do not feel too happy about this promise. The other day the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) said that we wanted to do everything too fast, that we want a letter to reach its destination just a few minutes after we have written it. That of course is unreasonable. I have here three envelopes which were mailed from Toronto addressed to Woodstock, New Brunswick. Ordinarily these letters would take two and a half or three days to go from Toronto to Woodstock, New Brunswick. There was no extra postage on them, just the four-cent stamps, but they went air mail with speed and dispatch. In fact they went at such speed and dispatch that it took them 11 days to go from Toronto to Woodstock, New Brunswick. An interesting thing about it is that they went around by Goose Bay, Labrador, in order to reach their destination.

I wonder if the minister would consider a pithy little suggestion which a Toronto writer put forward the other day. Perhaps he would put out a six-cent stamp which would provide that the envelope would go by train only. This business of having our letters go air mail whether we want it or not is not always to our own advantage.

Mr. Cote: If my hon. friend will hand me those letters I will inquire the cause of the delay, whether it was by accident or otherwise.

Miss Aitken: I am opposed to this increase in the postal rates. I am not even convinced that it is necessary. One hon. member called it a preventive measure. If the Post Office Department needs increased revenues they should put the stamps back on cheques. I know it is a nuisance tax but there will not be an election for at least four years and they can get away with it for that long.

The cheque stamps would be a nuisance but they would not be the hardship to anyone that this general increase will be. I suggest also that we keep the extra two cents for air mail postage and let the T.C.A. woo and win its own customers instead of having them handed to them on a silver platter. Let us not allow one of the most important facets of Canadian life, the means of communication, to become a luxury instead of the right of every citizen rich or poor. For that reason I am opposing this bill.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question for the sake of clarification. The Woods-Gordon report made one recommendation which on the surface seems to have a lot of merit. It suggested that if the post office savings banks were discontinued probably the banks could provide most of the service required and the taxpayer would be saved, I think it was $377,000. Listening to the debate, I do not think the minister has as yet made clear the government's position with regard to that recommendation. If it is true that that amount of money can be saved without resulting in any inconvenience to the people of the country, then I think we should know whether the government intends to proceed with that recommendation.

Mr. Speaker: The minister cannot answer now as we are not in committee. The hon. member has asked his question and it will appear on Hansard. Perhaps when the minister takes advantage of the right to reply he may answer the hon. member, or the question could be answered when we are in committee on the bill.

[Miss Aitken.]

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief as usual. I contend that those who use the postal service should pay for it. I do not think that anyone who has attained the age of 65 or 70 years and has only $40 a month in the way of income will have very many stamps to buy.

Considering the opposition to the increased indemnity, I was hoping that the C.C.F. would bring in a motion supporting the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart), who suggested that we cancel our franking privilege. We are getting an extra $4,000 a year and we should be able to pay for our own postage. Why should we ask the man getting only $40 a month to pay for our postage? Let us cancel our franking privileges and wind up this thing and help the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote).

I would like to speak longer on this because I think there is a lot of sense in it, but we have not heard anyone except the hon. member for Charlotte say anything about cancelling our franking privileges. If that were done it would result in more revenue for the Post Office Department and there would be a lot less mailing done.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I want to add a few words at this time in support of the amendment before the house. I believe this amendment, which calls upon a committee of this house to obtain the fullest possible information on the operations and administration of the Post Office Department and for the bringing in of recommendations that might be of assistance in providing more efficient postal services, is vitally necessary at this time. If I was not in favour of the amendment before then, the speech of the Postmaster General convinced me that it is necessary, because the more he spoke the more confused the entire situation became.

I believe his proposals are contradictory. This afternoon, for example, the minister time after time reiterated that those who use the mails must pay for them. I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that until he has demonstrated that the principle which he enunciated is in effect, then he has no business whatsoever in asking this house to authorize an increase in postage rates. The minister is definitely putting forward a basic principle which he himself knows is not in effect, because those who use the mails in all categories are not paying for the services they receive.

I am not going to take up the time of the house in expounding at too great length what has already been mentioned by several speakers this afternoon, namely, the matter of second-class mail. If the minister is correct in his assertion that those who use the mails should pay the costs, then he ought to carry through his own contention and make those who use the second-class mail carry the second-class costs. If this were done I am convinced, from what I have heard, that there could not possibly be any deficit in the coming fiscal year.

As regards the minister's contention that those who use the service should pay, I want to add my voice in support of those who have already said that the various departments of government should not have the right of using the frank, which admittedly is a charge of $4,000,000 on the Post Office Department. That $4,000,000 is for administrative costs of government itself and administrative costs of various departments and it should honestly be charged as such. If that were done, there would be an immediate saving of $4,000,000—I believe that is the correct figure—on the charge for postal services.

There is another angle of this phase of the department's operations and that is this question of franking privileges. I am convinced an examination of this question would not only place the postal service in its right perspective, but would also save the taxpayers of this country a great deal of money. I have been absolutely amazed in the time I have been here, since becoming a member of parliament, at the terrific amount of mail I receive from government departments. I would make a bet, if it were legal to do so, that if a check were made on the wastepaper baskets in members' offices this very evening there would be found such a stack of envelopes and discarded material from government departments as to astound everyone. I have spoken to member after member and they have told me they have reached the point now where they do not even bother to open much of that mail but simply tear it in half and throw it in the wastepaper basket.

An hon. Member: Not here; we open it and study it.

Mr. Winch: If you spend time on reading all the material from government departments, I do not know what you can possibly get out of it.

I believe that from the angle of efficiency and of lowering costs the minister's own principle of making those who use the mails pay for it should be extended to all categories of mail. Until that has been investigated by a committee of this house the increases proposed by the minister should not be passed at this time. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am very strongly in support of the amendment which is now before the house.

Mr. R. H. Small (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, the speech of the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote), supplementing the remarks made when a resolution calling for an increase in postage rates was presented to this house, has little to commend it because the minister failed to establish by facts and figures his contention that the increase is necessary.

According to the Postmaster General the estimated deficit for the department will amount to $7,500,000 through the loss of revenue due to the cancellation of the excise tax on stamps for use on cheques. He estimates that there will be a $5,000,000 deficit due to the adoption of the 40-hour week; $7,000,000 due to the increase in wages of general post office staff; $1,500,000 due to an increase to rural mail couriers; and approximately $1,000,000 covers increased awards to railway companies. All these estimates belong in the realm of conjecture.

The addition to post office revenue of moneys arising from excise stamps on cheques was unwarranted, for this tax had its proper place in the consolidated revenue fund. To suggest the inclusion of the receipts from this tax in a post office department surplus or deficit was entirely wrong in the first place, and the only conclusion that can be drawn is that it was an indirect way of supplying the funds that were necessary for subsidies and subventions within the department. It is now apparent that these concealed subsidies will have to be paid from the consolidated revenue fund and not from postal revenues.

As to the deficit attributed to salary increases, it is quite evident that the predicted deficit will disappear through the normal expansion of business which, according to the department's own figures, shows an average increase per annum of $4,100,000 and which in turn exceeds expenditures by $100,000 per annum.

Further support for the claim that the government has blundered in proposing increased postal rates at this time may be found in the J. D. Woods and Gordon, Limited, report, which was so abridged in the Postmaster General's report that one could only obtain the gist of its content. After reading a major portion of this report I came to the conclusion, as many hon. members have surmised, that the department has allowed the perfection of its service to deteriorate because of inadequate staff and equipment, and that an overburdened staff could not cope with the demands of an expanding economy and an increased population.

It is my contention that the department has only to put into effect the recommendations of the report in order to return to its previous halcyon days. Had the government made a sincere effort to study this report they would have found it a veritable gold mine of useful suggestions, observations and recommendations. It clearly points the way for the pay-your-way advocates. Here are a few comments from the preamble to the survey. I am quoting from page 11:

> We have been impressed by the over-all efficiency of the department and the basic soundness of its organization and administration.

The Leader of the Opposition drew attention to that quotation. But page 12 contains this, and I quote:

> Prior to war, the services were steadily expanding. During the war the expansion accelerated and has continued at an ever-increasing pace. The established policy of successive governments was that expenses should be kept within the confines of postal revenues.
>
> That expenditures on salaries and services have increased substantially since 1945.
>
> There was also a substantial increase in the volume handled.

On page 13 the report continues:

> The principal object of the survey was to consider the over-all organization structure, for improvements in the service, and not merely ways and means of cutting costs.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that survey has the right approach as regards the method of improving the service without reducing staff.

On the general over-all organization of the department we find these recommendations on page 16:

> (f) Provide and arrange for the erection of letter boxes or other receptacles at such locations as he deems appropriate, in which mail or mailable matter may be deposited or stored.

I will have further comments to make upon that matter later. On pages 19-20:

> That decentralization has gradually taken place through pressure of events.
>
> The senior officials of the department raised the problem of the difficulty of carrying out adequate operational planning under adverse circumstances, as they were fully occupied in their daily routines, with no opportunities to appraise the over-all situation and plan for the future.

Then on page 21 you will find this:

> This is common to all organizations operating on a stringent budget. The staff who should be dealing with long-term plans are called on to assist in meeting the peaks of normal operations, and gradually become so involved in routine matters that they are unable to carry out their planning function.
> Steps have already been taken to deal with this problem by some appointments, headed by a special assistant to the deputy postmaster general.

> However, it is apparent that the number of qualified staff presently available for this type of work is completely inadequate to deal with the problems encountered throughout the department.

Here again is shown the need for more staff, and an effort made to meet the situation by the appointment of a key official.

At page 27, under "Grades of Staff":

> In an operation of the magnitude of the Post Office Department, it is essential to have a sufficient number of top level positions of adequate remuneration to provide the incentive to high calibre men to join the service and make it their career.

Then on page 33, section II:

> The work of the operations branch has over the years increased to the point where the staff at all levels are overloaded with a multitude of routine problems and correspondence. No one has had time to develop policies which can be applied on an over-all basis.

Then on page 34 under the heading of "Adequacy of Staff":

> It is essential that detailed consideration be given to new construction in order that the most efficient operating methods be incorporated in the designs. Quite properly, the postal superintendent in charge of the buildings division has concentrated on this phase of his activities. All the staff in the division have been so engaged and they have not had time to seek out and introduce operating economies throughout the existing post offices. Our survey has disclosed that there is room for substantial savings through better lay-out, equipment and control.

Then on page 35, under "Equipment and Material Handling":

> Certain improvements in equipment or methods which have been introduced in some post offices have not been made available to other offices as there is no machinery to pass on the experience gained or to ensure that the most efficient methods are used throughout the organization.
>
> Our examination has indicated that there is opportunity for substantial savings if the best use were made of staff and equipment.

Controls.

> The branch is operating under severe handicap as there are no standards established to measure the relative efficiency of a given method of operation. The lack of such standards is particularly felt when requests are received for additions to staff or accommodation. The lack of such a standard also makes it difficult to appraise the benefits which might be obtained from improvements in methods and equipment.

On page 37, under "Mechanical Engineering Division":

> This division should make detailed examination of the equipment and lay-out presently in use. This study will disclose great differences in equipment. Equipment installed many years ago is still being used, although more efficient equipment is available, and no attempt has been made to standardize it.

On page 39, under "Postal Service Division —Letter Carrier Service", we find this. I may say that this is one matter in which we are all vitally interested.

> There is a need for a re-appraisal of the services being provided at various centres across the country.

The department should be continually examining the nature and extent of services provided, and be prepared to make alterations to keep pace with changing conditions.

At pages 39 and 40, under "Revenue, Post Office Division":

It is essential that this division should delegate operating responsibility and authority to the field organization. At the present time, decisions are based on information collected in the field. This results in voluminous correspondence, and delayed action. In many cases, the men who collected the information in the first instance are in the best position to make the decisions.

I would add this. There is in the department nothing more disconcerting and more demoralizing than to have suggestions offered by the staff with regard to various improvements either ignored or not acted upon. Under "Methods and Procedures", on the same page we find this:

The staff available for this work has proved inadequate, and the existing manuals were in many cases issued years ago and are now to a large extent obsolete.

The production of up-to-date operating manuals should more than repay the expenditure involved in staff salaries required to prepare them. At the present time, there are numerous errors occurring throughout the service, and the correction of each one requires the expenditure of time and labour. Clear instructions should do much to reduce the number of errors.

It should be quite apparent to anyone who is on the operations staff that that would be good business and would be a good method of improvement. Here again is failure to take full advantage of information gained and to introduce needed improvements. On page 42, under "Workshops":

It was noted during our survey that a number of these workshops have extended their activities to the manufacture of equipment, such as cupboards, waste paper containers, binneys and skids, and to the repair of typewriters and other office equipment. These workshops were not established for this purpose, and it is questionable if this type of work is economical.

At pages 43-44, under "Time Study—Equipment Design":

One of the time consuming tasks in the post office is arranging letters on their arrival so that the addresses can be read and the stamps cancelled, —the "facing-up" and "primary sortation" operation. The use of conveyor belts and changes in equipment would allow two operations to be combined. While this plan will require further development, there is an indicated annual saving in the forward letter section of the Toronto post office alone of approximately $200,000 per annum.

Work Place Layout

In our opinion there is a tremendous scope for this work, and we feel that the benefits which would be derived would far outweigh the cost.

Post Office Act

Here is a case where they venture to place the saving at 20 per cent. At page 49, under section III, "Transportation Branch—Planning":

Pressure is continually brought to bear on the branch by the public, or through their parliamentary representatives, to institute new services, or to extend existing services. The officials investigate these proposals and finally accept or reject the individual submissions.

These decisions are often difficult, for while the cost of providing a service can be calculated, the benefits are not easy to evaluate. This has left the branch in a position of continually taking a defensive stand in regard to new proposals.

Little effort has been made to appraise the whole transportation problem, and to develop a rational plan or policy to govern future operations and methods. This lack of planning appears to be the most serious shortcoming of the branch.

At page 57, under "Establishment and Extension of Services":

The department in many cases has not considered the establishment of completely new services, or the extension of existing services until public demand has drawn their attention to the need for such action. This has resulted in the services varying according to the demands of the public in various parts of the country.

There should be a constant review of the services to be in a position to anticipate complaints.

At page 57, under "Transportation—Within Cities":

A limited survey of conditions in Toronto disclosed that the planning of this pick-up and delivery service had not been given the consideration which it deserves. A careful planning of routes and scheduling of services should reduce the transport required by the contractor, and the time the transport would be in use, thus reducing the cost to the department. In larger cities, where continued changes in traffic regulations are being made, this is a full time job. Officers should be appointed to study this problem.

The last three quotations I just read from pages 49 to 57 give a fair and impartial summation of what has happened generally, but particularly in suburban areas, and the members representing such ridings know the end result thoroughly, because they are constantly approached by their constituents to improve these services of which they are so sadly in need and to which they are entitled. On page 58 rural mail couriers are dealt with as follows:

This question has many broad aspects, and a clearer policy seems indicated. It would include further developments on standards of service, and the possible introduction of fulltime couriers employed, and provided with motor transportation.

I will go further here and make the comment that in the report reference was made to the fact that there was supposed to be a study of the situation with regard to rural mail delivery by a committee of the house. But that was not pursued further and no action was taken with the exception that an increase was granted to them. That has been the only action so far. There still has not been any investigation of the conditions under which rural mail couriers find themselves. On pages 76 and 77, in section V dealing with the administration branch, there are the following observations and comments under the heading "Financial and Statistical Controls":

> It has been recognized in the department for some time that there is a lack of information on which to base policy decisions and control activities. The only existing data which can be used to compare the operations of two post offices is the dollar revenue received by post offices. This is not an adequate measure of the volume of work performed by each. This lack of information is particularly felt when additional staff or space is requested. It is not possible to decide whether these requests are justified by comparison with other similar operations.
> A cost division has been established to devise a practical method whereby the cost of handling various types of mail could be established or estimated. It has made some progress and each year reduces the cost of the various postal service estimates.

On pages 77 and 78 there is the following:

> During recent months a few of the larger post offices have been asked to estimate their expenditures in advance and submit monthly reports comparing their actual expenditures with these estimates. It is recommended that the development of controls be pushed forward vigorously.
>
> The immediate goal should be the production of regular monthly statements for the various operations in the major post offices showing:
> (i) Actual expenditures for the period on an over-all and unit basis for each operation.
>
> (ii) Similar figures for the same period in the prior year.
>
> (iii) The budget figures for the period.
> The information contained in the monthly statements of individual post offices should finally be compared on a unit cost basis and differences investigated.

These are some of the salient points picked at random from the survey, a selection of opinions, observations and recommendations, and a fair summary of them would be that there is no system or method of breakdown to determine the cost of each operation within the postal service; that decentralization has taken place by the very force of circumstances and not by any conscious policy of the department; that the survey is interspersed with comments on the lack of competent personnel and the need for modern equipment, and because of this the senior officials cannot solve the many problems confronting them, let alone carry out adequate operational plans; that this lack of planning is evident, whether caused by neglect, pressure of work or complete indifference; that work has increased to the point where the staff at all levels is overloaded with a multitude of routine problems and correspondence, and no one has had time to develop policies and the situation has produced a catalogue of deficiencies.

[Mr. Small.]

I shall now revert to page 18 and the chart of the organization set up for the top level—the Postmaster General, the deputy postmaster general, a chief executive officer to be assistant to the deputy minister, and a special assistant. Their duties are also defined. The one I am interested in is the special assistant whose position is defined on page 18 in these words:

> There is also a special assistant who has been carrying out special assignments of a planning nature.

All through the survey it is indicated that there is a pressing need for such an official. How long has he been appointed and where has he been? In the face of the facts presented, is this lack of staff again, or is it a question of too late and too little? The survey reveals that some changes have been in operation for some time, that some have just been initiated and that the remainder are in the realm of probable outcome. While the survey implies that a reduction of staff will result in certain instances, these people can be absorbed by transfer and promotion to departments now undermanned, and an abundance of opportunities will be provided for ambitious personnel with talent to aspire to higher positions.

It is now abundantly clear that we have established our claim that the government has made a major error in introducing a bill to increase postal rates before effecting the reorganization of the department. We are entitled to have the plan of reorganization tried out before the imposition of the proposed increases in rates, and to insist upon these increases before the plan has had a fair trial is an affront to the people of this dominion. Let me state that all through the survey positive statements have been made by the consultants that savings can be made. Such assertions are repeatedly made, and the report even goes so far as to say that the savings would amount to approximately $1 million.

When the minister presented his statement today supplementing what he had previously said, he said he had been further advised by the consultants that the proposed changes to be put into operation would result in an increased cost to the department of over $700,000 and that this would be an added burden on the department. This advice is not contained in the survey. It clearly indicates and points out where savings can be made. As far as the increase in staff is concerned, I do not think it is going to be as great as mentioned. I think that men of talent required for the top level positions will be produced, and you will have to establish a training school to develop them.

It seems to me that no attention is being paid to the development of staff for future use. It has not been established when the service deteriorated into a deplorable state. The fault is attributed to no one and I am trying to find out whether there is not some person in the department to whom some vestige of responsibility can be attached.

The only place in the survey where I can find any indication is where reference is made to the appointment of a special assistant to the deputy minister. In fairness to him, the only thing that remains to be established is when he was appointed and what time he has had to accomplish the improvements mentioned as being necessary in the survey. I would say that this survey, on the face of it, is a wonderful one. It is not a woebegone chant or the lament of selected Jeremiahs trying to establish that there is something wrong with the operation. It is surprising that the postal department has been so good and has provided us any service at all in view of the handicaps under which it has had to operate.

If further staff were provided and the improvements implemented, the increased revenue that would result would more than make up for any loss caused through the adoption of the 40-hour week and increased wages for the mail carriers. On the face of this survey I say that the government has been ill-advised, and commits an outrage on the intelligence of men who are supposed to be of $10,000 a year calibre by putting this kind of proposition forward without first putting into effect the improvements which the report says can be accomplished. I think that this should be further questioned, and that the minister would be well advised to impress upon his colleagues that this is the time to show, for once, a little intelligence. I believe this bill should be withdrawn until such time as the minister has an opportunity of convincing them that there will be surpluses instead of the deficits that have been predicted.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): We have heard from a number of members in the house, and we have seen quite a number of brickbats thrown across the chamber at the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote). This has been true, not only in this session but in previous sessions, and I have probably thrown some myself. Before I throw any this afternoon, I want to publicly express my appreciation of the co-operation which I have received from the Postmaster General's department, and particularly the Toronto postmaster, with regard to cases I have brought to their attention.

I have found the postmaster at Toronto and the postal officials here, particularly since the present Postmaster General took office, quite ready to investigate any case which I have referred to them. I have had occasion to refer complaints about delay in mail delivery; I have had occasion to refer complaints about the time of the delivery; complaints about the location of post office boxes; complaints about the inadequacy and unsuitability of sub-post offices in my riding; and in each and every instance I found the department ready to investigate the complaint. I think that wherever there was justification for the complaint, or where the service was suffering by reason of these particular circumstances, changes have been introduced and improvements made. I find that the tension which existed, certainly two years ago, as between the general public and the Post Office Department on the one hand, and as between the postal employees and the Post Office Department on the other, has lessened considerably.

I keep in fairly close touch, both with the postal employees and with the service rendered by the post office in my constituency. I have every reason to believe that there is much less dissatisfaction today with the service being rendered, certainly than there was one or two years ago. I have often wondered just how the post office functions as well as it does, considering the frequency with which postmasters general are changed. Since I have been here I would say that no postmaster general has ever held that office long enough to really acquaint himself with the business of the post office—

Mr. Knowles: They get promoted.

Mr. Noseworthy: —or to take any effective action towards improving that service. I do not know who runs the post office. Certainly, it is not the postmasters general, because they never hold the position long enough to become acquainted with the post office. I do not know why cabinet ministers do not want to hang on to that position longer. It may be because there are so many headaches in it that just as soon as they find out how many headaches there are they want some other cabinet position or some promotion. Certainly, I would think that is the basis of much of the trouble in the Post Office Department. I would recommend to the cabinet that once they get a good Postmaster General they keep him in that job for a while and give him an opportunity to do something.

The bill before us is based on two theories. The first theory is that the post office should be placed on a paying basis. I think that is a basic question that the house and the government should consider. I believe it is one of the questions that a committee such as is recommended in the amendment could investigate at some length, and a question about which we could get more than the opinions of postal officials themselves. I suspect this idea that the post office should be maintained strictly on a paying basis is a tradition that has grown up over the years amongst postal officials, and one that has not received very careful examination. For the life of me, I do not see why the post office should be singled out as the one public service that should be placed on a paying basis.

I do not see why the post office, for instance, any more than the Department of National Health and Welfare should be on a paying basis. It is a service department. I have not heard anyone suggesting that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) should collect enough revenue to offset all the expenses of his department. The mines branch of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys is rendering a service to the mining operators in all parts of this country. I have never heard any suggestion that that department should collect from these mining companies enough fees to offset the expenses of the department. The whole question is, why should the post office be the one department of government rendering a public service that should pay its way? I think it is a fundamental question that should be examined.

The second point, of course, is the statement by the Postmaster General that the users of this service should pay for it. Even if you accept the theory that the over-all service rendered by the Post Office Department should be paid for by those who use the service, in other words that the revenue coming into the post office should be sufficient to offset the total expenditures, there are groups of people being served whom it would not be in the interests of the country generally to require to pay for the service.

About two years ago, I believe, the government brought in an amendment to the Post Office Act to increase the rates on second class mail. There was a flood of propaganda from newspapers and magazines against the original government proposals, and the consensus in this house and, I believe, in the country was that by enabling Canadian citizens to receive newspapers and magazines at a lower cost than the actual cost of carrying them, and thereby keeping down the price of those newspapers and magazines to the public, the government was rendering a public service. If I remember correctly the government, in the face of that propaganda, modified their original suggestions regarding the rate that was to be charged. I quote that as one example to prove that we certainly do not expect the users of the post office to pay the whole cost of the service. We do not expect the editors and publishers of newspapers and magazines, nor do we expect the individual subscribers to those papers and magazines, to pay the whole cost of the postal service.

I just cannot see why one group of people who use the services, the group who use the first-class mail service, should be called upon to carry the deficits which result from giving other users a service below cost, especially in the light of the fact that the users of first-class mail are the one group of users of the public service who not only pay for the service they get but every year contribute a considerable surplus to help carry other branches of the post office service.

I am going to support the amendment. I am sure that as far as his office is concerned the present Postmaster General has no greater ambition than to see that that service is maintained on as efficient a basis as possible. I would think that the Postmaster General would welcome the setting up of a committee before which he and some of his officials could appear, and at which a study of the whole administration of his department could be made. If the department is administered as efficiently as the minister would have us believe it is, surely he has nothing to fear from the investigation of such a committee. I would think it would be a feather in his cap to have a committee set up and to have his officials come before it and to find out that he has the most efficiently run department in the government service.

If on the other hand we can discover ways and means of improving this service, I am sure that the minister would welcome any suggestions along that line. We are told that there is nothing perfect. It is just possible that the administration of the post office may not be perfect in every respect. It is just possible there may be ways of improving it; and if by the type of investigation that is visualized by the mover of this amendment we can improve that service to the public, then by all means let us do it. I hope the minister will consider the possibility of having such an investigation.

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): I should like to say a word in respect to the amendment. The charge has been made that we have political patronage in our postal department. I for one feel that the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) was certainly right on the beam when he said that. We find it apparent everywhere. We need only go to our own particular ridings and examine some of the incidents and we shall find probably no end of them.

Perhaps it is a coincidence that in my particular riding the post office at Newton—it is a rather small one—should have required a new postmaster this year. I would not charge that this was a particular case of political patronage. There are about six or eight boxholders in that Newton post office, and it does a very substantial business. The reason it is doing such a substantial business is that the area surrounding the post office has a rural route, and naturally these people have to get their mail through the rural route. They buy their stamps and their postal notes, and so forth, at their nearest post office, which all helps the post office business.

Apparently, under the existing act the only people who can apply for a postal position of that particular kind are those who happen to get their mail at that post office. War veterans wanted to apply for the position but because they happened to live around the area, perhaps not more than 50 yards or 100 yards from it, and were on the rural route, they became ineligible. I wrote a letter to the postal officials and explained the situation but apparently the rules prevented them from changing the system. We found that a young man who was not a war veteran—I do not say that we must necessarily put war veterans in every position—got the position, since there were only one or two other applicants eligible and they were found to be, shall I say, of an inferior nature.

Another instance that I have in mind has to do with the post office that serves my own community. Some three or four years ago we had occasion to require a larger postal outlet. The people in the community knew nothing about the post office until it practically became a reality. The fact is it was only through representation on my part, and from one or two other prominent citizens, that they took it from a proposed building in a lane and forced the man who got the contract finally to build it up on the highway to which people had access. I would say that the rents for a building such as that were excessive. When you have to pay about $5,000 a year for a post office building which is only 120 feet long and 60 feet wide, I would say you are paying too much, especially in a rural area.

In the Cloverdale area a department, possibly the Public Works Department in this instance, hopes to build a federal building which is to be used for the purpose of housing the post office. When you pay $22,500 for a two lot building site in a small town of about 500 people, I think it is a little excessive. I do not know how the departmental officials feel about it, but it would appear to me that there is some patronage involved.

I now come to the most specific cases of patronage that our postal officials give. I refer to the users of second-class mail. I do not think we can reiterate that statement too frequently in order to bring it to the attention of the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote). There is no way that you can get the support of the newspapers more freely than to give them a cheaper rate of postage than anyone else.

That brings in the matter of efficiency. The Postmaster General was quite happy about the efficiency report he had received on the service. It sounded very good. However, would you call an automobile an efficient automobile if there was a continuous drip of gasoline from the gas line? I would say that in comparison our Post Office Department is not an efficient department if the users of first-class mail must continually give in order to keep the second-class mail in operation. To my mind that is certainly patronage.

Business today exists for profits. If a business finds its profits sagging it will examine its books. In this particular instance we are operating a big business—the post office business is big. Apparently its profits are about to sag and we must examine the books. We are told that the big businessman is going to pay for this first-class mail, but let us examine things a little more closely. If Eaton's, the Hudson's Bay Company or any large mail order house finds that its profits are sagging, the management will be told they must make a profit. Where are they going to get that profit? They are going to pass on this one-cent increase in the postage to the consumer. It will go right back to the little man who in turn will be subsidizing the second-class mail for newspapers.

Postage stamps will be no exception to this ruling. Big business bases its costs on small items like stamps, light, heat and other overhead items. It gives nothing unless—perhaps I may be so blunt—it donates to political slush funds of the party that is going to see to it that these postal rates continue to give them a better deal.

If the little man is going to be protected, and I think he should be, we should see to it that he gets the cheapest service it is possible to provide. We should examine our efficiency. I was happy and surprised to hear the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart), a socialist, suggest that we should examine one of our greatest socialistic institutions. I was glad to see that he recognizes that a system of patronage can offset any socialistic idea that he may have in mind for the future.

The Postmaster General referred to earlier debates and he referred to the suggestion that we should live off post office surpluses. He said that it cannot be recovered from the public treasury. I have no doubt that it cannot be recovered from the public treasury because it does not exist. He is quite right there.

Mr. Cote: My hon. friend is misquoting me. I did not say it could not be recovered; I said that even if it could be recovered there still would be no surplus in fact.

Mr. Hahn: I stand corrected. Even if it could be recovered, but it does not exist in fact. That is what the minister said and that is what I intended to say. We must examine the facts very closely. The minister has suggested that $20 million has been made over a 20-year period. But the charges were not all-inclusive to the post office. Business does not operate that way. Why should not all these charges be charged to the Post Office Department?

Why should we keep hoodwinking the Canadian public by telling them that the Post Office Department has made $7 million, $5 million or $10 million. Let us tell them the truth, that their Post Office Department has cost them a million a year, that they were in debt last year to the extent of $5 million. It is ridiculous for us to say that we made $3 million or $5 million profit last year and did away with the excise stamp on cheques; that there was that additional profit and we are not going to be in need of it. I do not know whether that was an election ruse; I do not pretend to know and possibly nobody knows. My position is that as long as the condition exists today whereby the taxpayer is going to be charged more money without every fact being examined in full detail, then I cannot support the idea. I am ready to support the appointment of a committee, as suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in reading the amendment moved by the C.C.F. party to the motion for second reading. The amendment reads:

> That Bill No. 168 be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house a parliamentary committee should be established for the purpose of making an inquiry into the organization and operation of the Post Office Department and the postal services of this country.

After what has been said by the leader of the official opposition, there could be no question but that we would be in full agreement with the first part of the amendment, namely, that Bill No. 168 be not now read a second time.

Mr. Knowles: Or any other time.

Mr. Fulton: Or, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says, any other time. I am interested particularly in the second part of the amendment which suggests that consideration be deferred until the matter can be discussed by a parliamentary committee. I imagine that most hon. members will agree that a parliamentary committee or any committee to get information on the matter, in view of our feeling that the measure is ill-conceived and ill-timed, would be desirable. But what does interest me, without making any further comment on the matter, is that this suggestion that the matter be studied by a committee comes from a party whose members not many days ago greeted with some ridicule or attempted ridicule a similar suggestion which we made when dealing with another matter. We suggested at that time that nothing would be lost and a great deal would be gained by having a proposal which affected us personally referred for other study—

Mr. Knowles: To a royal commission.

Mr. Fulton: —to a royal commission or to a parliamentary committee. That was the suggestion made on this side. As I say, a good deal of ridicule was advanced against that proposal and it was suggested that it needed no further study, that we could deal with it ourselves, and that we really did not need the benefit of any other assistance or any further study of the matter.

I only point out that it is strangely inconsistent for a party which takes that position on one matter to advance an almost similar proposal when dealing with another matter.

Mr. Knowles: That is not true at all. You were taking that matter outside of parliament whereas our amendment keeps this question inside parliament.

Mr. Fulton: Obviously hon. members are worried, but I just remind them again that when they objected to a royal commission we said that we were prepared to send it to a parliamentary committee if that would suit them better. I did not notice that the hon. gentleman indicated any readiness to accept the second proposal.

Having said that, I would point out that the effect of the amendment, if carried, would be to delay consideration of this matter. Indeed, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) when speaking on this present bill, and as reported at page 1153 of Hansard, suggested to the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) that he would be well advised to withdraw the bill and study it further before bringing it in again. In effect, therefore, the motion moved by the C.C.F. party in this instance merely places in a formal manner before this house the suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition on that earlier occasion.

For myself, I cannot see very much reason why I should not support this proposal as at least a suggestion which would result in a further delay of the bill before the house. In case there should be any doubt, sir, I can certainly say that even if this proposal would not carry, then we will stand by our position that the bill should not be proceeded with and, as the Leader of the Opposition indicated, we will most certainly vote against it.

