Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, on motions hon. members will have noticed that there is a notice of motion appointing members to serve with Mr. Speaker on the Special Committee on the Television and Radio Broadcasting of the House. If there were a disposition to let the motion pass, I would call it. Indeed, I gather there is a disposition to pass the motion. Therefore, I move:

That the members serving with Mr. Speaker on the Special Committee on the Television and Radio Broadcasting of the House and its committees be Mssrs. Beatty, Blackburn, Coates, Goodale, Laprise, Pinard and Reid.

● (1510)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Of course, the presentation of this motion at this time would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent for the presentation of such motion at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion standing in the name of the President of the Privy Council. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to an item which appeared in Hansard yesterday on page 2896, the second column, on line six and some following lines. Some remarks are attributed to the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail). He is recorded as having made those remarks while I had the floor. I do not recall the hon. member having said what he is alleged to have said in Hansard, and request that those remarks be deleted. If they were said, and I doubt it very much, then I, as the member who had the floor, did not have the right or opportunity to reply to his unfair, sarcastic, inaccurate, exaggerated and unjust remarks. I therefore request that those remarks be deleted.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Without elaboration, I might say that that does not fall within the normal parameters of corrections to Hansard.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The point I am making is that the words were not said.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If a correction has to be made to delete remarks in Hansard attributed to the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail), this ought to be done at the instance of the hon. member for Restigouche and really not by any other member.

EDC—CONTRACTS FOR PROFESSIONAL SERVICES

Question No. 289—Mr. Orlikow:

1. For the fiscal year 1975-1976, what contracts for professional services were let (a) for studies, surveys and analyses into present or future policies, programs or information analysis, and their efficiency and effectiveness (b) into the examination of the administration or internal operation of the Export Development Corporation?

2. How much was committed on each contract and to whom?

3. What were the comparable figures for the fiscal year 1973-1974?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as Export Development Corporation is concerned: 1. By tradition and as a matter of commercial principle Crown Corporations have not been required by Parliament to answer detailed questions on their administration and operations, and in the case of Export Development Corporation, the Export Development Act places the responsibility for such matters on its Board of Directors. The corporation's transactions are reviewed by the Auditor General of Canada, EDC's auditor.

2. Please see the answer to Part 1.

3. Please see the answer to Part 1.

RECRUITMENT AND SEPARATION OF PUBLIC SERVANTS

Question No. 661—Mr. Lachance:

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: Between May 25, 1976 and October 12, 1976, the recruitment and separation of public servants was as follows: Hired: Industry, Trade and Commerce; 35 (from inside the Public Service); 27 (from outside the Public Service); Total, 62; Foreign Investment Review Agency; 2 (from inside the Public Service); 4 (from outside the Public Service); Total, 6; 0 Metric Commission; 0 National Design Council; Dismissed: Industry, Trade and Commerce; 11 retired; 1 released; 2 laid off; 4 died; Total, 18; 0 Foreign Investment Review Agency; 0 Metric Commission; 0 National Design Council; Transferred: Industry, Trade and Commerce; 36 transferred to other government departments; 0 Foreign Investment Review Agency; 0 Metric Commission; 0 National Design Council; There are no employees listed for Standards Council of Canada.

In so far as Export Development Corporation is concerned: By tradition and as a matter of commercial principle Crown Corporations have not been required by Parliament to answer detailed questions on their administration and operations, and in the case of Export Development Corporation, the Export Development Act places the responsibility for such matters on its Board of Directors.

GOVERNMENT AGENCIES—PERSONNEL

Question No. 672—Mr. Lachance:

Between the date of the presentation of the last budget May 25, 1976 and October 12, 1976, did the Canadian International Development Agency, International Development Research Centre, International Boundary Commission (Canadian Section) and International Joint Commission (Canadian Section) hire, dismiss or transfer employees to other departments and, if so, how many?

Mr. Fernand E. Leblanc (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): In so far as the Canadian International Development Agency is concerned: Hired 27; Dismissed None; Transferred 6.

In so far as the International Development Research Centre is concerned: Hired 26; Dismissed None; Transferred None.

In so far as the International Boundary Commission (Canadian Section) is concerned: Hired 36 (including casual employees); Dismissed None; Transferred None.

In so far as the International Joint Commission (Canadian Section) is concerned: Hired 6; Dismissed None; Transferred None.

Order Paper Questions

GRANTS TO ANIMATORS—MINORITY GROUPS

Question No. 770—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What is a definition of the duties performed by persons receiving grants from the Department of the Secretary of State classified as animators under the government's bilingual programme and is one of their tasks to go into an area to agitate members of either a French or English language minority group into pushing for minority language rights?

2. (a) What is a list of all such grants given in the past four years (b) what are the names and addresses of the recipients (c) how many were involved with furthering or encouraging (i) English language services (ii) French language services (d) are such grants still made and are the animators sometimes referred to as Social Development Officers?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): 1. Animation in a minority environment is a practical technique for ensuring language and cultural rights. The animator is concerned with groups' sociocultural identification. He seeks to arouse their self-esteem and maximize their participation in various organizations through projects that promote their development and self-determination. Recipients of grants awarded for animation purposes encourage members of French and English-speaking minority groups to participate in community activities by making it possible for them to express their creative abilities and by awakening their pride in possessing, preserving and strengthening their Canadian cultural heritage.

2. (a) and (b) See following table. (c) All the associations. (d) Yes, such grants are still being made, and no, animators are not called Social Development Officers.

DREE—ESTABLISHMENT OF CHALLENGE MILLS AT SPRINGHILL, NOVA SCOTIA

Question No. 811—Mr. Coates:

1. Was approval given for assistance by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion for the establishment of Challenge Mills at Springhill, Nova Scotia and, if so, on what date?

2. (a) How much was provided in loans and grants (b) what is the amount of employment that would be produced (i) immediately (ii) in the long-term as a result of the firm's establishment?

3. Was assistance made available through any provincial agency in Nova Scotia and, if so, in what amount and in what form?

4. How much has Challenge Mills received to date of the total amount in loans and grants made available through DREE?

5. What is the present employment at Challenge Mills?

Mr. Ed. Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): In so far as the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is concerned the response to Question number 811 is as follows: 1. Yes. An offer of assistance under the Regional Development Incentives Act was made on March 9, 1976 and accepted by the company on March 24th.

2. (a) The departmental offer, as accepted by the company, was for an incentive grant estimated at $568,000. (b) (i) The company initially hired 8-10 people for clean-up work at the site. (ii) Employment is expected to grow gradually to 63 within three years.

3. Yes. The provincial agency Industrial Estates Limited has announced that it is providing long-term loan financing of $1.2 million to the project.

4. Nil to date.

5. Approximately 30.

[Mr. Roberts.]

BILINGUALISM DEVELOPMENT PROGRAMME—CONTRIBUTIONS TO PROVINCES FOR PAST SEVEN YEARS

Question No. 1,240—Mr. Herbert:

By province, in each of the past seven years, how much has been contributed under the Bilingualism Development Programme?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): The hon. member is referred to Question No. 803 (part 2) tabled this day.

NOTE: Program was not in existence in 1969.

RDIA PROJECTS—CAPITAL COSTS

Question No. 1,403—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

For each year since the Regional Development Incentives Act came into force, what percentage of projects approved for assistance under the Act with capital costs of (a) less than $250,000 (b) $250,000 to $500,000 (c) $500,000 to $1,000,000 (d) $1,000,000 to $1,500,000 (e) $1,500,000 or more, were approved or dealt with in any manner by the (i) local (ii) regional (iii) national office of DREE?

Mr. Ed. Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: From the enactment of the Regional Development Incentives Act in 1969 until the department's activities were decentralized in 1974, all incentives projects were approved in Ottawa, with the exception of some cases which were approved in the Montreal Office when Region C was designated. Since April 1, 1974, the percentages of projects which were approved for assistance (i.e., offers of incentives were made to applicants) by DREE offices are depicted in the accompanying table. The table is based upon existing levels of signing authority. Exceptions may have occurred when individual cases were referred to more senior officials for resolution of specific or unusual problems; departmental records do not contain information on normal administrative actions of this nature.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO GENERATE JOBS

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition) moved:

That this House denounces the government's failure to generate jobs in Canada, particularly in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces, and urges immediate and resolute action, including the early presentation of a budget.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the motion we shall debate today which stands in my name is inspired by the most recent unemployment figures announced earlier this week which shocked all members of the House. They are shocking not simply in terms of the human burden which they impose on nearly one million Canadians who are out of work, but they are also disturbing by reason of what they say about our capacity to keep our country together and realize the economic growth potential which exists here and which can be one of the central means of ensuring that Canadians will choose, because it makes economic and other sense for them so to choose, to remain part of a large country full of promise and possibility.

I do not intend to dwell at length on the figures which are all too familiar to the House of Commons and to those upon whom they impact most directly. To make the House clearly aware of the degree of the problem we are facing, it would be helpful to enter on the record some relevant figures. Last month the number of unemployed in Canada, according to Statistics Canada, reached 889,000. That, sir, is the highest figure recorded by that agency in the more than 20 years it has been providing this labour force survey.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Shocking.

Mr. Clark: These are shocking figures, a shocking way in which to start the year 1977, and present a great challenge to the country. The number of people who were actually working in January, even on a seasonally adjusted basis, was up only 70,000 from one year earlier, while the labour force had increased by more than 150,000. That means that in 1976 we created new jobs for less than half the new entrants to the Canadian labour force. While we were registering that meagre performance, we made no progress at all in reducing the backlog of jobless in this country.

Unemployment in the five eastern provinces of Canada—Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island—was even more serious because the number of jobs available there was down by 24,000 from one year ago. During 1976, fully 50 per cent of the increase in unemployment occurred in the province of Quebec. I repeat, 50 per cent occurred in that one province. Thirty per cent of it was accounted for by the Atlantic provinces. That is, eight out of every ten Canadians who joined the ranks of the unemployed in 1976 lived in those five eastern provinces of Canada.

On a longer term basis it is worth noting that over the past decade the unemployment rate for Atlantic Canada has been, on average, 50 per cent higher than for the country as a whole. In Quebec, the average rate during those ten years of the life of the present government has run at 30 per cent above the figure for Canada as a whole.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Some government.

Mr. Clark: The aspect of those figures which is most troubling is that among young people—among those in the 15 to 24 age group—the rate of unemployment in Canada in January was 15.2 per cent, or close to double the figure for the labour force as a whole. The figure with respect to young people in Quebec was 17 per cent. That is to say, the unemployment figure was 17 per cent and in Newfoundland it was as high as 29 per cent. That was the figure applying to those who were forced by the economic policies of this government to begin their work career without the possibility of finding a job.

One could go on at great length enumerating this dismal catalogue. I want to go on and recite one or two basic factors. First, unemployment has been rising in Canada even though one of our traditional excuses, the old boast about having the fastest growing labour force in the western world, no longer rings true. It does not hold water any more. In fact, our work force grew last year at less than half the rate experienced by the United States. It is important to note that in the United States the unemployment rate has been moving steadily downward, while in this country it has been creeping steadily upward. Second, the so-called participation rate, the number of eligible Canadians actually in the work force, is down over one year ago, otherwise our problems would be even worse than they actually are.

Finally, I think it is important as we consider this question to take note of the forecasts of the Conference Board. They say that without some action by this government to stimulate growth and generate jobs, unemployment will average more than 10 per cent this year in all the five eastern provinces which have already borne the brunt of unemployment brought on by the economic policies of this government. We are speaking not simply about figures to feed to computers; we are talking about individual Canadians, about people who face the fundamental problem of obtaining a job around which they can build their lives and on which they can base their futures. We are dealing here not just with a passing event, not with a statistic which cropped up this month and is going to pass away, but with what has become an unfortunate feature of life in Canada under this government and one which has a very permanent and dangerous impact upon the lives not only of individual Canadians but upon our capacity to grow together as a country.

● (1520)

I want to read to the House of Commons excerpts from a letter that was sent originally to the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) from a man in Victoria. He received no answer from the Prime Minister's office and so sent the correspondence to me. In a long and eloquent letter he talks about his six children; his oldest son, having worked his way through university, now unable to find a job in his profession; his daughter, a graduate nurse, in the same predicament; his daughter's boy friend, with a degree in business administration, also not able to find a job. The example, he says, is discouraging to his younger children. One of his daughters is talking about going to work in a fish plant in British Columbia when she graduates from high school because "when they are open she can earn great money", and because it is seasonal work she can draw UIC benefits when the fish plant is closed. That will give her time, she says, to walk on the beach and sit in a beer parlour with hundreds of other kids planning a similar future. This father asks:

> What the hell is wrong? Why are we letting this happen to us?

He concludes:

> I think everyone owes their country a service. I also happen to believe that a country owes something to its citizens, especially the ones that are working and striving to be better citizens and are preparing themselves to do great things. They've got to have a chance or we are finished.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: That is the report of one father, of one correspondent, to one member of parliament. Colleagues on this side of the House can cite countless others, particular those who come from regions of the country where unemployment has hit hardest.

Mr. Marshall: Hundreds of them.

Mr. Clark: The point, which is an important one to make, relates to what has been called the work ethic in Canada. Sometimes the suggestion is made that Canadians generally, and young Canadians in particular, do not want to work, that that is the reason they, in the words of this father, walk on the beach and sit in the beer parlours. There have been studies by this very government of the extent to which the work ethic is strong in Canada and the conclusions are that the work ethic is alive and well in Canada if there is work for those who practise that ethic.

I want to read into the record excerpts from Canadian Work Values prepared by the Department of Manpower and Immigration relating to surveys conducted over the last two years. It reads:

> When those in the labour force were asked whether they would rather—if given their preference—work full-time, part-time or never, more than 95 per cent chose either full-time or part-time.

Later the report reads:

> Seventy-five percent of those people who said they were in the labour force agreed that "I work more because I like to than because I have to".

Those are not reports of a country in which the work ethic is in trouble or is in decline. The cause of the unemployment figures that we have seen this month is not based upon the failure of the work ethic but, instead, on the failure of the government of Canada to recognize its responsibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The matter which has to concern us most as parliamentarians planning the future of this country is that while the work ethic is alive and well in Canada, Canadians like other people, are very adaptable. If our institutions create situations where there are no jobs to go to, where it is easier to go on unemployment insurance and to walk the beaches and stay in the beer parlours than it is to find work, then we will see a decline in that work ethic, not because there is a decline in the will of young Canadians but because this government is not doing its job of giving Canadians a chance. There is no question in my mind that this government can break down the Canadian work ethic if it wants to, and it gives every indication of it by its failure to generate jobs.

There are other long-term political impacts to the kind of statistics that we saw the other day. One of them clearly relates to political stability in this country, because there is a clear relationship between political stability and economic progress even in this fortunate country.

[Translation]

Let us take the case of the province of Quebec, for example. It would be easy to delude ourselves and believe that a few cultural concessions will solve all our problems and consequently that the threat of separatism will vanish forever. Nothing could be further from the truth.

I had the opportunity, both before and after my election as leader of the Progressive Conservative party, to visit the various regions of this province and each time I saw that Quebeckers attach great importance to the economic well being of their province. The federal government seems to be the only one to ignore it. Nevertheless, last November 15, when they brought the Parti Québécois to power, the people of Quebec expressed their economical concerns in no uncertain terms. I have already said, and I repeat it today, that Quebeckers did not vote in favour of independence, but for an efficient government likely to grapple with and solve the very concrete problems they are facing. Unemployment is surely one of those problems.

In that context the federal government must of course assume its share of responsibilities, urgently face reality and introduce real solutions to the unemployment problem, not just palliatives. If it remains apathetic, it will only emphasize the risk of making part of the population lose all hope and opt for radical solutions.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, there is also a third long-term impact of this continuing slowness of growth, this continuing failure to realize the promise of the country. That is the development of a sense in Canada that we are a stagnant country, not achieving the growth of which we are capable, not generating the jobs which our young people and other Canadians have a right to expect, not realizing a potential which is unparallelled among the nations of the world if only our government would act to achieve that potential.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The sense of stagnation that is developing in the country also imposes strains upon our unity as a nation. There is now, in western Canada, growing talk in loud voices, with perhaps few numbers behind them at the moment, about a kind of separatism in that region. I think it is important for us to recognize that where part of the sense of separatism in the eastern provinces is separatism of the disadvantaged, what we are seeing in western Canada right now is, instead, separatism flowing from the frustration of the entrepreneur. This frustration is flowing from people who sense that their country is being stacked against them, is placing obstacles in the path of the generation of growth and the generation of jobs which is so much part of the ethic of that region.

We are not talking here simply about the statistics which came from Statistics Canada the other day. We are talking about human lives, human opportunities and about serious impacts upon our capacity as a nation to grow together, to remain together and to maintain the work ethic and the standards which have been part of the Canadian experience and have generated the growth and the progress that we have known in this country. The government can no longer blame external circumstances or other governments, the opposition or anybody else, because they have been the government of Canada for nearly a decade and some of their ministers have been in office longer than that. They are clearly responsible for the failure of this country to realize the economic growth potential and generate the jobs that we can in this country.

Mr. Clark: I am not going to detain or entertain the House today with a long review of the record of bad government we have received from the government opposite. It is all too well known to Canadians. However, it is important to remember in passing that one justification this government gave for introducing a controls program by surprise, in the dead of the night and without consultation, was that that would allow the government to avoid fighting inflation by recession and unemployment. Now, as a result of the mismanagement of the affairs of this country by the government, we have the worst of both worlds. We have a system of controls, with all its distortions in investment patterns, in loss of new plants, in loss of new jobs and in diversion of opportunity to other countries or to other times, and we also have a situation of near recession. We have an economy which underperformed its realistic growth potential last year, and unless some definite action is taken by this government it is going to do even worse this year.

Yet the minister tells us, in effect, that his hands are tied and he cannot do anything to get the economy back on a course of sound and steady economic growth, because if he does, he might overstimulate it. I ask the minister, and Canadians also ask him: is he not aware of the amount of slack which already exists in this economy? Does he not feel that there is considerable room for stimulation in an economy which has unused capacity of up to 20 per cent in some sectors? How can he be so afraid of overstimulation when the Conference Board forecasts that without some change in government policy we will have negative real capital investment in 1977?

I want to talk for a moment about the argument of unused capacity because it is interesting in that regard to look at some of the figures for the third quarter of 1976, figures on the utilization of productive capacity in manufacturing industries, industries which would create jobs if encouragement were given to them. The figures show that during the last three months of 1976 the chemical industry was operating at only 83 per cent of its established capacity. I remind the House that furniture producers, heavily active in the province of Quebec, were employing only 72 per cent of their productive capacity. The electrical products industry was operating at 81 per cent capacity, and the durable goods sector—automobiles, major appliances and the like—was functioning at 82 per cent capacity. What is significant here is not simply the failure to come closer to capacity; it is that many of the industries which have been operating at less than capacity are in those parts of Canada where the unemployment problem we have today is most acute.

I think the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald)—I hope he takes the opportunity today—has an obligation to explain to the House why the President of the United States feels justified in advocating some $30 billion in new stimulus for the economy of the United States, which already is an economy outperforming ours in every major category. Why is it that the Carter administration feels that it can and, indeed, that it must provide stimulation to the U.S. economy, which is already growing faster than ours, at a time when unemployment in the U.S. is going down, and yet we cannot act in an economy which it is forecast will grow no more than 3.5 per cent this year and at a time when unemployment threatens to reach one million Canadians? I would be interested in hearing the minister's answer to that question. There is one answer which is well known on this side, and it is that, unlike the government of Canada, the government of the United States is committed to providing jobs for its citizens. That is a model and an example which should be followed here.

There are a number of matters which one might want to touch upon today, but I think one of the fundamental requirements is a new budget as soon as possible. Today the Minister of Finance indicated that there might be one before Easter. The other day in the House he spoke in terms of several months from now. Canadians rely upon economic growth and upon the generation of jobs and they just cannot wait for the convenience of the Minister of Finance. We need a budget as quickly as possible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Just in case the reason for the minister's delay is that he does not know what to do, we want to take the opportunity today to suggest some of the elements which that budget should contain, elements which would cut into the recurrent high unemployment figures in this country and which would give Canadians not only a chance but a sense of having a chance in this country.

[Translation]

First, in the budget it should be recognized that permanent employment is created not by government programs but rather by strong economic expansion in the private sector.

Second, steps must be taken to encourage consumer demand, perhaps by reducing sales tax: this would not create inflation.

Third, activity in the field of housing in Canada is slowing down at an alarming rate, at a time when the jobs in that industry are most necessary. That slowing down is particularly obvious in the construction of new units, the sector where the rate of vacancies is the lowest.

Stimulants must therefore be found to give new momentum in that field. If need be, the minister should say he is willing to discuss with the provinces the impact of rent controls in new buildings.

Fourth, we have witnessed in Canada for some time now serious cuts, on the part of corporations, in their budgets for research and development. These cannot be gauged strictly in terms of lost jobs. They are also contributing to our loss of competitiveness in foreign markets. Adequate stimulants are needed to encourage new expenditures in R and D, of such a nature as to encourage innovation and industrial productivity.

Fifth, the government should seriously consider introducing the concept of special fiscal contracts with companies desirous of locating new industries in underdeveloped areas of our country.

This approach which was applied with a certain amount of success in the Republic of Ireland and in New Hampshire in the United States has more guarantees to offer, I think, than the various measures put forward by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, as far as a viable and continuous industrial development in these areas is concerned. Mr. Speaker, to anyone who has the courage to face reality, it is clear that Canada has to cope with a serious problem: the lack of confidence on the part of investors.

This lack of confidence does not solely issue from the results of the November 15 election in Quebec, and I insist on this point. At most, the election of a new government in Quebec added a new element of uncertainty to an already precarious situation. On this point, it should be noted that, according to the Conference Board, new capital investments in Canada will drop this year and that this forecast is based on data which were compiled before the election in Quebec.

[English]

It is worth noting, too, that the Atlantic Economic Council has been pointing to this problem for some time as a major element behind the continuing difficulties in that region. It is time—indeed, past time—that the government of Canada faced up to this problem squarely and honestly. It is not going to help the situation one iota for ministers to begin, as some of them have already begun, at least by insinuation, to try to shift the blame for the problem to the new government of the province of Quebec rather than to the policies of the government of Canada. If investors have any concern about the future course of political events in Quebec, that is all the more reason for their being able to look to the federal government with some sense of confidence and some sense of reassurance.

Mr. Clark: So if it has been important for the government of Canada to create a climate of confidence in this country prior to this point, it is even more important now. That sense of confidence has been sadly missing for far too long. When we needed a climate of certainty we had a government that consistently changed the rules, often in the middle of the night and often without warning or, just as bad, a government that left important sectors of the economy hanging for years with no rules at all. Perhaps when one looks at all this, the difference in the approach of the two principal parties in the country to the economic future of the country and our capacity to create jobs and realize our potential, in the final analysis it comes down to a basic view of this country.

The Prime Minister and this government talk a lot about the virtues of Canada and why Canadians in all parts of the country want to keep it together. I do not doubt for one moment their dedication to the principle of unity. Of course they are committed to it, as all of us are committed to it. But the more I see of this government, the more I watch and hear their responses to the critical problems of Canada, the more I am struck by how little they really expect of Canada and how small and narrow a vision of this country they offer to Canadians.

That small vision makes it easy for them virtually to ignore the 800,000 jobless. They do not seem to believe Canada can do any better than that. This is a government which offers no real hope to Canadians, because it has no real hope itself. If there is any danger that Canadians are uncaring about the unemployed and the underemployed among us—and I do not believe Canadians are uncaring—it is partly because they have a federal government that does not seem to care.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We have been given a great gift in this country—a gift of potential to grow, to find opportunities, to express ourselves, to build secure lives, to build good families. This is a country whose potential is literally unparallelled in the world—a country of great promise. The sadness is that we are not realizing the potential for growth, for jobs or for progress. Instead, we have a country dominated by unemployment, by anger and by a growing sense of despair.

Unemployment

In a speech the Prime Minister made recently outside the House he indicated some fundamental changes in the rigid approach to federalism that has marked the government's conduct in the past. We have yet to see the proof of that promise although it has been made. I take the occasion of introducing this motion to make the point clear that we need from this government, immediately, an indication that it is prepared fundamentally to change its approach to economic progress in this country. We have been stagnant too long. We have a country to build. We have jobs to encourage. We have great promise to achieve. It will not be done by the timid policies of this government. It will only be done if there is determination to realize the potential of this country.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on behalf of the New Democratic Party to give our unqualified support to the motion before the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I do so because since this parliament returned last fall after the summer recess we have been saying that the number one issue before Canada, both in economic and human terms—and not just the people of Atlantic Canada or Quebec, as important as their problems are—is that of unemployment. Although the official figures published within the last couple of days indicate that 889,000 people are unemployed, for reasons that I and other members of my party have tried to make clear in recent days the accurate figure realistically describing the number of Canadians out of work is over one million. That is the highest level of unemployment not only since Statistics Canada has been providing data but since the depression. Politicians frequently indulge in rhetoric that causes language to lose its original meaning, but in this case we have what can only be appropriately described as a human tragedy for over one million Canadians.

We support the motion because we believe it is a fundamental objective of any government at the national or provincial level to create opportunities for work. If there is anything which my party and I stand for in global terms—I refer to the social democratic movement—it is the opportunity within the framework of the economy of any country for men and women who want to work to do so. People in Canada, as elsewhere, want jobs; they do not want hand-outs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: After all kinds of pressure—indeed, I am prepared to acknowledge pressure within their own ranks—this government created an unemployment insurance system that is good. What it has not done is to provide the complement that social democratic parties have always done—assurance of the possibility of work. If you have a social insurance scheme that enables people to live with dignity when they are out of work, the absolutely essential concomitant to that is a commitment to full employment to minimize the number of jobs at any time without occupants. It has been the total failure of this government to consider that option that is so objectionable and so fundamentally distasteful to anyone who is concerned. Human dignity can only come to individuals and their families from the capacity and opportunity to work, to contribute to their families and to the community through productive labour.

We believe in the motion basically because of our commitment to the right, as we see it, of all Canadians to have a job and an opportunity to make their contribution. We are, and have been, concerned about the direction of this government because of its mishandling of the economy leading to serious negative consequences for the country. If more of the 93 per cent of the people who have jobs are not as concerned as we would like about creating opportunities for those without work, at least they should be concerned about the immense cost of this level of unemployment to the economy and they should be moved by the economic arguments. In 1972, $1.9 billion was paid in unemployment insurance benefits; in 1975, the figure was $3.1 billion.

If you compare the first nine months of 1975 of unemployment insurance pay-outs with the first nine months of 1976, which is the most recent figure available, we see that in 1976 we were running well ahead of 1975 in terms of what it was going to cost in unemployment insurance pay-outs for people to do nothing. In the first nine months of 1975 it cost Canadians $2.6 billion in unemployment insurance pay-outs. In the comparable period of 1976 it cost $2.8 billion—up .2 per cent. There can be no doubt that when the final figures are in for 1976 we will have spent more than ever before in Canadian history on unemployment insurance pay-outs to people who need and deserve the money. There should be no mistake about that. If people cannot have the opportunity to work, we must ensure they have the economic subsistence to get by. My point is that it is an immensely stupid drain on the economy to pay people to do nothing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Second, if you calculate the lost production in goods and services which we would have had if these men and women had been working, it costs the Canadian economy about $6 billion a year. That would go a considerable way toward reducing the rate of inflation. Increasing the supply of goods and services, as every economist knows, would have the effect of bringing down prices. We are losing that production. Finally, in terms of economic costs we are losing hundreds of millions of dollars in tax revenues that these men and women would be paying if they were employed. Because they are not employed, and therefore not paying the level of tax they would pay if they had jobs, other working Canadians have to bear a disproportionate share of the tax burden. In addition to the human costs which are fundamental to us, the economic costs to the Canadian economy in billions of dollars year after year should cause all Canadians to be concerned about this question. It should motivate even this sterile government to take some concrete steps to turn the economy around.

The phenomenon we are dealing with is not a recent one. It is important for us to absorb that fact. It is not a new practice of the Liberal government. In fact, it is not just characteristic of that party. The last time we had comparable levels of unemployment, although they were not quite as bad, was during the last years of a Tory government. In the period 1962-63, unemployment figures were setting new levels of undesirableness for the Canadian economy. What I am saying is that this pattern is characteristic of parties in this country which have governed at the national level. They do not believe in taking the steps that are required in terms of national economic planning to deal with both unemployment and inflation.

Mr. Stevens: Like in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Grafftey: Like the socialists in the U.K. Tell us what is happening in England.

Mr. Broadbent: I am hearing examples of governments trying to clean up decades of Tory mess. They are trying to clean up decades of Tory mismanagement. Listen to the statistics. I will give the figures for the United Kingdom and a few other countries. Here is the record, comparative terms, of the eight leading industrial countries. These are the average unemployment figures for the period 1960 to 1974. The best is West Germany, which has had a social democratic government for years, with an average of .8 per cent. The next is Japan, with 1.3 per cent. I give credit to Japan because they believe in some economic planning, unlike the Tories to my right or the Liberals across the way. Third is Sweden, with 1.9 per cent. Fourth is France, with a 2.3 per cent average. Then the United Kingdom, with a 3.2 per cent average; Italy, with a 3.6 per cent average; and the United States with an average level of 4.9 per cent.

Which country in the industrial world has the worst average of unemployment? It is our own. The average rate of unemployment for that period in Canada, I am ashamed to say, was 5.4 per cent. That was up to 1974. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald)—who is in the chamber today—knows better than anyone else, the average since 1974 has become worse, not better.

This government has done virtually nothing. We raised this issue last fall at the opening of parliament and in special debates just before Christmas. Even after a month's recess at Christmas the government did not come back with a commitment to do something to provide jobs for the more than one million Canadians out of work. If we look at what they are doing now in terms of allocation of funds for direct job creation, compared with a few years ago when the level of unemployment was lower, we see they are even doing proportionately less than at that time. For the year 1971-72, when the unemployment level was 6.4 per cent, the government spent $603 million on direct job-creation programs. In 1976-77, when the unemployment rate had jumped to 7.1 per cent, the amount spent by this government on direct job-creation programs had dropped to $264 million. For 1977-78, the current fiscal year, with an unemployment average being forecast for the year 1977 of between 7.5 per cent and 8 per cent, this government plans to spend only $243 million in direct job-creation programs.

Surely this is a scandal. It is something that a government with any sense of human priorities would not tolerate. A few years ago, when unemployment was significantly lower, they were spending almost three times the amount in job-creation programs. The government is an uncaring one, one that is motivated, in terms of people-oriented programs, only a few months before an election. It is a disgrace.

Having said these things about the government, I must say that I regard the official opposition, to understate it, with considerable skepticism as they now express their concern about unemployment. I simply cannot understand that party putting a motion before the House at this time which does not even call for a vote of non-confidence in the government. This at a time when there are over one million people out of work. In recent weeks and months that party has proposed changes to government programs that most seriously affect those from parts of Canada about which today they are allegedly expressing concern. I refer to the changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act which were first advocated by the financial spokeman for the Conservative party, who was in the chamber a few moments ago. These changes were also actively supported by the labour critic of the Conservative party of Canada.

Those two men, before the Liberal government of Canada brought forward this change in the unemployment insurance regulations, both inside and outside the House said that the basic entitlement period for a person to be eligible for unemployment insurance should be changed from the existing one of eight weeks to 12 weeks. It was the Conservatives who made that recommendation. It is the Conservatives who are now saying we should be concerned about the problems of Atlantic Canada and the province of Quebec.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) is seeking the floor on a point of order.

Mr. McKinnon: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I presume the leader of the NDP is making his charge in ignorance of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) which would make an exception for areas of high unemployment in connection with the qualifying period.

Mr. Broadbent: Quite the contrary. I am fully aware of the hypocritical amendment proposed by the Tory party. As I said a few minutes ago, it was that party which advocated the change from 8 weeks to 12 weeks. They have since discovered the thousands of Canadians who would be affected in Atlantic Canada. Just by coincidence this is an area which provides them with a large number of their seats. They got a political reaction and then introduced an amendment which would apply to certain regions. I say to the hon. member that an unemployed Canadian is an unemployed Canadian, and that it doesn't matter whether he is in Ontario, Atlantic Canada or British Columbia. My party would not tolerate the kind of hypocrisy which has been indulged in by the Tories on this issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I want to put on record the number of Canadians in Atlantic Canada who will be directly affected by this Tory idea taken over by the Liberals. Assuming a continuing unemployment rate of 7 per cent, which is a conservative estimate with a small "c", the number directly affected in Newfoundland will be 16,500; in Prince Edward Island, 3,000; in Nova Scotia, 15,000; in the province of Quebec, about which so much concern has been expressed, 106,000. That is the number who will be cut off from benefits. Does it make any sense for a party like the Conservative party to rise in this chamber and express concern about the need for jobs, bearing in mind their advocacy of measures which would cut off from benefit thousands of Canadians who need such benefit now, not some distance down the road? That kind of hypocrisy is something which my party would never endorse.

I have put on record the number of persons who will be affected by the change which is coming in the unemployment insurance regulations as far as Atlantic Canada and Quebec are concerned. I should like, also, to mention the dollar value of these changes because of the impact on job creation. Newfoundland will lose between $24 million and $28 million. Prince Edward Island will lose between $4 million and $5 million.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but the time allotted to him has expired. Nevertheless, he may continue if he has the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Broadbent: I appreciate the consideration of my colleagues and I shall try not to abuse it. I was listing the revenue which would be lost to the provinces of Atlantic Canada, and Quebec, because of the changes in the unemployment insurance law as proposed by the Conservative party and accepted by the Liberal government. Nova Scotia would lose between $9 million and $11 million for the coming year, and New Brunswick between $19 million and $22 million. In the province of Quebec, about which the leader of the opposition (Mr. Clark) rightly said we should be particularly concerned at this point in our history, the loss will be between $93 million and $102 million. This money would be directly beneficial to the families suffering from unemployment. It would also have a good effect on the economy, because these people, if they got the money, would be spending it.

We have said that something has to be done about unemployment. We say it should have been done last fall, two weeks ago, last week. We shall be happy if the minister will act next week. Maybe he will be moved now that the figure of over one million Canadians unemployed has sunk into his mind with all its human implications. We have called for direct tax cuts for people in the low and medium income brackets who will spend the money and stimulate the economy which at the present time is only operating at 85 per cent of capacity in the manufacturing centre.

We have called for the reactivation of government work programs which were put aside during the period of restraint, programs which would stimulate expansion at the municipal level across Canada. Third, we have called for a significant increase in home construction, low income housing, to meet both the need of job creation and the human need for decent accommodation. Finally, as a short-run measure, we have urged the government to take steps to provide new and extended insulation capacity in federal offices and residential buildings right across Canada. The government took up that suggestion more than a month ago and applied it to Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia. We asked that there should be a national program in this area. This would not only create jobs; it would help toward the solution of an almost equally important question, the conservation of energy.

These, Mr. Speaker, are concrete steps which ought to be taken by a government which is truly concerned about the right of Canadians to work and the loss to our economy resulting from a million Canadians wanting to do something but being out of work. It is not enough, of course, for a government to deal simply with unemployment. It must simultaneously set up a mechanism to plan the national economy. This is what has been done in Sweden, in West Germany, in Norway and in Japan. A policy which deals with inflation for a time, moves on to deal with unemployment and then switches back again, is not good enough. We must plan the economy in a rational way so as to minimize, in a modern market economy, the amount of inflation while maximizing the number of jobs available for those who want them. That is the real issue.

Our party is committed to maintaining the capacity of our people to realize themselves as responsible citizens in their communities and among their families, and the most effective way in which they can do so is by finding jobs. It is time the government showed more sympathy with that objective.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the motion be amended by adding at the end thereof the following words:

"This House also urges that the government

(1) immediately decrease personal income taxes for those in the lower and middle incomes to stimulate purchasing power and take up the current slack in the economy,

(2) immediately reactivate all federal capital works projects and encourage the provinces and municipalities to follow suit, and at the same time, lift any restraint on shared funding of such projects,

(3) immediately expand—in consultation with the provinces—the capital budgets for low income and co-operative housing and land assembly,

(4) immediately launch an assisted repair and renovation program of homes owned by pensioners, the disabled and low-income families, and

(5) immediately launch a program—in co-operation with the provinces—of insulating or improving the level of insulation in all residential buildings—a program which would provide not only jobs but would also conserve energy."

● (1610)

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the motion today provides a useful opportunity, by way of preparation for the budget, to hear the views of the various groups within the House on possible measures of economic stimulus that might be taken, just as in recent weeks I have taken the occasion to discuss the approach of the executive of the Canadian Labour Congress, that of various groups across the country and, of course, most recently that of the provincial governments last week.

By way of introduction, I would just indicate that my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien) will be participating in the debate and talking in particular about specific federal commitments for industrial expansion, and more specifically in the province of Quebec. My colleague, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) will also be participating for the purpose of talking about his direct job-creation program.

Therefore, what I should like to do is to talk about some of the fiscal and monetary measures which have been effective within the last several months in particular in stimulating personal disposable income; to indicate that in many respects the measures which the leader of the opposition (Mr. Clark) and the leader of the New Democratic Party have put before the House are already incorporated in measures the government is taking; and also to make some comments relating to the very serious and important concern that exists about unemployment and the very serious concern we must have and continue to have respecting the level of inflation in Canada.

Firstly, I would review once more for the House the measures we have taken in the category of enriching personal disposable income. By a series of measures previously taken through legislative action in this parliament and effective as of January 1, 1977, there has been a transfer from the federal public sector of approximately $1,700 million, on an annual basis, to the incomes of individual Canadians. Indeed, adding to this particular transfer the equally automatic transfer that is effected by indexation of provincial tax in the nine provinces which participate in the tax-sharing agreements, there is approximately $2 billion worth of fiscal transfers, on an annual basis, which has gone to the incomes of Canadians. What this, therefore, means is that the various measures which have been taken in Canada will have some effect, indeed in percentage terms greater effect, on personal incomes of Canadians than the tax cut measures which President Carter has indicated it is his intention to put to the United States Congress.

Let me review these measures again in some detail. Firstly, the income tax indexation is well known to the House and I would only rehearse the figures involved. Canadians but for the indexing operation, would have had to pay, on an annual basis, in 1977 $950 million more than in fact they will now have to pay. Indeed, starting from the deductions effective as of January 1, 1977, those tax cuts are already going into the incomes of individual Canadians. As I have indicated, with the automatic indexing which is offered under the tax-sharing arrangements with the provinces, a further approximately $300 million has been flowing into the incomes of Canadians in the nine participating provinces in addition to the amounts of reduced federal income tax.

In terms of specific groups in the community, many of whom are in the middle and lower income groups, there have been not just tax reductions but actual increases in transfer payments—an increase in the transfer payments to old age security recipients of $390 million, on an annual basis, and to the recipients of family allowance $160 million, also on an annual basis. In other words, the senior citizens of Canada and families with children are already receiving increased payments on a monthly basis over those they were receiving in December, 1976.

Further, the working people of Canada, people in the work force who are contributors to and participants in the unemployment insurance program, are as of January 1, 1977, paying less by way of contributions to the program than they were required to pay in the year 1976. This reduction in unemployment insurance contributions amounts, on an annual basis, to $250 million. So you can see, Mr. Speaker, that on the basis of these various measures which are offered under existing legislation there has been a return to individual taxpayers, on an annual basis, of close to $2 billion in terms either of transfer payments or obligations to pay tax which have been forgone.

But that is not all in terms of stimulative effect, Mr. Speaker. I have talked about the impact of fiscal policy and I think I should also draw to the attention of the House the fact that within the last three months, with three successive reductions in the bank rate, the Bank of Canada, in monetary policy terms, has also increased the personal disposable incomes of Canadians. If I may make reference to a statement that was made at the first ministers' meeting on February 1, 1977, it was said there:

> We estimate that Canadian families, over time, stand to save about $1 billion a year in interest charges for each percentage point decline in interest rates. This saving breaks down into about $250 million on consumer loans and $750 million on mortgages. This, in itself, represents a substantial net addition to personal disposable incomes. There can be no doubt that it also strengthens consumer and business confidence.

That quotation is not of myself but of the provincial treasurer of Ontario, Hon. Darcy W. McKeough, who was talking about a $1 billion reduction for each point in the interest rate. Given the fact that the interest rate has gone down 1½ points, the reduction will be even more than that. Therefore, the combination of the reduction in income tax, the increase in transfer payments, and the reduction in the bank rate and, therefore, in interest rates that are payable by Canadians, has increased personal disposable income by more than $3 billion. These are measures which have been effective within the last two or three months. So when hon. gentlemen talk about further measures to stimulate personal disposable income, they are obviously ignoring the fact that those measures are already operative within the economy, that individual Canadians are already being spared additional tax or interest payments which, but for these measures supported by this government, Canadians would have had to pay.

If I may go to some of the remarks made so far, may I first comment on the speech of the leader of the opposition and then that of the leader of the New Democratic Party. In his remarks the leader of the opposition made reference to job-creation rates. I think I would have to emphasize that one has to be concerned at the current level of unemployment in Canada, and one has to guard, as well, against any undue optimism when presented with the figures for January, 1977. But there are some elements which could have a positive potential from the standpoint of the work force. I refer, for example, to the fact that since December, 1976, there were 69,000 created jobs among that group within the age bracket 15 to 24, which is one of the groups which has been most severely hit by increased unemployment since August, 1976.

In other words, for the first time since that year the figure respecting the younger members of the work force has turned around and shows an increase in the month of January. In addition to that, smaller increases occurred in the number of men and women over that particular age, making for an increase of 79,000 jobs in Canada since December, 1976.

The hon. gentleman made reference to the government's having ignored Quebec in regard to particular measures, and my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who is here with us for this debate, will have a specific opportunity to give, chapter and verse, the measures which have been taken under his direction to provide an active and more competitive economy for that particular province.

I followed with interest—because it was important to follow the suggestions of the leader of the opposition—some of the measures that he would have included if the presenting of a budget had been within his responsibilities. I find again, as I have already said in my general statements, that there is a substantial measure of agreement between the hon. gentleman and myself. Indeed, to a very great degree the points which he enunciated are ones which are now effective or operating favourably in the economy. If I understood him correctly, he would, if he had responsibility, have committed himself to no increase in government expenditures. That has been the policy of this government.

Mr. Broadbent: That is right.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That has been the policy since the statement of October, 1975, and, indeed, will continue to be one of the elements which guides us in our continued concern about the impact of inflation in Canada. The hon. gentleman said that he would have preferred stimulating consumer demand, he having said at another point that the Carter administration has stimulated consumer demand by allowing increased personal disposable income. Therefore, why should not the same thing be done in Canada? Of course, I just dealt with that, Mr. Speaker, by pointing out measures which will provide about $3 billion on an annual basis. They are now in place and in operation.

Let me say a word about housing. I make this comment both to the Leader of the Opposition and to the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent). It is interesting to note that despite all the rhetoric one hears about the housing policies espoused by this government, particularly those set forth to this House by my colleague who is now Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) but who was then minister of state for urban affairs, this government created on an annual basis in 1976 the highest rate of housing unit construction which we have known in Canada. The figure as at the close of the year was 279,000 units. That is the highest level of housing starts which we have achieved in Canadian history.

Mr. Broadbent: Yes, but the population is higher, too.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It is well above the level stipulated by the government when it said it would need to create one million new housing units in the next four years. The rate is well above the annual rate necessary to achieve that. It is interesting to note, in connection with the building of those 279,000 housing units across Canada, that the government of Canada, through various programs introduced by my colleague, has been responsible for assisting in the creation of 120,000 of those additional housing units, particularly for those at the lower end of the income scale. I had occasion to refer to this fact in recent days during the course of debate when dealing with projects such as the Dundas-Sherbourne project in my constituency which will provide housing for low-income Canadians at the bottom of the income scale. As well, the government has assisted many others at the middle range of the scale, through the Assisted Home Ownership Program, in being able to finance a home. In general terms, the government has provided substantial assistance and has made a substantial contribution to the achievement of the record figure mentioned. Indeed, although the current rate of housing starts observed in January, 1977, has fallen off the dramatic rate obtained in 1976, the rate has not fallen off severely. I notice that the rate for 1977 is projected at 268,400 houses, which still represents a substantial contribution and is still ahead of the target which the minister set forth in his statement one year ago.

I now come to regional development incentives. I think we shall need to study what the leader of the opposition said in this respect.

An hon. Member: That program is a farce.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): We shall need to see to what extent his proposals vary from the substantial panoply of measures which the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) now has in operation particularly in Quebec and Atlantic Canada. I noted one interesting innovation contained in the remarks of the leader of the opposition—his suggestion that particular assistance should be given to research and development projects of corporations. I shall take careful note of the hon. gentleman's words in this regard in the course of the preparation of my budget.

I now turn to the leader of the NDP. He began by saying, as he has so often in the past, that we have ignored job creation in Canada. My colleague, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, will in an effective way be able to deal with programs which he has put in place for the purpose of direct job creation. The hon. gentleman raised an interesting point and suggested that because the rate of growth of the Canadian economy is down, some Canadians are not making the level of income they might otherwise expect and other Canadians are therefore paying a greater level of taxes. That is not correct. Indeed, as I have already said, the level of taxation is down as a result both of the tax measure which we hope will soon be enacted and as a result of indexing.

Therefore, there has been no increase in the impact of taxation upon Canadians. On the contrary, there has been a reduction. Of course, the federal government by assuming a deficit has for this period of time been prepared to pick up the difference in order to avoid imposing an additional burden.

As I have pointed out already, the direct tax cuts are in effect. Approximately 120,000 housing units have been provided for those who are largely in the low and middle income brackets. These measures have already been put into effect.

Let me make an observation about the amendment which has been moved. The hon. gentleman opposite talked about unemployment at present, but he is not concerned about present unemployment when the building season starts or when planning can be completed and major projects undertaken later this year and in 1978. In that sense it is difficult to follow his reasoning when he suggests there should be reactivation of federal capital works projects and that provinces and municipalities should be encouraged to follow suit. For reasons which I have indicated many times previously, we think there must be restraint on public expenditures in Canada in order to provide an opportunity and room for expansion in private expenditures. It is clear that legislation enacted to provide for capital works projects would not for months and months produce any major new jobs.

Mr. Broadbent: For the first time, you are right.

Mr. Rodriguez: That is why you should have started one year ago.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I listened with calmness and courtesy to the leader of the NDP. Perhaps his eager colleagues might show me the same courtesy. Whether or not any capital projects are now brought forward, it is fair to observe that any such projects would not assist substantially this current winter in dealing with present levels of unemployment.

Before I conclude my remarks, let me say that I have given an indication to the House of the increase in personal disposable income which has resulted from the fiscal and monetary policies espoused by this government. I have indicated the direct expenditures which the government has made in fields such as housing and direct employment creation. In a few minutes the House will hear from my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, to the same effect.

In closing, I wish to bring to the attention of the House a matter of fundamental concern since it is important to look at the economy in a balanced way. We do not think we can look on the economy with one eye, as the hon. gentleman opposite did. One of the factors which distinguished the speeches of both hon. gentlemen who preceded me was that they, apparently, are happy with the 6 per cent rate of inflation in Canada. They were not concerned enough about the inflationary challenge which Canada faces at present. They showed no evidence of concern with respect to what a continuation of inflation at the present rate, or even several points below the present rate, would do to Canada's economic competitive position in the long run.

When debating the economy of our country, it is fundamental to understand that we cannot afford "one issue politicians", politicians who talk one day about inflation, the next day about unemployment. We need to take a balanced look at the economic problems we face and, at the same time, try to bring forward measures which will deal with unemployment in particular sectors of the economy such as younger age groups. At the same time, we need to deal with structural problems which are evident in certain regions. But we have to do so within a framework which makes certain that the success we have gained until now in reducing the double-digit rate of inflation to below 6 per cent is not only a gain that can be held but one that can be added to by even further reduction, because in the long run the problem of inflation is also the problem of unemployment.

If Canada continues to run a level of inflation above that of our industrial competitors, if we continue to have a level of industrial costs and a level of industrial wages in particular that runs substantially above those in the countries against which we compete in foreign markets and which compete against us in our own markets, then we will not only be concerned about the impact of inflationary increases on our personal lives but people will be concerned about losing their jobs, for the loss of competitiveness by the Canadian industry will mean, in the long run, a far greater challenge to the job picture in Canada than any of the temporary changes in the economic cycle which we have known up to this time.

I would like to say one more thing in closing, I think the leader of the opposition employed some admirable rhetoric in talking about our country. At the start he spoke about the growth potential and the promise and possibility of Canada. I agree with those two terms. I think we do have an enormous growth potential, and there is enormous promise and possibility in Canada. But one thing we have to remember, all of us from political leaders through to the working man on the assembly line, is that while we have enjoyed a very high standard of living in this country, we have enjoyed it by reason of being able to retain our own costs in control and by remaining competitive in our markets at home and abroad.

Unless we are effective in restraining the rate of inflation in Canada, we are not only not going to be able to compete abroad but we will have difficulty sustaining the position of our manufacturing industry in our own markets. It is for this reason that I find many of the suggestions made by the hon. gentleman not to have been a constructive approach to the very serious economic problems which we have. But I would have to say, in all fairness, that one of the points made by the leader of the opposition was indeed a constructive suggestion, and several of those made by the leader of the NDP were in the same vein. I will consider those as I will be considering the suggestions and observations of many members of the House and many people throughout Canada in preparation for the budget which I hope to be presenting to this House within a matter of some months.

Just before I conclude—I see the leader of the opposition is back in the House after being out of it—I would like to say that I find myself in the same difficulty in which he found himself. Because of the shortness of notice, I was not able to move all my appointments, and I will not be able to remain in the chamber for all the speeches. I hope hon. members will not regard this as a discourtesy, and I apologize to them in advance.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to take part in this debate. First I should like to thank the author of the motion and those who chose this opposition day to raise a matter so much discussed throughout the country. We know that when speaking about unemployment, there are huge difficulties involved. I really appreciate that the province I am living in was specifically mentioned together with Atlantic Canada which faces even more serious difficulties.

Mr. Speaker, I too listened to the speeches like the other members of the House. I heard the answers by the minister a few moments ago who was pointing out the effort his government had made, the expenditures his government had incurred, the decisions his government had taken recently. Of course the government has to make some decisions. What is unfortunate is that those decisions are often long overdue. The government takes decisions every day because it has to and it seems to me that the government was not able to do anything to foresee the difficulties and hardships that Canadians have been facing in recent years.

After listening to what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) just said it seems that the situation is not so bad in this country. The government acted with enlightened moderation, and we just have to go out of this House to see the difficulties and the misery that we are now facing and not only in Quebec, but in several provinces of the country. I think that the question is very relevant and that it is important to recall certain things to hon. members.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

I remember very well that in 1968, for example, when I came in this House as a new member, we were told that unemployment would be reduced. At that time, there were approximately 170,000 unemployed. The government had this very important goal which was included in its principle of a just society; it wanted to fight unemployment. There were 170,000 unemployed. Then, from that figure, we passed to 200,000, 300,000, 400,000, 500,000 and then came the inflation factor. I remember that the Prime Minister stated publicly: "You know, there are 500,000 unemployed and inflation is starting to eat up everyone's wallet. You will have to get used to unemployment." So, with about 500,000 unemployed, the government tried to have Canadians admit that unemployment was not only temporary, but that it would remain and that we had to take steps not to fight it but to maintain it. And that we had to create unemployment to fight inflation. Finally, Mr. Speaker, we have both, inflation and unemployment. I still hear the minister saying today: Despite all of this the situation is not too bad, the government has a sound administration.

There are many government members in this House who are very well aware of the difficulties facing Quebeckers. Of course, one would be tempted to accuse the provincial government, and not only the one in power since November 15. The difficulties the premier of Quebec had since 1966 with this government are well known and we recall that over the years the federal government has given more than one negative answer to recommendations made by Mr. Bourassa's members of cabinet. We all remember that but of course we will not talk too much about it today. Nevertheless, unemployment is in a precarious state in Quebec.

Those were this government's objectives and commitments. And if one dares accuse the government for failing to take action, for lack of vision, then we have no solutions. In addition, it seems that someone is always trying to make us believe that the government has done everything. If the government has really done everything, Mr. Speaker—I had counted 500,000 unemployed, but today, in 1977, the number has reached 800,000 and according to some very conservative economists, in 1978 we will break the one million barrier, as it were—well if that was the Prime Minister's objective, to get used to unemployment, I do not think Canadians are willing to pay for and support a million unemployed in the country.

So, Mr. Speaker, the only patent result of this government's administration in the last ten years is a complete failure as regards the fight against unemployment and inflation, I am led to believe that it was easier for the government to create unemployment than to create jobs. I think we will agree on that. There was also some talk about economic investments that would create jobs. We will be reminded of course of the extraordinary expenditures made by the Regional Economic Expansion Department to create new industries.

To what extent, for instance, has the government cared for the preservation and protection of our Canadian industries? Every day some of them close and many are expected to close in the future. It seems that the government has yet to find the solutions that will help protect our Canadian industry first.

Of course the government is going to talk about its free trade policy. We must open our doors to friendly countries, but little effort has been made to protect our industry in Canada. Should I recall the dramatic situation in the textile industry and hon. members from Quebec who are here know this. The situation in this industry has deteriorated. Of course we had to accept foreign products but I do not think we were seriously concerned about the future of the textile industry, particularly in Quebec where it employs thousands of workers, and in high unemployment areas. This situation results from the lack of courage, the lack of audaciousness, the lack of initiative of a government towards a particular industry. Quebecers know what price they have to pay for it, when we consider that in the manufacturing sector one worker out of four is in the textile industry.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien) made a statement recently; many people are concerned but he made a statement after God knows how many other ministers had let this industry fend for itself. This afternoon the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) announced some economic injections or some cost-sharing programs, but the harm is done.

How would it be possible to give a new direction to this industry, to ensure the contribution our industries and Canadian workers are entitled to? How many years will it take for Canada to recover a market which was once controlled by a Canadian industry. Therefore I suggest once again that one can blame it on the weakness, the lack of leadership, of foresight or courage on the part of the government in its relations with importing countries.

A few days ago I was informed about the catastrophic situation in which the footwear industry finds itselfs. Questions are in the air, we are being asked: what are your solutions? We should see that industries be reoriented and stabilized as soon as possible. Some of them have closed their doors; the structure is still there, ready to receive workers and to manufacture something. No question of it and in the footwear industry the same policy applies. The policy was one of no intervention but our footwear industries have also difficulties, even in Quebec, and I am talking about federal decisions. Talk about public powers! That means important loss of jobs for the province of Quebec. But we will come back on that point later.

The government will compensate with fantastic amounts of money spent for social programs. There has been a good deal of leadership in that field. With social programs we are going to keep one million unemployed and we are going to increase pensions of every description but we are going to get people used to it and corrupt a whole generation with unemployment! A whole generation will get used to living on unemployment benefits and we are going to deny older people the right to retire at 60 if they wish to do so. We never said that old people should be compelled to retire at the age of 60, but I wonder why should the government not consider that people aged 60 and concerned about their physical condition might find it logical and rewarding to ask for a well deserved rest and a well deserved pension, and leave room for the thousands of unemployed young people we have in this country. From the point of view of productivity, it is far from being outstanding. The possibility of creating an optional retirement pension has been mentioned to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde). I do not mean anything compulsory. Thousands of people between 60 and 65 might feel ready for a little rest after having served their country and worked in industry during 40 years. But, no, it would be too expensive. Maybe the government thinks it is a better idea to maintain almost one million unemployed.

As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, it seems easier for this government to find money or new ways to maintain thousands of people without work than to create job opportunities. Should I remind hon. members that agriculture was far from being a success in 1976. I remember that some of our friends from Quebec on the other side were far from being happy with the government policy. I even remember hearing the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) confess publicly, barely three weeks ago on television, on a Sunday night, that his government has made a colossal error with regard to its dairy policy. He did not say so in the House, but he did in answer to questions put to him that night. I have not heard the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) support the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, but I do agree with the hon. member for Papineau when he says that colossal errors were made with regard to the dairy policy.

We know what that cost Quebec last year, and that Ontario producers paid through the nose, as a consequence. But once again, credits will be voted for social measures and we will be expected to applaud the government. That is why we feel the government has failed in its responsibilities, because it did not have the foresight, the courage and, above all, the initiative to plan employment, I should say to protect and keep what jobs there are in Canada. So, what was done to protect and encourage Canadian industries is not too bright. This opposition day gives us the opportunity of reminding the government that we are asking it to provide money for creating new jobs, but the most basic decency demands that we should first of all save our industries and protect those jobs, especially when we know that Canadian consumption can use up Canadian production.

As for housing, a small $500 program was provided to attract buyers and promote expansion in that field. It did not last long and, when we are faced with increased unemployment and huge difficulties, they take away the $500. Nowadays it would probably cost $1,000 to put the housing industry back on its feet again.

The minister mentioned earlier an increase granted last year to that effect for the number of units but failed to mention at what cost. And to think that today the average worker will commit himself for 30 years and pay in interest 1½ times the real value of his house! But they do not talk much about that.

The important thing for the government and producers is that policies have been set up with regards to loans and loan granting has been made easier. It posed no problem. Pay back when you can!

In agriculture, the same thing goes for milk producers. The government compelled farmers and milk producers to borrow, that no one can deny. Whenever someone wanted to borrow $30,000 from a farm loans office to upgrade his operations, the government would say: You cannot go wrong, you are going into the milk industry, you will have the good life, your children will follow. That is why you do not need $30,000 but $60,000. You do not want to buy 30 cows, you want 50.

Everything is settled and for a long time. But after only one year, the farmer had to give up a certain number of cows. I am not going to rehash the same story but the minister is looking at me and I am certain that people in his own riding have told him the same story. It is not the case only in my part of the country, it is the same everywhere. As a matter of fact, I remember that some Liberal members who sat on the Committee on Agriculture last year were not happy about this policy.

We now blame the government for not having had the necessary foresight, for having badly oriented certain groups of producers and also for having given thousands of Canadians illusions about their position and for not having been able to protect them at that level. I now would like to talk about the cuts in research budgets. In the long term, Mr. Speaker, we know how costly this can be for Canada. Experts tell us so, and I am not the one who invented this, I would not be able to do so. I have read some material like everyone else. Some people want to cut expenditures in research. Once again we shall let foreign countries make the inventions and we shall once again depend on these countries to sell them to us at the prices that they will choose. But it is not a part of government policy to provide, maintain and emphasize research to constantly protect Canadian industry, for Canadians and by Canadians. I think this would be more logical. But no, cuts must be made! There is growing concern about this and university specialists tell us about this, not only to us, members of the opposition, but to all members of parliament, and the government is surely aware of it.

Earlier the minister explained the efforts that he is making. Mr. Speaker, we have to be glad about this opposition day on unemployment and take the opportunity to repeat certain things as I am doing. As a Quebecker, I deplore the inertia that the federal government has shown for too long and its lack of foresight, which has been very costly and which has placed the province of Quebec in a difficult situation because of extremely high unemployment rates.

I was looking at unemployment levels in various areas. I know that certain members on the other side must be terribly concerned when, for instance, the rates are up to 19 per cent in northern Quebec. In some places, they are up to 11 per cent and 13 per cent. The situation is bad in the Gaspé Peninsula when the unemployment rate has reached 22 per cent. We would be happy to listen to the Minister of Finance say that the government has made tremendous efforts and that we should be satisfied with these efforts.

Mr. Speaker, I know that my time has expired and I hope that this day will have been beneficial by urging the government to reflect about what has been said in the House today. I would like to repeat that in Quebec, we are waiting for the government to take specific stands. I assume that Quebeckers opposite will take this opportunity to remind their government they have failed miserably to remedy the unemployment situation for lack of a policy.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Before recognizing the minister it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert)—Canadian Pacific Railway—Commuter service in Montreal area—Request for report; the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise)—Trade—Level of cheese imports—Government position; the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow)—Manpower—Canada Works Program—Funds for native projects in urban communities.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO GENERATE JOBS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain):

That this House denounces the government's failure to generate jobs in Canada, particularly in Quebec and the Atlantic Provinces, and urges immediate and resolute action, including the early presentation of a budget.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to rise in this debate after having had the pleasure of hearing the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) for a few minutes. I submit the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) said nowhere in his speech—

The opposition leader is leaving the House. I realize he has to work very hard to keep his job.

I do not remember hearing the Minister of Finance ever saying we are satisfied. We are not satisfied. As the Prime Minister said a few days ago in this House—as long as there is one Canadian in this country who wants to work and cannot find a job we will not be satisfied. We work from that principle. What we want to do is try to improve the situation considering the circumstances in which we find ourselves.

We have problems, I admit, but if hon. members opposite want to give us credit for it, which I doubt, I will say that in the last three years while the United States of America, the most powerful western country in existence, was for 27 months in a period of recession we, in Canada, managed to go through a period that was not one of recession. We did not have a period of great economic growth but we went through a period in which we did not go below the zero line as was the case for the Americans during 27 consecutive months. We encountered certain difficulties but of all countries of the western world in the last three years we were probably one of those which were the most successful. In spite of that I must admit we had problems and that we still have problems. But the problems we face in Canada are probably not more difficult to solve and not more serious than those of other countries.

I understand the hon. member, and I agree with him when he says that it is not good that workers who want to work should not find jobs. However, I believe that we managed in Canada in the last 15 years to give ourselves a social structure that allowed us to reduce to a certain extent the ill effects of unemployment. Today we can be proud of the fact that generally speaking in our society there is suffering but nobody is starving or freezing. There are always a few individuals who for particular reasons are in that predicament. But this government's program vis-à-vis the social needs of the people of this country is probably the best in existence to the point where today many Canadians claim that the fact that we have such a generous unemployment insurance plan has become for certain people an escape door to avoid their responsibilities vis-à-vis work.

I would not want to waste my time in this large debate. I would rather simply concentrate on what we have done in recent months to provide specific help for certain industries in difficulty, particularly in answer to the motion by the leader of the opposition whom we saw reappear in the House. He does not come here often. We are quite happy to see him when he shows up, and see him today raise the problem of Quebec and the Maritime provinces.

Mr. La Salle: He has too much work.

Mr. Chrétien: I do not think it is because he has too much work, Mr. Speaker, but every time the leader of the opposition appears in the House, he looks so pitiful that he does not come back the following day, this is obvious. The Prime Minister tears him into pieces and I do not blame him for staying away, because if I were in his shoes . . .

Mr. La Salle: Those are not good arguments, Jean!

Mr. Chrétien: It is a humble way to confess that he is very appreciated. I wanted to say, Mr. Speaker, that in the last few months, we have taken specific initiatives to try to alleviate the situation in the province of Quebec. Let us take for example our textile policy. I heard the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) raise that problem earlier on.

Mr. La Salle: Yes, certainly.

Mr. Chrétien: Last night, Mr. Speaker, there was a program on Radio-Canada, "Consommateurs avertis" where in general all policies of the government are criticized; but in this half an hour program, where normally the consumers are supposed to be against the new textile policy that we have established in November, "Consommateurs avertis" gave its support to all decisions which have been taken. Besides I believe it was the first time in many years that the unions, the industry and the government worked hand in hand towards a common goal.

Mr. La Salle: We have waited 10 years for that!

Mr. Chrétien: I am sorry but in 1970, when my colleague Jean-Luc Pepin held this portfolio he announced a new textile policy which allowed us to modernize our industry. I believe that today the textile and clothing industry in Canada is strong enough to compete with other developed countries. The representatives of the Canadian clothing and textile industry gave me their assurance that they were not afraid anymore of American or European competition but they pointed out that I had to protect them against countries such as Taiwan for example, where textile workers are paid 46 cents an hour, while in Quebec and in the rest of Canada textile workers receive 10 per cent more than in the United States.

That means we were able to increase our productivity, and with the protection we have announced last November 29, we hope to be able to restore some balance.

Mr. La Salle: I agree with that.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we must also take into account the consumer's interest and the needs inside our country. If we close our borders tight against imports in every field, we will be penalized because we are an exporting country. Last year we exported $1.3 billion more than we imported, which means that we are extremely vulnerable, and that under such circumstances it is required of the government and particularly of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce that they use their judgement. The new policy about the clothing industry we have announced last November 29 has been welcomed by nearly everybody in Canada, and particularly in Quebec, and will be well accepted. But again, that is never enough.

Mr. La Salle: That is too late.

Mr. Chrétien: For 1977 I announced a policy to restore the 1975 level in Quebec, they said I should have chosen 1973. Had I chosen 1973, I would have been told to chose 1971. It reminds me of the story about the guy eating bread and maple syrup: some syrup to finish his bread and some bread to finish his syrup. One day he died because he never did finish. You have to stop some time and find the happy medium.

I should also like to talk about another program extremely important for Quebec, which the hon. member for Joliette did not mention and on which the press did not make an adequate report unfortunately.

Mr. La Salle: My time had expired.

Mr. Chrétien: He talked about all kinds of things, but I am glad to see he would have talked about it. On October 29 last, exactly one month before the establishment of the textile policy and of course, I have only been holding that position since September, I announced that Canadair in Montreal would undertake a program for the construction of a revolutionary executive jet, the Learstar. If the program becomes productive, we will directly create some 1,500 jobs at Canadair in Ville Saint-Laurent, which means more jobs than on the Olympic sites during the construction of that so popular stadium in Montreal. Unfortunately the press did not often mention it. And not only those 1,000 jobs directly related to Canadair.

● (1700)

This program will create 1,500 additional high-technology jobs in other parts of Canada. Some people felt I was taking a gamble going into that. I remember replying to some questions in this House. I stated that the prospects were not too bad and that I thought we had a good chance of selling 25, 26 or 27. I am glad to report to this House today that as of yesterday we signed 65 contracts and another ten will be completed very soon. The marketing is so good that we hope by the end of the year to have sold at least 125. The break-even point, Mr. Speaker. We have done this in the past two months. I wish the opposition would open their eyes once in a while.

We will give another illustration. In this morning's paper it was reported that we had sold a train to Amtrak in California—high technology, produced by Canadians, in Montreal. If the leader of the opposition (Mr. Clark) were around more often, he would know that. In fact, he would have mentioned it in his speech. He should thank me for that, but I guess he did not know it. Those are real words, "high technology." This train will be built by Bombardier-MLW in Montreal, it was announced today. It is right there. It is too bad that it was not mentioned in the motion. I do not know what is going on over there. They should look at what is really happening, rather than always trying to find skeletons and not finding any. I want to touch upon another matter.

[Translation]

... the construction of ships in Lévis recently. They had obtained orders for three ships to be completely rebuilt. However the subsidies for shipbuilding were not applicable because they were not new, they were entirely rebuilt. I felt they were almost entirely new and I succeeded in having regulations amended so that the Lauzon shipyard will be operating during the next 18 months thanks to the intervention of the federal government.

[English]

I am glad to see a member from Newfoundland in the chamber this afternoon. On February 4 the Canadian Development Corporation approved a loan of $14 million to support the sale of five tugboats to Norway. These are to be built in Marystown, Newfoundland. It will involve 500 man-years of work in Newfoundland. This is in an area that is very competitive. To date, approximately 85 per cent of all orders for shipbuilding in the world have gone to the Japanese market. This is because of their different techniques, and so on.

We are looking abroad, as well. I made a trip to Venezuela not long ago. I am quite happy to report to the House that a Canadian firm from Toronto submitted the two lowest bids for the Metro in Caracas. They have not yet signed the contracts. There are some problems. However, they were the lowest bidders in two of the contracts which the Venezuelan government placed on the table some months ago. This shows that Canadian entrepreneurs can be efficient. I am proud to see that. I am sure everyone knows of the large project which the Canadian government is supporting with a group of industries in Canada, the Canaven program. We hope to be chosen as the contractor for the construction of a huge railway in Venezuela.

There is not a country in the world that has more expertise in railway construction than Canada. Over the past century we have been obliged to build railways all across this land. When the bids were opened a few weeks ago Canadians were the lowest bidders in this very complex project which will cost $1 billion. We are not sure we will get the contract, but we were the lowest bidder. There are some technical problems to overcome, but at least we are in the game. The benefits from such a contract would be spread across Canada. I understand the rails would be made in Cape Breton. I am glad to see an hon. member from Cape Breton in the chamber. He is always asking me questions about his area, which is his duty.

If Canada obtains this Venezuelan contract, it will involve a large order of rails from the steel mill in Cape Breton. The engines and the cars would be produced in Central Canada, Hamilton and Montreal. We worked very hard to get this contract and we hope we will be successful. The main contractor would be from Alberta. CNR and CPR are involved. They are trying to bring together all the technological knowledge and ability that is available in Canada in order to do a good job in Venezuela. That is only part of what we are doing at the present time. The opposition chooses to ignore those positive steps we are taking, preferring to sit comfortably in criticism.

And I say it again, as long as there is one Canadian who wants to work, who is unemployed, we will be concerned. But miracles do not exist. There are extremely complex problems in a country such as ours. As far as I am concerned, my country is Canada. I have no hesitation on that, there is no other country in the world better than Canada, none more free than Canada. That is why we try, as in CANAVEM project, to unite the interests of Nova Scotia, Quebec, Ontario and Alberta to prove that we Canadians can accomplish something positive for the well being of all citizens. We are not sitting on the fence as some are; at least, I am not.

In my riding I shall not ask PQ members for help to be elected. That is clear.

An hon. Member: You will be defeated.

Mr. Chrétien: Defeated? There is no danger for me to lose, that is clear. I do not go to bed with just anybody, that is also clear.

An hon. Member: Nor do I, I also choose them!

Mr. Chrétien: But it is really incredible to think that those people who want to divide Canada, who are not willing to make any compromise to stay within Canada, who want to separate, also want us to court them. I find that really disgusting and unacceptable. I will not make any proposal nor offer to those people, not for anything in the world. If the Parti Québécois wants to cooperate with me at the administrative level, if it wants to do what it was elected to do, that is to administer the province of Quebec, we shall help them. That is why I continue to make all the efforts I can so that Quebecers can take advantage of federal programs. But they will have to stop talking about independence, I can tell you that!

In Chicago, where I went, as well as in San Francisco, in Sacramento and in Los Angeles, the first question put to me was always the following: Will Canada be divided or not? This is not likely to help Canada or Quebec. They should deal with their problems and stop establishing planning committees whose terms of reference are to submit a report within six months or a year, and make concrete decisions.

In this respect, we should be clear and precise in order to continue helping Canadians from the east as well as from Quebec, I am glad to say it and I repeat it, not without getting arrows from the opposition. The hon. member for Sydney keeps asking me when I intend to introduce a decentralization program. As far as Sydney is concerned, I will soon, but I hope he will tell the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) in the front row to stop complaining against that program.

[English]

You cannot have it both ways. You cannot ask for decentralization and let your House leader shoot arrows across at me all the time. I am in favour of a program of decentralization. It was the most important feature in the program of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Clark) when he was running for office but his seatmate was always against it. They want it both ways. I am not on both sides of the fence; I am squarely on one side of the fence.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. minister, but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Unemployment

Mr. Chrétien: For example, we are developing a data centre for the Department of National Revenue in St. John's. I am glad to see the hon. member for St. John's here: I hope he will be thankful one of these days. We have moved the Department of Veterans Affairs, not without criticism from the other side, to Charlottetown. We have moved divisions of the Unemployment Insurance Commission to Bathurst, New Brunswick. We are moving the superannuation divisions to Moncton. We have moved the cheque redemption division to Matane, and we have moved some data centres of the Department of National Revenue to Shawinigan and Jonquière.

An hon. Member: And St. Maurice, too.

Mr. Chrétien: Yes; and one in Shawinigan. We have done the same thing for Winnipeg, and one has gone to British Columbia. This is the kind of activity we are carrying on. So far we have decentralized 2,300 jobs which will be going from Ottawa into the field where there is need for jobs. The first phase of the program I am charged with will involve 5,500 jobs, more or less. There will be an announcement, because the opposition is so divided on this issue that I do not know where they stand. Anyway, it is too difficult for them to follow me in all my activities, so I will put it in one package in order that hon. members opposite can understand it. I was making announcements one after another and they could not follow. Therefore, I have to make one announcement so as to make it simpler for the opposition.

Mr. Ellis: Will the minister accept a question at the end of his speech?

Mr. Chrétien: Yes, Mr. Speaker, but I just want to conclude.

[Translation]

We do what we can. I hope people will start realizing that a debate is now going on that is harmful, and that we should, above all, work together in trying to solve current problems. I am told that yesterday the hon. member for Joliette said that an economically strong Quebec can become independent. Such a statement can help neither Quebec . . .

Mr. La Salle: I did not say that!

Mr. Chrétien: So much the better if he did not. That is what Le Nouvelliste of Trois-Rivières reported this morning. I am happy to hear the hon. member say he did not make that statement. It's all to the good! I congratulate him on not having said so. However, riding the fence can be dangerous: if one slips, one can fall on a post. When one is openly on one side, there is no danger.

I am a Canadian and I am not ashamed of it. Canada is a great big, beautiful country and I can fight for it. I trust the hon. member for Joliette will do the same in the province of Quebec instead of flirting with the separatists.

[English]

Mr. Ellis: After all the thunder we have heard, I want to ask one simple question of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien). Out of all the programs which are doing these great things, can he name one single program which will do anything for a man living in Hastings county? Let him name one program.

Mr. Chrétien: I should like to inform the hon. member that when we started decentralization two years ago, we decentralized a unit into Belleville, Ontario. Is that not true?

Mr. Ellis: A program of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Chrétien: Every one of them.

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, we can all relax. I wish the 29,000 who are officially unemployed in Newfoundland had been watching the minister this afternoon. They could have relaxed, because according to him there is no problem. He has produced so many jobs that there is no unemployment in Newfoundland. The figure of 29,000 is a myth though 29,000 people have vanished in the miasma of the minister's remarks.

If they could have watched him speaking they would have understood us when we talk about an arrogant government. He tells us the government has done all that is possible to deal with the situation. If that is his admission, let him get out of office, because if the result of doing everything that is possible is to limit the unemployment figure to 800,000, and 29,000 in Newfoundland, to say nothing of the present figure in Quebec, he should get out of office.

The hon. gentleman is scooting quickly out of the chamber now, so we can relax. The hon. gentleman had the gall to mention, as a feather in his cap, the loan he is making for five ships to be built in Marystown. Newfoundland had to beg on bended knees to get the hon. gentleman even to consider that and to get the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) to push for it. Then they tried to screw Newfoundland into having to put their credit on the line as well, and he claimed that to his credit. I say it is a shame that he did not agree to it long ago. Originally there were ten ships, not just five. So don't regard Marystown, Newfoundland, as any great employment creation job done by the minister in the last few months.

I could not believe my ears when I heard the minister say that there was no danger of his losing his seat. By golly, Mr. Speaker, I hope that the electorate in his constituency will hear about that. If a minister of the government or if any member of the House thinks that this wonderful, tremendous minister, who is doing such a job of creating so much work and who is so perfect, is not in danger of losing his seat, let me tell them that his seat will be in jeopardy at the next election.

This is a government which has the gall to call a program the Canada Works program. They should be calling it the "Canada does not work program", not the Canada Works program. To create work is why we need this wonderful program. They are giving Canada the works; that is their program. In view of the smug and arrogant speech made in this House today on unemployment, which is at its highest ever in the land, and particularly high in Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, the Atlantic provinces and Quebec, it is not any wonder that this government is in such disfavour and has but one straw to grasp, Quebec, which they are going to use for all they are worth. However, they are going there anyway as soon as the electorate gets the chance to put them out.

I only have 20 minutes, Mr. Speaker, so let me come to the motion, which reads:

> That this House denounces the government's failure to generate jobs in Canada, particularly in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces, and urges immediate and resolute action, including the early presentation of a budget.

I do not need to spend much time on how bad the situation is in Newfoundland because that is well known. In my maiden speech in this House I spoke on this exact subject, I think on November 15. Nothing has happened since then except that the situation has become worse. In Newfoundland the actual unemployment figure is 17.1 per cent; that is the Statistics Canada figure. This amounts to 29,000 unemployed. To those we must add 8,000 or 9,000 able-bodied on relief, and all of those who are not looking for work because they know they cannot find it. Then we must add the low participation rate, which is about 15 per cent below the national average, and several other factors I mentioned which indicate that the real unemployment rate in Newfoundland is at least 25 per cent to 30 per cent. And the hon. gentleman opposite says the government is doing all it can! Well, I will tell him about a few things it is not doing before I sit down.

The government is taking a cruel and inhuman attitude in ignoring regional differences in Canada. There are a number of other factors which show what the situation is in Atlantic Canada. I looked last night at the comprehensive review of the unemployment insurance program which is an official document of the government's advisory council. In 1974, when the situation was not as bad as it is now, the Atlantic provinces had 8 per cent of the labour force, but 16.8 per cent of the beneficiaries of unemployment insurance. Quebec had 27.1 per cent of the labour force and 36.4 per cent of the beneficiaries. When you look at how long the claims went on for, Atlantic Canada averaged 22.5 weeks in 1973 and the prairies averaged 15.4 weeks. In 1974 the Atlantic provinces averaged 21.8 weeks and the prairies 12.3 weeks. The claim rate in the Atlantic provinces was 63 per cent above the national average, and the cost ratio was 2.2 times the average. In Newfoundland, in 1973, we had 4 per cent of total benefits and only 2 per cent of the population. The situation in 1976 was much worse, and it will be the same in 1977.

What is the government's solution? It is to bring a bill before this House to change the eligibility requirements from eight weeks to 12 weeks, which has removed 16,500 people from eligibility in Newfoundland and will take $28 million out of the economy of Newfoundland in 1977 and 1978. The Progressive Conservative party will be moving an amendment, which the minister said the other day—I hope he changes his mind—the government will not accept, to the effect that in areas of high unemployment, in areas considerably higher than the national average, the eligibility period should remain at eight weeks in recognition of their higher unemployment rate, the fact that the people in the area cannot get jobs, as well as other factors that I mentioned earlier. It is the same recognition as that given in the provision that permits a person to have benefits for a longer period, depending on the region in which he lives. The principle is the same.

We agreed to the 12-week measure in areas where unemployment has not been allowed by the government to become the tragedy which it is in the Atlantic provinces. If the hon. gentleman for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) was conducting a filibuster the other day, it will be nothing compared with the filibuster that I intend to attempt to conduct if hon. gentlemen opposite do not accept some reasonable amendment such as this.

I have outlined the problem. What is the solution? There has been no solution offered so far. There has been a retrograde amendment to the unemployment insurance legislation that we hope to correct. Although the Canadian economy is bad and the forecast for this year is not good—I will not go into all the details—in Newfoundland we have not had a 1 per cent improvement in the gross provincial product; it was not 1 per cent better in 1975 or 1976, and it is forecast to be no better in 1977.

The level of construction is very low, unemployment is very high. Prospects for this year are very poor. We need to have a budget brought down which will stimulate the Canadian economy, will provide encouragement for investment and help regional economies. We need tax cuts to stimulate spending. We are also going to need increased government spending in certain areas where there is very high unemployment, such as Newfoundland, the Atlantic provinces and Quebec, on capital projects and on general government services so as to tackle the problem of high unemployment. Yes, there has to be some restraint of government expenditure, but more has to be spent in areas of this country which are a living scandal, such as Newfoundland and the Atlantic provinces with their unemployment rates.

The provincial governments of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and P.E.I. cannot solve this problem. I cannot say about Quebec. They think they are miracle workers, and perhaps they can, so we will wait and see. But I know that in the four Atlantic provinces the provincial governments do not have the financial capacity or borrowing power to solve the problem. They do not control the Bank of Canada. They do not print the currency. They do not control the money supply. Their hands are tied. Newfoundland has been borrowing a couple of hundred million a year for the last four or five years, and they cannot borrow any more. They are doing everything they can. They have now introduced a little program worth $2 million for job-creation purposes and it is all that anyone can expect of them.

It is the federal government that has to help in this situation. It is the federal government that has the fiscal capacity and flexibility to help, and the Newfoundland government has asked the federal government to help. When I was a minister of that government in December of 1975 and all during 1976, the Secretary of State for External Affairs was our representative in the cabinet, and he has been forgetting Newfoundland. He is turning his back on Newfoundland. What help has he pushed through to help Newfoundland in its extreme need? Nothing except Canada Works.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He thinks more of Cuba.

Mr. Crosbie: I will come to that if I have time. Even in his own district the fish plant at Gaultois is closed today and should not be. The premier of the province has written to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) outlining a whole series of matters on which I can only touch today. He has asked for special assistance for Newfoundland in view of the extremely high unemployment we have. I am not saying that he has not had an answer. Probably he has had an answer, but he has not had any help. No special program has been devised or settled on to help Newfoundland.

Not only that, but they have been doing positive things to hurt the provinces, such as cutting down on federal-provincial financial assistance and all the rest. The province of Newfoundland has thrown out the lifeline to the federal government. The Prime Minister has taken the lifeline and has thrown it back. We are floating on a sea of unemployment. We have our hand over the Canadian lifeboat, the federal government, hopefully to climb into it, and all that has happened is that our hand is trampled on by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs and we have been given no help. In fact, we have had the opposite—cutbacks in DREE spending, as I mentioned in my maiden speech, as well as cutbacks in public works spending. The minister who has just spoken mentioned the new taxation data centre. That is great, but it does not help the unemployment situation if construction will not commence for another year. We need to start that, and more, this spring. There is an environment building under way but Public Works budget has been cut for the last two or three years. The people down there cannot maintain their facilities properly. Why can't they have some extra money for repairs, maintenance and painting? That would create jobs. Spending on small crafts and harbours has also been cut. Mr. Speaker, spending in a dozen areas in my province has been cut, as if my province were like Ontario or Alberta.

The Newfoundland dockyard needs expansion. The government should spend a few dollars on expansion and enable the yard to instal a synchrolift, which would enable it to do more repair work. They had negotiated a contract for repairs to the Russian fishing fleet, but that was terminated by Ottawa several years ago because Ottawa felt it was not in the national interest. That situation has now changed with the introduction of the 200-mile limit. That dockyard should be encouraged to obtain that kind of business. And which minister of the government is attempting to get contracts of that sort for the Newfoundland dockyard which employs 320 people? There were two lay-offs at the yard in the last two weeks. I wrote to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) about them but have received no reply.

I asked him if he would let a couple of CN vessels to use the dockyard, to prevent lay-offs. But no one here cares. Only 50 or 60 men were laid off; but that represents another 50 or 60 men on the unemployment rolls of Newfoundland. I suppose from the minister's point of view it is no emergency; only a few men have been laid off. That is the government's attitude. Neither the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. LeBlanc) nor the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) has done anything about that situation on the south coast of Newfoundland; the Gaultois fish plant has already closed because of our present fishing regulations. It has closed despite the introduction of the 200-mile limit, and in that very area two or three others may close in the next couple of months. At Gaultois 220 men were thrown out of work, because the Minister of Fisheries either will not or cannot act; or, possibly the Secretary of State for External Affairs is not putting pressure on the Minister of Fisheries.

There is evidence to show that the federal government is to put the squeeze on Newfoundland because Newfoundland dares to claim jurisdiction over offshore oil and gas resources. Spending in Newfoundland is to be cut back. There was some suggestion that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) had been in favour of assisting, to the extent of $2 million, in the matter of certain hydroelectric studies which were to be undertaken for three years in Labrador; unfortunately the federal government cannot assist in this regard, it being so hard up for money.

Ottawa thinks it is going to bully Newfoundland into accepting its policy regarding offshore resources. Mr. Speaker, never, never will we be bullied. They will never bully Newfoundland into accepting their offer, because Newfoundland can at least hold out for 18 months until the saviour gets into power, in the person of the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark).

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: The Gull Island hydro project, another huge construction project which ought now to be under way, has been scuppered by the federal government. The oil refinery at Come-by-Chance has closed and the federal government has not moved its little finger to open it again. It is indifferent. It has sloughed the question off. It says, "it is not our responsibility." It initiates no action. It leaves it to a little province to act, a little province which has less resources than any in Canada. It says, "It is your problem." During the last general election campaign the Secretary of State for External Affairs was down at the site at Come-by-Chance, telling the union people how the area was going to open up and what programs were to be initiated during the winter. He has not been seen there since. That is the attitude of the government.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You bet.

Mr. Crosbie: Another one of the government's programs is user pay. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who introduced that program is now involved in the greatest surrender since Napoleon retreated from Moscow. He has retreated from his concept.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): And Napoleon paid his own way home.

Mr. Crosbie: At least Napoleon did not have an aircraft to fly in. Someone on radio the other day asked, "Who was the author of "Fear of Flying!" The fellow asking the question said, "It certainly was not Otto Lang". He did not know who the author was, but it was not Otto.

There is no question about our need and about our difficulties. No one wants to pretend that we face simple problems which any government can overcome. Therefore, why should those speaking in this debate pretend that the problem is just about non-existent, or that there is no grave problem, that the government is doing everything possible, and so on. To say that the government is doing everything possible is to admit that a huge percentage of the people of this country are going to lead useless, non-productive lives all their lives. How can you admit that? How can any government stay in office and say that, or have that attitude?

That was a perfect illustration of this government's attitude. It says, "We are doing everything possible." But it is going to do a lot less. At least, that is what it seems to imply.

The government has been battling the inflation for which it was primarily responsible. It still hesitates to turn from the battle against inflation to the battle against unemployment, for which it was responsible as well. It cannot deny responsibility for inflation or unemployment.

It will do nothing to help with the Gull Island program in Newfoundland. It offers no special help to overcome unemployment except the LIFT program and the new Canada Works program which, although better than nothing, is not very much of a program.

The government is dealing with eastern provinces which do not have the flexibility of increasing their own spending and so solving their own problems. The government is remote from their difficulties. The Canadian International Development Agency spends $1 billion a year in foreign aid. Mr. Speaker, we shall need to ask some foreign country to start an Atlantic provinces development agency to look after us, if this government's attitude does not change.

The government's attitude was well illustrated today. I suppose we are all tired of listening to the grim unemployment figures. In my province, particularly in my district, there are many, many thousands of unemployed people. They want jobs. They write to me and telephone, saying they want jobs. We all know that some small number of the unemployed do not want to work, but the vast majority do want to work; but they cannot get work and see little prospect of employment this year. We shall not get employment in Newfoundland this year if we must depend on the government of Newfoundland and private industry for construction money. It is just not there. It will not flow to Newfoundland unless the federal government institutes new programs which will grapple with our great problems and create jobs.

Our labour force is the fastest growing in Canada. We shall have large out-migration again. This constitutes a serious problem in Newfoundland, and what is the government offering us? Ministers speaking in this debate have said little of how the government will tackle our difficulties. We have heard the same old malarkey again. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) got up and voiced the same old malarkey. We hear it every day. He says he does not know when he will bring down a budget, and this and that is to blame for our present difficulties. We are suffering from general inflationary tendencies, and he talked of wage and price controls and so on. Mr. Speaker, our people want to know what is the program for jobs? What is the program for economic development? How is the government going to get Canada moving again? Those are the questions they ask.

Our people wonder what will happen to them when their unemployment insurance benefits run out, and in Newfoundland people in the thousands will run out of unemployment insurance benefits this year. They will stay on unemployment insurance to the last minute, and then they will not be able to find jobs. They want to know what will happen to them then. They are waiting for the government to tell them; and if the government will not tell them, if the government's attitude is that it is doing everything possible, as the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce suggested, our people will want the government to call an election. They will want another party in power which will be prepared to do something about the problems I have outlined.

The government appears to be tired. It is fretful, indifferent, callous and smug. My God, I was nearly smothered by its smugness this afternoon. I was amazed at the smugness of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, as shown in his speech. No wonder many in Quebec think that René is going to save them. I will tell you this, Mr. Speaker: in my view, the Quebec crisis will never be solved by the present crowd opposite.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Some people suggest that Prime Minister Trudeau is the only one who can hold Canada together.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I will conclude in a minute. As I said, some in Canada think that our present Prime Minister is the only person in Canada who can keep this country together. He was originally elected in 1968 on the platform that he could solve the Quebec question with the policy of bilingualism. He has had eight or nine years in which to do this.

• (1740)

Having heard the Prime Minister say six months ago that it was all dead, and it was on our TV screens two weeks ago from New York where he, René Lévesque, alive and well and talking to all of North America, some people are suggesting that the Prime Minister is the man to hold the country together. It is the same as suggesting, I say, that Neville Chamberlain was the man to lead Britain through World War II after having promised peace in our times, and the war broke out a year later.

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I was somewhat dismayed at the tone of the remarks made by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). I had rather hoped he would have positive suggestions and ideas to put forward.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Why do you guys get the big salaries? Let us hear a few things from the other side.

Mr. Cullen: I had thought the official opposition would add a little more credibility to their debate and add more sincerity to their approach to the unemployment issue by at least calling for a vote. But what we have is an academic exercise. The speakers are going on and on but not standing up to be counted at the appropriate time. I was disappointed that the opposition members, who had an opportunity to call for a vote, did not see fit to do that. So this debate will run its course until ten o'clock.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. One of the reasons that there is no vote tonight is that we did not want to put government members in the embarrassing position of supporting that shambling lot over there.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest the hon. member is engaging in a point of debate.

Mr. Cullen: The embarrassment is that which the opposition parties have suffered in the last few votes we have had when they have been unable to muster more than 60 or 65 members for a vote. I am not surprised, therefore, that they have not been able to get a sufficient number of members to vote on this non-issue.

There is no doubt that the Canadian economy now faces and has faced, particularly since 1975, serious economic problems including, in particular, the problem of unemployment, and nobody is hiding that under the rug. Back in October we indicated our concern, we looked at reports that were coming in, and we initiated measures that were going to be taken.

If we are to understand these problems and deal with them effectively we must see them in perspective and not through some political rhetoric such as we have had here this afternoon from the hon. member for St. John's West.

We must recognize that we have not been alone in facing these problems; we must also remember that over the longer period of the 1960's and early 1970's the performance of the Canadian economy was exceptionally strong. During this period the growth rate of the economy was of the order of 5 per cent. The growth in employment was of the order of 3 per cent. Even during this healthy period there were specific times of difficulty as, for example, in 1967 and 1970-71. This is the typical pattern of all free economies, that is, alternative periods of rapid and slow growth.

The unique feature of the Canadian economy during this period was the rapid growth in the labour force of 3 per cent to 4 per cent, particularly arising out of the dramatic influx of youths and women into the labour market; in fact, during the period, and except for a few recent months, we experienced the highest growth rate in the labour force of any western industrialized country.

I read an article by Mr. MacGillivray, whose research is usually well documented, and I was surprised that he saw fit to pick one particular time frame when he said Canada's labour force was not the fastest growing in the western industrialized world. I wonder why he felt it necessary to pinpoint that area. Nevertheless, the growth of the economy during this period was sufficient to provide the required additional jobs to keep unemployment rates relatively low for the period as a whole.

The following are the specific problems of unemployment put in this perspective. We are still faced with a rapid growth in the labour force. But, at the same time, we are faced with relatively slow economic growth rates. We are not alone in facing this problem. For us, however, it is worse than for many other countries because of the openness and vulnerability of the Canadian economy to the changing economic situation of our major trading partners, particularly the United States. Our ability to devise satisfactory remedies for our problems, we must remember, has been severely constrained since we have found ourselves in the grip of serious inflationary forces.

Given this perspective, what is the government's response? Faced with these problems and constraints on action, the government has adopted selective measures to help prevent and alleviate the serious problem of unemployment. Briefly, the government's employment strategy includes the following: a doubling of the LIP funds for the current winter period to $200 million; the launching of a year-round Canada Works program involving the expenditure in 1977-78 of some $200 million on direct job-creation; and the strengthening of rehabilitative or preventative measures, for example, through training involving annual expenditures close to $600 million.

I think the government, recognizing the problem, has pinpointed the areas where, given the restraints we have, and given the fact that we do not want to be inflationary, help must be given, and we have pumped millions of dollars into these areas, notwithstanding the sloughing off which the hon. member for St. John's West thought we should do with millions of dollars. Under LIP we have pumped $17 million into the island of Newfoundland alone.

The selective measures, particularly direct job-creation projects, in which 120,000 individuals will participate in 1977-78, have two critically important advantages. First, they rank amongst the best employment measures in terms of cost per job created and in terms of generating employment quickly. Indeed, they have been a model on which other countries have based their own job-creation programs.

Second, the government's job-creation programs can be, and are, targeted to groups and communities most seriously affected by the problems of unemployment. For example, we have special programs for youths and the disadvantaged. We have also allocated the largest proportion of job-creation funds to the provinces east of the Ottawa river which are suffering acute unemployment problems. We are also allocating a large proportion of job-creation funds to meet the more severe problems of unemployment during the winter season.

We must not lose sight of the fact that the Unemployment Insurance program is a major bulwark against the problem of income deficiency arising out of unemployment. By supporting the level of individual incomes, it helps in a significant way to maintain the over-all level of demand within the economy. This in turn helps to sustain a higher level of employment.

The combined expenditures of unemployment insurance and the departmental appropriations will involve the expenditure in 1977-78 of some $4.5 billion to help alleviate or prevent unemployment in Canada. We have embarked on this with a spirit of innovation. We have been sensitive to the changing nature of unemployment, the labour market, and the economy, as well as the limitations of traditional approaches.

I note that the hon. member who spoke before me seems to be satisfied to stay with the status quo, to keep to the eight weeks and not to use the money. He seems to be saying—and that concerns me—that we should now go to selective areas in the country and move back to the eight week program. We are using that money as a lever to get more money. If the hon. member would look at the individual figures, and particularly those for Newfoundland, he would see that from the small amount of money that is coming from the unemployment insurance program we will be in a position to pump three, four and five times that much money into the economy of Newfoundland, given the leverage I have indicated.

We are approaching these changing problems in a spirit of innovation. Specifically, we have included in Bill C-27 provision for the developmental uses of the unemployment insurance funds so that claimants will have a variety of productive program alternatives while they are receiving their benefits. These include participation in training programs, job-creation projects, and work sharing arrangements. The latter two, which will be launched on a pilot project basis, could lay the ground work for new and more successful approaches to deal with problems of unemployment in the future. Canada can be proud of its innovative nature in dealing with the specific problem.

Criticism of the measures of unemployment causes me no little concern. Recent comments made by some members of parliament have unfortunately confused the discussion of the scope and nature of unemployment problems. Various measures of unemployment published by Statistics Canada inevitably have their limitations, and these are well recognized by Statistics Canada itself. They are, however, incomparably more reliable as indicators of the scope and nature of unemployment and changing trends than the statistics concocted, interpreted and misinterpreted by some. A particular case in point is the recent assertion made by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) to the effect that the unemployment rate for 1976 was really closer to 11 per cent than the 7 per cent reported.

Specifically, the hon. member contends that during that year some 455,000 people who were laid off or who had lost their jobs should have been counted among the unemployed rather than among the non-labour force, as they were in fact counted in the labour force survey. He maintains that these people are "discouraged workers" or "the hidden unemployed".

The hon. member has no factual basis for making this assertion. In the first place, the 455,000 people to whom he refers were laid off or lost their jobs at any time within the previous five years. Moreover, there is no indication whether on termination of their jobs any of these people searched for work or even had an interest in continuing to work. But what we do know is that they were not looking for work at the time the labour force survey was conducted.

The hon. member also ignores the fact that this category includes people whose jobs ended due to seasonal factors, such as the end of the fishing, logging, trapping, farming or tourist season. We know that many of these people are interested only in that type of seasonal work.

Many studies of the problems of "discouraged workers" have concluded that while statistics in this group should be gathered, the people who comprise it should not be counted as unemployed. Indeed, statistical agencies throughout the world have found that a definition of unemployment incorporating a measure of an individual's desire to find work is far too subjective and ambiguous to permit the production of objective, meaningful and consistent data.

However, we recognize the limitations, and what is our approach? Our approach to the question of the limitations of using Statistics Canada figures as sole indicators of unemployment is much more equitable, objective and defensible. In particular, in the formula for allocating funds in the first phase of the Canada Works program we have included statistics on unemployment insurance beneficiaries. Specifically, we have used such beneficiary statistics in the case of those provinces where the number of beneficiaries exceeds the number of labour force survey unemployed.

This approach, on an objective basis, helps to compensate for certain limitations in the labour force survey definition of unemployment. For example, unemployment insurance beneficiary statistics include those who are virtually unemployed but have earnings from part-time employment. Such individuals may be counted as beneficiaries, but they are excluded from the labour force survey unemployed.

Therefore, in the provinces east of the Ottawa river, the number of unemployment insurance beneficiaries is higher than the labour force survey unemployed. Selecting the higher measure results in the allocation of a large proportion of Canada Works funds to provinces east of the Ottawa River, where it is recognized that the problem of unemployment is more serious. In the case of Newfoundland this involves an increase of some 50 per cent in the measure of unemployment, to give some degree of equity to these particular statistics.

In the case of the provinces west of the Ottawa River, it is to their advantage to use the labour force survey unemployed, which is higher than the number of unemployment insurance beneficiaries. This is attributable in part to the number of people who are unemployed but do not qualify for unemployment insurance benefits.

The use of unemployment insurance beneficiary data in connection with the labour force survey thus achieves a balance which is not possible through the use of other sources of data alone.

None of us has the final solutions to the complex problems of unemployment. While our own employment and insurance programs are among the most advanced of any country in the world, we recognize that still more imaginative and concerted efforts are required. With this goal in mind, the government has undertaken a systematic review of the current unemployment situation and is reassessing programs and mixes of programs which are likely to be most effective in coming to grips with the problems of the next two years. At the same time we are carrying out an in-depth examination of the longer term aspects of employment and unemployment, so that we will be prepared to meet the problems of the next decade.

What is called for is a broad strategy which examines the widest possible variety of programs and approaches, ranging from the stimulation of the private sector to direct job-creation programs, where appropriate, and supplemented by income maintenance, where necessary. This strategy also involves a continuing search for innovative measures tailored to the ever changing dynamics of our society and economy.

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that there are only a couple of minutes before six o'clock, I wonder whether I may call it six o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a sad state of affairs for parliament and, therefore, for Canadians as a whole, that while unemployment, according to the latest figures from Statistics Canada, is at the highest level since the formation of that department, that it is left to the official opposition to introduce a motion dealing with this serious subject matter rather than depending on the government to act.

It is not something that has developed overnight and caught the government unaware or ill-prepared with which to cope. As we all know, the unemployment figures have been creeping up steadily over the past decade of this Liberal administration's reign until they have reached this incredible level where nearly one million Canadians now find themselves without a job. Meantime, the government sits placidly by, working on the introduction of bills such as an Act to amend the Historic Sites and Monuments Act, or introduces for debate, after a one month Christmas recess, a bill to televise the proceedings of this House, a move that would surely bring about the deterioration of this Chamber into a three-ring circus. These are examples of the government's sense of priorities.

We cannot even blame it on international conditions because other western industrialized nations such as Japan and West Germany have virtually full employment, while at the same time we see the United States unemployment figures steadily decreasing, a fact based on that nation's own priorities and action.

Throughout this debate many reasons were cited for the high level of unemployment in Canada, and a number of recommendations to cope with the problem were enunciated, none more precisely than by the Leader of the Opposition Mr. Clark who opened the debate so eloquently this afternoon. Having listened to subsequent speeches, I find myself a bit appalled by the fact that no one has put a finger on the root of the reason for unemployment. The problem does not lie with the extension of the government's costly job creating programs, for example, because the majority of these programs do not solve the unemployment problem on a permanent basis; they give an appearance of assisting the situation on a temporary basis, when in fact in the long term they can simply be defined as phony.

The problem is not even with our large industries such as General Motors or Stelco where employment, in fact, has increased over the past years in accordance with the growth within their specific sectors. No, Mr. Speaker, this is not where the bulk of the labour force is and where the potential exists. Nor is the bulk comprised of the membership of the Canadian Labour Congress, for example. The majority of the labour force in Canada, and the greatest potential increase—this is backed by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce—are in the owner-managed sector of our economy, most often referred to as small and medium sized enterprises. Over 60 per cent of the labour force is employed either directly or indirectly by this vital sector. That sector is virtually ignored by this government and its philosophies of centralization. Oh yes, I know that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) recently appointed my friend from Kamloops as the Minister of State (Small Business) (Mr. Marchand), but this move means absolutely nothing if the government's policies in general are not altered in any way, shape or form, and this philosophy of centralization continues to exist.

One can only assume that the reason for forming this sub-ministry is simply a temporary move to pacify the disgruntled small businessman. If one looks back prior to the 1974 election and remembers a Ministry of Multiculturalism having been established, only to be quickly abolished after a Liberal mandate was assured, one could easily conclude that the same procedure may be followed in this instance and that the future of the Minister of State (Small Businesses) will not be long lived.

To illustrate a specific example, allow me to point out the plea of the small or specialty apparel shops, of which there are literally thousands in every part of the country. As a result of the blanket quotas on the imports of textiles imposed recently by the government, the majority of these small shopowners are being threatened with bankruptcy and are presently in the process of laying off perhaps tens of thousands of employees because they fall under this blanket quota program.

It is not because they are a threat to our own textile industry which, granted, deserves the protection it needs. The majority of these shops do not even attempt to compete with the large textile manufacturers such as Dupont and others, and must continue to be dependent on quotas which they may not even have had in 1975. Yet, when questioned just yesterday, the Minister of State (Small Businesses) was apparently so unconcerned with this situation, which falls directly within his jurisdiction, that he had not even approached the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien) with representations as to the possibility of exempting the quotas within this important but harmless market.

This is only one typical example where government action is harmful to the small business community and results in a yet further deterioration in the employment situation. There are, in fact, countless examples of such instances all stemming from the fact, as I said earlier, of the government's insistence of continuing their philosophy of centralization and introduction of legislation for the benefit of big business without having had any consultation, or given any thought whatsoever to what consequences a small business will face.

It is of immense necessity that governments in general extend their consultations to the small firms sector and deal with that sector as a separate entity when developing policies and introducing legislation. The fact that the potential labour growth is within this small firms sector can no longer be ignored, and one must realize at the same time that the most economical form of employment opportunity lies with the entrepreneur who is constantly struggling to avoid the obstacles this government's actions cause to fall in his path.

Surely it would not be difficult for the government to reduce the tons of bureaucratic paperwork the small businessman is expected to cope with, including the total revamping of the costly tax structure as it relates to the small business community. Instead of strangling this community with bureaucracy and all sorts of restrictions and controls, it is time that the government initiated forms of incentive, be they through the tax system, research and development, or what have you, incentives that would encourage the growth and development of the small firms thereby creating built-in employment at the lowest possible cost.

In any event, the fact of the matter remains that the largest economic growth potential is virtually at a standstill. Because it is in a stagnant position, the many jobs that could be generated from within this sector are simply non-existent. All of this is caused by the government's inability to come up with basic, long range policies. Instead, it governs on a day-to-day ad hoc basis causing an unprecedented climate of confusion and uncertainty within the economy as a whole. A businessman, be he involved in a large or small enterprise, simply cannot take the risk to expand or plan for the future knowing that the government may impose upon him overnight unexpected and impromptu changes, as it did with wage and price controls, for example.

There are many other areas that reflect on the unemployment figures that we, as Canadians, are faced with today, and they relate directly to the government's inability to deal with small and medium sized businesses in a realistic and business-like fashion. However, with the time limitations that are imposed on us, I would like to introduce just one other area of potentially mammoth employment, related directly to the small and medium sized business sector. I am referring, of course, to secondary industry and secondary manufacturing.

In this regard I simply find it very difficult to comprehend the present situation in which we find ourselves. Canada, being one of the richest nations in natural resources, is at the bottom of the totem pole when it comes to secondary manufacturing. We encourage foreign interest to develop our natural resources, and to a certain extent this is a necessity, but then we fight like hell to sell our raw materials abroad where, as a result, jobs are created and economies bolstered. Then we purchase the finished goods in large quantities, goods that have been made out of our natural products in the first place, and we pay for them through the teeth without having reaped any advantages within our economy.

Needless to say, this trend that we have allowed to develop, and in fact encouraged, should and must be reversed if we are to reverse our sluggish economy and if we are to develop realistic long-range and permanent job opportunities. There are a number of ways this can be done, be it through various tax incentives or the availability to the entrepreneur of the vast technological research and development programs which the government is capable of having, but mainly it is the attitude and general philosophy of the government itself that has to be altered first.

We can no longer depend solely on the costly make-work programs which I alluded to earlier. They simply are not realistic and do not solve the underlying problems of unemployment. They are certainly not popular with the small businessman either. When the Canadian Federation of Independent Business asked their membership whether or not they supported federal LIP programs as a way of providing direct employment, for example, only 16 per cent approved and over 65 per cent categorically did not. This poll was conducted on a national basis.

It is very clear that socialistically oriented programs tend to postpone the inevitable, and we are currently witnessing this inevitability. Therefore, if we want our country to remain the great place that it is, we must revert to the basic philosophies that it was built on, and I am of course referring to the freedom and encouragement of a successful free enterprise system, a system that must be maintained in its original form.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, as I listened to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien) this afternoon, I wondered whether they were talking about the same country. Indeed I wondered if they were talking about the same world. The Minister of Finance talked about this government transferring more than $2 billion to the taxpayers of Canada so that they could better meet their costs, and how they had increased old age pensions by $390 million. He told us that those who were unemployed received among the highest benefits in the world, and so on.

Then the minister said they could agree with everything which was in the motion and in the speech of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) with one small exception, because the government had already done those things. What the minister forgot to tell us was that the number of those presently unemployed is higher than it has ever been since Statistics Canada began to collect these figures.

I listened to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. He began by telling us the government was not satisfied with the situation, and that as long as there was one unemployed person who wanted to work it would not be satisfied. He went on to recount all the good things it had done. He said our social programs are among the best in the world, and then he gave examples of programs it had introduced and which had created work, he said, in Montreal, Moncton, Saint John, and so on. Well, just a few days ago the unemployment figures for the month of January came out. How did the Toronto Globe and Mail report those figures? The headline on February 9 read: "889,000 Unemployed in January—Highest Total on Record".

The news story began:

> Unemployment in January was 889,000, the highest recorded since monthly labour statistics began to be collected in 1953, Statistics Canada reports.

Since they concern the subject we are discussing today I think these figures ought to be put on record in relation to the speeches—the cynical speeches in my view—made by the Minister of Finance, and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. There were 889,000 people unemployed last month, representing an increase over the same month in 1976 of 89,000.

What was the number of unemployed by regions in unadjusted figures? In the Atlantic provinces it was 105,000; in Quebec, 274,000, up 32,000 over the same month in 1976. Look at the rates. In the Atlantic region the unadjusted unemployment rate was 13.6 per cent. In recent weeks we have been discussing whether the figures are correct or not. I do not think anybody but one or two cabinet ministers would deny that there are thousands of people presently unemployed who are not counted in the statistics. There are a number of reasons for this. They might have been unemployed for longer than the period during which they are included in statistics. They might be young people who have never held a job. They might be single wage or salary earners who feel that unemployment in their areas is so high there is no use registering for work.

In Quebec there were 274,000 unemployed in January, and the unadjusted unemployment rate was 10.3 per cent. I am not so naive as to think the only reason some people in Quebec believe in a separate state is because they are hungry or because they are unemployed. I recognize there are linguistic, cultural or historical reasons why some people there have come to believe in a separate state. I do not believe that all the 40 per cent of the people of Quebec who voted for the Parti Quebecois were voting for a separate state, but I suggest to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce that the 274,000 people who are unemployed in the province—I suppose if you look at Quebec east of Montreal you are looking at an unemployment rate not of 10 per cent but of between 12 and 14 per cent, and in the Gaspé you are talking about a rate of 30 or 40 per cent—could be forgiven if they are not enthused by the concept of one Canada. I am surprised there are not more who have been turned off in their thinking about Canada.

I suggest to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce that what we do not need are ringing platitudes about his belief in one Canada. What we do need is a belief on the part of the federal government that Canada can have full employment. It is thinking of that kind which could lead Quebec and other regions to believe that Canada as a country means something.

We have heard ad nauseam from the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) that the unemployment figures are not as serious as they sound, because among the people they include are many women seeking to earn second incomes. Then we hear the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) saying recently that women should not be working. Again, it is said there are a lot of young people who really do not want to work and who try to get by on unemployment insurance. Well, the recent survey by Statistics Canada which showed there were 889,000 unemployed tells us two-fifths of them were heads of families or single people living alone. The bureau's own figures suggest that the additional number of workers available for work but not counted could amount to anywhere between 108,000 and 573,000 during January, depending upon the criteria used.

What I am saying now is what this party has been saying for a considerable time. We are in a major crisis, and it is only the government which refuses to face the fact.

What are the prospects for 1977? I refer hon. members to a survey recently carried out by the Conference Board, a very respected organization which conducts economic surveys, and whose membership includes academics, business people and a few labour people. The result of that study is reported in a recent issue of the Globe and Mail as follows:

> Canadian economic growth will slow markedly in 1977 with real gross national product expanding only 3 per cent compared with nearly 5 per cent this year, the Conference Board in Canada estimates.
> The prospects for 1977 have deteriorated because of the unanticipated continuation of the weak economic recovery in the major industrialized countries, particularly the United States, which are Canada's trading partners.

A slow-down in the growth of the GNP means more unemployment in 1977 than in 1976. The Financial Times, again not a very radical or revolutionary journal of opinion, said in a recent editorial:

> Canada's economy should have produced 87,000 more jobs than it has since May, 1975—the bottom of the recession—in order to have made any inroads into the number of unemployed.

> The outlook for unemployment is expected to worsen in Canada this year, especially without any fiscal stimulation. From Plains, Ga., president-elect Jimmy Carter has already shot his $15 billion fiscal bolt, largely directed at creating jobs in the U.S.

The article goes on to point out that even if Canada had that kind of program, which it has not, it would not mean a very drastic cut in the rate of unemployment we are presently facing. If we believe that this country could have full employment and that the bulk of our people who are now unemployed really want to work—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) rising on a point of order? The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow).

Mr. Epp: That is the shortest speech you have made yet.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Order.

Mr. Orlikow: If we believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is better for people who are now unemployed to be working than to live off unemployment insurance benefits or welfare of various types, then we must ask ourselves how we can put our unemployed to work. It seems to me that we have only two possibilities which, pursued separately or together, are these: either the private sector of the economy will expand and hire a substantial portion of the tens of thousands who are unemployed, or in the public sector the federal, provincial and municipal governments will activate programs that will employ people.

Let me examine the private sector and ask whether it will fill the need and hire a substantial percentage, I will not say all, of the 889,000 people who are now unemployed according to Statistics Canada. It is obvious that the demand for products produced by Canadian companies, by the private sector of the Canadian economy, is not there. Manufacturing capacity is now operating at only 85 per cent of capacity. This means that whatever tax incentives the government proposes in its wisdom two or three months from now, or whenever it is the Minister of Finance brings forward his budget, they will not in fact do the job. The C. D. Howe Research Institute, in examining the result we might get from further tax concessions, said that these "are unlikely to be the major determinant of investment; business perceptions of the future prospects for the economy are likely to be the critical factor in investment decisions".

That being the case, Mr. Speaker, it is not likely that companies that are not now working at full capacity will be hiring any substantial number of people. With close to one million unemployed we are losing in the neighbourhood of between $5 billion and $6 billion worth of production each year. It seems to me that if the private sector is not in a position to hire people—I do not say that in any critical sense; it will hire people when there is demand for its products—then there is only one alternative, and that is government action.

We have proposed today in the form of an amendment to the motion moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) five specific methods for dealing with unemployment. The first proposal is for an immediate decrease in personal income taxes for those in the lower and middle income groups, for the purpose of stimulating their purchasing power, and to help take up the current slack in the economy.

The Minister of Finance claims that the government has already done this through its indexation of income tax. I do not have the time today to put on the record again what we have done many times to show that the bulk of benefits derived from indexing income tax goes to those in the middle and upper income brackets. They are people who can afford to save. They are people who do not spend all the money they get back as a result of tax cuts.

I should like to compare our indexing proposals with that which President Carter has proposed in the United States. He is proposing an immediate tax credit of $50 for every taxpayer in the United States. The bulk of this money will go to people in the low income brackets who will spend it because they find it difficult to meet the rapidly increasing cost of living in the United States. We suggest to the government that that kind of proposal should be put into effect in Canada immediately. People should be given the opportunity to take the credit, not on their 1977 income but on their 1976 income, when they prepare their 1976 income tax return.

We have also suggested that there should be an immediate reactivation of all federal capital works projects, not just those of the federal government, and we should encourage the provinces and municipalities to follow suit, at the same time lifting any restraint on their share of funding such projects.

Let me give the House an example which I gave before the Olympics were held. I thought then, and still think, that it was madness to spend hundreds of millions of dollars on a two week extravaganza in a city of two and a half million people which is still dumping its raw sewage into the St. Lawrence river. The city has plans that are ready for a sewage treatment plant, but it has had to delay the implementation of those plans because it has borrowed so much money for the Olympics that it does not have any credit.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Arthur Portelance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in a debate like this one, it is natural for the opposition to try to depict the employment situation in Canada under a certain lighting. I did say "lighting" because, as a matter of fact, we were rather offered a great "blackness" with these fireworks of questionable of "Broadbentic" statistics, or others.

I do not intend to minimize the gravity of the situation but I would like to recall, as the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) did this afternoon, that the unemployment problem should be considered in its real context. However, this phenomenon is not limited to Canada. All the large industrial countries, including the United States where President Carter is going to implement a special program in this area, have to face a similar situation. Indeed, as far as statistics are concerned, ours as published each month by Statistics Canada are more complete with their distribution by region, by class of workers or by age group. In most countries, where there are several different schemes they are instruments which could not be rigorously accurate. It is understandable because we know that tens of thousands of Canadians shift from one job to another every week and it is, of course, a sample. But because of such estimates we can provide our job creation programs with better accuracy so as to allow further consideration to the needs of specific regions such as the province of Quebec and the Maritimes.

This kind of barometer also allows for better appraising of the impact of some programs and thus enabled us to realize that in January in the province of Quebec, because of the efforts made by the federal government through its public works and its job creation programs, the situation had improved and there were 20,000 fewer unemployed. It does not change the situation for those Canadians who are out of work but the program which I will refer to in a few moments and which has been specifically designed for that purpose will look after this situation.

Mr. Speaker, the number of Canadians who are working and the standard of living of the Canadian people, including those who are having problems, have never been so high. There are countries which do not have statistics on unemployment; would Canadians accept this other formula which indeed denies the word accept itself. There are also other formulas La Presse editorialist Ivan Guay pointed out last January 12 how some policies of the Labour Party which were often praised in this House had led Great Britain to its present economic difficulties. I was in England last September and I also found out that although there was a rate of inflation of 13.5 per cent, the unions of that country were allowing that workers be granted increases of about 4.5 per cent. They were accepting 4.5 per cent in order to settle agreements. But here, how much criticism we got, especially from the official opposition, when in our current anti-inflation programs the increases granted are always higher while inflation still exists.

Magic remedies and final solutions lie nowhere on our planet, and the global effort the government of Canada is making this year has no equivalent with its programs whose efficiency has already been proven, and other programs which are ahead of what is done throughout the world; many countries are indeed on their way to adapt them, such as LIP. But in Canada, we are ahead of our time with programs like "Canada Works" and "Young Canada Works", which I will discuss in a moment. That does not consider the regional assistance nor the considerable amounts made available to the provinces through equalization which next year will provide the provinces for instance with $2.5 billion, including $1.3 billion to Quebec.

Here again, Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to hon. members' attention what must exist between provincial government and the federal government, and in particular the Quebec government. Very recently, in the Ottawa Journal of last February 9, we read that the mayor of Hull is very much worried about the existing situation, and I quote:

[English]

Taking into account that each worker spends on average $800 a year in the place he works, Mr. Rocheleau says that one building alone with 5,000 employees would mean $4 million being spent in the area nearby.

The mayor is worried over the fact that projects amounting to $26 million could be cancelled, just because of a policy which would be rather difficult to understand for the Quebec government. Just as he does I wish the new Minister for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) could meet them to correct the situation in which they seem to get in.

Mr. Speaker, I was just referring to the Local Initiatives Program, a program which allows enormous sums of money to be pumped into the economy where the situation is most serious. For this winter we have a program worth about $200 million which will create 47,000 jobs, about one third of them in Quebec. Furthermore, we are presently completing the allocation of $60 million for Phase I of Canada Works program. There will be $140 million more in this sector by the end of this fiscal year, which will allow for the creation of a total of 61,000 jobs.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote some figures dated February 8, 1977 which show the interest of most Canadians looking for employment and the groups which would like to co-operate with the new Canada Works project. We note that on February 8, 1977, there was 6,630 applications to create about 62,000 jobs representing $340 million. This shows the interest of some people in creating employment in Canada. I agree with the leader of the NDP. We know that Canadians are not lazy and that they would rather work than receive unemployment insurance benefits or social welfare allowances.

[Mr. Portelance.]

I do not feel however that programs such as Canada Works or the Local Initiatives Program are a form of social assistance. I am sure of that in my constituency, because I have some evidence that the people who are now interested in various LIP projects are eager to work and willing to help. Nor only do they earn a salary, but their work has a social aspect. In most cases, they help senior citizens, visiting them at home once or twice a week, to do their housework and other things. What those women do in those programs is desirable, and I trust that in the not too distant future the provinces will give similar home services to the needy. Once again, the federal government will have taken an initiative which can perhaps be followed up by federal-provincial agreements.

In all its programs the government has given special attention to the young, helping them either to complete their studies or to have easier access to the labour market. For instance, in the next few months, thanks to three programs, namely Young Canada Works, the Summer Job Corps and summer jobs in various federal departments, 47,000 jobs will be created, at a cost of $65 million. The program Young Canada alone will allow expenditures of $26 million. The number of manpower centres on Canadian campuses will increase from 70 to 88 across Canada in the next three years.

Another program will exist after Bill C-27 has been studied. I trust the House will pass it fairly quickly. With the integration of the two departments, the Department of Manpower still has a very interesting program in co-operative education. A budget already set at $500,000 will enable the federal government, and those provincial governments that are interested, to cooperate in looking for a solution to what I feel is a major problem so that students, while taking classes, can spend some time in private industry; this training period can serve as a bridge between studies and a job. Too often, when applying for a job, young people with 12 or 15 years of schooling are asked whether they have some experience. Unfortunately, they are unable to say that they have some and their application is turned down. I think that a thorough study of the matter with the funds made available after the creation of the new department could probably solve one of the major problems. Perhaps this will answer the question put today by the leader of the opposition when he referred to the father who was rather disappointed because his children who were graduates found it difficult to land a job. The educational system should also provide courses for which there are openings so that the young people will not realize, once they have completed their studies, that there is no employment for them.

In addition, young people and other groups of workers can take advantage of a massive operation whose full extent I have been in a position to evaluate as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration; the training or retraining programs for workers in institutions as well as in industry.

Mr. Speaker, in 1976-77, the department is going to spend $477 million for institutional training and $64 million for on-the-job training, a total of $541 million. In 1977-78, within two months from now, the Department of Manpower and Immigration is going to increase its spendings in this field, allocating $513 million for institutional training and $70 million for on-the-job training or a total of $583 million. This is to help Canadians improve their skill and find a job.

Indeed, not only will these investments increase the qualifications of the Canadian workers and allow them to find a job more easily instead of receiving unemployment insurance benefits but they will also help them take a more active part in the economy of our country. I could talk about many other programs to help the disabled workers who need special training. For example, there is the LIAP—Local Improvement Assistance Program—which, with $14.8 million, will create this year 18,840 man-months. In our department, we have, among others, the workers' mobility program.

Mr. Speaker, if I have enough time, I would like to point out other innovations in a bill now before the House and which will be applied if the Department of Manpower and the Unemployment Insurance Commission can better coordinate their operations once they will be merged. I hope I can deal more deeply with this subject when we will study the bill, but right now I want to tell you how the work sharing program will be applied. Beginning next fiscal year, it will help avoid lay-offs in factories or industries with temporary problems.

Usually, we cut down on personnel, which creates unemployment and results in a loss of skilled staff for a company. This work-sharing program will help keep the whole personnel, but the work week will be temporarily reduced and the cost will be charged to the new Employment and Immigration Commission. These are pilot projects which will come into effect next fall in an effort to improve the condition of the workers who have difficulties and help them keep their incomes. This will be done as generously and cautiously as possible.

This formula brought positive results in several industrialized countries, especially the German Federal Republic and its cost is partly balanced by the unemployment insurance spendings which could not otherwise be avoided. Obviously the elaboration of such a program is complicated and cooperation will be expected not only from governments, and employers but from workers and their unions as well. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) indicated recently that there was a danger that the employers might be tempted to abuse the system and make it absorb some of their losses. I agree that we will have to proceed with care but if we doubt the good faith of those who are ready to participate in such a program, we would never have had programs such as local Initiatives, training on the job, Canada Works, Young Canada Works, etc. Of course the opposition would be in a better position then to criticize the government and produce fine statistics.

Mr. Speaker, the new job creation strategy announced recently by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration includes a new formula which will allow this year a pilot project for the unemployed which will encourage them to participate voluntarily in projects of direct job creation within the community and still receive their unemployment insurance benefits. Or still, again on a voluntary basis, to take training courses while their benefits continue to be their main source of income. It will be suggested that in certain cases the benefits are higher than the salaries being offered. Those are rare cases, and the formula is intended particularly to help those who are thinking about improving their skills while they are waiting to find a job, therefore improving their chances of finding a job, and also keeping more busy in an interim period which they want to be as short as possible.

In brief, Mr. Speaker, we are in the presence of an additional effort by the government which all told is going to cost over $1 billion to bring unemployment across Canada to its lowest level possible with special attention going to those areas where the situation is more difficult. In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I still want to note certain points raised by the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek) who seems to be extremely concerned with small business or at least certain small businesses. I would indeed like him to define them. If it is about certain storekeepers that he is concerned, I hope that in his case there is no conflict of interest.

I have here an item made in Hong Kong bearing the name Jelinek Import Registered. This may not be one of his companies or the company of one of his relatives but it is still the same name. The hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) was also in agreement with the positions taken by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and, as he suggested this afternoon, bringing imports from Asia and elsewhere back to the rate of 1975 helps to create more jobs in Canada.

That is the main objective. In my area and in Quebec as well as outside thousands of textile workers are losing their jobs because of continued imports of all sorts of clothing made outside this country. I think they should rather buy Canadian to create thousands of jobs in Canada and not import or be afraid that some imports will not come in. There is not a dealer handling 100 per cent imports. In the majority of cases they have Canadian products, for sure.

And even they are permitted to import 75 per cent of the current quota. I think it is enough to continue to create jobs here, and that would not be one of my main fears. I think the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is simply doing its job, and it certainly has the support of the majority of government members.

[English]

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, thank you for giving me the opportunity to say a few words on the motion moved by my leader this afternoon:

> That this House denounces the government's failure to generate jobs in Canada, particularly in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces, and urges immediate and resolute action, including the early presentation of a budget.

I listened very carefully to the speech of our leader which, I thought, was a reasoned one and contained very good suggestions. It was well presented. I also listened to the speech of the leader of the NDP (Mr. Broadbent), which similarly was good. However, I regretted his attitude at one point. For a while I even thought we were in government because he was attacking the Conservative party so much. However, I suppose that if, for 30 or 40 years, you cannot change the polls or win an election you have to lash out in every direction. Nevertheless, on one point I do agree with the Leader of the NDP, contrary to what the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) said, namely, that there are more than 889,000 people unemployed in this country. The minister better realize that day after day members from the Atlantic provinces and from Quebec are in constant contact with people they represent. They receive letters from them saying, "Look, I have to get a job. You say, "Go to Manpower". Look, I am tired of going to Manpower. I've been going there for months and I cannot find any work there". This is not the fault of the officials in the Manpower offices. They do not have any work to give anyone. Let me give you an example.

The following is the type of letter I get from my constituents:

Dear Sir:

This is the first time that I have written to any MP. I guess there is a first time for everything.

The reason that I am writing is to get a little information to help plan my future. Just maybe you can help.

I am a widower, with three small children. I have worked every day since I got out of school. I was laid off at SYSCO ten weeks ago. I was wondering if you could advise me on my next move. I have been going around looking for work but there is none to be found. I love working; it keeps my mind off things. Do you think I should stay around and wait to see what happens at SYSCO or should I pull up roots and go west to look for work?

I have lived all my life in Sydney and I don't want to leave and I don't want to go on welfare. Do you think something will break soon?

Keep up the good work and keep fighting for the working man. May the Lord be in your corner.

This is the type of letter we get, time and time again, from many people who cannot find jobs. The thesis put forward by the Leader of the NDP is not new. I have stated it in the House before. I have also said it outside the House and I say now that the figures we get are not legitimate. There are thousands of people who are not classified as being unemployed in the Manpower offices, therefore they are not considered to be out of a job. So the figures we get are phony. There are over 1 million unemployed in this country. I say that to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, who has become arrogant when anyone asks him a question about the unemployed in this country. He used to be a regular, fine, decent gentleman. I think he better watch out and take lessons from the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) who knows how to answer people in the House and who does not get carried away by the importance of his position. We can do without his arrogance. It does not help the unemployed.

As my leader said, eight out of every ten Canadians joined the ranks of the unemployed from the five eastern provinces. These are not bodies, as referred to in bureaucratic language, they are not just figures or statistics, they are human beings.

[Mr. Muir.]

All we heard this afternoon was statistics. All the last speaker gave us was statistics. All we heard from the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien), from the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, and from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) was statistics. But they do not pay the rent, they do not pay the mortgage, they do not buy the food, and they do not buy clothes for the kids.

• (2100)

Before I go any further I want to say a word about Quebec, La Belle Province. The good people of that province are not interested in separatism. They are not one bit interested in moving away from Canada. What they want is an economic climate in which they can make a buck. That green stuff talks. What is the use of being able to speak two, three or four languages if you cannot find a job? If we provide the proper economic climate—and the government should provide that climate—we will not hear very much about separatism in the province of Quebec.

On several occasions the Minister of Finance expressed his serious concern about the unemployment situation, and I believe him. He talks about job creation, but since December, 1976, he tells us that there have been only 79,000 new jobs created. What the hell is the good of 79,000 new jobs when over one million are unemployed? I know it has helped a little bit, but it is still not the answer.

The minister is the bantam rooster type. Although he is not small, he is ready for a fight. However, he condescended to say that the leader of our party and the leader of the New Democratic Party put forward some good suggestions, and that he would keep them in mind when he is proposing a budget a few months hence.

Mr. Ellis: That is where he gets his ideas.

Mr. Muir: That is quite right. I go along with one point in the amendment proposed by the New Democratic Party. In fact I go along with all of them. I go along with co-operative housing in Nova Scotia. The Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) has been down there. The former minister, the minister who is now looking after the Boy Scouts of Canada, our last line of defence, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson), was down there talking about a co-operative program in Nova Scotia which would provide jobs. He is doing nothing about it and has done nothing about it. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) talks about grants and about all the jobs they produce, but they are not producing jobs in the Atlantic provinces. I do not know where they are producing jobs.

One of the factors which has affected the employment situation in Cape Breton in the last couple of years has been a strike at Nova Scotia Forest Industries, which affected 1,500 employees. That was a legitimate strike. The company was trying to get the employees to work for nothing. The Cape Breton construction industry is down to its lowest ebb in years, creating more unemployment, because of the economic climate in this country. Construction employment at the heavy water plant has wound down. There was a disastrous fire at Devco's No. 26 colliery, which put more people out of work. There has been a softening of demand in the world steel markets. At Canadian Motor Industries we used to assemble Toyota cars, but that effort has gone down the drain. They have pulled out. I raised this matter time and time again with the then minister of industry, trade and commerce, but there were no results. Nothing happened. Forty of the boys who were laid off got together and borrowed $3,000 apiece and set up a fund of $120,000 to try to do something themselves with other agencies, but there was no co-operation either from the provincial or federal governments.

General Instruments employed 1,000 people assembling tuners for car radios and so on, but it is gone. There was no effort made by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to keep that company there. The Kaiser strontium plant is going out of business. Just today the Nova Scotia development minister said that the province could not buy or subsidize this plant. That means 100 more people out of work. I tried to make contact with the Asahi Glass Company in Tokyo. What has Devco done about that? What has the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce done to get them interested in taking over this plant? Nothing.

In the last two years 1,664 men have been laid off by the SYSCO steel plant, the Sidney Steel Corporation. Today, when I checked the number on the payroll at SYSCO, it was 2,290. Two years ago it was 3,954. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce mentioned me in dispatches several times today during his speech that I was always raising hell and crying for more rail orders, etc. Why would I not, when we have all these steelworkers walking the streets, losing their houses, being put out into the cold, and unable to pay their electric bills because the power rates are so high?

The minister also said I have been after him about decentralization. Of course I have. Let us move a government department down to Cape Breton. That would provide 800 or 900 jobs. The lame excuse of the minister was that some members in this party did not think it would be a good idea. That is not the point at all. The minister misled the House because the members of this party, as well as the mayor of Ottawa, said that they want a program and that they want to know what is going to happen. Is there going to be an announcement tomorrow that some department is moving? We want to know ahead of time. The minister promised that there would be an outline right after Christmas, but it has not come yet. I would like to see a department brought down there so that people in that area can be employed. Let us not move people just for the sake of moving them. The Department of Veterans Affairs is moving to P.E.I., but that will not be for another three years. It might be like the causeway the Liberal Government was going to build to P.E.I.; it never did come about; perhaps the move of the Department of Veterans Affairs will not, either.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said that no one is actually suffering from hunger and cold. I have gone with welfare workers and found people living in tents in cold weather, and tried to find places for them to live. Why does the minister not get with the people and find out what is going on? There are people who are starving in this country. There are people who do not have a place to live, no matter how many statistics the government throws around about housing starts, etc. There are people who are suffering.

An hon. Member: Give us solutions.

Mr. Muir: We will give you solutions. Why does the hon. member not make his speech standing up and not while sitting on what little brains he has? When I am through, the hon. member can speak. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, to have to use that kind of language, but it is very apropos of the hon. member. In any event, our leader gave solutions today, and so did the leader of the New Democratic Party, but will they be used by this government?

What about the consortium Gerry Reagan is trying to set up for a new steel plant? Gerry Reagan used to sit here.

An hon. Member: Never heard of him.

Mr. Muir: The steel plant is going down the drain. He has played around with setting up a consortium for years. Why does this government not get busy? Mr. Reagan could not do it; his province does not have enough money.

This government has its priorities all screwed up. It can throw $40 million to Cuba, and money to Iran and all over the world. Why does it not send it to where it is really needed? There were 1,000 workers at the docks at North Sidney, stevedores—I say to the hon. member who is interjecting—maybe you do not know what a stevedore is because maybe you have never worked, but a stevedore is a person who works hard like a coal miner or a steel worker—but now the number is down to 200 per shift.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. When hon. members have the floor, they should address their remarks to the Chair.

Mr. Muir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You are very kind. There used to be 1,000 men per shift working there, and of course because this government gives subsidies to private shipping firms, the shipping goes in other directions. It does not go through the port of North Sydney to Port aux Basques in Newfoundland. So what happens? There are only 200 working there. The rest of them are walking the streets.

Under the terms of confederation, in accordance with section 31 of the terms of union of Newfoundland with Canada, provision was made for the taking over by Canada of the vessels and other marine services formerly operated by the Newfoundland Railway. Subsequently, by order in council, Canadian National Railways was entrusted with the management of these services.

Pursuant to section 32 of the terms of union, Canada is obliged to maintain, in accordance with the traffic offering, a freight, passenger and vehicle steamship service between North Sydney and Port aux Basques. That is in Newfoundland, for the information of hon. members on the Liberal side.

The policy of the Ministry of Transport is, therefore, to conform with the terms of union and provide such service in keeping with demand.

CN Marine is the principal employer in both North Sydney and Port aux Basques. CN Marine employs somewhere between 2,000 and 3,000 people directly, and they, with their dependants, make up about 10,000 to 15,000 people.

Port aux Basques in Newfoundland has been historically the entry point for goods coming to Newfoundland from mainland North America. It is, therefore, incomprehensible that this government or this minister, "travelling Otto," should consider increased subsidies to some private outfit which cannot make it on its own, take millions of dollars of taxpayers' money, feed them the money to operate against a Crown owned corporation which has had its ships tied up in the harbour doing nothing.

There is another solution.

Mr. Peters: You have told them; now try to make them understand.

Mr. Muir: I would have to draw a picture; even then I do not think they would understand.

Further, Mr. Speaker, the constituency of Cape Breton-The Sydneys does not meet the qualifications for the additional $30 per week allowance for material costs associated with Canada Works projects because the Minister of Manpower states our unemployment rate is not high enough and we do not meet the other ridiculous criteria! That is poppycock, Mr. Speaker. The amount allocated for projects in Cape Breton-The Sydneys is a measly $382,000. That is crazy. That is not worth anything. Under the Local Initiatives Projects Cape Breton-The Sydneys received $1,700,000, unfortunately—I say unfortunately, because the unemployment rate was so high that is why we got so much. Of course we have to consider the formula used to determine the allocations under the Canada Works Program—now get this the constituency has to have had an unemployment rate in excess of 7 per cent for the first quarter of 1976. Then the constituency, according to Statistics Canada 1971 census figures—imagine-1971 figures—in the lowest 20 per cent of all ridings in terms of either average family income or the median value of single detached, owner occupied now farm dwellings. What gobbledygook! Did you ever hear the like of that Mr. Speaker? Down on the south shore in the riding of Queens-Lunenburg they call that "bafflegab". Nobody can understand it.

I say to the hon. gentleman who was shooting off before: try and explain that to a man who cannot find a job and has not been able to find one for over a year, and whose unemployment insurance benefits have been exhausted. He is not on the books anywhere. All I can say is that the bureaucrats who came up with this formula might know all the answers, but they damn well do not understand the questions. It is the same problem. Some ministers run their departments, and some departments run their ministers. If the Minister of Manpower and Immigration were interested in the unemployed, he would call those bureaucrats in and say "What kind of foolishness is this? Straighten that out. I want to see what it is all about."

We have the unemployment down there; that is the sad part of it. We have lost General Instruments. We have lost Kaiser Strontium. We have 200 out of 1,000 stevedores working, we have all of these steelworkers laid off, and coal mining—there is another solution. If the government wants solutions, the Arab sheiks have made DEVCO a success and the Cape Breton Development Corporation now that coal is becoming king again because of the energy problem. But try and get the government to open new coal mines! There is no faster way to put people to work than to open coal mines. Let us open two or three new coal mines. Even the oil companies in the United States are buying up leases and opening coal mines. Such cutbacks and restraints! You cannot even get an extension for mail delivery, which would provide half a dozen jobs for people in many areas.

Mr. Peters: No matter how you explain it to that backward member he will never understand.

Mr. Muir: The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce stated this afternoon "We are doing and have done everything possible". The Minister of Manpower and Immigration speaking for the government, of course, said this afternoon, "None of us have the answer to unemployment". Mr. Speaker, if on their own confession they have done everything possible and none of them have the answer—and they admit that—and we have over one million people unemployed, is it not time that those two ministers were moved and some crackpot like the member who has been interjecting be made a minister? He could not do any worse. There is no reason in the world why he could not be a minister. He is just as stupid as the rest of them. He reminds me of the man they tell about who was so stupid he did not know the difference between arson and incest, so he set fire to his sister.

The greatest joke is trying to find out about training from the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I wrote to him trying to find out about training, and on November 30 he wrote to me as follows:

> I am pleased to be able to tell you that the federal-provincial manpower needs committee for Nova Scotia, carefully reviewed the supply of construction tradesmen—

We want tradesmen because at least they will get an allowance and it will help them to feed their families and they will be trained when they have to move to Ontario, or whatever they are forced to do. The letter continues:

> —and the need to train additional workers, to meet the needs of the proposed steel mill to be built by Cansteel.

Now listen to this part, Mr. Speaker:

> Although the project is in the planning stage, site clearance is expected to commence during 1977, and when construction gets under way approximately 1,600 tradesmen will be employed during the first year, rising to 3,700 in the fourth year.

To hon. members here that does not mean anything, but up to the the present time the Premier of Nova Scotia says no consortium has been set up. We do not know where they can put a steel plant. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) does not know anything about it, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) does not know anything about it, but the Minister of Manpower and Immigration tells me they are going to start construction.

Mr. Speaker, there is so much but I see my time is up and you are looking at your watch.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, suggestions are being made. Let them get off their asses and get people to work and get this country back on its tracks again.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Mr. Speaker, I see by orders of the day that this is supposed to be an opposition day. Certainly we can understand now why the Progressive Conservative party and the other opposition parties were not in favour of having television brought in on our return after the Christmas recess. After watching the show just put on, I am sure it would not have a very high rating in terms of general entertainment across the country. It did seem to amuse some of the colleagues of the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark), however—a few of the ten or 11 members of that party who are in the House this evening. There are not too many NDP or Creditistes either. Yet we know that there are approximately 125 members of the opposition. This is supposed to be an opposition day but they do not seem to find the motion put forward by the hon. Leader of the Opposition important enough to support.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There are only a dozen Liberals.

An hon. Member: Where is your minister?

An hon. Member: Fifteen members.

Mr. Harquail: I think it is rather a sad day—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) has the floor.

Mr. Harquail: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My sympathy is with you. I realize the great difficulty in having these people show some respect for parliament. They spend many hours preaching about it. Every speaker at one time or other, whether it is the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) or others, lectures parliament on how important is is for us to have respect for it. Yet when a member stands in his place with his legal right to speak and be heard, this is what we have to put up with. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for bringing order to the House.

Mr. Muir: The truth hurts.

Mr. Harquail: The hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. Muir) has a very short memory and failed to mention what the Minister for Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien) said this afternoon when he informed the hon. member that they were very close to obtaining an agreement with Venezuela—

Mr. Muir: For five months and we are working on that. We have not got it yet.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member has had his say. I suggest we now listen to the hon. member for Restigouche.

Mr. Harquail: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his support, but I suggest he should direct it to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to help him obtain that contract so that we can provide jobs for the people of Cape Breton that he was talking about.

Mr. Muir: We have been waiting for it. You had better wake up and find out what is going on.

Mr. Harquail: It is interesting to see the hon. member show a bit of respect for the government and the programs that are being carried out through DREE and the Department of Manpower and Immigration. He admitted that he received over $1 million through the Local Initiatives Program and that he is quite happy to accept additional money through the Canada Works program and will be quite happy to receive money under the Young Canada Works program. They always show great respect and great support for the government at that time.

Of course we know that in the maritime provinces, especially those administered by a Conservative government at the moment, they are very cautious not to mention the federal government after the agreements have been signed—not to mention the federal government after they have obtained these funds, but they are right there for the signing and are very anxious to get the publicity. They try to hoodwink or mislead the public by saying it is a provincial program, but their memories become very short when it comes time to mention where they got that money.

We all know that in terms of equalization payments so far as New Brunswick is concerned—they talked about one billion dollars last year. Half a billion dollars is handed over by the federal government to the province of New Brunswick on their day-to-day budget operations in addition to the hundreds of millions of dollars that is handed over through DREE and through regional development incentive programs. However, no mention is ever made after they receive the money.

It is much the same situation in Newfoundland. This afternoon the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) talked about the same old stuff that he talked about in his maiden speech in this House. He said that at one time he was a minister in the government of Mr. Moores. He did not tell us why he left Mr. Moores. He did not explain why he did not stay to help Mr. Moores solve some of the problems he was talking about. Nor did he tell us of any of the solutions he had for his province when he was a member of the present administration of Mr. Moores. The hon. member left the provincial administration and the Newfoundland people with their problems. He decided to let them try to work them out for themselves. However, he did not acknowledge the millions of dollars pumped into Newfoundland through equalization payments under DREE and other programs.

The effect of the 1977 indexing of federal personal income tax is close to $950 million. The effect of indexing family allowances is $160 million, and indexing old age security payments is $390 million. The effect of the change in the reduction in UIC payments represents $250 million. This is the type of thing we like to get on the record and speak about. We can be sure that we will not hear about it from the official opposition.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wish to point out that the hon. member's speech is the same speech that was read this afternoon by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I suggest to the hon. member that is not a point of order but a point of debate.

Mr. Harquail: I would only say that the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock, should get his eyes checked because I do not look like the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald).

Mr. Muir: Is that an insult or a compliment?

Mr. Harquail: I will not let myself get down to the low tone of the debate we heard this afternoon and this evening from the previous speaker. I refuse to do that. I am one who likes to see dignity maintained in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Harquail: I will not let myself be brought to the level of debate we listened to from the opposition this afternoon. The other day they said they wanted to do great things for Canada. We listened to Rodriguez.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Order!

Mr. Harquail: The hon. member for Nickerbelt, the Nickerbocker kid, or whatever he is called, tied up this House.

Mr. Peters: There must be some ridings you are able to pronounce.

Mr. Harquail: It is always nice to have the assistance of Mr. Peters.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Order!

Mr. Harquail: What is the name of your riding, Mr. Peters?

[Mr. Harquail.]

Mr. Peters: Timiskaming.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that he must refer to another hon. member by his constituency and not by name.

Mr. Harquail: Timiskaming, that does not surprise me.

As I said earlier, it is little wonder the opposition is opposed to having television brought into the House after witnessing some of the performances that go on here.

Mr. Muir: Even make-up wouldn't help you.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harquail: The opposition takes great pains to avoid some of the facts and figures. For example, in addition to the amounts of money that I mentioned with regard to indexing federal personal income tax, and other programs and moves that have been made, the major transportation subsidy payments covering five areas transferred approximately $280 million to the Atlantic region in 1976. You can bank on it that the opposition would avoid mentioning that.

Tomorrow morning the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) will be signing a formal agreement with the premier of New Brunswick, the hon. Mr. Hatfield. This will represent in excess of $40 million to assist in the continuation of the construction of Route 11 from the city of Moncton to Campbellton, New Brunswick.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harquail: This is as a result of long negotiations that have gone on because of the problems encountered as a result of the negative attitude of the Progressive Conservative administration in that province. However, I am delighted to be able to say tonight that at last we have an agreement. They have finally been wise enough to accept the money being offered to them by the federal government. After that agreement is signed tomorrow, I hope they will not be too bashful to mention that this money came from the federal government.

In addition to the sub-agreement with regard to the highways, there are the benefits that will come to them under the new agricultural program. The question of programs and amendments to the agricultural development subsidiary agreement, the agricultural agreement, is extended. In addition, money will be poured into that province by DREE under the small business incentives program, as well as more money in Kent county.

These are a few of the sub-agreements to be signed tomorrow. I am delighted to be able to announce and put on record in my speech this type of positive move being taken by this government. Of course the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, in addition to negotiating with New Brunswick, negotiates continuously with Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland with regard to federal-provincial agreements. They bring millions of dollars to create new jobs, develop the highway structure so that the economy can be improved, and assist in the development of the tourist trade of the Atlantic provinces.

This is the type of positive action the people want to know about. It has to be supported if we are going to continue to alleviate high unemployment. No one is sidestepping the fact that we are faced with these complex problems.

I hope that some day the opposition will sit down and seriously consider the problems facing this country. They should consider making some reasonably legitimate suggestions, rather than taking a full day of the time of this House with the type of motion that is before us today.

The decentralization approach which the government has taken, one area of activity with regard to the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, is revealed most markedly in the administration of the Regional Development Incentives Act. Provincial directors general now decide on cases involving up to $500,000 in capital costs and 40 jobs, while regional assistant deputy ministers are authorized to approve all cases involving capital costs of between $500,000 and $1.5 million and up to 100 jobs. As a result, more than 70 per cent of the decision making authority in this program is now outside the Ottawa area. The incentive officers have become increasingly familiar with their regions. There is greater co-operation than ever before between the two levels of government on the matter of incentives to industry. This is the type of positive approach that the government takes in co-operating with those provinces.

It surprises me to see in the motion before the House today remarks criticizing or calling for debate with respect to the type of assistance being given by this government to the four Atlantic provinces. However, it does not surprise me when we observe that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) is not able to state his position on any of the policies which they like to skirt around and sidestep from time to time. He does not seem prepared, informed, or ready to take a stand on any of the issues facing us today.

He tells the Canadian people he would like to remain as Leader of the Official Opposition. In his travels across the country, he talks about how he will do this and that, and what a great future there will be. However, he does not seem to have the capacity or ability to put on record exactly what his position is with regard to the very difficult problems which face us today.

The Canadian people will be watching the performance of the opposition very closely. We hear them continuously moan, cry, and lament. It will not be surprising to see them remain in that position for another ten or 15 years, as has been the case for the last number of years. When you consider their performance and input in this House, you observe almost a non-opposition situation. They say nothing constructive. They do not seem to be interested in putting forward worth-while ideas. It appears they would prefer to sit in the House and be entertained, as we found when the previous speaker was making some smart remarks about the situation in Cape Breton Island.

Mr. Muir: You go down there and tell the people what you are saying now.

Mr. Harquail: He, and two or three of his colleagues were amused. They had a great time. But, as I said earlier, I would much prefer that they should look seriously at the comprehensive and effective program which has been introduced by the government, and the positive steps which have been taken. I think, for example, of the hundreds of millions now being spent by the Department of Manpower and Immigration and of the steps taken by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) to ease the situation through a number of programs and policies.

The situation today reminds me of the situation last year when the opposition took a great deal of the time of the House setting themselves up as great defenders of labour. They were speaking against the establishment of the Anti-inflation Board. We all agreed that something drastic needed to be done to halt galloping inflation, and the action taken at that time has proved a positive step for the government to have taken. Today we hear labour people, including many of the senior labour organizers and officials, agreeing with the position taken by the government; they are supporting it in almost every sector, and encouraging the government to move cautiously before removing these restraint measures. I believe this speaks well of the dynamic and decisive leadership which came from the government in a most critical period.

This is a government which accepts its responsibilities and does not turn its back in difficult times but marches forward and meets problems head-on. Not only do we meet problems head-on but we resolve to come up with policies and programs to eradicate the situation, as has been evident in 1976. I invite the opposition to accept its responsibilities and try to refrain from excessive and unnecessary verbiage of the kind we have to listen to in the House from time to time on so many occasions. I realize we have to try to work with the opposition. That, after all, is the set-up. That is the structure of parliament. There must be an opposition, and if we had a good opposition it would make for good government and the better working of the parliamentary system. Unfortunately some of those who make up the opposition fail to make a positive contribution as far as their role is concerned.

Going back to the Atlantic area, I should like to take the opportunity to encourage those who are charged with the responsibility for administering the province of New Brunswick to accept their responsibilities in terms of seeking to develop policies and programs which would show a greater degree of co-operation between the two levels of government in many areas, not only in the area of DREE where they smilingly sit down to accept all those moneys, but also in the area of education, health and welfare, and justice, as well as some of the other on-going programs. I would encourage them to be serious and accept their responsibilities in the day-to-day administration of that province and to see that the moneys forwarded to them by the federal government are indeed spent in the various sectors of that province as they have been destined and directed to be spent. I am thinking of one particular area which I understand is being cleared up now in the northern part of the province I represent. It has to do with the second language program; for the last few years they have said there is no money to hire extra teaching personnel or to arrange for facilities to carry out this program.

An hon. Member: What do they do in Moncton?

Mr. Harquail: That is another subject I shall deal with tomorrow.

The positive steps taken by the Minister of Finance with respect to the subsidies and other federal moneys which are being awarded to the Atlantic provinces certainly do not place the opposition in a very happy position today. In the motion they have placed before us they mention the unemployment position, but they are not prepared to mention the fact that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) has taken some definite and positive steps in this area to provide jobs through the strategy he has put forward in connection with the Canada Works and Young Canada Works programs. Only today he announced new time limits with respect to applications to accommodate students and young people who wish to participate in the Young Canada Works program—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I am very dismayed that we on this side of the House were obliged to bring in a motion today in order to focus attention on what I call a national disaster, that is, high unemployment. The last speaker talked about decisive leadership. All I can say is that at this time in our history we find there are increasing numbers of our youth who feel alienated, increasing numbers who are prepared to work but are unable to do so because of incompetence in the management of the economy. We have not found jobs for our youth.

When the hon. member refers to decisive leadership, I think of the senior citizen who is frustrated and who feels that we, as parliamentarians, do not realize the presence within that group of a bank of skilled resources from which there have not been sufficient withdrawals, that the government has no idea of what these people could do in terms of bringing about a better climate in terms of the economic situation. They have been put out to pasture. That is the kind of decisive leadership the hon. member was talking about. He continually forgets that business is suspicious. Business is also frustrated and is holding back. Why? Because the government likes to play games and it likes to change the rules during the game. He talks about decisive leadership, and I think of the farmer who wants to eke out a decent livelihood. Under the policies of this government that is not possible. The hon. member talks about decisive leadership, but I think of the way this government conducts its federal-provincial relations. This government believes in confrontation, not consultation and co-operation. That is why this country is in a hell of a mess.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Alexander: The provinces say that this is the government's idea of co-operation and consultation: "We have option A and option B and we are going to push ahead with option B; what do you want to do?" I am not making this up, Mr. Speaker.

I had a very pleasant experience in the Atlantic provinces. They told me that that was the way the federal government operated. But do you know what really disturbed me? I have been fortunate enough to have the confidence of my constituents since 1968, but I listened to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Portelance). I want to be kind because he is a nice chap and means well, but he is a Liberal and sits on the other side of the House and he has to read the speech that is prepared for him. I wonder whether he is getting the same number of letters that I am getting from university and high school graduates who are now looking to members of parliament for jobs. Does the parliamentary secretary not receive those kinds of letters from people in all professions, Ph.D.'s in chemistry, engineers, business administrators, high school students? I hear some nitwit over there, but that is what he calls them, not me. He has no idea what we are talking about here. Does the parliamentary secretary not receive these letters?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Portelance) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Portelance: Mr. Speaker, I am sure I heard the question that the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) asked me, and truly I never received one letter from any of these well-qualified people in my region.

Mr. John Campbell (La Salle-Émard-Côte Saint-Paul): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member referred to me by indicating me with his finger. I have not received one such letter, and I think all the comments he has made are completely false and he should read his speech more attentively.

Mr. Alexander: As I was going to say, Mr. Speaker, this is my yardstick. This is how I can tell that this country is in trouble. I do not know where other hon. members go. Perhaps they do not go to their offices. But when they tell me that they have not received one letter from a university graduate or a Ph.D., then I wonder why the parliamentary secretary was so selective. Why did he tell me how many letters he had received from anybody who is looking for a job?

Mr. Portelance: I said I did not.

Mr. Alexander: Now says he did not. You see how they deliberately try to confuse, how they try to mislead. He is not talking to any dummy over here, though he may think so. Be honest and be truthful.

We are experiencing right now the problems and frustrations of our youth. When we think what the government has done with respect to research, both medical and scientific, with the government's tunnel vision that money has been cut off. This is one of the most important matters to which we should be addressing ourselves because through research we are dealing with our future. But through its shortsightedness and tunnel vision our researchers are doing what? Perhaps the parliamentary secretary doesn't understand this either, but they are all going south, and more will be going south.

I am not here to be mean, Mr. Speaker. I am not being mean tonight; I am trying to whack some sense into the brains of hon. members opposite. I heard what the parliamentary secretary said; he did a beautiful job, so he thought. He said that we had to look at unemployment in its true context. Then he started to describe conditions around the world. Well, I am not interested in conditions around the world; I am interested in the leadership that should come from this government to solve this very chronic and desperate situation. Do not try to bamboozle the people by comparing us, say, with Angola. I know he did not mention Angola, but I do not know why he did not, because with all due respect it is a very dishonest way to look at a very humane problem.

Then he said that living standards here are high and he started to compare them. I am not interested in comparisons; I am interested in what this government is going to do. I like the parliamentary secretary, he is a nice guy, but he must be talking about members of parliament when he says living standards are high. Everybody thinks that our standard of living is high. I do not want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, what my wife thinks about that, but let us not try to say that things are great so we should not get too excited. That is not a proper approach when there are some 900,000 people out of work, though others have said that because of the confusing way we compile our unemployment statistics the figure could be one million.

To say we should look at unemployment in its true context and to relate it to the living standards of other countries is no way to approach the problem. We have senior citizens who want to work and become involved in the mainstream of Canadian life. Yet the government says to them. "Get out of the work force at 65 because you are not going to get any more unemployment insurance; you cannot contribute by way of premiums, nor will you get any benefits". That is the mentality of this government. This reservoir of manpower which could be of such importance to the development of this nation is told by the government that at 65 its members should get out because they are useless, whereas other workers can contribute to and benefit from unemployment insurance. What kind of nonsense is that?

On the other hand, those who want to work, our youth, cannot get jobs because the government does not have the imagination or the aggressiveness to bring about the job creation that is so needed. They laugh at us, Mr. Speaker. They tell us the minister will be making an announcement regarding DREE. Up until this the government has believed that this is a problem that does not concern the Canadian people. Surely when we go to our respective ridings we hear the problems of the frustrated. Do we not hear about the problems of the unemployed?

As I have said, I have been in the Atlantic provinces and I am going to Quebec soon, I hope, God willing, in order to share the experience of our senior citizens in regard to their quality of life. We are concerned about unemployment in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces, and that is why we have underscored it.

We urged the government and pleaded with the government to take immediate, resolute action, including the early presentation of a budget. As my leader pointed out earlier today, eight out of every ten Canadians who joined the ranks of the unemployed in 1976 lived in the five eastern provinces of Canada. That is a shame, a national disgrace.

Mr. Muir: The hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) did not seem to realize that. He did not seem to know anything about that.

Miss Bégin: Are your Ph.D's ready to go there, to work?

Mr. Alexander: In Newfoundland 13.6 of the people were unemployed; in New Brunswick, 11.1 per cent, or more; in Prince Edward Island, more than 9 per cent; in Nova Scotia, more than 9 per cent were unemployed, and in Quebec the figure is 10 per cent and climbing. Lord knows, if the true figures were only known we could perhaps add another five or six percentage points to all those statistics.

Some people do not appreciate that it is one thing to be unemployed in Ontario but quite another to be unemployed in the Atlantic provinces or Quebec. Why, Mr. Speaker? The reason is that jobs do not exist in the Atlantic provinces. The jobs just are not there; the opportunities are not there, and there is no industrial development in the area. In Ontario the situation is quite different, and I say this with all due respect to those who may be unemployed. I hope the people of Hamilton will understand what I am trying to say. It seems to me that it is much easier to get a job in Ontario and, say, Alberta.

We may say we are all Canadians, that we are all pulling together and that there is equality of opportunity. However, for some of us there is more equality of opportunity and that disturbs me. When there is not equality of opportunity one sees animosity and anger. Anger builds up to such a pitch that you find the Liberal government of Quebec being kicked out—but I will not dwell on that.

Mr. MacFarlane: Come on; you are talking about the land where I lived. Do not talk about it that way.

Mr. Alexander: As I was saying, because the government in Quebec did not have its ear to the ground, did not keep its eyes open and see the people's economic frustration, it was kicked out of power. It goes to show you what can happen.

When we came back from the Christmas recess, what was the government's priority in terms of matters it brought forward for consideration in this House? At a time a slow growth, high unemployment, business uncertainty and lack of confidence, we debated television coverage of proceedings of the House. I do not care one way or the other if television is brought into this House. Frankly, I do not think it will last. Once people see some of our dismal performances, my own included, they will turn their sets off very quickly. But that item was brought forward because it had priority. It was brought forward while economic questions begged for solution. As I said, the unemployment rate is a national disaster and a national disgrace. What has happened shows that the government has a callous disregard for the suffering of hundreds of thousands of Canadians.

I condemn their hesitancy in moving, condemn their foot-dragging and condemn their procrastination. That is the government's attitude. The government says, "We will wait to see what Jimmy Carter does; he is the savior. What happens in the United States is bound to rub off here."

We knew what was coming. Heaven only knows—I know the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) wants to speak and I will not rob him of his opportunity—heaven only knows, the Conference Board in Canada, the University of Toronto Institute of Policy Analysis and the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development pointed out most vividly to members of parliament, the people of Canada and the government that, in the absence of immediate action, we shall face higher unemployment and a stagnant economy. Despite all those economic indications and forecasts, the government sat back, silent. It took outsiders to tell the people of this country what is happening in this country, and all the time the government remained silent, hesitant and indifferent. It turned a deaf ear and watched the unemployment figures rising until they reached the one million mark.

In human terms, Mr. Speaker, we are talking about anger, frustration, despondency and futility. One million people unemployed means that retailers cannot sell their wares. Unemployment of that proportion affects producers. You start multiplying the effects of unemployment and you will see what a hell of a mess this country is in.

I have a lot more to say, Mr. Speaker, but out of respect for my hon. friend, I will let him wind up this debate in his usual manner.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I was not particularly interested in winding up this debate. However, I have listened with interest to the speeches which have been made and I feel sad for the Canadian public. The motion we are debating is most worth while. In some of our regions unemployment is running as high as 20 per cent.

An hon. Member: Thirty per cent.

Mr. Peters: Yes, perhaps as high as 30 per cent. Yet some hon. members ridiculed what the hon. member from Cape Breton said about unemployment today. In addition, an hon. member from Newfoundland rose and ridiculed the whole problem of unemployment, when about one in five in his area is unemployed.

An hon. Member: It was the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail).

Mr. Peters: It does not make much difference. There is a lot of unemployment there as well, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It makes a difference to me, because I was the only speaker from Newfoundland in this debate and I did not ridicule unemployment. The hon. member is referring to the hon. member from New Brunswick, the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please, that is not a point of order. It is a point of debate.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, in the riding of almost every member of this House, including Ontario constituencies, there is a considerable amount of unemployment. The unemployment question is dammed important in northern Ontario ridings. It is important for all hon. members of this House to consider not only the question of unemployment, but how we can create employment.

I was shocked to hear many members on the government side offer nothing constructive and only offer lots of ridicule. If the government is really serious in asking for the co-operation of all parts of Canada to end this problem, it should not be looking to Jimmy Carter for salvation. We, in Canada, should ask ourselves what we can do to provide jobs. The government would be well advised to institute in this House a debate which would allow members of parliament to provide input as to how employment in this country is to be created. I suggest that a winter works program will be of little benefit in many areas and will not cure our difficulties or provide regular employment, the sort of employment people can count on day after day. I am ashamed that many members of parliament have not made more constructive remarks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It is my duty to inform the House that, pursuant to Section 11 of Standing Order 58, the proceedings under the motion have expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—COMMUTER SERVICE IN MONTREAL AREA—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, the constituency of Vaudreuil includes the Canadian Pacific Railway commuter passenger train service that runs from Rigaud through Hudson, Vaudreuil, Ile Perrot, Ste. Annes, Baie d'Urfe and Beaconsfield, into Montreal. A total of about 7,500 passengers use this line each day on which there are a total of 26 stops. The annual loss is over $300 per passenger.

The announcement of the CPR in January of fare increases, coupled with drastic cuts in the number of trains, was followed by some 40 letters to me from individuals and municipalities requesting federal intervention to stop the reduction in service.

Most of the complaints relate to the reduction in trains between Vaudreuil and Rigaud. About 400 passengers a day use this section of the line. In such a situation one does not first argue jurisdictional responsibilities, so on Thursday of last week I proposed a motion which can be found on page 2667 of Hansard. It reads:

● (2200)

That the Minister of Transport personally intervene on behalf of all the commuters in the Montreal area and solicit from CPR a postponement of its intention to reduce the frequency of service until the province of Quebec indicates its policy on or before July 1.

The request for the postponement is related to the urban transportation study by the province of Quebec which is expected on or before July 1 of this year.

In recent months the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) has intervened to obtain a delay in the introduction of fare and service changes for the Montreal commuter rail services announced by CNR and CPR. The minister has indicated that the financial support of these services is the responsibility of the province of Quebec, and his intervention has been taken to minimize inconvenience to the public until the provincial government has determined how it will exercise its responsibility.

Although it is acknowledged that the provision of urban transportation services is the responsibility of municipal and provincial governments, which should also take responsibility for the costs, a federal program of capital assistance can help in relieving problems by providing capital to assist in the expansion of public urban transportation services.

I recognize that any federal urban transportation assistance program is not likely to subsidize the operation of urban commuter and transit systems. Nevertheless, this government has made a commitment to provide assistance to urban areas in order to alleviate their transportation problems. The promise of this financial assistance, and the role played by the federally appointed Canadian Transport Commission, led to the public appeal to the federal government.

I appreciate the prompt action of the Minister of Transport. Many residents in the constituency of Vaudreuil are entirely dependent upon public transportation, and service cuts of the magnitude of those announced by CPR would impose considerable hardships on those people who, for a multitude of reasons, do not have the use of a private automobile.

Now that there is a little more time for a fuller discussion of the subject tonight, I will be pleased to hear any further comments from the minister or his parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) who raised this important question on urban transportation. It is not the first time that the hon. member has raised that question in the House. He also raised it in committee. I think the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) agrees with this philosophy or principle raised by the hon. member.

Current urban criteria being what they are now, the aim of the Department of Transport is to banish cars from the heart of the cities to give public transport the priority. Since then, many meetings have been held between federal and provincial governments and, in the case of Ontario, it was clearly established where responsibilities would like for public transport services.

Even now in Ontario, Go Transport and Go Transit exist; the work is performed by the federal government but the province of Ontario finances the deficits. The problem of urban transport is urgent and we want to follow up on the request of the hon. member. On October 25 last, a meeting was held of all the mayors of the municipalities concerned. Transportation by CN rail was then discussed: we have Laval-des-Rapides and Montreal: the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) is now speaking of the same problem with regard to the role of the federal government in connection with the services given by the CP on the south shore. I should like to point here to the hon. member for Vaudreuil that I am quite willing to table the correspondence exchanged at that time with the minister of transport, Mr. Raymond Mailloux, with regard the shared responsibilities.

At the October 25 meeting last year, with regard to the increase in costs and decrease in services, it was agreed with the minister of transport, Mr. Raymond Mailloux, that before July 1 a report would be tabled at the National Assembly on integrated urban transport services, specifically for the south shore and the north shore at Montreal. We therefore hope that that report will be tabled . . .

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the parliamentary secretary, but his allotted time has expired.

TRADE—LEVEL OF CHEESE IMPORTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, my colleagues and I on appropriate occasions in the past have made numerous representations to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) regarding the unacceptably high level of cheese imports.

Adjournment Debate

On January 25, 1977, I asked the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to clarify press reports attributed to the chairman of the Canadian Dairy Commission to the effect that the freeze on cheese imports imposed a year ago would be extended for an additional year. I also asked the minister if he would not consider using a well accepted government practice of utilizing a previous five-year averaging approach in establishing a more acceptable and equitable basis for cheese import levels. If such a principle were to be adopted, our cheese import level would be somewhere in the neighbourhood of 38 million or 40 million pounds.

Replying in the usual fine tradition of his cabinet colleagues, the minister said in part that he would inquire. It is widely known and recognized throughout the industry that, although naturally not accepted by the government, the decision to freeze import cheese levels at 50 million pounds a year ago was largely, if not entirely, the result of opposition protests, protests which were raised here in this House on this side of the House.

Concern about this problem is the result of a number of factors. When the quota on cheese imports was first set by the government in 1975, it was established at too high a level. Imports of variety cheese in 1973 and 1974 were 38 million pounds and 45 million pounds respectively. If a significant portion of such imports had not been subsidized by the countries of origin, the volume experienced in the two years prior to the application of the quota would never have been achieved.

Second, in 1974 it is common knowledge that greater volumes entered Canada illegally because of inadequate policing methods, and further to that, no action was taken except to legalize the entry.

Third, another case in point involves cheese believed to be from East Germany which is trans-shipped via West Germany and enters our market at the level of 56 cents a pound. This transshipment situation was never proved; however, there is no way West Germany could sell cheese at 56 cents a pound when the Common Market support prices are close to a dollar.

Yet another factor which discredits the use of 1974 cheese levels as a standard is the fact that more cheese was imported due to a shortage of Canadian milk that particular year. The government failed to take into account that commencing in 1972 Canada's trade in cheese had become totally imbalanced, largely because of the trade protection measures imposed by the European Economic Community, whose member countries enjoy some 65 per cent of the share of the expanding cheese trade into Canada.

Our cheese exports, which traditionally have been dominated by sales to the United Kingdom, fell from the 30 million pound level in 1970 and 1971 to 18 million pounds in 1972 and to 6 million pounds in 1973. Since then they have amounted to less than three million or four million pounds.

In contrast, cheese imports, mainly from the trading bloc which has wiped out our traditional export market, have nearly doubled, from some 20 million pounds in 1970 to probably close to 50 million pounds in 1976.

When the loss of cheese exports is combined with the growth of cheese imports over the past five years, the Canadian dairy industry has lost a potential market for half a billion pounds of industrial milk, or about 5 per cent of total requirements.

Every ten million pounds of cheese imported into Canada cost the Canadian dairy industry approximately $4 million. It should not have come as any surprise to the federal government under these circumstances that the dairy industry strongly opposed the establishment of the quota level at 50 million pounds in the past two years. The government failed to recognize that the Canadian dairy industry is quite capable of producing nearly all the varieties of cheese that are being imported into this country. The government has implied that this is not possible, and that consumers must be able to purchase the cheese of their choice. I wish to lay this myth to rest once and for all. It should be noted as well that savings on lower cost cheese imports are not passed on in the same relative proportions to the consumer.

In the first place, the Canadian industry manufactured and offered for sale to the public, some 50 different varieties of cheese in 1975, many of which are the exact same varieties being imported. Second, about a dozen specialty cheeses which together make up about half the imported varieties in tonnage, either are or can be manufactured in Canada without difficulty.

It is nonsense to suggest that Canada requires the imported cheeses because of our inability to make them. The real problem is the government's lack of policy to prevent imports from being subsidized by the countries of origin. The effect of this is that the Canadian manufacturers have no incentive to invest in plant and equipment to manufacture some of the large volume import varieties here.

I would like to point out that a ten million pound reduction in cheese imports would generate some $20 million or more of sales for the domestic industry, while at the same time saving skim milk powder export costs of close to $5 million.

It should be noted, as well, that the special access agreement for mature Canadian cheddar which Canada worked out with the EEC in early 1975, and which the government announced with considerable satisfaction, is in today's environment practically worthless. It is high time for the government to review this access agreement and either improve it or put more restrictions on cheese imports from EEC countries to Canada.

I would suggest that the responsibility for the control of all dairy products should rest with the Canadian Dairy Commission, which already manages dairy product export operations. It controls butter imports and has a vital over-all co-ordination role to play in carrying out federal government dairy policy.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Postmaster General (Mr. Smith).

Mr. Walter Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I rise with pleasure this evening to correct the unfounded and misleading statements which the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise) made in this House on January 25, 1977.

I should like to begin by advising hon. members that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has never proposed that the cheese import quota should be doubled. The global cheese import quota was first implemented in Canada in 1975 in support of the domestic supply-management program for industrial milk. Prior to this date, there was no limitation on the quantity of cheese which could be imported into this country. The government took this action under Article 11, section 2 subsection (c) of the GATT which permits the implementation of import restrictions in support of supply management programs. The maximum import level for all types of cheeses was maintained at 50 million pounds for 1976-77, and the Minister of Agriculture has already indicated on numerous occasions that this level will not be increased for the 1977-78 dairy year.

It should be noted that under this quota imports of cheddar cheese are limited to a maximum of one million pounds. The other 49 million pounds represent specialty cheeses. The market for these cheeses has increased rapidly in Canada in recent years to the point where it is now economically feasible for Canadian cheese manufacturers to produce some 60 varieties. However, Canada continues to import some 200 cheese varieties, the market of which for many of these does not justify their production in Canada. Hopefully, with increased consumption of these varieties, it will become economically feasible to produce them in Canada, as has happened with numerous other varieties of specialty cheeses.

The maintenance of the quota of 50 million pounds has permitted the domestic industry to absorb growth in the market such that the cheese sector accounted for some 31 million hundredweights of milk, or 30 per cent of the industrial milk supply in 1976, compared with 29 million hundredweights, or 27 per cent of industrial milk supply in 1975.

Rather than restricting opportunity in the Canadian cheese industry, the limit on imports has permitted it to look to the future with confidence.

MANPOWER—CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—FUNDS FOR NATIVE PROJECTS IN URBAN COMMUNITIES

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, we in this country, as in most countries in the industrialized western world, face severe unemployment. Figures released by Statistics Canada for January, 1977, indicate that there were 889,000 people unemployed. As far as I can tell, the government proposes to deal with this problem mainly by means of the Canada Works program. It proposes to spend $200 million in the 1977-78 fiscal year.

For phase one, the period beginning April 4, 1977, it has only allocated $60 million. According to my calculations, it proposes to spend approximately $6.25 per unemployed person in the next six months. In phase two, beginning October 31, 1977, the government proposes to spend $118 million.

