THE LATE RÉAL CAOUETTE

MINUTE OF SILENCE TO HONOUR MEMORY

Mr. Speaker: Order. Hon. members are aware that the funeral of the late Réal Caouette is taking place at this very moment in Rouyn. It is a fitting tribute to this man's memory and to his many friends and relatives to whom our sympathies have already been extended that such a great contingent from this House has gone to attend the funeral this afternoon, including the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), and of course the entire Social Credit caucus. Since the funeral is taking place at this very moment, I ask hon. members to join with me in observing one minute's silence.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY PRESIDENT OF TREASURY BOARD ON PERFORMANCE OF ECONOMY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to Standing Order 43. As the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) has remarked that Canada's financial performance during the past four years has been nothing short of remarkable, yet we find the prestigious independent Credit Swiss in their Canadian financial letter stating that Canada's rating as a place for investment has suffered due to the growth of the public sector at the expense of the private sector, the excessive and erratic taxation of corporations, and the productivity-hampering profit controls which have been wilfully introduced into the Canadian investment picture by Ottawa, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Lavoie):

That this House request the President of the Treasury Board to make a statement on motions setting forth why he feels our performance has been nothing short of remarkable in view of contrary views being held by independent world observers such as Credit Swiss.

Mr. Speaker: I have some considerable misgiving about this kind of motion being moved pursuant to Standing Order 43. I have indicated that such a motion ought to set out the reason for the motion and that members should stay away from controversial motions that are subject to debate. I will put the motion to the House pursuant to Standing Order 43, but I think hon. members should stay away from this kind of preamble in future. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 the motion cannot be presented to the House without unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST TO SPECIFY DATE OF APPLICATION OF PROVISION OF BILL C-69—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

The Minister of Manpower and Immigration said, concerning the case of Mr. Charles Dubé and of many other citizens involved in an awkward situation as a result of section 7 of Bill C-69 amending subsection 25 (b), which according to a letter from the minister's office came into effect on July 4, 1976, that after some inquiries this piece of legislation would have been effective in fact since January 4, 1976. Because of the misunderstanding about the date of implementation of the act, I move, supported by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander):

That the Minister inform the House as soon as possible in order to clarify the situation so that the Canadian people involved in this matter do not fall victims of a misinterpretation on the date of implementation of the act, for which the civil servants concerned cannot be blamed.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the terms of the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; therefore the motion cannot be put.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF ALL FORECASTS AND ANALYSES FOR 1977—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The urgent and pressing nature of this motion concerns itself with the unacceptable silence of the government regarding its available economic forecasts related to unemployment, job creation, real growth and inflation for the year 1977 during a period when such respected bodies as the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, the University of Toronto's Institute for Policy Analysis and the Conference Board of Canada in general forecast for 1977, 8 per cent unemployment, 3 per cent real growth, higher inflation and the real possibility of a recession.

In light of the above and the desire of most Canadians to remove this veil of secrecy in order to have some indication of what the economic climate of this country will be in 1977, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens):

That this House urge the Minister of Finance to table without further delay all economic analysis and forecasts for the year 1977 which deal with unemployment, job creation, real growth and inflation.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to the presentation of such a motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTED TAX CUTS FOR LOWER AND MIDDLE INCOME GROUPS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask the unanimous consent of the House to deal with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that every major economic forecaster in Canada, including the Conference Board, is predicting even higher levels of unemployment in the coming year, I move, seconded by the hon. member for the Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth):

That this House urge the government to bring in a budget when the House reconvenes in the next year with tax cuts for the middle and lower income groups which will stimulate weak consumer demand, eliminate excess capacity in our industry and create needed jobs without inflating the economy.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion under Standing Order 43 cannot be presented to the House without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AUDITOR GENERAL

GUIDELINES FOR AUDITING BOOKS OF UNITED DEVELOPMENT INCORPORATED OF ISRAEL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Rod Blaker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and I have some reason to believe there will be unanimous consent to this motion as a result of some considerations and deliberations during the lunch hour.

Whereas the Standing Committee on Public Accounts has been made aware of the terms which the Auditor General has set in order that he might accept an invitation by United Development Incorporated of Tel Aviv, Israel, to carry out an audit of that company's books as they relate to the Atomic Energy of Canada sale of a CANDU reactor to South Korea; and whereas the Auditor General has expressed the concern that his mandate to parliament might obligate him to disclose information related to the business of United Development Incorporated which goes beyond the transactions of United Development Incorporated vis-à-vis Atomic Energy of Canada Limited; and whereas it is in the interests of the Public Accounts Committee and of the House of Commons and of the people of Canada that the Auditor General does accept the said invitation and report thereon to the committee, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):

That this House advise the Auditor General of Canada of it's desire that he accept the invitation of United Development Incorporated to audit the books of that company in Israel, and that this House further advise the Auditor General that his report thereon be restricted to those matters which relate to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited transaction and involve no matters related to the other business affairs of United Development Incorporated.

Mr. Speaker: The motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can only be presented for debate at this time with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt this motion?

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we did not deny the unanimity required to permit the hon. member to present this motion, but there are a few words about it which I would like to say. We understand the stated purpose of the motion, namely, that the Auditor General have our approval when he comes back from Tel Aviv not to disclose matters which might come before his eyes other than those related to the transaction between Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and the purchasers of CANDU reactors through Mr. Eisenberg. However, the phrase at the end of the motion bothers us. I refer to the phrase which says that these inquiries by the Auditor General shall involve no matters related to the other business affairs of United Development Incorporated.

If such other business affairs are dealings between Mr. Eisenberg and other countries around the world, we are prepared to say that that is not the business of our Auditor General, but what would be the case if Mr. Macdonell, in surveying Mr. Eisenberg's books, finds that there are other business affairs between Mr. Eisenberg's company and the Government of Canada or other agencies of the Government of Canada? It seems to me that for us to pass a motion at this time which would keep those matters secret would not be in keeping with the purposes of this inquiry.

The hon. member for Lachine-Lakeshore (Mr. Blaker) discussed his proposed motion with me before we met at two o'clock, and I indicated that we would not deny unanimity for the purpose of presenting the motion, but I also indicated to him that I was concerned about the point which I have just now made, and the more I have thought about it and the more I have discussed it with my friends, the more strongly I feel that we should not be passing such a blanket motion of secrecy. I realize that the purpose of the motion is to facilitate the going of the Auditor General to Israel to get all the information he can about the deals involving Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, but to repeat my question, if he finds that Mr. Eisenberg has been involved with the Government of Canada in other respects or with other agencies of the Government of Canada, it seems to me that we should not tie the Auditor General's hands with respect to the disclosing of that other information.

We would be happier, or less unhappy, with the motion if a few words were added to it. I therefore wish to propose an amendment which will add words to the motion before the House, and I hope the mover and the House generally will accept these additional words. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That the motion be amended by adding at the end thereof the following words: "unless such other business affairs are between United Development Incorporated and the government of Canada or any agency thereof."

If that amendment is added, then the House of Commons is saying to the Auditor General, "Do not tell us about Mr. Eisenberg's affairs with other countries around the world but if you find on going into his books that there are other matters involving Canada or other agencies of the government of Canada we do not want to restrict you from bringing that information back to us."

I hope that the mover will accept my amendment and if he does, that the House will do likewise. Otherwise, I am afraid that although we were prepared to let the motion be presented to the House, we could not support it in its original form.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lachine-Lakeshore (Mr. Blaker).

Mr. Blaker: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Auditor General

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to the Standing Orders of the House I should indicate that in putting this motion the hon. member for Lachine-Lakeshore has in fact spoken. Some hon. members are indicating that if he speaks now he will close the debate. May I remind them that discussion is now on the amendment put by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. Blaker: Mr. Speaker, I want to respond briefly to the comments made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Prior to doing so, I want to say that as he was speaking there seemed to be general indication of agreement to the amendment he put. As the mover of the main motion I would also agree. We are receiving the greatest co-operation from Mr. Eisenberg and his company, United Development Incorporated, in Israel and I am sure all members would agree that we hope the amendment would not cause Mr. Eisenberg to finally withdraw the invitation. He has shown the greatest co-operation and has asked for some lessening of the massive publicity surrounding his private business. So be it, and the risk will be ours if as a result of this amendment we cannot get his agreement on this.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: The question is upon the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion (Mr. Knowles, (Winnipeg North Centre)) agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: The question is therefore upon the motion as amended. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion as amended?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Oral questions.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar on a point of order.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on this preliminary point of order in view of the unusual circumstances today which result from the vote on the Standing Order 43 motion. I believe when this matter was previously discussed Your Honour indicated that if there were debate or a division on a Standing Order 43 motion, the business of the House would be interrupted at 2.15 p.m. in order that the question period could proceed without being affected by any debate on such a motion. I wonder if Your Honour would be inclined to indicate if we would have the full period of time for question period available to us or, as an alternative, everyone would simply agree we have the full three-quarters of an hour for the question period today in view of the unusual circumstances.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I recognized the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) because of the obvious nature of the point of order involved. I think it would be very dangerous for the Chair to rule that the question period ought to continue and the time ought to be made up. It would seem to me to be unfair to use Standing Order 43 in a way that might cause us great concern in the future. The time is really not that great. Perhaps under the circumstances, however, and with the opportunity to consider this problem further and time to clarify it in discussion in future, the House might now give its unanimous consent that the question period will continue until ten minutes past three this afternoon. Is that understood?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ALLEGATION CANADA'S RATING AS PLACE FOR INVESTMENT HAS FALLEN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. With the shocking prospect that within one year there may be over 800,000 people out of work, as predicted by the Conference Board of Canada yesterday, and with business investment estimated to drop 1.5 per cent this year and slump by another 2.5 per cent next year, would the minister, responsible as he is for industry, trade and commerce, indicate if it is likely that we are faced with such a low level of investment, and does he agree in part with the current, scathing Credit Swiss financial letter which states that Canada's rating as a place for investment has suffered, owing in part to the imposition of our productivity hampering wage and price control program and arbitrary bureaucratic procedures at Ottawa?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): No, Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with this statement made by somebody who lives in Switzerland.

[English]

ALLEGATIONS OF CREDIT SWISS CONCERNING REASONS FOR UNEMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As the President of the Treasury Board has commented that our financial performance during the past four years has been nothing short of remarkable, would the minister indicate if his department or any department of government has undertaken any study to determine if we are in fact doing so well; and if we are, why have we had a higher unemployment level in this country, on average 622,000 people out of work, than any of the countries referred to by the President of the Treasury Board; also, does the minister agree with Credit Swiss that our " . . . all-too-high unemployment in the country is 'structural', the heritage of years of ill-conceived policies that produced huge budget deficits . . ."?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with that judgment.

IMPACT OF INTEREST RATES—POSSIBILITY OF LOWERING

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a final supplementary question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce? As high interest rates in Canada, three to four points higher than in the United States, have become an impediment to business development and an unreasonable burden for our homeowners and consumers, would the minister indicate if his department has reviewed the adverse impact of such high interest rates on our economy and, based on that review, has he made any representations to the Minister of Finance concerning the desirability of lower interest rates in Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the government monetary policy is drafted by the Minister of Finance, not by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

[English]

FORECASTS FOR REAL GROWTH AND UNEMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce? Given that the University of Toronto Institute for Policy Analyses forecasts continued sluggish growth and even higher unemployment, that the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development warns that this country faces a mini-recession and that the Conference Board of Canada is concerned about the Canadian economy going into a stall which would result in 3 per cent of real growth and an unemployment rate of 8.3 per cent by the end of next year, does the minister accept these serious conclusions? If not, does he have available at this time any analyses and forecasts to refute these most serious conclusions?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, of course the government is always concerned about the economic situation of our country and that is why we have recently announced measures to reduce unemployment. We are really concerned about the present situation, but I do not think we are going towards a recession, even if the percentage of our growth rate for 1977 will not necessarily be higher than this year's.

[English]

REASON FOR REFUSING TO REVEAL ANALYSES AND FORECASTS FOR 1977

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The important part of my question was whether the government had any analyses of economic forecasts upon which it bases its position? I ask this since the Minister of Manpower and Immigration on November 22, when replying to a question I asked, said in part, as reported on page 1221 of Hansard:

I would say to the hon. member that obviously we have forecast information on which we base our judgments, but I think it would be inappropriate to put this up as a target for the opposition critics to shoot at.

Surely, such reasons for refusing to divulge analyses and economic forecasts are unacceptable. Therefore, why will not the minister or some other minister of the government reveal, for the benefit and edification of the Canadian people, analyses and economic forecasts pertaining to the year 1977? I am not prepared to accept the stupid reason given by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Surely the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce would be prepared to answer the question, because the people of Canada need to know what the situation is to be in 1977.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I do not have much to add to the remarks of the hon. member, but I would advise him to read the last budget speech. It includes all the government economic data established by the Minister of Finance. When we will be proposing the next budget, the hon. member will once again be in a position to treat himself to statistics.

UNEMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT'S VIEW OF IMPORTANCE OF PROBLEM

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the Conference Board's forecast on the economy which predicts even higher unemployment levels next year, is the government now prepared to admit that unemployment is Canada's number one problem and that it can be tackled without inflating the economy, as has been pointed out by the Conference Board?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to the policy statements that have been made by the Minister of Finance on the subject of unemployment and inflation. The Minister of Finance has already indicated the priorities of the government in this field. It is not my intention to change them today.

POSSIBILITY OF REDUCTION OF TAX FOR LOWER AND MIDDLE INCOME GROUP TO STIMULATE CONSUMER DEMAND

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that we have legislation before us now which will reduce the tax load only for people in higher tax brackets, and in view of the fact that a reduction of the tax load in lower and middle tax brackets would have a far greater effect in stimulating consumer demand to take up the slack in the economy, will the acting minister tell the House if he is prepared to take this step and, if not, what action will he take to stimulate consumer demand?

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the budget measures that are now before the House have been before the House for a long time. I hope hon. members will shortly be putting them into law. As for a future budget, the Minister of Finance has already indicated a new budget will be forthcoming which will take into consideration many or all of the matters raised by hon. members in the question period.

Some hon. Members: When?

Mr. Kaplan: As to when, it will be in the first six months of next year.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

POSSIBILITY OF MEASURES TO STIMULATE CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary is to the Acting Minister of State for Urban Affairs, if there is an acting minister. In view of the Conference Board's prediction that housing starts will be down some 30,000 units in the coming year, has the minister in charge of housing any new initiatives he will be presenting to the House early in the new year to take up this slack in housing production?

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we all know that housing starts for 1976 were above what we expected them to be. We set a quota of one million starts in four years. We are better than half way through that mandate and we think we can continue with it. We are confident at this stage that we have more or less surpassed our commitment. We have every confidence that next year there will be at least 235,000 starts.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

MEASURES TO ENSURE THAT OBJECTIVE OF GRANTS NOT DEFEATED

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Inasmuch as a number of plants in receipt of grants under the Regional Development Incentives Act are experiencing serious difficulty due to the deteriorating economic situation, an example of which was experienced in Pembroke with the recent closing of Homco Mobile Homes with a consequent loss of 120 jobs or layoffs at Storewall International, both firms having received over three quarters of a million dollars in RDIA grants, what action is the minister or his department taking to ensure that the reason for which the grants were made, that of job creation, will not in fact be defeated?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, it is most unfortunate that some of these industries which were granted support from our department are being faced with problems and that some of them are compelled to end their operations. However I can assure the House and the hon. member that whenever our department is informed of such situations, which is virtually always the case, it does contribute to seek solutions to the extent that the law enables it to do so. Whenever possible, we have provided technical and advisory means to get them financial assistance other than the one granted by our department.

Unfortunately, I must confess that there are limits to our possibilities and that sometimes there is no other alternative. We must accept therefore that these industries close their doors and give up their operations. But I shall remind the House that we are fully aware of those problems and that we are considering the reasons for such situations. We will attempt in the future to bring corrections when it is in our power to do so.

[English]

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON ACTION TO CREATE EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): In view of the considerable concern there is with regard to the need for long term job creation and the problems the minister and I both alluded to, and in view of the decreasing level of funding provided under RDIA for long term job creation as compared to the overall budget for DREE, will the minister make a brief statement today or, if that is not possible, make a statement shortly in this House indicating what steps are being taken to stimulate greater employment possibilities, particularly in those regions where the department has prime responsibility and where the unemployment situation is the most acute?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, we are in fact undertaking an advertizing program to promote certain activities for small and medium businesses in the designated areas. This program was launched a few weeks ago and will go on during the next weeks and months.

In addition, we are looking for other solutions and, as the hon. member said, I hope to be able, very early at the beginning of next year, to make a statement which would allow us to change our programs and thus, perhaps, meet some of the concerns expressed by the hon. member.

[Mr. MacDonald (Egmont).]

[English]

CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES ON MEASURES TO CREATE JOBS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful for the minister's offer to make a statement in view of changes that may be made. In view of the fact there are a number of programs operating under federal departments as well as a number of provincial government departments, some of which are still somewhat in conflict with each other, and the need for these programs to harmonize in order to achieve maximum effectiveness in job creation, can the minister now say, before such a statement, that there will be a meeting convened of responsible ministers in the provinces in order to get maximum agreement with them and coordinate most effectively changes that will be made in order to make up the loss of jobs presently occurring in the plants I described or others that may be in jeopardy?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I am currently taking part in this series of meetings which are called for under our agreements with the provincial governments. At these annual meetings—I had one last week and shall have another one next week with another provincial government—I review the programs which are already in place, including our assistance program to the industry, trying to make the necessary improvements.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

GROUNDING OF TANKER "ARGO MERCHANT"—POSSIBILITY OF POLLUTION OF CANADIAN SHORELINE

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment. It relates to the grounding last Wednesday of the oil tanker Argo Merchant off Cape Cod, Massachusetts, at the west end of Georges Bank, which vessel at nine o'clock this morning broke in half and which vessel has already spilled over one and a half million gallons of crude out of a total cargo of 7.6 million gallons. Will the minister advise us of the potential pollution to Canadian coastal shoreline and waters, particularly having regard to our claim to jurisdiction over the Georges Bank area?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, if the quantity of oil is as large as has been indicated, it is obviously a very major spill. At the moment the wind is not blowing inland, but it is impossible to predict what will happen to the oil slick because of storm conditions. Our officials are meeting this afternoon in Halifax. We have kept in very close communication with the United States officials. As far as the damage to the fishery is concerned, there would obviously be damage if the oil slick were to move into our traditional fishing grounds.

AVAILABILITY OF CANADIAN EXPERTISE TO UNITED STATES COASTGUARD

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): In view of the fact that Mr. Russell Train, the administrator of the United States Environmental Protection Agency, describes the spill as a potential catastrophe of major proportions, is a Canadian team on site now and, in view of our experience resulting from the Arrow disaster of a few years ago, have we made our expertise, our personnel and equipment available to the U.S. coastguard oil strike unit?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, there has been close communication between our officials and the United States officials since the very beginning of the accident. The offer of assistance has been made.

DEPARTMENT'S ATTITUDE TOWARDS CONSTRUCTION OF PIPELINE FROM KITIMAT, BRITISH COLUMBIA TO ALBERTA

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of the Environment arising out of this unfortunate tragedy. Will the minister advise the House what position the Department of the Environment is taking with regard to the application of the consortium that wishes to build an oil pipeline commencing at Kitimat on the British Columbia west coast and through to the province of Alberta?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, we have indicated to the National Energy Board, as it is our duty to do, that all the environmental assessments we have will be at their disposal. I might say I view that situation with considerable skepticism.

ENVIRONMENTAL STUDIES OF CONSEQUENCES OF OIL TANKERS OPERATING NEAR KITIMAT, BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Can the minister tell the House whether a full environmental study has been carried out with regard to the possible consequences of oil tankers entering the dangerous waters opposite Kitimat? If such a study has been conducted, is the minister prepared to make the results public?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): No full environmental study has been done yet.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

REQUEST THAT CHEQUES BE DELIVERED TO VETERINARIANS BEFORE END OF YEAR

Mr. C. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Supply and Services and it has to do with cheques promised to veterinarians of the Health of Animals Branch. It appears some of these cheques have been delivered but that others have not. Is the minister aware of the consequences which late delivery will mean to members of this group in the context of their income tax returns? I understand that some of the cheques may not be delivered until January 3 or January 6. Will every effort be made by the department to ensure that all the veterinarians affected by the agreement will receive the promised remuneration in the 1976 tax year—either have them postmarked prior to midnight, December 31, 1976, or delivered prior to December 31?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Following consultations with the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of National Health and Welfare, Mr. Speaker, we have decided to send veterinarians their cheques for up to $1,000 before Christmas or by December 31, 1976 at the latest.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON DEATH OF ANNA AQUASH IN UNITED STATES—POSSIBILITY OF COMPENSATION FOR CHILDREN

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It has reference to the mysterious death of Anna Mae Aquash in the United States. I first raised this question on May 14 and again on November 15. Does the minister have anything more to report on this matter? Further, will the children be receiving any compensation?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I have some information which has been conveyed to us by the United States authorities. I was planning to reply to the hon. member's letter to me on the same subject of December 16. The documentation provided by the United States conveys information from the FBI on its investigation into the death of the woman in question. I can make it available to the hon. member and would be prepared to table it. However, we have just received it and I do not have a French translation. I would be glad to let the hon. member see it, and perhaps table it subsequently with the agreement of the House.

Mr. Firth: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The minister did not answer the second part of the question. Will the children be receiving compensation of any kind?

Mr. Jamieson: I apologize to the hon. member. In looking over this document, which is to the best of my knowledge the only document received from the United States authorities, I find there is no reference to compensation. But I shall be glad to make further inquiries and advise the hon. member.

Oral Questions

ELDORADO NUCLEAR LIMITED

APPLICATION FOR CONSTRUCTION OF REFINING PLANT IN ONTARIO—DATE OF APPROVAL

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): A question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, Mr. Speaker. Has ministerial approval yet been given to the application by Eldorado Nuclear to build a new refining plant in Ontario?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lawrence: Would the minister indicate whether approval is expected, or can he give an undertaking that there will be an announcement concerning this matter prior to the House resuming in January?

Mr. Gillespie: I can give no such undertaking.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

DECISION TO CANCEL TWO TRAINS AND ONE FERRY IN NEWFOUNDLAND—ALLEGED BREACH OF AGREEMENT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Will there be any further lay-offs by Canadian National in Newfoundland following the announcement on Friday that they were cancelling two trains, and laying off two crews, which seems to fly in the face of the understanding reached between the CN, the government of Newfoundland and the unions that there would be a freeze of present services in the province pending the findings of a commission of inquiry?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): I am not aware of the terms of the agreement to which the hon. member refers but I will look into the matter. I do not at the moment know of any further plans by the CN.

Mr. McGrath: While the minister is checking with the CN, could he inquire into the rationale behind a further decision of the railway company to withdraw one of the ferries connecting Newfoundland to the mainland of Canada, leaving only one ship to provide that service during the off-tourist season?

Mr. Lang: I am advised that the rail car offerings expected can be handled by the remaining vessel and that an additional one is therefore not required.

NORTHERN CANADA POWER COMMISSION

COMPARABILITY OF COST OF ELECTRICITY IN NORTH WITH OTHER AREAS—POSSIBLE TRANSFER OF COMMISSION'S OPERATIONS TO PRIVATE SECTOR

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Can the minister tell us whether he has had an opportunity of reviewing the recommendations of the task force on electrical energy costs in the north and, in particular, does he accept the statement that power bills paid by domestic consumers are generally not out of line with those paid in higher cost areas elsewhere in Canada, particularly in view of the comment by the Mayor of Inuvik to the effect that monthly power bills in the north can often exceed mortgage payments on the home?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I am reviewing that report now. I did not accept the recommendations of the report in total. I am looking for other options which will relieve the impact of power rates in the north. All those options are not in the report.

Mr. Neil: In the Speech from the Throne it was stated, and I quote, that "all federal programs will be reviewed to identify government activities which could be transferred to the private sector without reducing quality of service to the public." Has the government reviewed, or does it intend to review, the activities of the NCPC to determine whether some of its activities could be transferred to the public sector?

Mr. Allmand: That suggestion has not been made to us by the people in the north and is not under review.

AGRICULTURE

ALLEGED STATEMENT BY MINISTER UNDERWORLD INVOLVED IN MARKETING OF MEAT—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Would the minister give us whatever documentation he has to support the validity of the statement that the underworld is involved in the marketing of beef in Canada?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): I think the hon. member should go by the record. If the hon. member would refer to the tape I made at Edmonton and to the press comments afterward, he would find that a question was put to me by a number of farmers. What I said afterward would clear up any misconception the hon. member may have. I was referring to a crime investigation being carried on in the province of Quebec, and that evidence is available to anyone.

he breaks up with tradition, and inquire when the airport construction in northwest New Brunswick will be announced. Or will he have to wait for a separation threat from the republic of Madawaska to get things moving?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker. I think the hon. member has done enough already and that no further action on his part is needed. I am happy to say that we are making positive progress and we will soon have a time schedule for him.

PENITENTIARIES

REQUEST THAT INMATES WHO TESTIFY BEFORE COMMITTEE BE PROTECTED FROM ILL TREATMENT

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General, to whom I was unable to give a copy of the letter in question, but I will do so as soon as I can.

Following the recent visit to Quebec penitentiaries, and in view of the fact that several inmates appearing before the committee mentioned they feared retaliation after their testimony, just before coming here I received a letter from an inmate advising me that one of the witnesses who had denounced some guards had indeed been thrown in the hole. Can the minister tell the House then whether he intends to find an early solution so as to prevent the ever increasing stress in that penitentiary before there is any row in there, and to protect the director, Mr. Goulem, who is also in a bad situation vis-à-vis these guards?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, of course I am looking forward to the report and recommendations to be submitted by the committee of which the hon. gentleman is a member.

As to the question of retaliation, I am not aware of the case the hon. member is referring to, and I am waiting for the letter with much impatience. It is obvious that I should like to tell him that no individual can be sent to solitary confinement unless he appeared before a disciplinary committee of the institution, and members of the committee are always appointed by the institution's director.

POLICY ON TRANSFERRING PRISONERS—ALLEGED REFUSAL OF AIR CANADA TO TRANSPORT PRISONER

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Solicitor General. On Monday of last week I asked him about policy on transferring dangerous prisoners between federal prisons in relation to delay of a certain commercial flight and the minister said he would look into it and get back to me. I should like to ask him again today, what is the government's policy on this important matter, and does he have the information he promised about the specific case?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer as far as policy is concerned. Perhaps the hon. member could bring to my attention the specific case to which he is referring. In the matter of policy, I can say there has been no change in policy recently. I will go beyond that to say that our policy is to use commercial means of transportation, taking into account the security of the public, but in all cases of transfers of inmates the captain of the aircraft is consulted. On his refusal to accept inmates as passengers we use other means of transportation as available and convenient.

ENERGY

NATURAL GAS—RATE INCREASE IN NORTHERN BRITISH COLUMBIA—APPROVAL OF NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources whether he is aware of an increase in natural gas prices in northern regions of British Columbia, particularly the town of Fort Nelson, amounting to 68 per cent, which results in an increase to the average householder of $30 per month? Would the minister indicate whether he is aware of this situation and if the National Energy Board was involved in approving of or scrutinizing this action?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am not familiar with the details of what the hon. member has raised. I suspect it may have to do with the B.C. government's pricing policy rather than the pricing policy at the wellhead. However, I will draw it to the attention of the National Energy Board.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

POSSIBILITY OF BOARD INTERVENING IN RATE INCREASE FOR NATURAL GAS IN NORTHERN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance. Will he co-operate with the minister in determining what deal was made with the province of British Columbia that prevents the Anti-Inflation Board to intervene in a case where such an increase is imposed on the domestic consumer of energy?

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to bring that to the minister's attention and look into it with him.

Oral Questions

TRADE

TEXTILE IMPORT QUOTA—ACTION TO RELIEVE SMALL RETAILERS FROM EFFECT—POSSIBILITY OF MONOPOLIES BUYING QUOTAS

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State (Small Business). I am wondering whether he would advise the House on measures he is taking to alleviate the plight and concerns of small retailers and importers who have been caught in the 1975 quota guillotine of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will take the time to read the release we issued on the subject last Friday, on which my colleague worked with me, he will be satisfied we are doing our utmost to help the small businesses who started up in 1975. He will realize, too, that yesterday the first question by a member of his party called for more protection for the textile industry in Canada.

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the minister that I have read the release many times. I am wondering whether the minister can advise if the textile quotas are to be permanent, and is he sympathetic to the growth of potential importing monopolies that are being encouraged through the buying up of these quotas?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, this is a very complex problem. Of course, I can see another change in the policy of the opposition in this regard since Monday. My main aim is to protect the textile industry in Canada and I hope to be able to achieve that in a rational manner. If the hon. member has not understood my statement of last Friday I will be pleased to send him a copy in French.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, I really think these two questions are serious and important. They are not negative in any respect. Would the minister advise whether he is taking steps to prevent such a concentration of importing privileges in the hands of a few in Canada? There are many small businesses and retailers who are affected by this measure. I am sympathetic to the basic move, but are these problems being fixed up?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, in order to cope with this, especially for small businesses, we have decided to have a special allocation for businesses in high quality fashion, for those who started after 1975 and for the hardship cases we have retained 10 per cent of the quota for 1975 to distribute among those suffering the most.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

SIGNING OF NEW AGREEMENT WITH QUEBEC—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Could the minister tell whether the people of the Lower St. Lawrence, the Gaspé Peninsula and the Magdalen Islands can expect to enter into a new agreement of economic development as promised for 1976 or the beginning of 1977 or whether they must resign themselves to the resumption of negotiations presumably resulting from the change of government in Quebec on November 15 last?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. member and the people of the Lower St. Lawrence can reasonably expect to profit from an agreement on regional development which we hope to be in a position to conclude before the beginning of the next fiscal year.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PAKISTAN—GOVERNMENT VIEW ON SUPPLYING MATERIAL IF NUCLEAR DEVICE DETONATED

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, might I address my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that December 31 is the deadline for negotiating nuclear safeguards with Pakistan, which is believed to be working toward the explosion of a nuclear device, and in view of the fact that Canada has insisted that the explosion of any nuclear device by Pakistan will be followed by a cessation of Canadian supplies, keeping in mind that the deadline is so near, will the government reiterate this determination to cease supplying nuclear materials to Pakistan if a nuclear device is exploded by that country?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I believe I could answer the question with one word, namely, yes, but I should perhaps amplify it by saying the hon. member is quite correct in indicating the deadline, not only in relation to Pakistan but in relation to at least two other customer countries of which I am aware. We are in the process now of last minute, if that is the appropriate term, negotiations in the case of Pakistan, to see if there has been any change in attitude which would indicate their willingness to abide by the proposals we have placed before them. If the current last minute negotiations are not successful then the end result will be as the hon. member has outlined it, namely, there will cease to be any ongoing co-operation between us.

INDUSTRY

TEXTILES—PROPOSED STUDY OF INDUSTRY AND APPOINTMENT OF MR. PEPIN TO HELP STABILIZE

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of widespread reservations, especially by bodies such as the Economic Council of Canada, about the present means to deal with the textile industry and bring stabilization, which is being greeted with some concern, is the minister considering any in-depth study of the industry either by his own department by bringing in outside people in the form of a task force?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I believe we had no other alternative in the circumstances. Of course, I read the comments made by the Economic Council of Canada where they say they would prefer it if we took other actions but they do not know which. After analyzing the situation in the textile industry in Canada in the last few years, I am happy to report to the House that it has improved and modernized itself greatly since 1970, but it still needs some assistance. That is why I decided to give Canadian manufacturers at least 55 per cent of the market and let the remaining 45 per cent to imports. No other industrialized country is as generous as Canada in matters of imports.

OLYMPIC GAMES

AMOUNT OF UNSOLD COINS—GOVERNMENT PLANS FOR DISPOSAL

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Supply and Services I should like to pose a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who is in a position to shed some light on this subject. In view of the unfortunate shortfall in respect of the projected sales of Olympic coins, could the minister advise the House what the total overrun amounts to and what the government intends to do with the large quantities of unsold coins now on hand?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to give specific information to the hon. member, but I will pass the question on to my colleague the Minister of Supply and Services.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, may I address a supplementary question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Supply and Services. I wonder whether the parliamentary secretary could confirm the fact that the overrun of unsold Olympic coins is in the neighbourhood of 60 per cent to 70 per cent of the $450 million which were expected to be sold, and who will bear the cost of liquidating these coins? Would the parliamentary secretary also explain the statements made by Mr. Garot Jackobsen, the assistant master of the Mint, to the effect that no melting of the coins is in fact taking place?

Mr. Rod Blaker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I have no information on that. I doubt that the premises of the first part of the question are correct; as for the other two points, I will communicate with the minister and the information will be provided to the hon. member.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LOCATION OF PARACHUTE MAINTENANCE CENTRE IN RELATION TO AIRBORNE SCHOOL—POSSIBLE REMOVAL OF AIRBORNE SCHOOL FROM EDMONTON

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. The minister informed us last week that he was moving the Canadian forces parachute maintenance depot from Edmonton. As the Canadian airborne centre, which gives initial and advance training to all parachutists, is apparently to remain in Edmonton, can the minister confirm that the parachutes used by the airborne school—representing 40 per cent of the total—will have to be sent down here to be repacked after each jump?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman is correct in that the airborne school does do the majority of the jumping. The airborne regiment does much less than the others, so that the packing facility and the airborne facility have to be together. That is why, in speaking to the hon. member for Edmonton Centre the other day, I said that any moves have to be phased so that the packing facility and the school facility are close at hand.

It is not a new phenomenon. When the airborne school was at Shilo, I believe it was, and at Rivers, chutes had to be returned for packing to one central depot, which is usually associated with the school where most of the repacking is done. As I pointed out to the hon. gentleman from Edmonton Centre, the chutes are repacked before the troops jump.

Mr. McKinnon: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister now has the situation hopelessly confused. Last week he said that the depot was moving down here, and now he indicates that it is going to stay in Edmonton. Could he be more specific: Is he or is he not going to move the parachute packing facility, what is known as the parachute maintenance depot, out of Edmonton?

Mr. Danson: When the airborne school is moved from Edmonton, as part of the phasing operation the packing operation will have to be moved to be close to it.

Mr. McKinnon: A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. This is the first indication we have had that the minister has any intention whatever of moving the airborne school. Can we now take it that it is going to be part of his future policy to move that, too, out of Edmonton?

Mr. Danson: That is a possibility, Mr. Speaker.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

JUSTIFICATION OF COST OF MOVING DEPARTMENT TO PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. In the December issue of the Argus-Journal, the Public Service Alliance of Canada publication, there is a quotation from a letter received from the deputy minister of veterans affairs, Mr. Bruce Brittain. In this letter he states that the estimated total cost of moving the Department of Veterans Affairs from Ottawa to Prince Edward Island is $20 million. Would the minister justify this expenditure at this time of supposed government restraint?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that is the anticipated cost, with completion of the move in 1980.

Mr. McKenzie: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can I take it from that answer that the government is definitely going to move DVA to Prince Edward Island at an estimated cost of $20 million?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): The principle of this proposal has been approved by the government of Canada, Mr. Speaker, and as far as I am concerned the department is definitely going to move.

INDUSTRY

REQUEST FOR ACTION TO PROTECT ONTARIO CHICKEN PRODUCERS FROM EFFECTS OF IMPORTS

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to give the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce another opportunity to demonstrate his support for the protection of Canadian industry from cheap foreign imports. In view of the fact that imports of chicken into Canada this year are running at four times the 1974 level and that 95 per cent of the chicken being imported into this country is coming into Ontario, does the government propose taking any short term action to provide relief for Ontario producers from these extremely high levels of chicken imports between now and the time the final decision is made on the creation of a national chicken marketing agency? I ask this question in view of the fact that not only dollars but jobs are being lost to the United States in this respect.

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a related question on the subject of import quotas. Is the minister now in a position to give that report, and, if so, what is it?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, according to my information, and concerning the hon. member's question, I think that the closures mentioned by him are due, in particular, to a reorganization in the industry, and are not specifically related to the import problems. I must say to the House that the level of imports in the footwear industry concerns me. I just received the recommendations of the Canadian committee of footwear manufacturers and I expect to be able to announce a policy in that area soon.

PRIVILEGE

MR. YEWCHUK—NEWS REPORTING

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege since it is the only course open to me to protest against a recent, shabby CTV news report which, by innuendo, casts a slur upon me and my family. The report dealing with travel on DND aircraft and written by Mr. Charlie Greenwell, after a telephone interview with myself, was inaccurate and erroneous as well as clearly designed to make a preconceived point. I was unable to resolve the matter with CTV News since no one, not even the reporter concerned, would discuss the subject with me, although I made three attempts to contact them.

● (1510)

Having been given the facts, Mr. Greenwell chose to sensationalize the issue by producing a false and misleading report. Subsequent refusal to discuss the matter and take corrective action, in my view, establishes him as the journalistic equivalent of a creature to whom scientists refer as sus scrofa, or referred to pseudo scientifically as porcus domesticus. In view of the facts which I have outlined, and in view of the fact that this House has always staunchly defended the freedom of the press, if you, sir, should decide that my question of privilege is valid, I would move that this House express its displeasure with all examples of shabby and irresponsible news reporting.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: You would have to abolish the Globe and Mail.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. For reasons which I set out at greater length in respect of earlier but similar cases raised by hon. members respecting the reporting of their activities, either directly or indirectly connected with their capacities as members of parliament, I have come to the conclusion that, as I have expressed in the past and for these reasons, unless the reporting amounts to a contempt of the House it should not be looked upon as being in the class of a question of privilege. Certainly, no argument is put forward that the reporting is contemptuous in this situation. Therefore, I will have to hold that no prima facie question of privilege appears to be raised by these remarks at this time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I should like to ask the government House leader if he would indicate what order of business is intended for today, in view of the statement made yesterday in the House that he intended to have Bill C-22 passed through all stages. Would he advise the House of his intention with respect to the business of the House for the balance of the day?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I varied the order of the business in an effort to develop a more seasonal atmosphere in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Therefore, I would like to call the bill on historic sites and monuments, followed by the metric conversion bill, followed by the bill on scientific activities, followed by the bill on satisfied securities.

Mr. Elzinga: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I seek clarification of Your Honour's ruling with regard to questions relating to financial matters which might possibly be related to future budgetary provisions. I refer specifically to questions put by the hon. member for York-Simcoe yesterday and by the leader of the NDP last Friday. These two members were cut short by Your Honour and it was Your Honour's opinion that their questions were basically on budgetary matters. I am sure Your Honour can appreciate the difficulty which hon. members have in asking questions on fiscal matters since almost all questions can ultimately be considered to be on budgetary matters. In my humble opinion, the questions appear to be in order with regard to form and content, and I wonder if clarification could be obtained from Your Honour in regard to this matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member raises a very interesting question. It has been the subject, I am sure, of much conversation. I am prepared to consider the matter very carefully over the Christmas break. However, it does seem to me that when a question is put to a minister, the answer to which would result in one of the strongest and most clearly established breaches of privilege in the annals of that very narrowly defined procedural area, there is little sense in allowing the question to be put if the answer will clearly be that it is a budgetary matter, and if it were to be answered it would breach one of the most well established privileges of the House.

It might be preferable to allow such questions to be put on the narrow grounds that the minister can always say that he is not prepared to consider such matters. However, that seems to me to be most unlikely ground, and in fairness we should indicate to hon. members putting such a question whether the Minister of Finance is prepared to consider a cut in taxes. That is a question that has been the subject matter of rulings on both occasions. If the minister were to give an indication that such matters were being considered, his answer would have to be classified as a leak of budgetary considerations, which is a clear breach of privilege. Therefore, if the answer will result in an offence against the privileges of the House, it seems to me that the question should not be put. However, if there is a strong feeling about it, I can listen to other representations and perhaps consider them over the Christmas break.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: If Your Honour will be considering this matter over the Christmas vacation, I would mention that two of the instances in question related to requests for tax cuts; they sought an indication from the minister as to whether there would be tax cuts. I would remind Your Honour—and perhaps you will recall yourself—that certainly this is merely one option with respect to the economic circumstances of our country which was presented to the federal-provincial meeting by the Minister of Finance.

When the question was asked by the leader of the NDP and by the hon. member for York-Simcoe with respect to that possibility, it seemed to me to be in the context of whether or not it was an option that was being considered. In other words, the minister had the opportunity of saying either that it was, or was not, that there were other options, or elaborating on them. It seems to me that when there are serious economic matters that face our country, as there are today, these kinds of questions simply search out and seek clarification on the options that are available. The possibility is available to us, and it would not breach budgetary secrecy and the traditional privileges of hon. members would not be thereby affected.

So I simply make my observations in the knowledge that Your Honour will probably have thought of them himself. I simply wanted to raise them in case, by some oversight, you did not consider that aspect.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I should like to assure the House that the next time a question of this nature arises which does not invite a clear breach of parliamentary privilege and which is not a representation, which is often the case—a question put in this form is in double jeopardy because usually it is a straightforward representation—I will give it careful consideration, and if I have any doubt perhaps I will postpone the question until three o'clock and listen to arguments as to whether or not the question is in order.

OFFICIAL DEVELOPMENT ASSISTANCE

Question No. 918—Mr. Howie:

What progress has been made with the five-year strategy for international development co-operation commenced in 1975 in respect to achieving the United Nations target of 0.7% of Gross National Product?

Mr. Fernand E. Leblanc (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): In 1975 Canada increased its official development assistance (ODA) by 23 per cent, for a total of $880 million dollars (U.S.), as compared with $713 million dollars (U.S.) in 1974. Therefore official development assistance increased from 0.50 per cent of GNP in 1974 to 0.56 per cent in 1975.

3. Has a cost benefit analysis been completed with respect to the relocation and, if so, what are the results?

4. What is the estimated cost of the renovations required to adapt the new building in Sault Ste. Marie to the needs of the CCRI?

5. What was the cost of renovations recently completed to the current building in Ottawa which is leased by the government?

6. Does the current building have to be restored to its original condition before turning it over to the owner and, if so, what is the estimated cost of such a project?

7. What criteria were used by the Treasury Board in making the final decision on the move?

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): 1. Yes (a) April 1, 1977; (b) 1½ years; (c) $285,000 (including (d)); (d) 35 employees—$175,000.

OLYMPIAD FOR THE PHYSICALLY DISABLED

Question No. 937—Mr. McCleave:

With reference to the motion passed unanimously in the House on October 19, 1976 concerning support for the Olympiad for the Disabled, is it the intention of the government to support the Olympiad for the Disabled fund raising programme and, if so, in what form will such support be and will funds be made available?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): There will be no direct support to the fund raising campaign for the Olympiad for the Physically Disabled from the Fitness and Amateur Sport Branch, Department of National Health and Welfare. As stated in the Minister's news release of July 28, 1976, the funds which had been destined for the 1976 Olympiad for the Physically Disabled in Toronto, until its organizers invited South Africa, will be devoted to assisting the development of a national sports and physical recreation program for Canada's handicapped.

OUTSTANDING DISABILITY PENSION CLAIMS

Question No. 962—Mr. Howie:

1. As of November 1, 1976, how many veterans had cases pending decision or awaiting a hearing before the Pension Commission?

2. How many of these veterans were residents of New Brunswick?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): 1. At November 1, 1976 there were 2,776 claims by veterans or their surviving dependants at first decision level awaiting adjudication. In addition, there were 5,024 cases in which a first decision had been rendered but in which the applicant was dissatisfied and requested an Entitlement Board hearing to determine eligibility for pension. Of these, 2,291 are awaiting preparation of the statement of case in the manner and form required by the Pension Act. In 1,328 cases the statements of case have been prepared and are in the hands of the Avocate and/or the applicant, for certification by the applicant that he is ready to proceed with the hearing. The hearing cannot be held until the certification is received. There are 1,405 claims which have been certified as ready to be heard. There are 818 cases where the pensioner has appealed the Commission decision as to the amount of the assessment of his disability and has requested a formal hearing as to quantum by two members of the Commission. Of these, 167 cases are awaiting certification of readiness to proceed by the applicant or Advocate, 197 cases are listed as ready to be heard.

2. Statistics are not maintained concerning the province of origin of applications at first decision level. However, at November 1, 1976 there were 344 applications from New Brunswick, for a hearing by an Entitlement Board or as to quantum by two Members of the Commission. Of this number 162 claims are in the process of having documentation prepared in the manner and form required by the Pension Act. In 98 cases the documentation has been referred to the applicant, usually through his Advocate and the Commission is waiting the applicant's notice that he is ready to proceed with the hearing. Eighty-four cases are ready to be heard.

IRVING CASE—LEGAL FEES

Question No. 1,027—Mr. Howie:

1. How much money was paid to date, for the prosecution of the Irving interests under the Combines Investigation Act, exclusive of departmental personnel and to whom was it paid?

2. Was the cost of travel outside of Canada in connection with this case paid to any departmental personnel and, if so, to (a) how many persons (b) what destinations?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): 1. William L. Hoyt, Q.C., $174,335 (fees and disbursements); T. Joseph Scanlon (Consultant), $12,467 (fees and disbursements); Winnifred Johnston (Witness); $630; Total, $187,432.

2. (a) Two. (b) One to Washington and one to Bermuda.

AIR MAIL LETTERS

Question No. 1,039—Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra):

1. Do airmail letters sent from Europe to Vancouver take from ten to sixteen days to reach the receiver and was the average time last year from four to six days and, if so, what action, if any, is planned to improve the service?

2. Is mail from Britain to Vancouver shipped first to Montreal or Toronto before being shipped to Vancouver and, if so, for what reason?

3. Does the government intend to route outgoing mail from Vancouver to Europe via Toronto or Montreal instead of shipping the mail directly from Vancouver and, if so, for what reason?

4. If mail is handled first at Montreal or Toronto, then again at Vancouver (a) are there more employees involved in handling the mail than if it was sent to Vancouver directly (b) considering the wages paid to post office employees at both locations, is the total cost of handling the mail greater than if the mail was shipped directly to Vancouver and, if so, how does the government explain this excessive expenditure?

5. Does overseas airmail receive lower priority in sorting than third-class domestic mail and, if so, for what reason?

6. Have expenditures on machinery in the postal system resulted in a reduction of staff?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): 1. Some airmail letters from Europe to Vancouver may take from ten to sixteen days to reach the addressee and the time lapse would depend, in part, in what country the mail originated. However, such transmission time should be the exception rather than the rule. There are no figures available that would show that the average time last year for such mail would have been from four to six days. Checks made at Vancouver have indicated that, in some cases, airmail letters have been posted in England up to five days prior to despatch. Allowing possibly up to two days for such mail to reach Vancouver, and an additional two days if a weekend intervenes, up to nine days' transmission time would be accounted for.

2. Air mail from Britain for Vancouver is transported by British Airways to Mirabel Airport exclusively. The decision to off-load at Mirabel Airport all air mail destined to offices in Toronto and west was made by the British Postal Administration in January 1976.

3. Air mail from Vancouver for Britain and the major European countries has always been and will continue to be routed directly from Vancouver.

4. (a) Yes, our postal employees at Mirabel Airport must effect a bag transfer operation. This consists of taking the bags out of the incoming airline tub carts and transferring them to other airline tub carts for connection with next available domestic flights to Toronto and/or west. (b) Since the start of this new routing, there has been no need to increase the number of postal employees or create overtime at our Mirabel postal facility to cope with this light increase in workload.

5. Overseas letter-rate items are afforded first-class service in Canada.

6. Acquisition of mechanized equipment to sort postal coded mail has reduced overtime and usage of casual labour. It also reduces the number of additional positions that must be filled to process increase in mail volume.

In so far as income taxes owing by persons not resident in Canada, statistics are not maintained to allow the production of this information.

1. What is the total dollar value of DREE grants to Algoma Steel Corporation since 1968?

2. How many new jobs were to be created by the grants?

3. How many new jobs have been created as a result of the grants?

Mr. Ed. Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: 1. Two offers totalling $12,000,000 have been made to The Algoma Steel Corporation Limited for projects in Sault Ste. Marie.

2. 1,100 new jobs are expected to be created as a result of these two DREE offers.

3. One of the projects is still under construction and, as the two projects are complementary, the projected increase in employment attributed to the offers will not be realized until both projects have reached commercial production.

Mr. Goodale: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, according to the order paper, the House is due to recess tomorrow for approximately a month. Can the parliamentary secretary give us any assurance that he will make some attempt to clear up some of the outstanding questions on the order paper going back to the beginning of the present session?

Mr. Goodale: I think it would probably be useful to point out to hon. members that we have been keeping track over the last several weeks of this session of the rate of response to questions, the rate at which the government has been able to provide answers to questions put by hon. members.

• (1520)

I am pleased to report to hon. members that the rate of response to the number of questions which have been asked is, in fact, one of the highest rates which has been seen by this parliament. So I will give my hon. friend the undertaking that we will do our best to answer as many questions as possible before the adjournment, which is anticipated soon, but I think it is worthwhile pointing out that the performance in this particular session has been very good indeed.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE NUMBER OF MEMBERS OF BOARD

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that Bill C-13, to amend the Historic Sites and Monuments Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Keith B. Penner (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to introduce this bill at the second reading debate stage on behalf of my minister, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Allmand) who is also responsible for Parks Canada under the purview of which this particular bill falls.

The Historic Sites and Monuments Act provides that the board, bearing the same name, recommend to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development places, events and persons of historical significance to our country. Established in 1919, the board is composed of 15 members; two representatives each from Ontario and Quebec, one each from the remaining eight provinces, one representative each from the National Museums of Canada and the Dominion Archivist, and an officer from the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I understand that the latter position is vacant at the present time. The provincial representatives are usually historians or archivists of great repute. Mr. Marc Laterreur is the chairman of the board, and he is also a member of the Department of History of the Faculté des Lettres of Laval University in Quebec.

In the past 20 years, on the recommendation of the Historic Sites and Monuments Board of Canada, more than 70 historic parks and major sites have been designated, and almost 700 persons and events of historical significance have been commemorated. National historic parks and sites attracted 4.4 million visitors during 1975-76. The Halifax Citadel and Signal Hill in St. John's, Newfoundland, each recorded more than 800,000 visitors. The Fortress of Louisbourg, in Nova Scotia, received nearly 300,000 visitors, and the Alexander Graham Bell Museum, at Baddeck, Nova Scotia, recorded 243,000 visitors. In western Canada, there were 115,000 visitors to Lower Fort Garry, and 101,000 persons visited the RCMP ship St. Roch in Vancouver. In the Yukon Territory there were almost 85,000 visitors to the historic buildings and sites in the Dawson City area, including 10,000 visitors to the Palace Grand Theatre and 24,000 visitors to the Robert Service cabin.

In the past, much emphasis has been given to military sites in Parks Canada's presentation of national historic parks and sites. As a result, some provinces with little military history have not been adequately recognized in the present historic parks program. Planning has now been directed to provide a proper balance of thematic and regional factors which will allow Parks Canada to recognize Canada's history in such fields as agriculture, industry and ranching. The departmental estimates which were approved by parliament provide almost $19 million for capital expenditures by the national historic parks and sites branch of Parks Canada in the current year. In the years to come we will be asking parliament for additional amounts to carry out this program of historical commemoration, preservation and restoration for the benefit of all Canadians.

The purpose of amending the Historic Sites and Monuments Act is to have a better representation of two important parts of Canada, namely, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. Up until now representatives from these northern regions attended board meetings only as observers without the right to vote. If the amendment to the act today, at second reading, is adopted, the delegates from the Yukon and the Northwest Territories on the Historic Sites and Monuments Board of Canada will no longer voice their opinions in merely an advisory capacity. The board would have 17 members instead of 15, and the representatives from the Yukon and the Northwest Territories would have full voting rights which up to the present they have not had.

In the eyes of all the people of Canada, the north, with all its human, cultural and natural resources, is becoming increasingly important. I therefore believe that hon. members of this House will approve a measure which would ensure the participation of these vast regions in that board.

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments with respect to Bill C-13. It is a fairly straightforward bill, and as the parliamentary secretary has said, what it does is increase the representation on the board by two, one representative from the Northwest Territories and one from the Yukon Territory. Quite frankly, this amendment should have been proposed a number of years ago. I was interested to hear the parliamentary secretary say that until now the representatives from the two territories have sat as observers and have not had voting rights. This is the situation with respect to most boards and with respect to conferences which take place where representatives of the territories are invited.

I am reminded of a conference which took place a short time ago. It was a federal-provincial conference of ministers with respect to manpower, and two territorial councillors, one from the Yukon and one from the Northwest Territories, were invited to attend. When they arrived at the conference, where they thought they would be given full delegate status, they were seated in the back rows behind the mandarins and were told, quite frankly, that if they wished to put any questions or to participate in the debates at that conference, they would have to do so through the mandarins or through the ministers. So this bill is a step forward in giving some status to representatives from the two territories. I hope this is just the beginning of steps to give more representation and more authority to the people in the territories, Mr. Speaker.

I was disappointed, in the parliamentary secretary's remarks about the various parts of Canada, that he just hopped over the province of Saskatchewan from which I happen to come. This province has an historic background and some historic sites well known to people throughout Canada. The Riel rebellion of 1884-85 took place in Saskatchewan; we have Batoche, Fish Creek and other places—yet the parliamentary secretary did not see fit to mention the number of visitors to these historic sites last year.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: All located in Saskatoon-Biggar!

Mr. Neil: The hon. member says they are located in his constituency, and that is true. It is a fine constituency, and when the parliamentary secretary speaks on the subject in future I hope he will not overlook the province of Saskatchewan which is so often overlooked by members from other parts of Canada. The parliamentary secretary also mentioned that additional amounts of money would be needed to provide for future historic sites and monuments. I think it is important that money be set aside for this purpose because historic sites and monuments indicate part of our history and part of our heritage.

When I was looking over Bill C-13 and making a few notes in preparation for my remarks today, I came across the two programs that are proposed to assist unemployment; the Canada works program and the young Canada works program. I think either, or both, of these programs could be used to further the development of historic sites and monuments. When I look back over the LIP programs that have taken place over the years, I find that many of the projects did not have lasting value. The money is spent, the program is over, and there is nothing to remember it by. It would seem to me that the young Canada works program in particular could be adapted to the development of historic sites because it would give the youth of our country an opportunity to participate in their heritage.

I hope the minister will be in touch with the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) and will suggest to him that he direct the attention of the ministerial advisory committee to programs directed toward historic sites and monuments.

Mr. Speaker, I have nothing more to say on the bill. We are in agreement with its terms and it will be passed through committee very quickly. I am sure that when it comes back to the House for third reading there will be a very short debate in order that the bill may become law.

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, this is a lucky day for the Northwest Territories and the Yukon in this House with this debate on Bill C-13 which will give part-time jobs to a couple of people. This is a big deal because we need the jobs, I guarantee that. Bill C-13, to amend the Historic Sites and Monuments Act, will increase the number of board members from 15 to 17 with the addition of one from the Northwest Territories and one from the Yukon. Whoever they are, will, I am sure, be a useful addition to the board and will make some good recommendations. I think the bill should receive support because, as I mentioned, we need the jobs in the north.

Mr. Speaker, in Yellowknife a two-bedroom apartment rents for $560 a month; electricity, for a home in Yellowknife, costs from $150 to $250 per month; fuel, for the average home in Yellowknife, runs from $150 to $200 a month—yet wages are not higher than anywhere else in the country, although the taxes are. In a place like Fort McPherson, in the Mackenzie Delta, a loaf of bread costs a dollar; a quart of milk, $1.84; butter, $1.75; eggs, $1.93 a dozen. What is the government doing about this, Mr. Speaker? Is the bill going to change the Northern Canada Power Commission Act so that northerners can run the commission themselves through the territorial councils?

It is fine and dandy to bring in this bill which gives a couple of part-time jobs. I understand each member of the board is paid something like $100 per day, plus expenses. It works out to about 10 or 12 days each year, so that brings about $500 or $600 into each territory twice a year. But the government has not introduced a bill to do something about the extremely high cost of living in the north, although the figures are very easy to check when one looks around the towns of the north.

This bill is all very fine and we appreciate the couple of jobs it will create. I cannot see any opposition to this bill so I will not waste the time of the House, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I think the parliamentary secretary probably knows that I had charge of this particular operation one time when I was minister. I should like to speak on a couple of points that might be of interest to the Historic Sites and Monuments Board. I think everyone here realizes that a place that does not have a history does not have a future. We have not been the most active country in the world to preserve our history, but in all fairness, within the limited amount of funds provided to the Historic Sites and Monuments Board there has been a fairly comprehensive effort to preserve some of the physical evidence of our short history.

I should like to mention, in addition to those monuments where certain things happen, a couple of things that I think should be brought to the attention of the Historic Sites and Monuments Board that could make their work a shade more fruitful in the next year or so. The first thing I should like to draw attention to is the Centennial Series. I know it will shock the House to learn that Canada has never had a series of history texts which recount our history and is written by Canadians. We were always forced to use British books, the Cambridge History Series. Volume 6 dealt with Canada. In 1957, after discussions with the Historic Sites and Monuments Board, a target was set for centennial year for a history of Canada done by Canadians. It was to consist of 18 volumes, each written by a leading expert under the over-all management of Dr. Morton and Dr. Creighton. This was the decision of a group of people who turned the work over to these two people. I do not know whether the parliamentary secretary has seen any of these volumes, the most recent of which by Dr. Creighton was issued last fall.

I would like to suggest to the parliamentary secretary that he could serve Canada well by finding out why the missing volumes were not published. I know why: we calculated a certain amount for the grants, which came from a source other than the Historic Sites and Monuments Board, but we did not foresee the inflation of the last few years. It now costs nearly twice as much to produce these books which have a limited readership—hence the delay. The other reason, I suspect, is the question of the work, in one case, and I think the Historic Sites and Monuments Board should attempt to solve that problem.

I make no apology for bringing up this subject nearly 20 years after its inauguration. It annoyed me as a school teacher to realize the basic sort of information I had to use in teaching Canadians was that their own history was work by English writers. We tried to correct that situation in 1957, almost 20 years ago, by setting 1967 as the target date for the completion of the series, in time for the centennial celebrations. We could not meet that target because of cost and other factors. I say that we should complete that series in 1977. It should be made known to every school board and every school room in this country that there is a series of history text books concerning every part of Canada and every period of our history. This has never before been available. I have learned from talking to teachers that many of them have never heard of this series.

Since the government is spending millions of dollars publicizing many of its programs, why cannot they allow the Historic Sites and Monuments Board to publicize the existence of this history series? It was begun before many of our present teachers were teaching, even before some of them were born. I advise hon. members on the government side to read the last volume by Dr. Creighton, "The Forked Road", to learn where they went off the track. These books are an authentic history of our nation and have been written by Canadians. At least we should make them available to teachers. They are not the type of reading material you give junior grade students. The books are based on authentic documents of which teachers of history and students should be aware. I know that not many volumes will be bought, and I regret that as a nation we are not literate; only a small percentage of our people are truly literate in the sense that they read serious material.

The second matter I shall mention briefly has to do with the activities of the geographical names committee. That committee selects the names of Canadians who have played a prominent part in this nation's life and applies them to certain physical features such as mountains. It has been the rule that only physical features in this country can be so named after the person's death. That rule is occasionally broken by the provinces because they, too, are empowered to name certain geographical features.

I ask the Historic Sites and Monuments Board to consider the questions I am raising. We wanted to honour, say 15 or 20 years ago, those who were then prominent on the Canadian scene. When they were active their profile was high. Unfortunately, after a person dies, for a long time after death his profile becomes low in the public view. We tend to forget what such people did 15 or 20 years ago, and tend to forget the tremendous contributions to this country they made during their lifetimes. In other words, I suggest that the parliamentary secretary or the minister should remind the Historic Sites and Monuments Board that it must consult with other groups, such as the geographical names committee, which comes under another department, in order that we may reassess periodically the names applied to certain physical features of this country.

I am well aware of what is happening in the Arctic Islands, and of the new names which have appeared in recent years. I think they are well deserved. I do not say this because the name "Hamilton" has appeared in the centre of Ellesmere Island. That name is there for a good reason—and it is not to honour me. It honours one who did substantial work in that area. I simply say that it is up to the Historic Sites and Monuments Board, and committees like the geographical names committee, to keep alive and vibrant the memory and names of those who served this country. The rule, by and large, is that we are not to use the name of any person living. Unfortunately, people once prominent tend to adopt a lower profile in the last years of their lives, and they tend to be partly forgotten. We must remember to honour them by naming after them certain parts of our geographical country, to remind the people of the north or other parts of Canada of work done in resources development and other fields.