I believe we should deal in some detail with the reasons why the government's proposal should not be accepted by this house. The Postmaster General again this afternoon based his arguments in favour of the bill on the fact that without the proposed increase the Post Office Department would incur a deficit of approximately $13,500,000. I want to deal with two or three other methods by which this hypothetical deficit could be dealt with, and methods which would be an alternative to the increase in rates now proposed.

I refer first to the question of franking privileges. Earlier this session, on December 16 to be exact, I asked the Postmaster General how much it was estimated the franking privileges available to government departments cost the Post Office Department, and how much revenue the department would receive if government departments had in fact to pay for their mail services. The answer which I received to that portion of my question reads as follows:

> Based on periodical checks made at the Ottawa post office it is estimated that the postage involved on free mail posted by or addressed to government departments and agencies during the fiscal year 1952-53 was $4,060,230.

Therefore, based on the estimates for the last fiscal year there is a possibility of increasing revenue to this department by over $4,000,000.

When the Postmaster General was dealing with that this afternoon he said—I took his words down and if I missed anything I would ask him to correct me—he said in effect that the elimination of the franking privileges would cover only a small fraction of the increased costs which his department is now facing, and which, as he said, would result in a deficit of $13,500,000 if this proposed increase were not accepted. But, Mr. Speaker, according to my calculations the elimination of the franking privileges would result in increasing the revenue to the department by approximately one-third of his anticipated deficit, and one-third cannot be described as a small fraction.

It is true, as the Postmaster General pointed out, that if other government departments were required to pay for their mail the taxpayer would in the long run have to meet the cost. But the position at the moment, according to indications we have from the various monthly reports of the Department of Finance, is that there is a substantial surplus of revenues over expenditures to date in the fiscal year; and certainly, if the calculations of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) are correct, we will end up with a surplus this year. I believe we will actually end up with a much larger surplus than the minister forecast. Therefore, it would not involve an increase in tax rates to absorb the extra costs, and to provide extra revenues for the Post Office Department, which would be occasioned if other government departments paid for their mail.

That extra cost would be more than covered by anticipated surpluses of government revenues over government expenditures for the current fiscal year, and thus an increase in taxes is not a possibility, certainly not a necessity if that suggestion were adopted.

I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, it would be much sounder accounting practice for the Post Office Department to be credited with the amounts which would otherwise be paid to it for the purchase of stamps by other government departments, and that there should also be included in the estimates of this house a credit for the franking privileges now enjoyed by hon. members.

I am not going to deal with the question of whether our franking privileges should be taken away, except to repeat the statement I made earlier, when the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) was speaking, that if he is serious about his suggestion he has but to move a motion, which he suggested someone else should move, and I will be glad to support it.

I would also point out to the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor), who also seemed reluctant to take the responsibility and who asked somebody else to move the motion, that if he is prepared to give up his franking privileges all he or anyone else has to do is to move a motion. In addition, there is nothing to stop him going down to the post office and buying stamps for all his letters, nothing at all, if he puts that forward as his solution. But I do not see why he should ask someone else to move a motion.

As long as franking privileges are extended to members of parliament I believe it would be a sound thing to include an amount under a legislative item which would cover the revenue that would otherwise revert to the Post Office Department if our mail in fact were required to carry postage stamps. In that way, and if the same thing were done for other government departments, there would be a very substantial increase in revenue for the Post Office Department at no greater expenditure to the taxpayer, because somebody has to pay for the carriage of mail in any event.

The hypothetical deficit, which seems to worry the Postmaster General so much, would be decreased by almost one-third of what he anticipates it would otherwise be.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Fulton: Just before six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I had dealt with the fact that although the amendment now before the house is, as I see it, somewhat inconsistent—in fact entirely so—with the attitude expressed by the members of the C.C.F. party on an earlier occasion, still as giving a further opportunity for study and providing, if it were carried, a means of delaying the passage of this bill, I felt that we should support it because we like to be consistent ourselves even though our opponents are not always consistent.

Mr. Knowles: I thought we settled that matter before supper.

Mr. Fulton: I indicated that therefore in all probability we would support the amendment which they have moved. I then dealt with the question of other possible methods of avoiding the entirely hypothetical anticipated deficit which would otherwise arise out of the operations of the Post Office Department if the government's proposal were not carried. I had pointed out that if other government departments—and indeed the House of Commons—were to provide, through their estimates, for the meeting of the cost of carrying their mail, there would accrue to the Post Office Department an additional revenue of something over $4 million which would be approximately one-third of this anticipated deficit. I certainly suggest that that method should be adopted as one of the methods which would be preferable to the imposition on the people of Canada of an additional tax of one cent on the first-class letter mail.

Then there is another way in which this anticipated deficit could be met and which would obviate the necessity of an increase in postage. That would be by requiring those who wished to use air mail service to pay for it. In this connection I want to put forward a point of view which applies particularly to the people who live in rural areas. I have said before, in discussions of the post office estimates and of other measures submitted to us by this department, that I feel it is entirely improper that the residents of rural Canada should be required to subsidize what I might call luxury services for the residents of the urban areas when, at the same time, the people in the rural areas are getting a service which is of a lower standard than that which they are entitled to expect.

There is not a member here from a rural area—and I am quite sure there is not a member here from an urban centre who has visited or lived for any length of time in a rural area—who will not agree with me that, by and large, the mail services now accorded to the rural areas of Canada are far below standard and are far below what should be accorded to them in this present century. Yet a person living in a rural district in my riding or in any other such riding in Canada is now going to have the cost of his letters increased by one cent per letter, largely in order to support the provision of a super-service to the people living in urban centres. As between urban centres of Canada, there are now in existence the facilities for providing an adequate air mail service. There is also, incidentally, in existence the means of providing a fairly, if not completely, adequate surface mail transportation system. Yet the people who live in those large urban centres are now going to be able to avail themselves of air mail service at no extra cost. All they are going to have to put on their letters is a five-cent stamp and then they can have them carried from Montreal to Vancouver in a day whereas the same five-cent stamp will not enable a letter to be delivered from one end of my riding to the other in less than four days. But people living in Vancouver or Montreal, or other large cities, who want the super-service, and who under the old method have been able to get it for an additional two cents—or rather, I should say, an additional three cents over the old rate of four cents per letter—all they have had to put on was an additional three cents to buy themselves an air mail stamp in order to make sure their letters were carried from Vancouver to Montreal, or the reverse, by air and were delivered within twenty-four hours. If there is that much importance attached to the air mail service in Canada, I would think that those people would be quite willing to continue to pay the extra three cents so that the people of my riding would not be subjected to the necessity of paying an extra cent on every one of their letters in order to get them delivered—and not by air mail—within a space of three days from one end of the riding to the other.

This air mail delivery does not benefit the rural areas. Their letters still have to go down—and I am thinking of British Columbia particularly—to Vancouver before they ever get on the air mail service. It takes a letter perhaps two days to get to Vancouver. Then it may have to go only as far as Seattle, Calgary or any other place with which the people of my riding have business. The fact that from Vancouver on it goes by air mail is really not of benefit to the people of my riding or to any of the similar areas of British Columbia. Mr. Speaker, I am just not able to appreciate that there is any equity or justice in demanding that all my people should be required to pay five cents per letter, an additional one cent which does not improve their service one iota, when the air mail service which might be required by large businesses in large centres is available to them if they want to pay an extra three cents per letter. Why should not the people who want luxuries have to pay for them?

What was that comment, Mr. Speaker? What did the hon. member say?

Mr. Byrne: You should have a special stamp.

Mr. Fulton: If Kamloops riding were able to get the Post Office Department to change its mind on this proposition, it would deserve a special stamp. I am surprised that the hon. member who comes from a rural area in British Columbia should make a remark like that. If he would get to his feet and make a similar speech and similar suggestions, then he should have a special stamp for his riding.

Mr. Knowles: Then he would be stamped.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fulton: But what do we find in connection with the cost of this proposition? It is not easy to get accurate information but, as far as I can determine, the present cost to the Post Office Department of providing this all-up air mail service on the present four-cent basis—that is to say, allowing every letter to go air mail with a four-cent stamp as is done at present—approximates $6 million per year. Those figures I take from an answer given me by the Postmaster General as reported at page 1047 of Hansard of April 2, 1952, when I asked the question:

> What has been the additional yearly cost to the Post Office Department of carrying mails in Canada since the inauguration of the "all-up" air mail letter service, directly or indirectly attributable to the institution of that service?

The answer of the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) as given on April 2, 1952, and as found at page 1047 of Hansard, reads in part as follows:

> When the "all-up" service was introduced in July, 1948, the Post Office Department agreed to pay the Trans-Canada Air Lines the amount estimated for surcharged air mail in the domestic services for the fiscal year 1948-49, plus $2 million.

There was an additional $2 million at that time. The answer continues:

> For this extra payment the T.C.A. made available to the Post Office Department space to accommodate additional mail up to two and a half times the volume of surcharged mail estimated for the same fiscal year—1948-49. In 1951 the amount paid to the T.C.A. was increased on a sliding scale up to $6 million per annum and for this increase additional space was made available.

Therefore, in the absence of some further explanation, the only interpretation I can put upon that answer is that for the provision of all-up air mail service as of the date of the reply, April 2, 1952, the Post Office Department had to agree to pay T.C.A. an increase on a sliding scale up to $6 million. It might be possible that the increase was only $4 million, the difference between $6 million and the $2 million that had been previously agreed to, but as I read the answer the extra cost of providing all-up air mail service was increased to $6 million in 1952. The people of Canada are paying an extra $6 million for this all-up air mail service and it does not give one bit of benefit to the rural areas.

I do not see why anyone to whom it is important that his letter should be carried by air mail should not pay for that privilege. If that were done, then on the basis of that answer it seems to me that there would be a reduction in the anticipated deficit up to $6 million a year, or $4 million on the other basis. But taking it at the lower figure, that $4 million plus the additional $4 million of revenue from the elimination of the franking privilege to government departments would mean a reduction of the hypothetical deficit by $8 million. That would leave about $5½ million of a possible deficit on the basis of the Postmaster General's own figures.

But I do not see why people who do not want to use air mail service, for whom air mail service is not a necessity, and to whom it does not do any good, should be penalized in order that a luxury service can be provided to people who are already adequately served and to whom, if they want to use air mail, the financial resources to use it are readily available in any event.

Let us take the third heading under which the Postmaster General said this hypothetical deficit might arise, namely, that the cancellation of the excise stamps on cheques and notes will reduce the revenues of the Post Office Department by $7,500,000 or, in other words, over half the anticipated deficit to which the Postmaster General has referred. A great deal has been said about that already and I am not going to repeat all that has been said except to emphasize that when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) announced the proposed elimination of stamps on cheques in the last budget he introduced before the election, he did not indicate that it would be necessary to make up the revenue loss by another tax. No sir! He was prepared, and I do not blame him, to take any advantage that he could from this proposed reduction in taxes. The government badly needed to take any credit they could around that time, and so he took the credit.

But, sir, it is impossible for any of us to believe that the Minister of Finance did not know what the loss of revenue was going to be. He is here tonight, and if he is prepared to say he did not know what the loss of revenue was going to be then we would all be glad to hear from him. I do not hear from him and therefore I assume he did know what the loss of revenue was going to be. It would be interesting to know why he did not say before the election that it would be necessary to make up for this loss of revenue after the election by the imposition of an additional tax on the users of the letter service of Canada. I still do not hear from the minister so I assume that the only explanation that occurs to us is the correct one, namely that he did not want to tell the people of Canada before the election that this tax concession was a mere phantasy, that it was introduced for election purposes only, and that the government knew at that time that they were going to demand from the people of Canada after the election that they make good that loss of revenue which was held out to them as an additional bait in the pre-election budget which the minister himself introduced.

Mr. Argue: Cynical budgeting.

Mr. Fulton: Well, sir, we have had some experience before with cynical budgeting. I thank my hon. friend for that term. It seems to be a much better one than cyclical budgeting, the term which the Minister of Finance likes to attach to it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that perhaps we had better consider the principle of the bill. While I am on my feet, I should like to point out to the hon. member for Kamloops that under our rules repetition is not in order. That includes not only repetition of one's own arguments but also repetition of other members' arguments. I have heard it said since this debate was initiated that the postal increases sought by the bill are perhaps a consequence of measures announced by the Minister of Finance in a previous parliament. Therefore I hope that every hon. member who speaks on the bill will not repeat the same argument. I should like to warn the hon. member about this standing order.

Mr. Fulton: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your warning. I might draw to your attention, sir, and the attention of other hon. members, that, while it may be true that the point I am now putting forward is to some extent a repetition of points put forward by previous speakers, we have not on previous occasions always had the advantage of the presence in the house of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Abbott: It is very seldom he is not here.

Mr. Fulton: Let me make it clear. I want to be fair to the Minister of Finance. He has been away on an important conference and that is the reason why he has not been here at earlier stages of this debate. But he is here now, sir, and I have invited him to make certain comments.

Mr. Sinclair: How nice of you.

Mr. Fulton: The terms of my invitation were more courteous than any invitation that would have been extended by the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair), but we will let that pass. The Minister of Finance is here for the first time, I believe, in this debate, and I have invited him to make certain comments. I suggest that if he does not offer an explanation, then the obvious explanation which we ourselves advance must be accepted as the true one.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Abbott: That is unworthy of a Rhodes scholar.

Mr. Sinclair: I object.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): You really do not have to speak for 40 minutes, you know.

Mr. Sinclair: There are Rhodes scholars and Rhodes scholars.

Mr. Fulton: I shall be very glad to give up my place right now to the Minister of Finance if he indicates any willingness or desire to offer an explanation of why the government took off a tax before the election and put it back on afterwards. Does the minister want to explain that?

Mr. Diefenbaker: You cannot explain the obvious.

Mr. Fulton: Does the Minister of Trade and Commerce and Acting Prime Minister want to explain it?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We would like you to get on with your speech.

Mr. Fulton: Does the Postmaster General want to explain it?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think we ought to carry on with the debate in the manner—

Mr. Cote: When I close the debate I will be glad to answer my hon. friend, and I think it will be satisfactory to him.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think we ought to continue with this debate in the usual manner of debate, and not in the form of a private conversation. If the private conversation which was taking place a moment ago at the other end of the house was intended for me, I am sorry but I could not follow it.

Mr. Fulton: Well, sir, I thought I was doing fairly well until you drew my attention to a rule which had not been previously applied in this debate. In the absence of any satisfactory reply from the government, I shall let the matter stand because I feel that the answer is obvious. I shall not pursue that point any further.

I want to deal with one additional point before I sit down, and that concerns the report of J. D. Woods and Gordon on the Post Office Department. I was interested particularly in the section of the report which appears at page 70 of the copy tabled as sessional paper No. 94-A. It reads as follows:

> The postage supply section of the postage stamp division is responsible primarily for the receipt, storage and dispatch of postage and unemployment insurance stamps to postal depots and government agencies. The physical facilities presently available for this purpose are inadequate both from the viewpoint of security and material handling. Many improvements in procedure could also be made.
> We have reviewed a report of the civil service commission. A comprehensive analysis was made in 1950 of the method of keeping records and issuing stock. It is suggested that this report be reviewed and the suggestions put into practice.

One of the reasons the Postmaster General says he needs an increase in postage rate is that his department is going to run into a deficit if he does not get it. Yet we find, as established by the Woods and Gordon report, that in 1950 the civil service commission made a report which recommended certain changes in the procedures and methods. Then, the Woods and Gordon report suggested that the civil service commission report be reviewed, and the suggestions put into practice. The Woods and Gordon report is dated November, 1952. This means that two years before Woods and Gordon reported, the civil service commission had made a report recommending certain changes, which report was not implemented. When Woods and Gordon came along two years later and found the same unsatisfactory conditions, they suggested the Postmaster General might just look at the civil service commission report and implement it.

In this house we are accustomed to finding examples of the government having had reports available which suggested streamlining of methods and procedures to increase efficiency and save money for the taxpayers of Canada, yet these reports have been gathering dust in departmental files. It seems obvious that is the situation here. How the Postmaster General has the temerity to come along and tell us that we must now increase the letter rate in Canada by one cent when this report makes it obvious that, had his department had the interests of the taxpayer at heart sufficiently to read and implement the report made two years earlier, they might have saved substantial sums of money, I am at a loss to comprehend. How can they expect this house or the taxpayers to swallow such a suggestion?

The reason I feel somewhat strongly on that matter is that almost two years ago we had a similar example. At that time there was another important report being considered by the house, a report made by Mr. George S. Currie. He made certain recommendations which, if implemented, would save the taxpayers of Canada a considerable sum of money. After that report had been under discussion for some time, we found that two years before Mr. Currie's investigation the civil service commission had made a survey of the same field, and had found a situation which they said was resulting in substantial losses to the taxpayers of Canada. The civil service commission report had been gathering dust in the archives of the government for two years because while the taxpayers' money was being wasted during that period of time the government had not bothered to implement the civil service commission report. When, sir, we asked for the production of that report in the house—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is now flirting with a violation of the rule of relevancy. I believe he will agree with me that, having quoted from a report relating to the Post Office Department, and having complained of the fact that that report would have saved money for the taxpayers if acted upon and perhaps rendered unnecessary the measure which is now before the house, I let him present another argument by analogy. If the hon. member continues along that line, I feel he is going too far.

Mr. Fulton: We are confronted here with a situation where the government is asking us to authorize an increase of one cent per letter to all users of the mails in Canada. I am suggesting that if the government would merely implement the reports they have had available to them for two years, substantial sums of money would be saved which would obviate the necessity they think now confronts them.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member could argue, if he followed that line of argument to the extreme, that the entire fiscal policy of the government should be changed.

Mr. Fulton: So it should.

Mr. Speaker: We would have, therefore, another budget debate in this house. I do not believe the rules of relevancy give the hon. member the opportunity of going so far afield.

Mr. Fulton: You will recall, sir, that the Postmaster General covered a fairly wide field this afternoon in the statement he made to the house. It does seem to me that in dealing with this report of J. D. Woods and Gordon, which refers specifically to an earlier report made by the civil service commission, we are entitled to know what was in that civil service commission report. We are entitled to know—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let us be reasonable on this point. When I stopped the hon. member he was dealing with the Currie report. Now, if he wants to go back to the Woods report, let us remain with the Woods report.

Mr. Harkness: Let us get amongst the tall timber.

Mr. Fulton: You have anticipated me because I want to show a similarity which exists between this situation and the attempts we made to deal with an earlier report. I am coming back directly to the civil service commission report referred to here. Your Honour will recall that in the earlier case—

Mr. Pickersgill: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it not true that some days ago a motion was made to have this report tabled, and that it was turned down by the house? Is it possible for the hon. member to renew debate on a subject upon which a decision has already been made?

Mr. Fulton: I expected that eventually we would get the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) to his feet to raise the very point he has raised. I would submit to you, sir, that at this point I am not seeking to change a decision of the house. I am pointing out, as I am entitled to point out in connection with the present discussion, that the government refused my request for the production of a report made by the civil service commission on January 20, 1954. The government, whose spokesman on this occasion was the Secretary of State, has just raised a point of order. It is true that matter was thus decided, but what I am trying to point out is the position we are placed in as a result of that refusal of information by the government, led by the Secretary of State. He is a very apt pupil in following the precedents which have been set by this government in connection with the refusal of information.

Mr. Speaker: Order. On the point raised by the Secretary of State, so far as I can ascertain, after consulting with the deputy clerk, the report referred to was voluntarily tabled, was it not, by the Postmaster General?

Mr. Cote: We are talking about another report, the civil service commission report, which was asked to be tabled by my hon. friend, and which we voted on in this house, turning down the request.

Mr. Harkness: Cloaked in secrecy.

Mr. Speaker: I was not aware there was a second report. I thought the hon. member was discussing the Woods and Gordon report. If he is dealing with a report that is not before the house I do not think he should refer to it.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I was leading up to the particular point raised by the Secretary of State. The production of the report made by the civil service commission on the Post Office Department has been refused. This was a report made two years before the Woods and Gordon report was made, and to which the Woods and Gordon report referred, suggesting that it be implemented even at this late date. What I am pointing out is that a report exists, and had it been implemented then, the people of Canada might have been saved a considerable amount of money from the point of view of expenditures by the Post Office Department, and possibly the necessity for this increase might to that extent be lessened.

I am quite prepared to admit that the production of that report was refused earlier this session by the government majority, on the suggestion of the Secretary of State. I am sufficiently aware of the rules of the house to know that I cannot at this stage seek to have that decision reversed. But I am pointing out that this is just one of a great many examples with which we have been confronted, where information as to the possibility of saving the money of the taxpayers of Canada has been refused and is still being refused by this government.

I want to ask the Postmaster General this question. Will he extend to me the same courtesy that was extended to the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace (Mr. Hamilton)? If there is nothing to hide in this report, if it is a matter of not establishing a precedent by tabling it in this house, if that is what is bothering the government, will the minister extend to me the same courtesy of going to his office—

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are now discussing the second reading of a bill. The house is in good humour. I should like to remain in very good humour; I much prefer to be in good humour, but there seems to be a tendency to—

Mr. Harkness: Levity.

Mr. Speaker: —drift away from the principle of the bill which should be discussed, and to indulge in a discussion of various other matters which, no matter how germane the hon. member may think they are, in my opinion are completely out of order.

The hon. member knows that he is not in committee. A moment ago he was asking a question of the Minister of Finance. He is now asking questions of the Postmaster General. When we get into committee on this bill he may proceed to ask questions, and it will be in order for the Postmaster General to reply. If the hon. member wishes the Postmaster General to speak now he will, as he knows, close the debate. I am sure he does not want him to do that. No, he would not close the debate because there is an amendment. My mind was carrying me a step farther. I thought that the amendment had been disposed of, but that is not so.

The hon. member is quite right; there is an amendment before the house. Let us have a normal discussion on the second reading of this bill. The hon. member has had wide latitude. I know he will want to continue this debate with strict adherence to the rules of the house.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): His time is exhausted.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): He has been speaking for 45 minutes.

Mr. Argue: Less 40 minutes for interruptions.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I quite agree with you that the Postmaster General could not answer now without making a speech, although, with the amendment before the house, he could speak again without closing the debate. Therefore in the same way that I have asked other ministers opposite, and indeed private members opposite, if they wish to rise to their feet to interrupt—they are prepared to interrupt while sitting—if they want to interrupt—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to advise the hon. member that having spoken for 11 minutes before six p.m., and having commenced to speak again at 8.02 p.m., his 40 minutes expired at 8.31 p.m. I allowed him a few more minutes because of interruptions but I now have to ask him to resume his seat.

Perhaps I should deal with the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart). The amendment reads:

> That Bill No. 168 be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house a parliamentary committee should be established for the purpose of making an inquiry into the organization and operation of the Post Office Department and the postal services of this country.

What the hon. member sought to do by this amendment was to seek some information by way of a committee. Citation 657 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, reads:

> It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill, or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction, or prosecution; or otherwise opposed to its progress; or seeking further information in relation to the bill by committees, commissioners, the production of papers or other evidence or the opinion of judges.

If the hon. member looks at the reference underneath this citation he will see that it refers to May, page 390. During the dinner recess I looked at the reference of May at page 390 and I found the following:

> It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move, as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill; . . .

It carries on repeating the same words as I have just quoted from citation 657. But then a little further on it goes on to say:

The principle of relevancy in an amendment governs every such proposed resolution, which must, therefore,—

I should like to draw the attention of the hon. member to these words:

. . . which must, therefore, strictly relate to the bill which the house, by its order, has resolved upon considering—

I draw the attention of the hon. member to these words "strictly relate to the bill". Does he think for one moment that his amendment does just that, strictly relate to the bill which is under consideration? What the hon. member is seeking to do by his amendment is to have a committee inquire into the operations of the Post Office Department and of the postal services of this country. He is seeking to have a wide investigation held. What he is now asking is much wider than the scope of the bill.

I should like to draw his attention to the words which follow the words I have just quoted from page 391 of May. After having stated that the amendment must strictly relate to the bill which the house, by its order, has resolved upon considering, it goes on to say:

—and must not include in its scope other bills then standing for consideration by the house.

I direct the attention of the hon. member to the fact that there is now an item on the order paper calling for the second reading of Bill No. 76, to amend the Post Office Act, standing in the name of the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne). Would not the amendment moved by the hon. member cover the subject matter included in a bill which, as May says, is standing for consideration by the house?

In my view the amendment as it now stands is one which cannot be allowed. What the hon. member seeks to do, in the words to be found in Beauchesne's third edition and repeated in May, is "seeking further information by committee". That is perfectly permissible. If the hon. member wishes to reword his amendment in order to comply with the rules I shall be glad to hear him in that regard, but I think he will agree with me that the amendment he has proposed is too wide. I would not want to rule it out of order on a mere technicality and deny him the right of moving an amendment such as he might have in mind, which is merely to seek information by committee. I think his amendment should read, "that the subject matter thereof be referred to a select committee."

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, with deference and with some regret I have to differ with you. I cannot imagine anything more strictly related to the bill than the amendment which I have offered. We have a department asking for a 25 per cent increase for a certain part of its services and that to us seems to be such an extreme increase that it demands investigation into what is going on in that department. This is a point which we could argue interminably and I do not intend to do that. However, without conceding in any way whatever the rightness of my position, I think I can say that my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), would be prepared to move an amendment to the amendment I have moved which I believe would fit in with your wishes.

Mr. Speaker: Would it be agreeable to the hon. member if on the grounds I have indicated I rule his amendment out of order, and then the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre could immediately propose a new amendment which at this time would be in order? If that is agreeable I think it would be the best procedure, because if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre proposes to amend an amendment which in my view is not in order I do not think the amendment to the amendment would stand.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Naturally we do not want to do this in a clumsy way if it can be done in a simple way. I think perhaps my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart), might be permitted to change the wording of his original motion. If so, the suggestion I would make, subject to my colleague approving of it, would be that all the words after "organization" to the end of the proposed amendment be deleted and that in their place be inserted the words "reasons for the introduction of this bill." My colleague's amendment would then read:

That Bill No. 168 be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house a parliamentary committee should be established for the purpose of making inquiry into the reasons for the introduction of this bill.

Mr. Fulton: It is still introducing new matter.

Mr. Speaker: That wording seems to be more in accordance with the rule. The only reservation I have in my own mind is that the amendment is that a committee be established to inquire into reasons. As I understand the definition of committee, it is a body to inquire into subject matters and to hear evidence. I do not know that we establish committees to inquire into reasons.

Mr. Knowles: Then may I suggest to you and to my colleague these words:

—for the purpose of making inquiry into the circumstances connected with the introduction of this bill.

Have we got it now?

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed? Does the house give consent?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, with all respect to what my hon. friend is trying to do, I suggest that he knows perfectly well how he could make his amendment in order, and he has not approached it yet except by an indirect method. The reasons or the circumstances under which the government accepts responsibility for introducing a measure is something which they are prepared to defend here and are doing at the moment. But the subject matter is something about which an hon. member or the house can make any inquiry by the machinery that may be available to the house. I am afraid that I could not consent to the form of the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. Knowles: If there is not consent to that, I would suggest that we fall back on the suggestion Your Honour made a moment ago, that my colleague be permitted to withdraw his amendment. I would then be prepared to move an amendment in the language which Your Honour suggested, namely, that the subject matter of this bill be referred to a committee for inquiry.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to withdraw his amendment?

An hon. Member: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If I may have the floor without making a speech I would then move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight):

That Bill No. 168 be not now read a second time, but that the subject matter thereof be referred to a committee for inquiry.

Mr. Harris: On the point of order—I am trying to be helpful this time—I am sure my hon. friend means parliamentary committee, which was part of the original wording.

Mr. Knowles: Yes. If I omitted that word it was through oversight and I am most grateful to the minister for suggesting it. Since we are thinking out loud about this, perhaps we could add the words "and report" at the end of it. The amendment I am now moving would then read:

That Bill No. 168 be not now read a second time, but that the subject matter thereof be referred to a parliamentary committee for inquiry and report.

Mr. Casselman: Report to whom?

An hon. Member: To the house.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, speaking to the new amendment—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member, of course, is now taking advantage of a situation which, as he knows, is one that was created by unanimous consent. At the moment we are merely substituting an amendment which otherwise I would have ruled out of order. I would imagine that the hon. member, having spoken to the amendment as it originally stood, and the resolution having been amended in the manner that it was with the unanimous consent of the house, would not in these circumstances take advantage of the situation and make another speech.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I will accept your suggestion, but I will make this brief comment. Were it not for the fact that I felt the extensive interruptions made during the earlier portion of my speech had occupied so much of my available time that I had not in fact spoken for more than 40 minutes, I would not have attempted to speak again at this stage, although, this being a new amendment, I would have the right to do so. However, it will be open to me to speak on the main motion and I intend to take only two or three minutes in which to ask the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) to specifically reply to the suggestions I have made. Under these circumstances, I will wait until this amendment has been disposed of and then repeat my invitation to the Postmaster General.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment to the main motion lost. Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise only for the purpose of repeating my request to the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) that, when he replies, he indicate whether or not he is prepared to allow me to have access to and to study the report made by the civil service commission and referred to at page 70 of the Woods-Gordon report.

With reference to the fact that you indicated a little earlier that my time had expired, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that I felt that the interruptions had more than consumed the time which I would otherwise have had available on the earlier occasion. In making this request now to the Postmaster General, I put it on this basis. If the government have nothing to hide, and if they feel that they have taken action to deal adequately with that report and the recommendations made by the civil service commission, they should have no objection whatsoever to a member of parliament seeing this report so that that member—as well as other members—may be able to decide, in accordance with his responsibility, whether or not there is justification for this motion asking that the people of Canada should pay more for the carriage of their letter mail. If the Postmaster General refuses that request for access to the report, then I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker—and I think hon. members will agree—that there is no other inference that can be drawn except that the government know that they have not taken adequate action to deal with that report, that it is for that reason that they now refuse access, and that it was for that reason that the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) asked government supporters in this house to refuse production of that report when the notice of motion for the production of papers was before the house and was defeated by the vote of the government majority.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am rising to support the motion for the second reading of this bill. I have no intention of attempting to defend the Post Office Department because I know that my hon. friend, the Postmaster General, is perfectly capable of looking after it. I may say that I would be very happy to defend the Post Office Department because, when my hon. friend was absent in New York on the country's business, I was charged by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) with looking after the Postmaster General's portfolio and I had a little bit of experience with the Post Office Department.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: That is when all this trouble started.

Mr. Pickersgill: The impression I formed of the Post Office Department and of the things for which I was called upon to take temporary ministerial responsibility was the impression that I think most Canadians have outside this house, whatever party they belong to, namely, that the Post Office Department and the Canadian postal service are as good as any in the world and, in most respects, better.

I do not think that anyone on this side of the house relishes the idea of asking everyone who sends a letter to put a five-cent stamp on it instead of a four-cent stamp.

Mrs. Fairclough: Why do it, then?

Mr. Pickersgill: Some hon. member opposite—I think it was the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy)—said this was a policy that was decided by some official in the Post Office Department. That is not true at all. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) announced this policy for the government as the policy of the government—

An hon. Member: After the election.

Mr. Pickersgill: —that the actual current operations of the postal service, the running of the Post Office Department, not the providing of premises which the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) does and for which he does not charge, should be paid for by the people who use the service and not by other taxpayers. The hon. member for York South said that was a question of policy. It is a question of policy and one that can only be decided by the house. It cannot be decided in any committee or in any other way. It is the policy of this party that the post office as far as possible should exact a charge to pay for the service it renders. I believe that is a good policy. I believe that policy commends itself to most Canadians, and it is because I am convinced the extra one cent is necessary for the purpose of balancing the budget of the post office that I feel we have no choice, even though it is not very agreeable, but to support it.

The hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) suggested there were two or three alternative ways in which we might meet the deficit. No doubt my hon. friend the Postmaster General will deal with most of those alternatives.

Mr. Hees: If given a chance.

Mr. Pickersgill: But there is one point.

Mr. McIlraith: Do you mean only the opposition should speak?

Mr. Pickersgill: Even if a good many savings have already been made as a result of the Woods and Gordon report, even if there were a good many more savings here and there in the Post Office Department that could be made, and I dare say there are some—the hon. member for York South said that the Post Office Department was not perfect; of course it is not, and no sensible person says it is—even if a few thousand dollars might be saved here and there, and one evidence I got from my short experience was that savings were being made all the time, surely no hon. member opposite is so poor at arithmetic as to suggest that such savings have any relation whatsoever to the $13,500,000 which is going to be required to bring about an approximate balance next year.