President Carter of the United States faces about the same problem as Canada with an unemployment rate of about 7½ per cent. In the next two years he proposes to spend $16 billion on job creation, $8 billion a year. Canada has about one-tenth the population of the United States. If we were to emulate the U.S. proposal, we would spend about $800 million this year on job creation. Instead, the government proposes to spend $200 million.

The people most adversely affected by unemployment in this country are our native people. When we talk of 889,000 people unemployed, we have eliminated from our calculations the majority of our native people, certainly those in western Canada. They have worked so little on the reserves that they are not even included in the statistics compiled by Statistics Canada.

The Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) proposes in the Canada Works program special and separate allocations for works programs for Indians living on reserves. He said in a letter which went to every member of parliament dated February 1, 1977, and I quote:

> The purpose of this approach is to ensure that sufficient funds are available to deal with the particularly severe unemployment problem among this section of our population.

I agree with the minister that this constitutes a particularly severe problem. On many reserves as much as 80 per cent of the employable population is without employment. I agree completely with the decision of the minister to allocate special funds for work projects among the native people. What I object to very strenuously is the fact that allocation of these funds has been limited to Indian people living on reserves. Thus, in the province of Manitoba, for example, seven rural constituencies get special funds for native people, the amounts varying from Churchill with $843,000 in the next fiscal year, to Lisgar with $14,000.

I commend the minister for making a beginning for native people living on reserves. What I object to is that for the six urban constituencies in and around Winnipeg not one dollar is allocated for a special program. What we find in Manitoba is a situation in which the native population is increasing by between 3 and 4 per cent every year while the population on the reserves is remaining static, with the result the whole of the increase is effectively taking place in the city of Winnipeg. In that city there are now 10,000 registered native people and between 20,000 and 30,000 non-status people. The majority of both those groups live in the constituencies of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and myself. Most of them have no more that a grade five or grade six education. Their housing is the poorest. Their health is bad. A large percentage of them is unemployed and living on welfare.

It seems obvious the minister should extend the Canada Works program and the proposal to allocate money for native employment to include cities such as Winnipeg, Regina, Calgary and Vancouver which are facing increased problems as a result of the movement of native people from the reserves into the cities. I would urge the minister to reconsider his decision and to give favourable consideration to the question I raised on February 8.

Mr. Arthur Portelance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out that we give special attention to the natives when distributing funds for the Canada Works program. In the first place, we have provided a special allowance for status Indians living on reserves and on Crown lands. Indeed, since they are not included in the inquiry on people at work made by Statistics Canada and that they will probably not be eligible for unemployment insurance benefits, they would not otherwise be taken into consideration in the basic allocation of funds.

Likewise, we do not grant special allowances to status Indians nor to the Metis people who do not live on reserves, because they are not included in the inquiry on people at work. However, when the advisory commissions draw up the list of priorities submitted by non-status Indians, they also take in consideration the proposals from Metis and status Indians who are not living on reserves. In addition, if we do not receive enough reasonable suggestions from Indians living on reserves and on Crown lands of a riding, the unused funds are added to the riding's allowance and the Metis and status Indians who do not live on reserves get the priority in respect of these additional funds.

More precisely, about the electoral district of Winnipeg North, Mr. Speaker, I would add that the rate of surplus manpower is 6.01 per cent. Regular allowance amounted to $100,000. Since the riding does not include status Indians living on reserves nor on Crown lands, it has not received the special allowance that was intended.

In the ridings that did not receive a special allowance for Indians, the members of the advisory commissions have been asked to take into account the needs for employment in their riding and to give priority to suggestions made by sectors or groups where unemployment is the highest. If, in the electoral district of Winnipeg North, the natives living in cities represent a group where unemployment is high, I am sure the advisory commission will give them priority; further, considering the allowance made to Winnipeg North, I am convinced that the natives' needs will be met satisfactorily.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. A motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.27 p.m.

BILL OF RIGHTS

PROVISION OF FREE COPIES TO MEMBER FOR PRINCE ALBERT FOR DISTRIBUTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter which I hope will meet with the approval of all members of the House in view of its subject matter. In view of the government's desire to distribute material which will promote pride in Canada's traditions and history, as shown by the decision of the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) to expand the flag program to allow every member of parliament to distribute free 50 large Canadian flags, 200 small ones and 500 lapel pins, and in view of the importance to Canada's political and legal heritage of the concept of a Bill of Rights, I move, seconded by my distinguished seatmate the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather):

That in the opinion of this House the Department of Supply and Services should continue to supply the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) with free 18-inch by 24-inch copies of the Canadian Bill of Rights for distribution to Canadian institutions and citizens.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 the presentation of such a motion for debate cannot be done without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Ron Basford said no.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

EFFECT OF BOARD DECISION ON PAY OF FLOUR MILL EMPLOYEES ON CONSUMERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 concerning the serious situation which has developed in the province of Quebec over the non-delivery of bread. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House express its strong disapproval of the decision made by the Anti-Inflation Board to cancel the agreement between Quebec flourmills and their employees, because as a result of that decision many stores can no longer offer bread to Quebec consumers.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; therefore the motion cannot be put.

REQUEST U.S.S.R. REVIEW DECISION TO DENY PERMISSION TO PROFESSOR SALANSKY TO EMIGRATE TO ISRAEL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity related to imminent criminal proceedings in the U.S.S.R. against Professor Nahun Salansky—I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if you could ask the House to be quiet.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Vancouver South will realize that the difficulty is caused just as much by those who are close to him as by those who are far away.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fraser: Realizing that the difficulty was coming from both sides, I felt it appropriate that Your Honour should intervene.

I rise on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity related to imminent criminal proceedings in the U.S.S.R. against Professor Nahun Salansky, an internationally respected Soviet scientist who desires to emigrate to Israel. In view of the fact that a letter to the Ambassador of the U.S.S.R. from myself concerning Professor Salansky was delivered in Ottawa on January 31, 1977, but has been neither acknowledged nor answered, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather):

That this House request the Secretary of State for External Affairs to immediately ask the Ambassador of the U.S.S.R. in Canada to respond to the said letter and to inform the government of Canada what action, if any, the government of the U.S.S.R. is prepared to take to review the circumstances under which Professor Salansky and his wife and son are presently denied permission to emigrate to Israel.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be presented for debate only with unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

SUGGESTED PUBLICATION OF PLANS FOR FOOD POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. As this House is no doubt aware, thousands of volunteers across this country have designated next week as Canada Food Week to discuss the related issues of food and agriculture. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent):

That the government contribute to the discussion by making public its plans for a comprehensive food policy that will include recognition of the importance of agriculture to the Canadian economy.

Mr. Speaker: The motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ALLEGED COLLUSION IN THREAT OF BANKS AGAINST DAILY CALCULATION OF INTEREST ON DEPOSITS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, having been successful in getting the House to support a motion of mine under Standing Order 43 yesterday, I hope it will happen again today.

Mr. Dionne: I was not here yesterday.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member identifies himself as Mr. No. In view of the blackmail threatcned by the Canadian Bankers Association in its assertion as to the steps the 12 chartered banks it represents will take if they are required by law to calculate interest every day and credit their customers every month, and in view of the fact that this threat represents obvious collusion, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent):

That the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs be urged to launch an immediate investigation under the Combines Investigation Act into the collusion of the chartered banks in their threat against certain provisions of the proposed Borrowers and Depositors Protection Act.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House for the presentation of such a motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

TARGET FOR RATE OF INFLATION IN 1977—REASON FOR DELAYING BUDGET—DURATION OF CONTROL PERIOD

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The other day in the House I directed a question to the minister about the government's inflation targets for 1977. At that time the minister stated that his hopes of achieving their targets, and I think I quote him, were tempered by some of the difficulties of the economic situation. Since we now have a CPI increase of almost one per cent in January, the largest jump in some 13 or 14 months, is the minister prepared to give the country and the House some clear indication of the inflation targets for 1977 of the government of Canada?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would point out that on the year-over-year basis, the rate is at 6.1 per cent. As I indicated in my speech yesterday, and have on many previous occasions, we would anticipate that through 1977 there may be some increase in the consumer price index, but we are confident that we can bring that level down to the target which has been set out for some 15 months of 6 per cent by the end of 1977. I have to say that the prospects of getting below the 6 per cent rate in the current calendar year are difficult, but of course that does remain a target. We anticipate that there will be some increase in food prices, and other price elements in the consumer price index will not be coming down as quickly. But the target, which I have stated a number of times, of 6 per cent by the end of 1977 remains attainable, and depending on economic circumstances we are still hopeful we might go below that.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, clearly one of the factors upon which that will depend is government policy. Will the minister give the House some indication of when we can expect to have a budget from the government, and if it will not be in the next two to three weeks, will he tell us why he is delaying the introduction of a budget in a period when the CPI is going up, when unemployment is going up, and when the controls regime is clearly forcing a diversion of investment out of the country?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It seems to me that the last comment is without substantial foundation whatsoever. The government has indicated very strongly its policy with regard to inflation, that is to restrain the increase of expenditure at the public level, in support of the Bank of Canada to restrain the growth of the monetary mass in Canada, and, above all, to maintain the program of controls for the purpose of bringing down the increases in the consumer price index. I am now in the process of preparation and am indeed in pre-budget consultation and I will be indicating to the House, probably within a couple of weeks, the time in the next several months when we propose to make a budget presentation.

Mr. Clark: Did I understand the minister correctly to say that part of the program of the government is to maintain the controls, and if that is what the minister said, can he give the House some indication of how long the government intends to maintain the program of controls and when we might have a specific indication in that regard?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I have responded extensively on this point. The intention would be to maintain the controls for the year 1977, unless we can expect from major decision makers in the economy some strong commitment and support to restrain the kind of inflationary increases which might occur if the control program were taken off prematurely. This is the statement I have made on a number of occasions both in and out of the House.

REASON FOR PERMITTING GROWTH IN GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES—REASON FOR FAILURE TO REDUCE SALES TAX

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Finance. As the minister has indicated that it is government policy to restrain spending at the government level, which this week was indicated to be up again by 11 per cent in the coming fiscal year, would the minister indicate, if his target of a 6 per cent inflation in the current year is to be met with a real growth at 3.5 per cent, why is government spending contemplated to go up by 11 per cent, which would appear to be 1.5 per cent greater than the growth in the GNP?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): We have systematically set for ourselves a program over a period of time to reduce the percentage of the GNP that the government of Canada takes. I expect we will meet the target for the fiscal year 1976-77. We have set a lower target for 1977-78 and we expect to be able to meet it. Obviously, economic circumstances may vary within a year. It is important in expenditure planning to have longer term targets and systematic planning.

Mr. Stevens: My question is again for the Minister of Finance. As a reduction in the federal sales tax would be clearly deflationary in that this tax, being placed at the manufacturers level, triggers a pyramid of price increases, and in view of the fact that the tax is one of the most regressive of all taxes, hitting the poor relatively more than higher income people, would the minister indicate why his department has been so reluctant to reduce this tax?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. gentleman may not be aware that the manufacturers' level sales tax is not applicable on very many of the basic commodities which make up the demands of Canadians, and I am referring here to food, clothing and other articles. The manufacturers' level sales tax is applied very substantially elsewhere throughout the economy, as I indicated in the budget debate. If I recall the figures, I think to eliminate the manufacturers' level sales tax would require the equivalent of a 25 per cent increase in personal income tax.

Mr. Stevens: Or cut your spending.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. gentleman says we should cut spending. Presumably, he would advocate a greater increase in unemployment, which is something we would not like to have at this time.

REASON FOR DIFFERENCE BETWEEN CANADIAN AND UNITED STATES RATES OF INFLATION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): The minister referred to the current CPI figure in Canada. Would he indicate why, with controls, we are not doing as well in controlling inflation in Canada as they are in the United States without controls, where the over-all price increase based on total expenditures is 4.8 per cent compared with the 9 per cent increase in Canada?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): The hon. gentleman will recognize, I hope, that contrary to what has been said at some points, the controls program has not been restrictive in Canada, particularly on the wage side. The goal is to bring the rate of inflation down slowly. We have succeeded in doing so to this point without having to go to the levels of recession to which the United States' economy went several years ago.

Mr. Stevens: They have less unemployment than we do.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): If the hon. member is recommending for the Canadian economy a 6 per cent recession, as the American economy had, then I think hon. members would wonder about his judgment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Oral Questions

AGRICULTURE

DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF FOOD POLICY AND ACTION TO DEAL WITH ITEMS RELATED TO FOOD PRODUCTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Since the major reason for the increase in the consumer price index is the 1.2 per cent increase in the cost of food, including almost all food items, and since the cabinet received a recommendation, I understand, from its D.M.10 group at a cabinet meeting which took place in the first week of June last year that the government should prepare a comprehensive national food policy, I would like to ask the Prime Minister when we might expect such a comprehensive policy announcement from the government.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we do not contemplate any announcement. We intend to enact our policy as it is decided.

Mr. Broadbent: Could the Prime Minister inform us when we might expect these particular enactments from the government? I am thinking of the fact that the controls program does not apply to most of the components which make up the consumer price index as it affects food, so I would like to ask the Prime Minister if the detailed announcements to which he refers will cover such items as energy costs and the cost of the implements which are used in the production of food. Will they pertain to farm income, which dropped 20 per cent recently, and will the Prime Minister have something to say about competition policy as it affects the cost of food?

Mr. Trudeau: Some of the elements mentioned by the hon. member are controlled now. Energy, farm implements and the whole distribution and processing process are under the anti-inflation guidelines now. As far as other policies are concerned, they will be announced from time to time.

Mr. Broadbent: Given the very real need for a comprehensive approach to food policy both from a consumer and a producer point of view, and given the need to meet in an honest way the difficult trade-offs which are involved, would the Prime Minister explain to the House why the cabinet turned down the recommendation it received from its senior group of civil servants last June to come forward with a comprehensive national food policy?

Mr. Trudeau: I am not aware that we turned down anything. We have been examining policies put forward by various departments and deputy ministers, and we have been adopting or modifying various elements of them.

ENERGY

KITIMAT PIPELINE—CONDITIONS PRECEDENT TO APPROVAL

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Canadians will receive no initial oil supply from the currently proposed Kitimat pipeline, and British Columbia will develop a domestic shortfall of oil from Alberta in the early 1980's. Can the government assure parliament that before any approvals are given for such a pipeline condition, tied to such approval will be surety of supply to Canadians from such a pipeline, longtime economic benefits not just to the United States but also to Canada, and secure environmental safeguards?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is anticipating the kind of considerations that the National Energy Board would give to the application before it now. I have indicated in the House that the government would of course consider the recommendations of the National Energy Board. They would also wait to receive the environmental impact studies which are to be undertaken before making a decision.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF LEGISLATION TO MAKE CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL LAWS EQUIVALENT TO THOSE OF UNITED STATES

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. In view of the statement of a former Liberal member of parliament and leader of the British Columbia Liberal Party that the United States authorities believe our environmental legislation both at federal and provincial levels is inferior to United States federal and state legislation, and therefore a Canadian tanker terminal and pipeline could be built without the studies and safeguards that would be insisted upon in the United States, will the Prime Minister assure the House that supplemental legislation that will make Canadian environmental legislation not only equal to but superior to United States legislation, will be introduced and implemented in Canada before any approvals are given for pipelines?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I apologize. I will have to take notice of the question. Perhaps the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources can help on this.

KITIMAT PIPELINE—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF PUBLIC HEARINGS AND DISCLOSURE OF ENVIRONMENTAL IMPACT STUDIES

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the Prime Minister assure the House that environmental hearings proposed by the Minister of the Environment will include the right of all interested parties to participate in the hearings and that all information gathered in environmental assessments will be made available to parliament and the public in order that full public debate and disclosure will ensure environmental safeguards rather than that the Kitimat pipeline will be chosen only because it is the proposal of least resistance?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, it might be wise for me to read the question carefully before trying to answer it fully. I can tell the hon. member, however, that our approach is that we are in favour of public hearings. We are canvassing now to see the type of person who could direct them. I have taken the very clear position that we want all the knowledge and facts to be open on the issues. I hope the debate will take place with full knowledge of the facts.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADIAN POLICY ON ESTABLISHMENT OF TANKER PORT ON WEST COAST—SUGGESTION KITIMAT PIPELINE WAS ACCEPTABLE TO CABINET

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs to whom questions were put yesterday by the hon. member for Vancouver South. I believe the minister wanted a day to bring himself up to date. Can he tell the House whether it is the Canadian position that there be a single tanker port on the west coast or that we will accept multiple or more than one supertanker port on the west coast?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me an opportunity to answer. There is no declared policy with regard to either a single port or multiple ports because the issue is still being examined by all parties concerned, including myself and the premier of British Columbia as recently as yesterday. The whole issue is being explored. I am not in a position personally to judge whether a single port would be the best alternative but if it turns out that is the case, then that is the position we will advocate.

Mr. Jarvis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the minister was talking to the premier yesterday, and in view of allegations or specific statements in the British Columbia Energy Commission report of last September that the Kitimat proposal was generally acceptable to cabinet, which the Prime Minister described yesterday as being grossly misinformed, is the minister in a position to tell the House whether he has been able to determine the source of that information? In other words, who in the cabinet grossly misinformed the British Columbia Energy Commission?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, it must have been the same person who grossly misinformed the hon. member.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

PRODUCTION OF METHANOL FROM SURPLUS WOOD—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. A preliminary report entitled "An economic pre-feasibility study" has recently been released by the minister dealing with the production of methanol from surplus wood. Intergroup Consultants of Winnipeg in their report foresee a major new Canadian industry creating up to 49,000 new jobs and producing up to five billion gallons of methanol annually, worth $800 million. Could the minister advise the House what steps the government will take to verify the preliminary findings, and has he consulted with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources about this exciting breakthrough?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I certainly found that the briefing on this subject offered exciting prospects. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and my department support continued research in this area which can offer interesting prospects for Canada.

THE BUDGET

REASON FOR DELAY OF PRESENTATION

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, may I return to questioning the Minister of Finance? Since this has been a week of record announcements, record unemployment and record inflation—

An hon. Member: And record questions.

Mr. Grafftey: —may I ask the minister this question? Although the inflation and unemployment rate in the United States is lower than in Canada, and since President Carter had hardly put his feet under his desk than he put before Congress a comprehensive package to tackle the same problem facing Canada as well as the United States, I ask, why does the minister, when the situation is worse in Canada than in the United States where they are acting, sit on his hands and wait for an indeterminate date while his officials prepare a budget?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I pointed out yesterday, and I refer the hon. gentleman to my remarks, the government of Canada through the various measures which are now operative put forward a greater percentage program for stimulating personal disposable income than did President Carter.

Mr. Stevens: That is not correct.

Oral Questions

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

SUGGESTED ADOPTION OF NEW CONSUMER PRICE INDEX—ACTION TO STIMULATE ECONOMY

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since, according to our analysis on this side of the House, our consumer price index takes into account only a very small percentage of the increase in prices, as compared with the index in the United States, and since the system here does not give us a comparable rate, when will a new index be used by the Canadian government, to show the people really how bad the situation is? And, in answering the hon. member for York-Simcoe, did the minister really believe that by controlling government expenditures and properly stimulating the private sector we would be increasing the inflation rate in this country? In other words, when are we going to have action from this government in the middle of a cold, sad winter?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I repeat, effective as at the beginning of this year there has been, in substance, a $3 billion transfer in the direction of personal disposable incomes.

An hon. Member: Oh! It was $1.7 billion yesterday.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I suggest to the hon. gentleman that the kinds of measures which his leader was suggesting yesterday are now operative in this economy. In percentage terms they are greater than those put forward by President Carter. The suggestion that the hon. member has a new consumer price index, or a new statistical system which we should follow, I find interesting. It might be useful if he were to submit his findings to my colleague the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Statistics Canada might have something to say about it.

ALLEGED HARDSHIP CAUSED SENIOR CITIZENS BY INDEXING PENSIONS ON BASIS OF CONSUMER PRICE INDEX—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Finance. Having toured this country to learn the quality of life of our senior citizens, and noting that the food component of the consumer price index jumped upward 1.2 per cent in January, which caused the over-all consumer price index to rise by 0.9 per cent, the largest monthly increase since November, 1975, and noting as well that senior citizens of Canada will still lose part of their buying power for bare essentials, despite indexing, I ask if the minister is aware that old age security benefits as indexed through the consumer price index really do not assist senior citizens who are primarily interested in costs of food, clothing and housing? Will he admit that, for these people, the formula used is creating a hardship?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think it is difficult in a general consumer price index to make certain that it measures the demands of everyone in the economy. I do not imagine that even the personal indexing system as proposed by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi would be able to satisfy that. The fact is, there will be some differences between the impacts on different groups in the community. I think it is fair to observe that if the food component is particularly important to this group, and it is important to all Canadians, that they have really been very much the beneficiaries of the very substantial drop in food prices which has occurred over the last ten months.

Mr. Alexander: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Notwithstanding the minister's unacceptable answer and his belief that it is impossible to derive some formula which would assist our senior citizens, will the minister explore all avenues, in order to determine whether it is possible to introduce a better formula for indexing old age security pensions and thereby give our senior citizens a break?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to discuss this with the Minister of National Health and Welfare. As for the food component, may I point out to the hon. gentleman again that it is below the level of one year ago.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED REPRESENTATION TO SOVIET UNION TO ADHERE TO HELSINKI AGREEMENT AND RELEASE CERTAIN PEOPLE

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would the minister consider making representations to the government of the U.S.S.R., urging it to abide by the agreement signed at Helsinki and protesting the imprisonment of certain persons and the violation of human rights in recent months in the U.S.S.R., as has the United States secretary of state in the last couple of weeks.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, yes. I answered that question in a different form earlier in the week. Certainly, there will be periodic representations made on the question; they will be made not merely to the U.S.S.R. but to other countries as well which we feel are not living up to either the spirit or the letter of the Helsinki accord.

Mr. Orlikow: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister consider making representations to the government of the U.S.S.R., urging the release of the people imprisoned recently, including Mykola Rudenko and Oleksii Tykhyi, Alexander Ginzburg and Amnur Zavurov, to mention just a few of those imprisoned in recent months.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, as I said, I answered that question previously and the answer is yes, Mr. Speaker.

REQUEST FOR REPRESENTATIONS TO SOVIET UNION TO RELEASE NAHUN SALANSKY

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs? It arises out of my motion moved earlier this morning and the letter which I delivered to the ambassador of the U.S.S.R. in Ottawa on January 31 concerning Nahun Salansky who is presently being denied the right to emigrate from the U.S.S.R. to Israel. I gave the minister notice of my question.

May I ask the minister to use his good offices, get in touch with the ambassador of the U.S.S.R. here, in Ottawa, and ask what action, if any, has been taken with respect to the letter; also, could he impress on the ambassador that any action he could take or any review which the government of the U.S.S.R. might make in this matter would be a humane and compassionate act and go a long way toward being a symbolic act in favour of the principles of the Helsinki accord?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. I have also read the comprehensive letter to the Soviet ambassador. I will make inquiries immediately as to whether we have already made representations in this case. Certainly, I will do everything within our power to call this matter to the attention of the appropriate Soviet authorities.

POST OFFICE

CHALLENGE OF MANITOBA COMMUNITY NEWSPAPERS ASSOCIATION ON MAIL DELIVERY—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF HAYS REPORT

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. Is the hon. gentleman aware of the challenge issued by the Manitoba Community Newspapers Association, to the effect that they can deliver their papers faster by pony express than by mail?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: All the way to Sturgeon Falls.

Mr. Dinsdale: Is the Postmaster General willing to bet on the outcome of the challenge and will he accept the invitation to be present at the climax of the contest?

● (1140)

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out that although they have issued a challenge they want to wait until spring. They do not want to have the race in the wintertime. I shall be pleased to accept that challenge. This is a contest which undoubtedly the Post Office will win. I know the quality of the horse flesh in Manitoba, having seen some pretty fine performances there, but I am sure the Post Office has no competition at all from the pony express or any other express which is in vogue in this country.

Mr. Dinsdale: In view of the continuing tarnished public image of the Post Office, as demonstrated by this incident in Manitoba, and in the interest of freedom of information and helpful public discussion, would the hon. gentleman table the Hays Report on the post office which, according to press reports, contains constructive criticisms and excellent recommendations on reforms to be carried out in order to restore Canada's mail service to its former high level of efficiency?

Mr. Blais: A large measure of the recommendations in that report have already been implemented. The report has received a great deal of publicity and evidently it is available to the press. I shall consider his recommendation very seriously.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR COST OF MAILING LOTO CANADA FLYERS

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Postmaster General. Can the hon. gentleman tell us who paid for the flyers being distributed to support the purchase of Loto Canada tickets and who paid for the mailing of those flyers?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): I did not receive notice of that question but I will look into it for the hon. member's information. I am very pleased that Loto Canada has looked to the mails as a means of informing people of this worthwhile program. I would hope that all governments, whether at federal, provincial or municipal level, will do the same.

Mr. Ellis: Provided they pay for it.

POSSIBILITY OF TRANSFERRING CERTAIN AGRICULTURAL AGENCIES TO JURISDICTION OF CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister since it concerns a question of government reorganization. In view of the fact that the current edition of Farm and Country reports that the federal government may be giving serious consideration to transferring the National Farm Products Marketing Council and its agencies, plus the Canadian Dairy Commission, to the jurisdiction of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and states: "Farm groups have not been consulted and agriculture minister Eugene Whelan may still be in the dark", can the Prime Minister assure us that the report is unfounded and that no consideration has been given to such a proposal?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I have never heard of it, so I doubt whether anything is proceeding in that direction.

INDUSTRY

MEASURES TO PROTECT SHOE MANUFACTURERS

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, but in his absence I will put it to the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of the threat of massive lay-offs in the shoe industry in Canada, does the government intend to take measures similar to those it took last November 29, I think, to protect the Canadian textile industry?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will take note of the question and discuss it with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. However, I thank the hon. member for his notice.

TRANSPORT

WEST COAST FERRIES—IMBALANCE OF SUBSIDIES FOR EAST AND WEST COAST SERVICES

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question, also, is for the Prime Minister. In his answer to the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra on December 22, 1976 at page 2244, with reference to subsidies for west coast ferries, the right hon. gentleman said: "There is an element still to be decided". Will the Prime Minister tell us whether he has yet decided that element, how much money he is prepared to allocate to the west coast ferries to ensure that the gross imbalance in the subsidy as between the east and west coasts can be rectified in a manner which is fairer to the taxpayers of British Columbia?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): This is a question for the Minister of Transport. I will take notice of it on his behalf.

WEST COAST FERRIES—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF LETTERS EXPLAINING FEDERAL VIEWPOINT ON SUBSIDIES

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): The Prime Minister has informed the House that the federal point of view is explained in letters exchanged between the Prime Minister and the premier of British Columbia. Will he kindly table these letters so that the rest of us can be privy to his rationalization of the 100 to one imbalance between east coast and west coast ferry subsidies?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): If I cannot table the letters, at least I will try to persuade the hon. member, through argument, that his figures are grossly unbalanced.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFUSAL OF PERMIT TO EXPORT CESIUM TO SOVIET UNION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed either to the Secretary of State for External Affairs or to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In 1976, a permit to export 150 metric tons of crude cesium ore to the U.S.S.R was refused by ITC, although trade had taken place involving this commodity for the previous seven years. Is a ban now in effect on cesium exports and, if so, has action been taken to stockpile this valuable material in order that domestic research into its use as a catalyst to prolong the life of fossil fuel can be undertaken, thus creating employment, and especially allowing mines such as Tantalum Mines at Bernic Lake, Manitoba, to continue operations?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I recall hearing some months ago about the prohibition of this particular export. I am not in a position at the moment to say whether shipments have been resumed or whether the material is still on the restricted list but I will make inquiries and see what, if anything, can be done. My recollection is that cesium is regarded as being in the category of strategic materials but I will have to look into the matter more deeply.

DEPARTMENTAL RESPONSIBILITY FOR PROPOSED YOUTH CORPS—DATE OF ACTION ON PROPOSAL

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): A question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. On October 14 last year the right hon. gentleman and his cabinet colleagues indicated in the Speech from the Throne that the government intended to set up a youth corps. Since that time we have heard little about it, other than a comment by the Minister of National Defence to the effect that it might be environmentally oriented and that he did not know whether it would be under the jurisdiction of his department or not—perhaps it would be under the Minister of Manpower and Immigration or the Minister of the Environment. Has the government yet decided, some five months after the announcement, which minister will be responsible for the youth corps?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): If the hon. member checks the record he will find we have already implemented a great many of the programs set out in the Speech from the Throne and we intend to implement a great many more before the end of the session.

Mr. Dick: Which minister will be responsible?

Mr. Trudeau: You will see.

Mr. Dick: In view of the fact that more than five months have gone by since the government made the announcement—and obviously before making the announcement they did not think it out—is it the intention of the government to wait another five months before taking action on youth unemployment generally?

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member should realize that the Speech from the Throne addresses itself to the program for the entire session. It is not abnormal that in the first half of the session we should only implement the first half of what is mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. What does he expect us to do in the next half—adjourn the House?

VETERANS AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF PENSIONS FOR WIDOWS OF VETERANS WHOSE DISABILITY PENSION WAS LESS THAN FORTY-EIGHT PER CENT

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Veterans Affairs I should like to address my question to his parliamentary secretary. In doing so, may I say that this party wishes the minister a speedy recovery. In addition, we are even willing to support him in bringing in legislation which should have been brought in many years ago. Can the parliamentary secretary report to the House on the minister's position with regard to introducing legislation to do away with the glaring discrimination against widows whose veterans husbands died when receiving a disability pension of less than 48 per cent?

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): First, let me say I was speaking to the minister yesterday and expect he will be leaving hospital today. He is doing well, and will not be long away from the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Railton: As far as the widows are concerned, a letter has just come to the department from the widows of prisoners of war, and I know that this question of the widows to whom the hon. member referred is under consideration, together with other matters which were left over from last year. I am quite certain that the minister will have something to announce by way of legislation within the next two or three weeks.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INVESTIGATION OF COST OF EXCESSIVE CONCENTRATION BY SUPERMARKET CHAINS—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I also have to ask a question of the Prime Minister, in view of the absence of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It has been about one year now since the Mallen report told the government that excessive concentration by supermarket chains cost Canadian consumers an extra four cents on every food dollar which they spent. Will the Prime Minister tell the House what are the results of the investigation which the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs promised to conduct into this situation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will inquire of the minister when he returns to Ottawa.

PROPOSED MONITORING OF SUPERMARKET CHAINS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): May I try a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, in case the Prime Minister is aware of the answer? In June, in a memo to cabinet, DM's 10 group said that the government should admit that important concentration and market power problems exist in food processing, distribution and retailing, and recommends that the competition bureau make this sector a priority for monitoring under stage two of the Competition Act. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether or not he knows this will be done.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne has stated that phase two of the Competition Act will be introduced this session and that is still our intention.

POSSIBILITY OF ADDITIONAL GUIDELINES FOR CONDUCT OF CROWN CORPORATIONS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board arising out of a report to the board of directors of Polysar on certain invoicing and payment practices in Polysar International. I should like to ask the minister whether any consideration is being given to introducing standards of business conduct similar to the 17 which were proposed to the board of directors of Polysar, excellent ones I might say. Would the minister indicate whether it is his intention to consider those codes in addition to the announcement which he made to the House on December 16 involving corporate codes of conduct in regard to Crown corporations doing business within Canada and outside Canada.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the guidelines which I announced on behalf of the government in December the hon. member is already familiar with. The whole question of better financial control and management of Crown corporations is under intense examination, but there will be some announcement in the fairly immediate future with regard to this.

Mr. Mazankowski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Having regard to the fact that the board of directors has been forced to impose these new standards of conduct, could I ask the minister whether he is actively investigating any other corporations with a view to determining whether in fact such similar codes should be asserted as well with respect to other corporations? Is this going on as part of the investigatory process which he is undertaking?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I would not call it an investigatory process but an awareness that there has to be a general improvement in the financial management and control of Crown corporations. We are also doing this in consideration of the very serious problem of accepting the accountability factors which we have established in parliament over many years. All of those considerations are going into this intense examination to which I have referred.

OLYMPIC GAMES

NUMBER OF UNSOLD SILVER COINS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General. In view of the fact that ample time has passed in order to complete any remaining Olympic coin orders, would the minister now advise the House as to the number of silver Olympic coins which are left unsold, and what plans does the government have to dispose of them?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. gentleman would like us to have completed all the sorting out and tying of loose ends in the coins program. Unfortunately, we have not as yet done this. As he knows, we have had some difficulties relating to orders which were computerized and which eventually were lost, and which we are now trying to recoup. I am not at this time in a position to indicate to the hon. gentleman how many coins will be left after all of the orders have been filled.

Mr. Jelinek: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. There have been some reports leaked from the Mint to the effect that there exists an over-run of several hundred million dollars worth of unsold silver coins. I should like to ask the minister whether he is denying this allegation, and at the same time would he advise the House whether or not the over-run, whatever it may be, will be melted down in due course, and who will bear the cost?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I cannot comment on a leak.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe I overlooked a final supplementary from the hon. member for Vegreville.

[Mr. Mazankowski.]

GUIDELINES FOR CONDUCT OF CROWN CORPORATIONS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Thank you, Mr. Speaker; I appreciate your indulgence. I simply wanted to point out to the minister that I appreciate the fact that the investigation is under way into the financial management and control and accountability aspects, but my question really concerns more the matter of business conduct, morality and ethics rather than the broad question of financial management and control. I am simply asking the minister whether he has engaged in an investigation of that kind in addition to the one to which he alluded.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can elaborate further on the guidelines which were announced in the House. All Crown corporations, either directly or through the ministers responsible, have been advised of the significance which we attach to the conduct of Crown corporations in this whole field, and the guidelines have indeed been conveyed to them and to all ministers. At the time I announced the guidelines I indicated to the opposition that we would very much welcome their suggestions on how they could be further improved. So in that general sense I do not think we are in disagreement.

NATIONAL BUILDING CODE

REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF RESTRICTION ON USE OF PLASTIC BATHROOM FIXTURES

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of State for Science and Technology and the minister responsible for DREE, I will direct my question to the Minister of Public Works whose department is involved in the substance of my question. The National Research Council has recently changed the building code putting serious restrictions on the usage of plastic bathroom fixtures. This is seriously hindering the development of Boeing of Canada Limited in Winnipeg and other plastic manufacturing firms across Canada. This is ludicrous, Mr. Speaker, as DREE has made a substantial grant, not a loan, to Boeing to expand their facilities and to create jobs. I would ask the minister whether he would investigate and have this restriction removed from the national building code.

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to draw this representation to the attention of my colleagues.

Mr. McKenzie: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister also investigate why the National Research Council has not accepted the invitation of Boeing to visit their plant so they can gain firsthand understanding and knowledge that these plastic products will not catch fire?

Mr. Buchanan: Again the same response, Mr. Speaker.

DAIRYING—REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT ABSORB EXPORT CHARGES

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, in view of the absence of the Minister of Agriculture and his parliamentary secretary, I shall put my question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

As the Minister of Urban Affairs admitted barely ten days ago on television that the government had erred in its dairy policy; as that policy has led to in the last year the disappearance of hundreds of dairy producers, specially in Quebec, and as the government has not agreed to absorb the cost of export costs as does the European Economic Community in the case of its dairy producers, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if, under those circumstances and bearing in mind the hardships of the dairy producers, he is willing to comply with the recommendations of the federation to the effect that the government absorb export costs which, in the main, caused most of the dairy producers' problems. Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed to add that among the dairy producers who were forced to give up dairying and who are having problems, there are a few Liberals for they are not all PQ members.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not have with me what the minister may have said, but I should be surprised if he did not point out that the federal government pours hundreds of millions of dollars in subsidies to the dairy producers. The only matter to be settled now is that of the order in which those subsidies should be paid. Surely, the hon. member knows that we cannot continue indefinitely to pay subsidies to every sector of the population. In the case of dairy producers, we have a policy based on quotas. It is imperative that all parties concerned, producers as well as the board, respect those quotas. If they are not respected, I ask that the government not consider itself responsible.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. At the beginning of the sitting today I moved a motion under Standing Order 43, the purpose of which was to ask the unanimous consent of the House to continue to supply the right hon. member for Prince Albert with copies of the Canadian Bill of Rights, in accordance with the past history of the Canadian Bill of Rights which I think has been an important instrument in terms of our country and its legal system. Unfortunately, an hon. member said "no". I immediately checked the blues and, as Your Honour will recall, I accused the Minister of Justice—in a rather loud voice, I am afraid—of having said "no". I have found, and it has been confirmed by my colleagues, that I was wrong, and I wish to withdraw that imputation—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): —and to express my regrets through you, sir, for having imputed that "no" to the minister. I have subsequently found, and it has been confirmed by my colleagues and admitted by the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne), that it was he, in fact, who shouted "no", and I think that the record should be corrected.

• (1200)

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, on the question of privilege, I appreciate the hon. member's gracious withdrawal and correction of the record. I can appreciate that he may have been confused. In fact, I indicated yes to his motion. I did so because in five minutes' time, in the course of a speech I will be making in the House, I will be paying a very handsome tribute to the Bill of Rights and the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I did, indeed, say "no" to the hon. member's motion, for the simple reason that his motion asked for a special privilege for a single member of this House. If the hon. member wants some time to again ask the House to give the same privilege to all members, I will not say no.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is easily seen that in its basic nature this is a point of order as opposed to a question of privilege. I am not even sure whether it is a valid point of order. The difficulty we get into in attempting to elaborate on considerations in the minds of hon. members with regard to the giving or withholding of unanimous consent pursuant to Standing Order 43, of course, gives us difficulty. It does not constitute a question of privilege. It might make a very interesting discussion which might go on for some time, but I feel that with our precedents and standing orders we ought to terminate the discussion of the matter on this basis, at least at this moment.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, I want to approach this question in a somewhat different way. I hope the House will bear with me for a moment or two. I am pleased that the Prime Minister is here.

An hon. Member: He is here every day.

Mr. Coates: It is very important for all members of this House to give serious thought to the specific problem facing us, in the hope that we can solve it in a non-partisan, non-political way.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Coates: If hon. members will bear with me for a moment, they may discover what I am trying to do. I am very concerned about my country, as are all members of this House. It is important that we try in a positive way to do all we can to keep Canada together.

The Bill of Rights is one of those instruments that guarantees to all Canadians a degree of freedom that did not exist before 1960, when it was conceived, no matter what jurists and legal experts felt about it prior to that date. The Drybones case in the Supreme Court of Canada confirmed for all time that the Bill of Rights is a special protection for Canadians and we should have it enshrined as part of our constitution for all time. We are very fortunate that we still have in this House the father of the Bill of Rights, the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: At his age, the right hon. member does not have to look for votes in order to stay here. Therefore, whatever he does with the time he has left, whether it be signing a copy of the Bill of Rights for a school, court, individual or group of individuals, it is something very special. Rather than saying it is a special right for a special member, if the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi were to think about it for a little while, I believe he would see that it is a wonderful thing for people, groups and schools to have a copy of the Bill of Rights signed by the person who conceived it and brought it about.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: At the same time, hon. members may wish to have some helpful information that is being produced by the management and members' services committee. Following the proposal of the hon. member for Fraser Valley West we are considering the production of Bill of Rights certificates in English and French, and flag proclamation certificates in English and French. They will be available to all members of this House at a very special rate—at cost. The committee is considering producing 25,000 copies of the Bill of Rights certificates in both English and French, a total of 50,000, and 25,000 flag proclamation certificates in both English and French. This will total 100,000 certificates. The certificates will be available in two sizes. The 9 by 11 size will cost 12 cents, and the 18 by 24 will cost 17 cents. This is a substantial reduction in the—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I recognize, as I am sure all members do, the best intentions of the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North who is serving in a very distinguished way as chairman of the important Standing Committee on Management and Members' Services. However, there are some confines to a point of order. There is other House business. I therefore invite the hon. member to complete his remarks.

Mr. Coates: May I just finish by saying that at our meeting next Wednesday we will pass a motion that will be turned over to Mr. Speaker. It will then be sent to the commissioners of internal economy. Rather than having a charge of something like $1.25 each, I hope there will be a reasonable charge for the certificates in question and that all members will take advantage of this opportunity.

Mr. Harquail: Mr. Speaker, I noticed in yesterday's Hansard that the hon. member for Moncton raised a point of order with regard to my remarks as reported in Hansard for Wednesday, February 9, at page 2896 referring to inscriptions on a plaque in the city hall in the city of Moncton. Let me state that the remarks which are attributed to me as reported on Wednesday, February 9, at page 2896 of Hansard are correctly attributed to me. I stand by those remarks. The statement which I made is correct and requires no change on my part. I therefore stand by this statement as recorded in Hansard.

FOOD SAFETY INFORMATION ACT

DISSEMINATION OF SCIENTIFIC INFORMATION ON SUBSTANCES INTRODUCED IN FOOD SYSTEM

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-395, respecting the release of scientific information dealing with the content of any substance found in the food system.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill is to make available to other levels of government, independent scientists, consumer groups or interested persons any scientific information gathered by the government of Canada in the course of the analysis of any new substance introduced in the food system intentionally or by accident, or any scientific information existing in relation to a substance already introduced in the food system.

This legislation would protect the public by enabling them to secure any scientific data—confidential or not, old or new—concerning any substance incorporated into the food system, with a description of any contaminant or additive contained in that substance.

PROCEDURE AND ORGANIZATION

COMMITTEE STUDY OF STANDING ORDERS AND HOUSE PROCEDURE

On the order: Government notices of motions:

February 10, 1977—The President of the Privy Council:

That the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization be authorized to consider the Standing Orders of the House and Procedure in both the House and its committees;

That the committee be authorized to include in its reports drafts of proposed permanent or temporary Standing Orders drawn to give effect, if concurred in by the House, to any permanent or temporary change or changes proposed by the committee; and

That the evidence adduced by the committee in its consideration of the aforementioned matters during the first session of the thirtieth parliament be referred to the committee.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to section 2 of Standing Order 21, this government notice of motion stands transferred to and ordered for consideration under government orders later this day.

ROUGH FISH—MAXIMUM THEORETICAL SUSTAINED YIELD

Question No. 827—Mr. Yewchuk:

What is the maximum theoretical sustained yield at which all rough fish might be fished from Canadian lakes now open to commercial fishing, if the economics of a fishery for these species were favourable?

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): The management of rough fish as a resource is a provincial responsibility. Potential harvest of rough fish was obtained by summing up the individual estimates submitted by each province and the Northwest Territories. The data indicates the potential harvest exceeds 87 million pounds.

CISCO—MAXIMUM THEORETICAL SUSTAINED YIELD

Question No. 828—Mr. Yewchuk:

What is the maximum theoretical sustained yield at which cisco might be fished from Canadian lakes now open to commercial fishing?

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): The management of cisco as a resource is a provincial responsibility. Potential harvest of cisco was obtained by summing up the individual estimates submitted by each province and the Northwest Territories. The data indicates the potential harvest at 11,500,000 pounds.

ROUGH FISH—TONNAGE CAUGHT

Question No. 829—Mr. Yewchuk:

What tonnage of rough fish was caught by commercial fishermen in (a) Alberta (b) Saskatchewan (c) Manitoba (d) the Northwest Territories in 1975 but spoiled for lack of a market?

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): The following figures outline the approximate poundage of rough fish caught by commercial fishermen but not marketable due to low prices or marketability. (a) 300,000 lbs. (b) 1,600,000 lbs. (c) 5,500,000 lbs. (d) 400,000 lbs.

NOTE: This figure is to be considered as the estimated incidental catch presently harvested by fishermen in the western region. The total figure is dependent on variables such as mesh size and specific type of fishery. The poundage caught is not to be considered as the potential harvest.

PUBLIC SERVANTS DISMISSED OR DISCHARGED BECAUSE OF DISSATISFACTION WITH THEIR PERFORMANCE

Question No. 1,176—Mr. Herbert:

1. In each of the past ten years, how many public servants have been dismissed or discharged because of dissatisfaction with their performance?

2. What are the salary ranges of these persons?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Public Service Commission as follows: 1. Separations of Employees under the Public Service Employment Act.

	1969	1970	1971	1972	1973	1974	1975	1976
Discharge for misconduct	57	64	53	78	141	95	71	112
Release for incompetence or incapacity	71	131	130	141	129	168	140	114
Rejection on probation	481	450	461	469	535	695	685	681
*Revocation of appointment				49	2	15	39	26

* NOTE: Comparative data not available for 1969, 1970 and 1971.

2. The information requested is not available from the records of the Public Service Commission. In view of the workload that would involve all the departments, the Government does not feel justified in undertaking a review of all individual files.

SHRIMP FISHERY—GULF OF ST. LAWRENCE

Question No. 1,188—Mr. Marshall:

1. Have any measures been taken by the Department of the Environment to limit the number of vessels permitted to fish shrimp in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and particularly in the Constituency of Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe and, if so, what are they?

2. What are the names and addresses of the members of the Shrimp Fishery Committee in the Province of Newfoundland?

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): 1. In June 1976 control measures including a freeze on the number of licences to be issued was implemented for the shrimp fishery in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Following this, a Shrimp Fishing Advisory Committee made up of fishermen and others was established in Newfoundland to develop guidelines for the effective management of this fishery. The formation of a similar Committee for the Maritimes is now being proposed. The Newfoundland Shrimp Advisory Committee has held three meetings and under the guidelines developed it is expected that some fishermen all from the constituency of Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe will obtain shrimp fishing licences.

2. The names and addresses of the members of the Shrimp Fisheries Committee in the Province of Newfoundland are as follows: John Goodman, Port Saunders, Nfld.; Gene Gould, Port aux Choix, Nfld.; Dwight Spence, Port aux Choix, Nfld.; Chesley Genge, Anchor Point, Nfld.; Clyde Smith, Manager Fisheries Products Ltd., Port aux Choix, Nfld.; Lester Riche, Dept. Fisheries & Environment; E. Sandeman, Scientific Advisor, Biological Station, St. John's, Nfld.; Clar Fisher, Economic Advisor, St. John's, Nfld.

MINISTER WITHOUT PORTFOLIO

Question No. 1,316—Mr. Beatty:

1. With the exception of routine attendance at Cabinet meetings and meetings of subcommittees of Cabinet, what is a full and complete description of the special responsibilities given to the Minister without Portfolio by the Prime Minister as of December 10, 1976?

2. Since his appointment as Minister without Portfolio, has the Minister ever used government aircraft for travel and, if so, what were (a) the dates of the trips (b) the points of departure and arrival (c) the government business requiring the Minister's use of the aircraft?

3. What additional staff is the Minister without Portfolio entitled to, if any, as a result of his appointment to the Cabinet?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): 1. The Minister without Portfolio is a member of the Ministry. As such, he shares with his colleagues collective responsibility for all policies of the Government. This general responsibility of the Minister without Portfolio follows a long established tradition that enables a particular Government to benefit from the advice of one of its members without that member being required to undertake specific departmental responsibilities.

2. No.

3. All ministers are entitled to an exempt staff. The Minister without Portfolio has appointed two employees under Section 37(1) of the Public Service Employment Act.

POLICY WITH RESPECT TO CURTAILMENT OF LETTER CARRIER DELIVERY SERVICE

Question No. 1,340—Mr. Howie:

Has the Post Office Department a policy permitting no extension of letter carrier service and, if so, on what date did it commence?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Effective November 18, 1975, the Post Office Department, in line with Federal policy on restraint in spending, deferred until further notice extensions of letter carrier service into areas that are beyond existing route boundaries.

MERCURY IMPORTS

Question No. 1,386—Mr. Leggatt:

1. How much mercury has been imported into Canada for industrial organic processes over the past five years?

2. What controls exist to regulate the discharge of this mercury into the (a) air (b) water?

3. How much methyl-mercury has been used in Canada as a catalytic process over the past five years?

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): 1. Approximately 90,000 pounds of mercury have been imported into Canada over the past five years for industrial organic processes.

2. We do not anticipate that the uses under which mercury is being utilized in the organic chemical industry are causing a significant pollution problem. These uses however, are presently under review through the Environmental Contaminants Act. The general provisions of the Fisheries Act could be utilized anytime a problem with mercury discharges from an industry is found.

3. We are not aware of any use in Canada over the past five years of methyl-mercury catalysts in the organic chemical processing industry.

POST OFFICES IN WELLINGTON-GREY-DUFFERIN-WATERLOO CONSTITUENCY

DVA POSITIONS DESIGNATED BILINGUAL

Question No. 1,460—Mr. Herbert:

How many positions in the (a) Canadian Pension Commission (b) Pension Review Board (c) War Veterans Allowance Board (d) Bureau of Pension Advocates (e) veterans services, treatment services and administration services of the Department of Veterans Affairs are designated bilingual?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): (a) 128; (b) 11; (c) 29; (d) 26; (e) 1,175.

DVA EMPLOYEES—AGE BRACKET

Question No. 1,557—Mr. Marshall:

Of the 841 on staff in the Department of Veterans Affairs, how many are between (a) 20 and 30 (b) 31 and 40 (c) 41 and 50 (d) 51 and 60 (e) 61 and 65 years of age?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Eight hundred forty-one was the head office staff strength as of March 31, 1976. (a) 257; (b) 120; (c) 116; (d) 253; (e) 65. Thirty were under 20 or over 65.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

MEASURE TO PROTECT PRIVACY OF INDIVIDUALS

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-25, to extend the present laws in Canada that proscribe discrimination and that protect the privacy of individuals, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of satisfaction that I see today the end of a period of frustration for me and other supporters of this bill as we open the debate on second reading of the Canadian Human Rights Act, Bill C-25. It is timely that we discuss this bill at this time and that we pass it as expeditiously as parliamentary procedures will allow. Throughout the country there has been considerable discussion of human rights matters. In this chamber the discussion has raised the broad issue of the rights of a citizen to have access to the personal information about himself or herself that is held by government departments or agencies.

Elsewhere, away from this House, there has also been voiced deep and urgent concern in various parts of the country about the extent of racism and other illegitimate forms of discrimination being practised in our country, and we see in the news media from time to time reports of nasty racial incidents which have occurred to an extent where one provincial government has found it necessary to appoint a royal commission on certain aspects of the problem. It is, therefore, a matter of some satisfaction for me to be able to rise and state that there is now a bill before parliament which addresses both these and other issues connected with human rights within federal jurisdiction and addresses them in a comprehensive legislative way.

I suspect there are many people in the country who imagine that there is no discrimination in Canada and no need to act. Sadly, however—I know members on all sides will agree with me—it is a fact that there are some among us who are prepared to subvert our basic values by denying the basic rights of others. Their activities are deplorable. But it is not enough for us in parliament to deplore. We must also act, and act so as to ensure that the confidence of minorities in the protection afforded by the law is honoured and upheld.

Of course, no single piece of legislation can automatically, at the stroke of a pen, wipe out racism and discrimination overnight or change deepseated social attitudes, prejudices or hatreds. But without this bill at the federal level, victims of racist activities or of discrimination can point to the absence of a federal law and ask: Where is this country's, or this parliament's commitment to uphold tolerance, and where is this country's, or this parliament's legal protection that we need?

The purpose behind this bill is clear. It provides protection by giving effect to the following principles explicitly set out in clause 2 which reads:

Every individual should have an equal opportunity with other individuals to make for himself or herself the life that he or she is able and wishes to have, consistent with his or her duties and obligations as a member of society, without being hindered in or prevented from doing so by discriminatory practices—

Then, as well:

(b) the privacy of individuals should be protected to the greatest extent consistent with public order and well-being.

These are principles which rest upon the inherent dignity and the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family. These are principles as fundamental as freedom itself. The freedoms for which liberal western societies strive are set out in well known landmark documents: the English Bill of Rights of 1689, the French Declaration of the Rights of Man and Citizen, the American Bill of Rights, and the Universal Declaration of the Rights of Man. Each of those statements was the result of historic struggles to defend dignity and freedom. Each of those statements sets forth the principles and standards by which all free societies stand ready to be judged. Those standards include equal entitlement to all rights and freedoms including equal opportunity for self-realization and the enjoyment of life. It may surprise hon. members to learn that at present there is no over-all protection of these freedoms at the federal level. There are no comprehensive guarantees against infringement within federal jurisdiction by corporations, citizens or government of many basic egalitarian rights Canadians should enjoy.

The Canadian Bill of Rights of 1960 provides principles for courts and officials to follow in interpreting federal laws. I pay tribute to a former prime minister, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) who passed the Canadian Bill of Rights which is now being given increasing force and effect by our courts. However, that law does not set standards for behaviour or impose any sanctions. Right now, a Pakistani who was refused service in a dining car on the CNR because the waiter disliked his looks would probably have no legal avenue of redress.

There is partial protection at the present time against discrimination in employment in that part of the private sector which is under federal jurisdiction. Part I of the Canada Labour Code, which deals with fair employment practices, applies to employment by organizations such as banks, railways and others under the jurisdiction of parliament. I pay tribute to the valuable work which successive ministers of labour and officials of the Department of Labour have done under the existing provisions of the Canada Labour Code.

However, that code does not include employment by the Crown in right of Canada. It does not cover these public servants in any way. Nor does it cover discrimination by age, sex, marital status or physical handicap. There is some protection against discrimination in government employment. As yet, however, there is no act of parliament which provides over-all, comprehensive prohibition of discriminatory conduct by officials and private individuals within the federal domain. These are significant lapses in the legal protection to which Canadians are entitled and which they deserve. These are significant gaps in the legal protection offered, for example, to the many women of Canada whose careers are seriously limited by sexism on the job, or to members of many minority groups for whom the relentless pressure of discrimination is too often a reality. In a free society like ours, in a multicultural and open society like ours, in a country made up of two founding peoples but which has also been built and peopled by those who have come from all over the world, and of all races and colours, to build their lives and their families, it is essential that we put into law and into practice within the federal jurisdiction a clear commitment to equality of opportunity and to protection from discrimination. The Canadian human rights bill is designed to provide that clear commitment and to provide, at long last, the comprehensive body of law now lacking at the federal level, a body of law to which all Canadians will be able to resort.

The anti-discrimination provisions of the bill declare the following to be prohibited grounds of discrimination: race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, age, sex, marital status, a conviction for which a pardon has been granted, and physical handicap for employment, where the handicap does not affect job performance. In choosing these grounds we have concentrated on major issues which have already been the subject of human rights legislation in Canada and the United States, on which a substantial body of law has emerged and upon which the proposed human rights commission can build. These prohibitions against discriminatory conduct will apply to all federal departments and agencies and any business or industry under federal jurisdiction.

As a further protection again racism, the bill contains a measure proscribing the dissemination of hate over the telephone. I think those of us who were here in parliament at the time, felt that we had dealt with this issue in the amendments to the Criminal Code which were passed relating to hate, but new practices have emerged. Under this bill the sending of repeated hate messages over federally-regulated telephones would be prohibited. The measure is more rigorous than section 281.2 of the Criminal Code, but it avoids—or I have endeavoured to draft it in such a way as to avoid—interference with legitimate expression of opinion.

These measures dealing with telephone hate messages are designed to provide an effective supplement to the provisions of the Criminal Code to combat the calculating traffickers in hate whose foul activities subvert the confidence of racial minorities in the protection that they are entitled to feel under the law. I might say in passing that the introduction of this bill seems to have attracted the attention of those hatemongers who use the telephone in this way, in that they have at least been diverted from the dirt they have disseminated about black people or people of the Jewish faith and have now instead directed their messages of hate to Roy McMurtry and myself—so at least we have provided protection for two minorities.

The bill also contains measures to combat sexism and sex role stereotyping at the workplace. About 30 recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women would be wholly or partially implemented or made easier to implement by the passage of this bill. Upon passage this will bring the number of status of women commission recommendations implemented, partially implemented or whose implementation has been facilitated to 103 of the 122 recommendations directed to the federal government in the commission's 1970 report.

Besides including grounds for discrimination such as sex and marital status which are not covered by the Canada Labour Code, the bill also requires that equal pay be given for work of equal value. This is the first time the language "work of equal value" has been used in Canadian law to express equal pay requirements. The Canada Labour Code, the earlier version of this bill and provincial statutes in this regard required only that equal pay be given for similar work. There was no consideration of value. In the course of the preparation of this bill and the consideration of the earlier one, I consulted with and listened to various women's rights organizations who are involved in this matter and who contend that under the previous formulation women employees could be hived off into low-paid "job ghettos" where they would never have a chance to do work similar to that of men. In these job ghettos women can be paid less even though the jobs are of equal value.

Let us consider, for example, a hypothetical trucking firm engaged in interprovincial or international activities. Perhaps all the women employees are office workers, while the male employees are dispatchers. Since these are similar jobs, equal pay would not be required under the old formulation. Under this bill, it will be possible to compare the effort, the skill, the responsibility and the conditions of work in the two jobs and to determine if they are of equal value. It is for this reason that the women's rights organizations wanted the equal value concept embodied in the law. That is why the International Labour Organization included this concept in its convention which Canada ratified in 1972. That is why I have included it for the first time in Canadian law through this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Basford: In connection with this new formula, I want to pay tribute to those in the advisory committee on the status of women, and the various organizations concerned about women's rights, for their work and their advice to me on this subject, and I want to pay particular tribute to my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue (Miss Begin) who was a member of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women and whose advice has been very helpful.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Basford: I would like to pay tribute also to the hon. member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson) who has spoken on the subject with great knowledge, interest and conviction in this House since her election.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Basford: I am sure that before this bill is passed we will be told by some that this concept of equal value will place an intolerable burden upon employers. I do not accept that and I would like to make it very clear right now, beyond any possibility of misunderstanding, that as a parliament we would be wrong to accept that the economy of this country can survive only on the basis of unequal pay for women doing work equal in value to that being done by men. Enforcement of these and other provisions will be carried out under the proposed legislation by a human rights commission. The commission will have wide powers, including the power to establish tribunals able to impose severe financial penalties.

● (1230)

Besides initiating and seeing to the investigation of complaints, the commission would be able to issue guidelines interpreting the application of the act. The commission as it gains experience will, I hope, under the provisions of the legislation consider and recommend to parliament that the prohibited grounds of discrimination be broadened or added to as circumstances warrant. As benefits a body one of whose tasks will be to sit in judgment on government conduct, the human rights commission because, for example, of all the provisions that relate to the federal public sector as well as the private public sector, would unlike those in some other jurisdictions, will be independent of government and responsible only to parliament.

In preparing the bill, I have noted the comments of people like Mr. Borovoy of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association who generally have supported the bill but who have made the valid comment that the real test of this legislation and of our commitment to act against discriminatory practices is whether the commission will have the personnel and the budget to carry out its mandate effectively. When the bill reaches committee we are going to examine the question of resources and a proposed budget. It has been planned, in conjunction with Treasury Board, to give the commission the personnel and resources to carry out its mandate. I agree with those who say that the question of resources is crucial to the real effectiveness of the commission and I am satisfied that what we will be proposing will meet with approval.

Turning to a different aspect of the bill, that is, part IV, Mr. Speaker, I noted in my introductory remarks that apart from the question of discrimination, the question of individual access to government records is not a uniquely Canadian issue. It is a problem faced by most highly developed societies. My officials and I have carefully studied the experience of these countries. We believe the provisions in the human rights bill provide the widest possible access and the firmest safeguards consistent with our parliamentary system and the interest of the public as a whole. I believe that the provisions of this bill, taken as a whole, will give Canadians more effective protection against administrative misuse of personal information in government files than that now enjoyed by citizens of the United States.

The United States privacy act and part IV of Bill C-25 have the same basic objectives. Both acts have basically the same approach to providing access through the creation of a federal index of personal information banks. Both acts provide for an individual to see his file and to propose changes if the individual feels that errors exist. Both acts provide for administration procedures to warn users of the file that the subject of the record objects to particular information in the record if an institution refuses to make corrections.

There are, however, certain differences which lead me to believe that the protection afforded under this bill of the rights to Canadians with respect to abuse of their personal information in government banks is effectively greater than the rights of Americans. Under the United States act, the non-elected head of any agency can decide whether an information bank is exempt from access. Under Bill C-25, it is not a bureaucrat but an elected minister who, in the case of a whole information bank, must first obtain the approval of the governor in council before any exemptions from access can be granted. Moreover, under the United States act there are certain blanket exemptions. An entire information bank can be exempted just because it belongs to the Central Intelligence Agency. In Canada, access to the data banks of the most sensitive agencies is not automatically excluded.

As a further safeguard against administrative or other abuse of personal information in government files, the bill requires that a member of the human rights commission be appointed privacy commissioner, with the power to review at public expense any complaint by any individual that he or she is being denied rights under this part of the act. Like the Auditor General or the Official Languages Commissioner, the privacy commissioner would be independent of the government and would report at least annually to parliament, and could include—and under the act is empowered to include—in his report accounts of individual cases where an error or injustice is not rectified. This approach is consistent with our parliamentary system of responsible government. It rests the ultimate responsibility for decisions concerning access to personal information upon the minister responsible to parliament. Establishing the office of privacy commissioner will make the government more accountable to parliament and, through parliament, to all Canadians.

I indicated at the beginning of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, that I share the frustration of those who are disappointed at this point that the bill has not yet been passed into law. We are now on second reading and I hope we will make good progress. There are members of this House who have deep knowledge of the matters raised in the bill and who will want to make a contribution to debate and to the committee proceedings. There are other groups in the community involved with this issue who I know, from correspondence and discussions with them, will want to make suggestions to the parliamentary committee for changes in the law. All of that is welcome and I hope we will be able to agree in a non-partisan way that this bill be passed by this House and the other place and made the law of the land by June 30 this year. I hope that those who want to come to parliament and make suggestions about the bill will make them in a constructive, non-partisan way in order to help us reach that objective of enactment by June 30.

Nearly 30 years ago Canada and the other members of the United Nations approved the Universal Declaration of the Rights of man. About 17 years ago we passed the Canadian Bill of Rights. In the meantime, Canada has acceded to two further international instruments on the subject of human rights: the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. It is time we met the urgent need for a domestic charter against discrimination recognized by all as a commitment to building a nation in which denial of equal rights and opportunities is totally unacceptable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, first may I thank the minister for the shortness of his speech. I am not sure whether I can be as brief. I have the problem, at twenty minutes to one, that unless I can finish in twenty minutes my train of thought might be interrupted. I do not think the minister need worry too much about his June 30 target. From the point of view of my party, I can tell the minister that we welcome the bill and will be anxious to see it progress as rapidly as possible, given the fact—as the minister himself said—that it is important that not only ministers but others speak to this bill at this stage. I do not see that there will be any disposition to hold it up, although there will be a disposition in committee to suggest and recommend, in the non-partisan way the minister asked for, some amendments that may improve the law. That is an undertaking which I gladly give on behalf of the party of which I am proud to be a part.

For many years I have been carrying around a little quotation. I think it puts the matter in perspective. The quotation is from a Russian émigré to Paris, a philosopher and theologian called Berdyaev. He said that the law may compel men to be just, but it cannot compel them to be brothers. Pity, mercy, love—these are works of grace in freedom and not works of a compelling law. I think the minister agrees with that sentiment. It is not enough, as the minister admits by introducing this bill, to have before us such injunctions from splendid philosophers. There is a duty on us, as legislators, to put in place a code or frame of reference which would allow those elements which philosophers want to be part of our citizenship to come into play.

I was not in this House when the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) introduced the Bill of Rights. The common law lawyers of this country universally condemned that concept—and I am not being partisan; I am trying to put this question in its historical perspective. The common law lawyers said that the bill was an unnecessary frill in our jurisprudence. I remember my own misgivings, I having been brought up in that tradition which was concerned about these things being set down in statute form. Yet, as the minister says, not all in this country are of the common law tradition. We are of many traditions, and it is important to have the human rights commission in place and to have the Bill of Rights. I hope to serve here long enough to see us enshrine the Bill of Rights as an inviolate part of our constitutional arrangements when we patriate the constitution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fairweather: The minister may remember that the common law lawyers objected to the Bill of Rights. There was some debate about it. I will not comment on how the Bill of Rights has been used over the years. I happen to think it has been a useful code for those who otherwise might have strayed, and my remarks apply to those acting within the jurisdiction of the government of Canada.

I also happen to think that we have very few commonly shared heritages. Obviously, a Bill of Rights of some 17 years standing and a flag adopted in 1965, I think, are not yet enshrined in the minds of all Canadians as part of their shared heritage; but they will be, I am sure. Similarly, I hope that the proposed human rights commission, the establishment of which, after all, follows that of the ten human rights commissions now in place in the provinces, will give Canadians the feeling that in this land they can move about and participate without fear of discrimination.

It is curious that within five days of ten years ago, on February 16, 1967, the government established the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. Three and a half years later, on September 28, 1970, the commission tabled its report and recommendations, including the establishment of a human rights commission. In July, 1975, the then minister of justice introduced Bill C-72. In November, 1976, the present bill was introduced. Perhaps it will interest those who read the reports of our debates to know that I was fascinated, as a member of parliament, to watch the by-play—that may not be an accurate description—to watch the nervousness among members of the public service with regard to the privacy part of the bill.

I was privy to one or two secrets, if I may say so. You cannot live in this community without at some time rubbing shoulders with some of the first-rate public servants who serve our country. I know that the privacy provisions of the bill underwent at least 15 drafts. I do not think there were any cardiac arrests during that period, but there were some pretty nervous people in the public service who thought that at last the government was going to bell the sacred cow of secrecy. That will not come about; it is not part of the bill. I think the Canadian Bar Association told the minister what has to be done in the area of secrecy. Nevertheless, it is amusing and somewhat worrying to note that many who serve the country in the public service are worried about information being freely available.

As I have said, the present bill was introduced in November, 1976. It has two main purposes. The intention is, first, to prohibit discrimination on certain grounds within federal jurisdiction; second, to establish certain measures to protect the privacy of individuals. I hope hon. member will not mind if I quote a paragraph or two from the 1970 recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. At page 65 of the report the commission recommended:

—that (a) federal . . . human rights commission be set up that would

(a) be directly responsible to parliament—

The minister proposes to do this. I continue quoting:

(b) have power to investigate the administration of human rights legislation as well as the power to enforce the law by laying charges and prosecuting offenders;

(c) include within the organization for a period of seven to ten years, a division dealing specifically with the protection of women's rights; and

(d) suggest changes in human rights legislation and promote widespread respect for human rights.

Presumably, once the commission has been set up that last recommendation will be included in its ongoing obligations. I listened carefully to what the minister said. He suggested that the Advisory Council on the Status of Women during the years since 1970 has been commenting, urging and recommending. I think this is the appropriate time to compliment it on its restlessness about this legislation. The council has been positive in its views. As far as I can tell, it has been quite non-discriminating—if I can use that word—about its requests. It has been free to come and give recommendations to opposition party spokesmen, and so on. I agree with the minister that although the bill in its present form may not meet all the council's urgings, at least the legislation has been launched. In 1975 the Advisory Council on the Status of Women made a statement which recognized:

—the crucial need for federal involvement in the human rights area, not only from the point of view of the status of women but in the context of the increased racial and other tensions manifest in our society—

It recommended the immediate tabling of the human rights legislation, and here we are at last. I am sorry to note that one part of the advisory council's statement is brutally, demeaningly true, sorry that there is indeed an increase in racial and other tensions manifest in our country. We will not serve our constituents or our country if we fail to recognize this fact. It is not only confined to one or two of the great metropolitan areas. I think of the evil jokes spread across the country. Perhaps somebody has done a study.

● (1250)

It seems to me that if you could trace the racial joke or the ethnic joke, it would follow the waves of the settlement of this country. In other words, historians could pick out the jokes which were told about one minority 100 years ago and find them recurring as the waves of immigration took place. To put it in another way, the Newfoundlander today is all too often the recipient of the same type of demeaning comment as the Polish Canadian would have been 50 years ago, and presumably the Irish Canadian 100 years ago. Perhaps somebody has done a study on those lines. I am not a behavioural scientist, but I know that this form of humour is still very demeaning to the part of our society which is the butt of these jokes.

The minister was right when he spoke of the use of the telephone. It is curious that these bullying cowards do these things using our technology. They paint out the signs at night.

Nobody would paint out a bilingual sign in the daytime. Few people would dare to perpetrate the type of language they use on the telephone if they had to do it face to face. But unsigned letters come to all of us and, of course, the telephone is used for the same type of thing. Unhappily, there are some who, because of the length of time during which they have been in the country or the disability from which they might suffer or, if I can put it this way without being arrogant, from a lack of serenity or assurance with regard to their acceptance in society, are put off by this type of thing. It is unfortunate, in my view, but legislation is the only solution if it is to be stopped.

I was curious to find a reference to a friend of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp). I am sure the hon. member for Eglinton knows the works of Thomas Carlyle. Carlyle said we have no duty of tolerance to the intolerant. At one stage of my life I would have been overcome by a statement like that, but I do not think Carlyle was right. It was very nice in the leather-bound books of the day, but we cannot be satisfied with that type of aphorism. We have to be intolerant and that is why in the ultimate resort the technology of the telephone hate campaign has to be interrupted by a statute. It will not end it, but it will be evidence in the statute books of the country.

Really, what the government is attempting in the human rights legislation might be likened to lighting a candle toward respect for each and every human being. I suggest that the cultivation of such respect requires more than law. It requires a fundamental commitment to the worth of human kind. I do not mean to preach, but it occurs to me that to respect, you have to work at it. It is often not easy for those of us who are democrats to respect everybody at all times. It requires a fundamental commitment on our part. I am not sure, but I suspect that respect for one's brother is not innate in our psyche; it has to be nurtured and worked on. Surely the minister and others who will be participating in this debate and who are committed to human rights would agree that a wound to my brother wounds me, and that the outrage in the subway, whether it is to somebody in Toronto, Vancouver or Fundy-Royal—because none of us is immune—is wounding ourselves.

I have been fascinated by the phenomenon in the United States of the television program "Roots" which was seen by more Americans than any other program since the invention of that technology. There was an example of a group of American citizens for whom a large part of their history was unknown. The fact that the program took a family through from its origins in West Africa until the present day must have been compelling for both black and white Americans.

Lastly, on this point, because it is about one o'clock, I might say that the small "1" liberal "schtick" of inviting a black to break bread with you might not work out the way you expect it to. He may not share one's own aspirations with regard to material things, for instance. Jules Feiffer pointed this out in a powerful cartoon. The answer is, if you ask one black to lunch, ask two in case it doesn't work out.

May I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, I did complain about having my speech interrupted by the lunch hour, but I find now I have to withdraw a couple of things. One is my complaint about that. Then to my horror I find I was much too tough on Thomas Carlyle. In any race for immortality between myself and Thomas Carlyle, Carlyle would obviously win, and he has done so again. What I was trying to say was that we could not be tolerant of intolerance. I have had discussions with certain people who find that even with the most liberal editing they could not make head nor tail of my attempt to savage poor Carlyle, so the only thing to do is what the lawyers call confession and avoidance. I make it clear that the hon. member for Eglinton is not a contemporary of Thomas Carlyle.

In getting some thoughts together for this speech today, I came across another curious paradox. It has to do with Eldridge Cleaver who ten years ago was sought in the capitals of America and the world as being an outrageous radical, as undoubtedly I think he was. Among other things, Eldridge Cleaver went to Cuba and found his radicalism tested there because the generals in Cuba are white and the foot soldiers black; at least, that is what he said. So a lot of things happened even in American society to tell people that discrimination has no boundaries in the world, and no matter what the ideology, discrimination and racism can creep in. To Cleaver's credit, in this regard in any event, he saw the error of earlier days.

Another paradox I want to cite is a peculiarly Canadian phenomenon. I refer to people who sing brotherhood songs at service clubs on Monday and then busily go to private clubs which discriminate on the basis of colour, creed, and so on, on Tuesday. This is in no way an indictment of the service clubs, because I think they have contributed immeasurably to Canada. But in 1977 there is, surely, no place for any club, private or otherwise, the membership of which is affected by racial origin, colour or what have you. I must say that there is a high degree of hypocrisy in this aspect of our contemporary life. I assume that discrimination and prejudice have their origins in fear and threat, a threat to what people think of as their own little piece of earth, because there can be no other basis on which such cruelty is founded. I should like to end the philosophical part of these few remarks with the thought that one definition of "man" surely is that he is a hoping creature. Once man gives up hope, he gives up everything. Hope is an essential condition of our very humanity.

I should like to compliment the minister and others who have had a part to play in this bill. The bill is an expression, in legislative form, of the hope that we have that practices that are outlawed will end some day in Canada. The greatest hope we could have, of course, is that the commissioners themselves could, in that utopian day, work themselves out of a job. I do not believe that would ever happen, but it would be the ultimate of man's feelings about man.

As I said earlier, there are human rights commissions now in place in all ten of the provinces. This bill will apply to the federal jurisdiction and also to the Yukon and Northwest Territories. The minister was quick to confess that it will not in itself end discrimination. There is a fascinating book on the whole subject of discrimination and prejudice written by an expert, Gordon W. Allport, entitled "The Nature of Prejudice". He writes:

> Legislation, if enforced, may be a sharp tool in the battle against discrimination. Legal action, however, has only an indirect bearing on the reduction of personal prejudice. It cannot coerce thoughts or instill subjective tolerance. Law is meant to control the outward expression of intolerance. But outward expression, psychology knows, has an eventual effect on inner habits of thought and feeling. For this reason legislative action can be listed as one of the major methods of reducing, not only public discrimination, but private prejudice as well.

In a way, that is what I was trying to say this morning about the Bill of Rights, that its eventual effect on people will be that they know that they and others have rights, and the eventual effect on people in the human rights field will be the same.

There are, of course, some criticisms. Because the House has been rather generous to me about time, I will not go through all of them. I will save that part for the committee stage. Here I want to say how helpful the Canadian Association of University Teachers have been. They think that political views, family relationships and sexual orientation should be included as grounds. They are also concerned about physical handicaps, the restrictive way in which the legislation is now drafted. They feel that the matters related to employment, that is the phrase in the statute, appear to exclude the physically handicapped from the protection of clauses 5 and 6.

There was another very interesting comment. I heard it spontaneously. I think another member will be raising it later, so I just note it in passing. Most of the comments about age are with regard to pension and retirement. Actually, age is a prohibited ground of discrimination. Clause 7 states that employment cannot be denied on the ground of age, but clause 14 refers to normal age of retirement. Therefore, it would not be illegal to fire an employee because he has reached retirement age. In committee we will have to consider whether the bill condones systematic discrimination in the form of compulsory retirement, or possibly even a statement from the minister at the committee stage will suffice.

Others have commented, including the Advisory Council on the Status of Women, that there is not sufficient protection in this bill for the handicapped in matters other than employment. The minister spent a good deal of time on the new phraseology "work of equal value". I was particularly interested in what he had to say. We have to confess that many employers have taken advantage of this sort of grouping throughout the years. Presumably the hon. member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson), who will be speaking, will address herself to this matter. We have had some very interesting conversations with people who have reflected on this aspect, including the Ontario ministry of labour which put out a pamphlet in October of last year entitled "Equal Pay for Work of Equal Value". They discuss some of the dilemmas. Again, I am not going to read into the record that long discussion. However, the House should be reminded of some of the difficulties.

To the extent that formal processes for comparison of jobs would be required by government, rather than merely encouraged or assisted, equal pay for work of equal value would carry with it a presumption of increased intervention by government in the collective bargaining and wage determination process. The question arises whether this is desirable or acceptable. Reactions to the federal government's heightened role in this area since the anti-inflation controls took effect in October, 1975, suggests that no consensus presently exists on the question. Despite the minister's comment about it, I hope that perhaps from this debate and what other people will say some of the dilemmas can be laid to rest.

Countries such as Belgium, Luxembourg, Ireland, West Germany, Denmark, France, the United Kingdom, Italy and The Netherlands have also attempted to deal with the removal of sex discriminatory pay situations and have generally accepted the principle that pay rates be established using a single set of criteria for both sexes. However, there seems to be quite widespread recognition that progress toward equal pay for work of equal value has been slow. Just because I make this gloomy comment— it is actually a gloomy comment from the Ontario government's paper—does not mean that my party or anyone else who has thought about this matter does not support what the minister is trying to say. Perhaps I had better withdraw those comments. I would expect that a large part of the work of the new commission will be trying to make this part of the law applied fairly.

There are one or two further comments I would like to make. In clause 12 there is another definition of a discriminatory practice. The Advisory Council on the Status of Women feels that this clause is far too limited because it applies only to published notices and signs. The advisory council feels that advertising in other media should not be overlooked. The clause does not seem to attack the problem of, for example, stereotypes that are rampant in the advertising world about women.

Others in my party, particularly the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), will be dealing carefully and thoroughly with what I might call the second part of the bill dealing with privacy. I think it is fair to make this comment, and I do it without any particular partisan feeling. Had this bill been part of the law of Canada, the type of activity that we witnessed in the last couple of weeks, the so-called blacklist, would in itself have been an infraction. If not, then this law is not very effective.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): It is an infraction of natural justice.

Mr. Fairweather: My colleague says it is an infraction of natural justice. Natural justice is one thing. I want it to be an infraction of statutory legislation. If it is not, the bill does not do what many of us had hoped for. I have given a lot of thought to the list, as have many members. I presume that this is a place where we can offer gratuitous advice and not be considered self-righteous. Anyway, we will try it out on hon. members. The problem of the list was that it was not stopped where it started. It was elevated into an evil thing because it was not stopped by the minister whose desk it came across. It was given credence because it was trotted around into various other offices.

I must say that had the solicitor general of the day been fulfilling the responsibility I would have expected of him, he would have destroyed the list. I am one of those outrageous people who welcomes the funding of some of the groups the government has been funding. The government was hoist with its own—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Petard.

Mr. Fairweather: Well, I wanted something better than "petard". I am hoist with my own cliché, really. However, the government seems to be nervous about risks. It takes risks once in a while by funding organizations and then seems surprised that some of the people who attend conferences say things the government does not particularly like to hear. This becomes elevated into some sort of a documental state warning the ministry that so-and-so may eventually bring about the downfall of western democracy. I have never been as nervous about western democracy or about the Canadian government as this government seems to be, and I hope that in future this type of thing can be stopped where it should be, in the hands of the minister—I suspect that it will be, and I mean this as a compliment to the new minister—or else that public servants will have a right to deal with it under the legislation.

The House has been very indulgent. When I started I said to the minister that this party understands the timetable. It has been ten years almost to the day since the royal commission was established. The bill has been drifting around Ottawa for some time in one form or another, and although other people will want to make their contributions the bill will be supported by this party at second reading. However, we will be expecting, particularly on the privacy part of the bill, substantial amendments at the committee stage. But neither the minister nor the government need have any doubt about the feelings of the Progressive Conservative party about the need for Canada to fall in line with the provinces with regard to having human rights legislation.

One last thing: the fact is often overlooked that sometimes we can do things in this country rather well. One place where some things are done very well is the province of Ontario, where the human rights commission and the operation of the act are among the best in North America. I hope nobody runs for cover or gets out a red covered partisan manual refuting that. In other parts of the world Ontario is looked upon as a bellwether in the human rights field. I hope that this government, being the national government, can supplant in excellence what Ontario has been able to do.

Just a few moments ago I had a discussion with the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow). He may be wanting to speak, but he said something very wise and it provides me with a neat ending. He said he hoped that most of the work—and I am paraphrasing him—of the commission will be in conciliation and not in prosecution. I believe very deeply that the fewer prosecutions and the more conciliation, the better it will be for the human rights commission, because that will mean that slowly there shall be public acceptance for the concept.

Mr. Brewin: I wanted to use that in my speech.

Mr. Fairweather: I hear the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) saying that I am using his speech, too. I am sorry. Perhaps the two hon. members met, and perhaps it is time I sat down. However, I want to say, with no reservation, that the concept of human rights, so long being born, is enthusiastically supported, generally speaking, by the Progressive Conservative party.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to assure the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) that I was not complaining about his quoting something said to him by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow). What I did say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North was that I had also intended to quote his remarks, so perhaps I will do so later in my speech. I certainly have no objection to the hon. member for Fundy-Royal doing so.

I can set the mind of the minister at rest very quickly on one score, and that is that this party will support this bill at second reading. We have no desire whatever to hold it up. If we were going to comment in terms of time, we would be likely to comment that we should have seen the bill sooner. However, we are certainly not going to be in any sense responsible for its not passing quickly. There are matters which have to be examined thoroughly. This is a very important bill and we propose to do our duty, but we think that can be done without taking a great deal of time in this case. Those parts of the present bill which proscribe discrimination have been supported by this party for a long time and we will continue to support that principle by voting in support of the bill at second reading.

Those kind remarks in no way refer to part IV of the bill which is entitled "protection of personal information". We regard that part of the bill as being a farce and we think that the Canadian Bar Association rightly described it as totally inadequate. I shall deal further with that matter later. There are some matters which will have to be discussed in committee, of course, but there is no purpose in holding up second reading by dealing with any of those details.

We certainly approve extending the prohibitions against discrimination to discrimination on the grounds of age, sex, marital status or physical handicaps. To us, this bill—which might have been produced before now—is timely because it is obvious that there is a serious danger of the poison of racial feelings being expressed in a way which is entirely damaging and harmful to our community. Most of us who have been around a little while can recall the immense burden of human suffering which was caused by racial discrimination flowing from so-called racial superiority, and we certainly support provisions to prohibit the various forms of discrimination which are mentioned.

I would also like to join with the hon. member for Fundy-Royal in commending the excellent contribution made in this field by the Royal Commission on the Status of Women, which made recommendations along these lines in 1970, for the persistence with which it has carried them out. I commend that because I think it is important to know that although things in this parliament sometimes go slowly, if people are persistent in good causes they can sometimes get results. This is a cheering illustration of a case where results have followed a very persistent, informed and reasonable presentation of a case.

I single out the women's movements of this country, and the special committees upon which they have worked, for special notice because I think they deserve it. Even at this hour I have a copy of background notes on this bill which were prepared for the Advisory Council on the Status of Women and only made available in January of 1977. I hope that the committee, when it gets the bill, will have, not a vast number of witnesses, because that would delay the matter, but some experienced witnesses to deal with the act who will make their suggestions and give us their advice.

A problem is raised on the question of retirement. The phrase used is that there shall be no discrimination in regard to age, or the normal age of retirement, in dealing with that type of discrimination, but my recollection is that that is not well defined and is left to the impersonal operations of the market. So that if it becomes customary in some industries to retire people at the age of 30 or 40, then presumably the bill has no application. I think that should be looked into very carefully.

There is another factor which we think should be looked into very carefully. That is, as has been mentioned already by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal, that—as I think is the case in nearly all the provincial acts dealing with this subject matter—stress should be laid on a process of conciliation. It is all very well to have sanctions and prosecutions in the courts, but I am not at all satisfied that the courts, which sometimes lack experience in this type of matter, are necessarily the best instruments in which to seek enforcement of the bill. They may have their part to play, but there is a process of conciliation, a process for seeking to get a change of mind, an attitude as well as merely formal compliance with the act. We think the bill requires to be carefully looked at to see whether adequate machinery is provided encouraging that type of conciliation which has been proven useful in other jurisdictions.

There is an exception which we think is dangerous; that is the one which exempts action which can be described as a bona fide occupational requirement. There is no definition of this so-called bona fide occupational requirement, and we are fearful that that expression might well be used as a loophole through which some people can escape from complying with or obeying the spirit of the legislation. We know that in England the sex discrimination act, dealing with a similar matter, clearly defines what is meant by a bona fide occupational requirement, and we think it is necessary to put that in this bill.

Now I want to deal with part IV of the bill which is called "protection of personal information". In our view, as I have mentioned already, this is utterly inadequate. I think it is a good example of what good legislation should not be. The minister, in the usual fulsome way in which he refers to his own proposals, has described this part of the bill dealing with personal information as an improvement on previous legislation and as establishing a legislative framework for protecting the individual right of access to personal information.

We do not see it in that way. Part IV is full of exemptions and exceptions that are so sweeping that in all likelihood, even if they had any virtue to begin with, they would turn out to be unworkable because they are so broad. The exemptions are all in the hands of the minister who is declared to be the appropriate minister to deal with this act. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) has even suggested that somehow or other this part of the act would take the place of a freedom of information bill such as exists in the United States and some European countries.

Mr. Basford: I never suggested any such thing.

Mr. Brewin: I listened very carefully, and the minister certainly did say it.

Mr. Basford: I did not.

Mr. Brewin: Make yourself clear some other time. I am sorry I was so complimentary of the minister in what I said before. I will try to improve my style so that he will understand exactly what I am saying.

This suggestion—I thought I heard him make it, and certainly the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is reported as having made it in discussing the freedom of information bill—is a total misconception. The committee on regulations and other statutory instruments, as the Minister of Justice knows very well, has been struggling with the freedom of information bill. The committee travelled to the United States and some of its members travelled to Europe. We have spent a great deal of time on it. I am sure that if he had thought for one moment it was worthwhile consulting that committee, he would have been told that there is no relevance in the statute we are dealing with now to a proper freedom of information bill.

We were impressed, and I think that is true of all members of the committee, with the practicality, the clear, forthright and, indeed, successful manner in which the freedom of information act is administered in the United States. But I ask hon. members to take a look at part IV of the bill and note some of the exemptions. I will not attempt to go into all of them. Practically the whole part consists of exemptions. The bill deals only with federal information banks which are defined in the definitions section. It entitles an individual to see the records in these federal information banks. But the appropriate minister may, with the approval of the governor in council, exempt or restrict the information when he determines that it might be injurious to international relations, national defence or security, federal-provincial relations, or when it is likely to disclose information obtained or prepared by the government or any part of the government in relation to national security, detection or prevention of crime generally, or in the course of the investigation of offences against any act of parliament. So if in the course of investigation they collect any information of an alleged infringement of any act of parliament, the information can be exempted.

The minister also may exempt all material detailed by him to be detrimental to the custody, control or supervision of any person under sentence. That is another fairly large exemption. Further, the appropriate minister can prevent the disclosure of information which is described as confidential to the Queen's Privy Council of Canada, or any information relating to investigations pertaining to the enforcement or administration of any act of parliament.

Anything we investigate that is related to the administration of parliament can be exempted, or which might reveal personal information concerning any individual, or any information that impedes the functioning of a court of law or other tribunal, or which might disclose legal opinions or advice provided to a government institution. Mr. Speaker, since when have legal opinions become sacrosanct? I know the rules of confidentiality—that is, the confidence of the client—but this is a sort of general theory. The Minister of Justice knows about this because a parliamentary committee was refused permission to find out what was the basis of information being handed out wholesale by his department. A blanket of secrecy is put down by the minister himself on the efforts of members of parliament to find out what is being done in government. This provision is on a par with that. I think it is time we got rid of the myth that just by putting something in a legal opinion it is exempt from disclosure.

There is an even stranger provision. If, in the opinion of the minister, the harm of the disclosure would outweigh the benefit, then it could be made exempt. This bill says, in effect—and I put it in general phraseology—that anything the minister thinks should be disclosed, can be disclosed, and if there is anything the minister thinks should not be disclosed, it will be exempt. From the way some of the ministries have been behaving, I am quite sure much material would be exempt.

[Mr. Brewin.]

In our view, the act is a perpetuation of the reliance of the government on secrecy and its determination that we should not have an open system of government. By putting forward a measure that on its face requires something to be disclosed, and then it is eaten away by exemptions, makes the measure meaningless in practice. This is the government's method of holding on to the pattern of secrecy which characterizes its attitude in these matters.

The freedom of information act in the United States may not be perfect, but I think it has made useful and valuable changes in their law. This is not a light issue, Mr. Speaker. There are no doubt many reasons why the people of Canada and this parliament should not have confidence in the government. To me it is clear that this practice of general secrecy is a good enough reason for the people of Canada to get rid of this government as soon as possible. We are tired of a method of operation which conceals from the people of Canada and the parliament of Canada what the government is doing about various things.

Part IV of this bill is an illustration of how they seem to think we are eternally gullible enough to thank the great government for saying, "You can look up a freedom of information bank if you do not fall within some of the wide exemptions that are illustrated." An open society is important because you cannot have a participatory democracy—in which this government believes in theory—without information. To pretend that part IV of the bill is a real step forward toward making information available to people is a farce. In committee we shall do whatever is appropriate to have this clause removed from a bill which is certainly valuable in other parts which deal with discrimination. In its so-called protection of information it is a worthless piece of paper.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to see the introduction of a federal human rights bill. It is understandable that human rights legislation in Canada was first developed at the provincial level, since employment and housing are primarily provincial responsibilities and because the lives of many more Canadians are directly touched by matters under provincial jurisdiction. However, the need for federal human rights legislation to deal with the public service and with agencies under federal jurisdiction has been obvious for some time.

Previous speakers have referred to the Royal Commission on the Status of Women which made very specific recommendations. Since the report of that commission there has been continuing pressure for unified legislation to include and strengthen the various federal statutes and regulations. For example, part I of the Canada Labour Code, which deals with fair employment practices, applies to organizations such as banks, railways, and so on, under federal jurisdiction but does not include the public service. There were a number of exclusions of this kind.

In August, 1973, the Federal Court of appeal confirmed Bell Canada's action in denying back pay to two women employees who, prior to reorganization of the system, did the same managerial work but were paid less than the men on the job. This particular case raised very considerable concern among working women and has resulted in an increased sensitivity to the whole question of remuneration for women in the marketplace.

The bill before us today is, indeed, as the minister has said, a greatly improved version of the human rights bill, Bill C-72 which was before us in the last session, and to me one of the most significant improvements is that this bill establishes the principle of equal pay for work of equal value. The average female worker in Canada earns 40 per cent to 45 per cent less than the average male worker, and the gap between the two is widening. This massive earnings differential is due in part to the evident failure of our present equal pay legislation. It also results from the fact that women tend to be segregated in lower paying jobs—particularly in secretarial, clerical and service work.

Contrary to public opinion, this occupational segregation of women has increased during the past decade. "Equal pay for equal work" legislation which has been in force in Canada for over two decades compares the rate of pay of women and men in the same establishment on the basis of the same or similar work. In practice, however, comparison of similar jobs has often been avoided. Different job titles, or slight differences in work schedules enable, for example, a male janitor to earn more than a female cleaner. The argument has been made that employers undervalue women's work simply because jobs are staffed by women.

It can also be shown that when men and women perform jobs requiring comparable levels of skill, education and responsibility, men are usually better paid. This discrimination often comes as a great surprise to fair-minded men. A friend of mine who, in his own university, had studied the jobs, pay and skills of men and women on the non-academic staff, confidently expecting he would find no inequity because his university was progressive and followed good personnel practices, found to his great surprise that women in administrative support jobs by and large had two years more formal education than men and were paid about $1,000 a year less. He also found, as one might expect, that the title of the job was different, depending on whether it was performed by a man or a woman. These kinds of inequities, hopefully, will be dealt with by using the concept of "equal remuneration for work of equal value", rather than that of "equal pay for equal work".

The notion of "equal pay for work of equal value" allows for the comparison of unlike jobs, or of jobs that are not precisely the same on the basis of objective criteria of skill, effort, responsibility and conditions of work. We are not talking, in the bill before us, of a massive intervention in the marketplace. We are talking about guidelines for agencies, whether they be government departments or Crown agencies, which already have fairly sophisticated personnel departments, job evaluations and descriptions. Really, it is a matter of doing this differently and perhaps weighing some factors differently.

Men as well as women should benefit in the long term from an equal pay amendment. A gradual elimination of sex role stereotypes linked to occupations offers more possibilities for both men and women to make vocational choices based on their own talents and skills, as opposed to choices which are limited by stereotyped expectations. Once experience has been gained in applying this kind of legislation, it should be possible to develop a body of expertise in its application.

In 1972, the government of Canada, with the concurrence of provincial governments, ratified the 1951 International Labour Convention No. 100 which was concerned with the principle of "equal remuneration for work of equal value". In his announcement, the then minister of labour stated that "the basic obligation of a ratifying country is the pursuit of policies aimed at the achievement of the objectives stated in the convention". A number of years have gone by during which the implementation of this basic obligation has been studied. I have been interested to note, at meetings of the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, that officials have gradually changed their initial position, of thinking that there was no way in which this idea could be implemented, to one of finding that the idea had possibilities.

I note, with interest, that the commission is to be empowered, among other things, to play a role in public education and research. I should like to see this idea applied narrowly and immediately in the development of mechanisms which will ensure compliance with the intent of this legislation, particularly in the public service. Unfortunately, a number of blocks to the advancement of women exist not because of bad intent but because old rigidities have not been modernized. This applies, for example, to job qualifications. Until recently, one of the qualifications for investigative jobs with the ministry of consumer and corporate affairs was five years' police experience. That was the qualification needed for the investigation of misleading advertising practices. Since few women in Canada have experience in a police force, the effect of that requirement was to introduce a male-oriented bias to selection. Obviously, for this kind of job some experience in investigative techniques is necessary. Surely, however, with careful selection of people and adequate in-service training it should be possible to find some equivalencies which would not have the effect of excluding women.

Similarly, until recently there was an absolute requirement of experience in labour administration for many jobs in the Department of Labour, experience which up to this point in our lives has not been generally available to women. Again, one finds few or no women at all in some of these positions. Given an intelligent assessment of equivalencies and an insistence on in-service staff training, it should be possible, surely, to include some women in such jobs. It has been the experience of those who have worked in large organizations, whether in the public service or in the private sector, that good staff do not fall like manna from heaven. They are generally the logical product of intelligent staff development and in-service training.

Another program which was designed to find "promotable people" and develop their careers, but is not doing this for women, is the data stream system. Again, certain rigidities have crept in here. The "buzz" words which describe the needed qualifications tend to exclude women. For example, a master's degree in business administration tends to be much more highly regarded than perhaps a master's in social work or in nursing. Actually, the latter kind of specialization has often been seen as a handicap. Surely this is not reasonable, because although for certain types of jobs financial and business expertise are essential, there is more than one kind of administration. One thinks of an administrator as somebody who can create a climate in which people can work to capacity and as somebody who knows how to enable people to work effectively. The application of interpersonal skills in a task-oriented way is not necessarily something for which the M.B.A. is the only possible kind of preparation.

I hope that with the introduction of this new legislation and the requirement that equal pay be given for work of equal value we shall also find attention given to some of these mechanisms which will reduce the rigidity.

Another important element in this legislation is the inclusion of unions. The record of the unions in promoting the status of women has not been impressive. However, some very encouraging resolutions were passed at the last annual meeting of the Canadian Labour Council and one must hope that this represents a change of heart, one which I am sure will be helped by the existence of the legislation before us.

When I was in Washington last September I met with an American unionist who told me that some of her associates had successfully sued her union for a large amount of money on the grounds of inadequate representation. Her comment was that the result had been to create in that union and in others a greater sensitivity to the needs of women members. But she added; "I really hate to see our union hit with a great big fine because, after all, it is our own money." I agree that union funds could probably be used for many more constructive purposes than the payment of legal fees and I would hope that the existence of the law, together with changing social attitudes, will result in more effective representation by the unions of the needs of their women members.

The fact that the commission has been created with a considerable degree of independence, and that it is to report directly to parliament, is important precisely because the commission has the power to review and comment on federal rules, orders and the like, and if these are found to be inconsistent with the principles set out in the bill, to include such matters in the report to parliament. This aspect of the commission's work will be extremely significant because the barriers to the advancement of women in the public service and in Crown corporations are often constituted less by overt prejudice and deliberate exclusionary tactics than by rigidities in old-fashioned hiring practices.

[Miss Nicholson.]

Two major criticisms of the bill have come to my attention through the mail and also by telephone. The first is that it places too much emphasis on negotiation, that it "lacks teeth", that it does not go quickly enough to court action. The other side of that criticism I heard, in Washington, in September when women in the women's rights movement were talking about big settlements which one corporation or another had been obliged to make as a result of a decision under the equal rights legislation. They told me that these court actions dragged on for so long, and large corporations were so well able to wait matters out, that the individuals concerned rarely benefited. One disheartened person said to me that perhaps equal rights legislation should have been called the "lawyers and economists social security act".

The emphasis on negotiation in this Bill and on attempts to reach a settlement before resorting to punitive action is one which fits the Canadian situation better. I think we have more taste and talent for negotiation and trying to reason matters out than for engaging in fierce fights. Moreover, we are smaller. We are dealing with organizations which are less entrenched. By and large we are dealing with situations where there is good will rather than otherwise, and I think that to use the heavy hand prematurely would probably not be in our interests. Nevertheless, it is well to have it in reserve, and I like the balance of the bill in that regard.

Turning to the second criticism, there are some who feel that questions having to do with employment should still be under the Canada Labour Code, that we are dealing here with a commercial transaction between a woman and an employer and that one ought not to be obliged to go to a human rights commission to get what is a basic right of that kind. I feel that this objection is met in the bill before us in several ways. First, there is the possibility of group action. A woman does not have to complain on her own; her union or group can lodge a complaint on her behalf. In the second place, there is the commission's power to initiate and examine. Then there is the fact that the inspection right under the Canadian Labour Code is retained. Inspectors in the Department of Labour retain the obligation to look for inequalities in pay. The accumulated expertise in the Department of Labour is retained and made use of.

I am sure that as with any bill some improvements will be made in committee, but I believe we are starting off with a bill which has many good features in it.

Mr. Brewin: I am rising on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. In the course of a speech I made earlier this afternoon I spoke about the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) having referred to the American freedom of information act. He has told me that he was in fact referring to a quite different American bill known as the privacy act. I misunderstood his reference, and on the basis of that misconception I attributed something to him which was quite inaccurate. I withdraw it and I apologize.

Mr. Basford: Further to that question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the hon. member for his intervention. It is a confusion which easily arises and I was speaking very quickly—the difference between a freedom of information act which refers, of course, to general information, and the protection of personal privacy and personal information, which is what this bill deals with.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on Bill C-25 which is an act to extend the present laws of Canada which proscribe discrimination and protect the rights of individuals.

I believe the Canadian people should know exactly what we are establishing here. This is a bill to provide for a Canadian human rights commission, and the powers and functions of the commission are described. It is provided, for instance, that full-time members of the commission are persons deemed to be employed in the Public Service of Canada for the purpose of the Public Service Superannuation Act and for the purpose of the Government Employees Compensation Act and any regulations under section 7 of the Aeronautics Act. Also the commission is to provide for the payment of witnesses' fees to persons appearing before tribunals, and a tribunal may award compensation in the manner prescribed to a victim of a discriminatory practice.

I am not a supporter of establishing another government department or of expanding the bureaucracy, but certainly I support the establishment of the human rights commission. I want to read into the record this afternoon some of the reasons why we need such a commission and also to relate some of the discriminatory ways in which some employees are being treated by Crown corporations.

The enforcement of human rights legislation has always been weak and difficult. The Canadian human rights commission will have the exclusive power to turn away a complainant if it thinks the problem can be solved elsewhere. It could shortly become the last resort for a complainant as a result of overwork. The individual may be forced to turn to other agencies or even the courts.

The cases I am going to discuss this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, are cases that have gone to the court but the individuals have still not been informed why they were dismissed by the Crown corporation concerned. The individual or group has no right of appeal should the commission refuse to take a complaint or decide it is without basis. Nowhere in this provision does it state that the complainant has the right to information collected by the commission during the course of the investigation. The enforcement of a person's human rights is entirely in the hands of the human rights commission. I think there should be some check on what they do or refuse to do, and I hope this aspect will be thoroughly discussed at the committee stage.

In terms of enforcement, the commission has no powers. It can at any stage after the filing of a complaint appoint a tribunal which will hold meetings to determine whether the act has been breached. If so, it issues binding orders which are enforceable in the same manner as an order of the Federal Court of Canada. It will take at least two years or more before this commission is established. One wonders whether the new federal ombudsman will have problems with the bureaucracy in terms of their resenting an outsider's authority to poke into their procedures.

I have received a letter from the Canadian Telecommunications Division of the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway, Transport and General Workers. They have taken up the plight of one of their colleagues who has been dismissed by CN Telecommunications. The union has done everything it possibly can to find out why this person was dismissed, and the matter has been to the courts. Unbelievably, Mr. Speaker, even after going through the courts the courts did not demand that CN Telecommunications give a clear cut explanation of why this individual was dismissed. I should like to read the contents of this letter into the record.

On July 7/75 an employee of Canadian National Telecommunications in Whitehorse, Yukon Territory, named Bernie Maguire was called into the office of the Superintendent and was handed a letter which read:

"We regret to advise that subsequent to your being accepted for technical employment it has been determined that you do not fully meet entrance qualifications for such employment with our company. In view of this we must terminate your services immediately."

Mr. Maguire had been employed for eighteen months as a technician in the testing and regulating department and he was not allowed to return to his shift but was paid two weeks wages in lieu of notice.

The company refused to give Bernie any specific reason for being fired. He had passed both the company technical examinations and the company medical. He completed the probationary period which is six months, and his immediate supervisor, Mr. Bruce Lodge, stated that he was quite happy with Bernie's work. Bernie Maguire to this day has not been given the specific reason for his dismissal.

It was not until the case was heard by an arbitrator that the company finally offered a partial explanation. Bernie Maguire had failed to pass a security clearance.

It should be pointed out at this point that prior to his service with CN Telecommunications, Mr. Maguire served in the Canadian Army in the "cryptology" department and he was security cleared to a very high level.

So the House can see that this is a strange case. This man could not pass the security test of CN Telecommunications, but he was not considered a security risk for the army, which had a higher priority over CN Telecommunications. Continuing with the letter:

The case was grieved by the union representing Mr. Maguire, which is the Canadian Telecommunications Division of the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway, Transport and General Workers. It was grieved on the grounds that the collective agreement was violated and that an employee must be given a specific, valid reason for being dismissed. The case went through the first three stages of the grievance procedure with negative results. During this time MP John Reynolds brought the matter before the House of Commons and certain members and ministers promised support should the grievance procedure fail to bring satisfactory results, among them the Hon. Jean Marchand, hon. Ed Broadbent and hon. Erik Nielsen.

The case was heard by an arbitration board headed by Justice J. C. Anderson on November 14, 1975. The company stated that due to a contract with the Department of Supply and Services for the provision of communications facilities for the Canadian Police Information Circuit, all employees concerned must be security cleared.

In his decision Judge Anderson declared that the company had the right to set security as a standard of employment and that they were right in terminating the employment of Mr. Maguire. He ruled also that the company "could only do so upon paying the employee in lieu of reasonable notice, a sum of money at the rate of pay he was receiving at the time of his termination, equal to seventeen (17) weeks of pay." He did not rule that Mr. Maguire should be told the specific reason for his dismissal.

I am going to give the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) a copy of this letter and I hope he will launch an immediate investigation. I find it very stange that the courts did not insist that CN Telecommunications provide a full and clear explanation of why Mr. Maguire was dismissed.

In view of this the union decided to appeal to the Supreme Court of Ontario to reverse the decision of the arbitrator. This court upheld the arbitrator's decision. On December 21, 1976 the case was heard by the Ontario Court of Appeal and was dismissed on that day.

Legal counsel for the union has advised against further action in the courts but advises that the case be pursued in the "political arena".

So we are now pursuing this man's case in the political arena this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, and I certainly hope that the Minister of Justice will take some action on it.

We appeal to the members of parliament to correct this injustice. We are asking only that Mr. Bernie Maguire be given the specific reason for being denied his security clearance.

If CN Telecommunications has a clear cut, logical explanation why this man was dismissed, then he is certainly entitled to hear it. One reason we need this kind of bill and a commission is to investigate cases like this. The letter concludes:

Do we live in a country where the rights of an individual can be so trampled on that a person can be fired from his job and be branded for life as a "security risk" with no reasons given and no avenue of appeal?

The matter is in your hands. Please don't let us down.

This letter is signed by a number of his colleagues in the union, and the case is one example of an individual I should like to see helped. It is unfortunate that this human rights commission will not be established until about another two years, so I hope that the Minister of Justice will take some appropriate action.

I should like to give the House another example of what happened to some employees in another Crown corporation, Air Canada. Five Air Canada employees were wrongly charged in connection with the theft of gold at an airport in the state of New York. They incurred legal expenses amounting to $18,000 and the airline refused to compensate them for their financial losses even though they did in fact receive their back pay lost during their four months' suspension.

This is not an isolated incident, Mr. Speaker; rather it is one that seems to occur quite regularly. Perhaps there are many Crown corporation employees who do not fully realize the position they are in, and I will just explain why. We had another case of a gold theft at the Ottawa International Airport in April, 1975. Although this case has now been solved, Mr. Speaker, Air Canada employees who worked at the airport were under suspension. The same thing happened to them as happened to the Air Canada workers in New York.

The crux of the problem is the lax security measures at Air Canada terminals. This is not the fault of the employees. If Air Canada expects its employees to guard valuables, Air Canada should make the task easier by first stepping up its security measures and then it should take on the responsibility of paying the legal fees of those falsely accused of theft. If they are placed in this vulnerable position, they should certainly be protected. There has been no decision with regard to paying the legal fees of these Air Canada employees falsely charged with theft. This is another group that can appear before the Human Rights Commission because they have been treated unjustly.

There are others who wish to speak on this bill this afternoon. Therefore I will not take any more time. As the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) stated, our party fully supports this bill. There are details that can be worked out in committee, and some improvements made. I welcomed the opportunity to enter this debate this afternoon.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Lafontaine-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, at a time when basic individual rights are constantly jeered at in most countries of the world, the spirit if not the letter of the International Declaration on Human Rights remains ineffective, in spite of the nobility of the feelings by which it was prompted. I am grateful to the minister for that legislation which will legally ratify what is already found in the provincial jurisdictions and will enable Canada to join the unfortunately select club of nations which are not satisfied with pious and hollow words when time comes to deal with discrimination.

It is not sufficient, Mr. Speaker, to endorse the principle of a national, interjurisdictional or even international statement of rights, since concrete pledges to which it gives rise often contain pointless restrictions which deprive those rights of any real meaning and governments can then with impunity under the guise of national security or another wrong or hyperbolic reasoning cast them aside, alleging their temporary character. However, that feat of strength shows the weakness of those rights and the necessity of incorporating them in a statement and explaining grounds for discrimination while establishing an enforcement body to act as watch-dog ready to detect possible abuses by governments or individuals.

Therefore, principles and statements of intentions are important, but experience clearly shows that they are not enough and that solid structures must be developed to translate them concretely into facts and that solid tools must be developed to ensure that they are respected. That is the objective of Bill C-25, an Act to extend the present laws in Canada that proscribe discrimination and that protect the privacy of individuals.

This is an important step in the total process involved in implementing an articulated Canadian policy for the protection of human rights, but it is not the ultimate expression of this process since human activities related to this area are innumerable and the list of the abuses involved nearly endless. I hope that this is only the start of a dialogue which will find its extension in the study by the human rights protection commission and future discussions in the House, since the House will periodically evaluate any change in the situation. In this context which is somewhat vague, I admit, but nevertheless very tangible in what directly affects certain Canadians who are now the victims of discrimination, Bill C-25 will aim at correcting the weaknesses which are the most obvious and the most socially unacceptable in discriminatory practices without ending completely all discrimination among human beings.

Unfortunately, and in spite of the beauty of the concept of human brotherhood, as long as there will be a humanity, there will be discrimination. But it is precisely the role of society to protect itself from it and eventually eliminate it by establishing general policies from which it must not deviate while strictly defining the limits of its intervention and action so as to protect effectively, without interfering with, the expression of the most basic of rights, that of freedom of thought, individually and collectively.

Bill C-25, as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) and the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) have said so well, is a valid working paper with technical aspects that can eventually be reshaped and refined during the detailed study by the parliamentary Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. I will therefore postpone at this point some hopefully constructive criticisms that can better await the committee stage, in the light of the minister's commitment to reconsider the details of this proposal.

The bill is in five parts with a preamble stating the purpose of the legislation and its basic principles. These are that every individual should have an equal opportunity with other individuals to make for himself or herself the life that he or she is able and wishes to have, without being hindered in or prevented from doing so by discriminatory practices based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, age, sex or marital status, or conviction for an offence for which a pardon has been granted or by discriminatory employment practices based on physical handicap. As I said, there is a recognition of the need to strike a delicate balance between the rights of the individual and those of the community, in the statement that the privacy of individuals should be protected to the greatest extent consistent with public order and well-being.

I am somewhat astonished that in his speech the minister avoided any reference to the protection of the individual's language, because this is a basic right deserving special protection, as indicated in Section 2 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. I find no mention of it in the proscribed grounds of discrimination as stated in Bill C-25. I very much expect the minister can explain in due time to the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and the Canadian public why he rejected that right, at least in this bill to extend the present laws in Canada that proscribe discrimination and that protect the privacy of individuals, and what he envisages as a substitute to the protection embodied in this legislation.

I realize that sufficient protection might be afforded by the insertion, in the preamble to the Canadian constitutional statutes commonly referred to as the Canadian Constitution, of a specific reference to the right of Canadians to communicate with the Canadian government in one of Canada's official languages. But what about the many Canadians whose mother tongue is neither French nor English? There is something to think about although in every day practice it would be very hard to distinguish between outright discrimination on purely linguistic grounds and normal linguistic restrictions necessary to the orderly operation of Canadian society, more specifically of course in the area of unemployment.

Finally, let us remember that several members are expecting explanations and alternatives in this area from the minister. The creation of a Canadian Human Rights Commission is the natural extension of the statement of proscribed grounds of discrimination. Indeed, it is primordial to provide for the formation of a politically and administratively independent body whose object would be to sanction the contents of this legislation by looking for and into patent cases of discrimination. It was also very important that this commission should have extended powers, and clause 22 in that respect overwhelms me since in addition to the nearly police like aspect of its action in its role as a watch dog against proscribed discriminatory actions as set forth under Part I it may also undertake any action likely to promote collectively and socially the just cause of respect for all basic rights.

I hope in that sense that the commission will have great public exposure and that it will build around its work an aura of justice and equity, a sort of a secular arm of the equalitarian social aspirations of our community. I will go quickly over Part III which also takes a look at discriminatory practices such as depriving an individual in Canada of government services to which he would normally be entitled, or adverse differentiation upon the provision of services.

Part IV deals with the protection of personal rights. This is an area about which a lot was written recently as it is related to the broader area of the right to information. The only thing covered here is an individual's access to government files compiled on him, and as many others I will be looking forward to an explicit line of conduct on what should be a unified and coherent policy on the right of the people of Canada to information and, correlatively, the classification of papers and documents produced by the government.

As for the protection of privacy of individuals, it is another of these fundamental rights that modern society has rediscovered after decades of systematic hesitation by governmental, semi-public, private and even sometimes secret agencies. Time has come indeed for us to issue, within the limits of the government's responsibility for collecting and processing individual data for federal information banks, strict rules enabling individuals to consult and, when required, correct the information stored about them. It is a very commendable objective whose sole foreseen restrictions, which I think will be very far reaching, would eventually inhibit its realizations by creating problems and conflicts of interest between the individual and the community in general.

In committee I intend to explore with the minister the extent and application of the anticipated restrictions and the right to information in order to establish with him and with our colleagues if, yes or no, we might be recognizing this right and at the same time strangling it by imposing overly severe restrictions. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I will simply add that the bill is very valid and that its objectives are no doubt shared by all Canadians and a fortiori by all members of the House. As for the different clauses, they will be studied where we discuss such things, in committee. For the moment we are discussing the principle behind the bill and, like everyone else here, I consider that this principle has already been established.

● (1530)

[English]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, this legislation has been long awaited and, as hon. members have said, there may be some difficulty in getting it to a level which we think would answer the best needs of Canadians as a whole.

We know that in the various provinces there are acts covering human rights, with some of the provinces, if not all, having human rights commissions. We have heard of some rather sensational cases and we have heard of others where, frankly, the commissions have got themselves in a snarl. I am concerned here about the danger of overlapping and that we would get varying standards between the federal legislation and that applicable to the provinces. I do not think one could say that it would be in any way tolerable, even less logical, to have differing standards of human rights in this country, regardless in which province the citizen or the resident may be located.

I would like to look briefly at some of the problems which I think must be encountered in some of the applications of human rights legislation by some of the provincial commissions. I think there is a very grave danger of discrimination in reverse. We have seen, particularly in the service industries, employers who have a particular purpose and who have a particular type of business in which a certain type of person must be employed, being denied the right to advertise, for instance, for a French chef. That is a no-no. Presumably one has to do it by way of advertising for a chef, either male or female, with a knowledge of French cuisine, and regardless of who may come up, in that particular type of establishment that person should have the right to that position. He may be completely unsuitable in the atmosphere or the type of restaurant or hotel that might be contemplated.

I was discussing this matter with manpower officials in Alberta with regard to the introduction into Canada under a work permit of, say, a Chinese chef of a particular type, whether he is skilled in Mandarin Chinese or Cantonese Chinese, whether he is a pastry cook, or what have you. One runs into the difficulty of saying you cannot specify that, you cannot say that you are going to put a Chinese cook in a Chinese restaurant. I say that is all a lot of poppycock because if the establishment is a Chinese restaurant, then in the kitchen there will be Chinese who understand the foods and who understand one another. To say that one should admit a person of other racial origin, who would be introduced, bulldozed or ramroded into one of these establishments, is totally wrong. That is one difficulty. It has already occurred and it might, unfortunately, happen under legislation of this kind which in itself is very well meaning but which in its application is sometimes less than logical. Thus we get negative results. All that this can be called is discrimination in reverse, or inverse discrimination.

The third difficulty—and here I come back to the Department of Manpower and Immigration—is that in our present regulations the point system is discriminatory and certainly in principle and in spirit is contradictory to this act. Hon. members know that under the point system a person up to the age of 35 has no disabilities imposed upon him or her by reason of age, but any prospective immigrant over the age of 35 has one point deducted from the points obtained up to a maximum of ten. In other words, persons 45 years of age and over to the age of 65 have ten points deducted from the point score they have obtained, all because of age.

I say that the government of Canada in its application of its own immigration rules is engaged in a blatant form of discrimination with regard to the age indicated in this bill. Of course it may be that some of the purists or, to be more accurate, some of the legalists, will say "But in the act under clauses 5, 6, 7 and 8 immigration is not a subject in which discrimination is prohibited." I will say that perhaps it is something we should discuss in committee. Clause 8 reads:

> It is a discriminatory practice . . .
> (ii) to make any written or oral inquiry that expresses or implies any limitation, specification or preference based on a prohibited ground of discrimination

I suggest to you that maybe the insistence on the point system with regard to age in a written or oral inquiry is a prohibited ground of discrimination. This is something that I will not discuss with the minister but he might want to take a look at it and inquire from his colleague, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), as to the existing and intended practice in the devising and application of regulations relative to the point system under the Immigration Act.

The next point I want to talk about is that perhaps one can justify it and say there is no discrimination in the two tier system of post-secondary education fees. It is said that this applies to all known Canadian residents whether they are landed immigrants or Canadian citizens. However, we should face the fact that the public clamour in some areas of Canada seeking to impose higher levels of fees on foreign students is nothing more or less then outright racism.

Far too many people have told me that they have seen people going around our university campuses who are not white, and it is for that reason that Canadians are being excluded from what they would consider easy admission to university courses, whether their averages are worthy of it or not, or whether their scholastic performance is worthy of it or not. Usually if a close inquiry is made, it is found that the academic standards were simply not high enough. However, these self-same people lump in as foreign students many Canadian born students who are of second or third generation but whose skin does not happen to be white. They are all lumped together as foreign students, and the attitude is that they must be kept out. I say shame on all of it. I think that is a wrong principle. Where it has been used I think it has been wrong, and it has been used by the government of the province where this is being done.

After all, 85 per cent of the cost at university level is borne by the public purse. About 10 per cent of the cost is covered by tuition fees, and 5 per cent by grants, bursaries and scolarships. However, of that 85 per cent—and this is where some of the provincial legislatures are loath to come clean with the people—50 per cent comes from the coffers of the government of Canada. Granted, it comes from Canadian taxpayers all across the country. One of the reasons this country is suffering in this particular regard is the absence of a national educational policy. There are many reasons—but that is another subject—why there should be a national educational policy. However, this is one of the consequences of its absence.

Three years ago the universities were crying because they did not have enough students, but now when there is a problem of some crowding I do not think we should impose a two tier system of fees. The fact that it is done in some jurisdictions in the United States does not make it any more right. Perhaps I am subjective because it was my privilege to spend three years at a university in a country outside Canada. There was no distinction as to where I came from with regard to fees. I hope that the university life there was better for that policy. I certainly benefited from the presence of many foreign students, and I know that in Canadian universities the presence of foreign students benefits both the student body and the faculty, in the same way as does the use of foreign teachers. The alternative is intellectual incestuousness.

I am wondering whether the two tier system of university fees is not in contravention of at least the spirit of clause 5 of this bill, because it seems to me that the provision of education is the provision of a service. There is a differentiation "adversely in relation to any individual on a prohibited ground of discrimination", and that is of national or ethnic origin or race. I hope that those who seek to impose two tier systems of fees at universities will be dealt with in this bill. I will admit that there have been some arguments made, but in essence they must yield to the other arguments for treating all applicants to universities alike, whether they are at the under graduate or post graduate level.

Then there is a final area, and that is the area of labour relations. The hon. member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson) made reference to unions. Many years ago I proposed motions, and I actually proposed an amendment to the Canada Labour Code which would prohibit the firing of a person who held bona fide religious beliefs against participation in a labour union. There are thousands of these people here in Canada, and there have been desultory efforts in Manitoba and Ontario—and there may now be in Saskatchewan—to bring in provisions to allow these people to engage in their chosen employment notwithstanding the fact that there is a closed union shop; that is, that those people who have a bona fide belief, as I indicated, will be able to continue in their employment, notwithstanding that there is a closed union shop agreement, by paying the equivalent of full union dues to a charity which is mutually agreed upon by the union local and the individual concerned. There is no free ride in so far as non-payment of dues is concerned, but I suggest that there has been blatant discrimination on the basis of religious beliefs as a result of the implementation in many provinces of clauses under closed shop agreements.

The formula I have suggested has been tried. There may be other suggestions, but let it not be said that because of any type of labour agreement a person in Canada shall be kept out of his or her chosen employment by reason of religious beliefs.

The last point I wish to make refers to the Immigration Act. Persons presently in Canada under a minister's permit so that they may be able to work and get medicare and other benefits, are issued a social insurance number in the series nine. That is a clear indication to employers today that the status of this person as a citizen or immigrant is unsure. I have been advised by persons holding such cards that they must take jobs at lower than the going rate and that there are various forms of victimization as a result. Why must they have that series nine designation? As soon as the landing is cleared a new card is issued with a non-identifiable number. Mr. Speaker, that identifiable number is like the mark of Caïn, and it should not apply.

There are many other areas of concern. We could talk about prejudice and so on, but these are the areas in which there is discrimination by reason of race, ethnic origin, maybe colour, religion, age and other things. I hope we will be able to discuss them with a degree of objectivity with the minister and his officials. If there is anything that will help passage of this legislation it will be the flexibility of the minister and his officials to accept ideas from the opposition and backbenchers. The front bench and its immediate advisers has no copyright on commonsense, logic and justice.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané).

Mr. Paproski: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Matane): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the Conservative Whip would like to participate also, but as he is here on a permanent basis he can do so at any time.

Mr. Paproski: Wait until May, 1978.

[Translation]

Mr. De Bané: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to participate in the debate on second reading of Bill C-25 and as the minister himself said, our whole legislation in the area of human rights protection is inadequate, and the federal government is lagging behind some provinces in this regard. Surely this bill is an important step forward, but I would like during the time allocated to me to emphasize specific points which I think are weak and I hope will be corrected when the bill is considered in committee.

The first point which strikes me, concerning the Solicitor General, is the second part of the bill, which deals with the federal information bank. For the first time since the completion of studies it commissioned in 1971 and 1974, the federal government comes directly to grips with this extremely complex problem, namely the information which the state is allowed to gather for various administrative purposes. The bill before us provides for the appointment of a Privacy Commissioner who is responsible for the enforcement of this part of the legislation. He will act as an ombudsman reporting to parliament on any possible problems relating to specific bodies—more than 90 of them—government departments or Crown agencies which must gather some information about citizens under their current activities.

It is an ombudsman as the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Béchard) has reminded us, who will carry out in the privacy area the same functions as the Official Languages Commissioner. The problem here—and I am quite sure the Solicitor General will deal with it—is the following: every minister will be allowed to exempt those institutions which come under his jurisdiction from the requirement to disclose all information obtained about individuals in Canada. This exemption which I call a loophole will enable any minister—and sometimes a Cabinet meeting will have to be held—to refuse to explain, for reasons which he will not be compelled to state, the exemption granted to a government institution. This is understandable when matters of national security and intelligence are at stake. I realize, Mr. Speaker, that it is four o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely public bills, notices of motions and private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Shall orders preceding Order No. 56 stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

[English]

Mr. Kaplan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I believe you will find unanimous consent in the Chamber to proceed under private members' bills with Bill C-256, an act to amend the Criminal Code of Canada (counterfeit of rare coins and notes).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I believe we are moving in that direction.

[Mr. De Bané.]

HOBBY PROTECTION ACT (NUMISMATIC)

EXTENSION OF CURRENCY COUNTERFEIT LAWS

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): moved that Bill C-256, to amend the Criminal Code (counterfeit of rare coins and notes), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have often seen the Chair come to a very rapid understanding of matters in the House and I want to congratulate Your Honour for reading the mind of this Chamber and knowing we had agreed to proceed at this time with Bill C-256, an act to amend the Criminal Code (counterfeit of rare coins and notes).

I intend to be very brief, Mr. Speaker, but I should like to take the time of hon. members to outline the background of the bill and tell members about the support it has received.

Currently it is legal to buy, sell and own counterfeit copies of obsolete coins, non-legal tender coins. The Criminal Code in section 406 defines counterfeit moneys to mean counterfeits of current coins and current paper moneys that are the lawful coin of this country or elsewhere. Under present Canadian law a counterfeit coin may be produced if the government which issued it has expired, for example the Third Reich in Germany, or ancient Rome, or if in the country of origin that money is not received any longer as legal tender.

Part X of the Criminal Code, which deals with offences relating to currency, is intended to protect the money circulating in this country, whether foreign or Canadian. When the relevant section was enacted, the intention was not to protect the value of rare coins. However, Mr. Speaker, some coins have acquired a very high value and it is difficult to convict a counterfeiter or someone buying and selling counterfeit coins, because at present it is legal to own, buy or sell such counterfeit coins.

A lawyer who administers the hobby protection act in the United States when testifying at the hearings before that act was passed said that some fraudulent coins have been sold as originals. He gave as an illustration one importer who, in a few years prior to 1973, sold 40,000 coins as originals. All his shipments consisted of imitation coins, none of which was marked as a replica. Inexperienced persons are particularly easy to dupe when dealing with counterfeit coins. This practice causes problems for generations, and threatens the historical and exchange value of the originals.

It should be illegal to manufacture counterfeit coins without the word "copy" on them. This would protect collectors, investors, speculators and hoarders. With the word "copy" clearly embossed, it would be obvious that the coins are not meant to be used as currency. The market in gold and silver coins is estimated to be many millions of dollars. What is needed, and what is proposed, is a law to protect collectors from fraudulent non-current coins.

It is common practice in Italy and Lebanon, and was until recently in Germany and some other places, to counterfeit coins as long as they are not current coins. Mints in those countries are actively engaged in manufacturing such coins. With modern technology and methods, the counterfeiters are turning out copies of very valuable coins which cannot be distinguished from the originals; these are copies not only of obsolete coins, but even copies of Canadian $5 and $10 gold pieces of 1912, 1913 and 1914, as well as of Canadian silver dollars of the 1930's and 1940's. These are listed in price lists as counterfeits, mailed all over Canada and the United States by counterfeiters, if I may call them that, and sold at just over the metal value. These counterfeit coins are so good that is often impossible to tell the difference between them and the legal ones. In fact the counterfeit ones quite often look more authentic. Although they are advertised as counterfeit coins by the manufacturer, unscrupulous buyers can pass them off as originals, and this is being done frequently. These counterfeit coins also find their way into bazaars in Europe and then into our own country. There are literally millions in circulation.

In 1973 the United States passed its hobby protection act which made it unlawful to manufacture, import, introduce into business or distribute any imitation numismatic item, coin, paper money, token or medal, which is not plainly and permanently marked "copy". The act is both criminal and civil. It permits any person to commence civil action for an injunction and damages wherever the defendant has an office or home. It makes it illegal to bring a counterfeit coin into the country unless it is stamped "copy". This legislation was enacted ten months after being brought to the attention of Congress. I am told it has worked very well.

West Germany in January, 1975, enacted a similar law which prohibits the manufacture of unmarked reproductions. This law was passed a few months after members of the Vancouver Institute of Coin Enthusiasts and the Montreal Numismatics Society presented petitions to the German ambassador in Canada. This organization in Canada can take much credit for the enactment of the law by the West German government.

Mine is a short bill, Mr. Speaker, and has already been widely circulated in the country. It was referred to in the trade magazine, the collector's magazine and the numismatists' magazine. I have also received letters, which I should like to present to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, from the Canadian Association of Numismatic Dealers, signed by Mr. Al Bliman, executive secretary; from the Canadian Paper Money Society, signed by Mr. W. H. McDonald as past president; and from the Canadian Numismatic Association, signed by the president, Mr. Alex L. Munro. As those letters show, those three organizations representing the major numismatic associations of Canada support the principle of the legislation. In one letter it is suggested that the size of the word "copy" should be somewhat different from that proposed in my bill. In any event, the technical aspects of the bill, matters of size, type, etc., can more properly be considered in committee. I look forward to having the bill referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, first, let me congratulate the parliamentary secretary who has just spoken for bringing forward Bill C-256, a bill which is endorsed by the numismatic associations to which he referred. May I say that although the present bill has come forward today in the hon. member's name, it is not a new proposal; but that does not detract from the importance of the legislation. If my memory serves me correctly, this matter was first advanced by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds). I think that is the case. However, I wish to make it clear that my remarks are not to be taken as in any way detracting from the merits of the bill and the good sense of the hon. member in bringing forward the bill in its present form.

In order to allay any suspicions the hon. member may have about our intentions, let me say that the opposition does not intend to talk the bill out. I would not want the hon. member to think that I shall speak for the maximum time allowed under the rules. Members of the opposition recognize the importance of this hour, for good ideas are put forward during private members' hour not only by members on the government side but by those in the opposition as well.

I should like to see the bill referred to the appropriate committee. Having said that, I ask hon. members on the government side to remember the importance of this hour.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Many good concepts are advanced by private members, by those on the government side as well as on the opposition side. I suggest that it is good to allow committees to examine private members' proposals. When, from time to time, the House adopts a private member's bill, or allows the subject matter of a private member's proposal to be studied in committee, the law of the country is enhanced and, because the work of the private member has been given recognition, the legislation of this parliament is enhanced.

• (1610)

I am afraid, and I do not say this in any partisan way, because this is not a partisan hour, that there are many times, I must say, through design rather than accident when private members matters are talked out, so they can never have the question put. I know the committee on procedure and organization has considered a change. I am sure the hon. gentleman who is nodding his head so vigorously on the other side is going to raise that matter, but I think we need much more than a change which would allow one item to go forward out of so many—for example, a draw.

I think we need a change in attitude toward the private members' hour, an attitude which will ask the House to consider very carefully the matters which are brought forward if there is some merit in them, even for the purpose of having a question looked at and, regardless of the side from which the matter comes, private members will still be encouraged and the initiative of the members in terms of legislation would be encouraged.

Too often an indiscriminate no, an indiscriminate number of speeches, can destroy a good idea, and I do not think we should be destroying good ideas almost by design. The private member should be encouraged.

I think we should go far beyond even the suggestion which I know the hon. member opposite is going to put forward in good faith, in terms of the consideration of business. We could change the hours of the House. We could do other things. But I think we have to change our attitude, and that is perhaps the most important thing. I say this with some personal knowledge gained in the last week or so. I advanced a private member's bill which I admitted was really the first word rather than the last in terms of legislation in the hope that the subject matter at least, would go to a committee. But it didn't. I will persist, but it can become discouraging from time to time. I do not think good ideas should have to be pressed again and again. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who has been here since 1940, with a short break—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Since 1942.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Since 1942, with a short break, will acknowledge the difficulty faced by private members.

In saying I approve of this bill I am not asking for a trade for someone else's bill. I am asking for a rethinking of the principle by government, really, because I think the principle is a sound one, and I congratulate the hon. member for bringing it forward.

One other thing. I hope the hon. member will forgive me for importing it into the debate but I believe it is relevant to the subject matter. Members of parliament, including members of the Senate, now travel rather widely under the auspices of the Speaker of the House and the Speaker of the Senate. We visit other countries. We receive many delegations from other countries. This year I think the habit has been that we present those delegates with souvenirs of the 1976 Olympics. It has been the habit for us to give Olympic coins.

It happened yesterday when the Speaker presented the Speaker of the Venezuelan House of Representatives with a gold Olympic coin, a very treasured thing. But if that is a treasured gift to give and to receive, I think we ought to consider the striking of a parliamentary medallion which would be reserved for use by the Speakers and the heads of delegations visiting foreign countries under the auspices of one of our parliamentary associations. Such a medallion could be given to the other delegation, perhaps replicas or miniatures to members in the House, and we would also do the same to visitors to our parliament who come here under the auspices of other parliaments to visit in an official capacity as parliamentarians.

I have been in this House since 1972. There are some in this Chamber who were in the House before that time. Some were here a long time before that time. Some have been here only since 1974. As a Canadian, I am very proud to be a member of this parliament. I know that all members in this House are proud to be members of parliament. Whether we sit here for a long time or a short time depends on a number of factors, but we are all of us proud to be members of parliament. We are proud of these buildings.

We are proud of the traditions which are part of this institution. It is an institution which is changing, but I do not think it is too much to suggest that we could exhibit that pride by some striking medallion which could be presented in the way I suggested, and under the auspices which I suggested, and which would be a visible reminder to our visitors, a visible reminder to our hosts, of our pride in this institution. I hope this idea will gain support from members on both sides of the House of Commons and in all parties and that Your Honour would convey my feelings to the Speaker of the House of Commons and that he, in turn, would convey them to the Speaker of the Senate.

I know we would have to examine the technical details and a host of other things, but in principle I believe it is important that we exhibit as members of parliament, in the broad sense in which we use the word parliament, our pride in belonging to this institution, our pride in taking part, for a long time or a short time, in the national life, and participating in debates in this place. And given the fact there is a certain importance attached to this authorized travel, in having the world understand our country, and in understanding the rest of the world and people in other parts of the world who are engaged in exactly the same practices, people who are now, hopefully, under free and democratic parliaments, but perhaps even some who are not so free and democratic, we should adopt this bill being put forward by the hon. member today, and consider in the long term sending a message to the Speakers of both Houses asking them to study my suggestion in consultation with the House leaders. I think this is a very important thing.

I hope I have not impinged on the courtesy of the hon. member in discussing his bill and that he will not feel hurt that I import this into a speech, but I want to congratulate him on bringing forward his bill and let him know he has my support.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when the sponsor of the bill first started to speak I cautioned him not to talk it out, and I can assure him I have no intention of doing so either.

As I looked at the bill I was reminded of the fact that as members of parliament we do learn about most of the things that are wrong in this country, the social ills and all the things that plague and bother our people. I have to confess, though, that I had never heard of this one, so it is nice to be participating this afternoon in action to correct a social evil even if I did not know it existed. I understand that the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) knew about it. He said he had heard of it because one of his colleagues had presented a similar bill. Maybe I had not heard about it because no one had informed me about this legislation. Nevertheless, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Kaplan) made a good case for it, and I am happy to know that even on his side of the House there will be no talking out but that the bill will be given second reading and sent to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

The next part of my speech I really should not take the time of the House to make, because it is really a carbon copy of the speech made by the House leader of the official opposition.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Why don't you table it?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friend, who was not here yesterday, for which I am very grateful—I did get a motion through under Standing Order 43 in his absence—does not realize that private members cannot table anything. Therefore if I have an idea that I want to present, unfortunately my hon. friend has to listen to me. I simply want to support the position taken by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton that private members' hour is an important hour. Although some of us feel it is important even if all we can do is to press ideas year after year until we finally win their acceptance, it also helps to establish the importance of the hour if every once in a while a good idea which has been brought in by a member on either side of the House is accepted.

Perhaps it is time we added up the score to see what has happened in this session. I think the number of bills which have been allowed to go to committee is adding up a bit, but I cannot recall that any of those that got through came from this side of the House.

Mr. Landers: Yes, one from the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) two months ago.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Was that a bill or a motion under Standing Order 43? Yes, my hon. friend is right, it was a bill. Then that is good. So the score must be about five or six for the Liberals, one for the Social Credit, none for the Conservatives, and none for the most important party in the House, the New Democratic Party. One of these days perhaps we had better take steps to bring the score a little more into line with the proportions of the seats we hold in the House.

Having said that, I emphasize the point made by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton that what really should count is the merit of the idea, no matter where it comes from.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): You get more 43's.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton had three parts to his speech. I have joined with him in the first part. I have offered a carbon copy of the second part, and I just want to say that I enjoyed the third part of his speech. In particular I enjoyed the way he stood up and expressed his pride in the heritage that we have in this country. I wish to goodness that my friend and his friends would let us express that pride by letting the bill for Heritage Day pass.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Bring on the bill.

Mr. Mike Landers (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, before I commence, the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) has suggested that a medallion to commemorate the second 100 years in the House of Commons of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) should be struck! However, the problem he and I were both faced with was: what type of material should the medallion be made of?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The problem is that the hon. member might not be here.

Mr. Landers: Hopefully I will not be. Hopefully I will be in the House of Commons in another place. Before entering into a discussion on the merits of Bill C-256, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate my seatmate, the hon. member for York Centre and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Kaplan) for his initiative on behalf of numismatists and other coin collectors who have been defrauded in the past. At present the Criminal Code definition of counterfeit money does not include numismatic counterfeits. This is so because section 406 as it relates to coins requires that the coin in question be "current". "Current" means that the coins must be lawful currency in Canada or elsewhere by virtue of a law, proclamation or regulation in force in Canada or elsewhere, as the case may be.

Section 406(a) provides that a false coin is counterfeit if it resembles or is intended to resemble a current coin. The numismatic coins that the proposed amendment is designed to cover do not resemble "current" coins. They are designed to resemble genuine rare coins that may have been current at one time but no longer are. In fact it has been argued that the "fake" numismatic coins are not false in that they have as much if not more gold, silver or nickel content than the original coins have.

Section 406(e), likewise, does not apply. It provides that a coin cased with gold, silver or nickel is counterfeit if it is intended to resemble or pass for current gold, silver or nickel coin. Again, this section does not apply since the authentic numismatic coins are not current. The same reasoning applies to counterfeit paper notes. They must also be current.

There is no specific provision in the code to cover numismatic counterfeits. It may be that a criminal fraud or an obtaining by false pretence charge may be laid if the vendor of these coins or notes represents them to a purchaser as authentic. The Crown would be required to establish beyond a reasonable doubt that the vendor actually knew that the coins were not authentic. Subjective knowledge is extremely difficult to prove.

It clearly is not an offence if a person manufactures a replica coin or note that is not current.

Numismatic Counterfeits

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. The hon. member for Athabasca is seeking the floor on a point of order.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I want to bring to the attention of the hon. member who is speaking rule 144 of Beauchesne. It deals with the matter of addressing the House orally. I should like to quote this rule:

> It is a rule in both Houses of Parliament that a member must address the House orally, and not read from a written, previously prepared speech—

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we have an example here of a total breakdown in the hon. member's ability to follow the rules of the House, and I should like to have that corrected.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Athabasca is quoting an authority which the Chair would not challenge. However, I have said this in the past, and even today I have seen people reading speeches. Nevertheless they have expressed themselves verbally without reading or quoting from notes. I hope the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Landers) will speak in this way.

Mr. Landers: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Actually I was quoting from a memo which I received from the Department of Justice, and in view of the fact that I am speaking on behalf of the Department of Justice I thought I should refer to notes occasionally. If I may continue quoting from my memo, it clearly is not an offence if a person manufactures a replica coin or note that is not current. However, if the word "copy" is not printed thereon, then this omission creates a temptation to deal with these items as being authentic. If the code were to be amended to prevent this temptation from arising, then the number of frauds involving counterfeit numismatic coins or notes should be substantially reduced.

Therefore, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) recommends that the proposed amendment be supported as it is designed to correct this serious problem.

In view of the fact that my whip wants to catch a plane, I will now sit down.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Lafontaine-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief. Very seldom in this House can a private member's bill or motion reach that stage and be referred to the committee. I would like to answer quickly the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and tell him that I totally agree with what he said about the attitude of the House and of the members toward the private members' hour. Once again he was here himself.

The Committee on Procedure and Organization wanted to review the Standing Orders so as to give more substance to the concept of the private members' hour and so that a greater number of motions or bills can reach all the stages. This gives us something to think about. The private members' hour can be very important and, indeed, today's example shows that it can really be the case. We will have to study the amendments proposed by the Committee on Procedure and Organization. These are not final propositions, they are a matter for discussion, but I think once again that we should study this question and make the necessary improvements. I will not forget to throw the ball back to him saying simply that there should also be a change of attitude as far as the other hours we spend in the House are concerned, especially when the government introduces motions, and I hope that it will be the case.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Five o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is there unanimous consent to call it five o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business has expired. It being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until 2 p.m. next Monday, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 4.33 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

SUPPLEMENTARY RETIREMENT BENEFITS ACT

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE ANNUAL ESCALATION OF PENSIONS OF MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES AND MOUNTED POLICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, because this is an urgent matter I ask leave under the provisions of Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) to move:

That this House urges the President of the Treasury Board to introduce at an early date the necessary amendments to the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act so that retired Canadian Armed Forces and Royal Canadian Mounted Police personnel will have their pensions escalated annually, in accordance with the rise in the cost of living, commencing in the year following the year of retirement, regardless of age, thus ending the unfair discrimination which applies to many such personnel.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House before such a motion can be put. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF USE OF GOVERNMENT AIRCRAFT BY MINISTER OF TRANSPORT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) informed the House that the guidelines concerning the use of aircraft by cabinet ministers are sufficient. However, a number of Saskatchewan people have voiced their concern about a recent flight by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang). I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House ask the Minister of Transport to make a statement on motions explaining why on Saturday, February 5, he used a government aircraft to fly out to Regina to attend a Liberal curling bonspiel and social at Milestone, sponsored by the Assiniboia Federal Liberal Association.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Speaker: Consideration of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can only be made with unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: No.

ABORTION

CONDEMNATION OF CERTAIN MUNICIPAL TRANSIT SYSTEMS FOR REFUSAL TO ACCEPT ADVERTISEMENT OF ANTI-ABORTION GROUPS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. Larry Condon (Middlesex-London-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity, namely the banning by the Public transit systems of Toronto, Ottawa and Vancouver of an advertisement supporting the anti-abortion group known as Valade Vitae Service of Winnipeg which depicts a pregnant woman in an advertisement protesting the killing of 172,265 babies by abortion between 1970 and 1974. This responsible and legitimate message asking the Canadian people to respect the rights of babies is being denied by certain individuals in these transit systems who feel the issue is too controversial.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni):

● (1410)

That this House condemns the censorship imposed on this anti-abortion group, and that a committee of the House of Commons investigate the blatant infringement on civil liberties.

Mr. Speaker: Under the provisions of Standing Order 43 such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INFORMING DIRECTORS OF CROWN CORPORATIONS OF RESPONSIBILITIES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. It arises out of the continuing discussion on rules governing Crown corporations. Given the fact that it seems that one of the major reasons for some of the great difficulties in which Crown corporations are now finding themselves is that boards of directors are not fulfilling their obligations as well as they might, does the government plan to inform all directors whom they appoint to Crown corporations that they have responsibilities to fulfil as least as great as those specified under the Canadian Corporations Act?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I must confess that I have no knowledge that we are acting in that direction, but it seems to be a very valid suggestion. I have ascertained that the ministers have informed the Crown corporations for which they are responsible, first under schedule B and later under the other schedule of the Financial Administration Act. But I do not know whether or not they have also informed the members of the board of directors. I will inquire and if they have not, it would seem to me that they should take this suggestion very seriously.

POLYSAR

ACTION TO DISCIPLINE OFFICERS OF COMPANY—POSSIBILITY OTHER CANADIAN COMPANIES INVOLVED IN OPERATION IN SWITZERLAND

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Can the Prime Minister tell us whether or not the government, as the principal shareholder of CDC, has asked its directors on the board to inform the management of Polysar or to inquire of them what action will be taken to discipline those officers of that company who were engaged in acts which may indeed be repugnant to the standards of corporate practice in Switzerland?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will be pleased to report this suggestion to the Minister of Finance who is the minister to whom CDC responds.

Mr. Gillies: Can the Prime Minister tell us whether or not it has been ascertained if any Canadian corporations or subsidiaries of Canadians corporations were involved—I am now referring to companies in the private sector—in the Polysar situation in Switzerland where it has been reported there were blocked currency deals and the avoidance of income tax? Where there any Canadian companies in Switzerland involved with Polysar in these deals?

Mr. Trudeau: I could not say, but I will certainly ask the Minister of Finance whether he has knowledge of it. It would seem to me that the committee chaired by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham might ask this type of question of the officers involved.

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE STUDY OF ALL GOVERNMENT-CONTROLLED CORPORATIONS

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is with respect to the Polysar matter and in view of the fact that the truth of the matter came to light not particularly as a result of effective government controls but rather from vague and random government processes, if even that.

Would the Prime Minister take steps to give the Public Accounts Committee the authority and the staff necessary to make a full investigation of all government controlled corporations, including the power to examine all board minutes, supply contracts and other like documents, which have been denied to the committee thus far in its investigation of the AECL matter? I ask that question particularly in view of the fact that in the cases of both Crown corporations which have been investigated by this committee thus far business practices have been revealed which charitably can only be described as slipshod.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the premises of the question. The House will recall that the action which was taken resulted in an assertion and statement being made by independent auditors and lawyers that there was nothing untoward in the actions of Polysar. It was only later that a subsequent inquiry came out with a contrary opinion, and perhaps the committee of the House will be trying to reconcile these two contradictory opinions.

As far as the suggestion of the hon. member is concerned, if it is just enjoining the committee to do everything it can to get to the bottom of this, I would support the desire of the hon. member. However, if he is suggesting that the committee be given special powers, and they are not within the traditions of our parliamentary system, I suggest that this is a matter for the House to decide. If the House wants to make a special reference to that committee, perhaps the hon. member can discuss that with the government House leader, with whom he has daily contact.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I want to thank the Prime Minister for his answer, particularly the latter part. In the event an approach was made to the government House leader, could the House be assured that the kinds of matters which I have tried to describe, and which the Prime Minister has defined in his answer, would have the support of the Prime Minister? Would he, in fact, speak to his seatmate, the government House leader, so that parliament and the public could be assured that this committee would have the power necessary to make the fullest possible investigation of this kind of activity and, indeed, if necessary, other activities which could from time to time come to prominence?

Mr. Trudeau: In its very form the question is hypothetical, and my answer will also be hypothetical. If the proposals of the hon. member are in conformity with our parliamentary system, the government House leader would be open to his suggestions; but if they have the effect of changing the parliamentary system into a congressional one, it is possible the hon. member would have some difficulty convincing the government House leader.

POSSIBILITY OF INFORMING FOREIGN COUNTRIES OF WRONGFUL OPERATIONS OF CANADIAN COMPANIES IN THOSE COUNTRIES

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I think it ought to be clear to you, Mr. Speaker, and to hon. members that the intention is not to change the system but to make the parliamentary system somewhat more effective than it apparently is, judging by news reports with respect to the investigative capacity of the Public Accounts Committee.

However, leaving that aside for the moment, is the Prime Minister taking any steps to indicate his attitude to foreign companies and to foreign governments with respect to companies operating under Canadian aegis in those countries, particularly when, as has been established, there has been a kickback system operated in other countries and certain nationals in a certain country have benefited from the operation of a Canadian company abroad?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): At this point I do not see what representations the hon. member would suggest I make to foreign countries. I have stated quite clearly and unequivocally in the House that Canadian corporations, subsidiaries of Crown agencies and Crown corporations would have to act in conformity with the laws of Canada and the laws of the countries in which they are operating. Beyond that I am not quite sure what the hon. member would suggest I do.

COMBINES

THREAT OF BANKS TO TAKE ACTION AGAINST PROVISION FOR CALCULATING INTEREST—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the threat made last week by the Canadian Bankers' Association on behalf of the 12 chartered banks which are members of that association to take concerted retaliatory action if parliament passes a law requiring banks to pay interest on the money they receive from their depositors all the time they have it, is the minister requesting the officials in his department to investigate this matter under the Combines Investigation Act to see if the banks are acting in violation of the law against collusive action?

● (1420)

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I deprecate some of the comments made by the Canadian Bankers' Association at the standing committee because I believe they are attempting to exaggerate the problem in order to strengthen their case when they know full well their points are unjustified. I am advised that the provisions of the Bank Act concerning agreements between or among banks apply to banks in lieu of the Combines Investigation Act. Therefore, I understand the director of investigation and research has no authority to launch an investigation. I suggest to my hon. friend that he might better address his point to my colleague the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, perhaps because the Minister of Finance is not here today my friend would refer that comment to him. As a supplementary question may I ask if the government is firm in its intention to proceed with this legislation and will not be backed down by the intimidation of the Canadian Bankers' Association?

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, the government and myself are certainly determined to proceed with this legislation. The Canadian Bankers' Association's principal point was that they could not afford interest being calculated on a daily basis. At no time have I stated that this would be the case; the bill does not state this and they have been assured that we are sympathetic to the point that remote branches that do not have computer facilities would find this burdensome. That is why I suggest they are utilizing this point in their brief to cause wide alarm in the community. It is both unjustified and inappropriate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

BANK ACT

DATE WHEN LEGISLATION PRESENTED TO HOUSE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as a final supplementary and in the absence of the Minister of Finance perhaps I may put it to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in his capacity as second Acting Minister of Finance. In view of the delays that have already occurred can we be told when the government will bring the new Bank Act before parliament?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Acting Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer that.

MANPOWER

ALLEGATION 300,000 UNEMPLOYED OMITTED FROM STATISTICS—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I should like to bring to his attention something which I am sure has been brought to his attention already by his officials, namely, an article under date of Saturday, February 12, in the Toronto Star and I quote in part, " . . . unpublished figures leaked to New Democratic Party by Statistics Canada show the number of hidden jobless is at least 300,000." This makes the unemployed now in the neighbourhood of one million with an unemployment rate of some 11 per cent. Has the minister caused an investigation to be made as to the truth of the allegation regarding this leak? If not, I hope he will. Will he also advise the House why Statistics Canada found it necessary to hide some 300,000 people who should have been in the statistics relating to unemployment?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if I have heard any complaints about Statistics Canada it is that they give out too many figures rather than too few. This may be a pet project of an individual. It is all a question of how these figures are used, what their import is and why those in a particular category over a period of time are not in the labour force. There is no attempt to talk about hidden unemployment. I will be making a comment on this in a major address next week. It is a little difficult in the time given in the question period to deal with all the misinformation spread about these particular figures.

An hon. Member: Do it on motions.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, the minister still has not answered my question which is: will he cause investigation to be made to ascertain whether there is any truth in the leaking of those figures to the New Democratic Party? As a supplementary question, would the minister take it upon himself to advise Statistics Canada, and the ministers responsible, that the hidden jobless should also be included in the statistics issued periodically regarding unemployment in order that we may have a true picture of the unemployment rate in Canada?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, the reason for the figures, why they are put out and what programs they are based on, have been spelled out over and over again. There is no need for anyone at Statistics Canada or anywhere else to leak figures. They are all a matter of a comprehensive review which covers a myriad of information that is available to all members of the House. I am not so much interested in the fact that there are so many; I want to do something about getting the number reduced.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF CRITERIA ON WHICH ALLOCATION OF FUNDS BASED

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I hope the minister will not ignore my main question. Will he cause an investigation to be made, to determine if there is any truth to the allegation made by the Toronto Star? I shall now ask my final supplementary question. Since certain criteria placed before this House and the people of Canada regarding the Canada Works and Young Canada Works programs is based on old statistics relating to the unemployed, will the minister now review the criteria relating to the unemployed and moneys going to high unemployment rate areas? I ask this in view of new findings which apparently cannot be questioned. Actually, it has been suggested that the figures prepared by Statistics Canada show that over one million people are unemployed and that the true national unemployment rate is approximately 11 per cent. Will he review the criteria with respect to the Canada Works and Young Canada Works programs?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is saying, "me too," and aiding and abetting the misinformation and garbage being spread by the leader of the New Democratic Party. I again commend to the hon. member a careful reading of my letter sent to every member of parliament, indicating the criteria being used in making allocations under the Canada Works and Young Canada Works programs. We indicated that where the labour force survey figure was lower than that for those registered on the unemployment insurance rolls, we used the higher of the two figures. We used this system to the particular advantage of the Atlantic provinces. I would think my hon. friend would have accepted that. If we are going to keep bandying these figures around without indicating why they are used and what their base is, I think we shall be spreading a kind of mischievousness around the country which is not warranted. Mr. Speaker, the use of those figures reminds one of the reason for "Con" in "Conservative."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: You had better hurry up and make that statement, for there is lots of hanky-panky going on on the government side.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: There is "libel" in Liberal.

PROGRAMS TO CREATE JOBS FOR THOSE NOT INCLUDED IN UNEMPLOYMENT STATISTICS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Notwithstanding the minister's flippant attitude in this House, one must assume that he is concerned. I wish he would express that concern by telling the House what programs he proposes to create jobs for this hidden list of the unemployed. I say this since in my own province, for example, it stands at 28,000 and in the province of Quebec at 139,000, well over one third of the actual unreported job list. Now the minister tells us that his job creation program is based on Statistics Canada figures. I ask him, earnestly and sincerely, does he have under consideration at present extra programs to deal with this supplementary or unreported list of jobless?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if I were basing my criteria on the figures indicated by the hon. member, a different series of criteria would be used across the country. As I indicated in my letter, the procedures we were using worked to the benefit of the hon. member's province; we did this rather than using the labour force survey which leaves out some of the people who are not shown on the unemployment insurance rolls and others listed in a particular area. It represents an increase of about 50 per cent, and the benefits all accrue to the hon. member's province. I would think he should look at my letter again and welcome the changes we have made, indicating that where the labour force survey in our view does not do an adequate job, we have used our own statistics for the betterment of, or at least for the purpose of making more money available, to areas of high unemployment.

UNEMPLOYMENT—POSSIBILITY OF MEETING WITH PREMIERS OF ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration? In view of his visit to the Atlantic provinces where he will discuss, presumably, just this question, and the suggestion of my colleague from St. John's East with respect to meetings with the four Atlantic premiers—I understand the premiers have indicated their willingness, indeed desire, to hold such a meeting—can the minister tell the House if a meeting has been arranged and where and under what circumstances it will take place?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that a meeting has been arranged with the leaders at this particular time. It is a question of whether it is too soon to move into that particular region. However, I shall want to have a look at the suggestion, to see if something positive can come out of it, other than a mere show, by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration going down to see the premiers. I want to talk to people who perhaps can help me to create some jobs.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I hope very much that the minister will have some specifics to discuss with the four provincial governments. I wonder if he could indicate to us what specific programs he has in mind, so that they can come prepared to discuss specific projects or programs which can be undertaken this winter. I ask this in view of the critical situation existing in all four Atlantic provinces and the necessity, as I am sure the minister agrees, for doing something over and above that which is currently contemplated in the Canada Works and Young Canada Works programs. I think he and all hon. members recognize that this is but the beginning of attempts to deal with that serious situation in that region.

• (1430)

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, there has never been any shortage of ideas or plans coming from the governments of any particular persuasion. They have the same concern that I have about the high rate of unemployment in that area. Where there are good ideas coming forward, I will do my best to find the funds to make them work.

ENERGY

STUDIES OF POSSIBLE SITES FOR HYDROELECTRIC PROJECTS IN LABRADOR—EXTENT OF GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The minister will recall stating publicly last year that he favoured the government of Canada helping financially with regard to detailed studies being done in Labrador in order to obtain more information on possible hydro sites that could be developed in Labrador. Is it correct that in September the province wrote the minister asking for financial assistance for a series of studies that would cost approximately $2 million to be carried out over approximately three years? If that is correct, is the minister in a position to say what assistance the government of Canada will give toward these studies which will cost $2 million over three years? Is the minister prepared to say now how much the government will contribute?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm, as the hon. member has stated, that we are looking at the possibility of providing funds for an inventory of hydro resources in Labrador. I am not in a position at the present moment to indicate what the amount might be. I hope to be able to make an announcement in the very near future.

Mr. Crosbie: Will the minister confirm or deny whether Treasury Board has already turned down the minister's request for $1 million, a 50 per cent contribution, and therefore the contribution will be zilch.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the last word was parliamentary. It may be a well-known Newfoundland expression. I can tell the hon. member that the matter is under active consideration. At the present time, there has been no veto with regard to the program he and I are talking about.

Oral Questions

SPORTS

GOVERNMENT PROGRAM FOR AMATEUR SPORT—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister in charge of sports and fitness. Given the gold medal successes last week of our swimmers and skaters, it seems a perfect time to ask our minister for sport for a report on where her plans are. Two weeks ago she told the anxious members of the Sports Federation that she would let them know very soon the federal plans for amateur sport for the next four years, that she was waiting for cabinet. What is happening in cabinet about sport?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, in view of the hon. gentleman's prowess in the fitness test, I would like to wish him a Happy Valentine—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Campagnolo: —and inform him that following the presentation of the estimates, I will be happy to answer his question in full.

ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA LIMITED

IDENTIFICATION OF AGENT OF ITALIMPIANTI—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Prime Minister is supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton with regard to examples of representations he might make. It relates to the singular lack of co-operation that the Public Accounts Committee has been getting from the government in its attempts to throw some light into the murky warrens where AECL does its business. In view of the fact that one solution to this Argentine puzzle lies in the hands of Lucien Secouri, President of Italimpianti, who has so far refused AECL's requests to identify the agent, will the Prime Minister make official representations to Italimpianti and, if necessary, the Italian government in order to obtain this information?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I take exception to the preamble to the question. The government has been co-operating. We have asked every minister to go to the Committee. They have answered to the extent of their knowledge. It is true there are things that are happening at the end of the line of the Crown corporations of which we do not have control or knowledge. We have urged the committee to seek to obtain as much as it can from officials and anyone who might be connected with the operation. The ministers themselves obviously have a clean bill of health. They have co-operated in every way. I think that the preamble is really justified. In so far as the request itself—

[Mr. Gillespie.]

An hon. Member: Come on, Pierre.

Mr. Trudeau: Would you like to answer the question? I see the member of the NDP open his hands in anguish. If the member could be present at the committee and get the committee to inquire into areas into which he might have great insight—he shakes his head—perhaps the committee would hear something more than a rattle.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I am sorry the Prime Minister was diverted from answering my question. Will the Prime Minister allay the fears of those who might consider the lack of action on the part of government as being disinterest or, even worse, some sort of corroboration of the lack of activity in the investigation by simply informing, through the diplomatic channels, the Italian government and Italimpianti that we will not go any further in the partnership unless we receive the information requested by members on both sides of the House and the committee, regardless of which party?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I answered a similar question just last week. I raised the question of whether it was proper to discuss in the House the proceedings of the committee until the committee had finished its report. The questions today substantiate that question mark. When we have a report from the committee, surely the government will then be able to be faced with a reasonable series of suggestions. In the meantime, this kind of second guessing of the committee is not only premature but unparliamentary.

ABORTION

SUGGESTION MINISTER REQUEST BRIEFS FROM ANTI-ABORTION GROUPS

Mr. J. Larry Condon (Middlesex-London-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. It is my understanding that the Minister will be having a meeting in which a brief will be presented from the Planned Parenthood Federation of Canada, a known pro-abortion organization, on Thursday, February 17, in Toronto. If so, will the minister request briefs from the Alliance for Life or some other anti-abortion groups so that some balance may be obtained on this important issue?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is clearly a representation as opposed to a question.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON USE OF METRIC SYSTEM FOR WEIGHING CATTLE

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As this country proceeds into metric conversion, there is great concern among cattlemen in Canada. Can the minister advise whether he intends to convert the weights of cattle to metric and, if so, whether he will do that in conjunction with the United States because cattle trade is very much a North American market?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this is an administrative matter which comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of State (Small Businesses) who is concerned with the metric system. I shall be pleased to convey to him the hon. member's representations.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ALLEGATION CUSO INSTRUMENT OF SEPARATIST PROPAGANDA IN QUEBEC—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. What investigation is being made by his department in connection with the Canadian University Students Overseas (CUSO) organization respecting allegations that have been made by most responsible authorities that that organization is an instrument of separatist propaganda in Quebec and, indeed, that the federally financed group have been sending pro-separatist recruiters into Quebec?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have not personally heard of that specific allegation. From time to time there have been news reports to the effect that some people in non-governmental organizations which receive some form of government support are acting in a way which some people regard as not being consistent with national unity. If the right hon. member will let me have this particular allegation, I will certainly have it investigated along with a number of others that have come to my attention.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the minister, who is always up to date in connection with his department, is not aware of the fact that Dr. Arnold Smith, C.H., who for 11 years was Secretary-General of the Commonwealth and is now a professor of international affairs at Carleton University, made the statement, and I repeat it, that the federally financed group, not ancillary groups but members of CUSO, have been sending pro-separatist recruiters into Quebec. Does the minister tell me that the matter is apparently so well known that persons like Mr. Smith, who has universal approbation in all parts of the Commonwealth, does not know what he is talking about? And if he does, why is it that the minister is in a position where no one has even whispered this to him?

Mr. Jamieson: Well, Mr. Speaker, it really is not a question of whispering or saying it out loud; it is a particular allegation. I said that I had heard other ones. The first question the right hon. member asked did not include the name of Dr. Smith. Had it done so, of course, I would have realized that he was one of the sources from which this kind of criticism has come. I am looking into this whole question of whether or not there are those who are being, in one way or another, financed by federal funds, by taxpayers' funds from the whole of Canada, and whether they are in fact contributing to what the right hon. member has called the "separatist cause". Certainly, this one I will add to the list if it is not already there.

In so far as penetration of Quebec, or infiltration into Quebec, is concerned, that could scarcely at the moment be called an external affairs matter, and my feeling is that it will be a heck of a long time before it is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister has a masterful capacity for evasiveness. He is in charge of CUSO and external affairs. He now says that he has been looking into some allegations. What are those allegations, how many have been made, and when did the investigations start which he now recalls and did not have in mind a little while ago when I first asked the question?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I may be the master of evasion but the right hon. member is as sure as heck the master of a convoluted kind of question which bears no relation to the one he first asks. I should just like to say, in fairness, that I think the right hon. member would realize that CUSO is in fact a private or semi-private organization—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Under the minister.

Mr. Jamieson: No, sir, not under the minister. It is an organization to which we give a good deal of support, but it is not an organization which acts responsibly in terms of responding or coming to the minister concerned. It is an organization which has a good deal of independence. But that does not detract from the seriousness of the right hon. member's question. I have told him that I will follow through and he knows I will look into it and give him an answer.

ENERGY

MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—FINANCIAL GUARANTEES TO ARCTIC GAS—POSSIBLE REPRESENTATIONS FROM UNITED STATES

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that the Arctic gas consortium have not yet formally requested financial guarantees from the government on cost overruns on the proposed Mackenzie valley pipeline, but have indicated before regulatory bodies that they require such guarantees and formal requests will soon be made, may I ask the minister if the Canadian government has received representations from the United States government on the question of financial guarantees by Canada, especially in view of the United States Treasury Department's negative reaction to such U.S. government guarantees for cost overruns?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I want to give as comprehensive and accurate an answer as I can. I have just checked with my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs. To our knowledge there has been no representation made by the United States government.

MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—ALLEGED THREAT BY COMPANIES TO REDUCE EXPLORATION IF PIPELINE NOT APPROVED

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question to the minister on the same matter. Given the threats by certain oil companies in Canada that they will cut back oil and gas exploration in the western Arctic if the government does not approve the Mackenzie valley pipeline, will the minister assure the House that the government of Canada will not bow to these blackmail tactics when deciding whether or not this pipeline should be built, and if necessary cancel the exploration permits of the companies employing such tactics?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member is imputing certain motives which it is far from clear at the present time do exist when he refers to blackmail efforts on the part of the oil companies. I should like to reassure the hon. member that if a decision is taken, whatever the decision may be, with respect to the Mackenzie valley pipeline or any other pipeline, that decision will be taken with the national interest in mind. I have made it clear on previous occasions that the federal government will not be blackmailed or put itself into the position of being blackmailed by any group.

INCOME TAX

POSSIBILITY OF USING MOUNTED POLICE TO ASCERTAIN PEOPLE WHO DEFRAUD THE DEPARTMENT

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the Minister of National Revenue.

Last week the Minister of Finance apparently said, regarding certain loopholes of the RHOSP's and RRSP's, that some taxpayers managed to avoid paying millions of dollars in taxes by taking advantage of weaknesses in the law. My question is this: Does the Minister of National Revenue intend to request the services of the RCMP to investigate this, as her predecessor used them to investigate some loopholes in Bill C-203 concerning contributions by individual taxpayers to electoral funds?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to ask the hon. member if he is a great one for telling tall stories since I never had any indication whatsoever that millions of dollars of alleged fiscal frauds, as he said, have been made possible through RHOP's or RRSP's. As for using the RCMP to build evidence, we do so only in cases of extreme necessity, mostly to complete records already established by our investigators. It was never brought to my attention that fiscal frauds have arisen out of RHOP's but as far as other plans are concerned we have noticed some behaviour patterns which suggest possible frauds. In those cases, my administrators do their best to reject claims from taxpayers who try to beat the system.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary.

To reassure the minister, let me say first of all that I am not from Marseilles but from Quebec, and I am a Canadain right through and through. Just the same, I appreciate the tone of the answer of the minister: it indicates a state of mind that I admire very much because it reveals a will to get to the bottom of things. Here is my supplementary: first, the statement I quoted was not made by the hon. member for Bellechasse but by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) who complained that some taxpayers take advantage of the loopholes in the legislation to avoid paying millions of dollars in income tax. He did not say dollars but millions of dollars.

In view of the seriousness of the matter, and so that all taxpayers may be treated fairly, my question is very clear and I make it even more specific: does Revenue Canada, whose responsibility it is to collect taxes, when it discovers loopholes in an act and realizes that taxpayers are using them to avoid paying millions of dollars in taxes, as the Minister of National Revenue (Miss Bégin) said—I put the question and put it again—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): My question, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) has a question to put, he must put it immediately.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I realize once again that the Chair has a perfect sense of justice. Here is my supplementary: I should like to know whether the Minister of National Revenue will undertake investigations, with the cooperation of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, to find out whether the assertions of the Minister of Finance are really founded, and will those taxpayers be sued exactly as others were who took advantage of Bill C-203?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, my department and I never sue people who take advantage of the law; we sue those who fail to respect it; that is the first point I want to make. Second, in order to try to unravel the intricacies of this long question, I shall assure the hon. member that I will have a summit meeting with my colleague the Minister of Finance as soon as he is back in the House, to determine whether he did say what is reported.

I shall add that according to the information I have been given—I repeat—relating to registered retirement savings plans, a pattern of operation leading to fiscal evasion is known to us, and we do not accept such cases which are proposed by taxpayers every year at this time. For the moment, I do not know of any other cases that would call for changes in the law, and I will consider such changes only when the ambiguity will be so great that the interpretation could turn in favour of the taxpayers against the intent of the legislators.

AIRPORTS

PICKERING—GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS WITH REGARD TO CONSTRUCTION—POSSIBILITY OF DIVERTING FUNDS TO AID COMMUTERS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. As figures released by Transport Canada indicate there has been little or no growth in Toronto air traffic over the past two years—in fact, last year there was an apparent decrease in traffic at Malton—and as the minister himself admitted last week that air traffic is declining throughout North America, would he now tell the House whether the government is still intent on saddling Canada with a white elephant airport at Pickering, a gift which, judging from the government's sad performance at Mirabel, where a deficit of $47 million was run up in the first year of operation, is not needed.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has once again put together a great number of inaccurate statements. What I said last week, I believe, had to do with air traffic failing to achieve projected levels, which is quite different from saying there were significant downturns. I also believe, without checking the figures—I do not have them in front of me—that the hon. member is looking at part of the figures of air traffic in Toronto, not at all of them, for instance, scheduled and chartered flights. I would be glad to make those figures available. Of course, our basic objective, one with which I would have thought the hon. member might have some sympathy, is to try, in all modes of transportation, to provide effective means of transportation for the people of Toronto.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, since there is a very serious question as to the need for Pickering airport, would the minister tell us whether he has been apprised of the fact that there is severe commuter traffic congestion, especially on trains commuting into the Toronto area, and that $57 million is needed very urgently to relieve congestion in the Toronto shunting yard alone. If the minister is aware of this, would he give consideration to routing some of the funds earmarked for Pickering to help relieve this congestion?

Mr. Speaker: That is just as clearly a representation as the one made by the hon. member for Middlesex-London-Lambton.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST THAT MINISTER VISIT EDMONTON TO EXPLAIN RELOCATION OF AIRBORNE REGIMENT

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. About a month ago I asked the minister whether he would accept an invitation to attend a meeting in Edmonton to give an explanation in military terms for the moving of the Canadian Airborne Regiment. That invitation was refused, but there was an indication that the Chief of Staff would be in Edmonton very shortly. He was in Edmonton, but he said nothing and refused to see anyone. I am again extending the invitation to the minister. Would he come to Edmonton to give the military reasoning and the cost-benefit analysis related to the movement of the regiment without any equivocation?

Mr. Speaker: That, too, is a representation.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

WEST COAST TANKER PORT—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ASSURE BEST SITE CHOSEN

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can he assure us that the west coast tanker policy co-ordinating group, whose chairman is, I believe, from his department, has been given terms of reference sufficiently wide to enable it to undertake a comparison between the environmental impact, over-all benefit and cost of a tanker port at Kitimat, or Port Angeles, or, preferably some port out on the Pacific such as Gray's Harbour or Neah Bay, so that the best site might be chosen?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would have to look at the terms of reference. I would be glad to do that overnight. From the briefings I have received and the answers I gave in the House on Friday, it would seem that the committee is empowered to consider all these questions but without any specific commitment by Canada that it would opt for one alternative or another.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, would the minister tell us what plans are in hand to co-ordinate the efforts of this Canadian committee with its United States homologue so that a close study might be carried on the potential port facilities on the west coast and that we will manage in the end to keep these tankers out of the Straits of Juan de Fuca and out of Kitimat?

Mr. Jamieson: Here again, I would ask the hon. member's indulgence to find out precisely what the possible linkage of these two organizations might be, what it is at present and how it might be expanded. I will reply later.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

WEST COAST TANKER PORT—NUMBER OF COMMITTEES INVESTIGATING SITES

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Minister of the Environment. Are the two committees just referred to, one a Canadian committee the other an American, the same as the Termpol Advisory Committee, and, if not, is the Termpol Advisory Committee operating on its own? And is the minister considering a fourth possible committee, namely an environmental assessment committee within his own department?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, they are not the same committee.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, there are now three committees, one Canadian and two United States committees. Is there any truth in the report that there is a fourth committee, namely a committee of the Department of the Environment to look into the environmental effect of tanker traffic?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, the Department of the Environment is asked to make an assessment of the environmental impact when firm proposals are brought forward.

TRADE

GUIDELINES TO COMPANIES WITH REGARD TO INTERNATIONAL BOYCOTTS—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Recently, the deputy minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce issued guidelines to implement the measures the government said, in its statement of October 21, it would be taking to carry out its policy regarding international boycotts such as the Arab boycott. The statement said in part that "all Canadian firms . . . would be required to report instances of their complying with boycott provisions and that such reports would be made available to the public". Can the minister explain why, as it would appear from the text of the guidelines, the government will be doing less than it said it would do in its statement of October 21, and will be reporting only those companies complying with the boycott which approach the government to request assistance from it for transactions involving such boycotts and not those companies which do not require its assistance for their transactions?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think the guidelines issued by my deputy minister are perfectly consistent with the government's decision whereby any person required to go along with the Arab boycott should inform us about it and we would make this demand or this agreement public. But in any case, I shall compare the cabinet's decision with my deputy minister's guidelines to ensure that the guidelines do reflect the cabinet's decision.

GRAIN

WHEAT—EFFORTS TO NEGOTIATE INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. In 1976, prairie farm income fell by around 25 per cent and a similar drop is anticipated by many farmers in 1977, in large part because of international wheat prices. Can the minister tell the House what he is doing in that respect and what progress he has made toward helping negotiate a new international wheat agreement for which many farmers on the prairies are calling?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we have maintained a constant position in international discussions in favour of the grains arrangement. There has been little positive support from certain key quarters, but we are continuing to pursue the question and will certainly be glad to work towards an international arrangement, if possible. The hon. member might also recognize that the Western Grain Stabilization Plan has been put in place which will be of great assistance to the grain farmer.