Perhaps I could mention a couple of other points usefully, since we are not often given the opportunity to discuss this subject. I think the House is anxious to pass the bill. As I say, the minister must make certain that the Historic Sites and Monuments Board knows that members of this House want it to do its job and to record in physical form the history of our nation, a history which is short but of which we can be proud.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I, too, want to take a few moments to speak on this bill. Obviously, there is general support for it in the House, and rightly so. The present debate gives hon. members a parliamentary vehicle for airing grievances about the operations of the parks division of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I am fortunate enough to have in my constituency one of the most historic sites of Canada and certainly one of the most scenic and commanding sites of this country, Signal Hill national historic park. The park was established by the government of Canada in 1957, as one of the first acts of the Diefenbaker government, which adopted the recommendations of its predecessor, the St. Laurent government. Following the establishment of the park as a national historic site, development has lagged considerably, which is the point of the grievance I wish to put forward today in my representation to the minister.

Briefly, by way of historical background, Signal Hill national historic park is the site of the last armed conflict in North America between the forces of France and Britain which fought for a foothold on the North American continent. The site has long been recognized as an historic one. During the colonial administration of Newfoundland, prior to confederation, it was recognized as an historic site by the dominion government of Newfoundland. The most commanding feature of the site is Cabot Tower, which was completed in 1897 during Queen Victoria's jubilee to mark the four-hundredth anniversary of the founding of Newfoundland by John Cabot.

In addition to the early historic significance of the park in relation to colonial wars for the possession of that part of North America, the park is significant in that later, more contemporary historic events took place within its confines. For example, in that park was received the first wireless message sent across the Atlantic by Marconi in 1901. It has been associated with many other historical events to do with development of modern telecommunications, by virtue of the fact that it is the nearest point of land in North America to Europe. The distance between the west coast of Ireland and Cabot Tower, which is located near Cape Speare, is relatively short, shorter than the distance between Winnipeg and St. John's. For that reason the park has lent itself to the development of telecommunications and wireless communications in Canada. Apart from the erection of the Cabot Tower which was the site of a wireless station that was operated until a short time ago, very little took place until the establishment of the park in 1957. Following that, development, paradoxically, lagged considerably.

The bureaucrats in Ottawa, without advantage of having been there, decided that this would not do. They decided these people could not stay there. Without having one alternate plan of their own as to the development and restoration of these old buildings, and that building in particular and the fortifications surrounding it, they decided, against my protests, that these people would have to be evicted and they were. A short time after, the building was burned to the ground. That was a great tragedy. We lost that building, and to date—over 15 years later—it has not been restored. The building still has not been rebuilt notwithstanding the fact, in my estimation, it was because of the negligence of the department that the building was destroyed in the first place.

It is interesting to note that the St. John's Daily News of Friday, December 17, carried an advertisement over the signature of the area superintendent of historic parks and sites. The ad asked people to come forward with old photographs of this very building. Apparently they do not even have a photograph of the building, let alone any part of it which survived that fire. That is the kind of thing which has irritated the people of St. John's and the many hundreds of thousands of Canadians and other North Americans who had the pleasure and thrill of visiting this site.

Last year the number of visitors to the site reached the one million mark. In fact, there were over one million visitors to the site last year. I am told that this year they will also surpass the million mark. Next year, because of the Canada summer games which will take place in St. John's, a very sharp increase in the number of visitors to that park is anticipated. However, the total expenditure on the site for 1975-76, covering capital construction, maintenance and operating costs, was less than $300,000—$278,000. By comparison, for the same year, 1975-76, the fortress at Louisburg, an equally historic site that is visited by many tourists, the total expenditure was almost $4 million. The total for the same year for the Halifax Citadel was $582,000. That site is equally prominent in historic importance.

A decision has been made and an announcement released that it is the intention of the government to spend $20 million on the restoration of Citadel Hill in Halifax. I applaud that decision. It is a very progressive and wise move on the part of the government because Citadel Hill is a beautiful historic park, one that commends itself to restoration. However, what is wrong with historic Signal Hill in St. John's? Why can we not get some of that development capital for restoration to at least put that park back in the position it was before one of the lone surviving historic building, dating back to colonial days, was destroyed by fire because of the negligence of bureaucrats in Ottawa who did not see fit to provide a caretaker for that building? It has caused us to wonder.

I believe the importance of the park can be measured by the number of visitors, over one million last year. That compares with Louisburg where there were less than half a million visitors. Even Citadel Hill had less visitors.

The restoration of the fortress of Louisburg is something in which all Canadians can take pride. Indeed, at the time the decision was made to restore Louisburg, it was done as an act of great humanity because of the terrible economic conditions that prevailed at the time on Cape Breton Island. The restoration of Citadel Hill can equally be applauded as a very wise and progressive move. However, I say to the government, why not get on with the development of Signal Hill historic park in St. John's? This is one of the most beautiful historic sites in Canada, and certainly one of the most neglected historic sites in the country.

I appeal to the minister to visit the site. He will see, in a very dramatic way, exactly what I am talking about. All that has been accomplished since the designation of the site as a national historic park is a certain amount of landscaping—not a great deal. Less than $3 million has been spent there, since 1963, on everything. A very unattractive, badly designed visitors' centre was built. It does not lend itself to the area, the park or the surrounding environment of the old city of St. John's. However, at least they built that. Work then stopped. They seemed to have drawn a blank. Signal Hill seems to have been declared a non-entity in terms of receiving the attention of the planners and the department and in terms of expenditure on the development of that site.

The people of my province, more particularly the people of my city, take a great deal of pride in Signal Hill park. It is one of the advantages we have, living in the beautiful old city of St. John's, that we are able to go to the top of the hill and look out over the vast expanse of the North Atlantic, knowing we are standing on the most easterly site of the North American continent. We take pride in it and we are concerned about the government's attitude toward it. I can assure the minister that the sentiments I have put forward today would be echoed by all the people of St. John's—by the daily newspapers, the television stations, the municipal government, the government of Newfoundland and the hundreds of thousands of Canadians who have taken the opportunity to visit this beautiful park.

I urge the government to discharge its responsibility to this most ancient of historic sites by getting along with the development of the area and carrying out badly needed restoration work on the old buildings. By all means develop Louisburg; but let us not forget Signal Hill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to prolong the debate to any great extent. We are, of course, delighted that the government has finally consented to appoint some representatives on the board and concern itself with the national historic sites and monuments in our country, particularly in that great part of our country which is north of the sixtieth parallel. I want to say a few words about another great region of Canada. It should be no surprise—it has never been any surprise to me or to those of my colleagues who represent the vast areas of northern and central British Columbia—that as far as historic sites and monuments are concerned we should get no better consideration in this respect than is given in other directions such as transportation, communication facilities and public services of all kinds. People up in that country have always been second-class citizens. We have never considered ourselves as part of Canada. As a matter of fact, I sometimes wonder when British Columbia ever did become part of Canada. When I look at historic sites and monuments, I find myself asking how many of my colleagues here or, indeed, how many citizens of eastern Canada, know anything at all about those brave explorers who opened the road to the west, the activities of the Hudson's Bay Company, and so on.

One has to stand on the bank of the mighty Peace River to get the feeling which must have inspired those early explorers who wrote in their diaries about the splendour and the natural beauty of the scenes they witnessed, the abundance of wildlife, the friendliness of the native population they encountered in the search for access to the Pacific Ocean. One has to travel the trails which go from Dawson Creek to Fort McLeod, from Fort Saint John to Fort Nelson, or take a canoe to travel the lake district of Central British Columbia, where the natives have carved out an existence since time immemorial, to appreciate what must have been in their minds. Yet there are no historic sites or monuments of any significance in that part of the country. Those of my colleagues who have read the logs of Fraser and McKenzie, who know the great rivers, the Columbia, the McKenzie and the Fraser as well as the fast-flowing coastal rivers, the Skeena and the Stikine, will realize that this is an omission for which there can be no excuse.

I have spoken about this often in committee. I have had private conversations with the minister asking him to encourage the board which reviews applications made to it and considers plans to preserve historic sites. My heart bleeds when I look at the old fort at Fort Saint John and see another log carried away, another log floating down the river having been torn away by pranksters. I wonder whether people in the east are interested at all in this great chapter of Canadian history. I have worked with citizens groups, particularly in the Fort Saint John and Fort McLeod area. We have spent hours and hours, days and days, years and years, trying to persuade someone, either in the provincial or in the federal government, to establish some kind of point of recognition for the benefit of people who traverse that great highway to the north known as the Alaska or the Alcan Highway, 1500 miles of wilderness road. Yet there is no indication of any kind that the national government is interested in explaining or documenting the history of this spectacular region.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that I have gone somewhat beyond the scope of the bill. But let me say this. If the people who are to be appointed from the territories and who will, I suppose, make recommendations about commemorating the history of the territories, the history of the Arctic Ocean, are not able to make a contribution any greater than that of the person who has represented central northern British Columbia, we are wasting our time here. I am glad that both my colleagues from central and northern British Columbia are in the chamber this afternoon. I have desperately searched for any contribution to the debate in recent years with regard to this matter, one which has always been of concern to me. I have not discovered that there was any great interest. I merely rise to serve notice on the minister that if the representatives from the northern areas are not allowed greater input into the policy-making of the department in establishing historic sites and monuments, they will be wasting their time and we shall be wasting our time in the House this afternoon.

I regret to take this attitude. I know the minister is interested in the subject and that he is concerned, as many of us are, to preserve a number of the sites which are still in existence. The history of the white settler, of course, is not an ancient one in the region of which I am speaking. I know the minister is concerned about recapturing some of the stories which are documented in archives and libraries and which have been left to us by these great explorers. But he will need better co-operation from his colleagues on the government side. It will take a little encouragement from the government side. This is not a very expensive undertaking. There are a lot of people in the area who would, with a little encouragement, spend countless hours helping to recreate some of the stories which have been almost lost. A book has been published by just such a citizens group of which I speak in the Tayler and Fort Saint John area of my constituency. It is called "The Peace Makers of the Peace." I spent tireless hours trying to get a little help by way of a Canada Council grant. After all, it was a local publisher who printed the book and it was a local citizens group who produced it—senior citizens, mainly, had compiled the information and told the story. But there was no response. It would seem as though the sparsely populated areas of our country have little input into decision-making of the kind we have been discussing.

I hope the minister will take my comments to heart and will be a little more receptive to the ideas I will advance and that have been advanced by my constituents and the residents of the great coastal area of northern British Columbia. I hope he will join with us in our efforts to give greater recognition to that part of our history that I consider to be the most colourful and most significant in the evolution of our national development.

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I could not help but notice the fact that of all of us on this side of the House who have spoken during this debate, three including myself, are from the province of Saskatchewan. That is an indication of the great interest we in Saskatchewan have in this whole topic of historic sites and monuments. We are glad the government has brought forward this bill. Although it has very few provisions, dealing, as it does only with the structure of the National Historic Sites Board, this does give us an opportunity to comment about the constructive suggestions we on this side of the House have made to the government. This is an area in which the government is in need of our assistance to develop policies and ideas relating to all elements of the board's activities.

My colleague, the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil) was good enough to mention that in Saskatchewan we have a number of historic sites and areas of great significance to our Canadian history and development. He referred to the historic sites at Duck Lake, at Batoche and at Fort Carlton, all of which are within or immediately adjacent to my own constituency. One part of a proposed redistribution that saddens me very considerably is in respect of this area. It is to be deleted from my constituency. Although it will be well represented in the future, as it will form part of the constituency of Prince Albert, which will continue to be represented by the right hon. member, I must indicate my personal sadness as the result of the deletion of this very historic area from my constituency. I refer to that area which also includes the Fish Creek national historic site, Duck Lake historic park, Nesbit provincial forest, the historic towns of Rosthern and Laird, and the Indian reserves lying therein of Beardy's, Okemasis and One Arrow.

I know that these names as I recite them will bring forward recollections of a very important part of our history, particularly as it relates to the 1885 northwest rebellion which had such significance in the development politically, and in other ways, of our country.

I have just given an indication of some of the historic sites located within a part of my constituency to show that this bill gives me an opportunity to rise and bring forward representations to the parliamentary secretary, who I am sure will be back in a moment, on behalf of the citizens of the area who have, through their own initiative, developed some very incredible museums and have worked to develop the area on the basis of a neighbourhood concept, linking up these national historic sites with the idea of co-operation among the communities, allowing the people from across the country to visit the area and see the precise locations of some important events and occasions in terms of Canadian history.

Part of the investigation now taking place involves different levels of government. We have a study authorized by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, on the part of the federal government, as well as a study authorized by the appropriate department of the province of Saskatchewan, the department of tourism, I believe, prepared by Mr. N. Dyck, M.A., entitled "Saskatchewan Rivers Heritage Complex: A Preliminary Investigation and Overview for Future Development". There has been a summary of this study, which is at present in the hands of the provincial government, if not the federal government, prepared for distribution to interested people and agencies. It is a very definitive study made of the potential of this area.

The summary leaves out some very important information which has been investigated and developed by Mr. Dyck. I know that if the people of the area involved had access to the entire report they would be better informed and better able to advise different levels of government as to the best possible use for the development of the area in terms of retaining the historic value in years to come. The report points out that one of the most striking features of the Saskatchewan rivers heritage complex is the very large inventory of important historic sites, locations and institutes.

Mr. Dyck points out that together with the area's interesting natural history and setting, to which I have referred, this area constitutes a heritage resource in the broadest sense of the term. The importance of this area included in the complex has certainly been appreciated by scholars, laymen and government departments for many years. Canadian historians recognize this area as the place where treaty No. 6, the most important treaty signed in Canada between the Indians and the Crown, was negotiated; where Louis Riel and the Métis people made their stand in 1885, where Seager Wheeler, the Canadian wheat king, achieved his triumphs in grain growing, and where many other important events and themes of Canadian history have unfolded.

This area attracts an amazing number of visitors from within and without Saskatchewan. During the past summer I travelled through my constituency in order to speak to the people. I had occasion to travel this historic area and trace out the course of General Middleton's march and engagement at Fish Creek. I saw the location of Batoche and some of the historic buildings and the museum in the area.

As has been pointed out by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton), we in Canada really do not do a very good job of taking pride in and maintaining the history of our country. I think this is a very important endeavour and should be very high on the priority list of any federal government interested in maintaining a sense of Canadian unity and federalism. More importantly at this time than at almost any other, we should be paying attention to those parts of our history with which we can feel a sense of reality and development. We look back to past events which were difficult at the time, such as an outbreak of fighting, but it tends to bind us together rather than tear us apart. For example, the Americans spend a lot of their time talking about and looking back at their civil war, but over the years the United States has become stronger and more unified. So while we may regard the northwest rebellion as an unfortunate part of our history, it was nevertheless a fact of life, one which we can now look back on as the basis for and beginning of the development of Canada as we know it today.

I have had the chance to go through this area and to travel somewhat more leisurely than is the case when the House is sitting, and I was amazed at the kind of development that has taken place and at the participation and pride of the local people of the area. But many things remain to be done. Access to these historic sites and the development of historic sites can be very greatly improved. If the minister and his parliamentary secretary have an opportunity to visit this particular area, they will see great scope for development. I think there is no question that there will be development; but the real question at this time is how individual sites are to be developed, by whom and when?

It is incumbent on the government to examine this area very seriously with a view to making some decisions which will put into effect a co-ordinated plan to develop the area for generations to come. I, personally, have been involved in hosting representative groups from my constituency which came to Ottawa. I think in particular of a delegation from the Duck Lake and district board of trade which is interested in promoting a museum in the Duck Lake area. I arranged some meetings with various government departments to see whether any assistance might be available. I might say that I have had good co-operation from these government departments and the public servants in those departments. Quite frankly, I think development will require governmental initiative in the sense of cabinet initiative in order to put this project in its proper place.

The major decision to be faced by the senior government, which is the federal government, as well as provincial and local governments, is how they will expand from the foundation that has been laid down and which has proven successful in the past. The second matter to be decided is whether they will design and co-ordinate their future activities in the area in order to achieve the most suitable form of development, not only for individual sites and projects but for the complex as a whole.

The fact of the matter is that this is another of the situations that we in Canada face from time to time which involves not only one level of government but three, the federal government, the provincial government and the local or rural municipalities—the municipal governments in the towns and villages. These must be involved in the co-ordination that must take place if we are to assure the proper development of this area. I hope the minister and his parliamentary secretary will undertake to pay special attention to this and will give this development the initiative it so richly deserves.

I want to place before the parliamentary secretary one or two brief points. I am not going to take a lot of time, but it is important not only to my constituency and my province, but to Canada as a whole that these developments take place wherever possible. Quite frankly, I do not think a very substantial outlay of money is involved, and at a time of restraint I understand the restrictions placed on government spending. On the other hand, it seems to me that if the initiative on the part of the federal government is well warranted, attention must be paid to some of the points I want to make which have already been set forth by Mr. Dyck in his report.

There is considerable potential for further development of heritage resources and associated visitor services and facilities in the Saskatchewan rivers heritage complex. It has been pointed out that this is a unique area, for located within it are a number of heritage institutions, sites and resources. It is a part of Saskatchewan that we often forget, a part where the prairie wheatlands meet the tree line and rolling hills of northern Saskatchewan which eventually turns into the pre-Cambrian shield. It is a part of Saskatchewan which has terrific development potential because of the range of heritage resources included in the area. Notwithstanding the fact that they are numerous and diverse, Mr. Speaker, they are still complementary. There are possibilities for effectively utilizing heritage resources as the basis for development of some innovative tourism and recreational activities.

It has been pointed out to all levels of government that there is a cultural and educational value in the development of this area. This complex has been recognized by educational authorities as an area of considerable value, and more extensive use of the parks, sites and institutions in the area by school groups, historians and others interested in the history of this country would be certain if heritage development were undertaken.

One final point in the rationale for the development of this particular area, Mr. Speaker. I know I have the support of my colleague for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), and for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon). They always support these worth while projects.

Mr. Beatty: And the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Yes. I am sorry the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) is not here, because he has always been a great advocate of the development of the tourist industry. Here is another area where there is potential for tourism unlimited. However, one of the problems in this particular area has been the fact that it is relatively inacessible. Indeed, it was only last fall that we were able to induce the hon. member for Skeena (Mrs. Campagnolo) to visit the Beardy's reserve in her capacity as parliamentary secretary. She will be able to tell the House in the course of her participation in this debate about some of the difficult roads she had to navigate, unless she came in by DND helicopter.

Mrs. Campagnolo: The roads there are a lot better than they are in my part of the country.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Then the minister has a full appreciation of some of the difficulties of accessibility. She points out that the difficulties are similar to the difficult roads in her constituency.

Mr. McGrath: She has a difficult road anyway.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: When the minister was a parliamentary secretary she went there to attend an important event on the Beardy's reserve. She enjoyed herself and we enjoyed having her there. I welcome her back to that part of my constituency. She certainly impressed those she met and spoke to on the occasion of that special event.

Mr. Symes: Don't be so patronizing.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I speak the truth. Everyone who has met the minister was very impressed. The fact is that she made a very fine impression. I do not think it is being patronizing to say so; it is being factual.

To get back to the point I wanted to make on the representation I am making to the parliamentary secretary, let me say that I believe there is a potential for tourism in the area. Accessibility to it has been difficult due to the relatively underdeveloped state of the resources in the area, the extremely poor state of the roads and facilities there and the almost total lack of publicity for the historic sites in the area. In spite of this, I want to bring to Your Honour's attention the fact that about 25,000 tourists made the effort required to visit the area in 1974. That is a substantial number. Without a development program to rectify the situation, the number of tourists in the area is certain to increase in a substantial manner.

The tourist activity is an important one, but so is the educational aspect of visiting the area. Therefore, I want to commend to the parliamentary secretary the report that I referred to and the representations that have been made by the citizens interested in the area regarding meaningful initiatives being taken now or in the near future with respect to the development of the area which is now referred to as the Saskatchewan river heritage complex.

I would like to bring my remarks to a conclusion by listing briefly some of the important heritage resources we have in my constituency. First, I would like to refer to the historic site at Batoche, now known as the Batoche national historic site, and the Duck Lake provincial historic park to which I referred earlier in my remarks. In the town of Duck Lake itself is to be found the Duck Lake museum, a marvellous place with relics and mementos from the north-west rebellion. The museum was initiated by a grand old man from Duck Lake, Mr. Fred Anderson who, through his own personal dedication and hard work, started this project which has now been taken up by the people in the Duck Lake area and developed into a first-rate museum. However, it needs assistance, and I made representations in that connection to the museums branch of the Department of Secretary of State. We hope that some assistance will be granted for the maintenance of that wonderful museum.

There is also the Fort Carlton historic park. History springs out of these names. When I refer to them, Mr. Speaker, I know you will recall part of the important history of the west and of Canada. There is the Rosthern cultural museum located in that wonderful centre in my constituency. There is the Fish Creek national historic site, which includes Middleton camp and the Fish Creek battlefield. I travelled through those areas this past summer. They are incredible places where one can still pick up shell remnants and different parts of equipment of the Middleton troops which engaged in battle. One can find arrowheads and other interesting mementos of that time. Of course, we all realize that one cannot remove these particular items from the national historic site, but the fact is they are still lying on the ground; they are still there as part of the living history. Then there is Gabriel's crossing in remembrance of Gabriel Dumont; there is the Batoche river crossing, and the South Branch House of the Hudson's Bay Company. I have already referred to the leading Canadian grain grower, Seager Wheeler. There is the Carlton trail-marker and the Almighty Voice, a plaque in honour of this historical person.

There is the Duck Lake battlefield, the treaty No. 6 marker, the Fort Carlton marker, the Rosenorth Church marker, the Gerhard Ens-Seager Wheeler marker, the Nisbet provincial forest reserve, the prehistoric archaeology and the complex. This is an interesting part of Canada. There are the unmarked fur trade posts, the Almighty Voice grave, and the St. Laurent shrine, which is located near Duck Lake, the Qu'Appelle Long Lake and Saskatchewan railway line now operated by the CNR, and Seager Wheeler's Maple Grove farm. It is an incredible list of historic sites, monuments and institutions. There is the Rosthern experimental station and, finally, numerous historic buildings throughout the proposed complex.

I have touched in a brief form on some of the important historical and other places in my constituency. As the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) indicated, there were few, if any, national historic sites in his constituency and in northern British Columbia, but you can see that in my constituency alone we have a number of national historic sites. Hence the great interest I and the people in my area have in this bill.

Again I ask the parliamentary secretary to take back to the minister, to the department and to the National Historic Sites Board the expression of my constituents' concern that this area will be given the initiative and development that it deserves so richly. I hope the parliamentary secretary will in fact initiate an inquiry through his minister to his colleagues in the cabinet who have responsibilities for other departments which might affect the development of this complex so that we can proceed with the development of this historic complex of which we in Canada can be proud and which we could leave to our children and those who follow us a feeling that we have preserved a very important piece of Canadian history.

I want to thank hon. members for bearing with me and listening to the comments which I have made today with respect to what I consider to be a most important area in my constituency. I hope the parliamentary secretary will be able to encourage that initiative which we would like to see taken in this area.

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a few brief comments with regard to Bill C-13 which the House is debating today. I think it would be appropriate for me to say at the outset that it would have been difficult for me to have been in the House in the course of the last several minutes and to listen to my colleagues from various parts of the country speak without being struck by the pride which they have in the areas which they represent and without developing an increased awareness of the tremendous contributions which have been made to Canadian history by people from all parts of Canada.

I think that if there is one important core to the debate today, it is that we as Canadians have a tremendous history which we often overlook. Often our children in school find that the Canadian history, because it is not marked by bloodshed and by successive wars, is dull compared with the history of other countries. But I think that if we read our history and develop an increased awareness of our roots and of our origins, we cannot help but have a great deal of pride in our past and in our heritage. If we are to do a proper job in the future of safeguarding our heritage and moving society in a direction desirable to all Canadians we must develop an awareness of where we came from. This is why the work which is done by the federal government in terms of preserving and restoring national historic sites is a very vital function of the national government.

I want to say at the outset that I support the very simple principle behind Bill C-13, which is simply to increase the number of members of the Historic Sites and Monuments Board from the current 15 members to 17 in order to allow representatives from the Northwest Territories and from the Yukon Territory. It would be difficult for any hon. member of this House to be opposed to that principle because it is important that we have representation from all parts of the country.

In addition, as my hon. colleagues have said before, it is probably worth-while to deal briefly with the question of the way in which the government is functioning at the present time when it comes to the recognition and preservation of national historical sites, because this country is rich in historic sites: it is rich in history, and it is important that we do whatever we can to ensure that our children have the heritage, which has been passed on to us, maintained for them.

When we travel abroad or to other countries, we cannot help but be struck by the awareness people have of their own history, the pride they have in events which have taken place in their countries and their knowledge of the historic sites in their countries. A good deal of the credit for that must go to the respective national governments which have taken action to ensure that national historic sites are not lost, that they are properly publicized and that they are maintained for generations to come. Anyone who travels through the United States, for example, cannot help but be struck by the tremendous number of historic sites which have been recognized by the national government and by the individual states. I think it would be worth-while for us to follow the example of other countries and to give increased emphasis to the preservation of our national heritage.

I was first elected in 1972, and it is very difficult for me not to be overcome at times by a sense of humility when I study the history of my constituency and consider some of the great Canadians who have represented my area in the federal parliament. Since we are talking about historic sites, I think it would be worth-while for me to mention some of these people briefly. It was a tremendous responsibility for me to succeed Mr. Marvin Howe in 1972. He was a very distinguished member of this House. Mr. Howe followed in the tradition of a number of other distinguished Canadians who have left their mark on our national heritage. I would like to mention just a few of them.

One member who used to represent part of my constituency was the Hon. George Drew, the former leader of the Progressive Conservative Party and the former premier of Ontario.

Another is the Hon. Earl Rowe, a former lieutenant-governor of Ontario and a national figure of great consequence. He once represented the Dufferin county portion of my constituency. The Hon. Walter Harris was minister of immigration and minister of finance in the St. Laurent administration. He once represented portions of Grey county of my constituency. He was another great Canadian who made a tremendous contribution to our national heritage. His successor, Mr. Eric Winkler, was the chief government whip in the days of the Diefenbaker administration. He was also once the government House leader in the province of Ontario, and he represented portions of my constituency. Of course, there was Mr. Farquhar Oliver, who was the youngest person ever elected to the Ontario legislature, and he holds the record for political longevity in the Ontario legislature. He represented the Grey county portion of my constituency.

There are two other names I want to mention because they should be dealt with, particularly today. These are the names of distinguished Canadians whose contributions to Canada are recognized by people from all parts of this great country, but their contribution to my area has not been properly recognized by the federal government. The first is the late Agnes Macphail, who was the first woman ever elected to the Parliament of Canada. Anyone who has read Canadian history must be aware of the tremendous pioneering work which was done by the late Agnes Macphail. She was elected from the Grey county portion of my constituency. She lived there most of her life. The reason I mention her today is that earlier this year I was contacted by citizens in my area who are concerned that the Agnes Macphail home in Ceylon, Ontario, may very well be lost if action is not taken immediately to purchase it and maintain it as an historic site.

A tremendous amount of credit is due to Mr. Ivan McWilliam of Deep River, Ontario, who wrote as follows to a number of members of parliament and also to a number of government officials in May of this year:

> I am writing to request that federal money be made available to buy and restore the house and grounds, the whole to become an historic site. A great deal of the Macphail memorabilia is still to be found within a short distance of Ceylon, so that with some effort the site could be restored to its 1930-1940 period, even perhaps to the presence of a green 1941 Chevrolet in the garage!

Since the letter from Mr. McWilliam there has been a series of correspondence between myself and a number of officials in the federal government, and I have been urging the federal government to take action to purchase this historic site which is up for sale at the present time because the previous owner of the house died recently. I was a bit disquieted when I received a letter in reply from the former minister of Indian affairs and northern development, dated June 25, 1976, saying:

> Before we can become involved in the purchase or preservation of any property, I must first have declared it to be of national historic or architectural significance. I would consider doing so only if my advisers on these matters, the Historic Sites and Monuments Board of Canada, were to recommend this. According to the criteria set by the Board, a building must have been closely associated with events which, or persons who, have contributed significantly to Canada's history.

What surprises me about the minister's reply—although I was pleased he was asking the Historic Sites and Monuments Board to take a look at this and to make a recommendation—is that the recommendation should even be necessary because surely it should be self-evident to anyone who has ever sat in parliament that few Canadians have made a greater contribution to their country than the late Agnes Macphail. She was a pioneer when it came to social reform; she was a pioneer when it came to prison reform, and a pioneer in recognition of the rights of women in Canada. That should not require that the minister send a request to the Historic Sites and Monuments Board that it determine whether she was a figure of national historical significance. Surely that should be self-evident.

Since that time I have been informed by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Allmand) that in November of this year the Historic Sites and Monuments Board considered the possibility of acquiring this property, that the minister has not yet been informed of its decision and that he probably will not be able to report back to me as to what action the government intends to take until early in the new year. One of the things which concerns me about the present operations of the board and of the government department responsible for the preservation of national historic sites is that because of the tardiness involved, and because it will be more than six months between the time this matter was brought to the attention of the government and the time we will finally get an answer, it is quite possible that this house could have been lost to the public of Canada. I hope the house will still be available when the government makes its decision, but surely action should have been taken before now.

It is self-evident that this house is an important national historic site. The artifacts are available, the house is available, and I think the suggestion made by Mr. McWilliam, which has been echoed by the Grey County Historical Society in representations it has made to the federal government, deserves to be acted upon.

There is one other historic site in Grey country which was the home of another very distinguished Canadian, and I believe it also should be preserved. I bring this matter to the attention of the parliamentary secretary so that he can bring it to the attention of the Historic Sites and Monuments Board. The speaker who spoke before me, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) is very proud of the history of Saskatchewan, and one of the Canadians from Saskatchewan who made the greatest contribution to our national history is the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), a former prime minister of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: The people in my area are proud of the fact that they can lay claim to the birthplace of the right hon. member for Prince Albert. Although he is now generally looked upon as coming from western Canada, like every other prime minister of Canada he came from east of the Lakehead.

He was born in Neustadt, Ontario, and his early childhood home is still located there. I was quite disturbed by the fact that the federal government has made no effort to purchase the Diefenbaker home in Neustadt and preserve it as a national historic site. It should be beyond dispute that the individual in question has contributed a tremendous amount to Canada, and I do not think it should require much study to decide that his home is worth preserving.

● (1650)

A couple of years ago a private citizen in my home town of Fergus—a great admirer of the right hon. gentleman—attempted to purchase the house privately in order to ensure that it was saved for the people of Canada. He was concerned that the site might be lost unless action was taken to prevent it. Unfortunately, Mr. A. J. Youngblood was unsuccessful, but he deserves credit for trying. The house may become available in the future and I think it would be worth while for the government to recognize that it should be preserved as a national historic site. I think it should be beyond debate that the two sites in my constituency, the homes of two very distinguished Canadians from Grey county, should be recognized as historic sites and that action should be taken before this part of our national heritage is lost.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, let me again commend to the parliamentary secretary the recommendations I have made and ask him to bring them to the attention of the appropriate officials and ask that early action be taken before these historic sites are lost to us.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few brief comments on this bill and congratulate the parliamentary secretary on his speech introducing these amendments to the National Historic Sites and Monuments Act.

I especially want to make some comments concerning Fort St. Joseph National Historic Park on St. Joseph's Island which is located in Algoma. This former national historic site which is now a national historic park is perhaps one of the best examples of an historic site which had a very important part to play in the war of 1812 between Great Britain and the United States. It not only provided a defence for the frontier of Canada, as it was at that time, but also played a very important part in the fur trade in the frontier area, as well as having a very important role in the lives of the native people of Canada at that time. From this site one of the most successful attacks against a United States fort was launched in 1812. Their fort on the Straits of Mackinaw was successfully overcome by the British forces, the fur traders and native people who took part in the attack. Few sites have as much relevance as Fort St. Joseph in the history of Canada.

The fort site also has great potential for the development of natural bird and plant life. Over 600 acres of it was a bird sanctuary for many years and contains a large number of examples of bird, animal and plant life. This magnificent site overlooks St. Mary's River and gives a view of the entire area because of its reasonably high prominence. It has natural beaches for swimming, picnicking and other recreational purposes.

A few years ago, when this was only a national historic site identified by a placque, we established an advisory committee for the development of Fort St. Joseph. There are now 10 or 12 representatives of various community groups on St. Joseph's Island on this advisory committee. I believe they have made a very significant contribution in ensuring that the fort has been developed in the best possible way and in its day to day operations dealing with the thousands of visitors who come to see it. Their contribution is appreciated by the Parks Canada officials who operate the site. I think these people have been able to contribute to the development of this fort site and to ensure that it is historically authentic. There have been several archeological digs in the last three or four years; power and water have been provided and a utility building and an administrative building have been erected. A few weeks ago the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Allmand) announced the construction in the coming year of a $323,000 visitor and interpretative centre for Fort St. Joseph. This will provide a display area for the fort and a small theatre for visitors such as school groups.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it five o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin)—Immigration—Refugees in Argentina—Co-operation with Amnesty International; the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Duclos)—Immigration—Request to accelerate admission of refugees from Chile and Uruguay; the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald)—Immigration—Request for explanation of treatment of refugees in Argentina—Actions of United Nations Commission.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, private bills and notices of motions.

Mr. Goodale: I rise on point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Goodale) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, for private members' hour this afternoon I believe there has been agreement to deal with a measure which can be disposed of rather expeditiously, Bill C-237. It is not anticipated that the matter will take the full hour.

I understand that there are also few speakers remaining on the subject we were dealing with this afternoon, the Historic Sites and Monuments Act. If it is anticipated that that debate could be concluded in a short time, perhaps we could continue with it without interruption before dealing with private members' business which, as I say, it is anticipated will not take very long either.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, this is a novel point raised by the parliamentary secretary. I have not had an opportunity to consult with my colleagues as I always do with respect to these weighty issues. I was under the impression that the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) would not proceed with his bill; then I learned that he intended to proceed and unfortunately I dismissed from the chamber members of my party who had been ready to participate in the debate on this bill.

Mr. Benjamin: Dismissed?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Well, I told them they were free to go, but asked them to return at eight o'clock so that we could participate again in deliberations on orders of the day. Perhaps I could consult with the parliamentary secretary after I have had a chance to talk to some of my colleagues. The fact is that we look forward to hearing the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre, and several members of my party are interested in participating in private members' hour. Perhaps I could confer with the parliamentary secretary after I have had a chance to determine what the situation is on my side of the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the general state of flux may I suggest that we call the private member's public bill in the name of the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin). If it is disposed of quickly and there is time, perhaps we could decide whether, in the time remaining before six o'clock, we should continue with debate on Bill C-13. I think there would be a general desire not to begin debating another bill between now and six o'clock. Perhaps we should first dispose of the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre.

[Translation]

Mr. Guilbault: Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), except that I would like to hold a discussion now rather than after the debate on the bill of the member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) so that we may come back to the orders of the day, since I am convinced that the said bill will take very little time. On the other hand, I would hesitate to carry on a debate on the orders of the day since we do not know exactly how long it will last and government members do not want the bill of the member for Regina-Lake Centre to be rejected for lack of time to discuss it, because it has true merit.

[Mr. Goodale.]

[English]

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Goodale) has also risen on a point of order. I shall recognize him and then recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie).

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It seems to me that the arrangement described by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State (Mr. Guilbault) and mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is sensible. I suggest that we consider item No. 37 under private members' public bills, Bill C-237 standing in the name of the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin), in the hope that the bill will be dealt with expeditiously. We can hold open the option of continuing debate on Bill C-13 once we have concluded consideration of the hon. member's bill.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I should like to correct what the parliamentary secretary just said. He said, I think, that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) had been speaking on behalf of the New Democratic Party. I suggest that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) spoke on behalf of the New Democratic Party, not the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I was about to rise on the same point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it agreed that we consider Bill C-237 standing in the name of the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin)?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING TIME OF RESIDENCE

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre) moved that Bill C-237, to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Guilbault: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I suggest that the second reading motion as put should be amended to provide for the bill to be referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts, the committee dealing with the Citizenship Act.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): By unanimous consent, is it agreed that we refer Bill C-237 to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts, and amend the second reading motion accordingly?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Accordingly, Mr. Benjamin, seconded by Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moves that Bill C-237, to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the length of time hon. members on all sides have taken to accommodate me.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We did our best.

Mr. Benjamin: I thank colleagues on all sides for their co-operation. My initial comment is this: I am not sure what I am supposed to do, but I will figure it out as I go along. I have been here somewhat more than 8½ years and have placed various private members' bills on the order paper, but this is the first time one of my bills has been called.

An hon. Member: It must be the Christmas spirit.

Mr. Benjamin: It is not only the Christmas spirit; it is also evidence of socialist planning and perseverance.

Mr. Epp: You just blew the bill.

Mr. Benjamin: This bill has been on the order paper for the last four or five years and relates to another bill which has been on the order paper since 1969 or 1970 calling for the removal of the prohibition against epileptics in the Immigration Act. I have entered into correspondence with many citizens who are concerned about this matter and am supported not only by people in my constituency but by people in all parts of the country as well as members of this House of all parties. This bill is consequential to another bill presently before the House, namely, the bill to amend the Immigration Act. The amended Immigration Act will delete the prohibition against epileptics being entitled to landed immigrant status and, ultimately, the right to become Canadian citizens.

My bill would amend the Citizenship Act pursuant to certain sections of the Immigration Act. I am afraid I am not a lawyer and I will not become involved with legal terminology. I have entered into discussions with my good friend, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State (Mr. Guilbault), with the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale), and with legal counsel. The more I talked to legal counsel, the more confused I became. I understand that the bill, if the House is good enough to pass it on second reading, will require at least two minor amendments in committee, so that when the new citizenship act is proclaimed on or shortly after February 15, my bill will be relevant to that new citizenship act. As I say, it will have to be amended in committee in two ways. Instead of referring to the Canadian Citizenship Act, it will refer to the citizenship act. Also, the relevant section of the new act will need to be amended so that my bill is not redundant or is not completely wiped out by the proclamation of the new citizenship act. That is what I understand, according to the legal advice I have been offered.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would you now explain what you said?

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I can explain it, but I promised my good friend the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State that I would not talk too long, perhaps not much more than three or four minutes, because he, too, wants to speak on this bill. Let me remind the House of the history of this bill. It represents the culmination of the efforts of members of all parties, efforts going back a long way in time. I remind the House that the provisions of our immigration and citizenship laws have been somewhat inhumane.

I have a file of correspondence that has accumulated over the past several years. For example, the wife of a pastor of a Lutheran church in Winnipeg whose husband and children could be, and are, Canadian citizens, could not be a Canadian citizen because she suffers from epilepsy. They emigrated from the United States some nine years ago. If you were sitting opposite her at a table and she had an epileptic seizure, you would not notice it; it does not last ten seconds.

Another case involves a university professor who has been here since 1967. In addition to writing books, he occupies the chair on the faculty of an important university in this country. He has been denied Canadian citizenship because he is an epileptic. His wife and children can be, and are, Canadian citizens. They have made a marvellous contribution to this country. I have received correspondence from a person in Ontario. I will not name the place. He filed application for landed immigrant status at the Canadian consulate in Detroit. His application was refused because he is afflicted with epilepsy. I might point out that his last epileptic seizure was some years before making application. It goes on and on. Medical people have told us that this is not a mental illness: it is a physical incapacity; the medication for it even prevents seizures.

My bill states that when the amendments to the Citizenship Act are passed—and I presume they will be with a government majority, if they still have one in February, and if they do not it might be passed with our support—those who have been here on ministers' permits because they are part of a prohibited class, namely, epilepsy, will be credited with their time here.

I notice that the new Immigration Act puts an end to disallowing imbeciles, idiots and morons coming into the country. If the Liberals and Tories need that much more help, we will let them come in. I am only teasing my hon. friends.

After having talked to lawyers, I understand that if my bill is passed those who have been here for many years will be credited with that time. In two of the cases I mentioned, the people have been here for eight or nine years. They would be credited with at least half that time toward the three-year provision required to obtain their Canadian citizenship. In other words, the wife of the Lutheran pastor, the university professor and the four or five other cases I referred to who have been here on permits long enough would be able to apply for Canadian citizenship on the first day after the passing of the new Immigration Act. They would not have to wait three years, half that time or any length of time; they would be able to apply after the normal three months, which I think is too long, to get their Canadian citizenship. There would be no waiting period for those people.

I hope the House will readily accept my amendment. However, I might caution hon. members not to pass my bill until after February 15. If it passes any sooner, the proclamation of the new Citizenship Act would wipe it out. I am sure it is a rare occasion when an hon. member asks the chamber not to pass a bill until after a certain date. However, I would be most grateful if the House would pass my bill at third reading. I would like it passed around February 16, 17 or 18. Then cases such as those I have mentioned—and there are many hundreds, if not over a thousand—would be able to obtain their citizenship.

May I close with a short quotation from a letter which I found to be somewhat heart-rending. A gentleman who wrote to me stated:

> My wife died of pneumonia in March, 1966, but I have never forgotten the distress she felt at being treated in this cruelly insensitive manner by the statutory regulations regarding epileptics.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) for having consulted with the Secretary of State (Mr. Marchand) and myself to make us aware of his intentions. I wish to state that his avowed purpose to help those on ministerial permits is worth-while. After having consulted with officials in the department, I might state that we believe the hon. member's purpose is already covered by some sections of the new act. I will read them for the record. I have been trying to convince the hon. member, but he is somewhat reluctant about some legalistic talk. If one looks at the new Citizenship Act, he will find in section 2(2)(b) the following:

> A person who is lawfully present and entitled to permanently reside in Canada shall be deemed to have been lawfully admitted to Canada for permanent residence;

This is found in the interpretation section of the act and covers what the hon. member intends. Section 5(4) of the act which deals with special cases reads as follows:

> In order to alleviate cases of special and unusual hardship or to reward services of an exceptional value to Canada, and notwithstanding any other provision of this act, the governor in council may, in his discretion, direct the minister to grant citizenship to any person and, where such a direction is made, the minister shall forthwith grant citizenship to the person named in the direction.

I recognize that this is not a blanket coverage such as the hon. member is proposing, but nevertheless it can become useful. I submit that the first excerpt of the law that I read would cover the purpose of the hon. member. However, we are willing to send the bill to committee in order to have more time for departmental lawyers and others to appear before the committee. We will then be in a better position to know the exact effect of the hon. member's bill.

There is something I wish to clarify. It does not really matter whether the hon. member's bill is passed before February 15. The new Citizenship Act is already in existence. It is only that it has not been proclaimed. It can be amended. If it were amended today, when it is proclaimed, the whole act as amended would be proclaimed. There is no problem there. I just state that for the record. That being said, we on this side will agree to send it to committee.

The title to Bill C-237 reads, "An act to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act". As the hon. member has said, we would need the unanimous consent of the House to amend the title of his bill so as to read, "An act to amend the Citizenship Act", in other words, to amend the new bill. Do I have unanimous consent to do this, or would the hon. member do it—I do not mind. But it is essential, otherwise we would be amending the old act.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I, too, wish to thank the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) for presenting this bill to us and giving us the great opportunity to bring a matter of great importance to the attention of not only the House but Canadians generally. My intervention will fall into two parts, one of them dealing with the matter which I believe the hon. member has specifically in mind, namely, the provisions with respect to residency as they relate to epileptics. I shall refer specifically to sections 7 and 8 of the 1952 Immigration Act which give rise to some serious caveats. First, with regard to the provisions as the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre sees them, section 5 of the Immigration Act of 1952, under the heading "The Prohibited Classes", reads:

> No person other than a person referred to in subsection 7(2) shall be admitted to Canada if he is a member of any of the following classes of persons—

Subsection A(4) reads: "If immigrants are afflicted with epilepsy." Section 5 contains a number of other archaic provisions which would be removed by the new act. Turning specifically to the entry of epileptics into Canada, let me point out that at the present time they must enter on a minister's permit. This procedure gives rise to a number of difficulties. The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre has drawn attention to some of these difficulties. It is imperative that I mention them again. A person who is here on a minister's permit enjoys only quasi-legal status. He is not, of course, a citizen, nor does he enjoy landed immigrant status. He is not here as a visitor: he is in a state of limbo; his status has not been regularized. First, he is not qualified for residency.

Once the new act is proclaimed, the fact that such people are here does not qualify them for citizenship. Consequently, they are postponing the day when they will have the right to vote. They are also postponing the day when they will have the right to hold public office. Another practical consideration is this: they often find themselves in difficulty when they apply for a job because, of course, one of the first questions they are asked is whether they are citizens. When they say they are not, they are asked whether they have landed immigrant status, and their answer must, again, be no. Only two questions remain. One is, whether they are here as visitors, in which case they cannot be employed in Canada; and the other is whether they are here on a minister's permit. The answer, by its nature, indicates that their status is temporary. It indicates that a person does not qualify under the ordinary regulations and his right to hold gainful employment comes into question.

I am sure a number of members have been in correspondence with Mrs. Anderson, a British subject married to a Canadian. She was sponsored as an immigrant by her husband and eventually she came to Canada. Because she suffered from epilepsy, she was not granted landed immigrant status but was given a minister's permit. Mr. and Mrs. Anderson did not consent to this procedure without protest. Mrs. Anderson wrote to me, as well as to other members of parliament, drawing attention to the unfairness of this situation and to the difficulties in which people suffering from epilepsy found themselves. For example, she had difficulty in obtaining a social insurance number when it was found she was here under a minister's permit.

When the joint committee studying the green paper on immigration was touring Canada, representations on this point were made to committee members on a number of occasions. I recall that on one occasion in Vancouver, the hon. member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme) and I agreed in public—it is on the record—that we would present a motion which would delete section 5 B (iv) from the Immigration Act. We jointly checked with the then minister of manpower and immigration to ascertain whether it would be possible. He indicated that because of the process in which we were then engaged, that of revising the Immigration Act, he did not want to see the legislation opened at that time. I find it strange that while he did not see fit to open up the act and allow these people to get landed immigrant status on that occasion, he did, nevertheless, find it possible to open the act a few weeks later when the regulations were passed regarding deportation in the spring of 1976.

Again, I wish to commend the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre and say that members on this side are in complete agreement with the proposal to remove the restrictions presently in the act concerning epileptics. In other words, we would like to see them here as landed immigrants as opposed to being here on ministers' permits. Having said this, I must draw attention to the method by which the hon. member has chosen to bring this matter before the House. Bill C-237 reads in part:

Subparagraph 10(1)(c)(i) of the Canadian Citizenship Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

Citizenship

"(i) been lawfully admitted to Canada for permanent residence or under section 7 and 8 of the Immigration Act—

If we check section 7 and 8 of the Immigration Act, we find that section 7 is entitled "Non-Immigrants" or "Persons who may enter Canada as non-immigrants". In other words, these are people who are here on minister's permit. If you read section 7 of the Immigration Act you will find it says in part that the following persons may be allowed to enter and remain in Canada as non-immigrants, and under various sections there is reference to persons who are diplomatic consuls or officers, representatives or officials duly accredited with any country or the United Nations, or members of any navy, army or air force who come to Canada for training. As an example I just have to refer to the training of West German armed forces personnel at Shilo, Manitoba. As I understand the act, for the number of months these people are in Canada training at Shilo they will be qualifying under the provisions of Bill C-237; in other words, they are here under the provisions of section 7 of the present Immigration Act.

I could go into various other classifications under section 7, but I will not do that at this time. What I am trying to point out is that while we on this side of the House are in complete sympathy and agreement regarding the intent of Bill C-237, we must put some caveat on the method by which the bill hopes to arrive at the stated purpose.

I do not want to continue the debate too much longer, so in conclusion let me say that I reserve the right to investigate this matter further in committee. We would like to question officials of the Department of the Secretary of State and of the Department of Manpower and Immigration on the practical implications of including sections 7 and 8 of the present Immigration Act in the new Citizenship Act. Having expressed that caveat, we look forward to studying this bill further in committee.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I will not be very long as our spokesman, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), has placed our party's views before the House.

Let me first congratulate the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) for putting his finger on a very sensitive matter. Many of us in our travels across the country as members of the Joint Senate and House Committee on Immigration found there were archaic provisions in the present act which need to be reconsidered. I am pleased to see one of these points dealt with in this bill as it relates to epileptics. The hon. member, I am sure, has every good intention, and I agree with the position he has taken in terms of giving further consideration to the members of society who happen to be epileptic and separated by a sort of non-status atmosphere. The hon. member said he has been here for eight and a half years, so he should recognize that by changing subparagraph 10(1)(c)(i) to include the words "or under section 7 and 8 of the Immigration Act" he will include not only epileptics but at the same time a whole host of people referred to by the hon. member for Provencher.

The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre is attempting to remove a frustration. As our spokesman and critic has pointed out, we are in sympathy with the principle enunciated by the hon. member, but we must register some caution in respect of this bill as it now stands.

The parliamentary secretary has indicated there would have to be unanimous agreement in respect of the bill as it is entitled "An Act to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act", but should read "An Act to amend the Citizenship Act" in order to bring it within the four corners of the legislation which has been passed. Unfortunately that legislation has not been promulgated. Many people have asked what happened to the measure. It is of considerable importance, particularly that provision which reduces the time before one can acquire citizenship from five to three years. The minister indicated that it will not be ready for promulgation until some time in February, 1977. I hope there will be no pussyfooting in respect of that date which the minister announced in a press release.

The other thing that disturbs me is that we have not yet seen the bill in terms of the Immigration Act. We all know what is in it. We all know it has been given first reading, but we do not know its precise contents. Perhaps we are a little early in debating this measure as we do not know what position will be taken in the new immigration bill.

An hon. Member: We will see it at the committee.

Mr. Alexander: If the hon. member wants to ask a question I will be pleased to answer, but I do not want to use up my time in that way.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. If the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) wants to ask a question he will first have to return to his own seat.

Mr. Alexander: I was trying to help the hon. member who was interrupting me. We accept the principle of the bill regarding epileptics, but we register some caution in respect of those others who will also be included. We want the bill sent to the committee for the purpose of exploring the implications that will result from the inclusion of sections 7 and 8 of the Immigration Act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The question is on the motion of the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre that Bill C-237 be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films, and Assistance to the Arts. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Alexander.]

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films, and Assistance to the Arts.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it the pleasure of the House to revert to Bill C-13?

An hon. Member: No, call it six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Hon. members have heard the suggestion that we call it six o'clock. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At 5.42 p.m. the House took recess.

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE NUMBER OF MEMBERS OF BOARD

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-13, to amend the Historic Sites and Monuments Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, when we adjourned the debate at five o'clock I was speaking about Fort St. Joseph on St. Joseph's Island in the Algoma riding and the developments taking place there. I has just mentioned that $323,000 has been provided for the construction of a visitors' reception centre and interpretative centre for Fort St. Joseph. This facility will provide display space for the artifacts which have been unearthed at the fort. It will provide exhibit space, and also administrative and visitor service areas will be provided in a new building which is of contemporary design but very well designed to suit a national historic site.

A small theatre will also be provided for the hundreds of school students who visit the fort ruins each year. I think this is an important development because it will provide visitor services, and we do have a large number of student groups visit the fort each year. One teacher who visited the fort, and who pays regular visits to Fort St. Joseph, in a letter to me described it in this way:

It is my opinion that if Fort St. Joseph were reconstructed and re-enactments of drills of the British soldiers, the arrival of Brock's messenger from Penetanguishene, the gathering of the Indians, voyageurs and traders, the departure of Capt. Roberts and his men for Mackinaw Island were to be performed in the site of the reconstructed Fort St. Joseph, it would become one of the greatest tourist attractions in Canada, with all due respect for Upper Canada Village, Fort Henry at Kingston and the changing of the guard at Ottawa.

That is his opinion, Mr. Speaker, and I concur in it.

This fort has terrific potential. There are several needs for the future, and one is reconstruction of the blockhouse. I received tentative approval from the minister that during the next two or three years this will be commissioned and reconstruction of the blockhouse will go ahead. It seems to me that this very important site is rather remote from highway 17, and we often receive criticisms when people travel some 25 to 30 miles to see Fort St. Joseph and all they find there are ruins. With the development of the visitors' reception centre and interpretative centre, and ultimately the reconstruction of the blockhouse and palisade, the casual tourist who is only interested in history in a general way, and especially students who visit the site, will see more than just the ruins.

It seems to me that during the past year or so we have seen a very great increase in the number of visitors. Some 11,000 people visited the ruins of Fort St. Joseph in 1975 alone, and the number has been increasing over the years.

The problem that the historians of Parks Canada have is to get an authentic design of the original fort. They have the original plans, but the supplies that were delivered for the fort at that time do not exactly jibe with the plans. They suspect from this evidence, and from the archeological dates, that the fort was probably not exactly as laid out by Her Majesty's architects in planning it. Research into the original is going on at this time and we are hoping that the reconstruction of the fort will take place in the next two or three years.

It seems to me that it is important on an historic site such as this one to continue the archeological digs. I think this is very interesting for tourists and for historians. During the past year an archaeological dig has been taking place there. Traders' huts which were just outside the fort, the ruins and the basements for them, were unearthed during that dig. There is activity going on at the fort at all times when this kind of work is taking place and when historians and other visitors visit the site. Of course it is important that the ruins be stabilized as they are unearthed.

As I indicated, there is a great deal of interest, not only from the military and historical point of view, but in the fur trade and the trading huts of the company which had a trading post there at the time of Fort Joseph in the 1800's. It seems to me as well that this side needs to be developed from the natural point of view. As I mentioned earlier, there are over 600 acres on this site. There is a terrific potential there for the development of walking paths and trails for people to view the various plants, animals, and bird life that exist on this site which was a former bird sanctuary.

The third area which I think is important for purposes of tourism is the development of swimming beaches and picnic areas.

From the few brief remarks that I have made it becomes obvious that Fort Joseph is not only a very important historic site but it has tremendous potential for teaching students about the history of Canada. I believe that when it is fully developed and staffed it can be one of the most important tourist attractions in Ontario or indeed in all Canada.

I want to express my appreciation to the Minister through his parliamentary secretary, and to the department for the initiatives that have been taken in developing Fort St. Joseph. I hope they will continue the development of this most important historic site.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have an opportunity to speak this evening on the National Historic Sites Act and amendments thereto. In general, most hon. members find agreement with that act, but as the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) mentioned earlier today, opportunities such as this to speak about national historic sites do not come very often, and it is a privilege when we have the opportunity to make some mention of them.

It is not my intention this evening to talk about that great constituency of Battle River and therefore the need to develop the national historic sites there. I am sure every member of parliament would like to visit this area some time, and I invite them to come, but there is irony in a situation which has developed there which I am sure is not the intent of the government or of the department. It results from a regulation regarding national historic sites. This is the opportunity for me to bring it to the attention of the House, and particularly to that of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development which looks after national parks and historic sites.

I am pleased that the parliamentary secretary is present, and also the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport (Mrs. Campagnolo), because I think my comments relate to both of those ministries. The regulation which I would like to bring to their attention does not permit camping at a national historic site. Basically that is a position with which I would agree. When you have a fort, an old church or an old graveyard, obviously you do not want people going there and using that site as a camping ground. However, I would like to give a short account of the situation which took place in my home province of Alberta where there is considerable interest in whitewater canoeing and kayaking. In this sport you go out to a place where there are rapids and try out your Eskimo rolls.

I felt very privileged to be part of the Edmonton Kayakers. One of the most popular places in the province of Alberta where we went was down to Red Deer and west to Rocky Mountain House. There was a stretch from Rocky Mountain House going toward the mountains to the town of Horburg, a distance of 20 miles, that had eight descents or rapids.

In 1966 the Calgary Canoe Club, the Red Deer Canoe and Kayak Club, the Edmonton Whitewater Kayak Club, and the Northwest Voyageurs pooled together to clean out a large area along a flood plain of the North Saskatchewan river. That became a camp site. There were water facilities right across from Brierly and Fisher rapids. Of course this was a very fine site. It is interesting, however, that since that time it has been named a national historic site. I am pleased that the old chimneys of the David Thomson expedition are still there. Diggings are taking place in the David Thomson old fort, and that is quite commendable.

However, this year when the kayakers and canoers went out to camp at that site, the RCMP showed up and told them that no camping was permitted. One of my good friends in his usual way asked the RCMP officer, "Why would there not be camping there?" The officer responded by telling him, "It is now a national historic site". My friend, still playing coy, asked him the next question, which was, "Why is it a national historic site?" "Well," the policeman answered, "It is in recognition of David Thomson". The next question was, "What did David Thomson do to make this a national historic site?" He was told, "He camped here over night". We have a site there in recognition of David Thomson camping over night, but what is important is that whitewater canoers and kayakers in Alberta who want good whitewater only have the choice of this stretch on the North Saskatchewan river or an area closer to the mountains where you have water coming out of glacier ice. If you do a roll there or you flip into the water and have to roll back up, you have a few square miles of ice cubes out of glaciers to contend with, and that is not quite so comfortable to be rolling in.

All I would like to ask the department to do is to give special consideration to the David Thomson historic site, bearing in mind that there have been very active clubs for about three decades now and that it was the people who belong to those clubs who cleaned out the flood plain. The previous owner of the land built Brierly. One of the rapids is named after him. He made it his express wish that the site be kept for campers along that stretch of the North Saskatchewan river.

While this may seem to be too minute an issue to be raised in the House, the fact of the matter is that the large group from Calgary, Red Deer and Edmonton have traditionally, every year gone out on that river and cleaned it up. It is ironic that they are now being told they cannot camp there, when the reason the site was made a historic site is that David Thomson camped there when trying to find a route to the Pacific.

I would like to sneak something in and say to the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) that we in Canada ought to give more support to kayaking and canoeing in this country. I was disappointed that at the time of the Olympics Canada did not introduce canoeing and kayaking. All through Europe the terms "C-1" and "C-2" are used with regard to canoes. The "C" refers to Canada. As this country was being developed, our rivers were used as highways. In Europe the feeling is that Canadians are the experts when it comes to kayaking and canoeing. These sports are identified very much with Canada, and they should have been introduced by Canada at the Olympics. Incidentally, in Munich, Germany, these sports were tried on a temporary basis, although not as part of the Olympics, and they should have been introduced here. I pass that along also to the parliamentary secretary, and I hope he will give consideration to it.

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question. I wonder if he knows that Sport Canada has made a considerable contribution to the Whitewater Canoers and Kayakers, and that at the present time they are situated in the national sport administration centre here in Ottawa.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Malone: I am well aware of that, and I appreciate the interjection. We again have the opportunity we missed a year ago to make this into an international sport with a Canadian identity to it, and I think it was unfortunate that we missed it.

I would like to bring to the attention of the parliamentary secretary the number of people who have worked to make that flood plain a camping area, and it need not interfere at all with the national historic site of the David Thompson Fort at Rocky Mountain House. Members of the RCMP there have claimed that there is no problem with the canoers and the kayakers camping there. As a matter of fact they say they rather enjoy their company and like them, and in view of the reason that campsite is there, and because a citizens group over a number of years actually built the campsite, I hope the parliamentary secretary will give special consideration to having that regulation removed so that there can be a campground there. Officials in the department have been told that there is a place five miles away where these people could camp, but that is not satisfactory.

Once you have rolled over in icy water a few times, you want to get into a warm tent which is right near the rapids, and to go five miles downstream is just not safe. Not permitting camping in an area which is away from the old fort would be to kill the sport of whitewater canoeing and kayaking at that point on the river, and I simply ask that a special regulation be considered in that regard.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth) spoke for us this afternoon, indicating our support for Bill C-13, and at that time it was not our intention that any other members of my party would speak at this stage of the bill. However, some of the things which have been said have had the effect-which often takes place around here—of suggesting that perhaps something additional should be said, and a couple of us have a few words which we would like to add.

There are a number of things I could say and a number of suggestions I could make, but it strikes me that if one has a particular point he wants to make, it is better to stay with that point and leave the other for some other occasion. It is in that vein that I refer just to one matter, namely, the excellent statement made this afternoon by the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty) when he spoke about the desirability of the former home of the late Agnes Macphail being purchased so that it might become one of our historic sites.

When the hon. member was speaking, I was pleased to note that the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) (Mrs. Campagnolo) indicated her approval. It is nice to have that approval here in the House, and I see she is nodding her head up and down now to confirm it. I hope that her approval will also be indicated in certain councils where she has both a voice and a presence.

All of us who know anything about Canadian history, and particularly those of us who remember Agnes Macphail, are deeply conscious of the great contribution she made to the life of this country. She was the first woman to be elected to the House of Commons. That was back in 1921, and she was here for 19 years. She later went on to become the first woman ever to be elected to the Legislature of the Province of Ontario. I am sure hon. members are aware of the fact that her bust, along with that of another former woman member of this House, the Hon. Ellen Fairclough, will be found in the corridor just to the north of this Chamber. In other words, the late Agnes Macphail has already been recognized as an important person in Canadian history.

Miss Bégin: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am delighted now to have not only the support of the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport), but also the support of a very important minister, the Minister of National Revenue (Miss Bégin). I suspect that if the Minister of Communications (Mrs. Sauvé) were here, she would make it unanimous.