But the real reason why I venture to take part in this debate is not because I was Acting Postmaster General but because of what was said by the hon. member for Kamloops, by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), by the hon. member for York-Humber (Miss Aitken) and by one or two other members opposite about the air mail service. They suggested that in some curious way the air mail service was a luxury and that a luxury tax could be paid by those people who use it. It would probably be quite difficult to do a careful costing and probably would not be worth the money, but if it were done I would not be the slightest bit surprised to learn that it would cost more to collect a letter on one of those new streets in York-Humber, take it to the Toronto post office, carry it by rail to Ottawa and deliver it to one of those new streets out beyond Westboro in the constituency represented by the Leader of the Opposition than the actual out-of-pocket cost of sending a letter by air from the province and the constituency I represent to some post office in the province of Ontario where there is no letter carrier service and where people have to go and get their mail.

There are a great many people who, for economic and other reasons, find it necessary, as the hon. member for York South did, to leave the province of Newfoundland to earn their living in some other part of Canada. I am sure that the hon. member for York South would agree with me that the people of Newfoundland are very much attached to their families. They like to keep in touch with them and they, like the rest of us, want to get their mail as quickly as possible and do not regard air mail service as a luxury at all. In most parts of that province there is no letter carrier service and no pick-up service. There are just post offices where you go to get your mail. But most of them are not very far from an airport, and from that airport mail can come in one day to Montreal, Toronto or Winnipeg and perhaps in two days to Vancouver. There are a good many people from Newfoundland even in Vancouver.

It seems to me, sir, that this service is not a luxury service. It does not really cost very much more than it does to provide the kind of services that the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace (Mr. Hamilton) thinks are still not good enough for his riding. I believe that in the first place people who live in these outlying parts, and who want to communicate with relatives and friends and carry on business communications as well with central Canada, are entitled under modern conditions and in the modern world to this kind of service, the kind of service which is given by the post office and by T.C.A. In addition, it seems to me that the postal air service we already have has added a great deal to the amenities of this country and has added a great deal also to the sense of national unity. If, by paying about one-third or one-quarter of the one cent that is to be added by this bill, we can have the kind of service that tends to bring all Canadians closer together, then it seems to me it is not a very high price to pay, and I feel that most of the people in most parts of the country will agree with the government in that view.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I think we all felt, when the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) descended from the heights in which he had previously lived and came down to live among us, that new and perhaps exciting things were going to happen. I think to some extent we have been borne out in our judgment in the things that have happened already, but I submit that tonight we have gone quite beyond anything that we have had before. I suggest in particular to the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) that he has been proved wholly wrong in the argument he made this afternoon in which he said it was a pity that postmasters general stayed such a short time on the job, perhaps only a matter of a year or two.

But now he has been proved wrong because we have just been told by one who was only Acting Postmaster General for a few weeks that in that time he was able to know so much of the workings of the department that he is now able to tell us that it is as good as any system in the world and, in most respects, better. I do feel that after that it is almost a waste of time to continue this debate, and I think we should thank the Secretary of State for coming to our assistance and clearing up the matter.

(Translation):

Mr. J. W. Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, we have now before us a bill to amend the Post Office Act. We are asked to repeal chapter 212 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, and to replace it with another providing for an increase in the postal rates of approximately 25 per cent.

Going over this bill which is introduced by a government which calls itself Liberal, I cannot but recall the pre-electoral period of August 10 last and discuss briefly the attitude taken by the Liberal party towards the Canadian people.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): This is not relevant.

Mr. Dufresne: At that time, grandiloquent statements were made on—

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are not going to begin over in this house, on the second reading of this bill, the election campaign of last August. I think that the hon. member must discuss the principle of the bill.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, I certainly intended dealing with the principle of the bill, but before I get there it seems quite important to demonstrate to the country at large the contradictory attitude taken by the hon. members opposite when they are outside the house. I was just saying, Mr. Speaker, that at that time grandiloquent things were being said of the generosity of the Liberal government. I am getting there, Mr. Speaker; do not get discouraged, I am getting there.

Mr. Speaker: I am all but discouraged even before starting, especially when I hear the hon. member returning to the subject I have just asked him to leave. I think that he should immediately get on with the subject matter of the bill and not deal at length with conjectural matters which have nothing to do with the principle of the bill.

Mr. Dufresne: I have difficulty in understanding why in discussing a bill such as this one, we are not allowed—and if I am wrong you will put me right—to bring to the house details showing the really contradictory attitude taken by the government in their previous statements and subsequent actions. That is why I wanted to acquaint the house with certain statements made by Liberal speakers some time before the election when it was a matter of collecting votes from the people of this country.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member asked me to call him to order if he went wrong. I am sorry I have to inform him that if he continues to discuss the point he has just told us about in dealing with the principle of the bill under discussion, he would be out of order.

Mr. Dufresne: I will therefore continue my remarks in the way you have indicated and most certainly in the way my hon. friends opposite should wish for.

I was saying a moment ago that the government are now asking us to approve a measure which will force the people of this country to pay 25 per cent more for postage.

Allow me to make a comparison between a previous tax which has been removed and the one which it now intends to levy. What is your ruling on that, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: I have no authority to give rulings on points of order in advance. I give rulings on points of order as they come up. However, if I may be allowed to suppose that the tax which he wants to use as a basis of comparison is the one to which other hon. members have referred in the course of the debate, namely the excise tax on cheques, I must say that if he did touch upon this question he would be out of order, since no hon. member is allowed to repeat his own arguments nor the arguments advanced in the course of the same debate by his colleagues.

Mr. Dufresne: Even if he was absent while these arguments were being used? Very well, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, the workers, the small wage earners did not have very often the opportunity to put stamps on cheques. I will not say anything more on that subject. I only want to point out that workers in general belong to large families with members scattered all over the country, and that is particularly true in my province. The workers in my county have all asked me to oppose this legislation which discriminates against them, as it adds to the already too heavy burden of taxes which they have to carry.

The government have reminded us that they have granted substantial salary inincreases to postal employees. I agree that these employees, judging by those we have in Quebec, do a wonderful job and that it was only fair to give them a salary in line with the work they have to do in the carrying out of their daily duties. I congratulate the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote)—it will not be said that I am always criticizing—

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): We can see you coming.

Mr. Dufresne: —for his generous gesture and I would urge him to keep on recognizing the essential services rendered by the employees of the Post Office Department.

Mr. Speaker, there are some naughty boys opposite—

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Go on.

Mr. Dufresne: But, while recognizing the generosity of the hon. minister, I also recognize the additional work his employees have to perform in order to serve the people in the best possible way. There are sometimes complaints—justified complaints—about the slowness of some services, but we must admit that postmen, for instance, have to deliver their mail to 250 more families, particularly since the service was reduced to one delivery per day. They are accomplishing a difficult and exhausting task in all kinds of weather, going up and down the numerous stairs they have to cope with on their route.

Let us pay these devoted servants of the people what they are worth because they deserve the gratefulness of the citizens they serve. I have never known of an employer having become poorer because of the good wages he paid his employees. Once more I congratulate the minister on his decision to grant more acceptable salaries to the Post Office employees.

The Post Office Department, however, must be run according to normal business principles, by establishing an efficient administration, by replacing waste by economy, and by remedying whatever abuses may exist. Extravagance, even when it involves the taxpayers' money, leads to bankruptcy.

Let us stop certain departments from mailing each year millions of pamphlets of all kinds which are often nothing else but purely political propaganda or exaggerated praise of the government.

No doubt about it, the present government are clever; they know how to take advantage of every circumstance.

We are at the beginning of the twenty-second parliament and the government has not yet brought before the house one piece of legislation to alleviate the burden that is already weighing too heavily on the Canadian taxpayer.

I am very anxious to examine the bills that the government will submit to the house at the end of this parliament, that is on the eve of the next general election. You will note, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I believe that the hon. member should examine the bill now before the house. There is much leeway granted to hon. members during the debate on a bill of this kind, because of the general nature of the remarks made at the beginning of the debate, but I think that the hon. member should not go any farther afield than the previous speakers.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, I was just saying that the government has brought before us legislation that does not tend to help the people, those who need help. I am referring more particularly to the bill now before the house. I am sure that all measures enacted since the beginning of the present parliament are not popular. You will surely permit me to add that at the end of the present parliament more popular legislation will be enacted in order to get the people's vote.

Mr. Speaker: I regret to have to interrupt the hon. member once again, but he stated twice that he was anxious to see the legislation the government would submit at the last session of this parliament. Having said that twice, I believe he should now revert to the bill before the house.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, I know that my hon. friends opposite would like to see me resume my seat—

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): It is interesting.

Mr. Dufresne: In my opinion, the bill now before the house is another insult to the intelligence and the great understanding of the electors of the constituency I have the honour of representing. To protest against the increase in postal rates—

An hon. Member: Resign.

Mr. Dufresne: If my hon. friend wants to run as a candidate in my constituency, I am ready to do it.

Mr. Bourget: Be careful, you were elected by a minority.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, I know you are a good father, that you have a large family, and that some of your children are rather annoying—

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Not your family.

Mr. Dufresne: I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that this piece of legislation, in my opinion, is another outrage against the intelligence and the great understanding of the electors of the constituency which I have the honour to represent, and, by way of protest, I will do what each one of them would do if he were here in this house: I will vote against this measure which I consider a further provocation to those who are proud to call themselves the people.

(Text):

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I was pleased half an hour ago to have the first really possibly valid explanation why this new tax is necessary. That possible explanation was that there has been such a thing as absentee landlordism, which we all know is never a good business proposition. We in this section of the house would not hesitate to support the government if it could establish any need for a tax. However, after listening all the days that we have spent on this I find that nothing has come forward. I have watched the newspapers from one end of Canada to the other, and I have not noticed any newspaper openly coming out and saying that the government needs to impose this new tax.

I noticed the sympathy that was expressed for the little man. I think the statement was "pity the little man." This tax is a tax on the general public of Canada. It is a tax on the little man. I believe it was the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hahn) who pointed out that even though big business may initially pay most of this tax, in the long run it is added on to the cost of goods and services, and is in effect a tax on the little man.

I find it rather amusing that this government should now come to parliament at this time, taking into consideration the state of its finances, and say that it needs additional revenue. I do not think the government has proved that it needs additional revenue at all. It says that the post office must pay its way. Well, assuming, although I am unwilling to do that, that it is a valid argument that the post office must pay its way, how can you ask us to supply the post office with additional revenue if within the post office there are major divisions that are not paying their way? I am referring once more to the subsidization of advertising. I maintain that if advertising paid its fair share of operating our post office, the government would have a much larger surplus next year than they had last year. As I indicated on January 14, if advertising were made to pay its fair share the government would be doing the country a good service in many other ways besides helping out the revenues of the post office.

I am not going to say much more. I was pleased that the first solid argument has now been presented, and I would recommend that the difficulty can be easily avoided next year if our genial Postmaster General would remain in Ottawa during the coming fiscal year and help out in that way. I am wondering whether this idea in the post office originated during the term of the absentee landlordism. I notice that the Secretary of State is a pupil of a former prime minister of Canada who, despite a large majority, rode out of power on the philosophy of "not a five-cent piece". Perhaps that philosophy has been taken up by the pupils and this government, even though it now has a large majority, may not go out on a five-cent piece, but on a five-cent postage stamp at the time of the next election.

Mr. Roland Michener (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, we are asked to approve an increase in postal rates on letters ranging from 25 per cent to 50 per cent, and the increase is to apply only to letters posted in Canada and delivered in Canada. I suppose the result will be that first-class letters which will require five cents in Canada will require only four cents when sent abroad, which seems to me to be an initial breach of the proposition of payment according to service. I appreciate the fact that there may be international arrangements involved. That is the first thing I should like to point out.

My purpose is to consider for a moment the effect of the increase in rates on certain users. Like others, I have had a good many communications from individuals, mostly on limited fixed incomes, to whom this increase in rates will be a cost which they will feel. It does not seem much, but to those who are confined to limited quarters and maintain their communications by letter writing, it is a consideration. I might add that in my riding are located Eaton's mail order house at Albert and Bay streets and Simpson's mail order house on Mutual street. Those companies will not be affected by the increase because they mostly use parcel post and I do not note that the parcel post rates are to be increased. The letters which they receive will be from their customers who will have paid the postage.

I would not think that other business will be greatly concerned with this increase because postage is an ordinary cost of doing business which is deductible from income before taxation. Although there is some increase in the cost, in the case of a corporation half of that would be borne by the federal treasury in loss of taxation. That would minimize the increase in these cases.

Nevertheless postage is a cost of doing business. I suggest to the minister and to the house that all costs of doing business in this country, which was described recently in very authoritative terms by Mr. James Muir of the Royal Bank of Canada as a high-cost economy, are worthy of consideration, whether they are large or small. This is particularly so when one considers our competitive position in export markets which is of vital importance to every Canadian.

If postage is an element of cost it seems to me the sound principle upon which to approach postage rates is the maintaining as far as possible of rates that are comparative with those of our nearest neighbour and competitor, the United States of America. We all know that their rates are lower and the divergence will be even greater. There has been the suggestion that Canadians living near the border will cross and use the United States mails in order to save money.

In any event that is a factor and it raises a principle which to my mind is more important than the principle advanced to support this bill, namely, the principle of maintaining competitive costs in this particular element of the cost of doing business. The house is well aware that the principle advanced by the government is that those who use the service should pay for the benefits which they receive. It has been pointed out many times that that principle is not one which is observed in many other governmental activities.

I have not heard the minister estimate what may be the loss in revenue due to the increase in the rates. Undoubtedly many people who would have written letters and used the postal services for the transaction of some of their business will not do so because of the increased cost. As everyone knows, there is a point where the law of diminishing returns begins to have an effect and offset any increase in revenue. There may be a reduction in the number of letters that would otherwise be posted, but I have not heard any mention of that.

In any event, if we accept the proposition, there has been no basis on which these principles could apply to the operations of the Post Office Department. The sole basis on which any accountant would work would be that the cost of operating the Post Office Department should be the actual costs. It is true that we are given a balance sheet but no one can see what the actual costs are because they do not appear there. Nor can anyone see what the potential revenues are.

I would suggest that this is a matter of rating. Rating is not a difficult problem when applied to this kind of utility service. We have the board of transport commissioners which fixes the rates to be paid for the carriage of passengers in different cars on the same trains in which letters are carried. If it is possible to arrive at a fair rate for the carriage of passengers, surely evidence could be produced to show the fair cost of providing a service to carry letters on trains. The same with carriage by air.

The same principle applies to telephone and telegraph rates. This form of communication is in close parallel to communication by letter, and we all know that the rates are fixed on evidence as to the cost of doing business plus a fair charge for the service rendered. If the minister is serious in wishing to apply cost accounting principles to the department over which he has the honour to preside, it appears to me that the means of doing so are available. It may be that he should now reconsider whether the Post Office Department should be disentangled from other departments of government and established as a separate agency or utility whose rates would be fixed on cost principles by a board capable of handling that kind of proposition.

This is big business. The revenues of this department last year were $129 million, at least those revenues shown in the statement, and we know that the department did not receive payment for all the services it rendered. The expenses shown, which we know were not the full expenses, amount to $122 million, leaving a surplus of something over $6 million.

This is the kind of business which could be handled very much in the way the Bell Telephone Company handles the telephone business of this country, or in the way the telegraph companies handle their business. It is not too large in proportion to those businesses. If the minister is serious about this proposition, he could find many advantages in having the Post Office Department operated by a utility agency. He would then be sure that it was being operated at cost or at a profit, and the Department of Public Works would be in receipt of revenues for the buildings occupied by the Post Office Department. The department would be compensated for the services it rendered on a businesslike basis, which is to my mind the only justification which the government has attempted to put forward in support of this measure.

I suggest it would be an interesting speculation if the minister were to call for tenders for the operation of the postal services at the existing rates and find how many people would be ready to come forward and say that with efficient operation they could handle the mails of this country without increasing the rates. That of course is speculative, but it is no more speculative than the application of the principle upon which we are asked to approve this bill.

I have made it clear that I cannot vote to approve this increase in rates. I should like to conclude by giving one trifling example, but it is an example of what some government agencies are not doing to keep the cost of the postal service as low as possible. This communication was sent through the mail and reads:

> From: National Film Board, Ottawa
> Kindly note amendments to the cast-list of the film, "Farewell Oak Street" which now make the last two characterizations read:
> Old Age Pensioners, Mr. and Mrs. Pat Kelly
> Old Man, Doug Masters
> This is to correct any erroneous impressions created by our previous listing . . .

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): If the hon. member is reading this document as an example of what is going through the mails and with a view to criticizing it, I do not think there could be any complaint; but if he is reading it solely on account of its contents, I fail to see that it has any relevancy to the subject under discussion.

Mr. Michener: I am reading it on both counts, and I contend that it should not be going through the mail. I had finished reading it except for the last line, which is as follows:

> This is to correct any erroneous impressions created by our previous listing of Mr. and Mrs. Pat Kelly and Doug Masters as playing "themselves" and "himself", respectively.

This is, I suppose, an important communication, but it is an example of the kind of material one hon. member today referred to as filling up the wastepaper baskets of members of this house and those of many other people throughout the country.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I was particularly interested in the remarks of the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) because, like him, I represent a constituency which is located on an island, but an island in the Pacific rather than an island in the Atlantic, and the people in my constituency are also anxious to keep in touch with absent friends and hence use the mails for that purpose.

We do not seem to have quite the same facilities as those provided to the Secretary of State, and that applies to all the communities in my constituency. However, I want to draw his attention and that of the Postmaster General to a thriving industrial community of several hundred people which exists within 60 miles of the provincial capital and which one can reach by means of a combination of road and rail in less than six hours from the provincial capital. The mail is carried to that community, which contains a large mill and important fishing interests, by a method which has existed for many years, namely, by sea. In the past the Canadian Pacific B.C. coast steamships services received a large subsidy to carry the mail to this community. Unfortunately the vessels used by the steamship company are not as good now as they used to be and the result is that in this community of Port Renfrew, only 60 miles from the provincial capital, they receive their mail once every ten days, despite the fact, as I said previously, that you can reach that community in six hours.

Does the Postmaster General believe these people are going to appreciate the increase in the postal rates from 4 to 5 cents? I can assure him they are not, and I would like to assure the Secretary of State that when I visited this community I never heard anyone there say that the postal services are the best in the world. Frequently I have heard them say, "It is the rottenest service that exists."

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member moving the adjournment of the debate?

Mr. Pearkes: Yes, I will move the adjournment.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Pearkes moves, seconded by Mr. Blair—

Mr. Pearkes: I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker; I had already taken my seat.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) wish to speak?

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I do not quite understand. If for some reason I should move the adjournment of the debate I should be glad to do so.

An hon. Member: Go ahead.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to speak again in this debate, and I would not but for the remarks made in the course of the evening by the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State this evening emphasized the principle outlined by the Postmaster General this afternoon and I feel it is essential that principles in opposition to those submitted by the two hon. members I have just mentioned should be put forward at this time.

At the opening of my remarks may I put it this way. Many years ago there was a man who was a commentator in the newsreel films and he always concluded his remarks with this statement, "Monkeys is the craziest people." I cannot help wondering, after listening to the Postmaster General outlining that principle this afternoon, aided and abetted by the Secretary of State, what that commentator would have said had he been here this evening. If there has been any discussion which means anything at all in this debate it is the statement of the Postmaster General that those who get the service must pay for it.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

On motion of Mr. Winch the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow we shall continue this debate and when it is concluded we will take the Criminal Code.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

APPENDIX

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

SUGGESTED STEPS TO IMPLEMENT REPORT ON ORGANIZATION AND ADMINISTRATION

General

The initial step in the implementation of our report on the organization and administration of the department will be to enlist the support of the senior officials in the department. It will also be necessary to obtain the approval of the civil service commission and the treasury board.

Detailed establishments of some of the new divisions will have to be developed. It is difficult in the initial stages to accurately estimate the final requirements for clerical staff and it will be necessary to review these requirements after the new organization has been in operation for a trial period.

One of the first steps should be the appointment of a personnel director. He should be supplied with a small staff possibly borrowed from some of the other branches and immediately undertake a study of the following matters:

(i) Personnel available for immediate appointment to the new positions.

(ii) Personnel who, after training, would be suitable for appointment to the new positions and the training they will require.

(iii) What positions will have to be filled from outside the department.

The various changes in organization suggested in the report are set out below by branches with comments as to the timing.

Operations Branch

(a) Chief superintendent—engineering—A man should be obtained from outside the service to fill this vacancy. It can be filled as soon as a suitable candidate is available. There is no need to delay any other moves in the interval.

(b) Mechanical engineering division—This position should be filled either from outside the service or possibly by one of the engineers from the major post offices. The balance of the staff should be recruited either outside or from within the department but at least one engineer should come from one of the major post offices. This division can be organized as soon as personnel are available.

(c) Methods and time study division—A start should be made immediately on the organization of this division. Either the man to head the division or one or two of his assistants should be drawn from outside the department. A study should be undertaken of one of the major post offices and standards developed. The staff can be enlarged over a period of time as experience is gained and after suitable training could be drawn from within the department or, if suitable personnel are not available, from outside.

(d) Chief superintendent—operations—This position should be filled by the most experienced man available within the service. He probably should be drawn from the field organization and might well be a successful district post office inspector.

(e) Postal services division—This division will be made up of personnel presently in the branch. It can be set up as soon as a suitable postal superintendent is available.

(f) Revenue post office division—The removal of functions from this division will be dependent on the completion of the organization of the postal services division and the district offices.

(g) Methods and procedures division—The organization of this division is dependent on obtaining suitable personnel to carry out the work. This should be given a high priority and they should, if possible, be drawn from the field.

(h) Inquiries division—As soon as a suitable postal superintendent can be selected, this division can be formed. A post office inspector would be most suitable for this position. The personnel in the inquiries section of the inspection division would form the staff.

(i) The staff post office division would be transferred out of this branch to the personnel branch as soon as the personnel director is ready to receive it. It would form the nucleus of the employee services division in that branch.

Transportation branch

(a) Chief superintendent — transportation planning and research—This position should be filled as soon as possible. It is important that the right man be selected as the success of the proposal will depend to a large extent on the imagination and energy of the individual chosen. The mail transportation officers presently on the staff would form the nucleus of the chief superintendent's staff. A man with experience in commercial transport operations should be obtained from outside the service and added to the staff.

(b) Chief superintendent — transportation services—This position should be filled by a man with proven administrative ability.

(c) Motor vehicle services division—As soon as a postal superintendent has been selected from within the department, this division can be established, drawing its staff from the other divisions in the branch.

(d) Account verification division—This division can be established as soon as the postal superintendent is selected. He could be drawn from either the transportation or finance branches.

(e) The tender section can be reorganized and the new routines established as soon as the chief superintendent, transportation services, has been appointed.

Financial branch

(a) There are three senior positions to be filled in this branch and the organization changes can take place as soon as suitable men are available. In addition there is the position of comptroller in the administration branch. It will probably be necessary to go outside the department to fill two or three of these four positions.

(b) With the exception of the recommendations in connection with—

(i) Preparation and recording of salary warrants,

(ii) Punch card accounting machines,

(iii) Post office savings banks, all the recommendations in the section of the report on the financial branch can be proceeded with without delay under the direction of the director. The recommendations in connection with the preparation and recording of salary warrants and punch card accounting machines will have to be postponed until the district offices are ready to assume the additional responsibility. The recommendations in connection with the post office savings bank are subject to policy approval from the government.

Administration branch

(a) Inspection division—The changes in organization of the inspection division and the change in the method of operation is dependent on the revision of the field organization. It is contemplated that the changes in the field organization will take place progressively one district at a time. As the change is completed in each district the inspection branch would change its function in that district. The reorganization of the division at headquarters would be dependent on these developments.

The inquiries section can be transferred to the operations branch as soon as a postal superintendent is selected to head the new division.

The recommendations in connection with the misdirected mail office can be implemented forthwith.

(b) Comptroller—As stated above, it may be necessary to go outside the department to fill this position. In the proposed plan for decentralized operations, the financial controls will be very important. It is essential that the man chosen to fill this position be imaginative and aggressive and have good accounting qualifications.

As soon as the comptroller is appointed, the budgets, estimates and costs division can be formed absorbing the personnel from the cost ascertainment division and the personnel of the staff relations division presently dealing with estimates.

A postal superintendent should be appointed to take charge of the statistical and office services division and the balance of the staff would be drawn from the other divisions as work is taken over. This can be commenced as soon as the postal superintendent is appointed. Consideration might be given to appointing the postal superintendent in charge of the cost ascertainment division to this post and filling the vacancy in the budgets, estimates and costs division with a younger man chosen from the department or outside.

(c) Domestic mails division—The suggested illegal mail section can be formed from the staff of the dead letter office in Ottawa at any time.

(d) International mails division—The reorganization of this division should take place at the same time as the accounting duties are transferred to the statistical and office services division. This will be dependent on the organization of that division.

(e) Purchasing and stationery division—Approval of the treasury board of the suggested new limits of authority for expenditures will be required. The other recommendations can be proceeded with forthwith and do not affect the organization of the rest of the department.

Personnel branch

As already indicated the appointment of a director should be given priority.

Post Office Department

The first step in organizing this branch should be the transfer of the existing divisions dealing with personnel to the personnel director.

As already mentioned the staff post office division can be transferred at any time and would form the nucleus of the employee services division.

The training and welfare division can also be transferred at any time and would form the new training division.

The staff relations division can be transferred at any time and would form a section of the employee services division. As previously stated the personnel dealing with estimates would be transferred to the budgets, estimates and costs division.

The staff to form the personnel development division should, if possible, be drawn from within the department. There are undoubtedly a number of men in the training and welfare division, and the staff post office division who would be suitable and could be replaced in their present positions.

The organization of the division along the lines suggested can be carried out progressively over a period of time. It will not be completed until such time as the district offices are sufficiently organized to assume their additional responsibilities.

Field organization

The suggested changes in the field organization cannot be carried out all at once and it will take a number of years to complete.

It is suggested that the change-over be carried out on a progressive basis as follows:

(a) Select two districts as pilot operations.

(b) Select the district directors, the principal members of the district office staffs and the area superintendents.

(c) Draw up detailed plans for the organization.

(d) Plan a training course for the personnel involved which would stress the significance of the decentralization and the part each person is to play in it.

(e) Send half of the staff for each of the new districts on the training course. As soon as they have completed the course the other half would be sent.

(f) Establish the organization in the two districts.

(g) Routines and procedures should be carefully developed in these two districts as they will become patterns for the whole department.

(h) In the first instance, the new districts would carry on the same duties as are presently performing in the field but under the new organization, as the transition progresses further, duties and responsibilities will be delegated from headquarters.

(i) The same steps would be followed progressively in each of the districts.

(j) It is recommended that the deputy postmaster general appoint one senior man whose full time would be spent in coordinating this development.

(k) The recommendations in connection with the four major post offices can be proceeded with immediately personnel are available.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, February 5, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1954-55

EXPLANATORY STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1955, was presented by Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) and read by Mr. Speaker to the house.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as in past years, I do not propose to make any lengthy statement concerning the estimates. I might, however, note that the only change in the form of the new year estimates from that of previous years is in the manner in which the amounts included for salaries and wages of continuing staffs are summarized in the "details of services" section of the blue book.

Whereas the staff detail for each vote was formerly broken down to show numbers of position and paylist totals for permanent and temporary employees, a different form of summary has been substituted which discloses the same information for full-time, part-time and seasonal classes of positions. This change, of course, follows logically from the coming into force, on January 1, 1954, of the new Public Service Superannuation Act, the effect of which has been to eliminate the main distinction formerly existing between permanents and temporaries, namely, the pension benefit. The new breakdown between full-time, part-time and seasonal positions will give hon. members more information upon which they may make judgments concerning the size and character of the civil service organization.

As regards the figures themselves, the total budgetary expenditure for the new year of $4,492 million compares with a total of $4,434 million for the current year, an increase of approximately $58 million or 1·3 per cent.

This increase is the result of a number of changes, both increases and decreases. The total requested for national defence, defence production and civil defence is $1,955 million which is approximately $126 million less than the amount of $2,081 million approved for the current year.

This decrease reflects a tapering off in the capital assistance program for defence industry which reached its peak in 1952-53, and the more stable character of the defence department's equipment procurement program.

For purposes other than defence total budgetary expenditure provided for in the new estimates is $2,537 million compared to $2,353 million for the current year. This increase of $184 million is accounted for principally by $43 million additional for public debt charges, $27 million more for civil salaries, $22 million more for tax rental payments to provinces, a $22 million higher contribution to the civil service superannuation account, and $17 million more for family allowance payments. Also included in this increase are an item of $15 million for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and another of $7 million for the Department of Transport for which no comparable items were shown in the current year's estimates, although disbursements are being made under statutory authority.

I move:

That the message from His Excellency, together with the estimates presented this day, be referred to the committee of supply.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING ORDERS

FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. J. H. Harrison (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, by leave of the house I should like to revert to the order, presenting reports by standing and select committees.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to revert to "presenting reports by standing and select committees"?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Harrison: I beg leave to table the first report of the standing committee on standing orders.

Queen Elizabeth Islands

PENITENTIARIES

TABLING OF ANNUAL REPORT OF COMMISSIONER

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I now place on the table printed copies in English and in French of the annual report of the commissioner of penitentiaries for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1953, which have now been received from the queen's printer. Hon. members will recall that a photostatic copy of the material contained in the report was tabled on November 23, 1953, in order to comply with the provisions of section 14 of the Penitentiary Act.

QUEEN ELIZABETH ISLANDS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF NAMING OF NORTHERN HALF OF ARCTIC ARCHIPELAGO

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the house I should like to make a statement respecting our most northern islands.

I am pleased to announce that Her Majesty the Queen has been graciously pleased to allow that her name be given to the entire group of islands which lies north of Lancaster sound and Viscount Melville sound. Henceforth this northern half of the Canadian Arctic archipelago will therefore be known as the Queen Elizabeth islands.

It seems particularly fitting that our present sovereign should allow her name to be permanently associated with this part of Canada. It was during the reign of her illustrious namesake that British seamen made their first voyages of discovery into what is now the Canadian Arctic. In the 350 years which have passed since then, our Arctic has been widely explored and mapped. Now, in the reign of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II, we have every confidence that we are on the threshold of a new age, if not of discovery, then of development of our Arctic lands and seas.

It was important for the sake of administrative convenience that these particular islands should have some collective name. They stretch in a great triangle whose base, along the Arctic ocean's polar pack, is almost as wide as our three prairie provinces; to see even the outer edges of the group would require a flight of 2,300 miles. And yet these islands are in many ways a unit with its own peculiar conditions and problems. The lands themselves are, of course, the most northerly in North America and the most northerly of the Queen's realms. On their 160,000 square miles dwell less than 200 of her people, but beneath their surface may lie some of the richest treasures which we possess.

Hon. members will recall that the islands of our Arctic archipelago bear the names of other members of the royal family. Prince Charles island, in Foxe basin, was discovered and named about five years ago. Victoria island, Prince of Wales island and King William island are farther north, just below Viscount Melville sound. Now, northernmost of all, are the Queen Elizabeth islands, our final frontier.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the announcement by the minister in regard to the gracious acceptance by Her Majesty of the suggestion that these islands should bear her name comes at a particularly appropriate time. There is something symbolic in the fact that these islands, extending to the polar circle in the north, should receive the name of our young Queen at a time when she is enjoying the summer sunshine of Australia, on the other side of the world. It symbolizes in a dramatic way the world-embracing character of this commonwealth partnership of which she assumed leadership last year.

The minister has spoken of the fact that this carries our imagination back 350 years to the earlier days of exploration under another Elizabeth. All the land areas may have been discovered, but the horizons are wider than ever before, and owing to the miracles of science new opportunities open out in every part of the world. It is not beyond the realm of hope that these islands, which will carry the name of our monarch, may not only symbolize the extent of our territory and of the whole north, but at the same time play an important part in the structure of Canada itself.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRECEDENCE OF GOVERNMENT BUSINESS ON WEDNESDAYS

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister) moved:

That on Wednesday, February 17, 1954, and every Wednesday thereafter to the end of the session, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence over all business except the introduction of bills, questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

Motion agreed to.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT

CHANGE IN BASIS OF COMPENSATION IN RESPECT OF SWINE AND SHEEP

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act to remove the limits on the compensation payable in respect of swine and sheep, and to provide for payment of compensation on the basis of market value.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

TRADE

EFFECT UPON CANADIAN TRADE OF REPORTED RUSSIAN TRADE WITH BRITAIN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of press reports of contracts amounting to $1,120 million which have been proposed by Russia to Britain, and having regard to the fact that this would of necessity and in large measure involve supplies which we ordinarily might expect to sell to Britain, has the minister any comment to make on that report?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we have no authentic information beyond the newspaper reports which I read, as did my hon. friend. I looked over the list of items involved and I saw nothing which I thought would displace Canadian shipments, although shipments amounting to $1,120 million must certainly displace something. However, it is interesting to note that Russia proposes to pay in gold, which is helpful. At the moment, no action has been taken in regard to trade with Russia other than to offer normal facilities.

SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

SUGGESTED REFERENCE OF PROVINCIAL STATUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the minister's answer to my question yesterday suggesting a submission jointly, by the governor general in council and the government of the province of Quebec, of an act of the Quebec legislature known as the freedom of worship act, to the Supreme Court of Canada, and the minister's reply that there was no authority for such joint reference, may I now ask him if the federal government will consider using the authority contained in section 55 of the Supreme Court Act for references by the governor in council as to the constitutionality of this provincial legislation?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. According to news reports, steps which have been taken by counsel for the Jehovah's witnesses to test the constitutionality of the Quebec freedom of worship act are now being contested by counsel for the attorney general of Quebec. The whole matter is presently before the courts. Consideration is not being given at this time by the government of Canada to a reference of this legislation to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Coldwell: Does the minister realize that this legislation, while it does perhaps arise out of necessity in relation to Jehovah's witnesses, may have much wider application in the religious field?

Mr. Garson: In reply to my hon. friend's supplementary question, I may say we do realize that; but the point I think is that the constitutionality of the new Quebec act, either in relation to Jehovah's witnesses or to anyone else, is being contested in the courts at the present time.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE OF PRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether, now that the estimates are down, it is too soon for him to be able to give some indication as to when his budget may be brought down.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): It is a little bit too soon, Mr. Speaker; but I may say that it will not be quite as early as last year.

WATER POLLUTION

NORTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO EFFECT ON FISH LIFE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. Campbell (The Battlefords): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Will the minister have an inspection made of the fish life in the North Saskatchewan river to determine whether the pollution of the water in that river is killing or affecting the health of the fish in that river?

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of this question. There is no question that under the British North America Act legislative jurisdiction over fisheries rests with the federal government. However, by agreement with the government of Canada in 1930 the three prairie provinces took over the responsibility of administering their own natural resources, including fisheries. Since that date provincial officers enforce federal fisheries conservation laws. The federal government does not maintain any staff in those provinces for this purpose. Therefore the inspection of the alleged pollution of the North Saskatchewan river would primarily be the responsibility of the governments of Saskatchewan and Alberta.

There is no question whatsoever about the fact that the Fisheries Act which is enforced in those provinces by the provincial authorities contains sufficient authority. Perhaps if I just read subsection 2 of section 33 of the Fisheries Act, it will be seen how wide the powers are. Subsection 2 of section 33 reads as follows:

> No person shall cause or knowingly permit to pass into, or put or knowingly permit to be put, lime, chemical substances or drugs, poisonous matter, dead or decaying fish, or remnants thereof, mill rubbish or sawdust or any other deleterious substance or thing, whether the same is of a like character to the substances named in this section or not, in any water frequented by fish, or that flows into such water, nor on ice over either such waters.

In the five provinces—British Columbia and the four Atlantic provinces—where we have direct administration of the fisheries, we have found this section to be quite sufficient to control pollution of the water and I have no doubt that if the provincial authorities get together and use this section they will find the same thing.

REQUEST FOR IMMEDIATE JOINT ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, now that the fish population has been disposed of, I come back to human beings. I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether he received a telegram from the executive council of the Saskatchewan boards of trade in session in Regina pointing out their extreme concern over the pollution of the North Saskatchewan river and the need for immediate joint provincial and federal action to remedy a situation which is, to use the words of the telegram, "dangerous to human and animal life".

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member must ask his question, not read from a telegram.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right. What I want to find out from the minister is this. Are we going to get any action there? The situation is serious and emergent.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend will want to remember the words which he used yesterday when he was questioning me on this matter, to the effect that there was no reluctance on our part to give whatever co-operation we can under the constitution. My hon. friend acknowledged that fact yesterday. I have not received the communications to which he has directed my attention but I shall look forward to reading them as soon as they come in.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Just the same old passing the buck.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—FEDERAL RESPONSIBILITY FOR FULL EMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): May I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. It arises out of the developing unemployment situation. To what extent does the government accept responsibility for maintaining full employment in this country?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government accepts responsibility for maintaining an economic atmosphere conducive to a high level of employment. That we are doing.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Acting Prime Minister following the question asked by my friend the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). Is the government now employing those fiscal and monetary measures to which the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) referred on January 26, in order to maintain a high level of employment?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): The answer is yes.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON SETTING UP OF WOMEN'S BUREAU

On the orders of the day:

Miss Sybil Bennett (Halton): Mr. Speaker, before asking my question I should just like to extend my very warm thanks for this demonstration which has been made on my behalf. It is delightful and most encouraging.

I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Will the minister inform the house as to what progress has been made in setting up the women's bureau in the Department of Labour, following the statement made by the minister in the house on May 14, 1953?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I consider it an honour to be the recipient of the first question asked by the hon. member for Halton. I should like to tell her that good progress in planning has been made for setting up a women's bureau in my department along the lines of the statement I made in discussing my estimates last spring.

I am sure my hon. friend will agree that the first and most important part of that planning should be the finding of a suitable person to act as head of the bureau. Consequently the civil service commission last summer set up the position, advertised widely for applicants from both within and without the civil service and, I am told, received a great many replies. But up to date a decision has not been reached as to the result of that competition.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED OUTLET FROM BRITISH COLUMBIA THROUGH ALASKA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I should like to ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources a question arising out of the statement he made earlier this afternoon. Has the government under consideration any plan for attempting to arrange with the United States for an exchange of some northern territory for an outlet from British Columbia through the Alaska panhandle? I ask that question because press dispatches earlier in the week indicated that at least some of the ministers were interested in a plan of that type.

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): The answer is no.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

INQUIRY AS TO AWARDING OF CONTRACTS FOR BUILDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works today. Yesterday I directed it to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris). Will the contract for the removal of the film board to Montreal and the erection of buildings there be let before the house has an opportunity of considering the estimates necessary with regard to the buildings and removal of staff from Ottawa?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I might say that, following the statement made by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration in the house last Monday, I instructed the officials of the Department of Public Works to notify the lowest tenderer that he would be awarded a contract. That action has been taken.

With respect to parliamentary consideration of this move, I know the house is aware that parliament, on several occasions, has had the opportunity to consider every step to date. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) tabled the estimates today. In them there is an item to cover the initial stages of construction of the building in question. Subject to the wishes of the house and of the house leader, I should be glad to have the estimates of the Department of Public Works considered on the earliest possible occasion.

POST OFFICE

FIVE-DAY 40-HOUR WEEK—REQUEST FOR CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State in his capacity as the minister responsible in parliament for the civil service commission? Is the Secretary of State yet in a position to give the house the list, which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) promised shortly back on December 8, of localities where the five-day 40-hour week will be put into effect for post office employees, in order that we may have that information before we proceed further with the bill that is now before the house?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): The answer is that the minister has not yet received the report from the civil service commission. He will inquire when it will be ready.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which, I submit, affects the rights of the members of this house. We will have before us as an order of business today a bill which the government says is based on the proposal that the five-day 40-hour week is being established for postal employees. Some of the employees are disturbed lest that five-day 40-hour week may not come into effect in localities like my own city of Winnipeg and some other cities. I ask the leader of the house whether it is in order and whether it is proper to ask the house to go ahead with a bill that is to be first on today's order of business until we have that information, so we will know the extent to which the five-day 40-hour week is to be implemented for post office employees.

[Mr. Winters.]

Mr. Speaker: The Postmaster General in introducing his bill and moving second reading has advocated many other reasons for the postal rate increases which are the subject matter of the bill. I do not think the hon. member, by way of a question of privilege, should insist upon having a certain report tabled on a specific point before dealing with the bill, which has already been dealt with for several hours and the consideration of which will continue today. I do not see how the hon. member is entitled to raise that matter by way of a question of privilege.

Mr. Coldwell: May I just say that one of the considerations in the bringing down of this bill was that the five-day week would involve the expenditure of more money, and I think my hon. friend is quite right in asking the minister to produce this evidence in order that we may know what the situation is. I would ask the leader of the house if he would not agree to varying the business of the day until we do get this information.

Mr. Harris: In answer to the direct question, the leader of the house is one of many in the cabinet, and we accept the responsibility for introducing the bill, defending it and giving reasons for it. That is what is being done.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, there has been some discussion regarding the procedure by which members of the house would be kept informed, and at the moment Your Honour has under consideration the practices and rules of the house. I would point out that a question has been asked of the minister responsible as to whether information is now available with regard to the five-day week. If it is not available, it means that the argument that has been presented by another minister is not substantiated at this time. I think the point is well taken—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: —that unless the minister responsible for the civil service can say that it does cover every community, then the bill should not be proceeded with merely on the statement that costs are being incurred in that regard.

Mr. Abbott: I do not know whether I am in order, but I made the announcement of the introduction of the five-day week in the post office service. As the house knows, there is to some extent divided responsibility between the civil service commission and the personnel side of the treasury board with respect to hours of work and working conditions. At the time I made the statement I said that introducing the five-day week in the Post Office Department was an exceedingly complex operation and that it was for that reason that it would not be brought into effect until the 1st of April.

The personnel side of the treasury board and the civil service commission have been working assiduously to get the details of the operation completed. I said at the time that it would certainly be introduced in all areas where the five-day week was in operation for office workers, so if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is concerned about that aspect he can take it for granted it will be in operation in Winnipeg. As the Secretary of State has said, we will make inquiries and see how far the civil service commission and the personnel side of the treasury board have proceeded with the work. But the house can take it for granted that it will be widespread and very expensive, and I think that is really all the information the house needs in detail in considering the bill that will be discussed later this afternoon.

Mr. Speaker: This is a discussion on the bill. We are now on orders of the day and questions are being asked. If other members wish to ask questions of the ministers I will recognize them. Otherwise I shall call orders of the day and the Clerk will read the first order, which is the Post Office Act. Perhaps there might be a further discussion then, but first let us read the order of the day.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, may I submit that there have already been answers—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: —by three ministers which indicate that the source of information cannot come from one minister.

Mr. Speaker: With due respect to the Leader of the Opposition, may I point out that this matter was brought up on a question of privilege upon which I have already ruled. We are right back in the position we were in before that question of privilege was raised, the question period on the orders of the day. There is nothing else before the house at the moment. Orders of the day.

POST OFFICE ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE POSTAGE ON LETTERS AFTER APRIL 1, 1954

The house resumed, from Thursday, February 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cote for the second reading of Bill No. 168, to amend the Post Office Act.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, it has been stated in the past few minutes that a number of reasons have been outlined by the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) as to why he supports the bill to increase the postal rates. Analysing the statements that have been made by him as found in Hansard, I find that the Postmaster General put forward two basic reasons for the introduction of the bill. One is his claim that he requires to make up the sum of $13,500,000 which he maintains will be required to cover general salary increases, the cost of the five-day week and increased remuneration to mail contractors. He says that in addition the department will suffer a loss of $7,500,000 owing to the removal of stamps on cheques.

I should like to deal first of all with the $7,500,000 loss brought about by reason of stamps no longer being required on cheques. That is not a reason which should have been put forward by the Postmaster General. If this loss is, as I maintain it is, strictly the result of a cute, political trick pulled by the Liberals just before the election, then that should be their responsibility. At the time the government took that action prior to the election they were looking for kudos and backslapping because they were removing that charge and doing away with the inconvenience; but nothing whatsoever was said to indicate that the tax was going to be reimposed in another form after the election. Therefore there was, without a doubt, a general assumption on the part of the people that the loss would be made up out of the general revenue. I say it was a straight, cute political trick. It reacted entirely to the advantage of big business because the average citizen does not issue a great many cheques. It is companies, business, that issue the majority.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not know whether the principle of the bill as it now stands does not offer enough scope for relevant discussion, but it seems to me that I have to intervene much more often than I wish to. The hon. member is now dealing with a certain action taken by the government on an earlier occasion. If he wishes to make a comparison or a passing reference to that as being the reason for the increase contemplated by the bill it is quite in order. I have let many others do that. But the minute he goes into the merits or demerits of the action taken by the government at the last session in removing the excise tax on cheques I think he is drifting too far away from the principle of the bill.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, I thought I was adhering strictly to it because time after time the Postmaster General brought in this argument.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It so happens that, while the hon. member thinks he is dealing with the principle, I happen to think differently, and that being my ruling I would ask the hon. member to relate his remarks strictly to the principle of the bill.

Mr. Winch: Naturally, Mr. Speaker, I have to bow to your decision, but understand my difficulty as to how an argument can be used on one side and not on the other.

Mr. Speaker: I do not want the hon. member to leave the impression that I permit members on one side to follow a certain trend of argument and do not permit members on the other side to follow the same trend. The hon. member knows perfectly well that he was dealing with the gesture made by the government last session as being favourable to big business. He went on to say that big business does not need to have that kind of gentle gesture made towards it. It was at that moment that I intervened. Now, I believe the hon. member and I understand the situation fairly well.

Mr. Winch: In the arguments the Postmaster General used in support of the motion for second reading of this bill he mentioned the necessity for making up a loss of $7·5 million by an increase in the postal rate on first-class mail. I desired to state, Mr. Speaker, that in my estimation that loss is not one which rightfully should be given as a reason for an increase in the postal rate on first-class mail. Time after time the Postmaster General reiterated, not once but over a dozen times, his belief that those who used the mails should pay for them and that was the principle in this bill. If that is correct, then I would have expected that before this house was asked to impose a greater charge on first-class mail that principle, if it is not now in effect, would have been put into effect. That is not the situation, so the arguments that are used by the Postmaster General as to why this bill should be passed are the very reasons why we believe it should not be passed.

I refer the minister again to his own administration of this department, and to the statistics made available to this house and the public in the report of the Post Office Department. I am basing all I am going to say on the statements of the minister and the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) that those who use the mails should pay. According to the latest information I have on first-class mail at the present rate, for every 46 cents of revenue the cost of handling and distributing that mail is 29 cents. The revenue on first-class mail is 46 cents and the expense is 29 cents. We are informed that this works out at approximately $16 million of net profit on the handling of first-class mail. In such a situation where does the principle, that those who use the mails should pay, come into effect? We are being asked through the medium of this bill to authorize an increase that will bring in, according to the Postmaster General, a net revenue increase of $14 million. This net revenue increase of $14 million can only come from one source, and that is the increased postal rate on first-class mail. This is what the Postmaster General is asking, on the basis of the principle that those who use the mails shall pay. He is not satisfied with a net profit of $21 million; he wants a net profit of $35 million from those who use the first-class mail. I believe his own argument falls down completely.

In so far as second-class mails are concerned, the latest figures reveal that for 5 cents of revenue the cost of handling and delivering is 18·5 cents. The revenue is 5 cents and the expense is 18·5 cents, and this accounts for a deficit of approximately $16 million. The Postmaster General and the Secretary of State, in supporting this bill, say they believe in the principle that those who use the mails shall pay. I cannot see that argument, on the basis of the figures I have presented. If the Postmaster General really believes in the principle, then he should see that it is put into operation. If there is a deficit once the principle has been placed in operation, that is the time for him to come before the house with such a bill. I believe that to do so now, on the basis of this argument, is a most fantastic and ridiculous thing.

I was grateful that this debate could be adjourned last night because I desired to have the opportunity of reading the J. D. Woods and Gordon report which the Postmaster General tabled in the house yesterday and which appears as an appendix to Hansard. It is a most interesting report, although it is quite brief. Even before I read this report I was opposed to this bill, but after reading it I am more than ever opposed to it. It is quite obvious, at least to me, that something radical should be done in the post office administration branch. I cannot quite understand how this department has operated as efficiently as it has. The report, almost throughout, lays emphasis on the necessity for key personnel or the "top brass" of the organization. Just go through it very briefly, Mr. Speaker, and then try to understand how the postal service has continued to operate. I am taking the word of the Postmaster General that J. D. Woods and Gordon is a good firm on business administration.

Let us look at the report as it appears on page 1806 of Hansard for February 4, 1954. It reads:

Operations Branch

(a) Chief superintendent—engineering—a man should be obtained from outside the service to fill this vacancy . . .

(b) Mechanical engineering division—This position should be filled either from outside the service or possibly by one of the engineers from one of the major post offices . . .

(c) Methods and time study division—A start should be made immediately on the organization of this division. Either the man to head the division or one or two of his assistants should be drawn from outside the department . . .

(d) Chief superintendent—operations—This position should be filled by the most experienced man available within the service . . .

(g) Methods and procedures division—The organization of this division is dependent on obtaining suitable personnel to carry out the work . . .

(h) Inquiries division—As soon as a suitable postal superintendent can be selected, this division can be formed.

Transportation branch

(a) Chief superintendent—transportation planning and research—This position should be filled as soon as possible . . .

(b) Chief superintendent—transportation services —This position should be filled by a man with proven administrative ability . . .

Financial branch

(a) There are three senior positions to be filled in this branch and the organization changes can take place as soon as suitable men are available. In addition there is the position of comptroller in the administration branch. It will probably be necessary to go outside the department to fill two or three or these four positions . . .

This is the way the report reads; key man after key man; reorganization after reorganization, and recommendations to go outside the department to obtain suitable men to do the job. Is it any wonder, Mr. Speaker, that we feel the Post Office Department must have done a remarkable job in the past in operating as efficiently as they have? In view of that brief report which the Postmaster General received in December 1952—I have not seen the main report—I say there is conclusive evidence that some reorganization should be undertaken by the government. I say, on the basis of this report, that they are not carrying out their own principle that those who use the mails shall pay. I believe, therefore, that this bill should most certainly be emphatically rejected by every member in this house.

(Translation):

Mr. Romuald Bourque (Outremont-St. Jean): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take part in the present debate but so much fuss has been made about the report which was tabled the day before last that I believe it is my duty, as a businessman, to rise and voice my protests.

(Text):

Before proceeding further I should like to say that for the last three days hon. members have been commenting upon the report as if it were the Bible. Let me say that I have now before me a report which, as a businessman, I have just had prepared by a firm of management engineers. It is a very complete report. I have not studied it yet, but I am sure when I do study it that I possibly will not implement more than 40 per cent of what it contains.

I understand that about two-thirds of the recommendations contained in the report submitted to the Post Office Department have been implemented. This shows that it was given very close study, that it has been implemented after the study was made, and that the decisions were made by superior officers in the department.

We have just been told that one of the recommendations in the report was that some of the senior officers were to be changed. Well, in these days, in business, every day we are confronted with such things. We have to make continual changes in the administration of different corporations in which we are interested. And not only that, but in the larger corporations a complete bookkeeping system may be installed today, and in eight months' time it may be found that that system is not as efficient as it was supposed to be. As a result it is thrown out, and another one comes in.

So it is not surprising to find, in a vast department such as the Post Office Department, one which covers the whole of Canada, one which employs thousands of persons in thousands of localities, and handles mail in all parts of Canada as well as mail from the United States and other parts of the world—I say it is not surprising, in a department of this kind, to find at certain times that the degree of efficiency is not all that it should be.

Hence this report was called for and made; and we are told that to the extent of two-thirds the Postmaster General has implemented the recommendations it contained. I say he is to be commended upon his efficiency. This is particularly true when we consider the billions of letters handled by the department, and place alongside that the very slight loss that has been suffered in the last few years.

And yet some hon. members are very critical. For instance, if a letter coming to one of them is delayed, then immediately he attacks the department, and says all kinds of things about it. But we do not hear anything about human frailties, with the thousands of employees in the department, the number of trains it uses, the number of post offices, and the great number of articles passing through them. We hear nothing from them about the great number of hands through which a letter passes before it reaches its destination. To my mind it is nothing short of wonderful that in Canada at this time we have such a satisfactory system, with so few complaints coming in—and hon. members are in a position to know, because we receive complaints from practically all parts of Canada.

I do not want to be too long in what I say today, but I do not think the working population in Canada is going to object too strenuously to the increased postage they will be called upon to pay. I do not think the average employee writes more than ten or twelve letters a month; and if he is called upon to pay only one cent more, then I do not think the ten or twelve cents a month more, the $1.20 a year, will annoy him too greatly because he will be conscious of the fact that he is anxious to have increases in his salary, and that he has enjoyed such increases in the last few years. He will bear in mind that post office employees are also entitled to increases, and that if those employees are to receive higher pay it must be taken from the public by way of a higher postal rate.

The cost of living has increased to people in every walk of life, and I am sure that all employees in Canada will be glad to contribute their bit to enable the Post Office Department to continue the efficient service it has been giving the people of Canada.

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, listening to the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) last night I thought of something I received through the mail not long ago. It was a civil service notice advising that a commercial artist was required in the Department of National Defence.

I wondered about it, and discussed the matter with a colleague of mine. He gave me an answer in these words, "Well, with the estimates coming down, the Department of National Defence needs a commercial artist to paint a brighter picture." It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we will not find such a gentleman attached to the Post Office Department, because the Postmaster General needs no commercial artist: he paints his own picture. And he paints pictures that sometimes are not quite in accord with the facts, as many people see them.

This report has been tremendously valuable, I think, in establishing certain facts. One point which has not been brought out, and which might just be mentioned, is that apparently it cost over $70,000. In my original remarks I made reference to $10,000 or $15,000; but we find in the figures for the department a total of $72,000.54 paid to this company in the last two years. I want to get my money's worth out of it, as I believe most of us do; and that is why we are using the facts contained so plentifully in that report.

Before going further I wish to make one point crystal clear, so that subsequently it will not be distorted by the Postmaster General or by anybody else. He has tried to make it seem that it is inconsistent to compliment certain aspects of his departmental operations while condemning others. He said that several times and in various ways yesterday. I say there is no inconsistency in this. I, personally, am quite happy to stand here and praise the great bulk of post office employees who are doing their work under such trying conditions, and, although being so maladministered, are still doing their best to do a good job. I praise those employees for what they are doing.

I cannot help thinking of the words, as I remember them, written around the post office building in Washington. Perhaps I am not reciting them exactly, but I believe they run something like this: "Neither hail nor heat nor snow nor darkness of night shall slow these carriers from their appointed rounds."

Most of the people in the Post Office Department are doing a good job; but I criticize in the very strongest terms the Postmaster General for his administration of the department, and for many of the ways in which it is administered under his direction. I would remind him again, so that there may be no distortion, that these are two totally different fields—the staff who do the work, and the man who is responsible for directing the department.

And just thinking back to the quotation to which I referred a moment ago, it will be recalled that there was a reference to the darkness of night. I just cannot help feeling that if there is any darkness around this department, then it is that which has been caused by the minister himself, in an attempt to defend what is obviously an indefensible measure.

First of all I should like to deal in general terms with the arguments the minister introduced yesterday.

On page 10 of the report it says:

> The terms of reference were, in short, to see what improvements if any could be made in the existing postal services.

The report lists 73 recommendations under various headings so therefore we have indication that great improvements are possible. Further on page 13 the report says:

> Our principal object in this survey was to consider the over-all organizational structure, not to make detailed studies of ways and means of cutting costs.

And again:

> We have, however, during the course of our survey noted a number of instances where we feel confident substantial savings and improvements in service can be introduced providing the organizational structure is strengthened.

It is obvious that this report was not even designed to point out ways and means of cutting costs. That means that if those things arose as purely incidental to the report, beyond this report there must be a tremendous field in which costs can be further reduced and in which more work can be done to assure efficient administration. It is obvious that there are hundreds of thousands of dollars to be saved, that there are millions of dollars to be saved that I do not think the minister has even told us about.

Let us continue with the minister's remarks. Having had about two weeks to study our argument, the minister came back with what seemed to me to be a very poor case. We have had only overnight in which to study it, but his case is such that it takes no great strength to refute it. I should like to deal with the argument the minister introduced yesterday, and first of all I shall quote from his remarks on page 1765 of Hansard, as follows:

> Let me first state that in presenting this report the firm of business consultants estimated that in terms of salaries and additional staff required, increased amounts of approximately $300,000 per annum at headquarters and approximately $400,000 in the field would be required—

I fail to find that statement anywhere in the report. I challenge the hon. gentleman to show me where that statement is contained in the Woods and Gordon report. This means that we have here a perfect example of atrocious turnings and twistings which my leader so aptly termed yesterday as a tawdry political statement. But more important than that, it indicates something else. As far as I can see, it indicates that the Postmaster General somewhere has another more secret document from which he himself could draw those figures. I am quite sure, or I would rather hope, that he did not just draw them from his hat.

I should like to know whether this is a piece of isolated information which just came to him on a piece of paper or whether it comes from another secret document which in addition to this information contains other information which should be laid before this house and which specifically estimates possible savings as a result of the changes which the company that made the study suggests. I would like to know, in short, what the Postmaster General is hiding.

Then yesterday the Postmaster General attempted to deal with a statement I had made during the debate on the resolution. I think the easiest way to deal with this would be to read my remarks and then read his interpretation, which is completely different. I shall then tell why I said it. On January 15, as reported on page 1178 of Hansard, I said:

> Before I resume my seat I have just one further question. I should like to ask the minister when we in Notre Dame de Grace are going to get our second mail delivery a day.

By the time the minister got here he referred to my remarks as follows, and I quote from page 1769 of Hansard of yesterday:

> —he concluded by asking that the same postal department spend $4 or $5 million more to give the service of a second delivery a day in residential areas.

It will be seen that there is absolutely no relationship between those two statements. The reason I interjected that remark when I was speaking was that on December 4 I had written asking substantially the same question. Almost two weeks later I got a reply from the minister in which he said that the postmaster at Montreal had been asked to submit a report in that regard and when it was received I would be further advised.

It seemed to me that from December 15 to January 15 was long enough, even under present circumstances, to get a letter from Montreal to Ottawa and back, and so I asked the Postmaster General about it. The result is that my remarks were distorted and twisted to mean something which was never meant.

We have another interesting statement in the Postmaster General's remarks. He referred first to the financial statements which he publishes for the public, and then on page 1765 he is reported as follows:

> We do, however, maintain for our own guidance office estimates of what these various services amount to.

And then in the same paragraph:

> In recent years, however, these statements showed deficits not surpluses.

Is that not interesting? Apparently the hon. gentleman keeps two sets of figures. As he says, there are two sets of statements, one for the public, which he publishes, and another which apparently shows a truer picture, according to the hon. gentleman, for his department, and which he does not publish. That is what he says here that he has two statements, one which is published and another which is not.

This rather reminds me of the person who was applying for a job as a bookkeeper. He was asked if he could do double entry bookkeeping, and he replied, "I do double entry bookkeeping and even triple entry bookkeeping." He was asked what that was and he said, "In my last job I kept one set of books for the boss showing the true profit; another set of books were kept for the shareholders, showing no profit; and there was another set of books for the government tax collector, showing a loss." It seems to me that the Postmaster General has got as far as double entry bookkeeping with his two sets of statements.

So far we have seen two things. We have seen that the Postmaster General has been attributing figures to the Woods-Gordon report which were not contained therein. We have seen that he has another set of statements which apparently show a different picture from those which he published. If the hon. gentleman has information which denies that which he has given this house, and which bears on the problem, let him produce it so that we can see it and make our decisions and so that the people of Canada can make their decision on the facts of the case and not on his twisted interpretation of them. I feel rather badly about that twisting of my statement yesterday, and I am sorry if I am showing it just a little bit. Those remarks yesterday were quite misleading. Referring again to the question of ways and means of obtaining money to meet the additional expenditures which the hon. gentleman listed, he said, as reported on page 1769 of Hansard:

> There are two ways of obtaining the money to meet these additional and essential expenditures. One is by an increase in the postal rates; the other is by general taxation. So far I have not received from anyone in the house any other suggestion.

Let there be no doubt in the hon. gentleman's mind. If he did not read or could not understand or did not appreciate my previous remarks, I am now going to make an additional suggestion. I make the additional suggestion that he institute efficient administration in his department in order to accomplish these savings which, he says, he requires to meet his additional expenditures.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, the truth of the matter is that the hon. gentleman seems to have difficulty in even understanding what efficient administration is. Let us see why I make that statement. Yesterday the minister said, as reported at page 1766 of Hansard:

> The fact is, as the report repeatedly states, that the department is well administered and departmental officers have vigorously pursued a program of efficient operation over the years. What better evidence of this is required than the fact that during the past 20 years the volume of mail has increased by 178 per cent whereas the increase in total staff approximated 100 per cent?

Apparently that is the position on which the minister stands. He claims his department is well administered, and asks: "What better evidence can you require than this?" But, Mr. Speaker, the Post Office Department is engaged in the carriage of mails. The railways of this country are engaged in the carriage of passengers and freight. Let us see over the same 20-year period what the railways of this country have done. The steam railways of this country—my figures come from the Canada Year Book—have increased their combined passenger and freight mileage, passenger miles plus freight ton miles, by 211 per cent between 1931 and 1951, and during that time they have increased their staff by only 31 per cent. Here we have a comparison. We have the post office volume increased by 178 per cent and staff by 100 per cent, and we have the steam railways volume up by 211 per cent, and staff by 31 per cent. Both are engaged in fundamentally the same type of business, the carriage of commodities.

That demolishes, I believe, for all time the minister's claim, because similar instances could be introduced from many other fields showing that this vaunted record which the hon. gentleman is so proud of is inferior, owing to bad administration. He claims it is good administration which has produced this record, which, in fact, is inferior to most other industries and most other businesses.

Let me remind the minister that I am not criticizing the employees of the department. I am laying the blame on the administration of the department which is directly under the hon. gentleman who sits opposite me.

The hon. member on my left dealt at some length with the appendix which the Postmaster General tabled last night. I am not quite sure, because the minister did not indicate—and that may be rather curious—to which year that report referred. He said "December 17" on two occasions, but not once did he say which year it referred to. Surely he knows which year. However, let us look at it. If the document he tabled, containing a set of recommendations on the implementation of the reports, was received at the end of 1952, then the estimates for the coming year, which I have in my hand and which I have had only half an hour to study, contain very few of the recommendations contained in this Woods and Gordon report. It is quite obvious that if the recommendations in that report were to be implemented by March 31, 1955, then these recommendations would show up in the estimates. The Woods and Gordon report make suggestions for changes in position, for changes in title, and for changes in administration generally. I have studied the Woods and Gordon report, I sometimes suspect, almost as well as the hon. gentleman who holds the position of Postmaster General, and I have searched for half an hour and I cannot find any indication in these estimates that the implementation of this report is going through at the present time.

If this document which he presented is dated 1953—that is quite possible—then he received the report and waited thirteen months before he even asked for a set of recommendations as to how to implement them. Let the hon. gentleman take his choice, but I do not think it reflects too great credit upon his administration.

Turning for a few minutes, Mr. Speaker, to a few points which are brought out in this report, I would like first of all to deal with the carriage of mail. It is quite apparent from the report that the department seems in the dark as to the amount of subsidies it is paying to various carriers. For example, we find this at page 50 of the report:

> After a service has been in operation for a number of years the fact that it was the intention to pay a subsidy while the service was being introduced is lost sight of and future contracts are based on the existing contract. The subsidy may therefore be perpetuated long after the justification for it has ceased to exist.

Then on page 56, the report reads:

> The present form of contract with the railroads results in a subsidy being paid which is not clearly recognized.

A few sentences after that we find this:

> The department as a result is normally paying for space which will be required only on rare occasions.

I would draw particular attention to that statement, Mr. Speaker. What a horrible thing to have to say about that being done with the taxpayers' money. And then the hon. gentleman comes in and says, "I need more money from the taxpayers through the increase in postage rates in order to carry out such a practice."

The most obvious injustice, of course, Mr. Speaker, is in the case of air mail. In a previous speech in this house I pointed out that the department pays the Trans-Canada Air Lines some four times as much per ton mile as the average of other air freight which they carry. Let us examine this for a moment. The post office deals with Trans-Canada Air Lines, and Trans-Canada Air Lines is a hybrid organization. Its stock is held by Canadian National Railways which reports to the Department of Transport, sometimes—when it feels like it, I rather suspect. I have seen other occasions when it did not report when it was requested to do so. But at least in theory it reports to the Department of Transport. That is the C.N.R. On the other hand, the T.C.A., which the C.N.R. owns, reports to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and Defence Production.

Therefore, at a time when a question of rate adjustment comes up—and this is one time, frankly, when I feel just a little bit sorry for the Postmaster General—we have the hon. gentleman on one side who presumably would like to see his mail carried for the lowest amount of money, while opposed to him automatically, within this set of circumstances, we have two ministers whose interest is in carrying the mail via air mail at the greatest possible rate. We have the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) to whom Trans-Canada Air Lines report and we have the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) who, through the Canadian National Railways, is going to be affected by the operating results of Trans-Canada Air Lines. The matter is extremely complicated. It took me quite a little while to figure it out. But it is also very plain that you have two ministers on one side and one minister on the other. Perhaps that is the reason—I do not know—why we see this absolutely astonishing situation in which our post office pays per ton-mile some four times as much as do other people who use the same equipment and the same type of services.