TRADE

TEXTILE IMPORT QUOTAS—REQUEST FOR EXEMPTION FOR SMALL BUSINESSES

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that thousands of small and specialty apparel shops across Canada are on the verge of extinction as a result of having to comply with the government's quotas on textiles, which it is agreed are necessary for larger textile manufacturers, can the minister appease the many concerns—including those of the Minister of State for Small Business—and take the necessary steps to exempt these small shops from the quotas?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to do this because I do not see why we should make a distinction. We allotted a special quota to new businesses established since 1975 to take particular circumstances in consideration but I do not think that it is possible to exempt everybody while maintaining a sound policy for the textile industry.

POSSIBILITY OF CHANGE IN TREATMENT OF REVENUE EARNED BY INDIAN BANDS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue. For many years, revenue earned by certain Indian bands has been treated in the same way as revenue to Canadian municipalities so far as taxes are concerned. Can the minister advise us whether this situation is being changed and, if so, why?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure of the premise of the question, but I will look into the matter. I can inform the House now that I will be meeting with the minister responsible and representives of the Indians tomorrow morning.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In these days when misdemeanours of Canada's young people make instant nationwide news and bring Canada's youth into unfortunate disrepute, and when questions are being asked about where Canada's youth is heading, I rise on this point of order to indicate to the House how refreshing and reassuring it is to learn of a youth movement dedicated to serving those less fortunate than themselves—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have difficulty in relating what the hon. member is saying to a point of order having to do with today's business. If the hon. member can relate it to a point of order, he may continue.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, this is merely to recognize the presence in the gallery of all those who provided to members of the House the golly-gobbles made by members of the Canadian Pro-Life Organization, represented in both galleries this afternoon, by the Ottawa-Hull chapter of that organization.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, this is a very brief point of order which I would like to bring again to the attention of the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council. As answers to my questions on Statistics Canada have not yet been provided, perhaps he could leak some of these answers to their proper place on the order paper.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES ON LEGAL AID AND GOVERNMENT'S CONTRIBUTION

Question No. 1,309—Mr. Woolliams:

Does the government have an agreement with the provinces to provide assistance for the provision of legal aid and is the government's contribution 90 per cent of costs in relation to criminal cases and, if so, what amount has (a) been paid to the provinces to date (b) each province received?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Yes, the Attorney General of Canada, on behalf of the government of Canada has signed agreements with the ten provinces and the Northwest Territories to provide assistance for the provision of legal aid in these areas. The federal-provincial agreements cover services provided in relation to federal criminal offences. The maximum federal contribution payable to the provinces is the lesser of 90 per cent of claimable expenditures or 50 cents per capita. The contributions are payable annually in arrears. Revised agreements, applicable to 1977/78 payments in respect of 1976/77 provincial expenditures, provide for increased federal contributions of the lesser of 90 per cent of claimable expenditures or 75 cents per capita. The agreement in effect with the Northwest Territories now provides for a federal contribution of 50 per cent of both criminal and civil legal aid costs up to a maximum of $70,000 per fiscal year. Payments are also made annually in arrears. Part (a) $26,418,000 has been paid to the ten provinces and the Northwest Territories to December 10, 1976.

Part (b)

AMENDMENTS TO RDIA—TYPES OF INCENTIVES

Question No. 1,341—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

1. Is DREE aware of the comment made in a study by Professor Dudley of the University of Ottawa, that under RDIA as it is now constituted "... there is relatively little reason to believe that the relocation incentive desired from the program has been effective"?

2. In view of the many types of incentives to locate in underdeveloped regions offered to firms throughout the OECD nations, is DREE giving consideration to amending RDIA to provide its offices with a more flexible mix of incentives to offer to potential clients?

Mr. Ed. Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: 1. Yes, DREE is aware of the comment. The department provided both information and financial assistance to Professor Dudley for his study but his conclusions are, of course, his own.

2. The department is continually giving consideration to possible amendments to the Regional Development Incentives Act which might improve the effectiveness of the program.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—AIRCRAFT CF-104S, CF-101S, CF-5S

Question No. 1,353—Mr. McKinnon:

1. As of December 15, 1976, how many (a) CF-101s (b) CF-104s (c) CP Trackers will be fully operational?

2. In each case (a) how many (i) were originally purchased (ii) remain in inventory (iii) are in reserve (iv) hours of maintenance are needed per hour of flying (b) in what locations are they based (c) what are their roles?

3. As of December 15, 1976, how many (a) single seat (b) dual seat CF-5s will be fully operational?

4. In each case (a) how many (i) were originally purchased (ii) are still in inventory (iii) are in storage (iv) are in reserve (v) hours of maintenance per hour of flying time are needed (b) in what locations are they based (c) what are their roles?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): 1. (a) Classified information. (b) Classified information. (c) Eighteen.

2. (a) (i) CF-101s, 66; CF-104s, 238; Trackers, 100; (ii) CF-101s, 59; CF-104s, 104; Trackers, 31; (iii) CF-101s, Classified information; CF-104s, Classified information; Trackers, 13; (iv) Classified information; (b) CF-101s, CFB Comox, BC; CFB Bagotville, Que; CFB Chatham, NB; CF-104s, CFB Cold Lake, Alta; 1 Canadian Air Group, West Germany; Trackers, CFB Shearwater, NS; CFB Comox, BC; (c) CF-101s, Air Sovereignty/Air Defence; CF-104s, Conventional Fighter/Bomber Attack; Trackers, Medium Range Sovereignty Patrol; Search and Rescue.

GRANT TO FRENCH LAW SCHOOL IN NEW BRUNSWICK

Question No. 1,364—Mr. Jones:

Has the government contributed, by loan or grant, toward a French-speaking law school in New Brunswick and, if so, in what amount?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): No such grant has been made at this time, however, the Department of the Secretary of State has been approached by the Maritime Provinces Higher Education Commission to consider as a special project under the Federal-Provincial Programme of bilingualism in education, financial assistance towards the establishment of a French Law Faculty at the University of Moncton. The matter is presently under consideration.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—REGIONAL OFFICE, ST. JOHN'S, NFLD.

Question No. 1,399—Mr. Crosbie:

1. (a) How many persons are employed in the regional office of the Department of Veterans Affairs in St. John's, Newfoundland (b) what functions are performed from that office?

2. (a) Has the Veterans Land Administration Office been transferred from the regional office in St. John's to Sydney, Nova Scotia (b) are the functions of that office, previously performed by an employee located in St. John's, now performed by a field worker who travels from Sydney to Newfoundland periodically and, if so, for what reason was the change made?

3. Has the Minister made any decision to re-establish a Veterans Land Administration Office in St. John's, staffed by an employee located in St. John's so that the administration of existing mortgages granted to veterans and approval of new loans to veterans for home improvement and repair can be given prompt and efficient attention at St. John's?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): 1. (a) The Department maintains a District Office in St. John's, Newfoundland. The Treatment Services Program has a staff of 13 and the Veterans Services Program a staff of 39. (b) The Treatment Services Program provides eligible veterans with medical, dental and domiciliary care and provides grants and allowances, burial expenses and comforts to those who qualify, and administers the estates and properties of certain veterans. The Veterans Services Program looks after the social and economic wellbeing of veterans, specified civilians, their dependants and survivors pursuant to the various legislation administered by the department, including veterans established under the Veterans' Land Act.

2. (a) The Veterans Land Administration continues to have an office in St. John's, Newfoundland for interview purposes. (b) Yes. However, wherever it is considered practical, some Veterans Land Administration functions are performed by the staff of the Veterans Services Program of the Department located in St. John's, Newfoundland. This change was made following the retirement in October 1975, of the VLA field officer who was located in St. John's and subsequent to the March 31, 1975 deadline for veterans to apply for settlement under the Veterans' Land Act. There are only 400 veterans in Newfoundland who still have VLA purchase contracts and this number will continue to decline as the veterans repay their loans and receive titles to their properties. The workload associated with this declining number of accounts does not require the services of a full time VLA field officer with headquarters at St. John's and the current workload will be lighter still after March 31, 1977, which is the final date for veterans with subsisting VLA contracts to apply for additional loans.

MARITIME POWER POOL

Question No. 1,469—Mr. Howie:

1. Have any plans been made regarding the regulation of interprovincial transmission of hydro-electric power in a possible Maritime power pool and, if so, what are they?

2. Does the government plan to assist in the setting-up and maintaining of a Maritime power pool and, if so, in what way?

Income Tax

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: 1. No.

2. A federal-provincial study is underway. This will develop recommendations for the most suitable mechanism for co-operation in the Maritime region in electrical energy supply and will include consideration of a Maritime Energy Corporation. A decision on the type of federal involvement will be taken after completion of this study.

ENERGY—HUMIDIFICATION AND DEHUMIDIFICATION SYSTEMS

Question No. 1,605—Mr. Herbert:

1. Does the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources have a publicity program to encourage greater use of humidification systems in winter and dehumidification systems in summer as a means of reducing the consumption of energy for heating and cooling?

2. Has the Department considered any program of financial assistance such as that provided for the insulation of homes in Prince Edward Island?

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: 1. Nil.

2. The Program in Prince Edward Island was prepared to offset the projected high electricity rates that result from complete dependence on imported oil for electrical generation. A similar offer has been made to Nova Scotia. Programs of this type are not under consideration for other provinces.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Monday, February 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that Bill C-22, to amend the statute law relating to income tax, be read the third time and to pass.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, last Monday I made a few remarks in the House regarding Bill C-22—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Rodriguez: —and since that time many things have happened. I think it is only fair that I declare a conflict. The hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott) presented me with a can of hard candy which she said were humbugs. I want to declare that in no way will I be swayed by the corporate sector in this House with respect to the discussion of Bill C-22. The hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) says they are jawbreakers. I do not know. I have had a few of them, and I think that they were meant to sweeten my personality.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: I hear the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale). He was pretty loud on Monday night. As the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader, he had the responsibility for organizing the timing of this debate in the House. If I was speaking for a few hours last Monday, it is his fault in the House and he has to accept the responsibility.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: I would have far preferred him to have stood and accepted responsibility for the mistake he made, and I would be prepared to forgive him for having made it.

Mr. Goodale: There was no mistake, John.

Mr. Rodriguez: I hear shouts across the aisle from the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne). He said I was delaying the House and I was preventing the taxpayers of Canada from getting their rebates. In looking at the hon. member's riding, I see he will get $800,000 under the Canada Works program. That means the unemployment rate must be pretty high in his riding. I wish he would stand in the House and I wish he had stood at the report stage of the bill and spoken about unemployment in his riding. But all he can do is make remarks from behind the curtain across the way.

It is only fair to deal with whether the taxpayers of Canada would be delayed in receiving their rebates, if they have rebates coming to them. On checking with Revenue Canada, I find the following statistics show that National Revenue processed only 3 per cent of all tax returns by mid-March, and this bill will come to a vote long before we get to that stage of the game. But what is more significant, we on this side of the House argue that tax rebates can take place without the passage of this bill. After all, we had the example of Bill C-21. I see the hon. member nodding in recognition of this.

That legislation dealt with excise tax legislation appeals and sales tax exemptions. It relates to the same May budget. It has been administered by the Department of National Revenue as if the bill had been passed.

To nail down this argument and once and for all to put it to rest, I want to put some figures on the record. Figures from the Department of National Revenue show that by mid-March 1.9 per cent of returns on taxable income were processed, and 5.5 per cent on non-taxable, for a total average of 3 per cent. By mid-April 17.5 per cent taxable and 27.5 per cent non-taxable were processed and the total average was 20.2 per cent. By mid-June 33.1 per cent taxable and 43.6 per cent non-taxable were processed and the total average was 36 per cent. By mid-August the figure for taxable had jumped to 89 per cent, and 95.2 per cent for non-taxable, and the total average was 92.3 per cent. By mid-November, 98 per cent of all returns had been processed by the Department of National Revenue.

I bring these figures to the attention of the House to lay very effectively to rest the criticism which came from the benches opposite and from those to my right that our careful examination of Bill C-22 has somehow denied or delayed the taxpayers of Canada getting their rebates. As these figures show, Canadians waiting for rebates have not been jeopardized in any way.

I will be dealing with that matter again, but one thing which has really struck me is the time we have spent on this bill. All the provisions of Bill C-22 were mentioned in the May, 1976, budget. We have to keep the timetable in mind because it demonstrates very clearly that the allegation that we on this side of the House have delayed the bill is incorrect. It is alleged that we have embarrassed the government and that we are trying to obstruct parliament.

Mr. Symes: Never.

Mr. Rodriguez: I know we never obstruct parliament. Parliament will not be obstructed by the 16 members of the New Democratic Party or by one little school teacher from the backwoods of northern Ontario. If that should happen, God help democracy in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: As I said, all the provisions of this bill were mentioned in the May, 1976 budget. When was first reading of this bill? November 5, 1976. The government says it is concerned about the taxpayers of Canada; it says it is concerned about rebates. But when did we start second reading of the bill? December 2, 1976. When we came back after the Christmas holidays, what was the first item for parliament to debate? Radio and television in the House. I see the hon. member for Assiniboia banging his desk like a seal flipping his flippers.

Mr. Goodale: You voted for it.

Mr. Rodriguez: I wish a couple of ministers would throw him a fish.

An hon. Member: He would throw it back.

Mr. Rodriguez: If he kept it, he might get mercury poisoning. What are the priorities of this government? I recognize the importance of radio and television in the House. I recognize it even more since last Monday. It would have been wonderful to have had radio and television in the House, because we could have taken this show right across Canada, to the embarrassment of the government which is so incompetent and incapable of administering its own legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: All we asked for was ten hours to look at the clauses of Bill C-22 in some detail. Instead, we spent 2½ hours on Monday and 2½ hours on a closure motion debate. Today we will use four hours to consider this bill. When we add it up, we get nine hours.

Would it not have been easier and much more productive for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) and the government House leader to have agreed with the New Democratic Party and permitted ten hours of debate on the clauses of Bill C-22? It seems to me that we on this side of the House are very reasonable people.

Mr. Kaplan: It seems to you.

Mr. Rodriguez: The hon. member had his chance to make a speech. He deferred, so I am taking his time. His idea of democracy is that all debate is unreasonable. I recall the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) in the committee in the old days. He never wanted discussion of any bills at all.

Mr. Goodale: Have you ever been to the Saskatchewan legislature? You should see how Blakeney operates.

Mr. Rodriguez: We are reasonable people and we are quite prepared to discuss these things. All we asked for was ten hours to look at this legislation. Much has been said about our wasting time, taking up parliament's time, and all the rest of it, but I sat in this House and listened to unending debate on gun control which took months and months. Then it went to committee, and it still has not come back to parliament. That was a waste of time. We spent seven months debating capital punishment in this House. So for members of the government or members to my right to say that the New Democratic Party is filibustering or wasting time is not being fair at all. We have tried to give considerable and detailed examination to the provisions of Bill C-22. We have kept completely open minds. We have no axe to grind.

Something else happened since last Monday. People across Canada started to respond and I think it is only fair for me to mention some of those people who responded. There was a response from Elliot Lake. I received a telegram which says: "Congratulations, John. Kick them in the "—" ankles. It is from Roy and Evelyn Raftery of Elliot Lake. Here is another one from Sudbury. This one says: "Dear John, Give them hell". That is from Phil Landry, Mick Lowe and residence. Here is one from the boys from Bay Street. It says: "Congratulations . . . on behalf of vast majority of Canadians and incidentally all teachers. Don't forget AIB. Keep it up." It is from Frank, Doug and Pat, the boys from Bay Street. I do not have many friends on Bay Street. As a matter of fact, there are only three of them, and I hope to make their acquaintance.

Here is a telegram from Winnipeg: "No more tax concessions for corporations and the wealthy. Keep up the fight". That is from Jim Durcan. Here is one from Capreol, Ontario, where I live. It says: "You may have done something to change the rubber-stamp image of parliament". That is from Catherine M. Gilbert. Keep that in mind. Here is one that I am very proud of:

Best wishes. Local is proud of representation provided constituents of Nickel Belt which our members worked and elected you. It is gratifying that the Sudbury region has a spokesman for the wage earners and the unfortunates of Canada. It is unfortunate the Liberals or Tories have not the quality of members in the House they portrayed to the voters during an election. Our union's voice is with you.

That is signed, "Dave Paterson, President, local 6500, United Steel Workers of America." Mr. Speaker, that is the largest local of union members in all Canada, with some 16,000 hourly-rated employees. Here is one that really throws the lie in the teeth of any member across the way. I hope the hon. member for Assiniboia is listening. He was yelling across the floor the other day, "They want their RRSPs". Here is a letter that touches the heart:

Mr. Rodriguez, keep up the work. I will gain if the bill passes, but I would rather give up the gain to give the break to the old aged or the underpaid.

It is signed, "Josie Budnick".

Mr. Peters: There are a few benevolent people in this country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Kaplan) on a point of order.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Would the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) permit a question from the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Rodriguez: Certainly. Any time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, has the hon. member received any telephone calls, letters or telegrams asking him to sit down?

Mr. Rodriguez: No, Mr. Speaker. Since this started last Monday I have found what a wellspring is within the Canadian heart. When you get letters such as that last one, you know you are on the right track. When people across the country are prepared to say, "I stand to gain from this thing, but the things you have said are very important," we ought to take a good, hard look at them. The hon. member can yap and ask all the questions he wants. Here is an example. On Monday I got up and made my few remarks in a humble—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: —and sincere way to the House. Lo and behold, in the Toronto Star of February 8, alongside the story covering what I said in the House is an article headed, "Ottawa to close income tax loophole in retirement plans".

This is a Canadian Press article. I hope hon. members are listening, because I want to put it on the record. It reads as follows:

Federal tax investigators say they are cracking down on taxpayers using loopholes in registered retirement savings plans to avoid millions of dollars in income tax every year.

They knew it all along.

A Revenue Canada official said in an interview, the department is about to pounce on several hundred persons who have been using a wrinkle in the law.

But in the case of a second savings incentive program—registered home ownership plans—he said an unknown number of persons have used the plan as a tax dodge.

This is done simply by changing ownership of the home they already own over to the spouse's name. Both loopholes were created in November, 1974, when John Turner, then minister of finance—

He is the man who went to his eternal reward in the bosom of Bay Street.

An hon. Member: They should have put closure on the loopholes.

Mr. Rodriguez: That is right, but we never seem to be able to catch those loopholes.

Mr. Symes: Or the minister.

Mr. Rodriguez: The article continues:

—introduced changes in regulations to permit establishment of retirement savings plans on behalf of spouses.

At the same time, he created the registered home ownership plans "to assist young people in accumulating the capital required for a down payment on a house."

Both savings programs are vigorously promoted by chartered banks and trust companies at this time of year because deposits must be paid into the plans by March 1 in order that the amount of the deposits may be deducted from last year's taxable income.

For most people, the maximum amount that may be deposited in a registered retirement savings plan—commonly called a RRSP—is $3,500.

The money is taxable only when it is withdrawn from the plan. The theory is that the money will be withdrawn only in later years when a person is retired and therefore subject to a lower tax rate.

When the government introduced "spousal" plans in 1974, some taxpayers began to engage in what the revenue department considers sham transactions.

Typically, these sham transactions work this way—

These are what we call the loopholes in the plan. That is what we on this side of the House are against. It is really the crux of the whole thing. Here was an opportunity for a minister who really felt that the country should be supported by the taxes collected from those who had earned from the society and ought to be paying their fair share of taxes. Surely a tax plan is not to be set up so that every Tom, Dick and Harry, his dog and cat, can climb through the loopholes. I hope the minister is thinking about what I am saying. Here are the loopholes, according to this article:

The husband, the highest earner and therefore the highest taxed partner in a marriage, deposits $3,500 in a registered retirement savings plan (RRSP). He does this in his wife's name and before the March 1 deadline.

The husband deducts the $3,500 from his 1976 taxable income.

Shortly after the March 1 deadline, the wife—who is in a lower tax bracket—cashes in the RRSP and reports the money as taxable income for the current year, 1977.

[Mr. Rodriguez.]

This technique, merely a way of transferring income into a lower tax bracket, can be repeated year after year.

"There's a fair number of people who have done it," the revenue department official said.

"We're going after a few hundred, and serving notice on everyone that we're going to stop letting them play games."

How nice, Mr. Speaker! As the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) says, of course the trust companies, banks and insurance companies are going to report them. You can just see it. It is too ludicrous. Let some low income earner who is on unemployment insurance take out of the unemployment insurance fund something that he is not entitled to, and then see how he is tracked down. He can never escape: everything but bloodhounds are put on his track. This is the kind of loophole that we want to discuss and bring home to this government again and again. Something has to be done to plug that loophole. The income tax system must have credibility for the large number of Canadians who pay taxes. If people see that it has no credibility, they lose faith in the democratic process. That affects what we are doing in this House. We have to try to bring that home to the government.

The hon. member for York Centre wants to know if people have asked me to sit down. Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to stand here and talk until doomsday if that is what it will take to bring home to the Minister of Finance that something is seriously wrong with the system. That is only one loophole, but there are others in Bill C-22 that we want to discuss. As long ago as April, 1976, the minister was made aware of this loophole and urged in a meaningful way to block it. Mr. Speaker, an article which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of April 13, 1976, succinctly and clearly pointed out one of the loopholes in our law, a loophole which still exists in Bill C-22. The article read:

A few readers expressed mild annoyance that editorials on this page recently criticized illegitimate but nonetheless legal ways to avoid personal income taxes without giving enough detail on how to cash in on the bonanzas, in question.

They weren't just joking, either. They really didn't see why a minority of taxpayers should exploit tax laws in ways that weren't intended to be used but which are not prohibited by law. The Journal doesn't see why, either—but since giving detailed financial advice isn't one of the functions of editorials, the "how-to" details on tax dodges will have to be found elsewhere.

But some advice can and should be given. It's for the federal government. If a particular method of tax avoidance is considered an "abuse" of the tax laws, don't wait for more and more taxpayers to commit the act before cracking down on it.

If no change in the law is necessary to prevent fast "rollovers" of tax-free cash between husbands and wives under the guise of a registered retirement savings plan, for instance, then make it clear with a stern announcement.

Spell out what kinds of transactions qualify a taxpayer for the $1,000 interest income deduction from taxable income. If a quick buy-and-sell trade with bonds is considered an abuse, then explain exactly how long such securities would have to be held to qualify the taxpayer for the legitimate deduction.

Where Revenue Canada frowns on a tax avoidance device but is powerless to stop it because of the way the law is written, it should put pressure on the finance department for the necessary changes in law to close loopholes. The government should announce ahead of time its intention to make such changes. This would be a comfort to the majority of taxpayers who don't use loopholes and a useful service to the expanding minority who are being lured into them by the government's apparent laxity.

The need for clarification was well expressed in a recent brief to the Minister of National Revenue by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business:

The Journal quoted part of that brief as follows:

When the department remains silent on how it will treat certain flawed sections that can be easily abused, uncertainty and cynicism on the part of the majority of taxpayers who wish to be fair is the result.

The article went on to say:

If there is one thing Canada doesn't need more of, it's uncertainty and cynicism about the tax system. The government faces a massive job of cleaning up the incredible obscurity left over from tax reform that took effect in 1972. But the kinds of loopholes at issue here—such as in the RRSP, investment income deductions and the registered home ownership savings plan—are more recent imperfect creations than tax reform. They are also easier to tidy up in the interests of fairness and a healthier public attitude toward taxation. That job should be done now.

To that we say "Amen". That job should be done now. It is obvious to anyone reading the clauses of Bill C-22 and noting the existing loopholes that the theme of the bill is "one good loophole deserves another." The loopholes are legion. Considering that the provisions of Bill C-22 were mentioned in the budget of May, 1976, surely the Minister of Finance, together with his parliamentary assistants and nabobs in the bureaucracy, has had sufficient time to consider these loopholes and move effectively to block them. I do not blame the Minister of National Revenue (Miss Bégin), for the responsibility lies with the Minister of Finance. In this connection I cannot help noting another article which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of November 27, 1976, entitled "An ounce of cure." The article reads as follows:

Revenue Canada has let it be known that, among others, a tax dodge called the quick bond trade is under intense scrutiny and that taxpayers found to have used it will be pursued. The aim is apparently not to punish but to recover funds lost to the government under the device and to discourage its use in future. But it's almost a token exercise.

The quick bond trade usually works this way: Persons with less than the allowable $1,000 in tax-free interest or dividends arrange to buy and sell a bond simultaneously, acquiring accumulated bond interest that is tax free. The cost of the transaction, including the accumulated interest they bought from the previous bondholder, is tax deductible.

The attraction of the deal is obvious. Someone might acquire $1,000 in instant tax-free income while the $1,060 or so that it cost to acquire the income is reduced by the amount of the taxpayer's marginal tax rate. For someone in the 45 per cent bracket, for instance, the net cost of acquiring the $1,000 would be about $585, leaving a profit of more than $400 at the expense of other taxpayers. This could be done every year.

The weakness of Revenue Canada's campaign against this abuse is the limitation of the tax law. It can be used against "sham transactions" in which it is clear that no money changes hands, but it's doubtful whether it will prevent the same deal being carried out over a short period in which real money is put at risk. Since some bonds can be bought with little short-term risk for only four per cent down, the slightly less quick bond trade will still be wide open to abuse.

This, sad to say, is the problem with several other tax loopholes that should be closed. Revenue Canada is working to foil a significant number of taxpayers, for instance, who set up registered retirement savings plans for their low-or-no income spouses and then collapse the plans immediately to obtain a tax saving. But the loophole will apparently still remain for those with the small patience to allow a decent interval before skinning the taxman for the same amount.

The most effective place to crack down on tax loopholes is at their source. The source is the finance department, not the revenue department. Under the guise of stimulating savings through tax incentives, the government through the finance department devised too many abuse-prone tax laws. The revenue department's watchdog efforts may serve only to cause determined tax-avoiders to use more discretion. The impact on the millions of dollars lost annually in tax collections may be minimal.

I point out that the articles I have quoted from this afternoon came into my possession as a result of events which took place last Monday evening. People concerned about the direction in which our country is heading, and the cynicism prevalent in our government, sent this material to me pointing out those further loopholes as evident in the material which I have placed on record this afternoon. Last Monday evening, toward the end of my remarks, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) stood up and asked a question. He asked: What is the model for our tax system? That is a fair question, considering we are discussing a bill with such implications for the Canadian taxpayer. My model is the model of this party, the New Democratic Party: we believe there are three basic principles to a tax system under a socialist government. First, the tax system ought to be redistributive. There is no question about that. In this regard, the Carter Commission stated, in volume 1 of its report, page 6:

We are firmly convinced that this redistribution is necessary if we are to achieve greater equality of opportunity for all Canadians and make it possible for those with little economic power to obtain a decent standard of living.

That is our first principle, that the system must be redistributive. Not even a Tory would quarrel with that. But that principle would have to be accepted on all sides of the House. The second principle in our tax model is equity. I again wish to refer to the comments of the Carter Commission, volume 1, page 4:

The first and most essential purpose of taxation is to share the burden of the state fairly among all individuals and families. Unless the allocation of the burden is generally accepted as fair, the social and political fabric of a country is weakened and can be destroyed.

We know that is happening today. There are grave disparities between the bottom one-fifth of the Canadian population who every year receive a smaller percentage of the economic pie while those at the top receive a greater percentage. It was certainly neither fair nor realistic for the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to stand on January 26 and say he does not care if the rich in this country get richer as long as the poor get richer. He was obviously speaking in a vacuum. He does not realize the implications of the spread within the Canadian economic system. What has happened to the just society? Did it dissipate like dew in the early morning sun? We no longer hear much about the just society.

The third factor in our tax model is progressivity. I cannot stress that enough: the system must be progressive. Therefore, the three principles are redistribution, equitability and progressivity. It must be imposed on a broad base which embraces practically all forms of income and wealth. We are not alone in this position: it is not an isolated position. The Carter commission buttresses the principle of progressivity. I quote from page 272 of volume 2:

The greater the income, the greater should be the relative net contribution of the family or individual.

We do not have a progressive income system. The government knows full well that every time it comes in with a program or indexing exemptions, a registered retirement savings plan, a surtax or a child care allowance based on a formula dependent on income, it destroys the concept of progressivity. The higher up the income scale you are lucky enough to be, the greater the advantage with these kinds of programs. We fall into the trap of saying that all Canadians who are working and earning a wage can take advantage of the registered retirement savings plan, the registered home ownership savings plan or any of the other 18 loopholes in the system. However, we know full well that those at the bottom of the scale could never afford to take advantage of that sort of program.

We see a model with three principles. Our model is based upon the principle of ability to pay. There must be equality in tax treatment between men and women and between persons in like circumstances. I cannot stress that enough. Our model is based on reducing the gap between the rich and the poor by greater reliance on progressive, direct taxes on income and wealth. We have pleaded with successive Liberal and Tory governments to ensure progressivity in the tax system by using tax credits. We harp on that time and again. However, we do not get anywhere. We have not gained one inch in getting them to move toward a system of tax credits which would be the forerunner of a guaranteed annual income in this country.

That would be one of the best ways of eliminating poverty for over one-quarter of our people, 5 million Canadians, who live below the poverty line. What a travesty of our traditions, with so many living in poverty! Every time members go to the parliamentary restaurant they enjoy scrumptuous meals at cut rate prices, subsidized by the taxpayers of Canada. They should be asking themselves whether there is anything that can be done in this House to make the tax system fair and just.

Last Monday I suggested—and there were howls from the other side of the House—that when one looks at the income tax system in Canada one cannot help being impressed by the obvious close consultation between the wealthy in Canada and those who sit on the government benches. When I threw that out there was a whole slew of catcalls and howls.

I mentioned that the former minister of finance, John Turner, had gone to his reward on Bay Street where I am sure he is earning a lot more than he was earning in this House. The suggestion I made in this House is not as far out as some may think. I read a recent copy of Maclean's magazine, and in the section headed "People" on page 44, lo and behold, what is the scenario I read? It is:

● (1550)

If anybody still harbors any doubts about who really runs Canada, the following anecdote should dispel them. Recently Jean-Pierre Goyer, federal Minister of Supply and Services, phoned John Angus "Bud" McDougald, the head of Argus Corporation and the man in control of about two billion dollars in assets. Mr. Goyer said he'd like to talk with McDougald about the Canadian economy and Mr. McDougald said he'd be happy to oblige.

"I'd like you to come down to the parliamentary offices in Ottawa for our meeting," Goyer said. "If you want to see me, I'm at 10 Toronto Street in Toronto", McDougald replied. "Well, generally everyone comes to see me", Goyer said. McDougald said, "I'm not everyone". Goyer went to Toronto.

Mr. Goyer: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Rodriguez.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) is rising on a point of order.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that the hon. member permits me to make a rectification, thus eliminating the need of my writing to the Maclean's editor. I simply want to say it is true that I asked to meet this distinguished Canadian businessman, but I asked to meet him in Toronto where I had other business to do on that day. There has never been any misunderstanding between Mr. McDougald and myself about the date and the place for this meeting. The hon. member is kidding.

[English]

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Prud'homme: There he goes, enjoying his own fun.

Mr. Rodriguez: It is not fun. If the minister can find time to run down to see Mr. McDougald, when is he going to find time to see Jerry Beaulieu at the car wash in Toronto? That is not an isolated incident. On December 12, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Abbott), who had a lot to say in this House the other day about what we were trying to do with this bill, took a ride on the bankers' association plane to Toronto. When we were dealing with Bill C-16 in committee I asked if the minister had paid for his trip to Toronto.

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I suggest that the hon. member get back to the terms of Bill C-22, the bill under discussion.

Mr. Goyer: You do not want me to meet with businessmen?

Mr. Rodriguez: Yes, you want to meet with businessmen, but you also want to meet with lower income Canadians. This is very apropos the bill, Mr. Speaker, because the minister is getting advice from the top end of the economic scale of taxation. One should also get advice from those at the bottom.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I would ask the hon. member to get back to the bill under discussion, Bill C-22.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I am talking about the income tax laws of this country, and that is what Bill C-22 is all about. Any minister who wants to get advice from the corporate sector in this country should be prepared to get advice from those who earn small salaries in Canada, because they have a lot to say about the problems that face working class Canadians. However, I am not surprised by all of this. As I said before, we know the relationship that exists, and unfortunately this whole question of credibility comes into play. Bill C-22 brings the credibility of the Income Tax Act into question. One has to look at the relationship which exists among those who are responsible for writing the tax laws of this country, those who are responsible for administering the tax laws of this country, and those who at the other end receive the effects and benefits of that system.

In this regard, Mr. Speaker, as I have just read into the record, we have seen the relationship of the former minister of finance who has gone to his reward on Bay Street. Mr. Simon Reisman, who was the big mandarin in that department, has gone to his reward in the corporate world, giving advice to businessmen on how to deal with government. Isn't that just ducky, Mr. Speaker? But does anyone go to the outports of Newfoundland or to northern parts of Ontario to find out how the laws that we are debating in parliament contained in Bill C-22 affect the lives of people here? Do they really touch their lives at all? A lot of the clauses in the bill, as I have pointed out before, do not really touch the lives of the large majority of our people. It seems to us on this side of the House that only a small minority are able to take advantage of tax programs such as RRSP, RHOSP and the elimination of the surtax on those with incomes of over $30,000.

An hon. Member: Tax developers.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, a member across the way is interjecting and making comments. He had his chance to make a speech but he was so mousey that he sat there and did not rise. That is why I am on my feet. If he wants to make a speech, he can wait until I am finished.

We in this party have argued consistently that the legislation which is outlined in Bill C-22 is regressive in nature. One of the principal reasons for saying this is that Bill C-22 increases the tax deferrals and loopholes and adds to the numerous subsidies already present in the Income Tax Act which are largely beneficial to the wealthy and affluent. It is a deliberate deviation from the principle of progressivity. It is a primary deviation from the principle of equity, Mr. Speaker. It deviates from the principle of redistribution which we have talked about as our model for an income tax program in Canada.

The clauses on child care, registered savings plans, registered retirement savings plans, disabled persons and the registered home ownership savings program are inequitable in their application since they always give greater benefit to those at the top of the income scale than to lower income groups. As well, they are absolutely of no benefit to the poor who are outside the tax system because their incomes are too low. These deductions and deferrals must be reviewed in the light of more information that has come to my attention.

Hon. members on the government side keep on repeating that we have a fair taxation system and that the fiscal benefits we have been discussing do not unduly favour high income earners at the expense of low wage earners. Government statistics are impressive. Indeed we have been told that the vast majority of taxpayers who benefit from those deductions belong to the group of people at the bottom of the income scale. They continuously put forward impressive statistics which show, they say, that most fiscal benefits go to those who earn less than $10,000 a year. But statistics, Mr. Speaker, do not always tell the truth.

It reminds me of the story of a statistician. I believe he used to work for the Department of Finance and he once wanted to cross a river but did not know how deep it was. Looking up available statistics, he learned that it was three feet deep on average. As a statistician of the Department of Finance, he thought that information was quite enough. And, Mr. Speaker, do you know what happened to him? He drowned. His own statistics misled him, just as the Canadian taxpayer is misled by the statistics given to him by the government. Yes, the average depth of the river was three feet; but, Mr. Speaker, in some spots it was two feet, in others, five and even eight feet; and that is where we lost our statistician.

Mr. Speaker, we do not want Canadians to suffer the same fate. Unfortunately, just like the statistician who worked for him, the Minister of Finance allows himself to be misled by statistics that do not always tell the whole story. The minister tells us that 77 per cent of deductions allowed for child care go to families whose income is less than $10,000. The government likes to quote such striking figures. We do not question their accuracy. But those same figures hide the truth. That is, that in terms of dollars, child care allowances are more profitable to Canadians in high income than in lower income brackets.

The National Welfare Council, in its report entitled "The Hidden Welfare System" states as follows:

> A deduction always gives a greater benefit to the person with a higher income and a lesser benefit to a person with lower income. This is because deductions always take money out of a person's highest tax bracket—the bracket which is taxed at the highest rate applicable to his income.

Of course, we are not opposed to increases in child care allowances. But we are opposed to a tax system that provides for a considerably higher tax savings to the taxpayer who can best afford to pay the expense, and consequently has less urgent need of the subsidy afforded by the tax system. Deductions always give that type of results. The higher the deduction, the greater the disparity.

The National Council of Welfare gives us an example which shows how tax savings accrued from this deduction are much higher for the well-off than for the low income taxpayers. It illustrates how a person with an income of $6,000 a year, who is eligible for the child care deduction would save $257 whereas a person with an annual income of $20,000 would save $380 in tax with the same basic exemption. This is a good example of the type of situation the present government is hiding with its impressive statistics. This is the same kind of situation which made our statistician drown. We have a tax saving of $257 for the low income earner and one of $380 for the upper income taxpayer; is this what the government calls a fair tax system?

If we really had a fair tax system, as stated by this government, could they explain why in 1974 there were 252 citizens with an income of over $50,000 who did not pay any tax, and among them 17 had an income of over $200,000? Could they give us an explanation as to why the gap between the wealthy and the poor becomes greater and greater every year? We can explain this, Mr. Speaker. Amendments like the child care deductions tend to reinforce inequality, to maintain if not increase the gap between high income and low income groups. Our alternative is to replace this unfair child care deduction system by a tax credit system. Let me quote the Canadian Council of Welfare report; it says:

> The way to eliminate this inequity is to replace the child care deduction with a child care credit.

When fiscal allowances are socially justified, as is the case for child care allowances, they should benefit equally all wage earners, and this can only be achieved by fixed tax abatement system. Tax abatement is the best way to distribute the national income. This has nothing of a revolutionary idea. Some provincial governments use them to finance social programs. The federal government is well aware of the way these tax abatements are used. In fact, they are working very well as far as election expenses deductions are concerned. There are a great number of well-off benefactors who are friends of our Liberal and Progressive Conservative colleagues and who are well aware of the value and advantages of this particular use of the tax deduction system. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that we could at least take a first step towards a fairer Canadian tax system if the Liberal would be as concerned about the financial condition of the individual taxpayer as they are about the financial position of their own party.

If the government really believes, as it says it does, in a fair tax system, it will implement a tax credit system where it is required, particularly in the area of financial assistance to child care expenses, care of elderly and disabled people, as well as a variety of other important social programs. One of the benefits provided by the tax credit system is to ensure the payment of tax on every dollar earned. Now, I understand this might be a horrifying thought for a Liberal government and their Progressive Conservative friends who would be greatly alarmed by the loss of loopholes in such an advantageous tax legislation. They will certainly create dissatisfaction among their friends from the big industry. However, it is a measure of which the other 95 per cent of our people might take advantage.

Bill C-22 is unfair. It grants higher deductions to those at the top of the income scale. Take corporations, for instance. The higher corporate tax is not paid by the rich. The share of all revenues paid by corporations to the tax system has rapidly decreased during the past few years. From 1962 to 1970, corporate contributions to federal revenue have decreased by some 38 per cent whereas the contributions paid under personal income tax have gone up by over 23 per cent.

Not only are those Canadians who are in the lower 20 per cent income bracket becoming poorer every day but they carry a heavier tax burden. In the main, the tax system does not assist at all in redistributing incomes in Canada and Bill C-22, with amendments such as clause 21, relating to deductions for child care, emphasized even more the unfairness of the Canadian tax system.

• (1610)

As I stated, the child care deduction always gives greater benefit to the person with a higher income and lesser benefit to the person with a lower income. This is because deductions are always taken out of a person's highest tax bracket, the bracket which is taxed at the highest rate applicable to his income. The way to eliminate this—and this is documented by the National Council on Welfare—is to replace the child care deduction with a child care credit. A tax credit is just what its name implies, a credit of a fixed amount which each taxpayer could apply against his or her tax bill; in other words, a fixed amount of tax which he or she would not have to pay.

How is it possible to have that kind of tax credit with respect to election expenses and contributions? How is it possible to have that sort of tax credit applied to contributions to a political party? To me, that is a very fair way to go about it; but if we can do it in politics, why is it not possible to do it with respect to child care? They can no longer say that a direct tax credit is not workable, because it was that Liberal gang over there which used to tell us on this side that a direct tax credit would never work. But suddenly they needed party funds, and lo and behold, up pops a tax credit. Yes, we voted for it because we felt that any contribution to a political party should be above-board. We said, "No more handing over of envelopes in boardrooms. No more trips down to 10, Toronto street." No, sir, all contributions to political parties should be above-board, we believe. We do not object to that, but by the same token we believe that with regard to child care allowances there should be a direct tax credit and it should be above-board so that everybody sees where your hands are and nothing is done under table. Surely that principle should carry over. What gets to me is that in the House we have the power to do that. We can allow a direct tax credit to people who have to work and support a child. The child care reduction was replaced by a credit of $350. Women earning $6,000 and women earning $20,000 would receive the same fixed amount.

Mr. Peters: But the minister says that screws up the percentages.

Mr. Rodriguez: The actual tax dollars are not applied in a fair manner. The minister may have figures about how nicely these dollars are distributed in percentages. He may say that 60 per cent of the people take advantage of the child care allowance, but how much is that in dollars and cents? That is what we on this side are interested in. The minister keeps giving us percentage figures, but we are talking about how much that is in tax. Cuanto dinero, is what we ask. That is important. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) says "Si si". That is true. That is the response we have had in the House to tax credits. That is what we want to see. On top of all this, the child care clause is discriminatory, which I am sure the hon. member fo Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) will never be able to understand. At least he may live to regret his words. I do not have to deal with him any longer; that has all been taken care of.

An interesting letter with respect to child care allowances was published. I think that this woman, Joan Foley of Toronto, makes a very good point. This is what she says. First, she thanks the editor of the Toronto Star. Then she writes:

Thank you for your excellent editorial rebutting the objections by MP Marcel Lambert to increases in child care on deductions in ("Dumb, Dumb, Dumb," February 7).

My only regret is that you did not include among the legitimate reasons why married women work that, like their husbands, they appreciate the dignity which comes from being financially independent through paid work.

If it is conceded that both men and women should enjoy access to this status in the community, then it is not necessary to defend the working married woman by reference to the inadequacy of her husband's income to provide a reasonable standard of living for the family.

It also follows that the child care deduction should be applicable to the income of either parent.

Or is this twenty-first century thinking?

Joan Foley
Toronto

Of course, she refers to the editorial which appeared in the Toronto Star of February 7, 1977, entitled "Dumb, Dumb, Dumb", and refers to the hon. member for Edmonton West with regard to his outmoded ideas on why women have to work and the results of sending their children to day care centres.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Like many other people, she does not read carefully.

Mr. Rodriguez: Since the hon. member says I misunderstood, I will read the article because I think it is appropriate in view of the challenge with regard to my understanding of what it is all about. The article reads:

Someone, perhaps Anne Dea of Edmonton who's an Alberta representative on the federal Advisory Council on the Status of Women, should tell MP Marcel Lambert (PC—Edmonton West) the facts about the role of women in the last quarter of the twentieth century.

Lambert, objecting to income tax amendments that would raise the amounts working parents can deduct for child care costs, was complaining that women go to work for frills, not out of economic necessity.

He should try telling that to the 357,000 Canadian women in the labour force who are widowed, divorced or separated, who are supporting themselves and in many instances their children, too.

And what about the 1,198,000 single women in the work force? They don't work for frills—they work to pay the rent, to buy food and clothing, to pay their taxes. Lambert wouldn't approve, of course, but some of these single women have children to support too.

As for the 2,303,000 married women in the work force, they aren't working for frills either. They're working because, in many areas of this country, it takes two incomes in a family to pay off the mortgage on a house. Or they're working to send children to university or even, in some instances, to send their husbands to university. Some of those married women have alcoholic husbands, or unemployed or disabled husbands; without their earnings, these families would be on welfare.

Lambert opined, too, that children sent to day care centres become social monsters.

This would come as a great surprise to child welfare workers, for example, who find day care centres an excellent way of rescuing children from the risk of being neglected or abused by their parents.

But perhaps Lambert is one of those unreconstructed nineteenth century persons who doesn't want to be confused with facts. He is, after all, the same man who told a group of university students in Edmonton in 1972 that women wouldn't need abortion reform if they just kept their legs together!

So much for the progressive ideas which emanate from the Tory benches with respect to the child care allowance. We have seen how progressive the Tories are with regard to unemployment insurance, and now we see it with regard to taxation. I want to say that I reject everything which was outlined in that editorial and in what we sat and listened to a week or so ago.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not think the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) would intentionally mislead the House, but when he says he rejects all that appears in that Toronto Star editorial, I would do the same because it is based on a story which was a gloss of my remarks in this House the other day. The hon. member knows that, and he seizes on one small point out of context and then tries to build a case. His speech is as bad as the Canadian Press story was that day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: We flushed one from the benches opposite, and now we have flushed another pigeon from the bushes over here.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: I am not going to get into a debate with the hon. member for Edmonton West, but I sat in the House, I read Hansard, read it again and reread it.

An hon. Member: Why don't you do it now?

Mr. Rodriguez: I will get to Hansard in a minute. I read it before I made my speech on Monday. I thought I had dealt with the hon. member very effectively, but then, lo and behold, somebody sent me this editorial and I felt that it was very apposite to put it on the record so that we could have a complete picture of where the Tories stand on this bill. While I am dealing with this, I should also say that is the reason I am on my feet today after the few remarks I made last Monday night. It seems to me the Tories and Liberals agreed in principle with what is contained in this bill, and having done so, neither saw fit—

Mr. Paproski: Who were you sleeping with in 1972?

Mr. Rodriguez: The hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) asks a good question. We went to bed with the Liberals because we looked at the alternative and we did not think we could go to bed with him. He needs a face-lift.

Mr. Paproski: Shame on you, Rodriguez.

Mr. Rodriguez: The hon. member for Edmonton Centre keeps his legs crossed. I would not go to bed with him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: Those are not very nice remarks.

Mr. Rodriguez: It was a choice between worse and worst, and we chose worse. Nobody could fault us for that. The clauses of this bill with regard to child care are not acceptable. We take exception to the child care clauses, which we find discriminatory. The child care provisions are unacceptable because the method of deduction is unclear. It is based on the assumption that women must bear the full responsibility for child care. Such discrimination was excellently outlined in a letter to the Minister of Finance, the Minister of National Revenue, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford, and the government; from the Women and Law Association. I want to read that letter into the record. It reads:

Dear Sirs:

Re: Income Tax Act, S. 63, Child Care Expenses.

The Child Care Expenses section contains other discriminatory aspects which should be investigated and corrected.

1) The policy of this section is unacceptable since it assumes a woman must shoulder the child care responsibility. She must bear the expense of the babysitter when she goes out to work in the paid labour force. Women generally earn 60 per cent of men's incomes. (Statistics Canada, Dept. of Labour, Women's Bureau). Thus either her husband pays for child care and she deducts it (which is unfair to the husband, who should be able to deduct his real expenses). Or, she pays the expenses (usually more than the permitted deduction) and her earning power and consequently her financial independence is considerably reduced. This sex-stereotyped division of responsibilities is especially discriminatory. A clause should be developed which allows for maximum flexibility of responsibility and/or joint responsibility.

2) An indirect discrimination results from the absence in the definition of child care expenses (S 63 (3)(a)(ii)) of persons studying in full-time institutions. Under "earned income" there should be added a provincial or Canada loan or grant. As well, to S 63(3)(a)(ii) the phrase, "and to persons engaged in full time study at an accredited institution", should be added.

3) The $1,000 per child is inadequate and unrealistic in terms of the present cost of living and cut-back wages. A person running a business is entitled to deduct the full amount of expenses. Yet a maximum is placed on child-care expenses. Caring for children is a worthy valuable activity and full recognition of its value should be reflected in tax policy.

4) The child care expense deduction should be from tax payable—

I hope hon. members opposite are listening. It looks as though they are all asleep.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: There is one hollering from the back. I want to repeat that last paragraph:

4) The child care expense deduction should be from tax payable and not from taxable income as at present. Baby-sitting expenses are approximately the same whether the parent is at a $5,000 a year annual taxable income level or a $50,000 a year taxable income level.

I do not think this is seeping into the minds of hon. members opposite. We talked about the principle of progressivity. The government is undermining that principle because the child care allowance is going to be deducted from income. A specific suggestion is being made here that it ought to be a form of direct tax credit. Now I see that we are not alone; we are in good company in this regard. We have been saying that for years, but it takes a very long time for an idea to seep into the minds of hon. members opposite. I suppose they do not want to act on any progressive ideas. The only ideas they want are those which help their fine-feathered friends down on Bay Street. The letter goes on as follows:

[Mr. Paproski.]

The lower income person is therefore paying a higher proportion of income for child care and benefits least from a deduction from taxable income. This discriminatory discrepancy should be rectified.

In conclusion, since the described discrepancy in allowable deduction for child care expenses between a single parent man and a single parent woman is so clearly discriminatory, our Association would like a clear explanation from you as to why this section is drafted this way.

While you give your assurances—

Miss Bégin: Your party never supported the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. I do not think you ever spoke publicly in favour of its recommendations.

Mr. Rodriguez: The minister has found her voice. She is chirping that we never supported the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. Running for the leadership of this party was a fine woman and a strong proponent of bettering the status of women in this country, Rosemary Brown.

● (1630)

Miss Bégin: Why did you defeat her, then?

Mr. Rodriguez: The minister is a Johnny-come-lately—I should say "Janey-come-lately". We had Grace MacInnis here, the only woman in parliament for years and years fighting constantly for women's rights. For the minister to come chirping in now as if she is just coming out of the bush, she has another think coming. This party has been on record as standing up for the rights of women in this country for years and years. We will have to wait and see if the Badgley report is going to make any changes to the Criminal Code of this country. Let us see where they will put their mouths. I know where: where they put their heads—in the sand. The letter continues:

Will you give your assurances that this section will be amended to eliminate discrimination and the blatantly unfair discrepancies before the budget changes are given final reading? We are awaiting a response before proceeding with further analysis of the underlying policy of this section.

Thanking you in advance for your prompt attention to this matter, I am,

Yours truly,
Kriss Boggild

Mr. Speaker, I think that letter succinctly and clearly outlines the problems with regard to child care expenses. It puts on record the very questions we wanted to raise and which we were going to raise in committee of the whole before we were gagged. That has been our position consistently with respect to these kinds of clauses in the bill.

Mr. Pelletier: What is the punch-line of your speech?

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I am amazed at how Liberals find their voice when they know there is a time limit on debate. They all want to make speeches. That is the only time you hear them. At committee they sit like bumps on a log. They represent a vote. I know how boring it must be to sit in the back and not be able to participate in the discussions that guide the destiny of our country.

Mr. Pelletier: It is not as boring as listening to you.

Mr. Rodriguez: You do not have to stay. We can adjourn and come back tomorrow. I do not mind. I know how embarrassed you all are. Somebody asked me if I am embarrassing the government. Sure I am.

An hon. Member: You are embarrassing the country.

Mr. Rodriguez: Every time we try to hold up this kind of legislation, they are squeaking. They did not have much to say in committee of the whole. Not a Liberal spoke on this bill in committee of the whole.

Mr. Alexander: They could not get a word in edgewise.

An hon. Member: Do not forget you were on the committee.

Mr. Rodriguez: Yes, and you hear me when I am in committee too.

Mr. Pelletier: How can we speak, then?

Mr. Rodriguez: This bill creates loopholes. We have said there are three principles to our model of a tax system. First, it has a redistributive principle; second, an equity principle; and, third, a progressivity principle. As we look at the clauses in Bill C-22 and see what those principles are—

An hon. Member: What about incentive?

Mr. Rodriguez: Incentive for whom? I am glad the minister's parliamentary secretary raised the question of incentive. On the weekend a young man named Kenny Fawcett called me. His father was the member for Nickel Belt in 1965-68, a representative of our party. He was a fine gentleman, as many members of the House may recall. His son started work this year as an apprentice electrician at National Steel. He wanted to earn some money, so he worked hard and took all the overtime he could get. At the end of two weeks he got his pay cheque. The income tax was $150 for two weeks of hard work. When they talk about incentive, is it incentives for the working class? Is it incentives for the savings companies, the banks, financial institutions, the wealthy? They do not talk about incentives for the little guy. Why not give the little guy more incentive? He would be very productive. This young man wanted me to tell parliament about his case, and that is what I am doing, so I am glad the hon. member raised the question of incentives. Who becomes incited to save, to take advantage of the loopholes? I have just gone through some of them, but there are more loopholes.

An hon. Member: You should have told him about your case.

Mr. Rodriguez: The hon. member knows how I voted on the increase in wages. Members of parliament are perfect examples of incentive. We have more examples of how the loopholes work. The thing that gets me is that it is not just a few in parliament who are learning how to take advantage of the loopholes in Bill C-22. A magazine called Quest is distributed from home to home. In the February, 1977, issue there is an article entitled "Your money—how happy marriages can pay off in real cash at tax time", by William Scott. The article reads:

She's a wonderful woman, your wife. But now there's some even better news. She's more wonderful than you realized—she's worth money to you. Real, hard cash that you can put in your pocket.

It's all thanks to the government, which has devised a number of nice tax advantages for the married couple. Yet surprisingly, few married couples take advantage of the breaks available.

Don't just think of her as friend, companion, lover, and helpmate. She also could be the best tax shelter known to man.

Most of the tax advantages available to the married man flow from a sharing of property.

The hon. member says he knows that. He designed the tax system and he stands to benefit from it. The article goes on:

Perhaps that's why so few Canadians take full advantage of them. There is still an unrealistic, macho attitude around that says the man is supposed to have the money while the woman has the kids. Indulging that kind of attitude will cost you hundreds of dollars in taxes you don't really have to pay. For those of us who'd simply rather have more hard cash, here's some good news:

For a start, if you're earning about $30,000 and have the family house in your name, you're being about $500 unrealistic.

With a taxable income of about $30,000, your marginal tax rate—the rate charged on the last dollar you make—is 51 per cent, even if you live in Ontario (we shudder to think what it is in Manitoba). That means a $1,000 tax deferral will actually save you $500 in cash you will otherwise have to pay in taxes. That's $500 of real, extra cash in your pocket.

Here's the catch: that $1,000 deferral is available to you only if the family house is not in your name, nor held in joint tenancy, but is in your wife's name.

If you do not own a house now, you are entitled to deposit up to $1,000 a year for ten years in a registered home ownership savings plan. You are allowed to have only one of these plans in a lifetime. Once you have deposited for ten years, you are not entitled to make any further deposits.

But until then, your annual contribution is deductible for tax purposes. And, even better, you can get the money out tax free if you spend it to purchase a house, or to purchase furnishings or improvements to a house.

Those 10,000 tax-free dollars can be your down payment on a summer place. They can pay for the antique furniture you've always wanted. They can even give you a heck of a start at building that addition you've been planning to put on the back of the house. And while you're saving the $10,000, you're also saving $500 cash every year in income taxes. So—putting your house in your wife's name is worth about $500 a year. When you are old and gray and full of years, you'll pay a lot less in taxes if you are both drawing pensions.

The first $1,000 of annuity income from a registered pension plan at age 65 is tax-free. That's why it makes a lot of sense for you, as you are making deposits into a registered retirement savings plan, to make them not in respect of yourself, but in respect of your wife. The normal pension plan your employer operates has to be paid out to you. But an RRSP—whether it is a group RRSP at work, or a personal plan you are setting up—can provide a pension for your wife. The contributions to the plan are still deductible from your income for tax purposes. The limit on the size of your contribution—$3,500, less any moneys that you have been contributing to a company pension plan, or 20 per cent of your income—whichever is smaller—are the same if you are contributing to an RRSP for your wife as they are if you are contributing to your own plan. If you do not belong to a plan, the contribution limits are $5,500, or 20 per cent of income—whichever is smaller.

Setting up an RRSP for your wife can also provide you with some relatively short-term advantages. If she is not employed, she can draw the money out of the plan, and although she will be taxed on it when she draws it out, the total income in that year will be so small that the tax should be minimal. This is not to suggest that you can get into the habit of contributing to an RRSP for your wife every February 28th, and having her cash it in every March 1st. The contributions—like all transactions that have tax effects—must be genuine transactions.

But if a need for the money does arise, she can cash in the plan, and the money will be taxed at her rate—not yours.

The Department of National Revenue will depend on insurance companies, trust companies and banks to report withdrawals from the plan. I can just see them reporting that. I continue quoting:

But the real advantages of establishing pension income for your wife are at retirement. Then you will not only have two incomes—and therefore be taxed at a lower rate—but you will also have two pension income deductions of $1,000 each. The savings are really quite substantial.

The article continues:

Why settle for $1,000 worth of tax-free interest income when you could have more?

Your first $1,000 worth of interest income from Canadian sources is tax-free. Any interest costs you have to pay in order to earn this income—if, for instance, you borrow the money which you use to invest to earn interest—is also deductible against your income.

The same goes for your wife—and even better, if she earns some interest income, you are entitled to claim the rest of her $1,000 interest deduction against your income.

The next point is really interesting. I continue quoting the article:

Let's say you have $100,000 lying around the house. You decide to give it to your wife. She invests it at 10 per cent, and makes $10,000 on it in the first year. The attribution rules bring this income into your (the husband's) hands, and the $10,000 income is taxed at your rates. It's stacked on top of the other money earned and taxed at your marginal rate, not at hers. On the other hand, let's say you lend that $100,000 to your wife. You draw up a reasonable repayment schedule, have it notarized. She still invests it at 10 per cent, and still makes $10,000, but now the $10,000 is taxed in her hands, and at her lower marginal rate.

Like any transaction that has tax effects, the loan must be a real transaction. The Department of National Revenue had held that this means there must be a repayment schedule that is reasonable as part of the loan agreement, but there does not have to be an interest charge associated with the loan. And the loan has to involve money, not property. You can't lend your shares of Imperial Oil to your wife.

How big are the potential tax savings? Well, let's once again take an extreme case. Let's say your marginal rate is 50 per cent, and let's say the income that can be generated by the money you're going to lend to your wife is $10,000. If it is taxed in your hands, you'll be permitted to keep less than $5,000 of it (as your income climbs above $30,000, the marginal rate increases above 50 per cent). If you lend it to your wife, and it's her sole income, her taxes will be, at the most $3,000. Your minimum savings is $2,000.

The next point bears emphasizing:

If you work for yourself, it makes good sense for your wife to work for you too.

If you are a self-employed person, it may make sense to incorporate, and it will make good sense for you to employ your wife. The money you pay her will be money you don't need to run the household, and it will be money that will be taxed at her lower marginal rate rather than at your higher rate.

This doesn't mean that you can have your wife pick up the mail at your Post Office box every morning, and put her on the payroll at $25,000 a year. The income tax people stipulate that the salary you pay your wife must bear a reasonable relationship to her real contribution to the business. But even if you pay her only $1,000, and your marginal rate is 50 per cent, you have saved about $500 in income taxes.

On incorporation, you can make your wife a shareholder. She will then be in a position to draw dividend income from the company, and the dividend income can be reasonable—not in relation to her actual contribution to the company, but to its total earnings. This can have dramatic effects on the tax bite taken out of the money that is finding its way into your home.

Your wife's total income that year could be $13,000 in dividends. Her total tax liability will be zero. The company paid tax on the dividends coming out at the small business tax rate, and it's better than increasing your income over the $25,000 amount.

Some serious questions arise in connection with these matters. I continue quoting:

What happens if, after I do all these things, my wife runs off with the milkman?

There are two answers to that.

The first is that, despite the escalating divorce rate, most marriages don't end in divorce.

The second answer is that planning your financial life as though your marriage were going to end that way is one of the worst possible ways to run a marriage. Personal financial consultants are often closely involved in marriage breakdowns. They say financial misunderstandings have put more marriages on the rocks than adultery ever has.

And that brings us to the big non-financial bonus you'll gain from making the kinds of income-splitting arrangements described here. You can't make them without talking to your wife about the family's real financial position. You can't make them without involving her. And the marriage counsellors we've talked to tell us that kind of mutual involvement in money matters is a great tonic for a marriage.

So forge ahead. Realizing what a great tax shelter your wife can be not only makes financial sense—it's good for the marriage, too.

So there you have it. I did not know that the government, instead of operating an income tax system, was really providing marriage counselling. It just shows you how you can get all screwed up in this place. We have made a comparison. Asking the Liberals to organize and be responsible for a tax system is like putting Count Dracula in charge of the Red Cross blood bank. We have often stated that opinion. This is again borne out in Bill C-22. So much for helping the homeowners and the wealthy in this country with the various kinds of finagling that can go on with the income tax system.

● (1650)

The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) said that the registered home ownership savings plan was established to help young couples save for a home. We subscribe to that. All members of this House, regardless of their ideology, recognize that there is a great need to assist young people who are today trying to save a nest-egg in order to be able to purchase a home. When that plan was introduced by the then minister of finance, who has now departed for the upper echelons of Bay Street, we held our criticism. We thought there were certain drawbacks, but we muted out criticism. On the surface at least there were some advantages to which everyone could subscribe. However, the plan is now being abused. When the plan was set up, loopholes were included in it. Is there no logical, fair-minded person in this House? I stated that the principles of our model of a tax system are redistributiveness, equity and progressivity. I challenge any member of this House to stand and say that the Registered Home Ownership Savings Plan is fair.

An hon. Member: I challenge you to sit down.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: Is there any member of this House who thinks that the Registered Home Ownership Savings Plan as presently constituted is fair and equitable? It is a tax haven, a way for people to dodge their rightful responsibility to support this country. If every Canadian taxpayer took advantage of these programs, who would pay to keep this country going?

Mr. Peters: The poor people.

Mr. Rodriguez: Yes, the poor people, the elderly people, as well as the miners in my area and those in Sault Ste. Marie, Timiskaming and Cape Breton. It is these people who pay the administration costs of government. Therefore, my plea today is for the little people of this country, the low wage earner, the disenfranchised.

I want to return to the registered retirement savings plan. That program is also abused. If this minister would stand and say that he is prepared to make changes that would plug the loopholes, we would immediately give our support. I would consider that a victory of sorts for the low income people of this country. However, I do not expect the minister to do that. He had his chance. The registered retirement savings plan is supposed to help thrifty people. No fair-minded person would say that is not a good idea. It is good that younger people are allowed to put money aside for their retirement. They should be able to write off that amount for income tax purposes. However, it is not designed to help thrifty people. It helps the wealthy in a very direct way, the wealthy who have extra income on which they do not want to pay tax. Therefore, this has become another tax shelter. That is our quarrel with these programs and the registered retirement savings plan in particular.

In 1974 there were 3,580,000 people in the $5,000 to $10,000 income bracket who recorded $123,471,000 in RRSP deductions, an average of $34.49 each. In contrast, there were 274,009 people in the $25,000 plus bracket who had an average deduction of $1,501.76.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, and public bills.

Notice of motion No. 4, the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier). Shall the motion stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Stand at the request of the government. Notice of motion No. 7, the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall). Shall the motion stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Stand at the request of the government. Notice of motion No. 10, the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald). Shall the motion stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Stand at the request of the government.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, you will soon be coming to motion No. 14 standing in the name of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger). I understand there is agreement to proceed with that item today.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SUGGESTED REQUIREMENT OF WITNESSES AT CORONERS' INQUESTS

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, in consultation with the provinces, the government should take such steps as will ensure that all required witnesses are in attendance at future coroners' inquests in the provinces or territories.

He said: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Don't talk about income tax.

Mr. Schellenberger: Anything would be better now than income tax. The worst air disaster in the history of the Canadian Arctic occurred on October 30, 1974, when a Lockheed Electra transport plane crashed 2½ miles short of the landing strip at Rea point on Melville Island. Thirty-two men were killed as a result of the crash of the four-engine cargo-passenger aircraft which was owned and operated by Panarctic Oils Ltd. The aircraft was on a routine biweekly flight to change drilling crews at the site of one of Panarctic's operations. Three miles short of the landing strip, the plane was put into a nose-down position and power was reduced, thus increasing the rate of descent and making impact with the sea ice, far short of the runway, inevitable. Of the 34 passengers and crew on board the flight, 31 were killed immediately. The three survivors were exposed to a chill factor of some 75 degrees below zero Fahrenheit until they were rescued approximately two hours after the crash. The flight engineer, Gary Weyman, and the first officer, David Hatton, survived the crash, but a passenger who had survived the initial impact died on the way to hospital in Edmonton. The cause of the crash was not immediately known.

• (1700)

Since October of 1974 the circumstances surrounding the accident have been subjected to three official investigations. The initial inquiry and inquest conducted under the authority of the coroner's ordinance of the Northwest Territories was one of those. Due to the limited powers of the inquest to establish the true facts of the crash, two subsequent investigations were necessary. The Ministry of Transport conducted the investigation of the accident and Judge W. A. Stevenson was commissioned on November 20, 1975, to conduct an independent public inquiry into the circumstances surrounding the crash of the Lockheed Electra.

Only with the publication on June 29, 1976, of the evidence uncovered by the last inquiry was all the available information given to the public. It was a full 20 months after the accident before all relevant evidence was presented to the public. Relatives of the passengers killed in the crash, and relatives of the crew members, were left in a state of limbo during this time period. Civil suits were stalled and allegations and rumours concerning the captain of the Electra, Brian Thomson, were allowed to proliferate.

The prolonged time period between the actual crash and the release of the report of the independent inquiry was due to one further factor—the inability of the coroner, Mr. Walter England, to subpoena witnesses at the time of the inquest if their place of residence was outside the Northwest Territories. As a result, the two most important witnesses, the two survivors of the crash, were not in attendance at the inquest. Because the co-pilot and the flight engineer resided outside the Northwest Territories, and thus outside of the jurisdiction of the coroner, there was no way of compelling these men to attend. The jury was thus denied the best evidence available for determining what had caused the crash.

Section 21 of the Coroner's Ordinance of the Northwest Territories stipulates as follows:

> A coroner may issue a summons in Form H respecting any person, who in his opinion, may be able to give material evidence at an inquest requiring him to appear at the time and place mentioned therein, to testify to all matters within his knowledge relating to the subject matter of the inquest and to bring with him and produce any document, book, paper or article that he has in his possession or under his control relative to the subject matter of the inquest.

While the powers outlined in the ordinance are extensive, and no doubt effective in most cases where witnesses are residents of the Northwest Territories or provinces, depending on where the inquest is held they are useless in terms of compelling the presentation of evidence from witnesses who normally reside outside the area of the inquest in this case. With respect to the Panarctic crash, the limited jurisdiction of the coroner entirely frustrated the inquest. The two survivors were both in the cockpit of the aircraft at the time of the crash and could have provided the jury with important information concerning the last two minutes before the crash.

Up until the last two minutes the plane had been in a normal descent pattern. At a point approximately three miles from its destination the aircraft, which had been travelling some 300 feet above sea level and 250 feet above the Rea Point airport, went into an abrupt descent and struck the sea ice. It broke up on impact, with the bulk of the craft ultimately breaking through the ice. The jury, however, was denied a first-hand account of the pilot and crew's actions and reactions during the last two critical minutes of that flight. In addition to the two crash survivors, several employees of Panarctic Oils Limited refused to testify at the inquest and could not be subpoenaed to attend the coroner's inquest because they were outside the coroner's jurisdictional boundaries. Important background information concerning the procedural operations and regulations of both the Rea Point airport and Panarctic Oils Limited was thus unavailable to the jury.

The lack of jurisdictional authority of a coroner's inquest is, or should be, a matter of general concern to all Canadians. In this particular instance the type of plane involved is commonly used all over the country. If there had been some defect in it or in the way it is commonly operated which contributed to this disaster, the Canadian public had a right to know about it within a shorter period of time than 20 months. The north, in particular, depends upon air transportation and the people of the north should be able to have some confidence in the safety of their air transportation.

Further, this was one of the few occasions when members of a turbo-prop or a jet plane's flight crew survived a crash. Their testimony as to what happened in the last few moments was potentially of great value in preventing similar tragedies in the future. The Panarctic disaster clearly indicates the need for legislation making it possible to compel the attendance of witnesses at an inquest, even if they live without the boundaries of the province or territory concerned. Since coroners come under provincial jurisdiction, this would probably require legislation by all provinces, a thing not always easy to achieve. But it is surely in the interests of every province that an inquest investigating a crime or an accident anywhere in Canada should be able to get the evidence that it needs.

For more than a year after the accident public suspicion and ignorance surrounding the incident remained unanswered and undealt with. This situation could have been avoided if the jurisdictional authority at the initial inquest had been broader. Despite the competence of the jurors, they were unable to arrive at a conclusive interpretation of the events leading up to the crash. Realizing their inability to gather all the evidence, the jury recommended that a federal inquiry be set up to investigate the crash. It is also significant that one of the jury's 14 recommendations was that the powers of the coroner be broadened to enable him to subpoena witnesses from anywhere in Canada.

Despite the evident need for a public investigation, the government stalled and delayed the establishment of an independent public inquiry. Frustrated and concerned with this inaction on the part of the government, I rose in the House of Commons on July 25, 1975, as recorded at page 7935 of Hansard to ask the then minister of transport, Mr. Marchand, the following question:

> Will the minister request that another inquiry be sought in Alberta so that the co-pilot and flight engineer may be subpoenaed to attend and this whole matter can be cleared up?

● (1710)

Mr. Marchand, the minister at that time, replied to the effect that he was studying the question and would give me an answer at a later date.

During the same summer, my hon. friend from Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston) also questioned the then minister of transport as to whether he would establish an independent inquiry into the accident. Mr. Marchand was evasive in his reply and would offer no commitment that an inquiry would be launched. Still there was no action on the part of the government. Realizing that it was choosing to ignore pleas from the House of Commons, I issued a press release in August of 1975 in the hope that the public, once made aware of the situation, would pressure the government into taking action. Finally, on November 20, 1975, Judge William Stevenson of Edmonton was ordered by the government to conduct a full public inquiry into the crash.

The delay in setting up the inquiry can only be regarded as irresponsible. Mechanisms for carrying out a full inquiry were available to the federal government which alone had the jurisdictional authority to summon witnesses regardless of their place of residence in Canada. Yet the inquiry was consented to only after substantial pressure from both within and outside the House of Commons.

The reluctance of the federal government to establish a full inquiry highlights the need for joint action on the part of the federal government, the Northwest Territories and the ten provinces to broaden the subpoena powers of coroners. In this case it would have been more efficient, and much less heartbreaking, for the relatives of those killed in the crash if the initial inquiry had been able to assemble and analyse all the evidence. As it was, relatives of those killed in the crash were still trying to obtain death certificates for the victims a year and one-half after the accident. Settlement of estates was held up because of the unavailability of death certificates. When they did become available, some relatives were forced to travel to the coroner's office in Yellowknife and pay a fee in order to obtain them. As a result of the circumscribed nature of the coroner's power of subpoena, three inquiries were necessary and 20 months had to pass before the facts were known to the public.

The minister of justice, on November 3, 1975, acknowledged the feasibility of action to extend the jurisdiction of coroners. In reply to a question from the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), he stated:

> The solution to that problem is the enactment by the provinces of a uniform reciprocal recognition of subpoenas as was recommended a year ago by the uniformity commissioners. I urge provincial attorneys general to consider that report carefully and to act upon it. I would be happy at my meeting with the provincial attorneys general to raise this issue with them.

A co-ordinated effort on the part of federal, provincial and territorial authorities is essential to a successful attempt to extend the subpoena power of coroners. I strongly urge the federal government to take the initiative in bringing the necessary provincial and territorial officials together so that they can agree upon the means of changing existing coroners' ordinances. While it is clear that the subject falls under provincial jurisdiction, this is an obvious case where the federal government must accept its role as co-ordinator and urge the officials involved to consider the matter.

It was imperative from the beginning that the true story of the Panarctic crash be made known to the public, and it was extremely unfortunate that the facts were so long in coming to light. It was not until June 29, 1976, that Judge Stevenson revealed that the immediate cause of the accident was the action of the crew. Judge Stevenson held that captain Thomas's incapacitation was probably attributable to a cerebral seizure, and his conclusion that there had been a physical malfunction on the part of the captain relieved concern about the airworthiness of Panarctic's Lockheed Electra.

Aircraft are essential in the north to many of our activities. The numbers of flights are increasing substantially each year. Looking at the statistics, one sees that at Yellowknife and Inuvik the number of flights have more than doubled in a five-year period. It becomes imperative that the situation to which I have referred be looked into. Also, I regard the establishment of an independent inquiry commission to investigate transport accidents within federal jurisdiction as a crucial priority.

The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) has introduced a private member's bill to this effect, and I strongly hope that members on both sides will lend their support to this legislation. As outlined in the explanatory note to Bill C-220, the commission would have exclusive but selective authority as against any other federal body to investigate all accidents resulting in death, injury or property loss occurring on any means of transportation under federal authority. Such a commission would help avoid conflicts of interest arising in cases where transportation accidents are investigated by the federal body which is responsible for making and enforcing the rules under which the transportation system operated when the accident occurred.

In conclusion, I should like to reiterate the importance of taking action to extend the power of subpoena enjoyed by coroners. Only when such broader powers have been conferred can Canadians be confident that all the evidence needed for a proper inquest will be presented.

Mr. Ian Watson (Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, first, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) for moving this motion today. It is one which should receive the full attention of both this House and the government, and I hope today's debate will result in action on the part of the government.

The problem which the hon. member has outlined with particular reference to the Panarctic inquest has brought the circumstances into focus. It is one which has existed for a long time, however. From time to time accidents take place involving people from different provinces. Inquests are held, and while attendance at those inquests is often arranged voluntarily, from time to time this is not possible and testimony which is vital to a fair conclusion is missing. The basic difficulty is that there is at the moment no power to compel attendance of prospective witnesses who are outside the province or territory in which the inquest is being held.

The Supreme Court of Canada has held in a recent case, Faber v. The Queen, 1976, that a coroner's inquest is not criminal in nature, but civil. Accordingly, there is no federal jurisdiction with respect to the compelling of attendance by witnesses at coroners' inquests. At present, civil rules of procedure in each province empower a provincial court to issue a commission to take the testimony of a person or persons resident out of the province if this testimony is deemed necessary for a civil suit within that province. This, however, is the kind of process which is subject to many delays. It is not the sort of legal process which you would want to have in order to obtain the evidence of witnesses while their memory of an incident or of an accident is fresh in their minds.

It is essential for the efficacy of the inquest procedure that witnesses come before the inquest as soon as possible after the accident. There has been a move in Canada to achieve uniformity, and the uniform law conference has recommended a draft interprovincial subpoena act. I understand that this legislation has been adopted in Manitoba, British Columbia, Newfoundland and the Northwest Territories. Although the model act does not contain provisions per se subpoenaing witnesses to coroners' inquests, it nevertheless contains sufficient flexibility to allow the law to be amended to include that kind of proceeding as well as proceedings before bodies other than normal court bodies. It is this sort of approach which, I am convinced, will produce the kind of result which the hon. member is seeking in advancing this motion today.

Since I am strongly in favour of what he is suggesting, I do not want to hold up the proceedings any further. I urge the government to listen to what has been said today, and I urge the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) to include this question on the agenda of his next meeting with provincial ministers of justice, to push for the adoption of the suggested draft interprovincial subpoena act of the uniform law conference, and to urge that this act include the flexibility necessary to permit the subpoenaing of witnesses not only to coroner's inquests but also before other bodies.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I regret that the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) is not here to speak, but I am pleased that this matter has been brought before the House, not only the specific case in which the hon. member is interested and the fact that the government and the Department of Transport in particular seem to be running interference for insurance companies, but the fact that inquests have not really been effective because the people who know the story are not usually present. If the passage of this motion will clear up the matter, I am certainly in favour of it.

I am also interested in another accident the circumstances of which were very similar. It happened in Fraserdale, northern Ontario. I am interested in it because obviously we will have to do something about navigational aids and the assistance provided in those areas. Again, in that case, the Department of Transport is running interference for everyone. Information that had come out at the inquest is not available now, and the reports are secret. A couple of private reports are not available. It seems to me that information produced at an inquest should be right out in the open and the Department of Transport should not run interference for de Havilland aircraft company or the manufacturer of the particular machine. Yet that appears to be the case. They either protect the insurance companies or they protect the companies which manufacture the aeroplanes. The right questions should be asked at an inquest, and the people who can answer those questions should be available, whether they are from the Northwest Territories or any other province. Anything else is totally unsatisfactory.

This afternoon I was discussing the safety factor with a couple of gentlemen who told me that a number of inquests had been held in that area but the reports that were made do not cover a number of important aspects. In both cases there were fatalities and both cases involve aluminum wiring. Everyone knows that aluminum wiring is dangerous and causes fires. The CSA in this country is powerful enough to involve interest groups, but they make no recommendations for a change. In fact, the people who make recommendations at inquests are not the people who should be called. They are the people who protect vested interests.

Three young people died in Ottawa as a result of the use of aluminum wiring. It is difficult to provide a proper connection on aluminum wiring for a single reason which is well documented and pictures are available showing what happens. The fire marshall at the coroner's inquest co-operated with vested interests to ensure that people did not get to the root of the problem. In my opinion the coroner's inquest is not the place where blame should be assessed. That can be done in civilian courts.

In the case of the accident in the Northwest Territories, it is difficult to see what the reason for the accident was because in my opinion there has been insufficient investigation and not enough information made available to enable the coroner's jury to reach a decision. The same was true in the Moosonee area accident in which a number of senior hydro officials and of band 9 council members were killed. It was also true in Sudbury where an inquest was called after a man had been killed and the union charge was that the working place was unsafe. INCO then went in and blasted the rock, thus getting rid of the site. When the jury wanted to look at it, it no longer existed. So it was all right for them to destroy the site, it was all right for them to eliminate all the fixtures in the electrical system which may have caused the fire, and it was all right in the case of the air crashes to make the people who were operating that equipment unavailable. But it is a hell of a way to provide justice. It is a hell of a system.

We should be allowed to find out exactly what happened; the information should be available at the inquest, and the chips should fall where they may. However, in all cases those people will probably end up sitting on coroners' juries making recommendations to prevent accidents, fires or fatalities from other causes in the future.

● (1730)

In a democratic system eliminating the problems we know about is the responsibility of everyone, and I hope that the passing of this motion this afternoon will mean that some of the problems connected with coroners' juries and in connection with bringing witnesses before coroners will be solved.

Mr. Mike Landers (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to congratulate the hon. member who took the initiative in bringing forward this motion. I have been here only approximately three years, and this is the second good idea brought forward by hon. members opposite.

At any rate, I spoke to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) today, and he wanted me to assure the hon. member that he will raise this matter once again with the provincial attorneys general. He is sympathetic to the hon. member's motion, and we do not intend to talk this motion out.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Landers: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) suggested last Friday we should do this more often.

Mr. Kaplan: So did the Tories.

Mr. Landers: So did the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). In any event, there are a few short notes I would like to put on the record.

Legislative jurisdiction with respect to coroners' inquests is provincial or territorial, as the case may be, and not federal. Coroners in the territories have the power under territorial ordinances to subpoena witnesses, and this works well so long as the witnesses are in the jurisdiction. However, if the witnesses are somewhere else, there is no way for the coroner to compel them to appear. He just does not have jurisdiction outside the geographical area for which he is appointed. This problem is not unique to the Northwest Territories or the Yukon; coroners appointed under provincial statutes have the same problem.

The problem in the Northwest Territories came into sharp focus about two years ago in connection with the crash of a Panarctic airplane on October 30, 1974. Thirty-two people died in that crash, but two crew members survived. When the coroner was conducting his inquest, he naturally wanted to have the two surviving crew members attend to give evidence. They were outside the Northwest Territories and refused to go to the inquest. The eventual result was that the federal government, on the recommendation of the then minister of justice, appointed a judge under the Inquiries Act to conduct an inquiry into the crash, and under the Inquiries Act the judge had jurisdiction throughout the whole of the country, quite unlike the coroner, and he was able, therefore, to obtain all the necessary testimony.

The problems which arose in connection with the Panarctic inquest demonstrated how important was an earlier recommendation of the Uniform Law Conference of Canada. That conference, which was composed of provincial, territorial and federal government representatives, adopted in 1974 a uniform interprovincial subpoena act. This uniform act provided for a procedure for compelling the appearance of witnesses located outside the territorial jurisdiction of the relevant province or territory. This act was intended to apply not only to ordinary courts but also to subpoenas issued by coroners.

At the time of the Panarctic inquiry the Department of Justice suggested to the officials of the government of the Northwest Territories that they consider having discussions with provincial officials with a view to all jurisdictions enacting the uniform interprovincial subpoena act so that there could be procedures for compelling the attendance of witnesses who are outside the jurisdiction of each territory and province, and so that the statute could apply to coroners and to subpoenas issued by coroners. The officials of the Northwest Territories were very interested and attended at the very first opportunity to take up the matter with the provincial governments.

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief. I want to make only one or two comments. First, I want to compliment my colleague, the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger), for bringing this very important motion before the House. If I may say so, I was very pleased to hear the Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice (Mr. Landers) indicate that this will not be talked out, because it is indeed an important motion.

The hon. member for Wetaskiwin clearly demonstrated the need for federal co-ordination with his comments about the Panarctic crash. There is no doubt that a co-ordinating effort on the part of the federal government, and adequate investigations, are of obvious importance to all of us.

Historically coroners' inquests were primarily to determine how, when, where and by what means death occurred in particular accidents. There is an important component to coroners' inquests, to which my hon. colleague referred, and that is the necessity of adequate information, information from witnesses and other information which is required so that juries can assess adequately the circumstances surrounding accidents. The reason for that is obvious. When a coroner makes his charge to a jury, he points out very clearly that it is important to determine how, where, and by what means an individual died, but he also takes great pains to indicate to the members of that jury that from all the information presented to them, recommendations can be made by the jury. I simply want to say that this is a very important function of juries. All of us who have been involved in this area are well aware of many excellent recommendations which have been made by juries at coroners' inquests and that in fact their recommendations have effectively prevented similar accidents from recurring.

Again I want to compliment the hon. member for Wetaskiwin for presenting this motion. I was delighted to hear the parliamentary secretary indicate that hon. members opposite will not talk it out. I also hope that the government and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) will act with immediacy on this important motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the parliamentary secretary, and to suggest that it would be appropriate if we called it six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At 5.40 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that Bill C-22, to amend the statute law relating to income tax, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, as I was saying in my few remarks before private members' hour this afternoon, the Registered Home Ownership Savings Plan is one aspect of the tax system that we, on this side of the House, believe provides more than one tax loophole for people who participate in the program in certain ways.

During the supper hour I was visited by a friend who described a new wrinkle to the Registered Home Ownership Savings Plan. The more I hear about this program the more I am convinced it must have more ways than Masters and Johnson in its application.

An hon. Member: Who is Masters and Johnson?

Mr. Rodriguez: The hon. member knows who Masters and Johnson are. Here is a new wrinkle. A man and a woman, married, buy a home at the beginning of January and put it in her name. Then he establishes a Registered Home Ownership Savings Plan and for five years pays $1,000 each year into it. At the end of the five years it has accumulated interest and there is about $6,000 in it. At that point her mortgage comes up for review.

● (2010)

What does she do? She sells him part ownership in the home, for which he pays her $6,000. She then goes down to the bank; it is review time for the mortgage and she puts $6,000 against the outstanding mortgage. And, voilà, what is the result? The Registered Home Ownership Savings Plan is prostituted again. That is a new wrinkle. There is nothing illegal about it. But that is the kind of thing we have tried to draw to the attention of the House.

If time had permitted, we would have driven home these points to the minister and done our best to obtain changes in Bill C-22. It is my job to draw attention to clauses of the bill to which we object. We must bring home the injustice of this particular clause to the majority of taxpayers in Canada who cannot afford to take advantage of that kind of loophole.

Peter Myers wrote in the Ottawa Citizen of December 6, 1976, that the RHOSP is amazingly generous. It helps people who expect to buy homes in the future, families who want summer cottages, and even couples who are quite satisfied with their homes already. But like the other deductions, the wealthy benefit way more than low income earners. As I shall show, the facts bear out the truth of this contention.

For those earning less than $2,000 the average amount of grant was $105.21; for those earning between $2,000 and $5,000, the amount of grant was $203.18; for those earning between $5,000 and $10,000, the amount of grant was $264.93; for those with incomes between $10,000 and $15,000, it was $309.93. Those earning between $15,000 and $20,000 received grants of $365.80. For those with incomes between $20,000 and $50,000 the amount of grant was $462.11, and for those with incomes exceeding $50,000, it was $571.06. Those facts clearly show that the rich are getting richer. People at the bottom of the income scale for whom, presumably, the Registered Home Ownership Savings Plan was designed and who have the greatest need, got peanuts.

As we have tried to show in this debate, our model of the tax system is based on three principles: first, the redistributive principle; second, the equity principle; and third, the progressivity principle. I do not know if anyone in the House can tell me if this measure which we are debating is based on any of those three principles, or on all of them. In our minds there is no question but that the kinds of loopholes we have been discussing permit high income earners in this country to avoid paying their fair share of taxes which are needed to support the country, and programs which are absolutely necessary if there is to be stability and equity for the people of this country.

We are not alone in our opinion. It is echoed by the National Council of Welfare. Incidentally, the head of that council turned down an opportunity to sit on the Tory policy advisory committee. I find that extremely interesting. That council can by no means be described as a group of left-wing radicals, and this is what it says. I quote:

> Imagine a minister responsible for housing announcing a new program of federal-provincial grants intended to encourage home ownership. These grants would vary by a person's income.
> Of course such a program is unthinkable. The idea of a grant that increases with income would cause a furor in parliament and among the public. A minister of housing who would suggest such a program in the privacy of a cabinet meeting would be laughed out of the room—not to say out of the cabinet.
> However a former finance minister announced just such a program in the November 1974 budget and it became law. The program is called the Registered

Home Ownership Savings Plan—another of the savings incentives built into the Income Tax Act.

The purpose of Registered Home Ownership Savings Plans is "to assist young people in accumulating the capital required for a down payment on a house." One could wonder how many young people are in the income groups that derive the substantial benefits. It is certainly interesting to note that among persons making between $5,000 and $10,000 a year, only one in 49 took advantage of this provision. In the income range between $10,000 and $15,000, one in 32 opened up a plan. However in the $50,000 or more income group, the figure was one in 16.

I will not belabour the point. It is obvious, according to the National Council of Welfare and other statistics which have been quoted, that the wealthy are overwhelmingly taking advantage of this generous program. One in 16 of those earning more than $50,000 a year has taken advantage of the Registered Home Ownership Savings Plan.

The loopholes under the plan are indeed lucrative. As I have shown, the plan can be prostituted in all sorts of ways. I draw attention in this regard to the homeowners' dodge whereby many have transferred their property to the wife's or husband's name and taken a tax deduction for a contribution to a Registered Home Ownership Savings Plan. For example, if a man's income is higher than his wife's he might use the scheme as a handy way of saving taxes while at the same time building up a tax-sheltered fund. Any interest earned by this fund is tax free. If the taxpayer contributed $1,000 for ten years at 8 per cent annual interest, the fund would build up to $15,645. A taxpayer in a 30 per cent tax bracket for the top portion of his income would save $300 a year in taxes. If this $300 were invested at 8 per cent per annum, it would amount to nearly $4,700 in ten years. Thus, by contributing $1,000 a year for ten years a nest egg of more than $20,000 would be accumulated.

As I said, one partner in a marriage can become eligible by selling his or her share of a home to the other partner. The share would be sold by the partner with the higher income, who can make the best use of the RHOSP. The tax-free savings can be used to buy a second home or even—imagine this—to buy back the same home from the partner who owns it. That is a new wrinkle. I know that the minister can get up in this House and say, with the help of his charts and figures, that X percentage of the people have done this or done that. We know that the program is available to any Canadian who can afford to take advantage of it. Unfortunately, few are able financially to take advantage of the program. Therefore it is not used for the purpose for which it was designed. It has become a tax dodge.

Not long ago I asked, rhetorically, that if every single Canadian were to take advantage of the RHOSP program which I have described, and take advantage of the RRSP, who would bear the tax burden for those other programs which our country needs and which must be supported? How many would bear the burden? There would be very few people. We know who they are. As was pointed out this afternoon, it would be the poor people and the pensioners who would probably carry the burden.

Let us look at the twin program of the RHOSP, and the RRSP. Let us look at the benefits of the Registered Retirement Savings Plan.

Mr. Saltsman: That is important.

Mr. Rodriguez: The hon. member says it is important. It is very important. This party has talked about a national pension scheme for a long time. What do we get? We get the Canada Pension Plan. I recognize that the buddies of the government are in the insurance companies and banks of Bay Street. The government would not want to challenge them on that. It would mean taking away a very lucrative business.

The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Abbott) now wants to fight with the banks. He still has not paid for his airplane trip to Toronto. I want to know why not. That is important, especially when we are dealing with banks, their power, and the way they calculate interest on the savings of Canadians.

The Registered Retirement Savings Plan is supposed to help thrifty people put money away for their retirement.

Mr. Saltsman: Only rich thrifty people; poor thrifty people do not have any money.

Mr. Rodriguez: I wish the hon. member would not talk like that about the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott). She is just a poor little person.

Mrs. Pigott: Here is a present for you.

Mr. Rodriguez: It isn't ticking, Mr. Speaker. I think I am being bribed. Some people will do anything to get me to close my mouth and sit down. The hon. member has presented me with some cookies. This would be more appropriate for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. MacFarlane: He eats only Arrowroot.

Mrs. Pigott: I baked them myself.

Mr. Saltsman: She thinks there's something crummy about you.

Mr. Rodriguez: I will not be swayed, Mr. Speaker. I will not be bribed.

Mr. Epp: You just were.

Mr. Rodriguez: I always wanted to get my hands into the hon. member's cookie jar.

Mr. Saltsman: Watch it. This has been a clean debate so far.

Mr. Rodriguez: Well, she has a cookie jar in her office.

Getting back to the Registered Retirement Savings Plan, this was supposed to help thrifty people put money away for their retirement. However, it only helps wealthy people who have extra money they do not want taxed.

In 1974 there were 3,850,000 people in the $5,000 to $10,000 income bracket. They recorded $123,471,000 in RRSP deductions. That is an average of only $34.49 each. In contrast, 274,009 people in the $25,000 plus bracket had an average deduction of $1,501.76, for a grand total of $411,470,000 in excess income socked away. That is absolutely incredible.

The income tax system is supposed to be progressive. It is supposed to redistribute wealth in this country. A former finance minister, who has gone to his reward on Bay Street, opened up these loopholes for his wealthy friends. What is fair and just when those in the average and low income bracket have a saving of approximately $34.49 in contrast to the $1,501.76 for those in the $25,000 plus bracket? It is obvious that we have a big "L" government. With those odds, the poor people lose.

I wish to quote from an article that appeared in the Financial Post "How Savings Grow in Tax Sheltered RRSP". I quote:

> This example compares with the accumulation of savings achieved through annual contributions to an RRSP and through a fund produced from after-tax income.
> It assumes an individual can, from the age of 35 on, afford to put aside $1,000 a year from pre-tax income for retirement. The effect of assuming a 50 per cent marginal tax rate throughout the period and a 40 per cent rate are compared. Obviously the higher the tax rate, the greater the advantage of tax-sheltering contributions and the interest earned. Annual interest of 7 per cent is assumed throughout the period.

With an annual investment of $1,000 in an RRSP at the 50 per cent marginal tax rate, in ten years a person would have accumulated $14,784. After 30 years, he would have accumulated $101,073. Obviously this plan is not designed for low income Canadians.

Jerry Beaulieu works 60 hours a week in a cold and wet carwash in Toronto. He earns $8,650 a year. There is no way that Jerry Beaulieu can save $1,000 a year to put into an RRSP. Can you imagine Jerry Beaulieu in his overalls and rubber boots walking into that stable establishment called the Royal Bank and saying that he wants to borrow $1,000?

Mr. Saltsman: Only if he had a gun in his hand.

Mr. Rodriguez: Yes, and we know how far he would get with that. Jerry Beaulieu's tax saving would be nothing compared to a tax saving of $470 that is possible for Lloyd Robertson who earns $100,000 a year. I imagine Lloyd Robertson could get by putting his $1,000 a year into an RRSP and getting a $470 tax saving. However, Jerry Beaulieu who works in that dank, damp carwash in Toronto for 60 hours a week and earns $8,650 could not take advantage of that program. Obviously the plan was designed for the friends of the boys in Ottawa.

We should keep in mind the real purpose of the RRSP. We are reasonable people here. I am fairly reasonable. The RRSP was touted as an opportunity for people to put away money for their retirement years. However, it has been prostituted. The loopholes are so large that elephants can walk through them. And so the RRSP has degenerated and become a tax dodging device for high income earners.

Mr. Saltsman: They even advertise that.

Mr. Rodriguez: Yes, that is the way they advertise them, Mr. Speaker. One has only to look at the great scramble on the part of banks, trust companies and insurance companies whose advertising is designed to get you to put your money into RRSP's. Their advertisements say: "See by how much you can avoid paying the tax man"; "Avoid the tax grab"; and so on ad nauseam. I do not think that that sort of thing is fair to the rest of the taxpayers of this country. I do not think it is fair to the 16,000 hourly rated employees of INCO. I do not think it is fair to people who work for wages on an hourly basis and who are in no position economically to take advantage of these kinds of loopholes and tax dodges. Suddenly the RRSP is the magic formula for escaping taxes and making money to boot.

I could not escape the horrendous ad campaign being conducted in the Toronto subway, which I saw the other day when I was there. There in blazing colour was an ad which read:

> How to make money make money.
> Start turning your nest egg into a golden future by March 1st.
> Both National Trust's 9 per cent "no charge"
> RHOSP and National Trust's "high interest"
> RRSP will help your money make money.
> It's a golden opportunity.

Just walk by any trust company's office, Mr. Speaker, and you will be confronted with similar ads.

Here is another example which I extracted from the Globe and Mail for Tuesday, February 8, 1977. In big black letters was an ad from Credit Foncier reading:

> There's more to your RRSP and RHOSP than tax savings.
> The tax savings offered by all financial institutions, including Credit Foncier Trust, are identical. That's established by law. The key features you should focus on in choosing your Registered Retirement or Home Ownership Savings Plans are: Security, High Return, Flexibility No Sales or Administration Fees.

And on and on it goes, Mr. Speaker. This is the kind of advertising which is geared toward the people who have the money to invest. Unfortunately it is not the kind of advertising that opens the door to people like Jerry Beaulieu and so many people across the country who earn less than $10,000 a year.

The loopholes in the law are incredibly glaring. They are so glaring that Revenue Canada is now concerned about tracking down and closing the loopholes and threatening to prosecute, but they say they cannot, that their hands are tied by the legislation. All the minister had to do when this bill was at report stage was to stand up in this House and announce that he would accept amendments to block these glaring loopholes which permit the tax system of Canada to be used as a rip-off, rather than as a means of collecting tax and redistributing the tax in a fair and progressive manner.

As I have said, the loopholes in the RRSP are incredibly glaring, and I have already mentioned a few of them. But there are more. Here is another article by that famous tax lawyer whom I have been quoting incessantly since last Monday because he is an intriguing person. He is Mr. Paul Dioguardi and he writes in the Ottawa Citizen. He has more positions in regard to using this plan than the happy hooker. He headlines his article "Retirement Savings Plan Can Be a Tax-Saving Tool Too," and the article is as follows:

Although the Registered Retirement Savings Plan has been around since 1957, its potential as a tax saving tool has usually not been fully realized. Some time ago an interesting paper covering some of the possible benefits from RRSPs was presented before an annual meeting of the Canadian Tax Foundation.

The first point examined dealt with a spousal RRSP, the second with deductible mortgage interest. In both cases, the paper used tax deductible contribution limits before the 1976 federal budget. Calculations, therefore, are not exact and are presented here for illustrative purposes only.

Our hypothetical taxpayer—let's call him John Q. Taxpayer—is married, has no registered pension plan and is in a 50 per cent tax bracket. He contributes $4,000 each year for five years to his wife's RRSP. Each year the $2,000 he saved by being able to take a tax deduction on the RRSP contribution is used to fund a portion of the contribution.

The remaining $2,000 comes from liquidating some of his income-producing investments which he later repurchases with borrowed funds. (This is necessary because interest on money borrowed to make a contribution to a spouse's RRSP is not deductible.)

At the end of the five-year period the spousal RRSP is collapsed. The value of the assets in the plan, assuming that they have been invested at 9 per cent interest compounded annually, would be $23,940.

It is then necessary to take into consideration the amount of tax which would have to be paid when the money is withdrawn from the plan. This can be set at $7,223 using 1975 tax rates and assuming that the wife has no other income in the payout year.

In addition, one must compute the tax on the lost spouse exemption in the year in which the funds are paid out. This comes to about $822 leaving a net amount in hand, before loan payments, of $15,895.

Mr. Taxpayer then must pay the bank for the $2,000 loans taken out each year. Assuming a tax deductible rate of interest of 10 per cent, his payout would be in the area of $11,500.

After working out the mathematics, it can readily be seen that Mr. Taxpayer could have realized, as a result of these transactions, a net profit of $4,395. (The result would be even better using the new $5,500 contribution limit.)

That is proposed in this bill.

Naturally tax savings are more dramatic when using the example of a person in a 50 per cent tax bracket, but the procedure may also be of interest to those at lower tax levels.

Assuming Mr. Taxpayer is a participant in a registered pension plan and has the ability, within the deductibility limitations imposed by the Income Tax Act, to contribute $1,200 each year to a spousal RRSP.

If he had a taxable income in the $14,700 range each year and follows the drill previously outlined his tax saving would be slightly more than $1,000.

A spousal plan is not the only way an RRSP can be used to save tax dollars. Another concept utilizes an RRSP to effectively convert part of a taxpayer's home mortgage interest expense into tax deductible interest. It goes something like this:

Assume our friend Mr. Taxpayer has a $30,000 mortgage on his home. It comes up for renewal every five years and there are four more years to run on the mortgage.

For some time he's been making annual contributions of $4,000 to his RRSP. These amounts have not been borrowed and, therefore, over the next four years he will have invested $16,000 in the RRSP out of his free cash.

If he could utilize the $16,000 free cash to pay down the mortgage and then increase the mortgage in order to fund the RRSP contribution, it should be possible to make the interest on the $16,000 mortgage liability tax deductible.

Instead of using his own money to contribute to the RRSP, Mr. Taxpayer borrows $4,000 from the bank and makes his RRSP contribution from these funds. The $4,000 of his own free cash is then invested in Canada Savings Bonds or other easily cashable securities which pay good interest rates.

For each of the next three years, Mr. Taxpayer follows the same procedure until he has accumulated a bank debt of $16,000 and a bond investment of the same amount.

The only cost he should incur would be the spread between the interest paid to the bank and that received from the bonds. When the mortgage becomes due he simply cashes in the bonds and pays it down by $16,000.

● (2040)

Then he increases his mortgage by $16,000 and uses this additional money to pay off the bank loan.

Mr. Taxpayer is now in a position to claim a deduction of the mortgage interest on $16,000 because that amount was borrowed in order to pay off a bank loan which was originally used for the tax deductible purpose of contribution to an RRSP.

Although both of these alternatives may be of some interest, taxpayers should be cautious in tailoring their tax planning to fit the particular situation. Otherwise the result could be financially unpleasant.

Looking through this proposal, Mr. Speaker, one can readily conclude that it is not lower income Canadians who would be able to profit from the kind of advice which people like Mr. Dioguardi are able to provide with respect to investments in connection with the RRSP program.

We in the New Democratic Party are also completely and unconditionally opposed to clause 65. This clause is one in connection with which we requested extra time for discussion, because at the time the debate at the report stage ended only some two and one-half or three minutes had been spent on clause 65. This clause means that the surtax on high income earners will be in effect only for 1976. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) has confirmed that it will not be continued notwithstanding the fact that it was part of the anti-inflation program which is continuing beyond 1976. What a flip-flop!

Back in December, 1975, the Minister of Finance made the following remarks in the House of Commons:

As the House is well aware, it has been our concern from the beginning that the anti-inflation program should be fair, and should be seen to be fair, to all groups in our economy. That is critical to the credibility of the program and crucial to its success.

He went on to say:

In terms of fairness and equity, it is, we believe, only fair that those at the upper end of the income scale, who are able to absorb the impact of rising living costs without undue hardship, should be asked to shoulder some share of the burden . . . We have come to the conclusion that a surtax should be levied on all those in the upper income bracket whether they be professionals, independent businessmen, corporate executives, well-to-do farmers or senior public servants. While the guidelines do provide for a maximum increase of $2,400, it is fair to ask those who already enjoy ample means to make a proportionately greater sacrifice in the national interest.

So much for equal sacrifices. But what is to be expected? The minister, when he introduced the surtax at the time of the anti-inflation program, said that those in the higher tax brackets had to bleed a little. Yet, here, under clause 65 he said the tax is being lifted.

An hon. Member: Boring!

Mr. Rodriguez: You may say it is boring, but there goes the credibility of the government. This tax was introduced along with the government anti-inflation program. It is all right for you to laugh over there, but your turn will come.

What could we expect? The Anti-Inflation Board did not seem to affect Eric Trigg, executive vice-president of Alcan Aluminum, whose salary in the first year of the program went from $147,348 to $162,178, an increase of 10 per cent. Nor did affect John Armstrong, chairman of the board and president of Imperial Oil, whose salary jumped $30,000 in the first year of the program. The elimination of the surtax after 1976 is just another concession to the wealthy in Canada. The tax saving for someone in the $50,000 income bracket will be $402. For someone in the $80,000 bracket, clause 65 will mean a saving of $1,654, and for someone earning $100,000 it will mean $2,491. In total, it will cost the treasury, in other words, the people of Canada, $135 million, and every penny of it will go to the 2 or 3 per cent of Canadians with incomes of $30,000 plus. Is there anyone in the House who will tell me that this is an equitable tax system?

Clause 65 grants substantial savings to the wealthy, savings which are additional to the benefits these groups have reaped by escaping controls through the use of regressive tax measures such as personal income tax indexing and a variety of special tax shelters for high-income earners, shelters which make it doubtful that any individual would report a taxable income of $500,000.

The decision to rescind the surtax means that the burden shouldered by these income groups is being lifted at the time when the average working person is asked to accept stringent limits on wage increases. As far as this party is concerned, the only acceptable change in the application of the surtax would be to increase it.

We turn now to the question of indexing. The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) is looking askance at me. I can see it in his eyes; he is asking me: am I going to get into this subject? Well, I will give that some thought, and in due course I will let him know.

An hon. Member: He is not holding his breath.

Mr. Rodriguez: I am not suggesting he should do so. The government whip says the observations made have not been profound. Well, he did not have much to say when we discussed this bill in committee. He was sheepish, almost seal-like in the way he sat waving his flippers, like a seal waiting for a fish. Now he is heckling from his place. I wish he had made his comments at a time when such remarks would have been appropriate. I turn, as I say, to the question of indexing.

It is no wonder the Liberal government is in trouble. It is no wonder that poll after poll shows that the people are turning away in droves from the Liberal party. The bill before us is the most recent in the long line of mistakes the Liberal government has made. However, the interesting thing about the indexing system is to know where the Liberal government got it. Anyone looking at the income tax system would think that indexing was thought up by the Liberal government, but the Conservatives have claimed credit for our indexing system.

It was in the minority period—I think in 1973 or 1974—when the government brought in indexing of tax exemptions. I think it was the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) who advocated it in the 1972 campaign. Lo and behold, the Liberals stole the indexing system from the Conservatives and put it into effect. However, that was not the only thing that was stolen from the Conservatives. The Liberals also stole wage and price controls, and we know what is happening in that regard. Another thing stolen from the Conservatives was the latest proposed change to the Unemployment Insurance Act, moving the minimum period of attachment from eight to 12 weeks.

Does it really matter who sits on the government benches, whether it be Tweedledee or Tweedledum? They steal from each other. I am glad the Liberals are now stealing from the Conservatives because that means that our programs can remain intact.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Such as they are.

Mr. Rodriguez: Our programs can remain intact because they are waiting for the moment when socialism comes to the government of Canada. Hon. members will notice that in every instance when the government has taken a program from the official opposition—and indexing is one of these—it has been a dismal failure.

It is estimated that last year indexing cost Canada $1 billion in taxes.

Mr. Saltsman: Bay Street thinks that is great.

Mr. Rodriguez: The boys on Bay Street think that is great. The fact is that the indexing in our income tax system allows the wealthy to get the best breaks. I was asked what our model for an income tax system would be, and I pointed out that our income tax system would embrace three principles. One is the principle of redistribution. We would want a system which would redistribute the taxes collected. Second, there would be the principle of equity, and third, the principle of progressivity.

Mr. Paproski: You went into that an hour ago.

Mr. Rodriguez: I have to repeat it for the Conservatives.

Mr. Saltsman: You have forgotten it already.

Mr. Rodriguez: They have a short attention span; that is the difficulty. However, the indexing system permits the warp in the system to become even more pronounced.

Mr. Stevens: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: The hon. member may ask a question at ten minutes to ten.

We have before us Bill C-22, and once again the government admits it stole the policies in this bill from the Conservative party. There is little doubt where these ideas came from, and if there is, it can be cleared up very quickly; all we have to do is ask any frontbencher in the Conservative party.

As we turn our attention to this bill, we see that it has cost the taxpayers $1 billion because of the indexing system. If we had taken $1 billion and used it in a creative manner with respect to tax credits, we could have done much to close the gap. We could have done much in terms of redistributing the wealth of the country and eliminating the massive poverty which plagues so many portions of our great country.

What does the government do when it is time to consider the tax system? It does not do the things the Carter Commission outlined. Time and again changes to the tax system have been suggested, but the government tinkers around with the works and comes up with indexing, and as a result the situation is made even more complicated than it was before.

Earlier I made reference to that great benefactor of the Canadian economy, that selfless corporation performing the big, top, expensive job, to use its own propaganda. If there is any doubt, I speak of Imperial Oil. Some hon. members present may be familiar with that corporation. Fewer still, I am sorry to say, are aware of the massive tax breaks it has received from this "just society".

In 1975, which is the last year for which statistics are available, Imperial Oil, the Rockefellers' gift to the Dominion of Canada, received $76 million in deferred taxes. These taxes are theoretically recoverable at some future date, and I have no doubt that this is what the frontbench of the Liberal party and its philosophical ally to my right, speaking politically and physically, would argue.

However, the fact remains that the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants which, in 1968, was so instrumental in recommending the deferred tax break, has now served notice that it is prepared to argue for discontinuance of this very tax loophole by means of which the corporate sector laughs all the way to the bank at the expense of the middle and low income taxpayer.

Indeed, since this unjust and retrogressive tax break was given to the corporate sector, Imperial Oil has accumulated total deferred taxes of $424 million. This is revenue which, on paper, belongs to the people of Canada, but in effect it will never be collected. And who is called upon to make up the deficit but the ordinary taxpayer, to whom the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) wants to give lectures.

I might feel better if the seven leading oil corporations in this nation—all foreign owned—namely, Imperial, Gulf, Texaco, Shell, Sunoco, BP Canada and Husky, used this windfall to better this country's energy position. However, statistics show us that only one-third of these deferred tax dollars are pumped into exploration. It truly makes a rational mind wonder.

I think it is important that I read figures with regard to the deferred tax picture into the record. These figures are for oil companies alone. In 1975 Imperial Oil had deferred taxes of $76 million for total accumulated deferred taxes of $424 million. Gulf's 1975 deferred taxes were $18.6 million, for total accumulated deferred taxes of $182.7 million. Texaco's deferred taxes were $28.3 million, for total accumulated deferred taxes of $85.5 million. Shell had $15.5 million deferred taxes in 1975, and the total accumulated deferred taxes were $84 million; Sunoco, $12.1 million, total deferred, $59.1 million; BP Canada, $12.9 million, total deferred taxes $56.1 million. Husky had $10 million in deferred taxes for 1975, for total deferred taxes of $45.1 million. The 1975 total deferred taxes came to $173.4 million, and that is for oil companies alone.

The total accumulated deferred taxes of the oil companies alone is $936.5 million. These are taxes that will never be collected by the taxpayers of Canada.

Let us not forget that the government is providing corporations with another tax incentive through the 100 per cent write-off in Canadian exploration expenses for taxation purposes. The write-off is being granted not only to energy companies which have enjoyed the advantage of a 100 per cent write-off. Any business, energy related or not, will now be able to qualify for this 100 per cent write-off.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I wonder to what extent this amendment will promote exploration in our country. It is aimed at encouraging other investors to go into exploration for energy resources, but considering that the companies have other priorities because of the tax system, this amendment will not, in my opinion, have the expected effect.

Given the past experience, how can we be sure that this amendment to the tax system will promote exploration for energy resources? I think that Canadians might well ask themselves this question. Despite the recent increase in the price of oil at the production level the companies declare that they do not get enough incentives to go into exploration, and yet they made record profits in 1976. As of January 1, 1977, the cost of a barrel of crude was $9.75. How do we come up with that figure? The production of a barrel of crude oil costs 68 cents. In Alberta, for example, the provincial expenses amount to $3.90; the federal tax is $1.64. The profit of a barrel of oil is therefore $3.63, which is 40 per cent of the total price.

I think that our society is rich enough to develop oil exploration in the interest of all Canadian consumers. I tried to show what happened in the case of the largest Canadian oil company, Imperial Oil Limited. Although that company has made unprecedented profit and has increased its liquid assets fantastically, it has not engaged in any exploration, despite the fact that this would be the best way to reassure Canadians about the resources available to our country. I therefore suggest that clause 24 of Bill C-22 will remain without effect in the long run, and that the government will have been had once more by big oil companies. After studying clause 24, it seems to me that the government is giving in once again to the demands of the oil industry and has shaped this taxation legislation in such a way as to profit that industry.

[English]

Mr. Goyer: But this is not productivity.

[Translation]

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Minister, I am trying to speak in French.

[English]

Added to these benefits for corporations, the government refuses to close the tax loophole which permits multinational firms to set up foreign subsidiaries and then divert income out of Canada to lessen their tax liabilities. The method used is one of lessening their earnings in high tax nations and increasing them in low tax countries. The usual way of lessening tax payments is to underprice exports or overprice imports from a subsidiary, or simply charge artificially high expenses against the subsidiary. This often means that Canada is overcharged and is losing revenue.

We in the NDP have been concerned about this for a long time, and to refresh everyone's memory I will repeat some of the arguments that I made in the House on June 18, 1976, with respect to this matter. At that time I pointed out that we needed an international convention which would prevent multinational corporations from avoiding their proper taxation and from exploiting countries in which they are operating. Indeed, participating in that very debate on international taxation was the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) who made some relevant points with respect to the way in which multinationals wheel and deal to escape the tax system in one country as opposed to another.

It is also important that we put on record the question that was asked. It is a very relevant question. The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge spoke in the House on February 27, 1976, and it is reported at page 11321 of Hansard of that date. He asked the former minister of national revenue the following question:

> On June 12, 1973 the minister's predecessor announced in a speech to the Inter-American Centre of Tax Administrators that the government was launching a campaign to crack down on multinationals evading taxes. On November 19, 1975, the current minister announced the formation of a joint U.S.-Canada committee to study the same question. On February 23, 1976, the minister's department announced that because of spending restraints, all such plans had been shelved. While a penny saved may be a penny earned, in this case does the minister feel that the savings in wages and salaries outweigh the loss of forgone corporate taxes?

In reply the former minister of national revenue stated the following, and I quote his answer because I think it is important enough to be put on the record. He said:

> Mr. Speaker, within a month after my appointment to this portfolio, I met with Don Alexander, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue Service in the United States. We set up a committee to look into how we might act under the Canada-United States tax treaty to get at multinationals and transnationals which are using the tax haven to avoid taxes. Mr. Alexander will be back here following the report of that committee. We will be meeting again. I, like every other minister, would like to have all the resources necessary. Personally, I do not think it is a waste of money. I think it is an investment to get back the hundreds of millions of dollars. To me, a tax haven is an anathema. Within the scope that we have, both the resources, financial and man-years, we will do our best to plug these particular abuses.

[Mr. Rodriguez.]

We have not heard any more. The former minister of national revenue has moved on to become the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen). The government members are not so anxious to beat the bushes to get out these tax evaders. That was back in June, 1976.

This whole question of multinationals and transnationals escaping their responsibility to support this country with taxes is not something that started yesterday. It is estimated that they have absconded with over $1 billion in taxes. Back in June, 1976, the then minister of national revenue, now Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford), promised to eliminate this loophole. So even before the present Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), the present Minister of Justice when he was in that portfolio promised to eliminate the loophole. He said at that time that the practice was costing hundreds of millions of dollars in lost revenue, but like many promises that the Liberal government has failed to keep, it decided to shelve plans to close the tax loophole on the excuse that Ottawa cannot afford the expert investigators needed. Of course this is to be expected, Mr. Speaker. Any government that spends billions of dollars subsidizing the wealthy in Canada is not going to do anything to hurt its friends in the corporate sector.

Let me read from an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail of October 31, 1975, written by Jonathan Manthorpe, which clearly describes the problem.

Mr. Stevens: You have already lost one of your members.

Mr. Rodriguez: No, we have not lost one of our members; we are now infiltrating the ranks on the other side. The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge is over there. He is better suited to the frontbenches across the way than the backbenches here. He has improved the intelligence on the frontbenches by 100 per cent. The article, entitled "Avoidance of Taxes Costing Hundreds of Millions" begins as follows:

> Canada is losing hundreds of millions of dollars a year to people and companies that avoid taxes, and a lot of it is being lost to multinational corporations using their international status to shuffle their profits out of the taxman's reach.

That is how the article starts out. It is estimated we lost $1 billion with respect to corporations, multinationals and transnationals, shifting around on the international scene to avoid paying taxes. It goes on to point out the following:

> Multinationals use a number of techniques to minimize their taxes in countries with high taxes and to maximize their profits in countries with low taxes.
> The parent company may sell its product to a subsidiary sales organization in a tax haven country. The sales organization would then resell the product to foreign subsidiaries of the parent company, usually with a large mark-up in price.
> A straightforward example of how multinational companies can boost their costs so as to avoid taxes comes from the files of the U.S. Internal Revenue Service.

The situation was that a manufacturing company in the U.S. had a wholly owned subsidiary in another country that extracted raw materials. The multinational had another wholly owned subsidiary shipping company in a tax haven country that chartered ships from unrelated companies.

Most of the shipping company's activity was in transporting raw materials from the mining subsidiary to the parent manufacturing company in the United States.

But the shipping company also supplied shipping services in a small way to other companies which were not related to the parent. The key point is that it charged the unrelated companies the same shipping rate as its parent company.

On the surface this appeared to be reasonable, but on close examination U.S. Revenue Service Officials decided the shipping company was charging its parent company much too high a rate.

By inflating the shipping costs the parent company was increasing its expenses allowable against income and therefore decreasing its tax. It was also increasing profits of its wholly-owned subsidiary, the shipping company, in a tax haven country.

The U.S. Revenue Service decided the shipping rates were too high for several reasons. They reasoned that the cost to the parent should be much less because its business was on a large scale—

That is not such an isolated incident. In this country we have the example of Falconbridge which operates in my riding. Falconbridge has a totally owned subsidiary in Namibia. There is no double taxation agreement between Canada and Namibia even though there is a double taxation agreement between Canada and South Africa. But South Africa administers Namibia illegally, in spite of orders from the United Nations time and time again. What happens is that the Namibia operation writes off its expenses against the Canadian operation. In effect, we not only contribute to the exploitation of a third country and not only help in the imperialism of Falconbridge in Namibia, but we also assist Falconbridge in writing off a bonanza in taxes to its own credit.

Every time a corporation like Falconbridge does not pay its share of taxes, the rest of the taxpayers must make up for it. I have been after the Minister of Finance, and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) in the four years I have been in this House to help the situation in Namibia. All we have to do is close the loopholes in our tax structure. They tell me they cannot interfere with the operation of Falconbridge. That is just ducky. Let anybody on unemployment insurance take a week or two of benefits they were not entitled to and they would be hounded to the end of the world.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: Hon. members opposite are good at bawling, but when they have a chance to speak they avoid it like the plague.

Mr. Pelletier: You have been speaking for seven hours.

Mr. Rodriguez: We took the opportunity that was offered to us to examine the problems of Bill C-22 in detail. I think we have done a thorough job over the last week—an excellent job. One of my virtues has always been modesty. I think we have done an excellent job in trying to bring to the attention of Canadians some of the abuses within the tax system.

There is something terribly wrong when the government of Canada gives in to corporations crying about intolerable tax burdens. I have heard the mining associations claim there is only one way we can get the economy moving again. In an interview with a Paris magazine the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said the worst bitchers in Canada were the banks. Well, they have been replaced. The worst bitchers in Canada today have to be the mining companies. They say that to be able to stir up the economy they need more tax concessions, more exploration grants to be written off taxes, more tax breaks, and more "roads to resources" as they are called in Ontario. All of these things will not improve the unemployment situation by one percentage point. Like greedy cookie monsters they will eat every cookie in sight. I had better hide my cookies, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nystrom: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) on a point of order.

Mr. Nystrom: I wonder if the hon. member would answer a question.

Mr. Rodriguez: Certainly.

Mr. Nystrom: I wonder whether the hon. member would tell the House if he has just accepted a corporate contribution and, if so, what.

Mr. Rodriguez: It is not in cash, Mr. Speaker, but it is in kind. I am donating this to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre for the kind help he has given in this gargantuan task of examining the 87 clauses of Bill C-22. The hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton says that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre needs nutrition because this is Canada Week.

Mrs. Pigott: Food Week.

Mr. Rodriguez: I have always found he has staying power.

There has to be something terribly wrong when the government of Canada gives in to corporations crying about intolerable tax burdens. There is something wrong when the Minister of Finance has sympathy for these poor corporate welfare bums to the extent he now believes profit controls are hindering capital investment. How much are corporations really hurting? In many cases the tax rate for corporations is less than the average income tax rate. Let us consider some examples.

● (2120)

I ask hon. members to co-operate. If they have a piece of paper handy, they can mark down one of the answers I shall call out, and if they get all the answers right, they will score full points.

Mr. Goyer: You are an aggressive socialist.

Mr. Rodriguez: Here is the first question: Do you know what was the approximate value of all mining production in Canada in 1975? Was it (a) $7 billion; (b) $3 billion, or (c) $12 billion? Apparently the hon. member for York-Simcoe has an answer. Well, according to the Statistics Canada publication "Industrial Corporations—Financial Statistics, July, 1976" the profits of mining corporations amounted to $12 billion in 1975.

Mr. Goyer: So what?

Mr. Rodriguez: And what was the amount paid in income taxes by all mining corporations in Canada in 1975? It was, according to "A", the answer, only $1 billion.

An hon. Member: What's "B"?

Mr. Rodriguez: They paid only $1 billion in taxes in 1975. This figure represents a tax rate of 34 per cent which compares favourably with the tax rate many middle income Canadians pay. It certainly does not indicate that the mining sector is over-taxed. In fact an individual earning approximately $20,000 faces the same tax rate as a corporation in the mining industry.

The fact that corporate income tax is declining is substantiated in an article by Bud Jorgensen, which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of April 30, 1976. Mr. Jorgensen writes for the Financial Times News Service.

Mr. Goyer: What is your source?

Mr. Grafftey: You guys opposite can filibuster after the next election.

Mr. Rodriguez: According to Mr. Jorgensen:

> The corporate income tax is slowly but steadily withering as a revenue source.
> A study done for the Economic Council of Canada shows that corporate tax collections, as a percentage of gross national product (GNP), are almost half what they were 25 years ago.
> During the same period, the proportion of personal income taxes collected has gone up by 2½ times.
> The study by Prof. J. R. Melvin, 37-year-old economist from the University of Western Ontario, London, Ont., suggests dropping the corporation income tax completely. A royal commission on taxation in 1966 came to a similar conclusion.
> Mr. Melvin's study shows that corporation income tax collections accounted for 6.6 per cent of gross national product in 1951. In that year, total personal income tax was less, only 5.9 per cent of GNP. Indirect taxes, such as sales and property taxes accounted for 12.4 per cent of GNP.
> By the early 1970's, income tax collected from corporations accounted for less than 4 per cent of GNP.
> At the same time the proportion collected from individuals had gone up to about 14 per cent.
> The proportion of indirect taxes collected has gone up to about 14 per cent of GNP as well . . .
> Last year, income tax collections were higher and indirect tax collections lower in relation to GNP, but those figures are distorted by the recession holding down the value of gross national product.
> The 1975 proportions were as follows: corporate income taxes, 4.2 per cent; personal income taxes, 15.3 per cent; and indirect taxes, 13.5 per cent.
> The provinces have taken a bigger share of all types of tax. Local governments, which can only assess indirect taxes, also have had a sharp increase.
> Federal collections of corporation income taxes have dropped from 5.7 per cent of GNP in 1951 to less than three per cent in the early 1970's. The provincial share has gone from slightly less than one per cent to slightly more than one per cent.
> The big increase for provinces has been in personal tax collections—0.5 per cent to about four per cent of GNP. The federal share increased from 5.4 per cent to about nine per cent.
> Indirect tax collections by the federal government declined from almost seven per cent of GNP to less than five per cent. Provincial collections increased from 2.7 per cent to about five per cent and local government collections from less than three per cent to about 4.5 per cent.

[Mr. Rodriguez.]

An hon. Member: Are you tired?

Mr. Rodriguez: That article shows just how heavily taxed our corporations are. If one considers their share of the tax burden in terms of gross national product, one sees that the share they pay in taxes is declining. That is contrary to the experience in the United States.

Mr. Goyer: What are your sources?

Mr. Rodriguez: I now come to profit controls, a subject very much to the fore. I raise this matter because the statement of the Minister of Finance was clearly politically motivated. A leading government economist, as reported in the Globe and Mail of February 8, 1977, says controls are not holding down profit levels to any great degree since only a handful of companies are directly restrained. Corporations continue to cry about poor investment opportunities in Canada—

An hon. Member: What is the economist's name?

Mr. Rodriguez: —when in actual fact profits as a percentage of GNP have been higher in Canada than in the U.S. since 1970. Let's look at the actual figures as reported by the Globe and Mail of February 8, 1977.

Mr. Goyer: That is not a good source.

Mr. Rodriguez: If hon. members opposite would listen, they might learn something.

An hon. Member: Is the hon. member suggesting we are not listening?

Mr. Rodriguez: Is the minister taking a trip to see Mr. McDougald? I say to the minister, you had better catch that plane and go to see him.

Mr. Goyer: The hon. member is very exhausting, but go on.

Mr. Rodriguez: With respect, Mr. Speaker, we ought to examine the latest figures with respect to pre-tax corporate profits as a proportion of GNP. According to the Globe and Mail of February 8, 1977, between 1950 and 1954 in Canada the figure was 11.8 per cent, whereas in the United States it was 11.6 per cent. Between 1955 and 1959 the figures, respectively for Canada and the United States, were 10.9 per cent and 10.5 per cent; between 1960 and 1964 the figure was 10.4 per cent for Canada and 9.7 per cent in the United States. For the period 1965 to 1969 the figure in Canada was 10.2 per cent, and in the United States 9.6 per cent.

Mr. Goyer: That shows we are doing better that the United States.

Mr. Rodriguez: In 1970 the figures for Canada and the United States respectively were 8.8 per cent and 6.8 per cent; for 1971 they were, respectively 8.5 per cent and 7.2 per cent. For 1972 those same figures were 9.3 per cent for Canada and 7.7 per cent for the United States. For 1973 the Canada and United States figures were, respectively, 10.4 per cent and 7.4 per cent. In 1974 the figures for pre-tax corporate profit as a proportion of gross national product were, for Canada and the United States respectively, 10.1 per cent and 6.2 per cent. In 1975 the figure for Canada was 9.7 per cent, and for the United States, 6.8 per cent.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Rodriguez: And for the first nine months of 1976 the figures for corporate profits as a proportion of the gross national product were, in Canada and the United States respectively, 9.2 per cent and 7.9 per cent.

Mr. Goyer: Was that after or before taxes?

Mr. Rodriguez: According to this article, business capital investment in Canada has not been as depressed as in the United States. Canadian business capital investment was 14 per cent of GNP in 1976, which is above the 1961 to 1975 average of 13.5 per cent. United States investment was about 9.5 per cent of GNP last year, slightly under the 9.9 per cent average for 1961 to 1975.

This certainly makes us suspicious about remarks made by J. R. Ferguson, head of an Ottawa financial consulting company, which appeared in the Toronto Star of December 10, 1976. He stated that the tax on profit penalizes efficient companies, undermines the role of profits as an incentive for businesses to become more productive, and has produced a serious contraction of financial markets.

The unfairness of our system of taxation and privileged position of our corporations must be evident.

The immediate past leader of this party spent a great deal of time studying the infamous tax system of this country. He is well versed in our tax system. He wrote a book entitled "The Corporate Welfare Bums". No debate on taxation in Canada is complete without some words from our former leader. It has to be the ultimate benediction in a debate which has ranged in a very studious manner over each clause of Bill C-22. The remarks of the former leader of this party are extremely important. They are apropos because he draws a comparison between the Sudbury Basin and the income tax system. I quote:

Geographers call Sudbury an example of post-glacial topography, but to the Sudbury Chamber of Commerce it is the nickel capital of the world. The post-glacial rocks of the Sudbury basin yield in excess of 20,000,000 tons of ore annually, and through them Canada supplies between 80 and 90 per cent of all nickel in the non-communist world. The demand for nickel is high, and the corporation profits show it.

Mr. Epp: Who wrote this?

Mr. Rodriguez: The former leader of this party, Mr. David Lewis. He is remembered in this House. In fact he was one of the most dynamic forces in this House of Commons.

Mr. Goyer: What happened to him? Where is he now?

Mr. Rodriguez: He is carrying on the work which he started. He is presently doing that in our universities.

Mr. Epp: Who defeated David Lewis?

Mr. Rodriguez: That is a question. I do not know.

Mr. Goyer: That is not the only thing you do not know.

Mr. Rodriguez: I want to get back to what our former leader said. It is important because it puts before the House the structure of the tax system in this country.

The average income in Sudbury in 1970 was $7,530.

It is not much more than that today. It is about $9,200.

—in that year the basic weekly wage for INCO workers was $138.80. But if the incomes are higher than the national average, expenses are worse. Housing costs are among the highest in the country.

Indeed, according to the latest survey by Royal Trust, housing costs in Sudbury today are the highest in the land. In 1971 the average lot, that is 55 × 120 feet, sold for $6,500. Today the average is $22,000. In 1971, and I quote:

Single-family dwellings costs an average of $26,580 while the average income of families borrowing money for new homes was $14,248.

The cost of an average home in the Sudbury Basin today is $42,000. The amount needed for someone to qualify to purchase a home is $20,000.

To look at the situation another way, during 1971 only the combined incomes of two families earning INCO's base wage would have been enough to borrow the money needed for one new home.

That disparity still exists today.

In addition, severe northern winters result in high heating bills, and food costs reflect the inevitably inflated northern price structure.

We are told that is because everything has to be transported there.

An hon. Member: What are you doing about it?

Mr. Rodriguez: I defeated a Liberal. That is why a Liberal no longer represents Nickel Belt. The former member was not relevant to the scene there. You can go to Toronto and ask Mr. McDougald.

The quote continues:

In 1970 a realty firm associated with INCO built a series of townhouses on INCO property which rent for $225 per month.

The rent has now increased to $400 a month.

Single workers who stay in the company "village", a grouping of trailers outside of Sudbury near the Copper Cliff smelter, receive room and board for $32.55 per week.

That has been eliminated. It has been torn down.

Sudbury faces a problem common to many mining towns. Assets of mining companies are exempt from municipal tax assessments under the Ontario Assessment Act. Municipalities receive payments from the provincial government in lieu of property taxes, but these are usually far from adequate, with the result that the major burden of supplying adequate municipal services falls to the homeowners. The municipality may do its best; the people certainly do their best, but there is not enough money for adequate cultural and recreational facilities, or to repair roads fast enough or to renovate an older hospital—even to instal a sewage-treatment plant . . .

The balance sheet of INCO offers an indication of just how much money there really is in mining. The shareholders' equity section of the 1971 statement shows a total or more than one billion dollars, with retained earnings making up $894,969,000 of that.

The 1971 Annual Report indicates that of the 92,217 shareholders, 61 per cent have addresses in Canada, 37 per cent have addresses in the United States, and two per cent elsewhere. Statistics Canada refers to INCO as a Canadian-controlled corporation. However, 49 per cent of the outstanding shares are held by U.S. residents while only 38 per cent are held by Canadians.

The community of Sudbury has long provided INCO and Falconbridge with a great source of wealth. Through generous income provisions at both the federal and provincial levels, they were able to retain most of their earnings. They expanded their holdings, and not just in the mining field. INCO purchased a battery company in Philadelphia with money earned from resources taken out of the soil in the Sudbury Basin. Surely that company could pay its fair share of taxes in this country.

It is time that the causal relationship between the Liberals and the corporate sector was annulled. The public is sick and tired of a Liberal government and Tory opposition which cannot seem to stay out of the bedrooms of the corporate sector. Those who provide and justify innumerable tax breaks for corporations are just as guilty as those who profit from the non-payment of corporate income taxes. People are no longer vulnerable to the tactics of the Liberal government.

As David Lewis writes:

● (2140)

People are no longer very vulnerable to these tactics. They are not likely to be convinced that the Timmins mining companies' use of untaxed profits to buy shares of companies operating elsewhere in Canada or in the United States makes jobs in Timmins. They are not likely to be convinced that depletion allowances keep mines from becoming depleted or companies from giving mines up as the seams of ore narrow down and peter out.

They do see, as have so many tens of thousands of people in northern Ontario and Quebec, how the government must now pay to keep mines alive and people working because the huge profits of the fat years were not taxed.

They see and they wonder. They are not the fools that Mr. Turner takes them for. The people of Canada are not like children who scurry to bed when the Liberal bogeyman comes by. He has been coming too often.

The Liberals are, however, not alone in their defence of the extractive industries.

As pitiful as the recent income tax reform proposals were, the Tories stridently opposed even those reforms. Progressive Conservative finance critic Marcel Lambert opposed the legislation as "a system of legalized plunder and piracy by people motivated by desire for the have-nots to take from the haves". He criticized the capital gains tax, on the grounds of that famous bogeyman of the Conservatives, uncertainty in the business sector.

Mr. Lambert, like other Tories and Liberals, is a champion of that oppressed underdog, the mining industry in Canada. Speaking in Parliament on May 11, 1972, he said:

With respect to the mining industry, I would like to ask whether the minister has read the recent speeches by the president of the Mining Association of Canada. Has he read the annual report by the president of Noranda? I hope he takes it to heart . . . I commend it to all members.

[Mr. Rodriguez.]

I am prepared, Mr. Speaker, to read from the Holy Testament for the benefit of hon. members. Certainly I am not going to refer to the annual statement of Noranda Mines. Let me give hon. members some solace when they think about what they are to do with the tax system. The Liberal government is pathetically blasé about the unequal distribution of wealth in Canada. Through Bill C-22 it is saying "We do not care about income disparities, about poverty." While the Income Tax Act is the most useful tool for redistributing wealth, the Liberal government has chosen instead deliberately to use the Income Tax Act to enhance the position of the wealthy in Canada.

What can be expected from a man who arrogantly stated on December 28, 1971, during a CTV interview of the white paper on taxation—

Mr. Benjamin: This is Trudeau.

Mr. Rodriguez: I will tell you what he said:

And I concede your point, too, that it's likely we heard more from the vested interests than we did from the little taxpayer—

Little taxpayers, he calls them.

—who didn't have . . . the high paid lawyers to speak for him . . . I suppose in participatory democracy there will always be some whose voice is louder than others.

Now, Mr. Speaker, who said that? None other than the Prime Minister, who is leading a government that is sitting on benches, tattered and wracked by scandal after scandal, day after day. One has only to look at Hansard to see them wracked, hanging on the ropes from scandals such as the Skyshops affair, the black list, the judges' affair—dial-a-judge—AECL, Otto Lang and his airplanes; the Minister of Transport—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Rodriguez: —flying around the country at the taxpayers' expense. It is the same arrogance, Mr. Speaker, the same elitist attitude which was apparent at his press conference on January 26. I want to quote from that press conference of the Prime Minister. He says:

In the last ten years, more or less—since someone —himself—

—began talking about the "just society"—more or less the percentage of people below the poverty line in Canada has fallen from 21 per cent to something around 8 or 9 per cent.

The Prime Minister goes on to say in his speech:

Once again my philosophy is not one of equalitarianism.

Imagine that, Mr. Speaker: his philosophy is not one of equalitarianism.

I want to make the poor richer, but I do not care if the rich get richer in the process, provided they pay their taxes and they are honest, and everything else. So, that is the answer about your quintiles. We are not trying to bring them together towards some national average.

See how that contrasts, Mr. Speaker, with the kind of income tax system that we on this side of the House see as the model, an income tax system which, as a principle, is redis-tributive in nature; that secondly, has the principle of equity; and thirdly, has the principle of progressivity. Many people used to think that this Liberal philosophy was modelled after John Keynes and John Locke. Well, I hate to disappoint them about the real model of this Liberal party, because it dates back to pre-Biblical times. Indeed it goes back to Roman times. The Liberal model, Mr. Speaker, is not only the model for taxation but also for philosophy. I think that model is based on one Marcus Licinius Crassus.

Marcus Crassus was the first capitalist recorded in history. He owned the only fire brigade in Rome. Oftentimes when a building was on fire Marcus Crassus would line up with his fire brigade and would then negotiate with the owner of the building on the price of putting out the fire. Indeed, history records that Marcus Crassus, by this means, became a very wealthy landowner in Rome. He became the richest man in Rome and used his colossal fortune to further his political ambitions.

His great rival was Pompey, whom Sulla honoured for his military victories. Since he could not equal Pompey in war, he turned to politics. He headed a moderate party between the aristocratic conservative party of Pompey and the radical party of Julius Caesar. Yet, says Plutarch, he was "neither a steadfast friend nor an implacable enemy, but readily abandoned both his favours and his resentments at the dictates of his interests."

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, Marcus Crassus was a Liberal. The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) says that Marcus Crassus piddled while Rome burned, but I do not know about that.

An hon. Member: Sure gave them a hosing.

Mr. Rodriguez: The Liberals are not the only ones who are indifferent to the problems created by the taxation system in Canada. The Tories are equally indifferent to income disparities and poverty in Canada. They care so much about inequality in Canada that they could not even find 30 seconds of time to say something good, bad or indifferent about Bill C-22 on third reading. This has resulted in my having to step into the breach and make this sacrifice of speaking to this bill in detail.

● (2150)

A glance at the Parliamentary Guide would reveal to all who care to look the great array of wealth among my hon. friends to the right of where I sit. Their interests range from the directorship of a management company and of an apartment company all the way to a fisheries company, a packing company, and a company making wheels, brakes and equipment. One gentleman is a banker. We have bakers, too, and candlestick makers. The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) is fairly big in oil. Then, of course, there is the "Cookie Monster". And who can forget the generosity of the cookie monster? No one! I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and I are supplied with cookies enough for a lifetime.

It is certainly not surprising to note that the Tories have given their stamp of approval to Bill C-22. This is the party which thought the government had gone too far with tax reform in 1972. In fact the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) is quoted in the Globe and Mail of October 2, 1973, as having said:

> Edgar Benson and Prime Minister Trudeau have offered too much reform in one step. Their reform could not be explained. They could not lead the country in any united, let alone trusting way, to a new system.

The Liberal party's so-called tax reform may be unexplainable and irrational, but the Tory idea of reform, which involves more tax reform commissions and more discussion, is so chicken-hearted that we can never expect anything beyond platititudes. If they are serious about tax reform, even in modest stages, why have we not heard a single concrete proposal from their benches during this debate? There has not been a squeak out of them. Like mice, they run for cover. They run under the desks and scare the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), who is afraid of mice, and ran out of the House.

The socialist party on this side of the House objects to such disparities in income and to too much poverty in one of the wealthiest countries of the world. The Prime Minister says he does not mind if the rich get richer as long as the poor get richer. The fact remains that, despite all supposed attempts by the government to redistribute income, the low-income groups are still receiving a lesser share of total income than during the mid sixties before many social welfare policies were improved.

We believe the income tax system must incorporate the ability-to-pay principle. We have said that in our view an income tax system must be based on three principles. It must be redistributive. It must be progressive. And it must be based on equity. Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in the present system which meets any of these principles.

This bill ought to be thrown out of the House of Commons along with the Liberals and their Tory buddies. We say the tax system must incorporate the ability-to-pay system. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, which income group pays the greater proportion of its earnings in taxes? Is it those in the upper brackets, those in the middle brackets, or those in the lower brackets? The answer is, those in the lower brackets. Some of my hon. friends have guessed it. They will get a cookie for that. People earning less than $8,000 pay the highest proportion of their total earnings in taxes. We also know, according to 1969 statistics, that 8.3 per cent of family units receiving an income of $15,000 paid at a rate amounting to 8.4 per cent less than those earning $2,000.

Here is another question. The top 20 per cent of Canadian income earners get 48 per cent of total income. How much do the bottom 20 per cent receive? Is it 15 per cent, or 3 per cent, or 8 per cent, or 12 per cent? The answer, Mr. Speaker, is 3 per cent.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: No, no! Go on!

Income Tax

Mr. Rodriguez: I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre:

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "That", and by substituting therefor the following words:

"Bill C-22 be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of reconsidering Clause 65 thereof."

I place this motion before the House and trust that hon. members will support it.

I asked a question a moment ago. What is the answer? The answer is 3 per cent. It's the rich what gets the gravy, it's the poor what gets the blame.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will permit the Chair to put the amendment before ten o'clock.

Mr. Rodriguez, seconded by Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moves:

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "That", and by substituting therefor the following words:

"Bill C-22 be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of reconsidering Clause 65 thereof."

Order. It being ten o'clock it is my duty, pursuant to the order of the House dated Wednesday, February 9, 1977, to put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the third reading and passage stage of the bill.

The question is on the amendment. All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those against, will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Rodriguez) which was negatived on the following division:

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, February 15, 1977

The House met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

PROPOSED PARTICIPATION IN DISCUSSIONS TO FIND WAYS OF RELIEVING UNEMPLOYMENT IN ONTARIO CONSTRUCTION INDUSTRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I rise, pursuant to Standing Order 43, on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity, namely, that with 34 per cent of Ontario's construction workers now out of work—up substantially over last year—and with construction starts at a low, which augers poorly for an upswing in construction activity this spring, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), to move the following motion:

That this House urges the ministry to participate in a task force made up of labour, management and provincial representatives which commenced meeting in Toronto today and which hopes to determine ways and means of relieving this alarming unemployment situation in Ontario's construction industry.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

REQUEST CABINET RESCIND DECISION WHICH CAUSED INCREASED BREAD PRICES IN QUEBEC—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask leave of the House to move a motion related to the decision the cabinet should make about the strike in the flour mills of Quebec. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House request the cabinet to rescind the Anti-Inflation Board decision which forces Quebeckers to pay a higher price for their bread and which, if maintained, will provide additional benefits of about $450,000 to the companies concerned.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Since there is not unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

AGRICULTURE

PROPOSAL TO CANCEL EXPORT LEVY ON POWDERED MILK—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

In view of the increasingly persistent complaints by producers of manufacturing milk, since that production is essential and that the government's policy compels some producers to give up their business, which could be disastrous for the future, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette):

That the Minister of Agriculture reconsider his decision taken last year and grant to producers of manufacturing milk the fair revenue which they were seeking by removing the export levy on powdered milk, this new decision having a retroactive effect to April 1, 1976.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INFORMING SOVIET UNION OF CANADA'S CONCERN OVER ARREST OF CERTAIN CITIZENS IN VIOLATION OF HELSINKI AGREEMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Canada was the strongest proponent of basket three incorporated in the final act of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe, popularly known as the Helsinki Agreement. As such we have reason to be concerned about what are regarded internationally as serious violations of the spirit and letter of that agreement by the Soviet Union. I refer in particular to the recent arrest of certain citizens of that country who have been endeavouring to ensure the full implementation of the Helsinki Agreement and who have been defending fundamental human rights whenever they are menaced in the Soviet Union or elsewhere.

● (1410)

From my own experience as foreign minister, I am aware of the difficulties and dangers of appearing to interfere in the internal affairs of another country. I am also aware of the implications of selecting particular individuals for mention. Since the signature of the Helsinki Agreement, however, such matters can no longer be regarded as purely internal, and there are occasions when specific protest is both justified and necessary, since failure to do so might imply indifference.

Accordingly, I seek leave to move under the provisions of Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather), and with support from all parties:

That the Secretary of State for External Affairs convey to the government of the Soviet Union the disappointment and deep concern of the elected representatives of the Canadian people in parliament assembled at the arrest of Alexander Ginsberg, Mykola Rundenko, Alexy Tikhy and Yuri Orlov.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be presented for debate in the House only with its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

USE OF OIL IMPORT COMPENSATION FUND TO INSULATE HOMES AND CREATE EMPLOYMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the recent announcement of the government of its intention to issue grants and loans to assist home owners in improving the insulation of their dwellings in both Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia, and in view of internal financial figures from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources which show a surplus of $300 million in the oil import compensation program, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the government use these surplus funds to initiate a nationwide residential energy conservation program to conserve energy through better insulation of homes, and at the same time to assist in job creation.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43 such a motion can be presented to the House only with its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

DRILLING IN BEAUFORT SEA—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT—POSSIBILITY OF IMPROVEMENT IN MONITORING PROCESS

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and it relates to the alarming report of the review of the Beaufort Sea drilling—or at least the first year of drilling in that area—being prepared by officials, which report, among other things, apparently states that a number of potentially serious problems remain unsolved. Inasmuch as the problem areas mentioned concerned Canmar's ability to handle well blowouts, will the minister assure this House that when completed, this report will be tabled immediately in this House so that it may be examined by the appropriate committee of the House, and if the report is available now, would the minister undertake to table it this week?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the review process is still under way. It will continue for a few weeks to come. Once the report is received, I will see what can be done to meet the request of the hon. member.

Mr. Jarvis: In his press release of April 15, 1976 the minister said that a continuous monitoring system by ship-based federal inspectors was implemented to ensure that environmental standards were being maintained in that drilling area. Serious breaches of safety procedures have been reported, and federal safety inspectors were on board the drill ships when these breaches occurred. Can the minister say whether he has any plans to improve that federal monitoring process now in effect and if so, would he indicate when he will make us aware of the nature of those improvements?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the review process was to determine if the conditions imposed on Canmar were adequate. Once the review process is completed, we will announce whether we will have more stringent conditions, in what areas and also if a more adequate monitoring system is necessary. I might say that last summer there were those officials from the department on the drill ships. It was their duty to see that conditions laid down were followed and as far as I know that was done. It may be necessary to have more stringent conditions and that will be dealt with in the report.

DRILLING IN BEAUFORT SEA—ROLE OF DEPARTMENT OF ENVIRONMENT IN REVIEW PROCEDURE

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, I hope that the minister might indicate a target date for the accomplishment of some of the programs. In the absence of the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment may I put another supplementary question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In light of the general opposition to the Beaufort Sea project expressed by the predecessor to the Minister of the Environment, and in view of the series of uncertainties regarding the ultimate responsibility for the environmental protection of the north, will the minister tell the House what role the Department of the Environment is playing in the review procedure resulting from the first year's drilling operations and what voice that department will have in making the decision on the conditions under which the project will continue?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the first question, there is a definite deadline for the termination of the review process and the receipt of the report. We will be making an announcement well before the drilling season commences with respect to this year's drilling. With regard to the Department of the Environment, it is involved but I do not have the exact details of that involvement in the House right now.

ALLEGED RELAXATION OF DRILLING REGULATIONS IN BEAUFORT SEA—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is also to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. He will recall that last week I asked about the reported relaxation of drilling regulations governing the Canmar project. In light of his promise to investigate the matter, is the minister now prepared to tell the House if the regulations were relaxed and if so, on whose authority?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I did check that out. The authorization by cabinet for the drilling did not contain specific details as to how far the concrete casing must go and so on. Those details were not part of the authorization. They were originally agreed to by departmental engineers for the region and changed afterwards by the same engineers. The question of how far down the drilling should go and how far down the casing should go will be part of the review process referred to in earlier questions. We will have more stringent conditions this year.

Mr. Neil: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister advise whether the engineers who relaxed the regulations in question referred the matter back to cabinet?

Mr. Allmand: No, Mr. Speaker, that was not done. I do not know if it is correct to say they relaxed the conditions. They had originally agreed to certain conditions in respect of the drilling and after reviewing it themselves they felt it was not necessary, so agreed to new regulations or new guidelines. It was not discussed with cabinet at all or with my officials in Ottawa.

DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF NEW REGULATIONS FOR DRILLING FOR OIL AND GAS IN THE NORTH

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the northern oil and gas regulations were suspended some seven years ago, and in view of the fact that the existing uncertainty is threatening the development of oil and gas in the frontier areas, can the minister tell the House when he expects to bring in a new bill and new oil and gas regulations? Is the rumour that it will be some time in June, correct?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Maybe sooner, Mr. Speaker.

MANPOWER

OMISSION OF CERTAIN GROUP FROM UNEMPLOYMENT STATISTICS—REASON FOR LEAVING LABOUR FORCE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of misery, officially known as the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacFarlane: Some refer to him as the minister of hope.

Mr. Broadbent: On page 42 of the labour force survey for January of this year, some 573,000 men and women are listed as no longer being in the labour force and since in a statement the Economic Council of Canada pointed out before the weekend that they supported the New Democratic Party's contention that a large portion of such people ought to be listed among the official unemployed, I should like to ask the minister in all seriousness what he was referring to as garbage yesterday? Was he referring to his own government's official statistics? If not, if he finds the truth unpalatable, why does he not act to improve the situation instead of denying its existence?

• (1420)

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there is nothing like a headline in the Globe and Mail to flush out the New Democratic Party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: You mean, to wash it away?

Mr. Cullen: Well, they have to fight back. Not one statistic put out by Statistics Canada is secret or has to be leaked. All that information is available to any Canadian citizen at any time. That having been said, it becomes a question of how these statistics are to be used, and for what purposes: whether they are to be used as a basis in part for government programs of job creation, for political advantage, as they are used from time to time by the hon. member, or misused and misinterpreted. That, too, must be considered.

The official Statistics Canada report indicates that in 1976, 309,000 individuals were not looking for work at the time the labour force survey was conducted. Of this number, only 34,000 individuals gave as a reason for not looking for work their belief that no work was available in their area or suited to their skills. The remainder gave a variety of reasons for not looking for work, such as illness, family responsibility, attending school, awaiting recall to former jobs, awaiting replies from employers, etc. I think all that information should be brought forward. If the leader of the NDP is to use statistics, let him use all the information available and not mislead this country. He is the one who is spreading the misery abroad.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, if noise were a substitute for a good argument, the minister would have won his case. I ask the minister, has he consulted his own officials in Cape Breton, in the Gaspésie region and in Newfoundland on this very question, has he consulted about the numbers of people he has alluded to who are no longer in the labour force? Has he asked those officials if, in their view, those people left the labour force because they were not able to find jobs? If so, does he not agree that such people should be listed on the official statistics of the unemployed in this country?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, not only have I consulted with my officials, I also took the other course which may not be known to the hon. member, of consulting colleagues in the House of Commons who represent those areas. Only yesterday I met three or four of them from the Atlantic provinces and Quebec. They indicated that because of some measures we are taking, it would be extremely difficult for people to take advantage of unemployment insurance, in that they would be cut off. They asked what action was being taken.

I was able to indicate to them that by virtue of our job creation programs additional amounts of money, on the basis of two to one, even three to one, will be poured into those particular regions. That, to me, seemed to be a particularly good move.

If the hon. member intends to keep referring to statistics, I remind him that we do not rely solely on one set of statistics. I indicated yesterday, I think, to the hon. member for St. John's East, that we use the labour force survey when it is to the advantage of the provinces, and we use unemployment insurance statistics when those are available. In so far as Newfoundland is concerned the use of such figures represented a 50 per cent increase, which meant that more money was being pumped into the area which sorely needs it. Really, I am interested in doing that, not in fiddling with statistics.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REASON LESS MONEY AVAILABLE FOR DIRECT JOB CREATION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister suggested that he is interested in spending money. Can he explain to the House why it was possible for the government in its 1971-72 spending for direct job creation to spend $603 million on direct job creation programs when the unemployment rate was only 6.4 per cent, and why for this coming year, when unemployment is expected to average between 7.5 per cent and 8 per cent, the government can only scrape up $264 million for direct job creation?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, here, again, we see a slight under-estimation on the part of the leader of the NDP. On actual job creation we are spending in excess of $350 million. I thank the hon. member for those statistics. It is just possible that when I go to Treasury Board that is the kind of argument I use. Given the fact that we are in a period of restraint, we do not want to increase inflation and thereby increase the government's deficit or increase the interest rates, which is the action the hon. member would have us take. I think it is appropriate that in direct job creation we spend an additional $358 million. However, the hon. member again chooses to ignore the fact that my department alone, one department of government, spends $1,000,300,000 on jobs in this country.

HARBOURS

POSSIBILITY OF TRANSFERRING JURISDICTION OVER WHARVES TO QUEBEC—PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

In the course of last week, the minister has had discussions with his provincial counterparts, including that of Quebec. Can the Minister tell the House whether he discussed with his Quebec contract the question of the transfer from the federal to the provincial—

An hon. Member: Counterpart!

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Listen, you never make mistakes! It is a bit early for you to be sporting haloes! Shut up at least!

Can the minister tell the House if they discussed the transfer from the federal to the provincial authorities of certain wharves, namely those of Montmagny and the Île aux Grues? If so, can he inform the House of the progress made in the negotiations, so that the matter might be settled before the opening of the sailing season in the spring of 1977?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the subject of the meeting was, of course, motor carriage. Therefore, we did not deal with this matter on the main agenda. I have discussions beginning between our officials, looking toward a more complete meeting on the subject between myself and the minister of transport from Quebec. However, during the course of these meetings my parliamentary secretary has had an opportunity to raise the subject of wharves with the minister.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, following the minister's answer, can he tell the House whether his department is already willing to consider repairing these wharves before their transfer to the provincial authorities, or whether his department will agree to give funds to the province of Quebec to take over the maintenance of these wharves right now?

[English]

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, hon. members will appreciate that is one of the types of things that will be discussed in the negotiations.

NATIONAL REVENUE

WRITS OF ASSISTANCE GRANTED POLICE OFFICERS UNDER EXCISE AND CUSTOMS ACTS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Solicitor General, I will direct my question to the Minister of National Revenue. Recently the RCM Police applied to the Federal Court for 14 writs of assistance under the Excise Tax Act for selected officers and 15 applications under the Customs Act. In the judgment of the Federal Court judge, Mr. Justice Collier, he stated that he granted the application with substantial reluctance. He attached, and quoted with approval, a judgment from two years ago, stating that it was shocking and incredulous to have to give these orders to unknown officers, granting them unlimited powers with no date of expiry. Is the minister aware of these applications and is she planning on doing anything with regard to this kind of application under Acts which she administers?

● (1430)

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Revenue): I will look into the matter and report to the House as soon as possible.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: While the minister is looking into the matter I wonder whether she will consult with the Solicitor General as well, having regard to the Bill of Rights and the human rights legislation now before the House, in view of the fact that questionable activities of the RCMP, in some respects, have been brought to light, sometimes in the guise of national security, will the minister have a full review with the Solicitor General as to these applications and whether or not they can change this procedure with respect to applications under these two particular acts?

TOURISM

MEASURES TO DECREASE DEFICIT—PROPOSED UNITED STATES LIMITATION ON CONVENTION EXPENSES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, but in his absence I will direct it to the Prime Minister. It concerns the alarming growth of the deficit in the tourist industry. The figures indicate that for the first three quarters of 1976 the deficit amounted to $960 million, an increase of 68 per cent over the travel deficit for the same period in 1975. Since important meetings took place in December with respect to this matter, and since all the ministers agreed that something had to be done about this increase in the tourist deficit, may I ask whether the Prime Minister is aware of any specific initiatives which have been placed before the provinces, or agreed to by them, in order that this deficit might be substantially reduced, one which certainly worsens our over-all trade pattern and cannot help the situation with respect to employment, particularly in provinces where tourism is a major factor?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce did, of course, attend the meeting of all ministers in the country interested in this problem. It was acknowledged by all present that the industry was facing a problem of the kind the hon. member has mentioned. All the ministers, including the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, resolved that there would be further and better co-operation so that our resources might be directed not to dispersing the powers of the federal government and of the provinces but to bringing them together and putting forward our best effort, especially in parts of the world where we may be able to attract more visitors. And, of course, ask Canadians to do more travelling in Canada rather than in foreign countries.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Since the Prime Minister seems somewhat bashful, or uninformed, perhaps I could direct this question to him with respect to his upcoming visit to the United States. In view of the fact that new and proposed tax legislation in the United States limiting the deductibility from income for tax purposes of convention expenses incurred outside that country will severely restrict the flow of U.S. tourist dollars into Canada, further increasing the magnitude of the tourist deficit, has the Prime Minister placed this matter on the agenda for discussion with President Carter while he is in Washington next week? Specifically, are proposals being put together for presentation to the president in order that there might be a satisfactory resolution of this problem, at least?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The hon. member should not mistake for bashfulness my deference for the very knowledgeable parliamentary secretary.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I am only bashful in the face of superior knowledge, Mr. Speaker. I might add that it does not often come from the other side.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: The question asked by the hon. member relates to the serious problem the Americans are encountering with their economy. They experienced a serious recession a couple of years ago and it is quite understandable that tourists in that country should have less money to spend and that the government should be adopting measures to preserve their position. However, with the expected upturn in the economy of the United States, we hope the influx of tourists from the U.S. will increase and that measures of the kind to which the hon. member alludes will be looked at in this light.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I am relieved that the Prime Minister was able to answer the second question, but disquieted by his acceptance, or seeming acceptance, of this legislative change proposed in the United States. Does his answer mean that no representations will be made either at the Congressional or administrative level with respect to these proposals, given the substantial impact they would have on the expenditure of U.S. tourist dollars in Canada? Can he tell us whether or not instructions have already been sent to our officials in Washington so that some preparatory work can be done at the Congressional level, given the different nature of the systems of government in Canada and the United States?

Mr. Trudeau: I intended my answer to indicate the contrary—that there would be more optimism in the United States under the new administration with regard to the economic future and that restrictions of the kind the hon. member was mentioning would not be necessary. As to the second part of the question as to whether representations have been made, I will inquire about that.

FINANCE

RELATIONSHIP OF GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES TO GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT—EFFECT OF SPENDING CUTS ON EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance who on Friday confirmed his commitment "to reduce the percentage of the gross national product which the government of Canada takes." We are now approaching the end of the fiscal year. Would the minister tell the House whether, in fact, government spending for the current fiscal year will be less than the increase in the gross national product?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): My colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, in the course of tabling the estimates tomorrow, will be making a statement on the situation in the current year and the coming year.

Mr. Stevens: Referring once again to the minister's remarks on Friday, I note he rejected the suggestion that there should be further spending cutbacks on the part of the federal government, arguing that they would increase unemployment. Would the hon. gentleman now clarify his position by explaining whether he believes that federal government spending cuts inevitably lead to increased unemployment and, conversely, whether federal spending increases are the only way to create jobs in this country?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The converse doesn't follow, but I would point out to the hon. member, with reference to his suggestion in the past that there should be a substantial lay-off of federal public servants, that this is hardly a way to reduce unemployment.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): When did anybody say that?

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ELIGIBILITY FOR BENEFITS OF THOSE 65 YEARS OF AGE WHO DID NOT APPLY FOR OLD AGE PENSION

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

In view of the important statement made yesterday by the minister concerning the benefits paid to people of 65 and over, I should like additional information. Could the minister look into the situation of those who sought the advice of UIC officials and were told to apply to the Quebec Pension Plan, since they were not eligible for unemployment insurance since January 1st, 1976?

As all those people who were eligible before January 1st, 1976, applied to the Quebec Pension Plan on the advice of UIC officials or because of a misinterpretation of the act for which they cannot be held responsible, would the minister agree to pay them their unemployment benefits for the period during which they were eligible, while deducting as income the amounts they received under the Canada Pension Plan or the Quebec Pension Plan, as the case may be.

[English]

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): We do not have authority to move in the area the hon. member has suggested. Technically, only those who launched their appeals and did not make claims for QPP and CPP would qualify. However, in the interest of equity we are examining each of the cases—I think there are some 14,000 or 18,000—and we shall notify the individuals concerned that they may conceivably be eligible for a benefit. With respect to those who took this step of applying for CPP and QPP we will try to pay the difference from the date they were cut off until they actually began receiving their cheques under either of the programs. This appears to be as far as we can go under the authority of the Act as I read it.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR CHANGE IN REGULATIONS FOR DRILLING IN BEAUFORT SEA—SAFEGUARDS TO BE IMPOSED

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. On February 4, as reported at page 2715, my hon. friend from the Northwest Territories asked a question about a blowout from a well drilled by Dome Petroleum in the Beaufort Sea. The minister promised at that time to make a report to the House. If the answer given to the hon. member for Moose Jaw constitutes that report, I must say it is most inadequate. In view of the fact that we were assured in the House last year that drilling in the Beaufort Sea would be carried out under the strictest possible supervision, may I ask the minister whether he is now telling us that engineers on the ship were allowed to change the standards according to which the company was required to put in casing all the way down to the gas formation? What I am asking the minister definitely to tell the House is whether or not the chain of command is so lax in his department that engineers on the ground can make a change in regulations laid down by the department and the cabinet.

● (1440)

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the earlier question I pointed out that the requirement for casing down to a certain depth was decided upon by the regional engineer who is an expert in these matters. It was the same regional engineer who agreed later, after reviewing the situation, that it was not necessary to go down to the originally designated depth. Whether or not the water blowout—it was a water blowout, not an oil blowout—was due to the depth of the casing is not yet clear and will only become known once the review process now under way is completed. By the way, that report will be made public in a few weeks' time once it is received by me.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Radio reports this morning indicated that a committee of the minister's department is making a report to the minister, which I understand is going to be made public. The report indicates that in the submission to him his departmental committee is going to recommend five-year permits for drilling in the Beaufort Sea. I want to ask the minister, under such a provision, what type of safeguards will be imposed; I hope that they will be more effective than the safeguards which were imposed last summer. Also, may I ask the minister whether, before deciding upon granting five-year permits, he is prepared to submit this matter to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I think the report about five-year permits and other presumed reports of the committee are incorrect. The committee has not yet finished its review of the process, nor has it completed its consultations with the communities involved. The committee will only write its report, I understand, in about a month's time, so it is not yet known what it will be recommending. If it does recommend more stringent conditions, then we will certainly give that our close attention.

SUGGESTED COMMITTEE STUDY BEFORE GRANTING FIVE-YEAR PERMIT TO DRILL IN BEAUFORT SEA

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister did not answer the last part of my question. In the event that the suggestion of a five-year permit is approved by the minister and his department, will he undertake that before such a decision is made and before drilling begins on a five-year permit basis, this matter will be submitted to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Well, Mr. Speaker, I think it is very speculative to suggest that there may be a five-year permit. As far as I know there has been no suggestion in that respect at the present time. My estimates will be before the committee in due course and I will be willing to answer any questions with respect to this whole program.

TARIFFS ON OFFSHORE TOMATOES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance and is a follow-up to a question I asked him a few days ago, I think last week, regarding the importation of Taiwanese tomatoes into Ontario. Does the minister have an answer to protect the farmers of Hastings and Prince Edward counties and other parts of Ontario?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. I am glad to advise him that we have applied a surtax on canned tomato imports from Taiwan.

MANPOWER

REASON FOR FAILURE TO INCLUDE STATUS INDIANS IN UNEMPLOYMENT STATISTICS

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration in charge of unemployment insurance. In view of the fact there has been some question in recent days about the number of people who are unemployed, and in light of the fact that a Canadian human rights bill is being introduced into the House, does the minister still find it acceptable that status Indians are not included among the unemployment statistics in this country, or is this just a way of trying to show a low figure when in fact that is the group having the highest level of unemployment in Canada?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker. The fact that they are not included in the labour force survey is something that my friend might take up with StatCan and with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Recognizing that status Indians on reserves are not included in the labour force survey, we have made an additional allocation and treated the unemployment figure as 75 per cent and have made quite a substantial amount of money available under our Canada Works program to cover the particular group to which the hon. member refers.

Mr. Malone: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister going to make representation, in light of the upcoming human rights bill, that status Indians be included in the labour force; and secondly, would he give the House some indication what the unemployment rates are among the non-status Indians and Metis people of this country?

Mr. Cullen: Here again, Mr. Speaker, on the question of statistics, no, I do not intend to make that representation. So far as status Indians on reserves are concerned, that particular information is well known. Based on that information we are able to take the action that we needed to take at the job-creation end, which in fact is my responsibility. The others who are status or non-status Indians off the reserve are included in the labour force survey.

LEVEL OF UNEMPLOYMENT AMONGST INDIANS IN NORTHWESTERN BRITISH COLUMBIA—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question too deals with additional statistics and is in regard to reports from northwestern British Columbia, from the town of Smithers, where it is reported that 95 per cent of the Indian population is unemployed, as is 50 per cent of the rest of the population. Did the minister avail himself of the opportunity, when the premier of British Columbia was here, to discuss this matter with him, and did he exert his influence with his cabinet colleagues, particularly with the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, to see what the federal government can do to alleviate this most serious problem?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I share with the hon. member his concern at the high level of unemployment among Indians in that area. I have had first-class, excellent representations and information brought to me by the Minister of State responsible for sports in regard to this particular problem. It is because of representations such as hers that we did see fit to treat the figure as 75 per cent unemployment right across the country, so that so far as the job creation aspect at least is concerned we could relieve some of the concern to which the hon. member refers. No, I did not talk to the premier of British Columbia; I was not invited to the meeting.

PROGRAMS FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA—DISCUSSIONS WITH PREMIER

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, may I address my final supplementary question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion who is expecting my question. Could he tell me whether he had the opportunity to discuss with the premier of British Columbia the most serious problems faced by industry and commerce and all people of central and northwestern British Columbia at the present time?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Yes, indeed, Mr. Speaker. When I met last week with Premier Bennett we touched on most of those questions. We have agreed to address ourselves to them and have instructed our officials to work hard to find a solution and a proposal that both governments will be able to support in the months ahead.

POSSIBILITY JURISDICTION OVER SOME AGRICULTURAL AGENCIES TRANSFERRED TO CONSUMER AFFAIRS DEPARTMENT

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. Since there has been a good deal of concern by people in the agricultural industry that the federal government is looking into plans to move the Farm Products Marketing Council and its agencies, plus the Canadian Dairy Commission, to the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs as part of its move toward a national food policy, I would ask the Prime Minister whether he would indicate if discussions have taken place in this particular area.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, certainly not with me or in cabinet. I will see whether there are any experts looking into the question; I doubt it very much.

BANK ACT

PROPOSED PROCEDURE FOR DEALING WITH AMENDMENTS—ALLEGED FAILURE OF OPPOSITION TO AGREE TO REFERENCE OF WHITE PAPER TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Would the minister indicate to the House the plans of the government for dealing with the proposed Bank Act amendments, particularly in light of the fact that agreement was not reached with the official opposition respecting a reference of the white paper to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Nonsense.

Mr. Cafik: —which would have facilitated public hearings on this very important issue?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it appears that it will not now be possible to have a fully drafted Bank Act in time for full consideration by parliament before the present Bank Act expires on June 30 next.

An hon. Member: Is that the fault of the opposition?

● (1450)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It would therefore be the intention to introduce a short bill to extend the life of the current Bank Act for a further six months so that parliament may have adequate time to deal with the matter.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPRESENTATIONS TO FRANCE ON NUCLEAR REPROCESSING PLANT FOR PAKISTAN IN VIEW OF ATTEMPT TO LEARN HOW TO BUILD NUCLEAR DEVICE

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It arises from recent disclosures made by United States Senator William Proxmire that Pakistan embassy officials in Washington attempted to obtain information from John Phillips, a student at Princeton University, on how to build a nuclear device. Is the minister aware of this report, has he investigated it, and has he taken any action with the French government which is scheduled to build a nuclear reprocessing plant for Pakistan?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if I had time to read the question I would understand the connection between the beginning and the end of it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jamieson: I am aware of the story to which the hon. member referred because I saw it on the televised news, but I was not aware of any direct linkage between that and Pakistan. Since we have abandoned all nuclear assistance to Pakistan as of the present time, I am not sure what I might be able to do, but I will be glad to look into it.

Mr. Beatty: I will give it to the minister more slowly. In view of the fact that Pakistani officials confirmed that they approached Mr. Phillips to try to get information on how to build nuclear devices, is the minister prepared to make direct representations to the government of France to discourage France from building for Pakistan a reprocessing device which would use the nuclear waste from CANDU reactors?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, now I understand the connection.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: I will be glad to make representations to France again, as we have done repeatedly in the past, but I do not think that the French diplomats would be impressed if I said we wanted to stop it because of the incident to which the hon. member referred. We have been doing it on a much more broad and general basis and will continue to do so.

INDUSTRY

CANADAIR LEARSTAR JET PROJECT—EXTENT OF GOVERNMENT FINANCING—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): My question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. On October 18, 1976, the minister told the House that the Canadair LearStar 600 executive jet project does not require direct financial intervention by the government. Will the minister confirm that so far the government has paid $38 million to buy Canadair, guaranteed a loan for $50 million for start-up costs for the LearStar 600, and now is financing the federal Express Corporation's purchase of 25 planes, thus putting itself in the peculiar position of financing both the vendor and the customer from the start?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I suspect the hon. member is annoyed by the great success of that program, because we have already had over 65 orders, and in his intervention of October 18, he said the program was stupid. For a stupid program, I think we have been quite successful.

[English]

Mr. McKinnon: My question is for the same minister. On February 10, as reported in Hansard at page 2934, the minister stated that:

> I remember replying to some questions in this House. I stated that the prospects were not too bad and that I thought we had a good chance of selling 25, 26, or 27.

He concluded those remarks by wishing that the opposition would open their eyes once in a while.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Good idea.

Mr. McKinnon: As one of his questioners on the Lear jet contract I have searched Hansard without success trying to find the comments the minister claims to have made in the House. Could he now inform me as to when he made the remarks he claims to have made? The alternative for me will be to assume that he was indulging in witless boasting last Thursday and has attempted to mislead the House.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, to be exact, it was on November 2 in reply to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. But I did not say then that we had 25, 26, or 27. I was right when I said it was 53.

IMMIGRATION

ALLEGED EXEMPTION OF VISITORS FROM CUBA OF VISA REQUIREMENT—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that visas are required for all visitors to Canada from Communist block countries, can the minister advise the House why recent visitors from Cuba have been exempted from this visa requirement?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will check into that, it being one detail with which I am not familiar in the department.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs and it deals with the recent agreement signed by Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Capilano on a supplementary question.

Mr. Huntington: I wonder if while the minister is checking into this important question, in light of the type of training programs being sponsored in Canada by the Cuban embassy, he will give serious consideration to the requirement for visas for visitors to Canada from Cuba?

Mr. Cullen: There is one mistake, Mr. Speaker. I do not think we will make our policy based on that.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

AGREEMENT WITH SPAIN ON EXPORT OF NUCLEAR SUPPLIES AND DEVICES—TYPE OF SAFEGUARDS APPLICABLE

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It has to do with the recent agreement signed by Canada with Spain with respect to the export of nuclear devices and supplies. In the release by the Department of External Affairs it is stated that Spain has agreed to abide by the safeguards of Canada as of 1974-1975. Given the fact that the government brought down new safeguards in the fall of 1976, I should like to ask the minister whether this means that exports to Spain are governed by an earlier set of guidelines than the ones that prevail now on new contracts being made by the Department of External Affairs for the government of Canada?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Once again, Mr. Speaker, this is a highly technical question. I would like to take the details of it as notice, but my recollection is that both apply. In other words, Spain is not only subject to the earlier safeguard agreements which have been signed but also to those that were announced by me on December 22. But I will look into them in detail and let the hon. member know, or answer him in the House.

MANPOWER

CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—SUGGESTED CREATION OF SPECIAL FUND FOR RECYCLING OPERATION

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Because the Canada Works program as presently constituted would require some worthy would-be recipients of funding to layoff or fire existing personnel before qualifying for grants, thus defeating its job creation purpose, would the minister consider setting up a special fund for recycling operations, particularly under the Canada Works program, in much the way the special Indian fund has been separated from the general allocation?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I do not think so, Mr. Speaker. We are trying to create jobs for Canadians who are not working at present.

CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF SITUATION IN OKANAGAN-KOOTENAY CONSTITUENCY

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to one asked earlier by my colleague, the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary. In replying to that question, the minister referred to an article in the Ottawa Journal of February 5. I read that article since then and find the most plausible sentence in it to be the one saying that my figures were correct. While the minister is giving the review that he promised the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary regarding the unemployment statistics there and the possibility of the allocation being too low, would he consider at the same time the neighbouring constituency of Okanagan-Kootenay, because daily I receive letters in regard to the extraordinarily high rate of unemployment there at present?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I think, with respect, that the hon. member is putting words into my mouth, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Broadbent: A refreshing change.

LOTO CANADA

REQUEST THAT CHANGES IN REGULATIONS BE RECONSIDERED

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Can he tell the House whether, as a result of the very disappointing results of the post-Olympic lottery (Loto Canada) he intends to reconsider the changes that were made which may originally have been the cause of the lottery's decline?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am still unaware of the changes alluded to by the hon. member; perhaps, he could put a supplementary to me.

REASON FOR LOCATION OF OFFICES IN OTTAWA

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, could the Prime Minister enlighten us as to the circumstances which led to the resignation of the former president, Mr. Julien Côté, and the main reasons for deciding to move the head office from Montreal to Ottawa?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the board of directors of Loto Canada chose to be in the national capital seeing the lottery is national, and I think that decision is quite logical.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BAKER (GRENVILLE-CARLETON)—REVISIONS TO BANK ACT

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I asked for the privilege of speaking to you and to the House at three o'clock as a result of the intervention of the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik) which I would be charitable in describing as an irresponsible intervention. In that intervention he seemed to imply that the failure of either a revision of the Bank Act or a reference of the white paper on banking to the committee was because of some difficulty which had occurred with regard to the official opposition. At least, I presume that that was the case, or perhaps it was the opposition in general.

I want to indicate to the hon. member that that is not so. As a matter of fact, when the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp) was the government House leader, I wrote to him on August 26, 1976, asking for the reference of that white paper to the appropriate standing committee. I think it is important for the House to know that in my letter I said the following:

> In recent months you and I have shared a common concern about the real relevance of the House of Commons to public policy decision-making. We both believe, I think, that the House is the ideal and proper point of contact between the people of Canada and their elected and appointed leaders. While this shared belief should lead over the next several months to worth-while reforms of our procedures, perhaps you might consider the following suggestion for a short-term experiment.

The next paragraph refers to Canadian banking legislation, and particularly the white paper. I go on to say this:

> To this end I suggest that the white paper on Canadian banking legislation be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs as soon as the House returns in October.

It is now February.

> Hearings could be held before Bank Act amendments are drafted in their final form and those institutions or individuals with an interest in the banking system could be heard. This seems to me to be preferable to a closed review of the report followed by the presentation to the House of a complex and essentially unchangeable draft bill.

This request was made of the then government House leader in August of 1976.

> If the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs did hold hearings and issue a report, I assume that the committee stage of House deliberations on the actual amendments to the act would then be brief.
> The summary to the white paper states on page 47: "The proposals in this white paper are based on the assumption that Canadians want a banking and financial system which is national in scope, controlled by Canadians and as competitive as possible."

I conclude my letter by saying this:

> I hope the House of Commons will be encouraged to find out what else Canadians expect from the banking system.

Subsequently I received a letter from the government House leader dated January 21, 1977. I believe I have referred to this already in the House. The letter is dated less than a month ago and there is a paragraph on page 2 which reads:

> As you are aware, the Bank Act expires on June 30, 1977. We are making every effort to have a new bill ready for spring.

It has now become apparent from the answer that the new bill is merely to be a one-line bill extending the present banking system. The purpose of this intervention is to indicate that in the happy exchange of views which occurred—and which continues to occur—between the opposition and the government House leader there has been every hope, and every effort has been made by the official opposition, to have that white paper brought to the committee. I might say, without revealing any confidences at all, that this matter has been discussed between the present government House leader and myself. It was discussed on the basis that there was a willingness on the part of the present government House leader to have that paper come forward, but that I had to understand—which I did—that the discussion of that white paper might be interrupted by the presentation of a revision to the Bank Act.

I think we should be very clear that I have taken the view—and I know my predecessor took the same view—that the members of this House, not just on the opposition side but on the government side as well, have not had an opportunity to engage in this aspect of policy-making in a very significant way. This would have been an important opportunity and we have pressed to have this kind of innovative approach take place. This approach is not unique by any means, but it is innovative in terms of the day-to-day unfolding of parliament. So I want to make it clear to the House and to the hon. member for Ontario that in what he has said he has misled the House. I am sure it was inadvertent.

An hon. Member: I wouldn't say that.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): At least I hope it was inadvertent. There has been an attempt by the official opposition to have this white paper brought forward and to have a reference made, and I am informed by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) that if that had happened it would have been the intention of his committee, which would have charge of the debate, to make the debate on that reference very short indeed. So I think the hon. member for Ontario owes me, the opposition and the House, an apology.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I noted that the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) began his remarks by alluding to my question and its contents as being charitably irresponsible. I do not know his definition of "charity", but it seems to me that it would at least imply an understanding of what gave rise to the comments I made. It is quite evident, from the point made by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, that he has had communication with the government House leader, but there is another point which I think is abundantly clear, and that is that he ought to have had communication with his own colleagues.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cafik: The hon. member would then have realized the difficulty. When I was first elected chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs—

An hon. Member: That was a disaster.

Mr. Cafik: —I called a subcommittee meeting precisely to deal with questions relating to the white paper on banking and the proposed Bank Act which would be forthcoming. At that time, as chairman of the committee and with the consent of all members, I entered into negotiations with the government House leader and with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) in an attempt to achieve agreement whereby this committee of the House would be given the white paper to study. The purpose of that directive of the subcommittee to me was so that we could begin public hearings on that working paper and therefore cut down the length of time which would be needed to debate the bill when it was brought forward. I discussed this matter with the government House leader and the Minister of Finance and agreement was reached whereby the white paper would be referred to our committee.

The agreement was reached on these conditions: first, that there would be a limited debate on the reference itself. I pursued the matter further and it was agreed with the government House leader and the Minister of Finance that the debate would be limited to no more than one day's duration, and that was quite acceptable. Second, the agreement was that the standing committee would complete its public hearings by Easter of this year, and following that we would move to clause by clause consideration of the bill, if it was before us by that time, and conclude by the end of this session.

The whole agreement broke down when I raised this question with the steering committee and with members of the Conservative party because the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), who I presume was speaking for the members of his party, would not agree to a limited debate on the reference of the white paper. He indicated that the debate would last more than one day and in all likelihood that it would be a very extended debate. With that information brought forward by a representative of that party, I went back to the House leader and indicated that this was what was happening. That meant an end to the agreement, much to the chagrin of members of the New Democratic Party who wanted that reference, to members of this party who wanted the reference, to members of the government who were prepared to give the reference, and to some members of the hon. member's party who wanted to see a reference.

Those are the hard facts from my vantage point and my involvement in this matter. Therefore, the question that I raised and the comment that I made in that question is perfectly valid as far as I am concerned. Until the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton brought forward his communication with the House leader, I was not aware of it. The simple fact is that there appears to me to be a very legitimate misunderstanding between the House leader for the Conservatives and myself on this question and I—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure all hon. members will realize the difficulty that is encountered when negotiations are described on the floor of the House or attempted to be carried out on the floor of the House. There has been exposure of the point that objections were taken, on the one hand, to the tone of the question by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik) and the premise of the question. There has been a response. The further we get into the response, the more it is evident there is disagreement on the question of negotiation and understanding between members about arrangements to debate a reference or deal with a reference to committee and, in turn, debate a bill. All of this anticipates orders of the day and discussions that will take place on measures before the House or, alternatively, anticipates discussions related to matters that ought properly to be before a committee.

I did not want to cut that discussion short before allowing both sides ample time to state their positions. I think I have done so. It seems to me that the longer we let this go on, the more likely it is that other members will want to get involved and state their understanding of agreements that have taken place and negotiations that have taken place outside the chamber that by their very nature are not binding on this House. They ought not to be referred to, I think, and probably ought not to be referred to in a definitive way. I wonder if I might invite the co-operation of all hon. members, having given equal time to both sides, to terminate that question now and get on with other matters.

The hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather), on a question of privilege.

MR. FAIRWEATHER—NEWSPAPER AND RADIO COMMENT ON NATIONAL ASSEMBLY OF QUEBEC

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, you had notice that I intended to raise this matter of privilege which I suggest affects all of us. A Canadian Press story on the front page of today's Globe and Mail—which also was put out on the CBC radio news broadcasts—states that the Speaker of the National Assembly of Quebec "sits in gallery for foreigners". I suggest there are enough strains placed upon confederation these days without the need for pejorative and inaccurate headlines.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fairweather: These headlines have already—I had in my notes that they are bound to jangle nerves already somewhat raw because of those who wish to dismantle this country. I do not mean to be preachy, but the gallery where Mr. Clement Richard sat yesterday is the Speaker's gallery where you, sir, extend your courtesy to a visitor whether it be the Speaker of the territorial government of the Northwest Territories, of Saskatchewan, of British Columbia, Venezuela or other countries outside Canada. It is my understanding that visitors of the Governor General, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), or Your Honour sit in that gallery when they are here.

A similarly phrased headline would not have followed, I suggest with great respect, a visit of the Speaker of the legislative assembly of my province, New Brunswick. I ask, why we are subjected to this type of headline in these days?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fairweather: I am not attaching a motion to this intervention. What I plead for, as we pursue what I am sure is our joint resolution to preserve confederation, is that moderation be exercised. As my colleague, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) said, moderation in everything but our will to preserve Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) has raised, by way of a question of privilege, an event that occurred yesterday which I am sure has baffled and concerned a number of hon. members. The hon. member's description of the event is absolutely correct.

My colleague from the province of Quebec was seated in the area which is the most honoured position we can give to distinguished visitors. It is the same seat that is occupied by my counterpart in every province of this country, and it has never before drawn that kind of headline. I am grateful for the hon. member's intervention. There is no motion attached to it, and therefore no decision for the Chair to take.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn).

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I rise somewhat reluctantly on a point of order at this juncture. It deals with my question earlier in the question period. I know Your Honour has made an excellent interpretation of the questions and has discerned whether a representation has been made to any particular minister on any particular topic. I rise today because I feel very strongly about what I consider to be prima facie evidence of the infringement of the Bill of Rights of our country of the basic concepts and precepts of our common law principles of justice in Canada.

I want to bring to Your Honour's attention the fact that what I was attempting to do in the questions put to the Minister of National Revenue—and the Solicitor General, if he were here—was to bring the matter to their attention and request that they give an undertaking to stop this kind of activity with respect to legislation and acts under their particular jurisdiction. My purpose was to obtain, in the course of questioning, at least, an undertaking that they would review individually the applications to be made to the court with respect to this kind of application for writs of assistance in which there is no date of expiry, no specified officers or constables mentioned in the writ and which give unlimited powers to members of the national police.

It was not my intention to make a representation. I am sorry if I was not as clear as I might have been, but I feel so strongly about this question that I want to bring it to Your Honour's attention at this time so that I may pursue it at a subsequent time.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar deserves an explanation of my decision not to permit him a second supplementary question, that is to say, a third question. It is unrelated to the fact that he was making a representation. The minister did indicate, in response the hon. member's first question, that the answer would be delivered at a later time and the minister was not prepared to answer at this time.

That always sets in motion a difficult chain of circumstances for the Chair in that obviously it will be the intention and desire of the member putting the question to pursue the matter with supplementaries when the minister comes back with information. It is, therefore, difficult to allow the hon. member supplementaries at this time and on the subsequent occasion. I think the hon. member ought to have the opportunity to add, by way of one supplementary, other aspects of the question which the minister ought to be invited to include in the investigation for an answer at a later date.

I therefore allowed the hon. member a supplementary with the hope—and I am sure the hon. member will watch it closely—that the minister will come back at an early date. On that occasion the subject will be amplified by further supplementaries.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

MEASURE TO PREVENT DISCRIMINATION AGAINST PERSONS WITH CONTROLLED ILLNESSES

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-396, to amend the Canada Labour Code.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, it is a very simple bill and one which I hope the government will adopt as part of its own platform and policy. Therefore, it may get on a little earlier. I want to amend the Canada Labour Code which would control that part of commerce and trade which falls under federal jurisdiction so that people with controlled illnesses such as diabetes will not be discriminated against as we have seen happen in the not too distant past.

3. Daily rate on salary at time of retirement $108. Daily rate under contract $125. All other departments and agencies have submitted "nil" replies to this question.

INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE—QUOTAS ON TEXTILES

Question No. 902—Mr. Herbert:

1. Has the establishment of quotas for textile imports resulted in an effective control by foreign speculators of the type and price of garment available on the Canadian market?

2. Has the establishment of these quotas increased the competition in the product lines of the Canadian manufacturer?

3. Will future import restrictions by quota include reference to product type and price?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. Under the Arrangement Regarding International Trade in Textiles, Canada maintained voluntary restraint arrangements with a number of major supplying countries to restrain the level of imports of certain textile products. Under these agreements, Canadian importers were free to purchase these textile products regardless of type or price from countries with whom Canada had restraint arrangements. On November 29, 1976, previous measures on clothing were replaced by global import quotas under GATT Article XIX which limited the quantity of imports of certain garments into Canada in 1977 to the level prevailing in 1975. Under this measure the Canadian government allocates import quotas to Canadian importers on the basis of their past import performance which enables these importers to source the type of garments for which they have quota entitlements at any price from all sources.

2. The introduction of import quotas is expected to stabilize the market in Canada and create an environment more conducive to the development of a competitive textile industry in Canada.

3. The application for import quotas requires that importers state only the type of product to be imported.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—FAMILY REUNIFICATION USSR

Question No. 986—Mr. Howie:

1. What efforts has the government made to reunite 300 families in Canada separated from family members in Russia?

2. If no progress is made in the near future, what alternatives are available to Canada?

Mr. Fernand E. Leblanc (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Since 1971, when Prime Minister Trudeau raised the question with Premier Kosygin of the Soviet Union, the Canadian Government has made a series of representations to the Soviet authorities in Ottawa and in Moscow on behalf of families in Canada separated from family members in the Soviet Union. Canada played a leading role in the preparation of the text on reunification of families which was incorporated in the final act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe signed at Helsinki in August, 1975. Since then, representations to the Soviet government have been made at increasingly frequent intervals. Approaches were made by the Canadian ambassador in September and by the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the Soviet foreign minister, Mr. Gromyko, during his visit to Moscow in October. Since then the question has again been discussed with the Soviet foreign ministry and the Soviet ambassador.

2. During the past year, some progress has been made in reuniting families with close relatives from the Soviet Union. While the pace in resolving cases on which we have made representations is slow, the Soviet authorities have in fact increased this year the total number of exit permits issued to people emigrating to join families in Canada. It is to be hoped that this progress will continue at an accelerated rate. The question of family reunification will be discussed at the CSCE follow-up meeting in Belgrade in 1977 when progress in implementing the final act will be reviewed in detail.

AIR POLLUTION—NEW BRUNSWICK

Question No. 996—Mr. Howie:

1. Since January 1, 1974, has any money been expended by the government to alleviate air pollution in New Brunswick and, if so (a) what amount (b) to whom (c) for what purpose?

2. Since January 1, 1974, have any studies been undertaken of air pollution in New Brunswick and, if so, what are they?

3. Have any outside consultants been engaged to conduct any studies and, if so (a) who are they (b) what was the purpose of each (c) at what cost (d) have any written reports been received and, if so, are they available to the public?

Order Paper Questions

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): 1. The government has agreed to contribute $1 million through the Programme for the Development and Demonstration of Pollution Abatement Technology (DPAT) to St. Anne Nackawic Pulp and Paper Co. Ltd., to reduce air pollution problems from their Nackawic Mill.

2. Since January 1, 1974, many air pollution studies have been undertaken in New Brunswick. A list of these studies is appended.

3. Acres Consulting Services Ltd., has been engaged to conduct an air pollution study of emissions from the heating plant at CFB Gagetown, New Brunswick. Cost of the study was $25,000. Information collected is available to the public on request.

Air Pollution Studies Involving Environment Canada in New Brunswick since January 1, 1974; 1. Saint John Region Air Quality Study: This study was designed to follow up on the recommendations of the Lorneville Impact Study which assessed the effects upon air quality of the Coleson Cove Generating Station. It involves a monitoring network of six air quality stations and a program of computer modelling of atmospheric dispersion. It is hoped that the end result will be an aid to regional use planning and to the provincial air pollution control agencies. This study is being carried out in conjunction with Environment New Brunswick. 2. Air Pollution Assessment of Heating Plant at CFB Gagetown: Complaints have been received about emissions from this heating plant and a study is being carried out by a consultant under our supervision. 3. Air Pollution Study of Proposed Expanded N.B.E.P.C. Generating Station at Dalhousie, New Brunswick: This study was carried out at the request of the provincial department of the environment. Its purpose was to estimate ground level concentrations resulting from the proposed expansion of this generating station. The results were forwarded to the provincial department of the environment. The study involved computer modelling of dispersion from the stacks of the station. 4. Air Pollution Study in the Vicinity of the Lead Smelter at Belledune, N.B.: This study, also carried out at the request of the provincial government, involved computer modelling of dispersion of lead and particulates from the smelter. Much effort went into determining the emission rates at the smelter. At the present time the provincial government is carrying out an ambient air survey in the vicinity of Belledune, and the department is assisting them in the analysis of the samples that they are gathering. 5. Abatement Program, CIL Dalhousie Chlor-Alkali: This is not a study as such but is a program designed to ensure that the company is in compliance with the federal mercury emission limits to the air whose effect date is mid 1978. The department's activities there include inspections of the plant and meetings with plant personnel. 6. Lead-Free Gasoline Sampling: The department has an on-going program of sampling of lead-free gasoline in the Province of New Brunswick to ensure that federal regulations are met. The purpose of the regulation is to reduce emissions of lead from automobiles. 7. Leaded Gasoline Regulations: The department takes quarterly samples from all refineries in New Brunswick to ensure that the leaded gasoline also meets the federal standards for leaded gasoline. Quarterly reports of lead usage are also compiled from the refineries. This is also intended to reduce emissions of lead to the atmosphere. 8. Evaluation, Inspection and Approval of DREE Funded Projects: This is an on-going activity whereby our department in co-operation with the New Brunswick Department of the Environment assesses the pollution aspects of DREE funded projects to ensure that they are not a cause of pollution. Funds are withheld until both federal and provincial agencies are satisfied. This aspect of the work involves much travel, inspection of installations, assessment of plans, etc. This activity is intended to prevent pollution from new sources. 9. EPS/AES Sulphate Monitoring Study—Eastern Canada: The purpose of this study which is just getting underway is to assess the importance of pollutants, primarily sulphates, heavy metals and nutrients, that may be transported over long distances, say from the Eastern Seaboard of the United States, and deposited here in the Maritimes. Some intensive monitoring was undertaken in August 1976 and it will be resumed by Environment Canada for a two year period beginning April 1, 1977.

There are other programs within DOE that are not specific to New Brunswick but which nevertheless are intended to alleviate air pollution there. These are as follows: 1. Development of Federal Air Emission Air Guidelines: Guidelines have been developped for the cement, asphalt and coke oven industries and others are being developed for the petroleum refining, pulp and paper ferrous foundries, non-ferrous foundries and iron and steel industries. These guidelines are available to the provincial air pollution agencies, including N.B. which they may adopt as regulations as they see fit. 2. Training of Provincial Personnel: DOE holds several courses a year in which provincial air pollution personnel are trained in the technology. 3. Training Operators of Federal Boilers and Incinerators with Respect to Air Pollution Control: The department intends to start this program this year in order to reduce air pollution from these installations. Training of operators in New Brunswick will be included.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—STUDY OF "GIARDIASIS"

Question No. 1,253—Mr. Jones:

Is the Department of National Health and Welfare studying the disease "giardiasis" in Canada and (a) if so, what are the names of those engaged in combatting the problem (b) if not, is any group or organization in Canada studying the disease?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): (a) Yes. Investigations have been carried out in rural and urban areas, in Indian and Inuit communities and on Canadians returning from certain countries where giardiasis is known to be endemic. The following is a list of recent reports published by the Department of National Health and Welfare on giardiasis: 1. Canada Diseases Weekly Report Vol 2-34, 1976; 2. Canada Diseases Weekly Report Vol 2-32, 1976; 3. Canada Diseases Weekly Report Vol 2-25, 1976; 4. Epidemiological Bulletin No. 19(5), 1975; 5. Epidemiological Bulletin

No. 13(10), 1974. Departmental employees involved in these studies include: R. D. P. Eaton—Medical Services Branch, F. M. M. White—Health Protection Branch. (b) Other organizations studying the disease include:—1. National Reference Centre for Parasitology, Institute of Parasitology, McGill University, supported by a grant from Health and Welfare Canada. 2. University Clinic for Tropical and Parasitic Diseases, Toronto General Hospital.

POST OFFICE—STUDIES UNDERTAKEN BY MANAGEMENT CONSULTANTS

Question No. 1,301—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Did the Postmaster General state in his remarks to the Third Postal Users' Conference on November 2, 1976 that some fifteen studies were made by management consultants and, if so, in the case of each such study (a) what was its (i) title (ii) date (iii) purpose (iv) estimated cost (v) actual cost (vi) security classification, if any (b) by whom was it made (c) who were the recipients (d) are copies available (e) on what date were the answers to the questions prepared?

2. Are other studies by management consultants contemplated during the next two years and, if so (a) on what aspects of the Post Office operations (b) what will be the purpose of each study?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): 1. Yes. (a-i) See following statement (a-ii) November, 1968 to July, 1969 (a-iii) To examine and report on the effectiveness of virtually all aspects of postal operations. (a-iv) Unknown (a-v) See following statement (a-vi) With the exception of the three studies which have been tabled (Environmental Forecast Study, Blueprint for change, and a Canadian Public Address Postal Coding System) these studies are considered as internal working documents and therefore of a confidential nature. (b) See following statement (c) As stated in (a-vi) (d) Copies are available of those studies which were tabled, as they were distributed to a number of libraries. (e) The government takes responsibility for the answers it provides to questions and for the process involved in replying to such questions. It is not appropriate therefore to provide information about internal administrative arrangements.

2. At this time the department is not planning any studies of postal operations by management consultants.

REFUGEES IN THAILAND

Question No. 1,319—Mr. Epp:

1. What is the estimated number of refugees from (a) Laos (b) Cambodia (c) Vietnam, presently in refugee camps in Thailand?

2. Have these people been declared refugees by the United Nations High Commissioner on Refugee Matters and, if not (a) for what reason (b) what is their present status?

3. What steps has the international community taken to relocate such persons?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. (a) 63,766; (b) 10,699; (c) 2,688.

2. No. (a) The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees considers most of them displaced persons rather than refugees. (b) They have no status.

3. The first priority of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees has been to secure the voluntary repatriation of these "displaced and uprooted" persons. When that has not been possible, local resettlement has been preferred over migration to a nation where living conditions are not similar to those in their country of origin. Nevertheless both France and the United States have been accepting significant numbers of displaced persons from Thailand.

PURCHASE OF LEARSTAR JET

Question No. 1,357—Mr. McKenzie:

1. What are the names and addresses of firms that made deposits with Canadair for the purchase of a LearStar jet and what was the deposit?

2. What are the names of the Canadian chartered banks that loaned money to Canadair for the LearStar 600 Programme?

3. On what date will the first LearStar be completed for testing?

4. What are the terms of purchase for the LearStar and, if it is not airworthy, will Canadair refund the deposits?

Order Paper Questions

5. How many LearStar jets is the Federal Express Company of New York purchasing and what is the amount of their deposit?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: 1. As at December 14, 1976 58 orders with deposits had been received from 31 firms by Canadair for the purchase of LearStar jets. The amount of the standard initial deposit was 5 per cent of the value of the order, payable when the contract was signed. In the interest of commercial confidentiality the names of the purchasers are not being disclosed.

2. No bank has yet advanced funds for the LearStar project. Negotiations are taking place with two chartered banks.

3. The first LearStar flight is scheduled for February, 1978. Certification is scheduled for April 1979.

4. Business purchasers have paid a 5 per cent deposit on contract signing. They will pay a further 20 per cent 12 months before scheduled delivery and the balance of 75 per cent on delivery of the aircraft. Contracts may be terminated if Canadair fails to deliver the aircraft within 12 months of the scheduled delivery date. In this event Canadair is obliged to return the buyer's deposit.

5. Federal Express has ordered 25 LearStar aircraft and has signed an option for a further 25. The amount of deposit paid by Federal Express is commercial confidential.

RELOCATION OF ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES DIVISION

Question No. 1,368—Mr. Jones:

1. Was there an announcement made in the spring of 1976 stating that the Surveys and Mapping Division of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources would be moving to Fredericton, New Brunswick and, if so (a) for what reason is there still a degree of confusion as to whether or not this section will actually relocate (b) for what reason does the Minister's office maintain that the matter of relocation is still undecided?

2. Is the Division now scheduled to move to Moncton?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of Treasury Board): 1. No.

2. No.

RAPESEED PRODUCTS

Question No. 1,516—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

1. Is Canada a net (a) importer of rapeseed products (b) exporter of raw rapeseed?

2. Does domestic crushing and refining add approximately three dollars per bushel to the value of raw rapeseed?

3. What steps is the government prepared to take to make Canada a net exporter of rapeseed products?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. (a) Canada is a net exporter of rapeseed products. From January 1 to November 30, 1976 Canada has exported 41,387 metric tons of rapeseed oil and 33,325 metric tons of rapeseed meal. There have been no imports of either product. (b) Exports of raw rapeseed from January 1, to November 30, 1976 were 668,404 metric tons, imports were "nil".

2. The domestic crushing and refining of rapeseed adds approximately $3 to the value of a bushel of rapeseed.

3. Even though Canada is a net exporter of rapeseed and products, the government encourages the industry to seek new markets and expand existing markets by means of both incoming and outgoing technical and trade missions, technical seminars, research programmes, meal and oil trials, and works in close conjunction with the rapeseed Association of Canada on these projects.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS—ESTIMATED EMPLOYMENT FOLLOWING RELOCATION TO CHARLOTTETOWN, P.E.I.

Question No. 1,606—Mr. Herbert:

What is the estimated employment in the Veterans Affairs Headquarters in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island as at 1980-81, by groups, and how many of the positions are to be designated (a) unilingual English (b) bilingual (c) unilingual French?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Since the analysis of the implications of the relocation on departmental personnel is not completed, we are not in a position to answer this question at this time.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO SOLVE PROBLEMS OF FEDERAL, PROVINCIAL AND MUNICIPAL DEBT

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse) moved:

That this House notes with distress the prodigious increase in the federal, provincial and municipal debt, which will result in the shattering of our country; and

That this House further regrets the fact that the Government has failed to advance any new formula for the financing of the public sector to correct this situation, for instance an amendment to the Bank of Canada Act allowing it to use the credit of the nation as currency in order to make long-term loans to the federal and provincial governments at an interest rate equivalent to administrative costs rather than the present six-month limit and to relieve the burden imposed on Canadians to repay up to five times the amount of the loans made to the various levels of government by banking institutions under the present system.

Mr. Speaker, it may be by a combination of circumstances that I can hardly understand, but very often on an opposition day allotted to the Social Credit Party of Canada, it is felt necessary to rise on all kinds of questions of privilege, each more important than the other. I hope this is not done on purpose in order to shorten the time allotted to the motion before us today, but if it was deemed important to rise on the first question of privilege relating to the failure of the government to introduce a piece of legislation on banking, a review of or amendments to bank charters, I cannot but think that suddenly it is realized that some problems are really important and come to mind after someone else has laid them on paper.

Mr. Speaker, as years go by, problems seem to recur from generation to generation. After some years spent in parliament, our legislative responsibilities towards the Canadian people seem heavier and this has prompted me to consider in my remarks the merits of the so-called allotted days provided in the Standing Orders, days which may seem at times to be of minor interest. Still the members of the Social Credit Party of Canada believe that those days are quite important in the development of a democratic parliamentary system in Canada.

This is why each time we move a motion on an allotted day we always endeavour to tackle an issue of prime importance for the country, to draw the attention of the government on oversights or still to make constructive suggestions and exhort it to draft legislation aimed at improving our present systems in the financial, economic or social fields.

All those are problems that affect the whole population, and that is why we consider that those opposition days are very precious and ought to be used in such a way that they be profitable to the whole population, and that by the end of the day we could at least have made the cabinet aware of those problems. And then they could in turn during the next few months bring remedies to the problems we have detailed before parliament, to improve our fellow citizens' economic circumstances and thus make it possible for various federal, provincial and municipal administrations to better meet the needs of people under their jurisdiction. Therefore it is the exclusive privilege of the various opposition parties to choose the subject matter which will be debated in the House on those allotted days.

For many years, parliament was made up solely of members of the party in power and members of the opposition party: the old parties. Therefore it was then relatively easy for the opposition to have an understanding with the government on the distribution of allotted days for the Business of Supply as well as on the subject matter to be considered on such days. It was more or less a time for relaxation, for temporarily putting aside consideration of bills and for voicing some criticisms that the opposition deemed advisable to make. However, as time went on and in view of the behaviour of the old parties, Liberal and Progressive Conservative, who were as thick as thieves, some people lost confidence in them; this is how third parties were born.

That is why the people decided to elect officers who could convey ideas to parliament which in their view had value. As the result of the presence of third parties in the House traditions as well as the old party behaviour did change somewhat. Parliament had to amend the allotted days, which are called opposition days. Needless to say, there has been a drastic change in allotted days since third parties came into being. One only has to refer to past years to realize that the allegation I just made is true and that the so-called official opposition must necessarily agree with the third parties by allocating the opposition days according to the number of seats held by the opposition parties in the parliament.

It is because of the events and circumstances I just enumerated that the Social Credit Party of Canada had the privilege of choosing the subject matter of today's motion which reads very clearly as follows:

—That this House notes with distress the prodigious increase in the federal, provincial and municipal debt, which will result in the shattering of our country;

What does that mean? Why do we say it will result in the shattering of our country? Because, Mr. Speaker, the federal and provincial governments hold conferences. To my knowledge, there have been 32 federal-provincial conferences in which I am interested as a Canadian, where they have discussed to know whether Ottawa will abandon some revenue sources to the benefit of the provinces and where the provinces have expressed their needs to Ottawa to get the required funds to meet their obligations. And the motion goes on:

That this House further regrets the fact that the Government has failed to advance any new formula for the financing of the public sector to correct this situation, for instance an amendment to the Bank of Canada Act allowing it to use the credit of the nation as currency in order to make long-term loans to the federal and provincial governments at an interest rate equivalent to administrative costs rather than the present six-month limit and to relieve the burden imposed on Canadians to repay up to five times——the amount of the loans made to the various levels of government by banking institutions under the present system.

—in interest—

Now, Mr. Speaker, in addition to being constructive criticism, the motion I am now sponsoring does make some practical suggestions and urges the government to bring forward amendments to an act which has been in force for almost 42 years, i.e. since March 11, 1935. Obviously, I will not have time to go over the whole debate that took place in the House of Commons when that act was passed. The debate started with a resolution presented on February 22, 1934, by the then minister of finance, Mr. Rose, who at that time told parliament that he would have to follow up with a bill to create a central bank in Canada. The then leader of the opposition, Mr. Mackenzie King—everybody knows at least his name—stated on February 22, 1934, as reported at pages 830 and 831 of Hansard, and I quote:

Liberalism believes that credit is a public matter, not of interest to bankers only, but of direct concern to the average citizen. It stands for the immediate establishment of a properly constituted national central bank, to perform the functions of rediscount, and the control of currency issue, considered in terms of public need.

I repeat: . . . "considered in terms of public needs".

. . . A central bank is necessary to determine the supply of currency in relation to the domestic, social and industrial requirements of the Canadian people; and also to deal with the problems of international commerce and exchange.

That is precisely what we have been saying for years, but after 42 years, as intelligent people should be able to, it is time to make changes. The Bank of Canada fulfilled a tremendous task; the legislators of that time made no mistake when they decided to have that act passed by Parliament, but time has come to adapt its possibilities, its functions to modern needs, to the needs of today, because the act, as passed in 1934 under a Progressive Conservative government, says many things.

We say the same today, it is still true. The preamble of the act reads as follows:

WHEREAS it is desirable to establish a central bank in Canada to regulate credit and currency in the best interests of the economic life of the nation, to control and protect the external value of the national monetary unit and to mitigate by its influence fluctuations in the general level of production, trade, prices and employment, so far as may be possible within the scope of monetary action, and generally to promote the economic and financial welfare of the Dominion.

In those days, this country was still known as a dominion; but today, it is possible—I feel we would be justified in doing so—to write: to promote the economic and financial welfare of our country, Canada. That is what the motion requests: that the government go further, that it complete what the legislators of times gone envisaged; that is why we suggest that section 18(1)(i) be changed as suggested in the motion, because that section now reads as follows:

● (1540)

The Bank of Canada may

(i) make loans or advances for periods not exceeding six months to the Government of Canada or the government of any province on the pledge or hypothecation of readily marketable securities issued or guaranteed by Canada or any province;

(j) make loans to the Government of Canada or the government of any province, but such loans outstanding at any one time shall not, in the case of the Government of Canada, exceed one-third of the estimated revenue of such government for its fiscal year, and shall not in the case of any provincial government exceed one-fourth of such government's estimated revenue for its fiscal year; and such loans shall be repaid before the end of the first quarter after the end of the fiscal year of such government;

Mr. Speaker, this might have made sense at that time but in 1977 can you imagine a government which has to borrow let us say $150 million in order to close its financial year on March 31, being obliged to repay those $150 million sometime in June? How is it going to help? Well it will help temporarily but it will not solve the problem. For this reason we are suggesting that long term loans be granted by the Central Bank for the financing of the public sector in an orderly, intelligent way. Thus, people would have time to breathe before having to pay back, they could achieve something but at an interest rate just to cover operating, administrative and personnel expenses, in short all that is required in a well organized office, whereas today the government has only two ways of raising revenues to administer the country, like any provincial government: taxes and borrowings.

Some taxpayers are lending money to the government through savings, but the bulk of the loans are made to the federal government or the provinces by banking institutions under the present system, at very high interest rates, and those high interest rates paid by the government have some impact on the private sector which must necessarily compete with the Federal government. In the end it creates inflation and the national debt is increasing at an alarming rate.

The same is true of provincial governments. Just to mention a few examples in support of my arguments, I shall draw your attention to the fact that our national debt which amounted to $30 billion in 1967 has increased to $57 billion in 1974. Over a seven year period, the national debt has increased by more than $25 billion. Was the federal government the only one faced with such an increase? No, according to the answer given by the then minister of finance (Mr. Turner) in the House, as recorded in Hansard on May 13, 1975, page 5737, where it is said that generally speaking the provincial debt has almost doubled.

For example, it is the case of Newfoundland where the debt has more than doubled, within six years, going from $584,000,000 in 1967 to $1,222,000,000 in 1973.

The province of Ontario, for example, which is considered a rich province, with the best administration in Canada, had in 1967, a gross debt of $5,561,000,000. Six years later it went up to $10,817,000,000 and is still rising. This debt pyramid within the present system inevitably brings about increased taxation, and taxes. This in turn fans inflation, which results in unemployment and unemployment, as an hon. member put it today to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) spells poverty. But at any rate, those were his words, not mine but I think that the way he put it was not that stupid.

What happens, Mr. Speaker, is this: the government is under an obligation to provide financial aid to the private sector which is crushed under a burden of interest to pay. One only has to look in the newspapers to see why there has been such a number of bankruptcies this year and yet in certain cases, the governments had given the industries substantial subsidies to help them set up businesses which would create jobs for workers.

I have only to quote as an example, Mr. Speaker, the case of Thetford Mines, in Quebec a riding which is represented by a member from the party of the majority, but not the party in power, because they have not got the power, as the power lays outside the House in the hands of money men who do not waste their time standing for parliament, as there is not much money to be made there. They look after their own interests but they they have servants inside the House, within Parliament. We have evidence of that. In any case, Mr. Speaker, in Thetford Mines the province of Quebec is buying back Bellevue products, a firm which went bankrupt.

Mr. Fortin: This was financed by Ottawa.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): That company had received millions of dollars in subsidies from the federal government but then suddenly business went shaky.

And, in order to protect the livelihood of the 500 workers employed by this company, the government of Quebec decided that it would also subsidize this business, in order to keep it going.

In March 1975, the government took action to save this company from bankruptcy, by allowing the Industrial Development Corporation to guarantee the reimbursement of the operating deficit, to the tune of $2.5 million, up to August 31, 1975.

But that is not all! Far from it. I quote further:

This guarantee was to be extended later on to August 1976, but it has not been renewed since because the Industrial Development Corporation considered that its mediation in this case amounted to unfair competition towards the other trailer manufacturers.

This government decision to save the Bellevue plant from bankruptcy could be taken amiss by the other trailer manufacturers.

Mr. Speaker, I did not quote that to criticize a government for trying to save a business in Quebec, far from it. I only meant to show that our financial system in the public sector is destroying our small businesses. In spite of all our good intentions, it is impossible. We cannot make it. Mr. Speaker, I am tempted to quote something else which is extremely important. It concerns a recent loan from the government of Canada to the province of Quebec.

The federal government, through one of our Crown corporations, has just lent the government of Quebec, for the construction of 40 housing units, the sum of $966,960 at a compound interest of 10 per cent to be computed semi-annually. This represents 90 per cent of the value of the building, but not the furniture and future maintenance costs of the building. And the government of Quebec, the new one that talks about independence, has agreed to sign an agreement forcing Quebec taxpayers to pay back to the federal government $95,467 a year over a period of 50 years, which comes out to 4.93 times the amount of the loan. Are you going to tell me that this is reasonable, that this system should not be changed drastically so that governments can work together rather than against each other?

An hon. Member: This is bad federalism.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I consider that when the federal government grants a loan to a provincial government, it is to enable that provincial government to provide services to the people, and neither the federal government, nor a provincial government with regard to a municipality, has any right to grant loans to make a profit. Responsible governments should not exist to make a profit, but to provide services to the people.

We should let private enterprise make loans to the same type of businesses for a profit; which is quite normal since there is room for competition in the private sector. But none of this should exist in the public sector, where it would damage the good relationship which must prevail in a federated Canada as we know it now. I believe that it is the duty of legislators to make the public aware of such transactions or loans, because they could create a debt for future generations who are not at all responsible for today's situation. Mr. Speaker, our remarks are more than just negative criticism. We have said so time and time again in the House, and we repeat it in the motion.

I am trying to explain it with my modest means to urge the government to set up a special committee of the House to make an in-depth study of that whole policy now in use in order that we may together bring in amendments to that Bank of Canada Act so it will be in a better position to serve not only the federal government but the provinces and, through the provinces, the municipalities.

How many members are now witnessing that certain municipalities incur expenditures for the construction of water and sewer facilities which are beyond the capacity to pay of local ratepayers, and those people have to bleed themselves white. The value of their property goes down because they have to pay nearly five times in interest the value of those facilities. That is what is bad. That is what Parliament must react against. And Parliament is the only authority in this country capable of setting things straight, ensuring justice in order to have a more just society, and it must act rapidly, efficiently and in a very orderly fashion.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I do hope that in the course of this day hon. members who will participate in this debate will follow my advice—you do not have to share my opinions but you have the duty to examine them, you have the duty to suggest better ones, if possible, and we will support them wholeheartedly. But what are we looking for? We are trying to improve the situation, and today's problem is one of dollars for the government of Ontario, the federal government, Quebec as well as all other provinces. It is a problem of revenue to meet our obligations.

Considering all the facts I just set forth with the best intentions in the world I do hope I will receive the very generous support of hon. members so we may all together convince the government to introduce the legislation we want to ensure proper finance in this country. We must see that the authority of this Parliament is the real authority and that high finance just like our children in school complies with the legislation of this country whereas today it is governments that are submitted to the whims of high finance.

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, many times has the Social Credit Party of Canada proposed similar amendments to our banking legislation. Indeed the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) will remember that he introduced a private bill on November 5, 1976 which was almost along the same lines as the motion he proposed to the House today. He also made similar proposals on October 22, 1974, on March 18, 1969 and on March 15, 1967.

Of course the government has considered the Social Credit proposals because at first glance they do seem to offer valid arguments likely to convince people they should readily and easily endorse that philosophy without seeing the consequences. That is why many times the government gave a clear and precise answer to arguments by raising counterproposals which must be weighed when they propose such sudden change in our monetary policies.

My first argument is of course that if the proposition were accepted, it would automatically fuel inflation, not only by the federal government but more particularly by the provincial and municipal governments. Why? Of course, when you can borrow money without interest, you are inclined to borrow more often, and fairly easily, without taking the consequences into account. Thus this could lead to a rapid increase in spending in the public sector. At the present time many Canadians have adopted the opposite thesis. They say that the public sector, either federal, provincial or local, accounts for a vast amount of Canadian outlays and that government expenditures should be limited. When you propose loans with nearly no interest, you invite the governments to make almost unlimited spending for a certain number of years at least.

Of course, the law allows the Bank of Canada to meet some of my hon. colleague's aspirations. Pursuant to sub-paragraphs 18(1)i) and 18(1)j), it does not allow to lend funds to the provinces or to the federal government. But, pursuant to sub-paragraph 18(1)c), the law allows the Bank of Canada to buy federal and provincial government bonds. Up to now, the Bank of Canada has bought only Canada saving bonds. Why? First because it has always felt, and rightly so, and the government has always adopted the same views, that it would amount to interfering in the finances of the provinces and, in some ways, it would have conflicts of interest in applying a responsible monetary policy.

In fact, if it were so allowed, the Bank of Canada would automatically be compelled to buy provincial governments bonds, it would be compelled to choose and, thus, to discriminate. The bank should have to study the financial situation of each province and territory to check whether the bonds were regularly issued, whether the interest rate is valid and if it should consider buying such bonds. The rates vary necessarily according to the provinces.

The provincial capacity for payments and redemptions varies too. In order to manage its portfolio in a responsible way, the bank should definitely not act according to the established percentages but should be very freely on the market, according to the economic situation. But this would be putting the bank in a particularly delicate situation on the political field, I should say, because I suggest that the Bank of Canada should keep a certain leeway and a certain kind of freedom as far as the monetary policy of Canada is concerned.

● (1600)

A second point about the conflict of interest that would face the Bank of Canada. When we went through a period of monetary restraint and were faced with economic problems, the Bank of Canada might decide to sell some provincial or municipal bonds it was holding. The Bank of Canada would once again be in a conflict of interest situation because it would be in the position of having to take a decision of a generally political nature, namely which bonds should be put back on the market to restore some balance in the sound management of the monetary policy.

[Mr. Goyer.]

Well, what about federal bonds? The Bank of Canada buys Canada savings bonds. Is that not a conflict of interest situation? Is it not faced with a decision of an almost political nature in its policy of buying Canada savings bonds? In my view, that point cannot be made as far as the federal government is concerned. Anyway, the circumstances are not the same as in the case of provincial and municipal bonds. Because it is generally recognized that the federal government is responsible for Canada's monetary policy. Then government must cooperate with the Bank of Canada and ensure that the economy is managed in a responsible way.

Moreover, the provinces and the municipalities keep saying right and left that the federal government is responsible for Canada's economic stability. If this is true, and I believe it is, it means that the government must have the means to develop policies with the Bank of Canada and, of course, the monetary policy must go hand in hand with the fiscal policy drawn up by the government. This means that although the Bank of Canada may be in somewhat of a conflict of interest situation, although it would be facing choices of a very political nature as far as the provinces are concerned, that point cannot be made in relation to the Canadian government.

Mr. Speaker, there is a third point I should like to make to my collleagues in order to disprove their argument. To allow the Bank of Canada to make loans to the provinces without interest or with an interest that only covers the administration costs would be an indirect transfer of funds from the federal government to the provincial government, since the Bank of Canada is an instrument of the central government. Over the years, we have already accepted many fiscal and payment transfers to the provinces. We have already responded in a responsible way to the legitimate aspirations of the provinces which were asking for more funds to meet some of their obligations.

The great majority of payment transfers by the federal government to provincial governments have no string attached, which means the provinces are free to spend those moneys as they choose, without any obligation. However, it is true that some of the payments are made in keeping with federal-provincial agreements, so that the money must be used for very specific purposes but on the whole the money is transferred to the provinces without lien.

And what does the transfer of payments from the federal government to the provinces amount to? More than a fifth of the federal budget, more than a fifth of the taxes which are levied by the federal government is transferred automatically each year to the provinces. This needs to be emphasized, Mr. Speaker. The provinces do not have to levy taxes, they do not have to assume the often odious role of explaining to the people that they must levy taxes in order to get the money they need for their budgets. A fifth of the federal government's funds, a fifth of last year's $42 billion budget was transferred to the provinces, and even more, since some federal expenses go directly to aid the provincial and municipal governments.

Well, I think that the federal government is being very generous when it levies taxes on Canadians and transfers one fifth of the funds so generated to the provinces and, the same thing may be said about the provinces, when they give money to municipal governments to meet their needs. I think that all of us in this House, whether we are members of the opposition or of the majority parties, when we account for our budget and try to justify our expenses to the people, when we speak as members of the federal Parliament, we should stress the fact that a fifth of the taxes is actually levied on behalf of the provincial governments who do not have to assume the unpopular role of "saddling people with taxes."

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) referred to the federal public debt. He mentioned figures which look astonishing at first sight when we consider the growth of the Canadian public debt but I think such figures need explanations and should be placed in a general context. It is evident that the debt and the revenues are increasing, that government assets are growing and that the national gross product which represents goods and services produced in Canada is also expanding from year to years. But what does this growth mean, Mr. Speaker? I notice that I have caught the attention of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert). I believe it is important since he is the one who introduced the motion. But there are others who would like to rise and I presume they will have the opportunity to do so later on.

The gross national debt—the public debt as we call it—which is made up of the remaining non expired debt, that is outstanding federal bonds plus other debts which appear in the public accounts of Canada to pay employee pension funds for instance, is paid through the consolidated revenue fund. What was this debt in 1952? In 1952 it stood at $17 billion—$17.257 billion to be exact—and in 1976 it amounted to $71.750 billion.

Mr. Speaker, what were the registered net assets of the federal government in 1952? They stood at $6,072 millions, and in 1976 at $48,454 millions. What does it mean? This means that the net debt was $11,185 millions in 1952, and $23,296 millions in 1976. What does it represent?

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us talk about the net debt as a percentage of the gross national product, that is the growth in Canada in terms of production of goods and services in our country.

In 1952, the net debt in regard to the gross national product amounted to 51 per cent. In 1976, this proportion has dropped to 14.5 per cent. This means that when we compare the gross national product, that is everything produced in Canada over a year, to the federal government's debt, we find that the figure reached 50 per cent in 1952 and has been now sharply reduced to 14 per cent. That is an important point to remember. This must necessarily be considered in the general context of Canadian economy; we should not be afraid of those figures, but rather consider the percentages they stand for.

From 1965 to 1976, the debt increased at a compound rate of 7 per cent where as within the same period, from 1965 to 1976, the NGP jumped from $61 billion to $190 billion, namely at a compound rate of 12 per cent. This means that our wealth increased faster than our debt, that we now have more assets than debts in Canada, and therefore that we are in a better financial position.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I would like to emphasize that whenever the federal government borrows money, it borrows it on the Canadian market not on the American or foreign markets. We borrow through Canada Savings Bonds which are issued here, which means all our loans are Canadian loans and the majority of the payments on our loans, namely the interests, find their way back to the Canadian people. Historically, Canadians have always considered it a good thing to have Canada Savings Bonds in their wallets, in their safety boxes, because they are safe investments. And the hon. member for Bellechasse is perfectly aware of this, because he comes from the province of Quebec. Does anyone get nervous about Canada Savings Bonds? Not at all. Are there people who get nervous about the savings bonds issued by provincial governments? Yes, there are.

I could also take this opportunity to say something about the management of our monetary policy and the guidelines upon which are based the decisions and action of the Bank of Canada. Some 15 months ago, the Governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Bouey, publicly stated for the first time the approximate limits within which the federal bank was trying to maintain the growth rate of monetary supply. Mr. Bouey had then added that the bracket aimed at should be progressively lowered during the years to come, so that our monetary policy could remain consistent with the national aim of a gradual reduction of the inflation rate, which is still a government priority, because as the hon. member knows, small wage-earners and small depositors as well as those who are defenceless when it comes to big unions or big companies are affected by those things.

Mr. Bouey indicated that the bank then wanted to maintain the annual growth of money and deposits computed at the medium rate of that aggregate for the three-month period ending on June 1975 or at a 10 per cent rate. Last fall, the bank announced that the minimum targets for the growth rate of money supply had been set at 8 and 12 per cent annually, such a rate to be calculated on the average level of a three-month period centered on March 1976. This announcement by the Bank of Canada about the reduction in the growth rate trend of the money supply was met with positive reactions. It was favourably received. Last summer, the growth rate trend of the money supply and demand deposits remained close to the lower level of the 8 to 12 per cent annual range aimed at by the Bank of Canada.

Accordingly, the Governor of the Bank of Canada announced on November 19, 1976, a reduction in the prime rate from 9½ to 9 per cent. Mr. Bouey stated, and I quote:

This reduction in the prime rate is justified by the fact that Canada has been able in the last few months to control inflation better and to slow down the rate of monetary expansion.

● (1620)

[English]

Similar considerations led to the further reduction in the bank rate from 9 per cent to 8½ per cent effective December 22, 1976, and to the most recent reduction from 8½ per cent to 8 per cent effective February 1, 1977. These rate changes have led to a general easing of interest rates to businesses and consumers in Canada which will be an important support to steady economic growth in this country. These improvements in the financial environment are strong evidence to all Canadians of the benefits of a national program of restraint.

What these developments indicate is that the concerted action of the government in the fight against inflation continues to bear fruit. The actions of the Bank of Canada carry the full support of the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in joining in debate on the motion before us today, I think it is important to deal with it section by section. Hon. members will note that the motion starts out as follows:

That this House notes with distress the prodigious increase in the federal, provincial and municipal debt, which will result in the shattering of our country—

When we speak about "prodigious", I think we should refer to the Oxford dictionary, which says that the word means "marvellous, amazing, enormous, abnormal". If the mover of this motion is suggesting that the increase of our total debt in this country is "marvellous", I would not agree with him. If he says it is "amazing", I would agree in part. If he says it is "enormous", surely nobody in this House would disagree. If he says it is "abnormal", I would agree with him most heartily.

Before dealing more specifically with the first part of the motion, I should like to say that I find it most remarkable that in an age, in a month, in a year when we are faced with perhaps some of the most serious problems that have faced this nation since confederation, we should be confronted with a motion that when you read it in its entirety is simply harkening back to the tired, worn-out theories of social creditism. I say that because the Social Credit party that we have known in this country has from time to time espoused what is called the "funny money" theory. But basically I think it has been a Social Credit party of compassion. It was certainly a party that under its former leader, Mr. Caouette, at any given time showed great concern for unemployment and the well-being of the average Canadian. I would suggest that the Social Credit party, through the mover of this motion, could have given us a more challenging motion to consider in view of the tears that are taking place in the fabric of this fine country.

Perhaps it would be helpful to read into the record what some in the international economic world are saying about Canada today. For example, in a well respected publication, the "Bank Credit Analyst", which puts out a special supplement called "Outlook, 1977", the economic conditions of various countries are dealt with. At page 41 it has the following to say about Canada:

So you can see the basic ingredients of financial disaster in Canada—an overvalued currency sustained only by continuous recourse on a vast scale to foreign credit, huge budget deficits and balance of payments deficits, an uncontrollable public sector, sharply declining competitive position of manufacturing and a persistent shift of employment to unproductive "overhead" areas and away from the producing sectors. Corporate profits and the rate of return on capital have been sharply eroded as a result of this process and, more recently, by the controls program. Investment in goods-producing industries is falling at a rate which, if continued, will threaten the long-term viability of the economy. Private capital inflows for investment have slowed dramatically, partly due to the hostile political climate, controls on foreign investment and punitive taxation, and the outflow of private capital is on an accelerating trend.

It doesn't take much imagination to see where things are heading. As you would expect, the economic recovery of the past 18 months has been of very poor quality, supported primarily by government spending and deficits, subsidies to the housing industry, wage inflation and a temporary lift in exports due to some inventory restocking in the U.S. and elsewhere.

Unemployment is very high and could go much higher on existing policies.

Mr. Speaker, in total, 12 separate points of concern are spelled out in those two paragraphs. In short, this country is in trouble economically. I think it is time the government and all members of the House addressed themselves to the simple question: Why, with the potential we have in Canada, are we getting into the type of trouble we are now living with?

I listened with some interest to the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) because I hoped he would tell us that they planned to change their ways. I notice that he dwelt very gently on the question of credit. He pointed out that he felt if we became party to the Social Credit type of philosophy, somehow it would be inflationary. He pointed out, too, why he felt it would be inflationary. He dealt with the municipal level and the provincial level. Strangely enough, when he came to the federal level he said, "These rules do not apply. The relationship we have to the Bank of Canada is, somehow or other, unique. The relationship is one where, if we wish to bring monetary stances into line with fiscal stances, that is our prerogative."

That, perhaps, is the apex of the main problem in Canada today—the attitude on the part of the ministry that has been running this country since 1968. In short, they have chosen to use our monetary and fiscal position in Canada to suit their own political expediency instead of meeting the economic realities of the day. When I say that, I say it very advisedly. Let us not forget the simple fact that there is absolutely no mystery about where inflation comes from in any country. In Canada, inflation is manufactured in Ottawa: inflation is manufactured by the government of the day, namely, the Trudeau government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Over the last 24 or 25 years it is interesting to review, on one hand, what has been the inflationary stance in Canada and, on the other hand, what has been the real growth and the growth in our monetary system through those four six-year periods. One need not be a scholar of economics to know exactly what has happened. Incidentally, I am relying on government figures tabled in this House in response to a question I placed on the order paper on October 21 last. In the six years ending October, 1958, the rate of inflation in Canada was 8.6 per cent. I emphasize those figures—in those six years our inflation rate was 8.6 per cent. For the next six years ending in October, 1964, our inflation rate went down to 7.6 per cent. But in the next six years it rose to 24.1 per cent, and in the last six years ending October, 1976, the inflation rate in this country was 55.3 per cent. In short, our inflation rate escalated from 8.6 per cent and 7.6 per cent in the first two six-year periods to which I referred, to a rate of 55.3 per cent in the last six years.

Consider the increased money supply which has been generated in our economy. We find that in the first six years referred to our money supply rose by 25.9 per cent compared with real growth of 22.8 per cent. In short, we then witnessed better management of our fiscal and monetary matters. The money supply increased at approximately the same rate as the real growth in the economy. I point out that those low inflation years were basically Conservative government years. In those years the money supply went up 19.9 per cent, but the real growth of the economy was 31.6 per cent. Clearly, one could not call the increase in the money supply in those years an inflationary increase.

However, in the next six-year period we note a shift in conformity with Liberal philosophy. For the first time, the increase in the money supply started to overtake the real growth in the economy. We find that in that six-year period the money supply rose by 43.2 per cent while in real terms the economy grew by only 34.7 per cent. It is also interesting to note what happened to our money supply in the period October, 1970, to October, 1976. Mr. Speaker, it grew by 100.2 per cent while in real terms the economy grew by 31.7 per cent. Is it any wonder that this nation has experienced a 55.3 per cent rate of inflation when you consider that in the period when the real growth in the economy was 31.7 per cent the government expanded the money supply by 100.2 per cent?

Let us look at the matter in another way to see to what extent the government has overinflated the money system. We find that whereas the growth of the money supply approximately equalled the real growth of the economy in the six years ending in 1964, the period when inflation had been running at only 7.6 per cent, the growth of the money supply in the next period alluded to, because the government overcreated money, or printed it as some might say, rose five-fold as compared with the real growth of the economy. Those are the facts.

The minister generalized about the inflationary impact of the Social Credit philosophy and proposal. I can only say that the minister should have done some homework. Essentially, his government has adopted many of the principles advocated by the Social Credit party, namely, the monetization of the tremendous debt this government has incurred since assuming power in 1968. Let me be specific. The government likes to waffle, to obscure the real size of this debt. We heard certain figures mentioned today. According to the answer to my question on the order paper, the gross national debt in Canada as of March 31, 1975, including contingent liabilities—I emphasize these contingency liabilities because the government loves to minimize its debt by not including them—was $78,326 billion. That was two years ago. By this time it is more than likely that that debt exceeds $80 billion—probably $90 billion if all contingencies are taken into accounts. I point out that when the government took power in March, 1968, the gross debt in Canada was only $42 billion. Clearly, since gaining power the government has more than doubled this debt.

The point I wish to make is that when a government spends and overspends to the extent this government has been doing, it can cover its spending only in three ways. It can do the honourable thing and tax in order to cover its outgoing expenditures or it can borrow funds from the private sector. If it borrows too much from the private sector, it will drive up interest rates in that sector. Third, the government can do the most dishonourable thing and monetize its debt by falling back on the Bank of Canada. To a large extent, the government has followed the last of these courses in financing the debts to which I have referred.

Check my figures, Mr. Speaker. Everyone in the Bank of Canada brings out a statement on the fiscal position of Canada. Included in that statement is a breakdown of the total financial needs of Canada. The bank shows where the government has raised money. I have referred to the six-year period ending in 1970. It is interesting to note that while our inflation rate was rising somewhat, the government was still borrowing moderate amounts from the Bank of Canada to finance the ongoing operations of government. In that six-year period total government borrowings from the Bank of Canada amounted to $1.163 billion.

Then we saw a change of heart on the government benches. Perhaps that change of heart became most obvious when John Turner took over as minister of finance. Of all the finance ministers who have reigned in Canada since confederation, there was never a spender to equal John Turner when he was minister of finance.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You hoped he would join your party.

Mr. Stevens: I certainly did not hope he would join our party; let there be no doubt about that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But you did at one time.

Mr. Stevens: And where did the government, with Mr. Turner, raise a lot of the debt which it inflicted on the Canadian public? It raised it from the Bank of Canada to the tune of $4.159 billion. That was the figure up to December of last year. In short, in the six-year period up to 1970 the total debt this government monetized amounted to $1.163 billion. In the last six years this government has monetized $4,159 million of debt alone. Why is all this significant? It is significant because that debt is one of the main instruments for increasing the M-1 supply, the basic money supply in this country, and if the money supply is increased at a rate faster than the real growth in the economy, the result is inflation; there can be no doubt about it.

The government may pretend it does not know how to control inflation. It can state, as it did, that we needed wage and price controls to control inflation. It can state that the labour unions are the bad boys, or that businessmen are causing inflation. The truth is that the government itself has caused inflation—and the Canadian public must never be allowed to forget it. The creation of extra money supplies, together with an overly expanding fiscal stance, has led to the inflation now afflicting this country. The Minister of Supply and Services gave a nodding acceptance to this in his speech.

Mr. Goyer: I gave facts.

Mr. Stevens: He tried cleverly to pass the blame to the provinces and municipalities. But we find that the provinces are controlling their spending. They are controlling their spending increases more effectively than the federal government. That is exactly the reverse of what should be happening. If we want to get a handle on inflation, it is absolutely essential that we first accept the proposition that we must lower the federal government's take of the gross national product at a faster rate than has been taking place. When I speak about growth in federal government spending, I emphasize that between 1967 and 1977 Ottawa will increase their spending by 289.3 per cent, or an average of 14.7 per cent per year. In 1967, the total budget was $9,867 million. In 1977, it is $38,417 million. If we exclude defence, which has been growing much slower than other expenditures at the federal level, we find that federal spending has gone up 362.8 per cent, or an average of 15.8 per cent per year over the past ten years.

● (1640)

The motion is relevant in this sense. If it is used as a focal point to highlight why we have inflation in this country, to highlight that this government has thrust us into more debt per capita than ever before—and unfortunately they not only thrust us into debt but they have monetized the high proportion of that debt with the Bank of Canada, which in turn has given us inflation—it will be useful.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, looking at this motion I have come to the conclusion that I am glad it will not come to a vote. I would be hard put to know what to do with it. Nevertheless, I want to say this: there has always been a strong bond of sympathy between my views and some of the views put forward by the Social Credit party, even though I do not agree with them on particulars or techniques. The more I listen to the views of the Liberal party and the Conservative party, the more persuaded I am that that bond of sympathy should be reinforced.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Stevens.]

An hon. Member: What about last night?

Mr. Saltsman: Last night was a very interesting thing to observe. When the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) was speaking, a number of members of the Social Credit party were in the chamber. I could see they were listening. They did not agree with everything the hon. member for Nickel Belt was saying. However, their instincts, their feelings for the little man and their sense that our tax system is oppressive and weighs heavily on the little man, favouring the big man, are the same as ours. That is quite clear, and I respect that.

Whatever the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) had to say about the theories put forward by the Social Credit party—and the same holds true for the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens)—what they have is for more important than the facile sophistication of the two spokesmen for the respective parties. They have an instinct for the truth. The great geniuses of the Liberal and Conservative parties have had the opportunity to govern, or misgovern, this country at one time or another. They think they know what they are doing. They say to the Social Credit party that they have a very unsophisticated theory, that they do not understand how the whole system works, and then gently try to explain how it does work.

They know something that the people in my party know. We have a society where people have needs. We have productive resources that are sitting idle. We have people who need houses, people who need jobs, all the capital you could want, and all the resources one could possibly hope for. We have so much food that we do not know what to do with it. In fact, the farmers are encouraged not to grow more crops. How can you have all these things and say you cannot put them together?

The hon. member for York-Simcoe says that the villain is the money supply, that the Liberals are in fact Social Crediters and that they have been responsible for increasing the money supply. That accusation has some truth. In 1963 the Liberals, under Walter Gordon who went on to be minister of finance, supported in a very strong way a Social Credit motion to change the whole economy. The Liberals supported it. That is the way they are. They woo you one day, and leave you the next. They are very unfaithful lovers. "Kiss them and leave them"—that is their attitude.

The germ of what is being said in Social Credit theory is true. It is the same germ that is contained in Keynesian economics. The problem with our society today is that we do not have purchasing power where it is needed. In other words, those who need houses and have other needs do not have the money with which to buy them. Something is wrong with the system. I am not going to say that the A plus B theory of Major Douglas explains it in an adequate way, because I would not presume to understand it. I was a little confused, especially when it was translated from the French.

We have to find some way of increasing purchasing power in our society. There are one million people unemployed. What went wrong with our geniuses? What went wrong with our sophisticated people who hold degrees from every university in the universe? We have inflation at the same time as we have one million people unemployed. That is something to which these people must address themselves.

The hon. member for York-Simcoe pointed the finger at the Liberal party. He said it is their fault. His party did not behave any differently when they were in office. I am sorry I do not have the figures on the money supply when the Conservatives held office. However, they had to throw out the governor of the Bank of Canada because he would not increase the money supply fast enough. How can you hold the money supply responsible for everything that goes on? It is as though the price of oil did not increase 400 per cent and the prices of commodities did not rise. Most causes of inflation of the past few years can be attributed to everything but the money supply. The money supply had to be generated in order to pay the higher costs involved. The government and the official opposition continually harp that the money supply is always the villain; that if you increase purchasing power, you wreck society. That is just not so. They have not increased purchasing power or the money supply during the last year. Have they really helped the employment situation? Are people going back to work because the money supply has not been increased? The situation is worse than ever. The hon. member for York-Simcoe often argues that we have to increase investment. We have increased investment over and over again, with no effect. Very often when you increase investment you throw more people out of work. Therefore, the problem cannot be resolved by increasing investment. We have idle plant capacity, with less than 82 per cent employed. For what purpose do you increase investment?

Through the tax bill the government increased the ability of high-income people to save. There are some reasons for objecting to that. The effect of allowing people in higher income tax brackets to get this kind of benefit is that the very people who need the purchasing power and would use it to get the economy in action have to pay higher taxes. There is no such thing as tax avoidance to the extent that one group of people can shelter their tax and another group has to make it up. If you provide benefits which are essentially of greatest benefit to those in higher income brackets, it means that people in lower income brackets have to make it up in one way or another. They will do it through sales taxes; they will do it through income taxes; they will do it through taxes which might have been reduced but were not reduced. But the point is that it has to be made up at some point.

There is no way out of the morass we are in at the present time except to increase purchasing power for those at the lower end of the income scale. We have reached a kind of plateau, Mr. Speaker, in our society. Not only our society, but western society in general, I think, is in serious trouble. If you take a look around you will find that people in the middle and upper income brackets are accumulating savings at the greatest rate in history. There is no shortage of savings. We may, in fact, be reaching a point where the saturation of goods is such that people in upper and middle income brackets really do not need to buy anything any more; they already possess most of the things they want. If you are going to increase purchases, if you are to keep the wheels rolling—aside from the moral aspect of income distribution, and aside from the justice aspect of income redistribution—you have to find a way to increase the purchasing power of those at the lowest end of the economic scale, or you will never get people back to work.

You can see a phenomenal amount of savings being made available to people in the middle and upper income tax brackets, and how they are rushing to put it away. Normally, one could say that savings are a good thing, and I think that generally savings are a good thing. But it is also possible for what might be a virtue in terms of individual savings to be a collective disaster if a whole nation does it instead of redistributing that income in some way so as to provide full employment for the nation. That is really what is being talked about in a motion of the kind before us. We might argue about techniques, about whether you are going to have interest-free money or not, but the germ of an idea is there and it has never been answered.

People have laughed at the Social Credit movement for a long time, particularly those sophisticates in the Liberal and Conservative parties. When I listened to the minister and to the official spokesman for the Conservative party, I thought they were getting ready for the next Quebec election. They sounded as if they were going into the Creditiste strongholds and those were the arguments they were going to use against the Creditistes. In other words, "Don't vote for these guys; they don't know what they are talking about. Vote for us; we know how to run the economy; we know how to give you one million unemployed. Don't listen to those guys." They are already sharpening up for the next federal election. But that idea stays alive.

I think there is a lot wrong with the Social Credit theory, but I do not have time to go into the negative aspects of it today. There is a lot wrong with it, or obviously I would be a Social Crediter. I think there are problems with it. But one thing nobody has been able to answer is why this idea stays alive. If it were patently false, if it were indefensible, surely the people who voted Social Credit or for the Creditistes in Quebec would have rejected them. They are not foolish people. But I think that despite the fact they do not have degrees in economics, either the people who run for the Social Credit party or who vote for them, their instincts tell them there is something wrong with the sophisticated theories put out by the old-line parties. So nobody has been able to answer that great paradox: Poverty in the midst of plenty, and unemployment when there is so much to be done. It is to that paradox that the motion addresses itself, and in that respect the viewpoints put forward in this motion deserve respect and attention.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, after the very clear statement made by my colleague from Bellechasse (Mr.

Lambert), I do not intend to dwell on the means which the government should now be taking to control the staggering rise of our national debt which will lead this country directly to disaster.

I would like to discuss for a brief moment our public financing system, mainly since Confederation and thus note its disastrous effects on our Canadian community.

When we examine the public financing system in Canada and try to detect its shortcomings and bring about improvements in accordance with the wishes of all the provinces of Canada, we are aware of the faulty distribution of taxation powers which has been the source of our worst struggles since Confederation in 1867.

This little historical review will enable us to pinpoint the primary cause, I was going to say, the main cause of all our internal wranglings. Our problem is nothing else but a money problem, a dollars and cents problem. Matters of language, religion and even races are futile compared to our financial problems which result in the deepest indebtedness, as it becomes financially impossible to reimburse the capital because the interests must be paid five times before a dollar of capital can be reimbursed. Mr. Speaker, there are several ways of subduing a nation: militarily, politically or otherwise, but the most hateful is to subdue it financially. God knows to what extent the central government has taken advantage of this in the last hundred years to restrain financially the influence of the provinces in fields coming under their exclusive jurisdiction.

I wonder, after reviewing the events of the last hundred years, if that diabolical bond was not dreamed up by the British government which had absolute control over that North American colony known as Canada, because the British were well aware of the motto: divide and rule. The primary concern was to safeguard the interests of the Crown in the face of British subjects, although by means that were not always civilized. For that reason, I am of those who believe that the British North America Act was first and foremost a political gesture on the part of the government in London which, through a simple private bill sponsored by the Ministry of Colonization, foisted upon its subjects of the northern colony a sham responsible government which it called the new Confederation of British North America.

We find here that the British Crown acted very diplomatically, since it was essential to prevent an armed conflict between the English and the French who were then in greater numbers. The Crown knew full well that while the federal government and the provinces would be fighting over the biggest slice of the cake, its interests, which were to collect as much as it could in taxes from Canada, would be served. It is somewhat like the manager of two big boxers. He will have them fight together better to exploit them. I think that is what the Canadians destined to live together in Canada on that American soil, Anglophones and Francophones alike, never did understand very well. Still, we seem to be sensible people, on both sides. Why not sit down once and for all around a table and discuss sensibly the whole matter of money and indebtedness. That, in short, is the main sidelight of our financial history and the cause of our perpetual conflicts.

What does the federal government do? What does it want? More money and more ways of getting the provinces into debt. What about the provinces? What do they want? More money and more borrowing powers to meet the needs of the municipalities. Look at our cities municipalities, and school boards: they also need money. The problem cannot be solved at the bottom of the pyramid, that is, by the Canadian people, the powerless victims of that financial drama. Our society is sick. The central government is power hungry. It wants to be the unchallenged master of Canada and to achieve that status it will resort to every means at its disposal. On the one hand, it proclaims ministerial decrees from the heights of its authority, foisting this or that law or guideline upon the provinces. On the other hand, like a snake, it worms its way into exclusively provincial jurisdiction, under the pretext of helping, like the thief who distributes his spoils provided he reaps some popularity.

The federal government acts as if the provinces did not have enough intelligent men to manage its affairs and reach agreements among themselves. Just a few years ago, the government even set up a department to return to the provinces some of the funds collected in those same provinces without going through their governments. In years past, it invented the infamous shared-cost programs, of which there were 49 in 1964 and perhaps even more today.

Since the very beginning, Quebec has always asked to opt out of programs within its jurisdiction and to get tax points in return, because all the central government does it to collect taxes on behalf of the provinces and to give them back some of this money. I say some of this money because once, when I asked in the House what percentage was given back to the provinces, I was told that $2 out of every $5 collected was returned to the provinces. We heard quite a different story this afternoon, and I shall return to it later.

Ever since then, I have given my full support to the province of Quebec in the matter of tax patriation because it is really too costly to have the taxes collected by the federal government. More recently, the government created the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, supposedly to fight against regional disparity. This objective is good in itself, but what it hides is not so good. I still remember a meeting of the Committee on Regional Economic Expansion when we were asked to vote $500 million just before a general election. The then minister, the hon. Jean Marchand, hurried through the regions handing out millions of dollars, especially to industries with Liberal tendencies, which later went bankrupt or sold out after having pocketed millions of DREE dollars. Most industries that went bankrupt had probably forgotten that the subsidies they were given did not even cover the interest on the loans they required.

However, this was not the important thing for the Liberal party since the political objectives of the election campaign had been attained. It is the same today: You only have to watch the forthcoming by-elections. Just watch the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) at work; he has already proven himself. He will be called upon to visit various constitutencies where he will distribute his generous gifts as in past years and past elections in an attempt to sweeten up the people. Just watch him. The other ministers and not only the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion will do this; in the last election, 12 ministers came to my constituency. Just watch them and tell me after the by-elections.

I hope that the people in Quebec will continue to keep their eyes and ears open. All these subsidies only increase the debt of the public sector, that is the provinces, the cities and the municipalities. When a subsidy is promised, it generally covers only the interests on the loan needed by the parish or the city. We have the proof of this today in our region, in my riding, where the interests—I looked at the budget myself—on the debts resulting from these grants or loan promises, the interests alone represent 50 per cent of the total budget of the cities or municipalities. Is it not hypocrisy to get a municipality into debt and then use it to play politics? How can you hope to pay off the capital at those interest rates? And all this is an attempt to win an impossible political victory, since the more they put into my riding, the more they lost! The only purpose is probably to distract the provinces' attention or take their minds off their problems.

The federal government convenes federal-provincial conferences to impose its will on the provinces. From the early days of the Confederation pact, I always call it "confederative package", we have always found the same themes, the same wrangling over the separation of powers, for ever increasing taxes, more indebtness. Such reports make very tedious and irritating reading because several provinces, and Quebec in particular, are getting fed up with federal dictatorship and with the Trudeau administration and his strong central government.

We are convinced that the only way to restore some hope for unity in Canada is to start giving back the provinces their own jurisdictions and taxation powers commensurate with their obligations prior to all bargaining, full authority on taxation matters should be returned to the provinces. Even though the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) keeps telling the Quebec people to hold the referendum as soon as possible and that he, the Prime Minister, would start writing a new constitution if necessary, whereas the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) threatens to send the army in should Quebec proclaim its independence, proferring such threats and utterances will be to no avail because the Quebec people are no longer nervous. There is only one thing, which can serve any purpose and which incidentally, may be instrumental in bringing Quebec back to the bargaining table that is if the federal government gives back to Quebec the whole balance of taxation rights which it has claiming for a 100 years; let the federal government get out of areas which are under exclusive provincial jurisdiction, such as health, education, culture, language and so on; let the central government stop granting loans carrying an 11 per cent interest rate to provinces, which have to pay back fivefold the small amounts which were lent to them.

The Liberals will contend they are doing what they do to help the province of Quebec! The best way to help the people of Quebec at this stage is to be honest for once in a hundred years, and give them back what is rightfully theirs and restore the rights of the provincial government so that it can carry out its responsibilities. In other words, let the thief out of the Quebec family home, and peace will return. The things we are asking for today are not new, Mr. Speaker. Others long before us have done so for the provinces to reduce their debt. Besides, we find that the first province which used direct taxation was British Columbia when they taxed individual income.

Later, the province of Quebec began to tax corporate income. I think the government was not interested then in direct taxation, because it produced almost nothing. They kept for themselves customs fees and other more profitable indirect levies. But as soon as the federal government realized that they could get large sums of money from direct taxation, they decided to get into this field, and for this they always took the opportunity of a war, since they had to find an excuse to invade this area of taxation.

The first time, it was during the war of 1914, when they took hold of a large part of direct taxation, and with the war of 1939, more precisely in 1942, the King administration hypocritically urged the provinces to relinquish all provincial direct taxation fields. The opportunity was excellent, too good to miss, and so Ottawa took over for five years.

Ever since 1867, the provinces keep claiming from the central government either the abandonment of joint programs or the recovery of their rights.

And we have handfuls of newspapers. For example, I have here a newspaper dated January 13, 1964 in which the hon. member Maurice Lamontagne is reported as saying:

Possible abandonment by Ottawa of joint programs.

And a Social Crediter he was not.

Then I quote from a newspaper of 1964:

Quebec plans to withdraw from 7 of the 49 joint programs.

And so it goes. From another Quebec newspaper of 1964, I quote:

Quebec must at any cost recover its fiscal rights.

At next week's federal-provincial conference, the Quebec government will reiterate its request for 100 per cent of the direct taxes collected by Ottawa in this province.

Mr. Speaker, those are the arguments we hear not only from Quebec but from the other provinces wishing to recover their rights. As you can see, all prime ministers, one after the other, pressed for those rights. Is it any wonder then that the new Quebec government does not trust this government any longer? First of all, we have to comply with joint agreements, and bring this government to its senses if we want Canada to survive. We are faced with the worst bureaucratic and financial dictatorship this country has ever known since Confederation. We have to restore democracy and ensure absolute self-reliance and respect for provincial jurisdictions, if we want Quebec to resume discussions with federal authorities.

As far as the Bank of Canada is concerned, the minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) surprised everyone of us today by saying he could not monetize the nation's credit because it would be inflationary. But, Mr. Speaker, can you imagine how surprised I was, since I have always thought inflation was due to too high a rate of interest. The cause of inflation is excessive bank interest and discount rates by the Bank of Canada.

And then, the minister tells us that: The Bank cannot make representations to . . .

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time alloted to him is over. He could pursue his speech with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier).

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): I thank you very much. I shall take only two or three minutes. I was saying that the Minister of Supply and Services told us that the Bank of Canada cannot make representations to the provinces because it does not want to interfere with their affairs. Here is a reasoning which again took several hon. members by surprise and we wonder why. If we maintain the same reasoning, why does the government of Canada not hold the same position as the Bank of Canada in the best interest of the provinces? In any case the minister's line of thought is simply ridiculous since the provinces are an integral part of the great Canadian economy and the Bank of Canada is precisely supposed to control the money supply in Canada.

Finally the minister tells us that the provinces must be satisfied because the federal government gives them one-fifth of the amounts received. I thought it was two-fifths but it is not; the minister has just told us—and I am pleased about it—that when the federal government receives $5 from the provinces, it gives them back $1. I expect the provinces will be happy to hear this and Quebecers will keep that in mind in the future.

To those who ask what proportion of federal taxes raised in the province of Quebec goes back to them, the minister himself has just given an answer: one-fifth of taxes raised goes back to the provinces. Don't you think that this government is being overpaid for the job? And the minister has the audacity to say that the provinces should be glad not to have the dirty job of collecting these taxes. Do you realise that the minister is convinced of doing a favour to the people of Quebec when he takes $5 from them and gives them $1 back? And then the federal government does not understand why the province of Quebec is claiming the right to raise its own taxes. No doubt that with people like the Minister of Supply and Services, Quebec has no chance to enter into negotiations.

Therefore, again before concluding I appeal to all hon. members who are still able to think with some logic in this House so that the provinces stop suffering from the disastrous performance of this centralizing government which has been ruling this country for too long.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie)—External Affairs—Garrison diversion—Proposed trust fund to pay for alterations—Alternate source of water for Portage la Prairie; the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert)—National Defence—Request that minister visit Edmonton to explain relocation of airborne regiment; the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger)—Indian Affairs—Possibility of return of money collected from natives through export tax.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO SOLVE PROBLEMS OF FEDERAL, PROVINCIAL AND MUNICIPAL DEBT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

That this House notes with distress the prodigious increase in the federal, provincial and municipal debt, which will result in the shattering of our country; and

That this House further regrets the fact that the government has failed to advance any new formula for the financing of the public sector to correct this situation, for instance, an amendment to the Bank of Canada Act allowing it to use the credit of the nation as currency in order to make long-term loans to the federal and provincial governments at an interest rate equivalent to administrative costs rather than the present six-month limit and to relieve the burden imposed on Canadians to repay up to five times the amount of the loans made to the various levels of government by banking institutions under the present system.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate since it provides one with an opportunity to place on the record some of the gross failures of this government in dealing with the economic concerns and realities of this country, and also to place on the record some of the gross inadequacies in its management of public funds. I think the hon. member who preceded me outlined the philosophy which governs this government. It is guided more by politics than by anything which would resemble sound business principles. Some of the things which have been going on in the province of Quebec in the government's quest to win a few by-elections is probably indicative of the fact that it would do anything for political partisan gain. In many respects this attributes in large part to the problem alluded to in this motion, namely, the abnormal increase in the size of the debt of all levels of government.

I must say at the outset that my first observation is that in terms of size and power, the federal government has to accept the major portion of the blame for the massive debt which has accumulated in this country. There can be no doubt about that. My friends the members of the Social Credit party have proposed a solution and a philosophy which they feel would work toward ameliorating and dealing with that particular problem. I am not going to comment too much on that particular aspect, but I want to talk about the accrual of this significant debt which costs Canadian taxpayers millions and millions of dollars to service year in and year out.

Last year Canada was the top borrower in the international marketplace; it borrowed $9.2 billion. In all, Canada absorbed about 16 per cent of the total funds borrowed on world capital markets. The next largest borrowing nation was Brazil, which borrowed $3.4 billion. The great majority of this increased borrowing abroad represents new issues by Canadian governments and their agencies. As the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) pointed out, the federal government, in effect, forces the provinces and corporations to enter the foreign market because it literally dries up any loose cash floating around in meeting its operating deficit.

We have to ask ourselves, what causes this need to borrow? Surely, it is not normal spending. Surely, if all governments had embarked upon normal spending practices we certainly would not have accumulated such a deficit. We, as Canadians, are among the highest taxed in the world, and yet our tax dollars are not enough. I suppose something could be said about the fact that Canadians are perhaps the most overgoverned people in the world. Because of that, governments have embarked upon poorly planned, extravagant and ineffective spending programs and money has been committed by governments without proper cost-benefit analyses and without having any idea as to the long-term implications with respect to cost or the efficacy of those particular programs.

In this country we have a growing penchant for direct government intervention. Every day we rely more and more upon the government to solve our problems, economic, social or otherwise, and in many respects this is a sad situation for Canadians because there is a tremendous amount of competence and expertise within the private sector and among individuals for dealing with day-to-day needs. For example, in the area of job creation much more could be done within the private sector, given the proper incentives and proper tax policies, to encourage productivity and employment; but this government seems consistently to embark upon direct job creation programs by government means.

We have a situation where industry is over-regulated. We spend money on silly things like metric conversion and televising the proceedings of the House. These are items at which we could take a second look and could cut back our total commitment to the expenditure of funds. In that connection I want to place on the record an article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen. It was written by a gentleman, Douglas Fullerton, who in the past has been notably sympathetic to the Liberal party. The article is entitled "Dear Pierre", and reads as follows:

> Most of your new or expanded programs were concocted by a group of your colleagues, the "liberal" or spending wing, perhaps more appropriately designated as the "drunken sailors". With your support, their schemes were powered through cabinet and caucus, despite the doubts of more cautious ministers and members.

He goes on to say:

> Of course, your open-handedness has not been all your fault—you have been egged on by some of the big-time spenders across the parliamentary floor, led by the NDP.

I think that, in a couple of short phrases, really summarizes the mentality of this administration. We do not see any end to this. For example, when we look at the new transportation act we find that here, again, we are going to see a tremendous shift in power to the hands of the Minister of Transport. This might be all right if there were any degree of stability on the government benches, but the game of musical chairs which is being played by the ministers and by the bureaucrats will create a great deal of uncertainty in the transportation field. If it is going to be operated by the whims of politicians and bureaucrats, I do not hold out a great deal of hope for providing good transportation service in this country, nor if there are going to be any more fiascos like the Pickering issue or the $46.5 million loss at Mirabel which we will have to pick up this year, nor if we are going to have the "user pay" concept as it applies for example in the case of the Calgary airport. These expensive concoctions will be billed to the users, namely, passengers on various airlines.

The government has not been a worthy partner in dealing with the problems of inflation and government spending. The problem we have is that when these programs are put into effect they generate bureaucracies. The bureaucracies become irreversible, they grow constantly, and new ways and new schemes for spending money are constantly being devised. As time goes by, in many cases the original purposes of these programs are totally forgotten. The money keeps pouring in. The tilt of our progressive system of taxation is such that the government always manages to pick up tax dollars as a result of increases in salaries and the progression of inflation. We all know how politically difficult it is to abandon programs. Information Canada and the CYC are just two recent examples. Programs are very difficult to withdraw, so I think it is imperative that this House be very reluctant to pass legislation at random and to develop programs readily on an ad hoc basis.

I think we should provide a more favourable climate for individuals in the private sector to deal with the day to day issues and problems thrust upon them throughout their lives. Governments are certainly needed, but they should not be the end-all in dealing with the problems we have to face.

It could be summed up in the words of the Auditor General in his last report to parliament—the kind of mentality there is within the bureaucracy—the mentality for creating a greater penetration by the government bureaucracy. At page 6 of the Conspectus the Auditor General said:

A senior official told me recently that, for many years, recognition and rewards have gone to those who devise ingenious new programs, rather than to those charged with the responsibility of restraining and controlling expenditures and ensuring that value is obtained for money spent.

What possible result could have occurred from such a practice other than the wild spending spree we have been on for the past ten years? That statement indicates to me that for public servants there are no rewards for efficiency or economy, but rather for empire building. We know also from the reports of the Auditor General that parliamentary control is being and has been circumvented in the never-ending squeeze for money. This has reached crisis level.

That brings me to the next statement of the Auditor General, who said:

I am deeply concerned that, on the evidence of the two-year examination carried out by the audit office, parliament and, indeed, the government, has lost or is close to losing effective control of the public purse.

This brings into focus parliament's inability to examine, to scrutinize, to challenge government spending in an effective way. I think that is the core of the problem. It is a damning indictment by a qualified man, backed by some 75 professional auditors across the country. The Auditor General pointed out that he chose his words very, very carefully when he made that statement. It is a very serious statement, and I think it is endorsed by R. S. Malone of the Globe and Mail who, on February 24, 1976, had this to say:

For ten years it has been abundantly clear where the government was taking our country. Our politicians during all these years, unfortunately, were more occupied in trying to buy popularity with over-spending—and manufacturing money to pay for it all . . .

In a ten year period, Ottawa increased its spending by 600 per cent. It could only be paid for with devalued dollars, or legal counterfeiting, and Ottawa has known this all the time.

In summary, that means we are simply financing today's luxuries against the labours of tomorrow.

For the past two or three months there has been a great deal of interest in Crown corporations and their management. These corporations are recipients of vast sums of public money. For example, a question placed on the order paper on October 20 by the hon. member for York-Simcoe shows that in terms of government of Canada advances, loans and investments in Crown corporations, the total is $21 billion. That is taxpayers' money. The problem with Crown corporations is insufficient accountability. In many cases there is essentially no accountability to parliament and the shareholders, that is, the people of Canada. On that subject the Auditor General has this to say:

[Mr. Mazankowski.]

In the majority of the Crown corporations, audited by the Auditor General, financial management and control is weak and ineffective. Moreover, co-ordination and guidance by central government agencies of financial management and control practices in these Crown corporations are virtually non-existent.

He went on to say that whatever mechanisms were in place were grossly inadequate. While this is a very, very serious statement, what causes one to chuckle is the fact that the government is unable to provide a committee of this House with a list of the Crown corporations. It sounds unbelievable, but it is true. In testimony before the Public Accounts Committee on February 10, 1977, at pages 14:10 and 14:11, Mr. D. L. Meyers of the Auditor General's office revealed that no one in the government had a list of all Crown corporations. The Auditor General's officer prepared one and found over 30 not listed and apparently not subject to the rules of financial management provided by the Financial Administration Act. That is incredible, yet we have a continuing proliferation of Crown corporations and appendages in this country.

An hon. Member: Are you surprised?

Mr. Mazankowski: No, I am not surprised, but I am shocked and angry. When we have witnessed the revelations regarding AECL and Polysar we can understand how such problems occur and why we do not even know how many Crown corporations we have. Surely we have to question the competence of the directors and management of Polysar and AECL. Surely the responsibilities charged to them have largely been ignored. Enormous payments have been made to unknown people. There has been circumvention of foreign laws, and the government has simply failed to act or has acquiesced.

It is clear that the government has used Crown corporations as a vehicle for government departments to evade and circumvent parliamentary control. They become nothing more than reward centres for the heelers and bagmen. They have become tantamount to the Senate.

I could go on, Mr. Speaker, but my time is running short. I will conclude by saying the government is now syphoning off 41 per cent or 42 per cent of the gross national product. The federal share has grown rapidly, while municipal governments have been squeezed by both senior levels of government. Federal spending rose by 14 per cent this year, and will rise by 11 per cent or 12 per cent next year. The year before that it was some 18 per cent. I do not find this consistent with the empty promise of keeping government's expenditure in line with the growth in gross national product. Talk of cutbacks and restraint is comical when we know that we will see three or four sets of supplementary estimates.

We must ask if there is a solution and if we will ever be able to deal with the issue referred to in this motion. It seems to me we have to consider seriously the growth, power and size of the bureaucracy. We have to address ourselves to this problem of mismanagement in Crown corporations in which is involved a large amount of taxpayers' dollars. We have to consider seriously a better vehicle for planning and evaluating our programs, and the impact of further centralization. Above all, we must ensure that parliamentary authority is restored.

To achieve some of these goals the first thing we must do is honour the recommendation of the Auditor General and appoint a Comptroller General. On this the Auditor General had the following to say:

. . . will lay the essential foundation of a soundly conceived program for restoring effective control over public funds and assets, and for ensuring probity, prudence and economy in their management.

Second, the increasing trend toward centralization of government must stop. Local governments can, if permitted breathing room, do an effective and efficient job of providing service to Canadians. In a country as vast and diverse as Canada, local governments can provide a much broader form of government service.

● (1740)

Third, and in conclusion, it is important for the government to consider seriously the establishment of an effective program review agency, an agency which would be responsible for the independent evaluation of all programs involving government spending. I suggest that such programs ought to be examined by an independent—I stress independent—source early in their lives, probably in the second year of operation. Established programs should be subject to ongoing evaluations as to efficacy and cost. I suggest thorough cost-benefit analyses should be performed, to ensure that the Canadian public is getting its money's worth for every dollar spent.

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, first, I should like to thank the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) for introducing the motion under consideration which is of the utmost importance when one considers Canada's financial situation at this time.

On many occasions, the Creditistes presented the same subject for discussion in the House because it is not only of vital importance to them but also to the economy in general, in particular when one considers the financial situation of various public agencies and I cannot mention many of them today because time is running out.

At the moment I have in mind the financial problems faced by some municipalities in my riding and in some neighbouring towns. Last week, in my riding the whole city council resigned because of a serious financial situation. The problem is now left with the provincial government. More than 46 per cent of this municipality's budget goes to pay the interest on the municipal debt.

More than 58 per cent of the budget of St. Hubert, a town near Montreal, goes to pay the interest on the public debt. I could carry on, Mr. Speaker and give you a list of nearly all the municipal governments in Quebec in a difficult financial position.

Before going any further, I would like to say a few words about the new Quebec government as it faces the municipal problem. One does not know yet the solution they will propose, but at least they said the day following the elections or a few days later that they would grant municipalities and towns discretionary subsidies. The government used to decide which towns were to receive a subsidy, which should not, thereby creating discrimination among various municipal governments which led to a situation where these last ten years, some municipal governments were in highly abnormal position compared to others. For instance municipalities with 15,000 people would receive $100,000 from the provincial government whereas others with 50,000 or 60,000 people did not receive anything due to the discretionary policy of the Liberal government in Quebec. Therefore, I am looking forward to see at the provincial and at the federal levels, taxation and monetary policies whereby municipal governments, towns and school boards would know where they are going and which sort of support they can count on for the next two, five or ten years. Under the present system, all the municipal governments in Quebec are completely in the dark which explains why many of our councillors are now hitting the roof in front of the financial situation which confronts them.

Mr. Speaker, the motion under consideration today proposes a monetary reform. We are asking the government to issue new funds through the Bank of Canada and to stop private interests and intermediaries, namely banking institutions from creating public funds.

[English]

Finance public enterprise with public funds (that is, with new money created by the government, through the Bank of Canada, and issued as interest-free loans for such projects); finance private enterprise with private funds (that is, with the savings of the people).

. . . we now have a dual-economy, consisting of both public enterprise, and . . . the two should be financed on different bases . . .

The government's incredibly stupid and utterly needless practice of borrowing Canadian money, at interest, means that the taxpayers are saddled with the burden of paying about $5 billion in interest, each year, for which they receive virtually nothing whatever in return. This payment of huge amounts of unearned interest, which represents no corresponding new production, is a major cause of the present inflation and is largely responsible for our excessive taxes.

The government's practice of financing public projects with private funds (that is, with money borrowed, at interest, from private moneylenders) is doubly inflationary. Not only does it cause an excessive increase in the amount of money in circulation but, at the same time, it also tends to very greatly decrease production. When the people are urged to buy interest-bearing government bonds, the government is saying to them, in effect: 'Why bother to invest your money in private productive enterprise? Lend it to us instead and we will guarantee you a high rate of interest on it, with no work and no risk whatever on your part. The real producers will be taxed to pay you this unearned interest.' How much longer shall the private moneylenders be allowed to thus sabotage our system of encouraging and rewarding initiative in private enterprise?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, billions of dollars are now being invested in the public sector. Those billions of dollars come from the savings of Canadians and are created with a stroke of a pen by the savings bonds of the federal, provincial and municipal governments as well as school boards. The billions of dollars invested in building roads, bridges, schools and hospitals are unproductive. The financing formula we advocate for the public sector will have the effect of releasing those billions of unproductive dollars so they may be invested in the private sector. We believe that profit is a legitimate goal and that savings invested in businesses are entitled to a return and would find there a terrific opportunity of serving the common good by helping the country progress.

The savings released from the public sector could be invested in residential construction which would provide an opportunity for profitable investments and serve highly social purposes. The savings diverted from the public to the private sector would also provide businesses with an abundant source of capital. Canadian businesses would less and less have to turn to foreign investors and foreign banks to sell bonds and shares to provide for their financing. This way, Canadians could finance the economic development of their own country.

Mr. Speaker, it is rather easy to understand that private profit-making businesses must pay interest—and that is normal. On the other hand, public businesses such as the federal and provincial governments, municipalities and school boards which are non profit-making organizations designed to provide the community with services should have to pay interest. That is why we in the Social Credit Party of Canada advocate an economy where public capital would be financed with public capital and private enterprise should be financed with private capital. The savers, those who convert their money, their savings in savings bonds could convert them in company shares that could be guaranteed by the government of Canada and the provinces to prevent private businesses from being faced with the problem of financing their businesses.

Mr. Speaker, I do not have enough time to quote all relevant figures, but those interests stand out as the cause of those huge umpayable debts and taxes stiffling all sectors of our economy. I do not intend to refer to the figures of economists quoted this afternoon by the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), some economists who are paid to advocate the present system. I would like to refer, Mr. Speaker, to the Reader's Digest of Januray, 1977 which also has economists and takes a more realistic view of things. I quote:

[English]

Quiz on Taxes and Government Spending Total taxes paid by the average Canadian family, including direct and indirect taxation imposed by all levels of government, increased by 85 per cent between 1969 and 1975 because government spending at all levels has soared.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, between 1969 and 1975 taxes increased by 85 per cent, more than 14 per cent a year; this means that in seven years taxes will have gone up 100 per cent in Canada.

[English]

Moreover, governments spend much more than they take from us in taxes.

[Translation]

The government is spending more money than it is getting through taxation.

[English]

In this way they have contributed to the inflation that depletes the value of every dollar we earn . . .

[Mr. Rondeau.]

The national debt—the amount Ottawa must borrow to make up what it has spent beyond income, is soaring past $25 billion.

[Translation]

I am still quoting from the Januray 1977 issue of the Reader's Digest:

[English]

In ten years, the budget has skyrocketed 350 per cent from $8.8 billion to a forecast $39 billion in this fiscal year (April 1, 1976 to March 31, 1977).

Total government spending per person was $2,900 in 1975. But the governments took in only $2,700 per person. Thus they have proceeded to spend an additional inflationary $200 on each of us! And government spending has increased over 100 per cent per person since 1970 . . .

The national debt of the federal government will be around $28 billion at the end of the fiscal year, the result of budget deficits in 20 out of the last 23 years.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I want to draw your attention to the fact that during the last 23 years we had 20 budget deficits yet neither the Progressive Conservatives nor the Liberals have changed their policy on this point for both have produced budget deficits.

[English]

All these answers are correct.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not see a quorum here, and I have not seen one for the last half hour.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I am not trying to delay the proceedings. The hon. member has brought to the attention of the Chair the lack of a quorum. It states here that I am asked to consult. I do not know whether it means to consult hon. members to see what they have to say on this. I think the proper thing to say would be to ask the Clerks for guidance on this. It states in the rules that the names of those present—

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, I would seek your guidance in dealing with the situation which apparently some members of the House have drawn to your attention. Your Honour referred to the rules. Would you be good enough to mention the rule to which you are referring? I might then be able to refer to that and make some comments with respect to it.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock.

[English]

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, I see the problem that Your Honour and all parties are having. I am therefore prepared to withdraw the point of order. However, when we return this evening all parties should at least have the courtesy to show some respect for the motion of the Social Credit party and be present to listen to the debate. I withdraw my point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I think the hon. member's point will be well taken. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock, I was reading from an article published in the Reader's Digest of January 1, 1977 dealing with Canada's financial situation and related to the motion moved today by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert). I was referring to paragraph 5 of this article.

[English]

The interest on the national debt, which was already $1.2 billion in 1967 will be around $4.6 billion at the end of this fiscal year, making it the third largest federal expenditure after health and welfare and economic development and support. Last year, the government guaranteed $15.5 billion in loans and advances to Crown corporations, of which about $7 billion went to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The government also guarantees loans made by charter banks to certain groups, including the wheat board, farmers, fishermen and students.

Federal spending has grown faster in the past ten years than the private economy which supports it. While GNP tripled, federal spending increased from $10 billion in 1967 to roughly $41 billion this fiscal year. Some $12.4 billion was spent on social welfare programs during the last fiscal year. Defence expenditures, however, amounted to only $2.6 billion while government outlays on activities associated with Canada's natural resources and primary industry amounted to $3.2 billion. Under the government's bilingualism program, expenditures reached $121 million.

From each dollar of national income, federal, provincial and municipal tax collectors take 42 cents of which 22 cents goes to Ottawa. Tax revenues have been rising consistently since the mid-1950's. If public spending continues on its present course it will not be long before the government takes more than 50 cents from each dollar in taxes.

Government at all levels employs 1.8 million people, teachers and armed forces included. That is one out of every five in the labour force. It is the largest employer in the country, spending over $10 billion on salaries and wages. Federal employees, excluding the armed forces, were paid about $5 billion in 1975, roughly triple the $1.7 billion they were earning in 1965. Between 1965 and 1975, the consumer price index rose 72 per cent. At that rate, a dollar saved today will be worth only six cents 50 years from now.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, this is a shocking figure considering that the increase in the cost of living in the last 10 years was 72 percent. Taking into account, as the Minister of Supply and services (Mr. Goyer) said this afternoon, the fact that our national product amounts to approximately $175 billion and then what the Reader's Digest has to say, it means that inflation apart, our $175 billion gross national product for 1976 will come up to about $55 billion in constant dollars of 1965.

● (2010)

It means that our national production in constant or current dollars has hardly increased during the last ten years. We could say that the national production amounts to about $175 billion, but if we consider the cost of living we can say that the production did not progress during the last decade. However, in 1867, when our Confederation came into being, the national debt in Canada was $93,046,051; in 1900, our debt reached $346 million and fifty years after Confederation, our debt hit $3 billion, totalling ten years later, in 1943, $9.228 billion; in 1955, it was at $17.952 million and in 1967, public expenses, of all government levels amounted to $21.8 million to rise up to $55 million in 1974, an average increase of 14 per cent a year; that constitutes 32.9 per cent of our gross national product in 1967 and 39.1 per cent in 1974.

Mr. Speaker, that tremendous increase certainly indicates the continuing trend of governments appropriating a larger part of economic profits in this country.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, hardly 100 years after Confederation, the federal debt in Canada had soared by almost 60,000 per cent. I recognize, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian population increased sixfold since Confederation, but over the same time the public debt went up by almost 600 fold. So every day Canadians have to shell out almost $10 million in taxes merely to pay interest on the national debt.

How many bridges, hospitals, public schools, utilities will not be built for Canadians because of that $10 million a day? Ten million a day to help investors getting richer while Canadian taxpayers are waiting for services which they are entitled to and for which they paid taxes. We all know, Mr. Speaker, that the governments which let the public debt spiral out of control are responsible for that shameful waste, that is $10 million a day spent public debt service. That money should be used to meet the needs of Canadians, not to enrich financiers.

Mr. Speaker, several years ago, more specifically in May 1934, before the Bank of Canada was established under Bill C-19, when the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce was discussing the possible establishment of such a bank, there was in the British Columbia legislature a Liberal member who was to become a member of this House in 1935, and later a senator. Referring back to pages 500 to 800 of that committee's proceedings, we find that the Liberal member's suggestions to the committee are still extremely significant and relevant in 1976-77. I am referring to the Hon. G. G. McGeer, a Vancouver lawyer, MLA for Vancouver Burrard, who appeared on May 1, 1934. I would like to quote him from page 503, since his evidence is quite relevant to the motion now before us:

Under our system, there is no reason why mercantile banks should not keep doing what they have been doing until now, that is serving private interests. But when it comes to allowing a private banker to lay his hands on public credit and manage it to his own benefit as a monopoly, it is time all public leaders got involved, because under the present system, we are leasing the nation's public credit to a group of financiers who manage it with two goals in mind, first to serve the monopoly's private interests, and then to maintain the consumers' purchasing power and support the taxpayers' ability to pay. But unfortunately the latter aim has been sorely neglected. So much so in fact that across the Dominion . . .

. . . that was during the depression . . .

. . . municipal, provincial and national bankruptcy is widespread, the social system is in complete chaos.

I could go on quoting page after page of this extremely interesting evidence. On page 54 of the book Let's Talk Money and Banking, Arthur I. Judge, editor of the Baltimore Canning Trade, said the following:

For over a century, the management of the monetary system has been entrusted to bankers and finance specialists, in blind faith and absolute confidence.

Necessity now forces us to do away with bankers' management, and let governments manage public funds and control and direct the monetary system.

By giving these privileges back to the government, democracy will take over from the oligarchic power that bankers now have on government and trade.

Thanks to these changes, the elected representatives of the people will become the masters of the "economic arteries" of the nation, and it will be possible to maintain a responsible government on democratic principles.

No one has the right to say that the establishment of such a democracy cannot and will not lead to progress and prosperity as long as governments are not given a chance as were bankers, to control the monetary system.

The government should now take power away from bankers or the mismanaging of public funds will destroy the government and bring the civilization that generated it to an end.

The right hon. Prime Minister said is this House that provincial governments had only to ask for financial reforms, but I must remind him that, on the 20th of March 1934, as can be read in the minutes, under the title Money, Credit and Unemployment, the British Columbia parliament adopted the following resolution:

Whereas the monetary value of the exchange of goods and services inside the Dominion of Canada has fallen from more than $46,000,000,000 in 1929 to less than $30,000,000,000 in 1933; and

Whereas this decline in domestic trade has been followed by a disastrous increase in unemployment in Canada;

Whereas, pursuant to the constitution, the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada has exclusive jurisdiction over the creation, issuance and circulation of purchasing power in the form of money and credit belonging to the people of this province—

It is therefore resolved that in the opinion of this Assembly, the state should set up a national banking system to distribute national, provincial and municipal credit to keep in circulation a sufficient amount of purchasing power in dollars and cents and that the national, provincial and municipal credit should be used to alleviate the present burden of taxation and unemployment as well as to help restore and maintain Canada's prosperity.

It is also resolved that this Assembly declare itself in favour of a determined plan . . .

And not decided upon blindly, in an ad hoc context, on a day-to-day basis . . .

. . . of effective co-operation between national, provincial, municipal authorities . . .

That is what we are asking for.

. . . and the proposed banking system, to use public credit, monetized in the form of purchasing power, to implement an important program of public works designed to help the country and provide an income to its people, and to use as well the public credit thus monetized for expenditures required for the good administration of this country, its provinces and municipalities, school boards as well as social services which are vital to maintain education, health, peace, satisfaction, and freedom of all citizens of Canada with a minimum of expenses to taxpayers.

Mr. Speaker, before the Bank of Canada Act was passed in 1935, G. G. McGeer, a Liberal member, had warned this House and said: "Let us not make the same mistake as ancient Rome which brought about its ruin by entrusting bankers and financiers with public credit, and let us not provoke at home the same disasters which happened in Rome by surrendering national revenues to the public sector and allowing the latter to make overly big profits in taxes levied in the wealth of other vicious systems."

Mr. Speaker, it means that when the government collects high taxes today, it is to pay back mainly interests on the public debt. As I am running out of time, Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer to what G. G. McGeer said in 1934, and it is still relevant in 1977 since at present we have entrusted private institutions, which are called banks, with the administration or control of our currency, our credit, which represents 94 per cent of the money supply in Canada.

The Creditistes want the banks to carry on their financial transactions but not to manufacture money. The Bank of Canada which was established in 1935 has only been a "cover-up" for the chartered banks which today operate within the Bank of Canada because the federal government does not discharge its responsibilities and does not manage the finances of the country on its own. The federal government by issuing federal bonds, gives the banks the power to monetize the credit of the nation to let the country in debt and to make us pay now 50¢ for each dollar that is paid in taxes to the government of Canada, for the repayment of the interest on our provincial, municipal, federal and school board debts.

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have this opportunity to discuss in the House today in the presence of all our colleagues, a subject as important as this, namely the Bank of Canada. We, French-Canadians have a reputation to speak often about culture and language but rather seldom on financial matters. And yet owing to some of our French-Canadians colleagues opposite, we have the opportunity to-day to consider an important subject and I am convinced that this congenial and friendly discussion will make our colleagues, the other members of the House of Commons, realize that we are all concerned about financial problems.

Above partisanship, Mr. Speaker, it remains however that the basic matters of concern in our modern society are financial matters and even though the concern we share is the same in principle it does not always meet in certain areas because we often deal with it in different ways. And from this confrontation of ideas and solutions we have a richer society. If I consider the preamble or what is in fact the substance of the motion of today I read the following and I quote:

This House notes with distress the prodigious increase in the federal, provincial and municipal debt, which will result in the shattering of our country . . .

However incredible as it may seem, I share most of the concern of my colleagues opposite. I can see that our citizens are concerned with an increase in the debt of governments rather than with individual solutions to solve these problems.

Mr. Speaker, I think I voice the concern of all my colleagues when I support government commitments at all levels, federal, provincial and municipal, in respect of the social duty we must perform towards all individuals, and particularly toward the underprivileged. But I am not the only one who finds that the first concern of those known as our leaders is not to assume their responsibilities but to pass them on to the government level, and no doubt I am not the only one who deplores that the self-styled leaders of society at every level have become afraid of responsibilities, those who believe that governments are there to meet every demand submitted to them.

That this House further regrets the fact that the government has failed to advance any new formula for financing the public sector to correct this situation . . .

Mr. Speaker, I think that the Canadian society has tremendous advantages that I do not intend to appraise or stress, but I find that even the present society experiences exceptional difficulties, because its members are inclined not to assume the responsibilities that are theirs. If governments at all levels are so excessively in debt, that comes from the weakness of governments because they say yes to all requests put before them. That is because of the poor sense of responsibility of our leaders at all levels who, with a view to getting their responsibilities off their hands, apply to governments as if they were wonder governments, able to give at any time, under any circumstances, a favourable answer to everyone asking for money.

Mr. Speaker, as a French-speaking Canadian, as a full member of this House, I am glad to be able to demonstrate tonight with my colleagues opposite that the problems our government is facing will be resolved under the condition that our colleagues opposite collaborate with us to find solutions. When I ask this to my colleagues opposite, I know that they are aware that our governments need some participation, some collaboration from every member without any party considerations, because what is important is not to win acceptance for one's own political idea, but first of all to win acceptance for this idea of one Canada of which the flag is a concrete example, the flag beside our distinguished Speaker who does his utmost to give to every member of this House the rights to which they are entitled.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that it is becoming important to realize that the problems we face are not unsolvable. Sometimes we tend to exaggerate situations and it is sometimes normal, in all fields, in order to give a faithful image of a situation, to caricature it.

An hon. Member: That's the same as the Creditistes?

Mr. Marceau: No, it is not the same! What I mean is that in our society, there is a tendency to picture problems as though they were tragic. I suggest it is a better way to explain, and above all to say things. Mr. Speaker, tonight I am particularly happy to take part in this debate, not in the hope of bringing revolutionary solutions, original solutions that will solve all our problems, but I feel that what inspires all those who bring their contribution to this debate, their first concern, is to help Canadians, and particularly those who are least privileged.

We, who are here, cannot say we are underprivileged. I think we all enjoy a fairly high standard of living, that we all enjoy socio-economic advantages that are admittedly above average. But I do think it is our concern, our duty, our responsibility to help those who are less fortunate. And when I hear my colleagues across the way express their concern by suggesting solutions that may not be new, but have some value, in an effort to solve the problems, I feel that we cannot shrug off people who, like us, are trying to find solutions.

This evening, as I read the motion before the House, I see it is expressed in extremely restrained terms. When, for instance, one reads this, and I quote:

I am almost willing to conclude that the warning sounded by our colleagues is of value because, considering the problems facing us, we have to conclude that we have failed to find a real solution. Let us be honest about the situation. We should not dismiss any solution offering some possibility of helping those who are less well-off than we are. To my mind, the debate until now has maintained a desirable level, which allows us to conclude that we are not here to try to destroy by the use of words that exceed our thoughts, words that win acceptance for political ideas or that pave the way for an eventual election.

We are given here the opportunity to note together, in a fraternal and friendly atmosphere, that Canada, an extremely rich country is nevertheless beset with problems which we have not been able to solve. I think that this debate will have fulfilled its objective if it brings home the realization that we will have to work together if we want to help those who are less fortunate than ourselves.

Mr. Speaker, those who know me are aware of the fact that I am not the most knowledgeable person in financial or monetary matters but then it is impossible to be knowledgeable in everything in life. I do not think that all hon. members in the House who speak on behalf of the Canadian people can claim to be in a position to find solutions to each problem and to be well informed in every field. There is, however, one fact which seems to me to be most essential and most important. Members from all provinces, except one where we are not represented—and it is unfortunate since every province should be—should come together and realize that we are all Canadians sharing a common goal and prepared to work and accept solutions whether they come from the opposite side or this side, which could help the underprivileged.

Mr. Speaker, I think that the motion we have to debate tonight, on this opposition day, provides an opportunity for those who want to go beyond the boundaries of political parties, and work for Canadians, to do so provided that they set aside their partiality and radicalism and tonight, I am prepared in a spirit of friendship and fraternity, to accept my friends on the opposite side who endeavoured to present a resolution and had the courage to state their points of view before the House.

I think the time has come for us Canadians of French expression to bring our other colleagues to the realization that not only do we have the right to express our own views but also the opportunity to form with them a united front against problems and henceforth, I am offering my cooperation to my colleagues on the opposite side. I assure them that I have listened carefully to their remarks and hope that we will be able to work together and, above all help people who expect to get from us the assistance to which they are entitled and that they won't be disappointed in the future.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of interest that I take part in this debate today. I think it is most timely that this motion has been brought forward by our hon. friends in the Social Credit party.

I would like to read the first part of the motion which is as follows:

That this House notes with distress the prodigious increase in the federal, provincial and municipal debt, which will result in the shattering of our country . . .

There are a great many respected people who are seriously considering our economic position with regard to debt. Perhaps there have been times when the economic well-being of Canadians has been more endangered—for example, in the great depression of the thirties—but that was a long time ago, and we apply different standards now.

It can be said that people's expectations are the result of the economic times in which they live. At one time the economy was much more rural than our present economy, and people could almost have lived, albeit poorly, in a cashless society. To a considerable degree they found the basic necessities of food, shelter and clothing within the rural framework. However, more people now live in cities, and generations of them have no understanding of how food is grown. All they know is that it is found on grocery shelves. Some think that milk comes from factories and that housing is automatically provided by the state.

During the past 25 years—at least up until 1974—the western world had one of its most productive and tranquil periods. I read in a newspaper article some time ago that the first quarter of this century was, by and large, a reasonably good one; the second quarter was awful with depressions and wars; and the third a most tranquil and prosperous period. However, it looks as if the last quarter of this century will be more unpredictable and much more stormy.

Canada is fortunate because it has a large amount of natural resources. It is particularly fortunate to have a national oil policy. When the price of Arab oil quadrupled in 1973—and oil is very important to our economy—we were not dealt the knockout blow which the economies of western Europe and the developing countries suffered.

When one surveys the financial situation of this country and of its neighbours around it, it is cause for a great deal of serious thinking. Canada, being one of the most endowed nations of the world, is really turning up in much the same way as many of the Third World countries are in handling its business and handling its household affairs. I think it cannot be said better than in the December 17, 1976, issue of the Montreal Gazette, in which a columnist likened Canada to the improvident character, Mr. Micawber in a Charles Dickens story, who was always up to his ears in debt, always pursued by bailiffs, always hoping that something would turn up. Mr. Micawber was able to define his situation in precise terms: "Annual income twenty pounds, annual expenditure twenty pounds ought and six; result, misery." However, for Canada, he would have said: "Annual income $46 billion, annual expenditure $51 billion; result, misery." And if we do not feel the misery yet, it is because Canada is still able to borrow the $5 billion to make up the difference and, of course, we have the fact that this nation has the Quebec situation with which to deal.

The government has been paralyzed since November 15 and really does not know where it is going, because of the awesome political fact that there is in Quebec a prime minister dedicated to taking that province out of Confederation. But, to get back to our balance of payments in the foreign sphere, unless these improve we will have to take a sharp drop in our living standards to find the funds to pay the principal and interest on the money being borrowed abroad. And all of us in this House watched with a great deal of interest when Mr. Levesque was speaking to the bankers in New York where he was definitely making a pitch for continued financial support. The general comment was, "He will get his money but it will cost him two or three extra points."

The foreign debt owed by Canadians is a matter of great concern. For 1976 the Canadian merchandise trade showed a surplus of $620 million, which is considerably better than we have been able to do at any time in the past two and a half years. I believe, in fact, that it was something more than this as the figures were reported by Statistics Canada. But in Canada in the third quarter of last year, which was our best quarter for the year, we were still $700 million short for that three months. In other words, we still had to borrow to pay our way. And it does not do any good to remember that for all those people who take the sun in the far south, it is indicated that our balance in tourist trade this year will be nearly a billion dollars in the red. That is something for those who think about their suntans.

An analysis of the situation made by the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce indicates that Canada will have a surplus of about $1.2 billion on merchandise trade this year, but a deficit of about $5.8 billion on non-merchandise transactions. Mostly the money we must pay is principal, interest and dividends on capital previously imported, so we will end up having to borrow more than $4 billion just to balance our accounts with other countries. For 1977 the bank forecasts that things would be even worse. One of the ominous aspects of our Micawber style of handling international deficits is the way that our non-merchandise deficit is growing. Here is the picture: 1973, $3 billion; 1974, $3.8 billion; 1975, $4.7 billion; 1976, $5.8 billion, and for 1977 a forecast of $6.6 billion. Even if our balance on the merchandise side improves, we are still far behind. The deficit has more than doubled in the past four years and is still rising fast.

I mentioned previously about the deficit incurred by Canadians travelling abroad, but in fact we are borrowing heavily just to meet our current bills, and every jump in the amount we owe outside the country means a jump in the amount we must pay in interest the next year. One effect of this borrowing and accumulating of debt abroad is to be found in the decision of the government to impose quotas on textiles. The necessity to impose quotas is the direct result of borrowing abroad, keeping the Canadian dollar at an over inflated level and hence facilitating the entrance into this country of textiles, laying off our own workers in an industry that is vulnerable. Quotas seem like an easy and logical solution, but import restrictions tend to force up consumer prices and these prices are passed off as a benefit to the textile workers, paid for by consumers.

In the long run the textile workers suffer too because the Canadian's general cost of living is his cost of living too. And protection hurts the workers because it hurts customers not only in terms of price but in terms of jobs. Trade barriers are conceived as an attempt to exploit unemployment, that is, if somebody has to be out of work let it be a textile worker in Hong Kong or the United States, but not in Canada. But in a country as dependent on international trade as Canada it is self-defeating, so that the unemployed worker in the foreign country is not now able to buy Canadian production. Production really strengthens the beggar-my-neighbour forces in every country. It persuades others to try this game of increasing exports while shutting out imports. That is what happened in the great depression of the thirties, to a large extent.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is in our relations with the Third World that we have followed them in many instances. After the election of 1972 the government, to regain its popularity, decided that the money supply should be stimulated along with a vast new array of programs. Government spending at all levels grew at the rate of 16 per cent to 20 per cent, in spite of the fact that the so-called tax reform bill gave the government coffers a huge tax increase. Canada had developed unprecedented public sector deficits for 1974-75, while the money supply grew by 120 per cent over the five years ending in 1975. It is no wonder that a phenomenal wage inflation developed. Tremendous programs were created by grandiose and extravagant public works schemes somewhat like the Kubitschek of Brazil in the 1950's.

In fact the competitive position of Canadian corporations decreased as interest rates rose. Borrowing abroad occurred at a rate of $5 billion to $6 billion a year, which was to cover the balance of payments deficit. The government moved with its controls, but this fact only covers the basic weaknesses in our financial situation, so we have in Canada the basic ingredients of a severe financial disaster—an over-valued currency sustained by continuous recourse on a vast scale to foreign credit.

I think it is significant that three or four years ago the United States was considered to be in trouble when it had a foreign trade deficit of something like $2 billion or $3 billion. We have huge budget deficits and balance of payment deficits, a largely uncontrollable public sector, a sharply declining competitive position in manufacturing, and a persistent shift of employment to unproductive and under-productive areas away from the producing areas.

And then there was the Quebec election of November 15—the election of a very able prime minister of Quebec. We all know what his aims are. We all like to believe that the election of the Parti Quebecois was due to people turning against an inefficient government. Mr. Bourassa himself, writing in Le Monde, has said that he regarded the province of Quebec as part of the Canadian common market. Deep-seated structural and political strains are showing in Canada.

Canada is obviously not the only country in trouble. Britain, Italy and Mexico are also in a position worse than in Canada. But they have not nearly the capabilities of production in their economies that Canada has. Canada's foreign debt is about $28 billion; the United Kingdom and Italy's debts are $25 billion and $22 billion. Then there are the non-oil producing poor countries at $170 billion, with some already in default and many more that have been quietly rescheduling their debts. The Communist bloc is rumoured to be in debt to the west for $40 billion, with North Korea reporting a default of $2.1 billion. The president of North Korea has indicated that he sees no reason why this money should be paid. This year there might not be enough money left in the international economy to finance all these debts, since the International Monetary Fund will be cleaned out to take care of the United Kingdom and Mexican loans.

The world economy, Mr. Speaker, seems to be in the terminal phase of a supercycle; and, just as a person or firm, on becoming overly-burdened with debt and reaching an excessively illiquid position finds it difficult to function, so does an economy in similar circumstances find it difficult to function. These supercycles to which I referred seem very likely to create severe disruptions in the world. There could be widespread rejection of debt payments, and economic troubles, inflationary as well as deflationary, could well come to the fore.

The government could do several things. For example, it could end controls. Even the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) has talked about the flight from investment in the Canadian economy. Our corporations are uncertain about the investment decisions they should take. The Foreign Investment Review Board, while perhaps not a toothless tiger, has certainly given the impression abroad that Canada does not want foreign investment. This gives economic nationalists, who preach that we should borrow and not invite foreign investment, something to think about. Obviously interest on borrowed money must be paid, no matter what the level of the economy may be, whereas foreign money coming in as equity money must take its lumps. Obviously dividends paid to those outside the country will be reduced if a corporation is not making money.

Although our economic position is serious, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the people of Canada must address themselves to the question of national unity. The Prime Minister will have his chance to do so when he addresses the Congress of the United States in one week. He has said that he does not plan in his address to reply to Mr. Levesque's speech made to the Economic Club of New York a few weeks ago. The prospect of talking about the many issues affecting our two nations may be a most appealing one for the Prime Minister. Subjects which could be raised include the effect of oil and gas sales, the proposed pipeline, the new American tax on conventions held in Canada, and the CRTCs bickering as to whether we should delete certain U.S. programs from Canadian television. However, the U.S. Congress is made up of people from all walks of life, just as this House is. They will want to know about those things which worry them, those things about which their constituents at home are worried. No doubt they are wondering what is to happen to Canada politically.

Since November 15 the government has shown no indication that it knows where it is going. It has initiated no new stances for dealing with the problems of Quebec. The Prime Minister said that he was willing to live with an 1867 constitution, but would change it if the provinces want more flexibility. He did not spell out what he means by "flexibility." As a result, we are left in the dark. Probably the Prime Minister himself did not know. Nevertheless, when the Prime Minister addresses the Congress of the United States he will have to answer Mr. Levesque and announce his plans for keeping this country together. Will he give Congress the details of what he has in mind, or will he merely leave the impression that Quebec independence may be inevitable?

[Translation]

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to participate in the debate on this motion. After examining its contents, I realize that this is an appropriate time to discuss certain matters. With this country, the provinces and the municipalities going deeper into debt without much chance of coming out of it under our present system, I believe it is worthwhile at some point for the representatives of the Canadian people to try and find a solution to that problem.

I was listening earlier to the previous speakers and I was pleased to note that those I heard seem to be much more open than in the past to new ideas, suggestions, more willing to consider suggestions on an eventual monetary reform.

It is obvious that we cannot think of keeping on running things under a system based on increasing indebtedness. Indeed, none of us Canadians manage our business, our budgets, as the government does. There are laws, regulations which compel a person going into debt to pay his debts at a certain point—and that is normal—that is our way of doing things. I find that normal. You must try not to go deeper into debt than you can afford. The government, that should be showing the way through its example to the people of this country, is running into debt in a disorderly fashion. They are forced to admit that they are no longer even thinking about paying back our national debt. All they can do is to try and find the means to pay the interest on the debt. But that is nonsense. If any individual in Canada could not manage after a while to pay the interest on his debts, what would happen to him? That is what this country is doing.

As representatives elected to the Canadian House of Commons, we are not seriously considering a way out. My hon. colleague, earlier, acknowledged what I have heard hundreds of times, that we are privileged to be living in a rich country. The more learned would add: Immensely rich! How is it that there are so many thousands of Canadians who are poor? That is sheer nonsense. Members of this House are sometimes surprised, or pretend to be, that the Creditistes should so often talk about money, about monetary reform but that is the source of our concern. Ask anyone, at about any time, whether during the day he does not think more often about money than about God, his Creator! Ask him that question and see how he does answer. In fact, you do not even have to ask anyone that question, address it to yourself and you will see that in the course of a day, you think more often about money than about your Creator.

And unfortunately, when the time comes to bring in the reform in this field, the representatives elected by the people to give Canada a sound administration seem to be looking for an army of economists. Governments have officials called jugglers, who are well paid to juggle with figures and to try and find a way out of the present system. They fail to come up with anything. Why? Because, as we see it and as we suggest, they are not looking in the right places. It is common knowledge that all that is decided and controlled—you will all agree—many great social reforms, many fine programs to improve the general conditions of our Canadian society, are not carried out for lack of money.

There was the Local Initiative Program. Today, we have the Canada Works and the Young Canada Works programs. Government employees have laboured at finding these formulas which should help fight unemployment. But again, the minister, probably with the best of intent, tells us that these grants will be given out by constituency and we know from the start that the sums allowed to each constituency will not be high enough to carry out many of the projects already planned because of an early publicity. Surely, the government has encouraged people to prepare projects. Well, they have prepared them and we will once more be dealing with these new programs, with a host of fine and practical projects, which are feasible because we have the manpower and the materials required but which will not be accepted because they will run out of funds.

There is the problem again. That is why I was glad tonight to hear hon. members say how good it is for this House to take time to study the proposals made either by Creditistes or by members of other parties, provided they are made in all sincerity—and I do not think that members of the opposition have any doubt about it—for the purpose of bringing about better conditions in Canada. And then, that was the main purpose of the motion; we referred to public and private capital, to the debt incurred because interest rates have increased fourfold, and this is altogether too notorious, since everyone knows that when a municipality has to borrow in order to build a mile of sidewalks, why should this municipality be required to pay the costs for three or three and a half miles?

If we were certain that under that system, we would pay for one mile of sidewalk, we would use it and the money would be repaid. But to get a single mile of sidewalk, we have to pay for three and a half miles; two and a half miles for the financing costs and one mile for the municipality. This makes no sense and this is why we try to make suggestions.

I have also prepared something that I would like to note in passing. In our modern world, we all realize the difference between private and public capital. It is important for people to try to understand that. It is easy to understand that money which belongs to someone is private capital. Income from work, from the operation of a business or from some type of commercial activity is private capital.

When this capital is put into a bank and lent to someone else, it is supposed to bear a reasonable interest, just like a worker is entitled to reasonable wages. Public capital is not at all the same thing. Money used for building roads, bridges, water systems, schools or sidewalks, in other words everything that is meant for the general public and which does not make some profit for someone in particular, that is most federal, provincial, municipal and school taxes, comes into this category since this makes up a large part of public capital. In a sensible system, we would not use private capital to invest in public works any more than we would use public capital to invest in private enterprise. In a well-balanced economy, private capital would be invested in private enterprise and public bodies would use the public capital required for various public developments.

Therefore, why must governments borrow money and pay interest on capital used for public purposes and which do not bring any profit to anyone? How can a public agency pay interest if it does not make any profit? To be able to pay interest, it is necessary to make a profit because if we do not make a profit and we have to pay interest, our debts will automatically accumulate.

Under the present system, governments borrow money and pay high interests to build schools, roads, bridges or sidewalks. This is ridiculous and stupid. Many people who do not understand the present monetary system but who keep saying that Social Credit is too complicated, will wonder: What is there to do? How can those pyramids of unpaid and unpayable debts be checked under the present system? Creditistes have been saying it for over 30 years, and all those who removed the red, blue or any other color, bandages they had over their eyes understand that the federal government through the Bank of Canada, should make an appropriate credit device available to provincial governments, municipal administrations, and school boards, that would enable them to obtain the required capital at administrative costs, namely at about 1 or one and one-quarter per cent, which they could use to develop public services.

If the supporters of the present system cannot prove that the sum of $100,000 borrowed and invested to build a school, a bridge or a road in 1976 or 1977, will yield the value of two schools, two bridges or two roads in 20 years, we are twice right in our contention that the system is upside down, since the interests we pay amount to two and sometimes three times the value of such schools, bridges and roads or any other public works.

Then, as I said, if you cannot prove that the yield will be equal to the value of two or three schools within three years, then time has definitely come for you to open your minds and wonder if a solution could not be found. We did find one, and are suggesting it to you. You do not have to accept it, but if you do not and if we continue to live by this crazy system, we will say: for Pete's sake, try and find something, if you will not accept our suggestions.

We are paying for two or three schools, for two or three bridges, for two or three highways, but all we own is one school, one bridge and one highway; one school, one bridge and one highway belong to us while two schools, two bridges and two highways belong to the finance companies. That makes it unreal.

Those who defend the system blandly admit that since they will not follow the philosophy of the Social Credit party, they have to go through the channels of the financial system whose "big shots" resort to boisterous publicity in order not to see the light of common sense.

An hon. Member: A lamp without oil.

Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska): The kind of banking operations that have been going on for too long remind us of this patient who, when being asked what kind of operation he preferred, first class or second class, and enquiring about the difference between the two was told that, in first class operations new instruments were used with old assistants in attendance, whereas, in second class operations new assistants were in attendance and old instruments were used. Needless to say a patient cannot easily make up his mind in such a situation.

In the banking legislation field, there are novices who seem to be reasonably well disposed, but even in this age of electronics and automation, they go on using instruments with stripped gears. This is why the financial machine is squeaking. Those responsible for its operation seem to forget putting oil in the proper places to prevent the kind of bankruptcy which is to come sooner or later according to all the impartial observers.

There is concern about the possibility of fraudulent bankruptcies. But the people responsible lack the courage needed to take the necessary steps to help change the situation, for fear of hindering some "big shots" that go on getting fatter on the system. In normal times, products are always available, at least the essential ones, when one can afford them.

Let us consider housing. Various organizations are now dealing with that problem and what are the results? They are asking the government for labour credit, that is loans to families looking for accommodation. What does that mean? There is no shortage of space, lumber, stone, workers, technicians to build, but there is a shortage of money. You only have to lend the money and houses will be built. It is the same in other areas. Give money to the head of a family and you will see if he can find something else besides rags or used clothes for his children.

Surely, it is out of the question that money would be provided for non-existent commodities, but only enough money to purchase available goods necessary to meet the needs. We often hear nowadays financiers and politicians who maintain that there is too much money around. Well yes, some people say so at times. However, when visiting people, there are few who will admit that they have more money than they need.

Such facts are acknowledged everywhere. So it is hard to understand why the governments keep a portion of every worker's pay. Income tax has been debated at length lately. The government is facing a shortage of money, and they suck it right out of the worker's pay cheque and then . . .

An hon. Member: Out of the pensioner's cheque!

Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska): . . . everywhere, everywhere it can take a bite.

And yet the working families so badly need all their income to meet their very normal requirements. How can there be too much money around?

Oh yes, we sometimes hear some members make fine speeches on the monetary reform, who make comparisons between the money supply and the excess money in circulation. If there really is too much money in circulation, it is where there is too much of it that the government should go and get it, not where there is not enough. Is that clear enough? There is a shortage of money, but money is a human institution. As soon as the problem boils down to a question of money, people become frozen, helpless, as though overcome by the weather.

Of course, what can you do against the weather, but money is something else, it is possible to get some if you want to. But no, we remain idle, we do nothing when faced with an unbearable situation. What are we waiting for? A revolution, strikes everywhere, rampant disorder? I do not know what we are waiting for, but I am afraid we might be waiting too long. We have no power over the sun or the rain, and many who consider themselves as educated take . . .

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to have to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. The hon. member may go on with his speech only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to complete his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska): I thank my colleagues for giving me a few extra minutes to complete my remarks.

I was saying that we have no power over the rain and many who consider themselves as educated take for granted that one has no control over money, over the lack of money, over the lack of means of payment. Well, there are people who have come to think thus. Yet, money is not God's but man's creation. It is very important that people try to understand that. Where does money come from? How is it that it disrupts all economic activity at a given time? It is controlled by men, so why not take a look, a real hard look in that direction? We could certainly find out something there. There was no money on earth at the beginning of the world. Can somebody say anything to the contrary? In definite and fixed quantities, by a decree of God or by the forces of nature? Nothing of the sort. Whether it be metal, paper, or a mere credit transfer in bank books, all this money only exists because it was made and put into circulation somewhere by an act of man. And when the money supply increases or decreases in a country, it is because some people, men or groups of men, make more money or withdraw some from circulation. That is why it increases, decreases or becomes scarce at a given time.

Now, let us try to find out who those men are, let us try to understand and to see if there is some way of controlling the power of those men. All this is pure nonsense. Money comes from people who have the power to make it. This is the first thing we must understand. People should first become convinced of that. After that, if we want to remove the financial barriers between the goods and the needs of the people, we have to find out who controls the means, we have to find the money. That is what has to be considered.

The second thing that must be learned is that money is the easiest thing in the world to produce in the required quantities. That is what is surprising. I am always astonished to see that people do not try to understand why. It is much more difficult to grow a sack of potatoes than to make $5! Come on! To produce a sack of potatoes one has to think about it 12 months ahead of time. One needs a good crop, that has to be kept in the cellar if it is to sprout.

It has to be planted in the right place, cultivated, cared for, sprayed to avoid the potato beetle, and it takes all this work to produce a bag of potatoes. Nobody is afraid of running short of potatoes but everybody is afraid of running short of money; it is the easiest thing to do. Really, I am happy tonight to find that some feel that the time has come to try and find out what is wrong in the monetary field.

An hon. Member: The world is sick!

Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska): Unfortunately, there are too many doctors around the patient. It must be kept in mind that when Canada declared war in September 1939, nobody had had any money in this country in the last ten years, from the government to individuals. The crisis was due to a shortage of money. There were some good executives at that time. At least, many people believed they were good. There were no Canada works program nor LIP program, but various solutions were tried out with the funds available. The answer given was: There is no money.

All of a sudden, money became plentiful overnight. No money shortage throughout the war. Did we see those striking examples? Money came by millions, even by billions, as much as it was needed, and this in every country at war. Where did that money come from? Surely not by opening gold mines, because workers were not directed towards gold mines, but towards armies and ammunition plants. Money came by a stroke of the pen, by the simple decision to make it come. Those are the people you ought to try to find, my friends! With that, if all together we manage to find those who decide when the money should come and make them take out their pen, and if we draft legislation to make them act at the right time, we shall see that with Local Initiative Programs and Canada Works and Youth Canada Works programs, we will be able to resolve all those problems, and the number of unemployed will decrease.

This will wrong nobody, have no fear about it. This is not dangerous for inflation. Inflation we have, and those people control their pens and nobody seems willing to control them. Inflation we have, and inflation we fight against. When we try to jugulate—that again is another word which has become very in lately—inflation, unemployment appears and then we are dealing with two evil-minded twins. We cannot find any solution.

I most sincerely think it is about time to find a solution. I suggest ours. As soon as we understand it, we can no longer say we are short of money when money alone will move goods from shelves into households. Lack of money then is a criminal liability fraught with consequences. If we only thought about all the misery there is here in Canada! Fairly respectable people looked into the problem of poverty for months and they concluded that there were thousands of poor in Canada.

Poor people suffer miseries and privations. We are responsible. Then how come we who earn good salaries have ideal working conditions? I know what it is to chop pulpwood for 50 cents a cord. I know what it is to work for 50 cents a day. Today I am very happy with my living conditions but all those who enjoy the better things in life should never forget that some people live in misery because of the hardships we cause them by not considering the situation as it is. No government in wartime—I challenge anyone to deny this—would have agreed to lay off its soldiers or close its ammunition plants because of a lack of money. How could those same governments let individuals and families, by the hundreds,—that is going on even now—suffer from hunger and sickness, lose their homes and farms merely for lack of money? Not so long ago, a citizen of my area put this question to me which I find brilliant. He was speaking to me about the Anti-Inflation Act. He said: I am watching the implementation of that famous act to some extent, though I have not read it and I would like you to try and find out whether the board and its many civil servants has at some time put a break on the increase in taxes, municipal, school or other; so try to find out about that. That would be important because when taxes go up here, naturally it costs us more to keep up the house, to send our children to school. So the Anti-Inflation Board should also control tax increases.

In closing, I thank the Chair for having extended my time. To my mind, the country must not buy money. That fact must be recognized. It must create it itself. It may be a bit more difficult, but you'll see how easy it is. It is the sovereign right of the state. It belongs to us. It is a matter of using it instead of allowing ourselves to be controlled by a small team of bankers who decide whether people will eat three or four times a day. It is easy to see that does not make sense. A country cannot be managed if it does not use its sovereign right. The economy is distorted, turned upside down, damaged and that is what we have today.

I trust some of my suggestions will be followed, and that studies will be encouraged in that sense, that an attempt will be made to understand what ails that infamous monetary system, why we are controlled by a group of people who deprive everyone; even though Canada is rich, as I said at the beginning, tremendously rich, it is inhabited by people a high percentage of whom are poor in the midst of that wealth.

Mr. Claude Tessier (Compton): Mr. Speaker, first, let me tell you how pleased I am to take part in this debate because as concerns the indebtedness of governments, public bodies and municipalities, I share the same concern as my colleagues of the Social Credit party, although I would not propose the same solutions which I find simplistic. I may perhaps echo an old story that we have been hearing back home for 12 years and that I am still hearing in the House after more than two years.

I wish to point out the difference between an opposition member who can always ask for more regardless of cost and a government member who must decide on priorities and appropriate and redistribute public funds. I blame my Creditistes colleagues for exploiting the people's credibility by harping on the same string, but to be more positive, I would rather urge them to go deeper in search of solutions. I feel that for my colleagues opposite, it is a marketing problem, and they should understand that the House of Commons is the place where it is most difficult to understand, first because most people do not buy anything for want of money and second because those who would normally buy have quite different demands, as their mandate is quite different. However, I agree that we stop to think and try to find means to rectify a situation which could become catastrophic when I consider that the federal government had a deficit of some $4 billion last year, that the province of Quebec alone had a deficit of more than $1 billion and that my own little town with a population of 7,000 and with a budget of $1.7 billion might have an annual deficit of nearly $100,000 as things are. But if this discussion is just an oral dispute, there will be two causes for the catastrophe instead of one. I think we can come back to the proposal of our colleague, the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne), who told us we should look at our own budgets; there is certainly a way to face debts very efficiently, namely by deciding not to run into debt. This gives us the advantage of not having to pay interests which we find extravagant.

Therefore we should make sure that our constituents are committed to such a philosophy because there lies the only possible solution. Everything depends on the ability to pay of the Canadian taxpayers and on their free choice, insofar as they can make a choice. Therefore, it becomes a matter of conscience and knowledge, a matter of priority and personal choice. Thus what we must protect is the ability of the citizen to make a choice through adequate information, a participatory system and, finally, through real participation to the decision making process. The government should respect his mandate and, the opposition should perhaps see to it that the government is doing so, instead of putting words in other people's mouth to please a few.

I should like to say, however, that the matter raised by the Social Credit has merit and that together we should try to find possible solution. Indeed, it is useful and even absolutely necessary that thogether we should consider the financial position of our country; I would even go as far as to that what the opposition did today might be useful, provided that the proposed solution is understandable and intelligent, and the motion, in its present form, puzzles me. One thing is sure the phenomenal increase of the debt—be it federal, provincial, municipal, of the school boards and even of many taxpayers—must stop because the day of reckoning will come soon and the money will have to be available.

I think that, even in the most honorable and generous schemes, it is a problem which has to be solved right from the start and the government should see to it that these restrictions and reasonable request are accepted by the great majority of the people.

There is no magic formula. If goods and services are purchased, they will have to be paid. And if our liberalism can be faulted, it is for going too far, for getting people into the habit of requesting and receiving ever more. As a rule, they were always asking for more and good governments were those which were giving more. At present, a good government is the most reasonable, the one which will make people think. Why? Because otherwise they will all become slaves to their wishes, because our resources will exceed our ability to pay. And this is how rich people grow ever richer, and the poor who do not know how to ask but are only able to wait are becoming poorer in comparison with the rich.

I believe all Canadians can make that effort to think and understand because to protect oneself is also to protect others. Mr. Speaker, I wish to deal for a few moments with taxation at the municipal level. Surely we all agree that this is a real disaster, but I want to point out that the debt at the municipal level is neither a prerogative nor an initiative of the federal government. The fact is, however, that the taxation problem at the municipal level is such that we must absolutely find a solution and I think this initiative should come first from the provincial jurisdiction, and this is more than just devising a balanced budget formula.

The basic problem at the municipal level, and I speak from experience as a mayor, is that municipal governments are too dependant upon funds on which they have no control. I will quote as an example my own municipal budget which I had to administer and which amounts to some $1,700,000. In this budget, taxes amount to $726,000, compensation accounts for more than $56,000. exchanges of services for $280,000, local revenues total $400,000 but there are also revenues from outside, such as the sales tax which represents $494,000 and grants for $106,000. Therefore you will note that out of a budget of $1.7 million, $601,000 came from outside the municipality and in most cases, these are revenues which vary from year to year, and therefore which we cannot take for granted.

What is wrong is that people get used to receiving and finally they get the impression that everything is due to them. But we also create a state of dependence which changes from year to year. In addition there is the matter of bookkeeping; people cannot unravel figures from year to year and then they start having doubts about their administration.

To conclude, in municipal taxation there is only one accountant for the municipality, but as everybody is a rate payer the people should know why they pay and require that the money be used for the purposes for which they pay. It's a matter of discharging our responsibilities. There will be room for changes from time to time, always according to the wishes of the population—and the regulations of various systems and their size can change the regulations themselves.

At the present time, when we talk about Quebec and Canada, we should be careful not to confuse the issues. There is the government of Quebec, which assumes power in time and space. There are also the intentions of the P.Q., I mean the Parti Québecois, to separate Quebec, which is not included in what we consider the mandate of the Levesque government, namely the good management of Quebec affairs.

In my opinion, my colleague from Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) has perfectly managed to confuse all the issues. His party should clearly explain its position. Do they want the separation of Quebec, do they want to join that movement? If so, let there be no confusion. If not, they should be responsible and honest enough to say yes to Canada. We should pay tribute to men like Robert Stanfield and Réal Caouette who were also members of the opposition but who have always put Canada's unity above petty, partisan considerations and if the week-end reports had any basis I think that the present leader should heed this warning. Besides, Mr. Speaker, I would have liked more details from the opposition, and particularly from the Social Credit party of Canada, as far as the open attack against the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is concerned. To my mind, DREE, though, at the beginning, it was created to solve regional disparities, is the only instrument we now have, especially in rural areas, to help industries.

This is the question I ask: do we want to help industries in rural areas? Yes or no? Of course, I can see that the risks are greater in our areas because business people are obviously fewer, I think that they have as much merit, if not more, as the experienced industrialists of the great urban areas. Should we keep on trusting the small businessman trying to assess the risks, but should we continue to help the industries in our rural areas? To say that it is merely Liberal patronage is another gratuitous statement, and if there is to be some discussion, it will be about the application of the principle of assistance to industry, wherever it may be in Canada. Questions may be asked, but if charges are laid, they should be substantiated.

Secondly, in the specific area of health and welfare, particularly the guaranteed income for the handicapped—and I wish it would come as soon as possible—are we prepared to say yes or no? But the ever recurring question is: where will the money come from? More taxes, fewer services, other priorities. I also heard my colleagues across the way talk about increased pensions, pensions at 60, pensions at 50, pensions to spouses, and so on. Such aims are most commendable, but one thing is certain: where will that money come from? We agree on finding it together, but please, do not delude yourselves into thinking that services will be maintained without the required money, if not through further taxes or readjustments within the existing systems.

Third, with respect to housing there is talk, for example, of low cost rental units, particularly for elderly people or for the handicapped. Very complicated calculations are made to show how much buildings will cost. We are told that this building will pay for itself twice, three times, four and a half times. I think the real question to be asked is: are the Canadian people now prepared to provide that service for older people or the handicapped? If they are prepared to pay for such a service, then it might be possible and desirable to have the necessary calculations made in order to determine what such projects actually cost. For my part, I consider that people are now in favour of projects such as low cost rental units, homes for older people, even hospitals, schools. We are talking about a choice; this is a mandate we have to carry out and we intend to stand by it.

Fourth, I should also like to deal with agriculture, and particularly the milk policy that was severely criticized by the opposition and the press during the past year. It is a fact that in 1975-76, while the operating budget for the policy had been set at approximately $275 million, the cost to the government was in the order of $535 million. The government had no choice, it was a necessity, but some $535 million still had to be found.

In 1976-77, normally, the budget should have been in the order of $290 million, but we knew that we had to pay surpluses. The budget had been set at $631 million and during the year the government agreed to add an additional $10 million which brought the budget to a record $641 million in support of the milk industry as well as farming and rural economies.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I must inform him that his time has expired. Nevertheless, he may continue if he has unanimous consent. Is there consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Tessier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I also thank the House for that courtesy. I should like to pursue the matter I was discussing.

Yet, if we analyze the dairy policy, we know that the industry has taken advantage of the situation, and when I say the industry, I am talking about all the partners making up the dairy industry of Canada. The unions have also played foul with the rules, and to protect the economy of rural areas as well as milk producers, we had to pay a steep price. Some questions remain to be asked, and I ask them as follows: will the government have to pay milk producers for tractors that cost such fantastic prices as $25,000? Is that our responsibility? Yet we know it happens. Some producers have two, three, even four tractors or more. Once again, will the government have to give in to such well-organized blackmail, to help the dairy industry? Once again, the answer must come from the base, because I consider that among ordinary people common sense is still the best rule. This answer from the base must be reasonable and the government must insist on a reasonable answer.

Fifth, I would like to talk about job creation. This is of course a sensitive matter. We have talked earlier about the Local Initiative Program, about Youth Canada Works and Canada Works. In my opinion, this project is questionable because, to my mind, the creation of temporary employment is itself questionable. But are we ready to change from this concept of temporary job creation to a concept of permanent employment? If we choose to create permanent jobs, does this mean that we shall have to subsidize the industry directly? I believe my friends will agree that in the rural regions, when we talk about effective job creation, we do not talk about creating permanent employment—and until I have some evidence to the contrary, I shall always consider that no one equals big businessmen when it comes to creating permanent jobs! Does this really mean that the government will agree to find the required sums? Where, and instead of what priority?

In reality, it is always the same question. It is possible to have a multitude of projects. I believe that if after honest and sincere reflection we can come to a general consensus in the House, as my colleague said earlier, I believe it is possible to find solutions if we can forget party politics, and particularly partisan politics.

School boards have also been mentioned. I think we must be honest enough to admit once again that the federal government as such has no responsibility in this area, but we must also note that to reduce the powers of the school boards, a relationship dependency has been created towards the provincial government and the cost of this dependency has been excessive centralization and a nearly complete loss of power on the part of school boards themselves. The aim has been to subsidize furniture and boxes called "schools", but the rest has been completely forgotten.

Moreover, the efforts of the last few months have been aimed at saving the furniture, at trying to make political capital. Wage increases have been granted and the anti-inflation program has even been completely rejected in Quebec to allow these wage increases because of which, today, school boards are in such a situation that they are virtually unable to operate. This is why school boards still have to face strikes, like in the eastern townships. The goal was met. This dependency is a determinant factor, but today there still is the possibility of regulating at the provincial level. But as concerns school boards, where shall we find the required funds?

I feel that we, on this side of the House, must not delve upon this whole matter of the Bank of Canada but, like the others, we must take the time to consider the control of public finances and we are ready to do so, by reasonable and acceptable means. It is as much the responsibility of the opposition as it is ours and we are ready to assume it.

In conclusion, I would add that it is important to curb expenses and severely restrict the services we have become accustomed to in order to reshuffle priorities. Otherwise we will have to pay and since the paying capacity of the government, public agencies and individuals is limited, we will necessarily have to learn or relearn how to live within our means.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, in the five minutes or so that are left, I would like, with your permission, to draw a very short conclusion from today's debate, free of all political partisanship. Having heard the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Tessier) and the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) it seems to me that our message got through.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to thank very briefly my colleague, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) and commend him for bringing forth this motion. My colleague, the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) has touched upon the constitutional aspect of the financial problems of our country. My colleague, the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) dealt with the role of public and private assets with regards to the dealings of the House committees, to show that the idea we are touching upon today follows modern problems that have been around for a long time and my colleague, the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne) has defined the role of public and private assets in our country in a very efficient and vivid way.

In this respect we have heard the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) claim that provinces had enough with one-fifth per cent of federal general revenues. We have heard the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) say that time has come to sit down, leave aside any partisan spirit and consider the increase in the debt of our public bodies at federal, provincial or municipal levels, as it is a major problem. We have just heard our colleague from Compton (Mr. Tessier) raise the same question: Where are we going to find the money?

Mr. Speaker, the Social Crediters did not ask for any project. Today our party considered in a very positive way a problem which confronts every Canadian municipality in every province of Canada, this Canada in which we believe indeed but, in answer to the hon. member for Compton, not at any cost. Today we moved a motion proposing that the Bank of Canada be used to intervene, not in the private sector but in the public sector so as to put an end to this endless process by which we are constantly running deeper into debt.

Mr. Speaker, before concluding my remarks I would like to give an example which seems fundamental to me. The House of Commons has two problems to solve as soon as possible. First the financing of our public sector at municipal, provincial and federal levels. One has only to recall the successive failures of the federal-provincial conferences of finance ministers and of the first ministers to see how urgent it is to find a solution to this question. The second priority for the House to deal with is the question of the unity of our country, the Canadian unity. For our party these are two related questions and they are deeply linked together. We cannot pretend to rewrite our constitution while preserving a system for financing the public sector which was conceived a hundred years ago.

Mr. Speaker, this is a priority, so we repeat the proposal we made today that the government positively consider using the Bank of Canada to help provinces and municipalities.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being ten o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House that, pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 58, the proceedings under the motion have expired.

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—GARRISON DIVERSION—PROPOSED TRUST FUND TO PAY FOR ALTERATIONS—ALTERNATE SOURCE OF WATER FOR PORTAGE LA PRAIRIE

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is leaving for the United States next week to meet with President Carter, I wish to make one final plea that he include the Garrison diversion project on his agenda and again request of the President that the United States stop work on parts of the Garrison project, namely, the Lonetree Reservoir and Velva Canal, the two sections of the project that will affect Canada and pollute Canadian waters.

This matter has been raised in the House dozens and dozens of times. The misleading answers we have received from the Prime Minister have been most disturbing, as is the lack of positive action by the government to request assurances from the United States government that Manitoba is protected. Last week the Prime Minister was asked if he would include the Garrison diversion project on his agenda. He gave a most curious answer, stating in part, as reported at page 2775 of Hansard for February 7, 1977, that:

● (2200)

The hon. member is aware that that report has come out now and is before the IJC and is favourable to Canada.

It is not at all favourable to Canada. It calls for $50 million worth of projects to be changed in the diversion unit. I do not know how that can be considered as favourable to Canada. The Prime Minister went on to say:

We are expecting that the IJC will accept the conclusion of the report.

I do not know what the Prime Minister means when he says the IJC will accept the conclusion of the report. The IJC simply makes a report and presents it to both countries. It holds hearings. The IJC has no authority to force either country to take action. Instead of receiving answers from the Prime Minister to indicate that he will discuss the matter with the president and make certain that Manitoba is protected, we receive evasive, misleading answers.

Last week I asked the Prime Minister if, since the United States is ignoring the $1.2 million IJC study and continuing with two aspects of the project which will affect Manitoba waters, the Prime Minister would negotiate with the president to place $50 million in a trust fund, to allow for the alterations needed to the project. I also asked that a timetable be established for the work necessary on projects such as the $6 million alternate water supply which will be needed for the city of Portage la Prairie.

The northern Manitoba Commercial Fisherman's Association has also made representations to President Carter. In a letter sent to the president last week they stated that by 1980 the effects of the appearance of alien fish species into Manitoba water systems from the Missouri River watershed could result in a net loss of $5.2 million a year to Manitoba's commercial fishermen.

You can see that this is a matter for concern, Mr. Speaker, why we are asking for straightforward answers and why we ask the Prime Minister to raise this question with President Carter next week.

Another matter of concern has to do with the fact that the government of Canada, in a note it sent to the United States in October, 1976, requested a specific moratorium on Lonetree. This request has not been answered by the State Department.

I point out that Congressman Dante Facell, chairman of the Subcommittee on International Political and Military Affairs and a member of the Committee on International Relations was concerned about the fact that the request by Canada has not been answered by the Department of State. All of this leads us to believe that present construction work is a breach of the promises and of faith between the two countries.

Lastly, I point out that the North Dakota legislature has been asking Congress to accelerate funding which would further that breach. It is a matter of concern that anyone should be asking for further funding of this project when the IJC report stated that modifications should be made to that project.

I am asking the Prime Minister to request the president to establish a trust fund which will allow for the $50 million to be spent on alterations which would cover such items as the McClusky canal fish screen modifications, which would cost $2 million; the installation of works to remove wasteways, which would cost $22 million; the Lonetree outlet works and filtration outlet, which would cost $1.9 million; the sand filtration involving the Velva Canal, which would cost $9 million; additional costs for membrane lining for the Velva Canada Canal, which would cost $14 million. In addition, there will be a need for an alternate water supply for the city of Souris; that will cost $1.5 million. As I said earlier, it will cost $6 million to establish an alternate water supply for the city of Portage la Prairie. As well, additional cost will be incurred every year for operating this water plant.

Work is being done on the Garrison diversion project, but we have no timetable and no idea when it will affect Canadian waters. They keep digging and we keep asking, but we only get evasive answers.

The IJC has concluded that the Garrison diversion unit, as envisaged, would have adverse impacts on water uses in Canada. These effects arise primarily from effects on water quantity, water quality and the biological resources of Manitoba. The board has recognized that there are also potential benefits. We do not know what they are. They have not been spelled out. Alterations to the GDU for the purpose of relieving or eliminating some of the impacts are practical. Measures which might be taken in Canada to mitigate impacts may deserve further study. While they are digging, the IJC is telling us we need further studies. This is why I am once again requesting that the Prime Minister make a firm commitment that he will discuss this further with the President of the United States next week.

Mr. Fernand E. Leblanc (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on January 25, 1977, during adjournment proceedings, I had the opportunity to answer a question put by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway) on the same problem, the Garrison River diversion project. However, the aspect involved was rather the tabling of the IJC's report and the possibility of a work delay.

On the matter of the hon. member's suggestion . . .

[English]

I would like to clarify at the outset, once again, that the report which was made public on January 11 and was referred to in the House, is not the report by the IJC to the governments on the Garrison Diversion Unit, but the report by the International Garrison Diversion Study Board to the IJC. The report is currently being studied by the IJC itself and will be the subject of public hearings in March in Manitoba and North Dakota. The IJC is expected to submit its own report to governments in June, 1977.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) has suggested that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) negotiate with President Carter with a view to placing $50 million in a trust fund to allow for necessary alterations to the project and to establishing a timetable for the work on such alteration. Such a course of action would not serve Canada's interest. It would indeed prejudge the conclusions that will be reached by the Canadian government on the board's recommendations, and the subsequent recommendations to governments by the commission, as it would involve an assumption that if these recommendations concerning necessary alterations to the project, entailing expenses of $57 million, were implemented, the Garrison diversion project would be acceptable to Canada. Neither the IJC itself nor the Canadian government have yet reached conclusions on the adequacy of the board's recommendations. The government, therefore, does not intend to undertake specific negotiations with the U.S. before both governments have received, and had the opportunity to consider fully the IJC's own report and recommendations.

Finally, I would like to correct the impression of the hon. member from Winnipeg South Centre that the U.S. is now proceeding with work on the Lonetree and Velva Canal sections of the project. At North Dakota legislative hearings held on January 27 on a resolution related to Garrison, Mr. W. Jamison, the manager of the project, stressed that no construction contracts for the Lonetree Reservoir would be awarded until the State Department answers the October 12 Canadian diplomatic note. As for the Velva Canal, its construction is not scheduled to begin until after 1982.

[Translation]

I can assure the hon. member that the problem will be raised by the Prime Minister during his visit with President Carter, and the Prime Minister will have ample opportunity to completely inform the president of Canada's concerns with the project.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—REQUEST THAT MINISTER VISIT EDMONTON TO EXPLAIN RELOCATION OF AIRBORNE REGIMENT

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, originally I addressed this question to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) as one member from Edmonton who is very concerned. I expressed grave concern at the sort of non-information and reticence of the minister, and the absolute reticence of the Chief of Defence Staff to discuss the matter of the proposed relocation of the Canadian Airborne Regiment from the Edmonton training area to some split areas in central Canada.

Here I want to speak on behalf of my colleague, the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga), in whose area is located Canadian Forces Base Namao which provides air capability and also the Buxton dropping centre, which is the training area and the Griesbach barracks and ancillary facilities which happen to be presently in Edmonton West, a lot of it going in the future to my colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski), who will be taking over Edmonton North.

All Edmonton area members are vitally concerned. But what raises our hackles is the complete refusal to discuss this matter. Questions have been put to the minister critical of the strategy of denuding the whole of the north west of an active, transportable military force, not clerks, cooks and storemen on the Canadian Forces base. They are not the military presence referred to. We want the whole of the Northwest Territories to be considered.

We have seen fatuous statements made that the unit, or fragments of the unit after it has been broken up, will be transferred to areas where there is a greater concentration of population. That is wrong. Ten years ago, every effort was made by people who considered the Canadian Forces needed an airborne regiment, to bring one into being. There are papers galore on this subject. Those officers, Mr. Speaker, are as highly qualified, then and now, as are General Dextraze and his advisers at the present time.

All I can say, from my point of view and my connections with the Armed Forces, is that General Dextraze is among those who did not agree, years ago, with the formation of the airborne unit, and now that he is in the position of being the chief, his original objection is being implemented by a change which destroys all the work of a succession of commanders of Mobile Command. These are men whose capabilities are as good as those of the officers who are presently there, and they say this is one of the most fatuous moves which could possibly be inflicted upon the forces. If there are reasons, and I presume there are, why is it the minister and the general cannot come clean and tell us what they are? Do not send the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) or the minister in charge of small business (Mr. Marchand) to Edmonton to say the move is justified for military reasons. That is nonsense.

A great deal of money and effort was spent on putting this thing together. I have here a copy of a paper headed "The Selection of a Site for the Canadian Airborne Regiment." This was a working paper utilized in the Armed Forces—

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): When?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): In 1972. They were considering at that time where the Airborne Regiment should be located and they had various sites in mind—CFB Edmonton, Rivers, Val Cartier or Petawawa. And every factor being considered, Edmonton was chosen as the ideal site.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The facilities are there for training. There is one point which it seems to me has been overlooked by everybody.

I am not concerned now with any argument as to economic impact. I am thinking of the personnel involved and of their dependants. I am sure neither the minister nor his parliamentary secretary will tell us that in the Petawawa area these people will be able to find the same employment opportunities as in Edmonton, or the same educational facilities. Available in the Edmonton area are fine schools, as good as can be found anywhere in the country, and in French, if desired; an ample stock of residences off-base for those who want such accomodation. Where will they get this in Pembroke, close to Petawawa; and where will their children go to school? What technical schools and universities will they be able to attend? I am sure the parliamentary secretary and the minister do not know how many men have indicated to us privately that they will retire rather than be transferred. This has caused a terrible morale problem.

The last question is: how much is it going to cost to provide the necessary infrastructure for a comparable unit, unless this is the first step for a downgrading into merely an airborne capability? What about additional housing? What about the cost of moving 700 troops from Camp Petawawa to Gagetown? No one has come down with a cost figure in this regard. They do not dare, because they cannot stand by it.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I can readily understand the hon. member's concern about the loss of the airborne regiment to the city of Edmonton. But after listening to him and to his statement that the statements made by my minister and the Chief of the Defence Staff were utter nonsense, I have to conclude that if that is true then they have no monopoly on nonsense.

An hon. Member: You are speaking nonsense yourself.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, we have a donkey in the House tonight.

Mr. Paproski: We have an ass over on that side.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): A big one over there. The hon. member's charge of non-information is, of course, without foundation as well, because both the Chief of the Defence Staff and the minister have made several public statements and have made public the rationale for the movement of the airborne regiment from Edmonton.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): They have not given one reason.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): The hon. member says they have not. I have before me a statement by General Dextraze to this effect:

> At the present moment, I do not believe that the posture of the army field formations in Canada is in balance with military requirements. We have a combat group and an airborne regiment in the west, a small combat group in the centre, and a combat group in Quebec with an independent battalion in the maritimes. This undesirable situation is being redressed by redeploying our land forces in a more balanced posture. The planned overhead savings will be devoted to "The Sharp End" and will allow me to make better use of my total force capabilities.

That is a direct quote from the Chief of the Defence Staff.

The hon. member makes a great deal about the statements made by some retired officers of the Armed Forces. While I will not in any way take away from the service that those people have offered to this country, I will not sit idly by and listen to a dedicated public servant like General Dextraze being attacked in this House where he has no vehicle to defend himself. That is not an honourable course to take in this debate. General Dextraze is an outstanding soldier, an outstanding public servant and an outstanding individual, and is far more competent to judge the needs of the Canadian Armed Forces than some retired generals who happen to have a special interest in the airborne regiment.

That does not mean to say that General Dextraze does not have a special interest in the airborne regiment. But he has the responsibility for redeploying the Armed Forces in Canada to fit the needs of the defence structure of this country. That is his responsibility and the responsibility of the minister. The military forces knew when they joined that they were subject to movement within the country and outside it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

INDIAN AFFAIRS—POSSIBILITY OF RETURN OF MONEY COLLECTED FROM NATIVES THROUGH EXPORT TAX

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, tonight on the late show I wish to speak again on a question I raised some time ago in December last regarding the possibility of the return of the oil export tax to the Indian people from whose land the oil was extracted. As reported at page 1733 of Hansard for December 7, 1976, I asked the following question:

> Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In regard to the export tax which was collected from Indian bands four years ago, is the minister prepared to state unequivocally that he is going to return the money to the Indian bands, and will he arrange for a tripartite meeting to clear up this whole matter?

I think it is very important. The minister replied that the question is under review. It is important to know that I have been asking the same question now of three successive ministers of Indian affairs and northern development from whom I have received the same answer, namely, that the question is under review and that they will let me know about it.

I have also placed this question on the order paper. I asked how much money has been collected through the export tax from Indian bands, how much is held in the treasury, and, because of the time it is taking the governments to decide what to do in this situation, can the Indian people living on lands where oil is produced expect interest to be paid on this money? Because I have received no answers to this question, I can only assume that the money in question amounts to some $4 million.

We find that a great deal of the money in the Canada Works program is being set aside to provide employment for Indian people because the rate of unemployment among the Indians is the highest in Canada. In many bands it is in the region of 80 per cent or 90 per cent.

Surely this money could be put to good use. This is money that rightly belongs to the Indians. They are the ones who should decide what to do with it, how to put it to use to assist members of a band in finding employment.

Because I was not getting answers from the ministers, I put the question to department officials at a meeting of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development which was held about a month ago. The response of an official, as recorded in the proceedings of the committee, was as follows:

> We are actively interested in this and we are looking for a solution that would correspond to the interests expressed by the Indian people of Alberta. I am not fully up to date and I have the impression that some headway is being made as between the province, our department and the Department of Finance . . .

I am asking that the federal government provide some leadership and call the provincial government and the bands affected by decision not to return the money, to meet at a tripartite meeting to sort this out once and for all. The Indian people in Alberta should know how much money there is. This is something they do not know for sure. They should also be informed as to whether they can expect any interest on that money which has been collected for four years now.

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) raised this question on December 7 of last year. The question regarding the oil export tax which was collected in respect of oil produced on Indian land and whether this money will be returned to the bands is, of course, a serious and urgent question which has the attention of my minister.

I can say to the hon. member that there is no pat answer. I say that because, as he knows, the question involves three federal departments, the Department of Finance, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I can only speak for the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and I say to the hon. member that my minister, as well as his two predecessors, the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien) and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Buchanan), have advanced the requests of the Indian bands concerned that the share of the tax distributed to the provinces should be given to the Indian bands from whose land oil was produced.

As we all know, the Indian people of Canada are unique in that they are the aboriginal inhabitants of the land, and for this reason they deserve special consideration in respect of the reserves of land and minerals set aside for their full use and benefit. In this context, my minister recently wrote letters to his colleagues, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie), to see whether a basis can be found to pay over to the Indian bands a share of the tax moneys collected by the federal government under the Oil Export Tax Act. Until their response is in hand, hon. members of this House will appreciate that any unequivocal response such as that sought by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin—and I appreciate his endeavours in seeking this—is just simply not possible from this one minister.

I should make note in addition that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Allmand) considers that, again, until the response is received, it would be premature to seek any tripartite meeting to consider the matter.

In conclusion, I appreciate that the hon. member has raised this matter, and I will undertake to add whatever urgency I can to see that we can get an adequate resolution to this serious problem.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order please. A motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.28 p.m.

PRIVACY

SUGGESTION THAT SUBJECT OF WIRETAP BE NOTIFIED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the Minister of Justice is sitting with me at this moment. I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43 on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity with reference to the invasion of privacy provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada which were designed to protect the privacy of individuals by prohibiting all interceptions of private communications except where permission is granted by a judge.

The annual report of His Excellency the Governor General of Canada states that in 1976, 1,062 persons were arrested as a result of interceptions by authorization and only 13 of those said 1,062 persons were convicted directly as a result of the said interceptions. I therefore move:

That the Minister of Justice retreat from the position that he took in Bill C-83 to abolish the 90 day notice clause demanding that the attorney general of a province or the Solicitor General of Canada be required by Section 178.23(1) to give notice to the person who is the object of the said interception that his telephone was wiretapped.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be debated only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ABORTION

ALLEGATION FALSE INFORMATION PUBLISHED—REQUEST FOR CORRECTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to deal with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that Canadian taxpayers have paid to have booklets on sex education published by the Department of National Health and Welfare, and in view of the fact that one of these booklets claims to take its definition of abortion from the Criminal Code and that the information cited is not in the Criminal Code, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth):

That this House instruct the Minister of National Health and Welfare to recommend that such false and misleading information, which is being printed with public money, be corrected.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

AGRICULTURE

SUGGESTION THAT JURISDICTION OVER MILK PRODUCTION BE GIVEN TO PROVINCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing and urgent necessity.

In view of the precarious position of manufacturing milk producers, especially in Quebec, whose income is clearly inadequate; since the situation has deteriorated from year to year as a result of federal policies; and since the control of the Canadian Dairy Commission and the Department of Agriculture constantly perpetuate a standstill in that industry, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That the federal government give up all direct or indirect jursidiction over dairy production, leaving to the provinces the exclusive power to organize its operations.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CONVEYANCE TO RUMANIA AND CZECHOSLOVAKIA OF CANADA'S CONCERN OVER ARRESTS MADE IN VIOLATION OF HELSINKI AGREEMENT

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 which I believe deserves a similar response to that given yesterday to a motion moved by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp). Yesterday at long last the House approved the conveyance to the government of the Soviet Union the disappointment and deep concern of the elected representatives of the Canadian people in parliament regarding the Soviet Union's disregard of the Helsinki Agreement in respect of human rights. Because similar breaches of this agreement resulting in a multitude of arrests in other east European countries are taking place, namely in Rumania and Czechoslovakia, I move, seconded by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker):

● (1410)

That the Secretary of State for External Affairs convey to the governments of Rumania and Czechoslovakia the disappointment and deep concern of the elected representatives of the Canadian people in parliament at the arrests being made in those countries contrary to the terms of the Helsinki agreement.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can only be—

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, a point of order before the request is put to the House. Inasmuch as the Secretary of State for External Affairs is not present in the House today and inasmuch as he is requested to make these representations, I would suggest that the request be made when he is here tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Presentation of the motion at this time can only be made with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATION OF MARIN COMMISSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 involving the RCMP; because of delay by this government in acting on the recommendations of the Marin Commission of inquiry which has perpetuated the very inequitable situation in which RCMP personnel, particularly those in the lower ranks, find themselves, whereby they are still being denied rights to elementary principles of natural justice with respect to their own positions, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather):

[Mr. Speaker.]

That the recommendations of Judge Rene Marin be brought forward by the government for consideration by parliament so that the present status of RCMP personnel can be improved, particularly in eliminating existing double standards in dealing with personnel of low and high rank when they encounter problems, one such prima facie case being the recently set out by the well known Canadian journalist Marjorie Nichols with respect to Chief Superintendent Robert Vaughan.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be made only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF FAILURE TO INCLUDE ALL UNEMPLOYED IN STATISTICS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion under Standing Order 43. In view of the fact the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) claimed in this House yesterday that there are only 34,000 hidden unemployed who have given up looking for work that is not available, and in view of the fact that data from Statistics Canada labour force survey plainly shows this to be false, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House condemns the minister for misleading the House on the true extent of unemployment, and instructs the government House leader to take steps to ensure that spokesmen for Statistics Canada and the Economic Council of Canada appear before an early meeting of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs to explain why in their view the official monthly unemployment figures seriously understate the real extent of unemployment.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

KNOWLEDGE OF MINISTER OF USE OF WRITS OF ASSISTANCE—SUGGESTION COURTS BE GIVEN DISCRETION IN GRANTING SUCH WRITS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Revenue and the Solicitor General, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Justice who is also acting Solicitor General. My question relates to the most serious castigation by two of Canada's foremost jurists, Chief Justice W. R. Jackett and Mr. Justice F. U. Collier of the provisions under the Excise Act and the Customs Act under which applications are made by members of the RCMP Police for writs of assistance for unlimited periods of time, to unknown individuals allowing unmitigated powers to enter and search unspecified premises. In light of this very strong criticism contained in the recent judgment and by the two jurists, can the minister advise the House whether he is aware of the applications being made by the RCMP for these writs and does he approve of same?

Hon. Ron Basford (Acting Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the applications nor of the comments by Chief Justice Jackett to which the hon. member referred. I will immediately undertake to review those comments and review the situation. Generally, I would want to say to the hon. member that I have been concerned about some of the powers provided under the Criminal Code and otherwise to investigative agencies. I have discussed this question with my officials and with members of the Law Reform commission who are examining the whole of our criminal law and criminal law procedures. That is among the matters which the Law Reform commission is examining.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since this question has now been raised in the House twice, will the minister look into it as quickly as possible, for it is important? And, having regard to the basic principles of Canadian common law against unlimited and indefinite warrants, principles so dearly cherished by Canadians and all who believe in democratic freedoms and rights, will the minister not undertake to have amendments to present legislation introduced, in order, at the very least, to allow courts discretion in the granting of writs of assistance? I ask this in view of the mandatory basis upon which they must now be granted upon application.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I would not want to give that undertaking until I have reviewed the judgment to which the hon. member referred.

SUGGESTED DETAILS REQUIRED BEFORE WRITS OF ASSISTANCE ISSUED

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a final supplementary question? In view of the statement of Mr. Justice Collier that he was "shocked and incredulous that the court should be asked or required, on such fragile and unenlightening material, to lend its authority to the clothing of an unknown government officer with such extensive unlimited powers," will the minister now undertake that, henceforth, all applications for writs of assitance being made by those coming under his department, or by the minister, in his capacity as Attorney General of Canada, will be supported by the fullest possible disclosure of facts as to why the issuance of the writs is required, those facts to include details of the premises, persons and areas affected, and the minimum period of time for which the writs are required?