Miss Bégin: We know how to recognize competence.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I seem to be winning my point. Perhaps I had better stop while I am ahead. I support wholeheartedly the suggestion made by the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo, and I hope the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Penner) will note these remarks and do what he can to make sure that this piece of property is purchased so that it can be made an historical site in memory of the late Agnes Macphail.

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I will intervene very briefly in this debate tonight on Bill C-13, to amend the Historic Sites and Monuments Act. I do so just to bring to the attention of the minister, through his parliamentary secretary, whom I see in the House tonight, an incident which has occurred not once but twice in my area.

I agree wholeheartedly with the purpose of this bill, which is to increase the membership of the board which recommends to the minister that certain actions be taken by his department. I certainly agree that the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory should be represented on that board, and that fact has been well argued by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Malone) as well as by the speaker for the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for the Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth).

My purpose is to draw attention to what I call a rather petty feud which is presently going on in my area between the National Historic Sites and Monuments Board and the local historical societies. It stems from the fact that original plaques marking sites of national historic significance in my area are now in the process of being replaced.

One of them is a monument erected to the memory of two Jesuit priests who wintered on the shores of Lake Erie at the time of LaSalle's exploration of the Great Lakes and the Mississippi. There are several others which have been erected by the federal government. These plaques are being replaced by bilingual plaques which include, in many cases, more detailed information about the activity or national significance of the events they mark.

One particular plaque, which was on the outside wall of the Eva Brook Donley Museum in the town of Simcoe, administered by the Norfolk County Historical Society, has been replaced by a bilingual plaque which has more information on it. The local historical society would like to keep the original one and put it in the museum with the exhibits relating to the event it marks. The plaque commemorates the birthplace and the contribution to the history of Ontario and Canada of Dr. Egerton Ryerson after whom the hamlet of Port Ryerse on Lake Erie was named. Dr. Ryerson is known as the father of education in Ontario.

The local historical society had no quarrel with the newer plaque but they wanted to keep the original one. The Historical Sites and Monuments Board, however, insisted that it must be turned in to be melted down for scrap or something. It was necessary for the local society to take possession of the original plaque and literally hide it so that it could not be melted down. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, it is in my constituency office. The society has written the minister asking permission to keep the original plaque in the museum, a simple request which would not in any way detract from the plaque now in place. What bothers me is the insistence that the plaque must be scrapped, when it is really a part of the history of the area. A similar incident occurred in the municipality of Nanticoke when the local people made a request to keep an original plaque.

I would ask the parliamentary secretary to talk some sense into these people. In my view this is petty feuding. Why must they be so inflexible and demand that these plaques be returned to the government? They are of peculiar historical significance to the local area and, in my view, should remain there. If the RCMP want to come and take the plaque that is in my office they can, but I do not think the department will want to go that far. The local historical society is up in arms over the issue, however. This is just a minor thing in the whole scheme, but I would ask the parliamentary secretary to draw his minister's attention to the letter written by the local historical society requesting that they be allowed to keep the plaque.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I want to take a few moments while we are discussing Bill C-13, to amend the National Historic Sites and Monuments Act, to make a representation to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Allmand), who is responsible for Parks Canada, about a matter which is of concern to many of my constituents in Sault Ste. Marie. I corresponded with the previous minister about this issue, and he showed his concern as well.

Many citizens of Sault Ste. Marie, myself included, want to declare what is left of the St. Mary's River rapids and Whitefish Island, which is located in the rapids, an historic park site. The Great Lakes Power Company of Sault Ste. Marie has announced plans to expand its hydro generating facilities into the St. Mary's River rapids, and also to construct some facilities on Whitefish Island. If this were to go through it would mean the end of one of the great historic sites in Canada and Northern Ontario, the St. Mary's River rapids, because a concrete raceway would have to be constructed. This would destroy the scenic beauty of the rapids, and also the sports fishing which is enjoyed by many residents of Sault Ste. Marie. This beautiful site is right along the downtown waterfront in the city.

I need not remind the hon. parliamentary secretary and other members of the House of the historic significance of the St. Mary's River rapids or, as the French explorers called them when they first saw them, où les eaux de la rivière Sainte-Marie se déversent—"where the waters of the St. Mary's River jump". The city of Sault Ste. Marie, of course takes its name from this beautiful, important and historic site which is synonymous with the identity of the city. The rapids of the St. Mary's River appeared on the first map of the Great Lakes which was made in 1632 by the explorer Champlain. They were discovered 245 years before Confederation, in 1622, by Étienne Brûlé, the early French explorer associated with Champlain.

Brûlé found the rapids and Whitefish Island in St. Mary's River to be the centre of activity for the Indian tribes. It was a great fishing ground and meeting place for many tribes. Preliminary archaeological digs on Whitefish Island have found it to be a treasure house of Indian artifacts and an important archaeological site as well as an historic one. In a dig last summer archaeologists discovered some 3,000 artifacts, mostly fragments, some dating back 2,000 years, so they consider this an important site that should not be ruined by commercial development.

Tourists who come to our part of the country remarks on the natural beauty of these rapids in the heart of the city, the beautiful water and parkland surrounding them. Whitefish Island could provide a recreational facility for visitors as well as the many residents of the Sault who fish in the rapids. The rapids are still a good fishing ground and should be preserved. The area is adjacent to the world famous shipping locks that carry ships from the upper levels of Lake Superior to the lower levels of Lake Huron. What I am trying to convey to the government is that this is not only a place of natural beauty but a place of historic significance as well which must be preserved.

The Great Lakes Power Co. stunned the citizenry of Sault Ste. Marie by announcing plans to expand the existing power plant. The reaction to that proposal was one of alarm. Many citizens of Sault Ste. Marie began to organize, and founded the Sault Rapids Society, under the leadership of Mr. Harry Graham. The society obtained thousands of signatures to a petition asking that the power plant should not go ahead, and that the area be preserved as an historic parkland site. Indeed the city council of Sault Ste. Marie went on record as supporting the concept that the area should be preserved as an historic park site and that the rapids should not be endangered.

I fully agree with the objects of many of the citizens of Sault Ste. Marie, particularly those of the Sault Rapids Society, for making this area into a heritage park. It is important to preserve this last bit of the history of Sault Ste. Marie and the natural beauty of the area. I urge the Canadian government to follow the example of the American government which has declared its portion of the rapids a national historic site. It is important for Parks Canada to become involved in this development, to ensure that commercial exploitation of the area is not permitted and that the present residents of Sault Ste. Marie, as well as future generations, may enjoy the natural beauty and historic significance of that important area of the St. Mary's River rapids. I hope the government will consider the matter sympathetically and examine favourably the representations I have have made this evening.

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to participate in debate on Bill C-13, the bill to amend the Historic Sites and Monuments Act. Debates of this kind allow one to talk of various areas in one's constituency and neighbouring constituencies, to determine if they should be remembered. In some cases I suppose it would be best if they were forgotten.

As I listened this evening to hon. members speaking of various historic sites in their areas, it came to me that the history of the west coast of Canada is entirely different from the history of central or eastern Canada. Until less than 100 years ago, that is, until the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, there was really no communication between the two parts of the country now called Canada, that is, between British Columbia and the central heartland. The settlement of central Canada took place along the St. Lawrence River. St. Lawrence River communities sprang up. It also took place in Quebec, where French communities settled. The English communities went farther up-river and located in places like Kingston, Toronto, and Niagara. But this part of the country grew older, and political events took place which had no effect on the people living on the west coast of Canada. The people in British Columbia at the time were entirely isolated from Central Canada; perhaps I should say central Canada was completely isolated from British Columbia.

The different routes of the colonists were such that they did not come together until the 1880's. Consequently, as that part of the country now known as the west was opened with the coming of the railway, it was settled by and large by people from Ontario, Quebec, the Maritimes, and later from Europe. They came via eastern Canada.

The tale of British Columbia of course is entirely different. The British Columbia area was first seen by the Russians, who traded with the coast Indians early in the eighteenth century. The Russians were followed by the Spaniards, and such great names as Juan de Fuca and Quadra appeared on maps of what are now known as coastal waters; they so appeared in the late 1770's. The first of the British to show up was Captain Cook who arrived there late in the eighteenth century, around 1786. He was followed by Captain Vancouver, who established the first settlement on the east coast of Vancouver Island in 1792. Then, in 1827, the Hudson's Bay Company, then known as the British Hudson's Bay Company, established Fort Langley, the first permanent settlement in the area. That took place in 1827. These small settlements on the west coast were nurtured almost entirely from Great Britain, so that such events as the Rebellion of 1835 in eastern Canada meant absolutely nothing to the people of Vancouver Island, in the Crown colony of Vancouver Island. Subsequent great events, such as the Durham report, were meaningless to people living on Vancouver Island and on the British Columbia mainland. The Canada Act had no bearing at all on the people then living in British Columbia.

At this particular time of the province's history one great man appeared on the scene, Sir James Douglas. He had joined the Hudson's Bay Company at the early age of 16, and by 1839 was chief factor of the Hudson's Bay Company on the west coast. He was ordered to build a fort on Vancouver Island in 1843, he having explored it in 1842. Sir James Douglas landed on Vancouver Island, landing where the city of Victoria now stands, going ashore there. It is difficult to determine exactly where he came ashore; it is thought to be Clover Point, but there is some argument as to whether he landed closer to the inner harbour than Clover Point.

There is no plaque, so far as I have been able to determine, marking the spot where the first representative bearing our civilization set foot on Vancouver Island. Although instructed to build Fort Camosun, Sir James Douglas built a fort on the site in 1843 and called it Fort Victoria.

Victoria is filled with names which are totally unfamiliar to people in eastern Canada but well known on the west coast; there you hear names such as Blanshard, the first governor of the colony. Actually he came to Canada to be the governor of the colony centred on Vancouver Island; apparently he did not like it. He was the last person from outside Victoria who, according to our records, came there but did not like it. He left one year later and was succeeded by Sir James Douglas as governor and vice-admiral of Vancouver's Island.

Sir James Douglas first came to notice in 1840. He was sent to Alaska, to settle the trading arrangements with the Russian-American company which had at that time leased the Alaska panhandle to the British. I am sure the hon. member for Skeena (Mrs. Campagnolo), the minister responsible for fitness and amateur sport, wishes that it were that simple now, that we could again lease the panhandle as they did in those days.

Sir James Douglas arrived shortly after the Oregon boundary settlement. The British government had deemed it wise to establish a Crown colony on Vancouver Island. When Sir James Douglas did this, he became firmly convinced that he would have to control immigration, and control the Americans as they came in, particularly during the gold rush days, so that what had happened in Oregon would not happen in British Columbia. The vast majority of people who came for the gold rush in 1858 were Americans. With the help of a small contingent of the Royal Engineers, a few ships of the Royal Navy, a handful of magistrates, and Judge Matthew Baillie Begbie, he preserved law and order and kept firm possession of the country. None of these names are marked by historic sites and monuments. I ask the parliamentary secretary to look upon this as a request that more attention be paid to that part of Canadian history that did not find its well springs in either Ontario, Quebec, or the maritimes.

• (2050)

It is of note that the only Father of Confederation buried west of the Great Lakes is buried in Ross Bay Cemetery in Victoria. There is no marker of significance to point out this fact. I hope that after this bill is passed, and we do not intend to present any difficulties with regard to the passing of it, the parliamentary secretary will take these matters as representations from my constituents and myself and realize that there is more to Canadian history than the story taught in eastern Canadian textbooks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Before recognizing the parliamentary secretary, I must inform the House that when he speaks he will automatically close the debate.

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I rise only briefly to close this debate and to express to all members in the House who participated in the proceedings this afternoon my gratitude for what was a very stimulating and most interesting debate.

As hon. members noted during the course of today's debate, it is all too infrequently that the House provides us with the opportunity to remind ourselves about the historical content and the historical sources, some of them very rich indeed, that lie within our constituencies. Of course much of the debate this afternoon went well beyond the simple terms of the bill which, although it is important, does nothing more than add two members to the Historic Sites and Monuments Board in order to give representation to the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil) pointed out that this should have been done a long while ago, and stated that he hoped there would be more endeavours to give representation to these two territories. I would just remind him, although he is not present this evening—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: He is here.

Mr. Penner: Thank you very much. I would just remind him, although he probably knows it as well as I do, that it is the policy of the government, on a basis of evolution, increasingly to provide representative and responsible government to the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw quite correctly chastised me for not mentioning in my opening remarks the number of visitors to historic sites in the province of Saskatchewan. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) indicated how many members from Saskatchewan were speaking in today's debate. He pointed out that Saskatchewan had a great deal to contribute to the history of this country and that in fact I was guilty of an oversight. I must confess my guilt in this regard. I feel particularly badly about it because I was born in the wonderful province of Saskatchewan.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Penner: My parents, my father recently deceased, were also born in the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Then why are you a Liberal?

Mr. Penner: That is why, indeed. The summer before last I had the privilege of being a delegate to the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association which visited Saskatchewan. We held meetings in the legislative buildings in Regina. Part of that delegation made a visit to Batoche. Therefore, having been there, I know what the hon. member for Moose Jaw and the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar are referring to, as well as their references to Duck Lake, Fish Creek and Fort Carlton.

I was particularly delighted that the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton), a former minister of Indian affairs and northern development, saw fit to participate in the debate. He made a very useful contribution. His suggestions will, of course, be taken under advisement. I am particularly grateful to that hon. member for having mentioned the recent work by Dr. Creighton, "The Historic Beginnings of Canada", a well written, scholarly and beautifully illustrated book. The hon. member thought it would not have wide circulation or interest in this country. I am sure that as more Canadians know about that book, they will be anxious to read it and acquire it for their own libraries.

A number of members this afternoon made important representations, directed through the minister to the Historic Sites and Monuments Board. Representations were made by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar to whom I have already referred, the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle), the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty) who received strong support from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster), the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Malone), the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles), the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) and the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon). I wish to remind all these hon. gentlemen that the representations they made have been carefully noted and that the Hansard report of today's debate will be carefully studied by the board. In addition the minister will pay attention to it.

It is not unusual, when an opportunity like this arises, that every hon. member has a suggestion as to how a particular board or agency of the government should spend its money. As I said in my opening remarks, in this current year we only have $19 million to spend. We are going to ask for more money in the next fiscal year. Of course it will be recognized that if we were to meet all of the requests made this afternoon, we would have to ask for more money than we would have any hope of receiving. However, I do not wish to discourage any hon. members on the cases that they presented so well today.

As Canadians we must pay a great deal more attention to our history. We must be prepared to invest more money in our history. We pay a great deal of lip service to national unity and the national character of Canada, but we do not always adequately carry through with the commitment of expenditures that historic sites, monuments and personages so well deserve.

In conclusion, I want to thank again all members for a useful and interesting debate. I wish there were other ways in which we could provide an opportunity for members to talk about their constituencies and the history they know so well. This would contribute very much to a good record in the House of Commons with regard to the history of this country, much of which is not as well known as it ought to be.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

STATUTE LAW (METRIC CONVERSION) AMENDMENT ACT, 1976

AMENDMENTS TO WHEAT BOARD ACT TO FACILITATE CONVERSION TO METRIC MEASUREMENT

Hon. Len Marchand (for Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce) moved that Bill C-23, to facilitate conversion to the metric system of measurement, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to move second reading of Bill C-23, which is an act to facilitate conversion to the metric system of measurement.

I should like to talk first about the principles behind the government's decision in 1970 to assume a leadership role in metric conversion. We all know that to make such a change in a modern industrial nation entails cost and inconvenience. But it is also clear that almost every country in the world has concluded that the benefits offered by the metric system more than justify the costs of converting to it. Only Burma, the Yemen Arab Republic, the Yemen Peoples Republic, and Liberia are not yet converting. Of the countries now converting, Australia and New Zealand, for example, are about 75 per cent converted.

The benefits of metric conversion derive mainly from the inherent simplicity of the system which tends to have the effect of speeding up and simplifying the measurement calculations which are made every day throughout the economy. By simplifying many measurement-sensitive operational jobs it helps keep operating costs down, no matter what the size of a company.

Increasing Canada's exports is also one of the key reasons why it makes good economic sense to go metric. It has been estimated that almost half of Canada's export trade is measurement-sensitive; and there is a clear market trend to the metric system both inside and outside North America. The increasing importance to Canada of export markets, especially for manufactured goods, confers a certain urgency on the need to convert. In the case of exports by secondary industries to countries outside North America it is the practical judgment of many of those who are concerned with Canadian trade in many of the established metric areas of the world that the unfamiliar inch-pound standards significantly hinder Canada's penetration of those markets. On this score, there is one country which will no doubt continue for many years to be our most fertile export market, and that is the United States. It is a mistake to think that our great southern neighbour is moving only very slowly to the metric system. In fact the United States is adopting the metric system much more quickly than is generally believed. For example, 40 per cent of all General Motors automotive parts are manufactured to metric dimensions.

There is one principle which pervades all areas of the national effort. It is that metric conversion must be carefully planned, timed, and phased in order to make sure we minimize the cost while maximizing the benefits for the public, industry, labour and government at all levels. In 1970, the leaders of all parties in this House gave their support to the principle of metric conversion and to the policy as outlined in the white paper on metric conversion. On the basis of this support the government established the Metric Commission in 1971, and in 1974 approved the national program of guideline dates for metric conversion, consisting of four distinct phases as follows: Phase I—Investigation to be completed in 1974; Phase II—Planning to be completed in 1975; Phase III—Scheduling, to be completed this year; Phase IV—Implementation to begin in 1975 and to peak in 1978, the end of 1980 being fixed as the guideline date by which the economy will be working substantially in metric units.

Last year a resolution in connection with this program of guideline dates was introduced in the House by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs examined and endorsed the program last December. The ministers responsible for metric conversion in each of the provinces, who met with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in Ottawa in April, 1976, also unanimously endorsed it.

The program was similarly endorsed by organizations such as the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the iron and steel industry, the Canadian Construction Association, the Canadian Telecommunications Carriers' Association, the Canadian Labour Congress, and the Canadian Chamber of Commerce. The following two associations also endorsed it and stressed the importance of passing amendments to legislation: the Canadian Gas Association, and the Canadian Petroleum Association. The program received qualified endorsement from the following organizations: the Retail Council of Canada, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, the Retail Merchants' Association, the Canadian Federation of Retail Grocers, and the Canadian Electrical Manufacturers' Association.

Supporting metric conversion since 1971, some 1,500 volunteers from all sectors of the economy have been investigating, planning, scheduling, and in some cases actually implementing metric conversion in their respective sectors of the economy. These national metric conversion officers, grouped into more than 100 sector committees, have put their faith in the leadership of the government. They have produced sector plans for their industries which contain specific guideline dates indicating when it would be in their best interests to introduce metric products and services. They expect the appropriate legislation to be properly amended in time to meet their schedules. They are doing their share, and the results of their work are already evident in hospitals, in weather reports, in metric road signs on many of our roads, in litre milk containers in British Columbia and Quebec, litre soft drink and wine bottles and, kilometer per hour speedometers on 1977 cars, to mention just a few examples.

Hon. members may ask why an omnibus bill is being presented. Mr. Speaker, the House has already passed the law which is the basis for virtually everything the economy does in terms of measurement. I refer to the Weights and Measures Act of 1873, amended in 1971, which makes the international system of units legal for all purposes in Canada. But there are still approximately 90 federal acts which must be amended if we are to keep pace with the march of events I have just described.

Differing national sector plans call for different implementation dates in the various industries or public services. Although the implementation dates are not mandatory, they serve as guidelines for each member company or organization in a given sector. The patterns emerging so far in Canada and, for example, in Australia, indicate that the bulk of a given sector does convert on or around the dates in its sector plan. The important aspect as far as we are concerned in this House is that the federal government should also have a timetable indicating when legislation ought to be passed, because the time when legislation is required is clearly marked for each sector in the sector plans. It is thanks to this careful planning that we have developed a schedule of dates which covers the majority of the 90 federal measurement-sensitive acts needing amendment. The bill before us today is the first of four such bills to be proposed before the virtual completion of the final or implementation phase of metric conversion. It covers nine of the 90 acts.

I propose to deal briefly with the main features of the bill before us, first being the proposals relating to the grains sector. The most pressing deadline we face concerns the various pieces of legislation which must be changed to allow the bulk grain handling industry to go fully metric in February of next year. Domestic and export futures transactions have been made in metric tonnes since July of this year on the Winnipeg Commodity Exchange Futures Market. The conversion of scales has already begun. The Manitoba Pool, the Saskatchewan Pool, the Alberta Pool, the United Grain Growers, the National Farmers Union, and the Canadian Federation of Agriculture all support conversion. With this kind of support, with widespread conversion work already completed, and with our customers abroad, even in the U.S.A., already using metric units, it would be far more costly to undo the work already done than to make sure this bill is passed in time. The proposals with regard to grain involve four of the nine acts covered by the bill.

I wish to deal briefly with the reference to the Consumer Packaging and Labelling Act. Many metric conversion managers across the country have noted that when both metric and imperial units appear side by side on a consumer product, the consumer tends to notice only the familiar unit and ignore the new one. As experience in other countries, such as the United Kingdom, testifies, the result is that the consumer learns nothing about the new system. Many sector committees, with the support of industry, have recommended that the legal requirement to show the customary Canadian unit be dropped. The amendment is to the Consumer Packaging and Labelling Act and would mean that the manufacturer would have the option to show the old unit or not. This amendment would thus favourably affect all sectors manufacturing consumer packaged goods, not to mention all wholesalers, retailers, and the consumers themselves.

The Weights and Measures Act will also be amended. The sixth act that would be amended by this bill now stipulates that the governor in council cannot amend it in such a way as to prevent the use of customary Canadian measures in trade. Given the over-all policy in the White Paper acclaimed in 1970 of the eventual adoption of a single coherent measurement system, the proposed amendment to the Consumer Packaging and Labelling Act, and taking note of the accelerating pace of introduction of metric products, it is now time to delete this provision.

This amendment could affect the advertising and sale of commodities sold by weight, volume, or length, and prevent consumer confusion about the quantity of a product by controlling the unit of measurement.

There are other important acts that will also be amended. Another clause of the bill would amend the Regional Development Incentives Act by changing square miles to square kilometres. This is merely an arithmetical change to specify the size of a designated area as 12,500 square kilometres instead of 5,000 square miles.

In the natural gas distribution sector no change can be made to provincial legislation governing the transmission and distribution of natural gas until the Federal Gas Inspection Act is changed. In the metric conversion plan of this sector this amendment is therefore critical. The plan also calls for drilling to begin in July, 1978, with a lead time of one year for legislation, and this bill would amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act in time.

May I briefly point out that it is not only the 1,500 volunteers from the Canadian private sector who have been looking to the federal government for leadership in metric conversion. The provincial governments and the United States are vitally interested in every move this House makes in connection with metric conversion.

In 1974 all ten premiers sent a letter to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) expressing their support for the program of guideline dates for metric conversion. Omnibus bills have already been passed in provincial legislatures; the first was in British Columbia in June, 1974, and the second in Alberta on November 4 of this year. All provincial governments have organizations which co-ordinate metric conversion, and in most cases they have been operating for several years now. Metric conversion activity among the provincial governments is, therefore, well under way. Unless this House keeps up the pace with its own legislation, provincial legislatures will be inhibited from acting on their own legislation, as in the case of the Federal Gas Inspection Act.

Since May, 1973, the United States has been actively investigating, planning, and scheduling metric conversion for the private sector on a national basis. The national sector and co-ordinating committees of the American National Metric Council, formed since that time, have been operating along much the same lines as the Metric Commission national committee structure.

Contrary to some belief, the United States is doing more than just following Canada. It can be said that the United States is moving very quickly in some influential sectors of the American economy. For example, 40 per cent of all components in General Motors automobiles are now in metric dimensions. The Ford plant in Lima, Ohio, has been producing all metric engines since 1973. The essentially all metric General Motors Chevette is now on the market, and Chrysler intends to launch an all metric subcompact in 1977.

President Ford signed the United States metric conversion act in December, 1975, and this provides for a United States metric board. Its members have been nominated, and observers in Washington anticipate that these members will be confirmed by the United States Senate early in the new year. In light of all these facts it is reasonable to conclude that the United States is not far behind Canada, if not ahead of us in certain areas.

In conclusion, our trading partners both south of the border and overseas are watching us to see if we will continue to maintain our stature as a modern trading nation by moving unequivocally to the international system of units. Equally as important is the fact that our provincial governments, private industry, and commerce have put their faith in our leadership. Now is the time to respond.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, it is a great and exhilarating experience to speak in the House of Commons on a Tuesday night just before the Christmas recess. I will not be too long in my remarks. There are several others who wish to speak and I think they will all be reasonably short because I believe there is a disposition to move with some haste on this piece of legislation.

This bill is one of a series to be presented to parliament to facilitate conversion to metric. The standing committee which dealt with the metric resolution recommended in its report to parliament that the government proceed with plans for metric conversion by bills that would be presented to parliament, rather than proceeding by order in council. I am pleased to see that the minister has recognized this desire on the part of people in parliament. His predecessor did not appear to have the same recognition of the suggestion that this matter be aired here in this House rather than proceeded with by way of order in Council.

There has been considerable controversy over the introduction of the metric system, but we are more than half way down the road and we certainly cannot turn back now. I have not been at all impressed by some of the information that has come out of the Metric Commission, and all of us continue to get mail criticizing the fact that we are proceeding with this conversation. Generally speaking I think everyone supports the idea or concept of metric conversion, yet we find in talking to various ministers that they still want to proceed in this rather cavalier and high-handed way. The point I have tried to make in the past is that the best way to get the metric conversion settled is by having a wide open debate in the House so that interested people can speak on the measure. Let us get things out in the open. This would do a great deal of good, much more than some of the promotional material from the Metric Commission.

I would caution the minister that when he introduces another bill he should not leave it until the 11th hour. We recognize that this bill must be passed. We are going to recess soon, to return in late January, and this is supposed to be in effect on February 1. However, I think the bill could have been introduced one, two or three weeks ago. Certainly it was before us on November 22. I hope the next time around the minister will bring his bill in for debate in the proper way. I do not think that would involve too much time in the House, but there are members who have some misconceptions about metric conversion. I am sure they would like to be heard and to put forward the views of their constituents.

I think the minister and I have a slight disagreement in respect of countries, but there are only a few countries in the world not now on the metric system. I think this is a progressive step for us to take in order to complete our conversion. This bill amends several acts. I think it is pretty straightforward. It changes some of the designations in the Canadian Wheat Board Act and a few other acts dealing with grain. For example, it changes "acres" as it appears in various statutes to "hectares". The new term is a combination of the words "hecto" and "ares", "hecto" meaning "hundred" and "ares", which I think is of Greek origin, meaning a square unit and from which is derived the word "area". So the definitions are pretty straightforward. The word "bushels" is changed to "tonnes". That is an old English term. The old English is "tunne" and the middle English is "tonne".

To give the House an example of how people get upset about metric conversion, one of the metric terms that has puzzled me is the unit of measurement of barometric pressure. For years the common term has been "millibars" when referring to barometric pressure; it is now reported in "kilopascals". I do not know where the hell that term came from, frankly. The metric designation for pressure is "newtons per square metre" or "dynes per square centi-metre". These can be designated as kilinewtons per square meter, or newtons per square centimetre; but where they dug up the term "kilopascals" is beyond me. I have looked through several scientific digests and cannot find it anywhere. I do not know whether it is a creation of the Canadian Metric Commission or what it is, but that is the sort of thing that gets people upset. They are used to working with one term and then, all of a sudden, another one is thrown at them and they cannot figure out what it means. I have received letters from engineers and people in the scientific field, and they have asked me what the term kilopascals means. They want to know where it came from and who designed it, because they cannot find it anywhere.

They have the same sort of frustration that we had in the finance committee. We had a caucus committee meeting one night and the Metric Commission was with us. They had a map of Canada and, believe it or not, Mr. Speaker, they had Edmonton where Winnipeg is, and Winnipeg where Edmonton is. The Metric Commission is an agency of the Government of Canada and was telling us what a great thing metric conversion was, yet they had the audacity to show a map of Canada like that to a group of MP's.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Perhaps they did not know where they came from themselves.

Mr. Kempling: Perhaps they picked up "kilopascals" somewhere along the way, but this is the kind of silliness we have had regarding some of the matters dealing with the metric system.

I have spent a great deal of time trying to convince people that it does not cost $3,000 to convert a set of tools to metric measurement. I know for a fact it does not cost that because we use tools in my own business. Yet we are still getting letters, and representations are still being made to us by people who tell us that it will cost them $3,000 to convert a set of automobile mechanic's tools to the metric system. That is absolutely wrong; we know it does not cost that much. I have checked with tool manufacturers and tool distributors, and I do not think it will cost even 10 per cent of $3,000. But the only way we can get these things out into the open and get these concerns expressed is by bringing in bills to this House, sending them to committee, and then have the Metric Commission come before the committee to hear our views.

Talking to the Metric Commission at the time we examine estimates is totally inadequate. I urge the minister to continue bringing in bills as we proceed along with metric conversion, let us have a day or two's debate on each, send the bill to committee, and discuss our concerns. Perhaps this will give the Metric Commission some direction as to where their advertising efforts should go. I know there has been a tremendous amount of co-operation with industry, and although the separate committees have had some criticism, generally they have worked quite well. I cannot be too critical of them, but I do urge we continue to proceed by bill rather than by order in council.

I received a long letter from a man who is an engineer, and who simply tears the whole idea of metric conversion apart. I intend to answer him, but this is only one of many letters we are continuing to receive. This makes me feel that some of the advertising done by the Metric Commission is too slick, too professional to reach the people it should. It is great for young children and kids at school; they are very well adapted to the metric system today. But older people, people in the professions in some instances, are just not being reached.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I will conclude my remarks. We have three or four other members who wish to speak on the bill, and I believe some members of the NDP are going to speak. Nevertheless we hope we can move with some haste on this bill.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I want to make just a few brief comments on Bill C-23, an act to facilitate conversion to the metric system of measurement. The bill before us seeks to amend a number of acts of parliament dealing with measurement, and on the whole I cannot find any objection to the amendments in the bill. What I should like to do is to use the few minutes available to me to make some observations and suggestions on the whole policy of metric conversion.

I should like to zero in on three areas for the benefit of the minister and his officials to which they might address themselves. First, there are certain problems that I think are associated with metric conversion and information given to the public; secondly, I wish to refer to policing the changeover that is occurring so as to protect consumers; and thirdly, I want to address a few remarks to the cost of metric conversion.

On the first aspect, that of informing the public about metric conversion, I know the Metric Commission has launched quite a public information campaign on television, in newspapers, brochures and elsewhere. I think probably it is effective so far as young people are concerned, students in elementary and secondary schools, but I think it is failing in terms of educating the adult population who, of course, have grown up under the old system and are very set in their ways. They have difficulty relating Celsius to Farenheit, metres to yards, and so on. I must confess that when I hear temperatures expressed in Celsius I am still not sure how cold or hot it is. Or when the wind is so many kilometres per hour I still have to look outside and see how far the branches of trees bend in the wind to get an idea of its velocity. I think the Metric Commission should address itself to this problem that many adults are facing, and try to design information that relates in a very concrete way to some of the basic commodities adults are going to deal with in the consumer field, or in terms of temperature and distance.

For example, we know that a litre is about 88 per cent of the volume of a quart. When this bill passes, there will be an end to double labelling, the metric and the standard labelling on standard articles. When a housewife buys a litre of milk, she will still be thinking in terms of a size which in her mind relates to the quart. What she will be concerned about is the cost of that litre of milk as it relates to what she conceives as the usual cost of a quart of milk. I do not know whether we will still have the same volume, whether it will be the old quart expressed in terms of metric measurement, or whether eventually the quart will be transformed in size to the litre. Whichever way it happens, it would be very helpful if the Metric Commission would produce a set of tables or some figures for comparison purposes on a quart of milk or any other item which the housewife buys. For example, a quart of milk costs so many cents, but if you buy a litre of milk it would be expressed in terms of a litre being so much of the volume of a quart, therefore the corresponding price should be such and such. If you do such an arithmetical calculation for the consumer, when they go out to shop they will not be bewildered by a whole host of different sizes and prices. It would take a mathematician to figure out whether you are actually paying what you should be paying.

Some kind of educational policy should be directed at the adult population, because I do not think the kind of advertising which tries to change our whole mental conception of things is working. I remember some of the charts they have of a thermometer which shows so many degrees Celsius at which you cannot walk on ice and so many degrees Celsius at which you can skate on it, and so on. I do not think that kind of technique really works for the adults.

The other area of concern I have is with regard to the policing of the changeover. To my knowledge there is still no agency set up to protect the consumer from any unscrupulous business enterprise which does a metric conversion and does not put a corresponding fair price on that conversion. They may be using the changeover to reduce the volume and keep the price the same, or they change the volume and increase the price. The public should be made aware of the place where they can send their complaints but, more important, there should be a public agency monitoring the conversion with power to impose penalties on anyone who uses the metric conversion in an unscrupulous manner. I think public confidence would be much greater in the conversion system if people knew there was adequate policing.

For example, in clause 4 of the bill there is a proposal for a change in the Gas Inspection Act. No longer will we talk in terms of British thermal units but rather we will refer to something called megajoules. I have enough trouble with kilopascals in the barometric pressure system, but now I think I will have to get used to megajoules as well for measuring the sale of gas by what used to be the old British thermal unit. I also notice there have been changes in the term for cubic feet to cubic metres, etc., and I wonder again what that will mean to the consumer of natural gas. The gas meter measures units in cubic feet. It is stated here that there will be a changeover to cubic metres. I note that the bill provides for an "either or" situation, but I hope that no consumer of natural gas will have to bear the cost of the conversion of gas companies to the metric system.

That leads me to my third area of concern with regard to the cost of conversion to the metric system. On other occasions we have expressed our concern about the cost to small businesses of having to keep dual inventories of parts. As we convert to the metric system, people who have appliances, automobiles and other machinery which have been designed under the old system will need parts as those machines wear down. I hope it will not be an extra cost that will be added to the consumer who has some old equipment and has to keep finding parts for it.

We have spoken in the past about mechanics, carpenters and repairmen having to buy metric tools and use metric measurements. The only provision under the Income Tax Act to help people convert to the metric system is the $150 deduction for employment expenses. Surely if the government embarks on such a major revamping of our whole measuring system it could just as easily amend the Income Tax Act to allow for the cost to small business and to individual tradesmen of converting to the metric system. The Income Tax Act should be amended to allow greater deductions for that kind of expense that will be incurred.

I have outlined three areas in which the Metric Commission has to do some work, not only with the general public but with convincing the government to take certain legislative initiatives in order to protect the consumer and compensate the individual and certain businesses for the cost of conversion. We have no objections to the changes proposed in Bill C-23, but in order to facilitate further changes in acts of parliament I hope the Metric Commission will take serious note of the concerns I have expressed tonight on behalf of my constituents and the general public.

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make only a few brief remarks on the principle of Bill C-23. Conversion to the metric system is something which has been going on for some time, and as the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling) mentioned, we are gradually getting used to some of the invented terms used with respect to weather reporting and so on. However, according to the minister in his introduction of this bill, it was about six years ago that all parties in this parliament adopted a White Paper which set the country on the road to the implementation of the metric system. I suppose a change of this magnitude is bound to create some problems and inconvenience, and certainly there has been some confusion and apprehension over the nature of that decision.

I was pleased to listen to the minister tonight and to hear the long list of farm organizations which are supporting and co-operating with the metric commission in implementing the conversion program. I hope that those same farm groups he mentioned will stand up and help explain the program and the rationale and the advantages behind it, explain why they are supporting it, and help our grain producers become accustomed to this very major change.

The words and phrases which are very familiar to prairie grain producers—quarter section, section, acres, and so forth—have been part of the geography and part of the traditional language for a long time, and those words and phrases and that thinking will not disappear.

Mr. Mazankowski: It is part of our culture, Cliff.

Mr. McIsaac: That is right; it is. The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) says it is part of the culture of his part of the country, and the same is true for my part of the country.

I was reassured when I heard the minister tell us tonight that our American neighbours are moving roughly in parallel with the Canadian conversion program. That is a fact which is not generally recognized by farmers in my part of the country, and I want to urge the farm groups, and the civil servants who are involved with the implementation of this program, to maintain a closer liasion with the United States agricultural conversion program.

Western farmers have proved many times—and they do not need to prove it again—that not only are they the top food producers in the world but also that they are adaptable and progressive, and they look with favour on any change which will benefit them in the longer run. I hope the over-all metric committee, the provincial departments of agriculture to which the minister referred again, and the various producer organizations will work closely together to sell and explain this program, because it is a very large job. The farmer does not just have to get used to some of the terms which were pointed out by the hon. member who spoke prior to me with respect to litres of milk, wine, ice cream and so forth. These are not really major problems, compared with the machinery conversion and the new terms for quotas and so forth that farmers will have to get accustomed to in terms of gauging their own production, and of course in terms of their own pocketbooks and what is coming back to them.

I understand we are talking about so many tonnes per hectare as far as quotas are concerned. I wonder why we could not try tonnes per acre, or some part-way measure initially. If the various farm groups and the Canadian Wheat Board wish to proceed with this quickly, I am not going to stand in their way in that respect. I only say let them not blame the politicians when the flak begins to fly with respect to the rate at which it seems to me we are proceeding down the road to metric conversion.

I will be supporting the bill because I realize that the move to the metric system is inevitable and in the long haul, will benefit the country, but I do not support it with any great ethusiasm.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: Vote against it; I will join you.

Mr. McIsaac: I hope this particular program is not handled with the usual heavy-handed, insensitive bureaucratic touch which so often goes along with programs of this kind. It seems to me, and it has been mentioned by other speakers in this debate, that we need to spend some more money and explain this in more commonplace or common sense terms. We need to explain the program, and explain why we are moving in this direction, and I trust that the new minister, who is himself a man with an extensive rural background and who is sensitive to rural needs, will bear those thoughts in mind as we proceed down the road in implementing this program.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I was glad to see the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. McIsaac) step forward and speak on behalf of the grain producers in western Canada. Farmers and mechanics are going to be the ones who are going to be caught with this legislation. The hon. member suggested that the farm groups brought about the situation the government is now in, but I suggest that the government itself is to blame for the fact that this system has not been adequately publicized to the Canadian people. I say this especially with regard to farmers and mechanics.

For some time we have been trying to get the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) to relax just a little on his taxation policy as it relates to the mechanics of this country. There is no way mechanics can maintain their tool supplies even under the present method of taxation, and the government has not seen fit to provide any financial assistance by way of tax relief for mechanics who will be required to have two sets of tools.

The government should give consideration to this matter prior to implementing this program.

It has been said that we have gone too far down the road to turn back. Perhaps we have, and perhaps when we try to resist this, we are swimming against the tide. Nevertheless, the government has forsaken all the mechanics of this country by not allowing some type of allowance so that they can buy the extra tools they will require if they are to work on implements, automobiles, trucks and so on which are built under the metric system.

The hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley, and the Minister of State (Small Business) (Mr. Marchand) stated that we are travelling at a rate comparative with that of the United States. I suggest that we are far ahead of the United States because much of the equipment which is coming across the United States border to Canada and upon which the Canadian farmer relies has not been built under the metric system. All these machines will have to be changed. One of the real problems farmers have run into has been that when they have taken sprayers out into the field, they have had difficulty relating ounces to acres, and now under these changes they will have to use grams per hectare. Hon. members who do not think there will be problems should go out to farms and talk to farmers who have to use measures which have been assessed under the metric system. They have to work with these products in terms of hectares, and there certainly will be problems.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: A hectare of a problem!

Mr. Towers: That is exactly what is happening. When the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley says the flak will begin to fly—that is when it begins, Mr. Speaker. The government has made no provision for this and it has shortchanged industry and all farmers by not making suitable provision. A lot of problems could have been prevented if a program had been inaugurated to take care of this, and if there had been opportunities for dialogue.

I have spoken to many farmers and they do not realize the rate at which it is happening. I have a letter which I should like to put on the record because I think it expresses the opinion of many farmers. It is addressed to me as member of parliament, from R. R. No. 2 Lacombe, Alberta, and reads as follows:

> I would like to draw your personal attention to the enclosed clipping from the editorial page of the December 2, Western Producer. As you see it concerns the metric system as it applies to Britain. I believe it is time a little common sense was inserted into the way Canada is handling its conversion to metric. As our land is surveyed in square miles containing 640 acres, nothing can change this fact, call it what they will. Another thing is the handling of grain, it is ridiculous to have no measure in between the kilogram, about 2½ pounds, I believe and the tonne. What is needed is a metric bushel of 55 lbs making 40 bushels to a metric tonne. The gallon and inch should also be kept if we are not to make mistakes handling herbicides, etc. What is going to happen when we need a four feet by eight feet sheet of plywood to replace a broken one, are we going to have an odd size that fits nothing?
> I hope when the Conservatives form the next government—

I hope hon. members opposite are listening, Mr. Speaker.

—this course of action will be pursued. You would have every farmer in Canada behind you. If you agree, now is the time to start working on it. Thank you for listening.

The editorial referred to, which appeared in the Western Producer on December 2, reads as follows:

METRICS: BRITONS DIG HEELS IN

Britain learned that it would go metric in 1965. It has been 11 years since then and the Weights and Measures Bill—as it is called—is still battling its way through the House of Commons.

How has it fared? What can Canada learn from their experience which spans many more years than does our journey toward metrication?

According to a story in the Business Section of The Sunday Telegraph, November 7, entitled, "Metrication Muzzled and Delayed", a number of changes have been made to the bill as it fought its way through house committees. In order to ensure its progress the British government has conceded one major point: it has agreed that the mile, the inch, the pint and the gallon will be preserved and exempted from statutory metrication. Apparently the Common Market rules and regulations make it clear that such exemptions can be made.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what provision has the Canadian government made in this regard; what dialogue has it had with Great Britain in this regard?

The editorial continues:

Some members of parliament on both sides of the House were concerned lest metrication increase consumer problems, already vexed enough by inflation, and they asked for a delay in metrication of four basic foodstuffs until after 1979. The foodstuffs were bread, cheese, tea and butter. However, the government offered to prevent metrication of any foodstuffs before April, 1978. The members of parliament accepted the broader alternative.

The government also agreed that fish, meat, vegetables and fruit, which in Britain are usually weighed out in front of the consumer in smaller shops, will not be subjected to compulsory metrication until after 1980.

Canada is not faced at present with the problems confronting the British economy but it is possible we might find it useful to consider their experience with the legislation to see if it could have any application in this country.

This is why I say the Minister of State (Small Businesses) should have given some consideration to small business when he was speaking.

Some time ago the Retail Council of Canada estimated that it will cost at least $50 million to convert measuring scales in some 28,000 retail outlets, particularly food stores, to the metric system. My note on this says that the council wrote to finance minister Turner as well as provincial treasurers. It is some time since the Hon. John Turner was minister of finance, so that is how long the government has known about the problem. The cost to the small retailers is going to be tremendous. I think the minister should have given consideration to this problem before going ahead. We know what inflation has done and we know that the profits of the small business people are not great; we also know that any increase in their costs will be passed on to the consumer. Once again, the consumer pays.

Just today I spoke to a fairly large retailer of building products who told me that his increased costs will have to be passed on to the user. Therefore even in the construction industry it is going to be a problem. People buying a home today find it costs enough already.

I feel greater consideration should have been given to the problems associated with this bill. I was quite interested that the minister did not mention football but I see the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) (Mrs. Campagnolo) in the House so perhaps she will have some comment. I wonder if that game will be played as "first down and eight and three quarter metres to go".

There should have been more dialogue on the Canadian scene about this whole metric system. Canadian people are intelligent and can adapt to circumstances over a period of time. Certainly farmers, mechanics, and all those people who will be hit hardest should have been considered. There should have been provision to protect them and not all of a sudden subject them to this situation. I hope the minister will give some thought to that. Mr. Speaker, I see you are ready to rise, and I want to thank you for the opportunity of speaking on behalf of those people about whom I am vitally concerned.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. minister on a point of order.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, there was some discussion earlier with spokesmen from the other parties to the effect that we might complete all stages of the bill tonight. I wonder if I may inquire whether we might not see the clock and have the other speakers make their contributions and complete the bill as we agreed earlier.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, there certainly have been discussions about dealing with this matter, but it was my impression that if we reached ten o'clock with all those who wished to participate in the debate having done so, we might have been able to complete the bill. In canvassing my colleagues—as I always do to make sure we have a consensus on this side of the House—I find that a number of members still wish to address themselves to this important legislation. I also understand that another member of the NDP may wish to speak.

An hon. Member: We don't want to speak.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: It is ten o'clock. Perhaps he has gone home. At any rate I am afraid we cannot go along at this point with the suggestion made, owing to present circumstances.

Mr. Paproski: Try again, round about February 1.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. There is not unanimous consent to adopt the suggestion which has been made.

Adjournment Debate

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

IMMIGRATION—REFUGEES IN ARGENTINA—CO-OPERATION WITH AMNESTY INTERNATIONAL

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, two of my colleagues and I addressed questions to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) yesterday having to do with the situation of refugees in the Argentine.

The Canadian government in June promised to increase the number of refugees to be admitted from South America from roughly 4,500 already admitted to a total, including that 4,500, of 6,000. In other words, another 1,500 persons were to be admitted.

The three members I have mentioned in September visited the Argentine and Uruguay under the auspices of the Canadian churches and accompanied by Mr. George Cram, a representative of the Canadian churches. They directed their attention specifically to the question of Canada's contribution to refugees and to the question of fundamental human rights in the countries they visited. They presented a detailed memorandum to the minister, asking that the refugee situation be treated as a matter of urgency and that steps be taken by way of appointment of a special commission to deal promptly with the cases.

The minister replied in a memorandum furnished to us on December 16. The effect of the memorandum is to suggest that the situation is by no means urgent, that the Canadian embassy in Buenos Aires has reported that the Argentinian government is taking a more humane approach toward refugees and human rights, and that present regulations are quite adequate.

We interviewed the embassy officials, the UN High Commissioner for Refugees, and many of those in the churches and elsewhere who are responsible for refugee programs, and we talked to many refugees as well. We find it necessary to reassert that our statement that an emergency exists is indeed correct. The only evidence which might justify the statement of the more humane approach was the statement that the Argentine authorities have shown a greater willingness to co-operate with the UNHCR and such other organizations as Amnesty International.

This view, Mr. Speaker, is totally rejected by Amnesty International itself, which speaks in a recent interim report of kidnappings, including the kidnapping of the person who a few moments before had been interviewing the Amnesty International group. Father Drinan, a member of the Congress of the United States, says the situation is almost as bad as that in Chile at the height of the repression there, and indeed the situation is worse than in Viet Nam when thousands of prisoners were imprisoned and tortured. Amnesty International speaks of the killing of ten clergymen and the disappearance of many people as a result of "actions by unofficial security personnel." It is also clear that Amnesty International representatives were not in fact granted freedom to move throughout the country. We ourselves can attest from very many interviews we had that a situation of lawlessness does indeed prevail. There are at least 10,000 detained without trial on political charges. All of this has created grave uneasiness on the part of refugees.

It is apparent from the minister's memo that he has got his information from our embassy staff. When we were there, two junior officials were looking after immigration matters for the Argentine and six other countries. We understand that one more has been added. However, it was quite apparent to us that they took routine views of their duties, and we find it strange that the minister should prefer the opinion of these officials to that expressed by three members of parliament, all experienced and quite familiar with the situation. We think it is somewhat derogatory of our parliamentary system that representations from members of all major parties should be treated by the minister with such scant respect.

I urge the minister to reconsider the whole matter and to get in touch with the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees through well qualified and independent personnel in order to get at the real facts. This is a matter of human beings and their lives, and Canada should not base its policies on a garbling of the facts.

[Translation]

Mr. Arthur Portelance (Parliamentary Secretary to minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, even though we first consider the information provided to us by our embassy in Buenos Aires, we also take into account the information that might be given by organizations such as Amnesty International. Our embassy indicated to us recently that Argentine authorities showed a greater desire to cooperate with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and seemed more concerned about the international opinion. We were informed by our embassy that in early November two representatives from Amnesty International met with Argentina's foreign affairs under-secretary and were allowed to visit a few prisons and interview some inmates.

IMMIGRATION—REQUEST TO ACCELERATE ADMISSION OF REFUGEES FROM CHILE AND URUGUAY

Mr. Louis Duclos (Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, first I want to point out the non sectarian nature of the short debate we are having tonight about the political refugees of Chile and Uruguay who are presently under the protection of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in Argentina.

I should also say that this is as it should be since we are dealing with a transcendental issue, an issue which goes far beyond the electoral interests of the political parties of hon. members of this House who are concerned with this problem. Indeed it is quite out of question, Mr. Speaker, to play political games with values such as respect for human rights or promotion of individual liberties, which get virtual consensus in our country.

Mr. Speaker, I am amazed at the good conscience of the minister's advisers in this field. It is obvious that their vision of the Argentine situation is quite different from what my colleagues and I have been able to see during the week we spent there last October. This difference was already clear during the long discussions we had with our representatives in Buenos Aires. According to what they said, you would have thought that the coup of last March 24 was only one more incident in the political history of Argentina, and that the conditions of the political refugees coming from neighbouring countries had been only slightly affected when the army took over in Argentina.

One should know, Mr. Speaker, that Argentina today is no longer the open land that it traditionally was for political dissidents from surrounding countries. Because the new regime is hostile to them, they live in a climate of fear that the commendable efforts of the UNHCR are not enough to alleviate. Indeed, they had good reason to be fearful. One only has to recall the kidnapping last May right in the middle of Buenos Aires and the subsequent assassination of two Uruguayan refugees, Senator Michelini, a former minister of industry and commerce of Uruguay, and his fellow citizen, Mr. Gutierrez Ruiz who was Chairman of the Congress in his country. Yet those were two politicians belonging to moderate formations whom the Uruguay security forces, apparently acting with the tacit consent of Argentine authorities, picked up in a hotel rented by the United Nations High Commissioner right under the nose of the Argentine police. In that respect, it must be said that the protection offered by the police varies from day to day and that at certain times it is virtually inexistent.

At the very time we were in Argentina, a raid was made by the security forces in a place housing refugees registered with the United Nations in Argentina's second biggest city, Rosario. Some fifty persons were thus detained during 24 hours, without any apparent reason.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, it is not surprising that a large number of those refugees should strongly desire to leave Argentina. In fact, about a quarter of the 10,000 refugees registered with the High Commissioner for Refugees are considered urgent cases, that is individuals whose physical security can not be assured. So I am surprised that it could be suggested that few refugees want to find refuge in Canada because it goes without saying that the majority of those individuals would be quite happy to be in Canada. Indeed, a visit we made in a place accommodating refugees in that category showed us the obvious interest they have for Canada. We were literally assailed by many requests, for representations to the Canadian government by those living there.

Mr. Speaker, it must be recognized that Canada generally contributed a much larger share than the rest of the whole world to the solution of those difficult problems. However, this should not appease our conscience to the point where we should close our eyes to the miserable plight of people whose only fault for most was wanting to create a fairer social order in their country.

It is interesting to know, Mr. Speaker, that the UN High Commissioner for Refugees rejects about half of the request for political refugee status that are made to him. As to Canada, it rejected 70 per cent of the 1,284 cases submitted by the High Commissioner between January and September of this year. It is a scandalous rate of rejection of which we cannot be proud.

Furthermore, the Canadian embassy is known for being unable to react quickly in emergency situations so that fewer and fewer cases are referred to it. Last week, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees asked for a meeting with the officials of the embassy in Buenos Aires to make them aware of the problems created by the slowness of our admission procedure. So we cannot say that the relationship with the High Commissioner is really good.

Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that those who report to the minister on the situation in Argentina do not really understand the political events happening in that country. They do not realize that it is improper to unduly extend the stay in Argentina of people who are not welcomed there and who, according to a senior official of the ministry of interior that we met, will be deported to their country of origin if a third country is not prepared to receive them.

And how shall we establish if a refugee can stay or not in Argentina? The decision is based on the information given by the government of the country from which they fled in terror. Of course, they would not be welcomed back very warmly.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is essential that the minister decide to give more credibility to his young officials who perceived the distorted reality through a prism formed by three parliamentarians from political parties who got 95 per cent of the popular vote at the last elections and who have a long experience of those problems. If he cannot make a decision I encourage him to make arrangements so that an experienced official of the Department of External Affairs may go there and evaluate the political situation in the near future.

It must be remembered that it is only after the political situation was assessed by a high ranking official of recognized competence that Canada could start to decently discharge its responsibilities in Chile after the coup of September 1973.

Mr. Arthur Portelance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as indicated previously by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), immigration applications by Chilean and Uruguayan refugees are normally processed within two to four months. In cases where the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees or one of our officers identify an instance of particular urgency, a refugee can be accepted within days. There is no interview waiting list in Buenos Aires. Refugees are interviewed as soon as their application is received. Right now the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees refers about 30 cases every week to our embassy. Our three immigration officers can process a larger number of cases, but right now there is only moderate interest for Canada among refugees. It seems refugees would rather establish locally in a more compatible cultural environment.

I would repeat what Mr. Cullen already indicated to me, namely that a special mission is not required for the time being. We respond as quickly as possible to refugee applications. The applications cannot be processed any faster, in view especially of the screening which is absolutely essential to Canadian security. Unless refugees showed sudden interest for Canada, a special mission would in no way facilitate the entry of those Argentine refugees.

[English]

IMMIGRATION—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF TREATMENT OF REFUGEES IN ARGENTINA—ACTIONS OF UNITED NATIONS COMMISSION

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, before I deal with other parts of the subject under debate tonight I want to deal directly with the answer the parliamentary secretary has just given my colleague, the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Duclos). Perhaps this shows the virtue of having this kind of a debate on one single issue, something in which the three of us are obviously vitally interested.

It is unfortunate, and I feel very sorry for the parliamentary secretary, that he has had to provide an answer to this House which could be so incomplete and, in some cases, so factually inaccurate. In discussions we held earlier today with Mr. Cram, referred to by my colleague, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), we again reviewed the situation in respect of the length of time it takes to process refugee applications. We could find no basis whatsoever for the affirmation that has been made again this evening by the parliamentary secretary that the average waiting period is from two to four months, unless in fact he is referring to the period after the application has finally been approved, which means, of course, considerable time prior to that when a number of interviews, security checks and medical examinations are made.

Even more important, the assertion by the parliamentary secretary that there is no waiting list is absolutely inconceivable to the three of us who have had the opportunity of talking directly with refugees who are in an emergency situation, of which, by UNHCR reckoning, there are some 2,500. Each of us could speak very personally and feelingly about standing in a hostel containing more than 100 refugees who are absolutely desperate to get out of Argentina. From the moment we arrived and were pointed out to be parliamentarians from Canada, I can tell you that each of us had a number of animated conversations with people who would do anything to come to Canada, but in a number of instances have had their applications turned down. Some were encouraged through our conversations to reapply, and their process has perhaps now been completed.

When the parliamentary secretary suggests there is only moderate interest in Canada, it may be the situation of the chicken and the egg. It may be that the fact is that far too many refugees have experienced the reality that Canada has not seemed very willing to process their applications, and that the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees has recently reasserted with Canadian officials in Buenos Aires that there must be a better understanding of the refugee process than the one that is presently in process.

My colleague, the hon. member for Montmorency, in the latter part of his remarks suggested that indeed the time had come for there to be some cutting of the enormous amount of red tape, and of misinformation that has been conveyed on the subject from the minister's office and from the parliamentary secretary here this evening.

It is interesting to note when we reflect on the situation in Chile, following the coup that occurred there in 1973, that significant action did not occur on the refugee problem until the special delegation in 1974 of Geoffrey Pearson and Mr. Danby had the opportunity to give an objective stating of the situation as it existed at that time in Chile.

The problem we are faced with this evening, and it is a very real problem of modern day bureaucracy, is that the minister, and I am here in no way criticizing him in himself, suggested to us in response to answers yesterday that he does want to take a humanitarian approach to this problem, but he is relying, as my colleague the hon. member for Greenwood has said, on very junior officers who do not have an over-all and objective picture of the situation. They are in a day-to-day process of dealing with people who are coming in as refugee applicants. They have not had a clear directive in terms of their mandate. They are functioning, I think, in a very difficult manner, using forms that are regular immigration forms.

We heard some horror stories about people who came to apply, desperate as refugees, and who were being asked to indicate whether they had a valid job offer before their refugee status could be regularized. Surely to goodness we are not talking about a normal immigration program. The minister and his predecessor made it very clear that this is a special refugee program because of the very urgent, serious and dangerous situation for people living in the southern cone of Latin America.

Unfortunately the parliamentary secretary has been in the position again of providing information that obviously has been filed by junior officers, and which is simply not adequate nor accurate. What we are calling for here this evening is an opportunity to clarify that situation as it presently exists in Argentina. I would urge the parliamentary secretary to relay to his minister and senior officers of the department that the time has come to get some objective and accurate information.

I would hope that as a result of this particular exercise this evening of reflecting on questions which we raise about the perceptions that have been expressed by the minister in his memo to the three of us, he will in fact take the same action that was taken with respect to Chile, and an objective, high level commissioner will be appointed immediately to investigate the full facts of the situation. I have reason to believe that the information that the minister has operated with has not even canvassed the full range of the Department of External Affairs but has relied very heavily on two or three of the immigration officers who, as I have said, are in the day to day business of processing refugee applicants. They are not in a position to give an over-all or political perspective to the situation. It is vitally urgent, in view of the commitment that the minister's predecessor made earlier this year, to extend the refugee program with respect to Argentina, that we do not operate with these gross misconceptions which exist.

As I mentioned in my question to the minister yesterday, I can think of no competent observer who has visited Argentina in the last six months who has not confirmed, on the same basis that a recent article in the Saturday Review of books of October 24 suggested, that there is very great terror in Argentina, very largely in the first instance for those who have come as migrants from Chile, Uruguay, Paraguay or Bolivia, and increasingly for some residents of Argentina itself for whom we may well be seeking an oppressed minority category.

While the minister's parliamentary secretary may not be able to provide us with anything this evening than more of the same half-baked information from junior officials, I hope he will convey the thrust of our concern for accurate information and assessment of the real refugee situation in Argentina very, very soon.

Mr. Arthur Portelance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in answer to a series of questions that the hon. member has asked previously of the minister, I would add, as the Minister has already indicated that recent reports presented by our embassy in Argentina reveal that the government of that country has adopted a more tolerant and humane attitude towards foreign refugees within its boundaries. It is important to keep in mind that since the Argentine government has ratified the United Nations convention relating to the status of refugees, along with its various geographical restrictions, it only recognizes European nationals as refugees. Some 10,000 refugees, mainly from Chile and Uruguay, living in Argentina as refugees according to the UN definition, are considered by Argentina as simple illegal non-immigrants. Nevertheless, the Argentine foreign affairs under-secretary has stated that his government does not intend to deal harshly and rashly with these people, even with those whose documents are not in order after the registration program deadline.

Indeed, since this program has been terminated on November 30, 1976, there have not been any mass expulsions of Chilean refugees. The latest reports from our embassy in Buenos Aires show that the Argentine government does not intend to do anything before at least mid-February against people who forgot to register or who are recognized as ineligible for permanent residency in Argentina. Our officials in Argentina are looking closely at the refugee situation. If this situation should change and if expulsions were threatened, in agreement with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, we would consider what additional action be taken.

We do not consider that the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees has acted irresponsibly as concerns his mandate in Argentina. This mandate has been extended to people who did not always meet the definition of the convention on refugees because in Argentina, housing and survival allowances are available only to recognized refugees. Our officials work in close co-operation with the Buenos Aires office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. In fact, the representatives of this office are making a preliminary study of the immigration applications of refugees to identify those who are really interested in coming to Canada and who can meet our selection criteria. We depend mostly on the reports of our qualified and experienced officers on duty in Buenos Aires. They are well aware of the situation of refugees in Argentina and have good contacts with Argentine authorities and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. Moreover, we take into consideration the reports published by world wide organizations such as Amnesty International.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to repeat that in answer to the calls of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, and as concerns the situation of refugees in South America, Canada has accepted as permanent residents more South American refugees than any other country. As of November 30, 1976, the admission of 5,300 people was authorized under the special Chilean program.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 o'clock p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.27 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REFERENCE IN "GLOBE AND MAIL" EDITORIAL TO MR. SPEAKER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am seeking consent to rise under Standing Order 43. It is not usual for a minister to do this, but in view of the special circumstances that prevail as a result of an editorial which appeared in today's issue of the Globe and Mail, I thought it was essential that a response be made by the House—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: —to this unjustified, unwarranted and unacceptable attack upon yourself and your conduct as the presiding officer of the House. There is ample precedent to justify the statement that an attack of this kind upon your conduct and upon your person is an attack upon the House itself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: I refer particularly to the concluding sentence of the editorial which reads as follows:

Let it be said of James Jerome that he is not a Speaker but a gambler who plays incredible odds for the popularity of his party.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. MacEachen: The earlier part of the editorial deals with a labour dispute, and it is not my intention to become involved in the facts or in any aspect of that dispute, but I do take grave exception on behalf of the House to this final statement which affects the privileges of the House in a very real way.