I would just remind the gentleman who is the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) that it is possible to be so amiable about things that one becomes absolutely ineffective in protecting the interests of one's own department and in looking after the interests of the public themselves.

Let us take another interesting case. On page 41 of the report, referring to relations between the Department of Public Works and the Post Office Department, we find this:

> The two departments might well consider an arrangement whereby the supervision of caretaking, maintenance and service staffs would be the responsibility of the Post Office Department . . .

In the Financial Times for January 29 we find a story with regard to towels, soap, etc., which says, "The servicing job has been handed over to public works". In other words, after paying our money, $70,000 of it, for a report—and I would think, on balance, it is an excellent report—made by experts in administration, we find it recommending one thing. Then eighteen months later we find the department doing the exact opposite. The report recommends that the Post Office Department take this thing over. But the exact opposite is what happens. The Department of Public Works takes it over, which is just the thing that has not been recommended by the report. Actually, it is the thing which the report says one should get away from. How can the minister sit there and think of the things he said last night and not feel shamed by these things?

There is one other thing in the report to which I should like to refer. We find the report saying this:

> Under the present procedure before tenders can be invited the purchasing and stationery division must forward a list setting out the names of the suppliers who are to be asked to tender to the deputy postmaster general; he in turn passes it to the Postmaster General for approval. This practice is presumably to allow the Postmaster General to add to the list of suppliers any names he may wish. This procedure adds to the delay in calling for tenders.

I am not going to expand on that paragraph unduly, Mr. Speaker, but I think it is unfortunate that the administration of the Post Office Department should be held up in order that the Postmaster General can add the names that he wishes—and they might very well be personal friends of the government—to the list of those who are going to tender for particular contracts.

The United States has been referred to periodically in the course of this debate, Mr. Speaker. I took a great deal of pleasure last night in voting in support of a motion which proposed that the bill which is now before us might receive further study in a committee. Without trying to go to too great length, I might list some of the things which have been done in the United States before they have come to their conclusion, and I might say that they are still debating. They held public hearings on the subject last summer. They had an independent organization prepare a report on public reaction and public feeling about this matter. They set up a 10-man advisory council of the post office committee, which reported. They obtained a Senate report on the subject. There were various other incidental things. Of course they retained a prominent firm of chartered accountants to study costs, allocation of expenses, existing subsidies and so on, in order to give them adequate information.

The important point which I should like to make is this. This report which they obtained went far beyond the confines of the Woods-Gordon report; and it was made freely available to all who wished to see it without any sputterings, camouflage, delays or insinuations. Here we are being asked to decide an increase of many millions of dollars in the postage rate. Since the Postmaster General has made so many obvious slight errors up until now, I just wonder whether it is not possible that, in his calculations, he might again have made an error of a few million dollars, which error would invalidate the stand that he is at present trying —I think so unhappily—to defend.

I might say also that in the United States their committee suggested only 28 changes, one-half of those suggested in the Woods-Gordon report and, according to Advertising Age of January 25, 1954, their committee reported that "hundreds of millions" of dollars could be clipped from post office operating costs.

Even allowing for variations as between the United States and Canada, surely there is some opportunity up here for doing the same. I will give the Postmaster General one example. If he would be realistic about the printing of his stamps, he could cut his costs in that department alone in half, and that would represent about $375,000 a year. I am quoting here from an article in the Wall Street Journal which refers to investigations being done on this matter in the United States. To take one paragraph referring to this rotogravure process, it says this:

> And, says the man from the engraving bureau, rotogravure stamps cost less than half as much to turn out.

And later:

> To the layman, the rotogravure stamp will look as good as the current stamp, indeed far prettier.

Mr. Speaker, I think I have perhaps stayed away from the arguments that have been used in the past. I think perhaps I have introduced a little bit of new material. I think perhaps last night I found one of the reasons for the problems in the Post Office Department when the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) said that he had occupied the position of Postmaster General for a few weeks. I just want to say that I look forward with particular interest to what may be said by the gentlemen who support this government, because we have heard very little from them so far.

Perhaps it all falls into the same category as the statement made to me once by someone outside this house who had not had the benefit of a great deal of education. I am not suggesting that there is anybody in that class in the house. But he said to me: "You know, when you ain't got an education you just got to use your brains." We on this side of the house first of all have our education, but on this measure we are also using our brains, and our brains logically lead us to the conclusion that the present request of the government for an increase in the postage rates is completely indefensible and completely unsupported by any substantial documented or intelligent evidence. For that reason I, and I would imagine my colleagues as well, am certainly opposed to this increase.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I join with others in opposing second reading of the bill. I quite agree that the government has failed to give the house adequate reasons for the imposition of this additional tax on the people of Canada through an increase in the rates on first-class mail. If the figures that we have heard are correct and first-class mail has been yielding the department a very substantial revenue over and above the cost of operation, then the statement of the minister and of the government, that each service or each branch of service should pay for itself, of course falls to the ground, because so far we have not heard how the post office loses the amounts we have been told it loses, and will lose, and what that loss is in the various operations of the Post Office Department.

For example, we have not heard to what extent the carriage of second-class mail is profitable or unprofitable. I think the minister should give us that information, and I certainly do not think that this imposition should be made upon the users of the ordinary services of letter mail in order to make up deficits on second-class mail. If it is in the public interest, as has been said several times in this debate, to subsidize second-class mail—and it may be in the public interest—then it seems to me that should not be done by the users of letter postage mail but should come from general revenue.

I say to the minister that until we have complete information regarding the department and its operations we should not give consent to the second reading or passage of the bill. I should like to have seen, as I said when the matter was before the house earlier, a thorough investigation of the postal department. I do not think it hurts any department of government to come before a parliamentary committee, explain its operations, and allow hon. members to question various officials as well as the minister in charge. I want to say to the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) that I am not particularly critical, shall I say, of him personally. I do not think that is the point. The point is that I am critical of the department and its operations. There are many things about the department that I and many other members of the house would like to know.

I think of the organizations that have come before parliamentary committees—Canadian National Railways, Trans-Canada Air Lines, the national film board on one occasion, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on several occasions. Not only do we get very valuable information in such committees, information that enables us to come to decisions as to what the organizations are doing, but we also help the organizations themselves. I think much good has come out of the various parliamentary committees on broadcasting, the film board and atomic energy; and certainly the appearance of the presidents and officials of Canadian National Railways and Trans-Canada Air Lines before a committee has helped both members of the house and the organizations themselves.

I do not think for one moment that the house should give second reading to the bill until we have more information. I think that the amendment we moved last evening was one that the government should have adopted so that an inquiry could have been held before this measure passes, becomes an act of parliament and therefore an imposition on the people made by this house. Because I believe that, I am going to suggest that we do not proceed with the bill today. Indeed, I am going to put that suggestion in the form of a motion. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis):

> That the motion for second reading of Bill No. 168 be amended by deleting therefrom the word "now" and by adding at the end thereof the words "this day six months hence."

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I think there is quite a bit of merit in the amendment that has just been moved, and in speaking on it I should like to deal in some detail with the remarks made by the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) in the statement which he presented to the house yesterday. He said in part, as found at page 1764 of Hansard for yesterday:

> We think the readjustment of the postal tariff, increasing the postage rate, is the most equitable arrangement . . .

We have said on numerous occasions since this debate started that we do not agree with that statement at all. I might point out that the principle of equalization of rates has been accepted in many spheres of public service in Canada as well as in other countries. Surely that same principle can be fairly applied to the allocation of revenues and expenses among government departments, as indeed it is in some of them. I was interested in reading some comments on this very subject the other day in my home town paper, the Hamilton Spectator, in which it was said:

> In fact the whole basis of present day government finance is the collection of revenue according to the individual's ability to pay and the spending of it according to the general interest of the nation.

I think we have ample evidence that this is true. The Spectator goes on to ask:

> . . . why should Ottawa decide that just one department of government must be put on a paying basis —a department which performs a public service essential to the national good; a department which by increasing its charges can affect every citizen, raise the operating cost of every business and, quite possibly, interfere with that free communication which is vital to the development of a sprawling country.

The minister used as an argument the fact that it was not fair to ask the office girl or the worker or the little man to pay for the stamps of big firms like Eaton's, Morgan's, Simpson's and Dupuis Freres. That is precisely what they are doing, Mr. Speaker, under this new arrangement, because under the new rates these companies can claim the additional postage as an expense of doing business. For this reason it costs them less than 50 per cent of the additional postage because their taxes are in that category. The individual has no such advantage. What he pays out is a net loss to him. He is, in effect, therefore, doing that very thing, helping to pay for the postage of these companies which are, by reason of the nature of their operations, permitted to deduct from their cost of doing business the additional postage which they pay.

The little fellow who writes only a few letters each year is probably not in the income tax brackets. It is all very well to say this should be spread over all the people, but it is not spread over all the people. The little fellow now pays indirect taxation, sales taxes, and now the Post Office Department has decided he shall carry another levy which is not wholly paid by the industrial concerns of this country, the additional postage rate.

Later on, speaking of the four main proposals which he claimed the opposition had made, the minister said that if we should take the additional cost out of general taxes we should have a truly subsidized service. Towards the close of his remarks he said that this scheme would have illogical and dangerous consequences. Is this a new order under which we are operating? This is the first evidence we have had that the government views with horror the idea of subsidization. Even granting the government has had a change of heart or that the Postmaster General stands alone in his new-found virtue, it must surely be admitted that, if the Post Office Department is not to have the benefit of subsidy, then by the same rule it should not be called upon to dispense gratuities to other departments of government from its revenue. As the Postmaster General reminded us yesterday, you cannot have your cake and eat it too.

It seems to me the minister also made a little play on what he referred to as "the elementary principle that one thing cannot at the same time be white and black". I think there was some reference to the sins of the opposition in regard thereto. It would appear that the opposition are not the only sinners, Mr. Speaker. Certainly the Postmaster General's remarks, and the inference being drawn from them, would indicate that the government is guilty in this regard, too. I was very much interested all the way through the statement which the Postmaster General made, and from time to time I made a few notes. Until I actually obtained the text of his statement, I am afraid that some of the implications escaped me. It is rather difficult to hear a statement read in the house and absorb the full implications at the time it is being given. I made a few notes which helped me in looking for what I considered to be the more interesting portions of the statement.

I should like to refer to one statement, which has already been mentioned briefly this afternoon by the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace (Mr. Hamilton), and that concerns the financial picture revealed by the statements in the Postmaster General's annual report. The minister said the statements had been prepared for years along the same lines, and naturally are for comparative purposes. They do not furnish a financial picture along the lines that are usually provided in connection with commercial or industrial undertakings. Of course, that is apparent to even a casual observer.

The minister is basing his argument for an increase in rates on the figures of the department which he now admits do not reflect the true position; that is precisely what we have been saying right along. The minister is asking for an increase in rates which he cannot, under any circumstances, substantiate. Even today we had another example of this fact when several members of the government were unable to tell us just what the plans of the department and the civil service commission were concerning the implementation of the five-day 40-hour week. If the Postmaster General and these other ministers have no idea just how the implementation is going to be effected, how can they say they need $5 million for this purpose? It is a guess, and probably a wild guess at that. I am amazed that, in the light of this, the minister has the temerity or possibly the naiveté to ask this house to sanction an increase in postal rates because he feels that next year's fictitious figures will show a deficit. He does not know how much, but he comes to this house and asks for $15 million to play with, just in case we have a deficit.

The Postmaster General went on to make some other allegations. He related some of the things that we had said, and he said some things that we had not said. Speaking about the cost of operation of the department, he said that they had not calculated or taken into account the value of the services rendered to the department by the civil service commission. He went on to say what those services were. The same remark applied to the Department of Finance in connection with salary accounts, the writing of cheques and so on. He said these estimates do not take cognizance of the fact the Auditor General provides a free audit service. Do these departments not supply the same service to all other departments of government?

Let us follow this argument through to its logical conclusion. Supposing the Auditor General charged each department with the cost of auditing? I would think that by the time he got through at the end of the year there would be no need to have any estimates for the Auditor General's department, because all the other departments would have been charged with those costs. In turn, each of the departments preparing its estimates would put in an item for auditing. They do not do that. Apparently the Postmaster General thinks they should. Supposing the Department of Finance charged each other department of government with expenses in connection with salary services. In that case, the estimates of the Department of Finance would be materially reduced. All of these arguments which the minister used merely serve to point out our main contention, that the department itself does not know where it stands; yet it asks for an increase in rates.

The minister also tried to link up remarks which had been made by my leader with a reference to the situation in the United States. After telling that a speech had been made by the President of the United States, in which he intimated his intention to ask for an increase in postal rates, and despite the fact that this matter has not been considered by the congress of the United States, he said:

> This makes it clear that the United States government is abandoning the policy which the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) suggests we should follow.

Mr. Speaker, a little marginal note I made yesterday when the minister made this statement is, I fear, distinctly unparliamentary. So, following his example, I suppose I should make that confession, and then withdraw the unspoken remark, as he did yesterday.

Mr. Cote: Do it discreetly.

Mrs. Fairclough: I do not want to be sued. The very idea of suggesting that in our opposition to the increase we are likely to build up a deficit of $770 million, or even the Canadian equivalent, on a per capita basis, of about $55 million, is simply ridiculous. Apparently the minister and his advisers know this full well, because otherwise I fancy they would be asking for an 8-cent mail rate instead of a 5-cent rate. And that is just about what would be needed to cover a deficit of $55 million.

We contend that the 5-cent rate now proposed is just as unnecessary as an 8-cent rate would be, and we say the government has yet to show good and sufficient reasons why this essential service should not be supplied to the people of Canada at rates which are now in effect.

The Postmaster General then went on to talk about the cost of making the alterations in the service which had been suggested by the J. D. Woods and Gordon report. He admonished the house to please bear this increase in mind.

Well, Mr. Speaker, expert business consultants do not suggest expenditures unless they can justify those expenditures in subsequent savings and increased efficiency—and probably both. And so to say that the cost of making these improvements is something which should be borne in mind is unrealistic. What we want to know is not what it will cost to put the improvements into effect, but what the saving will be to the department if the improvements are put into effect.

And then in glowing terms the minister painted the picture of the wonderful administration the department had enjoyed over the years. In fact he took so long to do it that the little note I wrote yesterday I am going to repeat today, and it was simply this: The gentleman doth protest too much, methinks. I know the minister thinks his department is pretty good, but I doubt if he thinks it is so good that it can claim credit for the increase in the volume of mail, which undoubtedly bears some relationship to the increase in population. After all, the increase in the volume of mail handled should have some staff advantages, particularly at the administrative level. While it may take two postmen to carry twice as much mail, it certainly does not take two postmasters to supervise it. And with that increase in volume there is bound to be a saving in overhead at the administrative level.

So I cannot really believe that the Postmaster General gave too much thought to his statement that the increase in volume of mail by 178 per cent, and in staff by only 100 per cent, was a great achievement and I suggest that his bragging was not very well based. I am sure anyone who has been actively engaged in industry would not think it was much of a boast.

Then he went on to say that the officials of the department, entirely without any help, had replaced the old system of handling money order accounts. Well, I presume he was referring to the system of punched card accounting which they adopted. I must say that it is very laudable to find that this modern system was put into effect. But that is only ordinary business practice. It is used by all sorts of industries and by governments where large volume passes through their hands, and where such a change would make the procedure more efficient so that it would pay for itself.

But here again he brags about the amount that has been saved, and gives the figure of $350,000. I do not doubt that at all. But if by keeping up with improved accounting methods the department can save $350,000 annually in just one operation, how much can it save if it follows the recommendation in the Woods-Gordon report that modern techniques in materials handling be adopted? We do not know the answer to that. We know it is in the report, but we do not know what could be saved.

The minister says that we cannot make sufficient savings to keep the postage rate where it is today, but how does he know that is so? He admits a saving of a third of a million dollars in one operation. In one breath he says no great savings can be made and in the next he boasts of what he has done in adopting modern methods. How inconsistent can you get? The more I read the minister's statement, the more amazed I became.

[Mrs. Fairclough.]

Then, going on to speak about savings, he said that in the report they do not at any point indicate that these savings are to be realized immediately. Of course, you do not realize savings immediately when you change over your system. It stands to reason that it takes time to put in new methods and to introduce new techniques. It may even cost a little more until you get your new machinery, your new equipment and new system in full operation. But eventually you will make money on it, and save.

He has said it may be several months before the changes are finally completed. Well if he anticipates that it will be several months before these changes are completed, and if he admits that he has already saved over a third of a million dollars on one change, and if he also admits that this report has made suggestions which the department is seriously considering and which he hopes to put into effect, then why raise the rates now? Why not wait? Why not wait to see what can be done? After all, the department has had deficits before. It would not be the first time it has operated on a deficit.

The whole point is that he is estimating a deficit of which he is not sure—and I maintain he could not even hope to substantiate that estimate later on. Yet he asks for an increase in the postage rate at a time when he has no idea of what the results of operations may be in the department, under new and modernized conditions. Then he said:

> Thus the sweeping statements to the effect that efficient administration will permit us to make enough savings to meet the added cost are swept away by the facts.

What facts? The fact that you can save and have saved $350,000 in one operation? Does that prove that the minister cannot make a saving? I think it proves quite the reverse. Then he goes on to the question of franking, and he says that the suggested abolition of franking would cover only a small fraction of the total additional expenditures of $13,500,000, and calls this just another futile suggestion which brings no remedy to the situation.

Well, Mr. Speaker, as I recall it, the amount which the department itself estimates as being lost through franking is very close to $5 million. I believe the exact figure was $4,700,000. That is well over a third of the additional expense which the Postmaster General anticipates, and upon which he is basing his request for a 1-cent increase in the rates.

He goes on to say that the principle of franking is to give free mail communication to those seeking, as well as to those supplying, administrative information. We know all that. And then he says the privilege is given so that free mail communication may be established between the Canadian public, the ministers and members of parliament. As I recall it, we mentioned the matter of franking, but not only the mail and communications which flow between constituents and their members and ministers. We mentioned also that this practice is indulged in rather promiscuously, if I may say so, by the various departments of government.

Who suggested in this house that franking should be abolished? As I recall it, it was the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) who mentioned it. Later on the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) suggested it. I think it is only natural that other hon. members in different parts of the house should then take up the cry. As I pointed out during the resolution stage, there is much useless mail from departmental sources. I should like to read to the house a communication I received which I think well points up this claim. This letter came to me with its enclosure a week ago, after the debate on the resolution stage. It is addressed from the Norberry school, St. Vital, Manitoba, under date of January 19, 1954, and the text is as follows:

> Recently I noted that you spoke out against the proposed increase in postal rates. I too am opposed. I believe that considerable saving could be achieved at the government level. As proof I forward the enclosed book.

The book is the Canadian record of performance for purebred dairy cattle, Jersey.

> Weekly, similar material arrives from the Department of Agriculture. This is an elementary and junior high school in suburban Winnipeg.
> There may be some citizens who would be interested and even excited to discover that Fancy Girl, whose sire was Basil, gave milk for 305 days amounting to 3841 pounds of which 5·7 per cent was butterfat. However the teachers and pupils of this school do not seem to be included in this number. Doubtless they haven't been properly orientated or activated or whatever the word is that the progressive educationalists would use.
>
> However this is only the record of the Jersey cows. You must know that there are other branches of the cow family and that their numbers are even more numerous, necessitating thicker and heavier books.
>
> To date I haven't been able to discover any possible use for such material. However I could—and this is a fiendish idea—select some particularly recalcitrant boys and as punishment have them figure out which cow averaged the most pounds of milk per milking day. That ought to settle their hash. However I would run afoul of the Geneva convention.
> More seriously, this information must be compiled at considerable expense to the taxpayer. Surely this expense could be reduced by producing only sufficient copies to satisfy a carefully-selected mailing list. Those who desire such information must be highly specialized and would request it. To have postmen going about the country delivering this information to institutions and individuals who have no recourse but to consign it to the wastepaper basket, is a senseless waste of public monies.
>
> Yours truly,
> V. H. L. Wyatt, Principal.

When I made my remarks at the resolution stage, I did not have a specimen at hand. At that time I said that much of the material which comes across our desks bearing the government frank is pure junk. I do not mean that this particular report is pure junk, but in so far as this recipient is concerned it is just that. If the recipient has no use for it, why have it printed and why have it sent out? Then why turn around and say to the taxpayers of this country, "We shall have to charge another cent for first-class mail because the Post Office Department is losing money". It is perfectly ridiculous.

In speaking of the franking privilege, far from saying that the privilege itself should be abolished, I said that the Post Office Department should receive credit from the other departments of government to which mail service was supplied. This is not a matter of abolishing the franking privilege, it is simply a bookkeeping matter. If the taxpayer has the right to free mail, he certainly has the right to cheap mail. To say on the one hand that you must not abolish his franking privilege and on the other hand to say to him that he has to put another cent on every letter he writes unless he writes it to the government or to his member of parliament is pure nonsense.

Mr. Cote: May I ask the hon. member if she is for or against the abolition of franking?

Mrs. Fairclough: I thought I had made myself clear. I do not advocate the abolition of the franking privilege, but I do advocate proper credit being given to the Post Office Department for the services they render to other departments. An amount should be credited to post office revenues representing the service received by the different departments. Likewise each department should be charged with that service. In that way you would have a clearer picture and a truer position of the finances of the Post Office Department.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the hon. member think that in order to keep its books properly the Post Office Department should pay rent to the Department of Public Works for the premises it occupies?

Mrs. Fairclough: That could probably be worked out quite well, provided the Department of Public Works will not charge the Post Office Department the full cost of space used by other departments, such as the Department of Veterans Affairs, customs and excise branches, the income tax department, the annuities branch of the Department of Labour and other branches which use space in the so-called post office buildings at no cost.

An hon. Member: That will settle his hash.

Mrs. Fairclough: In referring to rates in the United Kingdom the Postmaster General stated that the distances the mails are carried in Canada are much greater than in the United Kingdom. He went on to say:

—a large part of which is by air transport with no additional charge to the mailer.

Whose idea was that? I do not remember that this was passed by this parliament. It just became a practice. As was remarked the other day, it gave T.C.A. a considerable advantage which was reflected in its annual statement. We have been under the distinct impression that the carriage of mail by T.C.A. was intended as a direct subsidy to that organization. Perhaps, after all, it had a secondary motive, to build up an alibi for a potential increase in postal rates which now threatens to become reality.

I do not think most of the people in Canada, the average little fellows who write a few letters a month, are much interested in whether their letters are going to be carried by air or by rail. An instance was quoted yesterday by the hon. member for York-Humber (Miss Aitken) where a letter which should have reached its destination in about three days took about eleven days because it was sent around by Goose Bay and Gander.

Mr. Brooks: It had to gander around.

Mrs. Fairclough: We spoke about the elimination of the stamps on cheques and the fact that in the first session after the election the postage rates were raised. I should like to speak about that for just a few minutes. In the first instance the Post Office Department showed a surplus of $6,500,000. The Postmaster General now says that the revenue derived from the sale of stamps for cheques was $7,500,000. It would appear that at the time this policy was adopted by the government the government knew full well that there was danger of running the Post Office Department into the red to the tune of $1 million. But that was not considered at that time. The Postmaster General says that the first information of the discontinuance of the excise stamps on cheques and notes was in February, 1953. The minister goes on to show that when the stamp tax on cheques was discontinued the government was not aware that certain things would occur. It was not aware, for example, that the civil service commission intended making salary adjustments. He stated these did not commence until the fall of 1953. He also stated that at that time they apparently did not know anything about the five-day 40-hour week. I quote what the minister said:

Furthermore, no decision was made by the government in regard to the general adoption of the five-day 40-hour week in the operating service of the Post Office Department until sometime in September 1953.

That was a full month after the general election. The minister continues:

The bill authorizing a readjustment of the rates for rural mail couriers did not become law until the 14th May, 1953.

But, Mr. Speaker, the budget was brought down in February; therefore the government could not possibly not have known these things were going to happen. If the minister did not know there were persistent demands for salary adjustments and for the five-day 40-hour week, he was the only person in the country who did not know, because it was in all the newspapers, it was a matter of great comment, there were public meetings, and certainly everybody else knew about it.

I would again emphasize the fact that the minister said the bill authorizing the readjustment of the rates for rural mail couriers did not come into effect until May 14. We all know a bill does not pass through this house in an hour, a day, or a week. Certainly I was a little curious on this score, and I looked up the order paper. I found that this bill was on the order paper on January 12 and that it was formally called on January 13.

An hon. Member: Which year?

Mrs. Fairclough: 1953. The bill was introduced on January 29 and it had third reading after the budget on March 31. The date on which it became law, or received royal assent, was May 14, the date quoted by the minister. If the minister seeks to imply by quoting that date that the government did not know about one of its own bills on the order paper, then I would say it seems to me to be a very curious implication indeed.

The minister stated these expenditures had not even been contemplated. But I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if they were not contemplated, and if the minister did not know they were likely to occur, then there was one thing he did know which the rest of the country did not know, and that was the date of the election.

Mr. Cote: I did not know that either.

Mrs. Fairclough: Then you must have done some tall guessing. Mr. Speaker, I feel that in spite of the language of the report which the Postmaster General favoured us with yesterday; in spite of his assertion all the way through that because of these statements, which he persists in calling facts, it has been proved that there should really be no opposition at all to the increase in postal rates, the minister has failed to prove his case.

The minister concluded his remarks with this statement, as reported at page 1769 of Hansard:

> I know the measure is not a popular one in some quarters, but it is at least honest . . .

I do not know how far one can go in this house, Mr. Speaker, in using words such as "honest, dishonest" and so forth. I have heard hon. members called to order for what seemed to me very minor infractions of the rules. I have heard them called to order for imputing motives, and I have heard a good many implications made in this house by hon. members who were not called to order. But that last paragraph really threw me. "This is an unpopular measure . . ." yes, ". . . but it is at least honest."

I submit, Mr. Speaker, there is no honesty in producing reports year by year which are now admittedly not correct, and which are now admitted to present an incorrect picture of the department's operations. I submit there is no honesty in saying you need $5,000,000 to implement a five-day 40-hour week and then turn around and say: "We do not know in what part of the country this will be put into effect." It is a wild guess at best to say that this department must have an increase in postal rates which will yield about $15,000,000 when there is an admitted need for only $13,500,000; to cancel stamps on cheques which yielded $7,500,000, in the light of a surplus in the department of $6,500,000, and then say "We did not anticipate any of these additional expenses."

The government and the minister must have fully anticipated these expenses, unless they were deaf, dumb and blind. I can see no honesty in such a course. To use this as an excuse that after all it was honest is surely the feeblest excuse of all.

In his closing remarks the minister said:

> I have also answered all the major criticisms, and many of the less pertinent comments of the opposition. I feel that this further constructive presentation shows without any doubt the soundness of the position of the government, and destroys alleged objections put forth by the opposition.

But, Mr. Speaker, he has not answered the criticisms, in my humble opinion. His presentation yesterday was far from constructive and certainly not objective, and none of the objections put forward by the opposition have been destroyed.

We were accused by the minister of sinning against some elementary principles. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that if we have sinned in objecting to the increase in these rates I must confess we are unrepentant and will continue to object.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I think I should say a word on this bill, more especially since the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has moved to give it the six months' hoist. Personally I agree with the hon. member's motion, and I would like to give one or two reasons why I do so.

First, the minister is asking this house for an added $13,500,000, which he claims is needed to bring about an approximate balance in his department. I believe that is the amount he mentioned. But it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that if we are going to change the rates of taxation or the rates for carrying mail we should bear in mind the people who are going to pay these costs. When we put the full onus of that increase on the general public it is the same as adding additional taxes to the goods they have to purchase: When we add an increase in first-class mail rates it affects every human being in this dominion.

In my view the attempt to raise money in that fashion demonstrates that no thought whatsoever has been given to means of raising the money from those who can best afford to pay. The minister surely would not argue for a moment that those in the low income brackets, in the exceedingly low income brackets, can afford to pay any more than they are paying now. Yet under this bill the minister is going to do just that very thing.

It seems to me that he should have looked around for some other means to raise that money, if it were necessary; and I am not so sure that it is necessary. For instance, with regard to our second-class mail, we subsidize newspapers to the extent of $10 million every year. The amount used to be $12 million. Maybe that is necessary; but every evening when we open our papers we find that 75 per cent of it is advertising. Why should the people of Canada as a whole be expected to subsidize second-class mail when those who put their advertisements in the paper are, in fact, being subsidized? Why should we attempt to subsidize Eaton's, the Hudson's Bay Company, real estate firms and enterprises of that sort which take advantage of second-class mail which is subsidized by the public? Yet in the very same breath we are adding a further increase in rates to these people in the low income brackets. The thing just does not add up.

The minister may be sympathetic—and I think probably he is—to these people in the low income brackets; but that is a mighty poor way to show your sympathy. What people are there in that class who can afford to use telegrams, long distance telephone calls and all that sort of thing to carry on their correspondence? No, they cannot do that at all. They must use the mail, and that is what it was intended for. I remember, back a few years ago, when the postage on letters was changed from 3 cents to 4 cents. That increase was put on as an emergency measure. We were told in this house that it was going to be a temporary thing and that, as soon as circumstances warranted it, that tax would be reduced again to the 3-cent level. Now we find that is not true. Instead of remaining at the 4-cent level, we find that it is going to be further increased. If the government is going to continue to make promises like that, the people will not have much faith in those promises.

Then I too must agree that the franking privileges to other departments of government should be modified. Like the hon. member who just spoke, I do not think I would be in favour of a complete cancellation of that service. However, it seems to me that the minister could so arrange his department that 95 per cent of that franking would be done away with; at least if it was charged up to the other departments, that would be of some assistance to the Post Office Department.

To say that raising this $13½ million in this fashion would put the Post Office Department on a financially sound basis is not true. The Post Office Department has never paid its way. The Department of Public Works has always made a major contribution to the Post Office Department. We are therefore not attempting to put the Post Office Department on a self-sustaining basis in this regard. If the department—and I use that word advisedly—is in need of $13½ million, it seems to me that it was the height of folly to take the stamps off cheques. When that repeal legislation was before us here, I remember that I spoke against it and used words to this effect. Let me take the bureau of statistics report, where they say that 75 per cent of the people of Canada earn less than $3,000 a year. How many people in that bracket, who earn $3,000 or $2,000 a year, spent much money on stamps for cheques? Not very many, I am afraid. Yet that source of revenue brought in about $7½ million. If the minister is really sincere in this thing—and I am not questioning his sincerity—

[Mr. Johnston (Bow River).]

Mr. Cote: Will my hon. friend permit me to ask a question?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Yes.

Mr. Cote: Does my hon. friend suggest that we re-establish the excise tax?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I was just going to come to that point. If the minister really needs that money that badly I would suggest that he reimpose that stamp tax on cheques. I think it would be much more equitable to do that than to expect the people in the lower income brackets to pay this added postage cost. I said, "If he really needs it". I am in doubt myself whether he does need it.

Since the minister asked me my personal views on the question of the stamp on cheques, let me give him my personal view with regard to the subsidizing of second-class mail. I do not think we should have to subsidize second-class mail, particularly newspapers, to the extent of $10 million a year. That is a tremendous subsidy, particularly when that subsidy is passed on from the newspapers to the other large business concerns I mentioned a moment ago. I think there is a good possibility there of obtaining some of this money which the minister says he needs, rather than obtaining it in the fashion he is attempting at this time.

At any rate, I personally am in favour of the motion moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), to give the minister a little bit more time to think over this measure and to see if he cannot apply the tax in such a way that it will be more equitable. I must say that I will have to support the motion for the six months' hoist.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

CURRENCY, MINT AND EXCHANGE FUND ACT

AMENDMENT TO PERMIT MINTING AND MARKETING OF GOLD COINS

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West) moved the second reading of Bill No. 173, to amend the Currency, Mint and Exchange Fund Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) in his place and to welcome him back from Australia.

This act would, in fact, establish a free market for gold within Canada. It would establish a free market for gold in a country which is not resorting to the evils of exchange control, currency restriction or any of the other trade-destroying measures that have been developed by money managers, in central governments and in the central banks since the war, and in many cases long before that. The bill sets out and describes a coin which is designated as to weight and fineness only. The fineness is 900 and the weight of pure gold contained in the coin is one troy ounce. It is similar in the amount of gold it contains to the gold coin now being minted by the firm of Rothschild and Company and put out under the name of the First Banking Corporation of Tangier. I say it is similar in weight of gold. It differs in fineness, the fineness of the Tangier coin being 916·7, which is rather greater. The coin would of course bear a Canadian insignia. The first point I wish to make, before I discuss some of my reasons for introducing the measure, is that today under our strange so-called free marketing of gold, which is certainly not free marketing in the true sense, Canadian gold from our largest single gold producer and all our base metal mines is shipped through some recognized broker to Paris or some other market, but chiefly Paris, I believe, where it is sold to somebody else. As a matter of fact I was informed that the few coins I was able to secure were actually Canadian gold shipped, refined and sold through the Rothschild organization.