Hon. Ron Basford (Acting Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I would readily agree that applications in the name of my department will be in such a form as to comply with the legal requirements under which they are made, and I will review the judgment of Mr. Justice Collier.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

POSSIBILITY MINISTER INVOLVED IN CONFLICT OF INTEREST IN ISSUANCE OF WRITS OF ASSISTANCE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Justice? It has to do with an apparent conflict of interest in that, technically, applications for such writs of assistance must be issued by the Attorney General, but that same minister has the responsibility to parliament and the country for the Canadian Bill of Rights. I ask the minister if he will examine the question of applications by himself, as Attorney General, for the issuance of those writs? On the surface this matter seems to involve a serious conflict of interest with the minister's responsibility in protecting those very rights of privacy of Canadians set out in the Canadian Bill of Rights.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF NUCLEAR SAFEGUARD AGREEMENT WITH EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, may I address my question to the Acting Prime Minister or the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs? I believe they are both the same person, which ought to make this easier.

An hon. Member: He has two heads.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He can argue with himself.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, it is reported that the European Economic Community will some time this week offer Canada a so-called compromise nuclear safeguard agreement, which would apply to seven of the nine EEC countries, exclude France, but enable France to secure uranium from the other members of the EEC, despite the Canadian embargo, without accepting the stronger safeguards formula demanded by Canada. Can the minister tell us whether that is correct? Is such agreement being sought, and if so, what is being done about it?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can tell the hon. member that there have been discussions and negotiations between the community and Canada on the question of safeguards. According to my information, at the beginning of last week no conclusion had been reached. Of course, I do not have further up-to-date information. I will have to check the various facts alleged in the statement of the hon. member and have the minister report tomorrow, when he returns to the House.

Mr. Brewin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister offer assurances to the House that no agreement moderating, compromising or dispensing with the safeguards requirements by Canada will be entered into with the EEC or any other country, so that adequate safeguards, which are extremely important, will be maintained?

● (1420)

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I believe I can give that general assurance to the hon. member that we have stated our safeguards policy and in all cases our objective is to have it implemented.

REASON FOR FAILURE TO MENTION OPPOSITION DAY IN HOUSE

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State.

Yesterday was a very important day in the House of Commons, an opposition day, which was devoted to a very special subject, one that concerns all Canadians, and last night the French CBC network did not even mention what went on in the House of Commons. Yet they went all over the world to report what happened there. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister responsible for the state network to be so kind as to check on the reason for that lack of public information on strictly Canadian matters, which are of interest to all Canadians, and to report to the House.

[English]

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I cannot help but agree with the hon. member that the proclamation of the New Citizenship Act yesterday was a matter of great importance to this country, one in which all members of this House share great pride. The ceremonies which took place yesterday to mark that were an indication of the importance members of this House and members of the other place have given to this legislative step. I therefore feel no compunction whatsoever in drawing the attention of the CBC to the remarks of the hon. member. I will endeavour to report to him the results of my inquiry.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, from the minister's answer I see that we are not on the same wavelength. This does not mean, Mr. Speaker, that the reference to the other event he mentioned in his answer was not important at all. I do not question that, but my query deals specifically with the proceedings of the House. Television is supposed to inform the public. Now, the House is willing to spend millions to inform people, and for the moment the state television network is responsible for keeping people abreast of the important things that go on in the House. It is on that subject that I invite the minister's answer. Will he investigate to see why the state network did not echo the very important proceedings which took place yesterday in the House of Commons?

[English]

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, you can readily understand how, when the hon. member referred to a matter of major importance, I automatically assumed, as I think most members would, that he was referring to the proclamation of the new Citizenship Act. In relation to the other matter, to which I confess I do not give quite the same importance as the hon. member, I will be happy to add this to my inquiry. I would point out that the sooner we get on with this business of televising the House, the sooner this problem will no longer arise.

POSITION OF MINISTER ON NOTIFICATION TO SUBJECT OF WIRETAP—ADMISSIBILITY OF WIRETAP EVIDENCE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. It arises from my proposed motion under Standing Order 43. Having read the annual report of His Excellency the Governor General, which states that 1,062 persons were arrested as a result of interceptions by authorization whereas only 13 of those persons were convicted of some offence as a direct result of wiretapping, is the minister now prepared to retreat from his position of abolishing the notice to the person who is the object of the said interceptions in the light of these figures?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): The report also indicated that electronic surveillance was an indispensable instrument of proper investigation in this country. I think my position was set out in amendments made to Bill C-83 in the last session—that there should be a change in the notification requirement allowing the law enforcement officers to apply to court for an extension of time for notification.

Mr. Woolliams: As the Minister of Justice knows, though he doesn't state it, he was going to repeal the very notice in that Bill C-83 and there was some objection to his doing so by the committee. Is he aware that the courts have now ruled that evidence from authorized interceptions has been declared admissible in the courts even if the Solicitor General of Canada and the attorneys general of the provinces failed to give the 90-day notice to the person who is the object of intercept. In other words, even if the Solicitor General or the attorney general fails to carry out his obligations under the Code, and there is no penalty, the evidence is still admissible in court. Will the hon. gentleman take that into consideration when looking at this matter again?

Mr. Basford: The answer to both parts of the question is, yes.

Mr. Woolliams: The Minister of Justice says that having looked at the legislation he feels it is necessary because the report indicates that it is. But I should like to refer to page six of the report, and I put this question to him again: does he think it is good legislation when they arrest 1,062 people and only 13 are convicted, and now he is about to abolish the notice to those who are the objects of that kind of intercept?

Mr. Basford: I believe that basically the legislation, which was very carefully debated in the House before it was passed, is necessary legislation. I do not think its effect is quite as the hon. member states it on the basis of that report.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REASON FOR RETURN TO OTTAWA OF AMBASSADOR TO UNITED STATES

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. What is the explanation for the announcement, six days before the visit of the Prime Minister to Washington, of the return to Ottawa of Canada's ambassador to the United States?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): I do not believe there is any explanation which is related to the timing of the Prime Minister's visit. My information is that our distinguished ambassador to the United States indicated some time ago that at a certain point he would like to return to Canada and resume some activity in the public sector. That is the significance, and the only significance, which should be attached to Mr. Warren's return. All of us know he has performed very ably and effectively as our ambassador to Washington.

Mr. Fairweather: There can be no doubt as to the distinguished service of the ambassador. But is it possible to find an example of more inopportune timing for an announcement than the one made yesterday?

AIR TRANSPORT

INCIDENT INVOLVING AIR CANADA FLIGHT 266—NEED FOR INSTALLATION OF RADAR AT VICTORIA AIRPORT

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. It is two weeks and two days since I asked him whether he had seen the report of a near-miss at Victoria International Airport. I ask him again whether he has seen that report.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have, and also the version of the report as put forward by the hon. member in the House was a gross exaggeration of what had occurred. I have received a report on the distance between the aircraft and the action which was taken and I think nothing further need be added.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): It is obvious that the minister has not seen the captain's report in which he clearly stated that had they not been looking out, had they been looking at the instruments, there would have been a disaster. Has the minister changed his mind at all about the disposition of the radar equipment which is being taken out of Vancouver Airport and, presumably, being sent somewhere else? Why is it not being sent to Victoria where it is needed?

● (1430)

Mr. Lang: The equipment is used where it is most adequate. The two instances are not at all related.

CUBAN AND SOUTH AMERICAN SERVICE—ALLEGED FAILURE TO GIVE FULL REPORT OF EXPULSION OF CUBAN DIPLOMATS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State and has to do with CBC broadcasts of news to Cuba and South American countries. It is with particular reference to the story that it carried in connection with the removal of certain Cuban officials because of their co-operation in espionage while they were resident in Canada. The report on the CBC international service to Cuba and South America was quite different from the domestic service report. It gave the Cuban denial of wrongdoing but did not give Canada's official reason for expelling the diplomats.

I should like to find out from the minister whether there is a special handling of broadcasts, featherweight broadcasts, pussyfooting ones, to Cuba and South America and whether or not these broadcasts emanating from Montreal are passed by any officials in the CBC or are simply the product of the actions of the individuals who are broadcasting?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, may I say how pleased I am to receive a question from the right hon. gentleman. Like him, I do not believe in pussyfooting around and I shall undertake to make some inquiries about the matter and report to him.

HEALTH

REASON FOR FAILURE TO ESTABLISH STANDARDS FOR ACCEPTABLE LEVELS OF ARSENIC IN THE AIR

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Considering that in a letter dated January 9, 1976 signed by Mr. J. R. Hickman, director of the bureau of chemical hazards in the minister's department, a copy of which I have before me, it is said that "it is now reasonably established that workers that have been exposed to arsenic over long periods of time because of their occupation have suffered increased mortality from cancer", and considering that this letter was sent by a department head within the minister's own department more than a year ago, would the minister explain how it is conceivable that up to this point nothing has yet been done to establish acceptable health standards as they pertain to arsenic levels in the air?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the New Democratic Party has a document I do not possess myself. I would be pleased to look at it and give an answer to the hon. member.

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: A supplementary question. While the minister is undertaking to investigate this document would he also consider the implications of another quote from the letter, in which Mr. Hickman says that "the purpose of this letter is to request you to initiate action under the provisions of the Clean Air Act". In order to remove this significant health hazard to workers, would he investigate that; and if, as seems to be obvious, appropriate action was not taken more than a year ago on this matter, will he take the appropriate disciplinary steps and also consider his important obligations in this area as a minister?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to listen to the admonitions of the leader of the New Democratic Party. As for the second quotation he referred to, he clearly indicated that my department has indeed asked that steps be taken; this seems to contradict the first quotation. Therefore I cannot see why he makes selective quotations such as these. It would have been simpler to send me the complete text of the letter. We could then exchange views more intelligently.

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister has clearly misunderstood my second question but I shall take steps to see that he gets a copy of the letter immediately. My final supplementary question is for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the absence of the minister who is responsible for bringing directly before the House or to cabinet regulations to enforce the Clean Air Act, would the Acting Prime Minister explain how it has been possible, given a memo dated February 6, 1975, which is almost two years ago, this time sent to a different minister in a different area of responsibility but precisely on the same subject matter of clean air, that no action was taken regarding that recommendation which came from a second department of the government?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have no ready answer to the question. Probably I could contrive one but I will be happy to look into the matter and see if indeed no action has been taken as alleged by the hon. member. I would be very doubtful that his suggestion is correct.

REPORT ON CONNAUGHT LABORATORIES—ACTION TO MAKE CANADA SELF-SUFFICIENT IN BIOLOGICALS

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether he has had the opportunity of studying the CMA committee report on Connaught Laboratories and when he will take steps to make Canada self-sufficient in the manufacture of biologicals necessary for the health needs of the nation?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have indeed received a copy of the report from the CMA which was made public a few weeks ago and I have asked my officials to examine it. I was very happy to see that this particular report proved that the allegations that had been made by various organizations and media people against Connaught were unfounded. At the same time, that particular report included some recommendations having to do with self-sufficiency in biologicals, and I have asked my officials to examine this matter. I expect a comment from my officials within the next few weeks. At that time I hope to be in a position to state what government policy will be in this respect.

TRADE

GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO STIMULATE EXPORTS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As Canada's share of world trade has recently slipped from 8 per cent to 6 per cent, and as we have a yearly deficit of $10 billion in manufactured products, the ones that produce the jobs, I ask the minister whether the program which he announced last week of combining six existing programs, none of which has been effective in increasing our sales of manufactured products, is his only answer to increasing exports of these products? If not, when does he expect to announce a really effective program?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, first I wish to indicate that I reject the hon. member's suggestion that the deficit amounted to $10 billion. I think it was lower than that and the hon. member forgot to mention that in 1976 we had a surplus of $1.3 billion in our balance of payments. In my opinion, the hon. member is very selective when it comes to statistics. As for the program, we decided on the procedure which is to take what I call the alphabet programs we used to have and simplify the formula thus enabling Canadian businessmen to call on our department's services to improve Canadian exports. Incidentally this morning I had a meeting with my department's businessmen advisory committee and I am glad to tell the hon. member that this meeting was extremely productive.

[English]

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As the minister will find out if he consults his agency, Statistics Canada, the deficit in manufactured goods was $10 billion last year and is well on the way to being the same kind of deficit this year. Does he not realize that any increase in exports which we show this year is solely due to increased sales of raw materials which other countries want to turn into manufactured products, and thus derive the benefit of employment in manufacturing industries which this country will have if the minister were on his toes and did something about it?

● (1440)

Mr. Chrétien: I hope the hon. member will talk to some of his colleagues who are complaining because I am trying to do something about the textile industry in Canada.

TRANSPORT

CHARTERING OF VESSELS FROM OFF-SHORE CORPORATIONS—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF CORPORATE STRUCTURE OF SUCH COMPANIES

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport about shipping which also affects taxation. The east coast motor vessel Marine Cruiser is chartered by the CN at approximately $1,400 per day, which revenues appear to be going to an off-shore corporation in the Bahamas, which is presumably not paying the type of corporation tax which would be the case if it were a domestic Canadian corporation. Would the minister review charters of this type to see whether there can be a tilt in favour of doing business with companies which are willing to pay regular Canadian tax, and thus avoid the leakage of Canadian tax revenue?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as a general proposition, I can certainly say yes to that question without necessarily confirming it in this case.

Mr. MacKay: I thank the minister for his answer. Would the minister indicate, while he is looking into this matter, whether he will ascertain and report to the House the identities of all the shareholders of the companies which are getting the benefit of revenues from this government's shipping charter, since my research indicates a very interesting corporate structure?

Mr. Lang: I will be glad to look into it, and I will be glad to have the benefit of the hon. member's research.

APPROVAL OF GRANT TO SPIRITUAL COMMUNITY FOR WORK IN GUATEMALA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs who is responsible for CIDA and ask him whether or not it is the usual course for CIDA and the Department of External Affairs to authorize a spiritual community based in Tennessee called "The Farm" working under the name "Plenty" in Canada, to collect funds to be sent to Guatemala, because CIDA has approved the submission and has agreed to provide $80,000 worth of materials.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That information should be sought in another way.

ENERGY

MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—STUDY BY FENCO ENGINEERING OF POSSIBLE COST OVER-RUNS—COST AND DATE OF COMPLETION

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Apparently Fenco Engineering is doing a study for the government on possible cost over-runs in connection with the Mackenzie pipeline. If so, can the minister tell us what the study's parameters are, when it will be completed, what the likely cost is, and whether or not it will be tabled in the House?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it is quite true that the department has commissioned such a study concerned with over-runs. There have been leaks in the press as to what it has to say to the government. If the hon. member has a copy, I hope he will send me one. We have not received it in my department nor have we received it in my office. I hope that the report will be completed and placed in my hands within the next few weeks.

MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—SUGGESTION COST OVER-RUN STUDY INDICATES LACK OF FAITH IN ENERGY BOARD

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, when the report is tabled and the minister receives it and has time to consider it, can the minister tell me, since the National Energy Board is conducting hearings into this whole matter, including costs and cost over-runs, is the fact that the government is having an independent study done not an indication of a lack of faith in the National Energy Board, or is the government assuming that the National Energy Board will recommend the necessary permits?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think the government would be criticized if the National Energy Board were to report and the government did not have some way of assessing the cost over-run question other than perhaps the views of the National Energy Board itself. Quite clearly, with respect to the Alyeska oil pipeline there were enormous over-runs, so much so that the financial viability of the project down Mackenzie, if the same were to occur, would be in great doubt. For those reasons the government has commissioned that study. I can assure the hon. member that it will be made public, and not only will it be available to members of parliament, it will also be available to the National Energy Board if they wish to use it.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ASSURANCE OF NEW BRUNSWICK ON CONSTRUCTION OF TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY IN EDMUNDSTON AREA

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. I should like to know whether the minister got a firm and irreversible undertaking from the government of New Brunswick for the reconstruction of the Trans-Canada Highway in the area of Edmunston, at the initial cost of $8 million. I ask that question, Mr. Speaker, for I want to know whether that undertaking was confirmed in writing, in some way or other, and if so, is he prepared to release that document in the interest of the people who want to know how their taxes are spent and how that agreement was reached?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to inform the hon. member and the House that during our negotiations leading to the signature of the three-year agreement on the development of the road system in New Brunswick, I had indeed received some representations with a view to improving the Trans-Canada Highway near Edmunston. While negotiating, we agreed as a matter of fact with the provincial government that it would be in charge of that section of the system in return for federal participation in other sections of the road system in northern and northeastern New Brunswick.

There has been an exchange of letters between myself and Premier Hatfield, and I am asked to release them. I will check with Mr. Hatfield and if he does not object, I see no reason why those papers should not be made public.

CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY

SHIPMENT OF CORN TO GHANA

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs who is in charge of CIDA and ask him if he is aware of the fact that CIDA purchased some 20,000 tons of corn at a cost of $2,340,000 for sale to Ghana, only to find that Ghana does not have the facilities to handle bulk corn. The outcome of all this nonsense has been the additional purchase of 160,000 bags into which the corn will be loaded—

An hon. Member: Metric bags.

Mr. Murta: —in order for the corn to be put ashore in Ghana, and the additional expense will come from the demurrage charges, which will amount to some $5,000 per day—

Mr. Hees: And the shovel they are sending over.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Information of such a detailed nature should be sought on the order paper and perhaps by correspondence.

Mr. Murta: I am coming to my question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Provencher.

RESOURCES

CESIUM—REASON FOR FAILURE TO GRANT EXPORT PERMIT—MEASURES TO ENSURE CONTINUED OPERATION OF TANTALLUM MINES

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources or possibly to his colleague, the Minister without Portfolio who has an ever-consuming interest in Manitoba. In view of the question I asked the minister last week, namely, that export permits for the export of cesium to the U.S.S.R. had been granted for the past seven years and were not granted in 1976, has the minister taken any steps in that regard and can he indicate whether steps have been taken to stockpile cesium as well as to develop research in order that cesium can be brought to a higher grade, thus creating and maintaining jobs not only in eastern Canada but in our manufacturing areas as well?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as I recall the question last week, I think it was directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It has to do with the issuing of an export permit with respect to a strategic material, namely, cesium. The government decided that no export permit would be issued at this time for those reasons. As to the second part of the question, as to whether or not we would examine the possibility of having material converted into a different substance so that it might be exported, I will be pleased to look into that.

Mr. Epp: May I ask the minister, in view of grants that have been given to companies such as the Tantallum mines in Eastern Manitoba, whether the government is taking steps to maintain the operation of these mines in view of the fact that export permits have not been granted. What future do these places have in view of the declaration of cesium to be a strategic material and without any alternative policy?

Mr. Gillespie: I will have to make some inquiries with respect to the technical question which the hon. member put to me and I shall get back to him.

GRAIN

WHEAT—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF SELLING COSTS AND LOW PRICE

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the great dissatisfaction with the recent final wheat payments and the feeling of many producers that they have been shortchanged, can the minister explore ways in which the Wheat Board can produce more information as to the cost at which the grain was sold and why the price seems to be low?

● (1450)

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Wheat Board is taking steps to give information to producers about the selling price which is reflected in the final payment. A booklet, or information piece, describing the total financial situation with regard to that crop year is about to go into the mail. It is being sent by the Canadian Wheat Board to all producers. Canadian Wheat Board commissioners are holding meetings throughout the prairies, and they are hoping to meet as many farmers in person as possible.

WHEAT—SUGGESTION INFORMATION BOOKLET ON SELLING COSTS ACCOMPANY FINAL PAYMENT CHEQUES

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that in future years the minister ensure that that booklet is included with the final payment cheque, a booklet including a full breakdown as to demurrage charges and all expenses taken off gross sales, so farmers can make an analysis when they receive their cheques without going through a long period of frustration.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the final payments of the Canadian Wheat Board are sent out in the New Year just as fast as the calculations can be completed. I do not agree with the suggestion of the hon. member that these cheques should be delayed until the preparation of those figures in a printable form. I think the cheques should continue to go out to the farmers as fast as possible, and then the information should follow as fast as possible.

ALLEGED DISTRIBUTION OF OUTDATED PRESS RELEASES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. Has consideration been given to discontinuing or monitoring the circulation of outdated government information, including outdated press releases from all ministers' offices? I cite as an example material from the office of the Prime Minister dated November 3, 1976 which was delivered to Alberta radio stations on January 18, 1977—

An hon. Member: By mail.

Mr. Towers: —not only wasting postage but clogging up the postal system thereby delaying first class mail.

An hon. Member: They should try the pony express.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I do not know to what the hon. gentleman is referring.

Mr. Hees: That's the trouble. That's why we never get any action.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

USE OF WRITS OF ASSISTANCE—PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF PRACTICE—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I see that the Solicitor General has returned to the House. My questions are with reference to the matters raised by my colleague, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar. Mr. Justice Collier, in a recent judgment of February 10, said the following:

> . . . the powers given under the writs are extremely wide and, but for any legal sanctification in the statute, would otherwise be an invasion of privacy and property and civil rights.

In view of that statement, and in view of a practice which I am sure must alarm the minister as a member of the bar, would he undertake to adopt the practice of personally reviewing and approving any further applications by the RCMP for writs of assistance under these statutes until an investigation is completed?

[Translation]

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I shall be pleased to make an exhaustive inquiry on this matter, but I must indicate to my hon. colleague that applications for a writ of assistance are made through the Attorney General of Canada as far as the Customs Act and the Excise Tax Act are concerned and through the Minister of National Health and Welfare as far as the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act are concerned.

However, hon. members should be reminded that, if we consider the Customs Act and the Excise Tax Act, there are more than 70 million visitors in Canada each year and if it were necessary to ask for a search warrant each time there should be a seizure, the evidence might disappear in several cases. I hope the hon. member does not question the very principle of a writ of assistance but rather that he considers the process of application for these writs.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I appreciate the difficulties with respect to law enforcement which have been raised by the Solicitor General, but I hope he will not balance those against the rights of individuals and the clear principle which has long been embodied in our law that the rights of individuals should be safeguarded. Surely, with the number of judges there are in this country and with the number of opportunities for applications to be made, the Solicitor General would not consider it unreasonable if I asked him whether he would make a general review of statutes with respect to the application of these wide, sweeping powers so that any police force, even the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, does not have the power to act arbitrarily in this situation.

After the review would the minister undertake to come to the House and make a statement on motions with respect to the findings of his investigation?

[Translation]

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I think I have no authority to review the Customs Act and the Excise Tax Act, nor the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act. Of course, I shall be pleased to study closely the procedure followed by the RCMP.

I would also like to draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that in several cases, for example in remote areas, it is necessary for the RCMP, under certain circumstances, to be able to use the kind of instrument described in a writ of assistance.

TRANSPORT

POSSIBILITY OF INQUIRY INTO WATER TRANSPORTATION ALONG WEST COAST

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the recent water transportation dislocations in the federal ridings of Comox-Alberni, Coast Chilcotin and Skeena, can the minister advise the House when his announced transportation inquiry will take place regarding water transportation on the west coast of Canada?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give an indication of that kind of inquiry at this point because any such proceeding may be affected by certain discussions which are taking place at the present time between the province of British Columbia and ourselves. I hope those could conclude at an early date, and then we could take the next step.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

SUGGESTED ROLL-BACK OF BREAD PRICES IN VIEW OF DECISION ON SALARIES OF FLOUR MILL WORKERS—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO SETTLE STRIKE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance, and it is in relation to the strike of flour mill workers in the city of Montreal. Is the minister aware that the decision of the AIB, which was supported by his government, rolls back the wages of workers in the flour mills but does not roll back the price of bread in the city of Montreal, and that as a result of that the companies are now accumulating an extra profit margin of some $400,000? Is the minister going to do something about that situation, where the wages of workers cannot be increased but that the price of bread is not rolled back?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the roll-back by the AIB was to prevent any further increase in the cost of bread and other flour products to consumers, not only in Montreal but also in other parts of Canada. With respect to the profit margin of the millers and with respect to the extent to which it has been expanded I would have to make a specific inquiry of the board. However, that profit margin is under the restraint of the anti-inflation program, as is the case with other companies.

Mr. Nystrom: The minister very recently said that the strike was under the jurisdiction of the province of Quebec, and I would like to know if the minister will now admit that he was wrong, in view of the fact that the strike is really taking place against the AIB. Would the minister tell the House what recommendation he is making to the cabinet to settle the situation in the city of Montreal?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I am quite prepared to admit to the House that I was wrong in that statement, but not because it is a strike against the AIB. The millers in question are governed by the Canadian Wheat Board Act, and in that sense they are under federal jurisdiction rather than provincial jurisdiction. I am glad to have this opportunity to correct the record.

It seems to me that it is in the interests of Canadian consumers and Canadians generally that we have this restraint against further increases in costs in the food industry. Locals in Alberta and Ontario have accepted similar terms as being reasonable for settlement of the contract, and it seems equally reasonable that those in Quebec should do so as well. We passed a law in this parliament to restrain increases in costs in this as in other areas, and I think it should be respected by that particular bargaining unit.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ELIGIBILITY OF PERSONS AGED 65 TO BENEFITS WHO HAVE NOT APPLIED FOR OLD AGE PENSION

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Acting Prime Minister.

Yesterday, in answer to a question put to him by the hon. member for Lapointe, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, who is responsible for the Unemployment Insurance Commission, said that he did not have the authority to implement the suggestion of the hon. member, namely to remedy the gross injustice suffered by persons of 65 years of age who, having been misled by employees of the government, were deprived of their unemployment insurance and who further, having applied to the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan now are told that they will not receive what other 65-year olds are being granted, all that as a result of an error which the government has admitted. Consequently, and for the sake of justice, I would ask the minister if he is willing to recommend to the cabinet that the situation be remedied as soon as possible so that justice be done to those persons of 65 who were misled, which error the government itself has recognized.

● (1500)

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure what correction the hon. member has in mind. As I understand it, the provisions relating to persons aged 60 stem from the law itself. I am not sure whether he has in mind a change in the law to overcome that particular point, or whether he wants better information.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary.

For the minister's guidance, may I say that since those people of 65 were cut off unemployment insurance from December 1975 and since the courts upheld those persons' rights, the government announced this week that it will resume unemployment insurance payments to people of 65, except for those who have applied for the Canada or Quebec pension. As civil servants had said to those persons that they would no longer get their unemployment insurance, the latter were in fact forced to apply for their pensions. That mistake was made by civil servants and I ask that justice be done to those persons of 65: only a decision of the cabinet can redress that injustice.

[English]

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has made a number of representations that are self-evident.

PRIVILEGE

MR. ALEXANDER—INVITATIONS TO HAMILTON FUNCTION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege as a result of information brought to my attention which concerns the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts). I was very pleased when I received a letter dated February 10, just before I came into the House, regarding the new legislation dealing with amendments to the Citizenship Act.

I read the minister's letter with a great deal of care and interest. He mentioned the ceremonies that were held on February 15. I became more interested when he stated that the purpose of these manifestations is to publicize the new act and encourage potential new Canadians to take advantage of it. I jumped for joy at that, Mr. Speaker, because I thought it was important and I would want to become involved with it. It made a great deal of sense. Then the minister advised that on February 25 the Department of the Secretary of State will hold a reception at the Hamilton Multicultural Centre "which you are personally invited to attend."

Here is the key sentence, Mr. Speaker.

> I am enclosing herewith 20 invitations which you might want to address to different individuals in your riding on my behalf.

Then the minister honours me with a list of some 50 people.

What I take exception to is that the invitation reads like this:

> To mark the Proclamation of the New Citizenship Act > The Honourable John Munro > on behalf of > The Secretary of State of Canada > request the pleasure of the company of

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I know the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) does have something to do with multiculturalism, but I think that what the Secretary of State is attempting to do is nothing but a cheap political trick.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: I cannot understand how the minister would want me to be enjoined with him in something that is misleading. If I did insert a name on that invitation it would appear that it was not put there on the minister's behalf by me but rather by the Minister of Labour.

I just want to let the minister know that this is no time to play tricks with a very important act—an act some one million people want to become involved with by taking advantage of the situation. I would have been pleased to co-operate with the minister, but he could have sent me an invitation reading "The Secretary of State for Canada requests the pleasure of the company of—." As a result of this very cheap trick I intend to use the list he gave me to send invitations to the ceremonies being held on Friday, on my own stationery. I hope the minister will govern himself accordingly in future.

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, on the same question of privilege, I am astonished—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Roberts: A series of these celebrations will be taking place across the country. I could not possibly attend all of them although I would like to be able to do so. These are celebrations undertaken by the government under the responsibility of my ministry quite properly for the purpose of ensuring that those most likely to be able to take advantage of the provisions of this act—

An hon. Member: —are the Liberals.

Mr. Roberts: —will be informed of the details of how they may do so. It seemed to me appropriate to involve members of parliament from all parties in the celebration of this extremely progressive legislation. Members of all political parties in the area concerned have been invited, and in many cases they have accepted. Indeed, colleagues of the hon. gentleman have wholeheartedly accepted invitations to take part in similar celebrations.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) has a fascinating grievance. However, in its substance or form it is not a question of privilege. Both sides have made a contribution to this interesting grievance, but in so far as it relates to a question of privilege under the terms of the rules and precedents of this House, the discussion ought to stop there.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order stemming from the earlier exchange between the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien)—I am sorry he is not in the House—and the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees). I take exception to the fact that at the conclusion of his answer and, after he sat down, the minister was yelling my name across the floor attempting to insinuate that the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings' attempts to clarify the reasons for the country's high level of foreign deficit are contradictory to my request made earlier this week for exempting small businesses from the government's textile quotas.

My point of order is to clarify this misleading information that the minister was trying to yell across the floor. Our party's position is that at no time—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member seeks to rectify some irregularity in today's proceedings I would have to be persuaded that such an irregularity has formed part of the record before giving him an opportunity to raise, by way of opposition thereto, the position of his party or himself in respect of the particular argument. At the moment what the hon. member describes is not something that has formed part of the record in today's proceedings. If it has, I would be prepared to hear the hon. member tomorrow. At the moment he is describing something that could be part of today's proceedings. I cannot conclude how that could form a point of order because the irregularity would have to be part of the proceedings before I could give the hon. member the floor.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order and I will be very brief. It arises out of the question I was attempting to put to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen).

● (1510)

In retrospect, I agree that the explanation to my question may have been somewhat lengthy. Nevertheless, I felt it was necessary before the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs could answer the question to put a lot of pertinent information on record. The question, really, had to do with the incredible bungling of CIDA. If I may have your indulgence, Sir, I would ask for the unanimous consent of the House to permit the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, who is in charge of CIDA, to reply to my question. Does he know about the problem, and will something be done about it?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have taken the decision in respect of the hon. member's question, as I have in respect of questions asked in similar circumstances by many other hon. members, that the information sought ought to be sought in some other way. The hon. member put forward greatly detailed information about a particular transaction. I have often said to the hon. member's colleagues in respect of similar questions which have been raised, as I said on two similar occasions this afternoon, that that kind of information ought to be sought in another way. It would be grossly and manifestly unfair to permit the hon. member to have a second run at the same question, unless I would be prepared to do this for his colleagues as well.

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1977-78

EXPLANATORY STATEMENT BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE TREASURY BOARD

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1978, was presented by the Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board) and read by Mr. Speaker to the House.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I heard hon. members across the floor from me commenting that I was being disrespectful to the Governor General in not standing up when the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) announced that he had a message from His Excellency, signed by his own hand. I submit that estimates are concerned with the raising of money, and my not standing does not carry any implication whatsoever of disrespect for the Governor General or others. If other hon. members wish to stand up because the cabinet is asking for money, that is their business, but my not standing should not be interpreted as disrespect for the person of the Governor General.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the main estimates of federal expenditures for fiscal year 1977-78, which I am tabling today, should dispel any remaining doubts about the government's determination to restrain the growth of federal outlays and to ensure, with the co-operation of other levels of government, that the trend in total public spending does not rise more quickly than the trend in the gross national product. This essential goal of the government's expenditure policy was unequivocally restated by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) in his budget speech last year.

My colleague indicated at that time that our target rate of increase for total federal outlays, in fiscal year 1976-77, had been set at a maximum of about 14 per cent, while our forward planning for fiscal year 1977-78, beginning April 1, was based on a growth rate of the order of 11 per cent.

Today I am able to inform the House that increases in both forecast expenditures for the current fiscal year ending on March 31, and planned expenditures for the new 1977-78 fiscal year, are expected to be lower than the targets announced by the government last year.

First, as a result of the relentless monitoring and control of spending plans exercised by the Treasury Board throughout the fiscal year, the most recent forecast indicates that total federal expenditures in 1976-77 will be less than the $42.2 billion projected by my predecessor last February. As a result, the percentage increase in total spending to be recorded in the current fiscal year is likely to be lower than the government's target of 14 per cent, and also lower than anticipated GNP growth.

I emphasize that, when I speak of total spending, I really mean total spending—all budgetary outlays and all non-budgetary financing, both statutory and non-statutory, included in the main estimates, supplementary estimates A, B and C, as well as any other supplementary estimates which may be tabled before the end of the fiscal year 1976-77.

Second, I am able to announce that federal expenditures are expected to be about 7 per cent higher, in fiscal year 1977-78, than the level of spending planned for 1976-77. That percentage increase will be marginally higher if, as currently forecast, we manage to hold expenditures in the current fiscal year below the target figure of $42.2 billion.

Main Estimates

The 1977-78 expenditure plan adopted by the government therefore provides for total federal expenditures of approximately $45.1 billion. Hon. members will note that the plan aims at an over-all percentage increase considerably lower than the 11 per cent target posted last May by the Minister of Finance. Barring unforeseen developments in general economic conditions, the growth of federal spending will be cut almost by half; it will have been cut for the third consecutive fiscal year; and it will be lower than the rate of growth in the country's GNP.

In other words, the main estimates for fiscal year 1977-78 reflect current concerns in Canada about public spending trends. It responds to these concerns in a responsible manner. If I were at liberty to put a label on the bluebook, Mr. Speaker, I would call it responsible and responsive.

Two factors account for this achievement. One is the government's decision, after consultation with the provinces, to propose new financing arrangements for hospital insurance, medicare and post-secondary education—programs launched jointly, several years ago, by the federal government and the provinces, and which are now well established.

While the new arrangements involve the transfer of tax revenues for the federal treasury, they also reduce substantially federal statutory payments to provincial governments by approximately $970 million in fiscal year 1977-78.

The other factor which explains why the government has been able to best its own spending target for the coming fiscal year is summed up in one word: restraint.

It is no secret, Mr. Speaker, that the review screening and pruning of departmental spending plans which started a year ago and ended barely three weeks ago—much later than usual—has been conducted with a rigour almost without precedent. It has been a tough year for the Treasury Board, a tough year for its secretariat, and a tough year for all federal departments and agencies.

"Vingt fois sur le métier remettez votre ouvrage", the French rhetorician Nicola Boileau instructed poets, a couple of centuries ago. Although there are few poets on the Treasury Board, I can assure you that on more than a couple of occasions since last spring we instructed our officials to put spending plans once again through the grinder.

The results of these successive and detailed reviews of departmental submissions are now self-evident: the dollar increase in planned federal expenditures for the new fiscal year is $3 billion—$2 billion less than the dollar increase forecast for 1976-77, almost $3 billion less than the increase recorded in 1975-76, about $3½ billion less than in 1974-75, and $1½ billion less than in 1973-74.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, despite much lower but still significant inflation, and despite the ever-increasing demands for federal services caused by population growth and the continuing expansion of the Canadian economy, the increase in planned federal expenditures during the coming fiscal year will actually be smaller, in absolute terms, than in any of the preceding four fiscal years.

Needless to say, a great number of highly commendable proposals to expand and improve federal programs has to be sacrificed or postponed. In fact, the Main Estimates for 1977-78 include financial provisions for only one major new program, namely, the employment strategy to be implemented in the course of the new fiscal year by my colleague, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen). Yet the Treasury Board has been able to restrain the growth of expenditures in a socially-progressive way, without distorting government priorities and without unduly impairing the ability of departments and agencies to deliver to all Canadians the essential public goods and services they expect from their federal government.

To achieve these goals, I asked, I expected, and I obtained the co-operation of the public service; I will ask for and anticipate receiving it again this year.

It would have been too much to expect ministers and departmental managers, concerned as they are about the effectiveness of the programs they administer, to enjoy the cut of restraint; but I must commend them for having accepted it all, if not with equanimity, at least with a good measure of stoicism and fairly restrained protest.

To avoid any misunderstanding about our expenditure policy, I emphasize that the $45,120 million figure for total spending projected for 1977-78 includes all budgetary and non-budgetary outlays by all federal departments and agencies for the 12 month period beginning on April 1, 1977.

An hon. Member: What about supplementaries?

Mr. Andras: It includes the anticipated supplementaries.

It includes not only the Main Estimates of $44,142 million which I am tabling today, but also reserves of $1,850 million for the supplementary estimates which may have to be tabled in the course of the fiscal year; and the aggregate of these two figures has been adjusted to take into account the customary lapses in credits voted, which are conservatively estimated at $872 million.

The Main Estimates proper include $41,145 million for budgetary outlays, the bulk of which will finance programs which are essentially redistributive in nature.

Many Canadians still have the notion that the money they pay in taxes to the federal government serves mainly to finance huge bureaucracies and remote agencies. Yet the operating and capital expenditures of all federal departments and agencies are expected to account in the coming fiscal year for less than one third of budgetary estimates, namely, $12.9 billion; and this includes the $3.8 billion required for National Defence.

I hardly need to remind hon. members that public servants, like other Canadians, spend most of their income on consumer goods, and that the federal government as my colleague the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), can attest—is the largest single customer of Canadian industry; so that what we will spend on goods and services during the coming fiscal year will sustain, as in previous years, output and employment in the country's private economy.

But the point I wish to make, Mr. Speaker, is that almost 69 per cent of the budgetary expenditures forecast for 1977-78 will not really be "spent" by the government, in the sense that these moneys will not be used to pay the salary of public servants, or to build new federal buildings, or to buy furniture, paper clips and typewriters for government offices, tanks or planes for the Armed Forces, uniforms for the RCMP, and so forth.

Over $26 billion worth of so-called government "spending" will actually be paid back to individual Canadians in the form of social security payments, grants and subsidies, or transferred to their provincial and municipal governments, or used to pay interest to government bond holders, the vast majority of whom are Canadians. Therefore the federal government will directly plough back into the Canadian economy more than two-thirds of tax revenues and borrowings required to finance its budgetary expenditures during fiscal year 1977-78.

The same can be said of the $3 billion dollars required for non-budgetary outlays. These will be used to make investments in Crown corporations and to extend loans or advances to various departments and agencies such as the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the Export Development Corporation, the Federal Business Development Bank and the Farm Credit Corporation. Consequently the bulk of the federal government's non-budgetary outlays will indirectly finance private expenditures such as housing, business and farm investment, or exports of goods and services.

I should point out that the 1977-78 Main Estimates include for the first time all non-budgetary items which are expected to be made under existing legislation, as well as those which must be included in appropriation bills.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of hon. members to a further dimension of the Main Estimates, namely, the manpower requirements of the public service during the next fiscal year. You will recall that my predecessor announced in the fall of 1975 the government's determination to curb and eventually stabilize the growth of the federal public service. The percentage increase of authorized manpower resources was reduced to 4.1 per cent in 1975-76; and the ceiling on public service growth was drastically lowered to 1.3 per cent in 1976-77.

A thorough review of manpower requirements in departments and agencies has enabled the government to project the growth of the public service at a still lower level in 1977-78—in effect, virtually to stabilize it. We have set the maximum level of authorized man-years in departments and agencies under Treasury Board Control at 323,272 in the new fiscal year—an increase of 2,081 man-years, or about six-tenths of 1 per cent, over the 1976-77 Main Estimates level. This is close to the "zero growth" target which has been suggested by some in recent months; but it has been achieved through successive assessments and reassessments of just what minimal manpower requirements were in each department or agency, rather than through the setting of an arbitrary target for the public service as a whole, or the imposition of across-the-board percentage cuts.

We have thus been able to streamline the public service without impairing its ability to produce and deliver essential services; and we will press on, in the new fiscal year, with improvements in public sector productivity, notably through better and more extensive measurement of performance.

I hope to have established, Mr. Speaker, that the government is in firm control of both the public treasury and the public service. In the framing of our expenditure plan for fiscal year 1977-78, we have taken steps to make that control more effective; and we will continue to do so during the next budgetary planning period, which has already begun.

Restraint must not be confused with stagnation. The government must continue to respond to essential public needs. But it must ensure that its expenditure planning is responsible as well as responsive.

• (1530)

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, may I at the outset thank the minister for providing me with an advance copy of the statement he has just delivered to the House, and also for giving me a sneak preview of some of the salient points in the estimates which have been tabled this afternoon.

On the basis of a quick examination of the estimates we have been given, and assuming we can accept the sincerity of the minister's statement, I believe I can say on behalf of my party that we generally approve of the government's desire to moderate expenditures, and the direction it is taking in this regard. I only hope the government's aspirations will be translated into reality. I trust, as I say these things, that in the course of our examination of the estimates and the specific proposals contained therein we shall not discover any surprises or juggling of figures which would contradict the position which seems to be inherent in the minister's message this afternoon.

I should like to take this opportunity to say that we in this party have provided a large measure of leadership in badgering the government to act more responsibly in relation to its expenditures. I trust the minister has paid heed to some of those speeches. I hope he will bear in mind that we have stressed the need for moderation in the growth of federal expenditure for a long time. We have also been concerned about the ever-increasing percentage of the gross national product being extracted by all levels of government, and to judge from the minister's statement this afternoon it would seem the government has taken heed of this aspect, too. I congratulate the hon. gentleman and I trust he will be successful in bringing in the degree of moderation which, I believe, all Canadians want to see, in government expenditures at all levels.

While the government has demonstrated a certain moderation, and while it has imposed restraint upon all Canadians, I have to say it appears to have imposed a lesser degree of restraint upon itself than upon Canadians generally. The estimates tabled today show that restraint is painful for government, that is, if we can call an additional expenditure of $3 billion an example of restraint. It must be pointed out that in this case the pain is lessened by exporting most of it to the governments of the provinces. While the percentage increase indicates moderation in spending at the federal level, it is, to some extent, illusory rather than real.

As the minister has stated, we must add at least $970 million to the planned 1977-78 figure if we are to compare it with the figures for the last fiscal year with any degree of consistency. That $970 million represents the additional amount the government would have been called upon to pay in fiscal 1978 if it had not transferred the burden of what used to be cost-shared programs to the provinces. While fiscal transfers to provinces amounted to 11.7 per cent in the main estimates last year, we find that the amount shown in the estimates tabled today accounts only for some 7 per cent, indicating a major shift of the burden to the backs of the provinces. If we are to be consistent when comparing actual spending this year with spending last year, it would seem to me that the real increase would be closer to 10 per cent rather than the 7 per cent about which the government is gloating.

When we look at percentage figures, increases or decreases may look somewhat modest. They should not be allowed to obscure the overwhelming sum with which we are dealing. After all, $45.1 billion is a huge sum of money. As far as the operation of trimming government fat and excessive expenditure is concerned, I have to say that it has been largely a cosmetic exercise. We find the first acknowledgment of the need for restraint in the budget of January 23, 1975. On July 7, 1975, and again on December 18 we were presented with itemized accounts of planned reductions in expenditure. It now seems only normal that we should ask the government to table an up-to-date accounting showing precisely whether and where those cut-backs took place. The government should identify the areas in which restraint was shown, and I urge the minister to do so in order that we may know precisely whether or not a true effort has been made to trim government fat and unnecessary expenditure.

We need only look at the Auditor General's report to find many opportunities of cutting back on waste and extravagance. For example, in December, 1975, the then president of the treasury board indicated that planned expenditure on accommodation for the Public Service had been cut, particularly as a consequence of the greatly restricted growth in numbers. He told us that the provision in the Main Estimates in 1976-77 for the construction of public buildings would be $30 million less than in the 1975-76 Main Estimates. What did the Auditor General have to say in his report tabled in November? He said at page 17 of the Conspectus: "We found that the present use of space exceeds the guidelines by more than 30 per cent." That is the sort of waste which we consider should be looked into and dealt with.

In the area of consultants' services, here again the former president of the treasury board, speaking on July 2, 1975, as reported at page 7182 of Hansard, had this to say:

My deputy minister wrote to deputy minister and organization leaders urging them to take measures aimed at lowering consultants' and travel expenses during the present fiscal year. That letter has to do with expenses that are not essential to the permanent efficiency of programs.

Have we seen any cut-backs in expenditure on consultants and professional services? I have just glanced at the bluebook and it seems to me the figure is still around $1.2 billion. The minister smiles and laughs. Where are these cut-backs? Where are these reductions in expenditure?

Mr. Andras: That figure includes manpower training, occupational retraining—

Mr. Mazankowski: The fact of the matter is that what the government says it will do is a far cry from what it does.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: When we are dealing with figures of the magnitude of $42 billion we should bear in mind that small percentages are translated into huge amounts. For example, an increase of six-tenths of one per cent in the numbers in the Public Service produces an additional 2,081 man-years, and an increase of 7 per cent in federal government expenditure increases total spending from $42.1 billion to $45.1 billion. Therefore while the percentages are modest, the aggregate totals become increasingly overwhelming.

● (1540)

I am sure that Canadians are going to be concerned about the size of federal government expenditures. I think they are also deeply concerned about another matter, namely, how the money is managed after it is allocated. As one travels across the country and witnesses the number of editorials written in daily newspapers, Mr. Speaker, it is clear that Canadians are worried. They are worried when the Auditor General says that parliament, and indeed the government, have lost or are close to losing effective control over the public purse. It seems to me that if the government were really serious about the concerns of Canadians, accompanying these all time record spending estimates we would have had the announcement by the minister of the appointment of a comptroller general who, coupled with the senior financial officer of every department, agency and Crown corporation, would be charged with seeing that after spending is allocated it is properly controlled.

Even more basic, Mr. Speaker, the Auditor General has stated that one of the major barriers to restoring parliamentary control is the form of the estimates themselves. I regret to say to this House that I have not seen a significant improvement in the form and content of the estimates themselves. There has been no substantial change. The committee structure which is set up to analyse and scrutinize these estimates is insufficient to deal item by item with matters that have to be studied in detail. They are then subjected to the guillotine rule, which assures that many of these items will not be thoroughly examined. Many will not be touched at all.

We have all read the Auditor General's remarks on financial control of the government of Canada. A large part of the moneys that we are dealing with today are going to be distributed to Crown corporations. In this area all semblance of fiscal responsibility is lost. As Mr. Ross of the Auditor General's office said before the Public Accounts Committee, Crown corporations have not been subjected to a high degree of accountability, and they have received an unusually high degree of financial freedom.

We have only to look at the events surrounding AECL and Polysar to indicate what has happened to the freedom which has been granted to these Crown corporations, Mr. Speaker. We have so many Crown corporations today that the federal government and Auditor General have found it impossible to tabulate them all. There is no complete list of federal Crown corporations available. Hopefully we will be able to prepare one some time during the course of the this year.

Crown corporations too should be subjected to an in depth examination annually or biennially by a committee with adequate resources. Any Crown appendage must be subjected to the provisions of the Financial Administration Act if there is to be any degree of effective monitoring and control.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, arguing over which one of the government's illusory figures showing how much spending has increased is correct will not arrest the fears of Canadians regarding how their money is spent. This is money held for them in trust by the federal government. I say to this House that positive and immediate action is needed to reform the estimates, to appoint a comptroller general to examine the management of Crown corporations, and to strengthen our committee system. Then, and only then, will we be able to restore faith in our system of parliamentary democracy.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, if I were to paraphrase the coy and ingenuous manner in which the minister put forward his description of his statement, when he called it responsive and responsible, I would have to put it in somewhat more simple and, I am sorry to say, accurate language, and describe it as just plain stupid. It may be responsive in the sense that a Liberal government has picked up every antiquated idea of the Tories. The government has taken a look at the Gallup poll and it has seen that the Tories are doing very well. It has then asked its own people, why are the Tories doing so well?

An hon. Member: Because we will do well.

Mr. Saltsman: Well, hon. members are a noisy lot, but that is not why they are doing so well. The Tories are doing well because they found some terribly old-fashioned ideas and have taken them right out of the eighteenth century and are dragging them around.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Just listen to the Tories cheering.

Mr. Saltsman: Yes. Therefore, "Let us not look at how outmoded, outdated and inappropriate those ideas are", says the government, "they seem to be working so far as the Gallup poll is concerned, so we will adopt them."

It is one thing for us to sit here in the social democratic corner and wince. But, Mr. Speaker, if there are any true Liberals in this country they must be crying today when they see the kind of estimates that have been tabled in this House. They are irresponsible in the extreme. This government—any government—has the responsibility to lead, not to knuckle under to the hysteria created by an irresponsible opposition which is sitting opposite and grinding its own axe. In tabling its estimates the government is behaving in the way that is usually attributed to generals—it is fighting the battles of the past instead of looking at the problems of today.

The government's estimates reflect an economic ignorance matched only by a blind disregard for the crisis of unemployment. The estimates that we see today would have been more appropriate for an economy that was bursting at the seams. If the government had brought these estimates in four years ago, there might have been some sense to them. But to bring in this kind of restraint at a time when there are one million unemployed in this country, and when the major objective of the government, indeed of any government, is to put these people back to work, is criminal.

It is senseless in another way, Mr. Speaker, and let me give a number of examples of the kind of senselessness that we are being asked to accept. On the one hand the government is holding down its manpower requirements in the coming year to virtually zero. Then it turns around and brings in a program called Canada Works, designed to create jobs elsewhere in the public sector which are going to be more costly and less effective. We have people coming out of universities who are looking for jobs, yet the government is going to bring down the guillotine on jobs. The government is compounding the unemployment problem.

The government's position for a long time now, aided and supported by the official opposition, has been that it has to get out of the economy. It has to get out of stimulating the economy and let the private sector in. To some extent, if that were going to work, it would be understandable. But instead the government is getting out of the economy, the private sector is getting out of the economy, and no one is getting into the economy. Under those circumstances even the most free enterprising of governments—for example, the United States—should recognize that there is a heavy responsibility on government to provide employment if the private sector has failed to do so. And the private sector has failed to do so, Mr. Speaker.

Some 83 per cent of our plant capacity is being used. There is an enormous gap in confidence, and lack of stimulation. Instead of the government stepping into the breach, even a private enterprise government, and saying, "All right, we have to supplement what is going on in the private sector", and instead of stimulating the economy, the government is walking away from its responsibility. It is the R. B. Bennett of the depression days; it is the Hoovers all over again, talking about balancing budgets when in fact the government should be creating employment. In my view, it is a most irresponsible thing for the government to do.

To take another example, the government is holding its capital expenditures, the amount of money it spends on capital works, to about the same level as it has over the previous years, this at a time when the private sector is not engaged, when we have one of the highest levels of unemployment in the construction industry which this country has seen, when we need houses, when we need sewage disposal plants, and when we need to upgrade insulation in public and private residences in view of the higher cost of energy. At this time the government is opting out. When is the government going to do all that?

Public transportation should be improved. When will the government do it? Will it wait for full employment and then decide to stimulate the economy and create inflation? Or perhaps it figures we will never have full employment. If it continues in the direction in which it is going now, we will never have full employment or anything approaching it.

I gave the government credit—perhaps I should not have—for having a little more sense than it has, but it does not seem to have any at all. It is one thing for ministers to take the heat off themselves, as apparently they have done, but I found the Conservative party's response to the government measures was awkward. The Conservatives were finding it difficult to criticize the proposals which the government introduced. If it was the government's objective to neutralize the Conservative opposition, it has achieved it. In the criticism levelled against the government's estimates, the official opposition stopped criticizing the contents of the estimates and reverted back to saying they do not like the form in which they were introduced. That is the most biting criticism they could mount on the estimates. That is the kind of thing that has been put forward to the House.

I think that the government's behaviour at a time of enormous unemployment in the country is absolutely disgraceful.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Saltsman: A reduction in government expenditures may be a virtue under certain circumstances, but in the light of the one million unemployed in this country, the government's conduct is callous, misguided, and is boot-licking the rich in Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to thank the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) for providing on time, to me and my colleagues, the French background information on the main estimates for the financial year 1977-78.

These estimates amount to some $45.1 billion for financial year 1977-78 and show a real increase of $3 billion over financial year 1976-77. I would like to make an immediate reference to the Reader's Digest of January 1977, page 80, where it is stated—and it does not come from Socred analysts but the Reader's Digest—and I quote:

[English]

In ten years, the budget has skyrocketed 350 per cent from $8.8 billion to a forecast $39 billion in this fiscal year (April 1, 1976 to March 31, 1977).

[Translation]

Well, Mr. Speaker, in light of such estimates I would like to correct the Reader's Digest's report that the budget rose from $8.8 billion to $45.1 billion, an actual increase of about 500 per cent over a ten-year period.

The government is trying to hide that increase by manipulating the figures and presenting the budget increase in regard to the gross national product in an attempt to sell us the idea that it accomplished financial miracles in connection with its budgets or the gross national product. I do not care for comparisons in increasing expenditures or estimates in relation to the GNP because if you take out of the GNP the drop in the value of the dollar caused by the increase in the cost of living you come to a first conclusion that national output in 1976 in terms of real dollars amounts to about 10 per cent more than the national output ten years ago. If, on the other hand, you exclude the output by new Canadians who have entered the labour market over the last ten years from the 1976 national output you realize that the per capita GNP in 1976 is the same in terms of real dollars as in 1966. So there was no actual increase in the GNP per capita during the 1966-76 fiscal year. That increase is due to inflated figures as shown by the consumer price index which rose by 72 per cent from 1965 to 1975.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to make an extremely important second point about the GNP and it is this: The GNP figures include amounts that are more a liability than an asset for this country. Let me explain. The gross national product includes—to use only that example—all sales or exports of raw materials such as asbestos ore or various forms of energy, or all other sales of iron ore or non-renewable natural resources. Those sales have inflated our GNP whereas if our natural resources were processed in Canada they would increase the gross national product much more and at the same time help reduce unemployment.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to the House that 55.7 per cent of the budget expenses tabled this day are statutory expenses, which means that the House cannot discuss nor change them, and that the first item, the largest statutory expense, amounts to $5.38 billion. These undebatable $5.38 billion statutory expenses are not meant for unemployed, handicapped or sick people, and even less for provinces strangled by finance to such an extent that unfortunately several of them are, like Quebec, thinking of separation, with the thought and belief that they will all by themselves get strangled less severely and less quickly without the co-operation of the federal government.

Mr. Speaker, these $5,388 million will go to the little people, the little people of the financial world for having financed 94 per cent of Canada saving bonds or of our national debt, a financing which should have been done through the Bank of Canada, as it was suggested yesterday by my hon. colleague, the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) in a motion tabled and discussed in the House.

The transfer of monies to the provinces for fiscal year 1977-78 will be around $2.88 billion whereas the transfer to the financiers of saving bonds will be twice as high. If they want transfer payments, the provinces have to beg the federal government, discuss, fight and be disappointed, while the chartered banks do not even need to attend federal-provincial conferences because, by statute, they come at the top of our spending to such an extent, Mr. Speaker, that we are not even allowed now to discuss it in the House. Mr. Speaker, unfortunately we shall soon see the day when the federal government will have to choose between financiers and their annual transfer payment of $5,388 million and the Canadian provinces which are fighting to get $2,880 million in transfer payments.

[English]

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the minister. It is obvious we will not get a change in the form of the estimates we talked about earlier this year when the Auditor General's report came down. As members of parliament, who have the primary responsibility of examining government estimates before granting supply, we are still faced with the same problem.

• (1600)

Given the fact that as of this moment there are 14 standing committees examining the estimates of approximately 32 government departments, not counting government agencies, and given the fact that Standing Order 58(14) requires that all the estimates will be deemed to have been reported back to the House and approved as of midnight, May 31, can the minister assure us now that all the estimates which he released today will be examined in committee? I ask that question because it has been the experience of the last few years—and if we examine the record we will find that this is a fact—that there has not been a year in which all departments came before the committees for an examination of their estimates, and consequently some of the moneys had to be voted by the House without any examination whatsoever. In light of what the Auditor General said about the government and parliament losing control over spending, can the minister at least assure us that every department will be scrutinized by a committee of this House?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I would like to reflect on that. I might as well admit frankly that I am not exactly sure of any plans to change the process by which we examine estimates from what it has been in the past, at least between now and the deadline of May 31. All I can say is that the hon. member can be assured of my co-operation to the degree I can influence a thorough examination of the estimates. I know the problem. It is not entirely a matter of the attitude of the government. It is a problem of the complexity and volume of issues with which we have to deal compared with the number of hours in which we can deal with them.

As far as the comment about the form of the estimates is concerned, I indicated shortly after I took this portfolio, I think in response to the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), that with regard to the question of the form of the estimates I was sympathetic to the need for more detailed information but that I doubted very much if it would be possible to introduce those changes for the main estimates this year for a reason I knew then, and that was that it would be a commitment to the members of the Public Accounts Committee particularly in their participation in the revision of the form of the estimates.

I can say now that I am more familiar with the problem than I was then, and there is a great deal of work and planning for some improvements which is going on and which, I hope, I will be in a position to announce with a fair amount of conviction in the not too distant future.

As to the estimates, I would be glad to co-operate to the degree I can, but I cannot make more time than has been available.

Mr. McGrath: Perhaps by way of a supplementary I can amplify or crystallize exactly what I am looking for from the minister. Will the minister give us an undertaking that he will examine the experiences of the last three years? Such an examination would demonstrate to him that there were departments last year, the year before, and the year before that which never did get before committee for examination of their estimates. Since we are talking essentially about the management of the House, can the minister at least give us an undertaking, given the concern about government spending—and rightly so—that he will consult with his colleague, the government House leader, so that we can be assured that there will be a sense of priority on the part of the government House leader and the committees of the House with regard to the examination of estimates and that, notwithstanding any other government legislative program, estimates will receive priority by the committees?

Mr. Andras: I will certainly examine the practices. I myself have been party to those practices in terms of having taken the estimates of my former ministries before committees. To the best of my knowledge they have been examined before those committees. I appreciate that when we get down to the deadline there is often not enough time to go over them in detail. If that is what the hon. member is referring to, I will co-operate to the maximum, but I think it becomes a question of procedures to which all of us are party rather than government initiative by itself. However, I would be glad to look into it.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) a question. Given the fact that the amount of spending increase the minister has indicated is virtually nullified by the increase in inflation, and if we are spending about the same amount in this year's estimates as last year in real dollars, and if we have one million and more unemployed, would the minister please try in a brief way to justify what kind of fiscal conservatism we have at this time, and specifically, could he explain to us why such important human and job-creating areas as housing, for example, have been cut by $30.6 million for next year, and urban renewal spending by $1.6 million, and could he explain to the people of Canada why the government embarked on that course of action?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, on this occasion I do not want to go into detail on all the figures in the bluebook, but with regard to housing I believe there was a reduction in the capital budget estimate, to which the hon. member referred. However, as I recall there was an increase of about $267 million in the operating aspect of the housing program, and I think that represents a 70 per cent or 75 per cent increase. One would have to take the whole thing together. I appreciate that the hon. member has not had an opportunity to do more than pick out a few things—and I am not making any accusations or allegations—but I think there is a deeper consolidation he might want to make before he gets too far out on a limb and makes that kind of statement.

With regard to general philosophy we have experienced substantial increases year on year over the last several years, as the hon. member well knows. There are many philosophical differences which could be debated here as to which way is the best way to stimulate the economy or the best way to attract investment, create jobs in the private sector, or spend our way through the public sector, but as the hon. member knows, he is arguing about the degree of these things. There have been increases for job creation and manpower training. These are designed to increase the opportunity for people to get gainful work while the economy is still slack. I suppose it is a question of philosophical argument.

Mr. Broadbent: Assuming that the philosophy of the government remains constant—and that is politeness on my part—I would like to ask the minister how he can explain the difference in spending from the 1971-72 period, when roughly three times the amount was allocated to direct job creation programs, from that being allocated now in the estimates for the forthcoming fiscal year when unemployment in the coming fiscal year is expected to be much higher than it was back in 1971-72. If there is any consistency in the philosophy of the government, why is spending not at least at the same level in direct job creation programs now as it was back in 1971-72?

Mr. Andras: I must seriously argue with the hon. member as to the accuracy—albeit inadvertent—of that comparison. It has been a few months since I was directly familiar with tracing the size of expenditures through those years, but I certainly do not recall a three to one difference in those ratios, as the hon. member has indicated. I would certainly want to see a consolidation of the job creation, employment producing measures today compared with what they were in 1971-72 or in any other year. If the hon. member brought them all together, I really believe he would find that there has been a steady increase. I have some personal familiarity with this, so I will try to get the figures together in an honest comparison to see what the relevance is.

Main Estimates

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in terms of the area I represent there is a trend in the estimates which worries me, and that has to do with the Public Service of Canada. The minister made a great play of reducing the size of the Public Service, although not by much, but in terms of the people and the families which will be involved by quite a considerable amount. At the same time the estimates indicate an increase in the cost of outside consultants. I just wonder how the minister can justify that kind of thing, which is really exchanging, I suggest, one form of expenditure for another, and in fact is moving more and more in the direction of not using the talent which is in the Public Service already. Would the minister care to comment on that?

Mr. Andras: I think the hon. member would be wise to reflect for a day or two on his comment about the increase in the cost of outside consultants. This is most frustrating for me because I have been trying to explain privately to some of my colleagues on the other side that this has got off the track. That billion dollars includes the purchase through the provinces of manpower training and adult occupational training.

An hon. Member: Give us a breakdown.

Mr. Andras: There is a special breakdown in the blue book. I cannot remember the number of the page but I hope hon. members read that thoroughly. I do not think they will find there is a significant increase in outside consultants. There may be a significant increase in the totality of those expenditures, some of which are related to the desire of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) to see employment inducing measures in our expenditures. That particularly is manpower training with which I have some familiarity. In the generality, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has indicated that he said "a reduction" in the Public Service. That is not the case. It is a reduction in the increase of the growth of the Public Service; it is not an absolute reduction. Frankly I wish we could have zero growth. By rather detailed analysis of various departments, we have come to the conclusion that a 2,081 increase in the Public Service is what we can live with for 1977-78. I will be very blunt about it; I intend to keep examining that.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I undertake to look at the matter of consultants and I would like to have an opportunity to study the breakdown. I put to the minister, by way of preamble to a second question, that one of the concerns in the Public Service is the increase in the use of outside people to do jobs for which there is already expertise within the Public Service. I think we ought to use that expertise.

The second matter I wanted to raise is the question of the rules of this House. This is a matter I raised with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) the day before yesterday. I refer particularly to the power of the Public Accounts Committee to subpoena, to examine, to choose the evidence it would bring forward. The minister has indicated he is prepared to look at the committee procedures. Is he prepared to recommend to his colleagues an increase in powers that would give the committee more of the investigative potential it has within the parliamentary system? Is he prepared to stand behind the Public Accounts Committee and the powers it needs to investigate government expenditures?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, that is a pretty wide-ranging probe that the hon. member is enticing me into. I may have sympathy but I am not going to express it today. I will re-examine that with the utmost care.

If I may come back to the preamble, Mr. Speaker, if we have the expertise inside the Public Service for analysis of a particular subject, obviously we should not go out and duplicate that.

There are cases, however, when we want confirmation or a different approach, and I think this is reasonable if we do not carry it too far. Surely the hon. member, as protective of his constituents in Ottawa as he is, would not suggest that we should create a permanent establishment of consultative requirements when we could get the information required in two months by paying a fee. That way we would not have the growth in the Public Service that goes with a permanent employee, a secretary and all the other things concerned. Surely if this is done within reason it is the wiser approach.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to make it clear to the minister that it is my contention that the Public Service of Canada is in many ways under-utilized and under-challenged. One of his predecessors indicated that was a problem but we could pursue it in another forum.

With respect to the discussion of the estimates, it is a fact that many estimates are not examined by committees, and it is a fact that parliament approves billions and billions of dollars in estimates without any scrutiny whatsoever. Is the minister in a position to say what his view is with respect to the rules of the House? Can we find a proponent for change to allow scrutiny on an unlimited basis of some departments in some forums of this House, either this Chamber or some other forum—a forum for the examination of the policies of the government, its expenditures and programs? Do I find a sympathetic ear within the government for that purpose?

Mr. Andras: Within reason, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, pursuing that line of questioning, I do not have to remind the minister about one of the most important functions of parliament, a traditional role and a very important part of our responsibility, that is, to examine the expenditures of government.

The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) brought to the attention of the minister that in the last three years there have been examples where some departments have never had the first item of their estimates considered. One example is the Post Office. I find this to be incredible in view of the problems we have experienced with the Post Office over the past three years. When we think of the operation of that important department we wonder what kind of planning the government undertakes with respect to scrutinizing the affairs of its departments.

May I ask the minister if, with the government House leader, he will ensure the right of each committee to determine its own activity, and ensure that government estimates receive high priority in the organization of the affairs of the House? Will he give that undertaking now, notwithstanding the fact that he is not now going to institute other changes of a more substantial nature?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, that is the kind of question I have been receiving in different forms. I do not think I can add to what I have said already. The deeper I get into this the more I understand the need for time to move on it with better concentration. My information is that as a government there are some adjustments we are going to have to make in discussions with the Auditor General etc. A great deal of the rest of it is the decision of this House. I can only indicate some understanding of the concerns and a sympathetic response, but I will not make any specific procedural commitment at this stage.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I just want to make a proposal for the minister to consider with the government House leader. It seems to me it would be sensible for the minister to give an undertaking that he will at least ask the government House leader that these estimates be brought to the Committee of the Whole so that we can be assured no department will be left without being examined. That way we would know, with the time limit involved, that we have an opportunity of examining every department. That is a simple proposition. It does not require the instigation of any fundamental change in the procedures. It seems to me the minister could give that undertaking.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to look carefully at that representation.

Mr. Speaker: I shall recognize the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), followed by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse). I think that should conclude the questioning.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, one of the matters which has concerned members for a good many years is the apparent lack of effective control over Crown corporations, not just with respect to their day-to-day operations and not just with respect to little scandals which turn up, such as payments by AECL and kick-backs by Polysar, but the control of the expenditures, the borrowing and priorities which are pursued by the Crown corporations.

● (1620)

I want to ask the minister two questions. What effective control is exercised by Treasury Board over Crown corporations? Does Treasury Board have complete control of their budgets, that is to say, both their current and their capital budgets? Does it exercise control over their borrowing powers, and over priorities to be used in establishing borrowings? Does it have any role with respect to the disposition of surpluses which Crown corporations may have accumulated by the end of the year? Is any surplus remitted, in theory, to Treasury Board; does Treasury Board decide whether all of it or some of it shall be returned to the Crown corporation for development, in addition to other funds for which the minister responsible may ask? What type of control does Treasury Board exercise? It is extremely important for the House to know this. Certainly there is no adequate opportunity for hon. members to acquire this information.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, it would take a fair amount of time to respond to the specific parts of that question. Without generalizing too much let me say that so far as I am concerned there must be greater control of Crown corporations. I will be making specific recommendations, to which I may reasonably anticipate my colleagues will agree.

Mr. Mazankowski: Will there be recommendations for greater parliamentary control?

Mr. Andras: Yes. They may include greater control by the government, greater parliamentary control, and greater access by parliament to the whole system of information, annual reports, etc. I will not anticipate because I do not have those recommendations in my hot little fist yet; but I share some of the concern which has been raised.

This question brings to the fore another question, that of avoiding or at least of recognizing the danger of using financial control to gain other kinds of control over a Crown corporation. As you know, it is a fact of life that those who have the bucks have a lot to say about what should or should not be done.

An hon. Member: Why not have such control?

Mr. Andras: I am sure that there are a great number of enthusiasts in this House, in all parties, who would exercise such control in some Crown corporations, but we had better understand what we are getting into. As for financial control, I really have no argument about that aspect of the question. I think we all recognize that it is time to step in and gain a much clearer understanding as to the kind of authority which exists with regard to capital budgets, operating budgets, etc. Certainly parliament should have access to such information, to the maximum possible degree. It is time for certain procedures to be reconsidered.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am sure hon. members will be pleased by the minister's reply. We shall be looking for action along the lines he indicated. I point out that it is the right and obligation of both the government and parliament to exercise financial control, because public moneys are being spent, and if a Crown corporation incurs debts and cannot by virtue of its operation retire them, the taxpayers of Canada, finally, will have to repay the money owing.

The minister partly anticipated my second question. I should like to know not only what control Treasury Board has but what control parliament has. During all my years as a member of parliament I have never seen a thorough investigation by any committee of the House of Crown corporations. I recognize that it is not possible to do this between the present time and May 31 because the committees to which estimates are referred will be dealing with those departmental estimates. Therefore it is not likely that they will be able to devote much time to Crown corporations. But it seems to me that it would be possible, if the government were prepared so to do, to refer the annual financial reports of Crown corporations to appropriate committees, which could deal with those questions after we have disposed of the estimates. That procedure would give the respective committees the opportunity to look into such entities as Canadian National Railways, which has not been examined for many years, Air Canada, and other Crown corporations about which the public knows little and about whose financial management the members of this House know little. I do not know how much the cabinet knows about the financial administration of some large Crown corporations.

Mr. Mazankowski: Right on.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I ask the minister if it is not possible to work out with his colleagues and with House leaders a modus operandi whereby it would be possible to bring the financial reports of each of our Crown corporations before some standing committee of the House some time during the year? We could do this even if it means that some committees must come back for a while during the recess and spend some time considering these questions. Personally, and I am sure the minister must feel the same way, I feel guilty when I go back to the public and tell them that we have not looked at these—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I think I anticipated some of the hon. member's comments with regard to access by parliament to annual reports, etc. Really, I cannot say more than I said a few minutes ago. However, I will raise one point. I shall need a few more weeks, hopefully, to digest some of the details, and formulate some ideas which are developing along the line indicated, as well as other ideas. If this matter is treated as hon. members seem to agree it ought to be treated, we will need to consider the question of time and availability. This point is not unrelated to the earlier point concerning the examination of estimates of each department.

One should stop to think of the incredible amount of detailed work the committees will need to do and the time it will take to conduct such an examination. If we go that route, we shall need to be selective. We shall need to rotate our examinations perhaps over a period of two, three, four, even five years, to make sure that every department is examined. We shall need to be selective if we are to examine in detail, or if we are concerned for any reason. I will be glad, when we have time, to sit down with hon. members and work this matter out on a productive and prospective basis.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I simply want to endorse what already has been said by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) and the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) with regard to the examination of estimates. Having served for two years as chairman of the Public Accounts Committee and waded through the Wilson committee report, and the report of the independent review committee, all of which dealt with the evident lack of control over government spending, I would endorse what has previously been said and suggest to the minister that some vehicle must be found whereby not just one or two departments but all departments of government are examined by parliamentarians. When we return to our constituencies and are asked why we allowed certain expenditures—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. While I appreciate very much the sentiments of the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse), I must say that this period is provided in the Standing Orders for the putting of questions to ministers, not for the making of statements on remarks already made. If the hon. member wishes to ask a question, perhaps he will put it forthwith.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I was trying to lay the groundwork for my question. Since it is proposed to televise the proceedings of parliament, and since implementation of that proposal will make it almost impossible for members to sit in committee while the House is being televised, may I ask the minister if he has discussed this matter with his colleagues, in the hope that the estimates of at least six departments will be brought to the House? We, as members of parliament, should have the opportunity to examine estimates here, in committee of the whole. I ask this question, bearing in mind the May 31 deadline.

We examined neither the Post Office nor the Department of Labour estimates last year or the year before. Would the minister consider referring those estimates to this House, so that the committee of the whole House will have the opportunity to consider fully such departmental expenditures? Would the minister say what he plans along these lines?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can elaborate further on what I have already said. With respect, the hon. member has asked very much the same kind of question to which I have been responding, but I will be glad to consider it. I will not give a precise and detailed commitment now. I must do an awful lot of work on this question before I can do that.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

[English]

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 294, 794, 1046, 1124, 1416, 1477, 1511 and 1561.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member mentioned questions Nos. 1124 and 1416.

Mr. Goodale: That is correct, Mr. Speaker. There was an error in the list that was circulated earlier for the information of hon. members.

ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT COUNCIL—CONTRACTS FOR PROFESSIONAL SERVICES

Question No. 294—Mr. Orlikow:

1. For the fiscal year 1975-76, what contracts for professional services were let (a) for studies, surveys and analyses into present or future policies, programs or information analysis, and their efficiency and effectiveness (b) into the examination of the administration or internal operation of the Atlantic Development Council?

2. How much was committed on each contract and to whom?

3. What were the comparable figures for the fiscal year 1973-74?

Mr. Ed. Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Atlantic Development Council is as follows: 1. Nil.

2. Nil.

3. Please refer to Sessional Paper No. 301-2/556 of June 2, 1975.

SURVEILLANCE—EAST AND WEST COASTS

Question No. 794—Mr. Leggatt:

As of this date and as of January 1, 1977, what types and numbers of ships and aircraft of the (a) Canadian Armed Forces (b) Canadian Coast Guard (c) Department of the Environment on the (i) West coast (ii) East coast will be or are available for deployment within the new 200-mile sovereignty zone to defend national security and to protect fisheries and natural resources on the seabed?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of National Defence, Transport Canada and the Department of the Environment as follows: (a) (i) November 1, 1976; Destroyers, 8; Operational Support Ships, 1; CP-107 Argus Aircraft, 6; CP-121 Tracker Aircraft, 3; January 1, 1977: The same as for November 1, 1976. (ii) Destroyers, 12; Operational Support Ships, 2; Submarines, 3; CP-107 Argus Aircraft, 20; CP-121 Tracker Aircraft, 15; CH-124 Sea King Helicopters, 35; The same as for November 1, 1976. (b) Since the new Sovereignty Zone will not come into force until January 1, 1977 no requirement exists for ship deployment and no resources can be identified as being available for the period October 25 to December 31, 1976. (i) On the West Coast, the two weatherships Vancouver and Quadra will be available for 30 ship days from January 1, to April 1, 1977 for deployment within the new 200-mile Sovereignty Zone for protection of fisheries and natural resources on the seabed. These two vessels based at Victoria, B.C., are sister ships and have the following particulars:

Length m. (ft.)	Breadth m. (ft.)	Draft m. (ft.)	Horse Power kW (HP)	Displacement mt (L.T.)	Endurance n miles
123.23 (404.29′)	15.24 (50′)	5.33 (17.5′)	5,597 (7,500)	5,694 (5,605 tons)	10,400

(ii) On the East Coast, it is planned to make available, on a part time basis, 13 Canadian Coast Guard vessels for a total of up to 135 ship days from January 1 to April 1, 1977 for deployment within the 200-mile zone. The ships involved include Search and Rescue vessels and icebreakers which have primary tasks that cannot be changed under the existing order of government program priorities and, the use of these vessels for dedicated surveillance will be dependent on weather, ice regime, and emergencies at sea. Because of these factors affecting normal Canadian Coast Guard operations, some of the surveillance planned by Canadian Coast Guard vessels may only be possible by multi-tasking these vessels. The vessels and their particulars are listed in the following statement. (c) (i) Dedicated Fisheries Surveillance: three offshore and 51 inshore vessels; Multi-tasked Research Survey and Surveillance: three offshore and 45 inshore vessels; (ii) Dedicated Fisheries Surveillance: Currently four offshore vessels with two additional vessels scheduled to join the fleet in early 1977; and 41 inshore craft; Multi-tasked Research Survey and Surveillance: six offshore and 39 inshore vessels.

It is planned that the Canadian Coast Guard will also provide some 200 ship days for Fisheries Surveillance in 1977-78 and in subsequent years, but the number to be provided in each year and the proportion on each coast has yet to be determined and will depend on the capability of the Department of the Environment to meet the requirements of the Surveillance Program with their own vessels and those of the Department of National Defence. Other than ship-based helicopters, which may be used when available for transfer of personnel and short range surveillance, it is not planned to use Coast Guard aircraft in support of this Surveillance program.

PUBLIC WQRKS—POST OFFICE, DESCHAMBAULT, P.Q.

Question No. 1,046—Mr. Matte:

1. Has construction of the post office at Deschambault in the Constituency of Champlain been stopped and, if so (a) on what date (b) for what reason?

2. Was the work, undertaken by the Department of Public Works, approved by the Quebec Department of Cultural Affairs and, if not (a) for what reason (b) did the plans of the future post office meet the specifications of the Quebec Department of Cultural Affairs?

3. Which firm obtained the contract and for what amount?

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): 1. Yes. (a) October 6, 1976; (b) discussions between the Department of Public Works of Canada and the Department of Cultural Affairs of Quebec lead to mutual agreement that the originally proposed design should be modified.

2. No. (a) Approval was not requested; (b) discussions between the Department of Public Works of Canada and the Department of Cultural Affairs of Quebec lead to mutual agreement on certain design revisions.

3. Les Entreprises Justin Désy Ltée, Saint-Séverin-de-Proulxville, $102,992.

RESEARCH PROJECTS ON THE EFFECTS OF PONCEAU SX (RED # 4)

Question No. 1,124—Mr. Yewchuk:

What research projects is the Department of National Health and Welfare sponsoring or conducting on the effects of Ponceau SX (Red # 4) on human health?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): At the present time, the Department of National Health and Welfare is not undertaking any research studies on the health effects of Ponceau SX (Red # 4). This colour has been tested in several species of animals both by the Department in the 1960's and several other institutions in subsequent years. No adverse effects have been noted in the past regarding cancer or reproduction nor is there any new evidence to suggest this colour poses a health risk. This colour has a very restricted use in foods. Scientists of the Department are not aware of any studies presently underway on this colour. However, they are continuously monitoring world literature for new developments.

OIL SPILL CONTAINMENT AND REMOVAL EQUIPMENT ON THE BRITISH COLUMBIA COAST

Question No. 1,416—Mr. Wenman:

1. As of December 1 (a) 1976 (b) 1974, how much oil spill containment and removal equipment did the government own on the British Columbia coast and, in each case, how many were (i) slicklickers and what was their type, optimum rated capacity and locations (ii) slurp skimmers and what was their locations?

2. For the same years, what was the length and type of oil boom in each west coast location?

Order Paper Questions

AGRICULTURE RESEARCH STATION, FREDERICTON—RESEARCH ACTIVITIES

Question No. 1,477—Mr. Howie:

1. Are any specific research activities taking place at the Agricultural Research Station at Fredericton, New Brunswick under the heading of Horticulture and, if so, what are they?

2. (a) What research, if any, is being conducted in New Brunswick regarding the development of strains of grain adaptable to local growing conditions (b) what is the budget for this research (c) in what location is it being conducted?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): 1. In 1976-77 the following programs are included: (a) Potato production, 17.7 man-years, $1,427,000.; (b) Blueberry, 1.0 man-year, $75,000.; (c) Tree fruit, 0.3 man-year, $23,000.; (d) Environmental quality, 2.2 man-years, $201,000.; Total, $1,726,000.

2. (a) The Fredericton Research Station shares with other Stations a portion of the corn and cereal breeding program for Eastern Canada which amounts to 9.2 man-years and $780,000., which places emphasis on breeding, cultivar evaluation, early seeding, winter hardiness and harvesting losses. (b) and (c) The 1976-77 budget for the corn and cereal breeding program at the Fredericton Research Station is: (a) Wheat, 0.1 man-year, $9,000.; (b) Barley, 0.1 man-year, $9,000.; (c) Oats, 0.1 man-year, $9,000.; (d) Corn, 0.1 man-year, $9,000.; (e) Problem soils, 1.0 man-year, $73,000.; Total, $109,000.

ESTIMATED SAVING IN ADMINISTRATIVE COSTS BY INCORPORATING MAXIMUM GIS WITH OAS PAYMENTS

Question No. 1,511—Mr. Herbert:

Has the government considered incorporating the present maximum supplement to the old age security payments as a total universal payment and, if so, what is the estimated saving in administrative costs?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No. However, if maximum Guaranteed Income Supplement payments were incorporated with all Old Age Security as a universal payment, there would be an annual saving of approximately $10 million in administrative costs, and an increased cost in payments of about $1.3 billion.

FISHERIES IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT—LOANS IN NEWFOUNDLAND

By constituency, between April 1 and September 30, 1976, what is the breakdown of the loans made in Newfoundland under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act?

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): The requested data is not maintained by electoral district but only by province, by lender, and by purpose, for the following reasons: (i) Loans are made by banks to customers who may not live in the same constituency as the bank. (ii) Constituency boundaries change from time to time; thus comparative statistics cannot be maintained on a consistent basis.

ADVANCE PAYMENTS FOR CROPS ACT

MEASURE TO FACILITATE MAKING ADVANCE PAYMENTS FOR CROPS

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-2, to facilitate the making of advance payments for crops, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Hon. Judd Buchanan (for the Minister of Agriculture) moved motion No. 1:

That Bill C-2, an act to facilitate the making of advance payments for crops, be amended in Clause 2 by striking out lines 5 to 7 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

""crop" means grains, oilseeds, root crops, such other field crops as are prescribed, honey and maple syrup;"

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It might be useful to draw to the attention of the House that there have been the usual discussions with regard to our proceedings on Bill C-2 this afternoon. I understand there is general agreement that any recorded votes that might be required to dispose of the report stage proceedings of Bill C-2 will be deferred.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin) moved Motion No. 2:

That Bill C-2, an act to facilitate the making of advance payments for crops, be amended in Clause 4, by adding immediately after line 33 at page 3 the following new subsection:

"(3)Where a suitable organization willing to assume the obligations of this Act does not exist, the Minister may guarantee to a bank the repayment of a loan made to a producer under the same terms and conditions as prescribed in this Act for an advance made by an organization.

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Motion No. 2 is contrary to the bill. It goes beyond the scope of the bill. We would appreciate the guidance of the Chair as to whether this motion is acceptable.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has had some occasion to examine the motion in a cursory way, with the suggestion of some reservations about the procedural regularity of the proposed subclause. However, I think there ought to be an opportunity for the hon. member to hear the objections to the motion and to defend, if he wishes, the procedural regularity of his motion. It is obvious that any division to be taken on this motion is to be deferred. Perhaps we might now hear the argument of the parliamentary secretary in support of his contention that the motion in some way offends the procedures of the House, after which I could perhaps review the matter and see if it is possible to give a decision immediately or, if not, defer it until the time the division is to be taken.

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of Bill C-2 is to allow groups of producers to get advance payments. The government undertakes to pay interest costs and so on. The hon. member's motion says, I quote:

"(3) Where a suitable organization willing to assume the obligations of this Act does not exist, the Minister may guarantee to a bank the repayment of a loan made to a producer under the same terms and conditions as prescribed in this Act for an advance made by an organization."

In other words, Mr. Speaker, this bill which aims essentially at helping organizations of producers would not be applicable any more; it will be applicable only to individuals. For this reason, it differs little from other bills adopted by the House to assist farmers and we believe that it changes considerably the philosophy of the bill. At least that is what the minister thinks at this time and we believe, Mr. Speaker, that this would not be the purpose of the bill which was to help organizations of producers and I think that the philosophy of the bill will be changed, and that is why we think it is not acceptable to the minister at this time.

[English]

Mr. Schellenberger: Mr. Speaker, I must disagree with the hon. member. The royal recommendation states that this is an act to facilitate the making of advance payments for crops. The bill proposes that an organization be the intermediary between the farmer and the bank. All my amendment intends to do is state that where no organization exists there is no need for an intermediary and, as a result, the farmer should be allowed to go directly to the bank. As I read the bill, that in no way takes away from the ability of an individual or group of farmers to facilitate their interest in getting an advance payment for a crop. I do not believe that this amendment is out of order.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I understand the concerns and the sentiment which the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) is endeavouring to bring before the House in the form of this amendment. I do not in any way wish to stifle his opportunity to discuss those concerns, which I am sure he holds very sincerely. However, the amendment he has presented in the form of motion No. 2 is in danger of being out of order.

I would refer Your Honour specifically to the royal recommendation. In its own words, it recommends "the appropriation of public revenue under the circumstances, in the manner and amounts and, for the purposes set out in the measure entitled "An Act to facilitate the making of advance payments for crops." The only mechanism specified in the legislation for accomplishing the purpose of that recommendation is to provide for the availability of cash advances through the auspices of farm organizations. This is clearly explained in the definition clause of the bill and, later on, in some of the clauses dealing with the mechanism to be used. In other words, cash advances to producers of the crops defined in the legislation would be available through farm organizations. This is clearly the intention of the bill.

● (1640)

The hon. member's amendment seeks to depart from that principle by providing that cash advances, or loans as they might be called, I suppose, in layman's language, should be available not only through farm organizations but under other arrangements subject to a government guarantee. This is really quite a different principle from that outlined in the bill, wherein it is stated that cash advances may become available only where farm organizations are involved. This is clearly set out in clause 4(1). I will read the opening words: "Where an organization proposes to make an advance to a producer—", and so on. The hon. member's proposed subclause would go beyond the provision set out in clause 4 and would provide that individuals would be in a position to secure advances without availing themselves of the services of a farm organization. It goes not only beyond the terms of the legislation as presently drafted, but beyond the terms of the royal recommendation, for which reasons I respectfully submit it is out of order.

I do not wish to stifle the hon. member's opportunity to present his views on the subject, but I suggest that at a later stage he will have an opportunity to express his concern. Unfortunately, he might not be able to present his views at this stage, because the amendment he proposes is, I suggest, out of order.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Of necessity, Mr. Speaker, much of what has been said on the procedural point has really been addressed to the specifics of the amendment. However, it seems to me we have heard more argument against the substance than we have heard in favour of it, and I think it might be easier for Your Honour, as well as for the House generally, if we could hear more argument about the merits of the proposal. I should like to indicate my support for the suggestion Your Honour made earlier—that it might be the fairest thing to do to let the debate take place and defer any ruling until it has been completed. I notice there has been no argument raised from the government side to the effect that this proposal would involve the expenditure of money.

An hon. Member: Oh, yes it would.

[Mr. Goodale.]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Not of more money than would otherwise be expended under the bill. The argument has been directed to the avenues through which the money goes, not to the total amount involved. In any case I hope Your Honour will permit the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) to present his motion and defer your decision until later.

Mr. Speaker: For two reasons I am prepared to do precisely that. The first is that from a procedural point of view the matter leaves me in some doubt and therefore I should like to defer a decision on purely procedural grounds. Moreover, I would need to understand more clearly the technical operation of the part of the statute under consideration. I know it is contemplated in the bill that payment be made through producer organizations, but whether that is a principle of the bill or simply a method of carrying out the principle of the bill is not clear to me at the moment, and the only way to resolve this doubt is to hear argument in debate which may throw some light on the technicalities of the measure. I will therefore call the motion in the name of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin.

Mr. Schellenberger: Mr. Speaker, during the debate on the second reading of Bill C-2 I rose to take part in the discussion. At that time, along with colleagues on both sides of the House, I expressed approval of the minister's proposal to provide for advance payments for crops. Since 1958, western farmers under the auspices of the Wheat Board have been receiving advance payments for cereal crops, and I feel it is only right that other farmers who produce crops capable of being stored should receive cash advances as well, in order that they might be able to take advantage of the best possible prices for their commodities.

The bill is basically a good one, but I believe there is room for improvement. It is thus with the intention of strengthening the measure rather than weakening it that I present the following amendment for consideration:

Where a suitable organization willing to assume the obligations of this Act does not exist, the Minister may guarantee to a bank the repayment of a loan made to a producer under the same terms and conditions as prescribed in this Act for an advance made by an organization.

Adoption of this amendment would allow for added flexibility in the administration of the legislation. As the bill stands at present, an individual producer will be excluded from the benefits of the legislation if (1) there is no organization in close proximity to the farmer concerned, (2) there is an organization but it is unwilling to undertake the responsibility of administering the act, or (3) the individual producer concerned has no desire to join an organization. Let me take a few moments in which to discuss these three contingencies in a little more detail.

In many cases there is no organization in existence which could perform the intermediary function of providing advance payments. Despite the minister's devotion to supply management systems, many farm products are still not covered by such a scheme. To exclude these products because of the lack of an organization structure would be unjustifiable. Even where organizations do exist, they may not meet the definition of the word "organization" contained in the bill and hence they would be excluded from the benefits of the legislation.

● (1650)

I offer here the statement by Mr. Kleiman, the chairman of the Ontario Wheat Producers Marketing Board. He has acknowledged the lack of suitable organizations in some areas and for some products, and has suggested that the banks could replace the organizations for the purpose of administering the advance payments in such cases. In his appearance before the Standing Committee on Agriculture on December 14, 1976, Mr. Kleiman said:

> Since so few organizations exist that could fit the description, we have questioned whether or not the banks, as defined in the bill, could act as a lending body. We realize there is a great need for the lending body to be close to the actual marketing functions to administer the loan but still do not see how some producers are going to be able to avail themselves of the benefits of the legislation.

Mr. Kleiman pointed out that farmers are accustomed to dealing with banks, so that they would already be in a position to have an avenue open to them for a further loan. By allowing the banks to undertake the advance payments, all Canadian farmers who have storable crops would be given an equal opportunity to take advantage of those advance payments. The legislation would thus be more democratic and a larger number of Canadian farmers would derive benefit from it.

During one of the committee hearings the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) suggested that in cases where a proper organization did not exist the producers could go to a bank and the bank would transfer the contract for the administration of its marketing provisions to any area where an organization existed. From reading the committee reports of the discussion on Bill C-2, it is evident that a number of witnesses and members were very concerned about what would happen to producers for whom no suitable organization was available. In its present form the bill also denies payments to a producer who belongs to an organization which is unwilling to undertake the responsibilities of administering the advance payments. This lack of willingness on the part of producer organizations is a very real possibility, a possibility that the officials of the Department of Agriculture have not really looked into, in my opinion.

During the December 8, 1976, meeting of the Standing Committee on Agriculture, my colleague, the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil), questioned the minister as to what organizations he had consulted with and what their reactions had been to such consultation. The response of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) was unequivocal. He stated:

> I have not personally met with an organization on this bill at this point in time.

Pressing his point, the hon. member for Moose Jaw asked whether officials of the Department of Agriculture had met with any organizations to discuss the terms of this bill and whether they were agreeable to operating under such terms. Replying for the minister, Mr. Leggat, director of the grains and crops division of the Department of Agriculture, stated:

> A very few, Mr. Chairman. I have talked it over with the Ontario wheat producers and I think there was one informative session with potato producers from P.E.I., but we have had no real consultation with them, though we intend to do so and hope to do so before the regulations are written, so that we can get some of their ideas incorporated into the administrative end of operating this scheme.

The fact of the matter is that the Department of Agriculture has been very lax in its consultations with producer organizations which, under the terms of this bill, are the only groups that are allowed to make advance payments. The proposals for the "after the fact" discussions are somewhat senseless. Since producer organizations are to be given the entire responsibility for administering the act, they should have been consulted from the beginning. There are a number of organizations which have yet to be heard from. Their input is important and their views should not have been neglected.

Producer organizations may well find that the cost of administering the act is prohibitive. As pointed out by Mr. Kleiman during the December 14 meeting of the Standing Committee on Agriculture:

> The cost to an organization to administer such a program is not a small undertaking, and we are concerned that the organization should have to accept the risk of default proposed in this bill.

In order to be in a position to administer the advance payments, an organization will need bookkeeping facilities, a filing system, secretarial help and numbers of forms. They will have to get in touch with farmers. If the loan is not called in, they will have to send out notices. If the producer does not pay or if he has not yet sold, the organization will have to get in touch with him.

The Department of Agriculture has stated that the Canadian Wheat Board has experienced little difficulty in terms of the cost of administering the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, and that therefore there will be no problem with producer organizations meeting the administrative costs of Bill C-2. They state that this point is not really relevant here. So far as Bill C-2 is concerned, we are talking about large and small organizations. These organizations will be asked to administer the act. Structural changes in the organizations and among staff members will be necessary before they are in a position to administer these payments. For a small organization, the cost of bringing about these changes may be a burden; as a result, they may decide simply to opt out of this provision in the legislation.

During the committee hearings it was pointed out that a $5 levy has been imposed by the elevator companies to help defray the cost of administering the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. While this is a relatively nominal sum, I feel that the fee charged by organizations for administering Bill C-2 will have to be much higher. Regardless of the size of the organization, there will be a basic level of administrative cost. Because costs are not necessarily proportionate to the size of the organization, smaller organizations with fewer members will have to charge a higher fee than the larger organizations, and a much higher fee than the Canadian Wheat Board. The Canadian Wheat Board is set up in such a way that they have elevators and agents throughout the prairie region. This the organizations do not have, so they would have to be close to the farmers and producers in order to provide the service that is necessary. It is possible that the fee may be very, very high to keep the organization above ground when it is administering this plan.

As it stands now, Mr. Speaker, the bill also denies cash advances to producers who do not wish to belong to an organization. There are many independent farmers in this country—and I pat them on the back—who have made their way in this system without belonging to any organization. This was brought forward by the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Côté) during the committee hearings. He said that all the producers who are accustomed to selling at the retail level and storing their own production, because they were smart enough to organize their marketing, are not covered by this bill.

I feel it is most unfair to exclude non-organized producers from the benefits of this legislation. The banks should be given the power to perform the intermediary function in cases where farmers do not want to join an organization. Officials of the Department of Agriculture state that they are reluctant to get banks involved in administering the advance payments because it would impede the orderly marketing of crops. However, my colleague, the hon. member for Moose Jaw rebutted this argument very effectively at the committee hearing of December 7, 1976, when he stated:

I do not think the fact that the loan if it were made through a bank would have any effect on the orderly marketing aspect of it at all because if you make the loans through an organization you still do not have any more control of directing the time and place of marketing.

Banks are uniquely suited to the administration of the advance payments act. Having dealt with farmers for a number of years, the major banks are keenly aware of the risks and constraints involved in agricultural production in Canada. They have the staff and the ability to do these things without extra cost. The successful handling by banks of the government guaranteed farm improvement loans program and a number of other programs is testimony to their competence in farm lending.

I hope that the House will give serious consideration to the proposed amendment which, I believe, is in order and does not take away from the royal recommendation. As I have stated before, the amendment only gives flexibility to the administration of advance payments. It does not detract in any way from the principal intent of the bill.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to say at the outset that we in this part of the House have some sympathy with the amendment. What the amendment proposes is what producers have to do quite often in any case.

If a producer has a cellar full of potatoes or has sheds full of other storage products such as corn on the cob, and the market is not readily available, either locally or at a distance, it is common practice for him to go to his bank manager or credit union manager and get a loan until such time as he can market some of his crop. The only difference is that he has to pay interest on that loan from the first day. In this case, if the amendment is adopted, the producer could still go to the same credit union or bank manager and get a cash advance on his crop, which is what he might have done many times before, only this time it will be under a government guarantee.

I agree that there is no doubt that with many types of produce in different parts of Canada there are few if any producer organizations in existence and, if there are, they are not very strong. The amendment states: "where a suitable organization willing to assume the obligations of this act does not exist . . .". In such a case the individual producer should be able to go to his bank or credit union manager for a cash advance under the provisions of this act. Where there are marketing co-ops, for example, in potatoes or other commodities, and they are fairly widespread, undoubtedly the producer will go through that marketing co-op.

I should like to sound one cautionary note here. I presume that in the administration of the act, assuming the amendment is accepted, one thing that the bank or credit union manager will have to do will be to ascertain, if I have three or four cellars of potatoes in storage and am unable to market them for some period of time in the future, and want a cash advance, that I have those potatoes properly stored and that they are not rotting in the cellars. This would mean that there is an onus not only on the producer but also on the institution lending money under this act. I know that under the cash advance program many farmer friends of mine who come to the elevator with oats or barley are well known by the agent. That agent would know if a farmer has not a bushel left in the bin and therefore he will not get a cash advance. He might be able to get it somewhere else, but the elevator agent knows all his customers, and knows when a fellow did not have a good crop that year, or had fed most of his grains to his cattle and bootlegged some of it to other places. His bins are empty, and if he tries to get a cash advance the elevator agent would know about it.

The lending institution would have to bear some kind of responsibility under the provisions of this act for the loans that are made, but I do not see that as a handicap. It would not hurt the credit union or bank manager to be more aware of the situation of his individual customer in any case.

Assuming the amendment is in order, Mr. Speaker, of which you will advise us later, I see no harm in it. In fact there is no doubt that in some parts of the country it will not be particularly useful, such as in my province, but there is no doubt that in other parts of Canada it will be very useful to thousands of individual producers until such time as they get larger and more effective producer organizations which can look after this for them. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we are in favour of the amendment.

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, in rising to support the amendment put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger), let me begin by saying that during the rather brief second reading debate and throughout the committee proceedings my colleagues and I have raised several questions with respect to the provisions of this bill. It is interesting to note at the same time that to a very large extent the same questions or problem areas were raised by the witnesses who appeared before the committee and presented briefs.

I would like to commend the hon. member for Wetaskiwin on the amendment before us. The amendment deals with our main concern. We are convinced that, without this amendment, advance payments under this legislation would not be available to a significant proportion of otherwise eligible producers—producers who are not served by a properly constituted producer organization.

We recognize that grain producers in central and eastern Canada and grain producers outside of the designated area of the Canadian Wheat Board have been seeking this kind of legislation for some time, and for very good reasons. We recognize as well that this government and this parliament have an obligation and a definite responsibility to provide such a program, particularly in view of the fact that a similar program has been in effect in western Canada for some time. In fact, the government has attempted to defend the provisions of Bill C-2 by drawing a comparison to the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act introduced about 19 years ago by a Conservative government.

On the surface this might appear to be a logical and appropriate defense to use, but does the government suppose that the situation as it was 19 years ago, in an area fully represented and served by the Canadian Wheat Board, is comparable to the present situation in central and eastern Canada where loans will have to be made by a multitude of marketing boards, agencies, commissions and producer organizations?

For this reason alone, the conditions and circumstances of those producers within the Canadian Wheat Board area and of producers to be served by this bill, although similar, are certainly not identical. It must be evident now to the government that the bill as it stands cannot give equal access to all eligible producers because not all of them, by any means, can be represented for the purposes of this bill, by a properly constituted producer organization.

If, on the other hand, the amendment before us gains the support of hon. members opposite and becomes part of the bill, a major inequity would be removed, and the same service which is rendered to producers within the Canadian Wheat Board area by the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act would henceforth be available to all other producers in Canada.

During the earlier debate on this bill my colleagues and I raised a number of questions, and in a prepared opening statement the minister tried desperately to dismiss these questions, devoting six of his ten page opening statement to an attempt to refute what we thought were constructive criticisms. It should be noted that those very same questions were raised by witnesses who appeared before the committee and, indeed, some of our doubts were shared by government members opposite. In particular I might mention the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) who, although he represents a strictly urban riding, must be complimented for his contribution to those committee hearings.

I sincerely hope that in the future the hon. member will maintain his interest in legislation directed primarily to rural communities and that he will attend the Standing Committee on Agriculture on a regular basis.

During the second reading debate I suggested that in view of the way this bill was drafted its title should more accurately read "advance payments with limitations on some farm stored crops". Since the first meeting of the standing committee I stressed that our major concern is the inability of some producers to take advantage of this bill because of the absence of an adequately constituted organization or merely because of an insufficient volume of crop in the producers' areas.

Since the introduction of this bill I have indicated my party's support for the intent and principle of this type of legislation and, indeed, our desire for its early passage. In fact this debate would not be taking place today had we not given encouragement and certain commitments to the government House leader.

In all fairness I want to indicate as well that many of the questions raised in the second reading debate have been answered by departmental officials, and I thank them for their input and for their clarifications. However, let me remind them that in future the simple addition of explanatory notes would save us much valuable time. This observation is not purely a personal one; it is shared generally. In fact my good friend from the county of Oxford, Mr. Charles Munroe, the current president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, delivering his brief to the committee, noted the following:

> The main questions that can be raised about the bill relate to uncertainties as to how the bill, if it becomes law in its present form, might or should be interpreted, and whether some further spelling out of the intent might not be included in the text of the bill itself.

Those words support my contention and underline the need and desirability of more explanatory notations.

We can see no major problem in most areas because of the existence of many marketing boards, agencies, commissions and producer organizations, but it is very possible to foresee that there will be producers in areas where properly constituted organizations do not exist for a variety of reasons. For this reason and for others—for example, an insufficient volume of product from a certain area or region—we can easily predict that a number of producers will not be eligible for advance payments under this legislation. This is what the amendment before us today is all about. This amendment, if accepted, would not destroy the thrust and intent of this bill. On the contrary, it would simply ensure that all producers could participate in this program. It would ensure that all producers are extended an equal opportunity of access to the legislation.

I submit that without this amendment this bill would create disparity between producers and would deny advance payments to a significant proportion of otherwise eligible producers.

I readily admit that in areas where there now exist producer organizations, or organizations consisting primarily of producers, or even in areas where producer organizations can be formed without major difficulty, these organizations are the appropriate bodies to administer and operate this program. I would like to repeat that because I think there might be some misunderstanding among government members as to the thoughts of my colleagues. We support the idea that, where appropriate organizations do exist, these organizations should administer the program.

Surely this minister and this government must realize that their responsibilities extend not just to some producers and not just to most producers, but to all producers. I draw the attention of all hon. members to a portion of the brief of the Ontario Wheat Producers' Marketing Board in which the following is indicated:

> Since so few organizations exist that could fit the description, we have questioned whether or not the banks, as defined in the bill, could act as a lending body. We recognize there is a great need for the lending body to be close to the actual marketing functions to administer the loans, but still do not see how some producers are going to be able to avail themselves of the benefits of the legislation.

The Ontario Wheat Board chairman, Mr. Kleiman, went on to support the intent of the proposed amendment by stating the following:

> Yes, because most producers deal with banks, we would like to see the opportunity for all producers. As you say, a number are not covered, and one would think all farmers should have equal opportunities.

Those are the words of a well qualified farm leader who heads an organization which, even in its present form, no doubt could participate in this program. However, because of his knowledge, experience, and understanding of the agricultural industry, Mr. Kleiman was quick to point out the problem and, in turn, to offer the obvious solution.

The hon. member for Scarborough East, a member of the government party and a former cabinet minister, said in committee that he would be interested to know whether some lender other than an organization as defined in the bill might not still be a possibility. He said he was encouraged, in the search for an alternative, by the brief of the Ontario Wheat Producers' Marketing Board. In fact the hon. member was encouraged to the extent that he suggested an amendment to the effect that where no organization exists in an area, or some association of producers exists but cannot qualify under the act and where significant amounts of a crop are grown in that area—an area, I repeat, where there is no properly constituted organization—a producer might obtain an advance from an approved lender which is not an organization, provided that the lender enters into an approved form of contract. That is precisely what this amendment provides, and the minister himself indicated the worthiness of such a provision and said he wanted his officials to consider it in greater depth.

It should be noted that in addition to the hon. member for Scarborough East, my hon. friend on the government side, the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Coté), has shown his interest and concern about this very same point. My hon. friend, who has been a member of this House for a long time and who has taken an active role in the standing committee, and in all matters dealing with agricultural legislation, expressed a personal desire in committee to see the banks acting as lending agents.

Those who oppose this amendment do so on the presumption that this provision would destroy the orderly marketing thrust in this bill. This objection deserves to be met and discounted. We know, for instance, that there are presently approximately 100 marketing boards, commissions, agencies and producer organizations in various forms. Departmental officials have indicated that 30 to 40 of these are likely in a position now to provide advance payments to their producers, and if we give the government the benefit of the doubt it is possible, after some changes within the remaining organizations, to meet the requirements of the legislations and to provide advance payments to their producers as well.

In all, I think it would be reasonable to assume, in view of what presently exists, and in view of what could take place in the near future, that about 80 per cent of producers of storable crops could have access to advance payments under this bill. Thus it would be fair to assume that the encouragement and development of a more orderly marketing system will be extended to 80 per cent of producers. We think that the impact of such an orderly marketing thrust upon 80 per cent of producers will be no mean achievement. And there is nothing in the amendment before us which would diminish this achievement or undermine the orderly marketing thrust of this bill which, as it stands, will reach only 80 per cent of producers—those producers who belong or can belong to a properly constituted producers' organization. The amendment, Mr. Speaker, concerns itself with the remaining 20 per cent—a significant number of producers who would not be eligible for advance payments simply because they are not represented by an acceptable organization.

● (1720)

The orderly marketing of storable crops is a fine objective, but relief for the individual producer is a far finer objective. This government and this parliament cannot be satisfied with less than making that relief available to every producer in every area, whether he is served by an organization or not. Of course, I realize Mr. Speaker, that in so saying I might run afoul of the Department of Finance which sees the whole question in a different light. The Department of Finance takes the view that the whole philosophy behind the bill is that of accomplishing orderly marketing. According to the Department of Finance there can be no provision for unorganized producers because there is no reason for the government to pay interest if it is not accomplishing something, and if the producers borrow directly from a bank the government would have no reason to pay interest.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, if the Department of Finance thinks that for technical, legal, or other reasons some 20 per cent of producers cannot be accommodated within the scope of this bill, then it should tell us. It has not done so and therefore I take it that there are no such objections. If, on the other hand, the Department of Finance wants to assist agriculture or, at least, is content not to hinder agriculture, it would be better advised to direct its attention in future to tax reform and, as agricultural critic, I might suggest it begin with the capital gains aspect.

One would expect the Department of Agriculture to consult with the Department of Finance on the monetary and financial aspects of all legislation, but I would hope that we have not yet reached the point where the Department of Agriculture takes its advice on agricultural policy from the Department of Finance.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I commend my colleague, the hon. member for Wetaskiwin, on this amendment, and I plead with all members for their support. If accepted, Mr. Speaker, a greater measure of orderly marketing will be accomplished, and an equal opportunity will be extended to all producers of storable crops, regardless of where they live.

[Translation]

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure to introduce to the House a bill to help all Canadian farmers whose crops are storable in the efficient marketing of their products. As everyone knows, under Bill C-2, concerning the making of advance payments for crops, the government will guarantee bank loans to organizations of recognized producers for the marketing of their products, and will pay the interest on those loans. Canadian producers often have to cover their production cost soon after harvest. Accordingly, markets are then literally inundated with farms products and such temporary overabundance can only result in falling prices at the very moment when the farmer needs the revenue most badly.

[English]

The Advance Payments for Crops Act should reduce the pressure on farmers to market in a period when a heavy influx of the crop into commercial channels generally depresses prices. It will produce a more orderly marketing pattern. It should decrease, if not eliminate, potential transportation bottlenecks at peak postharvest periods. And it will help Canadian farmers to get reasonable returns for their products.

The legislation will also have benefits for the consumer. By not flooding the markets after harvest, Canadian producers will be able to provide a continuing flow of produce to the consumer, at a reasonable cost. Because Canadian producers will have access to the advance payments program and because the crops could be stored after harvest, the produce could be brought into the market when required. This ensures consumers a continuous supply, eliminating possible shortages and the consequent price rises later in the season.

It is a pleasure for me to support an amendment to Bill C-2. After consultation with and consideration by the Standing Committee on Agriculture, we have agreed to amend Bill C-2 to include honey and maple syrup as crops eligible for advance payments. The Advance Payments for Crops Act has been kept flexible for just this purpose—so that as many Canadian farmers as possible can take advantage of the benefits under the legislation. The act provides the legislative authority for the federal government to guarantee the repayment of advance payments on storable crops. In addition, it will guarantee the interest on such advance payments when they are made in accordance with the provisions of the act.

Honey and maple syrup producers have similar problems to other Canadian farmers. The Canadian honey crop, which was about 46½ million pounds in 1975, had a market value of over $23 million. Our maple syrup industry, which is centred in Quebec and Ontario, produced 1.4 million gallons of syrup in 1975 with an estimated value of over $12 million.

The advance payments program will enable Canadian honey and maple syrup producers to receive interest-free advances in the critical post-harvest period when they need cash to cover their costs of production. All to often, the rush to sell the crop results in congested markets or depressed prices. In addition, it can result in the loss of efficiency in marketing and loss of profitability. We have in the past assisted different producer groups of honey and maple syrup under several other federal acts. Although these two commodities were not mentioned in the original draft of the legislation, I agree with the Standing Committee on Agriculture that these resource-based products should be covered specifically in the act to avoid any confusion.

For the producer organizations set up to market and promote honey and maple syrup, only slight modifications will have to be made to their present organizational structure so that they can take advantage of this legislation.

[Translation]

Farmers can make use of that legislation by gathering within legally incorporated associations. For the time being, more than 20 organizations or groups will be eligible as soon as the legislation is passed and the related regulation introduced. Some other farm organizations, 10 to 15, will be able to avail themselves of the legislation by bringing a few changes to their structure so that they meet the requirements of the act. The rationale for the bill is nothing new in Canadian agriculture. The act will allow farmers to get a cash income for their storable crops when they need it most. That is why farmers and wheat, oats and barley producers out of the area under the authority of the Canadian Wheat Board also asked to make use of interest-free advance payments.

The objective of the program as explained in the bill is to allow producers to get cash payments. The government undertakes to pay the interest, and in case of non-payment by a producer, it ensures that payment to the association. For the crops covered by the bill, there are no such marketing controls as those applied to wheat, oats and barley under the Canadian Wheat Board system concerning delivery quotas and common pricing. To assess the best means of giving advance payments to the producers, as provided by the law, we had to draft a bill which would limit the guarantee given by the government to producers and organizations providing adequate controls to guarantee the repayment of the advance. I should draw your attention to the fact that producer organizations, and consequently the individual producer himself, must expect to pay for the administration of this program. However, it should be possible to come to an agreement similar to the western agreement, making it possible for the producer organizations to get part of the administration expenses back.

My last words are for those who spoke before me; I want to thank them for their positive attitude towards this bill, which without any doubt will serve all Canadian agricultural producers. Western wheat, oats and barley producers have been given these advance payments for 20 years now. For 20 years now other Canadian producers have wanted to take part in similar programs.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger). He mentioned that the minister had seldom sought advice on that bill. Mr. Speaker, if indeed there is a government minister who seeks advice, it is the Minister of Agriculture. Two, three or four times each week he meets producer organizations. This week, for example, he did not attend our sittings because he met seven different producer organizations for western Canada. This shows how much the Minister of Agriculture is interested in meeting farmers where they are, that is at home or out in the field.

Therefore, when the hon. member claims that the minister has not had enough consultations, I think he is not being fair because, quite the contrary, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) consults a great many people. Another thing I would like to add on this point, Mr. Speaker, is to point out that it is impossible to consult everyone for the simple reason that there are organizations which speak on behalf of groups of people. For instance, the Quebec Federation of Agriculture has openly endorsed this bill; this federation groups several producer associations and none has raised objections to the principle of the bill. That is why the minister did not see fit to have them come up to the department for consultation, since they were in agreement with the principle of the bill right from the beginning.

On other occasions when the Minister of Agriculture introduced other bills in the House, he never failed to consult the organization or associations of producers or farmers concerned by the bill being introduced in this House.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, there is the fact—as the last speaker mentioned—that many farmers in Canada have managed well without belonging to an agricultural organization. They have succeeded without having to organize. Mr. Speaker, I say to these farmers: Well done! But I think it is ever more difficult for a farmer to manage without the help of an organization to protect his interests because it is a well known fact that competition is fierce in many areas of agriculture. It takes only a little opening in our borders to affect an entire production or an entire farming sector and without organizations to bring pressure to bear upon the government to take remedial measures, the farmer has a very hard time managing his farm.

That is why I think the minister is right when he urges Canadian producers to organize, to get together and set up marketing boards. I think that if we could define the minister's personal philosophy, we could say that since his appointment, the current agriculture minister has tried to see to it that farmers are no longer the underprivileged of our society and are considered in the same way as other agencies, associations and organizations, able to claim their rights. It is with this in mind that the minister has always asked the producer organizations to get together and defend their rights. I know something about these farming areas, I am thinking for example of New Brunswick where I come from, the potato area. The hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain) knows what I am referring to and if this sector has been in trouble for many years, it is simply because of the lack of organization, of a potato marketing board.

Some years are tremendous, but sometimes the price is so low that some farmers must abandon their farms; I know it is so; I knew many farmers, many potato producers in the 50's and 60's who who had to give up their farm for lack of organization.

These are my answers to certain arguments presented in the House. Again, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the minister I would like to thank hon. members who took part in this debate for the positive way they did so.

[English]

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I know that a commitment has been made and I will not abuse it. I wish to speak not much more than two or three minutes. I suggest that the hon. member who just spoke should speak in support of this legislation in that area to which he just referred. He ought to speak about the requirements for organization in New Brunswick and elsewhere. Such organization is needed in the worst way.

I agree with virtually everything he said about this legislation, but for one thing. I believe the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise), and the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) touched on this point. Those hon. members represent widely separated geographic areas, but all were agreed in saying that this bill discriminates. It says to those who are not organized, "If you wish to take advantage of this legislation, you must organize." If the Department of Agriculture thinks that the amendment before the House will cause difficulty in administration, perhaps the minister, by virtue of the power to delegate which is vested in him, can say to provincial ministers, "Well, you can administer this provision for us in cases involving certain unorganized agricultural entities."

During discussion of this bill there was great doubt as to which entities can be considered as organized. Actually as things now stand it is questionable if the Prince Edward Island marketing board for potatoes, in its present form, could be considered an eligible organization. This bill, therefore, casts doubts on virtually every organization in the Atlantic area. There is doubt as to whether they would have authority to administer and guarantee loans.

I am concerned about the compulsory nature of the legislation. It says to people, "You must organize." I am concerned about the elimination of a great many people from eligibility. I say this because occasional crops are grown in many area of Canada. They are storable and marketable, and deferred sales may lead to requests for loans. These producers are left out. Many market gardeners operating in the peripheral areas of cities will find themselves locked out, because there is no marketing agency for them. As the hon. member for Wetaskiwin said, by virtue of their own capabilities they have developed their own marketing system. Are they to be eliminated from eligibility, under the terms of this act?

This is not democratic legislation. It is very definitely autocratic legislation. It is compulsive. It is discriminatory.

Has the minister consulted or in some way been in touch with independent farmers? I realize the Department of Agriculture in Ottawa would be faced with certain administrative problems if it were to go to individual farmers. I suggest it delegate that to the provincial ministers who, through their various structures, can on occasion come to the aid of farmers who need this help.

It is high time the government took a look at the democratic requirements of all society rather than being discriminatory and selective in the application of its wishes and compulsive in respect of agricultural organizations. It does not fit with the reality, dispersal and the nature of the men who farm in this country.

I ask the government to accept this amendment so that not a percentage but all farmers in Canada with storable crops are eligible. I agree with the spokesman on behalf of the government in virtually everything that he says. However, when he was through speaking, it was extremely obvious that the bill is discriminatory. It deletes a multitude of farmers from eligibility. It is not democratic. I ask the government to reverse its position. It is bad to make a mistake, but it is most regrettable to make a mistake, recognize it, and make no change. That is precisely what is happening with this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): There are no further speakers. In accordance with the announcement made earlier today, the decision as to the acceptability of the amendment stands deferred.

CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

MEASURE TO PROTECT PRIVACY OF INDIVIDUALS

The House resumed, from Friday, February 11, 1977, consideration of the motion of Mr. Basford that Bill C-25, to extend the present laws in Canada that proscribe discrimination and that protect the privacy of individuals, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Matane): Mr. Speaker, when I started to speak on this bill last Friday, I mentioned some evidence of progress made in the present situation. Today, I would like to speak about certain weaknesses in this situation, and I shall speak first of the part concerning the protection of the privacy of individuals, and then of the part concerning discrimination.

Mr. Speaker, what strikes me about this bill as it concerns protection of the privacy of individuals is that it contains many weaknesses which must certainly be corrected during the study in committee if we really want to protect the rights of the individual. The right to privacy is one of the main ingredients of the right to integrity and basic liberties.

As emphasized in the legislation passed by the American Congress in 1974—

[English]

The privacy of an individual is directly affected by the collection, maintenance, use and dissemination of personal information by federal agencies.

[Translation]

There cannot be any real privacy when tens of people are collecting data about each citizen who are denied the right to have access to their files and who do not know to what extent these files to which they cannot have access have an incidence on their daily lives.

Once again, this bill is surely an improvement over the present situation but, in so far as we can compare it with the one which the American Congress adopted two years ago, I think we will notice at the committee stage that further important improvements should be made. I shall give you only a few examples. The first clause relating to the protection of privacy says peremptorily that the law cannot be applied, when a citizen is denied some information, pursuant to any agreement between a minister of the government of Canada and a minister of a provincial government.

To my mind, setting such a principle in the first clause of a bill amounts to admitting that governments have priority over the individual and, as far as I am concerned, I believe in only one principle, namely that governments, states and nations should stand for the individuals and not against them. When it is said at the beginning of a bill that governments can always agree not to respect the right of the citizen to privacy, without giving any reason, I think of the principle in clause 2(b) of the bill which says, I quote:

(b) the privacy of individuals should be protected to the greatest extent consistent with public order and well-being.

I say that principle is not being respected when you go on to read right after that governments can agree among themselves that they will not publish information gathered about citizens without giving any reason.

Another example, Mr. Speaker, is clause 52(2) which stipulates that when a government agency collects information concerning a citizen for specific reasons, it can pass them on to other federal agencies. The first thing that strikes me here is that the agency is in no way obliged, contrary to the situation in the United States, to see to it in every way possible that the information is accurate and that it does not exceed the needs for which it is being compiled.

A second thing strikes me: the ease with which the information can be spread around: that is found mainly in clause 52(3) where it is stipulated that the consent of the citizen is taken for granted when he fails to reply to a letter requesting his authorization; then, his consent may be presumed to have been given. Here is once again another example of a situation that I find unacceptable.

Similarly, clause 53 states that a minister may always refuse to divulge information if that is detrimental to federal-provincial relations. Similarly, clause 56 states that federal information banks must wherever possible, and I quote, those are the words used in clause 56, operate in compliance with the law. Mr. Speaker, from a technical point of view, I have rarely seen more laxism because it states that the law must be complied with wherever possible. What is that if not giving an arbitrary and discretionary power to the various federal agencies collecting information?

Furthermore, clause 59. (1)(b) empowers the minister who has received a recommendation from the Privacy Commissioner recognizing that a citizen's complaint is founded, not to take any action on the recommendation of the Privacy Commissioner. What difference is there with the American 1974 Privacy Act system where the administration must, as it should, obey the recommendation of the privacy commission, otherwise it will be liable to be sued for damages. In this instance, if a department does not comply with the law and the Privacy Commissioner serves notice to that effect and recommends to the government that it take action on the founded complaint of a citizen, a minister may always ignore that recommendation and throw it to the garbage.

Once again, though an improvement, and I agree it is, this bill contains a lot of gaps, and it seems reasonable to me that we should hope that it would give people the same protection as in the United States. Certainly we cannot through one law ensure that men's and women's rights, individuals' rights to privacy will be as protected as in the United States since over there part of their individuals' rights are protected by the Constitution; unfortunately, the rights that the federal government also wanted to protect in the Constitution through amendments did not go through at the time the Victoria Charter was put forward, but we could at least hope that this bill, insofar as it involves citizen privacy, include similar safeguards as in the act passed by our American counterparts.

As I said the principle embodied in clause 2(b) of the bill is the recognition that:

(b) the privacy of individuals should be protected to the greatest extent consistent with public order and well-being.

In view of the loopholes included in Part V it is my contention, Mr. Speaker, that such a basic and commendable goal has not been reached, and I shall take the opportunity at the committee stage to put forward amendments which hopefully should be considered favourably, both by the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General.

As far as Part I is concerned, that is the part dealing with discrimination, it is an improvement over the first legislation that was introduced some months ago, especially since it includes a new ground of discrimination, the one involved with physical handicaps. But the list included in clauses 2(a) and 3 are far from complete in my view. I would refer for instance to the proposed prohibited grounds of discrimination which are race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, age, sex, marital status, convictions for which a pardon has been granted and, in matters related to employment, physical handicap.

Mr. Speaker, I submit the list is faulty in many respects. First, the terminology should be changed. For instance, I feel that "religious persuasion", or better still "religious liberty" would be much preferable to "religion". Second, certain recognized grounds of discrimination are not covered, such as political opinions, social circumstances, sexual orientation or illegitimacy, which is a lifelong stigma.

Similarly, when referring to a conviction for which a pardon has been granted, there is reason for concern at the outset because, if I do not misinterpret the legislation, it is forbidden to reveal that a person has already been granted a pardon since the very objective of the Criminal Records Act we passed in parliament is to alleviate the burden of a mistake which has already been made and regretted, and from which a person has been rehabilitated. Similarly, Mr. Speaker, how long can we discriminate against a person who has not been granted a pardon but who has been rehabilitated and who paid his or her debt to society? I recognized that there was great progress as far as employment for the physically handicapped is concerned. Even epileptics are mentioned in this legislation. Could we not extend this further to include those handicapped who suffer from mental weakness but who have not lost all their faculties?

Mr. Speaker, I also have a few amendments to put forward, just as some members of the committee have, I am sure. They relate to clause 3, which is the fundamental clause of the bill.

I see that it is six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

PROPOSED COMMITTEE STUDY OF DANGERS OF ARSENIC CONTAMINATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the clear medical danger arising out of exposure to arsenic, and in view of the recent revelations of elevated arsenic levels in Cobalt, Red Lake, Moira Lake and Gloucester township in addition to the previously publicized Yellowknife levels, and in light of the failure of the government to establish safe standards for arsenic exposure despite its having knowledge of the dangers for over two years, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House empowers the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs to conduct an investigation into the dangers of arsenic contamination and the adequacy of existing standards and efforts to deal with the problem.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion can be presented to the House only with its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SUGGESTED IMPLEMENTATION OF HALL RECOMMENDATIONS ON RAILWAY PENSIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in light of the urgency of this matter I ask leave to present a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That this House urges the government to take immediate steps to achieve the implementation of the recommendations made in the report of Dr. Noel Hall on Canadian railway pension plans, dated in September, 1976 and published in January, 1977, particularly the recommendation that all railway pensions be indexed in accordance with the rise in the cost of living, and that special consideration be given to the case of all older railway retirees without delay.

Mr. Speaker: Under the provisions of Standing Order 43 unanimous consent of the House is required for the presentation of such a motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

RESEARCH

REQUEST FOR INCREASED GRANTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing and urgent necessity.

Since Canadian researchers are now in a distressing situation because of the government restriction program and the freeze on funds for scientific research and as the federal government policy on that matter has been disastrous so far and that scientific research is, in scope and in nature, the best long term investment, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That the House call upon the federal government to take immediate necessary action so that all agencies concerned, including the National Science Council of Canada, the National Research Council of Canada and the Medical Research Council may benefit from the assistance which is needed by all Canadian researchers to further their scientific work for the betterment of man's condition.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DEPARTURE OF AMBASSADOR WARREN FROM WASHINGTON—DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF REPLACEMENT

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I might begin by saying that we checked this morning and learned that 14 ministers of the Crown are in Ottawa today—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: —and, although we certainly understand and approve the idea of ministers getting around the country, we are concerned because, while 14 ministers are in Ottawa, there are only seven in the House today.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: My question is to one of those, to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. My question relates to the departure—

An hon. Member: Here's Lalonde.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Paproski: The minister of nothing.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I think the minister of nothing just said something.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps we would all do well to start again.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I apologize for overlooking the presence of the minister "without".

My question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs relates to the departure of Ambassador Jake Warren from Washington. It appears that the announcement of that departure was made inadvertently by the minister and, as of this morning, it appeared that the minister's position had not yet been officially communicated to our embassy in Washington. In light of the damage to Canada's international reputation, the personal embarrassment to an outstanding public servant in the person of Ambassador Warren—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: —and the damage that this whole comic opera atmosphere can do to the discussions between the Prime Minister and the President, will the Secretary of State for External Affairs take the opportunity to tell the House of Commons what is going on?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Paproski: You keep quiet, Lalonde; you are nothing but a corporal now.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Lalonde, stick to your pills.

Mr. Jamieson: —I welcome the opportunity to indicate to the House exactly what happened. Let me begin by saying that the questions of the Leader of the Opposition were clearly drawn, for the most part, from a newspaper story which appeared this morning in the Montreal Gazette.

An hon. Member: No, it came from Ivan Head.

Mr. Jamieson: I doubt if they could have come from any other source. But, if they have, let me go back to the fact, namely, that the story to which I am referring and which contained, basically, the substance of the question asked by the hon. member, the story written by Mr. Ben Tierney, is totally groundless and without foundation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: In so far as the second part of the question is concerned, about an announcement having been made by myself, let me emphasize again that I made no such announcement. I did what I think all members of the House would expect me to do in the circumstances. I was asked a question by a newsman who, from his own sources, had heard of Ambassador Warren's pending departure from Washington. He asked me a question and in conformity with what I think is my reputation, I did not try to be evasive. I told him the facts of the situation.

The facts of that situation are these: Ambassador Warren advised me in October of last year of his desire to be moved from Washington at some mutually convenient time. Certainly, it was not to be beyond the two years which he had indicated initially he was prepared to serve, which would be up to the middle or end of June, as I recall it, of 1977. At that point, and it was an informal discussion, I suggested that he talk to the appropriate people in Ottawa, which he did prior to Christmas. I think this is reasonably common knowledge, certainly among the parties concerned.

Prior to Christmas, the arrangements were concluded for Ambassador Warren to terminate his terms in Washington at the appropriate time, namely at the end of the two-year period. There was no relationship to the Prime Minister's visit to Washington. Indeed, in October when we discussed this, we did not even know that President Carter would in fact be the President of the United States at this time. I want to emphasize again there is no relationship whatsoever. I repeat that it is a total fabrication. If there is anything further I can add to this, because I agree that it is a most unjust embarrassment to Mr. Warren who has been an extremely good public servant of Canada—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: —I can assure you I will do that.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the record is now clear, although I do not think that the House will accept the suggestion that we should blame Mr. Tierney entirely for the embarrassment this affair has brought to the country. When does the Secretary of State for External Affairs expect to announce the replacement to Ambassador Warren? Will that announcement come in the near future? We would also appreciate knowing whether the replacement will be a career diplomat or whether the appointment will follow the pattern of ambassadorial appointments by this government to London, Paris and Brussels.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, once again I can say without qualification that the matter quite literally has not been discussed in terms of replacement because there was no anticipation nor is there now that Ambassador Warren will be leaving, as I believe some of the stories state, immediately, or anything of that nature. The position is that Ambassador Warren's term does not expire until June. I think I am right in saying June, certainly mid-year. There has not been consideration of a replacement. Therefore, I cannot answer the second part of the question because I have not discussed it with anyone as yet.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the minister has already indicated that he has been seized of this information since October. It did not break to him yesterday as it did to the rest of the country. Surely, there has been some consideration of the question of a replacement in the three or four months that have intervened. Since the matter has now broken, can the Secretary of State for External Affairs tell us whether he intends to make an early announcement as to the nature and the person of the replacement to Ambassador Warren and when that might occur?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, may I again explain that there has not been consideration of this matter even though I have been aware of it since October. Hon. members opposite who are familiar with the public service will know that there is an annual review of ambassadorial transfers and appointments which takes place about now, in February and March of each year. It involves a very large number of transfers. Therefore, it would normally be considered and will be considered in that context. That is the reason for not answering the hon. member. On the second part of the question, I am sorry I have forgotten the precise nature of it.

Mr. Fairweather: Whether you are going to be the new ambassador.

Mr. Jamieson: I do not have any nominations at the moment, but I know of certain members opposite who would not be opposed to being approached.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Oral Questions

POSSIBILITY OF CAREER DIPLOMAT REPLACING AMBASSADOR WARREN IN WASHINGTON

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, that rather off-hand remark by the Secretary of State for External Affairs raises the question whether the government has any disposition regarding the appointment of a career diplomat or some other type of person to this position. Can the minister indicate whether there is a disposition to appoint a career diplomat to replace Ambassador Warren in Washington?

• (1420)

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, without in the least seeking to be evasive, the hon. member knows I believe personally, and hon. members on both sides of the House agree, that there are occasions when it is appropriate to choose someone other than a career diplomat, but in this particular case absolutely no consideration has been given to who will be the next Canadian ambassador to Washington. I can assure the hon. member and the House of this.

HEALTH

ALLEGED FAILURE TO ESTABLISH PROPER STANDARDS FOR LEVEL OF ARSENIC IN AIR—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Can the hon. gentleman inform the House why two years after the letter from the head of the air pollution control section of the Environment Protection Service in the Northwest, warning his colleague in Yellowknife of pending drastic reductions in arsenic permitted in the workplace, and one year after a request from the Director of the Bureau of Chemical Hazards in Health and Welfare that the Department of the Environment take steps to control arsenic air emissions because of the clear dangers from arsenic poisoning, nothing has been done to establish acceptable standards of arsenic levels in the air by his department?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): For an excellent reason, Mr. Speaker: because it is not my department that sets the standards.

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: In the absence of the minister who is certainly co-equal in responsibility, I am directing this question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Since his officials will play a central role in the establishment of such standards and since the warning to which I referred is more than a year old and came from an official within his department, I would like to ask him, as the man who is responsible at the national level for health standards in Canada, why he has done nothing about it.

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Once again the hon. member is totally wrong and incorrect. There is in the House now the acting minister of environment. He should therefore direct his question to the minister responsible, not to me.

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: Will the minister undertake in this serious matter, which should not be dismissed by quibbling debating points and which affects in a fundamental way literally the lives of Canadian workers, to make a statement tomorrow, in the House to tell us why, after more than two years, no action has been taken by the government of Canada?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, had the leader of the NDP had the common sense to ask his question of the right person, he would have learned that, following this letter, a joint committee has been set up by the Minister of Environment to consider every aspect of this issue. So far as I know, appropriate standards will be determined through consultation between the industry, the workers concerned and the government.

MANPOWER

CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—INQUIRY IF GOVERNMENT INTENDS TO INCREASE FUNDS ALLOTTED

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Considering that, according to Statistics Canada, the unemployment rate for January and the beginning of February is the highest we have had since 1953, and considering also that the funds provided for the Canada Works Program, particularly for the first phase of it, are clearly inadequate, would the minister tell the House whether the government has been planning to increase the budget of this program?

[English]

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Not at the present time, Mr. Speaker. We are looking at the applications which have come in. It is a new and innovative program which has found great acceptance in the country and I want to look at all the applications to see what we should be doing in this area.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

UGANDA—PROPOSAL THAT DEATH OF ANGLICAN ARCHBISHOP BE INVESTIGATED

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs; I have given his office notice of the question. The hon. member for Greenwood and the hon. member for St. John's East, and I think I could say all of us, are associated with the posing of this question. Will the minister express to the Ugandan authorities the distress felt by members of parliament and other Canadians at the tragic deaths of the Anglican archbishop of Uganda and two cabinet ministers; and will the minister urge the Ugandan authorities to have an independent inquiry into these deaths under the aegis of the United Nations or the Commonwealth?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is quite right in saying that his question reflects the views of many members of this House who have spoken to me since my arrival here just half an hour or so ago. I think all of us are appalled by the incident, which I have to confirm to the House has been reported and is indeed factual, in which the Anglican archbishop and two others were killed in the manner reported. We will, of course, make the necessary representations which the hon. member has asked for, and I would hope sincerely that there will be a disposition on the part of the Ugandan authorities to accept the independent investigation to which the hon. member has referred, whether through the agency that he has mentioned or in some other way.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

REASON FOR INCREASE IN EXPENDITURES OF CROWN CORPORATIONS—MEASURES TO INCREASE ACCOUNTABILITY

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. Since one of the more disturbing aspects of the estimates is that while Canadians who receive transfer payments are being cut back, and while the bureaucracy has slowed the growth of its wage bill to a still excessive 11 per cent, Crown corporations are having their share of the public purse increased by nearly one-third. In light of the restraint which has been imposed upon the Canadian public, would the President of the Treasury Board advise the House why such disproportionate increases are necessary for this particular sector, which is supposed to be increasingly able to stand on its own two feet?

Mr. Stanfield: It is obvious why they need it.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Without commenting on the intervention there, Mr. Speaker, one would have to go over the individual cases. I can give some general examples of further capital for operating budget, approval in regard to increased exports by EDC and things like that, but I think—

Mr. Stanfield: Agents' fees have gone up; they are now indexed.

Mr. Andras: Well, I suppose they are subject to inflation like everything else; we will try to do something about that. I would have to go into more detail than time would permit in the question period. You would have to look at each one individually and do a subtotal on it.

Mr. Mazankowski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the public accounts committee, which has just spent some three months investigating the operations of AECL, has discovered a great deal of financial maladministration and ineptitude on the part of AECL, and having regard to the Auditor General's report which concludes that financial management in this particular corporation is completely inadequate, would the minister tell the House how he justifies the doubling of the expenditures of AECL from $200 million to $400 million?

Mr. Andras: I would be glad to deal with that report of the committee, Mr. Speaker, but it would also be a question to be addressed to the minister responsible.

Mr. Mazankowski: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the continuing testimony that has been received by the public accounts committee to the effect that these Crown corporations are not accountable to parliament, would the minister outline to the House whether he intends to take immediate steps to increase accountability of these Crown corporations to the committees or to the House of Commons, and thereby to the people of Canada?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will review Hansard and my replies to the very same questions which were addressed to me by the hon. member for—

Mr. Mazankowski: You were dealing with control, not accountability.

Mr. Andras: I was talking about control in my response to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

Mr. Mazankowski: I am asking about accountability.

Mr. Andras: If the hon. member would read the answers in Hansard he would see what I said, but I will repeat it. The answer is yes, we are going to seek very quickly more financial control for government and for—

Mr. Mazankowski: I am asking about the accountability factor.

Mr. Andras: The accountability factor I touched on yesterday, and the hon. member knows very well that this is a very much more complex issue in that—

Mr. Mazankowski: You did not. You talked about controls.

● (1430)

Mr. Andras: If the hon. member will read Hansard of yesterday, he will see that I raised the very question that in the interest of getting financial control we had to face the issue of whether we were going to go further and take over policy control of those corporations also.

Mr. Mazankowski: Not only did I read Hansard, I listened to what the minister had to say.

ALLEGED REDUCTION IN EXPENDITURES ON COST-SHARING PROGRAMS—TRANSFER OF COST TO PROVINCES

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister. Would he explain how he can legitimately use the word "restraint" when referring to a cutback in federal expenditures of approximately $970 million in cost sharing programs, when in reality the minister knows there is no over-all reduction in the cost of these programs but simply a bookkeeping entry to transfer costs to the provinces. I should like to ask the minister whether it would not have been more straightforward if he had made his comparison of this year's estimates on the same basis as last year's to reflect the true increase in government expenditures rather than ignoring the transfer of costs to the provinces, thereby giving a misleading picture of restraint which, I suggest, has been done for political purposes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): May I say, with the greatest respect to the hon. member, that it is rather curious to hear her referring to the use of certain expressions and statements for political purposes after her question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

POSSIBILITY OF APPOINTING COMPTROLLER GENERAL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): My question is again to the President of the Treasury Board. Given the fact that this will be a record level of expenditures by the government, and the Auditor General has said that the control of expenditures is effectively out of control, is the Auditor General contemplating appointing a comptroller general to administer the expenditure of these programs in a more effective and efficient fashion?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): It would not be the Auditor General who would appoint a comptroller general if that decision were taken, and no such decision has been taken.

Mr. Gillies: Perhaps the minister misunderstood my question. I asked him whether he would appoint a comptroller general on the recommendation of the Auditor General to look after a more effective control of the expenditure of these funds.

Mr. Andras: No such decision has been taken.

Oral Questions

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN

SUGGESTION HER MAJESTY BE ASKED TO OPEN OR CLOSE SESSION OF PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. In this year, the twenty-fifth anniversary of the reign of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth the Second of Canada, in view of her intended stay among her Canadian subjects during the month of October, will the government follow the course that was taken by the then prime minister in 1957, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, who invited Her Majesty, as he stated, so that Canadians on the whole would understand and appreciate that the Crown is an integral part of the parliament of Canada, and invite Her Majesty, as is being done now in Australia, to open parliament or, if the session is still in process, that it be concluded and she be asked to read the speech which is normally given at the conclusion of a session?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the right hon. gentleman, may I say that I referred to the incident he has mentioned in my statement on television, that during the right hon. member's period as prime minister I believe Her Majesty did open parliament and the occasion was televised. If we succeed in having television implemented in parliament—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: —it would be a certain way of bringing the presence of Her Majesty in parliament within the view of all the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: I make this point because I think it is quite relevant to the question asked by the right hon. gentleman. To my knowledge, the final arrangements with respect to the visit of Her Majesty to Canada have not yet been made, and certainly the suggestion made by the right hon. gentleman will be considered and related, if possible, either to the opening or closing of a session of parliament. I think it is a suggestion that is well worth considering.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman ended his reply in a way he usually does, with a suavity that quietens all opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask him this: The excuse that we need to implement the recommendation to televise parliament in order to carry out my suggestion leads me to believe that he has forgotten that in 1957 when I came to office the Queen was here and the occasion was televised. Ever since, the opening of parliament has been televised.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why is it necessary to add such extraneous matters as the excuse he has now raised? All that has to be done, as I suggest—and I hope the hon. gentleman will agree with me—is simply to carry on what has been done in the past, namely, to televise what happens in the Senate when parliament is either opened or closed by the Governor General.

Mr. MacEachen: I thought I was paying the right hon. gentleman a well deserved compliment by mentioning the fact that during his period as prime minister the presence of Her Majesty in parliament had been televised.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And ever since.

Mr. MacEachen: But I look forward to an improved system of television—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: —and that would make the event even more spectacular than the one to which he referred when he was prime minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

HEALTH

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO IMPROVE DIET OF CANADIANS—POSSIBILITY OF STUDY SIMILAR TO ONE CONDUCTED IN UNITED STATES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. A Nutrition Canada report released by the minister this week shows the general diet patterns in Canada to be similar to the ones identified by a major U.S. study released earlier this month by Senator McGovern which linked diet to six of the ten leading causes of death in that country. In light of the seriousness of this situation, as revealed in both this report and Senator McGovern's report, can the minister tell us what new initiatives he is planning to improve the Canadian diet?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, several initiatives are now under way. In the very near future we will be publishing a new Canadian food guide to replace the old one which will have been revised and brought up to date in terms of desirable eating habits for Canadians. In addition, there is a whole series of activities in the field of public information and education within the framework of my department's program "Vraie Vie". May I also mention the efforts made through leaflets and inserts put at the disposal of the public, leaflets sent with old age pension and family allowances cheques. There are also a number of publications made available to educators if they wish to use them.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary.

In the report of Senator McGovern in the United States, mention is made of the fact that the foods most advertised in the United States are those which contain the most fat, sugar, and salt, in other words those that are the most harmful to one's health. According to that report, people in the low income group and the aged are the most affected by that publicity. Is the minister going to make another study on the impact in Canada of that publicity on Canadian eating habits?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to congratulate the hon. member on the quality of his French. I wish to add that I shall take his suggestion into consideration. I shall discuss it with my officials and see whether such a study should not be undertaken, or whether we should merely transpose the study made in the United States to the situation in Canada.

SOCIAL SERVICES

EFFECT OF NEW ADULT CARE PROGRAM IN SOME PROVINCES—AGREEMENT OF PROVINCES TO NEW PROPOSALS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare regarding his new policy affecting adult care. His new policy means that he will now give the respective provinces some $21 per person in order to provide adult care services, thereby doing away with the cost-sharing program. I would like to know if the minister is re-assessing this proposed new financial arrangement with the provinces. This new arrangement will penalize provinces like P.E.I., Saskatchewan and Manitoba which have pioneered programs offering the best adult care services in the country. This policy would inhibit the improvement of services and reduce the quality of existing services. Is there no flexibility in the minister's mind at this time?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to advise the hon. member that there is so much flexibility that his information is out of date. As a matter of fact, the proposal will come before the House tomorrow for second reading. Legislation has been introduced in the House to the effect that there will be a $20 per capita grant rather than $21, and the federal government will continue to share the cost under the Canada Assistance Plan for a whole series of services provided to persons in need. It is a proposal which is different from the one the hon. member referred to, and it will be of appreciable benefit to the low income provinces.

Mr. Alexander: I appreciate the minister giving me that information, but let me ask him this: do Manitoba and Saskatchewan approve of the policy as it now stands? In light of the fact that the deadline for the new proposals passed one or two days ago, can the minister assure me now that all the provinces are in favour of the proposal he just enunciated?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: No. Mr. Speaker, I can tell the hon. member that as far as I know the province of Saskatchewan has neither accepted nor approved the proposal I mentioned. I have yet to receive the reply of the province of Manitoba. However, I can say to the hon. member that five provinces representing over 75 per cent of the population have already agreed to the proposal.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REASON ANNOUNCEMENT OF TERMINATION OF DUTIES OF AMBASSADOR WARREN MADE AT THIS TIME—SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION OF LEAK

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to get back to the lead question of my leader and ask a question by way of a supplementary of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I listened very carefully to his replies to question regarding the termination of the duties of Ambassador Warren. Given the fact that the announcement of the termination of Ambassador Warren's tenure at this time could only reflect poorly on the ambassador and could in fact cause embarrassment on the eve of the Prime Minister's visit to Washington, could the minister explain why this announcement would be released or leaked on the eve of the Prime Minister's visit to Washington?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on the matter of leaks, that is something over which I obviously have no control.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Things are worse than we thought.

Mr. Jamieson: I am, of course, speaking in a totally non-biological sense.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: However, I have explained to the House that indeed this is a rather good example of the dilemma which faces a minister or any other member who is anxious to be forthcoming with the media. Initially, the media got the story and asked me to confirm it. I did what I felt was the appropriate thing, which was to say "Yes, it is true", and then to go on to explain the situation, which I have done in the House today. I want to emphasize that it was not a formal announcement, and clearly it would not have been the most auspicious time, to say the least, to make such an announcement. It was simply a confirmation on my part of a report which had been obtained by the media.

Mr. McGrath: In spite of the fact that the minister has no control over non biological leaks—and we readily concede that—obviously as a minister he has to take responsibility for his department and for leaks which emanate from within that department. Given the announcement and the embarrassment this has caused the government and the ambassador, will the minister at least undertake an investigation within his department to see who is responsible?

Mr. Jamieson: Oh, yes, Mr. Speaker, and let me assure the House that if I find out, there may very well be some biological leaks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PENITENTIARIES

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO IMPROVE INSTITUTIONS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Solicitor General a question. There is now evidence coming from members of parliament serving on a special committee of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs with regard to penitentiaries which shows that these places are almost horror chambers. Men as young as 15 years of age are being subjected to disgusting sex acts. Is the Solicitor General now going to take a step, or is he going to wait for the report before getting rid of these horror chambers in Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I must say that one of the reasons why we set up a parliamentary committee was precisely to shed more light on the conditions in Canadian penitentiaries and try to educate some members of the official opposition who have always been reluctant—to endorse some improvements which we would have liked to make in the penitentiary system.

It is certain that criminal acts perpetrated in our penitentiaries and brought to our attention will always be prosecuted. In this case, the facts reported by the hon. member will be drawn to the attention of the British Columbia attorney general.

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: With the greatest respect to the minister, I appreciate that there will be a report, but there are reports appearing in the media about witnesses who are giving evidence—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: I wonder why the hon. member would laugh at this; it is very important. I wonder why the Solicitor General would wait and not take steps to clean up what I call horror chambers.

[Mr. Jamieson.]

[Translation]

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, not long ago in the House the colleague of the hon. member, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), asked me to delay any change and any new penitentiary construction program until the House committee made its report. Hon. members of the official opposition could perhaps agree to take a common position. As for myself, I do not intend to delay the proceedings of the House. As I said earlier in reply to a question of the hon. member for Yukon, we intend to carry out our construction program and close at last some of those fortresses in the country.

THE ESTIMATES

DATE OF REFERENCE OF DEPARTMENTAL ITEMS TO COMMITTEES

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the President of the Privy Council. With the tabling of the estimates yesterday, when can the House anticipate the motion allocating the various departmental estimates to the House committees? There are less than eight working weeks before the guillotine falls to close the study of those estimates. May we have the motion tomorrow?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Yes, Mr. Speaker, it will be put to the House either tomorrow or on Monday, but certainly at the earliest possible moment.

NATIONAL ANTHEM

DATE WHEN LEGISLATION WILL BE INTRODUCED

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, my question is to one of the 15 ministers present in the House; with 14 others being in Toronto. I would like to ask the President of the Privy Council when he intends to call item No. 10 on the order paper, respecting the national anthem of Canada.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I have already announced to the House the legislation which will be before the House for some time, and I do not see a moment in space or time in which I would be able very soon to call this bill.

MANPOWER

PRACTICE OF SUPPLYING WORKERS TO COMPANIES WHOSE EMPLOYEES ARE ON STRIKE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that Canada Manpower offices are referring scab help to companies where workers are on legal strike, such as in the case of Wyandotte Chemicals in Scarborough, Ontario and the Ottawa Journal, and in view of the fact that with unemployment at close to 8 per cent Manpower can virtually guarantee a steady supply of desperate workers as scabs to companies whose employees are on strike while at the same time denying striking or locked out workers UIC benefits under a guise of neutrality, is the minister now prepared to instruct his Manpower offices across Canada no longer to refer scab workers to plants where legal strikes are in process?

● (1450)

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the industrial dispute policy of the department is to maintain a neutral position in these matters and that is what we are endeavouring to do. We indicate to individuals who are looking for jobs that a particular plant is on strike. If they take it on their own initiative to report, that is up to them. They are advised in advance that the plant is on strike.

Mr. Rodriguez: A supplementary question. In view of the fact that the UIC is bound by clear legislation not to support workers on strike and maintains this supposedly impartial position, is the minister willing to recognize that Canada Manpower Centres which are supported by the taxpayers of this country from all sectors, are acting in violation of the spirit of impartiality and should review the regulations with a view to changing them?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I think the stance we have taken is correct. If an employer, who also pays substantial taxes, wants to make use of the Canada Manpower centres to indicate a job vacancy, we tell the workers that there is a vacancy but that the plant is on strike. If the individual opts not to go he is not penalized.

SYDNEY STEEL CORPORATION—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE IN SECURING ORDERS TO COMBAT UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Acting Prime Minister which relates to comments made by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce on opposition day in the House when he mentioned me in dispatches on several occasions for pursuing the government to get rail order contracts for the Sydney Steel Corporation. Knowing the minister's interest in this matter and his active participation, particularly with reference to the possibility of securing orders from Venezuela, may I ask if he is in a position today to at least give some encouragement to the Cape Breton area? I do not have to explain to the Acting Prime Minister the unemployment situation at the Sydney Steel Corporation plant.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member mentioned, I am aware of the situation at the Sydney Steel plant. Not so long ago, in company with the Minister of Transport, I had a meeting with the then president of the plant with a view to searching for possible ways to augment the order books of the Sydney Steel plant. All I can say by way of encouragement today is that the problem is very much before us and every step we can possibly take will be taken in the short term to assist the steel plant to secure orders.

THE ESTIMATES

ANTICIPATED INCREASE IN 1979—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board. When tabling the estimates yesterday he indicated the percentage increase over the previous year. I wonder if he could indicate what he anticipates the increase for the fiscal year 1979 will be—in other words, one further year. He gave that percentage last time when the estimates were introduced.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as I recall, any such forecasting was done by the Minister of Finance in his budget statement last May and not by the President of the Treasury Board when tabling the estimates. I will check on it but I am not prepared to make such a forecast now.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

COMMITMENT GIVEN CORPORATION ON INCREASE IN ESTIMATES—REASON FOR INCREASE

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In answer to a question on January 25 placed on the order paper by the hon. member for Vaudreuil, it was indicated a commitment had been given to the CBC for the coming six years for a 5 per cent real increase in their estimates, plus inflation. Could the minister indicate if that commitment has been given and if so, could he explain why there was a 16 per cent increase in the current estimates with respect to the CBC?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I would want to check the exact formula arrangement with the CBC but I am aware that there is a real growth—a commitment there for a period of time. I believe it to be 5 per cent. Since that is real growth it also probably reflects inflationary growth. I will check on it and make sure my answer is completely correct.

Oral Questions

COAST GUARD

OPERATIONAL DATE FOR NEW EQUIPMENT

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In view of the concern that exists on the west coast for the general condition of the coast guard capability in regard to the $63 million equipment program that was announced last May by his department, can the minister advise if there has been any change in this program and can he tell the House when this new equipment will be operational?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the M.V. Bastien City will be available for assistance to the fishermen during the herring roe season. In addition, the program which was outlined with regard to our coast guard facilities in total and our search and rescue facilities in total will be put in place. That means some additional search and rescue tasking will be given to vessels which are otherwise available. There will not be additional new equipment apart from that this year.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

BOUNDARY DISPUTES RESULTING FROM EXTENSION OF FISHING ZONE—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT ON SETTLEMENT

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs? On Tuesday, February 8, I requested a report from the minister on the boundary dispute between Canada and the United States. He stated that a series of meetings was held on this matter in Los Angeles and that further meetings will be resuming before the Prime Minister meets with President Carter on Monday next. Since the settlement of this boundary issue involves jurisdiction over the fisheries resources as well as national sovereignty over possible under water oil, gas and mineral development, has the minister any further information to give the House which will ensure there will be no disruption of Canadian fishing activity on the Georges Bank area as of March 1, especially since Ambassador Warren has returned to Canada and I understand he was one of our negotiators on this matter? At the same time will the minister indicate the progress being made by another group of the Department of External Affairs which is working on the maritime boundaries dispute between Canada and the United States.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in the precise way in which the question was phrased, relating to Georges Bank, I could answer briefly that these negotiations are progressing very satisfactorily. That would not tell the total story, however, in the sense that there is also some problem with regard to negotiations on the west coast relative to salmon stocks. This is for the short term or the interim arrangement which we are seeking to obtain for 1977.

[Mr. Andras.]

The further talks to which the hon. member referred began on Friday last week and continued into Sunday. The members of the Canadian delegation, who returned home, have already reported and will probably be going back again. In other words, it is a continuing negotiating process. It is still my expectation, and I believe I can say it is the hope and expectation of the United States authorities, that we can have in place by March 1 an interim arrangement on fisheries for 1977. The objective of this will be to ensure there is no significant change in traditional fishing patterns. This would be put in place with a view to obtaining a period without difficulty for fishermen in 1977 during which the longer term negotiations on the boundary might take place.

Mr. Crouse: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the economic importance of this whole matter to Atlantic Canada as well as the west coast, can the minister assure the House that it will be discussed when the Prime Minister meets with President Carter on Monday?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I have not the slightest doubt it will be. As I think the hon. member knows, I will also be in Washington at that time. It is my intention to see it is dealt with at the official level also.

RUMANIA AND CZECHOSLOVAKIA—SUGGESTED PROTEST OF ARRESTS MADE IN VIOLATION OF HELSINKI AGREEMENT

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have two simple questions for the Secretary of State for External Affairs which refer to the disregard of the human rights aspect of the Helsinki agreement by a number of east European countries. Can the minister explain to the House why his government is afraid—gutless would be a better word—to voice its concern and dismay to these countries without depending on the motion of an individual member? Second, why is the government limiting its objections to one nation only, the Soviet Union, as was witnessed yesterday by the refusal of government members as well as ministers to accept my motion extending this parliament's concern to the governments of Rumania and Czechoslovakia for similar breaches of the Helsinki agreement?

An hon. Member: You were told that.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is the first time in a long time that I have been referred to as gutless. Let me say to the hon. member that I would refer him to Hansard. I saw the response of the Acting Prime Minister and I thought it quite reasonable in the circumstances to suggest that the matter be discussed upon my return to the House today. I will be very glad to do that. There is no reluctance on our part to denounce the kinds of activities in various other countries to which the hon. member has referred. It is a question—and unfortunately I have to say this in public—of looking at this matter on a mutually agreed basis so that we can have a satisfactory result, as indeed we did have on Monday.

Mr. Jelinek: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I always assumed that a motion presented under Standing Order 43 was for parliament and not for one minister. I ask if he will assure the House that a message will be sent to the governments of Rumania and Czechoslovakia similar to that to be presented to the Soviet government regarding this matter?

● (1500)

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member wishes to have assurances that we will record our disapproval, as has been done in the case of the motion presented on Tuesday—I said on Monday—by the hon. member for Eglinton, he has that assurance. But I would also refer the hon. member to the much more skilled parliamentary approach of the hon. member for Eglinton, with which he might go further.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, this being Thursday, I rise on a point of order to ask the government House leader his intentions for today and tomorrow and if he will bear in mind my request to allocate Wednesday, February 23, as an allotted day?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, to reply to the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton may I advise the House that today we shall continue debate on the bill in the name of the Minister of Justice to do with privacy and discrimination. Tomorrow, regardless of what happens today, we shall begin debate on the fiscal arrangements bill and we shall probably continue it on Monday if necessary. This will be followed by amendments to the National Transportation Act. If it can be worked in to the satisfaction of all parties perhaps we could consider the Air Canada bill. Wednesday would be an allotted day. Therefore, at the suggestion of the hon. member I should like to designate Wednesday, February 23, as an allotted day.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the government House leader mentioned first the amendments to the National Transportation Act, then Air Canada. Judging from his tone, he was not saying that those two bills would necessarily be called in that order. Can one assume that he would be willing to discuss the order of the calling of those two bills?

Mr. MacEachen: Quite.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the government House leader with respect to the business of the House? Last Thursday, in an attempt to get him to bring forward Bill C-30, I offered him two badges, one of which said "Heritage has its day" and the other "Le patrimoine ça se fête." The minister's reply was in these words:

Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member provides the badge in Gaelic, I will consider bringing it in.

External Affairs

Mr. Speaker, I should like to present the minister now with a badge in Gaelic. It is worded on the authority of two Gaelic scholars in Cape Breton and it reads, "Tha m'ag aontachadh la m'oighreachd."

An hon. Member: What does it say?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It says the same thing. If the minister wears it, he will be saying, "I support our heritage." Now that I have met his condition of last week, may I ask if he will bring in Bill C-30 so that we can have Heritage Day next Monday.

An hon. Member: And you will wear a kilt?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am looking at the badge. It is Gaelic, I see it is Gaelic, but when the hon. member pronounced it it sounded like Swahili. The hon. member uttered these words. I am encouraged by his interest in the language; it encourages me to give further consideration to Heritage Day.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TABLING OF INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table, in English and French, a number of international agreements which recently came into force for Canada.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if among the agreements tabled there is included the recent agreement on pipelines between Canada and the United States.

Mr. Jamieson: Forgive me, Mr. Speaker, but there are between 40 and 50 agreements in this batch. Perhaps I could send a list to the hon. member. I do not think the one he mentioned is in this particular lot. I shall see if I can send a copy to the hon. member.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, will the pipeline agreement with the United States be tabled?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Health and Safety Committee Act

WORKER-INSPECTOR ACT, 1977

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH WORKER-INSPECTORS IN THE WORKPLACE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-397, respecting the establishment of worker-inspectors in the workplace.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Explain.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill, and of the two others which I hope to present later today, is simply to give recognition to certain rights of Canadians. It seeks to do something with respect to health and safety hazards which are increasing daily in our places of work. Specifically, the intention of this bill is to establish worker-inspectors for health standard purposes in places of work.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

RIGHT TO REFUSE TO PERFORM DANGEROUS WORK ACT, 1977

MEASURE TO ENSURE RIGHT OF EMPLOYEES TO REFUSE TO PERFORM WORK DANGEROUS TO HEALTH OR SAFETY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-398, respecting the ensuring of rights of employees to refuse to perform work that is dangerous to their health or safety.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Explain.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to give Canadian workers the right enjoyed by working people of certain other countries, the right to refuse to perform work which in their view is dangerous to their health or safety.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

HEALTH AND SAFETY COMMITTEE ACT, 1977

MEASURES RESPECTING HEALTH AND SAFETY COMMITTEES IN WORKPLACE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-399, respecting health and safety committees in the workplace.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Explain.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is perfectly straightforward. It would establish health and safety committees for working people in their places of work.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

[Mr. Jamieson.]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR PAYMENT OF MATERNITY BENEFITS FOR ADOPTED CHILDREN

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-400, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, (benefits to adopting parent).

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, since working women contribute to the unemployment insurance fund, it is felt that they should be entitled to the benefits of the act. The purpose of the bill I am introducing is to correct certain discriminations and would allow women to collect maternity benefits no matter whether they adopt their children or bear them by natural birth.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 204, 214, 1,257, 1,266, 1,270 and 1,502.

CONSTRUCTION OF LIFEBOAT BASES

Question No. 204—Mr. Marshall:

1. Is it the intention of the government to build four new lifeboat bases in Shippegan, New Brunswick, Souris, Prince Edward Island, Louisbourg and Sambro, Nova Scotia and, if so, what is the estimated cost of (a) the bases (b) each new lifeboat?

2. In determining the strategic location of the bases, was any consideration given to the wide gap of coverage on the west coast of Newfoundland between bases CG-114 in Burgeo and CG-109 in St. Anthony and, if not, for what reason?

3. (a) What is the capability and operational coverage of the four 44-foot self-righting steel-hulled lifeboats, particularly insofar as their capability under ice conditions is concerned (b) can the government confirm that the capability of the lifeboats is restricted to a few inches of ice, which in fact severely limits their capability?

4. With reference to a letter of December 5, 1975, from the Minister of Transport to the Member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe, is any reconsideration being given to deployment of new lifeboat bases in the Atlantic region to cover western Newfoundland between lifeboat bases CG-114 and CG-109, a distance of 400 miles?

5. How is it expected that the area between lifeboat bases CG-114 and CG-109 will be covered, when the coverage of each base is operational only up to fifty miles?

6. Is any investigation planned into the basic and fundamental lack of appreciation of the objectives of search and rescue exhibited by those responsible for the neglect of a 400-mile strip of seaboard on the west coast of Newfoundland?

7. Is the destroyer escort Annapolis still designated under international agreement as a fisheries inspection vessel?

8. Are any other Canadian ships being designated by the government of Canada for fisheries inspection under bilateral agreements with foreign nations, viz: USSR, Spain, Portugal, etc.?

9. What departments are involved in the apprehension and boarding of foreign vessels under bilateral agreements?

10. As a result of a DOT release of May 16, 1975, have any of the new proposed lifeboats been delivered and, if not, what is the expected date of delivery?

11. What are the details of the electronic aids to navigation and the complete range of life saving and rescue equipment to be incorporated into the lifeboats being provided?

12. What agency of DOT is making arrangements to provide search and rescue capability in the Atlantic region?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by Transport Canada and Environment Canada as follows: 1. The lifeboat base at Shippegan, New Brunswick, was established in October, 1975, and at Sambro, Nova Scotia, in April, 1976. The bases at Louisburg, Nova Scotia and Souris, Prince Edward Island, became operational at the beginning of June, 1976. (a) Estimated cost of operation and maintenance of these four bases is expected to be $508,786 for the fiscal year 1976/77. (b) Each lifeboat costs approximately $300,000.

2. Areas where lifeboat stations will be of use to a maximum number of vessels are given priority.

3. (a) The capability of 44 foot self-righting steel-hulled lifeboats has proven satisfactory for search and rescue purposes. They operate within a 50 mile radius from their bases, each has 400 horse power and is capable of towing vessels up to 50 feet in length. (b) These boats are designed to operate only in very young ice.

4. At present, in addition to the lifeboat bases which have already been decided, no new bases are under consideration.

5. The fact that there are no lifeboats based on the west coast of Newfoundland does not mean that area is without SAR protection. Search and Rescue coverage on this coast of Newfoundland is provided by other vessels operating in the area which are tasked for SAR when required and by the CAF Rescue Squadron at Summerside, P.E.I. The stationing of additional search and rescue helicopters in Newfoundland and the establishment of a Canadian Coast Guard Marine Search and Rescue Emergency Centre at St. John's, Newfoundland as announced recently will greatly improve the protection available to all fishing vessels and other shipping on the west coast of Newfoundland.

6. No such investigation is planned. The operational area of a lifeboat is 50 miles from its base and it was never intended to have such a base every 50 miles on the Atlantic Coast but rather in areas where these boats could be of maximum use.

7. Yes. In addition to the HMCS Annapolis, all 11 other DND destroyers on the Atlantic are designated as fisheries inspection vessels. These have been so designated since December, 1974. They are HMCS Algonquin; HMCS Assiniboine; HMCS Athabaskan; HMCS Fraser; HMCS Huron; HMCS Iroquois; HMCS Margaree; HMCS Nipigon; HMCS Ottawa; HMCS Saguenay; HMCS Skeena.

8. No, there are no other Canadian ships other than the 24 ships now designated by the government of Canada for fisheries inspection under bilateral agreements with foreign nations viz: U.S.S.R., Spain, Portugal etc. As such, the bilateral agreements do not require Canada to designate specific vessels for enforcement purposes. The agreements simply recognize that upon extension of fisheries jurisdiction to 200 miles by Canada all foreign fishing in the zone will be governed by Canadian regulation and be subject to Canadian enforcement procedures. The designated fisheries inspection vessels in addition to the 12 destroyers are: Fisheries and Marine Service Department of Fisheries and Environment CGS Chebucto; CGS Cygnus; CGS Golden Bay; CGS Nonia; CGS Arctica; CGS Baffin; CGS Dawson. Ministry of Transport CCGS John Cabot; CCGS Bartlett; CCGS Sir Humphrey Gilbert; CCGS Alert; CCGS Daring.

9. Department of Fisheries and Environment, Department of National Defence and the Department of Transport.

10. The four lifeboats were all delivered in the latter part of 1975.

11. The following equipment is fitted on board: Radar, magnetic compasses, radio direction finder, LORAN, first aid equipment, search lights, towing lines, line throwing apparatus, pyrotechnics, power chain saws, inflatable liferafts, inflatable boats, outboard motors, stretchers and portable pumps.

12. The Canadian Coast Guard.

MARKET VALUE OF SHARE CAPITAL FOR CANADIAN COMPANIES

Question No. 214—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Has Statistics Canada or the Superintendent of Insurance any estimated figure, for any recent years, of the gross amount of share capital and the gross market value of such share capital of all Canadian public companies and, if so, what are they?

2. How much in terms of percentages and/or dollars of the shares of Canadian public companies are now held by (a) private pension funds (b) mutual funds (c) non-profit foundations?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): In so far as Statistics Canada is concerned: No official estimate of the market value of share capital for Canadian companies exists. However, figures are published of share holdings of trusteed pension plans and mutual funds at market value. No estimates, either official or unofficial, exist for holdings of non-profit foundations. On the basis of the net worth of Canadian non-financial and financial companies, other than government enterprises, it has been possible to derive a very rough approximation of market value of shares. At the end of 1972 this figure stood at approximately $74 billion. The book and market value of shares held by Trusteed pension plans including their investment in pooled pension funds, as published in "Trusteed Pension Plans Financial Statistics"—Catalogue No. 74-201 were $4.6 and $3.8

billion respectively in 1974. The corresponding figures for mutual funds as published in "Financial Institutions—Financial Statistics"—Catalogue No. 61-006 were $1.3 and $1.1 billion. It should be emphasized that the total figure is only a proxy for the market value of shares outstanding and that because of the volatility of the stock market, the above totals are subject to substantial year-to-year changes.

In so far as the Department of Insurance is concerned: No further information is available.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE—ATHLETIC AWARDS

Question No. 1,257—Mr. Schumacher:

1. In each year, to date, since the inception of the Fitness and Amateur Sports Programme, how many athletes have received grant-in-aid awards from the Fitness and Amateur Sports Branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare?

2. In each case (a) who was the athlete (b) in which sport(s) did he or she participate (c) how and for what reason was he or she chosen (d) by whom was he or she chosen (e) what was the form of award and amount received?

3. In each case, what was the athlete's standing on the International Federation's list?

4. In each case (a) what competitions did the athlete compete in (b) where did the competition take place and what was his or her final standing in each event?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1.

Year	Number of Athletes who have received grants in aid
1970-71	68
1971-72	305
1972-73	579
1973-74	576
1974-75	386
1975-76	525
Total	2,439

2. (a), (b) and (e). The hon. member has been personnally advised as to the voluminous nature of the information requested (i.e. the names of 2,439 athletes, the sports in which they participated and the form of their awards). It was agreed that requests for such information should be made directly to the Program Operations Officer, Programs Operation Directorate, Fitness and Amateur Sport Branch at 365 Laurier Street West, Ottawa. K1A 0X6. (c) and (d) Upon the advice and recommendation of a selection committee of each of the various national sports governing bodies, the National Selection Committee and the Game Plan Technical Committee of the Fitness and Amateur Sport Branch recommends to the minister, for approval, the names of those student-athletes best qualified for a grant-in-aid.

3 and 4. Information concerning the international ranking of athletes involved in the Olympic disciplines, as well as information regarding the competitions, their locations and the athlete's final standing in these competitions is not available from the Fitness and Amateur Sport Branch. Enquiries of this nature should be directed to the national sports governing bodies and to the athletes' respective national associations.

ORANGEDALE ALCOHOL PROJECT

Question No. 1,266—Mr. Crouse:

1. Did the Orangedale Alcohol Project of Orangedale, Nova Scotia, qualify for a grant from the Department of National Health and Welfare and, if so, under what programme was the grant awarded?

2. What was the amount of the grant and for what purpose was it given?

3. What are the names and addresses of the project's sponsors?

4. How many people will be employed as a result of the project?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. The project qualified for a contribution under the Alcohol, Tobacco and Drug Resource Fund Contributions Program of the Non-Medical Use of Drugs Directorate (Health Protection Branch).

2. The project received approval for funding in the amount of $43,200 for the period September 15, 1976 to August 15, 1977. The project will attempt: (a) to refine data collected in the summer of 1975 on teenage alcohol consumption at the community and country levels; (b) to develop a model alcohol education program, based on locally perceived alcohol and drug issues, and integrated into a school-based health education program; (c) to present the information gathered on local teenage drinking to small community groups and to discuss possible responses. These would reflect the degree of local concern and take advantage of as many available local resources as possible.

3. The project sponsor is: Board of Directors, Orangedale Alcohol Research, c/o John Fuller, President, R.R. No. 1, Orangedale, Cape Breton, Nova Scotia.

4. Three people will be employed: one full time; two part time.

CALENDAR "AGRICULTURE GOES METRIC"

Question No. 1,270—Mr. Epp:

Was a calendar published by Agriculture Canada entitled "Agriculture Goes Metric" and, if so (a) what was the cost (b) how many calendars were printed (c) who designed these calendars (d) were tenders called for the design and production of the calendars and, if not, what method was used to award the contract and/or contracts for design and production?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): In so far as Agriculture Canada is concerned: Yes. (a) $106,846.60; (b) 354,000; (c) Miln-Bingham Limited; (d) Contracts for design and production were awarded by the Department of Supply and Services.

In so far as the Department of Supply and Services is concerned: (d) Yes, competitive tenders were called for design and printing separately.

INSULATION

Question No. 1,502—Mr. Herbert:

1. Is there a shortage of insulation material for residential use?

2. What percentage of the domestic production of wool batts and loose wool insulation material is exported?

3. What percentage of the domestic consumption of wool batts and loose wool insulation material needed for residential use is imported?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. By its nature, insulation cannot economically be transported long distances. For this reason localized shortages can occur from time to time in various parts of the country when local demand exceeds local supply. Currently, there is no general shortage of insulation in Canada.

2. Statistics Canada does not publish export statistics in sufficient detail to provide this information on Canada's exports of insulation.The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce estimates this figure to be quite low on a year-to-year basis.

3. Import statistics for mineral wool batts and loose wool insulation lack the detail required to provide a definite figure, which one can relate to domestic consumption. The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce estimates the percentage of domestic consumption provided by imports is currently about 8 to 10 per cent.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if questions Nos. 173 and 1463 could be made orders for returns, these returns would be tabled immediately. The answers are presented in this way because they are very long.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

LAWYERS RETAINED BY GOVERNMENT IN DARTMOUTH AND HALIFAX

Question No. 173—Mr. Forrestall:

How many lawyers have been retained by the government and its agencies in (a) Dartmouth (b) Halifax County, Nova Scotia, since January 1, 1970, to date and, in each case (i) what are their names (ii) how much were they paid?

Return tabled.

CIDA—FOOD AID

Question No. 1,463—Mr. Murta:

1. For each year 1972 to 1975 and by country, what food aid in the form of grains was supplied by the Canadian International Development Agency and, in each case (a) what was the number of bushels shipped (b) what was the total dollar value?

2. In each case, what ships carried the grain?

3. In each case, who were the governmental agencies in the recipient countries that CIDA dealt with?

Return tabled.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

MEASURE TO PROTECT PRIVACY OF INDIVIDUALS

The House resumed, from Wednesday, February 16, 1977, consideration of the motion of Mr. Basford that Bill C-25, to extend the present laws in Canada that proscribe discrimination and that protect the privacy of individuals, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Matane): Mr. Speaker, I mentioned yesterday certain categories of discrimination which are not covered in the bill before us. I mentioned among other things the "freedom of conscience" which is not provided for as such in the bill in the provisions on religion; I feel this is a much very wider extension of the freedom of any individual to practise the religion of his choice or to decide not to have any religion. I also talked about expanding the provisions in the sexual area to cover homosexuals who are still discriminated against in spite of the fact that we amended the Criminal Code several years ago. I also mentioned other categories like the political beliefs and the social or economic conditions of people.