So I would like to have the consent of the House to move the following motion:

That the statement "Let it be said of James Jerome that he is not a Speaker but a gambler who plays incredible odds for the popularity of his party" contained in the editorial in the Globe and Mail on December 22, 1976, is a gross libel on Mr. Speaker, and that the publication of the article is a gross breach of the privileges of this House.

• (1410)

Mr. MacEachen: I should have included in my comments that the motion is seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the consent asked for by the government House leader, it is granted without reservation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): With respect to the force and purport of the motion which he asks this House to accept, we accept the words, the spirit and the intent without reservation, and I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) will join in those sentiments as well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my party I join in the sentiments which have been expressed. We give consent to the presenting of this motion. We regard it as a very serious matter, and we hope the House will now adopt this motion unanimously.

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my party, I wish to join the official opposition and give our consent to the House in that connection. I think we must protect the House against such an attack since Mr. Speaker represents the House. We must unanimously protest against such action.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion presented pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: This is an extraordinary situation and one which would never call for a comment from the Chair, but I cannot help but say that I am deeply gratified by the action of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PROPOSED COMMITTEE STUDY OF MOVING DEPARTMENT TO PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the terms of Standing Order 43. In light of the fact that it has been revealed that the transfer of the Department of Veterans Affairs from Ottawa to Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island will cost an estimated $20 million and will create another level of bureaucracy in Ottawa, in light of the objections raised by the Public Service Alliance of Canada and veterans' organizations, and especially in view of the fact that budget cut-backs in military hospitals have created waiting lists of veterans seeking admission, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage (Mr. Masniuk):

That this House ask the government to refer this matter to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs to ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs to justify the expenditure of $20 million on a transfer that all involved oppose at a time of restraint and when military hospitals must restrict admittance because of budget cut-backs, and further that the committee study the objections made by the PSAC and the veterans' organizations.

Mr. Speaker: For such a motion to be presented the House must give its unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

GROUNDING OF TANKER "ARGO MERCHANT"—ACTION TO PREVENT POLLUTION OF CANADIAN WATERS—SURVEILLANCE OF WRECK

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my questions are directed to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment, and they concern the impending environmental devastation which may result from the breakup of the Argo Merchant which, as of this morning, has released over 5 million gallons of crude oil, or to put it in grim perspective, twice as much oil as the Arrow spill in Chedabucto Bay six years ago. In view of the severe consequences which this spill could have, not only on the aesthetic beauty of our coastline, but on the marine life in the prolific Georges Bank, will the minister tell this House what action he will be taking to ensure that the spill does not affect Canada or Canadian waters?

[Mr. Speaker.]

In addition, will he indicate whether his department has the wreck under direct surveillance and if so what his current estimate is of the chances that part of the oil slick will enter Canadian waters?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, this matter obviously changes almost as often as the wind changes. It is the very problem we are dealing with. The latest report I had, about three hours ago, is fairly optimistic about the chances of the oil slick not reaching Canadian shores. A meeting was going on at ten o'clock this morning in Halifax so I have not had a report on it yet. Our officials are keeping in very close touch. The fact is, we are facing very difficult weather conditions.

POSSIBILITY OF BANNING UNSAFE TANKERS FROM CANADIAN WATERS

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that tankers of dubious registry such as the Argo Merchant—which is reported to have been involved in 18 previous accidents including two groundings and is in fact banned from our ports—are little more than potential environmental catastrophes, will the minister tell the House whether he is able to acquire powers to ban these ships from operating within our 200 mile limit, powers that would be similar to those already available to the Minister of Transport, for example, under the Canada Shipping Act?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the Law of the Sea Conference, which is addressing itself to these very questions, should produce more positive results than we have had so far. I certainly join with my United States counterpart in deploring the fact that tankers that are badly equipped—I am not saying this one is because I have no way of knowing what the fundamental problem was—should be plying waters that are a potential risk to coastal states. The regulatory powers are vested in the Ministry of Transport—powers governing approach to Canadian shores.

EQUIPMENT AND ASSISTANCE AVAILABLE TO UNITED STATES TO HELP PREVENT CONTAMINATION OF COASTLINE

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In light of the fact that this event is one of the first occasions for the implementation of the joint Canada-United States marine pollution contingency plan, will the minister indicate what action Canada is taking under the plan to assist the United States in preventing the environmental contamination of her coastline? Specifically, can the minister give any indication of the personnel and equipment being made available or ready to be made available to the United States Coastguard?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, we have indicated to the United States authorities that we would make all the resources we have available to them if the slick moves to their coast. I might say the subject of the meeting in Halifax this morning was precisely on the point the hon. member has raised.

CO-OPERATION OF CANADIAN AND UNITED STATES COASTGUARD IN SURVEILLANCE OF OIL SLICK FROM GROUNDED "ARGO MERCHANT"

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the very serious environmental threat posed by this oil slick to Canadian waters and the Canadian east coast fishing industry, what steps is the Canadian Coast Guard taking to keep the oil slick under surveillance and what co-operation is the Canadian Coast Guard offering to the United States coastguard?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think my colleague effectively indicated the co-operation which always exists. In this case, we have a very good working relationship with the United States coastguard and of course we are available at any time.

POSSIBILITY OF INTERNATIONAL ACTION TO REGULATE TANKERS USING FLAGS OF CONVENIENCE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs? In view of the statement made by the chief of the Environmental Protection Agency in the United States today to the effect that stricter international regulations are required to govern this kind of tanker traffic, especially with tankers flying flags of convenience—and we had an unhappy experience of our own with the Arrow disaster with which the minister is familiar as it happened when he was minister of transport—what steps has Canada taken on the eve of our implementation of a 200 mile fisheries management zone to press for international regulations in this regard, perhaps in concert with the United States?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member will recall that Canada was in the forefront of proposals such as those outlined today. In 1959 we took the initiative at IMCO, one of the United Nations agencies, and of course many good results flowed from that. That agency is still operating and Canada is a member. We are still discussing what I agree ought to be a tougher regime in terms of international tankers. As the hon. member will also know, it is very difficult to get international agreement on this. In Canadian terms we continue to have the special fund which is assessed on all oil cargoes moving within our territorial waters. I have no doubt that we will be discussing with the United States, as well as with others, the possibility that now the 200 miles economic zone has been declared, of extending the current limit to 12 miles farther out with regard to further pollution incidents.

Mr. McGrath: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister prepared to take the initiative on Canada's part and tell his counterparts in the international community that Canada, following the implementation of the 200-mile limit, is prepared to take the initiative in boarding vessels flying flags of convenience, in order to ascertain whether they have satisfactory navigational equipment and to protect the Canadian environment?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I think that is a useful suggestion, and if there could be even a bilateral agreement with the United States on this we might well be able to move in that direction. As I recall, boarding rights extend only out to 12 miles, but as I said in my earlier response, while the economic zone established deals primarily with fisheries, I think a justifiable link between those two aspects could well be established.

REQUEST FOR NEW MEASURES TO CREATE JOBS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Considering that over the Christmas period some two million Canadians directly or indirectly will be affected by unemployment and that government job creation programs for the winter will create at most 40,000 jobs during the winter period, will the Prime Minister assure the House that appropriate ministries will be given the obligation during the one month Christmas recess to institute new job-creating initiatives for after the recess, and present them to the House?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the appropriate ministers, indeed the government itself, will be devoting a great deal of energy and thought to this very serious problem.

FINANCE

POSSIBILITY OF NEW BUDGET AIMED AT CREATING MORE JOBS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, it is encouraging to note that there will be thought, but we also would like action. May I ask the Minister of Finance if, in terms of his responsibilities, he would undertake during the next month to reconsider the government's position with respect to a budget and promise to come forwards when we resume work after the Christmas break, with a new budget of which the central economic thrust will be the task of creating more jobs in the Canadian economy?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. gentleman that we will continue the work we have had under way for the preparation of the budget which will be announced in 1977. Naturally, the impact on employment and growth in the economy as well as the impact of inflation on any possible measures will be fully considered.

Mr. Broadbent: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Are we to conclude from the answer of the minister and that of the Prime Minister that the government has no definite plans but is simply keeping this serious and damaging problem affecting Canadians under review, and are we to expect initiatives to come only from the Bank of Canada but not from other sectors which Canadians expect to show serious leadership?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will recognize that statements on major economic decisions in this parliament occur in the course of a budget statement, and therefore the budget statement we are preparing will incorporate our conclusions on this point.

TRANSPORT

ALLEGED INEQUITY OF FERRY SUBSIDIES FOR EAST AND WEST COASTS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Since the Premier of British Columbia has sent a telegram to the Prime Minister on the subject of the inequality of ferry subsidies in Canada—

Mr. Fraser: Don't laugh about this; laughing will do you no good where I come from.

Mr. Clarke: —I ask, has the Prime Minister received such a telegram from Premier Bennett and is it the government's policy to allow the inequity of $108 million for east coast ferries as contrasted with $1 million for west coast ferries to continue, or what action can the west expect?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is a long history of correspondence between myself and the present premier of British Columbia and, indeed, at least the two previous premiers. The federal point of view has been explained in those letters. There is an element to be still decided; but, so far as the inequities are concerned, I assure the hon. member that if he studies the facts, he will find that they are not inequities as he says they are.

Mr. Fraser: That is your view.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RELOCATION OF AIRBORNE REGIMENT—INVITATION TO MINISTER TO EXPLAIN TO CITIZENS OF EDMONTON

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Defence. Would the minister accept an invitation to attend a public meeting in my constituency wherein is located the Canadian airborne regiment and where, accompanied by the Chief of the Defence Forces, he would be prepared to explain the government's views about the relocation of that unit, and in effect its destruction, and be prepared to answer questions both to the military and civilian population who, without exception, find this policy unacceptable?

An hon. Member: Wear your helmet.

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the Chief of the Defence Staff is going to Edmonton in the next month to meet with the military and civilian officials there. I know he is going to meet with Mayor Cavanagh. I certainly would welcome the opportunity to speak to people in Edmonton. I hope the people in Edmonton show the same breadth of vision as they do in other places and on other issues and do not put the narrow focus on one regiment. I do not accept the premise that it means the destruction of the regiment.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Will the minister categorically answer whether he would accept an invitation to a public meeting in that constituency in order to discuss that matter?

Mr. Danson: No, Mr. Speaker, I really cannot conduct the affairs of the Department of National Defence by holding public meetings in an adversary situation. I would be pleased to meet with a delegation of people who want to come to see me or, if I am in Edmonton, I would be pleased to meet with a delegation of people there. I do not think a public forum is the place to discuss this type of matter where there is naturally, understandably and appreciatedly a sense of emotion about the loss of a very fine regiment to a very fine community. I understand that. I would like to discuss it with people dispassionately in terms of our military force structure. I am sure the people of Edmonton would understand that and I appreciate their reluctance to see the regiment go.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF MINISTER'S STATEMENT ON PIPELINE FROM KITIMAT, BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to questions asked earlier of the Minister of the Environment. Yesterday in answer to my question as to what environmental studies were available to the National Energy Board on the application of the consortium which wishes to build an oil pipeline from the Port of Kitimat on British Columbia's west coast through to the province of Alberta, the minister said that all environmental assessments they have will be at the disposal of the Board. He went on to state:

I might say I view that situation with considerable skepticism.

Will the minister explain to the House just what he meant by that?

[Translation]

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the use of a language with which one is not fully conversant can sometimes lead to confusion. It is obvious that my skepticism—it is the word I used and I do not take it back—was about the proposal concerning such a pipeline and not at all about the National Energy Board. We are co-operating as much as possible with the board, precisely to assert ours views on environment, but my scepticism is strictly about eventual damages in a very vulnerable area.

[English]

SUGGESTION THAT COPIES OF ENVIRONMENTAL STUDY BY KITIMAT PIPELINE LIMITED BE MADE AVAILABLE

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer. We on this side of the House certainly accept it. Yesterday the minister said that no full environmental study had been done. He was referring to his own department. I now want to ask the minister this: In view of the fact a study has been done with regard to the dangers or possible dangers of oil pollution of the ocean by the applicant consortium, Kitimat Pipeline Limited and that particular study does not go before either the minister's department or the National Energy Board, but before an intergovernmental committee called Termpol, and in view of the fact that Kitimat Pipeline Limited has let out four or five of these studies to libraries and one is available at their Vancouver offices but they will not publish any copies and as a consequence copies are not available to the public of British Columbia which is vitally interested in this matter, will the minister assure the House that he will take immediate steps, either directly or through his colleagues, to ensure that Kitimat Pipeline Limited make copies of this environmental study of the dangers of marine pollution available to interested citizens in the province of British Columbia?

● (1430)

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): In response to the hon. member's first point: when I said that no full environmental assessment had been made, I should have added the word "yet". Obviously, in the study of this application environmental impact information will be given to the National Energy Board. I do not know whether I have the power to compel the group to whom the hon. member refers to publish its data but I will look into that aspect.

Mr. Fraser: In view of the fact that the Secretary of State for External Affairs talked only a few minutes ago in this chamber about introducing a tougher regime with respect to oil tankers, will the minister at least discuss with his colleagues the necessity, in terms of public relations, of insisting that the consortium make available copies of these particular environmental studies on marine dangers to the public of British Columbia and to interested citizens' groups?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): If the hon. member will observe what I did in connection with the seal hunt, he will find that I am a strong believer in full public disclosure of information with respect to issues which are by their very nature controversial and in connection to which knowledge of the facts is the only way of basing sound judgment.

POSSIBILITY OF PROHIBITING TANKER TRAFFIC IN STRAIT OF JUAN DE FUCA

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question of the same minister.

I also want to come back to the question of the Argo Merchant wreckage. Does the minister intend to make representations to the American authorities with a view to controlling if not eliminating tanker traffic in the Juan de Fuca Strait?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the question is really too general for me to answer without examining its implications on the international level.

POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHING UNLOADING PORT FOR TANKERS AT GRAYS HARBOUR, WASHINGTON

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a supplementary question to the minister.

Given the answer by the Secretary of State for External Affairs that he wants to initiate talks with the American authorities, I would like to know whether the Minister of Environment would be prepared to suggest to our American friends and neighbours reconsidering the project to establish a tanker unloading port at Grays Harbour in the state of Washington?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I certainly can undertake to consider that proposal and discuss it with my colleague.

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN NUMBER OF CANADIAN CITIZENS PARTICIPATING IN LAGOS FESTIVAL

Miss Coline Campbell (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the minister in charge of cultural affairs. Is the hon. gentleman aware that of the Canadian delegation to the Lagos Festival only 31 persons out of 50 are Canadian citizens and, if so, is the hon. gentleman prepared to increase the number of Canadian citizens taking part in this event?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I presume, Mr. Speaker, that the question was addressed to me. I shall be happy to take under consideration the suggestion made by the hon. member.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

PROPOSAL TO BAN SPORTS FISHING IN ENGLISH AND WABIGOON RIVERS IN VIEW OF MERCURY CONTAMINATION—LACK OF CONSULTATION WITH NATIVES

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Since the latest health study affecting residents of Grassy Narrows and White Dog reserves shows dangerously high levels of mercury poisoning persisting in the natives of the area, will the minister, now, after years of buck-passing, demand that the government of Ontario ban sports fishing in the English-Wabigoon River system, and if Ontario fails to do so, will the federal government take unilateral action to close the river under the authority contained in the Canada Waters Act?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): My predecessor had asked the government of Ontario to ban sports fishing in those rivers and I did so as well when I met with the Ontario minister a few weeks ago. Because the Ontario government has decided to reconsider the issue—as a matter of fact a meeting took place on this subject very recently—we are awaiting the results of that meeting before proceeding further.

Mr. Symes: In view of the decision by the federal government on November 16 to abandon the idea of a national park for the area, and promises of further consultation with native leaders to seek a solution to the problem, can the minister explain why no Indian representatives from the bands were invited to recent meetings between officials of the two governments, why no officials of Indian Affairs have met with the band councils to hear their proposals for economic development on the reserves, and why not even any written communications have been sent to the chiefs informing them of developments?

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Allmand: As far as I know, that is not true. I have met with Indian leaders with regard to this problem and I understand my officials have done so as well. I do not know where the hon. member is getting his information.

[Miss Campbell (South Western Nova).]

TEXTILES—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF SURTAX ON IMPORTED POLYESTER YARNS

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It has to do with the question I put to the Acting Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce on December 20 with regard to the extension of surtax on imported polyester yarns. He promised to have an answer ready before the House recessed. In redirecting my question to the minister, I should like, first of all, to wish him a merry Christmas, and then ask him whether he will assure the same festive spirit to those engaged in the textile industry by announcing an extension of the surtax which is due to expire before the House re-opens.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of all those who have expressed congratulations to the hon. member, might I formally recognize the honour which she, as a member of a great and famous clan, has received?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): As to the question of the surtax, I can assure the hon. lady that this matter is receiving contemporary close examination by the government. I hope to be able to make an announcement within a very few days.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): I thank the minister for his comments in the preface to that reply and hope the statement, when it comes, will be a positive one.

PROPOSED SERVICE FOR SIX PRAIRIE COMMUNITIES—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Has the minister received an assessment from the Canadian Transport Commission in connection with proposals to provide air services to six prairie communities—an assessment which was due on December 10—and, if so, when will he be announcing the carrier and the inauguration of the service?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): I have not yet personally seen the proposal, but it is now completed. I shall be looking at it as soon as possible and trying to reach the necessary arrangements with the appropriate carrier. I cannot at this point predict how long that process will take.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

MANDATORY USE OF AIR BAGS IN AUTOMOBILES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport and it has to do with highway automobile deaths and injuries. Since early in 1977 we can expect a decision from the new US administration in relation to the provision of air bags as a mandatory safety feature in new motor vehicles—and it is my view that no other safety measure would do more to reduce deaths and injuries on our highways—can we expect a decision from the Canadian government in 1977 which would make the provision of air bags mandatory on Canadian motor vehicles?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member knows that while there is general agreement as to the usefulness of these devices it is not as generally agreed that the cost can properly be imposed in every case when one considers the availability of alternatives, such as the use of seatbelts. There is an arrangement in the United States whereby a significant number of automobiles will be equipped with air bag devices and this will allow us to examine their usefulness and reach a further conclusion a year from now.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED REVIEW OF UNITED STATES STUDY ON USE OF AIR BAGS IN AUTOMOBILES

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): My supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In so far as the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is mandated to protect the Canadian consumer, and many objective studies across North America have shown significantly that the air bag as a mandatory standard in motor vehicles will do more than any other standard to reduce the slaughter on our highways, would he review these studies and impress on the Minister of Transport the necessity that Canadian authorities implement this standard in future vehicles?

• (1440)

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, may I take that as a representation.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

APPOINTMENT OF MR. GRAY AS CONSULTANT—POSSIBLE VIOLATION OF GUIDELINES FOR FORMER GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Given the announcement that Mr. J. L. Gray, former president of Atomic Energy of Canada, has been appointed a consultant to Finmecanica, which is the parent company of the Italian licensee of Atomic Energy of Canada in Italy, could the Prime Minister tell us whether this is in violation of the guidelines which he laid down for former employees of the Canadian government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take that question as notice.

AIRPORTS

POSSIBILITY OF NEGOTIATIONS ON CAR RENTAL CONCESSIONS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Can the minister tell the House whether or not there has been any rearrangement of preferred airport car rental locations at airports across Canada?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have no further comment on that question today.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the fact that there is litigation or lawsuit underway at the present time, but I do not think the departmental position should be prejudiced. Are there any negotiations being conducted by the department respecting the location of car rental agencies within airports at the present time, and has any specific proposal been made to any car rental agency? I think that is simple; it has nothing to do with the lawsuit.

Mr. Lang: It is simple, Mr. Speaker, and it is that which I was really not prepared to comment upon. But I will tell the hon. member that there have been some discussions concerning the matter of an arrangement which would allow our car rental services to operate satisfactorily at airports.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the minister would be able to confirm that this new arrangement will be in place before the end of the year, or is there any time limit at all on the rearrangement of car rental locations?

Mr. Lang: I have no further comment on the discussions at this time, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SUGGESTED DELAY IN RELOCATION OF AIRBORNE REGIMENT PENDING APPOINTMENT OF NEW CHIEF OF STAFF

Mr. Steven Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. In view of the fact that the chief of staff is due to retire and that he is completely preoccupied with his retirement plans and therefore not preoccupied with the logical location of the Canadian airborne regiment, which should remain in Edmonton, would the minister give the worthy women and children of the Canadian airborne regiment a Christmas present and leave well enough alone until a new chief of staff is appointed six months' hence and a complete economic and military study is reviewed?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I really think this question is quite uncalled for, with the reference to the chief of the defence staff making decisions that are not in the best interests of the Canadian forces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danson: General Dextrase is one of the most distinguished soldiers that this country has ever produced.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danson: He is respected by the armed forces of all nations, and civilians as well. I think the hon. gentleman will be very embarrassed when he reads Hansard and realizes what he has said.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister please give me an answer?

CRIMINAL CODE

POSSIBILITY OF AMENDMENT OF ABORTION PROVISION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact that some 50,000 Canadians lost their lives in 1976 by being aborted in hospitals, institutions whose only function should be the preservation of life and the alleviation of suffering, could the Prime Minister indicate whether amendments to the Criminal Code will be introduced by the government in 1977 which would restrict this abhorrent, immoral action to those rare cases where the life of the mother is seriously threatened and give the greatest gift of all, namely life, to another 50,000 Canadians in 1977?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, some time ago the government appointed a committee to look into the equitable and proper application of the law. I understand the report of this committee, headed by Mr. Badgely, is ready for tabling very soon now, and I think it is the intention of the Minister of Justice, probably when the House reconvenes, to table the report. I think at that point the government and the opposition parties can study it and assess in a more proper way the functioning of the present law before discussing any changes.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, may I put a short supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that in his office he is the protector of every Canadian, could we have his assurance that he will do everything in his power to protect those people who can least protect themselves?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR AID TO WAR VICTIMS OF LEBANON

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Matane): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the head of the government.

Now that peace has been restored in Lebanon, considering that this country has been literally destroyed over the past two years, and considering also the size of the Canadian community of Lebanese origin, could the head of the government issue instructions so that, on humanitarian grounds, the various federal agencies and institutions may help Lebanon and participate in the reconstruction of that country, not only financially, but also through the distribution of prostheses, medicine, food and wheat? Could the government provide considerable help in addition to the $150,000 given to Red Cross international over a year ago?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the hon. member for his question. He has advised me on a number of occasions on the Lebanese problem and the steps the government should take to assist these unfortunate people. The hon. member is aware that we have already taken steps in the area of monetary and immigration assistance, and I feel that his suggestions today certainly deserve being looked into most attentively. I promise to bring them to the attention of the ministers involved and to reply to him later next year.

ENERGY

PROPOSAL TO DRILL FOR URANIUM ON LAKE WAHNAPITAE—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC HEARINGS PRIOR TO GRANTING LICENCE

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I spoke to the minister about this matter before the question period. Is the minister aware of the immediate plans of certain corporations and individuals to do extensive exploration by drilling for uranium on Lake Wahnapitae in the Sudbury district, which lake supplies the water for a great many people in the area?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. So far as I have been able to determine in the very few minutes available to me, there are no plans of which I am aware. I think an application was made at one time to the Ontario government and it was turned down. I can assure the hon. member that before any exploratory drilling is permitted by the Atomic Energy Control Board—and it would have to be permitted by the Atomic Energy Control Board—the Atomic Energy Control Board would take a very close look at it. Secondly, it would not consider any application for drilling from any company unless the prior approval of the province had been obtained.

Mr. Rodriguez: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact, as I have said, that this lake supplies the drinking water for the district, and in view of the fact that there have been difficult experiences with the Serpent River system in Algoma, would the minister assure the House that no licences will be granted to any corporation or individual to do any exploratory drilling for uranium on that lake in the Sudbury district?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I cannot give a categorical assurance other than this, that quite clearly before permissions of any kind are issued by the Atomic Energy Control Board the board would want to make a complete, thorough, comprehensive examination of the environmental effects. So that if any application were granted at any time, for drilling there or anywhere else, it would clearly have to meet the standard levels of health and safety.

Mr. Rodriguez: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that we have had these assurances in the past and there have been unfortunate experiences at Port Hope and Elliot Lake, would the minister assure the House that before any licences are granted by the Atomic Energy Control Board public hearings will be held at which hearings all environmental aspects of such drilling will be examined?

● (1450)

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I think if the hon. member were to look at provincial legislation he will find there is provision for public hearings under the Environmental Protection Act or an act of similar name. I would think that would be the appropriate area for hearings to take place, and Atomic Energy Control Board officials could be present.

Mr. Rodriguez: You want it after the fact.

Mr. Gillespie: I want to make it quite clear that I support the hon. member's interest in having full and public discussion, if in fact such application is called for.

Mr. Rodriguez: We want it before, not after.

AIRPORTS

ALLEGED REPORT ON AIR-TO-GROUND COMMUNICATIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

According to a report published in a Montreal daily newspaper last Friday, it appears that an exhaustive study conducted in 1970 by the office of management advisers, which comes under the Department of Supply and Services, concluded that the use of French in communications between pilots and controllers would make not only for more security but also greater efficiency in air traffic. I would like to ask the minister when this 200 page document was drawn to his attention and whether he had been made aware of it before ordering an inquiry into the use of bilingualism in air-ground communications?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, officials of my department of course were aware of the document long before they began their specific work in attempting to find procedures which allow for the safe use of the two languages in air traffic control in the province of Quebec. It was after the original study that our safety people began to look at the practical use of the two languages and determined that it, indeed, was an important improvement in safety when the two languages could be made available because of the demand for them, with the result there was better communication between the air traffic controller and the pilot when the pilot was able to use his first language. That, however, was always applied with great care in that we insisted upon the maintenance of the high standards of safety which we have come to know and appreciate throughout this country, and that is how we have gone ahead with the matter since.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Since the minister is aware of such a report, may I ask him why it has not been made public, and how can he explain that when he instituted the inquiry commission on bilingualism he fought for such an inquiry because no other study had been conducted before the establishment of this commission? The minister now agrees that a rather serious study had already been made.

[English]

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I am sure if the hon. member puts a question on the order paper to the appropriate minister and not to me, since I am not and never was the minister to whom that report was made, he could have some further information about it. As far as I am concerned, whatever opinions may have been held about the question, what was needed was a very careful safety examination by our aeronautical safety people to determine the progress that could be made, and that is what we have been doing toward our dedicated purpose, based upon a conclusion of what is, indeed, most practical and safe, namely, that we will introduce bilingual air traffic control throughout the province of Quebec as soon as appropriate and safe procedures have been developed and certified for that purpose.

Oral Questions

TRADE

TEXTILE IMPORT QUOTAS—REQUEST FOR RELEASE OF GARMENTS HELD IN CUSTOMS

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I should first like to commend him for the measures he adopted some time ago in limiting garment importation quotas in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alkenbrack: We still have some minor problems in this connection. There are some small shipments of rental uniforms consigned to local retailers now trapped in customs. These retailers have complained to me that they cannot get these shipments out of customs. The condition arose as a result of the short notice the minister had to give. They have asked if these shipments could be released by customs. They were imported into Canada and are being held. Some of the shipments were made on December 1, the very day that the limitation went into effect.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we have made two minor changes to this policy, first of all to allow the entry without any import permit for all clothings which were in transit the day the policy was announced on November 29, and, last Friday, we have allowed the same thing with regard to goods which were in transit between November 29 and last Friday and whose value did not exceed $10,000. I hope those two exemptions will help resolve the problem the hon. member mentioned, and I thank him for supporting the policy we have announced.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

GOVERNMENT METHOD OF INFLUENCING POLICY—STEPS TO REDUCE GOVERNMENT'S SHAREHOLDING

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. As Mr. Benson, the minister of finance when the CDC legislation was introduced in this House on February 22, 1971, stated, "the government . . . will always be in a position to exercise the degree of influence on the over-all policies of the corporation which would be appropriate to its shareholding at any particular time", will the minister indicate in practice how this influence has been exercised on the over-all policies of the CDC, and to what extent is he informed of CDC transactions or proposed transactions?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in terms of over-all policies, I would have to say that these would be policies of a general nature, such as areas into which the corporation should expand its operations or policies with regard to its capital. In respect of individual transactions, it has been my experience and that of my predecessor that the individual transactions have not been brought to the minister for scrutiny and advice.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, bearing in mind that the government still owns all outstanding common shares of CDC and has approximately 70 per cent of the voting power in the corporation, will the minister indicate what steps are being taken to lower the government's dominant shareholder position in the CDC, as it was originally represented the government would do when it first proposed this scheme?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): As the hon. member knows, Mr. Speaker, there are approximately 15,000 to 20,000 individual Canadian shareholders with interest in the Canada Development Corporation. That corporation will have to make a judgment, on which we expect to be consulted, as to the further issuance of shares in due course when market opportunity would favour that.

HEALTH

SWINE INFLUENZA VACCINATION—INVESTIGATION OF GUILLAIN-BARRE SYNDROME AND POSSIBILITY OF COMPENSATION TO VICTIMS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the two reported cases of Guillain-Barre syndrome resulting from swine 'flu vaccinations, will the minister indicate whether an investigation of these cases will be carried out by his department? Is his department passing on relevant information from the experience in the United States with this problem, and will compensation be provided for loss resulting to families which have suffered from this disease as a result of the vaccination program?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): First of all, Mr. Speaker, it would be premature to establish a casual relationship between the vaccination and this particular syndrome. I think there have been four cases defined, two of them involving persons vaccinated and two involving persons who have not been vaccinated. It is too early to reach a conclusion on this particular aspect. Certainly we are passing on to the provinces any relevant information we obtain from the Disease Centre in Atlanta, Georgia concerning their survey of the situation. As far as compensation is concerned, this is a matter of law. The House will know, however, that we have provided for a form of guarantee for the losses of manufacturers who might be prosecuted regarding incidents of the disease resulting from the vaccination program with the exception of negligence on their part. There is provision for ensuring that there will be money available if a particular manufacturer is prosecuted, but the matter of legal liability will follow the normal route of the court system in the case of an individual suing the manufacturer involved.

LACK OF A-VICTORIA MONOVALENT VACCINE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): My supplementary question deals with the fact that elderly people and those with chronic illnesses are still being given the bivalent vaccine which contains the swine flu vaccine and there is no A-Victoria monovalent vaccine available. Can the minister tell the House whether he has taken any action whatsoever to encourage or bring about the production of the A-Victoria vaccine which would enable older people to obtain flu vaccination without getting the swine flu vaccine as well?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, there is presently no A-Victoria vaccine available in the world. It would take several weeks, to say the least, to produce such a vaccine. In the meantime, we will wait for the result of the investigation in the United States to see if there is any relationship between swine flu vaccine and the ill effects which have been reported.

POSSIBILITY OF LOCATING GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENT IN CAPE BRETON

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and it is on the subject of decentralization of government services, a matter which I have been pursuing for a long period of time both with the minister and with other cabinet ministers by mail, in personal conversations and in the House. In the light of the serious unemployment situation on Cape Breton Island, which is well known to the government and the general poor economic situation, and since it is so close to the festive season, is the minister in a position today to spread some cheer to the population of Cape Breton by announcing which government service will be located on Cape Breton Island?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I wish I could play the role of Santa Claus, but I have to put on some weight before I do that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: Unfortunately, I am not in a position to announce anything today. I would like to meet the wish of some members of the House and of the municipality of Ottawa to make any further announcement all in one shot, if I may use that expression. I hope to be in a position to do that early next year and I hope there will be something for certain sections of Nova Scotia.

Mr. Muir: May I ask the hon. gentleman if he will continue to exchange notes with his colleague and my colleague from Cape Breton Island on that subject?

Mr. Chrétien: He is so close to me that we can exchange notes now many times in the day.

PUBLIC SERVICE

VETERINARIANS—DELAY OF INTERIM PAYMENTS—REQUEST THAT PAYMENTS BE MADE IN 1976

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I just want to pursue the question I asked the other day with respect to the 400 or 500 public service veterinarians. The minister had undertaken to look into the matter to see if some way could be found to have the interim payment made to them in 1976. As an alternative, he was going to discuss contingencies and remedies with the Minister of Finance. Can he tell us what the situation is with respect to that matter?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as I suggested the other day, a better solution seemed to me to be that a payment be made by the Department of Supply and Services. My colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services, being apprised of the situation moved very quickly and I understand the payment will be made before December 31, which I think is the best way to have the problem resolved.

An hon. Member: Fast government action.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am seeking guidance from the House. Because of the possibility that later in the day the House might adjourn for a fairly long time and there are half a dozen hon. members trying to ask questions, rather than conclude the question period now I would be prepared to at least permit those hon. members who have been seeking to ask questions throughout the question period to put one question, if not supplementaries, in order that they may be able to put their questions before the House adjourns.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: If that is the disposition of the House, may I conclude the question period by calling on the following hon. members to put one question each: the hon. member for Lisgar, the hon. member for Fraser Valley East, the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo, the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley and the hon. member for Victoria.

Mr. Broadbent: All Tories.

REQUEST FOR FREE MOVEMENT OF FERTILIZER AND CHEMICALS BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND CANADA

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture and ask him if he can assure the House at this time that the government will not move to restrict the flow of agricultural chemicals and fertilizers from entering Canada from the United States. If I may paraphrase my question so the minister knows exactly what I mean I should like to ask him if he will assure the House, and consequently the farmers of Canada, that there will be a free movement of fertilizer and agricultural chemicals between the two countries.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): There is free movement of fertilizers between the two countries, but certainly not free movement of agricultural chemicals between the two countries. Coming to Canada they are duty free, but a 12 per cent tariff is imposed on them going into the United States. What the hon. member is referring to is the fact that the farmers themselves can import chemicals to Canada without going through the process of purchasing the same chemicals in the United States which would possibly cost them more in Canada. So they bring them in free of duty. We have said, before we made our decision on that, that we would meet with the farm organizations concerned which have made representations to us. It depends on whether we will be able to come to full agreement, but I would say that many farmers in Canada and many farmers in the hon. member's district are asking me to put tariffs on all kinds of products coming into the country. If they want duty free chemicals coming in, they better make sure other products with which they are competing in Canada are not free of duty.

PENITENTIARIES

SECURITY ARRANGEMENTS FOR THOSE RELEASED ON TEMPORARY ABSENCE PASSES FOR CHRISTMAS

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Solicitor General or, in his absence, to the acting minister. In view of the concern that has been expressed by the residents of Fraser Valley regarding the report that over 50 inmates of Mountain Prison are being released on temporary passes over the Christmas season, among whom is a considerable number of those convicted of rape and some of murder, I wonder if the minister could give some assurance to the people of Fraser Valley as to the special precautions that are being taken to ensure maximum protection for people in that area?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the temporary absence program to which the hon. member is referring is the same type of program that was in effect last year and which had an extremely high rate of success, with almost the total number of the people released under the program returning at the end of a temporary absence. The same precautions that were in force in previous years have been taken this year.

[Mr. Murta.]

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NO FURTHER JAPANESE TERRORIST ACTIVITIES IN TORONTO

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Following the deportation of the alleged Japanese terrorist, Mr. Toshio Ohmura, and the plans by the Japanese consulate in Toronto to take all necessary protective steps within their jurisdiction based on reports of further Japanese terrorist movements in that city, can the minister assure the House that so far as the RCMP is concerned there exist no further Japanese terrorist activities in Toronto following RCMP surveillance which is continuing to take place in that city, and if the minister cannot assure the House of this, can he, together with the Secretary of State for External Affairs, take all necessary steps to have these accused terrorists deported accordingly?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): As the hon. member knows, the RCMP moved extremely quickly and efficiently in having the case of the known Japanese Red Army suspected terrorist dealt with in co-operation with the Department of Manpower and Immigration. The RCMP security services are monitoring the situation very closely, and all necessary precautions have been taken in connection with the Japanese consulate in Toronto.

INCREASED PAYROLL—GOVERNMENT VIEW OF EXAMPLE OF RESTRAINT

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance and it arises from the figures that the minister released yesterday in reply to a question on the order paper about the payroll of the Anti-Inflation Board. Has the minister reviewed the facts as revealed in his figures that while the number of employees with the board declined by 50 between July and September of this year, the AIB's payroll almost doubled in those two months, rising from $700,000 to $1,300,000, and is the minister satisfied that AIB is showing a worthwhile example of restraint to the private sector?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): I will be glad to discuss this with the chairman, with the hon. member's question being the opening subject.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

AIRBORNE WARNING AND CONTROL SYSTEM—INQUIRY AS TO CANADIAN COMMITMENT

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of National Defence about his conversation last week with the retiring U.S. Defense Secretary. I understand that the minister said that Canada is now firmly committed to participating in an AWACS—Airborne Warning and Control System—in Europe as a first priority, but I missed what he said about Canadian participation in an AWACS for North America. Would the minister tell the House if there is a commitment to both these systems, would he indicate the projected cost, and if we are not committed to the North American AWACS, which the U.S. air force is now acquiring, will the U.S. air force be permitted to operate in Canadian airspace?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I cannot give the answer to those questions because there is not a commitment to the system at this time. I believe the proper interpretation of the remarks at that time would have been that NATO ministers agreed that there was a military need for an AWACS in NATO. All ministers are speaking to their governments with reference to their participation, and we hope to meet in Brussels again in the New Year to reaffirm or explain our various government positions, but the expression at that time was not a commitment of this government to an AWACS. There was an indication that all NATO ministers thought there is a need for an AWACS in the NATO system.

REASON FOR DELAY IN DISTRIBUTION OF COINS

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Postmaster General. In view of the fact that there is a shortfall on the sale of Olympic coins, will the Postmaster General look into the distribution and delivery of Olympic coins? I have heard numerous complaints from constituents who have purchased Olympic coins, received acknowledgement and waited as long as six months for delivery. Further, I understand that many members of this House have purchased full sets of coins and have not received them to this date.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I had occasion to speak with the director of the coin program prior to his leaving, which will be on December 31, and we discussed the matter quite fully. There have been some delays, and I am very much aware of them; however, it is our intention to make good all the orders which have been made and which have been prepaid to the best of our ability. We ask people to be as patient as possible and invite them to communicate directly with me, if they wish to, so that we can bring about the accelerated delivery of the coins which are already committed.

The Late Olive Diefenbaker

BEREAVEMENT OF THE RIGHT HON. MEMBER FOR PRINCE ALBERT

DEATH OF MRS. O. F. DIEFENBAKER

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It is with a great deal of regret that I advise the House of Commons of the death early this afternoon of Mrs. Olive Freeman Diefenbaker, the wife of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). Mrs. Diefenbaker died at her home at 1.30 this afternoon after an illness of some months.

As hon. members know, she was a daughter of the manse. Her father was a Baptist parson who travelled widely in western Canada, and he served as a minister in Prince Albert, where the late Mrs. Diefenbaker met the right hon. member for Prince Albert. She was a graduate of Brandon College, had a distinguished teaching career, and provided leadership in adult education work in the province of Ontario. She was married in 1953 to the right hon. member for Prince Albert and was with her husband at his election to the leadership of this party, and subsequently at his election to the office of Prime Minister of the country.

I think it is fair to say that Mrs. Diefenbaker was known and respected throughout Canada and abroad for the manner in which she assisted her husband in carrying out his responsibility, and also for the warmth and the openness with which she performed her own responsibilities as the spouse of the Prime Minister of Canada and of the Leader of the Opposition.

Many of us in this House were privileged to know the late Mrs. Diefenbaker for many years. We knew her to be a woman who was gracious in public, and generous and thoughtful in private. She was a friend to many people in this House and to thousands of Canadians outside this House. Particularly in recent years she has been a symbol of strength, courage, courtesy and warmth to Canadians in all the provinces and territories. I am sure I speak on behalf of all my hon. colleagues in this House when I extend our deepest sympathy to the right hon. member for Prince Albert and to the family of the late Olive Diefenbaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, certainly we on this side wish to say that we regard the words spoken by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) as extremely appropriate on this occasion. Many of us knew the late Mrs. Diefenbaker and learned to know the support she was for her husband, and also to know of the many fine personal qualities she possessed in her own right.

All of us will want to convey directly to the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) our condolences on what for him will be a very great loss.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join with the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the government House leader on behalf of the members of my party in extending to the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) our deepest sympathy at this time.

As has been indicated already by the Leader of the Opposition, Olive Diefenbaker was known by Canadians throughout the country as a warm and thoughtful woman, a fine person, and a gracious human being. She is going to be missed by all those who knew her and, in particular, deeply missed by the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert.

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I associate with my colleagues to extend to the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and his family our most sincere condolences in those circumstances.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the following communication has been received:

Government House
Ottawa

December 22, 1976

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Honourable Bora Laskin, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 22nd day of December at 5.45 p.m. for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to a Bill.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière, Administrative Secretary to the Governor General.

Mr. Speaker: I would like to take this occasion to extend to all hon. members and others—although I must confess there is some temptation to make certain specific exclusions in respect to the generosity of the invitation—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Broadbent.]

Mr. Speaker: However, in line with notice given if the House should proceed to the consideration of a motion, and if the House should decide in its wisdom that following upon Royal Assent or some hour later today that the House should adjourn for a period of time, as has been the delightful and customary practice in the past it would be my great honour to receive all hon. members and some of their guests later on this afternoon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FISHERIES

TABLING OF CHARTS DELINEATING 200 MILE FISHING ZONE ON EAST AND WEST COASTS

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table in both official languages the Canadian Hydrographic Surveys charts illustrating the geographic coordinates of the new 200 mile fishing zone to take effect on the east and west coasts on January 1, 1977.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Statements by ministers. The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) on a point of order.

Mr. McGrath: This is a point of order, Mr. Speaker, which I think it might be appropriate to raise at this time. If Your Honour will hear me I shall endeavour to be brief.

We are about to hear a statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson), and I congratulate and applaud him for making the statement in the House. My purpose in raising my point of order is that yesterday, even though the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) was present in the House for the question period, no sooner was the question period concluded than the minister proceeded outside the House to hold a press conference where he made a very important statement regarding the management of our fishery resources in connection with the implementation of the 200 mile economic zone which is to come into effect on January 1 next.

I appreciate your rulings on this, Mr. Speaker; however, I am concerned that your ruling of December 2, and others that you have made, as well as the precedent set by your distinguished predecessor, Speaker Lamoureux, may be tantamount to a licence for ministers to make policy statements outside the House on topical questions that are before the House, thereby depriving members of the opportunity to reply, in the first instance; second, and equally important, it deprives members of an opportunity to question ministers on their statements.

I raise this point of order in sorrow because of the respect I have for the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. His contemptuous action yesterday was out of character. I regret very much that the minister chose to make the statement outside the House, and I can only commend to him the excellent example being set today by his colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief. I am surprised at the hon. member's indignation, when he did not even bother to ask one question on what he called this extremely important announcement of yesterday. It is quite obvious that the hon. member does not listen to his colleague, the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse), who sits behind him. For weeks now the hon. member for South Shore has been asking questions and I have simply had to say that consultations were going on in regard to this matter, so obviously this was not privileged information of any kind. The document was available to everybody we have been consulting with for the last three months.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Statements by ministers.

ENERGY

CHANGE IN NUCLEAR EXPORT POLICY

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce a change in Canada's nuclear export policy, a matter of central concern to the people and Government of Canada, raising as it does fundamental issues affecting world economic growth and world peace.

In this Christmas season our thoughts naturally turn to peace and the brotherhood of man. It is easy to pay tribute to these fundamental goals with words. It is more important that we do so with our actions. It is a challenge to the Government of Canada to respond to the demand of Canadian public opinion that this country exercise its influence toward the betterment of the global society in which we and our descendants must live. In the area of nuclear policy there is no simple answer or it would have long since been adopted. It is rather the need to balance energy requirements, the advance of technology which regardless of what we do will make nuclear capability within the reach of a wider and wider group of countries, and the need to establish a sound international framework which will curb the spread of nuclear weapons and yet take into account the legitimate economic aspirations of sovereign states. I wish to make quite clear, however, that the first priority, indeed the overriding priority, is to prevent the spread of instruments of destruction.

In this context I am pleased to announce that the Canadian government has decided upon a further strengthening of the safeguards requirements which apply to the export of Canadian reactors and uranium. Shipments to non-nuclear weapon states under future contracts will be restricted to those which ratify the Non-Proliferation Treaty or otherwise accept international safeguards on their entire nuclear program. It follows from this policy that Canada will terminate nuclear shipments to any non-nuclear weapon state which explodes a nuclear device.

This requirement is in addition to those outlined in December, 1974. The purpose of the Canadian safeguards policy is simple and straightforward. We wish to avoid contributing to the proliferation of nuclear weapons while at the same time satisfying the legitimate requirements for uranium and technology of countries which demonstrate the intention of restricting Canadian assistance only to peaceful non-explosive uses. Nuclear export policy already requires binding assurances that what Canada provides will not be used for explosive purposes. Existing policy, however, does not cover what a country receives from other suppliers or what it might do on its own. The new policy will close this gap. We will have, therefore, assurance by treaty that Canada's nuclear customers will have been selected from those countries which have made a clear and unequivocal commitment to the non-proliferation of nuclear weapons.

The development of the CANDU reactor has been one of Canada's great technological achievements. This technology is needed to reduce the world's dependence on oil. Moreover, our industrialized trading partners look to Canada as a source of uranium to fuel the nuclear reactor programs which they, like ourselves, have undertaken to meet a growing share of energy needs. In the absence of alternative technologies, developing countries will also look to nuclear power once they have exploited other conventional energy resources and have built up the national power grids necessary for large present reactors. While research into conservation and renewable energy technologies should be intensified, energy planning in Canada and elsewhere must look to energy resources presently available.

While the Canadian government recognizes the legitimate energy requirements of its trading partners, it is determined to do everything within its power to avoid contributing to nuclear weapons proliferation. It is for this reason that the Government of Canada has unilaterally decided to strengthen further Canada's safeguards requirements. As in the past we are prepared to accept the commercial consequences of being clearly ahead of other suppliers. This is the price we are prepared to pay to curb the threat to mankind of nuclear proliferation.

We recognize that for this policy to be fully effective we must persuade other nuclear suppliers to adopt similar export policies. In discussions amongst suppliers we have urged that a collective decision be taken to restrict their nuclear exports to non-nuclear weapon states to those which have ratified the Non-Proliferation Treaty or otherwise accept full scope safeguards. We regret that to date it has not been possible to reach a collective decision to this effect. Canada, however, is determined to assume responsibility where it has the power to act, that is, with regard to Canada's own exports of nuclear equipment, technology and uranium. We are charting a course which we hope will serve as a compelling example for other nuclear suppliers.

With this announcement I am calling on other nuclear exporters to review their own export policies, not in the light of commercial gain but in the interests of maintaining a safe and secure world.

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, we thank the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) for making his statement in the House. Occasionally one becomes discouraged while sitting in opposition for it seems almost impossible, even with the best will in the world and what appears to be an almost irrefutable case, to convince the government to change its mind about significant issues. Today we rejoice, because after almost three years, following the leadership of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) and other members of this House who advocated a change in the government's safeguards policy with respect to the export of nuclear reactors and nuclear devices, the government has taken its first tenuous step to assure that Canada will not contribute further to the proliferation of nuclear capabilities around the world. We applaud this first timorous move in what seems to be the only possible and rational direction.

We have always opposed the government's attitude toward the export of nuclear reactors. Its defence of its past policies has always seemed to us as specious. The argument that our own safeguards are adequate was proven false by the explosion of a nuclear bomb in India, an explosion made possible by the reprocessed fuel taken from a CANDU reactor. That explosion started off a race for nuclear energy in the Far East.

The argument that we must supply our technology to less developed countries is ludicrous in the face of our sales to South Korea and Argentina and discussions with energy rich countries such as Iran. What a strange way to be extending assistance when the AECL hires agents whom they do not even know in order to get contracts. What sort of argument is it that says we are coming to the aid of these countries when we engage in fierce competition in bidding for contracts and lose millions of dollars of the Canadian taxpayers' money in the process? What kind of argument is it that says that we must keep our nuclear industry employed when all the output of that segment of the Canadian economy could be fully employed domestically? Indeed, projections of current heavy water production suggest that we may be short of this integral part of our nuclear program in the early 1980's. There will be a shortage for our own domestic needs.

As the minister knows, the deadline the government set for the renegotiation of uranium exports will run out on December 31 this year. I presume that under this policy shipments will be suspended until new safeguards are put in place. Indeed this will be the test of the will of the government in enforcing these provisions.

Now the government has set forth a policy which will prohibit shipment to non-nuclear weapon states which have not ratified the non-proliferation treaty or otherwise accepted international safeguards with regard to their entire nuclear progam. Surely this should always have been the policy of any responsible government, and we regret that it has only now become the policy of Canada. We hope this is only the first step in the development of new policies with respect to nuclear shipments.

We have argued that the only effective world-wide control is control concerning the reprocessing of spend fuel rods. We hope that Canada will pursue with other countries the development of such a system of control. The non-proliferation treaty must be strengthened and we hope that Canada will show leadership in this regard.

We think that Canada must do more than talk about its moral responsibilities in the world. It must act in a moral way. Our credibility has been shaken in the past four months by revelations of some of our activities abroad. We only hope that the tentative step the government has taken today will reassert our moral leadership in the world.

Finally, we still insist that before contracts are signed for the export of nuclear reactors, uranium or related materials, these contracts should be discussed and ratified by parliament. Surely only parliament in its totality should take the responsibility for exporting these important devices. If the government had brought the Argentinian and South Korean contracts to parliament first, before entering into them, a great many of our present difficulties relating to those contracts could have been avoided.

At this time of good will when all men must pray for peace in what is truly an unstable world, we are pleased that the government is beginning to recognize tentatively its moral responsibilities, not only to Canadians, but to all citizens of this small planet, its responsibilities relating to nuclear expansion.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) for sending me a copy of his statement. It is admirable in its rhetoric; unfortunately its substance is somewhat dubious. I understand that the key to the statement concerns shipments to non-nuclear states. In future contracts will be restricted to those which ratify the non-proliferation treaty or otherwise accept international safeguards. In our view the important question is, how enforceable are these safeguards? I presume the international safeguards referred to in the statement are those administered by the IAE in Vienna, an organization which has inadequate staff to do the required policing and inspection.

We think that we should consider the question of alternatives. First, we believe that we should not enter into an agreement with a country which will not sign the non-proliferation agreement. Surely that is an important statement of intent. Such countries should also accept full inspection, not only by the IAE, but by Canada, and should accept Canadian control of radiation waste. These should not be alternatives. If we do not have that minimum assurance, we have no assurance. We would depend, as the previous minister said, on the good will and good intent of the people signing such agreements. In the world of today that is definitely not enough. There are many unstable countries in the world today; with unerring skill the government has picked the most unstable to which to ship nuclear reactors. I am referring to South Korea and the Argentine.

The British not long ago appointed a royal commission to look into the entire question of the development of nuclear energy. It reported recently, and pointed out that a major danger in the proliferation of nuclear reactors is the danger that terrorists, or those who exercise illegal powers within states, will obtain control of some waste materials and transform them into plutonium and nuclear weapons. They think that is one of the major dangers. And what have we done? We are to supply a reactor to the Argentine, a country in which, admittedly, extra-legal bodies wander around enforcing the law. In that country the machinery of law enforcement is out of control.

I will not pause to suggest that apparently we are working hard to secure contracts which will provide us with a deficit. I do not know if it has been proved that moneys paid to agents were used for bribery; but if that is true it is most strange. We are one of the few countries in the world which has ever paid money to secure unprofitable contracts. The same remarks apply to Korea. Anyone who has studied the situation in South Korea as well as North Korea will know that the authorities there have, without concealment, indicated their willingness to use force to suppress the freedom of their own people.

The international strategic studies dealt with this whole question. They said that in their view the attempt to control the spread of nuclear proliferation was a promising attempt, but not a radical barrier. I want to say that I think we have here a credible intent but not a radical barrier.

I understand we are dealing now with Japan, Switzerland, and the EEC countries through Euratom. I would like the minister to tell us, if he can, just what is the situation with regard to our nuclear dealings with those countries. Have they ratified, or do they propose to ratify before the deadline which expires on December 31 agreements on that subject?

I conclude by saying that this is indeed a step forward. In so far as it is a step forward, I congratulate the minister and the government. Using the very language that is used here about the overriding priority, the importance of actions rather than words, and the fact that this issue we are discussing affects world economic growth and world peace, I say to the minister that this is only a step. I think it was the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) who said it was a faltering step.

We are engaged in a long process. Let us not fool ourselves by thinking that what we have done here is indeed the answer to the problem.

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the statement of the Minister of External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) which I support without reservation.

I noticed, among other things, the passage in which it is said that Canada unilaterally decided to reinforce its safeguards requirements. On this matter, I support the minister's statement personally and on behalf of my colleagues.

[English]

Mr. Lawrence: If you will allow me, Mr. Speaker, I will put two or three short questions about merely one sentence in the whole statement by the minister. It is the only sentence that really means anything. It states: "Shipments to non-nuclear weapon states under future contracts will be restricted to those which ratify the non-proliferation treaty or otherwise accept international safeguards on their entire nuclear program." My three or four questions relate only to that one sentence.

First, where does this leave the Pakistani situation, the supply for the CANDU reactor outside of Karachi? My understanding is that Pakistan has not signed the non-proliferation treaty. If we can believe the president of Pakistan in his public statements, reported by reliable news services and wire services of the world, he has no intention either of accepting anything covered by such an ambiguous statement or accepting international safeguards on their entire nuclear program. Where does this leave the Pakistani supply?

Second, why does this have to relate to future shipments only? Everything else around here seems to be done in a retroactive way. Why are these restrictions not being applied to Argentina and South Korea, for example?

My final question is, what does the government mean by international safeguards? Is it talking about those rather vacuous and meaningless regulations coming out of the Vienna based organization, or the rules which we have not yet been privileged to see of the so-called Nuclear Supplier Club of nations which apparently may have some real meat in them, in view of the recent very welcome decision of one of the two bad apples in the nuclear barrel, mainly the decision of the French government to prohibit any future supplies to any nation building a reprocessing plant? My three or four questions to the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has already put three or four questions.

Mr. Lawrence: The minister was having difficulty in finding a pen that works, like everything else around here that does not work. If he has those four questions, may I have an answer?

Mr. Jamieson: I think I can answer, Mr. Speaker. As I recall, the first had to do with Pakistan, the question of why not retroactivity and what is meant by international safeguards. As I answered in the House yesterday, it is clear that the requirements of this new policy certainly do and will apply to the Pakistani situation.

During recent days and weeks I have instructed our officials in Pakistan to enter into what I believe I described yesterday as last stage or last minute negotiations. I can report to the House today that no satisfactory commitment has been achieved in terms of a Pakistani undertaking. Therefore for all practical purposes the nuclear co-operation between Canada and Pakistan is effectively at an end.

We have already indicated, and will continue to do so, that if Pakistan wishes to adhere to both the provisions which were submitted to it previously, and also those which were stated today, we will be glad to resume negotiations and co-operation, but as of the moment the situation is that no further supplies will be made available. In addition, no further assistance from Canada will be provided in terms of dealing with the existing plant in Pakistan.

With regard to retroactivity, the question becomes one of legality in terms of the contracts which are already in place and the like. It was not deemed by the Government of Canada to be in the best interests of the country to abrogate or in any way change contracts which in some instances had been entered into a long time ago with, of course, the exception of the Pakistan one which I referred to, and the Indian one with which hon. members are familiar.

It was generally felt, and I think with some reason, that in terms of our trading reputation, not only in nuclear equipment and the like but also in other matters, that retroactivity would not have been the appropriate course to take. My colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie), reminds me of the upgrading of the contracts which we have already achieved in some of the cases referred to by hon. members.

The international safeguards would be the ones to which the international community now subscribes. I do not quarrel if it was the intent of the hon. member's statement that these are to some degree unsatisfactory or somewhat inadequate. However, as a member of the international community, there is very little that Canada itself can do beyond participating in whatever level of agreement has been reached at any moment in time. We are, of course, most active members of the suppliers' club, the group that was referred to and which is meeting regularly in London. As I indicated in my statement, we are very much in the forefront of urging that the international safeguards be improved and also that these other countries take the steps which Canada has taken.

The hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) may very well be right if he is describing it in a world context when he says this is a rather timid step. However, I remind him, and I think he will agree, it also puts Canada many steps in front of every other supplier in the world in terms of the kinds of conditions it places on international sales. I hope I have done some justice to the hon. member's questions.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a couple of questions, particularly in light of the numerous statements we have heard in this House from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and other members of the government concerning the strength, vigour, and rigour of the safeguards we impose. Now we find they were not as rigorous as was imagined and that something more has to be done. Would the minister be prepared to let us have a list of the present potential CANDU customers, with a comparable list showing those which have signed, or not signed, the safeguards convention? I have a couple of other questions I should like to ask.

Mr. Jamieson: I guess it is only natural to proceed in this way but I would hope we could carry on this question and answer period without being unduly argumentative, in the sense that we are all anxious to reach the same objectives. The hon. member talked about the previous regime of 1974. Those of us who spoke about it indicated that it, too, was ahead of the international community in the application of safeguards. We have now gone beyond that. As I said in my statement, we are now closing what was clearly one of the gaps in that program. This was an endeavour to supply some leadership to the international community, members of the suppliers club with whom we are dealing.

The second question had to do with the uranium safeguards. This matter was also raised by the spokesman for the New Democratic Party. We have until the end of the year, as was stated, to conclude an arrangement with Euratom, which is the nuclear agency for the Economic Community, and with Japan and Switzerland. Within Euratom it is possible that bilateral arrangements may take the place of Euratom-Canada arrangements because, to the best of my recollection, there are three countries with which we are dealing. In any event, as things stand at the moment we are still negotiating with Euratom, and considerable progress is being made. We shall not know for another few days whether or not they will be successfully concluded before the end of the year. The same situation exists with regard to Japan. Switzerland, we have been advised, is very close to signing the NPT and thereby qualifying to receive continuous supplies.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): The minister did not mention either Korea or Argentina and the possibility of these more rigorous safeguards affecting sales, or otherwise, in these particular instances. He did not tell us whether the suggestion that one of these countries might be attempting to acquire an enrichment plant is a factor which might prevent our selling a CANDU reactor in such circumstances.

Mr. Jamieson: Is the hon. member referring to an enrichment plant or to a reprocessing plant? Or does he anticipate that a country would only get an enrichment plant if it had the intention of getting a reprocessing plant? I take it he is referring to a reprocessing plant for all practical purposes. It is hypothetical, of course, unless we knew the country concerned, but as I indicated in answer to the question with regard to Pakistan, we have made it perfectly obvious that under no circumstances will we continue co-operation with Pakistan if that country acquires a reprocessing plant as presently suggested. In a couple of other cases, Korea being one, and Argentina, as I recall, being the other, we did succeed in getting a commitment not to acquire reprocessing plants before the agreements were signed. Again, I am not quite clear whether the hon. member was talking about future sales or not. If he was talking about future sales, then in the case of both Argentina and Korea any future sales in either of those countries would be in accordance with the policy I announced today.

Mr. Speaker: I propose to conclude the questioning by recognizing the hon. member for Greenwood, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, the hon. member for Don Valley, and the hon. member for Wellington.

Mr. Brewin: In replying to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) I understand the minister implied that it was intended to proceed with the terms of the agreement to supply a reactor to Argentina. I believe he said the reason for this was that we had signed a contract and it was advisable to live up to our contracts. I want to put this to him, though. I know the question of whether some inducement was paid to members of the former government of Argentina is an open one, still under investigation. But if it were found that some moneys were paid to people representing that government, would the hon. gentleman undertake to obtain advice from the proper source as to the legality of the contract and whether this would not give us an opening to say that the contract was an unprofitable one and that we did not wish to proceed with it?

Mr. Jamieson: I am sure the hon. member realizes that the question he has just asked is hypothetical, and one on which I am reluctant to make any judgment or observation at the present time. My reference to contracts was in general terms and had to do with those which are valid, legal and, in every sense of the word, binding upon the government. In terms of the hon. member's question, I do not know whether any particular contract in Argentina or elsewhere falls into that category. That is not my ministerial responsibility. I was saying that in cases where we have made commitments we would, of course, honour those commitments.

While I am on my feet may I refer to the last answer I gave? I said I thought we had some success in getting a reprocessing plant decision reversed in Argentina. I am speaking from memory, and I am by no means sure whether that is correct or not. I am sure it is correct in the case of Korea and, of course, in the case we are talking about, Pakistan.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): My question relates to the approved licensing agreement between AECL and P.M. Nucliari which gives the latter company the right to design, make and sell CANDU reactors in Italy and, in five years' time, to sell CANDU reactors to other countries. As is usual, we have not seen the terms of this agreement but I should like to ask the minister whether, under those terms, Canada has any veto power over sales by the Italian company to other countries which may not have ratified the NPT.