It seems a great pity to me that Canadian gold should leave Canada in this form. If it were minted into a convenient coin, which I have endeavoured to describe, a great deal of it would remain in Canada. A great deal of it would be purchased by individuals and corporations, and under the terms of the bill it could be purchased by the Bank of Canada or any other designated agency, but they would have to bid for it on an open exchange. Therefore most of the gold at least would not be lost to Canada, as it is under our present marketing system.

I suggest that would be a great advantage. While I have inserted a clause in the bill whereby its importation or exportation shall be free, because I think that is essential in the establishment of any free market, nevertheless a great deal of it would remain here to be put to useful purposes rather than lost in the international sea. In addition, from what reports we have been able to obtain recently, the uses to which it is being put are inimical to the well-being of the western democracies. So much for the first point.

The second point, on which I wish to speak a little later at some length, has to do with how we would know what the price would be. That is exactly the point which I consider to be important. Would the price be greater or less than $35? Frequently, when I have made these suggestions, people have asked me whether, if the Americans withdrew their guarantee to purchase all gold at $35 an ounce, they would dump gold on the market and depress the price. The only answer I have to that is to ask whether, if an individual, a corporation or a nation has an asset for which it has paid a certain price, would it be willing, in order to depress the price of the asset it has bought, to dump it on the free markets of the world.

Would the United States government, for instance, in order to depress the price of zinc, lead or copper, initiate a program of dumping their stockpiles of these metals on the already jittery base metal markets? Surely an operation such as that cannot be contemplated by any reasonable individual. They have bought these stockpiles of zinc, copper and lead. Are they prepared to dump these metals on the markets in order to depress the price? In my opinion, despite the fact that the zinc, lead and copper were bought for strategic uses, they would be no more likely to dump their stockpiles of these metals than they would dump their stockpile of gold. First of all, they would be destroying a United States government asset. They would have paid $35 an ounce for so many million ounces of gold. If they dumped it at $30 an ounce there would be a net loss to the United States of so many dollars an ounce, the amount varying in proportion to the price under $35 at which the gold was sold.

Now, it is said that Russia has resorted to these tactics. All I can say to that, Mr. Speaker, is that although we have no accurate figures, Russia is probably the second largest gold producer in the world. Her gold production has been estimated—although I give no credence to these figures—at some $200 million per annum at $35 per ounce. Not only has Russia been a major producer of gold but she has been able, through conquest, to get the gold hoards in the national treasuries of the countries she has overrun, like Roumania, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Baltic countries, and possibly others. It is quite likely, therefore, that Russia has a considerable hoard of gold.

Apparently the new Malenkov policy in Russia is to ease the lot of the long suffering people by making what are known as consumer goods and food a little more plentiful. In order to accomplish this, and because of the failure of her collective farms, she has had to buy large amounts of food outside her national boundaries. Apparently the only medium of exchange was gold. A few years ago when gold was selling at $45 and $50 per ounce on the free market, I was surprised that Russia did not undertake the action she has taken today. I feel that the reason was internal Russian politics. I do know that for a time she was buying machinery of the most strategic sort in Switzerland. As a matter of fact, there was a delicate international situation in Europe because Russia was able to buy machine tools and other tools in France, Switzerland and elsewhere and, by devious means, get them back into Russia. I believe that has been largely stopped by international action by the western democracies.

So much for the fear that the United States will dump gold in order to destroy the $35 price. It is unrealistic, because in all my life I have never seen a Yankee who was prepared to throw away money he had spent in purchasing something. We come again to what the price would be on the free market. I suggest that the price is unimportant. It is not the price which is so important, but the stability of that price; and that is something which is extremely difficult to arrive at. The only true method by which a stable price can be arrived at is through open market transactions. If you peg the price of any commodity it leads either to surpluses or to chaotic market conditions. Shortly I propose to mention what the Randall commission said on that very point in the report released just a week ago.

We want the gold to perform a useful function. At the present time gold is taken from the producing mines in Canada under extremely difficult conditions. I ask hon. members what product could be sold today for 10 per cent less than in 1939 and have the industry producing that product still in existence. The fact that we have a gold industry is nothing short of a miracle. With the exception of three or four mines, the existence of the industry is entirely dependent upon the benevolence of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act and the Canadian taxpayers.

I believe that is a most unfortunate situation. What the costs of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act this year will be, I do not know. The strike situation has upset things, so we do not know how much it will cost, but it is assumed it will cost in the neighbourhood of $15 million. Now, the money of the taxpayers of Canada is just keeping the gold mining industry alive today. I believe it is money well spent, because if that industry ceased to exist for any reason a whole series of northern municipalities would also cease to exist and would become ghost towns; and in an expanding country like Canada, we cannot contemplate the closing down of our northern frontier. But the principle is wrong; the principle of bonusing any industry, to keep it in existence, is wrong. Neither I in this House of Commons nor, so far as I know, any of the major gold mines, or the gold industry as a whole, recommended this form of subsidy to keep the industry in existence, when the legislation was first introduced.

The mines that ship on the free market are prepared to do so without this subsidy. I have not consulted with or talked to any of my mining friends with regard to this proposed legislation, but if a free market could be established in Canada I feel sure that within a comparatively short space of time the money we are spending on the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act might be saved to the Canadian people. I admit that, compared with a gross national product valued at $25 billion, this $15 million is not a very great sum. But even $15 million is certainly not hay.

Consider the problem of marketing gold under the present situation. By no stretch of the imagination can this be called a free market, nor can it be so considered. What happens is that the mine, submitting bullion to a broker, says, "We have so much to submit". The broker asks at what price it is offered. It is not a bid-and-asked proposition as in normal stock exchange procedure. It is a one-way procedure; the mine takes it or leaves it; the price is set. The gold must be exported. It leaves the country, and the mine has no further say in its disposition once it passes into the hands of the broker.

I feel that this is delivering the mining industry into the hands of brokers, and I think that is a wrong procedure. It is bad in principle. I congratulate the government upon the fact that the mines may now sell fine gold without having to go through the ridiculous process of adulterating it and then having it re-refined when it hits the European market. It is marketed in countries the economies of which, to say the least, are not too stable.

A friend of mine asked me this question the other day. If you have a bearer bond or a Canada savings bond, which is a pretty good security, would you be very happy to have it in a safety deposit box in Paris or Tangier, or would you sooner have it in your own box at home? It seems to me that is a pretty good argument for the ownership of gold. If a corporation has a few thousand ounces of gold, where would they like to keep or to store it? Surely it would be in a country with a stable form of government and with a stable economy. Surely they would like to store that gold either in Canada or the United States.

To preclude that is, I think, wrong. That is the question I put before the house in connection with the holding and ownership of gold. Gold held in a country whose economy is safe and stable is likely to be much more valuable than gold held in a country the economy of which is not safe, and whose future is anything but secure. It goes without saying that if one has a painting of one of the old masters he would sooner have it here in Canada than leave it in some country in which there might be a revolution at any time.

So I suggest it is reasonable to expect that if gold were sold within the confines of a country which, first of all, is not practising exchange control, and second is at peace and is geographically situated away from centres of strife and turmoil, a country possessing a buoyant economy and a stable form of government, it would increase in value.

So much for the price of gold. But, as I have said, the price is not the important thing. The important thing is, first of all, the usefulness to which that gold can be put and, second, the availability of the metal.

I have mentioned the Randall report. I have not read it in detail because it contains well over a hundred pages of closely written script. One of the points the Randall commission makes, to my mind one of the most important points, is the futility of trying to peg and to control the market price of any commodity. It takes issue, for instance, with the international wheat agreement. It takes issue with all schemes whereby an artificial price for a commodity is aimed at. With that I must say I am in entire agreement.

Any attempt to peg the price of copper, lead, zinc, aluminum, wheat, cotton or any commodity at a level above or below the world market price, that is the price you can get for it on the open market, is doomed to disaster. All such devices as the bill to restrict the importation of Canadian base metals into the United States, which fortunately has not been proceeded with, are doomed to failure. They may succeed for a time by the device of parity prices, by providing artificial price support; but by creating a high-level economy and a high-priced end product they can do nothing in the long run but destroy the world market for the particular product.

What is the harm in allowing people to own gold? What is wrong with it? First of all, gold is not like uranium. It is not fissionable. You cannot blow anything up with it. You cannot make a bomb of it. You cannot make a narcotic of it. You cannot smoke it. You cannot injure anybody with it. Why have we in Canada denied to our citizens the right to hold and own gold? Surely it can only be the restrictions of the international monetary fund.

I have spoken at length in this house about this organization, and I do not propose to repeat what I have said, except to say that it has now been proved beyond any peradventure of doubt that in its inception the international monetary fund was communist-inspired. Dexter White, Coe and at least—

Mr. Abbott: Lord Keynes, J. L. Ilsley, D. C. Abbott and a few other communists.

Mr. Adamson: Lord Keynes did not approve of it.

Mr. Abbott: I was a delegate at Bretton Woods.

Mr. Adamson: Lord Keynes certainly did not approve of the set-up of the international monetary fund.

Mr. Abbott: I was just questioning your communist-inspired allegation.

Mr. Adamson: Certainly all the people who formed the international monetary fund and its officers, or at least a large number of the original executive, were communists.

Mr. Abbott: Complete nonsense.

Mr. Adamson: What about Dexter White? What about Coe? They were proven to have been communists.

Mr. Abbott: And who else?

Mr. Blackmore: That is enough.

Mr. Adamson: There were four, but I have not their names in front of me.

Mr. Abbott: You had better have your facts before making these broad sweeping allegations.

Mr. Adamson: There were four who invoked the fifth amendment anyway. Let us look at what happened to the international monetary fund.

Mr. Abbott: Communist Graham Towers was there too.

Mr. Adamson: Has the operation of the international monetary fund assisted in the convertibility of currencies?

Mr. Abbott: Communist Walter Tucker was down at Bretton Woods.

Mr. Adamson: I am glad to know there were so many happy and foolish people down there. Has the international monetary fund assisted in the convertibility of currencies? Are our currencies any more convertible today than they were at that time? Unfortunately the answer is no. Why? Because the rules set up by the fund made most difficult the convertibility of soft currencies, sterling currencies, into the so-called hard currencies.

What has been the reason? The reason has simply been that the soft currencies, which are designated as currencies which bear no relationship to gold, have been unable to be converted into hard currencies through the common denominator of gold. So no matter how the restrictions were framed they have proved of great disservice to us as a trading nation, and they have not assisted the trading of the world. This is simply because the price of gold was set and the ownership and holding of it by individuals was not allowed.

With gold, purchases can be made anywhere in the world. The Russians have proved that, the Swiss have proved that, and anyone who has travelled in the Levant in recent years knows that to be so. Through the operation of this fund we have virtually sterilized gold and made it not a useful commodity but merely a metal to be taken from one hole in the ground and put in another, there to remain inert. So much for what has happened with regard to the convertibility of currencies.

There are hard currencies, which theoretically have some relationship to gold, and there are soft currencies which apparently do not. In between them you have this great impasse, this great gulf of lack of convertibility simply because the problem, the correct equation and the proper use of gold, has not been solved.

My suggestions have met with considerable approval. The town of Timmins, for example, passed a resolution which I imagine was forwarded to the minister, in which they recommended the minting of gold coins. In that resolution they used an argument which I think is valid. The resolution states:

> While the government is not in a position to have the price of gold increased, it can increase its use.

The mayor of Timmins stated, and I think this also is a valid argument, that it was time gold was freed from the restrictions placed on it by the international monetary fund. Outside of uranium it was the only metal so treated, he said. What is the danger in increasing the use of gold in Canada? What harm can it do? Can it upset world trade? Surely if we have a free market for gold in Canada it becomes possible to pay those people who sell to us in gold. They can be paid in gold through devious channels today, but with a free market the transaction would be automatic and government agencies would not require to be consulted.

Another advantage is that people coming to Canada would be able to obtain gold for their ordinary business transactions, and it would also assist persons doing business with Canada. For example, people with insurance policies in a Canadian company would be offered the choice of having their claims met in gold at the daily rate for which gold was being offered.

I would now like to quote a paragraph from an article by an economist I believe in, Henry Hazlitt. In the fourth of his articles on this question he states, and I am quoting from the issue of Newsweek dated January 25, 1954:

> A full gold-coin standard is desirable because a gold-bullion standard is merely a rich man's standard. A relatively poor man should be just as able to protect himself against inflation, to the extent of his dollar holdings, as a rich man. The reason for returning to a full gold-coin standard in several stages is to prevent too sudden a drain on gold reserves before confidence has been re-established. A program like the foregoing would provide a faster schedule.

In the earlier part of his article he sets out a timetable for the return to a full gold standard; and a free gold market is the first stage.

Let us assume this market was established. The average individual, who is always forgotten today, would have the right to own gold coins, export them, import them, or do whatever he wished with them. Thus, if further inflation occurred he would be able, through the ownership of gold, to protect himself against it. That is a very important point, because obviously we are passing from the lush years of the seller's market into extremely combative years when our goods will have to be sold under conditions of the keenest competition. It may be that if the unemployment situation becomes acute this government, as well as the government of the United States, will have to resort to deficit financing. I hope it does not come to that, but I am certain it will if the unemployment situation grows.

Deficit financing by any other term means inflation. It means the government issues more money than it collects. Under such conditions the ownership of gold would protect the individual, particularly the poor man. The man of means, the man of wealth, can protect himself by the ownership of real estate, common stocks, or real property, but the man with a comparatively small income is denied such protection. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, that is the essential fifth freedom which we and all the democracies seem to have forgotten, namely the right of the individual to protect himself against the results of arbitrary action by the central government.

Such protection is imperative. Freedom of religion, freedom of trade, freedom of worship and the other freedoms are actually part of the total freedom, which is the economic freedom which can only be provided through the ownership of gold.

If we do not do something like this, if we continue our present policy, we shall be faced with the complete decay of the gold mining industry. We are faced with the loss of our gold into the hands of those who can use it for purposes which are inimical to our welfare. I am told that a considerable amount of the rioting and the assassinating which is taking place in the Arab countries has been financed by gold. That is hardly a use to which I should like to see Canadian gold put.

As I say, we leave our northern municipalities and our mining industry at the mercy of brokers who are not interested in the welfare of Canada. We thus lose a priceless asset. At the same time we continue, under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, the expenditure of some $15 million a year, money which could be saved. We have not approached any closer to the solution of the question of convertibility of currencies. Instead of being a useful adjunct to our economy, the gold is either used against us or is sterilized. Neither course is desirable.

I have spoken at some length on this question this afternoon, Mr. Speaker. I wished as far as possible to speak without notes or a prepared script because I wanted, if possible, to explain to the hon. members of this house why I feel that our present course not only is not assisting the industry or the northern municipalities, important as they are, but is not assisting Canada as a trading nation.

I cannot see any danger in allowing gold to be traded freely in Canada. I cannot see that the ownership of gold by Canadians can do anyone any harm. On the other hand I can see that, through the free ownership of gold, you are going to provide for many Canadians a form of security against further inflation, and are going to allow them to maintain, through the holding of gold, the ownership of a tangible, finite substance, something which throughout the centuries has maintained its value and commanded a price. It is not gold which has shrunk in price. It is not gold nor the gold standard which has failed. What has failed is the belief that those money managers in central governments and central banks can control world prices for products and for their currencies. This has never been done successfully, although it has been done at times over periods of years. However, it has always proved to be a disaster.

For this reason I would ask that this bill be given consideration. What harm does it do? Who does it help? Will it not assist in the convertibility of currencies? Will it not aid Canada as a great international trading nation? It is on this basis that I put forward this amendment to the Currency, Mint and Exchange Fund Act.

Mr. Macdonnell: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. While I have listened with great interest to the speech of my colleague and agree with much of it, I wish to say that I do not agree with his remark as to the communist origin of the international monetary fund.

Mr. Armand Dumas (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, having the responsibility of representing a constituency in which the gold mining industry is so important, I cannot keep silent on a matter such as that which has been brought to the attention of the house by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson).

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, and move the adjournment of the debate?

On motion of Mr. Dumas the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: As it is six o'clock, the house will revert at eight o'clock to the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

POST OFFICE ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE POSTAGE ON LETTERS AFTER APRIL 1, 1954

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Cote for the second reading of Bill No. 168, to amend the Post Office Act, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I know it is an unpopular move for the government to bring forward legislation that, regardless of what form it may take, means an increase in our taxation. Therefore I suppose it is difficult for a member speaking on the government side to hope, as many of the opposition members do, to gain some political kudos from the particular legislation under discussion. But for the past several days I have personally heard a good deal of political hypocrisy, if I may say that without being asked to withdraw. I feel that certain things have been brought forward in this debate that call for some answer.

Mr. Winch: Apparently the Conservatives are wiped out.

Mr. MacDougall: There are no Tories in the house.

Mr. Knowles: There are plenty, but they are on the Liberal side.

Mr. Byrne: I am not going to spend a great deal of time on the merits or demerits of the bill, but I do wish to say that from my point of view and that of many of my constituents the postal department is rendering excellent service. I know there have been a number of complaints where mail has gone astray—I hope, Mr. Speaker, that I will be allowed extra time because my speech is being interrupted by the applause for members who are entering the house. I realize that the applause is not intended for me. As I have said, there have been a number of complaints from time to time which have been cleared up.

For the last five years I have been in a position to gain some experience with respect to mail deliveries from the east to the west and from the west to the east. I have had considerable correspondence. As a matter of fact I corresponded with my family two, three or four times a week before bringing them here. Time after time I have received letters around noon of the day following the day on which they were posted, and may I say that they were not franked but had 4-cent stamps on them. They were posted in the little city of Kimberley in the interior of British Columbia, some 150 air miles from Calgary. Everyone knows the distance from Calgary to Ottawa and the transfers that are necessary before mail finally reaches the post office here. I think that is very good service.

On the other hand letters that were delayed and came by railway took two days longer, and on occasion three days, to reach here. Therefore air service is in many respects good and is not a luxury. In these days of air travel the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) could leave here yesterday afternoon, spend the night in Goose Bay and arrive in England this afternoon, but even when such things can be accomplished in this air age we have members of the opposition stand up and tell us that air mail service is a luxury.

I said the other day that the Conservative party needed a shot in the arm, and I believe that is the truest statement I have made in in the house for some time. It would seem that when the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) runs short of a sound argument in the next few years he is going to seek to intimidate members of the Liberal party because they voted for an absolutely justifiable increase in their remuneration.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Byrne: He is not going to intimidate me, although he did intimidate a goodly number of his supporters. The hon. member from the adjoining riding of Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) suggested last night that I should rise in my place and make a speech like he was making. I want to say to hon. members that I would be somewhat ashamed to stand up in the house and make a speech like he made. I am not going to read a great deal of what he had to say, but from the substance of it you would imagine that the hon. member for Kamloops represented a bunch of hillbillies with no interest whatever in the outside world. At page 1791 of Hansard of yesterday he stated:

> . . . I would think that those people would be quite willing to continue to pay the extra three cents so that the people of my riding would not be subjected to the necessity of paying an extra cent on every one of their letters in order to get them delivered—and not by air mail . . .

I wonder if the people of the riding of Kamloops are so parochial that they do not make the same use of air service for their mail as do the people of Kootenay East. I have no actual figures, but I would not be afraid to state categorically that 90 per cent of the mail sent through the post offices in my riding is for delivery outside of the riding to the prairie provinces, eastern Canada, Newfoundland, Victoria and many other places. In some cases the mail is on the airplane within ten or twenty minutes after it has been delivered to the post office. While there is a good deal of communication by mail within the municipality and the surrounding area, I am sure that a large number of people are going to benefit a great deal from the fact that all mail will be carried by air when a 5-cent stamp is placed upon it.

I said when I rose that a number of things have been said that I feel need to be answered. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hahn) referred yesterday to the speech made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) who implied that patronage was rampant in the postal service.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I did not imply it. I said it.

Mr. Byrne: The hon. member says that he said it. I say the hon. member should prove such a statement.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): The proof is on the record. The names are on the record.

Mr. Noseworthy: It is proved.

Mr. Byrne: He did say that a certain person was asked to pay $500 to keep a sub-post office. If I wanted to get someone to take over a sub-post office in my riding I would have to pay him $500, and there would be no political patronage in it. The amount of money made by a person who looks after a sub-post office is so infinitesimal that it does not amount to a hill of beans. I would say that if we did have a candidate who was so silly as to suppose such a thing, possibly he should have had his head read instead of becoming a candidate. That is stuff and nonsense.

The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hahn) went even further with some nonsense that I know is not true. The hon. member now represents a riding which was formerly represented by a very close friend of mine. I was personally acquainted with him for four years, and I know him to be honest, upright, and one of the finest gentlemen ever to come from British Columbia. Long before "Bible-Billism" ever hit that province, we did send hon. gentlemen down here.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member completed his remarks by saying that we did send gentlemen down here. This might be an implication that the member who is now representing this riding, and who is the successor of the one to whom he referred as being a gentleman, might not be of the same calibre. I know he does not want to leave that implication. While I am on my feet I might say that it would be more interesting if we were listening to speeches related to the principle of the bill.

I know that last evening a little story was told about patronage, and it was being told at a time when perhaps my attention was not being directed to the speech. The hon. member has made a rebuttal to that story, I imagine, and I believe he should come back to the principle of the bill.

Mr. Byrne: I did not imply that British Columbia would not continue to send gentlemen here. If the hon. member feels that anything I have said calls for a withdrawal, I am only too pleased to do so. It may be true that this debate has, from time to time, strayed from the principle of the bill; but I think it should be recalled that I am the first member from British Columbia who has attempted to show the inaccuracies in statements that have been made by some hon. members. In this particular instance the riding of an hon. member, and by implication the member himself, in my opinion have been left in a bad light. I seek the indulgence of the house to put the record straight. At page 1787 of Hansard for February 4, 1954, the hon. member said:

> Another instance that I have in mind has to do with the post office that serves my own community.

The hon. member was seeking to show that patronage is costing such a great deal that it would not be necessary to raise postal rates if we were not paying too much for buildings and so forth. Here the implication is that we are paying too much rent for a building. I continue the quotation:

> Some three or four years ago we had occasion to require a larger postal outlet. The people in the community knew nothing about the post office until it practically became a reality. The fact is it was only through representation on my part, and from one or two other prominent citizens, that they took it from a proposed building——and so on.

Then he goes on to say:

> I would say that the rents for a building such as that were excessive. When you have to pay about $5,000 a year for a post office building which is only 120 feet long and 60 feet wide, I would say you are paying too much, especially in a rural area.

The hon. member did not make it very clear which building he meant, but he did say it was the one serving his community. The hon. member has a store in this community which is some 200 or 300 feet from the postal outlet, so undoubtedly he has reference to the particular building I have in mind. The implication is made, of course as he said earlier, to substantiate the statement of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart), when he referred to political patronage. At page 1786 of Hansard the hon. member used these words:

> I for one feel that the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) was certainly right on the beam when he said that. We find it apparent everywhere. We need only go to our own particular ridings and examine some of the incidents and we shall find probably no end of them.

I am just examining the one instance, the charge that an excessive rental was paid for postal accommodation. It just happened that I was not in the house while the hon. member was speaking. I read Hansard and recalled having discussed this very matter with the former member for New Westminster. I thought I had some idea of what was taking place, so I checked and got the facts. The hon. member says that no one knew anything about it. If they did not it was because they did not read. This contract was let by tender in the normal way.

There were two tenders, and the successful tender was submitted by Mr. Thomas Binnie, in the amount of $5,964. This is $964 more than the hon. member mentioned in his statement, but in view of the fact so many of his facts are incorrect I think we can overlook that. The unsuccessful tender was submitted by a Mr. George S. Viel.

When the two tenders were received the Post Office Department asked for a report from the district field inspector. The contract was subsequently awarded to Mr. Thomas Binnie for substantial reasons which did not in any way indicate patronage.

An hon. Member: What were the reasons?

Mr. Byrne: The hon. member has asked for them, and I shall give them.

Mr. Noseworthy: Which was the Liberal?

Mr. Byrne: It is just that type of innuendo, Mr. Speaker, that brought the hon. member's party to power in British Columbia, and it will take them out. The reason Mr. Binnie received the contract was that Mr. Viel asked for $815 per month which amounted to $9,780, a substantial increase over the $5,964. I just bring this matter to the attention of the house and of hon. members opposite to indicate that, in my opinion, when they seek to intimidate members on this side of the house they should be more certain of their facts.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It has already been made crystal clear from this side of the house, Mr. Speaker, that we are opposed to the increase in postage rates involved in the bill which has been brought in by the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote). I shall, therefore, take only a moment or two to deal directly with that point. However, there is a particular aspect of this matter about which I want to say something further.

With regard to the increase in the postage rate itself, I feel that the government has not played fair with the Canadian people. In that respect I feel that the blame should be levelled not so much at the Postmaster General personally as at the government. I think perhaps he has had to take rather too much of the blame for this on behalf of the government as a whole.

The first of the two main ways in which the government has not played fair with the Canadian people is its action in taking off a tax just before the election and putting it on again just after the election, under another name. The second way in which I feel the government is not playing fair with the people of the country has to do with the fact that nothing is being said on the government side of the house in reply to the many speeches from this side in which reference has been made to the losses being sustained by the post office in respect of periodicals and magazines. I refer in particular to those which carry huge amounts of advertising, which means that the Post Office Department is subsidizing periodicals, newspapers and magazines that are making a considerable revenue out of that advertising. These publications are carried at a tremendous loss to the post office, so far as postage is concerned.

I give the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) credit for attempting to answer—though I do not feel he has answered satisfactorily—a number of the arguments put forward from this side of the house. Unless something has happened that has escaped my observation, I have not yet heard him deal with this question, to which I have now once more drawn attention. If my study of the matter has served me correctly, the deficit which the Postmaster General says must be met could be made up if magazines, periodicals and newspapers were made to pay their share of what it costs the Post Office Department to transmit this material. And the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) reminds me, from the back of the chamber, that if that were done there would be, in relation to the deficit the Postmaster General is now talking about, a surplus of $2,500,000.

So I submit that this is more than just a protest in the name of the Canadian people against a one-cent increase in postage rates. Naturally people do not like increases in taxes of any kind. Protest against an increase would be natural in any case. But I feel this is something more; it is a case of the government not playing fair with the people of Canada in respect of this matter. And I think it is quite appropriate that my leader has moved that the bill be given the six months' hoist. That is what this parliament should do with it, hoist it out of the House of Commons altogether.

The bill was introduced by the Postmaster General with a speech in which he said specifically that one of its purposes is to make up for the cost of the five-day 40-hour week, which is to be implemented on April 1. We have heard that statement on at least three occasions from the Postmaster General. We had it when he introduced the resolution preceding the bill; we had it again when he moved second reading, and we also had it from another minister on December 8, 1953, when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) announced that in due course there would be this bill increasing the rates of postage.

On each of those occasions reference has been made to the fact that one of the reasons for the bill is the need to raise $5 million, the cost of implementing the five-day 40-hour week. For a while I took it as a matter of course that it would take some time for the government to work out the details in connection with the implementation of the five-day 40-hour week. For a while I kept my suspicious nature under control; but as time goes on I am finding that more difficult.

It is now nearly two months since, on December 8, 1953, as recorded at pages 692 and 693 of Hansard, the Minister of Finance told me he hoped that very shortly there would be made public a list of the localities in which the post office staffs would go on the five-day 40-hour week on April 1. I had hoped that that list would be published very shortly. Maybe my definition of "shortly" varies from that of the minister; but at any rate on January 14, 1954, as recorded at page 1139 of Hansard I asked the Postmaster General if that list was yet ready, and he had to tell me that it was not.

I waited a little while longer. Yesterday, February 4, 1954, as recorded at page 1762 of Hansard, I asked again if we might soon have information particularly with respect to the manipulative staffs working in the post office at Winnipeg. Again I was told that this information was not yet available.

Well, today, as Your Honour will recall, I asked the question again, this time putting it to the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill), the minister responsible to parliament for the civil service commission. I happen to know that others have been trying to ascertain from the civil service commission whether or not certain cities, certain communities in the country, are to be included in the five-day 40-hour week arrangement. Up to the present time we have been unable to get any information in answer to that question, except the one bit of information which the Minister of Finance was able to give this afternoon when I raised the question of privilege. The information he gave to the house was something like this, that if the member for Winnipeg North Centre was concerned about his city, he could be assured that Winnipeg would be included.

Well, it will be a matter of some relief to the post office employees in Winnipeg to know that their case is covered. But it seems to me that it is not fair to the house as a whole not to give us the complete information as to the extent to which the five-day 40-hour week is to be implemented. We have been led to believe that it is the civil service commission which works out these matters. We found out this afternoon from the Minister of Finance that the personnel side of treasury board is working on it as well. But no one knows what the list of communities is.

This afternoon, however, the Minister of Finance was able to assure me that Winnipeg is on the list. Well, either he is jumping the gun, or he knows the communities that are on that list; and if he does, then I submit that before the house is asked to give second reading to the bill we should have that information. It is not fair to ask us in advance of that information to pass a bill which would provide money for that purpose. What position are we going to be in after the bill is passed by the house—if it is passed—if we find that the implementation of the five-day 40-hour week does not measure up to what we thought would be the case, with the proposed expenditure of $5 million?

I want to know what the situation is in some other cities. Is it going to be extended to Regina and Saskatoon? What about a large city like Montreal? Is the five-day week already sufficiently established in that city that one could be assured post office staffs there will be included; or are we going to have the experience, after this goes through and after the postal rate has been increased for this, among other purposes, of learning that a city like Montreal is not included?

I suppose members from every city in the country could rise on questions of privilege, as I did this afternoon, and worm information out of the Minister of Finance. But surely that is not the proper way to do it. As a member from Winnipeg I was glad to get that information this afternoon for the employees in my city. But I submit it is not fair to the house as a whole to ask us to go on without having complete information.

Just when the debate on second reading will be concluded, I do not know. Certainly there is no possibility of the matter being finally concluded tonight, so far as third reading is concerned, because it would require unanimous consent to go to third reading tonight. In other words I think it should be clear that since there is further time beyond today the government should play fair with the house, even if it is not playing fair with the Canadian people in the matter of raising these postal rates, by seeing to it that this list of communities and localities where the five-day 40-hour week is to go into effect is before this house before we go any further.

From what the minister said this afternoon we know that Winnipeg is one community that is on the list. That is fine, but let us have the entire list before we go any further. It is two months since the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) said the list would be ready very shortly. I hope the period regarded as "very shortly" has now gone by, even when considered in the minister's terms.

Some of us do not accept the proposition that there is necessarily a connection between the cost of the five-day 40-hour week and the postal rates. Other civil servants have been given the five-day 40-hour week without the Canadian people having imposed upon them a special tax for that purpose. But the government has taken the position that there is a connection in this case. All right; if from the government's viewpoint there is a connection, then I submit we are entitled to full information on that point before we go any further with this obnoxious legislation.

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, in rising for a moment to oppose this increase to five cents in the postal rate for first-class mail I wish to say that I do so because of the many protests I have received from my own riding.

The Postmaster General has said that this is the only way in which the increased costs of the department can be met. Postal delivery is a service which the taxpaying public has a right to expect the government to provide, and that public does not necessarily expect that the department which provides this service shall be self-sustaining. Quite apart from being self-sustaining, in the past few years it has been profit-producing.

I presume that those profits have gone into the general revenues of the government and have been used for other services which the government provides for the people of this country. Therefore I see no reason at all why the government should be in such a rush to offset any possibility of loss in the department by increasing rates before they have found out whether or not they are going to need the extra revenue.

Certainly the government does not take this attitude with regard to Canadian National Railways. Most certainly it does not take this attitude in connection with Trans-Canada Air Lines, and certainly not with regard to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. As a matter of fact, so far as T.C.A. is concerned the Post Office Department was called upon to accept a rather heavy charge for first-class mail, which might very well be described as a subsidy to T.C.A. which prior to that time had not been doing so well financially.

Over a period of ten years the surpluses of the Post Office Department amounted to $70,193,330.54 and for the preceding ten years the surpluses were $22,969,606.69, making a total of more than $90 million of a surplus in the last 20 years in the operations of this department. And this was at the lower stamp rates which were in effect during that period of time.