Today I would like to insist on one area of discrimination which is not mentioned as such in the bill and which, in my humble opinion, should have priority if we consider the political context in this country, its history and its problems: I refer to language. Of course, the bill does mention national or ethnic origin as well as race but, Mr. Speaker, I think that the word "language" should absolutely be included in the bill.

We are all aware, I hope, of the acuteness of the linguistic issue in this country, and I find it absolutely strange and astounding that the bill fails to mention this motive which, for a large part of the population, namely Francophones, constitutes in our view a discriminatory practice which has been investigated in depth, among others by the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) who introduced this bill will have to agree to add this motive, not to lessen the others that are already in the bill, but to recall that, given the number of Francophones in Canada, this problem is of prime importance for French-speaking people. The Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism has shown to what extent French-speaking people, or Francophones, are discriminated against. For instance, how in the province of Quebec, in spite of the fact that they are in the majority, they are at the bottom of the income scale. I think that by trying to skip this question, which is fundamental for us as well as for a good part of the people, namely French-speaking Canadians, we are not being fair to them in this bill.

To explain my view, Mr. Speaker, I shall refer to clauses 9 and 10, which affect both unions and employers, and see to what extent those clauses, in their present wording, could have spared us, for instance, the crisis which we are now experiencing at Air Canada. Given the wording of these clauses, I do not think that they would have prevented the discrimination suffered by French-speaking Canadians, particularly mechanics in Air Canada's workshops in Montreal.

Here, Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote some findings from the Official Languages Commissioner's report published two weeks ago and submitted to Air Canada's chairman regarding the situation of Air Canada's French-speaking employees. I am quoting from page 5 of the report: "Although Air Canada has made visible progress, particularly in its eastern region operations, at the moment of our review the situation was generally unacceptable for the corporation's French-speaking employees." English was the almost exclusive working language within the services of the head office and the employees in the eastern region had to use it when communicating with the head office.

The study stressed more particularly the following defects: lack of a dynamic policy promoting the use of French; lack of French working facilities which are essential to employees; deficiency in the recruiting policy and laxism in the staffing of bilingual jobs; lack of bilingual senior officers; insufficient technical training in French; negative attitude of some senior officers with respect to the use of French for operational communications.

Mr. Speaker, after reading this excerpt, I must again say with renewed emphasis to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) that the recognition of the language as a reason for illicit discrimination should absolutely be included in this bill if we really want to give justice to those groups which the Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism considered as the other majority.

So, I repeat that clauses 9 and 10 in their present form have not dealt with the situation which was described by the Official Languages Commissioner and which we all know. I think that this demonstrates most eloquently that, as concerns reasons for discrimination based on language, the bill as drafted falls far short of the present situation.

Clause 14 of the bill provides, I think, an easy way out as it stipulates that refusal, exclusion and expulsion are not discriminatory practices if they are based on a bona fide occupational requirement. This is the pretext always used by Air Canada to justify the exclusion of French-speaking people from that Crown corporation. If we leave to the employer total discretion to declare when exclusions, refusals or expulsions are based on a bona fide occupational requirement and he is the only one to establish it, I think it is an easy way out of observing the objective of the bill.

Another provision that, I think, should be amended is clause 19 of the bill providing that the cabinet can, in a contract with a third party, demand that the provisions of this bill be observed. I do not understand how this clause 19 gives such discretional powers in a field like this one, as it means that companies contracting with the government will be able, unless otherwise provided, to discriminate and engage in practices that are considered in this bill as contrary to public order and justice.

I think that clause 19, by not forcing the government to demand that companies contracting with it refrain from discriminatory practices provided in this bill, represents a dilution of principles according to which we believe that nobody in our society should be the victim of a discriminatory practice. Another provision I find quite strange is paragraph 13(2) where, after it is provided in the first part that it is forbidden to communicate telephonically to expose a group of people to hatred, it says that there is no offense when it is done through a broadcasting undertaking. If it is forbidden to expose a certain group to hatred telephonically, I think it should also apply to the use of broadcasting.

The Solicitor General reminds me that we passed a section on that subject in the Criminal Code a few years ago when the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was minister of justice, which is true. But I do not think it is a good legislative approach to stipulate in a bill on discrimination that it does not apply in the case of communications on radio or television and I am convinced that the Solicitor General will agree with me.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the House that the United States went much further by creating the Commission for Equal Employment Opportunity. Indeed, it is forbidden in the United States to engage in discriminatory practices, not only within the government itself but also in the big corporations to whom the government contracts out. Moreover, they must take what is called "affirmative action", that is dynamic action to compensate and remedy an unacceptable situation. I do not think this bill does as much since it does not stress what the Americans call affirmative action and what I would call dynamic action.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that we are wrong in thinking we will solve our problems if we simply go on saying it is forbidden to discriminate against Indians without making it mandatory, as did the United States with the Commission for Equal Employment Opportunity, to establish positive programs to correct the whole situation within a few years.

Finally, I would like to mention that this bill gives too much importance to regulations that the governor in council may make in future. When comparing this bill, especially the second part dealing with privacy, to The Privacy Act adopted in 1974 by the American Congress, we realize that it is much shorter than its American counterpart, mostly due to the fact that we refer too many decisions to the governor in council. Recently, a committee made up of members from all the different parties came to the unanimous conclusion that all too often when civil servants are allowed to enact regulations, they cause abuses and breach the fundamental rights in which we believe.

Finally, in respect of the language problem, it will no doubt be referred in the course of this debate to a provincial statute, namely Quebec's Bill 22, which grants some sort of precedence to the French language in Quebec. My impression is that, in opposition to that act, there will be allegations that it discriminates against the English language in Quebec. In answer I would call attention to clause 15(1) of this legislation, where it is provided that:

> It is not a discriminatory practice for a person to adopt or carry out a special program . . . designed to prevent disadvantages that are likely to be suffered by, or to eliminate . . . disadvantages that are suffered by, any group . . .

My intention is not to discuss here the pros and cons of Bill 22, this would be irrelevant anyway. I would simply submit the following reflection to my hon. colleagues: French-speaking Canadians outside Quebec would be quite happy if they were granted in their provinces the same rights that are recognized under Bill 22 to the English-speaking minority in Quebec.

I simply want to remind them that no group of French-speaking Canadians outside the province of Quebec enjoys the same rights as those recognized through Bill 22 to the English-speaking minority in Quebec. One must wonder how we can speak of equal and symmetrical measures when 98 per cent of people in North America use the English language currently with a French-speaking minority of about 2 per cent. If one thinks that it is the English language that is threatened in Canada and in North America where 98 per cent of the people use it, I would say that the blindest of all is he who does not want to see.

Those are, Mr. Speaker, some of the comments which come to my mind at this stage of debate on this bill. I hope that in committee each of us will be able to suggest amendments to strengthen the bill so that the basic intent of this legislation will be the primacy of the individual, the primacy of the human being over institutions, which should be our first concern, I believe. This purpose could be better served than in the present bill, which of course represents a step toward the improvement of the situation, but which does not go far enough, in my opinion.

[English]

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity of debating what I consider to be a very important bill. I am pleased that my hon. friend from Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) set the tone of the debate by indicating that there are problems which must be attended to, hopefully by way of amendments to the bill, to ensure the emergence of satisfactory legislation which at present is not satisfactory.

● (1530)

My hon. friend for Matane (Mr. De Bané) has indicated that there are some problems with respect to the "hate message" provision. He wondered, as I do, why broadcasting is an exception. I will have something to say about that, as well as about the awarding of contracts under, I believe, clause 19 and about the protection of personal information.

I think the debate on this bill is timely. I become a little dismayed when I pick up newspapers across the country and read that we have been relatively silent at the federal level about the verbal and physical assault and harassments which the visible minority in particular have been experiencing in the past few years. Therefore, it is about time we in this House realized that there is a role we can play, an interest that must be shown and a concern that should be registered. That is why, if I seem to be a little off target with respect to this bill, Mr. Speaker, you will understand because I want to bring forward some thoughts that I have, in the very short time at my disposal, in regard to what is happening in Canada and what I think Canada should be all about.

Since my election to the House of Commons I have had the opportunity on many occasions to travel the width and breadth of this land. Because of this opportunity I have been reminded continually of the greatness of this country, not so much because of its size but because of its way of life which has evolved and continues to evolve through the talents and cultures of peoples from various backgrounds.

In Canada we are overcome by the consciousness of the enormous task that needs doing. We all know that Canada takes in the northern half of the North American continent, involving a huge mass of real estate within which lies some of the world's richest resources. We have the responsibility, first, of maintaining our ownership and, second, of developing these resources for the benefit of mankind. This responsibility and development is a challenge for all Canadians regardless of race, creed or colour. This is a challenge of enormous implications, and to meet this challenge all people need, and deserve, the understanding and accord of each other and the assistance of enlightened government policy.

We are a nation of some 22 million people living together, involving various cultures, lands and heritages, all working together in dedication and with common purpose, the ultimate aim being a greater Canada in which all can share its wealth through equality of opportunity. Let me remind you, Mr. Speaker, that statesmen, politicians and economists are only incidental in the pursuit of the building of Canada. It is the people who will make or break this nation's life. What of its people? I am reminded of the comments of a citizenship judge who said:

> This nation has been enriched by the loyalty and sacrifice of persons who have come from many lands, heritages and traditions. To each this nation has given a chance to live and grow and share in the Commonwealth. From each Canada has accepted the gifts of different cultures and made them into an enduring heritage from sea to sea. This rich heritage is yours, as it is mine, because we are Canadians.

The hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) in a speech some time ago paraphrased a sentiment which I thought was put so beautifully. I should like to say that I maintain that our country has been enriched by the beautiful and noble culture of the first Canadians; by the gaiety and passion of the French Canadians; by the measured dignity of the Anglo-Saxons; by the stern efficiency of the Teutonic races; by the vivid tones of the Celts; by the moving processional of 1,000 years by the Baltic peoples; by the diligence of the Italian community; by the beauty and age-old mystic of Asia and Africa; and by the grandeur and pathos of the Jewish pilgrims.

As Canadians, we have rejoiced in and have been strengthened by all of these different and varied qualities of enrichment. No Canadian race, no melting pot, no fashioning all into one mould, but, rather, we are pursuing the attainment of an identity which is based on intelligence, tolerance and decent, neighbourly attitudes. We are in the midst of the great Canadian experiment, that is to say, freedom to pursue our legitimate aspirations and evolving further: equality of opportunity; greater appreciation of different cultures, heritage and customs; and last but not least, bringing about racial accord.

In light of the fact that we are still in the midst of this great Canadian experiment, and because some are not even aware of the same, it is necessary from time to time to reflect again on what it hopes to accomplish. When I speak of the great Canadian experiment, I am speaking about a very simple principle which is the elimination of inter-group prejudices which disfigure and distort religious, business, social and political relations, with a view to the establishment of a social order in which the religious ideals of government and justice shall become the standards of human relationships.

This legislation gives us an opportunity to dedicate ourselves as individuals to the basic ideals of respect for people and human rights, which are essential to our way of life and, further, to dramatize the practical things which people can do to promote understanding and realization of these ideals at the federal level, thus giving leadership to all Canadians on human relations. Although there has been considerable improvement in attitudes, one must admit there are still too many who have kept, and do keep, people down or let them stay down by using powers either openly or subtly in discriminatory ways. For centuries many have fought for equality and although, as I have said, things have improved, it seems to me we still have work ahead of us. Indeed there has been progress, but nevertheless in Canada and throughout the world there still remains a degree of social and economic injustice based on colour, religion, language and sex.

The special needs and requests, and even demands, of those affected by discrimination because of colour, religion, language or sex are treated with apathy and indifference by too many people, such as those in positions of power, including members sitting in this chamber. There can be no doubt that the legitimate aspirations of these people to achieve recognition or redress are at times ignored completely, or even met with outright hostility. Accordingly, notwithstanding improvement, there is a backlog of social and economic problems that can no longer be ignored if for no other reason than people have refused to remain patient in the face of injustice or settle for token measures that placate but do not remedy.

Many of us have been the victim of racial discrimination and have suffered grinding poverty and eventual degradation, a serious disability in facing the world. People of colour, in particular, have faced these horrible odds and obstacles and have kept alive their traditions and hopes notwithstanding. It seems to me that all the various stigmas and restrictions imposed on people, whether consciously or unconsciously, whether derived from colour, form of religious worship, degree of education, language, sex, and all the rest, are simply impediments to the advancement and development of an expanding society.

The tragedy in Canada is not only that many of those classed as visible minorities have not been completely accepted or recognized in a white society, but as well our human resources, a priceless social asset, are not permitted to make or are restricted from making a maximum contribution to Canadian society. No one in Canada should have to limit themselves socially, politically, culturally or economically. Yet by the actions of some, whether consciously or not, many of our people have been limited.

As a member of the Senate and House of Commons Joint Committee on Immigration, I travelled across this country and noticed that there still remains in varying degrees and in different locations in Canada racial and religious discrimination. Let me assure hon. members that despicable hate letters and hate messages are still around, and insidious social discrimination continues to rear its ugly head. But what is most important, I found that the vast majority of Canadians find these attitudes and actions despicable, distasteful, not wanted and not needed, which to me is certainly very encouraging.

Myths and untruths were prominent during these hearings, but the committee, after deliberation subsequent to the hearings, attacked many if not all of the myths and certainly emphasized truths. For example, quoting from the report of the joint committee, section 20 thereof:

> A persistent theme of submissions, hostile to immigration, was the view that immigrants crowded cities, exacerbating housing shortages, increasing the crime rate, bringing infectious diseases, taxing the welfare rolls and government services and causing unemployment by taking jobs from Canadians.

In this regard the committee reached the following conclusion:

● (1540)

> The committee recognizes that all these problems are faced by rapidly growing cities but concluded they are caused by economic, social and cultural dynamism of cities and their attractiveness to Canadians and immigrants alike.

The committee further concluded:

> Canadians worried about the quality of life in our cities should look elsewhere than to sharply reduced immigration for a solution to the problems of city living.

I would refer again to the report. Section 22 continues:

> Similar misconceptions also abound regarding the impact of immigration on social services and benefits and health care. None of the testimony supported with facts the popular notion that newcomers are using these services more than the native-born. If anything, the committee has the impression that the use of such services by immigrants falls below the national average for the obvious reason that many come from countries where such services are traditionally provided by the family. Indeed, it would appear that interprovincial and rural to urban migrants make greater use of government support than persons from abroad.

Section 23 has an interesting conclusion, and I quote:

Nor do immigrants participate less actively in the work force than long-term residents.

Another myth was exploded, and in this regard I would refer to section 24 which reads in part as follows:

Some submissions contained allegations that immigrants, especially the non-white, contribute proportionately to the crime rate—

Expert testimony did not support this charge, and I emphasize that. It continues:

—and in a study prepared for the ministry of the Solicitor General of Canada in 1974 statistics indicated that the crime rate for immigrants was approximately one-half that for native-born Canadians.

Another section which I believe is worthy of your consideration is section 26, which reads:

The committee recognizes that it has been through the contributions and efforts of successive generations of immigrants that Canada has grown to be the relatively secure, prosperous and satisfying place it is. About four million immigrants have come to Canada since World War II. Their skills, their energies and their enthusiasm have added immeasurably to every facet of Canadian life and have created a vibrant multicultural mosaic. The committee firmly believe that the settlement of post-war immigrants alongside the founding cultures is one of the most positive chapters in Canada's post-war history. It looks to immigration to continue to contribute to the economic, cultural and social well-being of the country.

I would like to read another commendable section in the report, section 39, which reads as follows:

There is a danger of creating second-class citizens of many foreign-born who have made their homes in Canada. It is evident that the ability of newcomers to adapt readily and successfully to Canadian life is in large part contingent on the esteem in which they are held by their chosen communities and on the existence of non-discriminatory treatment in employment, housing and services. The committee makes this assertion in the confident belief that the majority of the Canadian people are tolerant and generous, and not prepared to condone racial hostility and discrimination.

The committee also reported, in effect, that Canada has become to a large extent a multicultural and multiracial society, and it further stated that in order to promote inter-group understanding the committee recommends public and school education as well as legislative action to protect Canadians and immigrants alike from racial and ethnic discrimination. This society of ours, of course, must become greater, and in order to achieve the ultimate in greatness we must be prepared to understand that in our diversity lies a tremendous asset and that intolerance, injustice, discrimination and hate can only bring us to ruin.

As Thomas Curtis Clarke stated: "Let us no more be true to boasted race or clan but to the highest dream, the brotherhood of man". Will you allow me, Mr. Speaker, to quote Stephen Vincent Benet who said:

Grant us brotherhood not only this day but for all our years. A brotherhood not of words but of acts and deeds. We are all children of the earth; grant us that simple knowledge. If our brothers are oppressed, then we are oppressed; if they hunger, we hunger; if their freedom is taken away, our freedom is not secure.

Canadians must stand against prejudice, Canadians must stand for justice, and they must stand for equal opportunity for all. We as Canadians, have, I remind the House, a commitment to that end. Since December 10, 1940, when the United Nations adopted the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, there has been an increasing awareness in many countries of the need for enactment of domestic laws and the creation of internal mechanisms to deal with discrimination. In this regard, all provinces have enacted statutes respecting human rights and I believe all those statutes have provisions for the establishment of a human rights commission. Of course, the provinces have taken the lead in this field because discriminatory practices have tended to be more prevalent in matters under provincial jurisdiction in the areas of employment, accommodation and services, and because so many more Canadians are involved with matters under provincial jurisdiction.

What about the federal government? At present the federal government and its existing anti-discrimination provisions, federal statutes and regulations, are fragmentary. For example, within the Canada Labour Code, which deals with fair employment practices, certain provisions apply to the employment practices of organizations such as banks, railways, etc., under the jurisdiction of parliament, but do not include employment by the Crown in right of Canada, which is certainly unacceptable. I hope that will be rectified now.

I mentioned taped messages earlier which in my view, reflecting on the arsenal of hatred involved in which the taped voice is included, spilling forth malice and tolerance on the telephone, is the most insidious. After discussion with the provinces, and particularly with the attorney general of the province of Ontario, we now have a provision within this act regarding hate messages. But, as I pointed out earlier, it should include broadcasting. I hope that my colleagues on both sides of the House will ensure that this provision is accepted. The federal government is involved with a multicultural society; let us make no mistake about that. Although we do have much legislation which attempts to protect human rights and the dignity of man, more is needed. In asking for more, it is sad to reflect that our society is so warped that it continually needs to introduce legislation to bring about racial accord. Accordingly, a Canadian human rights act was introduced. The purpose of this bill is to prohibit discrimination in all matters within federal jurisdiction on the grounds of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, age, sex, marital status, etc. The bill also provides for a Canadian human rights commission at the federal level.

Because of this act there will be an over-all body of law at the federal level to which persons may resort when they consider themselves harmed by the discriminatory practice of organizations, Crown corporations or persons whose activities fall within the legislative authority of parliament. As well, there will be legislation providing for the establishment of standards on the basis of which personal information and government records are accurate, accessible to the individual, and used only for authorized purposes. When we look at this matter of the protection of personal information, we find that part of the preamble of Bill C-25 states that:

> The privacy of individuals should be protected to the greatest extent consistent with public order and well-being.

Compared to the universal declaration of rights section dealing with privacy, this is vague, weak and limited. Clause 52 and the noble sentiments of the preamble sound good. However, with the exceptions outlined in clauses 53, 54, 55 and 62(1)(d), all of clause 52 is made, or can be made, potentially useless since records can be withheld from the proposed information bank, or only partially listed at the discretion of any minister in charge of an information bank. Accordingly, the intent of clause 52 is completely emasculated and becomes useless. The whole section on privacy is like a game of definitions in which the individual has most of his right to information to lose. For instance, subclause 52(2) provides that individuals must be consulted before records are made available for any non-derivative use.

Note, however, that in defining "derivative use" the legislation hinges it upon the minister's opinion, that is, a derivative use is one that in the opinion of the minister is consistent with the use for which the record was compiled. This, in effect, means any use, since we all know that word games are the easiest to play.

Another instance is clause 55 which, in effect, is a blanket discretionary clause cloaked in terms relating to public benefit and the cost of applying the clauses or provisions. Any provision will not apply if the minister feels that the public benefits derived from the application of those provisions will be outweighed by the costs. This clause alone could reduce the information available to strictly trivial information collected about an individual. The cost of many rights in monetary terms may outweigh the public benefit, but this does not mean we should not be willing to bear that extra cost. I read somewhere that this clause of the bill was rewritten 15 times. I am sure that was to make certain that the bill was couched in such terms that the government would not have to reveal anything it did not wish to reveal, while at the same time appearing to have a comprehensive personal information policy.

If this legislation is passed as it stands, people will not have access to many records because they will not be listed in the government index which supposedly is compiled to inform us and aid us in obtaining information. People will not be able to ascertain accurately to what uses those records have been put since knowledge of the existence of secret records and partially listed records will be beyond the access of the individual. Of course, even if a record is available, one could never be sure that it is complete since the minister has the discretion to restrict the information published. The principle behind these exemptions seems a little absurd because, in effect, they counteract the underlying purpose of this part by preventing an individual from seeing information collected about himself on herself. In short, the protection of personal information is very inadequate and this part should be scrapped completely and rewritten.

Another major objection to the bill is that there is no explicit clause dealing with the manner in which government contracts will be awarded, that is, a contract compliance provision. Granted, clause 19 states that the governor in council may—which is permissive—make regulations with respect to this matter, but it is not clearly and effectively delineated and it is too important to be stuck away in the regulations. In my view, the legislation should be rewritten and the commission specifically empowered to give certificates of compliance to all prospective bidders on government contracts. For example, every department or agency awarding contracts for construction, alteration or repair of public works must employ direct methods of ensuring that minority group persons are employed to a significant degree on all such projects—and this goal must apply wherever public funds are expended.

The obligation thus placed on an employer to provide employment opportunity requires more than his willingness not to discriminate, more than a posture of neutrality. For this reason compliance laws, is most cases, are accompanied by affirmative action programs. I could go on with respect to that matter, Mr. Speaker, but my time is running out and I did promise to conclude very shortly.

In any event, by a direct and visible effort we are attempting to support the original objectives of the United Nations proposed decade programs which are to promote human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, colour, descent, national or ethnic orgin, especially by eradicating racial prejudice, racism and racial discrimination; to arrest any expansion of racist policies; to eliminate the persistence of racist policies and to counteract the emergence of racist policies and to counteract the emergence of alliances based on mutual espousal of racism and racial discrimination; to resist any policy and practices which lead to the strengthening of the racist regime and which contribute to the sustaining of racism and racial discrimination; to identify, isolate and dispel the fallacious and mythical beliefs, policies and practices which contribute to racism and racial discrimination; and to eliminate racist regimes.

The cancerous sore of racism, prejudice and discrimination which devours reasoning, love, compassion and tolerance is a problem for which education alone in the schools, the churches and the home is not enough, and therefore calls for other treatment. In this regard I place emphasis on the political scalpel—in other words, legislation—which can ensure that all of us in this multicultural society will have a meaningful future. It seems to me that many of us believe that the winds of change affect underdeveloped countries only, but I point out that in Canada also there is a wind affecting the attitude of all peoples and groups in their day-to-day relationships. Attitudes are affecting the thinking of the United Nations, the dogma of churches, the decisions of courts and the legislative programs of governments. There is a new social awareness and there are new attitudes calling for action.

I am not saying that the government should assure the survival of every ethnic group, but I am stressing that it should give everyone a reasonable opportunity to survive by seeing to it that the necessary climate for survival is in effect and is maintained. Such action must result in helping to assure that there will be an equal place in all aspects of life in this country for everyone without regard to race, origin or religion, failing which I am immediately reminded of a comment made by a former United States secretary of state when speaking about the American administration. He said:

If no one will listen, the lack of communication will cause more frustration and fear, and fear leads to hate and hate leads to violence.

I am pleased to have an opportunity to become involved with this bill. I would like to see its quick passage so that we can determine how best to contrive methods to make the bill even more meaningful. I am particularly interested in the hate message aspect of the bill because we will need the co-operation and the expertise of Bell Canada. I hope we are making some significant strides in order to see that there will be no hold-up, when this bill is passed, with respect to the installation of the necessary equipment to reduce, if not eliminate, hate messages.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate on second reading of Bill C-25, legislation to extend the present laws in Canada which prohibit discrimination and which protect the privacy of individuals. It is also known by its short title, the Canadian Human Rights Act. At the beginning of my remarks I would like to commend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) for bringing forward this legislation and also to express our appreciation to the Advisory Council on the Status of Women and to all other associations for their contributions to this bill.

Canadians have waited a long time for this legislation in the federal field, not only because of their personal interest and concern about civil liberties and Canada's commitment to human rights declarations and covenants at the United Nations but also because the federal government has been lagging behind provincial human rights legislation. It is timely that we in this House enact the provisions of this human rights bill, especially during this period known as the decade for action, to combat racism and racial discrimination, a program officially launched by a special United Nations General Assembly on December 10, 1973. Canada supported the adoption of this UN program, and it is only proper that the federal government has ratified the human rights convenants and conventions and continues to bring in legislation to help eradicate discrimination and racism, to increase understanding between the various groups which make up the multicultural and pluralistic society of this country and to promote respect for the human rights and fundamental freedoms of people both within our country and universally.

That is why I warmly welcome the purpose of this legislation, which is that every individual should have an equal opportunity with other individuals to make for himself or herself the life that he or she wishes to have, consistent with their duties and obligations as a member of society, without being hindered in or prevented from doing so by discriminatory practices based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, age, sex or marital status, a conviction which has been pardoned, or by discriminatory employment practices based on physical handicap.

The bill is also intended to protect the privacy of individuals to the greatest extent consistent with public order and well-being. This bill, therefore, upholds the universally acknowledged fundamental principles of inherent dignity and equal rights to all members of the human race, the same spirit that this House unanimously has demonstrated during the past year or two in voicing its concern wherever human rights have been violated.

However, to be effective and of benefit, human rights legislation must be put into practice and really enforced. The high-minded human rights principles embodied in the constitution of the Weimar republic did not prevent Hitler manipulating those very principles to secure the power to abolish the principles, and today, alas, the human rights principles in the constitutions of many countries are ineffective because they are not enforced. We welcome, therefore, this Canadian human rights bill because of the comprehensive guarantees against infringement of many basic egalitarian rights and the provision of measures to enforce those rights.

Prior to this bill before us today there was only limited protection of egalitarian rights at the federal level in specific areas such as employment practices, fair wages, housing and immigration. Additional protection for federal employees was offered by setting up the anti-discrimination branch of the Public Service Commission and the Public Service Commission appeals branch. However, apparently these protective measures were inadequate and the proposed prohibitions in this bill against discriminatory conduct will apply to all federal departments and agencies and any business or industry under federal responsibility. However, I am puzzled by the absence in the schedule of this bill of Crown corporations such as Air Canada and the CNR. I hope that further speeches on the bill, and the minister's reply, especially at committee stage, will provide answers why these and other questions have been exempted from the schedule.

● (1600)

This bill is timely because it will help defuse racial tensions to which hon. members have already referred and which seem to be increasing in our country. We also welcome the provision which prohibits discrimination on the grounds of sex and marital status, especially the proposal to require equal pay for work of equal value. Above all, the strength of this proposed legislation lies in the provision of enforcement by an independent human rights commission, responsible only to parliament, with wide powers to set up tribunals and to impose financial penalties. To enable this commission to be really effective and progressive, adequate funds must be provided for research and public education, and the government—especially the minister—should make sure that all sectors of our society are represented.

In our complex society which is often overgoverned and frustrated by bureaucratic red tape there is a need to protect individual privacy and prevent administrative misuse of personal files in government information banks. We must also give our citizens unfettered access to their personal files and the opportunity to propose corrections where errors exist. The proposal in Bill C-25 to establish the position of a privacy commissioner to review any complaint by any individual that he or she is being denied rights under the act makes some progress in meeting the need of citizens who fear that information about them is incorrect or misused.

This bill does not cover everything in the field of human rights. We must admit, however, that it is a step in the right direction and, indeed, an improvement over previous attempts to bring forth human rights legislation in the federal field. Though we do not have a utopia in this country, a parliamentary committee will study the bill clause by clause and interested ethnic groups and civil liberties experts will have every opportunity to study it.

It is urgent, in our present constitutional and national unity crisis, to develop a comprehensive, constitutionally entrenched Canadian charter of human rights. Many people have voiced the same opinion. One such charter, which I believe should be recommended reading material for those studying the bill, was produced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) when as minister of justice he inspired many Canadians and the delegates at the 1968 federal-provincial constitutional conference. At that meeting he proposed a constitutionally entrenched bill of human rights for Canada guaranteeing the fundamental freedoms of the individual and equal rights for all Canadians—namely, political, legal, egalitarian, economic and linguistic. I should like to quote from a document entitled "A Canadian Charter of Human Rights", especially the section on linguistic rights, page 27, which reads as follows:

> Education—guaranteeing the right of the individual to education in institutions using as a medium of instruction the official language of his choice.

The hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané) made some remarks about linguistic rights. I want to reiterate that all of us have heard complaints that specific sections of Quebec's official language act do not comply with either the spirit or letter of the Canadian charter of human rights nor the international conventions, covenants and declaration on human rights which Canada has thus far ratified. I therefore appeal to the Minister of Justice, often regarded as our chief ombudsman, to examine these complaints and come to the assistance of those sectors of the Quebec population—especially the parents and children of minority ethnic groups—who feel that their linguistic rights in education have been abrogated.

Another complaint to which we should give our attention is the under-representation in parliament and federal agencies as well as the underutilization in industry, especially at senior executive levels, of the skills, talents and experience of members of the minority ethnic groups in Canada. Some progress in this matter has been made, especially in recent years, but more remains to be done to level out the vertical mosaic.

There should be no need for any Canadian to become culturally assimilated or to change the family name in order to obtain a high position in government or industry. I believe the federal government's total commitment to multiculturalism and human rights will lead to harmonious relations in Canada and contribute immensely to national unity which we must strengthen and pass on, enhanced, to future generations.

[Mr. Haidasz.]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) has already pointed out on behalf of this party, we welcome this bill for the good that is in it. We hope that the portions that are not satisfactory will be corrected or improved when the bill gets to the standing committee. In particular, we welcome the declaration of equality of rights amongst all Canadians and the declaration that certain things which are identified as discrimination are to be prohibited. The section of the bill that disappoints us is that having to do with the privacy commission. As I have said, the hon. member for Greenwood has already stated our position with regard to that portion of the bill.

I propose to address my few remarks in this debate exclusively to one aspect of the bill and I hope to say a few things that are specific within that context. I am sure that we all welcome the attempt of this legislation to take us further down the road in terms of equality between men and women in Canada. Other speakers have paid their tributes to those who have participated in the production of this bill. I should like to add to those who have been named such persons as the late Agnes MacPhail, the Hon. Thérèse Casgrain and others of bygone decades who did their best to establish women's rights in this country. We are grateful to the Royal Commission on the Status of Women, which was chaired by Mrs. Florence Bird, and we are appreciative of the work done by the Advisory Committee on the Status of Women and also by the National Action Committee on the Status of Women.

Establishing this kind of equality is a slow process and we all recognize that there are problems. As I have already indicated, however, I wish to speak of a few things in relation to the equality of women with men which have not yet been achieved. As a matter of fact, I am going to get even narrower in my interest than I have suggested. One could talk about the differences that exist between men and women in rates of pay, despite our equal pay legislation; one could talk about the discrimination that still exists in employment; one could talk about the particular problems that face women who are single parents—all those things where we may declare the rights are equal. But there are countries in other parts of the world who give the answer that the constitution says everybody is equal when it really is not so. My point is, it is not enough to say that women's rights are equal with men's rights, although it is good to say it. It is worth while to have that declaration in this bill, but my point is, we must not stop there.

I said I would limit my remarks to the question of the equality of women, and I will narrow them still further. It will not surprise hon. members to know that I am concerned about inequalities in the field of pensions. First, I mention the Canada Pension Plan. The government, in this very session, plans to bring in amendments to the Canada Pension Plan, amendments which it says are to extend to women rights which now apply to men. I point out that no matter how much one says that those pension provisions are open to either sex, the fact is that most men in their working years are in the Canada Pension Plan, but a large number of women are not. Until we recognize that a woman's contribution in the home is just as much a part of the production of goods and services as the work any person does in an office or factory, we will not establish equality. You can say all you want about the Canada Pension Plan being equally open to all, in the sense that any employee, male or female, contributes to and participates in the plan, but the fact is that by far the largest number of persons between the ages of 18 and 65 who are not in the Canada Pension Plan are women. I suggest, in practical terms, that is a case of gross inequality.

Let me draw a parallel. Membership of the House of Commons is equally open to men and women, but in the 110 years in which the Canadian House of Commons has existed, about 3,000 men have been elected to this place, but only 28 women. Sir, there is equality in the sense that men and women have equal rights to become members of this House, but in practice it does not work that way.

Mr. Woolliams: It sure does not.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Incidentally, the statistic I mentioned of 28 women having been elected to this place in 110 years ought to shame us. I heard a comment, but I did not catch it.

An hon. Member: Most of the women were elected fairly recently.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes. Actually, all 28 women have been elected in the last 50 years. In the previous 50 or 60 years none was elected. During the past 110 years we have had 30 elections; therefore, on the average we have not elected even one woman per election. The Canada Elections Act says that everybody 18 years old and over can run for parliament. The human rights bill says that we are all equal. Yet unless something else is done, that equality will not exist.

Women have equal rights with men for the top posts in the public service, private industry, the boards of directors of banks, and so on. But how many women ever make it there? It is a miracle if women ever make it in certain professions. On the other hand, other professions seem to be left primarily to women. I do not expect the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) to correct all this in this bill, but I urge that it is not enough just to declare equal rights. Other things must be done.

I wanted to deal specifically with pension matters and I began by talking about the Canada Pension Plan. That, ostensibly, is legislation applying equally to men and women. It is true that under the law a man who dies leaves certain rights to his surviving widow, and the woman contributor who dies leaves the same rights to her surviving husband. That is supposed to be equality. But that equality is gained on death. Unfortunately, a woman's chance for participating in the Canada Pension Plan during her lifetime is denied, is limited, not by law but by the structure of our society. Those who designed the Canada Pension Plan failed to make provision for housewives or homemaker spouses, as we sometimes call them, to obtain pension benefits equivalent to benefits obtainable outside the home. That is a clear denial of equal rights.

I move to another pension area and suggest that some of the things one could say about pensions in the public service and pensions in the private sector can also be said about the provisions we make for widows. I know that this is a little speech I often make in this House. Hon. members have heard me say this a good many times, and I do not apologize for it. You can only get some things done around this place by repeating what you have to say time and again.

The pension system in the public service and private industry is for the most part based on the idea that the husband is the contributor; therefore, when it is time to retire and the husband and wife are both alive, they get 100 per cent of the pension—the pension which has been earned from employment either in the public or private sector. So all is well: they have both contributed in their ways, made their lives together and when they retire and both are alive they get the full pension. If the wife dies first, the husband's pension carries on at 100 per cent. But if the husband dies first, in most cases the widow's pension carries on but only at 50 per cent. In a few cases 60 per cent, although in some cases it is less than 50 per cent or there is no widow's pension at all. You cannot contend with success that there is equality in pensions paid either in the public sector or the private sector when such situations exist. Sir, I am not so naive as to think that the Minister of Justice can with the passage of this bill do away with all those inequalities, although I can tell you that there are Canadians out there who have heard of this bill and are hoping it will pass and bring about greater equality as between men and women so that some inequalities which work to the detriment of women in the field of pensions will be corrected.

I move to another topic with which many are familiar, that of widows of public service personnel, in which I include personnel of the RCMP and the Canadian armed forces. If the marriage took place after the husband retired from employment in the public service or any of the other services I mentioned, there is no pension for the widow. As long as the marriage took place before retirement, she can get a pension. Sir, this bill says that there is to be no discrimination, no difference on the basis of marital status. I do not know how one can say that this is being practiced if pension status depends upon the date of marriage. I have already objected to the inequality which results from widows getting only 50 per cent pensions when they ought to get a 100 per cent pension. Unfair though the payment of a 50 per cent pension to widows may be, I point out that some widows get no pension at all because their marriage did not take place before the magic date required under the law.

I refer also to veterans' widows, to the case in which the pension to the widow is based upon the level of the veteran's pension. The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) a moment ago referred to the schedule to the bill. I notice that the Canadian Pension Commission is in the schedule to the bill and is listed as one of the entities which is supposed to determine these matters under this law. This law states that there is to be equality. However, a veteran who is on a disability pension in some cases leaves a widow with a pension and in some cases leaves a widow without a pension.

● (1620)

I am very familiar with how these pensions plans were built up; I know the pension theory that is involved in them. In this legislation we are trying to establish a new concept. It is not brand new; it has been pushed for decades. We have been making progress in this field but we still have not got to anything that can be called real equality in the pension field.

I seem to be listing all kinds of pensions where there are these inequalities. We at least have one where there is equality—old age security. A man or woman gets the pension because he or she meets the age requirement and the residence requirement. There is no question about marital status. This bill has something to say about discriminating against age, but it makes the exception that you do not have to pay a pension to everybody. It is perfectly proper to put down an age at which pensions are payable. Apart from that, there are gross differences and gross inequalities that affect women at the time when they would be pensionable.

I alluded a few moments ago to all the other differences that women have to face in employment, wage levels, services available to them if they have children they need to care for by themselves, discrimination in terms of housing accommodation, and so on. I mentioned earlier a few organizations which have done good work in this field. I should like to thank the Canadian Council on Social Development for a publication it put out recently giving statistics in all of these various areas affecting women. It is an interesting booklet. It probably came to all members as it came to me a few days ago. I recommend that hon. members study it. It is good for us to read this kind of material at a time when we are patting ourselves on the back and saying we are laying down in glowing language and in choice rhetoric that women are the equal of men in this country. Women may be the equal of men in constitutional terms, they may be equal before the law and before the courts; but in practical terms they are not. Why add to the difficulties that they face during their working years these inequalities which face them when retirement time comes?

There is one other piece of legislation I want to mention in this field the terms of which are probably contrary to one of the provisions in the bill now before us. I refer to the spouse's allowance. The minister says this is an equal piece of legislation, anybody, man or woman, can get that allowance between 60 or 65 provided he or she meets certain conditions. The conditions include two in the main. One is that you are married to and living with a spouse who is 65 or over. The other is that your means do not exceed a certain level. Therefore, it is equal. However, the fact is that women in that age bracket who are in need but who are spinsters or widows do not qualify. Yet clause 17 of Bill C-25 provides:

> The establishment of separate pension funds or plans for different groups of employees does not constitute the basis for a complaint under part III that an employer is engaging or has engaged in a discriminatory practice if the employees are not grouped in those funds or plans according to age, sex or marital status.

I suppose the "out" for the government on this is the reference to an employer. However, we are talking about pension plans. I submit that the spouse's allowance portion of the Old Age Security Act is directly contrary to something that is prohibited by this piece of government legislation in that persons are grouped according to age, sex or marital status. I submit that not only is this happening with the spouse's allowance contrary to the spirit and the letter of that law as I just read it, but that it is totally and grossly unfair.

That is, as I have indicated, the contribution I wanted to make to this debate. Like my friend, the hon. member for Greenwood, I do not like the provisions relating to the privacy commission set up by this bill. I think they are inadequate and can be dangerous. However, I do like the parliament of Canada enacting a law which declares:

> —every individual should have an equal opportunity with other individuals to make for himself or herself the life that he or she is able and wishes to have—

Even if that is clumsy construction in our language, I am glad that it is spelled out as "he or she". It goes on, as my friend read it a moment ago:

> —consistent with his or her duties and obligations as a member of society, without being hindered in or prevented from doing so by discriminatory practices based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, age, sex or marital status, or conviction for an offence for which a pardon has been granted or by discriminatory employment practices based on physical handicap—

I am glad parliament is passing this; I am glad we are having this debate, standing up and expressing with great pride that we in Canada have come a long way. We have come a long way since Agnes MacPhail first stood in this House of Commons, the first woman to come here, and said that she asked for no quarter. We still have a long way to go. I am glad that other bodies such as those I have named are giving statistics and pointing out what needs to be done in areas of employment, housing, wage levels, availability of legal services, and all the rest.

I am grateful to you, sir, for letting me make the point this afternoon that we are a long way from equality of men and women in terms of pension rights. If this bill does not correct those rights, I hope we can at least persuade the government that when we have a statute that says these things about equality we ought to put them in effect. That will mean substantial amendments to the Old Age Security Act, the Pension Act, the War Veterans Allowance Act, the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act, the Canadian Armed Forces Superannuation Act, and quite a few others. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that parliament, having made this ringing declaration about equal rights, we will follow through with specific improvements. Let us make women equal, at least in pensions.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I was inspired by a number of statements in this debate which are worthy of the very best traditions of the House. I listened to some on the other side as well as some on this side. They show how fundamental, deep and very important this legislation is. As I listened to the proceedings in this chamber today I could not help but feel the importance of the matter raised by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) in the question period, the violation of human rights in Uganda, another part of the world. I want to associate myself with the matters he raised and the reply of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson). We hope that legislation like this will make our country a much better place, and I am proud to support it.

Having said that, I want to refer to two clauses in the bill that give me a great deal of concern. I hope that some hon. members on the other side, especially the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), will give heed to what I have to say because I think I have an important point concerning this bill and other statutes. I refer to clauses 21 and 57. Let me quote from the statement made by the minister, as reported at page 2977 of Hansard of February 11, when he introduced this measure.

● (1630)

> Enforcement of these and other provisions will be carried out under the proposed legislation by a human rights commission. The commission will have wide powers, including the power to establish tribunals able to impose severe financial penalty.

He went on to say:

> As befits a body one of whose tasks will be to sit in judgment on government conduct, the human rights commission because, for example, of all the provisions which relate to the federal public sector as well as the private public sector, would, unlike those in some other jurisdictions, be independent of government and responsible only to parliament.

My concern is with regard to the proliferation of agencies and bodies responsible to parliament, and to the mechanism by which parliament exercises, or fails to exercise, jurisdiction. I hope that when the bill is referred to the committee hon. members will examine these clauses and, hopefully, modify some of them. Why should such a body report directly to parliament and not be responsible to the executive? The Advisory Committee on the Status of Women asked for it. The minister has told us that those who sit in judgment, as it were, on government conduct should report to parliament rather than to the executive. Mr. Speaker, we have heard this argument about independence a great many times. I maintain that the affairs of these bodies are conducted, not better but worse as a result of the absence of government supervision.

It is important that the executive arm of government assume responsibility not only for the matters raised by the Auditor General—and these are serious enough—but that it should answer for the policies carried out by independent agencies or bodies. The Auditor General tells us he cannot even supply a complete list of all the Crown corporations which exist. He appended a list to his report but he says he keeps finding new ones. I ask myself how many agencies report directly to parliament. The Auditor General does so himself, but he has a special committee of the House which considers his report; there is usually a standing reference giving the public accounts committee the responsibility of considering the report and calling the attention of the House and of the nation to the matters contained therein.

The Chief Electoral Officer is responsible only to parliament and the committee on privileges and elections usually assumes responsibility for dealing with the questions he raises. The Public Service Commission is similarly responsible only to parliament. The plight of the chairman of the Public Service Commission is something of a scandal. When the report of the Public Service Commission went before the joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons almost two years ago, the chairman said, in effect, "Please, we want an examination of what is going on under the Public Service Employment Act". Eventually the government did make an announcement, some two weeks ago, that it would name a body whose duty it would be to carry out the inquiry requested. But there is no automatic referral to a committee of the report of the Public Service Commission.

The Commissioner of Official Languages reports to parliament and his work, too, is important. But which minister assumes responsibility for giving direction to him in terms of policy? My hon. friend might say a minister should not do that. The fact is, though, that there is no mechanism by which the House is exercising supervision, and I submit that when no effective supervision is exercised something unhealthy finally takes place. I call attention to the situation presented by the bill before us. Not only is the human rights commission responsible directly to parliament, but so is the privacy commissioner to be established under clause 57. He is a member of the human rights commission, but he has been given the responsibility of making a direct report to parliament.

I ask this question: what is the mechanism by which a member of this House can deal with one of these independent bodies? I do not know how many are on the list. The librarian of parliament is on it, and I am sure hon. members on reflection could add others who report directly to this place. Someone is going to say that the first thing that happens is the presentation of an annual report. Look at clause 47 dealing with the annual report; it states:

> The commission shall, within five months after the 31st day of December in each year, transmit to the Minister of Justice a report of the activities of the commission under part II and this part for that year including references to and comments on any matter referred to in paragraph 22(1)(e) or (f) that it considers appropriate and the minister shall cause the report to be laid before parliament within fifteen days after receipt thereof or, if parliament is not then sitting, on any of the first fifteen days next thereafter that parliament is sitting.

Earlier today I heard the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) ask the House leader to refer to a committee, as soon as possible, the government's estimates for expenditure in the coming fiscal year. The hon. member pointed out that there were only eight working weeks before the expiration of the time during which those estimates can be considered before the committee is required to report back. An annual report which need not be presented until the end of May will always be more than a year in arrears when a committee comes to examine it, if it does at all.

Why should not this type of body report within 60 days of the end of the calendar year so that members might have an opportunity to examine it? On those rare occasions when those bodies appear before parliament, at least we would then have a current annual report before us. The suggestion that a body of this kind should have five months after the calendar year ended in which to present its report is an act of contempt of this place: it deliberately invites a situation in which members who try to interest themselves in what is taking place are unable to do so in any real sense.

I hope that when the bill goes to the committee it will be possible to reach general agreement to change clauses 43 and 60 which are parallel clauses. Five months is too long a period. There is no reason in the world why such an agency should not report by the end of February, thus giving parliament time to deal with any supplementary estimate if one were presented. Then the regular estimates would have some timeliness about them.

I should like to turn now to the question of appearance before committees. I know the standard answer of the ministry is, "Well, of course, you can always call people before a committee". But which committees, and how often? If an agency does something really wrong, the Auditor General will comment adversely and the matter will come before the public accounts committee. But how many of these independent agencies are called before the public accounts committee every year? I take my hat off to the current Auditor General who is looking hard at this area and especially at the operations of Crown corporations. He is doing a job which should have been done many years ago. What I am saying to hon. members is that we are adding two more bodies which will report directly to parliament and which will receive an absolute minimum by way of supervision.

What is the other mechanism by which such a body will come before parliament? It might appear at the time of the supplementary estimates which go before the miscellaneous estimates committee. Those of us who sat on that miscellaneous estimates committee know what a log-jam that is; everything is thrown at you. The steering committee meet and decide to call one or two, or perhaps a few more, of those particular agencies and groups who are especially interesting, but by no means do they call them all.

● (1640)

If there is no supplementary estimate, then the body does not even get called before that committee. Then we are dealing only with regular estimates, and the regular estimates are referred to any one of a number of committees of this House in the course of events. I suggest that the human rights commission might be called once every three or five years for half an hour before a standing committee of the House of Commons, and that is the degree of supervision that it is going to get. That is not good enough, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Francis.]

I want hon. members of the House to think about this problem: how does parliament exercise supervision over this new family of agencies that we seem to be creating every week, which report directly to parliament when, in effect, parliament has no mechanism by which it exercises supervision? I suggest that there are worse things than having a minister responsible for such an agency—much worse things. If the agency were responsible to a minister, the minister would have to answer for it in the question period. He could not get up and say, "Well, that is an independent body and I am not responsible for it".

If it were responsible to a minister, Mr. Speaker, when the minister appeared before the committee dealing with his estimates or his supplementary estimates in every case members would have an opportunity to raise questions. It seems to me that the theory of responsible government is that the executive is responsible to the legislature. What we are trying to do is evade the very concept of responsible government itself, all in the name of virtue, all in the name of saying that we are creating something which is above and beyond parliament, so far beyond that the hands of politicians cannot touch it.

If we name bodies which are to be independent, immediately someone says, "Just like the judges are". But the judges are in a different position. The courts have a tradition and an established profession within the country that looks at everything they do. There are means by which those who are named to the bench and who fail to perform have to answer directly or indirectly. The independence of the judiciary is not in any way affected. I am suggesting that there are no comparable mechanisms in respect of this new family of agencies that we are creating if this bill is passed in the form in which it is presented to this House.

To me, one of the sadder things about Crown corporations—I see some other members here, such as the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), who are concerned about Crown corporations—is that they learned how to do things, such as setting up old boys' clubs, lunches, and so on. They get their estimates through and everything goes smoothly if it is done the right way. I would not suggest that perhaps the human rights commission should set up an old girls' club. Perhaps it would be nice if they could, but the number of women at the higher, responsible levels of the public service is so few that this is just not possible.

What is more than likely to take place, Mr. Speaker, if parliament does not consider this matter in some detail, is that we will create an agency which will manage to stay out of trouble and will not offend the Auditor General. It will avoid supplementary estimates and it will submit nice reports. It will conduct a few prosecutions, but not that many, and it will become an ineffectual body, in fact, escaping the immediate attention of anybody in terms of answering for its own actions. Mr. Speaker, I hope that this will not be the case.

I want to conclude by saying that I do believe in this bill. I think it is a tremendous bill. The principles behind it are very deep and profond, and in no way do I want what I have said to be a reflection on what the bill attempts to do. I have listened to other members who have spoken from all parts of the House, and I know how deeply they feel about the bill. I listened to the speech of the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané), one of my colleagues, but with all due respect I could not agree with everything that he said. When I hear a member of a majority language group telling us what great rights the minorities have, I am always a little concerned, especially when the minorities come up to you and tell you that they do not have those rights.

I hope this bill will be passed and that the spirit that motivated it will be transformed into agencies which effectively can administer the bill. But I have major reservations about independent bodies which report directly to parliament, because I do not believe that parliament is equipped in the way in which it is structured and in the way the committee system functions, to give any supervision.

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate this afternoon on a most vital subject, a bill that is, on the one hand, terribly important and, on the other hand, of such far-ranging scope and import that I fear it may be discussed in whispers and held up as something almost beyond criticism, when there are many penetrating questions to be asked about it on a whole variety of levels.

Whether one admires the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) or not, I do not think that the bill makes him the ombudsman, as someone recently said. In a way, I regret that the federal government has not moved to bring in that post and that individual, and I doubt whether the passage of this bill will in any way make unnecessary the role of ombudsman. I would hope that would still be considered and that that legislation will come before us very swiftly.

As the bill is spelled out, it is full of ringing words which have been mentioned by other speakers. For example, every individual should have an equal opportunity with other individuals to make for himself or herself the life that he or she is able and wishes to have, consistent with his or her duties and obligations as a member of society. One wonders whether that will end the closed shop, for example. This bill will have consequences which we cannot predict and interesting results will come from its passage. I, too, hope it will be passed and passed swiftly, but when some of its implications are fully understood I hope some of the people who are supporting the bill now will still support it.

The bill gives every individual equal opportunity without being hindered in or prevented from doing so by discriminatory practices based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, age, sex, marital status, or conviction for an offence in which a pardon has been granted, or by discriminatory employment practices. Brave words; noble words! The reference to "race" pleases me, because by passing this bill we should never again witness the experience of World War II when one particular racial group, or one part of a particular racial group, was singled out for one of the most serious discriminatory offences ever perpetrated by a government in this country. For Canadians of Japanese descent this bill, I trust, will be seen as some guarantee to them, as something of their Magna Carta that nothing of that nature would be permitted or would be possible again in this country.

Mainly, I should like to concentrate on the aspects of the bill that deals with women's rights, with equality based on sex. I have heard people, both men and women, say to me within the past year, when talking about job mobility and professional access, that a woman can go as far as she wants if she wants to badly enough. I do not believe that at all. Men say it with pride; women say it with bravado. But we have not arrived at that situation yet.

I feel that there is a long way to go still, and I trust that the passage of this legislation will help. However, it will not be enough, and I suspect that one of the dangers in passing the bill is that some of the people who are prepared to fight the battle may feel that the battle is won. There are still areas of discrimination possible, and they are so subtle that the bill does not cover them. Let me give an example from outside the country. I attended for a year the Institute of Education in London, England, and while I was there the child development program was headed by an extraordinary woman who was remarkable in many respects. Yet she could never become a full professor because that department was not raised to a chair at the university. Eventually she retired and the post was filled by a man. Immediately afterwards it was constituted a chair and he became a professor at the university. How could anyone prove discrimination there? Everybody would have the finest regard for the work that Miss Gardner did throughout her years in that post, and I am sure that the senate and the board of governors would say that the elevation had nothing to do with the sex of the person filling the post. They would say it had everything to do with the new importance being attached to education, particularly to that branch of education.

There are areas of male dominance in this country, which the bill will be hard put to attack. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has referred to this chamber as being somewhat of a scandal in terms of the equality of women, if not of women's rights. Since the years when women were first permitted to vote and were first elected as members of parliament much progress has been made. But I wish he had mentioned some other great names, such as Ellen Fairclough, Mrs. Black, Tilly Rolston, and so on, and had broadened the catalogue a little by mentioning some of the people who established a role for women in the House in the pioneering days. Also, I should like to commend the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for having appointed more than one woman to his cabinet. This is a great step at the federal level. At the provincial level, W. A. C. Bennett, when he was premier of British Columbia, took the revolutionary step of appointing three women at once to his cabinet.

Again, there are subtle areas of discrimination that are possible here and I felt that the cause of women's rights was set back a long way. I am referring to the time a couple of years ago when the main commissioner of the minister of education of British Columbia was publicly fired by the premier on a television show when the minister was in Montreal. When she returned she did not resign immediately. The premier would not have been able to do that to a man. It would have been unheard of and unacceptable. Some of these things have to be fought at the highest level. One of these days I hope we will find a woman serving as a cabinet minister who will be prepared to resign if she felt she had not been treated properly, instead of accepting the situation. I wish the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport (Mrs. Campagnolo) had not flirted with the idea of resignation in the last few days. It is part of the problem rather than part of the solution to one aspect of what can still be an area of discrimination.

As we go through the act, we find aspects of it that should be questioned. The bill goes beyond the traditional basis for discrimination, that is, colour, religion and national or ethnic origin, to include age. It is an interesting factor, not totally removed from the question of women's rights, and it is one of the great paradoxes in the country today because age will no longer be a factor in discrimination from birth onwards, but I gather it will still be a factor in the first nine months of life. Or does the passage of the bill mean that the practice of abortion will end in this country? Because there are racial groups in the country which count the age of the child at birth as being, the age of one. That is an interesting aspect of the hope that there will be no more discrimination on the grounds of age. It is a strange situation where life is preserved by statute.

Since we have abolished capital punishment it is difficult to take away a person's life without committing the crime of murder, yet it is possible to prevent some 50,000 Canadians from being born annually. That says something about this country, because I am sure that as soon as we have passed the bill many people will be applauding, clapping each other on the back and saying, "That is the kind of people we are who can pass this kind of legislation". But when we look at the statistics for abortion in this country, they also say something about the kind of society and the kind of people we are at present. There is a great paradox there which will be heightened rather than lessened by the passage of this statute.

I have been dealing with a private case which involves age and the way in which the government calculates it. I am awaiting the passage of this bill, following which I will raise it again with some of the officials of the Department of National Defence who will know what I am talking about. It involves the matter of a pension. There is certainly discrimination there because of what seems to me to have been an error made some years ago. It is one of the cases where the services of an ombudsman would be required. However, the passage of this bill might help to nudge the department into action or make possible the introduction of a private member's bill on this issue.

I am very interested in the question of equal pay for work of equal value. Here is a large area where women should benefit from this bill, although again we will have to know much more about the definition of "equal value". The principle would require employees to evaluate all jobs and determine pay rates on the basis of skill, effort, responsibility and working conditions of each job. One suspects that there may well be too many loopholes there.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker)—Government Administration—Request for committee study of all government controlled corporations; the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray)—Trade—Guidelines to companies with regard to international boycotts—Request for explanation; the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek)—Industry—Date of announcement of proposals to aid small businesses.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private member's business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions (papers), private bills and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Notice of motion No. 1, in the name of the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall).

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The motion stands at the request of the government. Notice of motion No. 11, in the name of the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe.

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The motion stands at the request of the government. Notice of motion No. 14, in the name of the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe.

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The motion stands at the request of the government.

REQUEST FOR REPORTS OR REVIEWS RESPECTING NATIONAL FOOD POLICY

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (York-Melville) moved:

That an order of the House do issue for copies of any reports or reviews with respect to a national food policy prepared by or under the direction of the group known as the DMs Ten.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on November 24 I put down a notice of motion for the production of papers concerning the group known as DMs Ten and the reports or reviews which have been done for the cabinet. I did so for a number of reasons. First, I believe in openness in government, and when a group such as the DMs Ten prepares a paper with background on a possible food policy for this country I think that should be made available to the Canadian people so they can be part of the discussion of our food policy. I do not need to remind the House that this is national food week in Canada; the interest shown in it by people from coast to coast is evidence of the fact that they would like to participate in a national food policy.

● (1700)

Second, various parts of that document have been leaked to the press over the past seven or eight months, and without seeing the complete document there is a possibility of distortion. Unfortunately, this also creates in a community the pitting of producers against consumers and the building up of bogey men on both sides of the argument. When we draft a national food policy, we know that there will have to be some trade-offs between producers and consumers. These leaks have also had the effect of spreading certain rumours and creating hard feelings in the farm and consumer communities. I also have very strong suspicions that the discussion of a national food policy has caused sensitive feelings within the cabinet itself. I have the impression that there is an internal power struggle going on between the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), on one side, and other ministers such as the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Abbott), on the other. I am asking the government to make public the DMs Ten report and all the background papers and study papers the DMs Ten looked at and made available to the cabinet, because I believe there should be openness. I believe the Canadian people should not be faced with a fait accompli and all of a sudden have a policy dumped upon them without their input.

I have before me a document which is alleged to be a copy of the DMs Ten report which was made to the cabinet on June 4, 1976. I want to spend what little time I have today referring to parts of that document which I have reason to believe is the report I am seeking in the House today. It is called "A Conceptual Framework for Food Policy in the Post-Controls Period". The object of the document is as follows:

This paper is intended to place before Ministers some of the elements at issue in the food sector and to obtain guidance as to the approach to be followed in the further elaboration of national food policy for the post-controls period.

The introduction to the report reads in part as follows:

The first section, "Basic Food Policy Decisions", presents major questions (underlined for easy reference) on which officials feel they require guidance from Ministers prior to proceeding to draft, if they agree, a more definitive policy statement. The second section, "Conclusions", describes (in the interest of pointing out some practical results of the discussion) an outline of the elements of one possible food policy for Canadians in the post-controls period.

They go on to say:

Even though it would appear that the sufficiency of nutritional food supplies or the income-price relationship are not major issues facing consumers, one of the key requirements of a national food policy is maintenance of consumer confidence in the fairness and efficiency of the marketing system and of government policy in this area. In the same breath, the confidence of primary producers in a stable return on their large long-term investments in the relatively open agriculture and fishing industry must also be maintained.

After that they go on to outline some basic food policy decisions. I do not have time to cover those in detail, but they refer to the scope of a national food policy and what areas it should cover. They refer to the question of the role of market forces in a national food policy. They refer to trade and aid programs as they affect food. They refer to primary producers, the fishermen and farmers of our country. They refer to processors, retailers and distributors in the food industry. They refer to consumer concerns and nutrition. When they talk about nutrition, they make the comment that Canada really provides very little to promote nutrition, and what we do provide as a nation is done in a very indirect way. They talk about the problems of federal-provincial relationships and they talk about the public information which should be part of a national food policy.

They go on to outline a possible food policy for Canada, and I gather this is what is being considered by cabinet ministers at this moment. I will read various parts of this document to the House. They begin by saying the following:

Canada's supplies of essential food products are adequate for the foreseeable future and there are resources to spare in some important areas. It would appear consumers need not worry unduly about the sufficiency of nutritional supplies. But, taking into account the world situation and the fact that Canadian agriculture and fisheries are open to the vagaries of climate, disease, etc . . . . there is at once the opportunity to earn foreign currency (mostly through grains and fish), and the danger of excess pressure on domestic supplies and prices from abroad.

The policy of the federal government is, therefore, aimed at exploiting production strengths and moving into other effective areas of production in a consistent manner to ensure the adequacy of nutritional food supplies at competitive prices for the domestic market and for export.

The concentration of government efforts on those limited key areas where the consistent and balanced protection of the interests of all participants in the food marketing system is required and will have the desired result of:

(i) shoring up consumer confidence in the fairness and efficiency of the marketing system; and

(ii) restoring producer confidence in a stable return on their large long-term investment in the relatively open agricultural and fishing industries.

They then go on to outline various concerns with regard to a national food policy and they talk first of all about consumer concerns. This is where I have some questions, and I think many Canadians will have some as well. They say, first of all:

1. The federal government recognizes that consumer interests must be given increased weight until there is a balance with the interests of producers in food policy formation and programs.

2. The federal government rejects:

(a) statutory import quotas and tariffs providing relatively high or permanent protection (and, therefore, artificially high consumer prices) for some food products;

(b) permanent or long-term consumer subsidies or two-price systems or export controls which can be expensive and distort the market, although short-term temporary subsidies might be effective for some basic commodities in specified situations.

3. The federal government believes:

(a) general income assistance programs already in place (U.I.C., pensions, indexing) are sufficient to provide average Canadians with the opportunity to eat in a nutritionally satisfactory manner;

(b) the marginal or low-income consumer in Canada faces special income problems which will be solved by special means developed in the context of a social security review.

They go on to talk about the implications for action on these various consumer concerns, and here is where we get into some interesting debate. First of all:

Make administered pricing systems for dairy, eggs, poultry more compatible with consumer interests;

consumer representation on all national food boards or regulatory agencies—

When we start talking about issues like that, surely to goodness the government could at least allow a public debate before making decisions affecting the livelihood of many Canadians which would create a lot of acrimony in the community. The least we should ask for is a national debate. This report goes on to talk about the elimination of conflict of interest in the management of boards and agencies in these words:

—possible reorganization of departmental responsibilities.

—Over a reasonable period of time, to review the import control list and all specific rates of duty on food products with a view to their eventual elimination;

—remove import ban on margarine;

—possible automatic destroy clause for Export and Import Permits Act with respect to need for individual import permits;

—eliminate two-price system for wheat—

It would be of considerable interest not just to producers but also to consumers if we were to eliminate the two-price system for wheat in this country. The other thing which I am sure would be shocking for consumers is the elimination of the skim milk subsidy and the comment about Canadians having adequate income assistance programs such as unemployment insurance, etc. They say this is in hand and we do not need any more revision of those areas. Then they talk about producer concerns and how government funds for investment in research and development of new and better varieties of product maintaining protein levels adaptable to Canada are needed. They go on to say that the federal government will work with the provinces in programs to preserve and promote a national market and that primary food production and its upgrading have been, and are, instruments of regional development.

● (1710)

Some of the implications of the producer concerns are: the total research and development outlay in Canada is $100 million, of which $70 million is salaries and wages; national health and quality control programs are necessary; a national transport policy for foods for domestic use and export will be needed; we will also need an appropriate commercial policy, national income assurance programs, etc. Further on the memo refers to land use and the need to accelerate the national land use policy of this country. They refer to the need for amendments to the foreign investment review agency to accomplish those aims, and they say we need restrictions on foreign labour to encourage progress and mechanization in the agricultural field. Continuing with various producer concerns, the report talks about the need for a comprehensive production and marketing information system and the need for farm income stability. They seem to reject marketing boards as a form of income stability; the report seems to be geared toward lessening the influence of marketing boards.

They say that the general solution to income instability for average crop producers will involve crop insurance, income assurance plans of the producer-government contributory type, and income averaging annuities under the Income Tax Act. They make an interesting comment about the dairy industry, saying it is a special problem which in view of the $600 million treasury impact for the fiscal year 1976-77 has to be resolved in the context of the post-controls era, and that there should be a review of long-term dairy policy and possible federal-provincial financing of an independent inquiry into the industry.

On eggs and poultry, they say that a review of the acceptability of supply management—administered pricing under the auspices of a national farm products marketing act is required. There are a few other things they refer to which probably are not quite as important. Under the heading "Marketing", the report reads:

The federal government believes marketing boards are not synonymous with supply management or administered pricing and should not be used as instruments to stabilize or raise incomes directly. Some marketing boards have a positive impact on the food system, but their activities are in direct conflict with supply management mechanisms.

The federal government will work with the provinces to continue to minimize impediments to interprovincial flows of food products.

The federal government will work with foreign governments to reduce the international barriers to food trade.

They then suggest a whole series of implications in the area of export and import permits and the trade area. They suggest the need for reviewing, clarifying and possibly expanding the role of the National Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act. I do not know what is happening about that in cabinet, but there was an interesting rumour about two weeks ago in one of the farm publications that the National Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act would be transferred to the jurisdiction of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. If that is the case, it is no wonder the Minister of Agriculture is becoming more and more grumpy when responding to questions in the House. There seems to be a conflict of opinion on marketing boards. The Minister of Agriculture is a staunch defender of them, but the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board has taken feed grains away from the authority of the Wheat Board, a move which concerns very many prairie farmers. It is good for the grain exchanges and for Cargill Grain and all the corporations. Meanwhile, the Minister of Agriculture is saying that we need more orderly marketing. I wonder what the government's policy is.

I notice that the government leader in the Senate, Senator Ray Perrault, said during the Christmas holidays that he thought transport was too big a job for one minister and suggested it be divided. I suggest the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) should begin the process by putting the Wheat Board under the authority of the Minister of Agriculture, where it belongs. I should like some clarification of the government's intentions in regard to marketing.

The memo goes on to discuss another very important aspect in part IV, under the heading "Processing, Distribution, Retailing Concerns". It says that some important market concentration and market power problems exist in Canada. That does not come as a great surprise. They talk about the implications of dealing with other problems concerning processing, distribution and retailing in the context of stage two of the Competition Act when it comes before parliament. The report says that the programs of incentives to enhance productivity and upgrading have been reviewed and that the federal government has directed that these programs be applied, on a priority basis, to the processing, distribution and retailing sector. They refer to the possibility of more incentive grants and more depreciation allowances as they affect retailing, processing and distribution in this country.

It is just about a year since the Food Prices Review Board reported that the retailing of food in this country is done by the large corporations which are very concentrated, and that as a result of lack of competition consumers pay more than they should. The government seems to imply they need more incentive grants and depreciation allowances in order to have a good food policy. I think we need an explanation of that, Mr. Speaker.

The memo says that the possibility of institutional change has been considered, but that the government does not believe that the creation of new institutions to deal with a food policy has a high priority. The formulation of policy and co-ordination of programs can be significantly improved without going the route of new institutions. It is said that the government has made certain decisions in this regard. Incidentally, this matter had led to conflicts within the cabinet, to some of those late-night quarrels one hears about between the Minister of Agriculture and other ministers.

● (1720)

I hope the government will make public the papers for which I am asking. I suggest that the Canadian people have the right to know. Various newspapers and members of the public have witnessed aspects of the DMs Ten—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret interrupting the hon. member to inform him that his allotted time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Some hon. Members: No.

[Translation]

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in all our discussions on a food policy, we should keep in mind that no two individuals, excluding groups and associations of any kind, think exactly the same way on this matter. As a matter of fact, it seems to me that we face a situation where we recognize some kind of failure in agriculture. The subject of a food policy for Canada comes up again and again. More than this, it is often brought up by people who do not know or prefer to ignore that the bases for such a policy have been established for some time and that they already operate effectively.

It might be worthwhile to recall that the idea of such a policy was brought forward eight years ago, namely in 1969. The prime objective of the Department of Agriculture which has been approved by cabinet, was and still remains to make agriculture in Canada an economically effective and independent industry. After further inquiries and several meetings and discussions, two special workshops were established in 1971. They had to determine the best ways to achieve these objectives. They made an excellent job and proposed the concept of a food system based on the market, and requiring therefore a good co-ordination between some 300,000 Canadian farmers and the various links of the food chain.

To meet the most essential food needs of Canadians, the farmer must not only be an efficient producer, but also be on very good terms with every level of his products marketing system—wholesalers, carriers, distributors retailers and, of course, consumers. Therefore this concept was shaped into a policy which is now working very well. Incidentally, there were four objectives reiterated in the Speech from the Throne of February 27, 1964.

[English]

Let me remind the House of these objectives. They were, first, to assure Canadians of high quality food at reasonable prices; second, to assure farmers a decent living; third, to provide food aid to countries where people cannot adequately feed themselves; and fourth, to produce products in which there would be a competitive advantage for domestic products for commercial export. In general terms, those objectives have been met, are being met and will continue to be met. They provide the broad basis for a food policy which makes Canada a world leader in this area.

In some countries farmers are making a hand-to-mouth living and food is cheap. In others, the farmers are on easy street but for the consumer the price of food is out of sight. A policy must maintain a balance between the primary producer and the consumer. That is what our policy is doing, and in response to changing times and patterns of consumerism it is changing and getting better all the time.

Look at the objectives one by one. The first, to assure consumers of a continuing supply of high quality food at reasonable prices, is one which, however successfully it may be realized, will constantly be taken for granted or overlooked by those who are quick to criticize. It is only taken for granted because it is working so well. When was the last time food was rationed in Canada? Not since World War II. If the average buyer found that the local supermarket was out of milk, meat, butter, vegetables, fruit or any of the 101 things we all take for granted, there might be some reason to get excited about a so-called new food policy. But because wide choice, high quality and stable prices are the norm, we all take food for granted. That would not be the case if, as happens in many countries, price, availability and quality were to fluctuate, or deteriorate as a result of a poorly organized agricultural industry. Canada's agricultural industry is probably the most efficient in the world. We do not have to import anything to keep ourselves well fed. We import because we want variety in our diets or because it makes economic sense, not because we need to import.

In the first objective high quality is mentioned. Mr. Speaker, Canadian food is the most wholesome anywhere, and our health and food inspection regulations help to keep it that way. The Department of Agriculture inspects and grades just about all the food we eat. The buyer knows, on buying it, not only that it is good to eat but how high is the quality of the food his or her food dollar is buying.

The first objective also makes certain that the food dollar is spread as far as it can go. Reasonable cost does not mean "cheap"; it means that food costs are maintained at reasonably stable levels in relation to producer-processor input and take-home pay. The average Canadian spends about one-fifth of his income on food, and the Americans—who are a little lower on that than we are—do not provide the same level of social assistance as we do in Canada. About 30 years ago a pound of butter cost just over an hour's wage—that is based on the minimum wage. Today, an hour's wage at the same level will buy you over two pounds; yet people complain that butter is being priced into the luxury class.

There is a popular notion that cheap food is a right. But why should one sector of society feed on the misery of another? If farmers are not given incentives to stay in business, to produce efficiently and at least earn a relevant return on their investment, there is no reason for them to consider staying in that line. If this country loses its farmers and relies on imports, the quality, abundance and, most importantly, price of food will change from one day to the next. We in this country will not be able to control those aspects; we will be too busy negotiating for sufficient quantities to feed our growing population.

That is where the second objective of the policy comes in. It assures the farmer of a decent living. But that does not mean that farmers benefit from an over-all security blanket. The assurance is there in the form of incentives and development programs for efficient farmers, but there is not too much for the farmer who will not keep up with the times. I do not see why farmers who are good at their job, who carry the multiple risks of their profession, who give the country its "staff of life", should be expected to take a loss and just survive. The rest of society expects a comfortable standard of living, modern conveniences, reasonable hours of work, educational and career opportunities for their children and the occasional holiday. Why should farmers have to take any less? The commitment in terms of both money and time is a great deal larger in farming than for the average white collar or blue collar worker. Farmers should get the same return for their labour and investment as those in any other sector of the Canadian economy. If they find that they are at a dead end they are not going to encourage their children to follow their career path and they may very well quit themselves.

Farming is essential to this country. The food chain starts with the farmer. Food production has to be made attractive and kept stable if there are going to be farmers left on the land in Canada.

The third aim of the food policy is being achieved so successfully that, once again, not too many people bother to think about it. It is to provide food aid to the world's hungry population who cannot feed themselves. Canadians on a per capita basis are the biggest food donors in the world. We are the largest donor to the United Nations World Food Program in absolute terms. Our annual contributions for food aid are now up to $230 million.

Getting food accepted for food aid programs is not nearly as easy as it sounds. We simply cannot use food aid as a safety valve that we can turn on and off to deal with whatever surplus situation comes up. It has to be a product which can be used in recipient countries, which is acceptable given the dietary and religious restrictions prevalent in a country, and which is digestable given the diet patterns followed by the people in that country. That is not all.

Any food aid program has to take into consideration the economic stability of the food producers of a recipient region. There is no point in providing large quantities of a product which, in a short time, will be coming up for harvest from the country's own farmers. Whatever food aid we give must not interfere with the existing balance of their economy.

Lastly, the policy aims for an agricultural industry that can export food to earn foreign currency. Income from exports is what keeps the economy healthy. In 1975 agricultural exports amounted to approximately $2.9 billion.

All the four objectives are being achieved, but to keep the agricultural food relationship a happy and a productive one it is only reasonable to look to the start of the food chain to see what can be done to make sure that the supply does not dry up.

Farmers look for income stabilization, they look for some sort of power to take on the corporate giants which can effectively hold their industry to ransom. With the introduction of marketing boards, backed by both federal and provincial governments, they have, in many cases, the edge they need. Government programs through the Agricultural Stabilization Board have helped maintain the farm price for many products. Recent legislative changes have expanded the number of protected products, and increased the flexibility of support to farmers.

Agriculture Canada backs the Canadian farmer not only with hard cash, but with a variety of programs designed to give him the resilience and ability to stay in business.

Such things as production research, inspection and grading of commodities, market information and protection of animal health go to strengthen the farmer's competitive position. Crop insurance, compensation programs for lost livestock, and development of hardy, disease resistant strains help protect the farmer against natural hazards.

The Canadian Dairy Commission, the National Farm Products Marketing Council, the Agricultural Stabilization Board, the storage assistance program are examples of some of the tools the farmer has working for him when it comes to fighting the effects of short-term market distortions. Agricultural markets are constantly being explored, extended, and often improved by the work of such government sponsored agencies as the Canadian Grain Commission and the Canadian Livestock Feed Board.

All in all, this government is proud of the food policy platform it has laid down, and made to work over the years. Unfortunately, as I have said before, the reason that it has been ignored is simply because it has worked so well. That is not to say that the policy is conclusive. Exactly the reverse is the case. We have a base on which we can build, and this is happening all the time. Any policy, to remain current and relevant, must keep up with changing times. Our present policy is no different. To make it relevant with the context of today, and keep it that way for tomorrow, it must be constantly reviewed, renovated, adapted and expanded.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I suppose that in doing so one should take criticism into consideration. Besides, coming from those who know the facts and the problems, criticisms are often a positive element. But from those who understand nothing of the problem, who only want to make headlines and who are constantly on the look-out for leading causes, that is another matter.

I am always surprised to see how often media give special recognition to subjects related to food policy. But again, I must recall that headlines seldom reflect reality. It is not unusual to see big red headlines which fade out or are shelved for good when it comes to facts. In this day and age, with all that gibberish about food policy, some think that the situation is definitively dreadful. It is most unfortunate since changing for the sake of it might bring us to an even worse situation.

The principles of the present policy are entirely logical and quite useful for all Canadians. However, they are constantly questioned. It is absolutely necessary to update it constantly and remove the weakest points as soon as they are detected. The consumer must be assured of the best value possible for each dollar allotted for food. The farmer must increase his efficiency through marketing procedures, processing costs established in relation to the cost of the finished product and he must be very closely supervised. Agriculture, Mr. Speaker, is closely connected with each of the numerous links in the food chain. There is plenty of room for various programs meant to improve the process.

[English]

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to ask whether the parliamentary secretary will answer a question?

Mr. Pelletier: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nystrom: I simply ask the parliamentary secretary whether he supports or does not support the motion that is before the House today? He spoke at length about a food policy. Unless I missed it, I still do not know whether he supports the motion before the House.

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member listened to my speech. We have a food policy which is working quite well. I said about the middle of my speech, and again toward the end, that that does not mean we cannot improve the food policy that we have in Canada. We are making, at least in the Department of Agriculture, every effort to improve that policy.

Mr. Nystrom: With respect, Mr. Speaker, my motion does not ask for a food policy. My motion asks:

> That an Order of the House do issue for copies of any reports or reviews with respect to a national food policy prepared by or under the direction of the group known as the DMs Ten.

I am asking that the government make public the document prepared by the DMs Ten group. That is all I ask. I want to know whether the parliamentary secretary is for or against the motion. That is all I am asking.

• (1740)

Mr. MacFarlane: What is this? An inquest?

Mr. Nystrom: Let it be down on the record.

An hon. Member: No!

Mr. Nystrom: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, we came here today with a motion asking that the government make public certain documents, and the parliamentary secretary is refusing to answer a question pertaining to the motion itself. In the 20 minutes he has taken up in the House he refused to refer for even one minute to the topic referred to in the motion, and I simply ask the parliamentary secretary whether he is for or against the motion.

Mr. Goodale: The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) asked the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Pelletier) whether he would permit a question. The parliamentary secretary permitted a question and replied to the hon. member.

An hon. Member: He did not answer it.

Mr. Goodale: The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville obviously did not appreciate the answer given to him.

An hon. Member: What answer?

Mr. Goodale: The point is that though the hon. member may disagree with the answer given him by the parliamentary secretary, to voice his disagreement in the form of a point of order is by no means in order and I think the House would be better served if we went on to hear the speech of the hon. member for Hastings.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Pelletier) has made his speech and he is not required by the rules to produce the paper.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, when that noisy bunch opposite has quietened down I will do exactly what the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) did.

Mr. MacFarlane: Sit down?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Ellis: As far as the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) is concerned, I am taller sitting down than he is standing up.

An hon. Member: Not wider, though!

Mr. Ellis: The parliamentary secretary obviously did not answer the question directed to him. He made a dry statement seeking to justify government policy, and he really did not do a good job of that. He talked about all kinds of things but he did not answer the question. The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville obviously has in his possession some very interesting documents. I would not be at all surprised if there has not been a plain brown envelope given to my hon. friend from Central Nova—

An hon. Member: He will get one now.

Mr. Ellis: I have not received a copy of this document but it appears to be very interesting and I should like to have a look at it. It seems to be critical of government policy in certain areas. It is refreshing to see a document put together by the bureaucracy at the top level which is critical of government policy.

I do not want to get too closely allied with the hon. member who speaks for the New Democratic Party on my left. He took a typical socialist stand on certain issues which I would find difficulty in supporting. Nonetheless, I can say that my hon. friend from Peace River has been trying for years to get a freedom of information bill through the House, and this is just the kind of information he has been trying to get. Obviously, it is not too hard to get. The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville got a copy in this case, and I think all of us should have a chance to read it.

It seems to me that debate during the many supply days, better known as opposition days, would be even more valuable if it could be spent discussing such documents as this. The government might learn something from the views of all the members in that regard. If this document has in fact been prepared by a group of deputy ministers, it is time the government had the benefit of the thinking of some practical members of parliament on the subject because not infrequently they have some good ideas as to what policy should contain. I am not at all sure that those ten deputy ministers have all the answers. In fact I would go further and say I am quite sure they don't.

Mr. Rodriguez: Read that document and you will know for sure.

Mr. Ellis: I should like to read that document. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Pelletier) talked about marketing pyramids and competitive objectives and things like that. He did not get around to talking about the fact that there was no policy until last Friday on the import of Taiwanese tomatoes that pretty near put out of business all the tomato farmers in Prince Edward County this year; there are warehouses full of canned tomatoes in Prince Edward County and without some tariff, as was finally imposed, they will stay full. This is the kind of protection which lost us the Ontario strawberry processing industry, and which is presently losing us the soft drink industry in Ontario.

The hon. member spoke about dairy policy. My hon. friend from the Cornwall area—I have forgotten the name of his riding—knows as well as I do that there are cheese factories in his riding which could produce far more cheese than they do at present if there were not at least 50 million pounds of cheese coming into Canada, a country that produces the best and finest cheese in the whole world. It is being brought in at cut-rate prices supported by foreign governments. My hon. friend knows that with few exceptions these cheeses could be produced in Canada. I think it would be worth while to have an opportunity to see what these deputy ministers have put in that document to determine whether there has been a change in policy, to decide whether the trade-off which took place, I am sure, between the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien), which allowed so much cheese to come into Canada ought not to be looked at in some detail.

While the parliamentary secretary went to some length to outline the aims of the food policy, many of which I am sure my hon. friends would agree with, nonetheless he did not answer the question. I am going to sit down—

Mr. Pelletier: Answer what question? He already has the document.

Mr. Ellis: The motion asks that an order of the House do issue for copies of any reports or reviews with respect to a national food policy prepared by or under the direction of the group known as the DMs Ten. If the parliamentary secretary would support that motion and there were a House order that those documents be brought into the House, I am sure we would get the kind of debate I have been speaking about and there would be some real interest, not only from members of the House, whose numbers, granted, at this time of the afternoon are rather slim, but also from the press gallery which similarly is rather slim in number.

• (1750)

Mr. Côté: Your party is pretty slim at the moment.

Mr. Ellis: How you can you call me slim? Well put together, but not slim! I contend that the parliamentary secretary did not answer the question and he should have the courage of his convictions, if the Department of Agriculture has nothing to bury or hide, to support the motion unequivocally so that these documents are brought into the House. I think that this would be good for the House of Commons.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The parliamentary secretary is rising on a question of privilege.

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

In relation to the question raised by the hon. member, the government's policy has always been that when a document is prepared, it is studied in depth and submitted to cabinet, and when cabinet takes a decision, it becomes government policy and is then introduced in this House.

I find it totally irrational that the government be asked all the time to table documents while it is making a careful study of the situation. Hon. members have no need to ask for documents, they have their own sources over there. They are always leaking documents here and there, from most departments, so they have no reason for complaint. This includes the hon. member that is now yelling over there. That kind of interjection has always been his own policy. From time to time he makes yelling appearances before the Committee on Agriculture, but otherwise he does not contribute much to the proceedings.

As regards the eventual policy to be proposed to Parliament, the government will bring documents to support it. For the time being, the motion brought forward by the hon. member has no relevancy whatever to this speech.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. It seems to me that this is a question for the House to decide, and in due course the House will make a decision.

Mr. Ellis: On the same question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, if it is indeed a question of privilege, I merely want to say that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture in those few short sentences said more about this question than he did in his whole speech. He was explained a few matters. If the government does not want to give us the documents, that is fine, but let it say so instead of giving us 20 minutes of drivel about policies, and so on, and not giving us an answer at all.

Mr. Claude G. Lajoie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to contribute a few words to this debate as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

National Food Policy

[English]

Consumers in Canada are becoming more and more concerned about food. In recent years they have seen people in countries overseas suffering from food shortages or famines. Canada is one of the world's main agricultural exporting nations. They wonder how she can help to reduce these shortages. Some even wonder if Canada itself might be facing food shortages some time in the future. They realize, of course, that there is little or no chance of that happening today.

The consumer has had to accept higher prices for food in recent years. Indeed it is fair to say that consumer interest in a national food policy is due directly to the food price explosion of 1972 and 1973. Between 1971 and 1975 food prices rose by about 60 per cent. By contrast, prices of all goods and services as measured by the consumer price index increased less than 40 per cent. The higher food prices are a burden to low income Canadians. Many Canadians cannot afford to eat well, even though they may be spending 40 per cent of their income on food. It is true that food prices did not increase through 1976. An increase of 1.2 per cent in January, 1977, coming after a small increase in December, 1976, seems to show that the upward trend may be back with us again.

Consumers are also concerned with what they are eating. They worry about the long-term effects of the many chemicals that are added to processed foods. They see children and teenagers eating junk foods. They know that many Canadians are poorly fed. Others—as one sees all too often—are eating too much. A shortage of essential foods and an excess of others can cause health problems or even death for the individuals concerned. This adds to the cost of our health programs.

Finally, consumers are questioning some of the marketing practices and power of the large food chains. As is well known, a few firms dominate the food retailing system. Consumers question why prices seem to vary from store to store for no obvious reason. They wonder how much all the promotions, "free" offers and advertising add to food costs. They feel that the food they buy lacks quality. In short, consumers are losing confidence in the food system. This explains why they are so interested in having a national food policy in Canada.

A food policy is of vital concern for Canada. We need a national food policy no less than we need a national energy or transportation or defence policy. Such a policy must be an integrated one. It must cover all parts of the food system. It should reflect the very real concerns of consumers. It should also respond to matters of concern to agriculture and farmers. It should be concerned with the industries which provide farmers with their fertilizers, chemicals and machinery. It should relate to the industries which process and distribute to consumers food products after they have left the farm.

In our food policy we must be fair to consumers. Some people think that a few of the farm programs we now have may result in higher costs for consumers. These are programs which stabilize and support farm prices and incomes. Marketing boards are a good example. It is important, however, to distinguish between different types of marketing boards. Some of them negotiate contracts on behalf of producers, others assemble and offer products for sale. There is no quarrel here. There are other boards which have the power to set prices. They may also control the quantity which is produced. They may even control imports as well. It is these boards that people are worried about. Perhaps we should consider if there are other ways of achieving stability in agriculture that avoid giving monopoly powers to producer groups.

Of course any national food policy which is developed must be based on a strong and healthy agriculture. No one wishes to see the demise of Canadian agriculture. No one wants to see—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

MEASURE TO PROTECT PRIVACY OF INDIVIDUALS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Basford that Bill C-25, to extend the present laws in Canada that proscribe discrimination and that protect the privacy of individuals, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr.Speaker, when I commenced my remarks this afternoon I mentioned that people sometimes say that we have advanced to the point where a woman can reach any objective that she sets for herself if she wants to get there badly enough. I do not think that is the case. In fact I am inclined to believe, if I may paraphrase the remarks of a former mayor of this city, that a woman has to work twice as hard to get half as far.

I find myself interested in the principle of equal pay for work of equal value. Probably one of the most important phrases in the entire bill is "work of equal value," and I hope we will see the day when the underpaid feminine secretary who is running the whole show, turning any profits that may be turned, and holding the entire thing together, at a salary a fraction of the person's who is the titular head of the organization, will receive a remuneration equivalent to the value of the work that she is doing for the business or the profession in which she works. It is only then that we will have taken a great step forward. It is interesting to note that if women actually achieve that and are paid equal pay for work of equal value, then the goal set by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) of seeing a greatly enlarged number of women in this Chamber will not be met simply because to get here politically—and the law will not change that in any way—a woman still has to be twice as good and work twice as hard. Of course the representation that we have here is remarkable.

One of the things that most encourages me about the potential success of the bill is the way in which the women's movement in the last 10 or 15 years in North America has forced changes in the languages so that one must be very careful now. I was speaking at an inaugural session of the city council in my constituency during the Christmas break. It is a council which at present, regrettably, has no women on it at all. I was making a run-through of other towns and municipalities in my constituency, pointing out the women who had been elected or re-elected aldermen and mayors in those communities, and I almost fell into the trap of describing them as able and charming, or able and beautiful. Then I realized that one would not describe a male alderman that way and that I had better be circumspect in my language, so I was reduced to describing them simply as able. That adjective certainly can be applied to the women representatives that we have here in parliament. They have come through a finer screen than any of the men who are here in order to be representatives, but when they go out to their constituencies advising the sisterhood to run for office, they are going to be told by those sharp business people that when the pay scale is considered, there is not enough in it. If women are going to get equal pay for work of equal value, the pay scale would not tempt people to come here, so I suspect the bill will not advance the cause which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre put forward so ably and excellently as long as the pay scale for a member of parliament is as uncompetitive as it is with anything equivalent anywhere else in the business or professional field in this country. However, I hope that can be changed.

• (2010)

I find the little exception with regard to age and retirement to be interesting. I suspect that will be one of the first clauses of this bill to be appealed because we are approaching the time when this business of automatically retiring at an earlier and earlier age will be challenged, and that will be seen in the not too distant future as a discrimination which cannot be tolerated. I think it would help women most of all if there was a flexible retirement age because I have seen too many who, by the time they are 55 or so, find that they can no longer attain any employment, and at that time they have to go on welfare. It would be more practical if they could retire on a pension at that time, if they should choose to do so, and if others, along with males who are vigorous at 65, could continue for somewhat longer if they should wish to do so. I suspect that we will have to move to something of that nature following passage of this bill.

One of the regrettable aspects of our times is the increased crime rate, but this bill excludes inmates who have served their sentences. It protects a person who is granted a pardon as if his crime had never been committed, and he is totally absolved of it, but one despairs for a country which will not accept the rehabilitating nature of a prison sentence, nor even the punishment aspect of it.

One of the reasons we have a parliamentary committee touring this country is to see what is wrong with our prisons. One of the things which is wrong is that almost everyone in them knows that after the sentence has been served a person has to pay and pay for the rest of his or her life. There is a discrimination there because we do not basically believe that a person has paid for his crime when he has finished his sentence. I realize how very difficult it would be, however, to extend this clause further than it goes at the present time.

There are important questions we could ask about the commission and its power to turn away a complainant if it thinks the problem can be solved elsewhere. If the commission refuses to hear a case, there is no provision for appeal, and people would then be thrown back on their own resources to the courts or other agencies. Whether there should be some check on the power of the commission in that way, I suppose we will have to wait and see. We will have to wait to see what regulations will govern its operation.

I realize that there are many things which bother the Advisory Council on the Status of Women about this bill. One prime objection is the exclusion of protection for Indian women against the discrimination which exists and which is embodied in the Indian Act. On this aspect the bill as it stands is no help at all. I do not think we should leave a growing portion of the population outside the law. There should be equal rights across the country.

I think we should seriously consider the Indian Act as it relates to this human rights bill because we cannot say that our aboriginal people are any less worthy of equal treatment in these areas.

We need some concrete suggestions as to the standards of skill, effort, responsibility, and conditions of work. The proposed human rights commission should establish effective standards to define these matters clearly so that we will know what they are, and so that the mass of litigation and appeals to the commission can be reduced. One would hope that that would serve a persuasive purpose in terms of hiring practices. Unless there is some definition or some guideline clearly set out, then the proposed human rights commission will be more swamped than the Anti-Inflation Board has been, and it will have to take unto itself a staff of enormous size in order to deal with the multitude of complaints which I am sure will be presented.

I hope that when this bill becomes law there will not be very many parts of it which will be disallowed or found to be inoperative because changes were not made in the Interpretation Act, and again the proposed human rights commission should concern itself with monitoring all the legislation which has been passed which has made it difficult for women to have their rights upheld in the courts.

I recommend for anyone's reading an article by Marguerite E. Ritchie entitled "Alice Through the Statutes" which appears in the McGill Law Journal, volume 21, No. 4 of the winter of 1975. That was not very long ago, and yet the writer found it necessary to sound a warning about the inability of women to find that they can be given the rights which are assumed to exist for men. I know that the bill before us refers to an individual; it does not use the word "male". The bill assumes that women have the same rights, so that may be taken care of, but I hope the minister will address himself to the concerns which have been presented to me by women who have had lengthy experience in Ottawa and who are familiar with some of the difficulties involved in taking a case to court in an attempt to remove discrimination.

The closing words of Marguerite E. Ritchie's article are interesting, and I quote:

> For over a hundred years it has been clear that legislation drafted in terms of the male exposes women to denial of rights granted to men. Even legislation drafted in neutral terms has often been used to exclude women from rights and privileges. The whole structure of the law with respect to women rests upon judgments of men who regarded women as inferior. Women who seek even the smallest hope of equality must demand express legislation, written in the clearest possible terms. Yet legislation, however clear, has often failed at the hands of antagonistic male judges.
> What is the answer? What should women and those men who sympathize with them do? Would it be better to ignore the Interpretation Act and to concentrate on other statutes which appear to promise equality? Will the promise of these statutes be any better than the illusion of the Interpretation Act?

Examples are cited with regard to the failure of that act to protect, and finally, in conclusion, the writer says this:

> What we do know is that words can be made to mean many different things. It all depends on who is drafting the statutes and who is deciding upon their meaning.
>
> Lewis Carroll said it all in "Alice Through the Looking Glass":
>
> "When I use a word," Humpty Dumpty said, in rather a scornful tone, "it means just what I choose it to mean—neither more nor less."

● (2020)

> "The question is," said Alice, "whether you can make words mean so many different things."
>
> "The question is," said Humpty Dumpty, "which is to be master—that's all."
> And that is the question. Not for dogs and cats, but for women and men who are concerned about something called justice.

As we prepare to pass this bill in which we can all agree with so much, there are still questions to be raised. I do not think there is anyone here so optimistic he would not see the bill failing to take its full effect until it has been used and faced with the challenges that will inevitably arise and which must be carried through to the Supreme Court of Canada for the final decision on whether the bill truly achieves the high aims set out in its magnificent and revolutionary preamble.

If I might make a final point, it is that this bill will be distinctively Canadian in its scope compared to practically every other nation in the world. We will have something that many people who come to this country will not have experienced in other parts of the world—a kind of freedom, a kind of mobility in the society forecast in these bright areas that I hope we can achieve. But we must realize that there are many countries in the world that, by their very nature and their long history, have not provided equality on all of these bases the way this bill will do for this country. We will be moving into a class that is distinct, separate, and special.

It will be to the credit of this country to pass the bill, but we must be warned that the struggle is not over the moment the legislation is proclaimed. It will have to be monitored by every group interested in preventing discriminatory practices whether by race, ethnic origin, colour, sex or marital status. Only by that kind of eternal vigilance can it be made part and parcel of our life and culture, something which we accept and in which we believe.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) has already indicated it is our intention to support this bill at second reading stage. We do that because we recognize the importance of putting a bill on the statute books which at least begins to outline the rights of Canadian citizens—which begins to delineate the human rights to which Canadian citizens should be entitled.

We support that kind of bill because we know that while many Canadian people like to think that this is a country which does not discriminate, in which people are not prejudiced and people are not adversely affected because they belong to a racial, religious or ethnic minority, such is not always the case. We have had the most glaring illustrations of prejudice and discrimination in every part of the country. I could start on the east coast or the west coast and take it province by province—the way we dealt with Japanese Canadians in British Columbia during World War II, how we moved them from the homes they had lived in for so many years, hundreds or thousands of miles away; how the Hutterite groups have been dealt with in Alberta, and how the native people have been mistreated in every province and territory.

Knowing our record and knowing how necessary this bill is, we give general support to it. We recognize there are some good things in it, and for them we give credit to the government. The bill consists of a number of important clauses which deal with some separate fundamental issues. Let me list a few of them.

I believe the bill spells out the right of all citizens, men and women, to receive equal pay for work of equal value. I know that is a difficult provision to implement. Countries in all parts of the world that have tried to implement it—and it is part of the International Labour Organization Convention No. 100—have had difficulty in doing so. We at least have it as part of this bill.

I believe this bill will permit the government to take affirmative action to help disadvantaged groups, people who have been discriminated against for various reasons. It will help them through special programs to attain improvements they have not been able to get until now.

This bill also includes a provision to help the physically handicapped and prohibit discrimination against them.

For these reasons, and for the general thrust of the bill, we want to commend the government and give our support.

We have had experience in the federal jurisdiction and in all provinces with legislation whose purpose is to prohibit discrimination because of race, colour, religion, etc. I refer to the Fair Employment Practices Acts of the provinces and federal government, and the Fair Accomodation Practices Acts of the various provinces. These acts are on the statute books but unfortunately in some provinces, if not most, they remain essentially a dead letter. The provinces have done little if anything to publicize the legislation, have done little if anything to let the people discriminated against know they have rights, and have done little in the form of education, and practically nothing in the form of investigation, and so in some provinces the laws have been singularly unsuccessful.

On the other hand, in some provinces such as Ontario, Nova Scotia, Saskatchewan and, to a lesser degree, Manitoba, there have been attempts which have been quite successful. Having passed the legislation, the governments of those provinces have established agencies and given them funds at least to begin to get the message contained in the legislation to the people, particularly those most directly and adversely concerned.

I hope I am wrong when I get the feeling that this legislation has been drafted almost exclusively—and I do not mean in just the legal and technical language—by lawyers. I have a feeling that the concept of the people who drafted it is that the whole thing is to be a legal operation. Someone complains. The complaint is investigated. The board, holds a hearing, makes a finding and issues an order. If the experience of the provinces in this field is any guide, we need fewer court cases and quasi judicial hearings and much more discussion involving those who have been discriminated against and those who have discriminated.

● (2030)

Mr. Basford: Hear, hear!

Mr. Orlikow: Only through such discussions can a solution acceptable to both parties be found. I hope, once this legislation passes, that the minister will consider an operation of that kind, instead of purely legalistic prosecutions to enforce the law. Having said that, I hope the minister will consider my remarks in the spirit in which they are offered. I meant to be complimentary.

I now wish to deal with the clause which, in my opinion, ought to have been left out of the bill, the clause purporting to deal with privacy. Mr. Speaker, privacy involves extremely complicated questions.

Every country of the world, by which I mean every democratic country—in totalitarian and authoritarian countries citizens have no right to privacy, have no freedom, and I will not discuss them—every democratic country in recent years has had to give much thought to the rights of individual citizens, to a citizen's right to believe what he wants, say what he wants, and think what he wants without interference by government. There are no easy answers to this complicated question. I hoped the government would introduce a freedom of information bill as a companion piece to its human rights bill. I believe a bill of that kind is a must for a modern-democratic society. We have seen no indication that the government accepts this idea. Even if it can be said that the government accepts the idea in principle, it has, as demonstrated by this bill and the minister's speech, so hedged its acceptance of the principle of privacy with so many reservations as to suggest that it does not intend to give the people of this country the right to privacy and the right to freedom of information.

Last Friday, after the minister had introduced the bill on second reading, the hon. member for Greenwood disagreed with some of the things the minister had said.The hon. member for Greenwood told the minister what we, in my party, think is wrong with the bill. To make my point clear I shall quote part of what the minister said last Friday, as reported at pages 2977 and 2978 of Hansard for February 11, 1977. He said:

> Turning to a different aspect of the bill, that is, Part IV, Mr. Speaker, I noted in my introductory remarks that apart from the question of discrimination, the question of individual access to government records is not a uniquely Canadian issue. It is a problem faced by most highly developed societies. My officials and I have carefully studied the experience of the countries. We believe the provisions in the human rights bill provide the widest possible access and the firmest safeguards consistent with our parliamentary system and the interest of the public as a whole. I believe that the provisions of this bill, taken as a whole, will give Canadians more effective protection against administrative misuse of personal information in government files than that now enjoyed by citizens of the United States.
> The United States privacy act and part IV of Bill C-25 have the same basic objectives. Both acts have basically the same approach to providing access through the creation of a federal index of personal information banks. Both acts provide for an individual to see his file and to propose changes if the individual feels that errors exist. Both acts provide for administration procedures to warn users of the file that the subjects of the record objects to particular information in the record if an institution refuses to make corrections.

Let us compare what has happened in recent years in the United States with what is happening right now in Canada. Those interested in the Alger Hiss case were able to obtain virtually all the records and materials accumulated by the FBI during its investigation of the case, as well as all the records pertaining to the prosecution. It does not matter to my argument whether Alger Hiss was guilty or innocent. The point is that American citizens could get that information. Similarly, the children of the Rosenbergs who were electrocuted for giving atom bomb secrets to the Soviet Union were able to see the FBI files concerning the Rosenberg case. Can the minister suggest for a moment that Canadian citizens have similar rights? I do not want to flog a dead horse, but let me say this: I have before me a copy of a letter dated June 15, 1971, written by the former solicitor general to other cabinet colleagues. It is marked "personal and secret." The contents of the letter were not revealed to the 21 people about whom the minister wrote. Talking about the report he had received, the minister said in his letter:

> The report also draws attention to the activities of various persons and groups, some of them employees of the federal government, who support the EPO concept and who appear to have as their aim the destruction of the existing political and social structure in Canada.

That is a most serious charge.

Mr. Woolliams: I'll say it is.

Mr. MacKay: I thought there was no list.

Mr. Orlikow: The letter goes on to say:

> Through such institutions the New Left seeks to organize and radicalize the underclasses of society and mould them into a revolutionary force capable of overthrowing the present socio-political system . . .
> Of more concern, however, is the presence within certain government departments and agencies, particularly CMHC, of a small group of former campus revolutionaries . . .

And so on. As I say, those are serious charges. If the government stands by what the minister said last Friday, it should at least give those people notice that they have been accused by somebody. They ought to be told what they are charged with so that they may have the opportunity to enter a defence.

In this connection may I refer to another case to which the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) referred earlier in the present debate. A man called McGuire worked for CN-CP Telecommunications, an organization which is partly owned by the Crown. That corporation entered into a contract with the Department of Supply and Services for the transmission by the RCMP of certain information. Under the provisions of that contract, Mr. McGuire and a number of other employees had to pass a security check. Mr. McGuire was told by his employer that he did not pass it, that he could therefore not work for the company any longer and he lost his job. Mr. McGuire was never given a bill of particulars. He was not told why he lost his security clearance, nor was he given an opportunity to defend himself and explain why, in his view, the decision to remove his security clearance was unfair.

The union felt they could not accept this action. If the employer could do this to Mr. McGuire, the employer could do it arbitrarily to other people. They exercised what they thought was their right to grieve the matter. The case went as high as it could to arbitration. The union lost at every stage.

The union eventually took the case to the Supreme Court of Ontario where it applied for an order quashing the arbitration award on the ground that the grievor, Mr. McGuire, has been denied a fair hearing, that he could not adequately defend himself not being aware of the reasons why he failed security clearance. Mr. Justice Robins sympathized with Mr. McGuire, but dismissed the application. He said in part, and I quote:

> While one may sympathize, as I do, with an individual's wish to know why he has been refused security clearance and with his desire to have the opportunity to contest allegations against him and confront those responsible for the allegations, proceedings before an arbitration board arising under a collective agreement between a company and a union do not provide the forum for vindication against such governmental decision. Recourse must be found elsewhere.

Where is that elsewhere? One would have hoped it was in this bill, but it is not. Under the provisions of clause 4, about which the minister spoke so glowingly, there are so many exceptions that we know in advance that no one will get any information that a government minister or bureaucrat does not want a person to have. We know from experience that individuals never get information about themselves to which they are entitled if the government does not want to give it.

The hon. member for Greenwood listed all the exemptions which this bill includes in Part IV. I will not do that again. I will merely refer to one. If, in the opinion of the minister, the harm of the disclosure would outweigh the benefit, it could be made exempt. Surely that makes the minister the judge, jury and prosecutor. That kind of principle is one which we in Canada would not knowingly admit is part of our system of justice. However, that is the kind of provision the minister wants us to accept.

In conclusion, I want to remind the minister of a policy with regard to the rights of individuals suspected of being security risks. The policy was enunciated by a former Liberal prime minister, Mr. Pearson. To my knowledge it has never been repudiated or modified. If one looks at the cases, it is obvious that it has not been lived up to. I refer the minister and hon. members to Hansard of October 25, 1963. I will read just a couple of paragraphs of the statement by the then prime minister, Mr. Pearson. I quote from page 4044:

> The first of the new requirements is to inform the person involved when his security or reliability is in doubt and may have to involve his dismissal. Employment departments and agencies will in future be required to tell an employee everything that is possible of the reasons for the doubt, if there is a doubt, and to give him an opportunity to resolve that doubt.

There is no question as to whether the 21 people listed in the appendix to the letter from the former attorney general were given that opportunity. Mr. McGuire was never given that opportunity. Mr. Pearson went on to say:

> The second new requirement is to ensure that a second look is always taken by a separate body before dismissal is finally decided upon. Once the individual is told of security doubts he will have the opportunity to give his side of the case. The employing agency will consider it, consult the staff of the government security panel, and arrive at a conclusion. It may be to accept the person as reliable, in which case no problem arises. It may be to transfer him to a less sensitive employment, as has been the case certainly more than once in the past—

None of these procedures was followed by the government in the cases that I have mentioned. I mentioned those cases because we know about them. Because of the way in which the government conducts its business, because of the secrecy which the former prime minister said would no longer be the policy of the government, and because of the failure of the government to enact regulations or legislation to protect the rights of individuals, we do not know how many other cases there have been. However, we have every right to believe that there have been others. In fact people have been accused, tried, convicted, and penalized without ever knowing it.

We have every right to call on the minister to re-think his position, to call on the government to re-study the question and to give Canadian people a law which will give them the same rights and protections which are embodied in legislation in the United States and other countries. Without that, many of the rights supposedly included in this bill will not be given to the citizens of Canada.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I want to incorporate many of the arguments that were outlined this afternoon and those that were given on the previous occasion in my speech. I am one who sometimes questions it when you spell out our inalienable rights in a statute. I believe that out of the growth of the common law, which is really the crystallization of customs and traditions that grew up through our social being, flows all real true freedom, and it is a matter of interpretation. When that doesn't work, of course, people crushed by law have no hope but from power, and if laws are their enemies they will be enemies of the law. Those who have much to hope for and nothing to lose will always be dangerous, and it is only when they are dangerous that sometimes we bravely get progress, because man climbed out of the slime because of discontentment.

● (2050)

We need a human rights bill. I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that the battle for human rights never ceases. We go back to the days when Cicero said the natural law was unchanging and everlasting, that it was one eternal and unchangeable law for all nations and for all times. In the Middle Ages, of course, Thomas Aquinas emphasized that natural law was superior to man-made law and that, as a result, all rulers were themselves subject to it. Of course what really grew out of that thought was that freedom, in our understanding of the word, flows from the rule of law, not from people.

The Reformation, of course, brought sharply to the fore the need for the protection of freedom of religion. It is interesting to note that we got freedom of religion in Canada before the Mother Parliament adopted freedom of religion in the United Kingdom.

As the concept of the social contract theory of government developed in the 19th Century, still greater emphasis came to be placed on the rights of the individual. If the government failed to respect natural rights, wrote Locke and Rousseau, disobedience and rebellion were justified. Thus was born the modern notion of human rights. So responsive were men to this notion that the greatest social revolutions in history took place in the western world, one in America and one in France, in order to preserve for individuals the rights which they claimed belonged to them.

This deep-seated desire for the recognition of human dignity—and human dignity, of course, is what we are talking about when we are talking about human rights—is reflected in the words of the American Declaration of Independence. I will only spell out a few of its thoughts in that regard. It says:

> We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal—

We have to remember that that was composed in 1776 and 1783 but it took them a long time, even when they had spelled out everything—and this is what I want to emphasize—before men were recognized as equal in the United States of America.

—that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness.— That to secure these rights, Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed—That whenever any Form of Government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the Right of the People to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new Government—

Of course that can be done in a democracy very easily because in a democracy, thank God, people can ask us to leave this job very nicely. There is that one law for all, namely, the one law which governs all law, the natural law which is known as the law of wisdom, and which is sometimes known as the divine law meaning, of course, the law of humanity, justice, equity and equality. All this is found in our common law and, if not found or enforced by the use of common law, I fear it may not be enforced by rights spelled out in the statutes. However, let us try. I say this, however, with some reservation, because of my own experience.

The common law of Canada which is a heritage we received from the United Kingdom, as did the United States of America, may in some cases, with some reason, guarantee all those freedoms outlined in the bill much more effectively than a statute can do so. For what a statute gives by guaranteeing freedom and equality may sometimes subtract from others the same amount of freedom and equality. I pause there. That is the one weakness of this bill.

There is to be set up a tribunal, which will be a bureaucratic administrative tribunal, to make decisions. That frightens me. It frightens me because I have had some experience in reference to administrative bodies and how they operate and what kind of evidence they listen to, because they can listen to hearsay or other evidence, direct or indirect. And I would say that one of the first amendments which should be proposed to this bill is that the right of appeal to a Superior Court should always be spelled out in the statute. Failing that, this bill could take away more rights and freedoms, and do more harm to equality, and create more discrimination than it gives, because you have a bureaucratic board administering it. Therefore the very spirit of the bill, which I endorse, could be lost in the wording of the statute.

Let me make some suggestions. I am in favour, of course, of human rights—like motherhood. As the bill sets out in clause 2:

The purpose of this act is to extend the present laws in Canada to give effect, within the purview of matters coming within the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada, to the following principles:

Others have quoted this, and perhaps I might just do so.

(a) every individual should have an equal opportunity with other individuals to make for himself or herself the life that he or she is able and wishes to have, consistent with his or her duties and obligations as a member of society, without being hindered in or prevented from doing so by discriminatory practices based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, age, sex or marital status, or conviction for an offence for which a pardon has been granted or by discriminatory employment practices based on physical handicap;

I would bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, and I am sorry he is not here this evening, the achievement of the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) who, in 1960, brought in the Bill of Rights. When you look at the wording of the Bill of Rights and at this act, you find they are synonymous. But one thing about the Bill of Rights is that the rights set out in that statute are enforced by the judiciary, an independent body, not by an administrative group or board appointed by an order in council or some government which might have some political influence or patronage behind the scenes. The Bill of Rights states:

It is hereby recognized and declared that in Canada there have existed and shall continue to exist without discrimination by reason of race, national origin, colour, religion or sex, the following human rights and fundamental freedoms—

This is exactly like the first clause of the bill. The words are the same.

(a) the right of the individual to life, liberty, the security of the person, enjoyment of property and the right not to be deprived thereof except by due process of law;

Note, it says, "an individual" it does not say "male". "Individual" means both male and female. The Bill of Rights goes on to speak of the right of the individual to equality before the law and the protection of the law; freedom of religion, freedom of speech, freedom of assembly and association and, above all, freedom of the press. I am not going to get further into that. I shall merely say that this Bill of Rights does not apply only to bills which are passed now but to bills which have already been passed. The Supreme Court has upheld that contention as good law. What I am saying is that the man who set the tone on the subject of human rights is a former prime minister, the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: I mention once again that the implementation and application of the Bill of Rights are done by the judiciary of Canada and not by some group of unknown people who may form some tribunal without the right of appeal.

Another matter I want to discuss for a moment is the privacy of individuals, which should be protected to the greatest extent consistent with public order and well-being. I was shocked this week when I read the annual report to His Excellency the Right Honourable Governor General of Canada, which is required by the Criminal Code of Canada, section 178.22. I am talking about wiretapping. I am happy indeed to see the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) in the House; he made a great contribution in the committee when these sections were going through. I was rather shocked to see this statement at page 6 of the report:

The number of persons arrested—

Not looked at, Mr. Speaker, but arrested, which means put in jail.

—whose identity became known to a peace officer as a result of an interception under authorization was 1,062.

This means, Mr. Speaker, that these people were locked up. They were just not talked to but locked up. Then paragraph (2) says:

The number of criminal proceedings commenced at the instance of the Attorney General of Canada in which private communications obtained by interception—

I will leave out the rest, but out of the 1,062 persons, 13 were found guilty.

Mr. Fox: Read the next paragraph.

Mr. Woolliams: I will read the next paragraph. I am glad the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) came across and spoke to me, because I am going to say something about his answers today. He told me that some cases had not proceeded, and I said that perhaps they were left over from last year.

Mr. Fox: Read the rest of it.

Mr. Woolliams: Well, if the Solicitor General wants to make a speech he can make one. If he says that I am wrong, then let him say so. But if he is going to endorse this kind of law, and if he and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) want to repeal the 90 days' notice clause in regard to people who have had their telephones wiretapped, then if 1,062 people were put in jail and there were only 13 convictions with notice, God help us when they abolish notice. This is why we took him and the Attorney General of Canada on in committee. They are members of the party which is supposed to stand for freedom. It is the party that is supposed to say it believes in civil rights. I would ask them to take a look at their own legislative clauses and to clean them out.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fox: Just read the next paragraph.

Mr. Woolliams: According to the Montreal Gazette of today's date:

Canadian bureaucratic procedures, it appears, grind on irrespective of the liberties of citizens. Justice F. U. Collier's 29 writs are the latest case in point.

These writs of assistance—search warrants—were issued to the RCMP for customs and excise work. They are extremely broad, directed against no person or crime and without time limit. They allow an officer to enter any building at any time, even breaking down doors, and to seize goods.

The government has allowed these writs to stay in use for 35 years. Do hon. members like that kind of law? Would they like it in Quebec? They remember what the Supreme Court of Canada said about the padlock law of Duplessis, and I am sure they would not like that sort of thing.

Miss Bégin: You should raise it in the question period.

Mr. Beatty: You were not in the cabinet then.

Mr. Woolliams: I will be saying something about the question period in a minute.

Justice Collier, believing he had no choice, issued them "reluctantly and despairingly." It is true that in 1965 the court ruled it had to bow to Parliament's wishes and so issue the writs.

But what are Parliament's wishes? Article 145 of the Customs Act says a federal judge may grant such writs.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

They went out with the Star Chamber court.

The law, which expresses Parliament's intent, seems to give the court discretion. Indeed, if it did not, there would hardly be cause for the procedure. There must be some means of checking police power under the law, and the courts are a logical instrument for that function.

The RCMP says it needs the writs, because it is difficult to find judges on off hours.

Yet they used these writs for 35 years, Mr. Speaker. That is a great excuse. I am surprised that the Solicitor General backs this kind of nonsense.

Maybe so, but it is not impossible, and police convenience is just one factor to consider. And why 29 writs, without time limit, when more can be had any working day?

So this editorial proves that what I said in reference to wiretapping was correct.

I asked questions about this in the House. I asked what was going on in the prisons. I called them horror chambers. I dared to raise my voice this afternoon to the Solicitor General and the government in regard to a report that a young fellow 15 years of age, who has been sent to a penitentiary in British Columbia, has been forced at the point of a knife to have oral sex with senior inmates. If that is not a horror dungeon there never was one. We have talked about civil and human rights, and when I asked the minister this afternoon to clean up the mess he said he had only waited for eight years and he was going to wait some more until he got a report. What does he need before he takes action, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): You keep pegging away.

Mr. Woolliams: All right, I will look after your hearts over there. I am always glad to see the party whip in the House because he takes a register every day of who is in the House. I hope he registered those who were absent on his own side.

Mr. MacKay: He was a football coach. He had to do it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. MacFarlane: The hon. member is always talking about rights and I hope he will not infringe on mine. Unless he comes over here and checks that this has been done, I hope he will not make a remark of that nature, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Woolliams: The former whip said that he kept one, so maybe the hon. member is getting lax in his duties. However, while on the subject of answers that I have been getting, I thought he would like to hear a quotation from Chesterton because it illustrates the kind of answers that we have been getting. Chesterton said:

It is a deadly error (an error at the back of much of the false placidity of our politics) to suppose that lies are told with excess and luxuriance, and truths told with modesty and restraint. Some of the most frantic lies on the face of life are told with modesty and restraint; for the simple reason that only modesty and restraint will save them. In one sense, truth alone can be exaggerated: nothing else can stand the strain.

I hope that the minister listened to that quotation.

I now want to come to another situation. May I refer to the second report of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments. Like other bills the government brings in, Bill C-25 spells out a lot of provisions, but much of what is going to be done will be done by order in council. What does the joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons say about this? It says:

> The Committee desires that, in principle, all subordinate law and rules made by the Crown and by those put in authority under the Crown, or by any other delegate or sub-delegate of Parliament, should be subject to Parliamentary supervision, unless specifically excluded.

In other words, regulations and the rules implemented by order in council are turned out by the government like an assembly line. In every bill the government is enlarging the right to legislate outside of parliament. Legislation should be debated in parliament, scrutinized, and voted upon. I see the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale) shaking his head, but I know he has been flying around with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) and has been getting into bad habits.

● (2110)

The report goes on to read:

> Any exceptions from such supervision should be made explicitly and be justified on such compelling grounds . . .
>
> All subordinate laws and rules should, unless again there are compelling reasons to the contrary, be registered centrally and published.

My point is that I hope that when the bill gets to committee those provisions that are to be set down by regulation can be written into the bill.

In the matter of human rights, it seems to me that education is the best way to persuade and to ensure that humanity and equality flourish throughout the land. I am not being critical of the government at the moment, but let me say that I was rather shocked to find that the very first Canadians, the Indians, were excluded from the provisions of the bill because their rights and privileges come under the Indian Act. Having at one time represented the old constituency of Bow River in which the Blackfoot and Morley reservations are located, I know that the Indians are skeptical because some of the treaties and rights are spelled out in the Indian Act, and therefore they are reluctant to see the few rights they have appear even in a bill called the human rights bill.

Leo Tolstoy said the following, and I think he put it very succinctly:

> It is very easy to take a child away from a prostitute, or from a beggar. It is very easy, when one has money, to have him washed, cleaned and dressed in good clothes, fed up, and even taught various sciences; but for us who do not earn our own bread, it is not only difficult to teach him to earn his bread, it is impossible; because by our example, and even by those material improvements of his life which cost us nothing, we teach the opposite.

In other words, you can legislate this type of bill, but as long as there are economic differences in Canada—and there are great economic differences today because of the high rate of unemployment which exists in the maritimes, in Quebec and in other parts of Canada—you cannot legislate against economic discrimination. No legislation will help, unless we achieve economic equality in Canada.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: I always appreciate when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre speaks on pensions in the House—and I mean this sincerely—because of the inequality which exists between pensions paid to males and females. This bill will not correct this situation unless there is other legislation to ensure that the intent and purpose of this bill are carried out.

I should like to make one comment about the equality of the sexes. We have heard a lot about that. It is easy to say and believe, but it will not occur overnight because of preconceived ideas.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: My hon. friend laughs. I do not know why. Let me give an example. I saw this in my own city. One female is hired as a telephone repairer. She is one woman among 100 men, but that does not guarantee equality. It means more than that. Such an example is merely hanging drapes over an untidy and unsightly window. My hon. friend laughs again. I am sure the ladies do not laugh. This is in the bill. We are not talking about the kind of sex the hon. member is talking about. I know that he is talking about. All I am saying is that there will be no equality between males and females by legislation if it only means that you hang out the drapes over an untidy or unclean window, and you hire one or two females and give them equal pay. That means nothing. It is merely an apology, merely an excuse for the bill.

I want to say again that the setting up of a tribunal or a commission to enforce the terms and sanctions of the bill creates a firm bureaucratic body with absolute power which could destroy freedom if a wrongful decision is made regarding race, national or ethnic origin, religion, age, sex, marital status, physical handicap, or conviction for an offence in respect of which pardon has been granted. There should be included in the bill the right of appeal, and I say that right must be granted from a decision in any superior court in any province. An independent review is a must, because if someone lays a complaint and if, for one reason or another, the tribunal says that discrimination has been exercised, under the terms of the bill the man is liable to have his business closed, and to many other actions.

It is the unalienable right of every Canadian to have the right to appeal the decision of any administrative body which will accept evidence. Having said that, let me say that I think that is the most important contribution I can make to this debate.

An hon. Member: What was all the rest of it?

Mr. Woolliams: You would not understand it, and I feel sorry for you.

Let me end on this note, Mr. Speaker, with reference to this bill, to the wiretapping legislation, and to other acts. I should like to read a poem which I have quoted previously. It is my favourite poem. It reads:

Eternal spirit of the chainless mind.
Brightest in dungeons, Liberty, thou art,
For there thy habitation is the heart—
The heart which love of thee alone can bind;
And when thy sons to fetters are consigned—
To fetters, and the damp vault's dayless gloom,
Their country conquers with their martyrdom,
And Freedom's fame finds wings on every wind.
Chillon. Thy prison is a holy place,
And thy sad floor and altar—for 'twas trod,
Until his very steps have left a trace
Worn, as if the cold pavement were a sod,
By Bonnivard. May none those marks efface!
May they appeal from Tyranny to God.

To me it is within the spirit and soul of man and woman whether we are going to have human rights of not. You cannot legislate morality. You can legislate kindness. You can legislate against bigots. You can only educate and try to enlighten people. It is in the flow of education and enlightenment, and in the soul of men and women, that you can bring about real equality and end discrimination wherever it exists.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Francis): The hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Thank you. I would like to begin my bachelor speech—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Pigott: —by congratulating Mr. Speaker and Mr. Deputy Speaker on their chairing of the debates of this House. In my three short months here I have come to realize that the spirit of impartiality and good humour that radiates from their presence is vital to the functioning of this great Chamber.

I suppose that every politician likes to think of his or her constituency as being a microcosm of the nation. In the case of Ottawa-Carleton, this claim is correct. Ottawa-Carleton is partly urban, partly suburban, and partly rural. The riding contains more public servants than the average, it is true, but in most other respects it is very typical. Most important, perhaps, the balance between French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians is about the same as in the nation as a whole.

● (2120)

In such areas as urban planning, housing, transport, bilingualism, decentralization, and the withdrawal of farmland from production, Ottawa-Carleton is a cross section of Canada. In my three short months here the telephone calls, the constituency visitors and the letters are all beginning to show a pattern of people who are human and who feel caught in the machinery of big government, big companies and big trade unions. They sense a faceless, remote power which is not concerned about them as people. We need more listening posts where people can find concern, humanity, and justice.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Pigott: In the years to come my riding will be a critical testing ground for the ability of the government of Canada to come to terms with the serious problems facing our country today. But overriding each of the difficulties before us now is the larger more human concern about the well-being of Canadians. It is in regard to the problems of individual people that I wish to speak on the proposed human rights legislation.

We welcome the bill. We are anxious to see it proceed as quickly as possible to a point where Canada can claim the entrenchment of human rights legislation exemplifying the spirit of the Declaration of Human Rights as approved by the United Nations. There are, however, certain points in the bill where some amendments might improve the law. Ultimately, of course, Canadians will make the guarantee of human rights a reality in our country. Proper legislation and education, however, can be very effective agents of this process.

No mention of human rights in Canada can be made without the recognition of the leading role of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) in pioneering legislation in this important area.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Pigott: I would like to join the minister and other hon. members in paying tribute to the right hon. member for his significant contribution to the area of human rights and to the spirit of that concern which carries forward today.

I am by occupation a businesswoman. You and I, Your Honour, as bakers, come from the same business background. For many years I have operated an enterprise employing hundreds of persons. I know the necessity of encouraging and maximizing the optimum use of every asset, and human resources are still the most vital asset of any company or any country. There is a need for governments, through leadership, example and prudent legislation, to establish a climate within which individuals can pursue their own goals. It is the responsibility of the federal government to encourage the various elements of our complex society to work in harmony for the well-being of all Canadians.

One of my favourite stories relates to Michelangelo when he was carving the beautiful statue of David. A young boy sat watching as he chipped away the stone, and the figure of David began to emerge. Finally, as he was putting the finishing touches to the work, the lad came up, pulled Michelangelo's sleeve and said, "How did you know he was in there?" As the economic, social, and cultural forces in our national life chip away at the large stone called Canada, I pray there will be many Davids emerging to take roles in business, politics, and labour to slay the Goliaths of mistrust, greed, intolerance, waste, and fear which keep us from maximizing the human potential of all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Pigott: One area of concern in the human rights bill is its provisions for dealing with discrimination aimed at the handicapped. We in Canada are still guilty of cruel discrimination against the 15 per cent of our people who, through no fault of their own, are physically handicapped. That equals half the population of Quebec, or the total population of the three prairie provinces. We have victimized them through our ignorance, oppressed them through our laws, or lack of them, hidden many of them from our sight and kept them from our communities by constructing buildings which make it all but impossible for the handicapped to exercise their basic human rights. For years now the handicapped have tolerated public insensitivity to their situation, but we live in an age when the level of knowledge in medicine, science, technology, communications and other fields has reached an advanced stage, and the "Forgive them for they know not what they do" attitude of the handicapped must go.

Disabled people have the same needs as the rest of us—a good job, an adequate income, a choice of housing, an opportunity to take part in recreational activities, personal independence and a chance to contribute to their society. These are not privileges; they are their basic human rights.

The newest developments in medicine are aimed at restoring the cardiac, the stroke, and the severe accident case to as normal and meaningful a role as their impairment will allow. I am concerned that the environment these people are coming into should be prepared and ready to take them on a fair basis.

How have we denied these rights to the handicapped? Buildings in Canada are monuments to our thoughtlessness. The catalogue of our obstructions is almost endless. Steps, whether one or a long flight, are a great obstacle to the handicapped. In my own riding during this past month I have been unable to find a place in an office building that could take care of the handicapped. I had to go to a second floor, where there are stairs.

Awkward, heavy or swinging doors, hard to manage door knobs and handles, narrow entrances, elevators in which the buttons are placed too high to be reached by someone in a wheelchair, and numerous other constructions effectively say "keep out" to the handicapped. The majority of our buildings in Canada, both public and private, restrict access to thousands of Canadians who are wheelchair bound, to those who use crutches or other walking aids, who have diseases such as arthritis or heart conditions, who are elderly, blind, or disabled in some other way.

One of the strong points in the proposed bill is that it aims at prohibiting discrimination in employment on the ground of physical handicap. We hope that under this bill an employer will no longer be able to argue that his office is inaccessible to wheelchairs, which thereby denies employment to a handicapped person. The alternative for a handicapped person who is denied employment on such unfair grounds is the kind of government assistance which, in financial terms alone, forces poverty level living.

The very strength of the proposed legislation in dealing with employer discrimination toward the handicapped is also one of its weaknesses, since problems other than employment are not resolved. One of the greatest needs of paraplegics and other wheelchair users is proper housing. The design of most Canadian housing is discriminatory to the handicapped. We need buildings with units for wheelchair users distributed all across our cities so that handicapped people can live wherever they choose.

Implicit in the goals of human rights legislation is the nurturing of a quality of life for Canadians which promotes the individual citizen's search for dignity and a meaningful control of his or her own existence. Only through the use of one's capacities can satisfaction and a genuine sense of worth be achieved.

The quality of the environment is a factor in the quality of life. A large gap exists today between the possibilities offered to the able-bodied and those available to the handicapped. If the environment in Canada is to serve the whole population equally, it must take into account those who are handicapped, one person in seven, and allow for their development and self-expression.

The image which our society assigns to the handicapped becomes the self-image of each handicapped person. It affects their expectations and their behaviour. By our negative view of the handicapped we not only limit their prospects but also deny ourselves the benefit of their many talents. Through our thoughtlessness we have turned what would otherwise be a medically identifiable condition of physical impairment into a handicap. We have turned a physical disability into one which can often place the handicapped in a mental wheelchair as well as a physical one. We have done this by maintaining an attitude which magnifies the individual's perception of his or her disability. No matter how physically disabled a person may be, inside the body is a human being that has enormous potential to live and contribute. We must work to build an environment which sustains people's morale and provides an impetus to pursue goals.

• (2130)

Sadly, we have also created a handicap from another physical situation—age. We stereotype into a universal category anyone over the age of 65.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Pigott: Chronological age, degree of biological aging, and personality are all lost in a blurred image which denies individuality. The stereotypes of old age lead to negative expectations.

As the Advisory Council on the Status of Women has pointed out, physical handicap is defined in clause 20 of the bill and includes any form of congenital or accidental infirmity. Two important restrictions limit protection to handicapped persons. First, discrimination prohibited with regard to the handicapped person only applies in matters of employment: in matters of services, facilities and housing, nothing is foreseen for the protection of the handicapped persons to benefit from these services normally available to other Canadians.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I have one short story. Recently a legless pilot of the Battle of Britain was in Ottawa. Charlotte Gobeil interviewed Sir Douglas Bader, DSO, DFC, on television. During the interview she referred to him as "disabled". "My dear girl", replied Sir Douglas, "I'm not disabled. I've just got a set of different abilities."

I urge the minister to consider that implicit in the term human rights is the right of "human potential", to be recognized and developed to the advantage of all Canadians. In the handicapped and the aged, we have such great human potential.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, it is a tremendous honour for me to follow the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: I want to pay tribute to her. I think those of us in the House who had a chance to listen to her very moving, eloquent, and compassionate address on the subject of Bill C-25 could not help but be struck by the tremendous contribution that is going to be made by the hon. member to public affairs in Canada.

Any of us who watched her career as a business person and knew of her public service in this community expected that when she came to parliament she would make a contribution to public life as well. In the three months she has been in this House the hon. member has justified the high expectations we had of her. She has proven in those three months that she is as able a representative as any in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, in the four and a half years I have been in parliament one of the most difficult problems I have had to face is in cases where legislation is put before the House which is flawed in many respects but which has also many good aspects, and to decide whether we should allow the bill to go to committee and possibly become law after making amendments to improve it, or decide to recognize the flaws as so significant that the bill should not be allowed to go further.

The legislation before us replaces Bill C-72 which sat on the order paper until the end of the last session. The fact it is no longer on the order paper is testimony to the government's belated recognition that the public would not stand for such poor legislation. If the government had resurrected Bill C-72 in different form and brought it before the House, my recommendation would have been to vote against it. It was so poor that it would have been worse than no legislation at all. The legislation before us is flawed in many respects but it is better than nothing, in my judgment, and deserves to go to committee.

When we deal with the bill in committee I hope the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) will prove he is flexible and willing to listen to argument made not only by members on his side but on the other side as well about improvements that must be made if the bill is to fulfil his intentions.

A number of my colleagues have spoken about the human rights provisions. The hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton was very eloquent and moving in her remarks, and other colleagues have pointed out that basically the bill is good where it deals with human rights although there are amendments we would like to see made.

I should like to address my remarks particularly to clause 4 which deals with privacy. Let me start by saying that this clause does not comply with the rest of the bill. Bill C-25 is a hybrid of two reports—the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women and the 1972 report on Privacy and Computers. The forced marriage between those two reports has resulted in a piece of legislation which in many ways is grossly inadequate. It is an unhappy marriage between poorly matched partners.

There is no need for us to debate whether action should be taken to protect individual privacy in Canada. Surely that case has been made long ago; surely there has been public acceptance of the need for action to protect personal privacy.

In 1972 when the excellent privacy and computer report was brought down, Canada was in a position of world leadership, recognized over the globe as being in the forefront of the recognition of the right to privacy and the need for legislative protection of that right. In the five years since, the government has squandered the lead that the privacy and computers report gave us. Already in other jurisdictions meaningful action has been taken. In Sweden legislation has been brought in which protects personal privacy and enshrines the concept of freedom of information in the public statutes. In the United States legislation has been brought before Congress and signed into law by the president, which deals with both questions of freedom of information and protection of personal privacy. In Great Britain strides have been made to protect the fragile right to personal privacy.

It is in Canada, where we had a lead in recognizing the problems, that there is today a need for action on the part of the government—not for cosmetics or smokescreens but for meaningful action. That is why this bill is a fraud in so many ways and is so deficient in attempting to live up to the expectations created by the government.

Two hundred years ago William Pitt described the rights of the citizens in those colonies still under English rule this way:

> The poorest man may in his cottage bid defiance to all the force of the Crown. It may be frail, its roof may shake, the wind may blow through it, the storms may enter but the king of England cannot enter. All his forces dare not cross the threshold of the ruined tenement.

What Pitt said 200 years ago was that even at that time British law recognized the need to protect the right of the individual from encroachment by the state. I think if Pitt had been able to foresee the technological and governmental changes in the 200 years following his speech he would probably have mentioned a number of other areas where any poor man in his shattered cottage had a protection which we do not have today. He might have mentioned two centuries ago that the king's forces could not bug private telephone conversations. Two hundred years ago we could not coerce information from individuals to fill statistical data banks. He would have mentioned 200 years ago that those clothed with authority could not burst into a citizen's home in the middle of the night under the authority of a writ of assistance; that the government could not establish blacklists based in part on information obtained from burgled private files; and that the forces of the government could not collect vast amounts of information from individuals to satisfy the voracious appetite of computer data banks.

In the 200 years which have elapsed since William Pitt's time the enormous growth of technology and the intrusiveness of the government have put in question the rights of the individual. The individual's standing in relation to his government is reduced, and our human rights are vastly diminished.

Let me deal specifically with a number of flaws in the bill. Before I do so, may I allude to the American privacy act of 1974. I think it is well worth while comparing the proposed legislation before us with the vastly superior legislation passed by the United States Congress. I wish to put on record the remarks of President Ford, made at the dedication ceremonies of the Stanford University Law School, Stanford University. The speech was delivered on September 21, 1975. Let me put on record what President Ford said with regard to retention of privacy. He said:

> Among the very first things we learned was that one of the worst offenders is the federal government itself.
> I don't mean improper or illegal invasion of people's privacy or constitutional rights by federal agencies or individual officials, which nobody condones, and which I will not tolerate as long as I am President of the United States. Rather, I mean threats to privacy which have resulted from laws duly enacted by past Congresses for very laudable purposes having wide public support and appeal.
> Many of these laws, with today's technology, cumulatively threaten to strip the individual of his privacy or her privacy and reduce him to a faceless set of digits in a monstrous network of computers. He has not only no control over this process but often has absolutely no knowledge of its existence.

When President Ford signed the privacy act of 1974 White House officials pointed out that it was then possible to identify some 6,000 separate American federal record systems which kept data about American citizens. We do not know how many personal record data systems containing information about individual Canadians operate at the federal level. The government has never catalogued them. I have attempted to secure such information by putting questions on the order paper, but the government has never published a comprehensive list of data banks in Canada.

I now wish to quote a short passage from "The New Despotism", by Lord Hewart of Bury, former Lord Chief Justice of England. The book was published in 1929; nevertheless, what the learned author had to say is still relevant. The author points out how a parliamentary system can be turned into a despotism. I wish to quote two of the points he raises, as follows:

> Two main obstacles hamper the beneficent work of the expert. One is the sovereignty of parliament, and the other is the rule of law.

The author then explained how the beneficent bureaucrat can turn the parliamentary system into a despotism. He must:

> (a) get legislation passed in skeleton form; (b) fill up the gaps with his own rules, orders, and regulations; (c) make it difficult or impossible for parliament to check the said rules, orders, and regulations; (d) secure for them the force of statute; (e) make his own decision final; (f) arrange that the fact of his decision shall be conclusive proof of its legality; (g) take power to modify the provisions of statutes; and (h) prevent and avoid any sort of appeal to a court of law.

I invite the minister to examine that prescription for turning the parliamentary system into a despotism. I suggest that the learned author's remarks could well apply to Bill C-25, for here again we see the government's proclivity for passing legislation which gives power to legislate by regulation without the necessity of bringing those regulations before parliament. The tremendous discretionary power this legislation would give to the executive is shocking. There is power to create secret data banks containing identifiable information about individuals. There is also a provision which would except such data banks from the provisions of the bill, rudimentary as they are, and deprive average citizens of basic human rights.

Other hon. members have mentioned clause 55 which allows any minister to decide at his own discretion whether any particular data bank is to be included within the provisions of the bill. If he feels that the disadvantages of inclusion outweigh the advantages, there could be an exclusion.

Last Friday, when introducing this bill on second reading, the minister said something which I hope he now regrets, because what he said was an abomination. As reported at page 2978 of Hansard the minister said:

> There are, however, certain differences which lead me to believe that the protection afforded under this bill of the rights of Canadians with respect to abuse of their personal information in government banks is effectively greater than the rights of Americans.

I can think of no more flagrant example of a statement which can only mislead Canadians about the true nature of the legislation the government is presenting. This bill, unlike the American legislation, make no provision about the sort of information which is to be gathered about an individual. The American legislation specifically defines the type of information about an individual the government's data-gathering machines may acquire. Specifically, the American legislation outlaws information about an individual's use of the first amendment, to do with freedom of speech, to ensure that there is no political surveillance of individuals. Surely, above all, a bill dealing with the protection of the privacy of individuals should define the classes of information about individuals which may be gathered and stored, and proscribe the gathering of information which is not to be used for legitimate purposes or is no longer timely.

Nowhere does this bill provide for the purging of data files, for the removal of information which is obsolete, for the removal of information which can only be damaging to an individual. I think it is important to consider this point.

For the benefit of the Minister of Justice I shall read an excerpt from the publication entitled "Databanks in a Free Society", a project of the Computer Science & Engineering

Board of the National Academy of Sciences of the United States, under the directorship of Alan F. Westin. The director is acknowledged as being one of the foremost experts in the world on the subject of protection of privacy. I quote from page 349 of the project as follows:

> First, in terms of privacy, a general policy should be to extend the zones of personal and group freedom from compulsory data collection so that matters that ought not to be considered in making decisions about individuals do not become part of the formal records of all. In this sense, privacy is the primary civil-liberties issue, since both confidentiality and due-process questions disappear if the data are not gathered in the first place, or once they are destroyed. Not only should the need for and relevance of specific items of personal data have to be established in positive terms but serious consideration should be given to whether some entire record-keeping programs deserve to be continued at all; this was the basic question raised about the army's domestic intelligence watch over civilian political activity in the late 1960's. A further consideration where the need for collecting data is at issue is whether records should be retained beyond their period of likely use for the purposes for which they were originally collected.

Surely the government ought to have had such considerations in mind before it introduced this legislation.

I have mentioned some of the exceptions in the bill, some of its omissions as well as the sweeping powers granted to the executive branch of government for making arbitrary decisions. It would be worth while to illustrate with examples the problems having to do with federal as well as provincial data systems.

● (2150)

How many Canadians are aware of the fact that the federal government is in the business of compiling and selling computerized mailing lists for use by commercial firms, allowing those firms to send junk mail to individuals served by the government? The Canadian Post Office is in that business.

For every federal constituency which does not have a commercial postal directory available, the federal government will make available for $5 a list of every householder in the constituency, with his or her address and occupation. What sort of record is that for a government which professes to be in favour of protection of personal privacy?

The provincial governments are no better. Most departments of transport sell the motor vehicle registration lists. Anybody can buy an individual's name if that individual is registered as owner of a motor car.

An editorial in the Globe and Mail a year ago pointed out that the Ontario government is selling the driving records of individuals to insurance companies, for example, or any one willing to spend $3 to buy them. This in itself poses a very serious threat to individual privacy.

I want to cite another example which is particularly important in this debate. It illustrates the way in which this ministry has acted in terms of protection of privacy. Some of my colleagues alluded to the incident of blacklisting where secret files were constructed. The government still denies they exist despite the fact that the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) has been able to obtain them. These files were collected and used to damage the careers of some civil servants. These civil servants have never had a chance to face their accusers, never had a chance to have due process in answering the allegations made against them.

I want to cite another example, although the one dealing with the blacklist is very worth while. We should look at that. When you look at the exemptions in the bill, the blacklist and the material leading up to it would be specifically exempted from the provisions of the bill. The blacklist would have remained secret if it had not fallen into the hands of the hon. member for Central Nova.

There is a further example which shows the colours of this ministry. I want to quote from the prince in exile, the hon. John Turner. When he was minister of justice in 1970, he discovered the importance of freedom of information and privacy. He delivered a speech entitled "Twin Freedoms: The Right to Privacy and the Right to Know." What a remarkable record for this minister, who was the most secretive of all the cabinet and would not disclose to the people his plans for the Canadian economy, to have discovered so many years before the value of freedom of information. I want to deal specifically with his attitude toward privacy. I quote from Mr. Turner's speech:

> I start from the proposition that the right to privacy is the most complete of human freedoms and that any encroachment on that right should be allowed only if society has proven that encroachment is necessary.

Further he said:

> Arbitrary practices, inscrutable executive decisions, can only find acceptance where there is, in fact, no other means or no other way. It must be our constant goal, our continuous endeavour, to circumscribe and eliminate whimsy and caprice in our search for justice.

I hope the Minister of Justice will compare those words which were delivered by his predecessor, the hon. John Turner, with Mr. Turner's actions in office, and with the actions of his immediate predecessor who is now Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) in the case of Bill Buchanan, the former chairman of the Anti-Dumping Tribunal.

On May 4, 1972, the former minister of justice and attorney general launched a campaign to impeach Bill Buchanan, the government's own appointee to the chairmanship of the Anti-Dumping Tribunal. On November 27, 1975, the Supreme Court of canada, without a dissenting voice, threw out the case of the federal government. Let me explain the circumstances leading up to Mr. Buchanan's dismissal.

Prior to being appointed chairman of the board, Mr. Buchanan served in private business and in some cases represented Canadian domestic glass manufacturers. At the end of 1969, a complaint by two Canadian glass manufacturers that sheet glass was being dumped unfairly in Canada from other countries reached the Anti-Dumping Tribunal.

The Chairman of the Anti-Dumping Tribunal removed himself from any decision that was made, stood aside and allowed two other members to go ahead and make the decision. After the decision was made that the dumping in Canada should be banned, he approached a solicitor to get legal advice as to how the decision should be signed. The advice he received initially was that all three members should sign the document. For two years, nothing happened. Suddenly in 1972 federal tax investigators swooped down on Mr. Buchanan, seized records dealing with his income tax returns and his personal files, ostensibly to do an audit of his tax returns.

I quote from the Montreal Gazette of December 20, 1975:

On May 4, 1972, Otto Lang as minister of justice and attorney general, moved through the courts to quash the Anti-Dumping Tribunal's glass case decision of two years earlier.

The government alleged that Mr. Buchanan had a conflict of interest in this instance. The article goes on as follows:

The justice department's file on Buchanan was relayed to John Turner, then minister, of finance and the cabinet minister responsible for Buchanan's tribunal. Turner asked for his resignation, effective immediately.

Buchanan complied.

Subsequently this case was taken to the Supreme Court of Canada where it was thrown out by a unanimous decision. Chief Justice Laskin, who wrote the decision, pointed out it was a travesty that should not have been allowed to take place.

Perhaps I could call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker. I would like to renew this at a later date.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION—REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE STUDY OF ALL GOVERNMENT CONTROLLED-CORPORATIONS

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, we have all watched with varying degrees of astonishment the investigations of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts into AECL's foreign dealings—astonishment that such secretive and expensive tactics are needed to lose money on reactor sales, and astonishment that a Crown corporation could operate in such a loose and arbitrary fashion. While we all respect the independence of Crown corporations we must also respect the concept of value for public money, no matter what the status of the agency through which that money is dispensed.

We can be thankful that parliament has an Auditor General with the resources to tell us when something in the system has gone badly wrong, and we sorely need a comptroller general to catch as many potential difficulties as possible before they occur. But for parliament the information supplied by the Auditor General is of little use unless there exists a suitable means of delving into his findings or complementing them with committee hearings.

We have the Public Accounts Committee to allow us to discuss the Auditor General's report, but that committee is not, as it should be, in any position to support the Auditor General in a concrete way, or to provide a forum which will add to the public's knowledge and understanding. At present the committee's scope seems to be limited by the degree of co-operation exhibited by those being examined and that is more likely to lead to farce than fact. What use is it to a committee of the House if the head of a Crown corporation or a department simply says, this when things get a bit hot, that he does not feel able to release or give the requested information?

I therefore asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) if additional powers could be considered for the Public Accounts committee, and received the usual vague brush-off. It should not be as easy as it is now to refuse information to a committee of this House. The Public Accounts Committee should have full powers to call for persons and papers, and there should be an obligation for those persons and papers to be produced.

● (2200)

If documents or testimony involved in a hearing are of a confidential nature, the sessions should be in camera with the minutes of proceedings edited. Committees at Westminster dealing with confidential or secret information sometimes do this. If co-operation is not forthcoming the committee should be able to report to the House, as it can now, but with a guarantee that its report will be speedily and decisively dealt with. The government could still side against the committee as must be its ultimate right, but it would have to do so openly and could not frustrate the committee by inertia.

It would also assist the Public Accounts Committee if the Public Accounts contained more corporate data and a summary of it, as suggested by the Auditor General in paragraph 5.24 of his 1976 report.

We should also devise a better method of examining witnesses to permit proper cross-examination, and the chairman should be empowered to chop off time-wasting and irrelevant answers. The committee has too much to do in a short time to permit a witness to be deliberately long-winded. Moreover, it is a committee with unique responsibilities to parliament and to Canada.

In answering me on Monday, the Prime Minister talked about "the traditions of our parliamentary system". It is marvelous the way spokesmen for government are able to laud the flexibility of the parliamentary system when they want to rewrite the rules to eliminate the rights of opposition parties, but are able to propound inviolable principles and conjure up threats of congressional republicanism when their own infallibility and authority might be questioned. No doubt we are about to hear more of this bunk from the parliamentary secretary. God knows, it should be obvious that if parliament is to remain even as relevant as it is now, my proposal which I intend to advance formally to the government House leader, at the suggestion of the Prime Minister, is not excessive. It is in keeping with the best traditions of parliament in an age that is becoming more complicated and difficult. I want the government to be more forthcoming.

Adjournment Debate

Mr. Jacques-L. Trudel (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I doubt very much that what I am about to say will satisfy the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). He has already qualified what I am going to say as being bunk.

Let me try to situate the hon. member in a proper context. I think he is showing a lot of disrespect for all the members of the Public Accounts Committee. I wish that if he had the time he would come to see what takes place in that committee before criticizing and characterizing what I have to say as bunk. Members of his own party, and of all parties, have spent many hours conscientiously engaged in this work. I should like him to have been present this morning when a code of ethics was supplied to us following questions asked by various members present.

The hon. member complains that the government has been restrictive. He says the tactics it has been using have been restrictive. I doubt very much that he has taken the time to read the minutes of the committee.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Every word.

Mr. Trudel: The question whether the committee has received some of the documents it was seeking should be examined very closely. I think we have been supplied with documents, in some cases with too many documents. We have asked to see certain contracts which are confidential in nature. We have asked the Auditor General. I think the hon. member has shown little respect for the Auditor General in his remarks because he has been co-operating and has been instrumental in helping the work of the committee, not hindering it. All the members have been co-operating and have been seeking some information. There is a report to be submitted to the committee, and I am sure there is frustration on all sides as to certain aspects of the work we are doing presently.

There is one aspect with which the hon. member is concerned. He is seeking to change some of the work which is being done. I will fully co-operate and I hope that all of us will achieve what he is seeking. The fact is that we can proceed in camera at the present time. It has not been done so far, but I am sure we will be doing so in the near future at the call of the Chair, whenever he asks us. The steering committee, as I said, has considered that. We will have to put before the House a report.

This is a very extensive study which has been placed before us. We have encountered evidence that there need to be changes in the rules. I feel there has been no hindrance by any member either of the cabinet or of any party at the present time, so I do not know what the hon. member calls "bunk", but I do feel that the chairman and the committee members have co-operated to get what we are seeking at the present time.

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

TRADE—GUIDELINES TO COMPANIES WITH REGARD TO INTERNATIONAL BOYCOTTS—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, on October 21 last year, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) made a statement on the government's policy on international boycotts. It read in part as follows:

> The government will take measures to deny its support or facilities for various kinds of trade transactions in order to combat any discriminatory effects which such boycotts may have on Canadian firms and individuals . . .
> Canadian firms may decide nonetheless to agree to certain boycott clauses and forego Canadian government support for the projects concerned. All Canadian firms, however, whether they accept boycott clauses or not, will be required to report all instances of their complying with boycott provisions. Information obtained from such reports will be made available to the public.

The two measures that the minister said the government would take to implement this policy did not go into effect on October 21; instead it was three months later, on January 21 of this year, that the deputy minister of industry, trade and commerce finally issued guidelines to his departmental officials for their implementation. From a reading of these guidelines, however, it would not appear that the government has done what it promised to do in its October 21 statement. That statement clearly says that all Canadian firms will be required to report all instances of their compliance with boycott provisions. But the guidelines say that only those firms that "request" departmental support for transactions "where boycott requests have been agreed to" will be reported.

Firms will surely know, Mr. Speaker, that they will not get support for such transactions, and they will not request such assistance in the first place. So, as a practical matter, the reporting system set out in the guidelines has no real meaning or substance. What is disturbing is that it would appear that through these guidelines the government has modified, has backed away from, the commitment that it made in its October 21 statement. That statement said all firms, not just those that approach the department and request its help, would be required to report boycott related transactions.

The guidelines appear to narrow down, to draw back from, what most observers thought the government was promising in its October 21 statement in another significant way. They say that government supporting services will be denied only where boycott clauses "have been agreed to". But most government supporting services in the trade area are provided before agreements are made. What the guidelines are saying, therefore, is that, in spite of the government's statement of last October 21, the government will be providing most of its services as before. It will be circulating trade opportunity information requiring boycott compliance. It will provide market information, promotional services, all of the facilities of its trade commissioners, until a contract with a boycott clause is finally signed and agreed to.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, very few of these kinds of government support services come after an agreement has been signed. There is no need for them after that point. This is not what the public thought the government was going to do. The words of the statement last October 21 create the impression that these services would be withheld for activities leading up to the signing of the boycott related transaction as well as those after its signing. Mr. Speaker, unless this is the case that part of the government's statement about withholding services has very limited meaning and value.

If the government is serious about what it said in that statement in connection with condemning international boycotts interfering with Canadian trade with friendly countries, and interfering with business and other relations between Canadians in this country, it must implement the two measures that it announced last October 21 in the fullest possible way rather than in the most limited, narrow, and meaningless way. But, more important, it must act on the findings of the Citizens' Commission on Economic Coercion and Discrimination, a report demonstrating the impact of the Arab boycott in particular in Canada, a report, by the way, to which the government has not yet formally responded. It must put into effect legislation of general application applying to all businesses, whether or not they need government support. If it does not do so, as the report points out, it is undermining its own policy on international boycotts. It is allowing foreign governments to extend their discriminatory law into Canada.

Surely the essential tasks of our national government are to protect our country's sovereignty and to afford the equal protection of our laws to all residing within our borders. Unless it brings forward all the measures necessary to make fully operative its October 21 policy on international boycotts, the government will not be carrying out these responsibilities in the way expected by Canadians generally.

I think that Canadians generally would join me in calling on the government for full and meaningful action to put its policy statement of October 21 into effect in a way that really means business and protects Canadian rights and Canadian sovereignty.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am here this evening to respond on behalf of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) and his parliamentary secretary. I want to begin by commending the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) for the obvious sincerity and conviction with which he expressed his views this evening.

The procedures laid down in the deputy minister's instructions of January 1, 1977, are consistent with the policy of the Canadian government on international economic boycotts.

Through the instructions, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is ensuring that its services are withdrawn or withheld in cases where a Canadian firm or individual has agreed to international economic boycott provisions of a type which contravene the government's policy on such boycotts.

The reporting requirement under which the department would publicize the names of companies or individuals from whom services and support have been withdrawn or withheld for contravening the government's policy on boycotts is a responsible and practical way of reinforcing the government's policy in this area. To go beyond these measures would not, in fact, give any greater consequence to these measures and could jeopardize the development of normal trade which did not contravene government policy.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. A motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.16 p.m.

PROPOSAL TO OUTLAW UGANDA IN VIEW OF PRESIDENT AMIN'S ALLEGED CRIMES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity to move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) that on the basis of information already available, it being apparent that President Idi Amin of Uganda and his associates have committed a revolting crime against civilization in the murder of Archbishop Janani Luurum and two of his ministers, and that this latest event being part of a continuous reign of terror and outrageous insane atrocities against Christians in particular, hundreds of whom have been shot and killed by gunfire by so-called security forces, I move:

That this House views with horror and condemns unreservedly Amin's crimes and believes that his country, so long as he is president, should be outlawed both in the United Nations and in the Commonwealth of Nations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 the motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: So that it be perfectly clear, Liberal members are the ones who said no.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT TO CLARIFY OPERATIONS OF METROPOLITAN AREA GROWTH INVESTMENTS LIMITED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the depressed state of the Nova Scotian economy and the need for maximum utilization of all resources to assist in overcoming regional disparity, and in view of the dismal and continuing failure of the Metropolitan Area Growth Investments Limited, that split-level, hybrid, crown venture capital agency, jointly funded by this government and the government of Nova Scotia, to the amount of $20 million nearly five years ago, I move seconded by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield):

That the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion make a statement on motions at the first opportunity to explain and clarify the operations of MAGI and inform the House and the country whether the minister has recommended and approved the multi-million dollar investment in a second-hand cruise ship to ply the waters of the Caribbean, and whether or not the continuing dispute between the minister and his predecessor and the Premier of Nova Scotia as to appointments of executive officers for MAGI has finally ceased.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

URBAN AFFAIRS

ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO KEEP COMMITMENT TO AID URBAN TRANSIT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I, too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Considering that the Prime Minister promised three days before the 1974 election that a returned Liberal government would spend $290 million on badly needed energy-efficient urban transit, and considering that both the need to conserve energy and the financial burden of our municipalities have increased since then, I move:

That this House condemns the disgusting cynicism of the Liberal government glaringly revealed yesterday when the Minister of Finance casually announced that this additional election promise was dead.

● (1110)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House for the presentation of such motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Macdonald said no. How would you like your wages frozen?

Mr. Fairweather: That's one more promise down the drain.

APPROVAL OF ANNOUNCEMENT PRIME MINISTER WILL DISCUSS GARRISON DIVERSION WITH PRESIDENT CARTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to present a motion under Standing Order 43, a motion which I believe will be acceptable in all parts of the House. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That this House welcomes the announcement that the Prime Minister will discuss with President Carter, during his forthcoming visit to Washington, the Garrison diversion project in North Dakota, and further that this House unanimously endorses the stand the Prime Minister has said he will take to the effect that work on the Lonetree reservoir be deferred, pending a review of the whole project and of this country's concern over its effects on Canadian waters, particularly in Manitoba and Saskatchewan, which is being made by the International Joint Commission.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House for the presentation of such a motion for debate. Is the unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, who said no?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): We agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I understood that there was agreement.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am prepared to put the question again. Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House before the presentation of such motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I am certain that all members of the House, all Canadians in general and Manitobans in particular, welcome the telegram sent to the Liberal leader of Manitoba, a non-elected member, announcing that the Garrison diversion would be put on the agenda for discussion. Mr. Speaker, I find it strange that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) chose not to make that announcement in this House; and, further, when asked direct questions by my colleague the member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta), by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) and myself, refused to answer.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The motion is debatable. Look at the Standing Orders.

[Mr. Fairweather.]

Mr. Whiteway: The making of such an important answer outside this House is, Sir, a degradation of the rights of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Fairweather: This is costing us $5,000 a word.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, may I mention that the Prime Minister had previously made an answer in the House in this regard. It is unfortunate that the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway) was not present. I have made several representations to the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: Now we know what you have been up to, Joe.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): The Prime Minister assured me that he would take the matter up with President Carter. For that reason, today we were in wholehearted agreement with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). We would not object to such a motion, because it had already been agreed that the Prime Minister would do exactly that.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to hear the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay), the Minister without Portfolio, or the minister "without", finally indicating what is his parliamentary role. I am concerned about one thing. Why was a burden imposed on the taxpayers of Canada in order to permit the hon. gentleman finally to speak to the Prime Minister? It should be made abundantly clear that the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway), the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) and the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta), have consistently over the years that this matter has been in issue been asking this government to do what they chose to announce through an unelected member of anything who happens to be a member of the Liberal party. The government did not even have the courtesy to send copies of that telegram to the members of this House from Manitoba. I am sure that includes the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) as well.

With regard to the project in, at least in the period of time that I have been here and according to the record I have read before that time, this matter has been dealt with extensively by the Canada-United States interparliamentary group year after year after year with some sympathy among congressmen and senators in the United States. The matter has been ignored by this government except through evasion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): If the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is going to speak to the President of the United States with regard to this very important matter, a matter which I class beyond an irritant, one that affects the environment of part of Canada and one in which there is still time to stop it, I hope the negotiations are conclusive.

I hope that the conversations, which have been heralded in a book this thick with regard to press briefings, go far beyond that in terms of the legitimate concerns between our two countries because this is much more than a public relations junket. The Prime Minister is meeting a new President, a new administration, an administration which has exhibited some friendly feelings to the nations north of it and to the south. This is a great opportunity for us.

The whole project discussed in this motion is only the first. Therefore, the Prime Minister goes to Washington with the goodwill of this House. However, he also goes backed by some expectations of this House and the people of Canada. It is our hope that those expectations are not false and ill-founded.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to speak at length on this motion to which has been indicated the unanimous consent of the House. I simply want to say that it was quite clear that in responding to an inquiry about whether this matter was going to be raised that neither the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) nor myself had any intention or thought of not doing it within this chamber.

As I have said many times, responses have repeatedly been made by us to questions. I wonder if the hon. member, who criticizes us for replying through a spokesman of a political party, would say that he is any less to be replied to than the hundreds of other people in western Canada to whom we have also made replies. There was no specific answer other than one which I, personally, have sent to many, many people including members opposite.

Mr. Whiteway: Why did you release it to the press?

Mr. Jamieson: If the hon. member will look at the media for the past three or four days, he will see there have been dozens of stories about various topics which are to be discussed during the meetings in Washington. I really do not believe there is much by way of substance in that particular complaint.

All I want to say at the moment is that I am delighted, as I am sure the Prime Minister will be, to have the unanimous support of the House on this issue. Clearly it is one we have been discussing in terms of planning for some time and it will have high priority. However, in fairness it is as well to note that work on this project and representations concerning it have come from members in all quarters of the House and there is general concern throughout Canada for it—

• (1120)

An hon. Member: With the exception of the government.

Mr. Jamieson: An hon. member says "With the exception of the government". I would remind him that the IJC has had a reference from the government on this matter for some time, that a group from the IJC has made a finding which it supports. I will conclude by expressing the hope that when we go to Washington on Monday of next week the United States authorities will be receptive to what I assure hon. members will be the strong representations made.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before carrying on with the debate I might indicate to hon. members that this sort of proceeding always places the Chair in a dilemma. A motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 of course requires the unanimous consent of the House only for its presentation for debate. Acccordingly, when consent is given and the motion is put, it is before the House as a debatable motion, and that debate is now under way. Only on rare occasions does such a debate occur, but when it does it stands a risk—and it is no longer a risk but a reality—of running into conflict with Standing Order 15, particularly paragraph (2) of that order, which reads as follows:

> Not more than two minutes after the reading of prayers, the business of the House shall commence. Members, other than Ministers of the Crown, may propose motions pursuant to Standing Order 43 at this time. Not later than 2.15 p.m. or 11.15 a.m., as the case may be—

And there we have the application directly to this morning's proceedings—> —oral questions shall be taken up.

And oral questions are to be concluded by 12 noon. Obviously, it is in our interest, when a few remarks are likely to be made by way of a very short debate, that I should exercise some leniency with respect to the beginning of the question period. As I say, the motion is a debatable one, but I am nevertheless under an obligation to proceed to questions in accordance with Standing Order 15. In the circumstances, I feel I should begin the question period now and listen to argument later as to whether we should resume the debate at the end of the question period.

URBAN AFFAIRS

ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO KEEP COMMITMENT TO AID URBAN TRANSIT—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Finance. It arises out of a press conference yesterday at which the minister solemnly laid to rest the government's undertaking made during the 1974 election campaign to assist in the development of urban transportation. As a matter of fact, on June 5, 1974, the Prime Minister, referring to that promise, said that while other election promises were just election promises, Liberal promises would not be pie in the sky.

My question to the minister, who now runs the risk of being buried just as that promise was buried yesterday, is this. What does he have to say to the one in every four of the people of this country who have to depend on urban transit to get to their places of employment and to their residences in view of the reneging yesterday of this solemn undertaking made by the Prime Minister in 1974 to provide full cost of developing and building urban transit facilities in this country?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would remind that group to which the hon. gentleman refers that there has been a widespread expression of concern by the colleagues of the hon. gentleman and by many other people in Canada regarding the rate of inflation in Canada and that as part of the anti-inflation program the rate of growth of expenditures of the federal government is to be progressively reduced over a period of time. The day before yesterday my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, tabled estimates, and I think the hon. member for Vegreville agreed with the notion that we should reduce federal expenditures. Indeed, arriving at that conclusion has been awkward and hard, as has been the choice in many other areas, the federal government will not be able to extend its assistance to municipalities which we had hoped to assist in earlier years.

Mr. McGrath: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would remind the minister that the rate of inflation in 1974 when this promise was made was considerably higher than it is now; we had double digit inflation at that time, but that was not a consideration when the Prime Minister made the promise. In view of the fact that the minister's colleague in charge of housing and urban affairs is now in Edmonton in pursuit of an attempt to get agreement between the provinces and municipalities to resume tri-level discussions of the new policies, and in view of the fact that the situation is urgent, does the minister intend to put in place, to assist municipalities and hard pressed metropolitan areas of this country which embrace 75 per cent of the population, measures to relieve the pressures on them of this population growth?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, in reply to his first remarks I would remind the hon. gentleman that the rate of inflation is indeed down, and down in part because of the decision of this government to exercise that kind of economic restraint. I find it a rather peculiar priority which the hon. gentleman has; he would sooner have 11 per cent inflation and an increase in government expenditure.

Mr. McGrath: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. It is precisely because the rate of inflation is down that the minister should discharge this solemn promise made in 1974. In view of these studies and the projection arising out of these studies which were made by his colleague, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, that by the turn of the century half of the population of this country will be living in three large metropolitan areas, thereby putting increasing pressures on urban transportation facilities, and in view of the substantial energy savings of $5 billion estimated over the next 25 years if we can increase our urban transit capacity in this country, would the minister take a look at these studies by his colleague, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, and his colleague the minister of energy, which are now underway and, in consultation with them, come up with some kind of cost-sharing program to meet the serious problem which is facing our cities and our provinces?

[Mr. McGrath.]

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, we are about to deal today with a provision having to do with the cost-sharing program whereby, as part of this government's priorities, we transfer fiscal room and responsibility to the provincial governments for the purpose of discharging provincial programs, such as those dealing with urban transit. In that sense we are making substantial financial room available to the provinces. In my own province this has been the obligation of the province of Ontario, and under these particular circumstances we think it reasonable that the provinces should continue as they have in the past to assist in the evolution of urban transit.

So far as transportation is concerned I go back to my basic point, that we are in the process of reducing the share of the gross national product taken by the federal government and this, of course, inevitably involves a reduction in major spending programs.

REASON FOR GIVING PRIORITY TO AIRPORT CONSTRUCTION OVER URBAN TRANSIT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Finance and has to do with priorities. Given that the federal government has invested massive amounts of public funds in air transportation facilities and projects, such as the white elephant at Mirabel and the stillborn Pickering proposal, which will serve at best only 10 per cent of the Canadian population, would the minister indicate why priority was given to these projects which presumably has resulted in the minister's having to make his statement yesterday that there is now no money to invest in urban transportation which could serve 75 per cent of the Canadian population?

● (1130)

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the provision of air facilities to Canadians has been the responsibility of the Government of Canada, and indeed, hon. members made reference to Pickering. It may well be that in time the present volume of traffic in and around Malton airport will require a further extension of facilities in my particular community. In that sense I entirely support the actions taken by the Minister of Transport and his predecessors to provide better facilities to the Toronto centred region, and in that regard I have no difficulty at all in defending the decision to acquire the land for Pickering. I hope that the provincial government in due course will realize some of the difficulties that the community will have to suffer by not having adequate air and other facilities.

SUGGESTED SALE OF PICKERING AIRPORT SITE AND CN TOWER AND INVESTMENT OF PROCEEDS IN URBAN TRANSIT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Again I direct my question to the Minister of Finance. As I understood that railways were also a federal responsibility and as the current estimated cost at Pickering as it now stands is $110 million and the CN Tower has cost $60 million, would the minister indicate if any study has been completed or undertaken on the feasability of selling either or both of these projects with a view to investing the proceeds so as to relieve the current chronic commuter congestion in the Toronto area?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): One of the conclusions that we have arrived at—and it seems to me to be a sensible one—is that one should entrust the management of CNR to the president and the officers of that corporation and let them manage. As a management decision, they have chosen to go ahead with the CN Tower, and I for one as Minister of Finance, as well as my colleagues, do not propose to lean over their shoulder and give them management direction. I say: if you have a good manager, let him manage.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, has the minister ridden on the commuter train at rush hour going into the Toronto area so as to experience at first-hand the congestion on that service and, if so, how can he say that priority should not be given?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: He has a chauffeur.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. gentleman is expressing a grievance. It is a condemnation which I think he should address to his friends at Queen's Park.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Trudeau promised it.

An hon. Member: And Sharp did, too.

PROPOSAL TO USE OIL COMPENSATION FUND TO AID IN DEVELOPMENT OF URBAN TRANSIT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance as well. Since the Prime Minister in his great election promise of 1974 made a specific reference to the need for more energy-conserving forms of transportation, and since the federal government has saved more than $300 million as a result of the excessive revenue over payments that came in during 1976 from the special tax for oil compensation payments to Atlantic Canada, if we are to take the government's promises seriously, why will the federal government not allocate that $300 million to pay for the $290 million election promise it made in 1974 in the field of rapid transportation?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think it has been a sound policy of the government, suggested, among others, by the Glassco Commission, in which we have sought, in the administration of public funds, to avoid earmarking sources against expenditures. In this regard we have reached the conclusion that we have some priorities in discharging public responsibility and we have made a decision to do that. I would remind the hon. gentleman that while it is true, under programs which have protected the eastern Canadian market against a cost increase we have been able to keep the costs down and have not had to meet the heavy expenditures because of a lower oil price increase than we anticipated. One cannot be certain about the future and, indeed, where an oil price increase might take us.

WITHDRAWAL OF COMMITMENT TO PAY PART OF CAPITAL COST OF RAPID TRANSIT LINE TO SCARBOROUGH

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Since the general manager of the Toronto Transit Commission has indicated that because the federal government has reneged on its commitment to pay 25 per cent of the capital costs on a proposed rapid transit line to Scarborough the Toronto Transit Commission will not be able to proceed with the planned project, can the minister say if the withdrawal of the commitment to pay 25 per cent of the cost is a complete withdrawal from financial responsibility, or will the federal government put up some money to pay the cost for this needed facility and, if so, how much?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): As I indicated yesterday, we have appropriated substantial funds for each of the provinces for the purpose of a range of priorities with regard to urban transportation, urban transit, commuter traffic, rail relocation, and level crossing improvement. As I indicated to the chairman and the mayors of metropolitan Toronto yesterday, we were really seeking guidance from those gentlemen as to how those priorities should be indicated. It is, of course, a matter for decision also with the provincial government as to the allocation of those priorities, but I think that if the provinces choose, for example, to seek assistance in urban transit from the funds now made available rather than improvement in grade separations, indeed my colleague, the Minister of Transport, will have to give that his serious consideration.

EFFECT OF WITHDRAWAL OF COMMITMENT TO AID IN DEVELOPMENT OF URBAN TRANSIT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I ask the Minister of Finance, in the absence of the Prime Minister, considering that the municipal planning of virtually every city from St. John's in the east to Vancouver on the west coast has been fundamentally put in jeopardy by this government's decision to renege on its 1974 election promise, does the minister not agree that not only has the government upset municipal planning because of this decision but it has also contributed substantially to public cynicism about politicians in this country?

Some hon. Members: Liberal politicians.

Mr. Broadbent: The government is completely withdrawing from what were allegedly serious election promises.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): We have a federal system of government, and the provincial governments are given very full powers, and by the arrangements, for example, that we will be debating today they are given substantial fiscal means to discharge this particular responsibility.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

ELECTION EXPENSES

ALLEGED REASON FOR DELAY OF LIBERAL PARTY REPORT OF CONTRIBUTIONS

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

It has to do with the report on contributions to political parties. At the end of December 1976, I obtained from Mr. Hamel's office all reports on contributions to political parties for the year ending December 31, 1975, except that of the Liberal party. I have been told that it will not be ready before the end of June 1977. Could the minister inform the House whether this is a normal situation, what are the reasons for such a delay and is there in the law a deadline for such presentation. The reason I ask this question is that I need the report at the end of May 1977 at the latest.

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, this is the responsibility of my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue (Miss Bégin).

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I thought it was the Minister of Manpower and Immigration because all the correspondence I received was signed by that minister. I apologize, and I shall direct my question to the Minister of National Revenue in the hope that she will give me an answer or investigate.

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Revenue): It will be a pleasure for me to do so, Mr. Speaker.

URBAN AFFAIRS

EFFECT OF DEVELOPMENT OF URBAN TRANSIT ON INDUSTRIAL POLICY AND ENERGY CONSERVATION

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the senior member in the cabinet from Toronto, the Minister of Finance. Does he not believe that in rejecting the 1974 promise he has cast aside a good industrial policy for the country, and does he not believe that some kind of a direction towards an urban transit system in Canada would be a good measure for saving energy?

[Mr. Broadbent.]

• (1140)

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated previously, it is not an either-or question in so far as either the saving of energy, the convenience of urban living or, indeed, with regard to industrial policy. There are substantial resources and responsibilities at the provincial level for the purpose of carrying out these kinds of improvements in our community, and I see no difficulty in their proceeding with the policy.

Mr. Horner: We on this side of the House are greatly concerned about the priorities of the government. It seems to have $60 million to buy Canadair and $40 million to buy de Havilland; why does the government not have some money to direct toward the system which the people are using and really want to improve?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There is an argumentative nature to the question. The hon. member for Don Valley.