Mr. Jamieson: The hon. lady will, I am sure, appreciate my position. I am not talking in legal language, but my understanding is, and I am quite certain I am correct, that our arrangement with Italy in the case she has mentioned is that all the Canadian requirements with regard to safeguards and the like are accepted in the technical agreement and must be adhered to by the Italian exporter in time on the sales it makes. In other words, it would be the same as if Canada were applying its own safeguards.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): I should like to direct the minister's attention to the post five-year period in which Italy would have the exclusive right to sell abroad. I should like to know what sanctions Canada will be able to apply if P. M. Nucliari went ahead and sold to countries which were not approved. What kind of control would Canada be able to exercise over such sales once the technology was in the hands of another country?

Mr. Jamieson: Let me repeat what I said a few moments ago. For the length of the arrangement, looking five years down the road, the Canadian safeguard requirements would be a total obligation on the Italian exporter using the Canadian technology. In other words, technology is covered by the statement I made today. As to the second point with regard to the reinforcement question, again I would have to look at the legal language but the safeguard agreement to which I referred a few moments ago would either be with Euratom or with Italy bilaterally, so it would be between the governments of Italy and of Canada, and presumably we can assume that the Italian government is going to live up to its word.

Mr. Gillies: It is my understanding that if the Government of Canada is not able to gain acceptance of these new safeguards between now and the end of the month, with the Euratom countries or any countries to which it is selling uranium, no sales will be made to those countries. Are these new safeguards to apply in the renegotiation of agreements for supplies of uranium to any country which does not live up to those safeguards?

Mr. Jamieson: I understand the hon. member's question, but with respect I should point out that there is a difference in that the countries that I referred to in terms of uranium sales are already, with the exception of France, NPT signatories, and therefore in that sense they meet the requirements of the policy.

Over and above that, however, we have safeguards agreements, bilateral ones, relating to the sale of Canadian uranium, and it is that issue which is in question in terms of the countries I mentioned—Euratom, Switzerland and Japan. It would not be a matter of adhering to this policy; it would be in some respects something beyond this particular policy because it would be a specific bilateral arrangement between us.

I might point out that while progress has been made, the problem with the Euratom situation in particular is that there are some nine governments involved, and it has not been easy to get all of them together and to meet precisely the same commitments. That is why I mentioned, as an alternative, the possibility of bilaterals. If at the end of the year there is no agreement in place for a continuation, we would have to decide whether progress was sufficient to allow us to continue shipments on an interim basis or if we would simply disrupt shipments as of December 31.

Mr. Gillies: Just to make it absolutely clear in my mind, do I understand from the minister's answer which he has just given that the safeguards announced today will not cover the export of uranium which has been renegotiated?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, it will.

Mr. Gillies: Then that is where I am in difficulty with the minister's answer. In the case of France and other Euratom countries to which we export uranium, but particularly France, the policy of the government is to negotiate a bilateral agreement rather than have this safeguard apply to the particular contracts which are coming up for renegotiation. Am I correct in that?

Mr. Jamieson: I can genuinely appreciate the hon. member's problem because I had it myself for quite a while before I finally began to understand it. I should make the side comment with regard to France, which is not covered by the policy because it is a nuclear weapons state. In the other cases, Canada has had for many years a uranium export policy. There are safeguards under the uranium export policy which are somewhat different from the over-all policy that I have enunciated today regarding the sale of CANDU's, technology and all the other things, but also including uranium. Therefore a uranium customer would have to meet the requirements of the general policy, and in addition to that would also have to meet the requirements of the bilateral safeguards which Canada has had for many years and which have been changed quite frequently with regard to the sale of uranium to individual customers.

I should point out that in the case both of the European customers and Japan they are already signatories to the NPT. That is what makes the decision whether we continue to ship or not one which can only be decided at the last moment when we hear how far the negotiations have gone. If it appears that we are in sight of signing, that would make for quite a different situation than if there were a total refusal to accept our bilateral safeguards. I hope I have made the situation somewhat clearer for the hon. member.

Mr. Maine: Mr. Speaker, my question stems from the comments of the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) and his reply to the statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson). I am afraid he inadvertently misled the House when he said that India exploded a nuclear device from material obtained from a CANDU reactor. That is not true, Mr. Speaker. A CANDU reactor produces electricity; it is a research reactor that produced the plutonium which India used to make a nuclear device.

My question relates to research reactors and the reactors used for making nuclear devices. It is Canada's policy now to stop the export of research reactors, as it did after helping India establish the technology needed to explode a device? If it is not Canada's policy now to export technology enabling countries to construct research reactors, do these safeguards that have now been announced take this fact into account and safeguard Canada from any further misuse of technology derived from Canada?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I learned long ago not to argue with a scientist. I think I will take that question as notice, except to say that I recall having discussed very small reactors for medical purposes, or some kind of nuclear device for medical research purposes. I would have to get behind the curtains with the hon. member to understand fully the import of his question. There is only one policy and that is the one we announced today. I believe that the only possible exceptions to it might be, as I said, very small units designed for medical research, but I am subject to correction on that highly technical point.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There is no hope of concluding the questioning with one question on either one side or the other. I did indicate earlier that I would conclude with the question of the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Maine). I now see several other hon. members who are interested. If the Standing Order asks me to make a judgment during the course of the questioning as to how long the questioning should go, I always try to base that judgment on the number of members seeking the floor at that time. Having made that assessment, sometimes other hon. members seek the floor and this puts the Chair in a difficult position. I feel that under the circumstances I have given fair spread and variety to the questioning and that we should conclude it at this point.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a question of privilege. I may have misspoken when I said "CANDU". I do know that it was a research reactor, and I stand corrected. However, I am sure that the hon. member knows that it was a research reactor which did come from Canada, which did produce plutonium, and which did eventually lead to the bomb.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I understand that the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) has a motion standing in his name.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No.

Mr. Speaker: The only reason I am asking is that there are questions on the order paper. I wonder whether hon. members might want to give their consent to my now calling questions on the order paper before calling motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

RCMP INVESTIGATION—MAILING LISTS

Question No. 43—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What is the name and address of the person, persons, or company to which Post Office Box 220, Ville Mont-Royal, Quebec is rented?

2. Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Post Office Department and the Department of the Solicitor General as follows: 1. It is post office policy to regard the information requested as confidential and not to disclose it without the customer's permission.

2. Yes. (a) Periodica International Subscription Agency purchases mailing lists from various firms (Canada and the United States) and sends them to the editors of three Soviet magazines. Subscription order forms are subsequently sent out from Moscow. (b) No.

CANE SUGAR COMPLEX UNDER EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

Question No. 501—Mr. Herbert:

What are the terms and conditions under which the Export Development Corporation financed an industrial cane sugar complex for the Republic of the Ivory Coast?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Export Development Corporation states: on August 11, 1976, EDC and four Canadian banks made an agreement to lend $50 million to the Société pour le développement des plantations de canne à sucre, l'industrialisation et la commercialisation du sucre, to finance a sale by Redpath Industries Limited and Redpath Sugars Limited, Montreal, of goods and services for the development of a sugar cane estate and the construction of a raw sugar factory. Repayment is to be by 20 semi-annual instalments beginning six months after completion. EDC also provided a guarantee for loans by banks up to $5 million.

GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT

Question No. 911—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. For each of the past three years, what were the estimated yearly GNP figures given at the end of each quarter?

3. For the same years, what were the sources of discrepancies which resulted in subsequent revisions of the GNP figures and what was the dollar amount each was in error?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): See the following tables. 1 and 2. The following table indicates the GNP figures (seasonally adjusted at annual rates) for each quarter from 1973 to 1975. In every quarter, the latest estimate is higher than the first estimate.

CHRISTMAS ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Joseph-Phillippe Guay (Minister without Portfolio): moved:

That, when the House adjourns on December 22, 1976, it shall stand adjourned until January 24, 1977, provided that at any time prior to that date if it appears to the satisfaction of Mr. Speaker, after consultation with the Government, that the public interest requires that the House should meet at an earlier time during the adjournment, Mr. Speaker may give notice that he is so satisfied, and thereupon the House shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time;

And that, in the event of Mr. Speaker's being unable to act owing to illness or other cause, the Deputy Speaker or the Deputy Chairman of Committees shall act in his stead for the purpose of reconvening the House.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if I might rise on a point of order, I do so for two reasons. First, I want later to seek consent to move a motion giving a reference to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence. I want hon. members to tuck that into the backs of their minds so that we can do it following the motion that stands in the name of the Minister of State.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Minister without Portfolio.

Mr. MacEachen: Minister without Portfolio. I was following the Speaker's latest pronouncement.

• (1610)

We have had some unexpected developments since the House opened this afternoon which have changed the character of the discussion and the length of our proceedings to the point where it may not be possible to do justice to the motion standing in the name of the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Guay), or do justice to at least the commencement of the debate on the introduction of television and broadcasting into the House of Commons.

Following consultations it is agreeable to me, upon passing this adjournment motion without debate, if we then recessed until the call of the Chair for Royal Assent. We would not proceed with the debate on the introduction of television or on the adjournment motion, because in the circumstances one or the other would be bound to suffer, so we want to let them suffer equally.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have tucked in the back of my mind the question of the order of reference referred to by my colleague, the government House leader, and the other matter raised by him. I should like to say that we are prepared to concur.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Spirit, in the same vein—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, first may I say that we too will agree to the motion which has been suggested regarding the giving of a term of reference to one of the standing committees. As for the immediate suggestion by the President of the Privy Council, I join with the House leader for the official opposition in saying it makes good sense. Things have happened today that we did not anticipate. There is not enough time left to do justice either to the adjournment motion, when we could point out all the sins of the government and so on, or to the motion to bring television into the House. I think it makes good sense for us to rise at this point and come back when you learn, Mr. Speaker, that the time has come for us to go to the other place for Royal Assent.

While I am on my feet, if this all goes through and we come back at a quarter to six for a trip to the other place for Royal Assent, there may not be any opportunity for anyone to say anything. Therefore may I have the honour and the privilege to be the first one to say it, Merry Christmas, Mr. Speaker, and Merry Christmas to all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I think my colleagues would not object to my adding that we agree to the suggestion that we adjourn immediately.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: May I simply say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, before seeing the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) again that I remain Mr. Speaker while I am in this Chamber. I only become "Mr. Spirit" when we move across the hall to Room 16.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, again on a point of order, could I get consent to put the motion giving a reference to the standing committee on External Affairs and National Defence?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There may appear to be two or three questions before the House at the same time. In fact I think there are not. The question that has been put by the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Guay) is before the House, and in its terms it says "when the House adjourns on this day". We are still under motions at the present time. Therefore, to be orderly, I would ask the House to address itself to that motion. That leaves it open for us, having completed all our other business, to call the other motion, after which we might adjourn, for the adjournment motion by its very terms would prevail. The House has heard the terms of the motion relating to the adjournment of the House in the name of the hon. Minister without Portfolio, seconded by Mr. Buchanan. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AID

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT—REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE ON EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL DEFENCE

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence be empowered to examine and report upon the full range of policies of Canada in the field of international development with particular reference to economic relations between developed and developing countries.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion. Does it in fact give its consent to the introduction of the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Royal Assent

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Orders of the day. If there is no further business, it being an appropriate time to adjourn the House, the House stands adjourned until the call of the Chair later on this day.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Should it not be recessed, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: The House stands in some sort of abeyance until the call of the Chair at a time close to 5.45 p.m. In relation to my earlier announcement, in case there is any doubt in anybody's mind, I extend an invitation forthwith to a reception in Room 16.

At 4.20 p.m. the sitting was suspended.

The House resumed at 6 p.m.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

At 6:04 p.m. the House adjourned until 2 p.m., January 24, 1977, pursuant to special order made this day.

PROPOSED REFERENCE OF VETERANS CANADA REPORT 1975-76 TO COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I wish to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The hardships caused to widows of deceased war veterans whose disability pensions were below 48 per cent and the fact that present legislation denies them a widow's pension require the immediate attention of the government. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander):

That in order to deal with the matter the Veterans Canada Report for 1975-76 be immediately referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 regarding a pressing and urgent matter, namely, that serious allegations have been made regarding a deliberate cover up by the Department of National Health and Welfare of the problems of arsenic poisoning around Yellowknife. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House immediately refer the problem of arsenic poisoning and its effects on the health and safety of the residents of Yellowknife to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

SUGGESTED REDUCTION OF TEXTILE AND CLOTHING IMPORTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Since the textile industry is constantly deteriorating, which results in the dismissal of a considerable number of workers, and since this worsening problem particularly affects Quebec and Ontario, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard):

That the House allow the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs to consider immediately the possibility of reducing textile and clothing import quotas as well as the effects which that measure could have on our grain exports.

Mr. Speaker: Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; therefore the motion cannot be put.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROPOSED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF EFFECT OF REMOVAL FROM SERVICE OF SHIPS OPERATING BETWEEN NORTH SYDNEY AND NEWFOUNDLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of extreme and urgent necessity relating to the drastic reduction in the employment of stevedores and others by Canadian National at North Sydney as a result of the removal by Canadian National of ships from service between the port of North Sydney and Newfoundland. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

Penitentiaries

That the government undertake an immediate inquiry into the employment cutbacks that would take into consideration the numerous representations I have made inside and outside this House as well as the representations that have been made to the Minister of Transport by the mayor of North Sydney and other delegations, including local 1259 of the International Longshoremen's Association . . .

HEALTH

POSTPONEMENT OF SWINE INFLUENZA VACCINATION PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that public confidence in the swine 'flu vaccination program has been seriously eroded by a possible relationship to a post vaccination paralysis, that there have been many difficulties in supply, production and distribution of the vaccine, that 1.6 million doses are not usable at all and that there is no evidence of an epidemic developing, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin):

That the program be shelved for now and be reinstituted only if there is evidence of an epidemic developing.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented to the House only with its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

SUGGESTED SITE FOR LOCATION OF MEDIUM SECURITY INSTITUTION IN NEW BRUNSWICK—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mike Landers (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the terms of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that a number of Saint John, New Brunswick citizens are concerned about a proposal to build a medium security prison within the Saint John city limits, and in view of the fact that my government and I would not want inmates to suffer the trauma of that "unwanted feeling", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne):

That this House encourages the Department of the Solicitor General to seek an alternative to the proposed prison site within the Saint John city limits, and preferably the new location would be in the Blue Mountain or Renous areas of New Brunswick.

Mr. Speaker: A motion under Standing Order 43 can be presented to the House only with its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

MANPOWER

EXTENSION OF DEADLINE FOR YOUNG CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of high regional unemployment among young people, especially in Atlantic Canada, where a 1976 summer survey in Glace Bay, for example, found 77 per cent of young people unemployed, and in view of the fact that the deadline for Young Canada Works is February 4, which is much too early for young people to apply for aid under this new program, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

● (1410)

That the Minister of Manpower and Immigration extend the application deadline for Young Canada Works to April 1, 1977.

STATUS OF WALTER RUDNICKI—LIST OF INDIVIDUALS ALLEGEDLY FORMING EXTRA-PARLIAMENTARY OPPOSITION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, relating to a serious matter having grave implications for parliament, the public service and civil liberties in this country, namely, the matter of Mr. Walter Rudnicki, who was wrongfully dismissed from the public service of Canada as was confirmed by Mr. Justice O'Driscoll of the Ontario Supreme Court in an action against this government. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That the status of Walter Rudnicki and all those factors which, as yet, have not become public knowledge but which had a direct bearing on the action the government took, be made public in the form of a motion either by the Prime Minister or a minister whom he considers appropriate and, in particular, that this motion deal with the existence or otherwise of a list reported to contain names of individuals who allegedly form an extra-parliamentary opposition to the government.

REQUEST FOR BREAKDOWN OF MONEYS RETAINED BY WHEAT BOARD FOLLOWING FINAL PAYMENT TO FARMERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43, one of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the final payment to grain farmers in the Canadian Wheat Board region was shockingly low for 1975-76 crop year, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga):

That the Minister in charge of the Wheat Board commence forthwith to indicate to the individual prairie farmers what moneys were held back by the Canadian Wheat Board and give a breakdown on the various allocations of retained money.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion can be presented to the House only with its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO ALLEVIATE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister which deals with the very unhealthy state of the economy, particularly as it affects unemployment. The Conference Board of Canada predicted this month that Canada is about to face its worst unemployment rate since the second world war and forecast in excess of 8 per cent unemployment by year's end. Does the Prime Minister agree with this forecast and if not, does he envisage a decline by the year's end of the 7.5 per cent December rate of unemployment which left some 778,000 Canadians out of work, which numbers are growing every day? Has the Prime Minister an answer to that question?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He has no answer.

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, hon. members are aware that a number of measures have been taken already, for example the lowering of the bank interest rate, which we expect will have positive effects on the economy. Work is presently under way within the department on the preparation of a budget. It will be considered and brought forward some time before the summer.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, you know what we think about parliamentary secretaries answering questions—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: —especially when they are directed to the Prime Minister. To paraphrase the right hon. member for Prince Albert, when we are after elephants we are not looking for answers from rabbits.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: I hope the Prime Minister can answer this question and give the House the opportunity to hear what he has to say with respect to the concern of many Canadians about what the government thinks regarding this very unhealthy state of the economy. Will the Prime Minister undertake to make a statement in this House as soon as possible, preferably within a week, regarding the state of the economy, tabling at the same time the government's economic forecasts and analyses for the year 1977 affecting unemployment, job creation, real growth and inflation? Is the government going to maintain its usual silence and secrecy in the face of grim forecasts reported by the OECD, the University of Toronto Institute for Policy Analysis and the Conference Board of Canada? Will the Prime Minister undertake to make a statement with respect to the state of the economy, dealing with those matters which I just mentioned?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this kind of statement in the normal course would be made by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I am amazed that the Prime Minister does not think these matters of great concern and that he will not reveal to the Canadian people the state of the economy, particularly in view of the forecasts of several private organizations. May I ask the Prime Minister this question: Given that economic indicators show that our economic situation is worsening rapidly, will the Prime Minister assure the House that he is considering the introduction of an early budget to deal with this unemployment situation, which can only be described as chaotic, frightening and unacceptable?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's remarks seem more in the nature of an argument than a question. Without agreeing to the zoological preamble to his previous question, I would repeat my answer, that the Minister of Finance will of course be introducing a budget in the course of this session.

Mr. Stevens: When?

Oral Questions

UNEMPLOYMENT—MEASURES TO COUNTERACT EFFECT IN EASTERN PROVINCES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration? Since the conference board in its quarterly provincial forecast, released last week, predicted an unemployment rate in the five eastern provinces in excess of 10 per cent, the rates in two of those provinces, Newfoundland and Quebec, being both considerably higher; and since the already announced works programs of the minister, the Canada Works program and the Young Canada Works program, are merely a new form of the existing LIP program which diminishes that program's effectiveness by stretching it over one year, may I ask the minister what new initiatives the government is prepared to take in the light of this serious situation, in which the actual rate of unemployment in one province, for example, is 35 per cent?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, again the hon. member is showing the typical knee-jerk reaction which the Conservative party shows to anything new being introduced.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cullen: We have placed heavy emphasis, particularly in the hon. member's province, on moneys spent on the LIP, Canada Works and the Young Canada Works programs, in recognition of the high unemployment factor there. We have institutional and industrial training, and in 1976-77 these programs will amount to $15.4 million and deal with 6,600 workers. Given that, plus the LIP allocation for 1976-77 of $17.8 million, I think it can be said that the government is doing its share, doing its part, and to denigrate from those efforts really does not say much for the party which has no policy whatsoever.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a supplementary question? Since some of those provinces already have an unemployment level of more than 15 per cent, the rate in my own province being 35 per cent, and since the Canada Works Program depends on the initiative of others, may I ask the minister what initiatives he and his colleagues are prepared to take, to make jobs in this country? For starters, I ask the minister to look kindly upon the suggestion that he meet with the heads of government of those five provinces, to come up with new programs immediately.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, unhappily for the hon. member programs are not financed with baloney, or he would have all he needs; they are financed with money. We have spent $1.3 billion annually on job creation and training programs, and the hon. member sees fit to denigrate what I think is a good effort. Maybe we can find more money; certainly, these programs are excellent, stretching over the whole broad spectrum of need in this country and there is much emphasis placed on areas like the hon. member's province.

UNEMPLOYMENT—ALLEGATION STATISTICS UNDERESTIMATE LEVEL—REQUEST FOR PROGRAMS TO ASSIST ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration who, being an expert in the subject, recognizes baloney when he hears it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: I ask the minister, with specific reference to the programs he referred to in terms of job creation, if he will acknowledge before the House that the allocation of funds for those programs depends upon official unemployment insurance statistics? If this is so, will he also acknowledge that statistics for Newfoundland, for example, and Cape Breton Island underestimate by 100 per cent the real level of unemployment and that therefore the amounts of money going into those areas are in inverse proportion to the need? If the minister agrees with that, will he tell us what special programs he is going to come up with to correct this, which increases the existing inequalities in the country?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, here again we recognize that we have what is called an imperfect science, but we are endeavouring to determine the exact statistics for which the hon. member is looking. However, we apply them equally across the country. It would be inappropriate to use one set of principles and guidelines in the area suggested by the leader of the NDP and different programs elsewhere. We are endeavouring to come up with better, more perfect and more appropriate statistics, but in the interim, given the funds available, those we have are probably appropriate.

Mr. Broadbent: I go back to the minister's choice of the term "baloney". His baloney answer took a long time to inform us he is not going to change the maldistribution of funds which now exists. I wish to ask a supplementary. Given the fact that Premier Moores of the province of Newfoundland stated publicly recently that for that province to maintain its already worst record in terms of unemployment levels in Canada, it has to create an additional 5,000 new jobs a year on top of the recent annual rate which was already an increase of 5,000, is the minister prepared to announce that the government will take a particular approach to Atlantic Canada and bring forward a significant job creation program, not some time distant such as the end of the summer, but within the next few weeks?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, here again the hon. member ignores the fact that some $17 million is put into that particular province, given its high levels of unemployment. The hon. member is wrong to say we are not changing our criteria because we are under the Canada Works Program. I am looking for a different method of determining unemployment in a particular area which will make it an even more exact indicator of the unemployment in that particular area. We are, fortunately, working on a bilateral and multilateral basis with my opposite numbers in all of the provinces, endeavouring to meet the needs of the specific provinces either through community employment strategy studies or dealings on a bilateral basis with officials in various provinces, given their particular problems.

FINANCE

DATE OF BUDGET—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE FOCUS WILL BE ON JOB CREATION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I will direct my final supplementary to the Prime Minister. If I recall correctly, the parliamentary secretary in his answer stated that we can expect a budget by the summer. Considering that the forecast for unemployment for next year by almost every group outside the government, and two government departments, indicates the worst level of unemployment since World War II, will the Prime Minister give us a date or approximate date for a budget? Hopefully it will be within the next few weeks, and not until the summer. In addition, can he assure the House that the principal focus of that budget will be job creation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I indicated that the budget would be forthcoming in this session. I did not indicate toward the summer. The exact date will be given by the Minister of Finance when he is in the House very soon. He will be able to announce that date. With regard to the particular province of Newfoundland which the hon. member was inquiring about, I had a long exchange of correspondence with Premier Moores. I indicated in quite some detail the kinds of expenditures that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration is making and many other areas of expenditure upon which the federal government is engaged to create jobs in that province. Naturally, the budget will be concerned with the state of economy and the very serious problem of unemployment. However, we on this side do not forget it is also important to keep inflation at a low rate. We hope that for a change we will have the support of the hon. member on this subject.

ALLEGED CONFLICT BETWEEN REGULATION AND COLLECTIVE AGREEMENT FOR CONSTRUCTION INDUSTRY

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

On November 24 last, I asked with my colleague from Bellechasse whether his department had taken a decision concerning the unemployed who, according to the commission, are involved in a collective dispute in the construction industry. The minister replied that he would look into the matter and report. Well, no decision has yet been taken and these unemployed are still waiting for it, while they are not considered eligible for welfare benefits. Is the minister in a position to advise today whether the commission has taken a decision about these cases so as to allow thousands of Quebeckers to obtain their just share?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we have reviewed up to 50,000 applications and we still have 70 to examine. We now have 325 appeals to consider. We expect this will be done by January 27.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Is the minister aware of the existence of instruction No. 7,542,145, signed by a Mr. Sanschagrin, a civil servant, document of which I have a copy, to the effect that the commission must not advise recipients of the decisions rendered, which means that these recipients cannot appeal these decisions? Mr. Speaker, this is a very serious policy. We are dealing here with an internal instruction which states that in every case where this administrative provision applies, it is very important that no notice of ineligibility be sent to the recipients. For all practical purposes, this deprives them of the right to go before the administrative tribunal of the Labour Council and appeal the decisions rendered by the commission. Is the minister aware of this instruction and is he willing to deal fairly with the recipients and to withdraw these instructions so that they may obtain justice from the commission?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, first I must examine the instruction the hon. member has been talking about.

TRANSPORT

APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSION TO STUDY PROBLEMS IN NEWFOUNDLAND—REQUEST FOR DETAILS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Since unemployment is closely related to transportation, may I ask the Minister of Transport whether he has yet made a decision with regard to the appointment of a commission to study transportation in Newfoundland, bearing in mind the impact of the present transport situation upon the current unemployment rate? Has he considered the relationship between such a study and the trans-Newfoundland corridor study already computed? When does he expect to appoint the commission and can he give the House details concerning its terms of reference?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): We have been working with representatives of the government of Newfoundland to determine appropriate terms of reference which would permit a broad investigation into the transportation problems of Newfoundland. It is very much our intention that any such commission would lean heavily on the work which has already been done—and a very significant volume it is—and bring together the conclusions and experience of individual Newfoundlanders quite quickly rather than take a long time for this work.

NEWFOUNDLAND—GUARANTEE OF JOBS FOR RAILWAY EMPLOYEES PENDING COMMISSION REPORT

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): The indication was given, in answer to earlier questions on this subject, that the minister or the CNR would put an end to the lay-offs which have been taking place and which are presently taking place—that a freeze would be applied, at least to July 1977. Would the minister assure the House that the jobs of CNR workers will be "frozen" until the commission presents its report?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): I believe it would be more accurate to say there have been strong expressions of hope that such a freeze, particularly on the part of the CNR, would accompany the commission's work. I have had discussions with representatives of labour concerning this aspect and I have also discussed the matter with the CN. One of the problems might be to define the situation in appropriate language so that the railway company would not be called upon to operate with complete rigidity during the period of the study, but, rather, attempt to assure that the basic levels of service would not be allowed to deteriorate while the study was taking place. This is a view I have put forward to Canadian National and I shall be having further discussions with the provincial government.

ALLEGED ESTABLISHMENT OF ESPIONAGE TRAINING CENTRE IN MONTREAL CUBAN CONSULATE

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the Solicitor General.

Would the minister agree to make this afternoon or tomorrow a complete and detailed statement on the circumstances surrounding the setting up at the Cuban consulate in Montreal of a training centre for spies?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to take into consideration the hon. member's representations.

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a supplementary question.

Considering that the investigation conducted by the RCMP was undertaken following the explosion which took place at the Cuban consulate in 1972, did the Solicitor General since then receive from the RCMP periodical reports on the suspicious activities going on in the consulate and when approximately were the RCMP's suspicions confirmed?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, as Solicitor General of Canada, I normally receive periodical reports from the RCMP's security service on activities which might present a danger for the interests of our country, but I think that both sides of this House have always agreed that it would be rather difficult to reveal their contents.

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a final supplementary question. Could the minister tell the House if the content of the RCMP reports is brought to the attention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and of the Prime Minister on a regular basis?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, each time the interest of the country is involved or the security service discovers something, this should be brought to the attention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and of the Prime Minister; the usual practice is to bring such facts to the attention of both these ministers.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NO ESPIONAGE ACTIVITIES BY EMBASSY OFFICIALS

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Solicitor General. In view of the fact that the minister's predecessor confirmed some time ago that the RCMP were well aware of foreign espionage agents posing as diplomats within embassies in Canada, and this prior to the expulsion of the Cubans as well as the Soviet air attache Vasilliev, can the minister now assure the House that as far as the RCMP are concerned there exists at the present time no further individual or individuals taking part in subversive or espionage activities within any embassy or consulate on Canadian soil?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, it is the normal duty of the RCMP security service to monitor activities of such a kind nature. Such activities, when they do exist, are monitored and the results of such monitoring brought to the attention of the appropriate authorities in the government of Canada.

SUGGESTED PURCHASE OF BELL HOVERCRAFT FOR CANADIAN COAST GUARD

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the fact that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has invested over $10 million under the federal program for the advancement of industrial technology to help develop a viable hovercraft industry in Canada, that the coast guard requires an additional hovercraft and that the Bell Aerospace hovercraft made in Canada meets all the operational requirements of the Canadian Coast Guard, can the minister assure the House that the Bell Aerospace hovercraft made in Canada is being seriously considered for purchase by the federal government as the machine needed for Canadian Coast Guard search and rescue operations?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I will note the hon. member's very interesting representations.

Mr. McKinley: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister able to advise us whether or not at the present time Treasury Board and also cabinet have given approval for the purchase of a British hovercraft for the coast guard?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can add to my previous comment. If such a decision is made, it will be announced in the ordinary process.

POSSIBILITY OF PURCHASING HOVERCRAFT IN UNITED KINGDOM—GOVERNMENT POSITION

I believe that during the last two weeks a delegation has visited Great Britain and has included representatives from the Department of Supply and Services and contract signing officials. Were they there to look into the purchase of a hovercraft for the coast guard from Great Britain or were they there to sign the contract, and has indeed a contract for the purchase of a British machine been signed? If not, what were they there for?

ARSENIC POLLUTION IN YELLOWKNIFE—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF CONFLICTING REPORTS

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Can the minister explain the discrepancy between his public statements of 1976 asserting the harmlessness of arsenic pollution in the Yellowknife area and the evidence of Department of the Environment studies which state, among other things, that the public must be prohibited from using melted snow as a potable water supply? In addition, does the minister now say that the previous study referred to in the press release of October 3, 1975 was inadequate or erroneous since he stated on January 18 last that a new task force is being established to study the arsenic situation in Yellowknife so as to determine what action should now be taken?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The answer to the first part of the question, Mr. Speaker, is that we have long been warning people in the area particularly Indian people, not to drink any water from snow thaw in the area of Yellowknife.

As for the second part of the question, the answer is no.

[English]

ARSENIC POLLUTION IN YELLOWKNIFE—MEASURES TO ASSURE NO CONCEALMENT OF PROBLEM

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of press reports that certain officials in the minister's department have advised concealing from the Yellowknife public the risk it runs from arsenic poisoning, would the minister tell the House what measures he is taking to assure himself that there is no concealment of matters affecting the public interest, matters the public has a right to know?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the inquiry I made has demonstrated that no civil servant in my department had advocated concealing certain facts. I think we have been told about a departmental memorandum issued by a Department of Environment employee, with a suggestion to this effect; but here again, it is simply the opinion of a junior civil servant which does not represent government policy. The paper concerned has been submitted to the government of the Northwest Territories, and it is available.

[English]

ARSENIC POLLUTION IN YELLOWKNIFE—ACCEPTABILITY OF MEMBERS OF TASK FORCE

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I too have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I should like to ask the minister whether he can assure the House that members of the task force which he announced on January 18, 1977 to study the arsenic pollution problems in the Yellowknife area will be acceptable to all parties concerned, especially to the residents of Yellowknife and area, steelworkers, those working in the mines and to Health Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in order that this task force be totally independent and impartial, I have asked the Canadian Public Health Association to select the members of this task force. As soon as I receive the names recommended by the Canadian Public Health Association I will make them public and the study itself will be conducted under the auspices of the association. I will have nothing to do with the selection of people recommended by the Canadian Public Health Association.

ARSENIC POLLUTION IN YELLOWKNIFE—GOVERNMENT ACTION IF PUBLIC SERVANTS CONCEALING FACTS

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, which I would like to direct to the Prime Minister. Would the right hon. PERFORMING ARTS

ALLEGED DENIAL OF VISAS TO CERTAIN ARTISTS—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mrs. Simma Holt (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. By what authority does John Cripton of the Canada Council touring office use threats to withhold visas from the Osipov Balalaika Orchestra and Bolshoi dancers, as has been done by seeming blackmail of Columbia Artists of New York, if this and other distinguished entertainment groups come to Vancouver under the auspices of the respected 40-year old Vancouver company, Famous Artists; and would the Secretary of State determine and report upon how much money in grants and subsidies from the Canada Council, the Canada Council touring office and the Secretary of State has gone to build the physical assets and business of David Y. Louie since 1969; and is the government—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mrs. Holt: —through the Canada Council in competition with established small, independent business in Vancouver?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for drawing this to my attention.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Roberts: I mean that entirely seriously, Mr. Speaker. When she brought these facts or alleged facts to my attention this morning, I immediately asked my department to undertake an investigation and I will promptly ensure that the results of that investigation are forwarded to her. If the situation is as she described it I will be extremely concerned and anxious to take remedial action.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

POSSIBILITY OF NEW MEASURES TO ENCOURAGE INVESTMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, as Jean-Luc Pépin, Chairman of the Anti-Inflation Board, stated last week, wage and price controls have hurt business investment in Canada; and as the Minister of Finance stated today, speaking in Toronto: "There is no question that we need a progressive recovery in private investment if we are going to be able to provide adequately for job creation and rising productivity", and then added: "The control of profit margins has been no tonic for investment", will the Prime Minister indicate whether, based on these statements, we may expect new directives for the AIB which would be designed to encourage private investment in Canada with its resultant much needed job creation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would have to take a look at the statements quoted by the hon. member. My information is that there is no hard evidence that the controls have in fact reduced the level of investment in Canada which there otherwise would have been, or that there has been any great misallocation of resources.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister indicate whether the Minister of Finance in his speech in Toronto today was reflecting government policy when he stated: —that the start of the solution to most of the economic challenges we face lies in more capital investment . . . Enhancing the role of investment is going to be an important item on our agenda for 1977.

Is that government policy?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, that seems like a pretty sound statement. I cannot say what the rest of the speech was, but that part taken in isolation seems to make good sense to me.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ALLEGED LIST OF PEOPLE FORMING EXTRA-PARLIAMENTARY OPPOSITION—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and relates to my earlier motion and to questions asked previously in the House. Is the Prime Minister in a position today to confirm that there has been a list or lists circulated among senior members of his Cabinet containing names which purport to form an extra parliamentary opposition to the government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not the slightest idea what the hon. member is talking about.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: It has been a long recess.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, since the Prime Minister is totally oblivious to a very serious matter which concerns the privileges of all hon. members of this House, will the Prime Minister cause further inquiries to be made in order to ascertain what is behind this question, and when he is fully briefed will he report to the House conclusively on this matter at the earliest possible moment?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I cannot give that undertaking. I repeat, I do not know what the member is talking about. There is obviously a lot of extra parliamentary opposition to the government, but that is normal in a democracy.

TRADE

ALLEGED BOYCOTT OF ISRAELI FIRMS BY CROWN AGENCIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Prime Minister. In view of press reports indicating varying degrees of complicity by Canadian federal Crown agencies and corporations with the Arab boycott against Israel and Jewish individuals and firms, will the Prime Minister indicate whether an internal investigation has been made by his government to ascertain the truth or otherwise of these facts and, if not, why not?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will have to refer this question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. We made a statement on this matter of the Arab boycott in the House, I believe a month and a half ago. If my memory is correct, it was supported by all opposition parties. I would have to see whether there is any departure from the application of that policy. I know of none.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Prime Minister would then indicate whether, from his office or from the office of whichever minister of the Crown would be in charge of these Crown agencies and corporations, any definite instructions in respect of governmental policy have gone out forbidding them to take part in any such Arab boycott?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the statement made by the government a short while ago in the House applied, of course, to the government, its agencies and departments. I know that this government policy does not go as far as some people would like, but it is our policy and once again I will have to say that I am not aware of it not being applied totally by some aspect of government. So far as I know there is no specific allegation to that effect. If the hon. member has some facts he can convey to me, I would appreciate receiving them.

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): No, Mr. Speaker, as you know that decision was made some time ago and the government then reaffirmed its support for the commercial deletion policy established by the CRTC. But we thought that under the income tax legislation passed in the House, it was necessary and maybe timely, following the discussions and negotiations we had with the Americans, to re-examine the impact of that legislation and at the same time look into other ways of reaching the same goals.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ALLEGED LIST OF PUBLIC SERVANTS FORMING EXTRA-PARLIAMENTARY OPPOSITION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question that is supplemental to one asked by my colleague, the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River, which I should like to direct to the Minister of National Defence who, on October 13 of last year, as reported at page 18 of Hansard, speaking as the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, stated in respect of the existence of an alleged list or blacklist of public servants who can be called the extra parliamentary opposition:

Fortunately, it is without any foundation.

I wonder whether the minister has made any inquiries, and does he still hold to that position?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I cannot see how that could be directed to the minister's responsibilities in connection with national defence.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct this question to the minister in his capacity as Minister of National Defence, and I submit it is equally applicable.

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, my answer still stands. I am aware of no such list.

TRANSPORT

EFFECT OF SUBSIDIZATION OF PRIVATE SHIPPING FIRMS ON MOVEMENT OF GOODS THROUGH NORTH SYDNEY

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of Transport is related to the hearings he gave and the concern he showed the delegation from North Sydney here in Ottawa and in respect of the meetings held on the docks in North Sydney by the union regarding layoffs and cutbacks at the North Sydney wharf. Would the minister cause an inquiry to be carried out to determine the effect that the subsidization of private shipping firms from the public purse is having on the shipment of goods through the Port of North Sydney in competition with a Crown corporation, namely, the Canadian National Railways, thereby causing massive unemployment at that port? This is a matter we have been pursuing for many months in an attempt to get some answers.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that I share his concern about employment in the Sydney area. Indeed, I have taken some action in that regard in recent weeks. In this particular case, we have undertaken with several provincial governments to look at the question and the impact on employment of the movement of goods from the maritime provinces proper to Newfoundland. That is, of course, a subject which may also receive some attention in connection with the work of the proposed commission.

● (1450)

Mr. Muir: I thank the minister for his answer. May I ask him, if he is too busy—I realize he has a large portfolio—if he would assign one of his senior officials to pinpoint the specific problem in that it is asserted that the shipping firms are definitely taking business from the port of North Sydney to the detriment of the stevedores there and that only one quarter of the force of approximately 1,000 men is working.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated, since this matter is being discussed with several of the provinces, it is a matter which already has the attention of several of my officials.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

INQUIRY WHETHER PORT WILL BE CONSTRUCTED AT ÎLES-DE-LA-MADELEINE FOR TRANSPORTATION OF SALT

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Would the minister tell the House and Quebecers particularly if the negotiations with Quebec authorities aimed at an agreement concerning the economic development of the Gaspe peninsula, the lower St. Lawrence area and the Magdalen Islands still include, as before the November 15 event, the appropriation of important federal funds for the operation of a salt mine—which, incidentally, was discovered before November 15, 1976—and the development of a seaport at Grosse Isle, Magdalen Islands, in order to export the products of this mine to the Quebec, Canadian and other markets?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the operation of a salt mine in the Magdalen Islands was indeed and still is one of the points under discussion which was considered by my department as part of a possible joint program of both Quebec and Ottawa governments for the development of these regions. I think this point will still be discussed. We said at the time that this was a real regional development opportunity.

HOUSING

SUGGESTED REDUCTION OF INTEREST RATES

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

Because of the marked slow-down in recent months of single-unit dwelling construction in Canada as a result of the prohibitively high rate of interest on the balance of the cost of those dwellings, which means that the average wage earner finds it difficult to buy a home, can the minister tell the house whether the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation he heads intends to alleviate somewhat the high rate of interest with a view to making it easier for prospective or new home-owners to buy those houses?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I feel that we have just completed a record year in the field of housing. I therefore find it difficult to reconcile the assertions of the hon. member with that outstanding performance.

On the other hand, I am quite willing to recognize with him that it is in the interest of small wage earners to be able to buy a home at the lowest possible rate of interest. That is why the government has brought forward the program known as AHOP, the Assisted Home Ownership Program, the purpose of which is precisely to lower the actual cost of interest to 8 per cent.

Mr. Beaudoin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Could the minister tell the House whether this lower interest rate will apply to single family dwellings in particular or to housing in general?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I have just said to the hon. member that this is a government program. I will gladly provide him with documents on this subject. I think that he should have a better knowledge of this program which is already under way and has contributed to the construction of some 38,000 units in 1976 in Canada.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

EFFECT OF REDUCTION IN WORK PERIOD NECESSARY TO QUALIFY FOR BENEFITS

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that a committee of this caucus at its recent visit to Newfoundland found out from the Manpower office and the Unemployment Insurance Commission in St. John's that fully 48 per cent of all those receiving unemployment insurance benefits in Newfoundland have between 8 and 19 weeks attachments to the work force, and in view of the fact that many of these people will be eliminated from unemployment insurance programs by the changes in Bill C-27 which raise the length of work necessary for eligibility from 12 weeks to 18 weeks, will the minister now reconsider these changes in the UIC program which will not only work unspeakable hardship on the lives of many unemployed workers but which will play havoc with the economy of the Atlantic provinces and other such areas in the country?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker, we are taking that particular bill in conjunction with the direct job creation program. Heavy emphasis on funding will take place in areas of high unemployment. We are satisfied also that the suggestion of the hon. member that all these people will automatically be unemployed is rather simplistic. These people do need help, but I do not think that continuing payments under the UIC program is really the appropriate method. We are also talking about the developmental use of UIC funds for training, and I think that is making better use of the money than just a straight payment out of the insurance fund.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am concerned that we are getting into debate on a measure which will be before the House shortly. However, I will allow one supplementary question.

Mr. Rodriguez: In view of the fact that such programs as the one which the minister just mentioned depend on the rate of unemployment calculated by Statistics Canada in conjunction with UIC and Manpower figures, and in view of the fact that it is admitted that in reality unemployment is much higher than shown in the official rate and so indeed the amounts of money for those programs are badly underestimated, is the minister prepared to at least review the method by which the rate of unemployment is calculated so that the funds going for these retraining programs would really reflect the actual unemployment in the Atlantic region?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that this question is a repetition of the same question put by the leader of the hon. member's party at the beginning of the question period.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. Boniface is Minister of State without Portfolio and indeed he will have a very important responsibility in the cabinet expressing the points of view of the very important western provinces.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

EFFECT OF ROSEAU RIVER PROJECT IN UNITED STATES ON MANITOBA—NEGOTIATIONS FOR CONSTRUCTION AND PAYMENT OF MITIGATING WORKS

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister following a question I asked him last December 7 with regard to the Roseau River project in the state of Minnesota and its effect on the province of Manitoba. It is possible that the Minister of State from St. Boniface has also directed this question to the Prime Minister. The IJC specifically recommended that mitigating works take place in Manitoba prior to the completion of the work in Minnesota. At that time the Prime Minister indicated to me that he would be making inquiries as to the negotiations and the payment for these mitigating works. Have these negotiations taken place and, if so, what is the result?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I will have to check the file again and also check with my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Certainly, the IJC report supports the Canadian contention that some of these works are undesirable.

Mr. Epp: Can the Minister of the Environment indicate whether negotiations have taken place between U.S. and Canadian officials and whether mitigating works and the scheduling and payment for them has already been decided upon?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): The report was officially transmitted to the two governments only some days ago. I will check to ascertain what contacts have continued since then.

GRAIN

REASON FOR LOW FINAL PAYMENT TO FARMERS AND RETENTION OF MONEY BY WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. Why was the final payment to prairie farmers by the Canadian Wheat Board so low, and what is the justification for individual farmers not receiving a statement with their final payment indicating the full rationale for the amount of money retained by the Wheat Board?

[Mr. Hnatyshyn.]

Hon. Otto. E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the hon. member thinks he is referring to when he speaks about the retention of money by the Canadian Wheat Board. The final payments are, of course, on the basis of the Wheat Board's calculation of the amount of money received when grains from a particular pool have been sold and deducting therefrom the initial payments which have already been made to the farmer at the time of delivery. In due course the Wheat Board does put together and make available to all producers a full statement showing the analysis of the costs and its full calculations, and I think there is no reason to suspect or think that there is any different procedure followed this year than in years past. In other words, the level of the final payment reflects exactly the prices at which the Wheat Board was able to sell grain.

● (1500)

Mr. Malone: Why is it that the individual farmer, on receipt of his final payment, is not able to find out the basis upon which that final payment is made? Putting it on the basis of the whole Wheat Board region does not give the individual farmer an opportunity to make an analysis of his business because that is across the three prairie provinces.

Mr. Lang: If the hon. member has some suggestion about a better way of communicating the individual situation to a farmer, I am sure the Canadian Wheat Board would be glad to receive that representation from him. The board does make available to the farmers of the prairies a statement of its operations and the manner of calculating the final payments. There is no such thing as an individual payment tracing the particular wheat which one farmer delivered and identifying the market into which it went, and I hope the hon. member is not suggesting that the Wheat Board try to set up that kind of system.

UNEMPLOYENT INSURANCE

LOSS OF CHEQUES SENT TO CLAIMANTS IN SARNIA AREA—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Has the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton brought to the minister's attention the fact that about 400 cheques worth several thousands of dollars which were addressed to claimants in the Sarnia area and which were sent by the Unemployment Insurance Commission have gone astray, and if so, has the minister been able to locate the cause of the problem?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton did bring that to my attention because the hon. member always does a great job, and I got on it right away.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: In this particular instance, from the standpoint of the UIC, we immediately got the names of the individuals affected and had a person go to Belleville to have duplicate cheques prepared so that the people would not be kept waiting for the delivery of their cheques, which have been lost or somehow mislaid. As the member of parliament for Sarnia-Lambton, perhaps I could direct that question to the Postmaster General.

POST OFFICE

LOSS OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE AND OTHER CHEQUES—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary to the Postmaster General. In view of the fact that the blame for the loss of these cheques has been laid upon the Postmaster General's Department by both the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton and also by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, has the Postmaster General been able to locate these cheques? In addition, has he been able to locate 11 cheques which were mailed December 10 from the Bank of Montreal in Guelph, Ontario, including one for over $100,000, which were lost?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, as usual, the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton made excellent representations, and I initiated an investigation with regard to these particular cheques. We have not as yet located them, so until we have, the Post Office is not ready to accept the responsibility for their loss.

STATISTICS FOR DAMAGE TO PARCELS

Question No. 629—Mr. Dinsdale:

What are the statistics for damage to parcels in each of the automated postal terminals for each of the five years (a) prior to (b) since automation?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Parcel damage statistics maintained by the Post Office do not designate the location where the damage occurred. Often this is impossible to ascertain. The parcel may have been processed through several plants and carried by various modes of transportation, yet damage, if any, may not be evident until opened on delivery by the addressee.

FINANCIAL POSITIONS OF NATIONAL SPORTS GOVERNING BODIES

Question No. 644—Mr. Beatty:

1. Is the government aware of the financial positions of the national governing bodies of any sports in Canada and, if so, which ones?

2. In each case, what is the (a) size of the present surplus or deficit (b) anticipated surplus or deficit for the end of the current fiscal year (c) date on which the fiscal year ends?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. The Fitness and Amateur Sport Branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare provides contributions on a project basis to approximately 70 national sports governing bodies for the implementation of programs. (See table below.) Such contributions are governed by terms and conditions which require submission of audited financial statements or auditable materials specifically in respect of these contributions. It is not a prerequisite for any contribution to a project that the recipient provide full financial disclosure of all its financial affairs.

2. Since the national sports governing bodies are not required, as a condition of receiving contributions, to provide full financial disclosure, information on their overall deficit or surplus position is not available. In relation to federal contributions, audits are performed upon receipt of appropriate accounting materials. If a contribution exceeds allowable expenses, a refund is requested in favour of the Receiver General for Canada; if allowable expenses exceed the original contribution, a supplementary contribution can be considered.

[Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan).]

Hon. Note: Statistics on activities under the National Housing Act, compiled by CMHC, are not based on federal electoral constituencies, but on municipal counties in Quebec. GRAIN CARS SHIPPED FROM WESTERN CANADA

Question No. 711—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

Were approximately 15% of all grain cars shipped from Western Canada during the current crop year loaded with the wrong kind or grade of grain and, if so, what steps is the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board taking to ensure that this percentage is reduced in the future?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): In so far as the Canadian Wheat Board is concerned: during the current crop year cars shipped from Western Canada loaded with the wrong kind or grade of grain have amounted to just under 15 per cent of all cars shipped. The Canadian Wheat Board is applying penalties on the basis of two cars lost for every car containing the wrong grade and four cars lost for every car containing the wrong grain. These penalties are applied to the offending companies' weekly car allocation.

LAWYERS RETAINED BY CMHC IN NOVA SCOTIA

Question No. 736—Mr. Muir:

1. What are the names of the lawyers or law firms on Cape Breton Island employed by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and how was each selected?

2. How much did each lawyer or law firm receive in fees and expenses in each fiscal year 1972-73 to date?

3. Can an individual securing financing from CMHC select a lawyer other than those recommended by CMHC and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I am advised by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, as follows: 1 and 2. The following lawyers were retained by CMHC, in Cape Breton, Inverness, Richmond and Victoria counties, Nova Scotia, to process mortgage documentation arising from CMHC direct lending, from 1972 to September 1976: Glace Bay—Khattar and Khattar, Simon MacDonald; New Waterford—M. J. Hinchey, Q.C.; North Sydney—David J. Ryan, Murray J. Ryan, Q.C.; Port Hawkesbury—Arthur J. LeBlanc; Sydney—J. Bernard Boudreau, George R. LeVatte, Russell G. MacLellan, Gerald F. Murphy, Q.C., J. Allister Ross, Q.C., G. Alistair S. Smith. Legal fees in connection with CMHC direct loans are paid by the borrower, and CMHC therefore, has no record of the amounts paid to these lawyers. The following lawyers were retained from 1972 to September, 1976, to handle action where arrears on loans approved in Cape Breton, Inverness, Richmond and Victoria counties, Nova Scotia required legal actions:

		Costs and Fees
Halifax	McInnes, Cooper and Robertson	$4,587.81
North Sydney	Murray J. Ryan, Q.C.	$2,296.90
Port Hawkesbury	Burke, Vincent and LeBlanc	$2,006.10

3. CMHC follows the normal practice of mortgage lenders in that where a mortgage is taken as security a legal agent is employed to search and report on title, to register the mortgage and advance the mortgage funds and certify to CMHC that its mortgage constitutes a first charge on the property. In the case of loans for the provision of housing to persons of low income, requests for the employment of the borrower's solicitor or notary are in many cases granted where the employment will produce a financial advantage to the borrower. In addition, in the case of loans on existing housing, where the borrower has employed a solicitor or notary to carry out the work of acquiring the title to the property, CMHC may employ the borrower's solicitor or notary to act on behalf of CMHC.

2. If the government no longer expects to open a postal processing plant in Newmarket by August 1978, on what date does it expect to do so?

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): 1. It is anticipated that tenders will be called in January, 1977 for the construction of a new mail processing plant in Newmarket, Ontario, with anticipated occupancy by August, 1978.

2. Not applicable.

CANADAIR LIMITED

Question No. 762—Mr. McKinnon:

1. Did the Crown purchase Canadair Limited from General Dynamics on January 5, 1976 for a maximum price of $38,150,000 and, if so, what was the value placed on the Crown's obligation to pursue a claim against Northrop Corporation for alleged breach of contract and to pay to Canadair two-thirds of any sums recovered from Northrop?

2. When the Crown settled the action brought against it in the Federal Court of Canada by Northrop Corporation by paying Northrop $9,000,000, what value was placed on the Crown's counterclaim against Northrop for damages for breach of contract?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Supply and Services as follows: 1. On January 5, 1976, the Crown purchased Canadair from General Dynamics for a maximum price of $38,150,000. The Crown paid $11,479,835 for 1,408,463 shares of Canadair; $25,170,165 for nine outstanding promissory notes of Canadair to General Dynamics, and $1,500,000 representing the company's profit in the period January 1, 1974 to December 31, 1975. The price was determined through a series of negotiations on a net basis for shares and notes and not for individual assets. It is therefore not possible, and would be misleading, to attempt to attribute a specific price to a specific asset.

2. No value was determined for the Crown's counterclaim when the action was settled with Northrop.

RRAP LOANS, ABITIBI, QUEBEC

Question No. 768—Mr. Laprise:

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I am advised as follows by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation: to November 1976, 15 loans for $60,700 were approved in Taschereau, and 41 loans for $171,955 in Duparquet, Abitibi County under the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program. Information is not readily available on the number of applications refused.

NOTE: Statistics on activities under the National Housing Act, compiled by CMHC, are not based on federal electoral constituencies, but on municipal counties in Québec.

UIC—LUMBERING OPERATIONS

Question No. 882—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

Did the government sign an agreement with Maine, USA on lumbering operations in the State by Canadian contractors and, if so, what are the terms of the agreement?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): In so far as the Unemployment Insurance Commission is concerned: it has not entered into any agreement with the State of Maine specifically in connection with lumbering operations by Canadian contractors in the State. There is however a reciprocal agreement between Canada and each of the individual states of the USA respecting the eligibility and payment of unemployment insurance benefits. This agreement has been in effect with most states since 1942. The State of Maine, however, did not subscribe to the agreement until January 1, 1972. The agreement enables persons living in Canada who have worked in Maine and who have credits under the Unemployment Insurance program of that State to claim against those credits through the office of the Unemployment Insurance Commission serving the area in which they reside. The reverse is also true for Maine residents having Canadian credits. In both situations the individual is paid by the Unemployment Insurance agency from which he derived his credits. The other jurisdiction merely administers the claim.

In so far as the Department of Manpower and Immigration is concerned: no.

MISUSE OF SUBSIDIES

Question No. 933—Mr. Horner:

1. With reference to the statement by the Minister of Transport in the House on October 27, 1976, namely "We have found in the past that where we put in large subsidies, a great deal of misuse of service occurred.", from 1968 to date, in each case where such misuse occurred (a) what was the subsidy (b) what are the details of misuse (c) what was the amount of the subsidy?

2. From 1968 to date, in each case where no misuse of service occurred, what was the subsidy and the amount?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): 1. (a), (b) and (c) I was not implying that Government funds have been misused. Rather, subsidies distort, over a period of time, the free market forces which are thus discouraged or prevented from providing efficient transportation services thereby eliminating or reducing the requirement for subsidies.

2. Transportation subsidies are voted by parliament and paid by government for various purposes. These subsidies appear in the Main Estimates and the Public Accounts for each fiscal year.

RESEARCH PROJECT ON AMARANTH (RED NO. 2)

Question No. 1,123—Mr. Yewchuk:

What research projects is the Department of National Health and Welfare sponsoring or conducting on the effects of Amaranth (Red No.2) on human health?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The Department of National Health and Welfare is fully aware of world research on the safety of amaranth and other food colours, and is in continuing close contact with scientists around the world who work in this area. In addition, the department has research projects underway to evaluate the safety of amaranth (Red No. 2). These studies involve an assessment of the purity and chemical composition of the dye in order to identify minor impurities. The toxicity of the impurities is being measured by short-term microbial tests to determine their mutagenic potential. Additionally, the metabolism and pharmacokinetic behaviour of amaranth is being investigated in a variety of animal species in an attempt to select the most appropriate species for chronic toxicity testing. No untoward effects have been noted in any of the tests conducted to date. A study of the teratogenicity of amaranth has recently been completed using cats as the test species. All food colours are being reviewed with a view to tightening specifications with respect to impurities.

RESEARCH PROJECTS ON CHLOROFORM

Question No. 1,128—Mr. Yewchuk:

What research projects is the Department of National Health and Welfare sponsoring or conducting on the effects on human health of chloroform added to toothpastes, cough medicines and cosmetics?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No research projects are being conducted by the Department of National Health and Welfare on the effects on human health of chloroform added to toothpastes, cosmetics and cough medicines. The department is, however, fully aware of the results of studies on chloroform and human health conducted elsewhere. As a result of a thorough evaluation of world knowledge respecting chloroform and health, a proposal has been formulated to prohibit the sale of products containing chloroform by manufacturers and distributors of drugs and cosmetics with an effective date of September 1, 1977 and communicated to manufacturers on July 8, 1976 (see Information Letter No. 472 attached).

Information Letter

Health Protection Branch

July 8, 1976 I.L. No. 472

TO: All Manufacturers of Drugs or Cosmetics

SUBJECT: Proposed Restrictions on Use of Chloroform

New information from a recent study carried out by the National Cancer Institute in the United States suggests that chloroform may be carcinogenic in rats and mice when administered in high doses over prolonged periods. Although there is no direct evidence that chloroform as used in drugs and cosmetics, has caused injury to the health of humans, the new finding raises doubts about the long-term safety of this ingredient.

As a result of this new information the Health Protection Branch has reviewed the need for chloroform in products subject to the provisions of the Food and Drugs Act and Regulations. The Branch is aware that chloroform has a long history of use in drugs and cosmetics. Presently available information indicates that current usage of chloroform in drug products in Canada is for its antitussive and carminative properties in products taken orally, for its counter-irritant property in liniments, as a preservative, as a flavouring, and as a solvent during the manufacturing process. In cosmetics it is used as a flavouring agent. For each of these applications, it would appear that alternative ingredients are available which currently are not open to suspicion. Therefore, it seems reasonable to discontinue the use of chloroform as an ingredient in drugs and cosmetics so that there will be no possibility of a hazard to the health of Canadian consumers.

It is my intention to recommend the implementation of regulations respecting drugs and cosmetics for human use that will prohibit the sale, by manufacturers or distributors, of products containing chloroform as an ingredient. It will be recommended that these regulations take effect on September 1, 1977. It is considered that there is no immediate hazard from the drugs and cosmetics currently marketed in Canada. Therefore, manufacturers and distributors of these products would be permitted to continue sale of these products up to that date in order to provide for an orderly conversion to reformulated products.

Comments in regard to this proposal should be submitted within thirty days of the date of this Information Letter and directed to:

PUBLIC SERVANTS RE-ASSIGNED BECAUSE OF DISSATISFACTION

Question No. 1,177—Mr. Herbert:

1. In each of the past ten years, how many public servants have been reassigned to other duties because of dissatisfaction with their performance?

2. What are the salary ranges of these persons?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Public Service Commission as follows: 1. Every year a large number of public servants are re-assigned to other duties because their employer is dissatisfied with their performance. If these re-assignments result in an appointment at the same rate of pay, they are treated as transfers and as such cannot be distinguished from transfers for other reasons. However when public servants are appointed to a position at a level with a lower maximum rate of pay, a demotion, either voluntarily at the request of the employee, or as the result of a joint decision between the employee and the supervisor, they are represented in our statistics. Employees appointed to a lower level within their occupational group: 1968—672; 1969—1,475; 1970—1,794; 1971—2,115; 1972—2,460; 1973—2,370; 1974—2,832; 1975—2,872. Occasionally a deputy head may find no alternative but to resort to Section 31 of the Public Service Employment Act, which provides for the appointment to a lower maximum rate of pay of an employee for incompetence or incapacity in the performance of his or her duties. During the last ten years, these appointments have numbered as follows: 1967—1; 1968—8; 1969—8; 1970—7; 1971—7; 1972—2; 1973—2; 1974—3; 1975—7; 1976—7 (January 1 to November 24, 1976).

2. Records for years prior to 1975 are not kept in such a way that the salary ranges of these persons can be readily identified.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Yes. The government is aware of these observations which are quoted from page 77 of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture entitled "Kent County Can be Saved". It is current procedure to involve farmers and/or their representa-

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

[English]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INCREASE IN UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the revelation that since the House last sat, unemployment has risen to 7.5 per cent, the announcement of further forecasts that unemployment throughout 1977 will remain at the highest level since the Second World War, and that related to these two points, the government has not announced, since the House last sat, any new job creation programs—and I include answers in the House this afternoon—or its intention to do so in the near future.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) gave the Chair notice of his intention to propose this motion pursuant to Standing Order 26, and accordingly the Chair was given an opportunity to reflect on the propriety of the subject matter with respect to the terms of not only the language of Standing Order 26 but also its clear application in respect of the precedents of the House. In that regard I refer the House to two previous rulings, one on June 12, 1973, when my distinguished predecessor, in respect to a proposed motion pursuant to Standing Order 26 dealing with regional unemployment and national inflation, had this to say:

[Mr. Kempling.]

Putting aside for the moment that the proposed request may be contrary to that section of the Standing Order which prohibits the raising of more than one matter, the Chair has frequently stated in considering proposed motions to adjourn the House that the question that must be determined does not necessarily concern itself with the importance of the topic raised but rather with the requirement that the matter should be one that must be given urgent consideration under the Standing Order.

In considering that portion of the hon. member's proposition which deals with regional unemployment, I think it is fair for the Chair to say that while the topic is one which has been of concern to all members, it is also one of a continuing nature which, as such, does not seem to meet the requirements of Standing Order 26.