I know from correspondence which I have had with different groups in my riding that this increase certainly is not popular. Personally I simply cannot understand why this government is advancing the rate to five cents on first-class mail. To me the raising of the rate to five cents from the three-cent rate which prevailed before the war—and at the present time it is only three cents in the United States—simply does not make sense.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, during the course of this debate we have heard a great deal about the advantages the new air mail service which is to come with the proposed increased rates will bring to parts of Canada such as the Yukon, Newfoundland and elsewhere. But it seems to me that the question should be raised here as to what advantages are going to accrue to some of the older parts of Canada.

In Ontario and Quebec there are a great many people living on the sideroads in rural areas. These people live on farms which have been well established and settled for many generations. In some cases they still have to go half a mile or a mile to get their mail during the winter.

Since the end of the war there has been a great influx of immigrants and a considerable increase in our population. Many new subdivisions have been developed outside of a number of our medium-sized cities. This condition is to be found throughout western Ontario. As I say, these subdivisions in many cases are not within the city limits and therefore do not receive daily mail delivery. Quite often you will find 20 or 30 houses on a sideroad with 20 or 30 mail boxes down at the end of that road. Those people have to go down to collect their mail, sometimes having to travel half a mile or so.

I cannot see how the new postal rates are going to bring any great advantage to those people. It is alleged that the people who use the service should pay for it. These people will be using first-class mail, yet they will gain no advantages from the increased rates, while the people in some of the newer parts of Canada will gain considerable advantage. That does not seem to me to be reasonable.

During this debate we have had a multiplicity of figures given as to why there should or should not be an increase in the postal rates. The minister has given some figures, as have hon. members of the opposition. From the reports which we have it would appear that in each of the years 1951, 1952 and 1953 the Post Office Department had a surplus of about $6 million. The minister has estimated that there will be a loss of around $7,500,000 this year because of the elimination of the stamps on cheques.

The Woods-Gordon report recommends many savings that could be effected within the department if certain economies were put into effect. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) has suggested that the people who are going to pay this increased first-class rate are going to pay more than their share. We all know that from an accounting point of view it is quite possible to adopt various viewpoints. For instance, we all know that it is perfectly proper accounting practice to value fixed assets in different ways, to allocate costs in different ways and so on. I mention that in passing merely to show that often it is quite possible to show a profit or to show a loss if one so desires.

It would seem that the minister is not too sure what are the receipts and expenditures of the Post Office Department. For instance, last spring the minister's predecessor apparently felt the revenue was sufficient so that the tax on cheques was no longer necessary, and that tax was accordingly removed.

This fall we have the situation that the hon. minister has changed his mind again, and it is necessary now to increase postal rates to make up the deficit. Surely between last spring and last fall the figures of estimates and expenditures would have been available to the minister. If not, then it is quite possible on that basis that by the coming spring we will have no need to increase the rates at all.

In view of the fact that last spring the department took off a tax because it was not considered necessary, and then this fall it put on another tax because a certain amount of revenue is now considered necessary, and in view of other figures we have had presented from all sides of the house, which are most confusing, it would seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that the correct thing to do would be to wait and see. It may be that by the end of this year it will not be necessary to raise the postal rates. In fact it would seem, from all we have heard, that it would be entirely unnecessary to raise the rates. In any event, should there be a deficit at the end of this year the minister could always bring in this bill again and increase the rates next year if necessary.

As the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) pointed out earlier today, the removal of the stamp tax on cheques certainly benefited large businesses, and there is no doubt that the increase in the postage rate will certainly affect those with small incomes who cannot deduct such charges as expenses.

In closing these brief remarks, Mr. Speaker, I think I should emphasize once again that the policy of wait and see should be adopted at the present time and this tax introduced at a later date when it is proved to be necessary.

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, although there have been some very critical remarks regarding the postal service, I believe it is remarkable that we have as good a postal service as we now enjoy when we consider some of the handicaps which have been mentioned during this debate.

Last night I received a letter from an 86-year-old friend of mine which was posted in Edmonton at 7.30 p.m. on February 3. By 7.00 p.m. Edmonton time on the 4th of February it was on my desk. The writer of this letter settled in Saskatchewan 50 years ago. It is quite remarkable that during his lifetime he should be in a position to post a letter in Edmonton one day and have it delivered here in Ottawa in less than 24 hours.

Having said that, however, I must say that I am supporting the amendment moved by the leader of this group. I want to emphasize what has been said by several members on this side of the house, namely that first-class mail is being operated, according to figures issued a year ago, at a profit of $20,700,000, and on the other hand second-class mail for some years has been losing 13½ cents out of every dollar, or a total loss of $16 million.

When one considers that that subsidy has been a factor in building up some of the immense fortunes made in the newspaper field I believe the government is not really being fair with the Canadian people in leaving the rates on that class of mail unchanged. In this connection, and to demonstrate my point, I need only mention the Thomson syndicate which operates not only in Canada but which recently bought the Scotsman in Edinburgh for several million dollars last year; the Southam group; the Toronto Star; the Toronto Globe and Mail; the Sifton group; and the hon. member of the Senate who died recently leaving $1,750,000. I do not know how much of that was made in the newspaper business, but he certainly did not lose anything in that field.

When these large fortunes have been made partly through the advantage accruing from the very low cost of second-class mail, I think the government has no right to place this tax on the Canadian people by increasing the letter rate by one cent.

Post Office Act

The next point I want to deal with, and it has not been dealt with adequately, is the action of Liberal candidates in dragging the affairs of the Post Office Department into politics. I received a letter from a Mr. John Fletcher of Kelvington and in this letter dated January 12, 1954 he enclosed a clipping from a local newspaper. That report states there is an item in the estimates of $110,000 for a new post office building at Kelvington.

Permit me to recapitulate. During the recent election campaign Mr. Ferrie, who represented the Mackenzie constituency in the last parliament, was able to ask, "What did Nicholson bring back to this constituency? I have brought back two post offices, one at Kelvington and one at Carrot River".

I bear Mr. Ferrie no ill will whatsoever. Indeed, I am greatly indebted to him for having given me a chance to relax for a few years. When you have been here eight or nine years you really should have a change. However, I was at one of Mr. Ferrie's meetings at a time when he mentioned that he was able to bring a post office to Kelvington, and one to Carrot River. I think hon. members will agree that no hon. member, regardless of party, should seek support on the basis that he decides where post offices should be built.

When this report appeared in the Kelvington paper to the effect that there was to be an item of $110,000 in the estimates this year, I was somewhat disturbed. In his letter to me Mr. Fletcher stated:

> The enclosed notice was in last week's Kelvington Radio. I was in to the editor's place yesterday renewing my paper and he showed me the letter he had received with this notice. It was on House of Commons stationery and signed by G. M. Ferrie and had no postage. Besides the insult to you of sending the notification by the defeated member he is still using the franking privileges of a member . . .

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member, I think, is stepping into a field which is extraneous to the matter now before the house. There was reference made earlier on both sides of the house to this matter, but I think we ought not to continue bringing into this debate matters which are related to political patronage. To a person who would come into the house, not knowing what was before the house, it would appear that we are dealing with the first item of the estimates of the Postmaster General.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, if it were not for the fact that a defeated member of this parliament gave information which appears in today's estimates, before hon. members had access to that information—

Mr. Speaker: Order. That has nothing to do with the increase in postal rates contemplated by this bill. I would ask the hon. member—I would plead with him—not to argue any more with me, because I feel I have stated the position correctly and he should accept my ruling.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that I mentioned this letter I think I should explain that I learned the editor of the paper, receiving this—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I think—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I am listening to the hon. member.

Mr. Nicholson: In view of the fact that I said the letter was sent by a defeated member of parliament without a postage stamp I think I should be permitted to explain.

Mr. Speaker: I just want to know if the hon. member refers to an abuse of franking privileges. If so, this is not the time to bring the matter up.

Mr. Nicholson: I think if the post office department uses the services of a defeated member of parliament, who in turn sends his mail without postage, that certainly is a matter of concern and should be considered before we approve any increase in postage rates. I think I should be permitted to say that the editor of the paper had been given this advance information. I am saying—and I think I should be permitted to say—that this letter no doubt went through the post office, with Mr. Ferrie's information that there was to be a post office at Kelvington, without anybody willingly making a mistake. In the light of the fact that we have a staff in the Post Office Department who are capable of making decisions we should not have information, which today comes to us officially through the estimates, sent out in January. I believe the minister should explain why it is necessary to use the services of Mr. Ferrie to get—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think I have been fair with the hon. member.

Mr. Cote: He has said—

Mr. Speaker: I do not think the minister should give a rebuttal at this moment. I believe the hon. member has had ample opportunity to present his argument that mail franking privileges should not be given to people who are not supposed to use them, and therefore the department would save thereby.

That has been his point. I have listened to him very patiently. I hope that he is now through with it.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I am through with that point, but I should like to have had the privilege of telling how expensive it is to have the inspectors—

Mr. Cote: You do not even have the envelope.

Mr. Nicholson: That is what I said. I am letting that matter go. I am not pressing it at all.

Mr. Cote: You are better with the bouquets.

Mr. Nicholson: No. I suggest that you should not have to clear through Mr. Ferrie, who in turn has to clear through—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Cote: I think my hon. friend is now slipping a little bit too much, and that he should be brought back on the right track.

Mr. Nicholson: I was going to refer to a case here—I have here sessional paper 159—to explain what the procedure is in connection with these post office matters in my constituency. For example, when a postmaster was short on April 16—

Mr. Speaker: No. The hon. member must be reasonable. If he intends to discuss the principle of this bill by bringing in all kinds of little cases affecting the operations of the Post Office Department generally, I would advise him to wait until the estimates or some other measures giving him an opportunity to discuss these questions are before the house, but not to do so at the moment.

Mr. Nicholson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker; I shall conclude. I do think there is a point that the minister should accept. When the minister has in his department men who have had experience for so many years, he should not have to depend upon the judgment of a defeated member of parliament.

Mr. Cote: We do not.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that I am completely in order in replying to the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) in answer to the charges he laid in respect to the post office question, but I should like to answer him at this moment if I may do so.

Mr. Speaker: I do not want my ruling at this moment to be detrimental to the interests of the hon. member, but my suggestion to him is to wait for a better opportunity. He was out of order in bringing up patronage matters earlier. My leniency toward him caused me to be lenient toward the hon. member for Kootenay East, who was also out of order when he replied to the hon. member.

May I ask him to delay this argument about the allocation of contracts or post office matters in New Westminster for another time. The estimates of the department will come before the house, and that is the time when these matters are discussed. The hon. gentleman will understand that if I allow him to give a rebuttal now, as the hon. member for Kootenay East has spoken to the amendment and has not spoken to second reading, when the amendment is disposed of he may decide to discuss this matter again. Then if another amendment to the main motion is moved later, the hon. gentleman will come back again and we will be discussing not the increase in the postal rates but the problem to which the hon. gentleman has referred having to do with post office patronage in New Westminster.

I think the hon. member might agree with me. What I am asking him to do is to postpone his remarks for another occasion.

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to appear to be out of order, but I do not like the reflection which the hon. gentleman cast upon my riding. I shall answer that reflection at a later date.

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, there can be no doubt that public opinion is increasing against the proposal of the minister to increase postal rates. I think he has had a verbal licking in the house here. When he brings in the 5-cent postage stamp I hope he will put plenty of glue on it so it will stick to the letters, because the arguments advanced in this house certainly are not convincing as to the justification for the increase which he proposes.

I would say that the evidence or rather the figures we have before us, and the reasons given by the Postmaster General for this needed increase, certainly do not conform to the principle he himself laid down. As reported at page 1102 of Hansard, at the conclusion of his remarks at the introduction of his resolution, he said:

> I believe everyone will also agree that the most equitable arrangement is for the cost of service to be borne by the users, and this is exactly the object of the present resolution.

I maintain that the increase in postage rates on first-class mail at this time will not be effective in that way, because people who wish to use ordinary first-class mail do not want to have to subsidize second-class mail such as periodicals and newspapers, and are very resentful over this action on the part of the government, which just prior to the election removed the excise stamp from cheques and now are imposing a new tax upon the Canadian people.

I particularly want to register my protest against this increase in postage rates for the simple reason that many of us are quite resentful of the fact that we are paying for or are subsidizing second-class mail such as periodicals, which carry a great deal of advertising matter and certainly no essential information to our people. I agree that in this country our newspapers and periodicals perform a very useful service in distributing knowledge and information to our people; but I went down to the reading room here and looked through some of the periodicals which enjoy the privilege of being subsidized by our Canadian taxpayers. In one magazine I found that there were no less than 32 full pages of liquor advertisements. That magazine enjoys a subsidy from the Canadian taxpayers.

I do not believe that situation is fair or just to our Canadian taxpayers. Furthermore, I should like to bring to the minister's attention the fact that when we find some places, particularly in our rural areas, where services are being cut, it does not seem opportune for the minister to introduce this increase in postage rates.

I should like to bring to his attention a matter in my own constituency, where we have just recently had a curtailment of mail service. I refer specifically to the case of the C.P.R. Reston-Wolseley line, where we formerly had the services of a mail clerk. Recently I had a letter from a constituent who, incidentally, was one of the key Liberal supporters and organizers in that constituency. He told me that I could refer the full contents of his letter and the postscript to any authority in the post office branch that I cared to, and he indicated in the letter that the mail clerk has been taken off that route which entails a cut in mail service on the Reston-Wolseley line. There are points where mail is delayed to the extent of a week.

Therefore I want to join with those who support the action of the leader of the C.C.F. party in moving the six months' hoist, which will have the effect that the bill will not come up again this session. I think it is even in the interests of the government and in the interests of justice and fairness to all concerned that the government should reconsider this measure before trying to force it through the house.

[Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain).]

Mr. Claude Ellis (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, before the vote is taken I should like to say a few words. At the resolution stage I did not make any contribution to the debate other than to ask a question of the Postmaster General. I asked him to explain an apparent inconsistency in the entire government argument for an increase in postal rates. In the minister's statement the other day he completely ignored what I believe to be the fundamental question involved in the entire bill which seeks to increase postal rates. At page 1764 of Hansard for yesterday the minister said:

> As I said in the debate on the resolution, if we adopt the principle that postal revenue need not meet expenditures but that the revenues of the department should be supplemented by tax money, then we should have a truly subsidized service.

The implication there is that at the present time we do not have a subsidized service. The implication is that at the present time the post office is paying its way, but that the establishment of a subsidized system is going to come about if we do not increase the postal rates. Many hon. members have pointed out to the minister that at the present time when a man places a 4-cent stamp on a letter, that stamp not only pays for all the services which the sender of the letter receives but does more. Up until this year—perhaps it might also happen next year; we do not know—it has taken care of the deficit on second-class mail service, and it provided the post office with a surplus of over $6 million last year.

If the minister is logical in his assertion that the post office must pay its own way, then I say that the person who places a 4-cent stamp on a letter today is paying for the service he receives. As a matter of fact a 3-cent stamp today would be a fair charge to the sender for the carrying of his letter. Now the government proposes to increase the rate to five cents, and as yet the minister has failed to explain this inconsistency. If the Post Office Department is going to be required to pay its operating expenses out of its revenues, then I want to ask the minister to explain to the house how he can justify the continuance of the subsidy on second-class mail.

The minister has not mentioned a word about the subsidy. It is accepted; it is not even questioned by the government. It is going to continue, and the senders of first-class mail who now pay three or four cents on their letters are going to be required to pay four or five cents. In other words they are now going to be asked to bear an additional burden in order to maintain a subsidy on second-class mail.

It seems to me that this is the crux of the whole matter, notwithstanding all the reasons that have been advanced for the increase in postal rates. Certain members to my right have suggested that there is a subsidy to Trans-Canada Air Lines. I was interested in reading an editorial in the Toronto Star of February 2 headed "Air Mail Cheapest by T.C.A." The editorial points out that the T.C.A. tariff for carrying air mail is $1.39 per ton mile, that the tariff charged by the private air lines, the largest of which is Canadian Pacific, averages $3.06 per ton mile, and that the lowest tariff charged by a private air line in this country is $2.79 per ton mile. In other words, T.C.A. is carrying mail at less than half the cost that is being paid by the Post Office Department for the transportation of mail by private carriers.

I have heard at least two or three members make reference to a subsidy to Trans-Canada Air Lines, but I notice they are never much concerned about subsidies to private air lines. All the reasons that have been advanced skirt the main issue, which must of course be the question of what is going to be done about second-class mail. In the statement made by the minister when he introduced the bill and in the statement he made yesterday he completely ignored the question of second-class mail. Before we are called upon to vote on this matter we should have a statement from the minister explaining how he can justify the position the government is taking, that the Post Office Department must meet its current expenses out of revenues, in view of the continued existence of the subsidy on second-class mail.

There is one other point I should like to mention. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) is in his seat. When the minister was giving estimates of the increased cost next year he estimated the cost of introducing the five-day 40-hour week at $5 million. There must be some basis upon which that estimate was made. Surely the Post Office Department must have had some idea of how many and what post offices would be involved. Apparently the Minister of Finance was able to assure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) this afternoon that Winnipeg was one of the cities.

Mr. Abbott: Regina is there too.

Mr. Ellis: That is all I wanted to know.

Mr. Knowles: What about Montreal?

Mr. Proudfoot: I was paired with the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon). Had I voted, I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: Shall we have the second division now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Does the minister wish to reply? If the minister speaks now he will close the debate. Or is it agreeable to proceed with the second division now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mrs. Fairclough: Does not the minister intend to answer any of the questions we have asked?

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks he will close the debate.

Hon. Alcide Coté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, at this time of evening I shall attempt to answer some of the arguments which have been made, and I shall endeavour not to indulge in any repetition. I shall deal first with some of the remarks made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), since they cover most of the objections raised on the other side of the house.

With some heat, the Leader of the Opposition seemed to object to what he repeatedly termed a political speech on my part. What I had done was quote from the Woods-Gordon report, give a clear-cut statement of the financial position of the department and make, I think, some proper observations in regard to the tactics of the opposition. He, and he alone, however, seemed to resent my doing so.

I repeat that there was no thought in my mind of making a political speech, in the ordinary sense of the term; but his reply was, I submit, political from beginning to end. After trying to create an atmosphere of confusion he then proceeded to flog a dead horse in discussing the tabling of the Woods-Gordon report. When I listened to his remarks, made in a loud and scolding tone, I thought I must have been guilty of something improper—only to find that, in fact, what he was doing was commending me for my action in tabling the report.

I am suggesting to him that the next time he agrees with me, he should not do it so violently. May I ask him also not to keep on repeating, and by his repetition encourage the idea, that there is nothing illegal about posting letters in the United States in order to evade paying the proper rate of postage in this country. As I informed the house earlier Canada, along with some 90 other countries, is signatory to the universal postal union conventions and documents; and under the terms of these international agreements and by regulations having the full force of law, it is absolutely illegal for anyone to attempt to evade postal rates in one country by depositing his mail in another. The penalties which I have mentioned would undoubtedly apply.

Moreover, United States postal authorities would not countenance such a practice. If the Leader of the Opposition, instead of reading "Alice in Wonderland" and quoting from it, would turn to section 5 (1) (j) of the Post Office Act he would see how wrong he is in what he had to say on this question of depositing mail in another country. I shall help my hon. friend in that respect by quoting this paragraph. It says that the Postmaster General may—

> (j) make and give effect to any postal agreement or arrangement with the government or postal authorities of any country or independent postal administration and pay out of postal revenue any remuneration or indemnity thereby provided.

That is exactly what we did. As I said before, Canada is bound by that treaty under the universal postal union. What I said before really applies. The Post Office Act does, I admit, make dull reading; but if, again, my hon. friend wishes to be authoritative he will have to give up his light reading, at least for a time.

His reference once more to Sir William Mulock, a tribute which good Liberals always enjoy, overlooked one fundamental point—that increased volume would net profits only if the per item rate is in itself profitable. It reminds me of the merchant who was going bankrupt and could not understand why. He knew he was losing money on each item he sold, but he was always hoping that the volume of business he was doing would permit him to make a profit.

Another, and not the last, item on which the Leader of the Opposition attempted to misinterpret what I said was when he said I had claimed that the opposition supported the idea that $13,500,000 added revenue could be obtained only in the way I suggested. Never at any time did I say anything of the kind. Once more may I suggest that the Leader of the Opposition give up reading "Alice in Wonderland" and pay more attention to what is said in the house.

Mr. Hodgson: If the minister is going to complain about the Leader of the Opposition he should stop reading his own speech.

Mr. Cote: I had only the lunch hour to gather what was said on the other side of the house, and this was the only way I could answer hon. members because they kept repeating and repeating the same arguments. I tried to find something which I could answer, and that was why I gathered these notes of the arguments used by my hon. friends on the other side. If I can judge by what I have not only heard but seen in the last few days, this was the general custom followed by all my hon. friends on the other side.

Mr. Hodgson: The Leader of the Opposition did not read his speech.

Mr. Cote: Mr. Speaker, what I am reading now is the result of the work I did. If my hon. friend would adopt the same principle he might be more interesting in this house.

I repeat that it was worth while to listen to what was said in this house. If that had been done, perhaps by the Leader of the Opposition, he could with advantage read Hansard and find out exactly what I did say, which was that everyone agreed that the $13,500,000 had to be paid out; that everyone agreed with the increased salaries to postal employees and with the shorter hours. I then went on to spell out in detail the items making up this cost and to summarize what the opposition had suggested as an alternative to the straightforward method of increasing postage rates.

The Leader of the Opposition tried to make some point of the fact that the government paid its telephone bills and other charges for similar services. I am sure no one would suggest that the government could do anything else, particularly when telephone service is provided by private concerns. But in the case of the Post Office Department, for other departments to pay their postage would simply be taking money out of one pocket and putting it in another, a bookkeeping device which would not change the over-all picture in any particular.

I cannot understand my hon. friend's excitement about a reference to using taxes to meet increased postal charges. He denied emphatically ever having suggested anything of the kind. Once more, I did not say that he himself had made the suggestion. I said that this had come from the opposition. It was, therefore, exceedingly amusing to find his stalwart supporter, the hon. member for York-Humber (Miss Aitken), repeating most emphatically this same suggestion a little later on. I think this is a complete answer to my hon. friend.

Then if I follow correctly the order of his remarks he came again to the idea that while we lost some $7,500,000 in the stamp tax we did have substantial savings in the cost of handling these items. I had already informed him that the costs were in the neighbourhood of $30,000, so the balance sheet of this particular item would be: lost revenue, $7,500,000; gain in lowered cost of handling, $30,000; net loss, $7,470,000. In other words we would be losing 99·6 per cent and managing to hold the other ·4 per cent.

There was one thing I was glad to note, however, in the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition. He disagreed with the junior addition to his ranks, the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace (Mr. Hamilton), who had earlier sneered at and derided the tribute paid by the Woods-Gordon company to departmental officials. I thank the Leader of the Opposition for his tribute to these same men, and commend his attitude to his back-row supporter.

I come now to the question of abolishing the post office savings bank and the repeated suggestion that there would be a clear saving of $377,000. There would indeed be a saving of this amount to the Post Office Department, but may I submit that it does not follow there would be a saving of that amount or perhaps of any amount to the government at large.

The savings bank is widely used and I am sure is an appreciated service. Some $37 million stays on deposit over many years and this money is made available to the government, thus lowering the amount it may need to raise by way of loan. The difference between the $377,000 cost of operation and the cost of short-term bank loans, with any administration costs, would be the only saving possible by the abolition of the bank.

While I am on the subject of the bank, which was also mentioned by many others, it is interesting to know that if the government does decide to implement this particular recommendation we will be able to assure depositors who might be somewhat disappointed by our action that the opposition were all enthusiastic for this course of action.

With regard to the reference to the $200,000, and some other items mentioned in the Woods-Gordon report, which could be saved in Toronto alone, again we have in the observations of the opposition the idea that Toronto is just one relatively small district, and that we can multiply manyfold the suggested savings to such a degree that $13,500,000 will be realized in a very short time. In actual fact approximately one-fifth of postal costs are incurred in Toronto, since about one-fifth of the whole mail handled passes through that area.

If we accepted, then, the estimated savings of the Woods-Gordon report and apply these same savings everywhere, we could not hope to realize any more than a small fraction of the $13,500,000. To make this small fraction a little more proportionate than that term would indicate, may I suggest that a maximum saving of $2 million might be possible, not an insignificant amount by any means but still a long way short of the $15 million we will realize and need under the proposal now before the house.

Now I come to one phase of the remarks of my hon. friend opposite which pained me greatly, that is, the outspoken commendation he gave to the methods employed by the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace in gathering information about the Woods-Gordon report. He counsels and encourages hon. members to follow such a course, but I am sure others were shocked by the action and perhaps even more shocked by the attitude of the Leader of the Opposition with respect to it. Just to make it quite clear to him that there are other views in this house, and not confined to this side, I may tell him that I have had personal reactions from members of his own party quite contrary to what he said in this house.

Mr. Fulton: On a question of privilege, I submit that the Postmaster General or any other member is not entitled to make reference to private conversations with members of this house.

An hon. Member: Why not?

Mr. Pickersgill: When did that become a rule of the house?

Mr. Cote: I do not think—

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has raised a question of privilege. I listened to it, but I should like to listen to what comments the minister has to offer.

Mr. Cote: If my hon. friend wants me to—

Mr. Fulton: If I may argue the point for a moment before the minister replies. I suggest that the reason I think this is the rule will be readily apparent. If private conversations are to be used as a basis for points raised in debate, any confidence in private discussion between members on either side of the house will be completely destroyed. If the minister is complaining of a breach of confidence, I suggest to him that here is the greatest breach of confidence that has been made in this house for many years.

Mr. Speaker: There is no rule to the effect that an hon. member must not reveal what he has been told by others. It is up to him; it is his responsibility. If, of course, he does divulge private conversation, and in all courtesy he should not, he will have to bear the responsibility.

I may say on this point that what I was worried about was not so much the comment made by the minister in regard to the remarks of hon. members opposite, but rather the fact that he was reviving a matter which I thought had previously been discussed and settled. That matter was perhaps revived in a way by the Leader of the Opposition at the commencement of debate on the second reading of this bill, but I was hoping that not too much importance would be placed on that because if we revive the matter again and again there is no point in settling it once.

Mr. Cote: Mr. Speaker, I agree with you. I had the same thing in mind. I did not want to revive the subject. I wanted only to say a few words, since the Leader of the Opposition had mentioned the matter at the opening of the debate.

I do not want to go all over the arguments which have been repeated. I want only to answer one question which was directed to me by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). He asked me if I would extend to him the same courtesy I extended to the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace. He knows I always try and will always endeavour to extend the same courtesy to every hon. member in this house; but he will not blame me if, from now on, I am very cautious of those who come into my office with a dictaphone machine during my absence.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a question which has been referred to by several hon. members. Will he tell us what the gain or loss is in connection with carriage of second-class mail?

Mr. Cote: In committee.

Mr. Coldwell: Will we deal with that in committee?

Mr. Cote: Yes.

Mr. Abbott: You might also tell hon. members at the same time what the gain or loss is in providing free premises, heating and services for the Post Office Department.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Cote) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: On Monday we shall continue with this bill in committee as it now is. Then we shall take third reading of the amendment to the Senate and House of Commons Act; then second reading of the amendment to the Salaries Act. There are on the order paper two resolutions, one in the name of the Minister of Agriculture having to do with the Animal Contagious Diseases Act and one in the name of the Minister of Fisheries having to do with the international convention with respect to the northwest Atlantic fisheries. Those resolutions will be taken in that order. Then there are two bills in the name of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham), one with respect to the boundary between the provinces of Ontario and Manitoba and one with respect to the Explosives Act. Then there is second reading of the amendment to the Canadian Forces Act. We shall take them in that order on Monday and Tuesday.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, February 8, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

STANDING ORDERS

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. C. W. Carter (for Mr. Harrison): Mr. Speaker, I move that the first report of the standing committee on standing orders, presented on Friday, February 5, 1954, be now concurred in. Notice of this motion was given last Friday.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the passing of this motion. Indeed, I am a member of the committee, the report of which is now before the house. There is, however, just one word I would like to say and I think I should be permitted to say it.

I have noted with interest that the motion now moved on behalf of the hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Harrison) is recorded in the Votes and Proceedings of Friday last suggesting that notice of it was given on that occasion. I also notice with interest that although notice was given on Friday the motion does not appear anywhere on today's order paper. In other words, it is apparently being regarded as a procedural motion which it is proper for a private member to move so long as the required 48 hours' notice has been given.

When one couples this with the ruling that Your Honour made in connection with another matter last week, it seems to me that a definite practice is being established. I have no objection, but I do wish to draw attention to it so that on future occasions when other private members find themselves in a similar position and wish to move procedural motions comparable to this one they may be accorded the same privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Since the hon. member has raised the point, perhaps I should remark here that it might be well for us to consider whether motions such as this should not be inscribed on the order paper under the title "Motions", so that they would appear on the order paper and no hon. member would be caught by surprise. This might well be considered by the standing committee on procedure.

Motion agreed to.

R.C.M.P., REGINA—BUTTER AND MARGARINE

Mr. Diefenbaker:

How many pounds of (a) butter; (b) margarine, have been purchased for use in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police barracks in Regina, month by month since the 1st of January, 1953?

Mr. Garson: The provisioning of messes in Regina and the selection of individual items of food is a joint responsibility of the mess committees, elected by dining members, and the dietitian. Food purchases are paid for from mess funds.

Administrative officers at Regina and headquarters, Ottawa, check the diet sheets and audit accounts to ensure that the nutrient value is kept at the proper level and that there is no extravagance or waste.

Based on the average cost of meals, a rate is struck from time to time and the mess funds are reimbursed from public funds. In turn, members taking meals in messes are charged a standard rate which applies generally throughout the country, and the amounts involved are stopped from pay and deposited as a refund to consolidated revenue.

Messes in Regina, operating under this system, purchased:

3. No.

4. T.C.A. under its existing route licences is not authorized to stop at Moose Jaw, and would not be justified in applying to the air transport board for the required amendment to its licence until deliveries of Viscount aircraft now on order, made available the additional DC-3 aircraft time which would be necessary for such a stop.

ATLANTIC REGION, C.N.R.—LAY-OFFS

Mr. Murphy (Westmorland):

1. In the recent countrywide lay-off by the Canadian National Railways, how many men were affected in the Atlantic region?

2. How many men were laid off in the Canadian National Railways shops at Moncton and is this a temporary lay-off?

3. What are the prospects of these men being taken into the railway employ at a future date?

4. Does it depend on traffic conditions generally or dieselization in the Atlantic region?

5. Are there more lay-offs to come and will they be of a permanent or temporary nature?

6. Is diesel equipment being repaired at the Canadian National Railways shops in Moncton and, if not, will diesel repair shops be built in Moncton?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe):

The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:—

1. Since October 1953, 312 employees in the mechanical department on the Atlantic region have been laid off.

2. Of the above group, 240 were from Moncton main shops. The duration of the lay-off will be determined by business requirements.

3. See answer to No. 2.

4. Staff requirements are affected by traffic conditions.

5. See answer to No. 4.

6. All diesel equipment presently operating on the Atlantic region is repaired on that region, and most of the work is done at Moncton.

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN IRRIGATION PROJECT

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. What is the present position of negotiations between the federal government and the government of Saskatchewan regarding the South Saskatchewan river dam and irrigation project?

2. Have representatives of the two governments met to discuss the matter? If so, who represented each government and how many meetings have been held?

3. Has the government of Saskatchewan made any offer as to the amount that it is prepared to spend in connection with the development of (a) power; (b) irrigation? If so, what was the amount of such offer?

4. Did the federal government suggest that this offer be withdrawn and, if so, for what reason?

5. Have contractors been asked to make any estimates as to the cost of construction since the 10th of August, 1953? If so, what are the names of said contracting companies and the amounts of their respective estimates?

Mr. McCubbin:

1. A committee of provincial experts under the chairmanship of the provincial minister of agriculture, Hon. I. C. Nollet, is meeting a committee of federal experts under the chairmanship of the director of prairie farm rehabilitation, Dr. L. B. Thomson, to consider possible costs of construction if a dam is to be built on the South Saskatchewan river.

2. Yes. The Minister of Agriculture met the premier of Saskatchewan on two occasions and following each meeting he and Dr. L. B. Thomson met the entire government of Saskatchewan in Regina.

3. The Saskatchewan government offered to pay $20,000,000 on the cost of the dam on account of power and agreed with the P.F.R.A. estimate that their expenditure on irrigation would be at least $25,000,000.

4. The federal government through the Minister of Agriculture suggested it would be better to have the actual cost of power written into any agreement which might be made. The provincial government agreed.

5. No. It would not be possible to get bids if we were going to publish the amounts and thus put other contractors in possession of such bids.

JOHNSTON-WESTERN CANADA PROJECT—IRRIGATION

Mr. Fulton:

1. Has treasury board approved a recommendation for the sum of $46,000 as an item, or part of an item, for inclusion in the estimates of 1954-55, for payment of the cost of irrigation works on the Johnston-Western Canada V.L.A. project near Kamloops, British Columbia?