IMPORTANCE OF DEVELOPMENT OF TORONTO HARBOUR FRONT IN RELATION TO RAPID TRANSIT SYSTEM

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Finance. I would like to ask him why one election promise, namely the harbour front, was kept in Toronto, whereas this one has been thrown out. Is it the position of the government that the harbour front is more important to the people of Toronto than a rapid transit system?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I point out to the hon. gentleman that the acquisition of the harbour front was achieved before the time, and with respect to our expenditures, we set ourselves upon the course—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Mr. Phoney.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The funds for the harbour front were expended before we set on the present course of reducing government expenditures.

An hon. Member: This must be very embarrassing for you, Don.

INCOME TAX

SUGGESTED EXTENSION OF TAX DEDUCTION FOR THE DISABLED

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In view of special considerations which have been granted to people in wheelchairs, people who are bedridden or blind—and that consideration is a special tax deduction of $1,420—would the minister comment as to whether he finds this equitable since two of those categories, those who are blind and those who are in wheelchairs, are able to work? Does he not feel that there should be an extension of the concept of "disabled" so that other people who are unable to work can have the same kind of tax deduction?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is asking essentially the kind of question which should normally be dealt with in a budget. I will take his question as a representation.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DEFENCE RESEARCH—STATUS OF PROPOSAL TO CONSTRUCT FACILITIES IN WINNIPEG

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence, and it is in connection with Manitoba's concern about an announced intention not to proceed with construction of a defence research establishment in Winnipeg. I would like to ask the minister what the status of that particular establishment is at the present time, since it was indicated to Manitobans by the former minister of national defence that this would be one of the priorities the government would be looking at.

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, that project is in temporary suspension, primarily because I want to take a look at the rationalization of the scientific research and development and industrial processes in the Department of National Defence in relation to our other industrial efforts. I think we want to look for things which will serve the best long term interests of Winnipeg and all of western Canada and also to rationalize our defence purchasing so that it is to the best advantage of Canadian industry and the armed forces.

Mr. Murta: If that is the case, the conclusion must then be drawn that the announement of the former minister was purely political. If there has been a postponement, is it still the intention of the government to locate the research centre in Winnipeg or in Manitoba if the project goes ahead?

Mr. Danson: I think that if there is a need for that facility, it will go ahead as planned by my predecessor, certainly in the interests of the people of Manitoba and western Canada, but I am taking a somewhat different look at these establishments right across the country at the present time.

Mr. Murta: I would like to ask one short supplementary question. What time frame does the minister have for the decision? In other words, when can we expect the decision as to whether there will be a defence research establishment built in Manitoba?

Mr. Danson: My colleague, the minister from Manitoba, is continually asking the same questions, but much more forcefully. I do not want to give a deadline. I have a task to do, and I want to pursue it properly. I do not want to set any artificial limits to which I cannot adhere. I am having discussions with my colleagues, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of State for Science and Technology, so that we can have a rational program which serves the interests of the country well. I hope that this can be completed within six months or a year. I hope it will not take longer.

An hon. Member: Just before the election.

IMMIGRATION

REFUSAL TO ALLOW PROFESSOR GUNDER-FRANK INTO CANADA—SUGGESTION FILE BE SHOWN TO OPPOSITION PRIVY COUNCILLOR

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, and it concerns a matter I have raised with the minister and with his office on several occasions, namely, the refusal by the government to allow Professor Gunder-Frank, an internationally known scholar, to take part in a symposium on world development at Queen's University.

Given that the minister has received many representations to reverse his decision because of the very real bewilderment and dismay at his flat refusal to admit Dr. Gunder-Frank with no explanation, given that we on this side of the House have consistently stressed the need for freedom of information legislation, and until that worthwhile goal is achieved would the minister undertake to show the file on Dr. Gunder-Frank to a Privy Councillor on the opposition side of the House for another assessment of the case so that it can be ascertained in an impartial manner whether there are indeed justified grounds for the minister's refusal?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, one of the things which concerns me and about which I feel very strongly is academic freedom. I understand that the lecture of Dr. Gunder-Frank will be given but will be read by someone else, so there is no closing out of his ideas.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: How generous.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): This is one of the funniest question periods I've ever seen.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the opposition is really serious; I am really sorry.

Mr. Alexander: You don't have anything else to say.

Miss MacDonald: I wonder if the minister would address himself to the question I put with regard to whether this file could be made available to a Privy Councillor on the opposition side to ascertain whether there are justified grounds for the refusal.

Mr. Cullen: As Harry Truman once said, the buck stops here. I take my responsibility seriously. I am satisfied that I have made the right decision. I am satisfied with my sources of information but I feel that I have to protect them. We are dealing with a matter of national security. I am satisfied that the decision I have made is correct. Today, I am meeting with representatives of the Canadian Association of University Teachers to hear their representation. I am not cutting out any representations from hon. members opposite or from this side, but in the final analysis I have to make a decision in the interests of security. I have made it, and I am satisfied that it is correct. I am also satisfied that the said professor knows why he is not coming into this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY

REQUEST FOR NAMES OF COUNTRIES WHICH ALLEGEDLY DO NOT HONOUR THEIR COMMITMENTS—ATTITUDE TOWARDS AID TO INDONESIA

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Now that the budget of the Canadian International Development Agency has been increased to $1.1 billion, has the minister investigated the Auditor General's statement with respect to CIDA that, and I quote: "Certain countries do not honour their commitments", and can the minister tell the House what countries are involved and what corrective action has been taken?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am in the process at the moment of setting up a full scale discussion and examination of questions regarding CIDA, in which the one the hon. member has posed will be very prominent. However, I do not have a definitive answer for him today, nor can I name the countries involved, but I will do so at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Roche: I wish to express the hope that the minister will make that statement at the earliest opportunity in order to sustain public support for the whole operation of CIDA. Is it the intention of the government to maintain a high level of aid to Indonesia, which is now at $37 million a year, without ever once publicly protesting the violation of human rights in that country, where 35,000 political prisoners are being held without trial?

● (1150)

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, once again I should like to take the question as notice and examine the details of our aid to Indonesia. I think the hon. member, probably better than anyone in the House, knows that the basic position we adopt with regard to international aid is that it is aimed at the ordinary and very poor people of a country. It is questionable whether we should seek to tie our aid to any kind of ideological questions or anything of that nature. The question is extremely complex. I want to give the hon. member a full answer and I would ask him to have patience until I examine it in detail and then I will do so.

[Miss MacDonald.]

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

ALLEGATION CORPORATION UNFAIR IN REPORTING DEBATE BETWEEN SEPARATISTS AND FEDERALISTS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Acting Prime Minister but he seems to be wandering around like a lost soul in purgatory this morning. I therefore direct the question to the Minister of Finance, the next senior minister. My question concerns the taping yesterday of a program for the Global television network in which eight cabinet ministers participated, in which it is reported that four of the cabinet ministers attacked the CBC for its lack of fairness—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): —in the debate between federalism and separatism. The Secretary of State said that he is anxious that the CBC resolve the issue of objectivity and balance. The government leader in the Senate said that "if it doesn't fulfil that mandate, then we parliamentarians must be prepared to take action." The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce went further and said, speaking of federalism—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member ought perhaps to put his question without further preamble.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to accuse the ministers of attacking the CBC unless I quote them. May I just quote one more briefly? The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said of federalism, "I am speaking freely about it, if I were on the CBC it would not be carried." These are very serious allegations.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I want to ask the government if it considers that the CBC is not giving a fair and balanced view—

Mr. Lalonde: Have you watched it?

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): —of the debate between federalism and separatism, does it not have the responsibility either to change the management of CBC or to defend a publicly owned broadcasting corporation?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has referred to statements made which would indicate that there is a feeling I think among many federalists from the province of Quebec that Radio-Canada is not discharging its mandate above all to work for the unity of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Right.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): This is surely one of its fundamental purposes. I would recognize the difficulties posed by the hon. gentleman in the sense that we have a national broadcasting corporation which is given a certain mandate by parliament and if there is a feeling on the part of the government that the mandate is not being discharged, as to whether action should be taken.

Mr. Horner: Take away its licence.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. gentleman opposite suggests we take away its licence. At this point I would not make a further comment.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I think this is a matter which should be widely discussed, not only by members on this side but by members opposite, to find some effective means of carrying out parliament's mandate with regard to preserving the country and to find out if indeed that mandate has been discharged by the CBC.

Mr. Horner: Send it to the broadcasting committee.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is a public body financed by the taxpayers of Canada, reporting to parliament through the Secretary of State, and that the government appoints the board of governors and appoints the management, surely any dissatisfaction with the manner in which the CBC conducts its affairs is the responsibility of the government.

Some hon. Members: Parliament.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I am therefore asking the government if it is prepared to document its criticisms of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and, if those are well founded, to take the appropriate action it thinks ought to be taken rather than go on a competing television network and criticize its own broadcasting corporation.

An hon. Member: They have not got the guts to do anything about it.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman in the past has often laid heavy stress on the fact that the CBC is not in any sense under the exclusive jurisdiction of the government of Canada and that other members of parliament and other parties have some deep concern about how it is operated. It seems to me that one of the more effective ways of engaging in a further examination of this question would be to do so within one of the committees of this House.

An hon. Member: Okay.

An hon. Member: Fair enough.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I suspect that my colleagues the Secretary of State and the President of the Privy Council would be quite prepared to have a further occasion upon which not only members of this side of the House but others can pass judgment on whether or not the corporation has carried out its mandate. Of course, it is the ultimate responsibility of the government to take a decision in this regard. On a matter concerning the broadcasting corporation, I think it has to be the concern in all corners of the House.

SUGGESTED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF ALLEGATION CORPORATION UNFAIR IN REPORTING DEBATE BETWEEN SEPARATISTS AND FEDERALISTS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. If the government does not have the intestinal fortitude to deal with this matter itself, is it prepared to refer the matter to a standing committee of the House of Commons so that it may be fully investigated and that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation may have an opportunity to defend itself and that the Canadian people may know whether the government tends to equate itself with unity and is criticizing the CBC more for the fact that it is not willing to be the slave of the Liberal party rather than that it is not supporting federalism?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that is just exactly what I said. We would be quite prepared to have a committee decision.

An hon. Member: Then do it.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I hope the hon. gentlemen will have the courage as well, if they find that indeed Radio Canada has not been maintaining the unity of Canada, to criticize the corporation.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I will.

Mr. Lalonde: You never watch it; you do not know what you are talking about.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is jumping on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to be a substitute or an excuse for a government that seems unable to reconcile the strains of confederation? That is the point.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I wonder whether the hon. gentleman might not want to participate in the discussions in the committee on this particular question and perhaps seek to make up his—

Mr. Fairweather: With a little more objectivity than your ministers showed yesterday, I will do it.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. gentleman has obviously made up his mind already. Perhaps he is not so objective.

Mr. Lalonde: Do you watch it?

Mr. Fairweather: Every day.

INCOME TAX

POSSIBILITY OF CHANGE IN TREATMENT OF REVENUE EARNED BY INDIAN BANDS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. Several days ago the minister indicated she would be meeting with Indian groups to discuss the question of a proposed change in tax law which would no longer permit Indian bands to treat income the same way that income would be treated in the hands of Canadian municipalities. Could the minister give the House some indication of whether a change in policy is coming or how the discussions proceeded?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the discussions proceeded very well. We have set up a key group of officials of my department who are working in conjunction with officials of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and with representatives of the Indians on better and more fair application of the Income Tax Act on matters of great concern for the Indians. Second, concerning the specific point raised about the eventual change in the interpretation bulletin IT-62 which is the one to which the hon. member refers, I can assure him that the Indian band councils on Indian reserves are considered as Canadian municipalities. Should any change be envisaged in the future, consultations will take place.

HEALTH

ARSENIC POLLUTION—MINISTER'S VIEW OF LEVEL AT YELLOWKNIFE IN RELATION TO HEALTH

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Does the minister, together with his officials, have reason to believe that arsenic levels in Yellowknife constitute a significant danger to human health and the environment? Mr. Speaker, I do not think the minister was listening to me.

Mr. Lalonde: I was waiting for the hon. member to sit down.

Mr. Brisco: Did the minister hear me?

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Mr. Lalonde: Sure.

Mr. Brisco: May we please have an answer?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, several studies have been made on the reports published about that subject. Of course, the matter is very controversial. That is why I have asked the Canadian Public Health Association to set up a work committee made up of independent experts. That committee has been asked to make a complete review of all studies made to date and to undertake any additional study that may be deemed necessary to establish, once and for all, whether mining operations in Yellowknife do present health hazards and, if so, to find out how to improve the situation and eliminate what dangers exist.

ARSENIC POLLUTION—REASON FOR ALLEGED FAILURE TO APPOINT ADVISORY BOARD TO STUDY PROBLEM

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the minister yesterday, when responding to the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, denied that he had any responsibility in this matter, and since the Environmental Contaminants Act authorizes the minister to set up an advisory board which can review these problems, I ask, why did the minister not appoint an advisory board whose mandate would be to look into significant environmental matters?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member failed to understand anything in the exchange of views I had yesterday with the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. I did not deny that my department has some responsibility in that field. The question of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby dealt with a very specific matter, namely the setting up of standards under the Task Force Clean Air Act, which act falls under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Environment and not mine. That is the question that was dealt with yesterday.

As for the point the hon. member brought up, I did indicate that a working committee was set up by the Canadian Public Health Association, at my request, and with funds supplied by my department. With regard to the other question concerning the environment, I indicated yesterday that a working committee has been set up by the Department of the Environment to determine what new standards might be required. I am sure that the Minister of the Environment will be pleased to answer that question when he comes back to the House.

ARSENIC POLLUTION—SUGGESTION ADVISORY GROUP STUDY PREVIOUS REPORTS

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Since the report which the minister tabled in the House in the fall of 1975 was based on standards accepting as normal ten parts per million of arsenic in human hair and since more recent scientific research findings suggest that levels of one part per million or more can be significant in causing the destruction of human nervous systems and thereby call in question the validity of the previous report, will the minister tell the House if he will ask the working group to which he just referred to consider the previous report in the light of the new findings concerning significant levels of arsenic in hair?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member's question, I would like to indicate first that all the studies I considered as well as all the comments I have heard are to the effect that no judgment can be made solely on the basis of the arsenic levels in the hair, and that urinalyses must also be made particularly to know the arsenic level there could be in the whole system and not only in the hair.

As for the second part of the hon. member's question, I would say that the working group set up by the Canadian Public Health Association has broad terms of reference which will permit it to consider even the standards referred to and to see whether such standards should be more restrictive.

[English]

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, may I ask another supplementary question? The minister seems to have missed the point of my question. He indicated that other tests have been done. That is the point. The research report which he tabled was not based on arsenic levels in hair of less than ten parts per million, and for that reason I suggest that the report is totally invalid. The experiments should be reviewed and more studies carried out. The tests to which he referred must be carried out on all whose hair contains one part per million or more of arsenic. That was the question I wanted the minister to answer.

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I will not argue with the hon. member on the scientific value of such or such report. This is why an independent group appointed by the Canadian Association of Public Health will assess all those reports and will also submit a report which will be made public. And if this working group comes to the conclusion that the previous reports were somewhat deficient, I would be glad to agree with the hon. member.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

PURCHASE OF CRUISE SHIP BY METROPOLITAN AREA GROWTH INVESTMENT CORPORATION OF NOVA SCOTIA—STATUS OF MR. McNUTT AS VICE-PRESIDENT

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion is engaged in a conference with Quebec ministers. I gave notice to his office this morning of my intention to raise a question concerning Metropolitan Area Growth Investment Corporation of Nova Scotia. Perhaps an acting minister can answer my question. In view of the continuing failure of MAGI, funded as a venture capital agency to the tune of $20 million several years ago by the federal government and the government of Nova Scotia to make a meaningful contribution to the Nova Scotia economy, can the acting minister indicate whether the minister or his department have been consulted or, indeed, have approved the multi-million dollar purchase of a cruise ship, by this agency, to operate in the Caribbean?

Mr. Ed. Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member may know, the minister on his way to New Brunswick last week to sign another multi-million dollar development agreement with one of the Atlantic provinces, made a side trip to Nova Scotia and had discussions with the premier. One of the topics discussed was MAGI. Unfortunately, I do not know the details of those discussions.

Mr. MacKay: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I thank the parliamentary secretary for his answer and ask by way of a brief supplementary question whether he is able, in view of the continuing history of controversy surrounding appointments to the executive positions of MAGI, to clarify the present status of Mr. Scott MacNutt, the vice president of MAGI who now appears to be operating in limbo between the Workmen's Compensation Board of Nova Scotia and MAGI?

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, MAGI is incorporated in the province of Nova Scotia. Its two shareholders, the government of Nova Scotia and the government of Canada, do not become involved in the day-to-day decisions of MAGI.

POSSIBILITY OF CHANGES IN FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT TO GIVE GREATER CONTROL OVER CROWN CORPORATIONS

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. Since the deputy secretary responsible for the financial administration of the Treasury Board admitted in the public accounts committee yesterday that control of Crown corporations under the Financial Administration Act is inadequate, specifically in that the government does not now have the right to obtain interim financial reports from Crown corporations to which it has lent millions of dollars, I ask the minister what changes are planned in the Financial Administration Act and when we can expect to see them?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, certain plans are under way to amend the Financial Administration Act. When the final decision has been taken it will be made known to the House. It will be soon.

Garrison Diversion

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I ask for the co-operation of the House? We now face a situation which some of us have anticipated for some time. It has now become a reality. A motion presented under the provisions of Standing Order 43 having been put with the consent of the House, debate on it has commenced. That debate was interrupted by another procedure of the House pursuant to a Standing Order.

Two interpretations are possible for the moment. I noted at 11.25 that only one or two other members seemed to be interested in participating in the debate. One of them, the mover of the motion, will close the debate. Perhaps the co-operation of the House may be forthcoming in bringing that debate to a rapid conclusion, particularly as everyone who wants to participate in the debate is anxious to agree.

That being so, it may give us the opportunity to explore more fully the conflict which arises from two interpretations. One of those could be based on Standing Order 45(2) which says that when a debate on a motion is interrupted for another purpose, it is to be transferred to government orders. The second interpretation could be based on a parallel with private members' hour, which in my opinion could be applicable. It is the rule that when an order of the day or a motion is under debate in the House and is interrupted by the private members' hour, that debate is automatically resumed at eight o'clock. There are two parallels. I do not think the House is disposed to argue them without preparation. It may be that after consultation the difficulty can be clarified for the future.

• (1210)

For the moment, I wonder if I might see one or two of those members who were anxious to make a brief comment before the question period was called, and then call the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to conclude the debate. The two hon. members who had the floor earlier were the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain and the hon. member for Lisgar; and then, of course, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It would be acceptable to the House leader for the government—

Mr. Fairweather: Wherever he is.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I am acting House leader.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blais: I would simply stress the admonition that you made, Mr. Speaker, that the matter is indeed a very interesting one, and that if you proceed now to hear two further speakers who have been recognized by the Chair the debate will have then been concluded. Any difficulty that may be related to the interpretation of Standing Order 45(2) in the face of the Standing Order which deals with private members' business could be disposed of at some future time. On that specific understanding we would be ready to accept two additional speakers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Andras.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have only indicated that, in the circumstances which we face, I am seeking the co-operation of the House. If I in any way call the motion and resume it, I have taken that responsibility upon myself. Once I do that it is a debatable motion and there can be no limit. I am only asking for the co-operation of the House. If there is to be any disagreement about that manner of proceeding, I would just as soon take a point of order and made a declaration now as to whether I am to be governed by another proceeding whereby this matter, now having been adjourned automatically by a Standing Order, will be transferred forthwith to government orders and debated when it is called again by the government. If the co-operation of the House is not to be forthcoming in concluding in the way I have suggested, I would just as soon hear the point of order and argument, and then I will make a final decision. Once I call it, if I do, it is open-ended because it is a motion before the House for debate.

Mr. Blais: On that point of order, Mr. Speaker, there is no consent from the members of the opposition. Therefore, we would like to call a bona fide point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. On the point of order the hon. member for Timiskaming was seeking the floor, and then the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I have great sympathy with the problem of solving this point of order without considerable debate. I appreciate the remarks made by Your Honour. I do not appreciate the remarks made by the deputy House leader who is indicating his support only if two members are called. All members will co-operate with Your Honour. That is likely the way it is going to be. However, I am violently opposed to the suggestion that was made by the deputy House leader that two speakers would be recognized and then the debate would be finalized. We have great respect for Your Honour's judgment and ability, and will agree to that proposal. I will not agree to the alternate proposal.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, as I read the rules, I thought there were only two ways to cut off debate, namely, by Standing Order 33 and Standing Order 75C. I did not know there was provision for a Standing Order deputy House leader to cut off debate. This is a debatable motion. I think the parties in this House will be responsible in terms of the length of the debate. However, I do not think it lies in the mouth of the deputy House leader to decide for all of us in this House of Commons when debate is going to end.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I thought this was a chamber of reasonable free speech, notwithstanding what the hon. member for Nipissing, the Postmaster General and now the duly annointed Standing Order 33 and Standing Order 75C expert, decides with respect to this matter. The matter is important and urgent because of the imminent departure of the Prime Minister. I think it is debatable and ought to be debated.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, it is not a question of trying to stop the debate; it is trying to interpret the Standing Orders such as they are found and such as they have been approved by all members of this House, including the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton. Your Honour was quite right in interrupting the debate on the motion under Standing Order 43 because of Standing Order 15(2) which reads as follows:

> Not more than two minutes after the reading of prayers, the business of the House shall commence. Members, other than ministers of the Crown, may propose motions pursuant to Standing Order 43 at this time. Not later than 2:15 p.m., or 11:15 a.m., as the case may be, oral questions shall be taken up. At 3:00 p.m., or 12:00 noon, as the case may be, the House shall proceed to the ordinary daily routine of business, which shall be as follows—

These are mandatory provisions. There is no discretion; there is an obligation. The routine proceedings are then listed as follows: Presenting reports from standing or special committees; tabling of documents (Pursuant to Standing Order 41(2)); statements by ministers; introduction of bills; first reading of Senate public bills; motions (except those permitted before oral questions).

Evidently that Standing Order envisages a situation where motions presented before the question period might attempt to be bootlegged during routine proceedings. The Standing Order makes an express exception of those motions presented prior to the question period. That is not the deputy House leader's motion of closure; it is the Standing Order. Quite clearly, Your Honour was entitled to adjourn the debate on the motion, under Standing Order 43, at 11:15. You allowed an additional ten minutes, and did so at 11:25. However, as Your Honour pointed out, Standing Order 45(2) reads:

> When a debate on any motion made prior to the reading of the orders of the day is adjourned or interrupted, the order for resumption of the same shall be transferred to and considered under government orders.

As Your Honour quite properly pointed out, government orders are at the discretion of the government as to the order of their being called. As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, the House leader indicated the order of business for today to the members of the opposition. It is to be the fiscal relations act. Therefore, this debate on Standing Order 43 had to be interrupted. The effect of that interruption was to transfer the whole of the debate to government orders. It becomes a government order and can only be called when the government chooses to call it.

In fairness to the opposition, and in view of the fact that we advised them as to the nature of business for this day, we intend to proceed with that business. I might call attention, Mr. Speaker, to your ruling when this particular matter was previously debated. At that time Your Honour felt you were bound by Standing Order 15(2), and the proceedings on the debate under Standing Order 43, which took up the whole of the question period, prevented you from holding the question period. I realize this is not directly on the point at issue, but it represents a recognition by yourself, Mr. Speaker, of the effectiveness of Standing Order 15(2). You have found yourself bound, previously, by the mandatory wording of that Standing Order. I submit that in this situation you are again bound by the provisions of the order and that there is indeed an obligation to proceed now to the orders of the day.

● (1220)

Mr. Speaker: Order. The difficulty, if I might summarize it, is simply this: there are arguments to be made on both sides as to the way in which this matter should be handled. The difficulty is that at 11.15 a.m. hon. members rose to take part in a debate on a motion which was debatable. If they were precipitating a consequence which might have cut off debate on the motion, as well as the finalization of it, they ought to have known that in advance. That is the courtesy I am extending to the hon. members who sought to participate in the debate. I have to say that if I were to enforce the Standing Order strictly, it might very well be that the debate would discontinue and that the question would not be put.

If this was the effect, under the present Standing Orders, of participation in the debate by two or three members, however briefly, they ought to have known at the time that they were running the risk of not having the question decided by the House before Monday's event which, after all, gave rise to the motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 in the first place. That ought to have been known in advance.

For that reason, therefore, rather than attempting to finalize the point of order at this moment I am attempting to extend a courtesy to hon. members who wanted to make a brief comment, and then call the question, leaving open for proper preparation of argument the means by which we should reconcile the difficulty between the provisions of Standing Order 43 and Standing Order 15(2). If I were permitted to do this, it might be the simplest way out of the dilemma at the moment. In doing it, I would propose to call now the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain, the hon. member for Lisgar and then the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who would finalize the debate before the question is put. That might be the easiest way out. Otherwise, I will listen to further argument on the point of order and make a decision as to whether or not the matter should be transferred to government orders, which might very well be the case.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): If I may say so, Mr. Speaker, I think that what you are proposing is quite reasonable. It is important that we establish once and for all how Standing Order 43 is to be interpreted. The rule itself talks about matters of urgent and pressing necessity—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I thought I had made it clear that if I am to do this, I will do it. If I am to hear argument or discussion on the point of order, I will do that and decide the point of order.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I know, Mr. Speaker, and I am quite agreeable.

An hon. Member: So is everybody.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity today to do as the Secretary of State for External Affairs suggested and let the House of Commons contribute a little input to the message which our Prime Minister will carry to President Carter.

On the subject of the waters of western Canada and the western plains, I hope somebody carries the message to the Secretary of State for External Affairs that Mexico has the same problem. I understand that two years ago the Americans and the Mexicans were discussing putting a dam on the Colorado so that the saline waters which come from all the irrigation upstream could be held back in the United States. I suggest to the Prime Minister that if he drew attention to this similar problem which arose between the Mexicans and the Americans, and drew a parallel with the Souris River in Manitoba, it would be helpful to us while at the same time being helpful to the Americans.

The second point I wish to make is this: our Prime Minister should explain to the President that we have plans ready in western Canada to put dams on the Souris River to divert waters in the Canadian section of that river right into Manitoba directly and not have to go through the United States to pollute their area. If these two points could be brought to the attention of the delegation which is going with the Prime Minister, when he expresses the feelings of Canadians with regard to the developments on the American side in connection with the Garrison project particularly he would have positive and constructive proposals to put forward which would make it easier for President Carter to reach a solution to this matter.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of pleasure that I find myself one of the final speakers in this debate because the Garrison diversion project, if and when it goes ahead and has an adverse effect on Manitoba waters, will probably affect my constituency, which is located right on the American border, as much as any other in Manitoba.

I suppose that the Postmaster General in his remarks was actually consuming more time than the debate would take. The topic we are discussing now is certainly one of the most important we could be considering at this time, in view of the fact that we face a situation in which the Prime Minister will soon be discussing the matter with the President of the United States.

I should like to sketch very briefly the happenings which led to the motion being put forward today, and refer to the requests made by various members of parliament, certainly by members of the opposition, and the reasons for them. On January 25 the hon. member for Selkirk who, along with the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre and myself has been putting as much pressure as possible on the government to act, asked the hon. member for St. Boniface, the minister responsible for Manitoba, if he would assure the House that the Prime Minister would raise the Garrison issue with the President of the United States as a matter of priority and urgency.

In response, we heard the hon. member for St. Boniface make the flippant, offhand remark, "Ask the Prime Minister." A remark of that kind does not instil confidence in the people of Manitoba. It does not lead them to think that something is to be done. It was interesting to note this morning that the hon. member for St. Boniface was virtually breaking his arm off by patting himself on the back for everything that has happened up to this point.

The whole question arose on February 7 when I asked the Prime Minister if he would make sure that the Garrison diversion project was high among the priorities as far as his talks with President Carter were concerned. The answer given to me was very unclear and uncertain: there was nothing positive about it. On February 17 positive action was taken, once again by the hon. member for Selkirk. I believe the House will congratulate him on his efforts on behalf of those concerned about the Garrison issue. What the hon. member for Selkirk did was write to the President of the United States urging him to place this matter high on the agenda of the discussions. It is interesting to note that within a few hours the Prime Minister corresponded with the Liberal leader in Manitoba and also, I gather, with the President of the United States, indicating that he was now prepared to put the Garrison diversion project on the agenda.

That action by my hon. friend, coming as it did at a crucial time, will assure the Garrison diversion project and the whole circumstances of construction as far as the Lonetree reservoir is concerned being talked about by the two North American leaders. The appalling thing, though, is that when the announcement was made, after members of the opposition in this House had tried, unsuccessfully, over a long period to get an assurance from the government, it was made in Manitoba through the leader of the Manitoba Liberals. It was a cheap political trick to try to maximize on something which was, in effect, forced upon them primarily by the hon. member for Selkirk.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): This is a non-partisan matter.

Mr. Murta: It certainly should be non-partisan, as the hon. member says. What we in Manitoba hope, and certainly what the members of the House of Commons should hope, is that the past stance of the President of the United States on environmental matters will carry itself through and that the President will, in effect, intervene in the Garrison study, and by intervening will hold up construction on Garrison projects, specifically the Lonetree reservoir which will affect Canadian waters, until the International Joint Commission's report has been issued. I think all members on this side of the House, and certainly most people in Manitoba, are willing to wait until the International Joint Commission's report has been brought down. We hope that President Carter, in his wisdom, will recommend a halt until that report is brought down.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I should repeat my warning, to be technically correct, that when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre speaks he will close the debate. Prior to calling the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I had indicated that I would defer a point of order to be raised by the Minister without Portfolio. Perhaps I should do that now.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to get into the debate. All I want to say is that I did make representations several times to the Prime Minister. I believe that I am entitled to do so, just as any member can make private representations to any minister. In my particular case, because I cannot raise a question in the House, I thought this was the best thing for me to do, and I have done exactly what I should in respect to my responsibility to the people of my province.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief, and I hope that when the motion has been passed it will be the words of the motion which will speak for the House of Commons on this issue today. I recognize, as has been demonstrated by the speeches which have been made, that this is an issue on which there can be a good deal of political infighting, efforts to claim credit, and all of that. Much of what has been said this morning is true. But my feeling and my motive in putting down the motion was that now that the point has been reached where the Prime Minister is going to discuss the matter with President Carter and is going to request the deferral of any further work on the Lonetree reservoir, we should express our pleasure and let the Prime Minister know that, for all the bickering that there is back here in the House of Commons, we support his efforts in Washington in presenting Canadian interests with respect to the whole Garrison project.

References have been made to all of those who have taken part. I am going to refer to a couple, obviously to put their names on the record but also for the purpose of underlining what the hon. member for Lisgar has just said, namely, that this issue has been around with us for a long while. I would remind members of the House who were here prior to 1974 that the former member for Assiniboia, Mr. William Knight, and the former member for Selkirk, Mr. Douglas Rowland, along with others of us were raising questions and speaking about this matter in the House on "late shows" in the twenty-ninth parliament. So the issue has been around a long while, and I want to give credit to all of those who have raised this issue in one way or another. I also give credit to the International Joint Commission for the study it has done thus far and for the preliminary position which that body has taken. It is really tremendous to get an international body with equal representation from both sides of the border to produce the kind of preliminary observation it has made.

So, Mr. Speaker, now that the Prime Minister is going to Washington, and now we know what he is going to do, even if we learned it through the publication by Mr. Huband of Manitoba of a telegram that he received from the Prime Minister, the thing for us to do is to say to Washington, to say to President Carter, to say to the Americans, that we are behind the Prime Minister in his request that work on the Lone Tree reservoir be deferred; and beyond that, we are with him in the efforts that we trust he will make on behalf of Canada to protect Canadian waters against pollution by the Garrison project.

It has been a long, hard struggle, Mr. Speaker. I have been as disappointed as my friends to the right in the kind of answers that we have had from the government. But as of today the word is that the Prime Minister is going to raise the issue, and I hope that the House will say unanimously that we are behind him in doing so.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It has been moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands:

That this House welcomes the announcement that the Prime Minister will discuss with President Carter, during his forthcoming visit to Washington, the Garrison diversion project in North Dakota, and further that this House unanimously endorses the stand the Prime Minister has said he will take to the effect that work on the Lone Tree reservoir be deferred, pending a review of the whole project and of this country's concern over its effects on Canadian waters, particularly in Manitoba and Saskatchewan, which is being made by the International Joint Commission.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: I should indicate, in respect of the procedural difficulty which we faced, that it would seem that positions on both sides of the question were adequately guarded by argument, and far from being in a position to set aside or disregard those arguments, they are very much in my mind. I think we ought first to have a discussion of the matter to see whether there is a solution which would meet the approval of all parties. In any case, if the matter remains in conflict, I would certainly invite discussion which would give an opportunity to all members who want to participate to have a proper preparation period.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, if that is the suggestion it is certainly agreeable to us.

RESIDENTIAL REHABILITATION PROGRAMME

Question No. 205—Mr. Marshall:

What amount of money has been allocated to each province under the Residential Rehabilitation Programme (NIP) and Rural and Native Housing since its inception?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I am advised by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows: Loans approved for Residential Rehabilitation since the inception of the program in 1974, are shown in the following table.

Loans Approved[1] for Residential Rehabilitation, NHA Section 34.1 by Province and Territory, 1974—September, 1976

COAST GUARD ON PACIFIC COAST

Question No. 581—Mr. Reynolds:

1. Does the Cabinet plan to announce a decision regarding the allocation of departmental responsibility of the Coast Guard on the Pacific Coast and, if so, on what date?

2. Will the Minister of Transport indicate what is the policy with respect to the funding of the Coast Guard Auxiliary, since in Delta, volunteers have already undergone training but are impeded by lack of formulation of policy and fund finances?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Prime Minister's and Privy Council Offices and Transport Canada as follows: 1. The Coast Guard is the responsibility of the Minister of Transport.

2. It is intended that funding for the Coast Guard Auxiliary will provide reimbursement to members for out-of-pocket expenses, such as fuel, incurred while engaged in rendering assistance at the request of federal rescue authorities. It is proposed to proceed with the formation of the Coast Guard Auxiliary as soon as possible on a national basis. Membership will include the existing members of the Canadian Coast Guard Volunteer Rescue Agent organization as well as other volunteers, mainly small vessel or boat owners, who would make themselves available to help in emergencies. The Canadian Coast Guard will assist with the organization and training of auxiliary units and it is not the intention that auxiliarists would be paid. However, the possibility of providing some form of insurance coverage for individuals and their boats while engaged on rescue operations is being investigated.

CMHC—MORTGAGES FOR NEW HOME CONSTRUCTION IN FREDERICTON, YORK AND SUNBURY COUNTIES, NEW BRUNSWICK

Question No. 1,011—Mr. Howie:

1. In the fiscal year ending March 31 (a) 1974 (b) 1975 (c) 1976, how many applications for CMHC mortgages for new home construction were received from (i) Fredericton (ii) York County (iii) Sunbury County, New Brunswick?

2. In each case, how many were (a) approved (b) rejected?

3. In each case, what was the total amount loaned on such mortgages?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I am advised by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows: 1, 2 and 3. See following table. Information on the number of applications received and the number rejected, is not readily available.

NOTE: The fiscal year of CMHC is the calendar year.

TASK FORCE REPORT

Question No. 1,138—Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton):

1. Has the Task Force on decentralization finished its final report for submission to the Minister and, if not, on what date is the report expected?

2. Is it the intention of the Minister to prepare a white paper based on the Task Force Report, for submission to Parliament and (a) if not, for what reason (b) if so, on what date?

3. Did the terms of reference of the Task Force include directions to study, as did those for the report "A Review of the Possibility of Dispersing More Government Work from London", by Sir Henry Hardman of the United Kingdom, the (a) precise estimated economic benefits which would accrue to areas where government functions are to be located (b) loss in communications efficiency of dispersed government operations and (i) if so, will the government include this information in any white paper prepared for Parliament (ii) if not, are such factors being considered, in what manner and by whom?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. The Task Force on Decentralization was set up to examine the feasibility of relocating different government units from the N.C.R. It should be noted that prime factors considered are each unit's ability to operate effectively in locations other than the N.C.R. without duplicating existing facilities and the ability of these locations to support the operational needs of the unit. The process is continuous and no date for completion has been established. No final report is contemplated.

2. No. See 1 above. (a) No white paper is contemplated. (b) Not applicable.

3. (a) No. (b) No. (i) See 1 above. (ii) Yes, by individual departments in consultation with Treasury Board.

DECENTRALIZATION PROGRAMME

Question No. 1,139—Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton):

1. What is the total number of Public Service positions which will have been moved out of the National Capital Region under the programme of decentralization by the end of 1986?

2. For the year (a) 1976 (b) 1977 (c) 1978 (d) 1979 (e) 1980 (f) 1981 (g) 1982 (h) 1983 (i) 1984 (j) 1985 (k) 1986, how many Public Service positions will be moved out of the National Capital Region?

3. With reference to the President of the Treasury Board's speech on September 3, 1975, that "... it is clear that as long as only 14 percent of the senior executives are located outside the National Capital Region, there is a great deal of room for initiative in this area ...", what is the government's target percentage figure for executive level location outside the National Capital Region and on what date does it expect to achieve that target?

4. (a) What is the government's total projected cost for the decentralization programme to the end of its implementation period, or to 1986, whichever is the sooner and, what are the estimated costs for the (i) movement of departmental facilities (ii) training of personnel recruited to replace those refusing transfer (b) what is the estimated percentage increase in yearly operating costs for those units being moved outside the National Capital Region and what will be the estimated annual cost per unit decentralized for (i) intra-departmental communication (ii) intra-departmental travel (iii) transfers or promotions between geographically separated sections of the same department?

5. (a) What departmental units or agencies have been identified for future decentralization (b) on what date will such decentralizations take place (c) how many positions are involved (d) what is the government's estimate of the number of positions which will be filled by persons already employed by units or agencies and how many will have to be recruited in the new locations (e) have any discussions taken place with the employees to be affected and, if not, how long before the decentralizations are publicly announced will such consultation take place (f) what was the period of such consultation with employees of the departments and agencies already publicly identified to date for decentralization?

6. With respect to the municipal areas to which government functions are being moved, have consultations been undertaken with local municipal authorities and (a) if so (i) what are they (ii) what matters were covered (b) if not, for what reason?

7. Have the municipal authorities involved requested assistance from the government to meet the additional costs of providing services to departments and serviced land to employees and, if so, what was the government's response?

8. Has the government estimated the total amount of new office space which must be constructed as a result of the decentralization programme and, if so, what total amount of floor space must be provided and what is the estimated cost?

9. Is there a third phase of the decentralization programme which will move scientific and research establishments out of the National Capital Region and, if so, what units will be involved and where will they be located?

10. In the case of Public Service positions moved outside the National Capital Region, will second language training facilities be available to the employees and will such training, if provided, increase the overall cost of the bilingual training programme?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. See answer to Parliamentary Question No. 1,138 Part 1 answered this day. Not known.

2. Not known. For those units already announced figures for permanent positions are as follows (by fiscal year): 1976-77:

126; 1977-78: 264; 1978-79: 228; 1979-80: 471; 1980-81: 728; 1981-82: 369.

3. No target percentages have been set.

4. (a) See answer to Parliamentary Question No. 1,138 Part 1 answered this day. Since the decentralization program is a continuous process no estimate to 1986 is available. (i) Not applicable. (ii) Not applicable. (b) (i) Not applicable. (ii) Not applicable. (iii) Not applicable.

5. (a), (b) and (c) See following table. (d) This will not be available until all employees have indicated their preference with regard to relocation. (e) Yes. (f) Individual department officials are involved in relocation plans from the beginning. For those relocations publicly announced, all employees affected were informed prior to public announcement. This is in accordance with procedures which have been recently endorsed by the National Joint Council.

6. Yes, after the announcement of each relocation, consultations have taken place with appropriate municipal authorities. These meetings conform to federal land management policy which requires that municipalities be brought into the planning of facilities in their areas. (a) (i) (ii) Many topics are covered including site selection; identifying number of jobs and size of payroll; determining the services required by facility; discussing effects upon traffic flow; relating operational needs of the unit to the objectives of the host municipality, etc. (b) Not applicable.

7. To date, no such requests are known.

8. Yes, for those units where relocation has been approved, total office space required is estimated at 1,905,000 sq. ft. at an approximate capital cost of $135 million.

9. No, as indicated in the answer to Question No. 1,138 Part 1, answered this day, the program is continuous and, without exception, all departments and agencies, including scientific and research establishments, are subject to consideration.

10. Consistent with provisions of the official languages policy, second language training facilities will be available. It is not anticipated that this will increase overall cost of the bilingual training program.

GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS AND AGENCIES SHIFTED FROM OTTAWA DURING DECENTRALIZATION EXERCISE

Question No. 1,193—Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich):

1. (a) Which departments, departmental units or agencies are to be shifted from Ottawa during the decentralization exercise (b) what are the dates envisaged for each move (c) how many public servants will be involved in each case?

2. Have any assurances been given to public servants who may be unwilling to move, that they will be re-assigned laterally to positions in the Ottawa area and, if so (a) what are they (b) will they be given a choice of re-assignment?

3. Have any provisions been made to deal with the problems created by public servants who may be unwilling to move or to be re-assigned and, if so, what are they?

4. Are there any domestically oriented provisions envisaged to assist the public servants who are re-located to (a) sell or otherwise dispose of their homes (b) acquire new homes in the new communities (c) get their family belongings to the new communities and, if so, what are they?

5. Has a cost effectiveness study been carried out on any of the proposed decentralization operations?

6. To what extent has the foregoing been the subject of discussion with the employees concerned or with the unions representing them?

[Mr. Chrétien.]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. (a), (b) and (c) See answer to question No. 1,138 part 1 answered this day.

2. Yes, while an absolute guarantee of job security cannot of course be given, the government is committed to taking measures on behalf of employees who do not wish to relocate by offering them, where possible, the chance to fill vacant positions in their own departments and by giving them priority consideration for jobs in other departments. (a) Not applicable. (b) Not applicable.

3. See answer to No. 2.

4. For public servants who relocate the provisions of the Treasury Board Relocation Directive (1975) apply. (a) See Treasury Board Relocation Directive. (b) See Treasury Board Relocation Directive. (c) See Treasury Board Relocation Directive.

5. Decisions on the relocation of government units from the N.C.R. have been based on an assessment of the impact of relocation in communities selected from the less advantaged regions of Canada, and from the cost impact of conducting government operations away from the N.C.R.

6. See answer to question No. 1,139 part 5 (f) answered this day.

2. Has there been or will there be any follow up on such findings and/or recommendations and, if so, in what manner will they be implemented in each case?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): The list of contracts included in this question appears to have been taken from the DSS R&D Bulletin for October, 1976 which shows all unclassified contracts issued by the Science Centre during the month of September of the same year. All these contracts were issued by DSS on behalf of the science mission oriented departments of Government, the names of which are included in the Bulletin. In order to obtain detailed information relating to the purpose, findings and any follow-up on such findings, it is suggested that it be requested from the departments which requisitioned the contracts. It should be noted that many of the contracts will not be completed until the end of the current fiscal year, or in some instances, until later in fiscal year 1977-78.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING ACT, 1977

MEASURE FOR MAKING CERTAIN FISCAL PAYMENTS AND OF ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING CONTRIBUTIONS TO PROVINCES, ETC.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-37, to provide for the making of certain fiscal payments and of established programs financing contributions to provinces, to provide for payments in respect of certain provincial taxes and fees, and to make consequential and related amendments, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the bill now before the House encompasses a larger part of the over-all fiscal relationships between the federal government and the provinces for the next five-year period. It covers the long-standing program of equalization grants to the provinces, the income tax collection agreements with the provinces, and other aspects of our fiscal relations. It also includes new arrangements for the major shared-cost programs in the areas of public hospital services, medical care services and post-secondary education.

The present bill, encompassing as it does an agreement made ultimately between the first ministers at the meeting in mid-December last, is witness to several important facts about the constitutional system. First, it has been found to be possible, with the exercise of ingenuity and a considerable spirit of compromise in Canada, to bring about substantial changes in fiscal responsibilities and also in the area of government programs between the two levels of government without seeking formal amendment of the constitution.

The British North America Act in its original form contemplated just the same kind of transfer payment that we have in the bill before us today, but those provisions, such as for example sections 118 and 119 of the BNA Act, have long since been overcome by the fiscal facts of life. Right from the start of our constitution the concept of transfer payments to certain of the provinces was built into our constitutional framework, and this bill represents the latter-day evolution of those provisions.

The second fact witnessed by this measure is that over a period of time an important evolution has occurred in the relations between the federal government and the provinces, a relationship which has not been enshrined in any formal act of law either by the federal or provincial governments. I am talking, of course, of the evolution of the institution of federal-provincial conferences, many of which occur every year in the context of purely functional questions by the ministers involved but which increasingly involve meetings between the first ministers of the 11 governments for the purpose of resolving major questions of policy which in some cases may have been discussed by ministers previously.

From the point of view of the provinces, the new fiscal arrangements provide for the transfer of a large part of national fiscal resources from the federal to the provincial governments. Pursuant to this measure, the provinces will be receiving some $8.5 billion in fiscal transfers, about $3 billion of it in the form of an increased share of personal income taxes and the rest in the form of cash payments. This contribution represents more than a sixth of the total federal budget. From the point of view of the ordinary citizen, the measures we are discussing constitute vital services we have come to depend on and perhaps even take for granted as Canadians. We are fortunate to have established in Canada publicly-supported programs for hospital and medical care which assure all citizens high-quality health services regardless of their ability to pay.

I am conscious, in introducing this measure to the House in the first place, of the fact that the bill is a very complex document. I regret that this is the case, but unfortunately it is unavoidable. Fiscal relationships between different levels of government are inherently complicated. Hon. members will be dismayed to see algebraeic formulae and cube roots worked into the clauses of the bill. The concepts they deal with are technically complex, but they have to be incorporated into legislation. The legal phraseology has to be as accurate and precise as we can make it. We are dealing with such notions as the measurement of fiscal capacity, methods of calculating cash entitlements, escalation factors and tax rate changes. These are essential features of the new fiscal relations we are proposing, and there is no alternative to writing them into the law.

I would have to say in this regard, however—if we can take at least one consolation from this—that happily this is not a measure which in the normal course of life will have to be interpreted by the ordinary taxpayer. Rather, it reflects the highly esoteric responsibilities of that rare but hardly endangered species, the treasury tax planner. As the House knows, that is a species which survives at a particular altitude in our community, living in communion with the binomial theorem, tending carefully square and cube roots, and comprehensible only to the other groups of similar planners.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Because of the complexity of the bill I would like to take a little time to speak of its detailed provisions, and I apologize for taking more time than I would normally on a measure on second reading. I wish to do so in order to put before the House, and for the record, an overview of the document before us and some indication of the ways in which the various fiscal arrangements have changed as a result of the discussions culminating in the meeting last December 13.

As I said before, this package of fiscal measures represents the culmination of intensive federal-provincial discussion and debate over the past year and a half. It implements the accord reached between the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his provincial colleagues at their conference last December. There were, and are, some differences between the federal government and the provinces. Indeed, there were, and are, some differences among the provinces themselves. This is hardly surprising. Canada is a country not only with divided jurisdiction but with marked regional differences.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I wish I had said that.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would like to emphasize that as a result of these particular discussions in so far as transfer payments have been involved in these measures to which the ministers and the premiers concurred and make a special comment on the fact that, particularly in relation to premiers from the so-called well-to-do provinces, not only had the transfer payments not been a subject matter of complaint but, indeed, the proposals have received very generous support. I would have to say in this regard, also, that this has been just another example of the self-reinforcing nature of Canadian federalism and of the responsibilities assumed by certain regions of the country for the welfare and development of other regions. The arrangements arrived at in mid-December are in the very best of traditions which have been involved in the evolution of our federalism.

Much of the discussion and debate over the past year and a half stemmed from obvious differences in perspective. We at the federal level believe that the national government must preserve enough fiscal resources to redistribute income to persons and regions, to stabilize the economy and to continue to help finance the services Canadians in all parts of the country need and deserve. Those at the provincial level have claimed that the federal government has in the past intruded into areas of provincial jurisdiction through the use of its spending power; that the shared-cost programs in particular have distorted provincial expenditure priorities; and that this, in turn, has forced the provinces to provide high-cost programs where equally effective but lower-cost alternatives would serve as well.

Reflecting only a personal viewpoint as a member who was in the House through the decade of the sixties when a number of these significant measures came to their realization, I for one remain unrepentant about the use of the federal spending power for the purpose of providing these better services to Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would think there could hardly be any question that without the exercise of the spending power in the areas of health or post-secondary education we could not have had the good national standards in all provinces in the fields of health and education which have been supported in all corners of the House.

Mr. Broadbent: Why are you getting out of it all?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Because the provinces have asked to be given increasing fiscal room. They have asked that they be given increasing possibility to determine their own priorities in this regard. The financial room is still there, but the greater freedom of decision-making power is also being conferred upon the provinces by the measures that we are putting forward here. I believe that the bill before us represents a remarkable accommodation of the varying interests that were represented at that conference.

Many of the ideas that are incorporated into this bill, such as, for example, those regarding the treatment of shared-cost programs, are not new. They represent the long-standing policy of the federal government, particularly of this administration, to seek effective decentralization of fiscal responsibility to the provinces. I might recall that similar initiatives were taken by the federal government about five years ago. This government has been in the forefront of this search for decentralization for many years.

If there is one striking fact about the evolution of the fiscal relationships between the federal government and the provinces during the past ten or twenty years, it is the increasing degree of fiscal freedom and flexibility which the provinces have achieved. They not only control a much larger share of total government revenues and expenditures than they did ten or twenty years ago, but they have developed a wide array of distinctive and effective programs increasingly under their own control.

The federal government has listened, and responded, to provincial demands for greater autonomy. There has inevitably been some tension between the two levels of government over the proper balance between the centralizing and decentralizing forces which are experienced in any federal state. The bill now before the House will, I believe, contribute significantly to striking an even better balance between these forces at this time in our development. I say "at this time" because there is no right or wrong answer for all time. As social, economic and political conditions change, different fiscal relationships between the federal government and the provinces become appropriate. The present bill is a response to those changing conditions. It represents a major step toward decentralization, especially in the areas of health and post-secondary education.

The cost-sharing formulae for these programs will be replaced by an arrangement under which federal contributions will no longer be tied dollar for dollar to provincial expenditures. Moreover, federal contributions will be in the form of cash payments and the handing over of more income tax room to the provinces. The cash portion will help to maintain national standards and objectives, where appropriate, without detailed auditing of provincial accounts. The greater provincial share of the tax will increase provincial fiscal flexibility.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in addition to its brilliant innovations with respect to health and post-secondary education programs, this bill will maintain the financial stability of the provinces through the equalization payment program. This program assures all Canadians of a reasonable level of vital public services, without forcing them to pay much higher tax rates than the national average. It attempts to reduce as much as possible regional disparities throughout the country and it will continue to do so as an efficient means of preserving national unity. Financial stability will also be maintained through methodical arrangements concerning the sharing of fiscal areas, the revenue stabilization program, and the guaranteed personal income tax revenues.

Before considering certain provisions of the bill, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that in spite of the understandable differences of opinion that exist between the various provinces as well as between the provinces and the federal government, the fact remains that the parties can come together to work with a view to improving the lot of all Canadians. Recently, some seemed to doubt that possibility. The result of the November 15 election particularly brought some to believe that Canadians could no longer live and co-operate as Canadians.

The election of a separatist government in Quebec led to two opposed reactions within English-speaking Canada; I do not approve either one of them. The first had overtones of hostility, and the second was marked by indifference. Those attitudes are both shallow and baffling, shallow because they represent opinions that no intelligent being would want to defend after thinking about it, and baffling because they reflect a profound lack of understanding of the legitimate aspirations of many French Canadians. Not only hostility incompatible with the democratic process of this country but it also serves the interests of certain extremist elements in Quebec. Likewise, indifference to the election of the separatist government shows that people do not know where the interest of Canadians lies.

The separation of Quebec will not miraculously solve the problems that gave rise to the separatist movement. The problems will persist and might become unsolvable. The means to solve those problems and put an end to the differences that exist between French and English Canadians are already present in our federation. This bill is an excellent example of the means made available to us and the agreements that can be made between various levels of government.

I also noted that the bill gives the provinces greater freedom and flexibility in taxation. However, it should not be forgotten that freedom, flexibility and responsibility go together. Through the years, the provinces have asked for a large part of the taxation resources to be able to finance the programs for which they are responsible and that they want to adjust to the objectives of their own policies. The new arrangements concerning the financing of shared cost programs allow for a large part to meet that request. However, it means that the provinces will have to accept more and more responsibility for their action and the control of their spending. Indeed they are more in a position to do so. So they will be more accountable to their own voters. That is the very principle of fiscal responsibility.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to call it one o'clock.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock, I now leave the chair until two o'clock.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

[English]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, if I could turn from my general introduction to the basic provisions of the bill, I think it might be simplest for me to deal with each of the ten parts in turn. Part I of the bill provides for a new equalization formula which is to be applicable for a period of five years commencing April 1, 1977. It will replace the present one which expires on March 1, 1977. The purpose of equalization remains unchanged; that is to say, to make it possible for all provinces to enjoy reasonable standards of basic public services without having to resort to levels of taxation above the national average. Equalization remains among the most important of all federal programs, and the fact that the programs have become well established should not let anyone forget its very great significance.

Hon. members will recall that seven provinces presently receive equalization payments: the four Atlantic provinces, Quebec, Manitoba and Saskatchewan. These are the provinces whose capacity to raise revenues from their own sources is below the national average. The concept of fiscal capacity is a simple one but one that poses great technical problems. How it is dealt with is set out in the bill.

It is estimated that equalization payments of about $2.5 billion will be made to the provinces in the fiscal year 1977-78. In per capita terms, that will be distributed as follows: Newfoundland, $479; Prince Edward Island, $577; Nova Scotia, $416; New Brunswick, $394; Quebec, $200; Manitoba, $194; Saskatchewan, $41. These figures reflect the relative fiscal capacity of the provinces to raise revenues from their own sources. Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia do not receive equalization payments because their fiscal capacity is above the national average.

The new equalization formula proposed in the bill differs from the one presently in effect in essentially four ways. First, revenues to be equalized have been reclassified and redefined to reflect in a better way what the provinces are now taxing. In effect, the representative tax system upon which the program is based has been updated. Among other things, this enables the equalization formula to give separate recognition to certain revenues which have become increasingly important in recent years.

Second, the treatment of national resource revenues has been changed. Commencing with 1974-75, provincial revenues from natural resources have been only partly included in equalization in order to avoid a sudden and unwarranted large jump in the cost to Canadian taxpayers of the equalization program. It is proposed to continue to limit the resource revenues subject to equalization, but to do so in a more consistent way.

At the present time, revenues from non-renewable resources, except for oil and gas, are equalized in full particularly because revenues are split into two parts, basic and additional. Basic revenues, essentially revenues up to 1973-74 levels, are equalized in full: additional revenues essentially representing the increase in revenues beyond the 1973-74 levels which were consequent upon the increase in world prices for petroleum and which, while not rising to world levels, increase as well, and are equalized to the extent of one-third. The new formula provides that half of all revenues from non-renewable resources would be equalized. All provincial revenues from renewable resources would continue to be equalized in full as they presently are.

Third, changes have been built into the formula to reduce existing possibilities for a province to influence its equalization entitlements by its own actions. In particular, a new revenue source, covering both corporate income taxes and the revenues derived from government business enterprises, has been established. The objective of this new grouping is to prevent a province's equalization entitlement from being significantly increased as a result of the province acquiring a privately-owned, profit-making corporation.

Finally, a partial ceiling has been built into the equalization formula for all natural resource revenues. This has been done to guard against a rapid increase in the costs of the equalization program resulting from such events as worldwide shortages or restrictions of supply that can affect resource revenues particularly. The way it has been done is by providing that the total amount of equalization payable in respect of all natural resource revenues may not exceed one-third of total equalization. The level of one-third is somewhat above the existing level and is unlikely to become applicable unless there is a very substantial increase in provincial revenues from oil and gas.

One final point on the equalization program, Mr. Speaker. I referred earlier to the importance of equalization in underpinning provincial financing. This can be illustrated by noting that payments under this single program regularly amount to about 25 per cent of gross general revenues in each of the four Atlantic provinces to more than 10 per cent in the case of Quebec and Manitoba and, on the average, to about 5 per cent in Saskatchewan. It is not possible to overestimate the impact that the equalization program has in the lower income provinces.

Part II of the bill provides for renewal of the fiscal stabilization program for a period of five years commencing April 1, 1977. It will replace the present one which expires on March 31, 1977. The purpose of revenue stabilization is to protect provinces from sudden year to year losses in revenue as a result of a severe economic downturn in the national economy or in their own economies. In essence, the program provides that where the total revenue of a province in any year is lower than its total revenue in the preceding year, it will receive a stabilization payment equal to the shortfall. The comparison between the two years is made on the basis of common tax rates and structures. However, where the reduction occurs in respect of natural resource revenues, stabilization is applicable only if and to the extent that the reduction exceeds 50 per cent of such revenues for the previous year.

This latter provision—the 50 per cent threshold—has been added to prevent the possibility of making substantial stabilization payments to resource-rich provinces whose revenues could fall from present, or future, high levels as a result of declining volumes of production or reductions in the prices of resources. We do not feel we should ask the taxpayers of Canada generally to underwrite resource revenues, given their historic tendency to reach peaks from which sharp declines occur. The rapid increases in such revenues are, for the most part, unexpected; their subsequent declines are often foreseeable. They should be planned for by the provinces which are fortunate enough to receive them. This is not the kind of contingency that the stabilization program is intended to cover. While no payments have ever been made under the stabilization program, it has proved useful to the provinces when they have gone to the capital markets to raise funds.

Part III of the bill provides for continuation of the authority in the present act for the federal government to enter into tax collection agreements with the provinces. The only significant change here is that for the first time provision is made for bringing the two territories within the tax collection agreements. Under these arrangements the federal government collects, on behalf of all provinces except Quebec, the provincial personal income taxes they levy. It also collects, on behalf of all provinces except Ontario and Quebec, the corporation income taxes they impose, and it does so at no cost to the provinces except for a small fee, in the case of some provinces, for the administration of special rebates. This tax collection system has been used as the main tool to keep federal and provincial tax systems in harmony. The two provinces not party to the agreements have shown a willingness to keep their systems similar to the federal system, thus preserving harmony.

When the agreements were first initiated, income taxes levied by agreeing provinces were required to conform rather strictly to the federal tax law. In recent years, provinces have sought modification to their tax laws to permit them to implement their own social and economic policies. They requested that these modifications—tax credits, tax reductions, etc.—be accommodated within the terms of the tax collection agreements. These requests have been met where it was felt that departure from strict conformity with the federal law would not disturb or damage the national system. This is a clear demonstration of federal willingness to grant provinces the flexibility they want to determine their own fiscal policies. Obviously, the accommodation cannot go so far as to undermine the very objectives of a uniform tax system. But I think it is fair to say that no reasonable provincial request has been turned down.

Part IV of the bill provides for a new, limited revenue guarantee program intended to avoid serious disruption to provincial financial planning as a result of federal tax policy changes in the year in which they are effective. Its purpose is to encourage the maintenance of a common tax system across Canada. Provincial personal income tax rates under the tax collection agreements are applied to federal basic tax. As a result, any policy change that reduces federal basic tax, after provincial rates are struck, alters provincial tax collections. The guarantee will pay for any such provincial revenue losses, as a result of federal policy, that exceed 1 per cent of federal basic tax in the province. The 1 per cent threshold is designed to avoid the necessity of making payments for what might be regarded as relatively small and unimportant changes. The guarantee will apply to all personal income tax changes announced after the beginning of the tax year and effective in that year. The change in revenues will be estimated by province, and where the potential loss exceeds 1 per cent of federal basic tax a payment will be made.

The province of Quebec both defines its own income tax law and collects its own income tax. Thus, it is not automatically affected like the other provinces. However, Quebec has indicated its interest in making its tax system conform with the national system and has asked to be included in the program. If Quebec makes changes in its tax system similar to the federal changes and in the same year, it will be eligible for a guarantee payment.

Part V of the bill authorizes the federal government to share with the provinces 20 per cent of the yield of a special federal tax of 15 per cent on the pay-out by corporations of undistributed surplus on hand at the end of their 1971 taxation year. The provisions of this part of the bill are simply a continuation of the arrangements provided for under the existing act.

I come now, Mr. Speaker, to part VI of the bill, the new provisions for the financing of established shared-cost programs. In essence, the present cost-sharing arrangements for hospital insurance, medicare and post-secondary education are replaced by a formula under which federal contributions will no longer be tied to provincial expenditures. The objectives of the new arrangements were outlined by the Prime Minister last June. They are: first, to maintain across Canada the standards of service to the public under these major programs and to facilitate their improvement; second, to put the programs on a more stable footing so that both levels of government are better able to plan their expenditures; third, to give the provinces flexibility in the use of their own funds which they have been spending in these fields; fourth, to bring about greater equality among the provinces with regard to the amount of federal funds they receive under the programs; and, fifth, to provide for continuing joint policy discussions relating to the health and post-secondary education fields.

The new established programs financing arrangements as defined in part VI of this bill will serve to help achieve each of these goals. The need for the detailed accounting required under the cost-sharing formulae for hospital insurance, medicare and post-secondary education will be eliminated. This detailed accounting has been a source of irritation and resentment between the two levels of government for some time. The federal contributions to the provinces will now take the form of cash payments and the transfer of tax room to the provinces. Federal contributions to the provinces under this part of the bill will come to more than $6 billion in the next fiscal year. These contributions, in conjunction with the equalization payments, will total almost 21 per cent of provincial gross general revenues, ranging from about 10 per cent in Alberta, a non-equalization receiving province, to well over 35 per cent in each of the four Atlantic provinces.

The basic cash contribution for established programs financing for 1977-78 will equal 50 per cent of the national average per capita contribution for all three programs in the base year 1975-76, multiplied by the population in each province and escalated in line with the growth of the Canadian economy since that year. The tax transfer will consist of 13.5 personal and one corporate income tax points, plus associated equalization. Since the provinces already have 4.357 personal and one corporate income tax points for post-secondary education under part VI of the present act, the increased tax transfer to the provinces will be 9.143 personal income tax points.

It would be helpful if I could take a moment to explain the concept of a tax transfer. The way this will come about will be through a reduction of federal tax in the expectation that the provinces will increase their taxes by an equivalent amount. The result is that the position of the taxpayer will be unchanged but he will pay less tax to the federal government and more to the provincial government. The tax transfer will give the provinces greater flexibility in the use of their financial resources, and thus promote the principle of fiscal responsibility. This is in accord with the wishes of provinces. It will also enable both levels of government to better plan their expenditures. The tax cut will be effective as of January 1 of this year, 1977.

● (1420)

The value of the tax transfer varies widely among the provinces. In the interest of achieving greater equality of treatment among the provinces, transitional adjustment payments will be made to ensure that the value of the tax transfer is at least equivalent to the value of the basic cash contribution. In this way provinces will receive as much in tax revenues and cash as they would receive if the entire federal contribution were in the form of cash. I should also note that the current shared-cost payments also vary widely from province to province on a per capita basis. Accordingly, levelling adjustments will be made in order to achieve further equality of provincial treatment. These levelling adjustments will assure all provinces equal per capita payments after five years. Provinces now above the national average will be "levelled down" in five years; those now below will be "levelled up" in three years.

There are two other issues I should mention in connection with established programs financing. The first relates to the recovery of a portion of the tax transfer, and the second relates to the extended health care services proposal made to the provinces by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde). The need to make a recovery arises because while the tax transfer will become effective on January 1, the established programs financing arrangements will not come into effect until April 1. At the last federal-provincial finance ministers meeting I proposed that this "overcompensation" be recovered from the provinces by means of a reduction of amounts otherwise payable over the next three fiscal years. The provinces argued that this would be unfair since there is a delay between collections by the federal government and payments to the provinces. The bill provides for a compromise solution by specifying that only one-half of the "overcompensation" in the first three months will be recovered by means of a reduction in amounts otherwise payable. This recovery will be made over the following two years. I feel that this compromise is more than fair.

The second issue has to do with the proposal of the Minister of National Health and Welfare to finance certain new health programs, as well as certain services now cost-shared under the Canada Assistance Plan, by means of an equal per capita cash grant of $20. These services are referred to as the extended health care program. The Minister of National Health and Welfare has informed me that the provinces generally agree with this proposal, and I understand he is communicating today with provincial health ministers to confirm that we are proceeding with it. This program which is provided for in the bill has the advantages of terminating all open-ended cost-sharing arrangements in the health care field and of making it easier for the provinces to provide less costly but equally effective services across the whole spectrum of our exemplary health care system.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the arrangements concerning established programs financing are an important step in the evolution and the decentralization of federal-provincial fiscal interdependencies in Canada. These arrangements will enable the provinces to enjoy greater autonomy in administering their own programs and will eliminate a source of tension and deception among the federal and provincial governments. According to the federal government, decisions concerning federal budget related expenditures will no longer be made in provincial capitals and both levels of government will be better able to plan their own business. The provinces will have greater control over their programs and will have to accept greater responsibility for the control of their costs.

Mr. Speaker, I should note here that the bill provides that any amendment proposed to Part VI of the new act, which will effectively reduce the right of a province, can be implemented only after a three year notice, unless of course the province involved accepts the amendment. Moreover, it provides that no notice will be given for at least two years. This provision ensures the provinces of stable and long term financing.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to speak about Part VII of the bill, which replaces the Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act. This act, which was passed in 1965, provided for the special arrangements with Quebec and allowed opting out of certain programs. In the mid-sixties, the federal government suggested to the provinces that they agree to finance certain cost-shared programs in exchange for federal tax abatements. Quebec was the only province to take advantage of the federal government offer. At the present time, Quebec receives a special abatement of 24 personal income tax points, including three for youth allowances, five for the special welfare program and 16 for hospital insurance.

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: Is that special status?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is familiar with the arrangements. He, of course, was not in the House at the time that was put through. I cannot recall whether his colleagues, under the leadership of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), supported that or not. I rather expect they did at that time.

Mr. Broadbent: Now would you answer the question?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the hon. member is for, or against, it. If he is advocating that we should make a change in these arrangements, perhaps we will hear from him in his speech to that effect.

[Translation]

As I have noted, Quebec was the only province to take advantage of the federal government offer.

The amount of revenues apportioned to Quebec is used to reduce the cash payments that the federal government should otherwise pay to the province. By reducing the equalization payments we get back from Quebec the three point value of the youth allowance program. The five point value allocated to the welfare program, which includes the Canada Assistance Plan, and the 16 point value under programs for hospital care is used to neutralize the transfers which would otherwise be required for these programs. Quebec does not enjoy more or fewer advantages than the other provinces with these fiscal arrangements. The only difference lies in the way the federal government makes its contribution.

These new fiscal arrangements will allow us to reduce the special reduction to take into account a reduction in federal taxation of 9.143 per cent. Therefore, the special reduction of 24 points for Quebec taxpayers will be reduced by 9.143 and will be fixed at 14.857. The situation will remain the same before and after the reduction in federal taxation. The remaining 14.857 points, amounting to 16.5 per cent of the new reduced basis and the present 24 points of the reduction will be reduced to 16.5 points. Out of the 16.5 points, 3 will be allocated to the youth programs, 5 to the special social welfare program and the 8.5 remaining points will be allocated to established programs. The final balance of the financial situation of the government of Quebec will remain therefore the same compared with that of other provinces.

● (1430)

[English]

Part VIII of the bill authorizes the federal government to enter into reciprocal taxation agreements with the provinces effective October 1 this year. These agreements will provide for the two levels of government to pay each other's consumption taxes. The reason for such agreements is to remove a lot of the uncertainty and dispute that has surrounded the paying of such taxes by government bodies in the past. To date, six provinces have agreed to enter into a system of reciprocal taxation with the federal government respecting consumption taxes. The six provinces are Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, and Newfoundland.

Part IX provides for the necessary authority to make regulations pursuant to the act and for the recovery I referred to a few minutes ago.

Part X contains the consequential amendments to other legislation. It provides for the reduction in federal income tax rates to which I alluded earlier as part of the established program financing arrangements. I should note that certain adjustments relating to the dividend tax credit and to the income tax surcharge in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories will have to be made as a consequence of the new arrangements. These adjustments are not provided for in this bill but will be dealt with later in the session.

To the intense relief of hon. members and, might I add, of myself, that ends my review of the main provisions of the bill. I see in them a reflection of the accord reached between the federal government and the provinces following extensive discussions during the past year and a half. This is not simple legislation. Nor can it be simple if it is to serve its purposes in a country so large and varied in needs, resources and political outlook. It is complex legislation because it is highly sensitive to this great diversity in our confederation. Above all, it reflects the ability of our federal system to accommodate our regional differences in a manner that enhances the strength and well-being of the entire federation. Our federal system is a dynamic one and it can respond to changing circumstances. Perhaps this is so because there is a basic generosity and understanding that underlies our mutual accommodations. These are qualities of which Canadians can be proud. Moreover, they can become the crucial elements in meeting the threat of Quebec's independence and other expressions of dissatisfaction and discontent in other parts of Canada. We do have the instruments to meet these challenges. In its essential purposes, this bill is one of them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin by expressing, on behalf of my colleagues, our congratulations to the minister for his stamina in reading that long review, a stamina exceeded only by our own. We sympathize with him for having to go through the details of a very complex bill. The minister spoke earlier of the complexity of the legislation. I think it is fair for me to say that this complexity is understandable. We do not take exception to that as much as to the fact that what we are faced with here is a fait accompli, an agreement arrived at by heads of government meeting away from here without allowing parliament so much as an expression of opinion with regard to the options.

The minister referred, as I say, to the complexity of the bill. Our spokesman on federal-provincial relations, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), will be referring later in the debate to some of the details of the legislation. Given all the mathematical equations and the nicety of the legal language, she has threatened to reply in Gaelic to match the complexity of the text. If she does show that initiative, she will earn a badge!

I want to speak more generally at this time about the nature of the country which these arrangements are designed to serve and about actions which we as a parliament might undertake to ensure the integrity of a confederation which is now under attack. As I have mentioned, the detailed response to the bill will be provided by my hon. friend. We are, of course, supporting in principle the legislation which is before us. In effect, we have no alternative even if we found there was cause for serious disagreement since, as I have pointed out, while this bill is being debated in parliament, it was decided outside parliament, and that is a system which must end—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: —not least because, as my hon. friend from Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) has stated, the process of debasing and demeaning our national institutions by taking power away from them is one of the causes of the decline in the sense of national spirit and national identity.

I want to begin by expressing my view that, while the challenges which face the country today are serious, there is no question at all that we as Canadians can hold this country together.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Indeed, there is no question that the present central crisis may be one of the most important elements in helping us not just to stay together but to build together as a country. Nations are like people. They need challenge. It brings out the best in them. It forces them to stop engaging in petty disputes, to stop fooling around. We have been ignoring reality for too long, lately, in this country. The November 15 election in Quebec forced us to face reality. We learned dramatically that separatism is not dead. But the lesson of deep discontent with existing national arrangements was there to see, for anyone who was looking, well before November 15. It might prove to be one of the ironies of our era that the election of a party dedicated to the partition of our country was the catalyst which forced us to adopt reforms which could bring this country together.

The bill before us, dealing as it does with arrangements to maintain confederation by helping it to function, provides a good occasion for us in the House of Commons to face the elements of the Canadian reality in 1977. The obvious challenge exists in the province of Quebec where a significant number of French-speaking Canadians believe their culture and community are not sufficiently protected in the present Canadian context. A minority among them is committed to an independent state. A great many others share a concern for the culture but are not persuaded to independence—at least not yet. We in the parliament of Canada, in the public life of Canada, must demonstrate that reforms in the Canadian federal system cannot only encourage that culture but protect it better than in a smaller, more insular, more exposed state.

● (1440)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: For our part in this party, Mr. Speaker, we would be prepared as a government to proceed seriously with reforms which would encourage and protect the French culture in Canada through language law, a more flexible communication policy and other administrative jurisdictional changes that frank discussion demonstrates are necessary. But, sir, the second challenge for us all is to recognize that the strains on Canadian unity are not confined to culture; nor are they confined to Quebec. When people cannot find secure work in a rich country like Canada, they are more likely to ask if the system itself works. As I indicated in the House the other day, our failure as a country, and the failure of this government to generate economic growth, feeds two kinds of frustration both of which corrode confidence in the Canadian system. One is the frustration of the disadvantaged when unemployment is high and prospects are few. The other is the frustration of the entrepreneur, most evident in western Canada, where there is a sense that the Canadian system is stacked against that region's instinct to build and to grow.

I want to speak for a moment about western Canada and what is happening there. In geographic terms, while there is no significant cultural concern in western Canada similar to that developing in Quebec, there is a growing sense of grievance in the west which is particularly menacing because that region's sense of connection with this country has always been less secure than in the older parts of Canada. It is tempting to dismiss western anger as being selfish or unjustified, just as once it was tempting to dismiss the early Quebec separatists as eccentric. But it is, in fact, quite justified for the west and for Atlantic and northern Canada to note that national policy, from the construction of seaways through to most transportation and tariff policy, has encouraged growth to concentrate in Canada rather than to disperse in Canada. One of the facts of life in Canada, one of the positive facts, is that we must continually demonstrate the worth of this nation to its parts, and that challenge is alive again today in most parts of the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: That, sir, is in the nature of a federal state and it is important for us to remember it as we consider some of the practical, political arrangements of our system. Politicians sometimes talk of constitutions and relations between governments as though they had some kind of compelling magic of their own. Yet my colleague for Kingston and the Islands posed a good question in Toronto the other day when she asked, "What Canadian explains his feeling for his country in terms of the British North America Act?"

An hon. Member: John Diefenbaker.

Mr. Clark: The hon. member knows that when the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) expresses his feeling for his country, as he does so eloquently and so effectively, he does it on a much wider range of questions and with a much deeper sense of the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The fact is that the arrangements in this bill, important as they are, are not the essence of this country. They are not even the furniture of this country; they are just the plumbing. The plumbing is important; it lets the country work and keeps it comfortable. There are some statutes which express the aspirations and the standards of this country. There was reference to the right hon. member for Prince Albert. Clearly, one of the statutes which does that is the Bill of Rights which was introduced in his day. Some day, sir, aspects of our constitutional documents may attain that status.

It is important to keep some perspective on most of these arrangements. They are simply arrangements. It is not fundamentally important to Canada what level of government controls, for example, cable television in the country, so long as the system works. What has been going wrong in Canada recently, and what has been contributing to the sense of strain in the nation, is that the federal government, this government, has been so preoccupied with the plumbing that it appears to have forgotten the spirit which makes this system work. The challenge particularly for this government now—because it is in office and has been in office through a decade of rigidity—is to change its rigid approach to its relations with the other partners in confederation. It may be that that has begun. None of us knows quite what to make of the speech of absolute reversal of position made by the Prime Minister in Quebec City, outside this House, two or three weeks ago, but I think it is fair to say that we will need more than a speech and a unity secretariat to demonstrate that there has been a fundamental change in the approach of this government to its relations with its partners.

I think it important to trace the two fundamental mistakes which this government made when dealing with the provinces during its tenure of office. The first was, in effect, to ignore the reasons for the federal nature of the country, to ignore the fact that only a federal system can respond to our diversity as reflected in the consistent attempt to impose Ottawa programs uniformly even where they did not fit. The second was always to treat the provinces as adversaries. We had another instance of that today, as recently as the question period, when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), I suppose doing the best he could with the brief he carried, was actually suggesting that the onus for acting on a federal Liberal campaign promise rested with the provinces.

No one would suggest that we can have a federal system without tensions, without differences between the central government and the provinces. Such tensions and differences have always existed, and they always will. They are part of the essence of federalism, part of the essential nature of our country. The issue is whether they are creative tensions and genuine differences, or whether too often they are destructive and contrived—whether they flow from the challenge of federalism, the challenge of our country, or whether they reflect an excessive rigidity by one of the partners or a deliberate attempt to pick a fight for perceived political advantage.

In my view, sir, we have had far too much of the latter in recent years. If you take a look at the previous governments under previous prime ministers—that of the right hon. member for Prince Albert, that of the late Mr. Pearson—we can find that there were tensions and differences between the partners in confederation. But there was an overriding spirit of co-operation and conciliation. There was no attempt to divide and conquer, no attempt to stage a confrontation. There was a genuine willingness to seek to accommodate national goals and national needs with regional aspirations. There was, in short, an honest effort to promote and sustain co-operative federalism.

One could cite many examples. Under the government of my colleague from Prince Albert the roads to resources program was adjusted from its original form to include tourism development to make it more relevant and more useful to the maritime provinces. Under his government, thanks largely to the initiative of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) and the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), the Canadian Council of Resource Ministers was created, not to bicker over jurisdictional points but to draw together the governments concerned to promote the fullest possible mutual understanding and co-ordination in an area of shared jurisdiction.

Probably the best known case of co-operative federalism under Mr. Pearson's government was the effort made to accommodate Quebec's particular needs and desires in the area of contributory pensions. But one should only mention the adaptations made to the Trans-Canada Highway program to better suit it to the special needs of certain regions of the country. I wish that I could find the same kind of spirit, the same kind of example, in the record of this government. Unfortunately, the examples that come most readily to mind, examples in certain areas such as energy policy, resource taxation and the phony conference on economic opportunities held in western Canada, bespeak not conciliation and co-operation but confrontation and a kind of unilateralism which is bound to breed distrust and feed a sense of regional grievance against the centre of the country.

We need to restore a sense of partnership to the relations between the governments in Canada and the sense of partnership among the individual citizens of the different regions of Canada, and to do that clearly we must be prepared to modernize our federal system to ensure that it better reflects and better respects the regional realities of Canada.

In terms of constitutional change, there is a clear place for us to start now. The premiers of all the provinces have indicated the questions where they think discussion is most urgent. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in his celebrated reversal in Quebec City, indicated that he is prepared to start with a clean slate. I leave it to him as the leader of the government to take the action that he should take. I simply say that if the responsibility for government were ours today, we would sit down with the premiers and discuss seriously the priority areas they identify, including references to language rights. When that responsibility is ours, we will begin by seeking the views of the members of the thirty-first parliament as to the kind of constitution which would best serve modern Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We would encourage the premiers to similarly consult their legislatures, and then we would meet the other heads of government in an open atmosphere and in the spirit of seeking agreement, first on goals and then on jurisdictions. Much can be accomplished without formal constitutional change. We have—and I have referred to some of them—examples of creative federalism in the years of the Diefenbaker government. I mentioned the Canadian Council of Resource Ministers, the ARDA program and several other initiatives. I think it is very important for us to begin again, in areas where jurisdiction is shared, to bring governments together to agree on goals, not simply to fight about jurisdiction but to emphasize the areas where we can co-operate rather than insisting on the areas where we have to disagree.

Again, we would be interested in pursuing, with the provinces, the development of mechanisms which would ensure that when one level of government acts within an area of its exclusive jurisdiction there was some means to ensure consideration of the impact of that action on other levels of government, even if they did not have a formal right to become involved under the constitution. Clearly, if the actions of one level have an impact upon another level of government, there must be some means for the affected level to be consulted before the fact.

In that same spirit we think it essential to ensure that national institutions, including the other place, the Senate, are in a better position to fulfil their functions as representatives of the whole nation. I have spoken before about my willingness to sit down with heads of other governments in the country, with the premiers of the provinces and others who are concerned, to discuss means by which we might ensure that the other place, the other part of this parliament, is better able to carry out its original founding function of representing regions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We would also—I reiterate this point because it should be a matter of offence to all of us in the House today—restore the capacity of the parliament of all the people of Canada to have some influence upon matters of such major national importance as the legislation before us today. Today, more important decisions on the future of Canada are made in the conference centre across the street than are made here in the House of Commons. That defies not only the principles of democratic government but also isolates the process of decision-making from the diverse and legitimate opinions which exist in the House. One of the means to restore respect for national institutions is to give these institutions meaningful work to do. I have indicated on other occasions the wide-ranging reforms we intend to bring to parliament to restore its capacity to contribute to national business and, when necessary, to restore its capacity to control the governments, a capacity which it no longer enjoys.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: One of those reforms will be to ensure that there is an opportunity for this parliament to discuss the options open to heads of government before they secrete themselves away at a private dinner to decide the nation's future. Our federal parliamentary system was not developed by accident or simply by a blind importation from elsewhere. We are a diverse country and we need institutions which both reflect and accommodate that diversity. The best institution for that purpose has been parliament, because it draws its membership from every corner of the country and has traditionally encouraged its members to express the views of their locale.

But parliament was never designed to be simply a talking shop: the assumption was that the Prime Minister and the cabinet who came from parliament would heed the views of the various locales. If they did not, in theory parliament would bring them down. But parliament, the forum of diversity, has lost this control over the executive, and the Prime Minister is increasingly able to construct a government which reflects his own views better than it reflects the diversity of the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: If that double-trend continues—the weakening of the forum of diversity and the empowering of a particular group—those regions and attitudes which lack power will naturally tire of the system and seek some other options. In effect, most of the federalist concern since the Quebec election has focused on the question: Can a Quebecer be a Canadian?

We can ask the question, as well, of residents of any other region—and it is important for us here in this assembly to remember that that question is not new. There are wise words from Professor Northrop Frye in his preface to his book "The Bush Garden, Essays on the Canadian Imagination", in which he writes:

> It is not always realized that unity and identity are quite different things to be promoting, and that in Canada they are perhaps more different than they are anywhere else. Identity is local are regional, rooted in the imagination and in works of culture; unity is national in reference, international in perspective, and rooted in a political feeling.

I think it is clear to us that the Canadian challenge has always been to balance the regional and the national without obliterating either. Today, the temptation is to retreat into the regions at the risk of losing sight of the nation. But that is a reaction to the trend in recent years where the tendency, fueled by this government, has been to impose a form of so-called national unity which has threatened local identity. The country was committed to universality in social programming, which suggested that we treat all regions as though they were the same, although we knew they were not.

Of course national standards are necessary in this country, and we in this party will maintain that as a basic principle, but it is also necessary for us to sit down with the provinces and discuss the kind of flexibility which might be built into national standards to ensure that both national and local aims are realized, because in the name of national standards and joint programs this government has forced some provinces to forgo some programs which the duly elected governments of their locales thought would better serve their needs.

The central government has refused to move on cable, refused to grant provinces effective control of their offshore resources and continues to stall provincial status for the Yukon, all refusals which seem funded either on a fear of the regions or on an arrogant belief that the national government can understand local development better than can local governments. That arrogance is misplaced, and it is the unanimous view of the members of this party and of most of the country that we have nothing to fear from strong regions as long as there is a strong national government too.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Indeed, there would be incalculable harm to Canada if we were to destroy the defining capacity of our local places and the defining identity of each of us who comes from those places to take our seats in this House of Commons, to bring the benefit of that experience to the cumulative business of Canada. Our virtue, as a Canadian community, is precisely that there is not one single way of being a Canadian and no uniform way of expressing our identity. Most of us enjoy that freedom from uniformity. It has let some fo us become a Maureen Forrester or a Bobby Orr. It has allowed others to raise good families quietly or to pursue other private goals. Political freedom is rare enough in the world, but the kind of social and cultural freedom which is the hallmark of Canada is even less common.

We have established here, partly by design and partly by the accident of history, a respect for differences and a tradition of diversity which is rare and valuable, and without which we would all be much poorer. Most of us define ourselves by where we come from, so there is always the danger that we will also confine ourselves to where we come from. This nation is rare in the opportunity it allows us to keep our roots yet to go beyond them. The particular challenge to us, I think, was expressed in the quotation earlier from Professor Frye because he made the point that the essential task of unity is a political task. It is a challenge and a responsibility to those of us who work in this profession to make institutions like the Parliament of Canada work as an agency which not only reflects the country but also allows it to move forward. In my judgment, and in the judgment of my colleagues here, we have important work to do to re-establish the strength and the capacity of our national institutions to command the attention and respect of the country.

I want to quote a western author, Wallace Stegner, who remarks in one of his works that "history is a pontoon bridge. Every man walks and works at its building end". That phrase, "the building end", describes a spirit we find uniquely on this continent. We have a place to build, and that sense of opportunity drew many of us and many of our ancestors here from more traditional places. That same spirit also provided the imagination and the energy to start great ventures and to dream large dreams. We have lost something of that sense in the last decade, when our political priority has been security rather than expansion. We have important programs of social justice and security in place now, and it is time for this country to begin again to build.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: It is time to remind Canadians of our unique opportunities and to provide them with the means and the encouragement to act. In some cases that requires incentives to allow those with resources to develop them; for others it means providing the jobs and training which provide a base for building. That capacity to build, to grow and to achieve one's own identity and to make one's own future is the promise and the nature of this country, and what we are discussing today in the legislation before us is part of the plumbing, part of the arrangements, which keep that kind of country in place. However, what we really must face in this parliament and elsewhere in the months to come is the larger question, not of the arrangements of the country but of the integrity of the country. We need to establish again a unifying sense of purpose, a sense which applies to building, a sense that there is more to Canada than simply conflicts over constitutions or tax points. This requires us, as members of parliament, to look upon other governments and members of other legislatures in the land not as adversaries but as partners. There has not been enough of that atmosphere of partnership in the country. Its absence has contributed to our present problems as a nation.

As I said at the beginning, we accept the arrangements which are before us, but we do not accept the atmosphere which has characterized the relations between the governments of this country for the last decade, arrangements of conflict, of confrontation and of controversy. If we are to retain the strength and the integrity of this nation, we believe that we must restore a sense of co-operation and of partnership, and it is to that purpose that we in this party are dedicated.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Clark.]

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I would like to thank my Conservative colleagues for their rousing round of applause as I got to my feet.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: We thought you were finished.

An hon. Member: You are deluding yourself again.

Mr. Broadbent: More than any other piece of legislation since parliament resumed last fall, this bill tells us what kind of Canada the Liberal party now believes in. I say this because the subjects involved—cost sharing for post secondary education, medicare, hospitalization and equalization—go to the very roots of the federal system, and I for one would have liked to have heard what the official opposition had to say on precisely these topics.

I listened with considerable care and no mean interest to see if the specific proposals which really do deal with fundamental questions which are found in this bill were going to get the endorsation or criticism of the official opposition, but I certainly heard nothing in that regard today. They are the fundamental aspects of a fundamental statement that we are dealing with, and they are at the core of this bill. They tell us something basically important about the government. Does it really believe that a woman working in a fish plant in Newfoundland, for example, has full equality in terms of certain aspects of life when compared to a bank clerk in Toronto or a rigger at some oil well in Alberta? I say this is what is involved precisely because the expectation for the lives of families in all these three areas and indeed throughout Canada, will be significantly determined by the capacities of the provincial governments concerned to provide for medical and hospital services, education, and other direct services dependent upon provincial revenues, all of which are determined by this bill for years to come.

● (1510)

A Canadian government believing in justice must work constantly to achieve equality of condition in certain major aspects of life. Without it, not only is our sense of fairness offended but also our commitment to nationhood in a federal society falters. Regional inequities in such matters are not only unjust, they produce disunity.

This morning the minister described the bill as a "latter day evolution" of our system of transfer payments. This bill does not represent evolution at all. It is the first major step toward the balkanization of our country; it is a step backward in history which may do us all untold damage in the years ahead.

Before elaborating on this point, I want to say something about the position the provincial premiers took on this set of proposals. Contrary to what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has told us, and contrary to what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) suggested, the financial conditions established by this bill were not agreeable to the provinces. Speaking on their behalf at the meeting of the first ministers on December 14, 1976, Premier Lougheed said, and I quote from the official transcript of the meeting which, of course, was a closed meeting, but this is what he said as part of his summary of the reaction of the provinces:

> . . . all the provinces are of the view that the proposal . . . is inadequate, but a number of provinces felt they were left with no alternative but to accept it.

Since the provinces realized that the final authority rested with the federal government, since existing arrangements were due to terminate on March 31 this year, and since they believed that if they did not accept this package of proposals worse still might be thrust down their throats, to put it bluntly they accepted, just before Christmas. As Premier Lougheed put it, "they were left with no alternative". This "no alternative" proposed by the federal government and rejected in detail by all the provinces has just been accepted in principle by the official opposition in the House of Commons, I might also note.

I want now to go to what I regard as the essence of the details put before us in this complex bill today. The fundamental changes that the government is making in our system of financial relations between the government and the provinces is to be found in the manner it proposes to finance continuing expenditures on hospital insurance, medicare and post-secondary education. The inevitable effect of these proposals is to downgrade the national government's role in ensuring minimum standards in health services and in post-secondary education. The inevitable result is to put the total risk of innovative programs in these fields on the provinces. And the inevitable result, I regret to say, is to make the richer provinces of Canada richer and the poorer provinces poorer.

At present, the federal government pays 50 per cent of costs of approved medicare and hospital insurance programs, and 50 per cent of operating costs of post-secondary education. Although this arrangement gave greater advantage to the wealthier provinces than is desirable, for the obvious reason that even if they only have to raise 50 per cent of the cost it is easier to do so for the wealthier provinces than it is for the poor—it was none the less a desirable approach to paying for needed social programs, for two important reasons. First, the federal government was helping the poorer provinces provide services on a continuing basis which they might not otherwise be able to afford. That surely is important. Second, the federal government's share on a 50-50 basis of the financial risks inherently involved in any new program made the burden of innovation in these important areas of Canadian life less risky to the provinces. Again, this is an important plus for the existing arrangements.

Having said this, Mr. Speaker, the existing financial arrangements have not been without their problems. The federal government was harsh and inflexible under the present Prime Minister in applying programs in these fields. For example, it applied the 50-50 formula in the hospital field only to expensive acute care hospitals but not to more effective health care delivery systems such as nursing homes and community health services. This is an important point in the fundamental inadequacy of the administration, not of the financing, of these existing programs.

What should have been done to correct this was to make the financing more flexible. This could have led to the inclusion of nursing homes and related facilities, and ultimately to a lowering of health service costs. That would have been an imaginative and flexible approach under the existing arrangements. Instead, the federal government first placed an arbitrary ceiling on the amount it would contribute to these programs. This inevitably, as the government knew, increased the burden on the provinces, and proportionately put an even greater burden on the poorer provinces. Not content with that element of unfairness and inequity, the government produced the regressive proposals which resulted in the bill we are discussing this afternoon.

What has the federal government come up with as a solution to this very significant problem of existence in Canada—the very significant problem associated with paying for post-secondary education, medicare services, hospital insurance and provisions of all kinds? It has replaced the 50-50 cost-sharing formula with a proposal which removes entirely its 50 per cent of obligation with the transfer of 13½ tax points, plus some slight equalization compensation to be made to the provinces.

What this amounts to in substance is equalization in reverse. A tax point varies in value to the provinces from $4 per head at one end to $10 at the other end depending on the province. The "equalization"—and in this context I put that in question marks—formula proposed by the federal government is based on the national average instead of the richest province. These are combined, and the net effect is that the richer provinces of Ontario and British Columbia come out on top.

According to confidential internal Department of Finance tables, Canada's richest province, Ontario, will reap a bonanza of $1.3 billion over the next ten year period as a result of this legislation. That is $1.3 billion more than any other province and more than that province is getting currently under existing arrangements. That is the kind of proposal to which the official opposition gave its official endorsement in principle today. What a package of proposals. It is going to make the richest provinces of Canada richer and inevitably work against the majority of our low income provinces.

● (1520)

An hon. Member: Where were you when our leader spoke?

Mr. Broadbent: I was right here.

Mr. Woolliams: I wonder if the hon. member is going to tell the people in his constituency that he is in favour of the people of Ontario paying higher taxes.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, unlike the Conservatives, members of the NDP say the same things in all parts of the country.

We have, then, a government solution which not only imposes the continuing financial burden of medicare, hospital and post-secondary education services on the provinces but, as well—and this is of equal importance—favours the rich provinces directly, by equalizing the tax point transfer to the average, not to the top.

It cannot be argued that the government was unaware of the consequences of this kind of change. The Prime Minister himself said at the December meeting "the richer provinces were bound to benefit more from the tax point transfer than were the poorer provinces." I am quoting from the transcript of the official proceedings of the meeting. I hope when Conservative members go back to their constituencies in Atlantic Canada, they will make it clear that the principles they are supporting today will make it clear that the principles they are supporting today will have negative effects in Atlantic Canada. When they return to their constituencies I hope they will not reverse their position on this legislation. I hope they will not do what they did with regard to the government's unemployment insurance changes when they discovered the implications of those changes.

Mr. Woolliams: I thought that was a good amendment.

Mr. Broadbent: Knowing that the rich provinces were bound to benefit more from the tax point transfer than the poor provinces, the Prime Minister proceeded to force on the provinces the most regressive set of federal-provincial financial measures to be brought forward since the Second World War. I see this move as reflecting a philosophy of federalism which is inherently unfair and dangerous to national unity. One of the factors holding Canada together is a social security system which has common elements from coast to coast—unemployment insurance, family allowances and old age security. Canadians share these on an equal basis, not on the basis of the ability of their provinces to foot the bill. They identify in part with the nation's capital because they perceive the fairness of treatment involved in these programs. Until now many of us in the House of Commons regarded hospital care, medical services and post-secondary education as permanent parts of this attempt to build equality of condition across Canada.

The introduction of this bill means that inequality in Canada will increase, not diminish. The wealthier provinces will be better able to maintain and improve their positions in all these fields. For the poorer provinces the situation is reversed. For them it will be more difficult to maintain present programs and almost impossible to introduce new ones.

Giving the poor provinces additional tax points is analogous to saying that millionaires and poor people have equal rights to buy cadillacs. Basic and central to this proposal is the fact that some 13.5 tax points are being taken away from the national government, which is in a position to correct glaring inequalities, and given to the provinces. Just imagine what 13.5 tax points will mean for Prince Edward Island, as opposed to what it would mean to Ontario, Alberta or British Columbia. No wonder people interested in fairness find this proposal repulsive.

The NDP has always believed that the national government must play a major and innovative role in Canada's social security programs. It is absolutely essential, for the sake of equality in Canada, that the national government should innovate and maintain programs of high quality in all regions. It is absolutely essential, for the sake of national unity, that Canadians wherever they live in this country, whether in Cape Breton, Toronto, Calgary or the Gaspésie region of Quebec should perceive that when they participate in certain fundamental programs they are treated as equals. In this bill we see the beginning of the categorical rejection of the co-operative federalist approach so imaginatively embarked on in the 1960's by the late prime minister Pearson. He took up the challenge thrown out by a number of Canadians and, in the name of decency, used the powers and financial capacities of the central government to make the country's social programs fairer for all.

By introducing this legislation, and I say this with care and seriousness, the government has begun a process of balkanization which, in a few years, could pit the rich provinces against the poor provinces in a way we have not experienced for decades. That should be of concern to everyone who is disturbed by the crisis of Confederation.

Unless significantly corrective steps are taken soon, the full impact of this bill on our country's future will be negative indeed. Therefore, because we believe in national standards, because we believe that Canadians one day ought to live together in a state of genuine equality, and because we are very much committeed to maintaining a sense of unity in the country, which can only come about if people share on a common basis the benefits of citizenship, we reject this bill, will vote against it and will, in the years ahead, just as we have in the past, propose a positive role which the federal government should play in these areas of concern.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: I didn't hear much applause. I would have clapped if I had known there would be so little response.

Mr. Broadbent: I would be concerned if you thought my speech good, Eldon.

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I was here when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) began his statement, but unfortunately I could not come back at two o'clock because there was a delegation in my office and they did not leave before three o'clock. I would have liked to hear the entire speech of the Minister of Finance as well as that of the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark). Nevertheless I want to say a few words on the beginning of his statement which surprised me at first because he was apparently congratulating himself for the last fiscal agreement and the last meeting with his provincial counterparts.

We were under the impression that his first meeting with the provincial finance ministers had not been successful because for the first time the ministers stood united against the federal Minister of Finance. This is why I am somewhat surprised by the comments of the minister who gives us to understand that everything was fine. According to him, the provincial leaders left quite satisfied, because after his failure with the provincial finance ministers he had to appeal to the premiers. Here again the premiers kept their proceedings open at the beginning, but then had to meet behind closed doors as they do each year and discuss. I am told that discussions were sometimes rather heated, that there was the odd skirmish, but nothing else can be said because it took place in camera. Strangely enough, the country's problems are always solved in camera. The storm over, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) comes in the House and says: All is well. Everyone was singing. And yet the echoes coming from the province of Quebec are quite different. Quebec newspapers report that the Quebec finance minister, the premier and their colleagues are not altogether satisfied with the arrangements.

Obviously, they had to accept at last the small share they were offered, so they said, because once more we really do not know what happened and we may never know, as for the 40 other federal-provincial meetings. It is always a game of hide and seek for parliamentarians. All they say in Quebec is that Quebec is not at all satisfied.

I heard someone say a moment ago that the richer provinces will be the beneficiaries. Of course they will, because they are the ones that pay more. They are also the ones from which more is withheld. When Quebec spokesmen request tax powers in areas under their jurisdiction I believe they are right in making such claims, even though the minister says that finally an agreement has been signed and $8.5 billion have been definitely returned to the provinces. The breakdown of these $8 billion is as follows: transfers in the amount of $5.5 billion, tax points in the amount of $3 billion, that is 13½ per cent of tax points.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I think that if the government had wanted to be honest, to be fair, it would simply have returned to the provinces those 8 billion in fiscal points, because they relate precisely to three provincial jurisdictions: health care, hospital care and education. The federal government enters the field of education with both feet through post-secondary education, and then it says education comes under federal jurisdiction. That is not true, education belongs to the provinces under the British North America Act. The health field also belongs to the provinces, and here comes the federal government, saying it has been tolerant toward the provinces, it has been good, it has been a good father because it gave them, after long disputes, 13 and a half fiscal points.

I am sure that is not what Quebec wanted. What it wanted was at least 38 or 39 per cent in fiscal points, and not the charities made to the provinces. That is what I call those fixed amounts, charities. If we really want to restore Confederation, if we really want to get the provinces to have more frank and open discussions, let us give them back their rights and they will come and discuss according to their rights. For the moment, we are simply giving them crumbs of their rights and keeping the lion's share for ourselves before later redistributing it at our discretion.

Many will say that some provinces are happy with that. Of course! Some provinces get a lot of money out of equalization programs because the federal government says we must deal with regional disparities and we all know that some provinces expect to get more from the federal government. But why should we sap the power and ressources of the provinces only to try to even out the benefits among all the provinces? Mr. Speaker, would it not be wiser to let the provinces do themselves justice rather than play referee between all the provinces? That is where the government is going wrong.

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Chambly (Mr. Loiselle) on a point of order.

Mr. Loiselle (Chambly): Would the hon. member be prepared to answer a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) be prepared to hear the question of the hon. member for Chambly?

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): He can always ask it.

Mr. Loiselle (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I would like to know whether the hon. member for Roberval is in favour of the 10 different systems of hospital insurance and of a different social program in each of the provinces of Canada or whether he believes in national unity and thinks that there should be similar systems throughout the country? This is my last question: could he tell the House whether he really knows the requirements set by Ottawa to enable a province to take part in the cost-sharing program?

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased about this question. The hon. member is asking whether I am in favour of the 10 different hospital insurance systems? Am I right?

Mr. Loiselle (Chambly): Yes, you are.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Of course, I am for 10 systems; I am clearly opposed to the establishment of 11 different systems. The area of health must be under provincial responsibility. We now have 11 different systems but we do not have 11 provinces, only 10. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am in favour of eliminating duplication at the department and civil servant levels because it costs twice as much to Canada.

● (1540)

The administration of provinces is reflected in the federal government and people wonder why it costs so much, why budgets are so big. But of course budgets are big because with its taxation power the federal government has invaded all provincial fields to get the money. It creeps into all those fields, so it gets all the money. Health belongs to hospital administration which comes under provincial jurisdiction: it is a provincial field of legislation. Education belongs to the provinces, not to the federal government.

Ottawa has invaded those fields because one day the provinces yielded their taxation powers at the request of the federal government in 1942 and it has kept them ever since. It pretended back-tracking but kept on invading and that is just what we are opposing: we do not want one system but ten. The province can look after its patients. Each province knows its needs; it is that kind of thing that Quebec is fighting for and it is justified to do so to keep its field of jurisdiction.

We will have a confederation when provinces have their autonomy and can live; it is somewhat like in a family. If the municipal council rules everything in the family, what is going to happen? What is going to happen is what is now happening in the provinces, because the government interferes too much in provincial business. That is all. All cards are mixed up. We surely have to . . .

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Chambly (Mr. Loiselle) again on a point of order.

Mr. Loiselle (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) allow me another question?

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, of course, the hon. member for Chambly may ask me another question.

Mr. Loiselle (Chambly): Can the hon. member for Roberval explain how federal shared-cost programs—if he knows at all the terms under which the federal government, as he says, expects the provinces to operate—downgrade the autonomy of the ten Canadian provinces?

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, what an odd question! How do you downgrade someone's rights when you encroach on his land? You just walk right into his house and then ask: How am I undermining your authority? Why, you should not be that ridiculous! We know that today it is more expensive to have two collectors instead of one. Besides, the minister proved it the other day in the House when he said that when the federal government collects in Quebec or in other provinces, it gives them one-fifth of the amount collected. That's all, it is clear! We cannot afford to pay four-fifths to a collector. In our fields—I am still speaking about our provincial jurisdictions—if the provinces interfered with matters under the federal jurisdiction, I would be the first to tell them to beat it. But when the federal government interferes, for instance, with matters under the provincial jurisdiction, saying that it is much better and will be less costly for them, what is to be said? That's it, when they need a collector, they will pay four of them and pretend it is better this way. Collectors are not what we need, we must try to keep our credit and our money as well as administration powers in our provinces, our regions, and in matters which come under provincial jurisdiction.

We will have peace, but why all these fights in Canada? There have been fights since the federal government has interfered with provincial matters. As far as I know, it goes back to that time, to the "great invasion." Everything had to be centralized here in Ottawa. All taxation powers had to be kept here in Ottawa to redistribute revenues later on to the provinces, as if they were too stupid to meet their own citizens' needs. That's it! Take for instance the field of education: post-secondary education is all very fine; I will say a few words about it: I deal a lot with that matter in my constituency. But it is ridiculous! You should know how much is spent for nothing in this area, and we do not know where to go. Financing is secured by the federal government, but the teachers are hired by the provincial government. There are courses in there that are not worth a nickel but that is paid by the federal government. The federal government's money must be used. But come on, if the percentage of taxation powers necessary to administer the whole province was there. Do not forget that Quebec is paying for those courses. They are given by Quebec teachers paid by the federal government. Why is that? If it were given its taxation rights would Quebec not have the means to pay its teachers just as well as the federal government? We know that when the federal government gets $5 from Quebec it gives $1 back. Come on, those teachers cost a lot in the end.

That is why I say a common effort will have to be made concerning the remittance of taxes. It is all very nice for the minister to start by returning 13.5 per cent. He should have returned 40 per cent. He would have been left alone, and all the premiers would have gone back happy. But no, he is again going to give them an amount of money, $5.5 billion with $3 billion worth of tax points. It is a small gain but the provinces must earn all the points. It is funny to hear me say that, because I am a federalist. But I want everyone to work in his area, and then we are going to have peace. As I said earlier, if the mayor of a city should try to tell the father of a family what to eat, how to dress and how to act in his home he is going to get thrown out. It is the same thing for the provinces.

Quebec is being shouted at today, and people find it extravagant and unfair but it is only asking for what belongs to it. It never asked a single thing of what belongs to the federal government. Never. That is all it is asking, as well as the other provinces. I sat the other day with the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia. It is the same thing for them. They are clapping hands and very happy. They said, that is the autonomy we have been asking for for years to be able to serve our people—the necessary taxation power to give them equivalent services. That is not asking for the moon, and that is all they are asking for. Not only Quebec, but all the other provinces ask for this! But why do we insist, and this is where I do not understand the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), why do we still keep the taxation powers for ourselves? Why? You want Canadian unity? I want Canadian unity myself, but let us act accordingly. As long as you act like you are now doing with your centralization, your dictatorship over the provinces, the provinces will revolt, and you have not finished yet! Give them back what belongs to them, this is all that they want, and take care of your own business.

Take care of your own sector, the federal sector, and you will have quite enough to do to administer your sector well. You are not even able to administer your own sector as you should, and you want to interfere in provincial sectors. Let us start simply by doing something honest and logical, then let us give back to the provinces what is theirs, and you shall see how well federal-provincial conferences will go! They will not be a farce like you said earlier. You may hold up your fist and tell Parliament: "It went like a charm!" Yes, it went like a charm if it is a boxing round that you had in mind, but that is not all that we want. If you want to save Canada, this is not what you should do, and it is a French Canadian who is telling you this! If you want to save Canada, stop acting like that and be careful! Give each province, and not only Quebec, its own rights, and then we can start to write a new constitution and to live in a new Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Miss MacDonald: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. May I call it four o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being four o'clock p.m. the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills and private bills.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I believe there is consent to proceed with private member's motion No. 6.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it agreed that all motions prior to motion No. 6 stand at the request of the government?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

EFFECT OF ARTIFICIAL FOOD ADDITIVES ON CHILDREN AND ADULTS

GOVERNMENTAL EXAMINATION RECOMMENDED

The House resumed from Friday, October 29, 1976, consideration of the motion of Mr. Yewchuk:

That in the opinion of this House, the government should take independent action to examine the relationship between artificial food additives and hyperactivity in children as well as between additives and behavioural changes in adults.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain.

Mr. MacFarlane: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I believe I do wish to say a few words.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I think I should explain to the House that I did not recognize the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) because he moved the motion and has spoken on it previously.

Mr. MacFarlane: I merely want to clarify the situation. Actually I believe there is another speaker on Your Honour's list who comes before me.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to make a contribution to the debate on this important subject, one about which we are just as concerned as the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) and his hon. friends. I think the only real question in dispute in respect to this motion is whether the type of investigation which is recommended needs to be independent, to quote the words of the hon. member's motion.

● (1550)

In order to make an intelligible contribution to the debate I should like to begin on a more general basis by dealing with the question of chemicals in the food supply. Chemicals in the food supply include the thousands of natural chemical constituents. The most valuable, of course, are proteins, fats, carbohydrates, and essential minerals and vitamins. However, there are many other naturally occurring chemicals; for example, an orange contains acetone, ethanol, methanol, etc. Other chemicals in the food supply include pesticide and veterinary drug residues; environmental contaminants such as PCB's, heavy metals such as lead, mercury, cadmium, arsenic, etc., natural toxins—bacterial toxins, fungal toxins and natural components of foods such as salanine in potatoes—and last but not least, intentional food additives, flavours and spices.

Now what about the possible relationship between food allergens and hyperactivity? Today the general public seems to be increasingly concerned that foods and food additives may be a major cause of hyperactivity in children. However, there is some evidence that hyperactivity in children may actually be a manifestation of an allergic reaction.

Hypersensitivity reactions, commonly known as allergies, to foods have been described in the medical literature for centuries. Hypersensitivity reactions have been observed in humans following exposure to pollens, dust, certain chemicals and, in a few isolated cases, to some artificial food colours and additives.

Food allergies of various types affect 30 to 40 per cent of the human population. An individual hypersensitive to a food may have symptoms ranging from nasal stuffiness, hives, eczema, rash, migraine headache, nausea, diarrhoea, or even a serious attack of asthma up to anaphylactic shock, or even death.

The range of foods to which people can be allergic is almost limitless. The most common causes of food allergy are milk, grains, especially wheat, eggs, fish, shellfish, fruit, especially strawberries, chocolate and nuts. In addition to natural foods, food additives such as tartrazine, parabens, vegetable oils, protein additives, caffeine, cyclamates, flavours, etc. have been implicated in allergic reactions.

Let me now talk a little about hyperkinesis or hyperactivity. These are terms used to describe a syndrome in children whose unusual behaviour becomes a major problem in the home and at school. These children may be described as being constantly active, flitting from one object or activity to another, restless and fidgety; exhibiting voluble, uninhibited speech, disorganized thinking, and impulsive behaviour. They are irritable and aggressive, have a short attention span and are easily distracted.

There is some concern that hyperactive children may have emotional disorders as adults. The characteristics of these children, including impulsive behaviour, short attention span, attention-seeking behaviour, and low tolerance to frustration in the face of social and educational difficulties, suggest that this group may become abusers of alcohol and other drugs in their teenage years. One study indicates that there may be a relationship between hyperactivity and subsequent alcoholism. This study showed a higher incidence of alcoholism and hyperactivity amongst the biological parents than the adopting parents of adopted hyperactive children. In addition it was observed that hyperactives have a high incidence of hyperactivity and alcoholism amongst their relatives.

With respect to other types of anti-social behaviour, there are reports of cases of explosive personality characterized by aggressiveness with a "hair trigger" temper. In these cases the explosive personality was preceded by hyperactivity in childhood.

While there are few follow-up studies of hyperactive children, most of the evidence indicates that they have a relatively poor outcome. There is usually a high incidence of anti-social behaviour and contact with police, and many have become institutionalized as delinquents or have become psychotic. Follow-up studies suffer from a lack of comparison groups, from small samples and from inadequate analysis of behavioural pathology. The incidence of alcohol, and drug abuse in particular, has not yet been examined in detail.

Statistics on the incidence of hyperactivity in school children vary considerably among investigators. This variation stems primarily from the lack of agreement among scientists on either terminology or definition of the syndrome. For example, school authorities report the incidence of hyperactivity in children to be as high as 15 to 20 per cent, while psychiatrists estimate the prevalence to range from 4 to 10 per cent.

Investigators feel there are several possible factors associated with hyperactive behaviour in children. For example, some hyperactive children exhibit abnormal brain waves which have been related to physical brain damage during birth; however, the relationship between brain damage and hyperactivity is unclear.

In addition, genetically inherited metabolic disorders have been considered as a potential cause of hyperactivity. Hyperactivity occurs four to ten times more frequently in male than in female children.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We have been listening to the hon. member reading his speech for the last 15 minutes. I should like to bring to your attention paragraph 144 of Beauchesne, which reads as follows:

> It is a rule in both Houses of Parliament that a member must address the House orally, and not read from a written, previously prepared speech—

I should think that the hon. member, having been here since 1968, would pay sufficient attention to the rules of the House to follow this particular rule. After nine years in this place he surely should be able to make a speech without having to read every word of it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I think this point was brought up previously by the hon. member. Again I must repeat that the Chair does not want to challenge authorities such as he has quoted. No doubt the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) was referring to notes which he has, and perhaps he would resume the normal practice in this House when making speeches.

Mr. MacGuigan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will admit that I cannot speak with my customary fluency on a matter of this technicality without more frequent reference to my notes than is usually the case.

As I was saying when I was interrupted, it should be pointed out that similar sex ratios have been recorded for many congenital syndromes in medicine but no firm evidence exists that the sex chromosomes are involved in the transmission of these abnormalities. Whether the hyperactivity syndrome is genetic or sex-linked is not known, because of a lack of knowledge of inheritance patterns involved in hyperactivity.

Some investigators have associated hyperactivity in children with accidental poisoning by chemicals such as lead, but the clinical evidence to date is inconclusive. It is known, however, that hyperactive children have a greater tendency to accidental poisoning in the home, presumably due to their intense restlessness.

The belief in the relationship of food additives and hyperactivity has evolved primarily as a result of clinical studies conducted by Dr. Benjamin Feingold, a San Francisco physician. He recorded a marked clinical improvement in 50 per cent of hyperactive children treated with his "salicylate free diet," also called a K-P diet. This treatment permitted a discontinuation of all drug therapy and resulted in a substantial improvement in scholastic achievement in these children. The diet given to the children contained no food additives or foods such as tomatoes, potatoes, cucumbers, squash, jams, nuts and virtually all fresh fruits, that naturally contain salicylates.

● (1600)

These initial clinical studies, as Dr. Feingold agrees, were empirical in nature. Although beneficial effects were observed, it is not possible to draw definitive conclusions from these data. In order to accommodate the child's needs, the diet must be strictly adhered to. This necessitated a dramatic modification in family life-style. Therefore it is unclear whether the improvement in the children was due to the diet or to the additional care given the children in these particular circumstances. In addition, the severely restrictive diet has been criticized by many nutritionists as being nutritionally inadequate.

Other investigators have designed projects to determine if a relationship exists between food additives and hyperactivity.

One preliminary attempt to investigate the hypothesis is the study designed by Connor, of Pittsburg's School of Medicine. This study involved 15 children diagnosed in accordance with the American Psychiatric Association's definition of hyperkinetic reaction of childhood.

In this study, both parent and teacher ratings showed a statistically significant difference between measurements made at baseline and those made after the children had been on the K-P diet. It is interesting to note that, when the K-P diet was measured against a control diet, teacher ratings showed a statistically significant difference, but parental ratings did not.

Dr. Connor concludes that "the special diet may reduce hyperkinetic symptoms" but warns, and I quote:

> . . . it would be hazardous at this point to draw too many conclusions from this experiment, given the small size of the sample and the lack of complete consistency in the results. Any thoughtful observer will understand that a major intervention into dietary habits of a family will produce behavioural effects, regardless of the specific diets, a phenomenon well understood in the management of such conditions as juvenile diabetes. The results would have been substantially clarified if it had been possible to have objective measures of function uncontaminated by the psychological factors which are bound to operate in the family-school-child system. At this point, the results point to the need for considerable further investigation.

Perhaps the most significant of all studies is that conducted by a team at the University of Wisconsin. This represents the first systematic investigation of the hyperactivity-food additive hypothesis. It includes objective psychologic, psychophysiologic and classroom observational data in addition to parent and teacher ratings of behavioural change associated with dietary manipulations. The study was designed in such a way that teachers, parents, clinical investigators, and classroom and laboratory observers of the children's activity level were unaware throughout the course of the investigation whether the child was on the special diet or on a diet containing artificial colours and flavours. Both the experimental and control menus were prepared from commercially available food stocks.

Available results indicate that of the 36 mothers with boys in the 6-12 year group, 13 rated their son's behaviour as improved on the special diet, while 6 rated their child's behaviour as worsened. Seventeen of the maternal ratings showed less than 10 per cent change due to effects of diet. Of the 30 fathers rating the behaviour of this same age group, 14 rated their son as improved, 3 as worsened and 13 essentially unchanged. In contrast, only 6 of the 36 teachers rated those on the special diet as less hyperactive, 10 rated them as showing more active behaviour while on the experimental diet, and 20 of the teacher ratings showed little change between the two diet conditions. Agreement between parent and teacher ratings of improved behaviour while on the experimental diet occurred in only 4 of the 36 children.

The observational data collected on a number of behaviours in the classroom and in a standardized laboratory task yielded very few ratings of improvement in association with the experimental diet. Preliminary statistical analysis of these data has been completed and no statistically significant effect was apparent.

However, the younger children (age 3-6) showed a greater positive response on the experimental diet as indicated by parent rating. All 10 mothers in this group rated their child's behaviour as improved, as did 4 of the 7 fathers in this sample.

Thus, with the possible exception of the youngest age sample, the preliminary analysis completed to date in the Wisconsin study does not appear to offer strong support for the efficacy of the experimental diet, at least with respect to group effects. The University of Wisconsin research team, however, has repeatedly emphasized the still incomplete status of their project saying that a number of the objective measures obtained on the subject have not yet been tabulated.

A study was recently conducted at the University of Western Ontario to determine the relative effectiveness of dietary and drug management of hyperkinesis. Preliminary findings suggest that the effect of diet was ambiguous. Parents and teachers were of the opinion that dietary infractions involving artificial food colours and flavourings had minimal and insignificant effects.

The aforementioned studies conducted to date clearly indicate the potential difficulties in any attempt to test the food additive-hyperactivity hypothesis. The small sample size used reduces the significance of all findings and makes the use of statistical analysis extremely difficult. Furthermore, the use of outpatients in all these projects makes difficult the control of compliance. Also, specificity of responsiveness must be studied by challenging subjects with individual groups of substances, such as artificial colours or flavours or salicylates. Finally, results are meaningless if strict adherence to guidelines is not preserved throughout the entire duration of an experiment.

Several other studies currently under way have been funded by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration. These include a study on the hyperkinetic syndrome in children being conducted at the Kaiser Permanent Foundation Research Institute in California. The study should be completed in about 1 year. A second study, at the University of Wisconsin, is designed to identify children who respond to the K-P diet.

Much more definitive scientific information is needed to determine if the consumption of food additives is related to the hyperactive syndrome in children and the ultimate effects in adults. This is very expensive.

A study sponsored by the Department of National Health and Welfare is now underway in a Canadian hospital.

Mr. Yewchuk: Which hospital?

Mr. MacGuigan: This study will address itself to some of the concerns associated with the validity of the results of former studies.

The Health Protection Branch is collaborating in this study by determining whether or not the children involved in the study are allergic to various food additives. It is hoped that this will permit an assessment of a possible association between allergies due to specific food allergens and hyperactivity in children.

It is the aim of all the studies described to determine the principal causes of hyperkinesis with a view to reducing the incidence of this disease. Obviously:

> . . . the syndrome of the hyperactive child, regardless of its cause, is a real and trying condition for all who are associated with its victim. Cures cannot be found until the causes are understood.

I think this indicates that the government is very concerned about the subject, is pursuing research in the matter, and therefore the independent action called for by the hon. member for Athabasca is not needed.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the speech on this motion, which I will read for the benefit of those hon. members who have not read it. It reads as follows, and it is in the name of the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk), seconded by the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should take independent action to examine the relationship between artificial food additives and hyperactivity in children as well as between additives and behavioural changes in adults.

I found it interesting that just a few moments ago the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) indicated that certain studies were going on in a Canadian hospital. When the hon. member for Athabasca asked him in a very clear voice to identify the hospital, the hon. member could not do so. I am not suggesting that the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville would intentionally mislead the House, but it would be interesting for us in the House and for the people of Canada to know the extent of the studies and the places where they are being carried out.

There are a couple of reasons why I have involved myself in this debate. And following a former dean of law at a Canadian university—not a medical doctor, but a dean of law—who has involved himself in a matter which is medical, as a lawyer I feel comfortable in this debate.

● (1610)

I am concerned about this problem. This possible relationship has been brought to my attention by teachers, people involved in the administration of education, and educators generally in the area which I represent. They share the concern I feel. I hope government members do not talk this motion out, and the reason for that is that this motion has been moved by a medical doctor who has practicised family medicine in a small town in Alberta, Lac la Biche. He has been engaged in the practice of family medicine, and that has brought him into contact, in this context, with the problems which must accompany the life and the professional work of a small town medical doctor in a way which is perhaps different from the experience of those who have had the advantage of practising in metropolitan areas.

It is a great tribute to the medical profession that the hon. member for Athabasca and other medical people are members of this House. When a medical man brings to the attention of this House something which is of concern to him, this House ought to listen. If there is nothing unreasonable in the proposal, the House ought to adopt the view that the motion should be accepted.

I am proud to be associated with the hon. member for Athabasca. He has been the critic of the Department of National Health and Welfare for the official opposition for some period of time, and he has immersed himself in the health problems of Canada. Aside from being qualified professionally to speak on this subject, he is also the father of six children. This motion has been advanced with some concern and some understanding, and I hope that it will be greeted as such and that we will not utilize all our time speaking on it. I hope the House will follow my suggestion and allow the matter to come to a vote. I myself do not intend to speak very long.

This matter has engaged not just the attention of the medical profession; it has gone far beyond that. I mentioned the educators and parents who have expressed concern since this information was released. I think I am being charitable when I say that we have had some difficulty convincing the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) that artificial food colouring poses a serious health threat to Canadians. Canadian standards are certainly not as stringent as those in the United States, and our fears were not at all allayed when in September, 1976, the Canadian Department of National Health and Welfare failed to follow the lead of the U.S. food and drug administration in banning red dye No. 2, red dye No. 4, and carbon black. At that time we discussed the matter with some seriousness, and it was of considerable concern.

This matter is so important that it has engaged the attention of the Canadian School Trustees Association, which has been in constant communication with the hon. member for Athabasca. In fact at the beginning of this month they reported on a meeting of its executive to my colleague. That meeting occurred in mid-January in Toronto, at which time concern was expressed about the whole question of food additives. That meeting also dealt in particular with motion No. 6, which is the subject matter of the debate today. The report of the president of the Canadian School Trustees Association is that after a lengthy, exhaustive, and thorough discussion of the problem the executive approved support for the effort of the hon. member for Athabasca to have the matter taken more seriously than it has been to date.

This is the kind of private members' motion to which we should give credence. If there are tests being conducted in other jurisdictions, the government can certainly have the benefit of the results of those tests. However, this House ought not to say, by its vote or by talking this motion out, to the Canadian people that it is not concerned. I want my colleagues on the other side of the House to know that the official opposition is very concerned, and the people of Canada ought to congratulate the hon. member for Athabasca for the persistence he has exhibited with regard to this motion.

The president of the Canadian School Trustees Association also indicated that he was going to request the chairman of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. McRae) to place the subject matter of this motion on the agenda of that standing committee, and why not? There are medical reasons why this matter should be considered, and there is a request by an agency which is involved, so is there any reason why this House should talk out this motion or vote against it?

I felt I should rise and support the action of the hon. member for Athabasca, who has done us a great service. We ought not to denigrate the spirit in which the motion was put forward or the importance of this question by failing to pass the motion or by talking it out, whichever the case may be. This is a matter which requires some re-evaluation, particularly in view of the way things containing food additives can cross the border. We should have strict standards. We certainly should be no less strict than other jurisdictions.

This matter need not have been brought to the attention of the House, if indeed it is being studied in the department—or, as we understand, it is to be studied, or may be studied in some unidentified hospital—but this House ought to indicate its concern and pass a motion which will not do anyone any harm but which may do the country a lot of good.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Before I recognize the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau), I should mention that at 3.50 p.m. the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) called it four o'clock, and that was proceeded upon. What the Chair might have failed to do was to seek the unanimous consent of hon. members, so therefore at this time I ask hon. members whether that is agreed.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, motion No. 6 standing in the name of the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) gives us an opportunity to talk about the whole question of regulatory agencies for food safety and the whole question which the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) discussed. The fact is that a private member's initiative like this one does accomplish something.

The object of motions like this is to bring forward an idea or to bring forward something an hon. member would like to have studied. The fact that speeches are put on the record accomplishes what the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton wants to accomplish, and that is to bring the matter to this political forum and to make sure that all arguments are heard. From there, if action is needed, it is taken. It is in that light that I want to speak in this debate about the government's perception of regulatory responsibility in the area of food safety.

First of all, without a coherent philosophy the chances for operational success of a regulatory agency are few and far between. One of the objectives of the Health Protection Branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare is to provide an effective channel of communications between the calorie control food and beverage industry and government officials, and to ensure that necessary scientific, medical and other personal information is available and understood by all concerned. One of the goals of the Health Protection Branch is to ensure that foods consumed by Canadians are safe. Some, perhaps, consider this to be an unreachable goal but it is a goal which we must continuously strive for if in good conscience the Health Protection Branch is to carry out its responsibilities to the public. The magnitude of the task is exemplified by the sheer amount of food consumed in this country each year and the wide variety of sources from which it is obtained.

We can say with confidence that, in the main, the nation's food supply is safer than it has ever been before. Nevertheless, to paraphrase the Irish nationalist, John Philpott Curran, the price of safety is eternal vigilance. Regulations must never be relaxed and we must not reduce our vigilant surveillance of the nation's food supply. We must continuously tune out the shrill voices of those who proclaim one extreme or the other—on the one hand that there is nothing at all to be concerned about and, on the other, that we are all headed for some sort of dietary Armageddon.

The instruments which permit us to strive for the goal of a safe food supply include the Food and Drug Act and regulations. Apart from the Income Tax Act I cannot conceive of any legislation that has greater impact on the purse and the health of Canadians. Historians in the Health Protection Branch of National Health and Welfare believe it is derived from the oldest legislation dealing with food and drugs in the western hemisphere. Its ancestor was born 100 years ago—almost by accident—as a result of the concern about alcohol.

It is interesting to note that a century ago there was widespread concern in Canada about the social effects of alcoholism and broad public support for abolition of the sale of alcoholic beverages. In typical Canadian fashion—for it has long been our practice to appoint a royal commission to investigate contentious issues before making judgment on them—a committee of the House of Commons met to consider the problem raised by excess consumption of alcohol. It concluded that the problem was not one of all liquor but only of bad liquor. As a result, a law to license compounders of alcoholic beverages and to prevent the adulteration of food, drink and drugs—the so-called Inland Revenue Act— was passed by parliament and became operative on January 1, 1875. It was the great-grandfather of today's Food and Drugs Act.

I wish to highlight some of the statutory bases which the act provides for us. Most important, the Food and Drugs Act is criminal law. By virtue of the British North America Act, criminal law is within federal jurisdiction. The British North America Act deals with the legislative, executive and judicial power by dividing the totality of public power among the federal government and the provinces. Food, drugs, cosmetics and medical devices are nowhere mentioned in the division of subjects of the public power in the British North America Act. This is not surprising, given the minor role of the state in health matters at the time of Confederation in 1867. These subjects are not explicitly mentioned. Control over those substances has, however, been determined to be a matter of criminal law and therefore within federal jurisdiction.

Several landmark decisions have upheld the federal primacy in this area and most authorities no longer seriously question it. Hence it is possible for us to legislate and regulate in these areas whether or not the subject matter is one which remains within a province or crosses provincial boundaries.

The Food and Drugs Act provides authority to establish standards for the composition and identity of foods; to prohibit the sale of foods that are manufactured under unsanitary conditions or are adulterated; and to prohibit the advertising, labelling, packaging, processing or sale of foods in a manner that is false, misleading or deceptive or is likely to create an erroneous impression regarding its character, value, quantity, composition, merit, or safety.

The practical enforcement of the Food and Drugs Act requires that certain sections be supplemented with regulations that interpret the act. Consequently there has been developed over many years an extensive body of regulations which provide standards, set out requirements for labelling and establish prohibitions or exemptions for certain substances within the scope of the act. The regulations, of course, frequently are changed as new foods are developed and new processes devised. The use of certain chemicals as direct or incidental additives, for example, is under continual review and new data on the safety of a particular chemical may require regulatory amendments.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Breau: Yes.

Mr. Yewchuk: The hon. member is talking about labelling the food supply. I wonder if he can explain to the House why most foods are not labelled specifically with regard to which chemicals are in them but simply say "artificial colouring and flavouring" rather than naming the specific chemical. The importance of that stems from the comments made by the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) who said that allergies can occur to certain chemicals in the food supply, but if they are not labelled people who may be allergic to them cannot tell. My question is: why has the government not taken action as far as labelling accurately is concerned, if not in banning some of these substances?

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer for the government on that point.

Mr. Yewchuk: You are speaking for the government.

[Mr. Breau.]

Mr. Breau: No, I am not speaking for the government. I am speaking to the motion.

An hon. Member: You are blocking it for the government.

Mr. Breau: I am speaking on the subject because I think it is a very important one. The objective desired by this motion, I believe, is covered by the Food and Drugs Act. There is no reason to have any other action.

Mr. Yewchuk: I just gave a reason.

Mr. Breau: The hon. member is asking for chemicals to be labelled or identified now. I do not see that in the motion.

Mr. Yewchuk: You are talking about labelling.

Mr. Breau: I talked about labelling because I went into the activities of the Health Protection Branch. I am explaining how that branch operates and what it does. It labels food and it does all the things I just mentioned.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Not very well.

Mr. Breau: I suppose the question the hon. member poses is an important one, as is his motion. I hope that someone can answer it later in the debate.

The Health Protection Branch, as a regulatory agency, is not isolated from the political process, though it is much more isolated from partisan politics than are some similar agencies elsewhere. The mechanism whereby it reports to a politically elected representative who has ministerial responsibilities before parliament, provides a continuing sensitivity to and awareness of the fact that the value judgments of society must be taken into account in reaching the final decisions about issues such as food safety, acceptable risks, and the legitimate role of a regulatory agency.

It is good that the hon. member interrupted to ask a question. This part of my notes answers his motion—that because the minister is responsible to parliament for the Health Protection Branch he has to be aware of what goes on in parliament and has to be aware of the initiatives of private members. I think it is very valuable to have this in our system, as the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton said. The Health Protection Branch is sensitive to all these things, and I am sure that is what is looked for in the motion. Since the hon. member brought the matter up, I assume it is important.

● (1630)

The task of the health protection branch is to provide the minister with the best advice, which means technically best advice. The minister bears responsibility for policy and often has to defend his decisions on the floor of the House of Commons or before parliamentary committees. It is against this general background that the enforcement philosophy and the administrative mechanisms to obtain compliance with the law are formulated.

Since Canada is a significant importer of food it is important to consider carefully the impact of legislation affecting food commodities in other countries. Over the years close liaison has been developed with regulatory agencies of other countries, particularly those of the United States, the United Kingdom, Switzerland and Sweden. There are frequent consultations on matters relating to food safety, food recalls and so on, with officials of other countries.

The enforcement philosophy must be flexible and able to respond quickly if we are to deal effectively with the immense variety of complex situations we face in the area of food safety. An overly-rigid bureaucracy is no answer to the extremely difficult issues to be faced each day. There must be co-operation with responsible food manufacturers and the encouragement of voluntary compliance by industry. Unnecessary confrontation and adversary proceedings so far as possible should be avoided.

The Health Protection Branch is firmly committed to the notion of full discussion with industry prior to regulatory changes. In doing so its officials try hard to avoid excessive formalism and legalism. They recognize that government does not have a monopoly on talent or integrity and that the regulatory process must of necessity and economy involve extensive discussion among the various groups involved, including the regulators, the regulated, and representatives of consumers. Indeed the assistance of the regulated is required to make certain that proposed regulatory changes are both theoretically sound and capable of practical application.

In order to encourage and foster voluntary compliance and to avoid costly court proceedings, officers of the branch frequently meet with industry representatives, to discuss alleged violations. The field operations directorate runs the gamut of compliance-type action from private sessions with an offending company to instituting and completing court actions. For example, an informal technique called, for want of a better name, a formal hearing, is utilized in cases where the field staff is of the opinion that compliance may be gained without the institution of prosecution proceedings. Thus, where appropriate, administrative decisions are reached in discussions between industry representatives and officials which result in a greater assurance of the safety of foods for the public without resorting to court action.

This does not mean that court sanctions are not useful. In any industry, including the food industry, there are those who are too irresponsible, too venal or too obstinate to abide voluntarily by appropriate regulatory standards. In the Canadian context the resort in such cases to court action is necessary to make regulations work. Thus, there is no hesitation to go to the "mat" with people who, for whatever reason, repeatedly fail to comply with the law. Whether the compliance action is voluntary or imposed by a court, it is the duty of the health protection branch to make sure that regulations provide appropriate guidelines, to ensure that industry accepts and lives up to its responsibilities and obligations to the public.

Perhaps the most important underlying principle influencing the Health Protection Branch is its insistence on providing advice to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) which is based on good science. Accordingly branch members consciously attempt to foster the attitudes and values of a scientific agency. They are not policemen; rather, they constitute a scientific regulatory agency which must be anchored on the rock of science if it is to ensure that the advice it gives the minister is of the necessary high calibre. Ministers may not have the necessary scientific expertise and would be vulnerable, personally and politically, if they attempted to second-guess their scientific advisers on scientific grounds. Therefore they must be careful in how they deal with the advice of their officials. Of course officials must set the highest possible standards of scientific excellence for their organization, and never depart from them.

Officials must recognize that many situations deal with other issues which must be considered in addition to the purely scientific factors involved. These issues, in an area of such vital importance as public health, must not be those of partisan politics, but they do legitimately include social and economic factors about which biomedical scientists are often less than fully knowledgeable. More important, they often include a perception of a value judgment of Canadian society about a given situation.

One of the most frustrating problems faced by scientific regulatory agencies such as the Health Protection Branch is the need to make judgments constantly and provide advice on the basis of inadequate evidence. It would, of course, be nice to wait until all of the data necessary for absolutely, unquestionably valid decisions could be collected. Because we live in an interdependent world, and because food can be transported quickly, the Health Protection Branch is sometimes asked to make its decisions rapidly. This is not an easy task, but it is the very essence of the work of a regulatory agency. In making such difficult benefit/risk decisions official agencies will not please everyone. The branch has evolved a system for making benefit/risk decisions. This includes a deliberate attempt to quantify as many variables as possible, in order for decisions to be made on a rational basis. The variables comprise several fundamental components which are opposed, compared, and weighed against each other.

Mr. Ellis: Brilliant!

Mr. Breau: There is risk, cost, loss, benefit and acceptability to the industry and the public. All these factors are recognized. When the risk is balanced against benefit, the risk will be considered as being acceptable in some situations, but not necessarily in others. All sorts of considerations are important—cultural, legal and philosophical. Such considerations sometimes modify the decisions which are made.

Before leaving this brief discussion on the factors involved in the assessment of food safety—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I interrupt the hon. member to inform him that his time has expired. I see the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) rising. Does he wish to raise a point of order?

Mr. Yewchuk: No, Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Welland.

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I enter this scientific debate with a certain amount of trepidation, bearing in mind the words of the opposition House leader who suggested that one certain member now present in the House ought not to enter into a scientific discussion involving the matters the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) has raised. Personally, I do not agree. I agree that the hon. member for Athabasca's background would lead to his interest in this matter. He has a scientifically trained mind. However, I took exception to the remarks of the opposition House leader, for I do not think they apply to the capabilities of the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan).

An hon. Member: The unwise remarks.

Mr. Railton: Yes, they were unwise remarks. The hon. member has the benefit of great legal training and experience, has no doubt been involved in the discussion of many scientific matters and is capable of digesting the material presented to this House. Frankly, the consideration of this subject requires a bit of common sense.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but in the absence of the opposition House leader I must object to the hon. member's misinterpreting what my House leader said. He did not in any way imply that the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) was not qualified to speak. He said they were both equally qualified to speak.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): That is a point of debate.

● (1640)

Mr. Railton: I will not say anything more about that. I feel that the point I made is well taken. There were several questions raised by the hon. member. The first was in the latter part of October with regard to the study of food additives and hyperkinetic children as well as the effects of diets on adults, and drug therapy and so on. On November 18 last many questions were asked about the effects of Amaranth or Red Dye No. 2, and Ponceau Red Dye No. 4, and again whether carbon black had any effects on the health of the population. Again there were questions about the possible existence of co-carcinogens in the Canadian food supply, wanting to know what research the Department of National Health and Welfare is doing. There were similar questions about the research projects with regard to additives in the Canadian food supply and, finally, the effect of chloroform added to certain things.

These are good questions. The hon. member for Athabasca has the right to ask them. On the other hand, I think I can say that the Department of National Health and Welfare is no doubt looking into all these things. It makes the statement that it has.

The Department of National Health and Welfare just does not consist of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde). There are many, many people who are experts in science, not only clinical medicine but scientific research into all the aspects which the hon. member previously mentioned. He has no difficulty finding experts. They will give us the latest reports on their own experimental work as well as scientific review.

The department is quite aware of the fear in society about the effect of red dyes. A great deal of this is as a result of exaggerated publicity.

There is talk about labelling, but nothing has been proven that the red dye is harmful. Let us be sensible in our questions about this matter. First the metabolic effects or pharmacokinetic qualities of Amaranth or Red Dye No. 2 are being investigated right now in a variety of animal species. This is being done under the supervision of the Department of National Health and Welfare. As far as the tests to date are concerned, there have been no untoward effects noted in any of the tests. This fits in with other tests in other areas of the world.

Second, there are studies they are doing on research into the purity of the dye. There is no doubt that some of the effects ascribed to the dye have been due to the impurities in the additives which contain the dye. Not only are they doing these other chemical tests, but also microbial tests, trying to see if they have any potential on affecting the chromosomes or the future health genetically of the population.

As far as the tumor forming effect is concerned, I do not mean just carcinogenic but the causation of any kind of tumor practically. They have been carrying this out using a large number of cats as the test species. These tests have been completed. It seems there will be a report soon. So far, there seems to be no indication that there is this quality in the food additives, if pure.

The next question was about Red Dye No. 4. There are no adverse effects noted in the past regarding cancer or reproduction, nor is there any new evidence to suggest this colour poses a health risk. It is not used very often.

You have to ask how many people eat a great deal of food containing red dye? Has it ever been proved that the amount of red dye in use has really increased, not just because of the increase in population, but in effect in the food they are eating? Has it ever been found that this type of "hyperkineticity" or the hyperkinetic child is found to be more frequent than ever before? It is one of these things that have been picked up in the last 20 years or so. We have no statistics whatsoever to show that this is on the increase. You have to go into those things.

There is the other question about the effects of carbon black. There is evidence in the literature to suggest that carbon black may actually protect experimental animals from the effects of polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbon content or impurities.

The Department of National Health and Welfare in addition to conducting studies is continually surveying world literature on carbon black. So far, nothing definite has been turned up.

With regard to the question of what is being done about sponsoring or conducting research on the existence of co-carcinogens in the Canadian food supply, the department has ongoing research programs to identify co-carcinogens in the food supply.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business has now expired pursuant to an order previously received by the Chair. It being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday next at two o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 4:50 p. m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

PROPOSED COMMITTEE STUDY OF POSSIBLE CHANGE IN PROCEDURE FOR APPOINTING COMMISSIONER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43 on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity with reference to the possible appointment of a new commissioner for the RCMP. The RCMP first came into being as the North West Mounted Police in 1873. Its existence assured that the great plains, the wheat basket of the world, later to be known as Canada's source of gas and oil, could be developed and so allow Canada to become self-sufficient in energy and oil. The RCMP is a traditional police force.

Throughout the world the escalation of crime continues to be one of society's major problems. The RCMP, in full co-operation with all other police agencies in Canada, is committed to keeping crime in check and to reverse the trend of increased criminal behaviour. All the heads of the original North West Mounted Police, later known as the Royal North West Mounted Police and finally, in 1920, as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I understand the hon. member's sentiments. However, he is permitted, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only to explain the urgency of the matter. Perhaps the hon. member could put that forward, and put his motion.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I am just coming to that. All the heads of the RCMP were chosen from within its ranks, with one exception at its beginning. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds):

That the question of changing the tradition and, indeed, the precedent of appointing a commissioner of the RCMP from other than the ranks of the force be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs for study and report before a head is chosen from another source.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The presentation of such motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL HERITAGE DAY

REGRETTED FAILURE TO PASS BILL ESTABLISHING HOLIDAY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, if the House will give its consent to the introduction of this motion under Standing Order 43, which I trust it will do, I believe it could be passed without debate. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That this House, on this special day, it being Monday, February 21, expresses its pride in Canada's heritage, regrets that the bill to establish national heritage day as a holiday has not been passed, and declares its confidence that the said bill will be passed during the present session of parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House for the presentation of such a motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO DEATH OF ARCHBISHOP OF UGANDA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask unanimous consent for the presentation of a motion under Standing Order 43 and do so because the provisions of the standing order require the matter to be one of urgent and pressing necessity. I raise this question in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) because of the provisions of that Standing Order and because of evidence which came to light over the weekend concerning circumstances surrounding the death of the Archbishop of Uganda and two cabinet ministers in that country. Therefore, with the leave of the House I will ask for unanimous consent to move the following motion, seconded by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald):

● (1410)

That this House condemns the government of Uganda denying due process of law to its citizens and calls upon President Amin to permit an impartial inquiry by the Commonwealth or the United Nations into the circumstances surrounding the deaths of the Archbishop of Uganda and two Ugandan cabinet ministers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion pursuant to the Standing Orders can be made only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

NO APPROVAL OF HEADQUARTERS BUILDING IN TORONTO WITHOUT PUBLIC TENDERING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the federal government seems to have arrived at the point of approving plans initiated by one Robert Campeau for a new CBC headquarters on the Toronto harbourfront and in light of the fact the government seemed to have reached the stage of announcing the project at a press conference last Thursday, complete with a model of the $150 million project, all without having gone through any tendering process, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the government be instructed not to proceed with the approval of the new CBC headquarters building in the Toronto area without submitting the project to a complete public tendering process.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

ENERGY

SECURITY OF NUCLEAR REACTOR SITES—POSSIBILITY OF DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES AND PUBLIC INQUIRY INTO USE OF NUCLEAR ENERGY

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It refers to the recent announcement that, after a lengthy study, the United States Nuclear Regulatory Commission has concluded that the possible threat of terrorist activity or sabotage against the 74 civilian-operated nuclear installations in that country warrants an immediate and significant increase in security. Can the minister tell the House whether Canada has been involved in any way in this review in the United States or whether Canada is otherwise looking in any serious way into the state of security at our own reactor sites?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I will be very pleased to make inquiries to see whether there have been discussions at the official level between Canadian officials and United States officials on this question. I do know that from time to time there have been discussions between the Atomic Energy Control Board and the officials of Ontario Hydro and the other utilities in Canada.

Mr. Clark: Given this most recent example of very real concern both in the United States and Canada about the special dangers that are involved in a modern nuclear society, will the minister undertake here and now to initiate a public inquiry, using a standing committee of this House or some other means, into nuclear energy in Canada and acquaint the public with the benefits and risks of nuclear energy?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member can make the case that such an inquiry before a parliamentary committee will not duplicate the work presently being done by the royal commission in Ontario under Mr. Porter or that such an inquiry will add to the kind of knowledge that he seeks, I will be prepared to consider it.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out to the minister that the terms of reference of the Porter inquiry by definition do not include installations in provinces other than Ontario and suggest to him that the onus is not upon me to make a case. That case has already been made by no less influential a body than the 1975 National Liberal Convention which went on record asking for precisely that kind of inquiry, and according to a report issued recently over the signature of one of the minister's colleagues on what is called the Consultative Council of the Liberal party—and a consultative council of the Liberal party must be something to behold—that is one of those questions on which no action at all has been taken. If the minister is prepared to ignore the opposition in the House of Commons, will he tell us why he will not at least pay attention to a resolution of his own party and have a public inquiry made?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: I am reminded from time to time of the Rip Van Winkle approach to policy taken by the hon. member opposite. If he had not been asleep for the past year he might have realized what was going on.

An hon. Member: What was going on?

Mr. Gillespie: If the Leader of the Opposition were serious about this matter he would have made it his business to find out how the terms of reference of that Royal Commission had been interpreted by the Royal Commissioner. He would have found that a public debate is being prepared right now by the commissioner dealing with the important questions before the commission with respect to nuclear energy. But it seems to me the hon. gentleman is still going by the book; he reads the terms of reference and says this Royal Commission has no jurisdiction in this area at all. He is out of date again.

Mr. Clark: I certainly would not suggest that the minister and his colleagues have adopted a Rip Van Winkle approach to politics; they are hoping right now that the Canadian people have slept through the last ten years.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: While we realize that their approach to federal-provincial relations is to dump federal responsibilities on to the provinces, we still ask the minister to tell the House why he is neglecting his responsibility as a minister in the national government to set up a national inquiry into a national question of national importance which is under national jurisdiction rather than trying to hide behind an initiative which has been taken by a government in a province.

Mr. Gillespie: If the Leader of the Opposition is saying to me, to his colleagues and to the rest of the House that the people of Canada should not trust the actions of a Conservative government—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Gillespie: —that the people of Canada should not trust a Royal Commission which has been set up by the Province of Ontario, a province which more than any other is committed to nuclear energy, if he is saying that, I think he ought to have a chat with Premier Davis.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): A supplementary to the minister with respect to his incredible lack of responsibility in this key area of nuclear development. In light of the fact that the request for such a public inquiry has been supported by Premier Campbell of Prince Edward Island, Premier Regan of Nova Scotia and by a number of members of parliament from all parties, and also in light of the fact that other provinces have taken varying positions with respect to the development of the nuclear option for Canada, I wonder whether the minister could tell us, given the establishment of further refineries at Port Hope and in Saskatoon, if either the companies concerned or his department are making plans with respect to these facilities to protect them from possible nuclear sabotage or terrorism? I think it is obvious the minister has not been exercising his jurisdiction effectively.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I think the Atomic Energy Control Board has made clear on a number of occasions the measures they are taking to provide protection for the Canadian public.

ATTEMPT BY ELDORADO TO STOP DRAMATIC PRESENTATION OF NUCLEAR QUESTION IN SASKATOON SCHOOLS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister indicate whether he has heard reports of, or taken action with respect to, a dramatic presentation on the nuclear question which has been taking place in the schools at Saskatoon and which has been protested by an official of Eldorado Nuclear, and that this official has written to the school board of Saskatoon instructing the school board to have this dramatic presentation stopped or else Eldorado Nuclear would take further action? Can the minister indicate under what authority the representative of Eldorado Nuclear has made this representation, whether the minister supports it, and what if any further action might be taken?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would be prepared to give me that information I would be prepared to look into it. He knows and his colleagues know that no decision has been taken to proceed with a refining operation in Saskatchewan close to Saskatoon. He also probably knows, if he has been following events, that no decision has been taken yet with respect to an additional refining and manufacturing facility close to Port Hope.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister indicating that he is not aware of the action that has been taken by an official of Eldorado Nuclear, and have instructions been communicated to this corporation in regard to terminating any kind of public discussion in the schools or elsewhere at Saskatoon regarding this important development?

Mr. Gillespie: Well, Mr. Speaker, I am not familiar with the particular schoolroom activities that the hon. member is referring to, but I would think it very important that our school children across Canada be exposed to the arguments, both pro and con, respecting the use of nuclear energy.

PROPOSED NEW CBC HEADQUARTERS IN TORONTO—DATE GOVERNMENT WILL ANNOUNCE DETAILS—POSSIBILITY OF PUBLIC TENDERS

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Public Works. Is the government ready to announce the details of the proposal of Robert Campeau, well known developer and Liberal supporter, for a new CBC headquarters at the Toronto Harbourfront, of which a model was to be revealed to the cabinet last week until the mayor of Toronto indicated that he refused to attend?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am a little confused by the question. I do not think the mayor was invited to attend any cabinet meeting at all. Certainly it is not normal practice. A model was not shown to the cabinet, Mr. Speaker. The subject was discussed and the details will be released to the House when a decision is taken.

Mr. Brewin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the proposed project going through any tendering process, or is it to be similar to the lease-back arrangement from the government to the same Robert Campeau for the land known as Les Terrasses de la Chaudière?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, I expect that if the project comes to fruition there would be some type of tendering arrangement whereby other interested builders or developers could make submissions as well.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

USE OF WRITS OF ASSISTANCE—POSSIBILITY OF AMENDMENTS TO PROVIDE FOR ISSUANCE OF DISCRETION OF JUDGE

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. Last week the minister indicated that he has been concerned about some of the powers provided under the Criminal Code and otherwise to investigative agencies and that he would specifically review the situation respecting applications by his department for writs of assistance. Can the minister now report to the House whether he is prepared to give tangible evidence of his expressed concern and will have introduced amendments to offending legislation providing for the issuance of such writs in the discretion of a judge on the basis of explicit criteria which ought to be carefully scrutinized by the court?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it would be premature for me to give that assurance at the moment. I am doing what I undertook to do the other day, namely reviewing the internal arrangements of my own department and that of several others as to applications for writs of assistance and determining in what way the objections expressed by his Lordship, Mr. Justice Collier, can be met. I have also indicated that in connection with its studies of powers of search, seizure and arrest the Law Reform Commission is considering the question of writs of assistance, and I think I would like to wait until those considerations have been completed before indicating whether any amendments to the law will be required.

REQUEST FOR REVIEW AND POSSIBLE TERMINATION OF OUTSTANDING WRITS OF ASSISTANCE

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that in the United Kingdom the court always has the alternative of granting or refusing writs of assistance, and in any case it is a very rare occurrence that such writs are issued there, and for the most part they are issued for the purpose of recovering possession of or preserving chattels, whereas in Canada such writs are not considered as merely remedial, but rather are used to enforce criminal and quasi-criminal legislation, will the minister immediately review the number and distribution of outstanding unlimited writs of assistance with a view to having existing writs voluntarily terminated except where justifiably and imminently required?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, both the Solicitor General and the Minister of National Revenue have been reviewing their internal arrangements by which writs of assistance are requested, and I am quite prepared—as I have already been doing—to ask my officials to make the same examination as to what internal procedures there are to assure that where writs of assistance are requested or granted they are surrounded by sufficient administrative checks to assure that they are not used capriciously or in an unjust way.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, in view of reports that some 4,212 searches were conducted last year under writs of assistance, that a total of 935 writs are currently held by RCMP officers and that 477 negative searches took place in 1976, can the minister verify that the incriminating evidence determined under the writs related to the statutes under which they were issued, and will the minister in any event examine the negative and other searches made to assess whether sufficient discretion is being exercised in the use of the writs, and will he report his findings to the House?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I have already undertaken to examine the situation. My colleagues could be more specific, but I would point out that of the number of writs of assistance used in customs, for example, there were some 70 million entries, and as I recall the figures—and my colleague could expand on them—there were seven writs of assistance used, which shows that they are used only after the most careful administrative screening as to whether they should in fact be used.

AGRICULTURE

DAIRYING—SUGGESTION POLICY BE MODIFIED SO PAYMENTS TO PRODUCERS RETROACTIVE TO APRIL 1976

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture.

In view of the exacerbation of manufacturing milk producers, especially in Quebec, as a result of the dairy policy announced by the minister last year and considering the disastrous weather experienced in Europe during the summer, can the minister say whether the 20 per cent lower quotas for manufacturing milk producers has proved satisfactory? In other words, can he say at this time of the year whether he or his government intend to alter that policy and consequently make payments to producers retroactive to April last?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has made many statements about the dairy policy for last year. The quota cut-back in the province of Quebec was decided upon by its own marketing board, and that board decided what percentage it should be. The administration of the quota is the responsibility of each provincial board, not mine, and if any debate took place in Quebec, I do not deserve 100 per cent of the blame because we did not have that problem in other parts of Canada. The quota was administered by the federal government in the same way with regard to each province. In so far as Europe is concerned their problem has been compounded, but in Canada the problem has been lessened because we have less surplus stocks on hand now than we did last year.

At the beginning of April when the new dairy year starts we will have about 100 million pounds of skim milk powder and about 10 million pounds of butter. Last year we had 300 million pounds of skimmed milk powder and 47 million pounds of surplus butter, so we will have a manageable surplus. The dairy program for this year will be announced soon, and again I think it will be one of the best in the world because our industrial milk producers are the best in the world and the best paid in the world.

SUGGESTION CONTROL OVER MILK BE TRANSFERRED TO PROVINCIAL JURISDICTION

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, the minister answers that the Quebec federation of milk producers is responsible for such conditions. I would like to point out that they accepted that reduction as a result of pressure by the minister and the Canadian Dairy Commission. This being so, considering the discrimination which seems to exist between Quebec and other provinces in that field, would the minister agree to let the production of manufacturing of raw milk come exclusively from now under the jurisdiction of the provinces?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Generally the producers think that all production of milk, and especially industrial milk, that is distributed across provincial borders or that is exported, should be a federal responsibility. Some are even suggesting that all milk production should be under one authority so that any unfairness or inequity that exists could be eradicated in that fashion. I am saying that these are some of the views that have been expressed to me. Again, I say that the distribution of quotas within a province is under the jurisdiction of the provincial marketing boards. I do not distribute quotas to them. We asked for a 5 per cent increase in production for the dairy year and in the dairy year 1975-76 we ended up with approximately a 14 per cent increase, a surplus that was not asked for and for which there was no money or market.

Oral Questions

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONER—POSSIBILITY OF CHANGE IN PROCEDURE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Solicitor General the following question. In light of the tradition of the RCMP and its basic jurisdiction in dealing with one of Canada's major social problems, namely crime, is it the intention of the minister, and indeed of the government, to change that tradition and precedent by appointing an RCMP commissioner, when commissioner N. J. Nadon retires, from sources other than the training ranks of the RCMP who have learned by serving in one, some or all of the 38 subdivisions and 686 detachments of that force?

Mr. Basford: How about yourself?

[Translation]

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I think that the press release issued in this respect by the Prime Minister about two weeks ago was very eloquent and clearly explained the situation. The Prime Minister established a committee which will recommend appointments and the committee's terms of reference are to find the best person to direct the RCMP. Obviously it goes without saying that persons already within the RCMP will be also considered. I should also add, Mr. Speaker, that notwithstanding what my hon. colleague has to say, it is not the first time that such a thing has happened. A committee was already established for the same purpose. To my knowledge, two previous commissioners came from outside the RCMP.

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: The Prime Minister might be eloquent, but I am not sure that he is not trying to destroy the RCMP.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: Does the minister not consider that the person who replaces commissioner N. J. Nadon when he retires should be from the ranks of the RCMP who have received training from one, some or all of the 38 subdivisions and 686 detachments, particularly at a time when crime in Canada is escalating and Canadians are looking for more control over crime?

[Translation]

Mr. Fox: Obviously, Mr. Speaker, there are excellent candidates within the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who will be considered before this appointment is made. Instead of discrediting the RCMP, Mr. Speaker, I think my colleague should have a look on his side of the House and consider the rather foolish accusations which were recently made against the RCMP.

ENERGY

MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NO AGREEMENT WITH UNITED STATES ON CONSTRUCTION

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and it arises from reports emanating from what appear to be high sources in Washington that an agreement or understanding has been reached between Canada and the United States about the construction of a pipeline down the Mackenzie Valley. Can the minister assure the House and the country that no understanding of any sort, either oral or written, has been reached with the United States government at any level with respect to the construction of the pipeline at this time?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Gillies: Again I direct my question to the minister. Can he once again assure the House and country that no discussions will take place with the United States at any level with respect to the construction of a pipeline down the Mackenzie Valley until the report of the National Energy Board and the report of the Berger commission are made public?

Mr. Gillespie: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Gillies: Why not?

Mr. Gillespie: I would have thought that the hon. member would have known that for something as large and complicated as a pipeline system which has to be worked into a legislative time frame in the U.S. and be conditioned by our own legislative bodies and the National Energy Board, it would be prudent for Canadians at all levels, officials, ministers and, very likely, first ministers, presidents and prime ministers, to discuss some of the important implications of building or not building a pipeline.

Mr. Gillies: My question was not about discussions but about decisions and commitments. That is what I am interested in knowing.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

PRELIMINARY REPORT ON DOME CANMAR DRILLING IN BEAUFORT SEA—DATE AND POSSIBLE TABLING OF FINAL REPORT

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and it relates to a document just received which calls itself a preliminary report on Dome Canmar drilling in the Beaufort sea prepared by the Arctic Waters Oil and Gas Advisory Committee in three volumes, namely, the social and economic assessment, the technical assessment, and the environmental assessment. In view of the fact that last week I was told by the minister that the same report—if this is the same report—was not due for some weeks, will the minister say exactly what status this preliminary report has and whether he will table it in the House so that parliament and the people of Canada may have the opportunity of examining this report and comparing it to the final report which presumably will follow?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I will check into that. I was told that the report would be issued only in one months' time. I do not know what the hon. member has in his hands. I will have to see it.

DATE OF PUBLICATION OF REGULATIONS GOVERNING EXPLORATION FOR GAS AND OIL IN THE NORTH

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): In light of the fact that the report which, quite frankly, is very complimentary to Dome Canmar in terms of their operations last summer, clearly indicates that oil and gas development, if effectively planned and regulated, can work to the advantage of northern communities while having a minimal impact on the environment, will the minister tell the House when the proposed oil and gas regulations, which have been some seven years in gestation, will appear, and when they appear, will they go beyond the financial regulations mentioned in the May, 1976 statement and include a comprehensive environmental protection regime?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): With respect to the oil and gas regulations, I am reviewing them right now. As a matter of fact, I was working on them over the weekend and they should be out soon, but I cannot give the exact date. With respect to the report, or alleged report, referred to by the hon. member, I can only say that our final decision will be based on the information we have received at the end of the exercise, and as far as I am concerned, the exercise is not yet finished. I do not know to what exactly the hon. member was referring.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

POSSIBILITY OF MEASURES FOR POST-CONTROL PERIOD

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question of the Minister of Labour, but since he is absent, I shall direct it to his parliamentary secretary.

We know that the finance ministers have discussed the economic aspects of eventual measures preparing the end of the controls. So what is the Minister of Labour doing with respect to the effects of the post-control measures on labour agreements?

Mr. Jacques Olivier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): The Minister of Labour has had discussions with labour unions and some directors of companies, which is a first step. The conference which will take place tomorrow morning with all the provincial labour ministers is extremely important and will prepare the second step. We want to enter into a new era of progress and consultation between unions and all economic agents throughout Canada, to reduce the number of conflicts arising now between unions and employers.

HARBOURS

PROPOSED OIL TERMINAL FOR KITIMAT PIPELINE—POSSIBILITY OF AGREEMENT WITH BRITISH COLUMBIA ON CONSTRUCTION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question concerns the proposed Kitimat pipeline and since this matter comes under three ministers I will direct my question to the Minister of Transport, in view of the fact that I assume he is responsible for the marine facilities for transferring oil from the supertankers to the proposed pipeline. In view of the fact that the government of British Columbia has some constitutional authority, particularly with respect to these facilities which are above the high water mark, I should like to ask the minister if there have been any discussions with the government of British Columbia with respect to this matter and whether they have given their agreement to proceeding with the proposal in the event it is approved by the National Energy Board and the cabinet?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there have been preliminary discussions with British Columbia government officials but certainly there is no question at this time of a blank cheque approval of any sort. Our position is that much further examination has to take place and an assessment made of the proposals themselves. This process is going on. I do not think anyone would want to make a judgment until all of that is in.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister if he considers it will be necessary to have the agreement of the government of British Columbia prior to such project being approved or does this government feel it can proceed without the approval and agreement of the province of British Columbia?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I would hesitate to answer such an obviously hypothetical question because I could not envisage all the circumstances and the exact nature of the expression of opinion by that government. I can say we have been developing an extremely good working relationship with British Columbia and I would look forward to the two governments agreeing fully on whatever has to be done.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

KITIMAT PIPELINE—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NO DECISION ON CONSTRUCTION UNTIL PUBLIC HEARINGS HELD

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment regarding the hope he expressed the other day that there would be public hearings with respect to the proposal for the Kitimat pipeline. May I ask the minister now when such hearings will be held, in what areas they will be held and for an assurance that no final decision will be made until those public hearings have been held and all who wish to are given an opportunity to express their views?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, what was a hope is a decision. The cabinet has decided public hearings should be held—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): —on the seaward or the terminal aspect of this project. The National Energy Board hearings obviously are another matter. I indicated when I was in British Columbia last week that the hearings would be held in that province and in more than one area of the province obviously. The exact type of hearings and their parameters are the subject of discussion between my colleagues and myself. We want to make sure that we have the best type of person to head these hearings. In fact, the gathering of technical data required before a hearing could take place takes us to roughly late April; that is the most optimistic prognosis. When all is said and done, public hearings on that issue could not be held before all the technical data and the assessments are accumulated and made available so that the discussion could be a well-informed one.

TRANSPORT

APPOINTMENT AND TERMS OF REFERENCE OF COMMISSION TO STUDY PROBLEMS IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the continuing transportation problems in the province of Newfoundland, has the minister made a decision on the appointment of a commission to look into those problems and if so what are the terms of reference and the make-up of the commission?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we have confirmed that we are happy indeed to join in the appointment of a commission and we are still looking to finalize certain details in relation to it with the government of Newfoundland. We therefore have nothing to announce about the appointment of the commission at this time.

Oral Questions

HIGHWAY CONSTRUCTION IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. On the broader question of transportation in the Atlantic region, would the minister indicate, as a result of his meeting with the Atlantic region transportation ministers, what progress is being made with regard to the great need for strengthening highway programs in the Atlantic region, particularly in view of the deterioration of the highways of the province of Newfoundland so necessary to economic development?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as the communiqué following our meeting indicated, there was agreement in principle with the general idea that certain moneys which otherwise would have been spent in the Atlantic region in relation to certain programs—and where it was agreed that those moneys were not particularly serving their original purposes of promoting development—that they would be diverted toward such matters as a highway strengthening program. That agreement in principle will be worked out in detail in the next weeks in terms of concrete actions and proposals and programs.

CITIZENSHIP

DELAY IN PROVIDING FORMS TO SIMCOE, ONTARIO—POSSIBILITY SUBCOURTS PHASED OUT

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, my question was for the Secretary of State but in his absence I will address it to the parliamentary secretary. Following the wide publicity given to the proclamation of the new Citizenship Act, large numbers of persons came to make applications under the new act at the citizenship court in Simcoe, Ontario, only to find that no application forms were available. Does this delay by the Department of Secretary of State in forwarding proper forms indicate a phasing out of these so-called subcourts?

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the Department of the Secretary of State has been getting ready for a long time to face a possible increase in the number of applications. I understand that no special long-term backlog is supposed to exist with the plans we have. I did not quite get the last part of the question regarding a possible phaseout of a subcourt. I have never heard of anything of that nature.

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, the subcourt acts in conjunction with the larger citizenship court, such as those in the cities of Hamilton and Brantford, for example. This happened in Simcoe which is under them, so to speak. Will the minister undertake a review of the excellent work being done by this type of court, presided over by county court judges, with a view to providing sufficient clerical staff at least on a part-time basis?

[Mr. Lang.]

Mr. Guilbault: Mr. Speaker, additional staff has been trained and should remain available in the location mentioned by the hon. member.

HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS

POLYCHLORIDE AND POLYSTYRENE—REASON FOR VOLUNTARY RATHER THAN COMPULSORY REGULATIONS GOVERNING USE

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs involves polychloride and polystyrene plastics. The former minister informed the House on two or three occasions that we could expect a firm set of regulations involving these fire hazard plastics which police chiefs across Canada and Department of Public Works officials have said are very, very hazardous. Can the minister inform the House why he has chosen to take the voluntary compliance route as opposed to a strict set of regulations, and is he satisfied that the plastic companies now involved are voluntarily complying with these standards to the extent they would if there were a serious set of regulations for these highly dangerous and inflammable substances which can cause death and destruction?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to be able to answer the hon. member in an informed way but I am afraid I am going to have to check on this unless he can give me more details.

Mr. Grafftey: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister's department is one concerned with many details and this is the fifth successive time the minister has answered me in such a way. This is not a detailed problem, it is a very serious problem that the minister has been informed of on many occasions. Can he tell the House why he has told me and the industries that instead or regulations they are going to have voluntary compliances?

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, I can answer the hon. member in accordance with the material I have but I thought he could raise a more specific point. The department has been working with the Canadian plastics industry to develop labelling procedures and all the other procedures that will warn people that where there is foam insulation it should be covered with an adequate thermal barrier such as half inch plastic board. I am reading this very useful résumé. I should like to be able to bring to the hon. member a precise answer to his question which is whether we can involve voluntary procedures or regulations. At this stage, I cannot give him an answer.

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Has the minister been able to reply to the brief on feed freight assistance for British Columbia, presented to him by the British Columbia Federation of Agriculture?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we met with the British Columbia Federation of Agriculture and discussed that item. The question of feed freight assistance is being considered. The Canadian Livestock Feed Board should be submitting a formal report to me shortly. It may be in my office now—I have not checked in the last couple of days.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

POSSIBILITY OF BRITISH COLUMBIA SHIPYARDS BUILDING NEW VESSELS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the minister's statement, as reported in Hansard, page 3138, to the effect that the program for Canadian coastguard search and rescue facilities will be put in place, will the minister advise when our empty shipyards will be given the opportunity to build the three 232-foot cutters and the fourteen 65-foot rescue vessels which were announced during the May, 1976 hearings in Vancouver?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the particular vessels are no longer involved in exactly that way in the program. The decisions to build particular vessels will be taken in due course. At the moment, as I indicated to the hon. member, we have discovered that a good deal of additional search and rescue time can be provided by giving that task to existing government vessels and having them in operation much longer hours than hitherto. That permits them to accommodate both search and rescue and other tasks, such as fishery tasks and surveillance, which they have to do. This has meant that we have been able to provide a good deal more search and rescue capability, with a maximum advantage for every taxpayer dollar spent.

Mr. Brisco: You mean, every American tax dollar.

Mr. Huntington: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the minister would explain his answer as reported on page 3138 of Hansard. Answering my question, he said that the program which was announced in May, 1976 at the transport committee hearings in Vancouver would be put into place. I did not understand his answer today.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I said that the program which the government has announced is to be put into place and that that will involve the addition of vessels, as they are required and as they were envisaged in the course of the program. The absence of immediate construction of all vessels must be considered in the light of a good deal of additional vessel time being available as a result of the longer-hour tasking of existing vessels.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REASON FRENCH NETWORK IN QUEBEC NOT BROADCASTING PRIME MINISTER'S ADDRESS TO UNITED STATES CONGRESS

Mr. Frank Maine (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. In his absence, may I direct it to the parliamentary secretary? It has been brought to my attention that the CBC's French network in Quebec will not be broadcasting the Prime Minister's address to the joint session of the United States Senate and Congress tomorrow.

Mr. Paproski: Too bad.

Mr. Maine: Will the Secretary of State inquire of the CBC why a news item of such national and international importance does not merit the attention of Canadian citizens in the province of Quebec?

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF MAINTENANCE OF SERVICE AND NO LAY-OFFS IN NEWFOUNDLAND PENDING COMMISSION REPORT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Transport? Earlier in the question period he referred to the pending appointment of a royal commission for the province of Newfoundland which is to look into CN operations in that province. Has the minister held discussions with the president of Canadian National, to determine if there is an undertaking by CN to maintain its level of services during the course of this inquiry and if there is a further undertaking to the effect that there will be no more lay-offs until the commission of inquiry reports?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make it clear that we are talking about a commission which will look into transportation matters generally, and not look simply into matters relating to Canadian National. The question of Canadian National's activities in Newfoundland during the period of the existence of the commission has been very much a matter of discussion in connection with its development. I expect to have an expression indicating the position which Canadian National will take, an expression which I think will be of benefit to the atmosphere surrounding the commission's deliberations.

FISHERIES

SURVEILLANCE OF 200-MILE ZONE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. Since Captain Symes of the trawler Cape John is publicly reported as saying that Canada has had no surveillance capability on Hamilton Bank since the beginning of this year other than aircraft on a fine day—and fine days have been few and far between—and since this has resulted in some 58 foreign trawlers using small mesh trawl, grinding up thousands of small fish into fish meal, will the minister inform the House if Canada intends to assume control of its fisheries resources within the 200-mile zone and, if so, when will the minister begin adequate ship surveillance in the north and the Gulf of St. Lawrence, surveillance which depends on the use of ship-based inspection officers?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I certainly would not agree with the statement attributed to the captain whom the hon. member quoted. I saw that press article during the weekend but have not had a chance to check those allegations. Frankly, I doubt some of the assertions in the article but will not quibble before I have checked the facts. I will give the hon. member full information.

STUDY OF FISH STOCKS IN GULF OF ST. LAWRENCE—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister has promised the so-called Gulf of St. Lawrence project which was to provide figures on the interdependence of fish stocks, distribution of stocks at any given time as well as where they spawn and when, but the project was never undertaken. Since this is the type of information the government and industry require before quotas on any species can be allocated, when does the minister plan to proceed with his promised Gulf of St. Lawrence project and stop scuttling his own management scheme?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the Gulf of St. Lawrence is one of the best fishing areas known to us, but there is still some research to do, as there is in every other fishery of this country. We are trying to establish the priorities where they belong. We need proper knowledge based on proper research in order to manage our resources. We have information about the redfish fishery of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, which is in most serious danger. We have full information and have been in possession of it since 1973. At that time we indicated to the industry that by the end of 1975 we would be running into serious trouble in the Gulf of St. Lawrence with respect to redfish.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we have some very good assistant deputy ministers. One of them, Mr. Jarvis, is acting deputy minister and, as well, we have a very good Minister of Agriculture.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is addressed to the Acting Prime Minister, can the Acting Prime Minister give some assurance that the new deputy minister of agriculture will at least be familiar with agriculture, so that we do not repeat the sort of previous unfortunate appointment.

PROPOSAL TO INCREASE DISABILITY PENSION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Privy Council. I am sure all of us in this House regret the illness of the Minister of Veterans Affairs, an illness which is responsible for his continuing absence. We hope that his health will soon be fully restored. In the meantime some pressing questions have to be dealt with, and I should like to address one of them to the government House leader today. Since the rate of the 100 per cent war disability pension which was established in 1972 in relation to the composite of five public service groups has now fallen behind that composite rate by more than $500 a year, will the government look into this matter and bring in legislation to close the gap, in fairness to our disabled war veterans?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate on behalf of the Minister of Veterans Affairs the comments the member made about the minister, especially his hope for a quick recovery. If I may answer the point about the relationship of the disability pension to the composite index, I will be happy to look into the question and see what can be done.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NEW COMMISSIONER APPOINTED FROM WITHIN RANKS

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Since the majority of problems in our penitentiary system have been caused by the appointment of people with no previous service, will the minister assure the House that the new commissioner of the RCMP will be appointed from within that service?