On November 9, 1976 the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby put before this House a similar motion related to unemployment. At that time I had the following to say:

Certainly, that language would indicate that a matter such as unemployment or any other matter of national concern would fall into that category. However, the practice and precedents in the House have indicated that the primary consideration which should govern the decision of the Chair in reference to this Standing Order is not so much whether a matter is one of continuing concern but, specifically, whether it is of critical proportions and constitutes a crisis as opposed to being chronic. While the matter of unemployment can scarcely be brushed aside as not qualifying under the opening paragraph of Standing Order 26, I am sure hon. members would agree that it is a matter of continuing concern as opposed to one of crisis proportions.

Therefore, in respect of that rationale which was based on the very clear ruling of my predecessor, I would have to find that unemployment remains a matter of continuing concern, and that in the opinion of the Chair, the subject—which at least in terms of its continuing nature, although perhaps related to a particular event, may in the future qualify under the Standing Order in its continuing nature—is not a matter for debate under Standing Order 26.

Orders of the day.

BROADCASTING OF HOUSE AND COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That this House approves the radio and television broadcasting of its proceedings and of the proceedings of its committees on the basis of principles similar to those that govern the publication of the printed official reports of debates; and

That a special committee, consisting of Mr. Speaker and seven other members to be named at a later date, be appointed to supervise the implementation of this resolution.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the adoption of this motion will have a direct and important effect on the democratic process in Canada. In this debate we must face head-on questions about the precise role of this House in our democracy. We must decide whether broadcasting will enhance that role and whether it will do so without sacrificing any of the fundamental rights and privileges of parliament.

Broadcasting raises a number of important questions, but we must begin with a clear appreciation of the functions of this House and how broadcasting is likely to affect them. To begin with, the House of Commons, with the other place and the Crown, makes the laws of Canada. Broadcasting will in no way affect the legislative function of parliament. It will not alter the role of the House as a law-making body. The House has, however, a number of equally important functions on which broadcasting will exert a direct influence. First, the House is the forum in which the government must defend both its legislative proposals and its administrative actions. Second, the House provides a framework in which the opposition parties expose their views and prepare to take over the role of governing. Third, the House is the body to which Canadians send their representatives, not only to support or oppose the government of the day but to intervene on their behalf.

Clearly, broadcasting will influence these functions. It will inform Canadians about what the government is doing, about what the opposition is proposing or exposing, and about the manner in which members represent their constituents and play an integral role in the governing process. In short, broadcasting will let Canadians know better what is being done here on their behalf. This cannot but have an important influence on the role parliament plays in Canadian democracy. In this age of communications, those institutions which fail to communicate their objectives and purposes lose both relevancy and meaning for the public. It is not enough for parliament to be flexible, for governments to be responsible. Achievements must not only take place but they must be seen to take place for the public to retain its interest and confidence.

Broadcasting is certainly the best way to ensure that Canadians, particularly young Canadians, understand what we are doing here and how we are doing it. And if Canadians are well informed they will better be able to respond and will keep our democracy dynamic by letting us know what they think. This could in the future have a direct impact on the way we meet our many challenges in the constitutional field, in social and economic policy, in communications, in transportation and in the many other areas of government activities. On the fundamental question, therefore—the question whether broadcasting will strengthen Canadian democracy—my answer is an unequivocal "Yes".

Now I should like to deal with a number of other questions which the motion raises. First of all, like any proposal for a major departure, it raises not only the question, "Why?" but also the question, "Why now?" and, "How will the operations of the House be affected?" A short historical comparison provides good guidance. As late as 1874 the Canadian House of Commons did not publish an official report of its proceedings. Observers of parliament were obliged to rely on what Sir John Bourinot referred to as "partial imperfect reports in the newspapers". The opponents of printing the debates cited arguments now familiar to us. According to them, the publication of debates would drastically alter the nature of the House, leading to more and lengthier speeches, grand-standing and further domination by the occupants of front-bench seats. They feared that printed reports would be distorted by their political opponents, and they argued that the technical expertise—presumably they meant shorthand reporters—was not available or, at least, was priced beyond the means of the government. Their ultimate assertion was that nobody would pay attention to the printed reports anyway.

Publications of our present Hansard began in 1875 and the opponents of publication were quickly proved wrong. I doubt if anyone today would seriously propose that we abandon the printing of these reports. The technological developments of the last 100 years have transformed the debate over a printed Hansard into the present debate over what can best be described as an "electronic Hansard". Not surprisingly, we must now answer, again, many of the questions answered 100 years ago: Has the broadcasting proposal been thoroughly studied? How will broadcasting affect the dignity, privileges and immunities of parliament? Will parliament be able to stand the kind of exposure television gives? Who will control the production of the electronic Hansard? What use will be made of the productions? What will be the cost?

The broadcasting proposal has been thoroughly studied. Television first appeared here in 1957 when parliament was opened by Her Majesty. The right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) merits the credit for this first step. We have had it back temporarily for special events since then. Proposals for broadcasting parliament have been discussed on many occasions. On June 5, 1967, there was a debate on a private member's motion by the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman). A similar motion was debated on an allotted day motion by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) on March 26, 1969. There was a debate in February and March, 1970, on a motion to refer the subject to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, and the adoption of this motion led to a two-year study by the committee. The result of the committee's deliberations was a report to the House on June 30, 1972, which recommended the implementation of broadcasting as an electronic Hansard. It is perhaps worthwhile reminding the House of some of the observations made in the report, as follows:

> Radio and television and particularly the latter have become the most important media of mass communications and exert a powerful influence on public opinion.
> If parliament excludes itself from access to the broadcasting media it may well deny itself the opportunity of making its most effective public impact.
> Parliament represents the people: and one of its prime responsibilities is to inform the people. The people therefore have a right to see their parliament in action and through television coverage this right could become a reality for all people from coast to coast.

● (1520)

Those are the observations of the standing committee of the House of Commons. These conclusions have formed the basis for the government's attitude and actions on broadcasting since 1972. Speeches from the Throne in January, 1973, September, 1974, and October, 1976, have repeated the government's intention to proceed; and for more than a year my predecessor, the hon. member for Eglington (Mr. Sharp), had on the order paper in his name a motion identical to the one now under consideration. At the same time, the government commissioned a number of technical studies, including a cost study tabled by my predecessor last June, and a half-hour videotape presentation in both official languages entitled "Broadcasting Parliament" which was shown to the party caucuses, the cabinet and the press gallery.

This is the background. It is now the government's responsibility to bring the question before the House for a decision. This we are doing, encouraged by the exhortation of members opposite.

Turning to the question of how broadcasting will affect the dignity, privileges and immunities of parliament, we must recognize that some action may be necessary but that there will be no sacrifice of existing privileges and immunities. One of the purposes of the special committee to be appointed on the adoption of the motion before us will be to examine this question. If the committee finds legislation on the matter necessary, the government will bring in the appropriate bill. Parliament would also, of course, ensure that the use made of broadcasts does not infringe the privileges of the House.

The broader question about the influence of broadcasting on the dignity of parliament is closely linked to the question about whether the House can stand the kind of exposure television gives. This is a matter of concern to all members. For my part, I do not subscribe to the view that the House cannot stand exposure. The purpose of broadcasting is not to provide entertainment, nor to convert the House of Commons to "show business"—although it displays such proclivities from time to time. The purpose is to provide Canadians with information and an archival and educational record of the proceedings. All members are aware that debate in the House is occasionally something less than scintillating, and that Canadians cannot be expected to remain glued to their television sets while we discuss such exotic things as bills dealing with consular privileges. But it is foolhardy to argue that Canadians will not understand the workings of the House and that exposure will be unhealthy. Indeed, exposure may well exert a healthy influence on the calibre of debate and the enthusiasm with which members put forward their views. It may also produce a better public understanding of the fact that a member's duties extend well beyond attendance in the House and often centre on the need to intervene on their constituents' behalf with the government and its agencies. In short, I have confidence both in the ability of this institution to adapt to new challenges and in the ability of Canadians to understand the workings of parliament.

The experience in other legislative bodies which have permitted broadcasting supports these positive expectations. Any observer of legislatures around the world recognizes that broadcasting has not had the negative effects foreseen by its critics. Television broadcasting is carried on in the Alberta and the Ontario legislatures on an ad hoc basis by the media. Nova Scotia has permitted experimental television broadcasts. Recently, the Quebec government has indicated that broadcasting of the proceedings of the Quebec assembly may become a reality in the near future.

At the international level, broadcasting is even more prevalent. Television broadcasting has taken place at the United Nations for some time, and a total of 21 national parliaments permit either live or recorded television broadcasts. Radio broadcasting, still a very important facet of communication, has been permitted by a number of national parliaments in addition to those permitting television broadcasts. Members of the House will, of course, know that the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-the Islands (Mr. Douglas) deserves recognition as a pioneer of radio broadcasting for his role in initiating radio broadcasts of the Saskatchewan legislature over 30 years ago.

Turning to the matter of production and control of the "electronic Hansard", several points must be made. First, production is to take place on the same basis as the present production of the written reports; that is, under the authority of the House as exercised by Mr. Speaker. The standing committee chose this option over control by the media or some external body or enterprise. The reason is clear: only supervision of production by the House itself, through Mr. Speaker, can ensure that the record of the proceedings is complete and that parliament's traditions and procedures are respected.

The second point about the proposed system is that though parliament would assume responsibility for producing the official "electronic Hansard", it would not assume responsibility for the editing of broadcasts by the media. It would not be consistent with the freedom of the press for parliament or the government of the day to attempt to direct how and when use should be made of the broadcasts. Though some members may hold reservations about the impartiality of the media, it is clear that editing by parliament would create controversy and confusion and, at the same time, impose a form of censorship undesirable in our democracy. Thus, parliament would produce the basic material, in both official languages, as it now does the printed Hansard. But broadcasters, educators and researchers would use the material according to their requirements. This would, of course, be subject to insistence by parliament that its fundamental rights and privileges be observed, as it is now the case with the written reports.

My third point about the proposed system concerns the distribution of the "electronic Hansard",. In the initial stages of the implementation of the resolution, parliament will be brought to Canadians primarily over the existing radio and television networks and private stations. The major Canadian networks have already indicated their interest, and it is reasonable to expect that they will fill the very valuable role of showing parliament on news, public affairs and documentary programs. Looking at the longer term, the report of the standing committee dealt with possible means for broadcasting, on a national basis, as comprehensive a record of the proceedings as possible, to give the public the opportunity to view the proceedings without intermediate editing by the media. The government endorses the principle that Canadians should be given direct access to the proceedings. Of course, many technical and practical problems will have to be worked out before such transmission becomes a reality, and it is likely that this will be one of the later stages in the implementation of the resolution.

Looking ahead, then, when the motion is adopted, the committee will be set up and charged with supervising the installation of production facilities, examining the distribution needs of the media and members themselves, and reviewing methods of ensuring that the rights and privileges of parliament are preserved.

Though broadcasting would not begin the day after the adoption of the motion, televising of special occasions, such as the budget debate, by temporary equipment would be possible almost immediately, and work on installation of the permanent system should be well under way by the end of the summer recess.

I do not intend to describe at this moment the nature of the production facilities which are envisaged, since I understand other members wish to comment on this subject in some detail. Let me say simply that technological innovations in recent years have made it possible to instal a completely remote-controlled system in which neither cameras nor production personnel would be visible, and to light the House without causing the physical discomfort we have experienced on occasions in the past.

Finally, I should like to deal with the question of cost. The feasibility study undertaken by the CBC, and tabled in the House, estimated capital cost for installing the production facilities at $3,269,000. The annual operating cost was estimated at $935,000. These costs are considerable, but let us not use this as a red-herring argument against broadcasting. At present, the total annual printing bill for parliament is approximately $3 million, $2 million of which is accounted for by printing the debates of the House, the Order Paper and Votes and Proceedings.

Clearly, the operating cost for broadcasting, at less than half parliament's annual printing cost, cannot be considered a serious impediment. Broadcasts could reach millions, while Hansard has a circulation of under 14,000. In terms of percentage increase in the cost of operating parliament, broadcasting costs would amount to an approximate 1.7 per cent increase in the present total of $56 million.

I have no doubt we will hear complaints during the debate about how broadcasting will end traditions here. Yet, while listening to arguments about privileges and rights we should bear in mind remarks of Edward Blake, a most distinguished parliamentarian and a member of the government that instituted the printed Hansard. He said:

The privileges of parliament are the privileges of the people and the rights of parliament are the rights of the people.

Now that broadcasting is technically possible, we cannot ignore our responsibility to the Canadian people—the responsibility to allow them the fullest knowledge of what is being done on their behalf here in parliament. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the House can move rapidly to a favourable decision and that we can move ahead in a very fundamental innovation in the operation of the Canadian parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in the last portion of his speech the minister quoted Edward Blake. In looking across to the other side of the chamber day by day I am reminded of Disraeli who, when looking at the treasury benches, saw before him a row of extinct volcanoes. When I look across to this government, what I see reminds me of a mud flat after the tide has gone out.

I listened with some interest to the minister's speech. I am somewhat amused by this government's issuing a clarion call for openness in parliament. This, from the mouth of the government House leader, is really a blasphemy considering what the government's attitude has been toward openness in government, in parliament, in answering questions or anything else with regard to providing a look into the operations of government by we whom the government House leader described as the representatives of the people.

Aside from its dullness, the speech is a list of pious platitudes from this government which speaks in the name of openness—believe it or not, this government that denied to this House a full debate on Viet Nam during the course of the twenty-ninth parliament. When that debate, which was called by the minister's predecessor, got a little hot, it was immediately cut off. The government has asked the opposition to debate national issues such as unemployment on its opposition days. It volunteered no initiative itself. The government has not given the House of Commons and, therefore, the people of Canada, an opportunity to discuss for even one day the cold ramifications arising from our position as a nation in the world in terms of foreign affairs. The government House leader is a former foreign affairs minister. Perhaps that is the reason we have not had the debate on that point.

This move by the government at this time is just so much hypocrisy. It is shrouded in the swaddling-cloth of questionable piety, on the one hand, and synthetic rectitude on the other.

We are back, after a parliamentary recess, faced with about the same legislative wasteland that we faced before we left. In terms of the order paper, after a month there is nothing new that shows itself. It is not even worth opening. It would not even be interesting to a student of the history of this time. There is nothing that faces us in this House except the fact that it is becoming glaringly apparent that the government wasted the recess. That is not to say they did not communicate with us. I received a letter, today, dated Friday, January 21. It was not delivered to my office this morning, or on the weekend; it was delivered to me in the House today. It states:

In managing the business of the House, I have in mind that members can give effective representation to their electors only if they have adequate and frequent contact with them.

Has anyone thought that the government might have done a little bit of work at Christmas? After all, the government are paid extra salaries with respect to this matter. It then states:

If the House continues to move at its pre-Christmas pace, I fear that there will be even less time available for members to spend among their constituents.

Isn't that a great way to start off a session?

Mr. MacEachen: You had better table the letter, now that you have read it.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to table the letter. I have copies of it here. Unfortunately, I do not have it in both official languages, but it would be equally offensive in both official languages. It goes on to state:

As a first planning step, we should attempt to agree on the completion of the 13 items on which the House has already taken some time.

Historic sites—is that what the government House leader has in mind as business to occupy us in this period of restraint when, notwithstanding the platitudes of the government, people are having trouble with respect to the fight against inflation? Almost 800,000 people in this country are unemployed. There are 82,000 more people unemployed now than there were last August. Is that the issue of priority?

The first step is for the government to make up its mind as to what are its priorities. In taking that first step there might be other things more relevant than the particular matter before us today. This is management by the managers, the technocrats, the men and women who pride themselves on being able to manage the economy, the House, and people's lives, the so-called indispensibles who have led us into an economic valley of the shadows. The government has demonstrated today its inability to solve anything, even to settle priorities for itself and rise to the challenges which face us. It cannot even order the priorities of this House responsibly. Even the most ardent apologist for the government is embarrassed by what has happened in the first part of this session, and equally embarrassed by the sense of priority shown in the designation of government business today.

It is important that the public should know the government's priorities. There is no evidence of any intention, for example, to bring forward a freedom of information act, which ought to be the cornerstone of the open government to which lip service was given in the pieties which have been expressed on the other side; this is something for which my hon. friend from Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) has called repeatedly.

Let me make this clear: the prospect of the broadcasting of our proceedings has a wholesome, tantalizing effect upon me. Frankly, I should like to see such broadcasting started in the public accounts committee when we are dealing with the foolishness of government, when we are dealing, let us say, with a report of the Auditor General. I would love to have seen the television cameras in the House when the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) was trying to justify the appointment of a royal commission on a royal commission. I would love to have seen television in the House of Commons when the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) asked the House to accept that the expenditure of $740,000 of public funds was a worthy price to be paid for his meanderings across the country to preach the gospel. He could do this in living colour and we would catch the blush on his cheek. It would be a wonderful thing to see him standing there with all the apparent innocence of a newly-laid egg.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): If broadcasting is to be the order of the day, we must debate it. But I hope the government does not believe the people of Canada will be fooled by this parliamentary diversion. They see their country going to hell in a hand-basket, aided and abetted by a government which is suffering from an acute case of the political DT's.

It is obvious that television is, really, the meat of the debate. Television is a many-faceted medium. On the one hand, it trivializes matters of importance, and on the other it can elevate the rare or the unrepresentative to omnipresent reality. All of this is paid for by distorting our evaluation of our own needs and confusing our judgment as consumers. Yet the very people who curse at commercials and sterile programming assume that television's intrusion into everything is either natural or inevitable. That is the remarkable thing about the present debate: except for a number of concerned people in this chamber, a debate on the subject of broadcasting House proceedings could hardly be said to exist. Our constituents believe that television is coming to the House. They are not interested in the argument for it or against it. They want to be able to watch it when it comes—and many of us suspect they will probably turn it off soon afterward. I suggest it is this sentiment of inevitability, as much as any conclusive debate, which will bring television into this chamber.

With a considerable number of reservations which I and those who follow me will put on the record, we will support the main object of the motion. Indeed, it is difficult to counter the weight of the argument that the people have a right to see and hear what is happening in parliament. But there are some deep reservations felt in this place and elsewhere, and I intend to express some of them in the form of an amendment. In particular, we protest vehemently the manner in which broadcasting is being introduced. The motion amounts to a strictly "take it or leave it" proposition, and we know that those opposite have been instructed to take such an attitude.

There are two fundamental questions to be dealt with. First: If the proceedings of this chamber are to be broadcast, by what process will broadcasting be implemented, and how will the innovation be evaluated? Second: What will be the effect of bringing into a chamber, whose chief purpose is to deal thoroughly with detailed and complex business, a medium which is judged by its ability to entertain? I want to deal with the second question first. We have to be concerned whether the selective cameras will give an accurate picture of what is really happening on the floor of the House. Despite our rules, it sometimes happens that more than one person is speaking at once, or is competing for the attention of the Speaker by a process which is somewhat undignified. Mr. Ward, the Associate Editor of Hansard, has made a comment with respect to that matter which I should like all hon. members to read. However, the question of the camera's view is the smallest part of our concern: the use made of film by various news editors will be the most important cause of concern to us all. What will those editors look for? Will they look for evidence of hard work, careful preparation, intelligence, persistence, perception? Or will they look for excitement and drama—and, in the process, attempt to create it? Will the questioner be in the evening news film clip, or will it be just the minister replying, however reluctantly? A need will arise, so far unfulfilled in the print media, for commentators who understand our procedures; and we must assert that those procedures are not irrelevant simply because they are complicated.

If television does bring about a change in our chamber—as many hope, and some fear—will that change be for the better or for the worse? Will we get along with it a freedom of information bill to provide the depth in our debates which people will expect, or shall we merely be driven to shorter speeches for the sake of better television as opposed to better debate? We must hope—I certainly hope—that television and the public reaction to it will not compel us to sit here during the discussion of business which does not immediately concern us and at times when we should be in our offices or in committee discussing things which do.

There is an expectation that television will highlight our so-called archaic rules. I imagine the government looks forward, as a result, to acquiring more power because the exercise of power is more entertaining than the tedious process of probing, delaying, exposing and qualifying, which is the task of the opposition. I assure the government that we shall continue to discuss rule changes which will give parliament the power to provide those checks on executive action which it is the purpose of parliament to provide, but that we shall resist any change which confuses relevancy with entertainment.

If I have been expressing anything, I have been expressing the doubts of one forced to run across unknown fields when prudence and experience dictate that we walk. We grow weary of watching the government advance with blind and extravagant confidence, and then retreat with banners flying, and public relations men trumpeting as though predictable defeat was justified by blatant confession.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to emphasize that our reservations are put forward on behalf of the institution of parliament. As a party, we feel that the government's rashness will be its own undoing. Viewers are bound to tire of the government's persistent assertion that the release to parliamentarians of studies done at public expense is, somehow, never in the public interest. They will demand more than slick answers in the question period, and will wonder at the casual passing to powerless parliamentary secretaries of important policy questions, which we saw today. They will be astonished to see billions of dollars of estimates whisked through after only cursory examination. That is the effect of the rules of this House now. It is going to make very depressing television for Canadians. I think it will be so depressing to them that the advent of television—and I support it for more than just this reason—is likely to speed the Liberal party's demise and its removal into a period of rest, which it deserves beyond measure.

Perhaps for all of us our constituents will appreciate the grinding tasks that we must perform, and perhaps they will come to reject as inadequate analysis the fashionable cynicism purveyed about us from time to time. I hope that will be the case. In short, Mr. Speaker, we must hope that good television and good parliamentary democracy are natural companions. We will have to wait and see, though, because no one in this chamber can predict that.

Will television bring out the best, or the worst, about this institution, or make no difference at all? That should be a sobering question for parliamentarians, and it is a shame that in the resolution as it is now framed we will not have the chance seriously to study the possibilities.

We are not without forerunners in this experiment, and we are not compelled to jump into broadcasting with all its unknowns. In Alberta, viewer ratings are so low that the networks are discussing turning over the broadcasts to the educational channel. In Nova Scotia, where a three-week experiment in televising the proceedings took place in 1971, no one has made any further demands for its continuance. In Ontario, where cameras have been admitted to the legislature, very little actual coverage takes place. In B.C., after many reports on the subject recommending broadcaster access, the government indicates that they have no immediate plans to allow television in the House.

As well, these arguments are related to the type of coverage that is, in the end, permitted. Saskatchewan has had radio broadcasts of House proceedings for almost 30 years with very little negative consequence. Television brings its own impact, but radio, in fact, may not. Perhaps the only clear message in all of these pro and con arguments is the need to discuss carefully, and introduce slowly, any major broadcasting efforts. Even the most trivial change in our rules seems to get more attention than is implicit in the resolution that is before the House with respect to broadcasting.

Where, for example, is a study on the implications of this move for parliamentary privilege? We can accept the platitudes of the government House leader, but where is the study and where are the conclusions? Is parliament to take part in this, or is it all to be done in the privy council office? Should we not have a committee report on our vulnerability to libel and slander laws before approving this motion? Will we be restricted in what we say, and to what extent? Conversely, what protections will other Canadians have from televised slanders? There is a vast difference between an intemperate remark in this House which may be buried in Hansard, on the one hand, and an insulting or libellous phrase broadcast on national television.

Where, too, is the chance for us to determine whether this is the most cost-effective way of providing broadcast facilities? The government House leader says the sum of $3.5 million will be the cost, but it will probably be more than double that. One million dollars is required for operating expenses. I hate to use the word, but I am sure it is a "conservative" estimate. What we are doing here, Mr. Speaker, really is subsidizing the networks. We have no idea whether MPs will be happy with the facilities or whether or not the networks will use them to any significant extent. Are there no cheaper alternatives? What chance have we to ask the networks how they plan to use the films? Does the government intend to ask the networks whether they plan to contribute to the cost so that the burden will not all fall on the public purse?

Not only do we have no committee stage before we are faced with the motion, but the motion itself in its very terms is a study in obscurity. It proposes to establish broadcasting "on the basis of principles similar to those that govern the publication of the printed official reports of debates". What are these principles, Mr. Speaker? Obviously, not all the principles that apply to Hansard can apply to broadcasting. MPs cannot send the electronic Hansard out to their constituents to provoke interest or clear the record. There can be no in-House editing. We cannot append anything to it. An electronic Hansard is primarily for the use of the media, and not the member, and there can be no greater deviation in principle than that. It is something that this House as an institution ought to consider.

According to the motion, we also get a committee, not to estimate the need or set the method, not to evaluate performance or hear complaints, but simply to supervise the implementation. Is that the only term of reference? When is the implementation stage deemed to be finished? More seriously, we wonder if its deliberations are of any use at all because the Privy Council, in making the technical decisions, has probably now decided the ethical questions as well.

Why cannot we make what may be a far-reaching change one step at a time? Would it not be more logical to discuss this fully in a committee with the power to make judgments on whether we broadcast at all, and if so, how? It does not seem right to me that the executive should make, on behalf of the House, a decision which could have an enormous effect in its outcome on the way the House, is proceeding.

A committee of parliamentarians should have been established as a first step. Some will say, as the House leader said, that a committee was established in 1972. He said it in such a way as if that committee had finally and completely made recommendations respecting not only the principle but now it was to be implemented. If that is what he meant by what he said in his speech, then I say with regret that he misled the House, though I am sure he did so inadvertently. I ought now to remind the House of what in fact that committee did recommend in 1972. I will simply read that committee's recommendation. It was as follows:

Your committee, while agreeing in principle with radio and television broadcasting of the proceedings of legislative assemblies and their committees, believes that certain further steps should be taken before a final report is made and therefore recommends:

(a) That a cost and technical study of building, equipment, personnel and other requirements consequent upon the introduction of radio and television broadcasting of the House of Commons and its committees be undertaken in consultation with this committee—

This has not been done. No subsequent committee has been consulted, and the technical studies are internal documents. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, not one member of parliament has received those internal documents, yet we are asked to deal with this matter.

Mr. MacEachen: They have been tabled.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The second part of that recommendation—

Mr. Reid: They have been tabled.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): All right, so they have been tabled. The recommendation continues:

(b) That closed-circuit experimental broadcasts by radio and television of the proceedings of the House and its committees be undertaken in consultation with this committee—

I think that is an equally sensible suggestion, but it has been ignored by the government in this present proposal. The recommendation continues:

(c) That your committee be authorized, in the light of the above-mentioned studies and experiments, to make further recommendations to the House for ultimate decision.

Not the executive branch, Mr. Speaker, but a standing committee of the House of Commons. I think the committee hit on the logical sequence. The tabling of those documents may have taken care of the first, but the second and third remain outstanding and are relevant. First, careful study by a committee of the implications of broadcasting, followed by an experiment. We might have tried radio and then television, for their advantages and disadvantages are by no means identical. Finally, we should have a chance to evaluate the experiment—not after people have forgotten about it, not when new initiatives must be taken to raise the topic again, but before expensive, long-term commitments have been made and after people have had a chance to watch it, conscious of its status as an experiment.

The committee on procedure and organization of the twenty-eighth parliament was worth listening to only when it proposed changes in the rules that would accrue to the advantage of the government. Apparently it was not worth listening to when it declared the virtues of careful thought and cautious progress.

In supporting this resolution in principle we on this side of the House are hoping that the most optimistic predictions about broadcasting will be realized. We accept that at its best television can educate people to the complexities of politics, of public issues and to the duties of citizenship. Televised proceedings have the potential to give viewers a better idea of reality than the hurried summations of reporters or the reworked and revised opinions we give downstairs at the scrum. People will have a chance to see that although there are elements of comedy and occasionally tragedy in this place, it operates mostly on hard work and long hours. Both criticism and praise for this institution and its members will have a firmer foundation.

As I said before, any reforms forced from outside may rebound to the benefit of parliament and not the executive. The need for a freedom of information bill will become obvious, as will the importance of real control by this House and its members of the estimates of the spending of government.

We should be willing to promote the maximum degree of public access compatible with our need to discuss seriously the nation's business, but there should be no confusion in our minds. This is not a step toward an open parliament. We already have that. It is, rather, a step toward an illustrated parliament. For if we are to have openness in this country, and if we are to have openness in respect of this government, more courageous action is required by the government, and that action we eagerly await. But from what we have heard in the last few days, we are, perhaps, not about to get it.

There are members in this party around me who advocated broadcasting House proceedings long before this motion was presented and, in fact, long before my predecessor in Grenville-Carleton led the original committee investigation. There are also people who have always had strong objections; objections which I do not think were considered as they should have been by those who drafted this peremptory motion. In a debate that concerns the nature—and I underline the word "nature"—of our roles as parliamentarians, we should not pretend to an artificial unanimity which does not exist.

A Progressive Conservative administration will view television in this House as an experiment. We will do what should be done by this motion, that is, set up the machinery for evaluation and review and decide whether to continue and, if so, on what basis. In the meantime, sir, it is unfortunate but true that what the predecessor to the present government House leader said on October 28, 1976, would occur has not in fact occurred. The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp), in an interview by William MacPherson of the Ottawa Citizen on that date, stated that the new resolution would contain all the proposed safeguards against interference with MPs privileges, something that is not evident in the present resolution nor the ones that he himself, as former House leader, put on the record.

We can speculate that the government is withholding these protections to which I have referred in my speech in terms of this resolution for some reasons of its own. I happen to think—and I hope this view is shared by people who care very much about this institution—that the reservations in the report of the committee of 1972 meant something and that the report of 1972 is not yet closed.

For these reasons and the reasons I have discussed, which will be expanded upon by other members of this House, I should like to propose an amendment to the resolution before us. I move, therefore, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

> That the motion be amended by striking out all the words after the word "that" in the second paragraph, and substituting therefor the following:
> "The cost and technical studies of building, equipment, personnel and other requirements consequent upon the introduction of radio and television broadcasting of the House of Commons and its committees be referred to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization for study and report, and
> That the committee examine the possible effect of broadcasting on the rights and immunities of members of the House and the rights and protections due to the public, such examination to include the subject matter of any relevant report made to the House by the special committee on the rights and immunities of members, and
> That experimental broadcasts by radio and television of the proceedings of the House and its committees be undertaken in consultation with the committee, and
> That the committee be authorized, in the light of such studies and experiments, to make further recommendations to the House before permanent broadcasting facilities are installed.

While that motion is being delivered to you, Mr. Speaker, I would ask for the unanimous consent of the House to the tabling of the letter referred to during the course of the debate which was requested for tabling by the government House leader.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. In respect of this last point I would bring to the attention of hon. members that according to Standing Order 41(2) the tabling of documents can only be done by ministers of the Crown or by parliamentary secretaries. Let me refer hon. members to citation 159(3) of Beauchesne's fourth edition which reads as follows:

> It has been admitted that a document which has been cited ought to be laid upon the table of the House, if it can be done without injury to the public interest. The same rule, however, cannot be held to apply to private letters or memoranda.

The hon. member is seeking leave as a private member to table a letter which he has not really identified to the Chair. Of course, the Chair is under the impression that it is a letter which was sent by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) to hon. members of the House, but it has not been identified as such. Of course, the House is the master of its own rules, but based on previous rulings by Mr. Speaker Lamoureux I would even hesitate to seek unanimous consent for the proposal of the hon. member to table the letter. I base that on a ruling of Mr. Speaker Lamoureux of March 20, 1973, as follows:

> The rules do not, of course, provide for the tabling of documents, even official documents or so-called confidential documents, quoted in the House by private members. The rule only applies when such a document is quoted in debate by members of the government. It cannot apply to hon. members generally. The suggestion is very often made in debate, when hon. members refer to or quote from a document, that the document in question be tabled. Certainly we would become involved in a very complicated practice, a practice which could easily lead to abuse, if we made it possible for members generally to table documents. I think that is not the purpose of the rule dealing with the tabling of documents.

At this point the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) sought permission to ask the House for its unanimous consent. Mr. Speaker then added to his comments the following:

● (1610)

Obviously there is not unanimous agreement. In any case I would hesitate to seek the unanimous consent of the House to allow a private member to table a document. I doubt whether this would be a good practice in which to become involved.

In any case, the House is master of its own rules and, as I have said, so as not to open the door to the tabling of any documents by any hon. members in the House perhaps I could make a suggestion which could be acceptable to the House. Perhaps by consent we could attach the letter to today's Hansard.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I did not mean to cause a fuss, Mr. Speaker; I was only responding to the shouts from the other side to table it. I am sorry that we will not have it. If that is a suggestion that you are putting to me, sir, I will certainly withdraw the request. I would be delighted to have the letter attached to today's Hansard. I think it will be a very interesting document as we move into this session.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there consent to having the letter referred to by the hon. member attached as an appendix to today's Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There does not seem to be unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Where are the cameras?

Mr. Alexander: Give us your first official statement as whip, Gus.

An hon. Member: Spineless!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Coming back to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), it is my feeling that it might be preferable for the Chair to take it under advisement, because at first glance I am hesitant to accept it in its present form. At the same time, I might read paragraph 6 of citation 202 which reads as follows:

It is not an amendment to a motion to move that the question go to a committee.

Farther on, paragraph 15 of the same citation reads:

An amendment approving part of a motion and disapproving the remainder is out of order.

I have the impression, after quickly reading the amendment proposed by the hon. member, that it might have this effect. So I would prefer to look at it more closely and give a ruling later. In the meantime, if the House agrees, I will call on the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) to continue the debate. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I should say at the outset that I almost lost a bet. Earlier today I discussed with a colleague my concern that the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada so far has been able to go through this parliament without taking a stand on any issue. I said that I believe this will continue, and the colleague said, "No, you watch; they will come down definitively and unequivocally on the television debate issue".

I listened with great care to the House leader of the Conservative party speaking, and for the first three-quarters of his speech I said to myself, "My goodness, I have lost my bet; they will make up their minds on this issue." He gave all the arguments in favour of adopting television and radio broadcasting of the proceedings of this chamber to bring it up to this point in the twentieth century. However, I then heaved a great sigh of relief because I won my bet. The House leader of the Conservative party produced an amendment which completely contradicted everything he had said. If the House accepts the force of the amendment put forward by the hypocritical Conservative party, this committee will look into the cost of applying broadcasting to the House; it will look into its effects on the rights and immunities of all members of the House; and it will have the right to make further recommendations and, presumably, the right to kill the whole idea.

In short, what the Conservative party wants, as usual, is to have it both ways. They want to be able to trot out all the nice arguments in favour of something, but instead of having the guts to follow it through and maybe take some flack about some bad aspects, they withdraw and say, "Let us have the committee do what in fact two committees of the House have done already in two parliaments, in two sessions, that is, look into the whole issue of broadcasting the proceedings in the House." I have heard a lot of hypocrisy from the Conservative party, but they outdid themselves today. I can say that we will have nothing to do with that absurd amendment, even if Your Honour rules it is in order.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Anything like that from you is a compliment.

Mr. Broadbent: We hear a front-bencher of the Conservative party, who recently discovered there was unemployment in Canada, say, "Look at what the Gallup poll said". That is the gist of his comment. The implication is that my party has remained at 16 per cent and his party has gone up. Of course I want my party to go up in popularity, but I tell the hon. member that I and my colleagues were elected to the House of Commons not to play popularity games, not to be cynical on both sides of this issue, but to take a stand. We will defend the government today, and we do not mind doing that when they are right. I say to the hon. member that his party has remained in almost perpetual opposition in this century in the House of Commons, certainly since the Second World War. The fact that it does not have the intellectual and moral fortitude to come down on issues perhaps has a lot to do with that.

Having said these words about the official opposition and its great resolution to come to grips with policy, I want to say also that having spent some time prior to this weekend touring part of the province from which the government House leader comes, that section of Cape Breton where 30 per cent of the labour force is out of work, having come from Newfoundland where 30 per cent, in real terms, of the adult population is out of work, having learned that in six months alone 20,000 Newfoundlanders have given up looking for work and have withdrawn from the labour market, and having listened to the President of the United States who campaigned in the past year on the basis that in his country unemployment was the number one economic issue and has decided that his administration would allocate billions of dollars to deal with unemployment, I was disgusted as a Canadian member of parliament to hear last weekend that the government, after four weeks of sitting back during the Christmas recess, and during that time hearing another forecast that unemployment in Canada in 1977 was going to be the highest at any time since World War II; and, the highest since World War II, I repeat, to the House leader who comes from a province that suffers from unemployment—

An hon. Member: Get back to the bill.

Mr. Broadbent: I am coming to the bill very soon, Mr. Speaker, because I am going to say that one of the advantages of television will be for the people of Canada to see the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) of this land get up, as he did today in the House when he was asked about unemployment, shrug his shoulders and turn to a parliamentary secretary to answer the question.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: How can you defend such a government?

Mr. Broadbent: I say to the government that if they do not smarten up soon they will be out on their collective asses. That is where they will be in terms of the concern of the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Remember that, Allan.

Mr. Broadbent: The government House leader smiles. I ask him to go back to Cape Breton and talk to the workers in the Toyota plant who, as he probably knows, have been out of work for 11 months, men whose average age is about 40. They have been 11 months without employment and without any action by this government. Let him explain to them how he can bring in today this kind of bill.

● (1620)

Do hon. members know what bill the government is going to introduce next? It is a bill concerning the metric application to agriculture. That is the second priority. The first measure the government brings in is this measure, which any sane person in the twentieth century will accept. We are not going to dilly-dally around and shilly-shally like the Tories. We accept the committee report. We accept its recommendations. The Tories supported it in committee; now they are backing down again. We support the idea. But why could the government not come in today and recognize, as the President of the United States has recognized for some time, that this continent is in trouble? It is in trouble, but hon. members opposite sit and do nothing. They sit and do not care. I suspect they are sitting and hoping for the American economy to turn around and bail them out before the 1978 election. In the meantime, 800,000 Canadians go without jobs.

I conclude that the government has the wrong set of priorities, but that could be illustrated in a rather democratic way if we had television and radio brought into this House. We accept unequivocally—not in a qualified way—the recommendation in the resolution which has been brought before the House today for debate. I would have thought that the Tory members would have learned something from the experience in the Ontario legislature. The experience there has illustrated that there is no problem with television if implemented along the lines under which it is proposed to implement it under this resolution with a committee chaired by the Speaker of this House. Another legislature, the Tory legislature of Alberta, has had its proceedings broadcast and there have been no problems concerning the rights and immunities of members to which the federal Tories refer in their amendment. The experience in Canada and in countries abroad which have introduced radio and television has been positive.

Mr. Kempling: What is the rush?

Mr. Broadbent: The Tories ask, "What is the rush?" The Tories have had a hell of a time getting into the twentieth century, and they say that anyone wanting to get us into the latter part is rushing it. The result of the experience in other legislatures has been a feeling that an updating of media coverage is long overdue.

Not many people subscribe to or read Hansard. It is an important document, but it does not have immediate relevance to most people. Most people read the press, and fortunately the press has reported parliamentary proceedings from the outset. We have had radio for a long time, and I am pleased that the government House leader gave credit where it is due to one of my predecessors, a former leader of this party. When he was premier of the province of Saskatchewan, he did not hesitate or equivocate. He was the first premier in this land to introduce radio, which was then the new and expanding medium, to cover the proceedings of the legislature. That was 30 years ago. We are 30 years behind.

So by all means let us proceed with this resolution. We are not going to put up a series of debaters. We are not going to support an amendment which would delay its passage. We want it passed and implemented so that the people of Canada can have access to the proceedings of this House which they should have had many years ago.

I want to make two straightforward points about the advantages of broadcasting House proceedings. It will enable the people of Canada, by way of radio or television, to see the adequate or inadequate performance of government or opposition members. I have confidence that with the supervision of the proposed committee the proceedings will be covered in a fair way, but if they are not in terms of technical requirements, hon. members can be sure that the people sitting up in the gallery covering this debate today will make it known. If the government of the day which has administrative responsibility is somehow distorting from a technical point of view the coverage of the proceedings, that will become known. I have no fear on that score at all. The people of Canada would be able to see the good and the bad performances on both sides of this House directly through television or to hear them on radio.

Second, on occasions of very great political importance in the history of this country, too frequently in the recent past the Prime Minister has said he could not come to parliament first to make important statements. Either time has not permitted or there has been some other rationalization given requiring him to go directly to television or to radio, thereby denying an important parliamentary right. We often hear bogus and phony arguments about parliamentary rights and privileges. In my experience, 80 per cent of them are bogus and phony. However, some of them are not and one of these, in my view, has been the traditional practice in our kind of democracy, dating back at least 100 years, for the prime minister to make major announcements or statements in the House and to inform the leaders of the opposition parties of such statements in advance, normally giving advance copies so that they can have a minimum amount of time to prepare a sensible response, especially in times of national crisis.

As I have said, on a number of occasions in very recent history—the most recent one being the election of a Parti Quebecois government in the province of Quebec—the Prime Minister did not make his initial statement in this House and receive the response of the democratically elected opposition, but went directly to television. I regret having to say that there were no advance copies given to the leaders of the opposition parties so that their responses on television at that time could be based on a careful analysis of what he had to say.

By bringing television and radio directly into the House, it seems to me that short of a response to a declaration of war—and presumably that should also be made in the House—I cannot think, off the top of my head, of any circumstances in which the prime minister of the day, once we get television and radio into this House, could not make his statement to this central, democratic body which is crucial to the democratic history of this country. If this is the argument the Tories were really concerned about—and I have no doubt in my mind that they were simply quibbling—and if they are concerned about parliamentary rights and privileges, the bringing of broadcast facilities to the House will heighten, not diminish, them.

There would be no excuse for the prime minister of the day to speak to the people by going outside this chamber. The technical facilities would be here. He would be able to get to his feet and make the government's case, and the leader of the official opposition of the time, and the leaders of other opposition parties, would then have the opportunity to respond in this democratic forum. The sense of real participation would be heightened because some 20 million viewers in the country would be able to see a democratic debate taking place in a way which has never been known in our history.

In conclusion, we support this motion. We will have nothing to do with the Tory hypocrisy. We regret the measure was brought in at this time instead of serious economic measures, but let us get on with the debate, let us pass the resolution and go on to more basic, important economic questions.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, instead of advocating economic measures, the government is presenting this motion about the broadcasting of our proceedings as a high priority. The motion is as follows:

That this House approves the radio and television broadcasting of its proceedings and of the proceedings of its committees on the basis of principles similar to those that govern the publication of the printed official reports of debates:

Consequently, Mr. Speaker, it is without knowing neither the technical aspects nor the way our proceedings will be broadcast that we should accept such a measure in principle so that the Canadian public knows what is happening and what approach Parliament is taking to the various problems facing our fellow citizens.

Of course, our party is favourable, in principle, to an extensive broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons. We are not worried at all by such a measure. On the contrary, the more Canadians realize the inefficiency of Parliament the more will they know that we spend days and days debating secondary matters whereas major problems such as those relating to the dairy policy, the review of the banking system or the unemployment rate are not discussed in the House of Commons but simply awarded. For example, the workers of the textile industry see that they are systematically losing their jobs, in Sherbrooke, in Quebec City, in Louiseville and in Drummondville—

An hon. Member: Because of imports . . .

Mr. Fortin: —because this government protects and encourages imports. Consequently, Mr. Speaker, the more Canadians will realize these facts, the better for democracy in our country. In the interest of our country, it is urgent that Canadians realize how we are losing our time in the House. I regret to say so but it is true.

Mr. Speaker, milk producers in Quebec are now systematically stopping their operations. They are penalized because they have worked. And instead of solving this problem the government goes on letting dairy products and secondary dairy products enter our country and gives high priority to measures concerning the metric system and the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House. Mr. Speaker, to my mind this is sheer inconsistency.

Moreover, at a time when our country has no industrial strategy not only to alleviate unemployment but also to protect existing jobs everywhere in the country, we are asked to discuss, on the first day of 1977 after the winter recess, a subject that we have been discussing since 1967. We talked about it again in 1969. We talked about it agin in 1970 it is still dragging on. So, it is not that urgent.

Mr. Speaker, I am simply saying that it is a shame and that we are not prepared to write a blank cheque the way the government is asking us, that is accepting in a way the principle of broadcasting the debates of the House of Commons since we do not know the practical rules, nor do we know the financial implications of such a proposal, nor do we know the procedural adjustments this would bring in the House. That is why, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my party I want to assure the other members of this House of the cooperation of our party when it comes to implementing the broadcasting of the debates.

We want to give the following warnings forthwith: first, we will have to change since the government wants to discuss that topic, since the government does not consider it important to review unemployment, the dairy policy or textile imports and the 50,000 unemployed in Quebec who are not entitled to benefits because the minister is mixed up. Mr. Speaker, let us have a small 10 minute discussion on that. For example when ministers come in and decide to make a statement in the House and do not have the courtesy to give members of the opposition a copy of the statement, they voluntarily put us in an impossible situation in the sense that they are asking us to reply on a technical statement without any preparation and without a copy of the statement, and that puts every one of my colleagues in a position that is absolutely ridiculous and unacceptable.

Before we accept to have all or part of the debates broadcast we should have a written guarantee on co-operation or the obligation to cooperate with respect to the statements made in this House, and in both official languages, Mr. Speaker. Sometimes ministers table statements in one language but some of us do not read English or do not understand it or would feel more at ease in their mother tongue. They brag about wanting to make this country bilingual but fail to act accordingly even in the House of Commons. I say this is a right that members of the opposition have. If television gets into this House, as we want it to in principle, and if ministers take advantage of it to try to prove to the public the incompetence of some members of the opposition by making technical statements at the last minute without giving us a copy of their remarks, the aim which is to better inform public through broadcasting becomes a mere political game in which they will try to distort the business of the House. Before we agree to allow TV cameras in this House, if we want the public to be well informed we shall also have to revise the oral question period. If the government wants to allow the broadcasting of the daily oral question period we shall seek assurance that the present distribution of questions, particularly supplementary questions, will be changed and adhered to.

Broadcasting House Proceedings

Today, Mr. Speaker, more than five supplementary questions have been put not by the same person on the official opposition side but by several other members. The matter of a better distribution has been discussed for a long time in this House, in several committees and with the Chair. We have always been favourable to a certain number of supplementaries by the same person who put the original question but not by other members. And if the right which is given to the Progressive Conservative party to ask supplementary questions when they did not put the original question, if the Chair gives this right to the Progressive Conservative party it should also be given to the Social Credit party of Canada because otherwise, Mr. Speaker, it will become a mere game. Again the situation is distorted as we are not treated equally and in such conditions we cannot accept to play the broadcasting game.

● (1640)

I find it difficult to understand, Mr. Speaker, how we could approve in principle the broadcasting of our debates. It would be a good thing in principle since it would enable the Canadian people to understand how our democracy works, to see the members of parliament at work, to see for themselves the action of the government in relation with specific problems. Because of television, the government will surely have to act more wisely and more quickly concerning the current problems facing our fellow citizens. Therefore, in principle, this would be a good thing.

Mr. Speaker, this can become reality only inasmuch as members of Parliament and the political parties represented in the House are truly treated on a equitable basis. The oral question period should be reviewed and better distributed. It is illogical to accept presenting such an image to the public when we are not treated equally in the House. This is a fundamental requirement!

We could also talk about the length of debates, Mr. Speaker. What exactly would be broadcast? Only the question period? Will the private members' hour, from 5 to 6, also be broadcast? This is an important period since this is when my colleagues of the Social Credit Party of Canada can often submit notices of motions or bills. This segment of the debates where we could show private members' business to the Canadian public, this period which is botched most of the time, shall we broadcast it? This is another of the things that we must know before giving our final agreement.

Mr. Speaker, in other words, the government is simply asking us in this resolution no. 8 to accept generally, without discussing technical questions like those that I have just mentioned, the need to broadcast our debates. Then the government suggests that we form a special committee to see to the implementation of this resolution.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps it would be wiser to select a committee to weigh and attempt to answer the questions I have just raised, before going through with the motion. As it were, the government House leader is suggesting we should put the cart before the horse. If we followed his suggestion, we would grant approval in principle without knowing where we are going. I think the government will understand our reluctance to give the motion unreserved approval without certain safeguards. It is important for Liberals, Conservatives or anyone else for that matter to realize that everything is possible in politics, and that broadcasting might eventually serve to rebuild the Liberals' image throughout the country.

Mr. Speaker, I believe this verges on politics. But before I conclude, there is something I want to put on record once more. I circulated across the country during the holidays, partly before, partly after. I went through the province, I saw people totally helpless, and industries shut down because there is no industrial strategy. My colleagues from Rimouski, from Roberval, from Bellechasse had the same experience. This applies throughout northwest Quebec. The feeling is that nobody is listening anymore.

Projecting Parliament's image will not solve unemployment. Nor will it prevent the flow of imports that are submerging our Canadian markets and constantly kill jobs here. Broadcasting will not give Canadians more amenities, nor will it change the Anti-inflation Act. What may I ask, is this motion No. 8 on broadcasting doing in the picture? It is a totally ridiculous priority. The government should realize that in addition to losing touch, they are now at a loss to understand Canadian problems and priorities.

I suggest to the government leader that we will not approve this motion so long as we have no absolute guarantee from the government that they will put forward practical policies for fighting unemployment, that they will develop an industrial strategy to protect existing jobs and control imports, so long in other words as we have no assurance that this government has a plan to manage the country and get it out of the current chaos.

Even if as a general principle this is acceptable, the government must understand that as far as members of the Social Credit Party are concerned, radio and television broadcasting of the proceedings of this chamber do not constitute a priority, but the economy does. We have been elected to represent the people, not to entertain them. It is indeed important to broadcast the parliamentary proceedings and it is important for Canadians to know how parliamentary work is done and to see what is taking place here, day after day, but as my colleague from Rimouski (Mr. Allard) said, it is even more important to give bread to Canadians and to the workers.

Mr. Speaker, for all these reasons I must let the government leader know that we are deeply disappointed with the priorities he set before us. I have in my hand this ridiculous list which he sent to the House leader of our party in which he complains about the inefficiency of the House of Commons. He recognizes it while putting the broadcasting of inefficient things as a top priority. This shows Canada that we badly need some leadership in our country, as there is a total lack of it now.

The government complains that we spend too much time discussing, but let us have a look at the list it sent us. Bill C-3, on the Canada Deposit Insurance Act; to date we have spent exactly 30 minutes debating it. Now, is that abuse? Bill C-8, on satisfied securities, we have debated exactly 13 minutes.

[Mr. Fortin.]

Bill C-12, on income tax agreements: we have discussed exactly 12 minutes. Bill C-5, on currency and exchange matters, we have studied for one hour and 40 minutes. And I could go on like this, Mr. Speaker, which shows that the government, while knowing the facts, tries to distort them. We too have those facts; we can prove to this House that its business is slowed down, not by the opposition but rather by a government that has no solution to put forward or to oppose to the various problems; and that, coming up against very serious ones indeed, it does not know how to approach them, it has no solution to suggest and that, consequently, it tries to accuse the House of Commons of inefficiency in an effort to cover up its own lack of leadership.

That is the fundamental reason why the government, on the very first sitting in 1977, without wanting to speak of the unemployment and other problems, imposes that ridiculous policy on us, Mr. Speaker, a policy that will change absolutely nothing, economically, for any Canadian, anywhere in Canada, quite content with entertaining the people to evade the problems.

Mr. Speaker, in closing, I should like to give the government one assurance and repeat that, in principle, we can only be in favour of televising the debates in this House thus enabling Canadians to be better informed; but before agreeing to passing this resolution in the House of Commons, Mr. Speaker, we will demand formal guarantees on some technical aspects, from the start. The leader of the government, who initiates the business of this House, will have to guarantee the changes I have just asked, concerning the oral question period, and the statements of the minister. We also have a number of other proposals to put forward in this respect. Otherwise, the government leader is venturing out into some sort of tower of Babel in which televising our debates will only perpetuate the downgrading of the role of public men in Parliament, since the rules of the game will not be fair and because all hon. members will not be put on an equal footing.

Mr. Speaker, in short we want the members for Rimouski, Roberval, Bellechasse, Shefford, Abitibi or Villeneuve (Messrs. Allard, Gauthier, Lambert, Rondeau, Laprise, Caouette) to be treated on an equal footing during the proceedings in this House, otherwise the government leader will realize that our co-operation is not quite a foregone conclusion.

[English]

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I very much appreciate the opportunity of speaking today on a subject that has been dear to my heart for some years, years long before I entered this House of Commons, years when I think I had an opportunity to learn about the power and the importance of modern electronics, radio and television.

In speeches I gave to constituents over the Christmas break, and in discussions I have had with colleagues for some five or six months, I have tried to argue that if Canada and Canada's parliament face crises today in the survival of the nation, if we face very real dilemmas such as the problem of inflation and the concurrent problem of increasing unemployment, that finally the real crisis of today in Canada is a communications crisis. The crisis is that Canadians in one part of our mosaic have no idea what Canadians in the other parts are all about.

The phrase "national unity" is not simply a phony or political word or phrase of propaganda. It is the foundation-stone upon which this country was built more than 100 years ago. It is the foundation upon which the future of this country now must be rebuilt. It is a question of a breakdown in communication so that regional disparities—the needs, the differences, languages, the background of various parts of Canada—are not understood by other parts of Canada. It is the communication breakdown that leads us to the crisis we face today.

From the beginning, the focal point of all these problems was discussed here in parliament. This is the place where it was funnelled down to. The narrow focal point of all our problems and how to correct them has been the Canadian House of Commons. It is here where we discuss and learn about problems faced by our colleagues from other parts of the country. It is here where I learn about prairie wheat, the problems of groundfish in the maritimes, the ambitions and desires of peoples in the Yukon, and the difficulties in northern Ontario because of pollution of the waterways. Indeed, it is here that I learn that people in Vancouver, Montreal, Halifax, Regina and Winnipeg may suffer problems even as I know my own people suffer in Toronto.

This is the focus where we, as members of parliament, as elected representatives, begin to understand the other parts of our country. We, as MPs, have to begin to appreciate the compromise. We must begin to come together and work out a pattern that is reasonable for all, if in each case specific to some. It is for that reason this debate does indeed have great importance. Television and radio in the House of Commons is a crucial first step in what I hope will become over a period of time a massive attack on the failure to communicate with the Canadian public and, thus, their inability to appreciate the great country that we have.

The Canadian public, by and large, does not know the existing laws of Canada. They do not begin to even understand what laws are before this parliament for change. They do not know what proposals are in the new laws that they might question. They are not well aware of what the opposition charges are flaws in the proposed changes which the government has put forward. Today, Mr. Speaker, the government of Canada, in putting forward its program, has the frustration of the public not appreciating the quality or goodness in that program and, in turn, the same public not being able to judge if there are, indeed, serious errors.

One of the great fears, I believe, of many members of parliament in bringing television into the House of Commons is the public's perception of politicians, by some at least, of us as a lazy lot, of us as a group of people who don't care, of us as a mindless lot on the government side or, indeed, within the opposition parties, of us as individuals without the views of individuals, without the strength to represent the particular area we have been elected to represent.

Mr. Speaker, we are an imperfect lot: I will certainly admit that, as I think most hon. members would. But surely there is nothing more essential today to end that kind of cynicism, that kind of misunderstanding, than to let the Canadian public see what really happens, to see what really goes on and to learn how diverse this country really is, how multi-faceted it is and how difficult it is to govern and, indeed, how difficult it is to be parliamentarians and try to resolve problems within parliament because of its diversity.

In speaking to this issue at the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association Conference in Quebec City in the summer of 1973, and again in Toronto in the summer of 1974, I gave one of my favourite examples of how the system breaks down. It is only one example, but it is one of which I am particularly aware because of my background as a journalist within the broadcasting media. I said that every day in question period history is at least twice rewritten before it reaches the Canadian public.

The print media and the broadcast media sit in the gallery and fervently write and record the questions put by members of the opposition and the charges they make. They also fervently record what government representatives reply. With that, they all fervently run down to the scrum, where they fervently re-do it after cabinet ministers have checked with their aides and changed their facts and straightened out the mess, and certain members in the opposition have picked up the idea or attack of the other opposition party and straightened it out or improved upon it. By the time they finish up with the interviews in the scrum, the print media, with all the notes they have already made, then go back to the people they just interviewed or overheard and rewrite it again as they go over the situation once more.

Mr. Speaker, nothing could be more fundamental than allowing the Canadian public to see exactly what happens, to see the talents and abilities of the opposition, the talents and abilities of the government, or the lack thereof on both sides. Let the public judge at the first instant, without second-guessing or second-judging or rewriting what happened in the parliament of Canada today. That will not for one moment eliminate the right of the print media or the broadcast media to go down to seek further interviews, to seek clarification or to challenge what has been said. But the fact is that the public will at last begin to understand what this country is and will begin to understand the variety of interests and demands, depending on what part of the country is being represented.

We cannot all be here all of the time. I am speaking here about the fear that constituents will say, for instance, that the hon. member for York West is not in his seat today. The fact is that the essence of successful communication is to have people understand what is true, what is real, not misunderstand and therefore not really know what is happening.

I do not feel worried. As a parliamentary secretary for at least another five months—I have held that position for a year and a half already—I am unable to ask a question in the House of Commons. My constituents will not see me bobbing up to put the government on its toes. Because of my workload as parliamentary secretary, and because my constituency is very large, I often miss debates in this House in which I would otherwise like to participate. I am not worried about how I will appear. I can do my homework, and so can all other members of this House. I will find my moments to rise in debate, though as a government backbencher I probably will not hit the television screen very often, nor the radio stations.

The fact remains, however, that Canadians may begin to understand what this country is all about. They may begin, by hearing voices from different parts of the country, by listening to different ministers posed with different dilemmas—because what is good for one part of the country may not be good for another—to understand just how this nation works and how parliament must be understanding and make compromises if this country is to survive.

Certainly, when the government House leader spoke of the first step as placing the debates of parliament over television and radio under the Speaker so that a totally objective recording can be made and, in turn, the media, without influence, editing and deciding what they want to use, and then, as a second step, having some means of making available broadly to Canadians the ongoing events of the House of Commons on a daily basis, I very much support that thrust.

I would also like to put in a plug to the government House leader, through you, Mr. Speaker, that we consider at the earliest possible responsible date the televising and broadcasting of committees of the House of Commons, or at least, at the first stage, making available the visual and audio transcripts of those meetings. I cannot think of a better way of showing the Canadian public how members of all parties and on all sides thoughtfully try to improve laws and fight for the rights of their constituents. This is an ongoing procedure and it would show the expertise members bring with them from their constituents or their own professional backgrounds. I hope the covering of committees will not be too far off if, indeed, this motion is successful.

I heard in the speech of the House leader for the official opposition some considerable doubt and fear of this whole issue. I must say that for one who is as active as he is in making speeches in the House of Commons and putting forth his faith in the Canadian system, I was very disappointed to hear him take the thrust he did today. It seems to me to be as mad, in the sense of insane, to oppose the televising and broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons as it would have been for the civilizations of thousands of years ago to have opposed the wheel or, indeed, to oppose the learning of language so that they could communicate with one another.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fleming: The civilization we live in today, and the pressures of our society, make it fundamental that we try to ease the pressures, burdens and confusion of the public here in Canada by bringing to them directly the issues of our country from its various parts and also the attitude of the government and the opposition. I would like to claim, and I believe it to be true, that it is not being done under the present system.

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith)—Indian Affairs—Relocation of departmental offices in Hull; the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall)—Search and Rescue; the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens)—Finance.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

HEALTH AND WELFARE

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF UNIVERSAL COST OF BLINDNESS ALLOWANCE

Mr. Paproski: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I believe there is a disposition to allow motions Nos. 4 and 7 to stand so that we could go on with motion No.8 in the name of the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk) moved:

That in the opinion of this House the government should consider the advisability of establishing a universal cost of blindness allowance for the legally blind of not less than $200 per month and to be indexed to the consumer price index annually.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of honour that I introduce this motion, a motion which almost on the surface would suggest that it needs no debate and that it would certainly meet with the acceptance of the government even if over the years it might have been reluctant even to consider a blind allowance or a negative income tax or a minimum subsistence level for those who are legally blind in Canada.

● (1700)

To set the stage for the background to this problem I want to read three preliminary clauses which I did not include in my original motion. I put forward the following as a preamble:

Whereas in general blind persons do not have similar opportunities to compete with the sighted in sustaining their own livelihood, and

Whereas the handicap resulting from blindness generally results in lower incomes and restricted opportunities for employment, and

Whereas there are additional living costs directly resulting from blindness—

Then my motion is as follows:

In the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of establishing a universal cost of blindness allowance for the legally blind of not less than $200 per month and to be indexed to the consumer price index annually.

It so happens, Mr. Speaker, that last August there was presented to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) the report of a study entitled "Vision Canada". This was a study jointly undertaken by the National Council of the CNIB and the Department of National Health and Welfare, and I want to quote from it because I believe that the subject of blindness is not one that ought to be debated in this chamber in an emotional way. The arguments and positions put forth on behalf of the legally blind in Canada themselves have merit on which to stand. This study was conducted by a Professor Cyril Greenland and, as I have mentioned, was presented to the minister some seven months ago. At page 3 the following appears:

The extent of unmet needs, revealed by this study, presents a great challenge to all Canadians. It is obvious that no single agency, however well intentioned and resourceful, will be able to overcome the years of neglect, prejudice and intolerance which is the common experience of handicapped people in our society. The commitment to remedy these injustices must be manifested by the federal and provincial governments in the form of rational social policies and a greater investment of public funds in the human services.