2. If so, when, and what is the number of the treasury board minute or order?

FISH SCREENS, NICOLA, B.C.

Mr. Fulton:

1. Has treasury board approved a recommendation for the sum of $6,000 as an item or part of an item, for inclusion in the estimates of 1954-55, for payment for fish screens installed in the Nicola, British Columbia, district?

2. If so, when, and what is the number of the treasury board minute or order?

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might answer these two questions orally. Both were placed on the order paper by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) before the tabling of the estimates. They relate to items for irrigation work in British Columbia.

The answer to both questions is that there are items in the estimates, as tabled, regarding the cost of irrigation work in British Columbia, but the treasury board does not issue a special order with respect to individual items and therefore it would be impossible to answer the second part of my hon. friend's question in both cases.

JOHNSTON-WESTERN CANADA PROJECT—IRRIGATION

Mr. Fulton:

With respect to the fact that the sum of $46,420 was approved by treasury board as part of an item included in the estimates of 1954-55 for payment of the cost of irrigation works on the Johnston-Western Canada V.L.A. project near Kamloops, British Columbia: 1. Did treasury board approve or authorize the release of this information for general publication prior to the tabling of the estimates in the house?

2. If so, when, and who was authorized to release it?

FISH SCREENS, NICOLA, B.C.

Mr. Fulton:

With respect to the fact that the sum of $6,000 was approved by treasury board as part of an item included in the estimates of 1954-55 for payment of the cost of fish screens installed in the Nicola, British Columbia, district: 1. Did treasury board approve or authorize the release of this information for general publication prior to the tabling of the estimates in the house?

2. If so, when, and who was authorized to release it?

Mr. Abbott: Here again, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might answer these questions verbally. My hon. friend asks with respect to certain items in the estimates concerning irrigation works in British Columbia, whether treasury board approved or otherwise the release of this information for general publication prior to the tabling of the estimates in the house.

In reply I would say that the treasury board performs many useful functions, but the approval or authorization of information is not among those functions. Hence the answer to these questions must be in the negative.

Mr. Speaker: Answered.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

JOHNSTON-WESTERN CANADA PROJECT—IRRIGATION

Mr. Fulton:

For a copy of any treasury board order or minute approving or authorizing the inclusion of an item, or as part of an item, in the estimates of 1954-55, of any amount or amounts for payment of the cost of irrigation works on the Johnston-Western Canada V.L.A. project near Kamloops, British Columbia.

FISH SCREENS, NICOLA, B.C.

Mr. Fulton:

For a copy of any treasury board order or minute approving or authorizing the inclusion of an item, or as part of an item, in the estimates of 1954-55 of any amount or amounts for payment for fish screens installed in the Nicola, British Columbia, district.

He said: In view of the answers given by the Minister of Finance to the two earlier questions, indicating that there are in treasury board no separate notes of approval for specific items, and after discussions with the minister, as a result of those discussions I would ask that these notices of motions be dropped.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

JOHNSTON-WESTERN CANADA PROJECT—ALLOCATION OF FUNDS

Mr. Fulton:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, and other correspondence, and memoranda of telephone calls, exchanged between the government or any minister, department or agency thereof, and any other person or organization outside the dominion government service, since 1st June, 1953, concerning the allocation of funds for the Johnston-Western Canada V.L.A. project near Kamloops, British Columbia.

WATER POLLUTION, NORTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all letters and telegrams which have passed since the 12th of November, 1953, between any department of the federal government and the provincial governments of each of the provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba, together with reports made to the federal department of health by all officials, investigators or analysts of said department relative to the pollution of waters of the North Saskatchewan river by the alleged dumping into the river at a point near Edmonton, Alberta.

Mr. Martin: I wonder whether my hon. friend would be agreeable to allowing this matter to stand until tomorrow so that I may have the opportunity of perhaps discussing the matter further with him before the motion is adopted.

Mr. Speaker: Motion stands.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED OUTLET FROM BRITISH COLUMBIA THROUGH ALASKA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. T. Applewhaite (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources following on the question of Friday last by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). Has the government received copies of a resolution passed by the executive committee of the British Columbia and Yukon chamber of mines recommending an early meeting between representatives of the province of British Columbia, the Yukon Territory and the territory of Alaska, to discuss the proposal that the territory of Alaska allow British Columbia and the Yukon access to the Pacific ocean by way of corridors through the Alaska panhandle? If so, has the government received any representations from the governments of British Columbia or of the United States asking that such a meeting be held—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Knowles: Does the hon. member not know the rules?

Mr. Applewhaite: —or does it see any adequate reason to initiate any such discussion itself?

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for having sent me advance notice of his question.

The answer to the first part of the question is yes. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), several of my colleagues, and I received copies of the resolution by the executive committee of the British Columbia and Yukon chamber of mines.

The answer to the second part of the question is no. The government has not received any representations from the governments of British Columbia or the United States, and it does not see any adequate reason to initiate any such discussions itself. So far as the Yukon is concerned, for which the federal government has complete responsibility, there are not at this time nor do there appear to be in prospect any problems of development that require the establishment of "corridors".

Goods to and from the Yukon, as hon. members are aware, are now transported through the Alaska panhandle. I have been told by businessmen in daily contact with these matters that goods from Vancouver destined for Whitehorse, or vice versa, which are shipped through Skagway in bond, are handled by the customs with no delay or inconvenience at all.

Mr. Speaker, if I may be allowed to do so, I should like to make this further statement. Some of the discussion with regard to corridors has stressed the importance of securing an area where industrial sites can be established on or near tidewater. I think there has been a tendency to overlook the significance of the word "near". Many large industrial plants, even when located right at the water's edge, find it necessary to load their raw materials into railroad cars to transport them to stockpiles or to various sections of the plant. If this has to be done anyway, it adds relatively little to the cost to transport the material a few miles from the seaboard. For example, the aluminum industry at Arvida is generally regarded as being located at tidewater, yet in fact the plant is about 20 miles from Port Alfred, where the raw material is unloaded from ocean-going vessels and where finished products are shipped.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would point out to the minister that it is not quite regular to say more than is required to answer the question which, as hon. members have noticed, was quite long. I think the hon. member has received a long reply, and I do not think it should be any longer.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Speaker, I will not be any longer, but it is a question of exposing government policy on this question of corridors, which is quite a complicated one.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister wishes to make a statement, he must do so under "motions". We are now at the stage of questions being asked and answers being provided. If I allow long questions to be put and long answers to be given, we shall then have long supplementary questions and long supplementary answers, and there is no end to the process.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I understand the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra wishes to ask a question on the same subject?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I understood that the minister had practically finished his statement. May he not be allowed to finish it?

Mr. Speaker: If it is the wish of the house to hear the statement, I have no objection. Is it the wish of the house to have the minister make the statement?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Ferguson: No.

Mr. Green: This question is of the utmost importance on the west coast of Canada. I would ask that the minister be allowed to finish his statement. He has been cut off right in the middle of it.

Mr. Speaker: I have no objection to that course. I just want to point out again that if a statement is to be made, it should be made under "motions". That is the practice that has been established, as the hon. member knows. If it is the wish of the house to hear the rest of the statement which the minister has started to make, he may proceed.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Ferguson: No.

Mr. Green: Go ahead.

Mr. Lesage: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. If there is any objection—

Mr. Speaker: I just asked if the minister had the consent of the house to continue with his statement. Apparently he has, so he may continue.

Mr. Ferguson: No, he has not.

Mr. Lesage: To continue, satisfactory industrial sites appear to be available in parts of British Columbia immediately adjacent to the Alaska panhandle.

A point that should be kept in mind is that the "corridor" proposal amounts to a suggestion either that Canada acquire title to some United States territory or else get extraterritorial rights on United States territory. Neither possibility is one that is likely to be viewed with any favour in the United States.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I object. The minister has not unanimous consent. He is establishing a precedent by breaking a rule that will be broken forever.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Speaker, speaking on the point of order, may I say that I am not surprised at the hon. member who has just objected.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Ferguson) has objected. Therefore there is not unanimous consent. Let us conclude this incident.

UNITED NATIONS

CONTRIBUTIONS TO FORCES IN KOREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has his attention been directed to a speech delivered by the majority leader in the United States Senate, Senator Knowland, on Saturday to the effect that with the exception of Turkey and South Korea, the other nations within the United Nations had not made proportionate contribution to the forces there? He also said that it would be a disservice to the allies of the United States to think that the United States approves of the inequality of the contributions of other nations.

Has the minister any comment to make on that statement? In addition, is he in a position to say whether or not the United States government has ever made any such suggestion to the government of Canada?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I have read the statement in the press attributed to Senator Knowland. I have no comment to make on it, and no suggestion of that kind has ever been made to the Canadian government by the United States government.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST FOR MORE FREQUENT RELEASE OF UNEMPLOYMENT FIGURES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the concern felt about the situation, can the minister have figures on unemployment released more frequently than once a month?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): The hon. member for Winnipeg North kindly sent me notice of this question. The answer to it will have to be in the negative, and I am quite sure my hon. friend will understand the reason for that. As I pointed out to the house on January 27 last, it was decided in December, 1952, to issue the complete employment and unemployment statistics derived from both the national employment service operations and the dominion bureau of statistics monthly labour force survey at the same time. This has been done partly because the labour force survey data are available only on a monthly basis and partly to avoid confusion between the two sets of figures.

There is also the point I mentioned earlier, that the gathering and preparation of these two sets of figures require a substantial amount of time and effort, and the costs involved in issuing both sets more frequently would be very substantial indeed. In view of these reasons it would be very difficult to do it twice a month.

FINANCE

REDUCTION IN DISCOUNT RATE BY UNITED STATES FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Has his attention been drawn to the report in Saturday's press that the United States federal reserve board has cut the bank discount rate from 2 per cent to 1¾ per cent as a move to curb the current economic decline, and is the government of Canada contemplating similar action here?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): This is a matter concerning the Minister of Finance, and I will ask him to answer the question.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): The government is aware of the action taken by the federal reserve board, the reason given being that it was a technical move to bring interest rates in the United States in line with treasury bill rates prevailing there.

[Later:]

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I should like to ask a supplementary question, or rather to ask my question again of the Minister of Finance, because quite obviously he has not seen the report to which I refer. The one to which I refer states quite definitely that the federal reserve board has cut the bank discount rate in an administrative move to curb the current economic dip. My question was whether the government of Canada is contemplating similar action. I have not had an answer to that.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend is reading from a newspaper report as to the purpose of the move. My information is based upon a communication made to the Bank of Canada prior to the move by the federal reserve board. The government of Canada is not responsible for the interpretation placed on these moves by the press of the United States.

BRIDGES

BURLINGTON CANAL—RECEIPT OF PLANS FROM ONTARIO GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Can the minister state if the plans for the Burlington canal bridge have been received by his department from the Ontario government and, if so, when it may be possible to approve them?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. In reply, I presume he has in mind the high level vehicular bridge which the Ontario government is contemplating. I make this point because there is a railway bridge and a low level vehicular and pedestrian bridge across the canal at the present time. Therefore there are related problems when considering a solution to the Ontario government's highway problem in this dense traffic area. The minister of highways and several of his officials visited me on January 22 with sketch plans which we reviewed. These plans they took away with them, and it was the understanding that they would send them to us with a formal application for federal government participation in the cost of the high level bridge.

Because of the nature of the problem the Department of Transport and the Canadian National Railways are concerned as well as the Department of Public Works. There have been meetings of officials of these federal government departments and agency to determine the extent of the federal government's interest. The meetings are continuing pending receipt of the plans and submissions from the Ontario government.

[Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo).]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF ADEQUACY OF PRESENT RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Will the minister have a survey or investigation made as to the adequacy or inadequacy of the present rates of unemployment insurance benefits?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): That problem is being surveyed and studied continuously by officers of the commission and of my department.

DUMPING

VEGETABLES—REPRESENTATIONS FROM MANITOBA GROWERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Has the minister or his department received representations from the vegetable growers' association of Manitoba with respect to imports of United States vegetables? If so, would the minister care to comment on the situation at this time?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): The hon. member gave me notice of his question. The answer is that the Department of National Revenue has no record of having received any representations from the vegetable growers' association of Manitoba during the past year. A somewhat similar question was asked and answered on January 15, and can be found at page 1142 of Hansard. It was asked by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings and had to do with the alleged importation or dumping of vegetables in the maritime provinces. In my answer I gave certain information, and if the hon. member will read it I think it may help to solve any difficulties with reference to the manner in which this matter is handled.

WATER POLLUTION

NORTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—ALLEGED KILLING OF FISH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I have a question I wish to ask the Minister of Fisheries, but as he is not here I shall address it to the parliamentary assistant. It has to do with the pollution of the waters of the North Saskatchewan. Has he received a report from the inspection staff—there are two inspectors of the Department of Fisheries in Prince Albert—regarding the hundreds of fish that have died within the last three days, and particularly on Friday last, as a consequence of pollution? What is going to be done to meet the situation?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Acting Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Fisheries was just called out of the house. As acting minister, I shall be very glad to bring the matter to his attention.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is a serious situation.

[Later:]

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): In view of my hon. friend's question to the Minister of Fisheries, and particularly his comment about the seriousness of the situation, which we all appreciate very much, perhaps I might read the text of a telegram that was sent the day before yesterday to the minister of public health of the province of Alberta. It reads as follows:

> In view of the many questions asked respecting the pollution of the North Saskatchewan river through industrial wastes said to originate with industries in Alberta, I would like to offer the co-operation and assistance of the technical officers of this department to participate in a joint study with the technical officers of your province and of the industries to endeavour to find a solution to the problem. I appreciate that the matter is not one that is within federal responsibility but in view of its importance and the complications and technical difficulties that would appear to exist, the solution may well be one that can only be found with the full utilization of all of the technical resources that can be made available. If you feel that this is a helpful proposal I suggest that you have Dr. Somerville communicate with Dr. Cameron with a view to working out satisfactory details and arrangements for an immediate study.

I have not as yet received an answer.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I make this one reference, in thanking the minister, to point out that the matter I raised a moment ago is shown in a picture appearing in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of February 6, in which hundreds of dead fish are shown piled up along the river near Prince Albert.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

SUGGESTED REFERENCE OF REPORT TO STANDING COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Will the minister consider presenting a motion to the house to refer the important annual report of the Canadian wheat board to the standing committee on agriculture?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to do that at an appropriate time.

SUPERANNUATED CIVIL SERVANTS

SUGGESTED SUPPLEMENT TO PENSIONS IN SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that there seems to be no item in the estimates to provide for a supplement to the pensions of superannuated civil servants, particularly those in the lower brackets, will the minister consider bringing in such an item when he prepares his supplementary estimates?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): He will consider it as usual, but I think it is very unlikely that there will be an item included.

Mr. Knowles: I hope the consideration will be better than usual.

POST OFFICE ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE POSTAGE ON LETTERS AFTER APRIL 1, 1954

The house resumed, from Friday, February 5, consideration in committee of Bill No. 168, to amend the Post Office Act—Mr. Cote—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Rates on letters.

Mrs. Fairclough: Since the minister has given as one of the reasons for an increase in the postal rate the introduction of the five-day 40-hour week, the manner in which this change in delivery is to be worked out becomes a question of considerable importance. Several reports have appeared within the last few days, both in the press and over the radio, with reference to staff which is to be eliminated. I am very much concerned about this because I cannot believe that some of the reports which I have heard can be correct. Will the minister tell us just how he intends to proceed under the 40-hour week?

Actually, the letter carriers are working a 48-hour week, and then having a liquidation week every eleven weeks. For the purposes of this system a staff was employed to work in the liquidation weeks. I understand that plans are under way whereby the regular staff will work five days a week, Monday through Friday, and that casual help will be brought in to work on the Saturday.

Now, this does two things, if it is true. It removes from the post office the liquidation staffs which, in the city of Hamilton, I am given to understand, number eleven employees, men who are experienced letter carriers, and substitutes in their place whatever casual help the Post Office Department may be able to pick up at the offered rate of $1 per hour.

In an effort to secure this casual help I understand the officials of the department have been soliciting the universities and high schools to ascertain if students at those institutions would care to undertake this work at $1 per hour. I understand also that the regular post office employees have been solicited and, regardless of the rate at which they are paid, have been offered this Saturday work at $1 per hour. Quite apart from the fact that they have been offered the work I understand that they have been told, whether or not they volunteer, they shall be called upon if necessary to perform these duties on Saturday.

I believe this house would be interested in knowing whether it is the Postmaster General's intention to utilize the liquidation staff where it is his intention to institute the five-day week, or whether he is considering the rotation of the staff to permit experienced letter carriers to carry the mails on Saturday, or whether the rumour which I have heard—I may say that I heard the announcement over the radio this morning—to the effect that the post office is soliciting casual help from all and sundry, is true. Will the Postmaster General please tell us?

Mr. Cote: The principle of the five-day week is to permit the employees to work five days or 40 hours per week. It is applied, as we understand, because we want them to work no more than five days or 40 hours per week. We will not force employees to work more than that. But if amongst those who are already working there are some who want to work in their spare time, we would certainly consider their application.

Now, we are going to employ some other people to work the time necessary to complete the week. It will be understood that, although we want to give the privilege to our employees of working the five-day week, at the same time we want to keep the best service possible. In some places it would disrupt the service for a new man to come in and try to get used to several routes. This would cause delay and difficulty. By adopting the scheme we have in mind, we will be in a better position to give service because the same man will be on the same route every day except Saturday.

[Mrs. Fairclough.]

For the information of the house as well as the hon. member, I might say that we are recruiting as well some clerical staff, so there will be openings there for spare carriers. A delegation from the letter carriers association has endorsed our scheme. I do not know if I have made myself clear, but since we are applying the 40-hour week we want to give those employees who do not want to work more than 40 hours that privilege. We want also to keep this service as speedy and as efficient as it was before.

Mrs. Fairclough: If I understand the minister correctly, he is now telling us that the casual employees he hopes to recruit will do a better job than by taking the experienced letter carrier and putting him on a different route. Do I understand the minister to have said that?

Mr. Cote: I do not want to be misinterpreted by the hon. member. We want to have the same service we are giving every day, but the rotating service suggested by the hon. member would mean that the newcomers would have to learn at least eleven different walks, and they would have to take a new route every day.

Mrs. Fairclough: May I say that is precisely what the liquidation staff have been doing. They take a route a week, and for eleven weeks they take different routes.

Mr. Cote: This has caused a lot of complaints and complications, and we want to avoid the difficulties we have experienced in the past in connection with that scheme.

Mrs. Fairclough: If the rotation scheme has worked and these eleven employees who have been taking eleven different routes are put on regular routes, does the minister not agree it would be preferable to having high school or university students come in and work two or three months and then stop because they get into examination periods, summer holidays come along, or for some other reason? It seems to me there will be a terrific dislocation in the mail deliveries. If there is a dislocation on Saturday, then naturally the hangover of errors will fall on the regular carrier for that route when Monday rolls around. I believe it would be preferable to employ the staffs now employed in the Post Office Department, in the liquidation staffs, and to use them to build up the service on a regular five-day basis, whether it be Monday through Friday, or Tuesday through Saturday, or whatever the case may be, so that these men could be kept in their jobs. But to discharge experienced employees to take on casual help at $1 an hour seems to be just asking for trouble.

Mr. Cote: The people who know the work and who have done the work have accepted the agreement we are now trying to implement.

Mrs. Fairclough: Do I understand the Postmaster General to say that the agreement they have made is with the complete approval of the national association of letter carriers?

Mr. Cote: Yes.

Mrs. Fairclough: If that is so, it certainly has not met with the approval of the locals.

Mr. Cote: You cannot please everybody.

Mrs. Fairclough: You have not pleased anybody, so far as I know.

Mr. Green: On this point, within the last few days there have been serious complaints from Vancouver. Apparently Mr. MacNabb of the minister's department was out on the west coast the week before last, and announced that probably there would be a plan of hiring high school students. I have here a press dispatch of February 1 taken from the Vancouver Sun, which says:

> Post office authorities are considering the hiring of casual help, including high school students, to make Saturday deliveries of the mail when the five-day week for most postmen becomes effective on April 1.
> This was the report of R. H. MacNabb, manager of postal operations, Ottawa, when he visited Vancouver at the week end.
> He said in an interview that regular postmen also will be given the opportunity of making extra money by working on Saturdays if they want to.

Now, that seems a very unusual way to bring the five-day week into operation. Surely private industry does not have to resort to measures of that kind when it brings in a five-day week. The postmen in Vancouver have been protesting very bitterly. Other newspaper dispatches say that the protests will centre around the employment of casual help by the post office at substandard wages, and the reduction of professional post office standards by the employment of unsupervised and inexperienced people to handle public property as valuable and vital as the mails.

Union officials are reported to have recommended that the only permanent solution to providing a five-day week for postmen is for the department to hire extra postmen for every five walks in the city.

Some such plan as that I mentioned last would seem to be the businesslike way to bring in this five-day week. Why is it necessary to go out and hire high school students on a temporary basis in order to meet this situation?

Mr. Cote: Mr. Chairman, we must make it clear that while many private enterprises can simply stop working on Saturdays, the Post Office Department cannot. We have to deliver the mail. If there have been some carriers who have worried about being relieved of their work, this should not be the case, because they might be absorbed in the sorting staff.

So on the whole we have thought over this problem carefully. And it has created a problem. The Minister of Finance explained to the house that the five-day 40-hour week was creating a great problem in the Post Office Department. We have understood that, and I think now everyone understands it. But we have made this study, and have looked into the implementation and have come to the conclusion that this was the best way to implement the five-day 40-hour week scheme, while at the same time giving the best possible service.

I think everyone would understand that we are not asking those people who want to work only five days or 40 hours to work on Saturdays. That is their privilege. But if they asked us for other work, we would certainly consider their requests. On the other hand, we have to do the job, and to do it as quickly as possible. So that we have to have these casual workers on Saturdays.

Mr. Green: Then, the situation will be that on Mondays, Tuesdays, Wednesdays, Thursdays and Fridays the regular postmen will deliver the mail, while on Saturdays it will be delivered by high school students or—

Mr. Cote: No.

Mr. Green: On Saturdays the mail will be delivered by high school students or by a regular postman who—

Mr. Cote: Not necessarily.

Mr. Green:—or by a regular postman who wishes to work the extra day.

Mr. Cote: Not necessarily.

Mr. Green: Or by any other casual help. Why not adopt the suggestion put forward by the union, that there be an extra postman for every five walks?

Mr. Cote: What union?

Mr. Green: This is made by the union officials. I am referring to a dispatch which mentions the amalgamated civil servants association. This dispatch from Vancouver suggests that there should be a plan to hire an extra postman for every five walks, rather than to bring in all this casual help.

Mr. Cote: Well, that is exactly the principle we have rejected—the principle of rotation. I have explained already that we think the plan suggested by the hon. member will not give satisfaction, so far as this work is concerned. We think further that by having casual workers—not necessarily students, but whoever may be hired, even including those already employed in the Post Office Department who are willing to work on Saturdays—we will give a better service.

Mr. Green: Then I am right in saying the situation is to be that on Saturdays the mail is to be distributed by casual workers.

Mr. Cote: Yes, that is what we have in mind.

Mr. Green: Well, that seems to me a very unbusinesslike way of doing it.

Mr. Cote: We already do it.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to put two or three questions to the minister. If he wishes to interrupt as I go along, it will be satisfactory to me.

First of all, as a member for Winnipeg I was glad to learn the other day from the Minister of Finance—although it was in advance—that Winnipeg is on the list of communities where postal workers will be put on the five-day 40-hour week. We also learned later in that day that Regina is on the same list. When will we have the complete list so that the whole country will know what communities will be on the five-day 40-hour week, so far as postal workers are concerned?

Mr. Cote: My hon. friend is right in saying that the other day the Minister of Finance made the statement that Winnipeg might have, or is going to have—

Mr. Knowles: No; don't qualify it—Winnipeg "is" on the list.

Mr. Cote: "Is" on the list. We had to assume that wherever the clerical staff was on the five-day 40-hour week, then we would have to consider introducing the five-day week for the operational staff. We did that because it was following the dominant pattern in a particular city or town where the five-day 40-hour week was already implemented. Therefore we have prepared our own estimates on that principle.

As far the second part of the question is concerned, we asked on Saturday and again today to have all the details as soon as possible, because we are going to implement this working scheme as announced before April 1. We are as anxious as my hon. friend to obtain all the details as soon as possible. Only this morning we again communicated with the civil service commission to have the details furnished to us in a week or so.

[Mr. Cote.]

Mr. Knowles: I am glad to know that the Postmaster General is as anxious as I am, because I am quite anxious. I move now, Mr. Chairman, to another question that I wish to put to the Postmaster General. When the Minister of Finance announced the postage increase in his statement to the house on Tuesday, December 8, as recorded in Hansard at page 691 he said:

> The government has accordingly decided to recommend the following adjustments in first-class postage rates effective April 1, 1954:
> 1. A general increase of one cent per ounce over existing rates.

I should like to know how far that policy of the one-cent increase is to be carried. The bill that is now before us amends only one section of the Post Office Act, namely, section 10, which sets the rates of postage on letters posted in Canada for delivery in Canada. In respect of what the bill does we are clear. It raises the present four-cent rate on letters from one area of Canada to another to five cents, and it raises the present drop letter rate from three cents to four cents. In addition, it raises by one cent the rate for additional ounces where a letter is overweight. But the question that comes to my mind has to do with postcards. I have been asked whether the rate on postcards is to be increased.

When one looks at the bill he finds no reference to postcards; but I have been rummaging around in the Post Office Act to try to find where the rate for postcards is set, and I do not find it there at all. It looks to me as though the rate for postcards is probably set under section 6 (d) of the Post Office Act, which gives the Postmaster General the authority to make regulations:

> (d) establishing rates of postage on any class of mailable matter for which the rate is not established by this act.

I hope the Postmaster General will correct me if I am wrong. I take it from that, and from looking through the act generally, that since there is no rate for postcards set in the act, the rate is fixed by the Postmaster General under the authority conferred upon him under section 6 (d). I assume it is under that authority that we have the present rate for postcards. I want to know, and I hope the Postmaster General can give us a clear and categorical answer on this, whether there is any intention on the part of the Postmaster General, either with or without the advice of his colleagues in the cabinet, to raise the rates on postcards after this bill has gone through. As I interpret it, that would be perfectly possible. The bill can go through and by statute parliament, over our opposition, might increase the rates on first-class matter, but it would still be possible after the act had received royal assent for the government to decide to increase the rates on postcards or to increase the rates on letters which are unsealed, that rate that people make use of at Christmastime in sending out Christmas cards, for example. I think it is only fair—I hope the minister will not be cross with me because I ask this question. I do so because I am suspicious; I have been around here a long time, and I am more suspicious the longer I am here. I hope the minister will not think that I am unfair when I ask for a categorical statement that it is not the intention of the government to raise any of the other rates except the one that is being raised by the bill that is now before the house.

Mr. Cote: My hon. friend is right. This bill is before the house, and because it is before the house it is up to the house to decide whether there should be a readjustment in the postal tariff.

As far as postcards are concerned, it is true that they will follow the principle of increasing the rates by one cent.

Mr. Knowles: In other words, the Postmaster General—

Mr. Cote: Not through this bill.

Mr. Knowles: No, but this is something that we have not known. I was right in saying that I get more suspicious the longer I am around here. I am sure a lot of members around the house are surprised and shocked right now, and the country is going to be shocked, to discover that, although all the bill does is to increase by one cent the rate on first-class letters, it is the intention of the government, when the bill has been passed, under the authority of section 6 (d) of the act, to raise other rates by one cent as well. I am sure they are doing that because the minister—

Mr. Cote: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend—

Mr. Knowles: I hope the minister can say I am wrong.

Mr. Cote: My hon. friend must remember that the Post Office Department has always had this right. He just quoted to the committee the section which says that we have this right. He cannot be shocked because we have this right and we have always had it.

Mr. Knowles: I quite recognize that the government has always had the right; but I think in terms of ordinary fairness the government should have told us right from the start that in addition to what is provided for in the bill they were going to raise these other rates as well. I ask the minister if the rates on unsealed letters such as the ones that people mail at Christmastime in which they put Christmas cards and mail them for two cents—it used to be one cent—are going to be increased.

Mr. Cote: The answer to my hon. friend's question is no.

Mr. Knowles: But postcards are going to be increased one cent?

Mr. Cote: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: But this is what we have not been told.

Mr. Cote: I am telling—

Mr. Knowles: You are telling us now.

Mr. Cote: I did not have a chance before, since my hon. friend has been—

Mr. Knowles: That is an insult to parliament, to say that; it is an insult for the government to say that in all the time that this bill has been before the house the government have not had the chance to tell us that along with the increase in first-class rates there is to be an increase in postcard rates, not by virtue of the bill that is before parliament, but by virtue of the authority that is already in the act.

Mr. Pickersgill: Exactly.

Mr. Knowles: The minister who has just spoken has only been in the government for a short time but he is used to this unlimited power that the government has.

Mr. Pickersgill: The power was given by parliament.

Mr. Knowles: Let it be clear that the hon. gentlemen on the other side are technically correct; the government has that right at the present time under the Post Office Act, and has had it right along; but at the moment we are not dealing in technicalities, we are dealing with the question of what is fair play. The government has a bill before parliament amending the Post Office Act. Parliament is being asked to put it through. If it had not been for my suspicious nature this matter might have gone through without parliament realizing that what is being effected at this time in practice is an increase of one cent not only on first-class letters, but on postcards. According to the Postmaster General they are going up one cent.

Mr. Cote: Perhaps I should tell my hon. friend that this act has been in effect since 1868. It was revised in 1951. That provision was then in the act; my hon. friend sat there and never said a word about it, never objected to it. I am talking about the bill. I am sorry if I have aroused my hon. friend's feelings. He said that this was a defy—

Mr. Knowles: "Insult" was the word.

Mr. Cote: So long as we are discussing the bill I stuck to a discussion of the bill. This is the first time that my hon. friend has asked the question, and I am answering the question he asked. What more does he want?

Mr. Knowles: The Postmaster General and the Secretary of State can throw their arms in semicircles if they wish. The plain fact of the matter is that the government is not playing fair with parliament in this situation. The Postmaster General is perfectly correct. This has been in the act ever since the year 1868. But here we have a case where the rates are being increased, and the portion of these rates that can be increased only by statute is before the house. I ask anyone with an ounce of fairness in his make-up if it would not be the proper thing to expect the government to say at the same time that they were going to make these other increases. The Minister of Finance did tell us what was going to happen in that one sentence which I just read. I repeat what he said:

> There will be a general increase of one cent per ounce over existing rates.

He did not tell us how far that extended. When we look at the bill all we see is an increase with respect to first-class mail in Canada, and another in the case of drop letters. But I submit even a parliament which has become inured to this kind of thing must be shocked by what we have learned at the present time.

Mr. Chairman, I have a third matter I want to speak about but I suspect there are other hon. members in the house who wish to pursue this point. I will leave the other matter until later. At the moment I simply want to protest as strongly as I can not only against the fact that there is to be this increase on postcards, but also at the way in which it is being done, and in particular at the way in which the government has tried to slip this over parliament.

Mr. Cote: Mr. Chairman, I think my hon. friend will agree that what he is suggesting could not have been done. A bill was brought here to readjust the postal tariff because we had to deal with it according to statute. Nothing else could be done. And it is absolutely—

Mr. Knowles: But could you not have told us on second reading of the bill that this was to happen? The minister cannot say he did not have time or that he did not have the latitude. He went all over the world—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Chairman, I would like to pursue this matter a little further. Can the minister tell us if there are any further increases whatsoever envisaged in the Post Office Department other than on postcards and first-class mail?

Mr. Cote: The domestic rates apply to the whole of the dominion and the western hemisphere. In the case of other countries, five in all, the cost will go up to six cents and postcards will be increased by one cent.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): But there will be no increase on two-cent mail?

Mr. Cote: There is nothing suggested on that.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Can the minister answer the question I asked on second reading?

Mr. Cote: The two-cent charge is now applied to Christmas cards and that will stay.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): You have already told us that. Can you answer a question I asked on the second reading? What is the actual cost of delivery between points on a first-class letter?

Mr. Cote: That depends entirely on where the letter is going. If for example a letter were sent to Aklavik it might be as much as 25 cents.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Chairman, I am asking for an average and I would suggest we be given the average on a letter, say, from Ottawa to Winnipeg.

Mr. Cote: We know the over-all cost, but if my hon. friend wishes to concentrate on a letter from one place to another it would be very difficult to supply the actual cost. It might even vary according to the area from which the letter was sent to Winnipeg.