[Translation]

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have already replied to the questions of the hon. member's colleague. I repeat, the press release of the Prime Minister replies to questions such as these and I have nothing to add to the replies I made to his colleague a few minutes ago.

DAIRY POLICY ADVOCATED DURING GATT NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to that of the hon. member who asked about dairy policy. I could direct it to the Minister of Finance but will direct it to the Minister of Agriculture, in the hope he has provided some input with respect to this policy. Since agriculture is an important component in the Tokyo round of talks now being held in Geneva in connection with the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, will the minister indicate what position with respect to dairy policy he has advocated to our officials when they talk with officials of other countries during the GATT round of negotiations?

● (1500)

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it would not be proper for me to say exactly what instructions our people have been given. However, they are taking an active part. After having met with the provincial people to discuss the position we should take, they will then be discussing along this plain.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is very simple. Will Canada's position be to advocate more control over imports of dairy products into Canada or to not advocate greater control over imports of dairy products into Canada?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, our program will not be changed very much. Never in our history has there been more control over dairy products than since we instigated the Canadian Dairy Commission. We will not be changing that attitude.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if I might ask the government House leader to let us know what he has in mind for tomorrow and subsequent days as far as government business is concerned.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, hopefully we will complete second reading of the fiscal relations bill today. Tomorrow we will start with the National Transportation Act amendments. Wednesday has been designated as an allotted day.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, in the event that we do not complete Bill C-37, the federal-provincial fiscal bill—and that is a very distinct possibility—will the government's order of business change? Will the government House leader address himself to that question?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we will carry on with that bill tomorrow, in the unlikely event it does not pass today.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the point of order that has just been raised, may I ask a supplementary question? If we do finish the item that is before us today, and have to take something else tomorrow, is it not a fact there was some discussion as to whether we would take Bill C-33, the National Transportation Act, or Bill C-17 having to do with Air Canada? The last word I had was that we would proceed with the Air Canada bill.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I always relate my decision to call the Air Canada bill to some clear understanding as to how much time it will take. If we had some understanding that the Air Canada bill could pass relatively quickly, I would be ready to call it before the National Transportation Act. However, if that is not the case, I would give a higher priority to getting a start on the National Transportation Act.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It would be better to call the human rights bill.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): With regard to the government House leader's announcement concerning the possibility of the National Transportation Act being debated as early as tomorrow, may I ask whether the House leader has made arrangements with the Minister of Transport to table, before the debate begins on second reading, the proposed amendments that apparently were agreed to by the Minister of Transport and the four Atlantic governments a couple of weeks ago so that there can be a full understanding of the nature of these amendments to the National Transportation Act when we have the second reading debate?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker, I have not had any such consultations up to the present time.

ESTIMATES

REFERENCE OF CERTAIN ESTIMATES TO STANDING COMMITTEES

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 59(1), I move, seconded by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald):

That the estimates of sums required for the service of Canada for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1978, be referred to the several Standing Committees of the House, as follows—

A copy of the detailed outline of the estimates and their destination has been circulated. It is, I believe, identical to the motion adopted last session. I would, therefore, beg the indulgence of the House to be spared reading this long list.

Mr. Speaker: If it is correct, the copies have been distributed to all the parties. If there is no objection, rather than reading—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, we have the assurance of the House leader that the motion is in the traditional form. If not, will he point out to us at this time any significant departures? I believe that would be satisfactory.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Agreed.

[Editor's Note: The motion referred to is as follows:]

MALTON AIRPORT

Question No. 838—Mr. Horner:

1. What amount is being spent to improve the facilities at Malton Airport?

2. What is the cost for each specific improvement?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): 1. $115,503,000, Total estimated cost.

2. Land developments and improvements Phase I, $1,251,000; Airfield, $1,425,000; Terminal No. 1 Phase I, $15,484,000; Terminal No. 2 Stage III, Phase I, $35,063,000; Utilities Phase I, $6,993,00; Roads and Parking Phase I, $44,766,000; Unapplied common construction costs, $2,146,000; Recoverable capital costs Phase I, $2,859,000; Energy Recovery System $3,980,000; Instal key card door control system, $400,000; Remedial repairs to parking structure, $525,000; Improve security facilities $611,000; Total $115,503,000.

APPEALS CONCERNING DESIGNATION OF A POSITION AS BILINGUAL

Question No. 1,005—Mr. Howie:

What persons can appeal the designation of a position in the Public Service as bilingual and when such a position is vacant, can anyone appeal?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of Treasury Board): The Treasury Board secretariat is responsible for the designation of positions as bilingual, in co-operation with representatives of departments and agencies for which the Treasury Board is the employer, and in consultation with representatives of the bargaining agents where appropriate. Unilingual incumbents of positions designated bilingual may elect to become bilingual and undertake language training, or transfer to another job having the same salary maximum, or, if they were to decline such a transfer, to remain in their positions even though designated as bilingual. With regard to vacant positions, however, according to section 21 of the Public Service Employment Act, an appeal can be put forward where there is a staffing action for a position but only by persons directly affected by the appointment. No other specific reason is set out by the act.

Order Paper Questions

MOUNTAIN CLIMBING IN NATIONAL PARKS

Question No. 1,170—Mr. Yewchuk:

Are any conditions placed on mountain or rock climbing activities in the (a) Kluane (b) Nahanni (c) Yoho (d) Banff (e) Jasper (f) Waterton (g) Auyuittuq (h) Forillon National Park and, if so, what are they?

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): (a) to (f) Section 23 of the National Parks General Regulations stipulates that climbers must check in and out with the park warden service when attempting a climb of any difficulty. (g) Auyuittuq National Park—The conditions imposed are as follows: (1) All climbers must be registered; visitors must sign in, indicate their itinerary, the length of time anticipated and so on. (2) During the summer, two guards are kept on duty at Pangnirtung Pass to check on comings and goings of visitors and to provide aid and assistance if necessary. (3) All equipment is inspected. (h) Forillon National Park—There are no mountain or rock climbing activities here because of the poor quality of rock.

CNR INVESTMENT IN CAST GROUP OF COMPANIES

Question No. 1,248—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Has a return on the money invested by Canadian National Railways in the CAST group of companies been realized and, if so, in each case, has the return been paid to CN and (a) if so, in what form (b) if not, for what reason?

2. What has been the percentage return on investment in each company and what has been the total dollar amount (a) earned (b) paid to CN?

3. Has the money earned been reinvested in the CAST group and, if so, has this been approved by the (a) CN Board of Directors (b) President of CN (c) Cabinet?

4. Has the CN equity in the CAST group been used to finance any new ventures by the CAST group and (a) if so, what is the nature of such ventures (b) if not, are any such ventures contemplated in the immediate future and what is their nature?

5. Can or does the CN intend to withdraw its money from the CAST group in the foreseeable future and, if not, for what reason?

6. For each CAST company, by office and/or title, what are the names of the CN personnel who hold offices?

7. What is the rationale for the investment of CN money in the CAST group?

8. Were CN personnel in their capacity as officers/directors of CAST companies involved in the recent decision of the CAST group to commence a container service between Montreal and Manchester/Liverpool?

9. Did CN personnel involved in this decision concur with this decision and, if so, are they aware of the potential competitive damage which may be done to other carriers serving the Canada/UK trade?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: 1. (a) and (b) CN, as a shareholder of CAST, has not received, to date, a direct return on its investment, since no dividend has been declared in respect to profits earned by CAST in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1976. However, indirect benefits have accrued to CN from the enhancement of its equity and from the inland handling of CAST traffic.

2. (a) and (b) The direct percentage return on investment received by CN is nil.

3. (a), (b) and (c) No additional investment in the CAST group of companies has been made by CN.

4. (a) and (b) Funds received from CN's purchase of equity in the CAST group were used to finance, in part, a special portfolio investment by that group in shares of Manchester Liners Limited and of Furness, Withy and Company, Limited.

5. CN does not have such a right or intention.

6. No CN personnel holds an office in any company within the CAST group. Mr. R. A. Bandeen, President of CN, representing CN shareholdings in CAST, is a director of Intercast, S.A. and of Eurocanadian Shipholdings Limited.

7. CN regards its equity in the CAST group as being a prudent financial investment and as one made in an organization that engages in business activities which are related to and capable of benefiting the conduct of CN's own undertaking.

8 and 9. As director, Mr. R. A. Bandeen concurred in a decision of CAST directors approving the proposed addition of Liverpool as a port of call to the Transatlantic container services offered by CAST. The recommendation was considered from the viewpoints of a director, as referred to in paragraph 6, and as affording to the public the option of an additional competitive shipping service.

FRENCH WINE TRANSPORTATION BY AIR CANADA

Question No. 1,414—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Was any French wine recently transported free of charge from France to Canada by Air Canada and, if so (a) what was the date, point of origin and departure (b) who owned the goods involved (c) what is the name and address of those to whom it was shipped (d) what would have been the cost had Air Canada charged for the shipment?

2. Have there been other occasions since January 1, 1972 when Air Canada on any of its flights carried freight or express items free of charge and, if so, in each case (a) what was the date, point of origin and destination (b) what was the nature of the goods involved and the estimated value (c) what would have been the cost if Air Canada had charged for the shipment (d) who owned the goods involved and what is the name and address of those to whom they were shipped (e) what is the total value of all goods shipped free by Air Canada since January 1, 1972?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The management of Air Canada advises as follows: 1. Yes. For promotional purposes in accordance with company and Canadian Transport Commission regulations. a) November 16, 1976. Paris, France. (b) and c) English-Gunn Limited, 87 Front Street East, Toronto, Canada M5E 1B8 d) $812.50.

2. Air Canada constantly seeks to promote and develop the movement of people and commodities. In order to do so, the airline sometimes provides a certain amount of free transportation, drawn from a closely controlled allotment and in accordance with Canadian Transportation Commission regulations. In addition, Air Canada frequently provides assistance during times of national or international disasters, such as shipping emergency medical and other supplies to earthquake victims in Guatemala and airlifting supplies of processed food to Bangladesh. Also, the airline assists such organizations as the Red Cross and the Canadian Cancer Society on a continuing basis. However, a list of all occasions since January 1, 1972, that Air Canada shipped goods free of charge is not easily available and it would take an inordinate amount of clerical time and cost to search for and obtain this and other requested information.

INDUSTRIAL POSTDOCTORATE FELLOWSHIP PROGRAMME

Question No. 1,496—Mr. Herbert:

1. In each of the past five years, how much has been granted to businesses through the Industrial Postdoctorate Fellowship Programme towards the salary of newly hired Ph.Ds.?

2. Is such assistance restricted to the hiring of Canadian citizens?

3. Is such assistance available to foreign controlled corporations?

4. Is there any monitoring programme of those hired with subsidy to establish the length of time employed by the company receiving the subsidy?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of State for Science and Technology): In so far as th[illegible]tional Research Council of Canada is concerned, the [illegible]s as follows: 1. 1971-72, $195,000; 1972-73, $418,0[illegible]74, $687,000; 1974-75, $769,000; 1975-76, $771[illegible]

2. Canadian citizens or landed immigrants. Landed immigrants must have received their doctorate degree from a Canadian University.

3. Yes, companies operating in Canada.

4. Yes, monthly payments are made upon receipt of invoices from the company.

ENGLISH LANGUAGE TRANSMITTERS TO SERVICE COW HEAD, PORT SAUNDERS, HAWKES BAY, PORTLAND CREEK AND TROUT RIVER

Question No. 1,503—Mr. Marshall:

1. Has CBC applied to CRTC under the accelerated coverage plan to install English language television transmitters designed to provide service to areas around Cow Head, Port Saunders, Hawkes Bay, Portland Creek and Trout River, Newfoundland and, if so, on what date are public hearings scheduled?

2. On what date will action be taken for (a) acquisition of land (b) site clearing, road development (c) power line construction, etc. (d) erection of buildings (e) installation of mechanical equipment (f) installation of technical equipment (g) erection of towers (h) erection of antennae (i) erection of transmission lines (j) transmitter equipment, list and ancillary equipment?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. Applications for installations in the Cow Head and Trout River areas were submitted to the CRTC in January 1977. It is expected that applications for installations in the Port Saunders/Hawkes Bay and Portland Creek areas will be submitted in February 1977. No CRTC hearings have yet been scheduled for the Cow Head and Trout River applications.

2. (a) Negotiations are now proceeding to obtain options on the properties selected as transmitter sites; (b), (c), (d), (e), (f), (g), (i), (j). The necessary work will proceed as quickly as possible, subject to CRTC approval, weather conditions and availability of material and equipment.

UIC—FIRST APPLICATIONS

Question No. 1,524—Mr. Laprise:

How many first applications have been submitted to the Unemployment Insurance Commission for the fiscal years (a) 1972-73 (b) 1973-74 (c) 1974-75?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): (a) 2,024,050; (b) 1,983,034; (c) 2,262,213.

ARTICLE ENTITLED "NOVEL FISH ESCALATOR PROVES SUCCESSFUL"

Question No. 1,610—Mr. Beatty:

Is the author of the article entitled "Novel Fish Escalator Proves Successful" published in the January, 1977 issue of the Department of Supply and Services' R and D Bulletin still in the Department's employ and, if so (a) is a future article planned to elaborate on the quotation attributed to the president of the company marketing the fish ladder in which he states that it is being marketed in the United States because "... it has tremendous potential there with so many rivers being damned" (b) was the author able to determine from his research by whom and for what reason so many rivers are "being damned"?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): See Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, 4th Edition, Citation 171 (a) and (b).

MEASURES TO REDUCE BACKHAULS AND IMPROVE CAR UTILIZATION IN SASKATCHEWAN

Question No. 1,686—Mr. Neil:

Has the Minister of Transport requested CN and CP rail to implement measures in Saskatchewan to reduce backhauls and improve car utilization similar to Alberta, as stated in his news release of December 31, 1976?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Some grain originating at points in Saskatchewan is already affected by the reciprocal agreement and is thus benefiting from more direct routing. I have not formally requested the railways to implement measures to reduce backhauls although both CN and CP know my feelings on the subject. The Canadian Transport Commission has been acting as an intermediary with the railways and I have requested the CTC to look at extending the concept wherever applicable in the prairies. I have specifically requested the CTC to look at improving grain flows to Churchill. Such an improvement would help to reduce unnecessary car mileage, particularly in Saskatchewan.

*RIDEAU RIVER—SPRING FLOODING

Question No. 1,461—Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton):

1. Will additional measures be taken this winter to reduce the possibility of spring flooding from the Rideau River and, if so, what are they?

2. Did the Rideau Canal Authority make a verbal commitment to lower the water level an additional two feet between freshet and, if so, on what date will it do so?

3. In the section of the River from Burritts Rapids to Long Island is the River and the Rideau Canal the same and, if so, is it Parks Canada's view that the responsibility for ice jam clearance is a municipal matter only?

4. Has Parks Canada sought a legal opinion on jurisdiction in this area and, if so, with what result?

[English]

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the answer is as follows: 1. Yes. The reach above Long Island is being closely monitored since February 1. This involves reading additional water gauges at Beckett's Landing and Kars Bridge to better predict the onset of the spring freshet. Location and behavior of any ice jams that may occur will be observed. An independent consulting company has been retained by Parks Canada, Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, to refine runoff indicators and dam operating procedures. This work will involve additional snow surveys.

2. Yes. This will be done when indicated by runoff conditions on the basis of the hydrological study now underway.

3. (a) yes, (b) yes, but Parks Canada would assist in this work by control of water levels and flows.

4. Yes. The bed of the river is considered vested in Canada by the Rideau Canal Act of 1827, the BNA Act of 1867 et al.

*RIDEAU RIVER—SPRING FLOODING

Question No. 1,462—Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton):

With reference to the answer to Question No. 511, Part 5(c), at what points in this stretch of the River is the natural configuration a problem?

[English]

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the flat terrain, the number of sharp bends and the several narrow sections are natural restrictions to river flow. An example is the Narrows near Manotick Marina.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING ACT, 1977

MEASURE FOR MAKING CERTAIN FISCAL PAYMENTS AND OF ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING CONTRIBUTIONS TO PROVINCES, ETC.

The House resumed, from Friday, February 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that Bill C-37, to provide for the making of certain fiscal payments and of established programs financing contributions to provinces, to provide for payments in respect of certain provincial taxes and fees, and to make consequential and related amendments, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

● (1510)

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the legislation before us is entitled the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Established Programs Financing Act, 1977. But we should not be deceived by that description. For the bill which bears this convoluted label—a label which surely could only capture the imagination of actuaries and chartered accountants—in reality constitutes the latest in a series of major fiscal overhauls to our federal system. Legislation of such importance and such complexity as Bill C-37, coming as it does at this critical time in our nation's history, demands of each of us the most careful and responsible analysis. In so doing, we should recognize the interdependence of all parts of this bill when discussing its over-all impact.

What is not useful at this time is a distorted interpretation of the bill for partisan purposes, twisting it out of shape to demonstrate either that it is a panacea for the ills of confederation, or that it is an unmitigated disaster. We were treated to that kind of interpretation of the arrangements before us by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) immediately following the first ministers' conference last December. We were treated to the same kind of irresponsible analysis by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) last Friday when he chose to ignore everything in the bill but the impact of the transfer of tax points to the provinces. Such selectivity in the reading of this legislation is hardly conducive to the strengthening of federalism, particularly at a time when partisan considerations must be subordinate to the cause of national unity.

As I said, this bill is an important one. We should give it the same attention that we would expect to give to a package of constitutional amendments or the major policies enunciated by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) in his budget. The measures incorporated in this bill are an integral part of the framework under which Canada will be governed in the next five years. Moreover, in dollar terms we are talking about a fiscal transfer to the provinces during the next fiscal year in excess of $8 billion, or, to put it another way, a sum roughly equal to the 1965 federal budget.

What is even more important than the breathtaking sums of money involved is the fact that this bill represents federalism at work. It is a product of some ten months of difficult and often acrimonious negotiations between the federal government and the provincial governments. One would have wished that less acrimony had developed. As I will later explain, I am convinced that much of it was needless. It could have been avoided by a more astute and sensitive approach on the part of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance. But putting that aside for a moment, the bill does represent a consensus which all parties involved in the negotiations concluded they could live with. It does continue to provide funding for four vital national programs: revenue equalization, hospital insurance, medicare, and post-secondary education. It preserves our national taxation system. It continues the representative tax approach to revenue equalization and it embodies elements of the equalization principle in its provisions for financing so-called established programs. These features will commend it to all fair-minded Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, while I have expressed in this chamber on earlier occasions my concern about the erosion of parliament's power through the proliferation of federal-provincial conferences, nevertheless I recognize the principle that what a federal-provincial conference has joined together, parliament should not capriciously rend asunder. We believe that Bill C-37 contains sufficient merit to enable that principle to be applied to it.

Certainly, when I recall the original proposals of the Minister of Finance to his provincial colleagues last April, I am only too well aware that the outcome could have been much worse. Indeed, had the minister stuck to the guns he unveiled in that speech, had he insisted on doing away with the representative tax system and destroying the whole concept of revenue equalization by tying it to the growth of the GNP, we would have had before us today a settlement arbitrarily imposed on the provinces, rather than one they were able to accept with a greater or lesser degree of reluctance.

My colleagues and I do have reservations about the bill. We see in it errors both of commission and omission, and we want to make it very clear at the outset that if we find injustices and inequities arising from this agreement—as could well be the case—we fully reserve the right to enter into new negotiations with the provinces as provided for in the bill. This legislation involves elements of experimentation: elements which may work hardships or prove to be impractical. Since that possibility exists, a significant factor in our decision to support this bill is the fact that it is limited to a term of five years.

Having said that, let me spell out the reservations that we have as to the substance of the bill. We are concerned that the projections as to what the provinces will receive from the tax points transfer and in cash payments under the established programs financing arrangements are based on a single set of arbitrary assumptions about the rates of inflation, real economic growth and tax yields during the next five years. If a new inflationary spiral, a cyclical boom, or continued recession should be our lot during those years, the fiscal resources available to the provinces could be dramatically greater or less than what was anticipated. Such fluctuations could make the results of these financial arrangements either equitable or inequitable. For that reason, alternative projections based on a wide range of possible economic trends should have been available for consideration during the bargaining. Had that occurred, a more informed judgment could have been made by all concerned as to the impact of the arrangements in economic circumstances other than the reasonably stable one used in compiling the single projection the minister felt obliged to provide to the provinces.

One of the main purposes of the newly established programs financing arrangements is to give the provinces more flexibility by substituting a block grant of tax points and cash payments for the previous cost-sharing arrangements which made federal funds available only for specified items of expenditures. But the established programs financing arrangements do not stand alone; they are part of a total package. The flexibility these arrangements promised is restricted by a number of factors pertaining to the bill. It is restricted, first of all, by the federal government's withdrawal from the revenue guarantee program; a withdrawal for which only partial compensation is provided to the provinces. The net result of that step will be a reduction of approximately $450 million in unconditional grants available to the provinces this year.

I know it is the contention of hon. members opposite that the revenue guarantee was never intended to go beyond the present fiscal year. But anyone who has taken the time to look into the subject with a reasonable degree of objectivity knows that the provinces were led to believe that the revenue guarantee program would continue in some form. That assurance was given them by the former minister of finance who is now waiting in some board room for the call to salvage the wreck of the Liberal party. The value of the revenue guarantee program to the provinces was further diminished by an arbitrary change in the method of calculating the payments.

Now, after reneging on their implied commitment to the provinces and arbitrarily changing the rules of the commitment to which they were legally bound, hon. members on your right, Mr. Speaker, came forward last week and tried to pass off this dubious conduct as part of their restraint program. Moreover, not content with that particular shell-game, they tried to represent tax point transfers to the provinces, which will replace part of the existing cash payments under the new scheme of the established programs financing, as yet another cut in government spending.

I cannot understand, when a real effort has been made in some areas genuinely to restrain government spending, why the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) would needlessly cast doubt on the credibility of his accomplishment by making the ludicrous claim that these bookkeeping adjustments represent real belt-tightening. In this instance, as in so many others, the government seems determined to be its own worst enemy.

As I have said, the withdrawal of the revenue guarantee payments imposed considerable restrictions on provincial flexibility. The ability of the provinces to reorder priorities while maintaining adequate levels of services is further constrained by the fact that the cash portion of the fiscal transfer for established programs will escalate at a rate equal to the growth in per capital gross national product. The principle that the proportion of GNP spent on these programs should remain constant has a degree of merit, but this method of implementing it has the potential, I suggest, in a prolonged period of lean economic growth, of putting considerable pressure on the provinces to cut back on services, or, at best, freeze them at unacceptably low levels. There is scope, of course, for savings by substituting low-cost alternatives for expensive services such as acute hospital care. But that scope is limited. Capable management of the national economy would be the most effective means to deal with that problem, but that kind of management is something we have notably lacked under this administration, particularly since the last election.

That is why I point this out as a danger area which may have to be dealt with by renegotiation in order to ensure that the flexibility acquired in theory is rendered practicable by adequate financing. These danger areas are very real. In December, the Prime Minister, by ignoring the impact of the withdrawal of the revenue guarantee payments, tried to create the impression that the over-all agreement was more than generous to the provinces. On Friday, instead of addressing himself to the real problems of the bill the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby attempted to show that it was a disaster for the poorer provinces by ignoring the mitigating effects of the levelling up and transitional cash payments under the established programs financing arrangements—payments that will counteract the advantage to the richer provinces of the tax transfer. Both the Prime Minister and the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby were, I suggest, less than honest in their presentations.

There is another danger inherent in this bill which I draw to the attention of the House. It is most unclear from the legislation what sort of conditions are going to be imposed on the provinces if they are to receive their cash grants. I note that there are going to be agreements under the hospital insurance act and the medicare act similar to those now in effect, but there is, nonetheless, sufficient latitude in the new arrangements that could eventually result in a situation where services would deteriorate in some parts of the country. At committee stage we shall be insisting on clarification of these conditions and on some guarantee from the federal government that the national standards already attained will continue.

Let me digress for a moment, Mr. Speaker, to make the comment that the GNP escalator seems to me to be a somewhat gratuitous piece of paternalism on the part of the federal government, especially in light of the fact that since 1971 federal transfers to the provinces have declined, as a percentage of federal expenditures, from 28.1 to 25.1, and as a percentage of the GNP from 4.5 to 4.4. During the same period, federal expenditures, exclusive of transfer payments to the provinces, have increased from 13.4 to 16.2 per cent of the gross national product.

I take these figures from the third quarter 1976 national income and expenditure accounts published this month by Statistics Canada—a source, I believe, that will be recognized by the government as authoritative. So let us hear no more of the pretence enunciated by the Minister of Finance last April that this provision—the GNP escalator or cash payments—was needed to check the extravagances of the provinces. Extravagant they may have been in the past in the administration of these programs, but as these figures indicate, since 1971 the provinces have made a real effort to bring these programs under control, an effort that those on the front benches opposite would have done well to imitate in their areas of responsibility.

However, if the federal government is in a mood to exercise leadership, may I suggest to them that they missed an opportunity to do so in a positive and constructive way. The opportunity to which I refer was the failure to explore with the provinces the possibility of an interprovincial agreement to ensure unimpeded mobility between provinces for students seeking post-secondary education. Such portability has always been—and, I am pleased to see, will continue to be—a feature of the hospital insurance and medicare programs. I believe it would be a sound contribution to national unity if the provinces could be brought together to work out an agreement which would prohibit discrimination of any kind either in admission or in fees by universities to Canadian students from any province. The negotiation of the arrangements we have before us provided an excellent opportunity which was allowed to slip by.

But beyond these defects in what the government is proposing, I take very serious exception to the way that this agreement was worked out with the provinces. What was involved in the negotiations that took place? Supposedly, the more effective financing and administration of four vital national programs. That was, and is, a matter of common interest to the federal government and the provincial governments. Yet from the outset the Minister of Finance seemed to feel he had to bludgeon his way through to a settlement. He began the process last April by virtually threatening to impose a settlement on his provincial colleagues with respect to equalization and the revenue guarantee which he knew was patently unacceptable to them.

The predictable effect of this hostile approach was to make the provinces equally adamant concerning their interests. Indeed, by the final stages of the negotiations the Minister of Finance had performed the remarkable feat of uniting the provinces for the first time in memory—but uniting them, I regret to add, against, not with, the government of Canada. Thus, as negotiations proceeded, even though the minister modified his proposals to make them more equitable and acceptable to the provinces, because the atmosphere had already been poisoned no sense of building a workable consensus developed. Rather, the provinces were made to feel that they were wringing essential concessions from the federal government against its will.

One of the most famous of Aesop's fables is that of the competition between the wind and the sun to get a traveller to remove his cloak. Hon. members will remember that the wind tried first. His approach was to blow the traveller's cloak off his back with his strongest blast, but the harder he blew, the more tightly the traveller held on to his cloak. When the sun's turn came, it simply beat down on the traveller, and when he grew warm enough he took the cloak off voluntarily. Throughout these negotiations the Minister of Finance used the tactics of the wind rather than those of the sun.

He did accomplish his purpose; we do have an agreement before us. But had he chosen the sunny way and had he begun by exploring the potential for consensus, rather than immediately polarizing the negotiations into a test of will, I believe he would have reached a settlement sooner, that he would have received more assistance, and less resistance, from the provinces, and that the exercise would have reduced the mistrust and relaxed some of the tensions which have marred federal-provincial relations in recent years.

My leader referred on Friday to the period of creative federalism inaugurated by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and to the co-operative federalism of the late right hon. Lester B. Pearson. Unfortunately, the hallmark of this government will be neither creative nor co-operative, but combative federalism.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: We have a settlement of these arrangements because the will to make federalism work in this country is very strong. It is strong at both the federal and the provincial level. What the present government seems to lack is the belief that that will exists in anybody else other than itself. Feeling that it is surrounded by hostile forces, it goes into negotiations with a chip firmly in place on its shoulder. But to inspire trust one must first have the self-assurance to trust others. I am not naive enough to believe that if a conciliatory approach was adopted, every federal-provincial conference would become a love-in. There are always real conflicts of interest which can only be reconciled by hard bargaining. However, that bargaining would be far more productive if the provinces and the federal government brought to the negotiations a realization that their common purpose is to reach acceptable settlements and not to find out who will knuckle under to whom.

It is all too easy to see our problem in terms of conflict between the federal government and the provincial governments. All the attention is focused on the arenas of federal-provincial conflicts, the conferences of ministers and first ministers and the adjudication of federal-provincial disputes in the courts. It is my belief that in our concern with issues of this kind we have lost sight of a more fundamental question. That question relates to the nature of Canada, to the reason we have a federal system and not a unitary system of government.

Conflict between the federal government and the provincial governments is not our problem; it is the symptom of our problem, a problem which has to do with the nature of this country. The reason we have a federal system and the reason we have problems with it spring from a common source: The regional character of Canada. That character is determined by our geography and size. There is a regional diversity of interests and concerns in Canada—practical, basic economic and cultural interest and concerns. These characteristics of regionalism in Canada, inherent in its nature, will not be changed simply by adjustments in the balance of power between the federal and provincial governments. The problems of regionalism in Canada cannot be solved solely by constitutional amendments or through redistribution of tax points.

I am not suggesting that constitutional amendments or the redistribution of tax points are unncessary. We clearly need to ensure a rational distribution of responsibilities and a rational allocation of funds to meet these responsibilities between the federal and provincial governments. However, it is equally important that we have national policies—federal government policies—which take into account regional differences. When this goal is not actively pursued by the federal government, Canadians tend to identify more and more with provincial governments as the obvious vehicle to redress regional imbalances and regional grievances. This growing dependency on provincial governments to provide solutions has reinforced the regional attitudes which have always existed in Canada, making us primarily concerned with the difficulties and aspirations of our immediate locales; but often we are unaware and unconcerned about the real problems and the real opportunities that exist elsewhere in the country. This turning inward has tended to make us lesser, not better, Canadians.

As provincial governments have been pressured to counteract the difficulties exacerbated by national policies which all too frequently fail to recognize the reality of a country based on regionalism, so provincial demands for more and more power to meet these pressures have escalated. When they are not met, the conflicts between levels of government, as well as the polarization between regions, also escalates. The situation in Quebec at the present time is but the most obvious and the most threatening manifestation of a deep-rooted malaise in this country. If we are to break out of this vicious circle of compounding conflicts, federalism will demand a greater degree of reconciliation and accommodation than all Canadians, particularly this government, have been prepared to offer to date.

As we pursue that arduous but necessary task of reconciling national policies with regional interests and creating the framework in which regionalism becomes the bedrock of, rather than the alternative to, strong national feeling, let us not overlook the unique and essential contribution which parliament has to make. This is, after all, the only institution in Canada which can speak for all Canadians. It is the only institution in which every community, province and region is directly represented. It is the only institution where 264 men and women come together to represent simultaneously the interests of their various constituencies and the national interest.

None of us, I believe, who has any sensitivity at all can sit long in this place and not gain an overpowering sense of the richness and diversity of Canada, of the interdependence of its parts and of its potential for greatness if we can ever fully exploit the unique contributions which each of our distinct elements has to make to the national spirit and character. Members of parliament, by our very role, have something unique to offer to any discussion on the future of federalism in this country. While the federal-provincial conference has emerged as a major forum of federalism in this country, its perspective of federalism is necessarily limited; the roles are stereotyped.

● (1540)

Mr. McGrath: It has become a private club.

Miss MacDonald: That is very true. The Prime Minister will speak for Canada. The premiers will speak for their provinces. That is the nature of their mandate. But in parliament we have a mandate to speak both for our local constituency and for Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: We have that unique dual perspective which will become more and more vital as our federal system evolves. My leader put forward the proposal on Friday that prior to each major federal-provincial negotiation there should be a debate in parliament on the principles of the position, or at least of the options the federal government will present. If such a tradition were established, the general public would be informed as to the importance of the issues being negotiated at these conferences, the provinces would come into the negotiations with a clearer grasp of the nature and implications of the federal position, and the air of mystery and intrigue which now surrounds the process would dissipate.

Federalism is now facing its ultimate challenge. We can no longer entrust its fate to a close elite of 11 first ministers and their officials.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: It would be strange, indeed, if the parliament of Canada which so uniquely reflects the reality of federalism were to allow itself to be excluded from participating in the revitalization of that federalism. In the case of the bill before us today, parliament was relegated to the sidelines while these fiscal arrangements were being negotiated. Every time this happens, parliament is diminished—and at this critical time in Canada's history we need strengthened, not diminished, national institutions.

This House, Canada's national forum, must become, again, what it was intended to be—the place where the diversity which is Canada is best represented and where the forces of mutual need and mutual aspiration bind that diversity into a nation. For that is what it must be if this country is to survive.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, it is that much easier for me to approve this bill that it is the result of long but fruitful negotiations between all the governments of our country. The agreement having been signed by all the authorities concerned, it would be ungracious of me to oppose it, despite some reservations about some of its secondary stipulations. However, and this explains the bitterness with which the agreement was reached, Bill C-37 is a typical example of the way federal-provincial relations should not be approached.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, we saw the Minister of Finance of Canada patronize the provinces, launch the discussions with resounding statements, threaten to put an end unilaterally to the guaranteed income program for the poorest provinces, and denounce the implicit agreement reached with difficulty five years ago in that particularly sensitive area. The proposals of the minister met with justified anger. For the first time in our history, all the provincial governments opposed a common front to the claims of the central government that it could, as it saw fit, dispose of the incomes of the country and reshuffle the equalization system.

The attitude of the minister gave rise in all sectors, and particularly in Quebec, to deep seated resentment. It increased the skepticism of many Quebecers with regard to the possibility of living within a form of federalism in which the provinces would be considered more than mere pawns but as true partners in the confederation to which they gave birth. Almost a whole year was wasted in useless quarrels and exhausting palaver. Two meetings of the finance ministers ended in deadlock. Finally, the leaders of the governments themselves were called in. They had the wisdom to agree on a compromise, but not without Ottawa having had to back up almost on every point. Bitterness persisted among the participants. In Quebec, federalism lost some support that went to the independent movement. I shall not dwell, Mr. Speaker, on the provisions of the bill which, over-all, renew, with some alterations, the agreement signed five years ago and which expires at the end of March.

I note that in the area of equalization payments, the Minister of Finance has completely reversed his former position. He finally took the stand directly opposite to his proposals of last April. He wisely accepted to include in the new agreement a clause which, for each year of its duration, guarantees that provincial revenues will be maintained if the federal government were to modify its income tax scale. In the case of established programs, the minister has even innovated, which is quite fortunate and he deserves congratulations for that. The new agreement combines the traditional system of direct payment from the federal treasury with the transfer of fiscal points to the provincial administrations.

The new system should allow for greater flexibility in the administration of those programs, particularly in the case of hospital and medical insurance plans. It will suppress the rigidity of the old formula about which provinces had good reasons to complain. Mr. Speaker, this legislation, goes to the core of our federal system and constitutes a practical application of it. Since federalism transcends the mere question of income a sharing, I should like, with your leave, to indicate a few avenues that could help us overcome the crisis facing us and which might not have reached its peak yet.

With regard to the overconcentration of decisional powers and income sources in the hands of federal leaders—a concentration of which Bill C-37 does remain a glaring illustration—the official opposition advocates greater decentralization of the legislative and administrative systems through a federalism of consultation. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, this idea was put forward with firmness and clarity by the official opposition leader (Mr. Clark) in his speech in the House last Friday, and all members would find it quite profitable to read it again. For us, decentralizing powers is not a means to weakening Canada, but on the contrary a means to reinforcing the structures and enhancing its efficiency. In my opinion, this decentralization will allow every government level to co-operate effectively towards the enforcement of the national policy.

Indeed, it is not a matter of denying the federal government powers that are essential to the country's cohesion. We must admit that, in some key areas such as the economy, Ottawa should enjoy the legislative supremacy without which Canada would face chaos. This is not the moment nor the place to define those essential powers. This should be the matter of a constitutional conference which hopefully should not be delayed indefinitely. For the time being, I shall only regret that for this government, Ottawa too often meant Canada. As a result, it assumed powers and mandates that could have been exercised with as many if not more advantages by provincial governments in the best interest of the Canadian community.

The constitution of 1867 provided for the existence of these governments precisely because of the disparities in the culture, the resources and the traditions of the different parts of the country. If we had tried to stick more closely to the objectives established by the Fathers of Confederation in the past, we would not probably hear about associated states today because the provinces would take an effective part in the establishment and the implementation of general policies which have been mutually agreed upon. Mr. Speaker, I refer particularly to the field of taxation which happens to be the subject matter of the bill before us. If all specialists tend to agree that Canada is divided into five economic areas, with various needs and priorities, would it not be more logical to use the resources and the capacities of each of the provincial governments to counterbalance the deficiencies in federal policies in local situations?

Nobody will deny the federal government a right to legislate to standardize incomes and give equal opportunities throughout the country. But considering the failure of some of their policies, one can wonder whether we have not been led astray too often and whether it is not the proper time to give the provinces a role which so far has been consistently denied by the federal government. For example, for how many years now, I do not know, we have been facing two problems—underemployment and inflation. Ottawa did take a lot of initiatives to cope with this, yet nobody could say that it has fully succeeded.

Would it not be better, Mr. Speaker, if the federal government, through fiscal and economic legislation, merely established a kind of common denominator from which a provincial policy, more attuned to local economic conditions, could be developed? Thus the provinces and consequently all Canada could stand a better chance of successfully tackling either inflation or underemployment, according to which is the more directly affecting them. However, to avoid the confusion which could result from ill-concerted initiatives, I think the Canadian confederation has to find new structures which could lead to this kind of federalism of consultation I was referring to.

I want to make it quite clear, Mr. Speaker, I am not in the least advocating breaking up our country as a prerequisite for renegotiating new conditions of association between its various components. During its hundred years of existence, the Canadian confederation has proven that it can meet the legitimate aspirations of each province and of each of its founding people. Therefore, the renegotiation of a new constitution must be conducted within the present framework of this country. As former premier Daniel Johnson said one day with humour, why divorce to go into a new partnership without knowing whether the other partner would still want to do so under the same conditions? Since in the spirit of 1867 Canada was also an economic union, can we not imagine, for instance, a national planning council whose role could be inspired by that of the European Economic Community Council.

● (1600)

This council could operate through commissions copied on the European model. It would remain then to define the type of representation for the various governments and the nature of the powers conferred on the new council. However, it would be desirable for a government to be represented by permanent delegates who would be commissioned to enter into contracts on behalf of their agents. Today, I shall simply launch this idea. It could allow us to find a durable solution to our present problems by assigning to each government level the role to which it is most suited.

I have talked about economic planning. There are other sectors where national commissions like the one I have just mentioned could advantageously replace the often sporadic meetings of ministerial conferences. Commissions could operate in other sectors, like agriculture, manpower, immigration, housing, regional development and so on. They would establish national priorities in each of those areas and would suggest them to the political authorities. I am not saying that discussions within the commissions would not sometimes be arduous and that all conflicts would be avoided, but I believe that such commissions would have a better chance of avoiding the tensions and crises which we have too often witnessed these last few years.

A truly national policy born of a consensus among all governments would, I believe, have a better chance of being accepted by the whole population because it would be more able to meet the objectives and priorities of each part of Canada. If we had such a council, we would probably have been able to offer better protection to several of our industries which are now threatened, and I am thinking about textiles, shoes, dairying and so on. We would have been less exposed to criticisms on the part of the areas whose interests were messed about or even sacrificed. We would probably have given our common development more coherence, more continuity, and we would have avoided many costly improvisations. At any rate, one thing seems sure: we would have better respected one of the objectives of the Fathers of Confederation, the economic union which led to the British North America Act. What the countries of the European Economic Community are now doing, their parallel economies, their various interests, and for some, the settling of their historical enmities, why should we, Canadians, who have been associated for more than a century in a country as big and as varied as a whole continent, why should we not be able to do?

But to do so, we must be firmly convinced of the need to separate decision-making centres and to modify consequently this constitution which no longer completely meets the needs of a modern Canada. Because it does not have a past full of mistakes, because it is the direct descendent of those who made this country, because it has always believed in a better distributed authority, the Progressive Conservative party is better placed than any other to preside at changes which are now needed urgently to save Canada from latent desintegration. Mr. Speaker, I know that following the verdict given November 15 last in Quebec, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) says that he is now ready to start again the dialogue interrupted in Victoria, to re-assess everything and to amend if need be the constitution in its entirety.

I would certainly believe in his conversion if in the same breath the head of the government did not declare publicly his skepticism about the chances of that kind of endeavour and if he stopped praising the merits of policies which no longer satisfy anyone and in which he alone believes. He would still have my confidence if he did not despise so much what he contemptuously calls the "constitutionality" and if he did not ignore the concerns of so many Canadians asking for a new constitution with more definite powers and responsibilities for each level of government. However I would not like Canadians to delude themselves and believe that minor economic or administrative reforms will neutralize all the pressures threatening the unity of our country. In Quebec, for instance, the concept of independence originated from other concerns. The Parti Québécois exists because, for a nation that has reached its full maturity, independence is a normal objective.

The exciting desire to live freely is not illegitimate as such. So it is by a continuous effort of reflexion and also a reflex of prudence but mostly a deep attachment for a country where their ancestors were pioneers that the majority of Quebecers have until now—and I am convinced it is still the case—adhered to our federal system even if they wish some changes to it. Mr. Speaker, federalism facilitates their self achievement as an autonomous community without the hazards inherent in a largely illusive sovereignty.

However, federalism will be saved in our country only if the association of our two communities is based on the equality of the two cultures and the mutual acceptance of the two languages through which they are channeled. The future of our country could be threatened if, because of the fanaticism of some extremists, a majority of Quebecers were led to the conclusion that they are no longer wanted in Canada and that there is no room for the French culture in their own country. Mr. Speaker, they are already seriously hurt by all these irritating remarks against the presence of a few words of French on mere commercial labels. They are indignant because some circles bitterly resent the expansion of French radio and television networks throughout Canada or want to deny Francophones the right to use French in their air communications over Quebec territory.

I am perfectly aware of the fact that most Anglophones are foreign to these explosions of bigotry, just as most Quebecers do not share this hostility to the English language. However it is high time moderates speak out and remind those who might be tempted to forget it that the development of one culture does not require of necessity the destruction of the other. Yet, I do not see why, because they are a minority, French Canadians should be the only ones to bear the consequences, if any, of a national policy on bilingualism.

When a country such as Canada has the rare privilege of having as its official languages those of two of the greatest modern cultures, it must be proud to use that privilege and share it with all its national institutions. The federal government must not be the only one to have that concern. The provinces' role is just as vital if we are to reach the level of linguistic and cultural equality without which bilingualism will only be an irrelevant moto. Canada's future lies not only in the distribution of jurisdictions between the various levels of governments. It is also linked to the way we treat our minorities, both in Quebec and elsewhere.

The time has not come yet, Mr. Speaker, to launch the great referendum campaign in Quebec, but it seems we are getting nearer to it. For the time being let me remind Quebec's new leaders that on November 15, they received a mandate to prepare such a referendum, but not to go through with independence. Indeed Quebecers entrusted them with their votes mainly because in the meantime they made a commitment to behave as a loyal provincial government rather than a sovereign one. They should not renege on their word. But as far as I am concerned, I would like to conclude by saying that with or without a referendum, my choice is made and I am all for Canada!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Wagner.]

Mr. Wagner: While a true Quebecer, I opted for Canada because at a time of federalism I have no wish to go counter-history wise. I choose to be a Canadian because I want to be true to my forbears' will, and Canada is the homeland they asked me to serve. I choose to be a Canadian because I will not be lured by the sirens of doubtful sovereignty whose benefits have not been proved. I choose to be a Canadian because I will not dive blindly into the unknown. I will not gamble my people's future at Russian roulette. I choose to be a Canadian because my fellow countrymen in other provinces need a Canadian Quebec.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wagner: They need a Canadian Quebec to survive and conquer their place in the sun. I choose to be a Canadian because I refuse to bury myself in a morbid isolation in which Quebec would merely be the shadow of what it formerly was, in which its culture and economy would constantly be jeopardized. I choose to be a Canadian because I do not renounce, I do not renounce any part of my heritage, because I like every little bit of this country which my fathers have discovered and erected. I choose to be a Canadian because I want to feel at home in the quiet villages of the maritime provinces, in industrial cities of Ontario, in the wide western plains and in the magnificent mountains of the Pacific coast. But in turn I want to be accepted in this country as equal and I want my mother tongue to be recognized as a betterment of the Canadian heritage.

I choose to be a Canadian, because Canada, whatever can be said, is one of the great achievements of history, and I call to witness the many people who envy its power and prestige. I choose to be a Canadian because in Canada I find protection of my democratic freedoms and respect for the cultural values which I was entrusted with. I choose to be a Canadian because, after all, Mr. Speaker, the social stability, economic progress, cultural influence and even the international prestige of the province of Quebec are closely linked to Canada.

[English]

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to make a few comments on this bill. I am a little unhappy about following the great and illustrious speaker from Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner), who just resumed his seat. However, I will do my best not to bore too many people. I am sure I will not be able to live up to his great performance. I have the responsibility to make a few comments in this debate because the fiscal arrangements act touches a significant number of federal-provincial fiscal arrangements which fall under the general subject of health. Being my party's health critic, I want to participate.

We had a very long debate on the subject of health less than a year ago, a debate dealing with Bill C-68 as it was known at that time. In my view, it was one of the first clear indications of the attitude of this government which created the difficulties this country has been experiencing over the past decade or so, particularly the past couple of years. The difficulties to which I am referring are those which involve themselves with confederation; the fact that the country, under the stewardship of the present Liberal administration, seems to be falling apart at the seams. The largest single contributing factor to the difficult situation which confederation is in is the fact that we have a government which is suffering from the disease which leaders and governments have suffered from ever since the first time history was recorded. The Greeks like to refer to this disease as a hubris. The term is appropriate to apply to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) and the key people who have been in charge of this government over the past few years.

Perhaps I should take some time to explain the condition. I am sure Your Honour will immediately recognize the similarity between the condition these men suffer and that originally described by the Greeks, if you care to refer to Greek history and the comments made at that time about the leaders of the day.

The condition to which I am referring involves a certain kind of pride. Everyone will agree that if an individual is to be successful in life he must have a certain amount of pride in himself and his ability to achieve. Through that kind of pride he has a certain amount of self-confidence which is required in order to propel an individual to strive for better things for his country, his family, himself, or whatever. In this case the particular pride has been destructive to leaders since time immemorial. It is a special kind of pride. It is an insolent pride, a pride of insolence and arrogance, a kind of pride which is really not justified. However, the keepers of it feel they are justified because they are appointed by divine right to rule and make decisions for everyone. This insolent pride is the reason we have a substantial strain between the federal government and virtually all of the provincial governments in this country. It is the reason for the loss of mutual trust and respect which is necessary between federal and provincial governments if confederation is to function in a meaningful way.

I am sure this mutual trust and respect existed when the party to which I am pleased to belong, the Conservative party, brought together a number of provinces to form confederation. If we review history ever since confederation we will not find that any other federal government has been as guilty of this insolent pride, and so destructive to confederation, as the present administration.

I mentioned Bill C-68 as the time when I, personally, became faced with this kind of pride in my dealings with the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It might be worth quoting some of the exchanges that took place between that minister and the members of the health committee who represented this party during the course of the deliberations on that subject. I wish to quote from the committee proceedings which took place about a year ago, No. 46:18. A questioner from this party asked in committee:

But before quoting, Mr. Chairman, I want to come back to a subject which I had touched on previously. My concern is for the effect of this on confederation and federal-provincial relations in general.

We were talking about Bill C-68 which was a unilateral, arbitrary imposition of a federal government decision upon the provinces without any kind of meaningful agreement with the provinces and without having had sufficient negotiations to come to an agreement. I continue the quotation:

● (1620)

Now we know that at a federal-provincial ministers' meeting of health ministers in early 1975, the federal government had made a commitment to the provinces, or at least had agreed to abandon the rigid plan for imposing arbitrary federal expenditure limits. The federal government at that time also agreed with the provinces to explore various alternatives for improving the cost effectiveness of health programs within the context perhaps of a more flexible interpretation of the existing federal-provincial agreements. My understanding is that a federal-provincial committee was set up of officials where studies were under way in order to determine methods of improving the health care delivery system at perhaps a lower cost. That committee was to meet to analyse results some time in July, but the minister of finance decided to announce in June, just two or three weeks before this meeting was to occur, exactly the kind of unilateral action which the minister had assured the provinces only a few months earlier would not take place. To my way of thinking, the country in which we live was built on a federal system. Confederation itself was built on the spirit of federal-provincial co-operation of such a kind as was necessary to keep the country together and to keep the citizens serviced with the best facilities possible under today's conditions.

We also know, for example, that during the administration of this government—and by that I mean since the advent of Prime Minister Trudeau—separatism in Quebec has grown perhaps by leaps and bounds. Alienation in the west has reached perhaps the highest peak since confederation or since the western provinces came in and the maritime provinces feel desperately neglected in many ways.

At this point, one of the Liberal members from New Brunswick shouted: "That is not true".

An hon. Member: Who was he?

Mr. Yewchuk: It was the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin). We are faced with legislation here with which virtually no province agrees. Every province has rejected it. Every province has indicated in no uncertain terms that it wants desperately to sit down with the minister of health in an effort to reach a mutually acceptable agreement with regard to changes in the health care delivery system. Yet the minister chooses to bulldoze his way ahead in spite of the fact that he has been before the committee on at least four or five occasions now, during all of which time he has failed to provide any reasonable explanation for choosing to take this route in the face of commitments to the provinces only a few months earlier that any changes which might be made would be arranged through mutually acceptable pathways of negotiation. The response of the minister to all that, and more, was this:

Mr. Chairman, several of the statements made by the hon. gentleman are so preposterous that I have difficulty in taking them seriously.

He went on to say that about 95 per cent of them were preposterous. He considered them to be so preposterous that he had difficulty in taking them seriously. Mr. Speaker, the statements which I made consisted largely of a summary of a number of letters sent to us by all the provincial ministers of health. So, in effect, the minister was saying that everything that those provincial ministers had said was preposterous and was not worth replying to at all. Then he flipped his lid, lost his temper, as he usually does, and said:

To come to some of your points. I will not spend much time on separatism in Quebec. I suggest you look at scientific surveys which have been carried on in Quebec over the last ten years—and I am ready to compare my expertise on Quebec with yours—and you will find that the percentage of people in favour of separatism in Quebec has not grown in the last ten years.

That statement was made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare only a year ago. At that time he was the Quebec lieutenant. We all know he is now a corporal or a private, but at that time he was in charge of organization in Quebec. I called attention to those exchanges because they illustrate two things: first, the sanctimonious, arrogant pride these people on the other side have, and, second, their total misreading of the situation in Quebec as far as the seriousness of the separatist movement is concerned. We have heard no further statements from that minister on the subject. However, we know he has now been replaced by another minister as Quebec lieutenant or organizer.

We know that the government since 1963, and particularly since the coming to power of the present Prime Minister in 1967, has had all the power needed to govern this country effectively, to come to grips with the problems of the nation and to devise appropriate solutions for them so as to ensure that the provinces would stay together on the basis of the evident advantages of a united country. I am sorry to say that these "leaders"—I put that word in quotation marks—completely lost that opportunity to keep the country together. We saw a similar failure on the part of the Liberal administration which was in power in Quebec for such a long time. It had taken to the habit of saying to Canadians over the years, in effect, "We are the only people who are capable of keeping the country together", and it was blaming Canadians at large for the country's falling apart.

Almost every time he goes on television these days, the Prime Minister blames all Canadians for the problems facing the country. He tells them he is working, he is trying as hard as he can, but it is the fault of all those naughty Canadians who refuse to do the things he says they should do to keep the country together. There is a certain short-sightedness on his part in taking an attitude of that kind because hon. members know as well as he does, if he is as intelligent as hon. members think he is, that the difficulties surrounding confederation are a direct result of his own policies and his own approach to governing this country.

An hon. Member: He is an expert on the simplistic approach.

Mr. Yewchuk: Hon. members on the other side are very sensitive. They always become a little excited when somebody on this side tells the plain truth about how things stand. They cannot bear to hear the truth because they are not accustomed to living by it. I am not trying to pose as an expert on Quebec, but I can pose as an individual who knows as much about confederation from the western point of view as the hon. member from Quebec who has just interjected knows about the western point of view.

I hear the hon. member from New Brunswick also interjecting to say he does not agree with the comments I am making. The fact is, it is the leadership of the Prime Minister and the government which is in question. The ideas and policies they have been putting forward are not accepted by anyone any more. It is not a matter of English Canadians not accepting French Canadians; it is a matter of all Canadians not accepting this particular leader and this government any more. The reason is that their policies, instead of unifying this country, have divided it to an extent never known before.

• (1630)

Mr. Breau: That is your opinion.

Mr. Yewchuk: That is my opinion, and I believe it is the correct situation. I am saying to hon. gentlemen opposite who are getting so excited that they should stop blaming Canadians for the problems we have and start blaming themselves. After all, they are the ones who have been in power in this country for nearly 15 years—and look where the country is after 15 years of Liberal government!

Mr. Whelan: The country is doing very well.

Mr. Yewchuk: Certainly, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) is not the envy of the world. Let us consider, Mr. Speaker, why Canadians are angry. Canadians are not angry at each other. I do not believe that Anglo-Canadians are angry at Franco-Canadians or that Franco-Canadians are angry at Anglo-Canadians. I think all Canadians are simply angry at governments which have been dishonest, which have been totally incapable of comprehending their problems, let alone of solving them. We still see the same kind of attitude persisting. Let me give the House an example. Even the former illustrious minister of finance, Mr. Turner, left that bunch in disgust. But he contributed—

Mr. MacFarlane: You should let him speak for himself.

Mr. Yewchuk: I will certainly do that.

Mr. MacFarlane: I would not dare to.

Mr. Yewchuk: Even he contributed to the difficulty that we find in Canada with regard to relations between the people and their elected politicians. The government has a program having to do with indexing of income tax, and I remember that that particular minister, whom I have to say was fairly well respected on all sides of the House most of the time, and perhaps in all parts of the country, attacked my formed leader, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), with great vigor in his own home town of Truro, Nova Scotia, which he visited to try to belittle the tax indexing proposals which my former leader made at the time. Indeed, he spent a good deal of time during the 1972 election campaign belittling my leader for having put those proposals forward, saying that they would bankrupt the country, that the country would fall apart under that kind of tax system. Yet lo and behold, as soon as hon. gentlemen opposite came back with a minority, they proposed indexing.

Mr. Breau: Of personal exemptions.

Mr. Yewchuk: All of a sudden it was a good idea. You can look at it whichever way you want, but if you look at it honestly you will have to accept the fact that this was deviousness and dishonesty on the part of that minister of finance. I suggest there is no other way to look at it.

Let me give the House another example why Canadians are unhappy with government and with the situation that exists in this country. Let me go to the 1974 election. Our party proposed a program which was known as price and income controls. I am sure that every member on the other side who is sitting there smiling right now and getting a little excited went out on the hustings and spoke against that program. I can remember advertisements on the radio to the effect, "if the Conservatives win, they will freeze your wages; is that what you want?" That is what hon. members said, and they all admit it.

Mr. MacFarlane: That is what you said, too.

Mr. Yewchuk: We did not say that.

Mr. Roy (Laval): That was a long time ago when things were quite different.

Mr. Yewchuk: In proposing that program, Mr. Speaker, we put forward a positive and honest approach, knowing full well that there were dangers in it. But we consciously made the decision to be honest with the people and to tell them what the prescription was going to be. But the members on the other side who still govern, thought we were rather foolish for being honest with the people and they chose the other course. They chose to be the opposite of honest and they were re-elected.

Mr. MacFarlane: Surely you are not challenging our honesty.

Mr. Yewchuk: They came back with a majority and the very first thing they did was to bring in income and price controls. I do not know how they justify it, Mr. Speaker. I have heard the Prime Minister say, "Well, that is just smart politics", or something to that effect, and many of his friends have said the same thing. They sit and drink their beer and laugh about it. It is smart politics to them. They were dishonest with the rest of the people, but they are in government.

Mr. MacFarlane: Do not try to analyse the last election after so long.

Mr. Kempling: Anything to win!

Mr. Yewchuk: I hope the whip on the government side will take the opportunity to say a few words on the bill when I sit down. He seems to be so anxious to participate; so do many other members over there. But it is rather curious that none of them has made a speech on this bill today. They have all sat back in their usual sheep-like manner waiting for the bill to be rushed through. I hope they will save some of their interjections, Mr. Speaker, put them together in a speech and present them as soon as I sit down.

To get back to the question of price and income controls which hon. members opposite campaigned against, and won the election because they campaigned against them, the result of that has been a total—

Mr. Breau: Order. Get back to the bill.

Mr. Paproski: This is part of the bill. Let Charlie look after it, Breau.

Mr. Yewchuk: The result of that, Mr. Speaker, has been a total—

Mr. Roy (Laval): This was two years ago, and the results are there for all to see.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) has the floor for the purpose of making a speech.

Mr. Paproski: We saw the results of November 15.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, you must have an inordinate amount of patience not to have thrown your show at hon. members by this time. I hope they will listen and learn, because I want to tell them that honesty in politics is a very essential ingredient if we are to preserve the democratic system. The fact is that the result of the flip-flops on the part of this government has indeed undermined the democratic system in this country. You see reports in the press every day, and hear people from all over saying that you cannot trust politicians, that "they are like a bunch of bananas—they hang around in a bunch, they are yellow and there is not a straight one among them." That is the kind of picture that the people of Canada have of their politicians today, and it is a direct result of the kind of dishonest dealing this government has participated in ever since it has been in power, simply out of a desire to propel itself into power, not at all caring what effect these tactics will have on confederation or on the democratic system itself.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister says to us that all we have to do, if we want Quebec to stay in, is to say to them, "I love you" it makes me want to laugh. As a matter of fact, it does a lot more than that; it makes me sick to hear him talk that way. I think it is high time he stopped fooling around with the people of Canada, came clean and tried to come to grips with the problems that face this country today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: Now we are getting the truth.

Mr. Yewchuk: I have been in this place, Mr. Speaker, for nearly nine years. I grew up in a community where there were people from many parts of the world who were all Canadians living together in harmony and peace. This harmony came as a result of the children of immigrants growing up together, going to school together, playing together, working together and living together. That, in my view, is the way Canada should be. But since we have had this government in office, all of that has gone. All of that harmony has been destroyed. As a matter of fact, I think there is more racism in this country today as a result of the policies which have been pursued by this government which has been pitting one group against another, one racial group against another in an attempt to divide and conquer. I think that kind of thing has to stop because the situation is too serious for governments to play with.

People in government in this country must forget about their own selfish aims, about keeping themselves in power forever. They must start thinking about what needs to be done to help Canadians understand each other better, to help Canadians to live together in peace and harmony in the way they did before the policies of this government shook them by the bootstraps. To me, Mr. Speaker, winning is not the primary objective, though this may sound a little foolish coming from a politician. However, I think it should be possible for political parties to win by honest means and to keep power by honest means. It is high time that the philosophy was stopped that it is more important to win by devious means than if by honest means you lost the election.

Why is there disunity in this country, and why have people become polarized? Let us go back to the Saskatchewan situation of a few years ago. I remember a very famous quotation of the Prime Minister. The Minister of Agriculture might be interested in this. The Prime Minister asked the farmers "Why should I sell your wheat?" I would like the Minister of Agriculture to explain to me the way he explains to farmers in Saskatchewan how that kind of statement creates unity. How does that kind of statement make the west feel that it is really part of Canada and that the government is really interested in doing more for the west and making the west feel welcome in this nation? I would like to hear an explanation of how, "Why should I sell your wheat", furthers unity in this country.

I represent an agricultural constituency, and in western Canada agriculture still happens to be one of the largest industries. We want to know why there is alienation in the west. When we are dealing with the subject of unity we should examine the policy started by a former minister of agriculture, Bud Olson. He was once the member of parliament for Medicine Hat. He decided that the way to solve Canada's agricultural problem was to take large numbers of farmers off the land and leave only a few who would then farm much larger units. Theoretically, that was supposed to be economically viable. We have seen the results of that policy. The agricultural industry in the west has been trampled by subsequent ministers of agriculture, totally ignored by the whole government, and it has come to the point where western agriculture is finding it difficult to survive. If we want unity, and if we want the western portion of this country to feel more strongly that it belongs to Canada, we must reverse the policy of the destruction of agriculture.

Mr. Whelan: Be honest about it.

Mr. Yewchuk: The minister is objecting because he thinks I am not being honest. I would like him to tell me why he has not done something about the beef situation in the west. Beef producers are finding it virtually impossible to carry on, but at the same time we are importing millions of tons of foreign beef. Our own producers are being squeezed out of business because they cannot make a profit. This minister sits by and says, "Let's bring all that beef in to make the consumers in the city happy."

Mr. Whelan: That is not true, either, and you know it.

Mr. Yewchuk: If the minister has any sense of fairness, he would do something about that. What representations has he made with regard to the GATT talks which are going on now in so far as the importation of beef into Canada is concerned? He has already told us that he has made no representations about the importation of dairy products, and the dairy industry is also in serious trouble. The minister said that today during question period.

Mr. Whelan: I did not say that in the House.

Mr. Yewchuk: I suggest the minister read Hansard if he cannot remember what he said. All these things give us some idea as to why there is not very much unity in this nation. Let us come back to Ottawa. Hon. members will recall that a few years ago some demonstrators came here from the province of Quebec. They were unhappy with the way the federal government was treating them. As they were demonstrating, the Prime Minister happened to drive by in his car. He opened the window and uttered some famous words which I will not repeat because I do not think they should be repeated in this place. However, the words certainly were not "eat cake". I would like the Minister of Agriculture, who was just interjecting, to tell me how—

Mr. MacFarlane: Oh, oh!

Mr. Yewchuk: —or the government whip to tell me how it furthers unity when the Prime Minister sticks his head out of a car window and shouts words like that to a group of protesters. How does that strengthen the desire of the people of that province who want to belong to this nation?

There are many other things I could go on about, but it is obvious that these fellows are just not interested in listening. They have their own views, and even though their own views have been a total failure for the past ten years they still have them. They refuse to examine the situation and admit that they might have been doing something wrong, that there might have been some misinterpretation as to what is holding this country together, and as to what we must do to hold the country together. We have not heard any of them voice the opinion that a re-examination on their policies is necessary.

Let me refer, again, to the west and to the oil and gas export tax which was suddenly imposed on the producing provinces without consultation, virtually wiping out millions of dollars of revenue upon which the provinces were counting. That was imposed by the federal government without consultation. The provinces were simply informed by way of a press release, a television speech or something of that nature. That is not the way to keep provinces trusting the federal government. The federal government should not make sudden decisions of that kind and inform the provinces by way of press releases. Rather, it should at least have the decency to make a telephone call. We have a very serious problem in this country and until we reverse that kind of approach to federal-provincial relations we will continue to have serious problems.

Let us consider the totally unrelated subject of scientific research. We want to know why there is unhappiness among the people of this country, why the people are unhappy with the government, why they do not seem to trust their politicians any more, and why they are looking for radical changes. Anyone who has any concern about the development and progress of this nation will admit that scientific research is a very fundamental part of the development of any nation. But what have we seen under this government? We have seen a continuing erosion of research. Researchers have been driven out of the country.

Mr. Maine: Have you looked at the estimates?

Mr. Yewchuk: Yes, I have looked at the estimates.

Mr. Maine: They are up.

Mr. Yewchuk: They have been increased less than the increase in inflation in the scientific field. If the hon. member disagrees, he can speak when I sit down and can give the facts as he sees them. In any case, we have a situation where the scientific community has been totally undermined and it is totally disgusted with and discouraged by the policies this government is following. They are Canadians, too, from all parts of the country. They are involved in teaching our students in universities and in many other institutions, and they are totally disgusted with the political process because it pays little attention to real needs but much attention to political gains.

Let us consider our national defence forces. There is a huge military base in my constituency.

Mr. Paproski: The one in mine is leaving.

Mr. Yewchuk: The one in the constituency of the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) is being dismantled.

Mr. Paproski: They are taking our Francophone unit.

Mr. Yewchuk: Let us consider what has been happening to the funding of the defence forces of this nation. It is easy to see that it has been continuously underfunded, undermined and underequipped. Bases are being closed everywhere and some are being moved unnecessarily—all things which appear to be totally ridiculous and unfounded.

Mr. Goyer: This is untrue.

Mr. Paproski: You don't know whether you are coming or going.

Mr. Goyer: There is a 12 per cent increase this year.

Mr. Yewchuk: These are things this government is doing, and the government tells Canadians that it is their fault that there is no unity in this country. I suggest, once again, that this government, including the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), re-examine these policies seriously rather than simply take the reactionary approach the minister is taking now which assumes that anything the opposition says is totally inaccurate.

Mr. Goyer: You are not reading the documents.

Mr. Yewchuk: It is high time everyone in the cabinet took a look at what is happening in this country.

Mr. Paproski: How much are agents getting this year?

• (1650)

Mr. Yewchuk: I think that we can also have a look at aboriginal rights. We will find that those rights have been ignored for a decade since this government has been in power. This has just been put off forever. You might ask, "Why do the native people express displeasure with this government? Why are they unhappy? Why is there disunity?" All you have to do to find the answer is to look at the record.

What upsets me most is that there are about one million Canadians in this country without work. Regardless of the statistics the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) might choose to quote, whether they wish to say there are 750,000 unemployed, or one million, both those numbers are very high. The government tells people that all they have to do to solve their problem is to say to Quebec, "I love you" and suddenly everyone will be happy. If they did that I am sure the response would be a very unpleasant one.

The Conservative party brought this country together over 100 years ago. This is the party which brought about the marriage, so to speak, between the Anglos and the Francos. Those are the words the Prime Minister himself has coined. I do not like them, but that is what he likes to use. So the Anglos and the Francos were married at that time. We kept the country together for 100 years or more. Now the marriage is falling apart. The Prime Minister's vision of the marriage is that Quebec has become like a petulant wife who simply wants her husband to tell her that he loves her. I suppose he envisages Quebec as a petulant wife because he is a petulant man himself and sees others in his own image.

We have a new premier in Quebec. I do not want to attack him unjustly because he has only started in his job, but I have to say that I do not like what I see so far. He seems to be saying, "Here is the wife"—Quebec being the wife and the rest of Canada being the husband, I suppose. Perhaps it should be the other way around. He seems to be saying that the wife has decided she wants a divorce but she would be willing to cohabit so long as the husband pays her enough. That seems to be the approach of the new premier of Quebec. I must say that the Prime Minister, and the former and the present Premier of Quebec, all three gentlemen, are totally wrong in their impression of the country and what it is.

I think the philosophy which these two gentlemen have adopted, namely, to do anything that is necessary to further their political goals, should be cast aside. The time has come when all Canadians—but particularly governments because they are the ones in power—must make up their mind to take all necessary steps to cure the ills to which I have referred and a whole lot of others to which I have not referred. When all these ills are dealt with, I am sure that confederation will be further ahead than it appears to be at present. It seems that the stage is set for the party which brought this country together to come back and reaffirm the marriage which took place 110 years ago. I am very pleased to say that we are ready, willing and able to do it—and the sooner the better.

PROCEEDING ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—Public Service—Freezing of pensions of members of armed forces and mounted police until age 60—Denial of pensions to certain widows—Request for report; the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave)—Transport—Possibility of continued assistance to flour shipments through Atlantic port; the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston)—Manpower—Canada Works Program—Suggested creation of special fund for recycling operation.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, may I call it five o'clock? I will be speaking in private members' hour.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, private bills and public bills.

[Mr. Yewchuk.]

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCLUDE PROVISIONS ADOPTED BY CANADIAN CONSTITUTIONAL CHARTER CONFERENCE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of making a proposal to the Parliament of the United Kingdom to amend the British North America Act to include the following provisions as adopted unanimously at the Canadian Constitutional Charter Conference held at Victoria in June 1971:

"The parliament and government of Canada and the legislatures and governments of the provinces are committed to:

(1) the promotion of equality of opportunity and well being for all individuals in Canada;

(2) the assurance, as nearly as possible, that essential public services of reasonable quality are available to all individuals in Canada; and

(3) the promotion of economic development to reduce disparities in the social and economic opportunities for all individuals in Canada wherever they may live."; and

That the Parliament of the United Kingdom amend the act only where it has received a formal request from the legislatures and governments of the provinces to amend the act in the same manner.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I suppose it is obvious that because of my background I am a fairly strong believer in the concept of providence. There is something providential in the fact that we are debating this notice of motion on the day on which we are having a general debate of fiscal arrangements, because there is certainly the closest possible relationship between the bill presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) and the motion I have on the order paper today. This motion asks the government of Canada to submit to parliament a proposal for amending the BNA Act, our constitution. It would add to the BNA Act a statement of purpose or commitment to which the federal and the ten provincial governments would subscribe. This purpose, simply stated, would be the elimination of disparities and the promotion of equality of opportunity for all Canadians regardless of where they live. This motion asks also that in addressing the British parliament for the proposed amendment no action be taken until the ten provinces have signalled their approval through like addresses.

Although the amending formula in this motion does not necessarily reflect either my personal or my party's position on an appropriate formula, unanimity among the 11 governments would be the most desirable and effective approach here. It would symbolize the breadth of our commitment as a nation to equality of opportunity and at the same time offer a basic point of common agreement from which to renew our constitutional dialogue.

On the issue of disparities there are two essential reasons for this motion today. First, and most obvious, is the widespread disparity of opportunity among Canadians. I believe these disparities are undeniable by any measure. They are to be found in living standards, income, employment, educational level, available social services, security, one's hope for the future and one's sense of purposefulness or meaningfulness within the Canadian confederation. As Joey Smallwood described the situation during the 1969 constitutional conference:

Some youngster is going to be born tonight somewhere east of that north-south line in Quebec or in the four Atlantic provinces, of whom you may say that a court has condemned that Canadian baby to an inferior existence—food not so good, home not so good, schools not so good, hospitals not so good, roads not so good . . . that child is condemned, as though a court had done it, to an existence inferior to the Canadian average.

What these disparities come down to, in very human terms, is that certain individuals, certain communities, certain regions are denied the opportunity open to their fellow Canadians to fulfil their dreams and aspirations whether as individuals or collectively. What hurts the most in admitting the range and depth of disparity across Canada is that so much of the solution lies within our power. The question is not whether we can eliminate disparity but, rather, whether we are committed and concerned enough as a nation to do anything about it. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) thinks we should be, noting in 1968 as follows:

If the underdevelopment of the Atlantic provinces is not corrected, then the unity of the country is almost as surely destroyed as it would be by the French-English confrontation.

Again, as recently as this month in his reference to inserting collective rights in a new constitution, he said:

[Translation]

"The right which people have to live in the part of Canada they like best and where they were born . . . without being penalized by not having access to equal opportunities."

[English]

Certainly no less a commitment was given by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) in Charlottetown last year when he said:

—regional disparity is an issue on the fringes of government policy-making instead of being a preoccupation at the centre of government policy-making when it should be and where it will be in a Progressive Conservative government.

Former prime minister Pearson stated at the 1968 conference that he regarded——the problem of raising economic levels in the Atlantic provinces as a principal aspect of the total problem of maintaining unity.

Or, as Premier Robichaud phrased it in 1968:

Canada's human cultural objectives may fail because they are not rooted in socioeconomic substance.

Past federal governments have also agreed and acted to reduce disparity. As far back as 1927 we had the first national pension scheme: in the 1930s, R. B. Bennett's reforms during the depression; later, the green book proposals and accompanying social legislation after World War II; then, of course, the first organized attempts to deal with disparity as a regional phenomenon under the Diefenbaker government through programs such as the Atlantic Development Board, ARDA, the adjustment grants, and so on; and in the late 1960s there was the creation and substantial funding of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion which attempted to co-ordinate programming and general policy-making for the federal government. In fact, apart from national unity it would be difficult to find a single theme upon which all administrations of all political stripes have been in such close accord, namely, that the disparity of opportunity between Canadians must be lessened and, if possible, eradicated. Yet disparity persists—even widening by some indicators.

Where we have been somewhat successful is in improving material living standards on an individual basis. But there has been almost no progress in helping those individuals, communities and regions to break the cycle of dependency to attain a position where their future is in their hands, coupled with the economic means to realize their potential. Providing to all a guaranteed standard of living has become increasingly the role of the federal government. Enabling them to do it for themselves has not.

The task is far vaster than can be undertaken by any government alone, with its limited resources, multitude of conflicting claims and pressures from vested interests. The task requires a mobilization and direction of our will and material resources on a scale not seen since the national policy of Sir John A. Macdonald. We need, in fact, a "new national policy" if we realistically expect to overcome disparity of opportunity among the individuals, communities and regions of Canada; one in which the federal government may provide leadership but which demands no less the same commitment from provincial governments and the private sector alike.

The task is truly immense. We must, for example, overcome the biases in our economic structure which deny to certain regions the opportunities afforded to others. We must overcome the biases in our culture which create the belief in countless Canadians that their way of life and goals are second-class compared to those of their fellow citizens. We must find and implement ways of convincing those with a material or psychological stake in the status quo that the national interest demands its restructuring. We must find ways of encouraging and involving the private sector in giving our disadvantaged areas the same opportunities for productivity as in the more fortunate regions. We must encourage individuals, especially in the poorer regions, to restore their faith in our economy and institution by proving that it can work to fulfil their needs and aspirations, and not just those of some other group or region. This task we face is of direct relevance to the constitutional process, because when a nation faces a challenge of such proportions as to overshadow any other before it, then that task requires a focus or a clear and unequivocal statement of purpose unlike any other. That focus, I believe, is our constitutions.

The second equally compelling reason for adopting the motion at this time lies in the current state of the constitutional review process. Patriation and an amending formula may be on the horizon, but without detracting from the powerful symbolic import of these events, they will not alleviate the backlog of dissatisfaction over inappropriate divisions of power, murky areas of responsibility, insufficient guarantees of individual and collective rights, etc. Although the Prime Minister appears to have discovered a renewed interest in the process of bringing our constitutional arrangements in line with modern realities, it is difficult not to conclude that little apparent progress has resulted.

The common ground on which to base the process of dialogue has not yet been found. Further, a basic agreement on the nature of that process will not be reached so long as the 11 governments involved have no shared perception of what they want out of the constitutional process. There is even a certain sense of futility to discussion about the "hows" of constitutional arrangements—division of powers, and so forth—without first achieving some consensus of the "whys": Why Canada? Why government? Why a federal system?

Only when there exists reasonable consensus on what this nation is about, and what the basic purpose of our governments should be, should we proceed to work out the mechanical arrangements of which level can best do which tasks. It is noteworthy that the British North America Act itself offers no sense of purpose about the nation it brought into being. "Peace, order and good government" is as close as it comes to defining such a purpose—but to what end? It is silent on that critical question.

Our present constitution reads like a contract for "business as usual", albeit under a different roof. It is totally preoccupied, apart from settling certain debts and liabilities with the form and practice of our government institutions—not with shedding light on the nature of their "business". We can only assume that the structures created by the BNA Act reflected the goals of a self-assured class which is a ridiculous perspective in a modern-day constitution. We are too pluralistic and, what is more important still, too conscious of that pluralism to permit the luxury of unquestioned assumptions about our nationhood.

I would not underestimate the difficulty of finding agreement on our objectives as a nation. There is a pressing need for at least one common point of agreement, shared by all 11 governments, if the process is to succeed. I submit that the commitment to equality of opportunity, to the eradication of disparity, is such a common point of agreement.

[Mr. MacDonald (Egmont).]

The substantive wording of this motion has, in fact, already been agreed to unanimously by the 11 participants at the Victoria constitutional conference in 1971. It represents a statement of purpose for confederation with universal acceptance by each federal and provincial participant in the constitutional dialogue, which meshes well both with our values and with the historical concerns of our federal government. To give a sampling of the breadth of agreement on this national purpose, I quote from presentations made by participants at the constitutional conferences of 1968 through 1970. The then premier of British Columbia, W. A. C. Bennett, said in 1969:

> We hold it to be the right of Canadians in every region to have a standard of living equal to the national average.

The premier of Alberta, Harry Strom, said in the same year:

> Our view is that we could and should find much more far reaching solutions to the question of inequality in the distribution of wealth in Canada.

The premier of Ontario, in 1969, John Robarts, said:

> There is a national need to rectify economic disparity . . . There must be some meaning to being a Canadian regardless of where you live, regardless of the economic circumstances of the particular area in which you live.

In Quebec, in 1968, premier Jean-Jacques Bertrand said:

> Economic disparity between the country's various regions is one of the two critical Canadian problems of the day.

It is true today, if not more so, than at the time he uttered those words. Later, in 1970, former Premier Bourassa said:

● (1710)

> It is clear—that this question—

Meaning economic disparity

> —should be given special mention in the text of the country's constitution.

Premier Smith of Nova Scotia said, in 1969:

> It is of fundamental importance that the constitution provide for balanced regional economic development.

Premier Smallwood of Newfoundland said, in 1968:

> The constitution should give recognition to the existence of serious regional disparities throughout Canada . . . and shall declare the need to eliminate such disparities.

The report of the June, 1969, working session spoke of "placing a moral obligation upon governments to take measures to combat regional disparities", and, significantly, the report went on to note that "no arguments were raised against this kind of obligation." Finally, the conclusion from the third meeting of December, 1969, was:

> The conference reiterated the earlier agreement that the objective of reducing disparities across the country should be written into the preamble of a revised constitution as a basic goal of the Canadian people.

I suggest that what we have before us represents a clear, unequivocal agreement on a most basic purpose of government and of confederation. It is an opportunity for leadership that we in parliament should not let slip; that is, to give expression to such rare constitutional consensus among our 11 governments and at the same time to initiate the most significant attack on disparity ever undertaken by this nation. Some would argue that this type of amendment should not be introduced alone; that either it should be part of a comprehensive revision or, at least, be included as part of a constitutional bill of rights. I do not agree. The disparities in this nation continue to erode our nation at a time in our history when we can least afford it.

I can appreciate the Prime Minister's reference to the "collective rights" of those burdened by unequal opportunity. But these are not rights in the traditional sense; they are rights which demand substantive government action and intervention. They should stand on their own, separate from a bill of individual rights, and they require immediate implementation. Finally, there may be some feeling that embodying such a basic purpose of confederation within the constitution means nothing except yet another symbolic frill. That would be a serious misreading of the power of symbols in a nation such as ours. I leave the last word on this subject to the only surviving father of confederation, Joey Smallwood, who observed at the 1960 conference:

> Even if clauses relating to regional disparity were not legally enforceable, that does not prevent them from becoming potent political forces, if need be, at some future time.

I firmly believe such action now would be a significant and positive step in strengthening our commitment to the ultimate value and worth of Canadian confederation. I hope that hon. members on all sides of the House will see fit to give approval to what I hope will be an important contribution to the further building of our Canadian confederation.

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, the motion which the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) has brought forward for discussion this afternoon gives all of us an opportunity to discuss two important subjects—the constitution itself and regional disparities in this country. On both subjects, particularly the latter, my hon. friend opposite has devoted much time, effort and energy both in the forum of the House of Commons and elsewhere. I wish to make some observations on the motion now before the House although, I regret to say, without the benefit of enough time to do as much research on this particular motion as I should have liked. I begin by considering the wording of the motion itself which has as its basis either article 46 or 47 of the Victoria conference, to which the hon. member referred. The first paragraph of the hon. member's motion reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of making a proposal to the Parliament of the United Kingdom to amend the British North America Act to include the following provisions as adopted unanimously at the Canadian Constitutional Charter Conference held at Victoria in June, 1971.

I question the words "adopted unanimously". I take exception to them and take exception to that idea as embodied in the context of the motion. The Victoria conference itself may well have agreed unanimously on the substance which forms the basis of the hon. member's motion. Certainly, I am sure that no political leader, federal or provincial, or adviser would disagree with the hon. member's idealism or his "motherhood" position, if I may use that phrase. When I refer to the issue as being one of idealism or motherhood, I do not intend to underrate it, for any politician in his right mind would adopt the hon. member's general position. Nevertheless, taken by itself, the Victoria conference as a conference was a failure and the unanimity to which the motion refers was not achieved. The government of Saskatchewan did not agree to the proposed general amending formula which it is suggested resulted from the work of that particular conference.

Saskatchewan's representative at the conference was the then attorney general, Hon. D. V. Heald. The conference took place about ten days before the general election in Saskatchewan, the election which resulted in a change of government in the province. The election resulted in the Liberal government, of which Mr. Heald had been a member, going down to defeat to be replaced about ten days later by the government of Allan Blakeney. He is still the premier.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. McIsaac: I suppose there was a sort of unanimity of consensus, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) himself acknowledged in a letter to do with the achievements of the Victoria conference dated October, 1971, of which I shall quote one paragraph:

> The charter was subsequently approved by the government of Canada and the governments of eight provinces. The government of the province of Quebec, however, did not give its approval to the document. The government of Saskatchewan changed pursuant to the election of June 23, 1971, and thus far the present government has not taken a position on the charter.

I will not read the concluding paragraph of the Prime Minister's letter of October, 1971. Although I have not inquired recently of the provincial government of Saskatchewan, I believe the statement the Prime Minister made in his October, 1971, letter holds true today. The government of Saskatchewan did not, and does not, formally approve developments which supposedly resulted from that Victoria conference. Indeed, may I draw to the attention of hon. members the position of the then attorney general of Saskatchewan. The question of constitutional reform and the Victoria conference was dealt with in the legislature of Saskatchewan. If I recall correctly, the present premier was then the chief opposition spokesman. If I may I quote briefly from hon. D. V. Heald's presentation to that conference, he said in part:

> We come to the conference in a spirit of co-operation and good will, knowing that all other participants approach the meeting with the same spirit. We believe the objectives of confederation and a new constitutional document can be achieved. We hope that our deliberations here in the next few days may contribute to the strengthening of confederation.
> Concerning the amending formula, our government has always taken the position that no one province should have the right to veto constitutional changes. We now understand that several provinces are not prepared to consent to an amending formula which does not provide for those provinces having a veto. We still feel that other less rigid provisions should be considered. However, in a spirit of co-operation and with the hope of achieving a consensus we are prepared to accept the amending formula which we believe was agreed on in February.

Generally speaking, I understand that eventually there was no consensus on the part of the western provinces on their role in approving or disapproving amendments. I continue quoting:

● (1720)

We would repeat this is a compromise. We are not too happy about it and we hope our willingness to compromise here will be reciprocated by other delegations when we advance proposals that are very important to us.

We repeat the position taken by Premier Thatcher at the earlier conferences that there are problems facing our people which have, in our judgment, a far-higher priority than constitutional reform. We will be bringing these problems to the attention of the conference, as we have in the past, and ask for sympathetic understanding and co-operation from the other delegations.

I will not go on to discuss the points raised about transportation policy and regional disparities, the very theme and essence, except considerably broader than that advanced today by the hon. member for Egmont. On that general point, I am sure that if the former premier of Saskatchewan, the late Ross Thatcher, were alive today he would think differently about the position in terms of priorities on the question of patriating our constitution and the revised amending formula and, indeed, a revised constitution. However, that is perhaps neither here nor there with respect to the debate this afternoon.

I suggest we would be confusing and perhaps muddying the waters if we approved this resolution to which its theme and object I certainly subscribe. I do not quarrel with the hon. member's objective. However, to move in this regard alone at this point in time would be a mistake. By the same token, I have no great suggestion as to where and how we should move in that sense. We need to come up with better answers and better approaches. We should move quickly to get our constitution here, finding an amending formula, revising and updating the document so that we can get on with the job of building tomorrow. It certainly concerns all of us.

In his opening remarks, the hon. member referred to the current debate on the fiscal arrangements act. It touches upon the constitution. We have had numerous effective changes and adaptations over the years by virtue of federal-provincial agreements. I am not now speaking of those conferences called to discuss or consider the constitution as such but, rather, the many, almost ongoing airlifts between this capital and the various provincial capitals respecting and affecting government departments and agencies. The results of the various agreements worked out there have a very direct effect on how the country operates. They have resulted in effective changes. We have had enough of that approach. As far as I am concerned, we have had more than enough to effectively modify or change the constitution of this country.

I disagree with the hon. member's remark that we should not reject this motion. We should think of broader things. We should be expanding the hon. member's resolution and getting on with the job of developing the kind of constitution this country needs, aimed at the theme put forward in the hon. member's resolution. Let us join the Prime Minister and the government in this regard. It is only by such a debate and joint endeavour that we can systematically deal with not only the concerns of the hon. member for Egmont but other concerns on vital issues which are at the forefront at this time.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) on bringing forward this resolution. We have all too little discussion in this House on constitutional matters. That is unfortunate. Although it is rather out of fashion to talk about constitutions, the plain truth is that constitutions are the fundamental law which provide the framework within which all of our laws are made and our government is conducted. We have neglected the responsibilities of parliament in this field. Therefore, the hon. member for Egmont has done a good thing in bringing this matter before us.

I have one complaint about one small aspect of this resolution. I could not disagree with the main purport and I do not think very many members of the House could disagree. The hon. member has taken from the provisions of the Victoria charter which were agreed to—either unanimously or, at any rate, substantially—statements to which the federal parliament, the government of Canada and the governments of the provinces are committed. The first reads:

—the promotion of equality of opportunity and well-being for all individuals in Canada—

We should be committed to that. My worry is not whether we state it in general terms often or not, but whether we do the practical things which bring about that equality. The second paragraph reads:

—the assurance, as nearly as possible, that essential public services of reasonable quality are available to all individuals in Canada—

That is something that we ought to be committed to as well. I am glad to reassert that. The last paragraph is somewhat similar; it reads:

—the promotion of economic development to reduce disparities in the social and economic opportunities for all individuals in Canada wherever they may live—

Those three general statements seem to be quite unexceptional. We should try to spend—perhaps it cannot be done in one resolution—a little more time working out and talking about how we are going to make these commitments into real things. For example, all these forms of equality require equalization payments flowing through the federal parliament from the richer parts of the country to those that do not have the equivalent tax power to provide public services of reasonable quality. Without equalization, that will never be done.

I sympathize with and entirely agree with those dealing with our present problems, such as the unity of Canada, who say that we must be flexible in dealing with those problems. That is fair and reasonable. I hope that in approaching the problems of Canada, particularly the problems of federal-provincial relations, we will be flexible.

I want to issue a word of warning. If we are too flexible, allowing ourselves to deprive the federal government of the effective spending part, the effective fiscal arrangements and effective powers to carry out this task of equalization, we will destroy this country. There are many different ways of doing this but we have to be careful that we do not so deprive our central institution, the federal government, of the power which will enable it to do the very things which are talked about here—to promote equality of opportunity, and so on. We have to preserve the power to deal with these things if we are to carry out the programs to which parliament and the provincial governments have agreed in this field.

● (1730)

I would not object at all to greater delegation, either formally or otherwise, of the administrative powers of government to the provincial legislatures but such delegations and such revisions to our constitution should not be carried out at the expense of creating an ineffective federal government at the centre. We cannot preserve our country on that basis.

The same is true, in my judgment, with regard to economic development, efforts to reduce provincial disparity, and so on. It was proposed not only in the Victoria Charter but also by the Joint Committee on the Constitution, of which the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) was the chairman, that these objectives should be included in a preamble to the constitution. This was the view of the joint committee, a very representative committee composed of senators and members of the House of Commons and which listened to people from all over Canada. They said—and this is not inconsistent with what the hon. member has proposed—that a preamble ought to be provided in the constitution to include these and other items which are basic to the future of our country, and I suggest it might be done in that way.

I said there was one part of the resolution of which I cannot approve. It is the last paragraph. I am not sure whether I have misunderstood the hon. member for Egmont, but what the words seemed to say is that the parliament in the United Kingdom should amend the act only when it has received a formal request from the legislatures and governments of the provinces to amend the act. It may well be that the hon. member was thinking only of these particular changes, but this touches on a very definite subject, and that is the whole question of the formulas of amendment and, indeed, the other question of repatriation of the constitution.

I do not believe there are many hon. members who are not of the opinion that we should have our constitution made into a totally Canadian document. This would involve not only patriation but many changes in the terms and expressions contained in the document.

In the joint committee report on the Constitution of Canada to which I have just referred, it is well pointed out, in my view, that a constitution ought to be an inspiration and a mirror for the community as well as an instrument calling for the distribution of powers and that, of these two ends, it is the inspirational role which is the more important. That is very true.

We do need, as the report recommends, a new constitution, though getting a new constitution means following a long, rocky road. What the hon. member proposes is fine, but in the last paragraph he seems to be harking back to the formula known as the Fulton-Favreau formula originally proposed by Mr. Fulton, a former minister of justice, and later revived by Guy Favreau, when he in turn became minister of justice. We, as well as the government of Saskatchewan, most strenuously objected to that formula, the reason being that it created an element of rigidity. It gave a veto to every single province, the power to veto and—I use this word hesitantly when we are talking about such august bodies—even to blackmail the federal government and the other provinces. The wording of the last paragraph seems to me to revive that proposition. The paragraph does not actually refer to the parliament of Canada at all. It does, however, refer to a formal request from the legislature and governments of the provinces, all of them, presumably.

One of the things the Victoria Charter was able to accomplish, and I think it was a great advance, was to provide for an amending formula which got away from the straitjacket by providing that the majority of the provinces, consisting of a certain combination of provinces, was sufficient to approve changes in the constitution. Of course the approval of the federal parliament was also necessary. I do not suppose the hon. member will have another opportunity to return to this subject, but I hope that if he does he will be able to explain this paragraph to my satisfaction. I do not believe it is central to the main thrust of his resolution and, for that reason, I intend to support the resolution, though with the quite serious reservation I have expressed as to the last paragraph.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre Bussières (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, as previous members have done, I would like first of all to congratulate the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) for giving us the opportunity to discuss the constitution and another extremely interesting problem, namely economic and regional disparities.

I am also interested in another aspect of this resolution: what is called the Victoria charter. This subject is important because it is an historical event in the life of our country. I am convinced that if an agreement had been reached at the constitutional conference of Victoria, the pressures we are now experiencing would have been greatly reduced.

What amazes me is that the hon. member for Egmont retained only one aspect of it—article 7 of the Victoria charter. He emphasized this afternoon the importance he attached to it, due to the consensus obtained on that article by the representatives of various governments. However, I think other articles of this charter are extremely important and that some kind of agreement has been reached by those who took part in this conference. For instance, article 1 which deals with political rights, would bring within a constitutional instrument all the basic rights of the Canadian people. I feel it is important that these be included in the constitution.

Article 2 dealing with linguistic rights, and while I think it is of utmost importance to make sure that all individuals and all areas in Canada have equality of opportunity on the economic level, I feel it is also very important to recognize the equality of opportunity for all, no matter the language spoken. And I can say, Mr. Speaker, that there are still some Francophones in my province who feel they are not getting the same opportunities—and I am not talking here about air traffic controllers or air pilots. I feel therefore that this second article was also very important.

The fourth article which deals with the Supreme Court of Canada was also very important. It brought about a new flexibility to the operation of the Supreme Court, from the appointment of judges to the establishment of a college which included the attorney general, and so on and so forth.

The chapter on federal courts was also very interesting, and so was article 9 which dealt with constitutional amendments. I must confess, Mr. Speaker, that I should have been very proud at the time if the Quebec government had voted in favour of the Victoria Charter. I think that it was flexible enough to allow for the evolution of our country. I will quote, for instance, the Quebec City newspaper Le Soleil in its edition of June 23, 1971, in which the editorialist concluded as follows: "The acceptance by the provinces of this charter would enable us to repatriate our constitution and it is the interest of Quebec, like all other provinces, and to a certain degree, more than the other provinces, that the constitutional charter become a new step toward the affirmation of our national identity and of the two cultures on which it is founded." Mr. Speaker, that statement by the editorialist of the newspaper Le Soleil in 1971 reflected accurately the view taken by a good number of Quebecers of the Victoria conference. Again I regret that the government of Quebec was not at that time more broad-minded and did not give its support to those negotiations.

With respect to regional development, the hon. member for Egmont made very interesting comments and I am convinced that they represent the concerns of an important part of the people. However, I do not think it is necessary to amend the constitution to get working on that issue. It is high time for the government to have a real regional economic development policy truly adapted to the needs of all regions. It is also high time we have a real policy to give help to small and medium-sized businesses. Of course, a statement of intent in a constitution does represent some guarantees, but it does not represent any, for instance, for the Quebec dairy producers, the shoe industry in the riding of Portneuf which is having a hard time of it, but a real policy for the small and medium enterprises would surely reassure them.

A policy to protect our industry would give relative protection to our markets in the face of progressively obtruding imports. I would like to touch upon one last point: I regret that the proposal of the hon. member for Egmont is not more complete. I should have liked him to invite the government of Canada once again to resume the discussion on the patriation of the constitution, as soon as possible, and in another framework. At the time of the Victoria Charter, which is recalled here, several newspapers in Quebec pointed out the need for a broader forum for the constitutional discussions. After the November 15 election in Quebec of a party that wants to destroy the country, several editors took up once again in the newspapers the idea of broadening the constitutional debate. I feel we should attempt to remove it from the narrow compass of government heads alone, that is the Prime Minister of Canada and the premiers of the provinces, so far the only participants in the constitutional debate.

[Mr. Bussières.]

To my mind, the forum must be enlarged. The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) was saying a while ago that we seldom have occasion to discuss that topic in the House, and I think all parties sitting both in the House of Commons and in the provincial legislatures are interested in those negotiations and should participate in them. I also believe many other citizens would be eager to discuss those questions; the sooner we come to an agreement and patriate the constitution, the sooner we will the have the opportunity of proving to the people that the government of Canada is able to adapt to situations and problems.

As our Prime Minister said recently in Quebec City, the objective of the constitutional discussions is to give each level of government the powers it needs to achieve as best it can the well-being of the citizens. And I think this should be our objective, without getting caught in the trap which the member who rose before me referred to, that is to say taking away from the central government the powers which allow it to distribute the wealth which is unfortunately uneven throughout the country. I think that if we vigourously tackle the constitutional revision and allow as many Canadians as possible to participate in the discussions, we will be able to come to an agreement and to include article 7 of the Victoria Charter as well as the other items. By doing so, I think our constitution will meet the expectations of all Canadians in a more satisfactory manner.

[English]

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) on his support for regional economic development. Perhaps because I grew up, like him and with him, in Prince Edward Island, we both appreciate very much the need for regional economic development.

● (1750)

If there is any place in Canada which needs regional economic development, it is Prince Edward Island. However, that is one of the places which has been undergoing it, and while in general I think I am not entirely satisfied with the way regional economic development has been proceeding—and this is one of the mental caveats I would feel if I were supporting a motion of this kind—I nevertheless think that in that province the development plan has been reasonably successful, and of course, many years of the plan are still to come.

I suppose we are all a bit uneasy about the fact that no method which has been tried so far—at least none of which I am aware—in the area of regional economic development has proved to be entirely successful, but there are many problems in life like that which we cannot entirely solve, and I think it is important for us to go on trying to solve them and certainly to express in the Chamber our support for those great objectives.

My problem with the motion is not at all with respect to its subject matter. As mentioned by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), my problem has to do with the end of the motion. In his text the hon. member for Egmont says the following:

> Although the amending formula in this motion does not necessarily reflect either my personal or my party's position on an apropriate formula, unanimity among the eleven governments would be the most desirable—and effective—approach here.

I presume by that he means that on an over-all basis he would not adopt a formula such as this, and I see him nodding his agreement. In that case I wonder why he would adopt it in a matter of this kind.

As the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. McIsaac) has pointed out, there has not been general agreement among the provinces with respect to the desirable goal of regional economic expansion and equality of opportunity for everyone, and even if this were to be one case in which all the provinces could agree, I think the hon. member must realize that following a certain procedure in one case involving the constitution would establish some kind of precedent which it would be very hard not to follow in future times. It would certainly exert, if not a binding effect, at least a persuasive effect on what would happen subsequently.

There are two problems, as I see it, with the proposal here. The first is really an entirely novel proposal. I do not know why the hon. member chose to put it in this way, but he proposes that the Parliament of the United Kingdom not act until it has received a formal request from the legislatures and governments of the provinces. I just do not understand why the English parliament would proceed in that way. Surely it would be enough for this House to canvass the support which the provincial governments are giving, and for this House then to indicate, in the usual form of address to the Parliament of the United Kingdom, that it desires the act to be amended. Even if we were to go along with everything else in this, I cannot see any reason why we would adopt a procedure such as the hon. member suggests. It would depart entirely from the precedents. It would put the provinces in the position of dealing directly with the British parliament, which has never been the case.

The premier of Quebec some years ago tried to lobby—personally, I believe—the British parliament, and he simply was not heeded. This has been the unbroken tradition, and I do not see any reason why we would depart from that part of the procedure which we have adopted in the past.

The other aspect is with respect to whether unanimous consent should be required at all, whether that unanimous consent is expressed through this House or, as the hon. member for Egmont has suggested, whether it be expressed directly by the provinces to the British parliament. Should there even be a requirement of unanimous consent? Well, like the hon. member for Greenwood, I was not greatly enamoured of the original Fulton formula in which there was to be—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At 5.56 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING ACT, 1977

MEASURE FOR MAKING CERTAIN FISCAL PAYMENTS AND OF ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING CONTRIBUTIONS TO PROVINCES, ETC.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that Bill C-37, to provide for the making of certain fiscal payments and of established programs financing contributions to provinces, to provide for payments in respect of certain provincial taxes and fees, and to make consequential and related amendments, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): May I say, for the information of hon. members who may not have had the benefit of my comments before five o'clock, that I will offer some more now.

As I said when introducing my notice of motion at the start of private members' hour, there seemed to be some providence in discussing that motion with respect to the entrenching of an amendment to the BNA Act concerning regional disparities and the over-all debate we are having today on Bill C-37 on fiscal equalization. It is providential, perhaps for me particularly, that I have an opportunity this evening to deal more specifically with the substantial bill before us, substantial both in terms of the money that is being allocated here as well as in terms of the major program with which it deals. We are creating a structure within which the provinces and the federal government will have to live during the course of the next five years, dealing with a number of basic social programs in the area of health and education in particular and, in general advancing revenues for the maintenance of equitable social programs from coast to coast.

Hon. members have taken already some opportunities to deal with the basic background to this debate in terms of where we stand with regard to the federal system. Comments have already been made with respect to the shape of negotiations that have led up to the agreement reached last December and the approach of this government to federalism.

Certainly I agree with my colleague, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), when she said this afternoon that the profile of combative federalism which has characterized the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and, I am sorry to say, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), has not been helpful to the country, and while the Minister of Finance waxed lyrical last Friday with respect to this agreement, certainly he was less than candid in his own performance in that situation, one which did not provide any leadership with respect to negotiation and reconciliation but one which was characterized far too often by unilateral approaches, ones that were in effect a kind of confrontation which our federal system can ill afford.

I suppose in a way the Minister of Finance, in this kind of "High Noon" approach that he has been adopting with provinces from time to time during his years in office, is not all that different from his leader. After all, from the outset to the time the Prime Minister assumed his position as justice minister in the Pearson government, he acquired an exciting reputation for himself by the way in which he was able to take on various premiers or other provincial officials and indicate what a clever fellow he was, how astutely he could argue nice constitutional points and, in effect, get one up, which I believe is the phrase, on various provincial governments. I cannot believe, and I doubt if many members honestly believe, that the exercise of one-upmanship will foster much by way of support for our federal system and for our willingness to understand and recognize each others differences, each others distinct advantages and sometimes liabilities. One would hope that at the very least, as a result of the election of the Parti Québécois last November, the Prime Minister has dropped that particular unpleasant characteristic.

I have more serious concerns about the Prime Minister's style and that of the Minister of Finance because it has become my firm belief that, during his time in office, the Prime Minister has exhibited on far too many occasions an out of date approach to the concept of how our federal system works. I know that the Prime Minister, if anything, has been regarded as a constitutional expert, that he published books, wrote articles, gave lectures, and was considered to be one of the more informed people with respect to the advantages of a federal system, particularly ours. But I think also we have to recognize the fact that much of the Prime Minister's formative experience took place in an altogether different situation, in an era prior to the 1960's when Quebec as one province stood in a much different relationship to the Canadian federation.

I think as well that there has come through clearly during the Prime Minister's time in office a rigidity of approach which has not been attentive to modern day needs and requirements either of the federal or provincial governments. The clinging to rigid, outworn concepts has not helped us, either in fiscal matters as are before us today or in more general matters as they pertain to Confederation.

In addition, I find the Prime Minister has a shocking lack of a sense of history and a sense of understanding of the nature of this country. Indeed the Prime Minister's approach to dealing with the Confederation issue has far too often been a kind of individualistic if not elitist approach. I suppose that is not surprising, given his background, but I wish he would stop imposing it upon the rest of us. It is terribly important, when viewing the situation in Quebec, in the Atlantic provinces, or in western Canada, to realize it is there not only in an individual sense but in a community sense. In dealing with that sense of community, its needs and its requirements, we will deal realistically with the shape of this Canadian federation.

As I said at the outset, Mr. Speaker, combining these with an attitude which registered federal-provincial relations on the profile of a winner's and loser's game will not help us to survive successfully in the twenty-first century. As I say, there are fundamental weaknesses in this government and its failure to understand the nature of modern federalism, and in particular the Canadian federation. I think some of them are reflected in the comments of the Minister of Finance on the measure before us today.

I want to quote two items in particular from the speech the minister made last Friday. As reported at page 3201 of Hansard for February 18 he said:

> We at the federal level believe that the national government must preserve enough fiscal resources to redistribute income to persons and regions, to stabilize the economy and to continue to help finance the services Canadians in all parts of the country need and deserve.

In some ways one could not take great issue with that statement, but one is hit particularly with the use of the verb "stabilize" and the phrase "stabilize the economy". I suppose in a way the minister let the cat out of the bag some months ago when preliminary discussion was taking place on these particular negotiations and the bill that is before us, with the suggestion that they had to put the cap on in terms of runaway expenses, shared-cost programs, and responsible expenditures, and that we did not want to see a situation that is perhaps in danger of occurring in some areas of runaway expenses that bore no relationship to the needs in the several regions of the country.

What concerns me, Mr. Speaker, is the lack of recognition that the services that are being provided across the country at the present time, in health, hospital care, and post secondary education, are not all the same. There exists in some instances the widest possible disparity. To fail to recognize that situation would be to fail to take into account some of the pressing problems that we have within our Confederation.

As reported at page 3202 of Hansard for Friday, February 18, the minister also said:

> This program assures all Canadians of a reasonable level of vital public services, without forcing them to pay much higher tax rates than the national average. It attempts to reduce as much as possible regional disparities throughout the country and it will continue to do so as an efficient means of preserving national unity.

Statements about not paying much higher taxes, or about attempts to reduce regional disparities, in a sense are a kind of halfhearted commitment to something that I thought the Prime Minister and his colleague had committed themselves to very fundamentally and fully. I will not repeat or trespass upon the patience of the House to put on record some of my remarks during private members' hour this afternoon. The rhetoric delivered by the Prime Minister on such occasions falls very far short of what the Minister of Finance was telling us about this bill on Friday last.

It seems that we are in a situation where, on occasion, the Prime Minister's rhetoric has been very clear in dealing basically and directly with regional inequality. But nine years after he assumed office there are still no clear goals. Perhaps what is worse there are no accepted or defined strategies with respect to closing the gap—the income gap, the opportunity gap, the employment gap—that exists between the several regions of this country, and between those who are poor and depressed and those who are more affluent. Measured by several criteria we can discover very quickly that in some instances the gap has actually grown.

The major weakness I find in the legislation we are discussing tonight are that it does not take into account disparity of income, unemployment, and opportunity, and it does not allow for the very real differences that exist in the cost of living.

Some hon. members may recall that last December, at the time of the conference between the Minister of Finance and the provincial governments, I asked the Prime Minister specifically about the related aspects of this particular discussion. As reported at page 1677 of Hansard for December 6, 1976, I put this question to the Prime Minister:

> Last June I questioned the Prime Minister about the possible negative effect of the proposed fiscal arrangement amendments on the have-not provinces. He assured this House then that the changes would prove advantageous to those provinces. In view of statements to the contrary by a number of provincial ministers can the Prime Minister now state definitely that these proposals will maintain the previous commitment to narrow the disparity in social services between provinces, and in particular take into account the increasing phenomenon of very high unemployment in these particular provinces?

The Prime Minister replied:

> Well, Mr. Speaker, on the last part of the question the proposals are not by themselves directly meant to deal with the unemployment problem. They have to do with social services, post-secondary education and medical and hospital care being part of the social services. The fact that some provinces object to them is not surprising. The provinces all come to Ottawa in the hope of getting a greater transfer of money or tax points. This is part of the routine of federal-provincial conferences. I told the House last year and I repeat now that these programs as they are being proposed, particularly the establishment of interim financing proposals, are meant to give the provinces a much greater degree of autonomy in the application of their programs and will still guarantee they will get the money necessary to fulfil those programs.

There were additional questions and answers which I will not put on the record again, Mr. Speaker, but the way in which they are presented gives a clear indication that the Prime Minister seems to fail to realize that in the kinds of major agreements being presented to the House today, and the transfer both of tax points and revenue, we are not dealing just with a "stabilization", to quote the Minister of Finance, of the present situation. If we are, surely we are condemning more than half the provinces of this country to being, in the common term, have-not provinces. I say that there is no attempt, either in the comments of the Prime Minister or perhaps more important, in the provisions of this legislation, to close the gap, or to deal effectively and directly with the problem that has plagued parts of this country since the time of Confederation.

I should like to quote from the report of the Royal Commission on Maritime Claims made in 1927 which had this to say:

> We are bound to keep in mind that the depressed condition of the Maritime provinces, the contraction there has been in the revenue from their natural resources, and the absence of large-scale commercial and industrial enterprises make the problem of provincial taxation for them a very serious one indeed.

That is not a quote from the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council or from the Atlantic provinces chambers of commerce during the past few months but, as I said, from the Royal Commission on Maritime Claims 50 years ago. It does not appear that the message has been heard.

Mr. Breau: Of course it has.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): My friend from New Brunswick will have an opportunity to explain in what way the measures before us are going to—

Mr. Breau: You people keep on speaking.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): There are all kinds of opportunity, Mr. Speaker, and I am surprised that the hon. member is so bashful. Perhaps he finds it difficult to defend the legislation or to explain it in terms of closing the disparity gap about which we are both concerned. He is concerned about the problem in New Brunswick, and I am concerned about the problem in Prince Edward Island. I am sure the hon. member does not intend to stabilize disparity. I think he wants to believe that if we are going to arrive at an equitable agreement covering the next five years, at the end of that time these particular programs will have assisted, not detracted from the single role we all have in mind, that of putting the provinces of the Atlantic area on an equitable footing with the rest of the country. If the hon. member wants to speak on that and support that concept, I will give him my wholehearted backing.

● (2020)

To point out the difficulties which the federal government seems to have in perception, let me quote from the report of another commission which did not sit quite so long ago as the Duncan commission in 1926. I quote part of the Rogers report of 1934, with respect to the Nova Scotia submission on dominion-provincial relations, as follows:

> The over-emphasis on money grants as a solatium for provincial grievances not only served to obscure the fundamental difficulties of the Maritime provinces within the federal system established by the BNA Act, 1867, but in its later development did much to disturb and vitiate the relations between the dominion and the provinces. In Ottawa it created an impression that disaffected provinces could always be bought off by a money payment. In Halifax and in other provincial capitals it suggested that the financial embarrassment of a province might be relieved by additional or increased subsidies from the dominion, secured as a result of a revival of old grievances or the formulation of new claims for financial aid. It is not intended to suggest that a revision of the financial arrangements of union was not necessary in 1869 or at later periods. This subject will be dealt with in due course on its own merits. It is important to observe, however, that the precedent created in 1869 gave a direction to the claims of Nova Scotia which had an unfortunate bearing on its relations with the dominion. It overstressed the importance of increased subsidies as a remedy for the economic difficulties of the province, and diverted attention from the more important task of securing an investigation and revision of those features of the federal constitution and of federal policy which have had a more important, though less obvious, effect on its economic position.

I have quoted part of the Rogers report of 1934 which reflected on the fact that subsidies or fiscal transfers in themselves are not enough and that we must make other, major attempts to see that these provinces are put on a viable, resourceful footing of their own.

We see the situation in which, under equalization, we shall see transferred something like $2,195 million in 1976-77, whereas the Regional Development Incentives Act will be responsible for transferring less than $100 million. Indeed that is one substantial program which, according to the estimates tabled the other day, is to be reduced by some 10 per cent. That means, if one takes into account the over-all increase in expenditures, a reduction over-all between 15 per cent and 20 per cent.

It seems to me that the story of federal-provincial fiscal relations and arrangements is as tortuous as any you will find. As the Rogers report has pointed out, since 1869 various attempts have been made on the part of the federal government to make an equitable transfer between the various provinces, in order to assist the eastern provinces, particularly eastern regions which find it difficult to operate on an equal footing with the rest of the country.

Almost yearly one hears threats, complaints, and representations. One hears demands for new deals, threats to separate, and appeals to the imperial government. But there is one clear, consistent theme in all of this: it is that a number of provinces and regions have seldom received an equitable deal. Indeed, if I may use the example of Nova Scotia prior to Confederation, Nova Scotia had expenditures of $664,000. With the loss of customs and excise revenues to the federal government, it received total revenues of only $107,000.

The history of the maritime provinces in many instances is that of inadequate financing, while provinces which had the advantages of being centrally placed and able to formulate their own industrial base protected by tariffs were able to show budget surpluses. The Royal Commission on maritime Claims in 1926 concluded that the level of grants given the Maritimes before 1907 had not been just, and that even with the major fiscal adjustments of that year they were still based on an inadequate adjustment of what the dominion government should concede by way of grants.

The problem with which we must grapple, along with the complexities of this bill, is whether or not the arrangements which have been put before us and which were generally agreed to by the provinces in December hold out the danger of fundamentally increasing the sorts of disparities which exist now. When we look at the situation in the five eastern provinces specifically, and the swelling of the unemployment rate which has taken place in the past several months, we cannot be sanguine about this kind of proposed agreement and about the services which will be provided under this arrangement. We want to be sure that the formula and framework which is being presented here will not be so rigid as to prevent effective action for dealing with disparities of income, employment, or unforeseen developments which may affect either existing revenues or bring about, indeed, a shortfall of revenues, or excessive costs in certain programs of the poorer provinces.

The other thing which disturbs me, is that, despite the negotiations which have gone on for the better part of the past year, there is no clearly defined commitment in terms of the standard of service to be achieved, and there has been little consideration of the impact of particular services within areas of acute economic and social disparity.

As I said at the outset of my remarks, one of the difficulties we faced in the past was the government's adversary approach in the field of federal-provincial relations. This has not happened once, in isolation. This course has contributed to the growing misunderstanding between the various regions of the country. When we look at the present state of Confederation we cannot be comfortable or feel confident about what is happening. What bothers me more than anything is the fact that misconceptions, misunderstandings, confusion, yes, even anxiety, exist in several regions of the country with respect to other regions.

What has contributed to these misunderstandings? Surely it is the fact that on a number of occasions the government, in attempting to resolve its own particular position, has reinforced some of the fears, misunderstandings and anxieties which exist. We have had enough of the confrontationist approach to federal-provincial relations, enough of unilateral actions which can undermine the confidence of provinces and the people of those provinces not only in the federal government but in the federal system itself. We need, more than at any time in recent years, a clear understanding of what our basic needs and requirements are, not only in specific localities where we, as individuals live, but in a total sense. We need to know, all of us, the various needs and requirements of the various regions of this country.

In addition, we need some sense of each other's worth. We spend so much time lamenting and listening to the problems being experienced in other parts of the country that we forget that in this unique experiment, Canadian confederation, we have each of us contributed our own gifts in the formation of this unique national enterprise. It is terribly important for us to identify the virtues which the various regions and provinces of this country possess, and show how we can all reinforce one another, to make Confederation stronger.

I suppose, in the final analysis, the responsibility rests heavily on the members of this House. It rests on members on all sides of this chamber who must realize that, individually and collectively, we represent a wide spectrum of opinion and aspirations existing in this country today. If these cannot be clearly stated and understood in the course of the next few years, if we cannot have a more frank discussion than has been the case, especially prior to the introduction of the bill we are now discussing, we will not contribute much which is positive or worth while in any attempt to re-invigorate and renovate Confederation, a confederation which has served us well for the last 109 years. Certainly that confederation can serve us a great deal better if we know which weaknesses need to be dealt with in Canada and where the strengths are which can be enhanced.

Although the Minister of Finance is not present in the House this evening I hope he will take very much to heart the suggestions made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) with respect to putting more than just discussions concerning major renovations and changes in federal-provincial matters before this Chamber, before such renovations and changes become a fait accompli. The government will be very much strengthened and improved by that kind of approach. Certainly the Canadian people will feel they have been much better served.

• (2030)

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to follow my good friend, the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald). I have been very interested in this debate which primarily has been conducted by members of this party. It is too bad the government members are again sitting on their hands rather than participating in the debate on this very important legislation. We would like to know whether they are slavishly following the dictates of the cabinet with regard to this legislation. As is so often the case, again they are not voicing the perspective from their constituencies.

I was particularly proud of the way in which the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) initiated the debate on our behalf with respect to this legislation. In an incisive way he dealt with the context in which this legislation should be considered. He made observations with regard to the kind of Canada he would like to see when he becomes Prime Minister of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I was also very interested in the remarks of my colleague, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald). At this time, when there is a lot of interest in equality of the sexes and the promotion of women's rights in this country, it is significant that the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands should be the first woman to analyse and deal with a financial bill of this importance in the House of Commons. She is the first woman in Canadian history to make such a contribution on this kind of legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I want to point out to the members on the government side that we are interested in looking at this legislation in its proper context. We are attempting to develop a meaningful debate with regard to the future of the country. It is very easy for members opposite to rely on their leader, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), to enunciate whatever policies they may have. However, in view of the developments that have taken place over the past few months, it is important for all members, regardless of party, to stand in their places and express the kind of Canada they see and want, and the reasons why they think it is imperative that this country stay together as one unit rather than splitting in separate directions.

As far as this party is concerned, I am not in the position of having to be modest on this occasion. The Conservative party has made a great contribution to matters of national unity. I am proud to serve in this House with the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). When he was prime minister of this country he led an administration which paid attention to the various regions. It attempted to come to terms with some of the regional disparities we faced as a matter of tradition after many under a Liberal regime.

The right hon. member was aided in that particular government by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton). I recall very vividly some of the types of legislation and initiatives taken by that government. There were innovative and creative programs which dealt with regional matters in a new and challenging way.

It was a time when some of the hinterlands of this country were remembered and recognized by the central government. There were programs such as Roads to Resources, the ARDA legislation, and legislation with respect to Atlantic Canada. Regional equalization grants were given to Atlantic Canada. Initiatives were taken to bring some regional planning in terms of energy and power to Atlantic Canada. I recall the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act.

Mr. McGrath: The Atlantic Development Board.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: My friend from St. John's East corrects me. Regional initiatives such as this were taken by that government which was truly concerned about equality of opportunity regardless of region. They were not only related to electoral gains or electoral prospects, which seem to be the only guidelines of the present government.

The government led by the right hon. member for Prince Albert was roundly criticized by spokesmen for the Liberal party. Its then leaders travelled across Ontario saying that the prime minister was giving everything to the west. Because some attention was being paid to regional disparities in an attempt to bring equal opportunity across this country, this was turned against the government in Ontario and Quebec.

A lot can be learned from the initiatives taken by that Conservative government. I can assure hon. members that with a Conservative government after the next election there will be a return to the proposition where all parts of this country are regarded in equal terms and all will receive reasonable attention.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: There is one thing that characterizes this government's approach to federal-provincial relations. As others of my colleagues have pointed out, there has been a spirit of confrontation. It is fair to say not one provincial government, regardless of political stripe, trust the national government at this time. The whole aura that surrounds federal-provincial meetings is one of confrontation, the adversary system. There is not one co-operative endeavour for the best interests of our national, provincial and regional areas.

I want to say something to the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale), who henceforth will be known as "one-term Goodale".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: If he continues to interrupt, I may have to go my full 40 minutes. I know he wants to speak in this debate. I am sure he will have something important to say.

I want to deal with this legislation from the perspective of what consideration should be given to it and the kind of approach that should be taken with regard to federal-provincial relations. I am concerned about the situation that has developed in the province of Quebec. However, it is not a unique situation. Various regions of Canada, the outlying regions at least, have some grievances. As a westerner, I know that some of these grievances have been around almost since the time of Confederation.

All members of this House unanimously agree that the prospect of anything other than the continuation of a united Canada would be a disaster. Those who suggest otherwise on the basis of the separation of one part of Canada from the totality of Canada really misunderstand some of the difficulties which would follow such a separation. I am thinking of those who consider the prospect of carrying on under some common market arrangement among the different regions of Canada, but I do not think this is an easy solution or any solution at all to the problems of this country. Thinking in terms of a common market is not going to do anything to solve this fundamental problem.

There are different areas one could discuss by way of example to demonstrate that, despite talking in terms of some type of union between different areas, our problems will remain the same. If you talk, for instance, about the tariffs we might expect under this new union, if you talk in terms of common money, if you talk in terms of transportation, in all these areas separation, or a concept of union or co-operation under a common market concept, really does not solve any of the problems which would arise.

When I think in terms of tariffs, for example, and about the possibility of a common tariff policy being accepted by various regions in our country, I realize there is an ongoing difference of opinion. People in central Canada have traditionally been in support of high tariffs to give protection to the manufacturing industries. Consider textiles, for example. People in Atlantic Canada and western Canada tend to be free traders by basic preference.

Then we talk in terms of monetary policy. We know that massive unemployment now exists in the five eastern provinces and people in those provinces tend to think in terms of supporting an expansionary monetary policy in order to deal with this very real problem. But when you take the balance of people in Canada, support for expansionary monetary policy is not a priority item because people tend to be more concerned about the inflation and inflationary tendencies so these other parts of Canada tend to support a more restrictive monetary policy.

I cannot visualize how in any type of Canada separated by region there could be anything by way of improvement in the already unsatisfactory transportation system we now unfortunately have. The fact is, I don't see that we gain any advantage by separating. I don't think, if one looks at these matters rationally from this point of view, that there is any particular or any noticeable advantage to be achieved by separation. I think we have to remind ourselves of the particular advantages of remaining united and trying to work within the context of a united Canada to improve each and every part and eliminate each and every regional disparity in each and every region.

I must say, as a western Canadian, that the idea of some type of alienation toward central Canada has been known to exist. There have been a number of expressions of that. Fortunately the feeling of alienation has not developed to any large extent. It has not developed to the point of there being any substantial support for separation as such. But there has been that kind of feeling in western Canada, and there is a historical background to this which has extended over a period of years. The more recent example, I suppose, is the concern people in western Canada have felt about the whole energy question. It appears to them, at least, to be a case of confrontation by the federal authorities against the rights of western provinces to exercise control over their natural resources.

The people of western Canada have, of course, been traditionally concerned over such matters as freight rates. They are at present concerned very greatly by the fact that while a national policy of restraint and controls is apparently being imposed in all parts of Canada, those controls do not seem to affect the cost of agricultural equipment and farming supplies, costs of which continue to skyrocket. These are examples of some of the general topics of discontent one hears about in western Canada.

I suppose it would be fair to say there has been across western Canada a general, undefined feeling that government located in central Canada has legislated with respect to western Canada under some form of thinly concealed policy of colonialism. This feeling, possibly has some historical basis, probably all starting with the difficulties leading to the Riel rebellion in 1885 which was brought on by ignorance of western conditions and indifference to prairie aspirations.

Between the rebellion of 1885 and the First World War the West was far too busy coping with the substantial number of immigrants coming to that part of the country to pay any heed to the grievances it might have had. There was, during those years, a commercial real estate and construction boom financed by eastern money. This money flow seemed to be arbitrarily shut down about 1913 when writs of foreclosure began to replace loans, and eastern bankers were blamed for extracting their pound of flesh. It has been stated as a fact that branch managers in the West pleaded guiltless and blamed policy decisions on head offices, a circumstance which helped to solidify prairie antagonisms. At that point in time, as it came clearly evident to western Canadians that they were somehow a captive market of the tariff-protected eastern manufacturers while paying freight on everything imported from eastern Canada, westerners felt they were obliged also to pay freight on everything they sold. Successive disastrous crop failures and wheat price levels wrought havoc over a period of years and historically the central government seemed either incapable or unwilling to answer these crises. The political manifestations of the West and dismay over the circumstances led to the creation of political movements such as the Progressive party, that splinter party over here, the CCF, which is now called the NDP, and the Social Credit party. The self-image that western Canadians have of themselves is that of a cow fed in the west, housed in the west, but milked in the east.

The western historian, James H. Gray, has said that it was an article of western faith that the fruits of western labour all went to enrich the Ottawa government, St. James Street, Bay Street, and the rapacious tariff-protected manufacturers of Ontario and Quebec.

● (2050)

I simply bring some of these historical considerations and feelings which one hears enunciated from time to time—and you will be glad to hear, Mr. Speaker, that there will be a happy ending—to the attention of the House to indicate that there is, and has been over a period of years, strong sentiment expressed by many westerners regarding their position within Confederation. While the list of generally held concerns on the part of western Canadians has been a long one, extending from the conviction that western Canada should have a higher proportion of seats in the Parliament of Canada to the feeling that legislation directed to the west has been characterized by a kind of handout legislation as opposed to more appropriate changes in taxation policy to stimulate economic growth and self-sufficiency, it is important that we understand the feeling of western Canadians in respect to regional disparity and the fact that those within western Canada are today not receiving the attention they should from the central government.

The fact of the matter is that, notwithstanding these statements, there has developed a very strong feeling in western Canada that, despite the fact that they consider they are not receiving or have not received fair treatment from the central government, the vast majority of western Canadians do support the concept of a united Canada and reject out of hand any concept of separation. I hope that we will continue to be able to have the people of western Canada support this particular position. I simply want to point out to my colleagues in this House who come from the province of Quebec that there is some sense within other parts of Canada that the needs and aspirations of these other parts of Canada have not in fact been met by the national government. However, let me tell these members, as a representative from western Canada, that I propose to do everything within my power to promote the concept of a United Canada, including a Quebec that receives fair and equitable treatment. I know that this feeling is shared by other representatives from western Canada, regardless of party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I want to deal, Mr. Speaker, with some of the specifics of Bill C-37. I think that this bill, when boiled down, amounts to an attempt by the federal government to reduce its expenditures in health and welfare and the equalization of regional disparities. Despite the statements of the Minister of Finance to the effect that this bill represents the ingenuity of Canadian federalism, the bill represents nothing more than the attempt of the government to unleash the burdens of health and education costs upon the provinces. This is the government's motivation in hurrying this bill before the House, and it was its motivation in starting the whole process of federal-provincial meetings which led to this bill.

Understanding this, we must ask ourselves why the provinces are so ready to accept this change in fiscal responsibilities which adds to their already substantial burden in the entire area of education, health and welfare? Quite frankly, it is not because of the minister's claim that it gives the provinces greater flexibility in budgetary planning, but rather that the premiers and provincial finance ministers sensed that they were dealing with a federal government determined to reduce its responsibilities in the area of social services, and that the federal government was going to be totally inflexible in doing so. In short, the provinces understood that the revenue-sharing proposals of the federal government were the best they were going to get.

For the minister to argue that this bill is not going to disrupt the quality of social services across the country is to ignore the statements of the premiers upon leaving the federal-provincial first ministers' conference last December. Premier Blakeney of Saskatchewan, for example, predicted a revenue shortfall for the province of Saskatchewan because of this revenue sharing agreement, and said that taxes will have to be raised in Saskatchewan in order not to cut back services. Premier Bennett of British Columbia, according to an article in the Ottawa Citizen, said that although he will not increase provincial taxes in 1977, there will be a reduction in certain services. Indeed the key words in this bill are "revenue sharing". No longer is the government talking about "cost sharing"; rather it is talking about changes in its bookkeeping practices so the huge expenditures that are foreseen over the next five years in health care costs, for example, will show up on provincial ledgers instead of on its own.

This bill in the simplest terms represents a "take it or leave it" offer to the provinces and, as we have seen, the provinces, seeing nothing more equitable or sensitive to their needs on the horizon, took it. This "take it or leave it" aspect of the bill which the provinces were faced with also describes the situation that parliament, and in particular the opposition, finds itself in with respect to this legislation. This has been dealt with very adequately by the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

The leader of the New Democratic Party, in a rather peculiar speech last Friday, said that the official opposition was supporting this bill and was doing so because of some perverse desire to increase the financial difficulties of the poorest regions and provinces of Canada. This criticism, besides being unjustified and unfair, fails to appreciate the difficulty we in the opposition are faced with every time this kind of legislation, representing the result of months of federal-provincial negotiation, is presented in this House. One wonders what possessed the leader of the NDP to come to the conclusion that he did. Since his party's popularity remains at 16 per cent, one wonders why he spends time flailing away in his speeches at the Conservative party instead of dealing with the merits of the bill or its shortcomings, as he sees them.

Like the provinces in so many cases when dealing with this particularly parsimonious government, we too in the opposition are faced with a "take it or leave it" proposition. To accept this bill is to accept that which we feel is far from perfect, and moreover that which we, if we were in the government, would never force the provinces to accept. But to oppose it unconditionally would leave us in a similarly tenuous position, for quite obviously, this bill represents a development in Canadian politics and in the Canadian constitutional system that has far-reaching consequences for the institution of parliament and parliament's relevance to the country.

My party's former leader, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), said recently in Edmonton that the House of Commons is the only truly national forum in Canada, made up of citizens from all walks of life and regions in this vast country. Yet despite this the House of Commons has had little, if any, influence upon this bill or upon the entire constitutional debate that has gone on in the country, particularly since the present Prime Minister headed the government in 1968. I believe that this is one of the most important reasons for the failure of that particular debate which ended in the rejection of the Victoria charter, and it is why I feel that the Prime Minister's expressed desire to repatriate the constitution before an amending formula is adopted will similarly end in failure. Such far-reaching discussions cannot be carried on solely at the executive and bureaucratic level without any input from the ordinary representatives of the Canadian people in the House of Commons and in the provincial legislatures.

Professor Donald Smiley has called the process in which the Prime Minister, or the finance minister, or the minister of health and welfare, meet with their provincial counterparts and with senior bureaucrats "executive federalism".

● (2100)

Bill C-37 is another example of what amounts to federal-provincial diplomacy, with the House of Commons serving as little more than a rubber stamp to ratify what could be described as a treaty between foreign governments.

This whole process of executive federalism, of dealing with the constitutional system of the country at only the highest and, in most cases, the most remote levels of government, belittles the House of Commons, renders the opposition meaningless, and contributes to a sense of the high-level confrontations between political stars which heighten rather than reduce the centrifugal forces inherent in federal systems of government.

It is this point, the habit of the present government to play one region against another to its own advantage, that I want to discuss this evening. As a federal politician coming from western Canada I feel that I would be remiss in my duty to my constituents and to my colleagues here in the House of Commons if I were not to bring to the attention of the government, as I did, the feeling which does exist in western Canada with respect to the state of affairs we find in our national government.

[Mr. Hnatyshyn.]

It is very easy to dismiss this feeling of hostility as the manifestation of grievances against a remote government in Ottawa which has very little electoral support in the west. What one sees, however, is a turning of this grievance away from criticism of the Liberal government to a criticism of Confederation itself. As I have pointed out, up to this point the talk on western separatism has been shallow and confined to a few malcontents, but it is disturbing to a federal member of parliament and to a member of a party which stands for a strong and united Canada in which regional and cultural differences are enriched through contacts established across the entire country to witness the emotional response such separatist talk elicits in many people.

Politicians and academics tend to underestimate the value and power of symbols in the political culture of a country. Unfortunately for those who espouse the federalist ideal, the symbols which are associated with that ideal are in many regions of the country being weakened and attacked as irrelevant, or even harmful to the legitimate aspirations of the citizens in those particular regions.

It is difficult to fix blame for this because the problem is so complex and ambiguous, but surely the role of the federal government is not to exacerbate such feelings of discontent within Confederation because of its fiscal inflexibility, its stubborn refusal to amend policies which offend particular regions—such policies as transportation in the west, or perhaps cable television within the province of Quebec and elsewhere—and its attempt to dump on to the provinces, as my friend, the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather), would say, the fiscal burden to provide for programs that it in previous years initiated.

As my party's leader pointed out in opening this debate this bill does not represent the real meaning of Confederation but rather the means by which our federal system is operated. But what is important in this bill is not so much the revenue-sharing agreement between the provinces and the federal government but the manner by which this bill was conceived—in bureaucratic isolation, imposed upon the provinces, and then presented as an accomplished fact to parliament for its cursory approval.

I want to joint in the statements made by my leader in opening this debate, and I urge upon the government during the remainder of its mandate to regard its federal-provincial relationships from a substantially different viewpoint than it has taken up to this time. Unless this happens we are going to suffer difficulties until the next election, but I can assure hon. members that after the next election a Conservative government will pay fair and reasonable attention to the regions of our country, to the betterment of the whole.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, as have all hon. members of this House, I have been very interested over the course of the last several hours to listen to the important debate which has been taking place with respect to federal-provincial fiscal arrangements. I welcome this opportunity to say just a few words in the discussion this evening, partially at least in response to some of the rather provoking commentary which we have just heard from my friend, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn). At the outset it might be useful to set the record straight. The water has been substantially muddied by what has been said in the last few moments.

Before the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar got into his substantive comments about the legislation and some of his concerns as a westerner, he began with a rather gratuitous and unnecessary preamble which, I am sorry to say, emphasized two rather familiar and unfortunate Conservative themes, divisiveness and confrontation. The hon. member spoke about divisiveness in Canada, and in the early part of his remarks he went back some 15 years in our history and made the general accusation that somehow the Liberal party had criticized the Diefenbaker administration for giving too much to western Canada. That allegation is rather nonsensical. In terms of regional disparity and alienation in western Canada those problems only grew worse during the years 1958 to 1962; they did not improve.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Goodale: In fact, despite the largest majority given to any prime minister, let alone a western prime minister, they did not improve. Western problems festered very much during those years. They received a lot of lip service, but precious little action.

After dwelling on that red herring, the previous speaker went on to make some comments about confrontation with the provinces. With regard to that matter I ask him to look particularly at his own province—which is mine as well—and look at the actions of the Blakeney provincial administration. That is getting pretty close to home for both of us. In relations with Saskatchewan I suggest that if there is confrontation in our federal-provincial dealings, it begins with Mr. Blakeney.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Goodale: Hon. members opposite laugh, but it is interesting to note that the Conservatives in Saskatchewan seem to approve of the Blakeney brand of politics. Let us consider the present provincial Conservative leader, Mr. Collver. He avoids confrontation, all right; he capitulates.

The potash controversy in Saskatchewan has been a very important subject to people there for many months. The provincial government proposes to nationalize that very important industry. The Conservative party there avoided confrontation with Mr. Blakeney's government; it did literally nothing in the legislature or outside the legislature to prevent the passage of legislation in the province of Saskatchewan which would, in effect, nationalize this particular resource industry in western Canada. The Tory formula for avoiding confrontation is capitulation, and I do not think anyone in this country would adopt that philosophy, let alone anyone from western Canada. So much for the hon. member's rather unworthy abuse heaped upon this administration! It simply cannot be supported by the facts.

If hon. members want to consider some real facts about western alienation and about the effective efforts which have been made and continue to be made to satisfy the legitime aspirations of westerners, I ask hon. members to think of an industry in western Canada which is fundamental to our way of life, fundamental to our economy and fundamental to our economic health. I refer to the grains industry of western Canada. It can be examined and seen as a useful, constructive, and positive example of what federalism in this country can achieve for a region such as western Canada.

As I say, nothing can be more fundamental to western aspirations and western well-being than a healthy and vibrant grains economy. You do not have to go back too far in the history of this country, only to the late 1960's, to find a period of time in western Canada when the grains economy was in real trouble, not in trouble because of any fault of the farmers in the west. They were doing what they do better than anyone else anywhere in the world, that is, to produce top quality grains and oil seeds. The problem was in marketing and in grain prices around the world. We found prices that were skidding steadily downward, and grain markets that were getting tighter and tighter. At that time the government of Canada began to respond with a series of important initiatives which have continued over the last six or seven years and which have led to a remarkable improvement in the health and the prospects for continued health for the grains industry in western Canada.

We can think, first of all, of such things as expanded credit facilities and long-term government guarantees for the Canadian Wheat Board to assist in the pursuit of new markets. We can think of such things, for example, as vigorous Canadian efforts to break into the world's barley markets where we had never seriously been before 1970. I would mention as well the annual commitment of $10 million toward a new market development fund to enhance our grain marketing opportunities.

New research facilities have been added through the Canada Department of Agriculture, a new crop science division at the University of Saskatchewan in Saskatoon, and a protein-oil-starch pilot plant in Saskatoon to help find new ways of processing our grains and oil seeds. We have seen also the development of a two-price wheat program. For 25 years the great clarion call of every prairie politician and every major western farm organization was a demand that the federal government implement a two-price program for western wheat. That program was in fact developed by the present minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) and by this government, and for the past five years it has been in place, functioning to the advantage of prairie grain producers.

I could mention as well the substantial increases in the level of available cash advances, and broader, more flexible repayment opportunities for producers. I could mention improvements in the timing of Canadian Wheat Board final payments and adjustment cheques; the implementation of the deferred cash ticket option on grain deliveries; the provision of the best available production and marketing information to farmers regularly and early each year well in advance of seeding.

There have been determined efforts, which have been largely successful, to remove the inequities in our system of domestic feed grains marketing to provide farmers with a freedom of choice and to allow our natural production advantages to prevail. We have seen the establishment of a separate marketing pool for malting barley, effective for the 1975-76 crop year; a new quota system; the block shipping system; and the producer election of the advisory committee to the Canadian Wheat Board which is now enshrined in the Canadian Wheat Board Act itself.

A poll has been carried out amongst rapeseed producers regarding their preferred method of rapeseed marketing, and now legislation is before the House to facilitate the voluntary pooling of producer returns from rapeseed sales to provide flexibility and again a freedom of choice.

We have seen the purchase of 6,000 grain hopper cars, with at least 2,000 more on order, to speed the movement of prairie grain to export positions. We have seen a boxcar repair program put into effect; the Mants report on boxcar allocation procedures; the appointment of port co-ordinators for Thunder Bay and Vancouver. Recently we've had the widely respected report of the Snavely Commission on the costs of transporting grain by rail, and soon the Hall Commission report on grain handling and transportation. That report is in its final stages of preparation after months of public hearings and careful deliberations which have established a solid base of credibility and trust for the commission's work.

I would also like to mention that after six years of determined, conscientious work we now have in place the Western Grains Stabilization Plan which commits millions of federal dollars annually to supporting the strength and stability of the western grains economy, a plan which even today is beginning to prove its substantial merit and value to individual grain producers and to the grains economy of western Canada generally, as we see, unfortunately, a weakening trend in world markets and prices, and at the same time costs of production continuing to increase. It is obvious that the Western Grains Stabilization Plan—a plan which was opposed and obstructed at every step by the gentlemen opposite—will, in the course of the next several months, establish clearly and categorically its unparalleled value to western Canadian grain producers.

I suggest that that is a rather impressive "check list" of accomplishments affecting the western Canadian grains industry, an industry which is fundamental to the west, and this tends to belie the kind of negative cynicism which unfortunately we hear expressed so often by the gentlemen across the way.

[Mr. Goodale.]

I should not leave the question of western alienation without reference to a major event which occurred about four years ago and which has yielded tangible results for the west since that time. I am thinking of the Western Economic Opportunities Conference held in Calgary in 1973.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Goodale: The gentlemen across the way do not like to recall that conference, just as they do not like to recall the list of achievements in the grains industry, because they know that their opposition to the items that have affected the grains industry and their skepticism and belittling of the Western Economic Opportunities Conference are not at all to their credit. It only establishes once again that cynicism and pessimism which have the effect, not only in the west but in other parts of the country, of contributing to national disunity and fueling the fires of separatism, of which they take political advantage whenever and wherever they can.

What has resulted from the Western Economic Opportunities Conference is, for example, our railway cost disclosure legislation, the response to another long-standing request of the provinces regarding more direct information from the railways about their costing factors. That legislation is now on our books, something that the gentlemen opposite forget only too easily. They also ingore the establishment of an important federal-provincial consultative institution known as the federal-provincial conference on western transportation involving all the ministers in western Canada with their federal counterpart and all the relevant officials who have been meeting constantly ever since the Western Economic Opportunities Conference to deal with western transportation concerns and to develop a consensus as to how they should be handled. I would mention also Bill C-33, which is on the order paper, dealing with the National Transportation Act, amendments proposed to eliminate largely the long-haul short-haul anomalies which westerners have complained about for so long. It also contains amendments dealing with maximum and minimum freight rates which can be charged by the railways, and provides a mechanism whereby the CTC can police more actively the freight rate tariffs filed by the railways. All of those were items on the table in Calgary in 1973 which the western premiers indicated they wanted rectified, and which are coming forward now for that kind of correction in Bill C-33.

We have seen as well such things as the highways strengthening program in western Canada, the Northlands Agreement, the iron and steel developmental agreement in Saskatchewan, and recognition of a larger provincial role to be played in financial institutions. As I said, hon. gentlemen across the way like to ignore the list.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if it would be possible for the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale) to come into the twentieth century and to recognize that it is hon. members on this side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Goodale: I apologize to the hon. member who has just spoken. I would not want to miss or to ignore her presence in this House. Indeed, as I pointed out in an interjection earlier in the debate, I think her contribution and her speech on this bill earlier today far outshone the rather petty contribution offered by her leader. I think she is to be congratulated for that. It might be that I overlooked the fact that she was here this evening because, during the course of my remarks, she was sitting there rather politely and, I hope, listening, while members around her were making it difficult for anyone to realize she was present.

● (2120)

In any event, Mr. Speaker, to conclude may I point out that the reaction of the gentlemen across the way—

An hon. Member: There, you said it again.

Mr. Goodale: I am sorry, I mean "gentlemen." The hon. lady reacted in a much different way. The reaction of hon. members, with the exception of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), this evening is unfortunately all too typical of the things which so sadly and tragically contribute to the disunity of this country. I was hoping that the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar would offer some change in that. He made some remarks of substance toward the end of his speech, but I regret that he began with such a negative and cynical preamble when his remarks could otherwise have been helpful to the House.

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few comments on the bill, but first I should like to say that in my time in this House I have never witnessed twenty minutes of greater insecurity than has been exhibited by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale).

I should like to speak about the bill in general terms. The specifics have been dealt with by others, most notably the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald). The bill is really a fait accompli. We are debating something that we do not have much control over in this House other than to voice criticisms and concern. I should like to spend my time, as did the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn), talking about Canada—what I think we should look to in Canada, and do it in as honest and in as non-partisan a manner as I can.

The problems of this country that people outside this chamber are talking about are very important to all of us. I think it is high time the House of Commons dealt with the central problem, that is, Canada vis-à-vis Quebec.

As an example, Mr. Speaker, Quebec has said she will boycott a federal-provincial communications conference this month. This is disturbing to most Canadians. A writer and historian of some note, Mr. Bruce Hutchinson, has said that Canada has entered the most dangerous and decisive years of its life. I believe that to be true. My great fear is that separation will come about unless we are prepared to make concessions and compromises.

What can Canadians do? I suppose not too much individually, but collectively we can do a great deal. I firmly believe that the country still belongs to the people and not to the politicians. In fact the response from the rest of Canada will help determine how the people of Quebec will respond to the most important question in our history. As Canadians we can remain objective, cool of head and willing to explore all avenues open to us to have Quebec remain in Confederation. At the same time I think it can be a positive exercise because we can be taking the steps to form a new and even better country than we have had.

I think it should be clear that despite what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), editorialists, and others have said—and this is my opinion—the question of Quebec will be decided in that province and not in the rest of the country. The unfortunate part, for a person viewing the situation outside the province of Quebec, is that the Quebec premier is at centre stage at the present time. He has it all to himself to espouse his particular theories. Premier Levesque will certainly make very forceful arguments for leaving Confederation. In my opinion the problem is that at this time there is no federalist Quebecer with equal status to challenge his arguments. The federalist argument for Quebec staying within Canada can be made equally as strong as those of the premier, in my opinion. At the present time there is a vacuum in Quebec, however, and people are not making that argument. The provincial Liberals are a spent force; they are leaderless and, to a certain extent, are without direction. The other major party, the Union Nationale, has experienced a certain upsurge of popularity but I do not think that will continue because I believe the base for its support, especially among the young people, may be too narrow.

As Canadians we must all start talking to the people of Quebec and not to the elected government of Quebec. I feel if we are to survive as a nation we will have to maintain the country as we presently know it. Canada can only be viable if that "sea to sea" concept brought about by the Fathers of Confederation some 110 years ago is kept foremost in our minds. It is time to stop hoping that the problems will resolve themselves. We see a lot of that in various parts of the country—the idea that if we do not look they will just go away. All of us in Canada must decide very quickly where we stand on the whole question of the Quebec-Canada confrontation.

The desire of French Canada to protect its own culture and way of life is not very different from the desire of the prairie farmer and the maritime fisherman to protect their unique communities, nor is it different from the desire of Canada's native peoples to protect their land and cultures. All these groups are threatened by powerful centralizing forces of the Canadian economy and by the prejudices of the Canadians. We need more understanding on the part of all Canadians if we are to preserve a united Canada. But understanding alone will not be enough to solve this problem. Governments, both federal and provincial, must actively resist the concentration of power and wealth in the centre. Canadians in general must be prepared to pay the cost in dollars and cents of a united country which sees itself from coast to coast as one Canada.

If we look at the problem from a positive point of view, which very few of us have done, the people of Quebec have presented to the rest of Canada, possibly without knowing it and certainly without meaning to, an opportunity to build a strong and more unified country.

There are some English-speaking Canadians, unfortunately a growing number, who view the bilingual nature of Canada not as a source of pride but as an annoying condition that somehow must be removed. They would welcome the departure of Quebec and the breakup of Canada. There are French speaking Canadians who have lost faith in the rest of Canada and urge separation. I believe that the majority of Canadians in both cultures have retained a spirit of good will toward their neighbours and have a desire to make Confederation work.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Murta: Those of us who share this belief must ask ourselves some simple questions. First, is there a risk of Canada's breaking up? Obviously, judging by what I and others have said, the answer is yes, there is a risk of Canada's breaking up.

● (2130)

Second, will a recognition of the fact that Canada is a country with two major languages help to unite the country? The answer is, hopefully, yes. I say hopefully, because at times there has not been much hope of this being the case. But we are looking to that fact to be a stronger uniting force. Along with the recognition of two languages and cultures must go the recognition of many other communities and ways of life.

Third, is the cost of this recognition in money and petty annoyances worth paying? This question is crucial, a question all Canadians must answer. Bilingual labels in supermarkets, signs in French at airports, and French television and radio involve no more than a very small percentage of our gross national product. Surely if we believe in Canada, this is a small cost to pay. Likewise, turning a box of cornflakes around in order to read the English is not too large a gesture to make for the unity of Canada.

But there is a larger cost, that being the recognition of the many disparities in Canada not only between the founding cultures, but throughout the country. I believe earlier attempts at unity failed because they ignored diversity in favour of a highly centralized national policy which used tariffs and railways as its chief instruments. This policy shaped a nation with an industrial heartland feeding on the raw materials of the regions of the country. The results, of course, were obvious—a concentration of jobs and people in a few large centres, a lack of processing and manufacturing in many of the resource regions of the country and, most important, a large group of people who did not enjoy the natural benefits which Confederation ought to bring.

This policy of inequality has contributed to the unhappiness in French Canada and also created great strains for the rest of Canada. In particular those living in the prairies, the maritimes and Northwest Territories feel aggrieved and not part of the action. People in these areas feel that Canada does not and never did make economic sense.

The truth is, Canada exists because the people of the country want it to exist, because it embraces values not found anywhere else in the world. It exists not because of economic realities, but despite those realities.

As we in the prairies see it, the bargain struck at Confederation was that tariffs set by the federal government would protect Canadian industries in central Canada against international competition. At the same time transportation policies formulated by the federal government would allow the regions, the west, northern Canada and the maritimes, to get their products outside, to be sold, and to get the manufactured goods they needed.

This bargain has never really worked. Power and wealth have concentrated in central Canada, while in the hinterland there has grown a feeling of injustice and inequity. Confederation was supposed to require everyone to make concessions and sacrifices in order to make the country succeed. Successive federal governments have followed the policy which says that those outside central Canada should suffer most.

Westerners continue to be alarmed by attempts to change Confederation. They want assurances, as do those living in the maritimes, that because they want to live and work in what they consider as special areas, or places, they will not be penalized for doing so.

The future of Canada will only be secured when all Canadians can be assured that the burdens and advantages of Canada will be shared equally. That is the central point to which we must address ourselves if we are concerned about our long-term future as a country.

I think that we, in this country, have reason to be optimistic. I say I think; I hope I am right. I hope we may be on the threshold of a new era of Canadian confederation, an era marked by greater awareness of provincial and regional needs and sensitivities, greater respect for the diversity of culture and heritage which characterizes the various parts of this country and, in the not too distant future, by a better balance as between the centre and periphery of the country. This is the concept for which we must strive, in both official languages, and all regions. We must be united in the knowledge that Canada is unique among the nations of the world and must be preserved. We must keep in mind that Canada is more, much more than just dollars and cents.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, let me begin by saying that I and, I think, other members of this House, were greatly moved by the speech which the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) has just concluded. All of us agree with him when he says that if Canada means anything as a country, it is as a country which stretches from sea to sea, and that it is inconceivable that the country should be less than that. Indeed, if any one part of Canada, including Quebec, were to leave Confederation, it is highly unlikely that the rest of Canada would continue to exist as a country.

We face tremendous problems, not the least of which is the question of language and culture. But we are not the only country facing that kind of difficulty. In virtually every other democratic country in which more than one language is spoken, the same kind of difficulty has arisen. I am sure hon. members know of the tremendous difficulties which have arisen in recent years in Belgium, where two languages are spoken. I am sure hon. members know that in Spain, which has been a country a lot longer than Canada, there are various regions; in one region, the Basque region, the people not only talk a different language but are sometimes prepared to fight violently for a separate state. Great Britain has been a united country for hundreds of years, but there is now talk of Scotland separating.

The difficulties we face are difficulties other countries have faced. If we are to survive as a country, as I believe we can and must, we shall have to address ourselves to those problems which have exacerbated the difficulties, the differences as between languages and cultures.

This is no time to be introducing a bill of the kind before us. We ought to examine the facts. What is the main fact? The bill we are considering can only exacerbate the differences between the provinces and the federal government, can only exacerbate the differences between the government of Quebec—no matter which party is in power—and the federal government, and by extension, the people of Canada as a whole. It is for that reason, as our leader indicated last Friday, that we in the New Democratic Party oppose this bill. That is why we express our surprise that the official opposition is going along with it, reluctantly but nevertheless supporting it. If every provincial government—Liberal, Conservative, NDP, Social Credit and Parti Québécois—expressed opposition to the federal government's proposals as embodied in this bill, we feel we ought to as well, and in fact will be voting against it.

● (2140)

We have been told by the government that this bill embodies the agreement reached between the provinces and the federal government. In fact it embodies an agreement imposed on the provinces by the federal government. The provincial governments oppose the major provisions of this bill. We challenge the government to table the transcript of the proceedings and discussions that took place between the federal government and the provincial governments at the first ministers' meeting. That would prove, as has been indicated by members of this party and the official opposition, and as government members know, that the provinces did not voluntarily agree to the proposals included in this bill.

This bill destroys important fundamental principles and rights which Canadians from one end of Canada to the other have had for almost 20 years. A basic foundation was available to all Canadians, regardless of the province in which they live, for post-secondary education. There was a basic provision for the payment of medical and hospital care. Under the old arrangement, Ottawa paid 50 per cent of the cost of post-secondary education, medical care, and hospital insurance.

Let me stop for a moment to give credit to the former Conservative prime minister of this country for the tremendously important role he played in establishing our hospital and medical insurance plans. Hon. members will recall that it was a Liberal government which brought in the first legislation for hospital insurance. However, that legislation required that more than 50 per cent of the provinces with more than 50 per cent of the people had to agree to the program before the federal government would participate in the 50/50 cost-sharing aspects of it. It was a Conservative government which in 1958 removed that requirement, permitting each province, when ready, to choose to enter the hospital insurance plan with the federal government paying half the cost.

Similarly, it was the Conservative government which appointed Mr. Justice Hall to look at the whole problem of medical insurance. It was his report which led to the implementation of a medical insurance plan whereby, as each province instituted a universal medical insurance plan, the federal government would pay 50 per cent of the cost. That was implemented by a Liberal government, but it was urged, if not forced, on that government by the Hall commission recommendation.

Under the provisions of those two plans, it did not much matter to Canadian citizens from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the American border to the Arctic ocean where they lived. There were some advantages or disadvantages between provinces and territories depending on how the provincial share of each plan was financed. Essentially, however, the people of Canada no longer had to worry about the tremendous costs of medical and hospital care.

One need only look to the United States. It is not only the poor people there who suffer because they do not have our kind of medical or hospital insurance. People in the middle income bracket may have to use their entire income and be forced to sell their homes because they have hospital and medical bills in the thousands of dollars. That fear has disappeared for Canadians because of the medical and hospital insurance plans which we have.

That 50/50 cost-sharing, as well as the extra which the federal government has paid to the have-not provinces, will disappear under the provisions of this bill. As the cost goes up for hospital care, medical care and post-secondary education, and as the federal government reduces its share of the payments for these programs, as it will have the right to do under this and other legislation, the provinces will be faced with some very difficult, unpopular, and unpalatable choices.

The provinces will have to reduce the level of service they have been providing. Fewer young people will be able to attend our universities and community colleges. There will be less of a guarantee of payment for hospital care. People will not receive the same kind of service from their doctors. Either all that will happen or the provinces will have to increase their fees. University fees will have to be increased substantially. It will be necessary to implement a deterrent fee for those entering hospital. It will be normal for people to have to pay a charge to see their doctor.

All these basic and fundamental rights which the citizens of Canada have had for the past 25 years will disappear to a large extent. They will be removed as a result of the thinking of the federal government which is embodied in this legislation. Because of what is happening, the provinces did not want to accept the deal which the federal government proposes and which they in fact accepted only because they had no alternative.

● (2150)

The provinces had no choice but to agree because the pressure of the dateline meant that in the absence of an agreement the federal government would be in a position to act unilaterally. We know this deal was accepted only reluctantly by the provinces. We believe the provinces were blackmailed by the federal government, that they were forced into it and that the arrangements will have a particularly bad effect on the disadvantaged provinces—including Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland and Quebec, the province about which we have heard so much.

Let me pause for a moment to say, again, that though we have heard so many speeches on the subject, so much good will expressed for the people of Quebec, when it comes to hard cash, that province along with the other six have-not provinces will, as a result of this agreement, in the next five years get substantially smaller payments than it would have received had the old agreement simply been extended. We believe this is a bad agreement. It should be opposed on the grounds that the people of Canada are entitled to a continuation of programs which guarantee them certain basic services, such as hospital insurance, medical insurance, and post-secondary education.

Along with post-secondary education, hospital insurance, and medical insurance, this bill deals with two other aspects of financial arrangements between the federal government and the provinces. It provides for equalization payments and for revenue-guarantees. Let us consider the revenue guarantee.

In 1971, when the federal government brought in tax reform, the share of new tax revenue accruing to the provinces was reduced. To make up for this, and to allow the provinces to make the necessary changes in their other sources of revenue to compensate, the federal government initiated the revenue guarantee program which was to last for five years (1972-1976). It agreed to pay to the provinces the shortfall between what they were currently receiving in income tax and what they would have been receiving prior to tax reform.

After the program was underway, the then minister of finance, John Turner, said he would consider continuing the guarantee program. This makes sense—particularly when you consider that by ending the straight 50-50 sharing of costs under the expensive health and post-secondary education programs, the federal government was shifting a potentially heavier burden onto the provinces.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

We know from the discussion which has taken place with regard to both the hospital and medical insurance plans that what the federal government proposes to pay for the next four years amounts to tens of millions of dollars less than it would have paid under the 50-50 cost-sharing program. We know already that the indexed federal payments, while rising in relation to the GNP and the growth in tax revenues, will not be large enough to make up 50 per cent of the cost of the programs. Surely if the provinces have to finance the risks of new programs, they should have the tax base available to them in 1971.

Then in April, 1976, the federal government announced that it was ending the revenue guarantee program and that, in addition, it was reducing the payments to the provinces for the last three years of the program—1974, 1975 and 1976. This meant that, to use 1976 as an example, the 10 provinces would be receiving not $1,600 million in payments, but only $900 million.

The provinces argued that, to make up for the end of the revenue guarantee, the federal government should transfer to the provinces four personal income tax points. A personal income tax point varies in value from province to province; in some, it is worth as little as $4 a head, in others it is as much as $10 a head.

The federal government offer eventually accepted was one personal income tax point and cash equivalent to another. This means, according to federal estimates, that the provinces will be receiving in 1977, $400 to $460 million, instead of the $900 million received under the revenue guarantee. Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Might I ask the acting government House leader what the business is for tomorrow?

Mr. Goodale: It would be our intention to continue debate on the subject matter presently before the House until the discussion can be concluded. If discussion on Bill C-37 continues for some considerable length of time tomorrow we would expect to move on to the legislation dealing with human rights and try to conclude that debate.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

PUBLIC SERVICE—FREEZING OF PENSIONS OF MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES AND MOUNTED POLICE UNTIL AGE 60—DENIAL OF PENSIONS TO CERTAIN WIDOWS—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, November 19, 1976, as reported in Hansard on page 1186, I put a question to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) relating to two issues which were unresolved when parliament considered and passed Bill C-52 during the last session. That was a bill which had to do with the many superannuation plans which came under the aegis of the federal government. The question I put to the minister speaks for itself, so I think I shall place it before the House again tonight:

In view of the fact that it is unfair to many retired RCMP and Armed Forces personnel to have their pensions frozen until age 60, will the minister consider this issue? Also, in view of the fact that it is unfair to the widows of many public servants, RCMP, Armed Forces and other personnel not to receive pensions at all because their marriages took place after the date the deceased husband was put on pension, will the minister consider this issue, and indeed, does he plan to make a report to the House on both these issues as soon as possible?

● (2200)

The President of the Treasury Board was very considerate in his reply. He took note of the two issues—indeed, he said he was already aware of them—and said he hoped within a reasonable time to be able to say something about them. I welcome his presence here tonight and I hope he will have a favourable response.

May I say a word with respect to the first issue, that of the indexing of the pensions of retired RCMP and Armed Forces personnel. When the indexing of pensions of federal employees was first brought in and fixed at age 60, it did not seem completely unreasonable to apply that age to these two groups as well. But later on an arrangement was made whereby some public servants could get the indexing of their pensions at age 55, and that being the case it seems to me that the position of retired RCMP and Armed Forces personnel has to be reconsidered. There are persons who complete their term of duty, who are retired at a time when it is difficult to pick up other employment, and to have their pensions frozen when pensions of other persons who work for the government are being escalated seems to me to be quite unfair.

We have been over the arguments many times. My concern tonight is not to take time to restate the arguments but to hear what the minister has to say.

The other point which I raised as a leftover from the last session has to do with the case of widows of all the various categories that I named where the marriage took place after the retired employee concerned went on the pension. I had something to say about this the other day during the debate on human rights when we were discussing equality between men and women. It seems to me that there is something basically unfair between widows when in the one case a widow gets the pension and in the other case she does not. Sometimes the marriage in the second case lasted longer than in the first case. Again there are arguments both ways, and we have been over them many times. My concern is that this unfairness be rectified.

I recognize, Mr. Speaker, that I am raising this issue at a time when there are some persons in the country, some agencies and newspapers, who are compaining against the indexing of public service pensions at all. I regard that as irresponsible. What is wrong today is not that only the pensions of some persons are indexed; what is wrong is that indexing of pensions has not been extended to everyone.

In my view the campaign against the indexing of public service pensions is just an attempt on the part of certain private employers and financial interests to fend off the day when they will have to do it too. I suggest that there is real merit in the statement made by Dr. Noel Hall in his report on railway pensions to the effect that unless private pension plans can meet this issue of keeping pension plans up to date with the cost of living, they will find that they do not fill the bill, and their place will have to be taken by a wider use of pensions, such as the Canada Pension Plan. However, we are not discussing that issue tonight—unless the minister wants to make a definitive announcement on it.

I should like to hear from the minister on the question of pensions of retired Armed Forces and RCMP personnel, from the time they retire until they reach age 60, and on the position of widows of the category that I have described.I thank the minister for being here tonight and I look forward eagerly to what he has to say.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member has indicated his non-support for Mr. Colin Brown and people like him and their attitude toward indexed pensions. I did give some indication to the hon. member, as did my predecessor, that his views would be given full consideration. The situation is the same as it was when I replied in November.

As the hon. member knows, there is considerable interest in the whole question of indexed pensions. I stated in this House, I believe in December—and I confirm my statement—that I was interested in commissioning an independent actuarial analysis of the indexing of federal employee pension plans to test, check, and confirm the information. We now have to satisfy, I believe, the concerns being expressed by certain people, and I have to say that until we get that confirmation or the results of that and certain other studies which are under way related more to the private pension sector, namely, the studies being undertaken by the Department of Finance and the Department of National Health and Welfare, it is not our intention to make moves, at least for a few months.

With regard to the situation particularly associated with the Armed Forces and the RCMP issue which the hon. member raised, the hon. member may recall that during consideration of the Statute Law, (Superannuation) Amendment Act early last year by the Joint Committee of the House of Commons and the Senate on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service a number of requests were made for changes and improvements in the survivor benefits payable under the Superannuation Acts to spouses of public servants and members of the Armed Forces and the RCMP.

There was an agreement at that time that these requests would be considered in light of the impending federal human rights legislation which will deal, among other things, with discrimination in pension plans. There has been some comment that the provision of spouses' benefits is regarded by some as constituting discrimination in favour of married employees over single employees and, as a result, it will be necessary to review all aspects of survivor benefits once the human rights legislation is in place.

Once again I have to seek the hon. member's patience. These concerns will be very seriously dealt with, but they will probably not result in changes until a review is completed, which I hope will not be too long in taking place.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I shall be asking the question again.

TRANSPORT—POSSIBILITY OF CONTINUED ASSISTANCE TO FLOUR SHIPMENTS THROUGH ATLANTIC PORTS

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) went to Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, and there conferred with the three premiers of the maritime provinces regarding transportation matters. It was that meeting, a meeting of what I regard as the other type of parliament, which brings us together this evening. I asked a question of the Minister of Transport upon his return here—and I was backed by my colleague, the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall)—as to whether there was any discussion about the "at and east" subsidies, those subsidies provided by section 272 of the Railway Act with regard to the movement of flour and grain.

This is a very substantial issue, as it affects the ports of Halifax, Saint John, and some of those on the St. Lawrence River system. It is a substantial matter as it affects the flour industry in Ontario and Quebec. I told the Minister of Transport that if Bill C-31,—a piece of inequity which, thank God, has not yet been presented—is presented, it will meet a storm of protest.

I asked the minister if this had been discussed with the three premiers and, if so, with what result. He skated around that issue. I suspect that the Charlottetown conference did not consider whether Bill C-31 would be presented to the parliament of Canada.

It is all fine and dandy for the Minister of Transport or any other minister to meet with the premiers in my part of the world, for they enjoy a feast of publicity and the fact that there is no debate whatsoever until one can get one's hands at the throats of these people in either parliament or in the legislatures in which they speak. For a day or so they enjoyed the fact that they had apparently made some important decisions, and we who are the representatives of Atlantic Canada were discomforted by the fact that we had no quick means of finding out actually what their estimable honours really achieved at that Charlottetown conference. We still do not know with regard to Bill C-31. We do not know whether the premiers of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, who might have been thinking about the ports of Halifax and Saint John, put up any kind of fight at all on behalf of the "at and east" subsidies for the ports of Halifax and Saint John. I rather suspect that they did not. I do not know why they would not have, but nothing that I have read in the communiques from that conference suggests to me that the plight of the longshoremen, the freight handlers and the stevedors of Saint John and Halifax had very much to do with the conference which took place in Charlottetown, so I raise it here. I am sorry to be late with it, but I did operate under the rules of the House. I brought it before the minister as quickly as I could and I brought it up for debate in the House at this time as quickly as I could. In any event, Bill C-31 has not yet been presented to us for debate. When it is, the minister will know that there will be a very sharp debate on it indeed.

We have various subsidies in the field of transportation. Subsidies are provided by acts relating to movement of freight in Atlantic Canada. There are subsidies on the St. Lawrence Seaway, subsidies on the Welland Canal, subsidies on the grain movement on the prairies, subsidies involving the Crowsnest Pass rates, and undoubtedly there are other subsidies as well. So when the minister decided that something must be done about subsidies, he decided to tackle the poorest of the poor. This is what irks us in Atlantic Canada more than anything else. If he starts some bold, new march to some bold, new transportation horizons, why does he pick on the poorest part of Canada?

If the minister has the temerity to present Bill C-31 dealing specifically with the ports of Halifax, Saint John, and a few other ports before he tackles other larger subsidies in the Canadian transportation scene, he will find himself in a fight. We have done it twice now. First, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) and myself alternately on the late show brought up the issue last year, and then with respect to Bill C-87 regarding the restraint program we knocked it out. If now he dares to bring it back a third time in this parliament, he will know that we have had it and it is going to be fought. Also, the Minister of Transport will find that it will not only be the members for Halifax fighting for the ports of Saint John and Halifax and certain ports in Ontario as well as the milling industry. He will find other members on this side of the House who will fight that battle as well. I think he would be well advised not to consider proceeding with Bill C-31 in this session of parliament.

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) mentioned, it is an important issue. The minister has received various representations from different associations in this regard, and he has also received many representations from hon. members on this side of the House.

I welcome the opportunity to reiterate the government's position on continued assistance to flour shipments throught Atlantic ports.

It is true that Bill C-31 proposes to repeal section 272 of the Railway Act, and thus eliminate a subsidy for export grain and flour via Atantic and east coast ports. This subsidy was largely an indirect payment to the milling industry because it froze the freight rates.

By repealing section 272 of the Railway Act and replacing the hidden subsidy with a direct payment to the milling industry we remove unnecessary distortions in the transportation network. Since we have an understanding with the milling industry on a flour assistance program which will come into effect once section 272 has been repealed, there is no reason to believe that Atlantic ports will suffer.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, the whole question of grain transportation has been discussed with the Canadian Wheat Board, and officials from the Grains Group are now working with the board to consider all transportation options, including the possibility of the movement of grain from the bay ports to the Atlantic seaboard.

This is the essence of the minister's discussion with the Atlantic provinces last week. It is the government's intention to make the best use of transportation dollars, but as recognized by our action on the flour subsidy where regional objectives dictate a departure from a policy of cost effectiveness we will not hesitate to do so. But when a subsidy is paid, it should be made directly and where at all possible it should not distort other variables in the market place such as the transportation system.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we believe that eliminating Section 272 of the Railway Act works in the best interest of national policy, but such things as the flour subsidy and our efforts to assess different options for moving grain to Atlantic ports reflect our sensitivity to the developmental objectives of the Atlantic region, objectives, Mr. Speaker, this government stands firmly behind, as we have demonstrated in the past through many initiatives through DREE amongst other things, and we will continue to demonstrate our commitment in the future.

The Atlantic region, as the hon. member did mention, is different from the other regions in the country and requires special consideration. This difference has been embodied in the objectives and principles of our new national transportation policy—a policy development in which the Atlantic region was closely involved, particularly at the provincial level.

MANPOWER—CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—SUGGESTED CREATION OF SPECIAL FUND FOR RECYCLING OPERATION

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to follow two such distinguished questioners in the adjournment debate this evening, as well as the respondents.

On February 15 I directed a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) regarding some of the problems in the new Canada Works program. I feel that when this program was initiated the department should have allowed itself almost a year to rethink the things that had gone wrong with the Local Initiatives Program and to consider all the changes necessary when shifting from what was at one time an innovative scheme of local initiatives, to direct incentive job creation, which is something quite different. Time was not found for reconsideration, however; quite the opposite.

The second allocation to the Local Initiatives Program at the end of 1976 strained the resources of the department to the limit in order to spread around that allocation and get late starting programs off the ground. Almost at the same time there was a call for applications for the new Canada Works program. Yet it carries with it many of the shortcomings of the other program, it seems, in terms of short range developments, insistence on new projects, and hiring people who are unemployed. For many worthy programs this almost forces people into the anomalous position of firing the people they have in order to pick up a grant to hire additional people and thereby qualify for enough funding to keep them going.

It seems to me that in tackling unemployment the federal government should act in conjunction with the municipalities and regional districts, working closely at that level. They have the planners, engineers, foremen and personnel to provide ongoing guidance and supervision. If the federal government must get directly into job creation or direct incentive, it should work through the existing institutions such as the Armed Forces. I am sure everyone was pleased to see the recruiting drive for 5,000 personnel for the Armed Forces. I am sure those jobs can be created far more cheaply than through the Canada Works program or LIP. It is better to put the money into such things as scientific and medical reseach, or even public works, prone as they are to the old misuse of patronage.

The Post Office in the town of Lumby, in my constituency, is a disgrace. We could have embarked on a rebuilding project this winter, and thereby relieved some unemployment. That would have been a worth-while project.

If all this is not sufficient, let me suggest a couple of important areas in which the government could act. One is recycling, the other pollution control. Many jobs could be created in these areas, to good effect, if only the government allowed those jobs to be long-range ones, and if every five or six months it was not necessary to let people go in order to begin new projects. It is difficult to sustain recycling. Private industry has not seemed to come to grips with the question, and it is too big a question for municipal governments to deal with. There are not industries in place which can use the products of recycling. Therefore that is another area in which the federal government could be legitimately involved in job creation.

There is nothing romantic about this proposal. If implemented, it will not lead to pictures being taken of people handing out cheques every time some glamorous new project is begun. But, if accepted, it will mean the development of a crucial program which will save limited resources in an era when the saving of resources has become highly important.

I am therefore asking the minister's representative this evening whether, with respect to Canada Works, the department would not consider working through the regional districts or municipal councils. We very much need a constitutional change which will give the municipal level of government a share of tax revenue and an almost sovereign power in disposing of it. Such revenues would have to be provided as of right, and not turned off or on at the whim of senior governments, particularly the federal government. Conscientious municipalities which plan for the long range are confused and often find their programs disrupted by free wheeling advertising which artificially raises hopes, as was the case in the advertising campaign conducted on behalf of Canada Works just one month or so ago.

[Translation]

Mr. Arthur Portelance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I shall not have enough time to answer all the questions asked by the hon. member this evening. However, in answer to the question of the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston), I would like to say that we should perhaps consider briefly the objectives of the Canada Works program. This program has been established to neutralize cyclical, seasonal and regional unemployment on a permanent basis and throughout the year. The projects must be sponsored essentially by registered and well established organizations, and they must meet the needs of the working force in the community; they should not force people out on the labour market nor impede private initiatives. Finally, and this is the main requirement, the proposed activities should not be dependent in any way on the community.

I am sure the hon. member will understand that to fight unemployment effectively, the persons hired for Canada Works projects should be unemployed. It would be very difficult to determine to what extent the unemployment rate could be lowered by hiring people for these projects who already work for the groups or organizations concerned. The reason is that we could not pretend these employees were about to lose their jobs. In other words, Mr. Speaker, if we were that flexible in our hiring practices, some would be prepared to wipe out the results we try to get through the Canada Works program by making use of the system.

Let us suppose that a sponsor fires employees so that they would be eligible for some Canada Works project as unemployed persons; nothing allows us to believe that once registered with the Canada Manpower Centre, they would necessarily be proposed for that project. When introducing applicants for a job, Canada Manpower Centres take into account the personality and the needs of everyone. In addition, they give priority to those eligible applicants who have been registered for a longer time.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member also indicated that we should examine again the allocation granted to the riding of Okanagan-Kootenay, as was the case with Okanagan Boundary. Mr. Speaker, concerning the riding of Okanagan Boundary, I must say that officials have examined this case to determine whether it had been mistakenly excluded from ridings where projects were eligible for a subsidy to offset high equipment costs. It has since been confirmed that Okanagan Boundary did not meet the eligibility requirements. However, no money allotment has been reconsidered and we do not intend to do so for any riding, for I am convinced that these funds were allocated as fairly as possible, particularly within areas facing high unemployment rates.

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced of the merits of programs which, like the Canada Works Program, create new jobs in areas where they are most needed, because not only will these jobs lower the unemployment rate in these areas, but they will also promote the development of these areas through community betterment projects.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.28 p.m.