Long before I was even of voting age, Mr. Speaker, colleagues of mine on this side of the House were asking the government to bring in legislation to provide for an allowance for the blind. For example, my colleague for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates), and my colleague for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), have on many occasions in this chamber asked the government to bring forward legislation to establish a minimum income for those legally blind. As everyone knows, blindness is a handicap. In 1975 there were just a few less than 30,000 legally blind people in Canada. This number will increase by the year 2000 to some 50,000.

The report "Vision Canada" was national in scope. It was preceded by months of research and study and countless hours of conversation with legally blind people in order that the recommendations that Professor Greenland put in his report were able to reflect the basic needs and desires of the legally blind. If I may use a biblical expression, the stones cry out for justice. The stones in this case, the legally blind, are crying out for a basic income. Let me refer to page 117 of this report, which has to do with a basic income for the blind:

The prime need of all blind Canadians is a basic or guaranteed income of a sufficient amount to provide life's necessities at a level which will permit the recipient to live in dignity.

I want to point out here that in the province of Manitoba there are no allowances for the legally blind. If they cannot earn their own way by employment, then they have no recourse but to go on welfare. Why is this, Mr. Speaker? Is it because they do not want to work or they have no skills? No, it is because they have a handicap that prevents them from competing in the marketplace. All these blind people are asking for, and what I am asking for on their behalf, is that the government take action now to establish a basic income to compensate the legally blind for their handicap. The quotation on page 117 continues:

For the older and more senior blind citizens, a reasonable basic income would provide that sense of security so requisite to contentment and peace of mind. For the younger and youthful blind citizens the reasonable basic income would provide the financial security which would permit them to move from occupation to occupation in search of one which was satisfying both mentally and financially.

It would be an understatement if I were to say that blindness costs money. There is a cost to blindness. I could say much about the cost of blindness, but I shall point to only two specific areas of cost to blind persons which are not common to the sighted. Again I want to quote from this impartial study conducted by Professor Cryil Greenland at page 113, under the heading "Transportation":

In our opinion and because transportation is the major, or at least one of the greatest problems of blind people, we feel that government financial assistance should be provided to help combat this frustration. In this day and age when traffic is a major concern even for sighted people, blind people are penalized in that they cannot safely travel alone.

For blind people to have the kind of mobility that you and I, Mr. Speaker, take for granted every day costs them additional money. The basic blindness allowance for which I am asking would compensate them for that. It would be a basic income from which blind people could pay these additional costs.

A second additional cost for blind people which is not common to sighted people is in the area of shopping. My ancestors were not Scottish, but I can spot a deal a mile away, Mr. Speaker. When I am shopping in shopping centres I watch for those bright red or yellow signs indicating that certain articles are on sale. It is obvious that those who cannot see also cannot see the bargains. According to page 13 of the report, it costs the legally blind from 10 to 15 per cent more per year to live because they cannot take advantage of the kind of shopping deals that we sighted Canadians can take advantage of.

I see my time is slipping by quickly, Mr. Speaker, and I think others of my colleagues want to speak, but let me simply repeat that blindness is a handicap and that a basic pension would simply compensate them for that pension. If I may go back to page 13 of the report "Vision Canada", a comprehensive and excellent report that I commend to every member of this chamber who ought to take the time to read it, the following statement is made:

Provincial income security programs, cost-shared with the federal government, were designed to reduce the worst effects of poverty. However, since no special allowance is made for the extra cost of blindness, blind recipients are in fact denied "a compassionate and equitable guaranteed income".

● (1710)

I took the time to calculate the cost to the Canadian taxpayer through this government or the treasury of the country of this allowance for the blind of a minimum $200 a month. If you multiply $200 a month by 12 months of the year, times the number of legally blind, it would cost the taxpayers in the neighbourhood of $72 million per year.

It has often been said that you can measure the compassion and the justice of a great civilization or nation by the way it treats its handicapped and socially deprived. It seems to me this is a small price to pay. As one Canadian taxpayer, I not only encourage the government to go forward with this program but I am prepared to carry a greater tax burden through my income tax and that of my wife, who has a full-time job, in order to establish this kind of financial compensation to the handicapped blind. Surely the government can afford this amount of money out of the $42 billion it spends per year. This is a small amount in comparison to the total.

To again use statistics from this article in "Vision Canada", less than 25 per cent of the legally blind in this country work. This means that the bulk, 75 per cent, are living for the most part from the public purse in terms of welfare. This is indeed degrading. This is not the result of lack of will to work, or industry on their part; it is because they cannot compete for many jobs because of their handicap.

I stand in this chamber today speaking on behalf of those who do not have sight. As I am sure do most members of this chamber, I place a great premium and value on my sight. I represent the 30,000 Canadians who are legally blind. I do not beg for charity; I reason for justice.

Mr. C. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway) on his presentation. Like that hon. member, and I am sure every other member of this House, I, too, place a great deal of value and store on my sight. I thank the hon. member for bringing this matter before us for consideration at this time. The hon. member's suggestion is that the government should consider the advisability of establishing a universal cost of blindness allowance for the legally blind of not less than $200 a month which would, of course, be indexed to the consumer price index annually. This indexing would, over the years, bring the cost much higher than when it started.

I should like to note, if I may, certainly not to detract from the hon. member's suggestion or because I do not have a great deal of sympathy for what he proposes, a number of arguments which I feel should be put forth in considering this most commendable proposition. These are arguments that would certainly come forward during the course of a study of this kind and arguments that a government, no matter what government at the time, would have to take into serious consideration. Of course, $200 per month indexed to the consumer price index annually, regardless of income or need, has also been stipulated. The government does not at this time foresee such an allowance being paid for this or any other segment of the Canadian population in the near future.

This is not to say that the government, myself and other members of this House, are not sympathetic to the plight of blind people. Hon. members can be assured that the government recognizes the severity of the handicap imposed by blindness and that it also recognizes that the problem is particularly serious when the disability is present from early childhood and has prevented persons from obtaining an education which would permit them to compete in today's labour market, a highly competitive labour market at the best of times. In this respect the blind certainly are among a large number of people who are at a similar disadvantage because of a variety of physical and social handicaps.

I think it is a little unfair to propose a $200 monthly allotment for the blind and not take into consideration those persons who, through no fault of their own, have been handicapped in other ways. I am thinking of the paraplegics, multiple amputees or the person who has suffered, through no fault of his own, mental retardation from the time of birth. These people have to be taken into consideration, as well, by anyone who considers the extension of a universal program to all registered blind persons in Canada. Limiting the program to those people would not be fair without extending the same benefits to the other disabled segments of our society.

Secondly, while the hon. member for Selkirk said this would be costly, we must admit that it would be very costly because, as has been suggested, there are more than 30,000 blind people in this country. I think the hon. member would find that this number could be extended to 50,000, and at $200 a month that would come to $100 million per year as an extra expense to the government purse. In 1975 there were 30,000 blind persons in Canada registered with the Canadian National Institute for the Blind. It is estimated by the CNIB that there may be in excess of 50,000 who could be certified under the act. As I suggested, the cost of a universal allowance of $200 a month would amount to about $100 million annually, and indexing would increase that amount considerably in the future. As the hon. member has said, this is a large amount.

In examining this problem, the government must be concerned primarily with measures which would benefit needy persons as a whole rather than certain categories within that group. Consistent with this philosophy, the Canada Assistance Plan was introduced in 1966, affording the provinces greater flexibility in providing for assistance to all persons, not only to the blind but to those with other handicaps. Therefore, most Canadian provinces have discontinued their participation in both the disabled persons' allowance and the blind persons' allowance programs in favour of the broader approach afforded under the Canada Assistance Plan.

Until a new system is implemented, the Canada Assistance Plan will continue to operate. Under this plan persons who are in need can apply for assistance through the general assistance program in each province, and if they are blind they can receive additional assistance because of that impairment. Under the plan the federal government shares in the cost of aid granted to the people in need. However, it is the provincial governments which administer these programs, and as such the criteria for eligibility are set at various levels. Let me point out that the general assistance plan has been in effect across Canada in all provinces. As a matter of fact, a single, blind person in Newfoundland would receive $250 a month, while a couple would receive $398. In Prince Edward Island, a single person receives $182 and a couple receive $243. In Nova Scotia, it is $226 for a single person and $356 for a couple.

Mr. Marshall: What was the figure for a single person in Newfoundland?

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): It is $250, under a means test. In New Brunswick, a single person receives $316 and a couple receive $456. In Quebec, the figure is $217 for a single person and $347 for a couple. In Ontario it is $250 for a single person and $458 for a couple. In Saskatchewan it is $235 and $340. In Alberta it is $241 and $266, and in British Columbia it is $215 and $430. The problem that could arise is that if the hon. member's suggestion were accepted, it could be to the detriment of those who do not qualify under the means test but qualify only under the proposal put forward by the hon. member. On examining this problem, the government is concerned primarily with measures which would benefit all the needy, not just those afflicted with blindness, which is, of course, a very serious affliction indeed.

There are two other programs which I should like to mention which serve to improve conditions for the blind. Those are the vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons program and the national welfare grants. The vocational rehabilitation program has been in operation since 1952, first under the authority of an order in council, and since 1966 under the authority of the Vocational Rehabilitation of Disabled Persons Act. The legislation was originally administered by the Department of Labour and subsequently by the Department of Manpower and Immigration. However, since 1953 responsibility for administering the program was transferred to the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Under agreements concluded with all the provinces and territories except Quebec the federal government contributes 50 per cent of the costs incurred by the province in providing a comprehensive program for the vocational rehabilitation of physically and mentally disabled persons. This program includes such services as medical, social and vocational assessment, counselling, restoration services, provision of prosthetics, training, maintenance allowances and the provision of tools, books and other equipment. These services are provided directly by the provincial government or purchased from voluntary agencies.

Shareable costs also include the salary and necessary travelling costs of the staff whose duties are directly related to the vocational rehabilitation program and other administrative expenses necessary for the co-ordination of delivery of services to the disabled. It provides 50 per cent of the costs incurred in the vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons. The federal government also provides consultation and advisory services to the provinces, develops standards and undertakes research. During the fiscal year 1975-76, over 50,000 handicapped persons received services across Canada and these were shared under the Vocational Rehabilitation of Disabled Persons Act. The federal contribution that year was $16.5 million.

It can readily be seen that the federal government is actively engaged in assisting not only the blind but any disabled persons who need service, and through this effort creates equality of opportunity for the handicapped so that they can move from a condition of dependence to a state of greater self-reliance. Basically, this is what we are talking about, and certainly what the hon. member for Selkirk is talking about; namely, the ability of a disabled person—in this case, a blind person—to become self-reliant.

For a child who has grown up with the affection, love and care of parents, which is usually heaped upon these disabled youngsters, it must be a traumatic experience to reach an age at which parents can no longer be with him or her because of disability, health reasons or death. It must be traumatic for such a young man or woman to be thrust into society and have to cope with the day-to-day occurrences from which they had previously been shielded by their parents.

We must consider also providing the handicapped, whether they are blind, paraplegics or mentally incapacitated, with the type of services of which they themselves can take advantage. In urban transit we must provide better accessibility for those in wheelchairs to get to buses and subways so as to better integrate them into the travelling community. We must also provide assistance for the blind to enable them to make better use of public transport and communications systems. I believe that this is where money should be spent, rather than handing money to these people. We should update the services which the federal, provincial and municipal governments provide for the handicapped, not just for the blind but for all the handicapped, through the wide spectrum of these cases which will be put in the public domain.

We should certainly consider welfare grants when we look at the over-all costs in the proposal put forward by the hon. member for Selkirk. The welfare grants directorate provides annual sustaining grants to the Canadian National Institute for the Blind and l'Association canadienne-française des aveugles. Sustaining grants are provided to enable these organizations to continue to focus on planning and co-ordination of services to blind Canadians. In 1976-77 the sustaining grant provided to CNIB was $83,000, while that to l'Association canadienne-française des aveugles was $13,000.

In addition, project funding may be provided for project activities such as specific planning projects, formulation of change in response to a current crisis or a current social problem, studies and consultations, especially of a goal-oriented nature, and inter- and intra-agency co-ordination. In 1976-77 project grants have totalled approximately $30,000.

On April 18, 1973, the Minister of National Health and Welfare presented a working paper on social security in Canada as the government of Canada's contribution to the launching of the joint federal-provincial review of Canada's social security system. The working paper on social security admits—and I think I and anyone else would agree—that in Canada today there are many deficiencies in our social security system. The working paper has identified seven of them. Needy and blind persons in Canada suffer particularly from lack of co-ordination of the elements of Canada's income security system. It is well known that blind persons may receive assistance through the provinces' general assistance program or the blind persons' allowance program. Other blind persons may receive assistance under the Canada Pension Plan or the workmen's compensation legislation. What is even more difficult in the case of blind persons in need is the number of authorities with which they have to deal federally, provincially, municipally and locally.

I think this is an avenue of approach for federal-provincial co-operation to allow these people better access to these authorities and to give them information as to how best to put their case forward, and to put it forward to the authorities who are best able to get them the most assistance in the shortest possible time. An hon. member who has his sight realizes how confusing it is when he himself goes to various departments for assistance. That is a matter which certainly deserves a great deal of study.

The citizen is expected to co-ordinate all of these bureaucracies if he is to resolve the financial problems with which he is confronted, a degree of co-ordination which even the governments themselves—and we had better admit it—have been unable to achieve. In addition, on top of the indignity of dealing with so many agencies, there is the additional indignity of the stigma which has come to be associated with social assistance.

During the recently concluded social security review which has taken place over the last few years the needs of the blind in the context of the review have been actively considered. Last February the federal government presented income support and supplementation proposals to the provinces which would, in the long run, ensure higher benefits and improve the administration of the social security system in a number of significant ways. At the June meeting of the ministers the majority of the provinces agreed that a guaranteed income should be made available to persons whose incomes are insufficient because they are unable or not expected to work, and that there should be a system for supplementing the incomes of those who are able to work but whose incomes are not adequate for their needs. Under this proposal provincial governments would deliver the benefits to the people who qualify for them, and the federal government would share in the cost at a rate of two-thirds of the cost of the supplementation program and 50 per cent of the cost of the support program. This program, when implemented, would give substantial help in meeting the financial problems of Canadians in disadvantageous situations, including, of course, blind persons.

Once again I want to commend the hon. member for Selkirk for his presentation. It is an honourable one which I think deserves serious consideration. However, I would like to ask that when considering this we consider not only the blind but all those who have any impediment whatsoever, whether it be through blindness—

[Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey).]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, first I want to compliment the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway) on presenting to this House a resolution which merits the support of every hon. member. It merits the support of every hon. member because it zeroes in on a very unique and special type of disability from which, fortunately, not a great many Canadians suffer. However, their number is significant enough that as private members of this House we should give special consideration to their problem.

The hon. member for Selkirk did an excellent job of presenting a case which I believe merits the special consideration of all hon. members because of the uniqueness of the disability. It is difficult for us who sit here to appreciate fully the darkness of the world which surrounds those who are cursed with this terrible tragedy in life. Everything about our world is associated with sight, and yet these people must live in darkness and bravely go their way trying, in their unique situation, to live with their disability.

One thing which bothers me a little bit about these private members' debates is that, almost without exception, the government seems to feel it has to ask one of its representatives to stand in this House and outline the position of the government and what it is doing in whatever field the resolution happens to fall. It was nice to hear the hon. member for Bruce-Grey (Mr. Douglas) indicate that he has some appreciation for and understanding of the reasons for the hon. member for Selkirk's proposing the resolution in the first place. He then went on to itemize the various things the government is doing at this time, in effect indicating to the hon. member for Selkirk that there is really little hope or compassion in the minds of the members of the government or any intention of doing anything about what he is proposing in his resolution. I believe that if we have compassion in our souls for our fellow men and if we recognize the very special disability blind people have, we should speak from our hearts rather than use the political dogma of the party in power.

The government should say to these people who are blind that it recognizes the very special disability they face in trying to live in this world, and we, members of parliament, collectively should urge that the government try to recognize this special disability. While we cannot overcome this disability, we should at least provide an extra little bit of material assistance which might help to provide opportunities which, as a study pointed out, these people cannot find in the world today in the present circumstances and under the present welfare system which has been developed by the government. Sure, there are other kinds of disabilities, and all disabilities should be recognized to a greater extent than they are now. As far as I am concerned, the amount of disability assistance itemized by the hon. member for Bruce-Grey indicate a degree of inequality for those people who have disabilities because of the despicable needs and means tests which are imposed upon them and because of the investigators who arrive at their homes to find out whether they are getting this much, that much, or too much, and are at all times trying to cut down the amount of money which goes to them to meet their needs and requirements.

On December 29 on behalf of the registered blind people of my constituency I received from Mr. William G. Hope a petition with hundreds of signatures on it, urging the governments in Ottawa and in Halifax to take certain special actions because of this special disability and the resultant disabilities which go with being blind. I immediately forwarded the recommendations in this particular petition to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) in Ottawa and to the minister of social services in Halifax. The recommendations were these:

Remove the present inequitable means test used to categorize blind persons in allotting allowances or raise the present ceiling to $8,000 per year for married couples.

Provide free prescription drugs to registered blind persons through the M.S.I. program.

That is a Nova Scotia program. There are hundreds and hundreds of signatures. These blind people are under the leadership of Mr. Hope, who is partially blind and whose spouse is blind. They worked together with the blind people in Cumberland county to put this petition together.

This motion is an indication of the fact that the hon. member for Selkirk recognizes that blind people are not getting enough attention, either from the federal or provincial governments, to enable them to overcome the very significant disabilities they face in their every-day lives. For this reason I commend him as highly as I can. There are a lot of other things he could be saying in this House that would probably be more politically advantageous to him. It is probable that in his constituency there are very few blind people, just as there are in all 264 constituencies in this country, but that did not stop him from feeling compassion for people who have a very special and unique disability, and for singling them out. While I recognize that there are many other disabled people in this country, blindness is a very special and unique kind of disability and should receive special consideration by the Government of Canada or the province in which these people live.

As the hon. member has said, what he is asking for is not that much, but it would be a guarantee. For instance Mr. Hope, who presented the petition to me, just happened to be able to secure employment. But as a result his wife lost her allowance. In other words, as soon as he was able to find employment she was penalized, even though by his finding employment she did not then discover that she could see. She did discover, however, that no further assistance was available to her to overcome her disability.

I say that this House, this parliament, if it has compassion, if it has a collective soul, will take to heart what the hon. member for Selkirk has proposed in his resolution and try in some way to show the blind people of the country that parliament does relate to the problems they face. When it is a unique problem such as blindness we should endeavour to put our stamp of compassion on a special kind of legislation that will single them out. We should show that we will endeavour to assist them in a material way to overcome some of the real and terrible problems that they face in their everyday life.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Selkirk, and to tell him that this is what I think members of parliament should be doing more often. If they did, then the people in Canada would think that parliament was a lot more realistic about the problems that face the people of this country.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to indicate that I warmly welcome the presentation of this motion by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway). I wish also to indicate that it has my support. There are one or two changes I should like to see made to it and I shall indicate what they are in a moment. The main point I want to make, however, is that what is asked for in this motion is a policy that I believe we should follow.

I listened with interest this afternoon to the first speech made by the hon. member for Bruce-Grey (Mr. Douglas) since his appointment as a deputy whip on the government side. I noticed with interest that he expressed sympathy with the motion put forward by the hon. member for Selkirk, but then he turned around and threw cold water on it or, in effect, opposed it. Why do I say that in effect he opposed it despite his expressions of sympathy? I say that because at least the hon. member for Bruce-Grey came to grips with what is the heart of the motion put forward by the hon. member for Selkirk, namely, that we should not apply to our blind persons the stigma and indignity of means tests. Those words "stigma and indignity" were words used by the hon. member for Bruce-Grey. But precisely because the assistance that blind persons can get today, whatever the amount, is under a means test, I say that is the way we are treating them.

From the late twenties when pensions for the blind were first added to the Old Age Pensions Act, until the end of 1951 at which time that legislation was replaced by the Old Age Security Act, the Blind Persons Act and the Old Age Assistance Act, there was a relationship between blind pensions and old age pensions. It so happened that in those years both were subject to a means test but at least there was a continuing relationship and, when the old age pension went up, the blind pension went up as well.

Beginning on January 1, 1952, we established a new regime under which we put old age security on a universal basis, but this was not done with pensions for the blind. In the intervening period the difference in the amount available has widened instead of the parallelism being maintained.

The hon. member for Bruce-Grey makes something out of the fact that most provinces assist the blind now under the Canada Assistance Plan rather than under the Blind Persons Act. They do that because the legislation that has been drawn up by the federal government makes it at least a little better to do it under the Canada Assistance Plan. He also makes the point that if we are going to do this for the blind we should do it for paraplegics, multiple amputees, and other disabled persons. I agree, and that time may come. What bothers me in all these fields, especially when we go into the general programs that do not recognize categories, is the continuance of the idea of the means test.

The hon. member for Selkirk and the hon. member for Bruce-Grey both talked about sympathy for the blind, and the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates) emphasized that all of us in this House have that sympathy. But, Sir, the basic difference is that the motion before us wants a universal non-means test pension for persons who suffer from blindness, whereas the hon. member for Bruce-Grey wants us not to go that route but to provide assistance for the blind under a means test or some kind of social assistance program. I take my stand on the same side of the issue as the hon. member for Selkirk. Perhaps he will allow me to say I have been taking it since long before he was of voting age. I regret that we are not giving special consideration to the blind as I believe they deserve.

This is a private member's motion. I believe we should support such a motion and I do not want to be guilty of seeming to talk something out and therefore I shall conclude my remarks. I said that if I had been consulted by the hon. member for Selkirk before he drafted his motion I might have offered a couple of suggestions. One is that I do not think the $200 figure is high enough. Today when we have responsible bodies suggesting that a person needs $350 or $400 just to exist, or $700 for a couple, I do not think $200 a month per person is high enough. Maybe the hon. member drafted his motion a long time ago and has not brought it up to date.

The other thing I should have liked was for the escalation to be on a quarterly rather than on an annual basis. I am not arguing that there is a great deal of difference between the two formulas but we already have a situation where a number of pensions are escalated quarterly and others only annually. Those who get their escalation annually feel they are being short-changed, as they are if you do the arithmetic all the way down. I am glad to see the hon. member for Selkirk nodding his head. If we could get this motion passed and get it to committee for consideration, perhaps those two changes could be made. In any case, I take my stand again for pensions as of right without a means test for those Canadians who suffer from blindness.

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I feel that the suggestion made by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway) makes a lot of sense, but three hon. members have already taken part in the debate. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) did not share exactly the views of the hon. member for Selkirk, so that in spite of the odiousness of this action, I shall have to fight in the House against this suggestion and this for the following reasons.

Like the government I represent, I am very much concerned by the problem of the blind, by the handicap of these people, but instead of considering individual cases, this Liberal administration, which is in agreement in principle with the concept of helping the blind, cannot support a social security system which would be based on categories. It feels that the need is of greater importance than the root cause of this need, whatever the handicap may be, whether old age, mental deficiency or physical disability. It feels that any handicapped person, whatever the nature of the handicap, should receive assistance from the government.

That is why, since 1973 and together with the provincial governments, this administration has been carrying out all sorts of studies which have already resulted in a guaranteed income plan for all these handicapped persons, and following consultations since June 1976 with the province of Quebec under the Bourassa administration, the federal government will introduce, between now and June 1977, a bill to provide for the assistance of handicapped persons because they cannot support themselves, and not for any so-called compensation we may owe them. We shall give them a minimum income if they really cannot earn it themselves. But what we shall try to give them instead is the means to help themselves.

Practically all disabled persons ask us to let them help themselves. And I think it is most pernicious to think that it is enough to give them a $200 cheque as the hon. member for Selkirk said, or a $450 cheque escalated on a quarterly basis, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said. I suggest that the most important aspect when we are talking about physical disabilities of any kind is never to forget human dignity. That is why the government wants to introduce a social service bill which will respect the principle whereby all groups like the elderly or the disabled of any kind should have access to community services just as anybody else, and furthermore that the community should be responsible for making those services available to everyone.

I wonder why an unemployed man can take advantage of government manpower centre services while the handicapped—be it blindness, deafness or any other disability—do not have access to facilities enabling them to earn their living. The bill will be particularly aimed at extending the range or services available to the disabled and in addition its object will not only be to provide for the training of handicapped but to improve their ability to be self-sufficient. Among the items for which the provinces may demand cost sharing will be diagnostic and assessment services, uninsured health services, consultant services, pre-vocational training as well as an extensive series of services.

The federal government will bear over 50 per cent of additional transportation costs incurred by the physical handicapped to reach an adequate place of work. The federal government will pay increased grants to companies which would like to improve and set up facilities providing permanent jobs to the handicapped.

To my mind, the opposition errs in its proposals, as I said at the start, by classifying the handicapped in categories. I went to university with a handicapped student who took down his notes during classes as fast as I could myself, though I was not blind. What bothered him most, I feel, was the fact that he felt different from the other students and that they considered him to be different from them. But, from the time when his friends, of whom I was, looked upon him as any other human being who was able to earn his keep, though with limited means, he felt accepted, useful to the society in which he moved, and which considered him no longer as a burden but rather as a human being capable of giving.

Indeed, the government I represent tries to give every possible tool to the handicapped that they might play the social role that can be theirs. I congratulate the hon. member for Selkirk who considers it worthwhile to look into the fate of the handicapped; but we must not believe that that is something the hon. members of 1974 or a new government have just discovered. The Canadian government has always concerned itself with this issue, with the support of the opposition, and we are trying in 1977 to prepare a bill that will take care of the essential, namely the human value. As long as this value is not taken into account, other members may be lead to believe that we want to generalize and, indeed, the fault with a great many laws is to establish categories. When bills are of a general order, applying to everyone, according to simple conditions, the people wherever they are can understand them better and therefore derive greater benefit from them. Any man can then fend for himself, eventually sorting things out and revalorizing himself.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) has already announced this bill on social services and I believe he will be able to meet his provincial counterparts soon and set out precisely, since there is a new government in Quebec, what the programs entail and what advantages there will be for the provinces, and I am convinced that every Canadian and every Quebecer will be able to take advantage of this new legislation.

Since it is six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, may I congratulate the hon. member for Selkirk. I invite him to take part in the work of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs so he may argue his points as well as he did this afternoon, but in a wider scope.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Broadcasting House Proceedings

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

BROADCASTING OF HOUSE AND COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen:

That this House approve the radio and television broadcasting of its proceedings and of the proceedings of its comittees on the basis of principles similar to those that govern the publication of the printed official reports of debates; and

That a special committee, consisting of Mr. Speaker and seven other members to be named at a later date, be appointed to supervise the implementation of this resolution.

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, at this point in speaking to this motion to have television in the House of Commons I should like to refer briefly to some of the comments made by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), the house leader for the official opposition. At one point I believe he said the government wants to run across an unexplored field. He went on to list a number of fears, a number of negative possibilities. He raised the question of cost. He suggested he wanted more studies, and even a study of studies.

In response, with as little politics involved as possible, I want to point out, as did the government House leader earlier in the day, that in 1957 television first came into the House of Commons. Fully ten years later, in 1967, the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman), I believe, brought forward a private member's bill. Two years after that, and still almost ten years ago, the hon. member for Peace-River (Mr. Baldwin) brought forward a private member's bill or motion which was passed and which led to a committee investigation. The issue has now been broached in three throne speeches.

We heard from the government House leader that more than 40 countries around the world have their parliaments or centres of democracy or government broadcast and/or television. Surely at this point when almost the majority of legislatures across Canada have television and broadcasting, or are proposing it, the central government and the Parliament of Canada are long overdue in taking that step.

For the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton to say the government wants to run across an unexplored field is not quite an expression of reality.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is not quite what I said, but it will do.

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member moved an amendment which says we should have a committee study the matter further. Once again the opposition seems to commit a crime of which it all too often accuses us. Nothing could be more absurd than to have a committee study the work of a committee which is trying to resolve a very crucial issue if Canadians are to understand what parliament and, more important still, what Canada is all about.

The minister in his comments made several points which I should like to mention again if I may. The televising and broadcasting of the House of Commons proceedings would be under the authority of the Speaker who survives in his office only because of support from all sides of the House of Commons. This is a guarantee of objectivity and efficiency in the recording or broadcasting of the events which take place in this Chamber. Further, the government House leader gave us his assurance that all parliamentary rights and privileges will be observed and upheld, and that if they are abused by anyone taking advantage of those broadcast tapes they will be answerable to the House of Commons which is, of course, finally the highest court in the land. And yet the media will continue to be free to edit and select as it sees fit, at its own discretion. For its competence or lack of competence in doing so it will be answerable to its viewers, to the Canadian public, and to the Canadian Radio and Television Commission. Finally, it will be answerable to this House if abuses take place.

Technical problems will of course occur, but not ones which are in any way insurmountable. Lighting can easily be arranged to avoid causing extra heat or difficulties to the eyes of those within the House of Commons. Those kinds of difficulties with television were conquered several years ago. Cameras can be placed unobtrusively, as the study done last year under the authority of the House leader at that time showed. There is no need to use "on air" lights or things of that nature which would be distracting to the on-going business of the House of Commons. Something very important to me as a member of the Chamber is that this Chamber and its beauty can be maintained and not damaged in any way.

Costs are something which the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton chose to comment on, especially when he interjected several times during the speech of the government House leader. At one point I believe he commented "What about our pensioners?" when there was mention of costs. I should like to point out that the annual cost of running television and radio in the House of Commons, of having these recordings available and of telling and showing Canadians what is happening, would be less than $1 million. On the other hand, if we were to say that we were not going to let the Canadian public understand better what is going on here but instead are going to assist our pensioners, this would work out to 50 cents per pensioner per year.

Mr. Yewchuk: That is fine.

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member says that is fine, Mr. Speaker. I suspect that if the hon. member thought this out thoroughly rather than simply interjecting he would say, if the issue of pensions is an important one and there should be an increase, what better way of focusing on that than allowing the Canadian public to see issues like this debated in the House of Commons of Canada? I know that the hon. member has some pertinent and wise things to contribute to this debate, and I look forward to hearing him when he gets Your Honour's attention.

[Mr. Fleming.]

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that when Hansard, as vital as it is, has a circulation of 14,000, when the operating cost is going to be about one third the current annual cost of Hansard but is going to reach not multiples of tens, 20's or 50's but will reach a hundred or even a thousand times the current circulation of Hansard—and a thousand times 14,000 is 14 million—then surely for an investment that represents an increase of less than 2 per cent of the budget for the operation of parliament we could better tell Canadians what is happening and what this country is all about.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Would you pay it?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I often find that when I speak in the afternoon the Conservatives are fairly well mannered, but after dinner they become very noisy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fleming: It seems to me to be an incredibly negative reflection on us all that we should not sooner be prepared to show the public their House of Commons and their elected representatives.

Mr. Alexander: That was a cheap shot.

Mr. Fleming: Well, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) says that that was a cheap shot. It is only because I respect that particular member that I have not replied to a number of cheap shots that have been made since I rose to speak. No matter how opponents of this resolution fog this debate, essentially it is: will the Canadian public at last be able to see and hear by means of modern technology what happens in the House of Commons, how it works and what the issues are, or will most of them still have this denied to them?

It seems to me that all of us as members of parliament are terribly anxious, when we receive visits from groups in our ridings, and when those with constituencies not too far from the capital have groups of school children coming here by the thousands in the summertime, to have them come in and see our Chamber in operation, and to speak to them. Yet when we try to keep together a country that stretches thousands of miles from shore to shore, is it fair to people in British Columbia, the maritimes, the north, and in remote areas that they not be given a better perception of what is happening here, what the issues are, and what other parts of the country are all about, as represented by various speakers in this House?

The committee fulfilling the directions of the motion will be made up of MP's from all sides of the House of Commons. Surely they can reasonably consider the problems involved and find answers to technological problems. To stall further and deny access to these basic instruments of communications to Canadians seems to me to be nothing but simply and directly unjust.

Radio has been in Canada, Mr. Speaker, as a tool of communications for almost 60 years. We have had television now for more than 25 years. Yet the focal point where all the diverse interests of our country come together to argue and debate and find consensus is still unavailable to those people who want to understand our system better. It seems to me that every concerned Canadian who believes that communications today are one of the major drawbacks to holding together this country should support this motion.

We are in an electronic age which is moving so rapidly it befuddles the mind. But these modern scientific advances must be used to help Canadians overcome pressures and misunderstandings. The greatness of our country is its size, its diversity and its potential. We have survived for over 100 years with geography that confounds us. Our mountain ranges run north to south while our country runs east to west. We have overcome huge distances and stayed together. In the past, despite communications shortcomings, we have managed to tell each other the story of ourselves and have survived.

Today, Mr. Speaker, I believe that few members of the House who are thoughtful about the Canadian situation would deny that we have a very real crisis on our hands, perhaps the greatest crisis we have ever had. If we cannot on all sides of the House of Commons agree better to communicate to the Canadian public the diversity of our nation and the efforts all of us are making, from every part of Canada, to solve our problems, then we are not going to have a united Canada in the future.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I am wondering what has happened to the government's sense of priority. I have listened today to the speech of the government House leader, to that of the hon. member for York West (Mr. Fleming) and to other speakers, in the context of a parliament that is reassembling after a month's adjournment, and the first order of priority is whether or not we should televise and broadcast the proceedings of this House. What kind of a sense of priority does this government have?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The answer is none.

Mr. McGrath: At a time when we are facing record high unemployment, when the Conference Board in Canada predicts that this year will see even higher unemployment, and reports in its latest findings that the five eastern provinces, for the year 1977, will have on average in excess of 10 per cent unemployment, we are debating this resolution. The two provinces with the highest rate of unemployment, according to the findings of the Conference Board, are Quebec and Newfoundland.

I heard the leader of the NDP speak with a great deal of feeling, he having made a tour of the provinces of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia, about the situation that prevails there. In my own province, Sir, as of this moment we in fact have a real unemployment rate of 35 per cent. Some 55,000 people in my province out of a total work force of 183,000 are drawing unemployment insurance. In order to qualify for unemployment insurance you must be available for work. Another 9,000 are on short-term assistance. Some 64,000 people are drawing unemployment insurance and able-bodied short term assistance. Statistics Canada is using new methodology, and it estimates that the rate of unemployment in my province is about 14 per cent.

Where are our priorities, Mr. Speaker? I sometimes wonder whether this place has lost touch with reality. Here we are discussing the tinsel, unreal world of television. I suppose in a way that is appropriate, because we all know that what goes on here is often unreal. It is certainly out of touch with reality for parliament to be seized today with a debate as to whether or not we televise our proceedings when the future of the country is at stake. There are stresses and strains on confederation today of a kind that have not existed in the last 100 years. We have unemployment today such as we have never seen since the second world war.

I suppose it is appropriate that we should be discussing this resolution, but I would say to the House, let us get on with it. This resolution in one form or another has been with us since 1972, but there are some very important factors of which we seem to have lost sight. For example, what has become of the findings of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization which worked long and diligently during the last session of parliament? What happened to the report of that committee? There is no move by the government House leader, or the government, to bring forward a new reference to the committee so that report could be brought before the House. There was, indeed, no reference made today by the government House leader to the impact that this resolution will have on the rules of the House.

Let me make it clear that I support the principle of televising the proceedings of this House. My House leader has put forward the position of this party that we support the principle of this move. I also submit to you, Sir, notwithstanding the fact that you have yet to make a ruling on the amendment put forward by my House leader, that it would be logical to consider the impact this will have on the rules of the House by sending this resolution to the Procedure Committee. We should consider the fact that the findings of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, structured during the last session of parliament to revise our rules, have yet to be brought before the House. We should further consider the fact that this reference in the last session to that standing committee did not cover rule changes in the context of televising or broadcasting the proceedings of this place. Surely if we are to contemplate this move we must do so in the context of the impact and the effect it will have on our procedures and standing orders.

It would seem to me to be logical and sensible for the House, having agreed to this matter in principle, to take the next logical step of referring this matter back to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. That would give the committee the opportunity to assess the rules and the need to change them to accommodate the new effect television will have on the proceedings of this place.

I was among those who were opposed at first to this proposal. I was very vehement and adamant in my opposition to televising and broadcasting the proceedings of this House. However, Sir, the key word is relevancy. I fear that this place is becoming irrelevant. All we have to do is examine the record of the government during the past session.

A year or so ago the House brought in new standing orders which made possible under the rules of the House a practice that had been in fact a tradition of the House, and that was for ministerial statements to be made in the House with the right of members of the opposition parties to reply to those statements. The House obviously felt the need to regularize that procedure and tradition of the House in the rules, and we did so by Standing Order 15(3). Yet almost every time there is a statement of any consequence to be made, notwithstanding the fact that the House is in session, the ministers and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) go outside this House to make these statements, thereby depriving parliament of the opportunity of responding.

Reference has already been made to the Prime Minister's statement of November 23, probably one of the most important statements ever made by a head of government in this country, in the context of what happened in Quebec on November 15, what this would mean for the future of the country and for the future of federal-provincial relationships in the immediate future. The House was in session at that time but the Prime Minister went on national television, completely ignoring parliament in this most important statement affecting the very future of the country. I suggest that was contemptible on the part of the Prime Minister. I believe that if the House had provision for televising and broadcasting its proceedings this is the kind of abuse that could and, I suspect, would be stopped.

Again I could refer to the statement made by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) on December 2. The minister made a very important announcement about the new search and rescue policy for Canada. He chose to make that statement outside the House, notwithstanding the fact that the subject had been the topic of debate throughout the last session of parliament and had become a matter of great concern here and throughout the land. Yet with the House in session, the Minister of National Defence elected to make his statement elsewhere than in this House, thereby depriving opposition members, especially members directly affected from both coasts and from Great Lakes constituencies, of an opportunity of having input to that new policy and an opportunity to react to it, or to question the minister on it as is provided under Standing Order 15(3).

Again, the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) on December 22, with the House in session, called a press conference to announce the management policy of the government in respect of the 200-mile limit which was proclaimed on January 1. If there ever was a statement that was relevant to parliament and that should have been made in this House it was this statement on a subject that had seized the attention of the House for several years, namely, the role of the government and its managerial responsibilities in connection with the implementation of the 200-mile limit. Yet that statement was made outside the House. We did not have an opportunity to question the minister on it or to react to it.

That is why I came to the conclusion that with the changes in the rules, and with this growing propensity on the part of the government to go outside this place to make announcements, whether by press conference, by speeches, or by federal-provincial conferences, this practice could possibly be arrested and in that context this place would become more relevant if its proceedings were televised and radio broadcast. That is why I changed my view.

I also had reason to change my view when it became evident to me that the government was somewhat less than sincere in its attempts to get the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization to change the rules of the House. Let us take a look at the rules. I have already referred to ministerial statements which, since December, 1974, have been provided for under the standing orders, with the growing practice of ministers circumventing that rule by making statements outside the House.

We should also take a look at the impact of television in the House on our supply procedures which, God knows, are already inadequate. I suppose this may bring on the necessary reforms to our supply procedures when we have cameras in the House, particularly if the country can witness the spectacle and humiliation of parliament having to rubber-stamp appropriation bills as they come before the House without having any proper examination of the estimates leading up to them. Indeed the standing committees of this House are so overloaded by legislation and so encumbered by the growing complexity of government estimates and the form of those estimates that there is never a year goes by when there are not a number of departments whose estimates never get to committee because of the guillotine supply procedure under the rules, whereby the estimates are deemed to have been passed and reported by the committees as of the end of May of each calendar year.

Perhaps cameras in this place would expedite the necessary reforms, which I believe everybody is now prepared to concede are long overdue, to give this place some control over government spending. If we had cameras here when we went through the procedures of dealing with appropriation bills, virtually having to rubber-stamp billions of dollars in government spending without adequate examination, that one spectacle would be worth having those cameras here. I believe that that would bring home to the people of this country more than anything else the spectacle of parliament having no control over government spending. For that reason I believe that television in the House would be an improvement.

What about the standing committees of the House? Would it not be logical that we should perhaps start by televising the standing committees? Certainly the rules have to be amended to change the procedures within the standing committees. I think everybody will concede that under the rule changes under which parliament now operates the standing committees do a reasonably good job in examining legislation. Legislation is given proper examination clause by clause, and indeed in many cases legislation is improved by the committees when it is reported back to the House. But the rules of the committees have to be changed to make the committees more relevant in terms of their ability to examine government spending and to call ministers to account for overspending their estimates, and indeed committees must be given the power to take the necessary initiatives, when they deem it advisable, to look on an ongoing basis into government spending, notwithstanding any rules of the House which may make it necessary to have estimates reported back to the House on a certain day.

We should take a look at the impact of television in the House on the most important part of our parliamentary day. A part of our parliamentary proceedings which has assumed a new importance and a new relevance as a result of the new supply procedures, the only part of the parliamentary day when we can hold the government accountable, is the question period. But the question period is at best an ineffective instrument to hold the government accountable. However, it is all we have. I believe the question period procedures in the House can be improved, and indeed I believe they will have to be improved before the House can agree to having television cameras in this place.

I believe that these reforms cannot be looked upon in isolation, just as I believe that by having this matter referred to a committee after the House has voiced its opinion on the principle—which I believe will find certain majority support—the committee will then have an opportunity to examine the need to change the rules in the context of the new situation which will emerge as a result of televising the House or providing, as the government House leader likes to say, an electronic Hansard.

There is one part of the government's proposal that has me somewhat troubled. The government has departed from the recommendations of the committee in one very important part. The committee recommended that the televising of the House be done on an experimental basis. I believe that to be eminently sensible because obviously we will have to look at the effect of television in the House on the rules of the House. Consequently I believe that before we put any permanent fixtures in place, before the House adopts any permanent procedures, it would do well to think that it will do this first on an experimental basis so that the procedures can be worked out as we go along. But in order to get at this in the context of the rule changes, in order to give all members of the House an opportunity to reflect on what this will mean to them individually in carrying out their responsibilities in this place as representatives of their constituents, it would be eminently sensible to have this matter referred to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, not in isolation but in the context of an examination and a reassessment of our standing orders and procedures in the light of the impact that television will have on these standing orders and procedures.

I hope that the government House leader will agree to this proposal—if in fact Your Honour finds it admissible, which I hope and believe that you will—so that we can get on with the real priorities of the House and of the country, the priority of jobs and the priority of the future of confederation itself.

● (2040)

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for recognizing me and enabling me to take part in this debate on the introduction of television in the House of Commons. I hope to be brief. I shall just take the time to underline the advantages I can see in televising the debates of the House of Commons.

As far as I am concerned, I think that we will derive greater exposure from the process, and exposure being the essential quality of politicians in the twentieth century, I think we need it more and more in our trade. Televising the debates of the House of Commons will thus spotlight government policies and motivations in the establishment of its programs and I think it will enable the Canadian people to have a much better perception of their representatives in the Parliament of Canada.

The measures we are proposing now will enable us directly to address the people, better than all the other measures which have already been taken such as the opening of the galleries of Parliament to the public and to the press, and the introduction of written Hansard.

I admit, Mr. Speaker, that I found it difficult to convince myself when speaking before a necessarily restricted audience in the House of Commons, and I understand the difficulties of having better attendance in the House. It remains that hon. members must address an audience which is necessarily very restricted.

I for one can hardly imagine that I am speaking to the nation, that all Canadians are listening to what I have to say, while a great many hon. members, who are overworked, must of necessity carry out their business in the House and listen to me only absent-mindedly.

Thanks to television broadcasting, we will be able to speak to the Canadian public as a whole. In my mind, this proposal to have our debates broadcast is certainly a new and most important progress of democracy within our society. If you will allow me this return to the past, Mr. Speaker, this bring us back to the "agora" of Ancient Greece, the open air meeting place where people would get together to obtain first hand information, without the assistance of intermediaries or, for that matter, translators, and where they could judge on the spot the effectiveness, sincerity, wisdom and what have you of their elected representatives. Little by little, the "agora" went indoors. Even during the last centuries, the proceedings took place in assembly halls such as this, their walls adorned with silk and velvet drapes, their floors covered with thick carpets, in certainly splendid, even impressive surroundings. However, gradually a protocol and a decorum quite foreign to the people was introduced in those rooms and the atmosphere so created could induce the governors to govern cautiously.

Today we propose to recreate the agora, but for everybody, for the people, for the Canadian people. Through the electronic Hansard we shall open the walls of this House to all Canadian citizens who will be able to follow our proceedings. If they wish, they will have direct access to our work. No longer will they have to rely on distorted or incomplete reports interpreted or revised by someone else. I do not say that the role of the media is not important. I do not say that they should not continue to interpret and report our proceedings but Canadians will be able to see directly what we are doing, when we are doing it.

There will also be an element of entertainment that might revive the interest of the public in parliamentary business. And if they continue to read newspapers, at least they will be able to compare their own perception of facts with the interpretations given by the media and those of us who sometimes complain about the misinterpretation of the media will no longer have reason to complain as our intervention will be on the record and will have been seen and heard by a large part of the Canadian people. Furthermore, as those interventions will be filmed and kept in the archives, newsmen will have there, I suppose, a reminder of the ethic that makes the glory and the honour of their trade.

But the opposition does not appreciate this attempt, this decision of the government to open Parliament. The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) complained earlier that some ministers make statements outside the House and carefully avoid making them in Parliament. I do not see the logic of his objection because if we broadcast our proceedings, ministerial statements will be recorded immediately and broadcast to all interested people and they will not have to use more efficient means outside the House. We propose a more open Parliament and it is precisely the wish of the hon. member. And we are using the best means available to make Parliament more open.

Opposition members are calling for a legislation to ensure access to information. They make no distinction between information which should be available immediately or a little later and information which would likely jeopardize certain negotiations. They are totally irresponsible when they advocate full access to any kind of information and in all circumstances. They want information to be more readily available. That is also our hope, and we have announced a legislation on access to information. But before the fact, we are offering, through the television broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons, immediate access to the most important information, that is what is happening in the Parliament of Canada. There are opposition members who are opposed to this project of televising the proceedings of the House of Commons.

The President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) was wondering this afternoon if Parliament would resist such an exposure? I ask in turn another question. Are opposition members afraid of not resisting scrutiny in this public forum, in the true sense of the word, that the television broadcasting of our proceedings would make of Parliament?

[Mrs. Sauvé.]

Mr. Speaker, since I came to this House, I have seen things that the hon. members of the opposition would perhaps not want to be laid before the eyes of the general public. For instance, the frequent absence of some members. The opposition tactics of planning very cunningly a rotation system for its members, a system that is only known to them and that we must try to thwart at some crucial moments in the House. They subject us to sudden fits of attendance and absence which prevent our members from spending as they do the necessary time in their riding. Of course, those are quite obvious tactics, but they shirk their parliamentary duties when they do not play the game, because there are some unwritten rules that the members opposite should obey. They take unreasonable advantage, Mr. Speaker, of the game of hide-and-seek at the time of crucial votes in this House.

Ever since I came to Parliament, I have secretly blamed the opposition for this and I now dare voice it publicly tonight because our role, as representatives of the people, is difficult enough to expect the cooperation of both sides of the House in allowing all hon. members, those of the opposition as well as those on the government side, to perform properly their duties as parliamentarians and representatives of the people. But all this, with the televising of our debates, will be brought out in full daylight: a mere travelling of a camera will enable one to see who respects the House and who does not.

Another thing I shall be delighted to see, Mr. Speaker, will be the televising of the question period. This House witnesses moments without equal when the questions of the opposition are direct and go straight to the core of current events, when questions and counter-questions fly on all sides, when the outstanding parliamentary talents of our Prime Minister come into play. We have quite a show on some days. We have no fear, Mr. Speaker, of letting the nation see that show. On the contrary we long for the day when we can let everyone know, on a daily basis, how the Prime Minister fights for the interests of the people.

We on this side of the House are ready to meet that challenge because on many occasions we tested the Prime Minister's qualities as a parliamentarian. I do not say that the opposition does not have its own good parliamentarians. Some days, when some of them are on their toes, we also have a good show from the other side of the House. But since the opposition too has its artful, able and competent parliamentarians, why not make them known to the whole nation? That is in fact the proposal we put forward to you: it will be an even contest for both sides of the House. Perhaps it is because the malicious intent of certain questions raised by the opposition will in the end become far too clear that they oppose that project. And perhaps it is because some people, whose talent can only be exercised through misdirected controversy, will be absolutely deprived of means if they were to change their style.

I am convinced that a broadcast question period will impart a much more resposible approach to that aspect of our deliberations. As a matter of fact, ours is more interesting than that of other countries, because very rarely is there prior notice and that element of surprise, which is peculiar to our House, will undoubtedly get people interested and bring them to listen to the question period.

I am therefore convinced that broadcasting the question period will change its style and, who knows, will perhaps give rise to questions much more relevant to the true concerns of the people. Why should we be afraid of this experience, Mr. Speaker? I do not understand the hesitation of the opposition members and I can only think that they are afraid to lose face before the judgment of the people which will certainly be merciless when they witness our debates directly.

Another aspect of our debates which will greatly benefit from broadcasting concerns our speeches. As many are aware I had a career on television and in the trade we always say that there is nothing that cannot be said in five minutes. Of course,we must know what we are saying, choose our words well and not repeatourselves. The operation of Parliament would benefit from being much more concise and much more controlled on both sides of the House. Because of the misuse of the privileges of the House, certain members often lose sight of their subject and take the time of the House, certain members often lose sight of their subject and take the time of the House to say unimportant things. All this, Mr. Speaker, will not hold up very long on television.

Moreover, by broadcasting House proceedings, we may obtain the parliamentary reform that government members urgently request and which the gentlemen on the side of the opposition refuse because they are obviously not interested in seeing this Parliament operate efficiently. This would cause their downfall. They do not want Parliament to operate efficiently because it is not at all in their interest.

And they count on the fact that there is in the House a certain theology of consensus concerning parliamentary reforms. Well, like many others, this theology could undergo a very fast evolution in view of the impatience that the people will surely express if we continue to delay needlessly the broadcasting of House proceedings and if we continue to multiply speeches simply to kill the time required for the passage of legislation. The opposition is also opposed to parliamentary reform and, like the hon. member who spoke before me, I believe that the broadcasting of the debates of the House will probably hasten parliamentary reform, which would allow us to keep pace with the twentieth century and operate Parliament as efficiently as possible in this day and age.

Similarly, television helped bring to an end the Vietnam war. For example, the single fact that each night of the week people could see real soldiers, both Vietnamese and American, being killed on a real battlefield, very quickly caused them to beg: "Stop! You cannot go on fighting when this war destroys human beings and also countries."

Those who analyze such situations say that television helped bring to an end the Viet Nam war and forced the leaders to stop it. Television has also known critical periods such as when narcotics were very popular in the United States. They were very popular simply because each day this subject was mentioned and discussed on television. Because of the overexposition due to television, some events are overlapping which, more rapidly than with other media, forces those involved to take stock. I think that if our proceedings were broadcast, we would all improve very rapidly the quality of our remarks in the Hous and we would realize very rapidly that we should be more pertinent in the House, closer to the true concerns of the people. This we should recognize with humility; we take the habit of discussing and of talking to each other in the third person. These are things that people may not understand very well. I repeat that we will rapidly come to the conclusion that we should change our style and improve the quality of our work in the House.

As for me, I think that the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons will improve Parliament and this is the goal I want to reach by supporting the present motion concerning the broadcasting of our debates. This measure will also have the great advantage of closing the almost inevitable gap between the people and their Parliament. Our country is large, the members must spend all their time in Ottawa and those of us who live in the extreme parts of our country find it very difficult to organize their timetables so that they can be in their ridings and fulfil their parliamentary duties as well. But if by means of television we can do both we will be physically present in the House and we will also be present in our ridings, then, the people will see us work as their representatives. Consequently this inevitable gap will be closed, which becomes more and more important. By the way, we know that in many cases people are not interested at all by the work of their representatives. Consequently we will be much more present before our electorate when the proceedings are broadcast; this measure will help people better understand what we are working at, what we do in Parliament. Maybe by following our proceedings they will be able to realize how tenaciously we try to fulfil our duties and this in their best interest.

Consequently, it is difficult for me to understand the reservations of the opposition about this motion concerning the broadcasting of our debates. Their reservations sound like the old objections about Hansard. When the proposal was put forward to print the record, there were objections similar to those we are now hearing from hon. members opposite. But the printed record has proven altogether useful, has it not, Mr. Speaker? We are now proposing nothing more than an electronic record, a medium in agreement with current technology. Nothing less, nothing more.

Before I conclude, I would like to share with you, Mr. Speaker, the experience of a small community called Ferme-Neuve, some 100 miles north of Ottawa. When I went there to make a speech, I was told that the community television station was broadcasting the city council's proceedings. When in the course of a council session the debate became animated and expressed the people's concerns, citizens came en masse to the council room to set nearer to their representatives and hear them debate. To me, this is a good example of TV's possible achievements in the way of getting the people nearer to their representatives and their work.

I believe that if we try this, people will rediscover Parliament. In so doing we will do Parliament a service, because we dared put it in better perspective. It takes daring indeed to broadcast our debates. This will put Parliament in better perspective, and as in Ferme-Neuve people will come to us in greater numbers. Canadians will rediscover that here, in Canada's Parliament, are people who want to serve them.

[English]

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight as the member from Okanagan-Kootenay and nothing more, representing a geographical area and sent here for the second time as the representative of the 100,000 or so people who occupy that specific geographical area. I speak as one who has opposed the televising of the House of Commons on principle through both my terms in parliament. It was lonely back in 1966 and 1967 at a time when television was new and seemed to offer some of the hopes expressed by the minister who has just completed her remarks. However, it is not so lonely now when a great and rising chorus of voices has been added to the people who see television as something less than it has been portrayed to us in the address we have just heard, and in other remarks on the subject.

I would like to begin with a quotation that is cynical. It was written by a British Columbian who, according to some speakers, should be thirsting to have this place televised. He writes for the Vancouver Sun and for Maclean's magazine, Allan Fotheringham. He has not been any particular friend of the Conservative party or myself. I do not share all of his cynicism, but I think the lines with which he begins his column in the latest issue of Maclean's are significant to this debate this evening. He states:

> The essential invention of government is the myth. A party in power that can take fantasy and sugar-wrap it into a guise resembling fact is a successful operation. It is why, as the House of Commons opens its lungs for 1977, the Liberals are decorating their legislative list with the machinery to televise parliament. There is a very good reason why the Liberals, after shying so long from appearing naked before the curious public eye, are being so vocal about this selfless act. It is now quite harmless to televise the Commons because nothing of importance happens there anymore.

I do not quite believe the last line, but I suspect the opening lines have much to say about the real purpose of this activity in which we are now engaged. We heard a great deal about opening up, but I trust Mr. Fotheringham more than the remarks we have just heard.

Televising the House of Commons should not be seen as a simple technological advance. It strikes at the heart of our democratic government. I believe that our form of representative government under constitutional monarchy and responsible to the elected representatives is the best guarantee for democracy yet invented. It should be appreciated and guarded for its own sake.

In that regard, it should be recalled that the original House of Commons was not secure until it was powerful enough to exclude a variety of people from its premises. I know that some of the most ardent advocates of televising this Chamber would fight to the death a latter day intervention in this Chamber by direct intervention of monarch, governor, or even member from the other place. Why they should welcome so enthusiastically and uncritically a technology and technicians who would wield an enormous power over each one of us, I do not know.

This proposal, if effected, would alter the privileged status that we as members have long enjoyed. There are important questions of privilege that must be settled prior to any televising of this place. I trust others will develop that particular point as this debate continues.

A popular belief holds, however, that representative democracy is inferior somehow to direct democracy. We had it rephrased again this very evening. The idea persists that long ago in a golden age direct democracy developed in Greece and that, somehow, any subsequent variety has been inferior to the original. As with any golden age it cannot be contemplated without nostalgia and a longing to retrieve the irrevocably lost.

Television with its awesome power to hold attention and to entertain is seen by many as the vehicle through which direct democracy can be returned to the people of a vast and populous land.

During the twenty-seventh parliament, when the question was raised and the advent of TV in the Commons seemed imminent, I was asked by a reporter, "Wouldn't you like to talk to your constituents through television?" His tone indicated no possibility of a negative answer. Yet implicit in the question are two assumptions that need examining. First is the assumption that my constituents would ever see me via television. I have been excised from enough reporting emanating from this place to know that one's chances with the press are slender indeed. I hold no hope that photographers and editors of film would do better by me than do reporters.

There is, however, an essential difference between television reporting and newspaper journalism. The member, ignored by the journalists, has several methods of presenting himself to his electorate. He can attend local events, speak at his own meetings, write for the local papers or write letters to the editor, and, as a last resort, he can even buy advertising space in the local papers. The printed Hansard, too, serves as his court of last resort, proof that he has been present and has participated in parliament.

But television is something else. If the member was excised from everyday's televising over four years' time, his re-election would be virtually impossible. And what recourse would he have? Who could afford to buy the time on national television to counter the impression that either he had never been there or had never been worth televising?

The second assumption is also important. What guarantee would I have, as a member, that what was televised back home was flattering to me or even neutral toward me? On one or two occasions in this House I have even fallen asleep when some member on the other side has carried on at great length to little point. Suppose that had been captured indelibly and forever on the screen?

There are two variations of what is going to happen in the House once it is televised. One is that a powerful committee would see that nothing untoward is ever turned out over the television system. We have the other voice, again embraced in the last speech, that there would be an enormous file of tapes kept forever. I can imagine! The cabinet cannot keep a thing secret for a moment. The leaks from that place are notorious, and have been for years. What security we would have that some unflattering and some misleading tape would not appear I do not know. However, those are minor matters compared to the really important points about the proposal to televise this place.

Everyone who comments on televising the House of Commons admits that it will change the House. Many say it will change it greatly. Again there is an assumption that needs examining. It is assumed that the changes will all be to the good. Television is seen as a broom sweeping clean, reforming, brushing away the irrelevant, the tedious, polishing up the debate, shortening it, illuminating the decisions, and improving the legislation. What a hope!

There are things that can be done to do that. Some have already been mentioned. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) could make his main statements here, as could cabinet ministers.

Anyone appointed to or recognized by the press gallery should be required to spend at least one hour of each working day listening to the debate in this place and commenting on it. One of the reasons why the level of debate has fallen so badly is that nobody does this any more. So no score is kept as to who is an effective debater, as to who can hold the attention of this Chamber, as to who is capable of saying anything relevant. That sort of change has come about in the 11 years since I first took my seat here.

There are things which need to be done, and those are two which would help enormously to improve the quality of debate.

Surely, too, we must look at other aspects of Canadian life which have not benefited from television. Can any hon. member point to one institution in North America which has benefited since the advent of television? Hockey has greatly changed since television, but has it really been improved? It is interesting to note that when the television of hockey began we were told the days of the commentator were ended, that Foster Hewitt was finished, that he would not be needed because people could see and hear for themselves what was going on. How wrong that prediction has proved to be.

There is very little about televising an institution such as this which is predictable in advance. I suggest there is nothing predictable in advance about televising this place. Already we can see the game being played by the government, and perhaps by the opposition too: it will damage you but it will enhance us. That line is being handed back and forth, but we cannot predict such a result with any certainty because the results of televising any institution are bound to be unknown until the attempt has been made.

Violence in hockey is attributed to television by many thinking people. Violence in the House of Commons is virtually unknown now, but could it be kept out of a televised House? Ratings are the important thing about television, and what would improve a rating more than if an hon. member from one side or the other were to run across and punch somebody in the nose? It would mean a dramatic increase in public attention, no doubt. But would television in the House really favour the genuine over the phony?

I suggest we seriously consider the quality of what passes for religious broadcasting in North America today. I am glad the previous speaker mentioned theology because we are now into the province of myth, theology and blind faith. We have heard a variety of blind faith expressed here already this afternoon. CBC drama has not been confined to parliamentary language. Would it be possible to refrain from bolstering a weak speech by the profanity which bolsters so much weak writing for television? I doubt it very much.

There are some on the other side who think they would be marvellous performers and stars of the show. I know the Prime Minister sees television as providing a restorative to his fading career—that he sees himself as the Mother Dexter of Parliament, over the hill and prone to profanity. After the speech we have just heard there is a danger that the Minister of Communications (Mrs. Sauvé) may become the Carol Burnett of this place.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Johnston: We are called to this assembly as members of parliament to debate and to legislate, and, increasingly, to act as ombudsmen. If the government wanted to bring in any measure which would improve the ability of members to perform their tasks it could have introduced a bill to fill the long-awaited post of ombudsman for the national administration. That would have been a worthy bill and it would have freed members of parliament from much of the work they must perform along those lines. We should always be conscious of the need to improve our performance in any of our roles as debaters or legislators, but if the House is televised we shall face a new demand, not for better legislation, not for better debate, but for better television. I submit that the changes forced upon us would be toward that goal. We would end up with our own cosmetologists, our own lighting men, and our own stars.

We have been sent here to represent our constituents. My constituents are the people for whom I speak. I am sure it is not my job here as the member for Okanagan-Kootenay to speak for the nation, and I can see many ways in which my role in this House would be complicated if every time I rose in this Chamber I had to contend with the thought that I was speaking not to my fellow members assembled here as legislators but to the nation. I am afraid that is a task which does not thrill me and one which my ego, such as it is, does not appreciate.

The most important argument of all derives from information obtained from a variety of writers who have had occasion to study the medium. We should remember, as well, that television is illusion and that it works best, if it works at all, as entertainment. The French philosopher-sociologist Jacques Ellul put it best in his book "The Political Illusion" in which he said:

Finally, TV's effect on politics is being much discussed. The televised transmissions of parliamentary sessions, the direct exposure of politicians, the possibility a statesman has to show his face to everybody when making a speech—all this, it is argued, provides some sort of direct democracy.

As we have noted, however, this entirely passive role of the citizen has nothing to do with a working democracy. Such TV transmissions illuminate precisely the division discussed above: on the one hand there is the political spectacle, on the other, the reality of power. TV accentuates the spectacle, on the other, the reality of power. TV accentuates the spectacle and makes it all the more special because it gives the individual the impression of life itself, or reality directly seized. He will say: "Political Affairs? Of course, I've seen this important debate in the Assembly, where everybody played his role so seriously. The State? Of course. General de Gaulle or Mendès-France talked to me yesterday over the TV."

The examples given are French, of course, because the author is French.

All that is just a spectacle, appearance without root, such a game. And precisely because all this is only a game, such a telecast is possible. The real political mechanism—the state structure—remains completely hidden, outside all control, all the more so as the flickering little screen fixes the individual's attention on the spectacle and prevents him from searching deeper and asking himself questions as to the true nature of power.

This shows the folly of pretending that the televising of the proceedings of this Chamber will accomplish any part of the crusade which the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) has carried on so long, as a result of which the pressure generated by his efforts is being felt by the government over there. Again, we get a trade-off which will really satisfy no one. Just as the trade-off of the abolition of capital punishment for gun control did not fool the people of Canada, so this trade-off will not fool them either. In fact I can think of nothing more detrimental to the successful conclusion of the effort to obtain open government than the televising of this Chamber, thus creating the illusion to which reference was made over and over again by the Minister of Communications when she said it would open this place up, while being unaware of the other point which is so crucial to anything like the free workings of a democratic government.

There have been other warnings that have been pertinent. Malcolm Muggeridge, a long time television personality, has this to say:

The media enormously distort life. People are given a surface picture which they come to believe—the legend made visible, the word become television. It promotes complete conformism. A phrase like "population explosion" is bandied about as if it meant something!

Or Blaik Kirby, writing in the Globe and Mail and speaking of Muggeridge's series "A Third Testament", says something that applies precisely to what is planned for the House when he writes:

. . . but nothing can be done really well on TV that is not properly adapted to the visual medium,—

[Mr. Johnston.]

This is one of the problems with this place; it is not adapted to the visual medium. It is not adapted to television now, but it would be because the demand would come and we would be forced to conform.

It is a pity, in a way, that the leader of the NDP is leaving because it was from that corner of the House that so much utterly unquestioned faith in regard to televising the proceedings of this Chamber comes.

We get back to the idea of myth that Fotheringham used:

In any case, it is quite certain that myths in our western civilization are connected with action, and incite to action. In that sense the definition of myth as "a motivating global image" is certainly the most exact. This myth is indeed a vigorous, highly coloured, irrational representation, charged with the entire believing capacity of the individual. It is, for the most part, a subconscious image, because the religious charge which it carries gives it an appearance of obviousness and certitude so fundamental that to become conscious of it is dangerous. Conscious awareness would run the risk of weakening the certitude. The person with a confused sense of it escapes the clarity of seeing the myth as myth. He can continue to take refuge in certitude.

I know this most important point is also the most misunderstood, Mr. Speaker, because it moves into the realm of the new sacred and the new mythological. It is one of my personal disappointments that some of the reverend gentlemen who are also members of parliament, and whom, one would assume, would know much about the former sacred and the old mythology, have themselves joined in demythologizing the old sacred, and seem to be unaware they are taking upon themselves a new sacred and have accepted a new mythology. So they will not be aware of the loss of objectivity in discussing this measure. In conforming to this world, spokesmen have raised modern technology to a level beyond criticism—irony of ironies!

I heard the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) speak of the right to know, that televising this Chamber somehow will provide the right to know. The most ancient of temptations, Mr. Speaker, is the right to know. It is the original one. That is the new myth, the myth that has been exposed, and first exposed by a Canadian prophet, Marshall McLuhan. He has spoken in his own country, and although perhaps unhonoured he has been generally unheard and almost completely misunderstood. Again I would go back to Ellul's writing; he has appreciated what we have heard but to which we have paid so little attention. He says:

Anonymity can no longer be assured by ancestral tradition in a society geared to the future and rejecting continuity with the past.

That is an excellent description of North America.

The anonymity is now assured by the mass media. The someone who carries the story to all, the someone who is completely known and completely anonymous and is assimilated to the "no one" speaking in the myth, is, par excellence, the television announcer.

That is where we find, not the birth of modern myth, but its guarantee of mythical authenticity. The transformations produced in the modern psyche by the mass media, the disconnected order of the discourse, the reappearance of global mythical thinking, the rejection of rational logic, the instant seizure of the real, etc., that has all been thoroughly shown, demonstrated and explained by Marshall McLuhan.

Yet it is as if he never wrote, Mr. Speaker. He has been a true prophet who has said these things 20 years ago. One listens in vain for any indication that he has been heard and understood, unless it is that he has been heard and understood so well by the government opposite that this exercise we are engaged in is a completely cynical one, and I suspect that might be the truth.

I should like to quote McLuhan himself on the subject of control. He said:

No society in history has ever known enough about the forces that shape and transform it to take action to control and direct new technologies as they extend and transform man. But today, change proceeds so instantaneously through the new media that it may be possible to institute a global education program that will enable us to seize the reins of our destiny—but to do this we must first recognize the kind of therapy that's needed for the effects of the new media. In such an effort, indignation against those who perceive the nature of those effects is no substitute for awareness and insight.

The extensions of man's consciousness induced by the electric media could conceivably usher in the millennium—

Having heard so many speakers from the other side, that surely may be what they believe. But he warns:

—it also holds the potential for realizing the Anti-Christ. Cataclysmic environmental changes such as these are, of themselves, morally neutral; it is how we perceive them and react to them that will determine their ultimate psychic and social consequences. If we refuse to see them at all, we will become their servants. It's inevitable that the world-pool of electronic information movement will toss us all about like corks on a stormy sea, but if we keep our cool during the descent into the maelstrom, studying the process as it affects us, and learning to program and control it, we can come through.

I wish I could be as optimistic as Marshall McLuhan. Certainly the LaMarsh commission appointed by the premier of Ontario, headed up by that very good friend of the government opposite who was a cabinet minister for so long, is having a difficult time drawing any report to any kind of conclusion. When the report does come I am very skeptical that it will result in any effective control even of violence, regarding which there is a profound feeling that somehow technology and television have got well away from us.

There are other Canadians of sense on this subject. Professor Norman Ward of the University of Saskatchewan, in a cautionary letter to the Speaker of this House, says:

It is simply not true that the camera does not lie; it can lie more spectacularly than any unaided human being, and given the nature of some of the House's proceedings, it is likely that members will sometimes want to help it along in that direction.

And later:

I know that Hansard is far from being a perfect record, but compared with the hit-and-miss selectivity of live television it is incomparably more reliable than the fleeting pictures would be; yet it is almost inevitable that the pictures would have a greater impact on the public.

It is there, Mr. Speaker, that we so often get the argument that television will let people know what is going on, or that it is the same thing as the print media and we are under no greater threat from the cameraman than we are from reporters in the gallery. But both Marshall McLuhan and Norman Ward warn us about this.

I could also quote Robert Fulford who talks about Peter Gzowski's shift from the medium of radio to television. He says:

As I saw the first show, it again occurred to me that the nature of unrehearsed entertainment TV makes every subject trivial. Television, unless it's prepared with the greatest care—as in good drama, comedy, and documentary—turns everything it touches to dross.

Again, from the performances opposite it would not take much of a turn, but nevertheless for those who hope that the unstructured televising of this Chamber will result in great television, I think they are caught up in a powerful illusion.

Robert Fulford goes on to say:

What Johnny Carson knows about TV—and the people who are hoping for a repeat of This Country don't know—is that it needs to be entertaining all the time, all the time.

This is the secret Johnny Carson knows, and that's why he never stops pushing, jiggling, tickling his fellow performers; we've taught him to fear our finger on the ChannelMaster, and that's why he's a nervous wreck. That's also why nothing of any permanent interest gets said on his show.

● (2130)

We can turn to the latest Chayefsky film, a film that has not reached Ottawa yet, called "Network". I would suggest very seriously, Mr. Speaker, that the Speaker of this House ought to arrange a private showing of that film for all members, because the technology has been around really for quite a long time now. There are people in this 20th century who are pretty conscious of the effect it can have and who are sounding warnings to us that we are paying no attention to at all.

Anyone who dares to stand up and say he is opposed on principle to televising this House is charged as being, at best, a red neck and, at worst, a dinosaur or Neanderthal, and those terms are used here with the suggestion that we are being dragged kicking and screaming into this century. The warnings are coming from this century, and they are coming from people who look ahead. They are truly prophetic people.

Television takes an illusion and makes it truth, and I think that's irresponsible and destructive. The worst thing is that the public takes it all seriously.

He also said:

To me, television is the symptom of something awful that could turn into something worse.

Ponder that, hon. members, because we have been told repeatedly already today that this place is something awful. But, believe me, televising it and the effect of televising this place could be something still worse, and we should remember that Chayefsky says:

I won't say television is any more corrupt than any other media of communication—movies, newspapers, even politics—but it does have a scope others lack . . . it comes right into your living room and pounds its message into your brain.

Of course the character in the film played by the late Peter Finch says:

Television is not the truth . . . Television is a—

I will bleep out the next word in true television style and continue as follows:

—amusement park. Television is a circus, a carnival, a travelling troupe of acrobats, story tellers, side show freaks, lion tamers and football players. We're in the boredom-killing business.

At this point one could fairly ask where the demand for televising the House originates. Certainly it does not originate with the general public. I asked the then President of the CBC, Laurent Picard, a year or so ago whether the CBC was under any pressure from the public to produce this service, and his answer was a flat no. From that followed the question, what size of audience would there be, and the estimate given by Mr. Picard was less than 1 per cent. Yet we have had suggested already this evening that televising this House would reach a majority of the population at any one time. I do not believe that.

I will not discuss the issue of cost at all. If televising this place would improve its basic roles and functions in any way; if it would mean better debate and better legislation, then the cost would not be important at all. But when we know that it will not achieve any of those things, when we know it is a cynical trade-off of something the government is now willing to allow in order to prevent something else from happening to it, and that other thing it dreads so much is open government, then we should not for a moment accept this when we want that other.

There are great minds who question the desirability of televising the House of Commons. The debate we are engaged in can be intellectual on the negative side. It does deal in myths and theology and sacreds and profanes. It is time that some hon. members on all sides of this House began to sort out the myth from the reality, and began to look with some objectivity at the proposal before us that, if permitted to proceed, could well destroy this institution which is the one bastion of our democracy that remains.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): While following this most interesting debate, Mr. Speaker, and I think it has been interesting, I could not help from having my mind go back to a situation that took place about 13 years ago. It was my first experience with television just after being elected when I was as green as grass, or even greener than that. I was invited to go to Montreal to attend an all-party television show that was supposed to discuss the future of political parties in Canada.

I went to Montreal and walked into this all-party show. The leading player was the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie). There was also in attendance a non-partisan chap by the name of Egan Chambers, who was a former Tory MP. The unbiased, impartial chairman was the present hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). That was the group that met me in Montreal for this unbiased, all-party show. In thinking back on that it would seem to me I would rather take my chances with television in the House of Commons.

Let me say through you, Mr. Speaker, to the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston) that I listened to his speech with interest. I have always admired the sincerity of that hon. member. He said something by which he hoped to make his point, but as I listened I thought in fact he was reinforcing my position in supporting television in the House of Commons.

That hon. member was suggesting that he wanted to speak only to his constituents. I know that hon. member, and I do not think he meant to say that or suggest that his responsibility was only to his riding, or that those of us who come here are here only responsible—

An hon. Member: He said just to those in the Chamber.

Mr. Saltsman: I know the hon. member, and I am sure he would not want to leave that impression. He said he wanted to speak directly to this Chamber and to his constituents. We are not here to speak to each other, we are here rather to speak to the nation. Our oath of office is not to our constituents or to each other. Our oath of office is to the nation. This is a national forum, and this country is in serious trouble for one reason or another, as a result of economic problems, problems in respect of confederation with provinces trying to opt out or change the terms. One of the reasons for this trouble is that too much of what takes place in this Chamber that is not noticed by the public takes place on behalf of a particular group, a particular section or a particular region instead of the nation as a whole.

Instead of coming here to try to keep this country together we come here to represent specific groups or regions when we should be trying to do as much for all the people of this country wherever they may live. I suggest regionalism is one of the sicknesses of Canada. It is too easy to make the kind of speeches I have heard in this House which are directed specifically to an individual's constituency or one group. If such speeches were read by other people in this country they would be appalled. It is too easy to clip out sections of Hansard and send them out to a local area, making a hero of yourself in that locale, while at the same time tearing down this country and the confederation we should all be trying to uphold.

It is about time the people of this country had an opportunity of looking at the performance of their members of parliament. Perhaps this is not the way a member wants his constituents to see him, but the people should have an opportunity of seeing the performance and behaviour of their member in this House. Let them see him directly without interpretation or the particularization that comes with selections from Hansard.

I heard the hon. member who preceded me speak about the people who are going to watch television, that there may only be one per cent, which may be true. I do not know but I suspect there may be a very wide audience if we televise the House of Commons. My wife complains to me that ever since I became a member of parliament I never take her to the theatre. I say, why should I go to the theatre, I make my living there! I am there all the time.

We tend to underestimate the vitality of this place. I know that this place can be a bore and I know it can be awfully foolish, but it is also capable of high drama and of the noblest of sentiments. I have come to appreciate and admire not only this institution but the people on all sides of the House who are in this institution. I do not know why we are afraid of exposing this institution to the public gaze. I think it is strong, I think it is worthwhile, and I think it will benefit from it. The weaknesses that are here can be exposed. Surely if something is strong, it can correct itself, and people will understand the weaknesses.

When my friends come to visit the House of Commons and they sit in the galleries, they walk away from this place saying to me, "Look, we never realized how dramatic and how exciting this place can be". This place can be dramatic and exciting. Real drama takes place here, such as the capital punishment debate and other debates which have taken place. These debates are an ornament to this country, and to thought in our society. I think we should provide the opportunity for people in Canada to view and to hear them, because few people do. There will be a thousand times more people than those who read Hansard who will get a picture of the House of Commons.

All of us who support this measure of the government at this time—and I should say that originally this was not a government measure but a private member's measure,—myself included, have for the last 12 or 13 years been putting forward resolutions to televise the House of Commons. It is not as though this just happened overnight and the government has just become aware of it. Like so many things the government does, it does perhaps the right things for what sometimes seem to be the wrong reasons. I will give the government the benefit of the doubt because this is not the time to cavil about it.

I do not want to go through the exercise of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). It is difficult to know whether he supports the measure or does not support it, but meanwhile he used the opportunity to lambaste the government for all kinds of things that have nothing to do with this debate.

As I listened to the debate this evening I wondered, if there had been televising of the House of Commons in effect tonight, who would have come off best. I think that my leader would have come off best because he made the most intelligent speech of the whole lot. The next one would have been the government House leader, and the last would have been the spokesman for the Conservative party because his speech would have been seen as a kind of ploy. I think that perhaps this is one of the things of which the official opposition is afraid.

I do not think there can be any doubt when I say that the government is probably doing the right thing for the wrong reason, that one of the reasons for haste is that we have a government which is in serious trouble. Their analysis has told them, and my analysis has told me, that televising the House of Commons will help the government and hurt the opposition. I am not saying that this is out of some Machiavellian aspect of television, but I think it is vitally important, even if that is the consequence of televising the House of Commons, that the television come in here, and I think it should happen quickly. I do not think that this should be dragged out and held over for a long period of time.

At no time in our history have we needed to have the House televised as we need to have it televised now. I can think, for instance, of English speaking Canadians who say to me that the government is full of French Canadians, all they have is French Canadians on that side. That is the misapprehension of many people in this country. Of course it is not so. On the other hand, you have people in Quebec saying that the whole government is run by les Anglais. It is about time that the people of this country saw what their parliament is like, saw that in fact there is representation of both French and English Canada, saw in fact the goodness that exists in both these people, and the sincerity which exists on both sides and how hard some of us are trying to keep this country together. I think that, if we televised the House, only good can come out of this important debate that is taking place in our society. The sooner we do it, because time is critical, the better the chance we have in dealing with what I think is an enormously serious problem and one that has to be dealt with as quickly as possible. I cannot think of anything that will do more to dispel some of the ignorance and prejudice with regard to what exists in this Chamber than letting the people see for themselves those who represent this country.

You may say that some of the things they are going to see will not be all that pleasant. That is fine. The Canadian people are not that weak stomached that they cannot stand it. I can only say the kind of thing that Cromwell said when somebody asked him how he was to be painted. He said, "paint me with my warts on". Let them see their parliament with its warts on. The warts are not that significant as to destroy what I think is a favourable picture of the institution which legislates in this country.

I want to come back to something I started to say about the effect that television would have, that it would benefit the government and be to the disadvantage of the opposition, at least in the initial stages. The reason I say this is that the present bias of the news media is to attack the government on every occasion and to make it look in fact worse, if that is possible, than it actually is. But the bias of the media in this country—and it is not because the government is Liberal, they would do the same thing if the government were Conservative or NDP—the actual tendency of the media now is to attack every institution that exists.

This is something that has happened in this country over the last number of years, and the only explanation I can come up with—and I am not saying it is something the media can do something about, I do not think they can because it is the nature of things—is that over the last number of years, with the decline of a number of competing newspapers, radio and television stations, the media has felt called upon to prove its purity and to show that it is not an institution, although it is the greatest establishment in this country. It feels called upon to attack, as a matter of course, every institution, whether it is the Workmen's Compensation Board, the Ontario government, the federal government, the Manitoba government, or the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. There is a presumption of guilt if you are a government agency or if you are an established organization.

I suppose that one of the reasons they do it—I know many newspapermen and I have a tremendous admiration for them and for many of the editors in this country—if you are a one newspaper organization or you are the only newspaper in town, you have to show that you are not the establishment even though in fact you are. How do you show this? You show this by attacking everything that exists. I feel that very often the newspapers—less so the television and radio—see themselves as the official opposition. It is very difficult to get any kind of statement out of here if the press gallery does not accept it as important.

It is the press gallery that sees itself as the official opposition and, to some extent, treats the opposition with contempt, treats the opposition in the way a puppeteer treats his puppet. They have to jump according to the issues they think are important. If they think scandal is going, scandal is what the opposition must talk about, even though the problem is unemployment. We in this party have seen unemployment as being a serious issue just now. Now the media is picking unemployment as an issue. We have been saying it for six or eight months while the media have been screaming scandal on their front pages. The greatest scandal in this country is the fact that there are 800,000 people out of work, and there is a government that is not doing very much about it. It is that kind of bias that exists in the newspapers, and I do not know that anything can be done about it.

To tell the newspapers what to print is unthinkable. That is the last thing we want, but we have to recognize what is happening to the media, and we have to recognize that Hansard is faceless and opinionless—it just records what we say—and this House desperately needs to have something which records exactly what is said and something which is not interpreted to tailor the headlines for a particular day or the editorial needs of a particular medium. This resolution will favour the government because the government, bad as it is, never looks as bad here as it looks in the press.

Judging by the press one would think the government never did anything right. I at least concede that occasionally it does something right, but one would never know it from reading the press. I seldom feel too terribly sorry for the government, but there have been occasions when I have. There have been occasions when charges have been made by the opposition, or by writers and reporters, and the minister involved has come out with what I thought was an irrefutable argument against those charges. Whereas the charges were banner charges, the refutation of the minister might have taken a paragraph on page 17: "The minister says that is not so", and they print only part of what the minister had to say.

I think our society is in danger of tearing itself apart. There can be such a thing as institutionalized criticism or institutionalized bias against the things which hold this country together, and those cements are not all that powerful. There has to be some way of enabling each side to be heard, each side to stand on its own—the public has enough intelligence to examine, and people do not need any editorial comment to go with it—and that is what television will do for this House.

[Mr. Saltsman.]

From what I have been able to read, one of the reasons Hansard was brought into the British House of Commons was that while reporting was not allowed, just as television is not allowed in this Chamber, reporting in fact always took place whether allowed or not. The problem was that the reporting was not responsible, it was inaccurate, and it was biased. The British House realized reporting would take place anyway, so they wanted it at least to be factual, and that is how we got Hansard. Televising the House of Commons would be an extension of Hansard.

I would like to use a quote I found in something called "The Procedure of the House of Commons" by Joseph Redlick, 1908. It reads as follows:

> The great Dr. Johnson was one of the regular reporters: he gave accounts of parliamentary affairs in the leading periodical, The Gentleman's Magazine, under the mask of proceedings of the Senate of Lilliput or of Rome.

Then in a footnote the author puts this down:

> Dr. Johnson afterwards confessed that he had himself composed many of the parliamentary speeches published by him, or at all events had freely ornamented them as he thought fit. In doing so he claimed to have held an even hand between the two parties: at the same time he declared that he had "taken care that the Whig dogs should not have the best of it."

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Newspapers haven't changed much, have they?

Mr. Saltsman: Well, at one time I would have put it a different way. There was a time not so long ago when there were more newspapers in places like Toronto or some of the other cities when in fact there was a biased Liberal press and a biased Conservative press. Those of us in the NDP or the CCF were fully aware of what kind of press we used to have, and in fact, just like the House of Commons, the Liberal press would go exactly for the Liberal line, the Tory press would go exactly for the Tory line, but at least there was some kind of balance in that. At least we knew where they stood. There was a time when I first came here when there were what were known as government reporters who had the inside track with the government and who took handouts from the government. I suppose where there was biased press or partisan press, that is what it was about. If the government had a story to leak, it was not leaked to the television networks; it was given to one of its inside reporters, and it suddenly showed up as an exclusive.

If there was a Conservative government, the story would show up as an exclusive in a Conservative newspaper; if there was a Liberal government, it would show up as an exclusive in a Liberal newspaper. Those days have passed because of changes in newspaper ownership and because of the change in the nature of the media, and we have to recognize that. For all the evil in that old system—and it was a pretty evil system in the sense that newspapers were either for this party or that—at least everybody knew what the colours were. If people did not like what one newspaper had to say, they could go to another one, or they could buy them both and make a comparison, although in fact few people ever did. They simply bought the newspaper which happened to reinforce their own particular prejudices and stayed with it rather than look for an unbiased position. However, in fact the thing which may save this House—because this institution is in trouble, just as the country is in trouble—is televising it.

If things go wrong with televising, they will change. I do not want to go into technique. I do not know what the technique will be. I presume it will be to focus on whoever happens to be speaking rather than to look around to see who in the back row is picking his nose or something like that.

An hon. Member: Disgusting.

Mr. Saltsman: I presume, Mr. Speaker, you would not permit that kind of editorializing, although I might add that I do not know of any hon. member who would do such a thing.

Mr. Broadbent: On this side of the House!

Mr. Saltsman: On this side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Saltsman: I was going to say something worse, but I could not think of anything worse at the time.

The House will change, and so it should. I know some of my hon. friends are concerned that some members are going to ham it up for television.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: They might grow a beard.

Mr. Saltsman: Some people may grow a beard in order to look more photogenic. I have met many members of parliament, and with the greatest of respect to my colleagues and to my friends, I have to say that there is not one of them who does not have a little ham in him, whether it is an editorial ham or a flare for writing or a flare for phrase making. What will change, or course, is that Hansard and newspaper reporting give an edge to those who can use the written word, and television will give an edge to those with blue eyes. Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

INDIAN AFFAIRS—RELOCATION OF DEPARTMENTAL OFFICES IN HULL—CONSULTATION WITH NATIVES

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, on December 1, 1976, I asked the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Allmand) if his department was planning to move its offices from Ottawa to Hull in the near future and, if so, whether Indian people were consulted about the move. In reply the minister confirmed that the move was imminent, that it was a Treasury Board decision and that he did not think the plan was made in consultation with Indian people. This government preaches consultation but promotes confrontation with the Indian people. I am sure that the minister is aware of the fact that there is a strong feeling among the Indian people that the offices should remain in Ottawa.

At a meeting between the National Indian Brotherhood and the minister on November 19 he was made aware of the position of the brotherhood on the matter, the position being to have the offices remain in Ottawa. The minister promised to discuss this with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien). To date there has been no further communication with the National Indian Brotherhood about this matter.

Why is there a strong feeling about the office remaining in Ottawa? First, under 4 per cent of Indians in Canada are French speaking. Second, government has had an ongoing commitment to employ Indians within the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Given that there is more than a reasonable possibility that the department, once relocated in Quebec, will experience more pressure to have all its employees bilingual, an even greater barrier will be created for Indians who want to work for the department. There will be an even greater emphasis that Indians be trilingual in most cases. This is so, as most Indians in Canada today are already fluent in both an Indian language and English. The bilingualism program already requires a third language—French. If the department moves into Quebec, given its present atmosphere, the pressure will be even greater. Thus a system already by nature unfair to Canada's Indian population for the most part will be further intensified, resulting in even fewer Indian employees at the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and, accordingly, fewer programs and policies designed to meet the needs of the majority of Indian people.

Third, the government has a commitment to have continuous, ongoing dialogue with the Indian people of Canada. It is only in the last few years that Indian people have begun to come to Ottawa for talks with government. Now, at long last, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is more centralized with most of its offices located at the Centennial Tower Building at 400 Laurier Avenue, West, and at the Journal Building at 365 Laurier Avenue, West. These places have become familiar to the Indian people. I fail to understand how a move to Hull can be considered—a move that would jeopardize the kind of involvement of Indian people that the department should be promoting.

Fourth, the organizations and other departments that the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Indian people are most closely involved with are in Ottawa, and all within walking distance of each other—for example, the National Indian Brotherhood at 102 Bank Street; the Inuit Tapirisat at 222 Somerset Street, West; the Native Citizens Directorate, Secretary of State Department, at 66 Slater Street; and the Office of Native Employment, Public Service Commission, at L'Esplanade Laurier, and, of course, the location of the parliament buildings is also in close proximity to all of these.

The final argument is, of course, the cost. It is no secret that relocation of a department the size of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is a costly venture. It means moving approximately 3,000 employees, two thirds of whom occupy offices or cubicles in either the Centennial Tower Building or the Journal Building. It does not take a financial expert to calculate that the amount that will be expended on such a move will be exorbitant. At a time when Indian bands are being daily refused their requests for funding of essential programs at a time when the school construction program is years behind, at a time when Indian housing is at its poorest, the federal government still has enough money to relocate the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development without even considering the needs and desires of Canada's Indians.

There is no argument to support the conclusion that a move to Hull of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development will result in any benefit for Indians. Will the programs improve? Will the policies and programs be more relevant to Indian needs? Will there be greater opportunity for Indian involvement, Indian input, or Indian employment? I think not.

We have heard that the justification for moving the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to Hull as perceived by the federal government is that this move is part of a massive decentralization policy. The Department of Veterans Affairs is going to Prince Edward Island. The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is going all the way to Quebec—or should I say just one mile away, across the river to Hull. This is ridiculous—a farce!

How were these key departments chosen? Who decided which ones should move? Whoever was charged with the responsibility should have realized that a department as unique in nature as the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development—a department which serves one key segment of the population—Indians—warranted much more consideration than was afforded it.

If the minister fails to acknowledge this concern, I feel he is acting irresponsibly toward the Indian people—the people his department exists to serve. It shows that this government is saying "to Hull with the Indians".

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I reply to the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith). The decision to move the headquarters of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development over to Hull has been taken by the Treasury Board on advice from the Department of Public Works. This decision is part of a plan to achieve a better balance in the distribution of public service employees and facilities in the National Capital Region, more particularly, between the cities of Ottawa and Hull.

[Mr. Smith (Churchill).]

At the moment the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has its headquarters accommodated in eight different buildings in the city of Ottawa. There has been a need to consolidate those offices for some time. The Treasury Board has decided that the department was a logical candidate for the moving of its headquarters into the new facilities that are being built in Hull.

In answer to the hon. member, neither the Indian people nor the department have been consulted about the move, but they have been informed of the decision. The minister has taken up the matter of the moving of the headquarters of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development over to Hull with the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) to ask him to reconsider the decision. This was done as a result of adverse reaction to the move which came principally from the National Indian Brotherhood and Inuit Tapirisat of Canada which are both based in Ottawa. It was done also because of objections voiced by some provincial Indian associations that the minister had occasion to meet during the last four months.

It strikes me that, given the location of both the National Indian Brotherhood and the Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, and the need to increase the frequency of face to face encounters between senior officials of their organizations and of the department, Treasury Board would want to reconsider this decision. In addition, because of the number of Indians who are located in Ottawa for purposes of pursuing higher education and seeking employment, and who need periodic assistance and counselling, the department might find it necessary to set up some offices here and employ additional staff if the departmental headquarters moved over to Hull.

The hon. member who raised the question will note that action is being taken. We hope that some reconsideration will be given to this by the President of the Treasury Board.

SEARCH AND RESCUE—REPORT OF TASK FORCE—DATE OF PUBLICATION AND POSSIBLE TABLING

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to bring to the attention of the House during this late show the question of the implementation of search and rescue operations in the province of Newfoundland, a matter which I brought to the attention of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) on November 15. I am pleased to note that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Dionne) will be replying because this really has more to do with that department.

While I have raised this matter on many occasions, I want in the short time allotted to me tonight to point out some fundamentals that are being completely ignored by those responsible in government to implement a surveillance and control capacity that will be required by Canada if we are to achieve the objectives for which we should strive in relation to our declaration to extend our fishing zone to the 200 mile limit.

As a result of the thrusts of my colleagues and myself over the past few months in an effort to get the government to deploy elements of the search and rescue capability, we have as yet only convinced the government to station one or two helicopters in Newfoundland on a semi-permanent basis, and other hardware in Gander.

While we are appreciative of the fact that the government listened, we are far from achieving what should be the requirements for protecting our 200-mile zone because the additional deployment announced is evidence of the lack of fundamental military knowledge in defence tactics which can be related to surveillance and patrol.

The extension of a 200-mile zone prompts the realization that Canada will be responsible to provide surveillance over some 600,000 square miles of coastal waters, a massive task that requires an extensive effort in funding and hardware, as well as logistic capability.

The land mass that will be in the forefront to provide the surveillance of foreign vessels in the province of Newfoundland and I am amazed that neither our Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) nor his officials realize what is involved. The height of their ignorance—I do not want to use that word, but I have to—is that any line of defence, to use a basic military term, cannot be confined to a small portion of the area to be defended and I ask that those concerned should look at a map of Newfoundland and of Canada and of the Atlantic region to see the phoneyness and lack of appreciation of fundamental basic training that are evident. In this regard I refer to the fact that the Minister of National Defence looked at the matter from a purely phony political standpoint rather than a strategic one, by not including in the deployment of necessary equipment the western sector of the province of Newfoundland. But what is more despicable to me is that I pointed this out to him in a co-operative manner, and in spite of promises made to me, I have been completely ignored, and this is evident, that even though I have been promised a hearing with top officials, it has been denied.

On the west coast of Newfoundland the sector of the province that I represent in this House, there exists a vacated strategic base, which was occupied during World War II by the Strategic Air Command of the American Air Force, which still offers every logistic support for a search and rescue base of operations. It has more than adequate fuel capacity, hangar space, housing accommodation and technical capability, not to mention the fact that it was considered during World War II to be strategically sound enough in the defence of our nation to warrant the expenditure of multi-millions of dollars to support the defence of North America. And yet the Minister of National Defence chose to ignore the economic benefits to station an element of the force in that area, but rather bowed to pressure on a political basis.

What I detest, however, Mr. Speaker, is that I was promised, verbally in discussions with the minister, a hearing to put my case before senior officials of the Department of National Defence. It is also hard to understand that at this late date the report of the Canadian Coast Guard task force review of the national search and rescue policy revision has not even as yet been tabled for debate, in spite of repeated assurances that it would be submitted to Cabinet six months ago.

I have tried, Mr. Speaker, in my representation over the years to be reasonable, but it is now finally obvious that I am barking in the wind, and I use "barking" advisedly, and regardless of the three minute reply which I am about to receive I can only deplore the attitude of not only the minister but also his Chief of the Defence staff, the great pretender, who in his declarations of national defence is just as phony as his minister, and I can only repeat what I said in a motion to this House, that they should both be dispatched to the nearest basic training centre for a refresher course not only in basic training but also in common courtesy and sincerity in their obligations to the nation which they represent.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to reply to the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall). I will try to deal with the main points that he raised in his question. I might point out that I am replying tonight on behalf of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) rather than the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang). Since the question was originally asked by the hon. member on November 15 the Minister of National Defence has been made responsible for all aspects of search and rescue, so my minister is now responsible for answering all questions on search and rescue.

However, it seems to me that the hon. member is confusing search and rescue with surveillance of the 200-mile limit. I respectfully suggest to him that he should make representations to the minister and to departmental officials with regard to the abandoned base at Stephenville and with regard to the surveillance capability which the department, in conjunction with the Department of Fisheries and the Environment, will be establishing for the surveillance of the expanded coastal zone.

I must, however, take exception to the statement that the minister and his officials do not understand what is involved. From personal knowledge and experience I am well aware that they do understand what is involved. They are working actively and seriously to see that the involvement is fully met both by men and equipment from within the armed forces and other departments that will work in conjunction with national defence in search and rescue, and eventually in surveillance work.

It disturbs me to hear the hon. member say that he has been ignored by the minister and departmental officials. I do not understand how that came about and I want to assure him that I will certainly bring that part of his comments to the attention of my minister at the earliest opportunity. I have found the hon. member to be a rather serious and objective member of the opposition and I would hope, in fact I know, this is some oversight for which there has to be a genuine explanation.

The department has established a search and rescue centre at Gander. The main reason is that Gander has the facilities to accommodate that armed forces unit and it is also the most open area of the province of Newfoundland in regard to weather. It is the area from which helicopters take off and land most efficiently during the largest number of days of the year.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The time allotted to the parliamentary secretary has expired.

FINANCE—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF FIGURES SHOWING SALES OF UNITED STATES DOLLARS DURING LAST TWENTY DAYS—NET CHANGE IN FOREIGN EXCHANGE POSITION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question tonight on this adjournment debate arises from a question put by myself to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) on December 10, reported at page 1869 of Hansard. At that time I asked the minister if he could produce certain figures that would show the true exchange position of Canada with regard to the outflow of foreign funds which resulted from the Canadian dollar falling quite dramatically in the latter part of November. In my question I asked:

> As figures released last week reveal that $803 million of our U.S. dollar reserves, about 23 per cent of the total, was used in late November to resist a fall in the Canadian dollar . . . would the minister table the daily trading figures and forward positions for the past 20 trading days so that we might better understand the magnitude of the drain on our dollar, for which there is a 1962 precedent inspired by his predecessor, Mr. Turner?

The general reply of the Minister of Finance was that he felt that the publication of such figures would not be in the best interests of Canada. The reference that I made to Mr. Turner appears in Hansard on October 18, 1962, page 673. At that time Mr. Turner, faced with a similar position when he was being denied the daily trading records of the exchange fund, made quite an impassioned plea—in fact, it was his maiden speech in the House—in which he pointed out that he had asked for an order asking for the daily trading figures. He stated that notice for production of the figures had been delivered, and he then said:

> The Minister of Finance, when he replies to this motion, may say that the figures I am seeking are privileged because it is the custom of the Bank of Canada to publish these figures on a monthly basis only.

In short, Mr. Turner was well aware of the fact that the then minister of finance, used the same old stock argument the present Minister of Finance uses, but Mr. Turner went beyond that in pressing his case when he said:

> —I suggest to Your Honour that the rest of us are entitled to go through and to inspect the tables and the figures in question. If the situation were otherwise the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister and the government as a whole would be suggesting for this House a double standard, namely, one standard for the government and another for the opposition and the rest of the members of this House.
> [Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi).]

Mr. Turner went on to make his case by stating:

> —the purpose of the question now being considered is not merely to secure production of figures necessary to the public but also to protect the rights of parliament itself and every hon. member.

In this respect I would suggest that Mr. Turner when speaking was quite accurate. Unfortunately we are now faced with a situation in which, as I pointed out, on November 19 in this House during debate on the income tax legislation that is still before the House, there may be arguments afoot concerning exchange matters. Let me refer Your Honour to page 1204 of Hansard for November 19 where I pointed out that we should be able to have a full review of the exchange fund in relation to Bill C-5, which dealt specifically with the exchange fund. I stated that:

> I hope he will change his mind, come to the committee, and give us the information to which we are entitled—

I was referring to the Minister of Finance. I went on to state:

> There are many rumours in the business community today and I think it is high time the minister set the record straight.

The minister got very haughty then and said:

> Rumours of what?

I then suggested to the minister that if he had come to the committee meeting the day before I could have put the stories to him and he could have had the opportunity of answering them. We now know the rumours to which I was referring. The hard fact is that the Canadian dollar was placed under perhaps the most severe pressure, so far as our exchange situation is concerned, of any time in our history.

I think this is particularly pertinent when we bear in mind that Mr. Turner referred to the publication on a daily basis of exchange figures over the period from April 9, 1962 to June 22, 1962. This was in reference to a debate that had taken place and was almost a focal point of the June 18 election of 1962. Those that now govern in this country were then in the opposition and they made a great show over what they regarded as a major exodus of funds. This was certainly one of their key issues during that election campaign.

The hard fact is that when the figures were finally tabled in this House showing day-by-day what had been the exchange position it turned out that from April 9 to June 22, 1962, the total exodus amounted to $461.7 million. Within a few days, as I have already indicated, in November of this year there was something in excess of $800 million that went out, yet the Minister of Finance refuses to give this House an accurate reflection on a day-to-day basis of exactly what the story was in November and, more important, what it was in December.

Monthly figures were published for December showing that there was a major inflow of exchange reserves during that month. There are now new questions as to where in fact that inflow came from, and did the government in fact engage in a futures operation in order to cover a position that had developed during November?

In short, there is absolutely no reason why the government should not publish, after the fact, the day-to-day figures showing the exchange position for Canada, and that is what we are asking.

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the opportunity to speak on this subject. It is one of interest to me. I want first to reject the notion that this is an issue involving the public's right to know. Of course it is easy to make the case that hundreds of millions of dollars are involved here in assets and the people have a right to know the arguments. In fact, they are delivered the monthly figures that reflect what has happened, and the Canadian people are in a position to judge the stewardship of the Bank of Canada and the Government of Canada over these tremendous funds and assets. But the hon. member himself indicated in his question the very kind of difficulty that will result, the kind of misinterpretation that will take place even among Canadians who are as well informed as is the hon. member opposite.

He referred to the allegation which turned out not to be true, as he subsequently illustrated, that the Canadian dollar for a period was under tremendous pressure. He said—I believe I am quoting him accurately—that it was under the greatest pressure that it had ever been in our history. Then, a few sentences later, he referred to the fact that in another few days there was a tremendous inflow of sums. He has the December statement and he knows there was a tremendous inflow of sums. If you take a photograph at the end of the day and you see hundreds of millions of dollars flowing out, it is like focusing only on the day and it can be misinterpreted that the Canadian dollar is fundamentally very weak, that we are in a great deal of trouble and that something has happened that will have important implications over a long period. Then, a few days later hundreds of millions of dollars are flowing back in, as the statement at the end of December shows.

I think the Canadian people ought to know what happens to these hundreds of millions of dollars, but I would argue that they do find out on a monthly basis and they can judge the stewardship of the government and of the Bank of Canada of these enormous and important reserves. To look at it on a daily basis can only result in hysteria by some people, and in efforts by opposition parties and other critics who exaggerate and distort the events that have taken place to draw totally unjustified long-term interpretations that are subsequently shown by events to be not at all what they appear to have been at the beginning. It is important that the Canadian people be told fully what the balance of transactions is. This should not be otherwise.

I have one more concluding sentence, Mr. Speaker. If any strategy at all is to be followed by those responsible for our exchange transactions, if any policy is to be followed at all, there has to be some manoeuvrability and freedom from the kind of interpretations which result from daily or hourly news reports.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

PROPOSED SUSPENSION OF AID TO CUBA PENDING INVESTIGATION OF SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the continuing revelations of the deceit being practised by Cuba involving the unannounced expulsion—and I emphasize "unannounced expulsion"—of a number of Cuban diplomats last June, including the second in command in the Cuban embassy in Ottawa, Mr. Alfonso Perdomo, whose improper activities were connected with certain subversive attempts in our foreign aid program and notwithstanding the recent expulsion of Cuban diplomats from Montreal, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

That this House condemns these improper and reprehensible acts and that all aspects of aid and trade with Cuba be investigated by the subcommittee of External Affairs dealing with CIDA while at the same time further aid to Cuba be suspended until the situation is resolved by that committee.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can only be presented to the House with its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTED COMMITTEE INVESTIGATION OF DISMISSAL OF WALTER RUDNICKI AND ALLEGED BLACKLISTING OF CERTAIN EMPLOYEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the statement by the Prime Minister on October 13, 1976 that he would look into the matter of the dismissal of Walter Rudnicki and of the alleged blacklisting of civil servants, and in view of the fact that to date this House has received no explanation whatsoever of these very serious allegations by a former senior civil servant, and in view of the potential for a serious violation of civil liberties reminiscent of the McCarthy era, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, with power of subpoena, so that a full and thorough investigation of these most serious charges by Mr. Rudnicki be carried out and that any list of names not be released publicly by this committee or anyone else in view of the serious damage that could occur to persons who would be on that list and have no opportunity to defend themselves and who could be smeared thereby.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43 such a motion can be presented to the House only with its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SUGGESTION BANK OF CANADA MAKE LONG-TERM LOANS TO PROVINCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the humiliating reliance of the economy of all Canadian provinces on our southern neighbours' high finance, in view of the fact that this reliance causes great harm to the advancement of this country, and since quite concrete solutions could be brought by this parliament, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette):

That the government allow the Bank of Canada to make long term loans to the provinces so they be able to meet their administrative duties.

Mr. Speaker: Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; therefore the motion cannot be put.

FAILURE TO INCLUDE BRITISH COLUMBIA IN CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to raise a matter of urgent and pressing necessity arising out of the failure to include any constituency in British Colombia in the list of those eligible for the $30 per man-hour week allowance for material costs in the new Canada works program. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke):

That this House ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration for an explanation of this failure to extend the supplementary program into the province of British Columbia thus adding one more to the long list of federal programs that do not reach across the Rockies.

ENERGY

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF HOME INSULATION PROGRAM TO CONSERVE ENERGY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The matter of urgent and pressing necessity concerns the announcement by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) several weeks ago that special programs of assistance were offered to the province of Prince Edward Island amounting in value to $11.5 million, and to Nova Scotia amounting in value to $63 million, to help with home insulation and to help industrial and commercial users conserve power, which offer of federal assistance was made to those provinces only on the basis that these were the provinces most highly dependent on oil-fired steam power for electrical energy production and therefore most requiring special assistance.

Since the net generation of electricity from now on in the province of Newfoundland and Labrador must be by thermal means, since the cost of heating oil in Newfoundland is substantially higher than in Prince Edward Island or Nova Scotia, and since the economic position of Newfoundland residents considering per capita personal income, the cost of living and other factors is at about the same level as that of citizens of Prince Edward Island but considerably lower than that of citizens of Nova Scotia so that their needs are even greater with respect of energy and other costs, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall):

[Mr. Speaker.]

That this House urge the government to cease discriminating against eight of the ten provinces of Canada by offering to all the provinces of Canada and the citizens thereof the special programs of assistance with reference to home insulation and assistance to industrial and commercial users to conserve power now offered to Prince Edward Island and to Nova Scotia, so that all citizens of Canada will be treated equally rather than suffering from the present discriminatory policy.

That this House urges the government House leader to call Bill C-30 for second reading not later than during the week commencing January 31, in order that parliament can reach a decision on this bill in sufficient time so that National Heritage Day can be observed on Monday, February 21, of this year.

SUGGESTED CONSERVATION OF ENERGY BY RECYCLING OF WASTE PAPER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my motion under Standing Order 43 is prompted by the delivery this week to offices on Parliament Hill and elsewhere in Ottawa of telephone directories of Bell Canada, and of the government service, creating therefore tons of excess waste paper to add to those produced daily. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston):

That this House take positive measures to urge government departments and industry to take immediate steps to conserve wasting forest and energy resources, by using more recycled waste paper in paper production.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

FORECASTS OF RATE OF GROWTH—EFFECT OF GROWTH ON INFLATION—POLICY FOR DECONTROL AND POST-CONTROL PERIOD

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Now that the minister has had time to review the 1977 economic forecasts of the Conference Board and the OECD, which indicate that our real economic growth will slow this year to the 3 per cent or 3.5 per cent range, down over 30 per cent from last year's growth rate, last year having been a rather slow year itself, can the minister advise the House whether he agrees with these forecasts and, if not, what is his own forecast for real growth in 1977?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, of course we will take into account forecasts of these kinds, along with others. My own statement on behalf of the government will be made in the context of the budget.

Mr. Stevens: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As some reputable forecasting institutions, the Conference Board and Wood Gundy for example, have predicted that slow growth rates will continue into 1978, can the minister tell the House whether a slow growth policy with its resultant unemployment is part of his strategy for controlling inflation, bearing in mind that the working paper "The Way Ahead" has argued that growth itself may be a contributing factor to inflation?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the government has stated its policy many times; it seeks to overcome the problem of inflation which has been plaguing the Canadian economy for the last several years while attaining the levels of growth necessary to meet the aspirations of Canadians. I, of course, will have an opportunity to elaborate on those particular guidelines during the course of the budget statement.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a final supplementary question to the Minister of Finance? Considering that the minister has made statements outside the House about possible administrative mechanisms which may be put in place when the economy is decontrolled, can the minister now tell the House what his tentative proposals are? Specifically, is the minister contemplating a price monitoring mechanism after controls and is he proposing any national consultative conference to set policies in any decontrol period?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I have engaged in discussion with members of the private sector across Canada with regard to the decontrol and post-control period. I also expect to meet both the executive of the Canadian Labour Congress and the provincial governments next week for the purpose of discussing the decontrol possibilities and those in the post-control period.

DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF PRODUCTIVITY INCENTIVES

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As the Prime Minister has been assuring me continuously over the past two years that the government would be introducing "soon" a program of productivity incentives to be made in direct proportion to the increase in productivity so that we can lower costs and selling prices, increase volume and provide more jobs, can the minister now advise the House when such a program will be announced?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Soon, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, as the minister's answer obviously has no more validity or meaning than the answers given by the Prime Minister over the past two years, I would ask him this question. Does he ever get a headache from keeping his head in the sand so much of the time?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

POSSIBILITY OF SALE TO PRIVATE ENTERPRISE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Will the minister confirm to the House the government's intention to turn over the CNR to private enterprise. If so, will he tell us what the government means by this? Does it mean specifically that any section of the CNR that is operating at a profit will be sold off in whole or in part to private investors?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, any formal decision by the government with regard to selling shares in any part of its Crown corporations to the public will of course be announced in a more appropriate way at the time such a decision is taken. What the government has done to this point is indicate to corporations like CNR and Air Canada that it wishes them to operate with the best possible management, directing themselves toward making a success of their enterprise and, therefore, in that sense paralleling the kind of operation which would go on in the private sector. We also indicated that where we believe a special duty should be imposed upon such a corporation we ought to quantify the cost of that special duty and pay for it so that it does not have to be melded by the Crown corporation into the fare structures or other rates charged to individuals in the operation of its business. These things together clearly, if directed to a Crown corporation along a path which at some time could lead to a consideration of whether some shares in some parts of it might be sold to the public, is a flexible way of financing as is done of course in other competitive sectors in the private sector.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the minister took a long time not to answer the question. Considering the fact that CNR came into being just after World War I because a number of private railways went broke and wanted the people of Canada to bail them out, and considering that even the profits that CNR allegedly is going to make in 1976 are dependent upon a $200 million subsidy from the people of Canada, will the minister assure the House that the government will not as a matter of policy sell off part of our great national railway system to the private sector after countless decades of subsidy coming from the people of Canada?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, that sounded more like an elaborate argument than a question. I presume the hon. member is not critical of the fact the railways were taken over at the time they were bankrupt and put together in one particular operation. Perhaps that demonstrates it was not for any great purpose of having a railway that we ended up in the railway business but because there was no other way than to bail out a particular series of railway operations. What the hon. member fails to notice is that the people of Canada as shareholders of a corporation like CNR may indeed benefit greatly if it has the flexibility in raising funds to not only borrow but to sell some shares in subsidiaries which, after all, is done by its major competitors.

I take it the hon. gentleman does not assume that when a corporation like the CPR or other large corporations sell shares in subsidiaries they are somehow giving something away to the public or to the buyers of those shares. They are entering into a commercial transaction for the good of the overall operation and the shareholders, and if anything were contemplated with regard to a Crown corporation it would be for the same reason— the good of the Canadian people who are the shareholders.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: If the minister is assuring the House that however the government plans to change the financing operations of the CN not one penny will be lost to the taxpayers by way of funds going out to private investors entering at this late point, we accept his answer. But so that we may gather the general intention of the government's overall policy, will the hon. gentleman assure us that in terms of other great public enterprises in this country—I am thinking, for example, of Air Canada—the government has no intention of selling off parts of these operations to the private sector, directly or indirectly, once they become wholly profitable?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is a repetition of the previous question.

REQUEST FOR ELIGIBILITY OF WORKERS IN SMALL INDUSTRIES

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

In view of the present dissatisfaction felt by some categories of unemployed who are told that they are not eligible for unemployment insurance, can the minister tell the House whether he intends to take the necessary steps in the very near future to remedy the situation with regard to the eligibility for unemployment insurance in some sectors such as agriculture, construction and commerce in general? I would like to specify that I am thinking here of the worker whose father owns an industry or a farm, and of the possibility for the father to insure those of his sons who work for him.

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I am not certain I understand the representation made by the hon. member—whether he is referring to training in particular skills or a particular enterprise or not. But I will examine the question, and reply.

ALLEGED BLACKLISTING OF CERTAIN EMPLOYEES—ACTIONS OF MINISTERS IN CONNECTION THEREWITH

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Would he inform the House whether at any time he received for his own personal perusal and action a document and list which was identified as an extra-parliamentary opposition list, and if so what action did he take to comply with the suggestions made on that list—actions against persons who are in the employ of the Canadian government and others?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have never heard of or seen such a list.

Mr. Oberle: I should like to direct a supplementary to the Minister of Supply and Services. Did he at any time have cause, in response to information which he might have received from the security service of either the Department of the Solicitor General or the RCMP, to construct such a list identified as an extra-parliamentary opposition list, and did he at any time circulate such a list among his colleagues in cabinet?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, security within the government is not the responsibility of the Minister of Supply and Services.

[English]

Mr. Oberle: The next question should obviously be directed to the Solicitor General. I should like to ask him whether he had cause to examine or structure a list such as I have mentioned, a list identified as an extra-parliamentary opposition list? May I ask him on what information he acted in constructing such a list; whether he has ever received such a list from his predecessor in office and whether such a list has been circulated among senior cabinet ministers?

Miss Bégin: Senior or junior ministers?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): I have not had cause to circulate the type of list referred to by the hon. member. Perhaps I should admitt—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Fox: —perhaps I should explain, Mr. Speaker, that in cases where people within the public service take positions where security clearance is required, a departmental security officer will ask for security clearance of the individual involved and that is the extent of the matter.

ALLEGED BLACKLISTING OF CERTAIN EMPLOYEES—REFERENCE TO LETTER DATED JUNE 15, 1971

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Solicitor General very directly if he has seen such a letter under date of June 15, 1971, signed by his predecessor in office, and what sort of procedures were used to group names together in the context of an extra-parliamentary opposition group and under whose control and supervision was this done?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am unable at the moment, without going over the files in detail, to check out everything that the hon. member has said, and to reply in breadth and depth to his question.

ENERGY

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF HOME INSULATION PROGRAM TO CONSERVE ENERGY

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The minister announced in December a special assistance program for P.E.I. and Nova Scotia amounting to $63 million and $11.5 million to assist citizens with insulating their homes and also commercial and industrial users. In view of the fact that the net generation of electricity in Newfoundland now is all from oil-fired steam, that the cost of living and per capita incomes are higher and lower than, and the people of Newfoundland have a need just as great as, people in other provinces, can the minister tell the House whether the government will extend that program to all other provinces of Canada, in addition to P.E.I. and Nova Scotia? If not, why not?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to learn that the hon. member, by implication, agrees with the importance of the conservation reinsulation program which is offered to the two provinces of Nova Scotia and P.E.I. It is a program that I would very much like to be able to offer to all provinces if we had the funds to do so. The hon. member must know that the reason it was offered to these two provinces is that they are more dependent on oil for their electrical generation than any other province. Indeed, in the case of P.E.I., 100 per cent of their electrical generation comes from oil; in the case of Nova Scotia it is 66 per cent, which is double, I am told, the percentage of the next nearest province.

Mr. Crosbie: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources realize, or would he agree, that the fact that—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That preamble sounds very much as though the hon. member is heading for an argument instead of asking a question. Perhaps the hon. member would put a question.

Mr. Crosbie: Did the hon. gentleman take into consideration the fact that the average temperature in Newfoundland and Labrador is lower than in P.E.I. and Nova Scotia, that 70 per cent of the households in Newfoundland are oil-fired households, and that the average family expenditure on heating in Newfoundland is higher than in Nova Scotia and P.E.I., or was the fact that these are the only two Liberal governments in Canada a factor that the minister took into consideration?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I think I have already made it quite clear, both a moment ago and on previous occasions, that the reason we did so was the dependence on oil by these two provinces for electrical generation; they both have very high electrical costs; in the case of P.E.I. by far the highest electrical costs in the country, and in the case of Nova Scotia very close to P.E.I. with a substantial increase in the offing.

PARTICIPATION IN MARITIME ENERGY POOL AND CONSTRUCTION OF GENERATING PLANTS

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, to the same minister. Now that the minister of energy has announced a plan of federal assistance to Prince Edward Island as an energy conservation measure, and in view of the government's willingness to develop a similar program with Nova Scotia, has the minister won from either of these provinces a commitment to participate in a maritime energy pool or an agreement to give priority to the construction of electrical power plants in the maritimes to permit the maximum economies of scale?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be premature to say that at the moment I have a commitment from the two provinces, or indeed from the three maritime provinces, with respect to a maritime power pool. I think I can say, though, without being unduly optimistic that there is a good deal of interest now among those three provinces in examining the benefits of a power corporation which might not only generate electricity and be involved in the transmission of electricity, but perhaps also purchase electricity from other provinces.

POSSIBILITY OF DEVELOPING GULL ISLAND SITE

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister indicate whether there has been a reassessment of the position of the development of the Gull Island site so that energy could be developed and be of benefit to all the Atlantic region?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member will perhaps know already from my previous answer, this was a reference I made with respect to a power corporation. One of the purposes I have always seen for the Maritime Power Corporation was just that, as a mechanism for purchasing power from other provinces and, in particular, of course, power from the Gull Island development, perhaps in the order of 1,000 megawatts a year.

REASON FOR FAILURE TO CHANNEL MORE FUNDS THROUGH HOUSING PROGRAM TO INSULATE HOMES TO CONSERVE ENERGY

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, in the announcement made originally in respect of insulation, which is concentrated to help Nova Scotia, I wonder whether the minister discussed with his colleague before making the announcement the fact that there is in existence right now and has been for five years a residential rehabilitation assistance program which provides for insulation and other things to conserve energy, and why are more funds not extended into that very excellent program?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): As the hon. member will perhaps have already noted, Mr. Speaker, the proposals we put forward were in respect of a grant program rather than a loan program.

TEXTILES—REQUEST FOR ACTION TO END DUMPING BY UNITED STATES TO REDUCE UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Louis Duclos (Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Can he tell the House whether the recent massive lay-offs in the textile industry, more particularly in Quebec, will induce him to take immediate steps to counteract dumping from the United States?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the matter is now under study. As the hon. member knows, last November we announced measures for the textile industry which were rather controversial. I am aware of the problem with regard to imports of certain fabrics from the United States. Still it has yet to be established that they constitute dumping. The department is now making an inquiry and we hope to act as soon as we have had a definitive report on the matter.

REASON FOR PUTTING CERTAIN EMPLOYEES ON ALLEGED BLACKLIST

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General and is somewhat supplementary to one asked earlier by the hon. member for Central Nova. My understanding of the minister's answer was that he was somewhat familiar with the list that has been alleged, or at least the letter that his predecessor may have written about the list, but that those included in the list were subjected to security clearance because of access to sensitive information. I would like the minister to clarify his answer now to the House as to whether any persons included on such a list were there because they were given information which may be adverse to the security of the state should it be released?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as far as current practice is concerned there is no such list in existence. What I was trying to explain to the House is that whenever a civil servant is appointed to a position where there is access to confidential information which ought to remain secure there is a security check carried out.

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON PRIME MINISTER'S INVESTIGATION OF ALLEGED BLACKLIST

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the government House leader. As recorded in Hansard for October 13, the Prime Minister indicated that on this matter of Walter Rudnicki and the extra-parliamentary opposition, he would inquire and investigate because at that time he had no information about it. Could the government House leader now indicate to the House whether in fact such an investigation has been carried out and whether various Cabinet ministers have been canvassed as to whether such a list was circulated to members of his Cabinet?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am able to say that I am not aware of any such list. I have not seen any such list and, to the best of my knowledge, no such list exists or has existed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ALLEGED REVERSAL OF MINISTER'S POSITION IN CASE OF WILLIAM BIGGS—SUGGESTED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. On December 20 last the minister told me that he was going to have an independent inquiry made into the case of William Biggs, an employee in Germany who was found innocent of charges but severely punished by being dismissed from his employment. The minister said he was going to ask the Ontario ombudsman to investigate the case. Some four days later, however, the minister changed his mind completely and wrote to William Biggs informing him that he was not improperly fired. The minister also had the gall to wish Biggs a happy holiday. Could the minister inform us what happened during those four days to induce him to reverse his position and deny an impartial hearing to Mr. Biggs?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I believe I discussed this case with the hon. member, and suggested alternative ways of dealing with it in a satisfactory manner. There was no commitment made in respect of any such inquiry. I do not even know, and did not at that time, whether the Ontario ombudsman would even accept such a reference. In the interim I made a very thorough study of the case, as I had been doing up till then, and came to the conclusion that no further purpose could be served; it was a normal management decision, there was no question of Mr. Biggs' integrity involved at all but was a management decision which was made by competent management authority. He was not in the armed forces nor was he employed by the armed forces, and I am satisfied that the proper decision was made. I do not expect Mr. Biggs to necessarily agree with that decision as I never did when I got fired.

An hon. Member: Stop your histrionics.

Mr. Nowlan: There were different reasons for you getting fired.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister. While Biggs may not have been in the armed forces, he was employed by them in that his superiors were members of the armed forces. To ensure that justice is seen to be done in this case I would ask the minister to refer the case of the dismissal of William Biggs to the Standing Committee on External Affairs National Defence, for that committee to be authorized to call such witnesses as may be necessary and to make recommendations to the House for a fair and just settlement of the case. Will the minister grant such referral?

Mr. Danson: No, Mr. Speaker. I think it has been dealt with in a proper way and I am satisfied that justice was done in this case.

MANPOWER

CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF DEADLINE FOR FILING APPLICATIONS

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that countless requests are being received by many members indicating the difficulty encountered in obtaining information regarding the Canada Works Program, will the minister consider extending the deadline beyond February 4 for submission of applications under Phase I of the program?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in view of representations that have been made to extend it, I am looking at that suggestion. I am endeavouring to determine how many applications are coming in now and how many are going to beat the deadline. It would seem inappropriate to extend the deadline too far if we have a sufficient number of applications by the deadline date, but I will look at this, not only the numbers but the actual areas from which the applications come.

Mr. Scott: Mr. Speaker, since a similar situation exists in respect of the Young Canada Works Program, would the minister consider extending the deadline in respect of this program to enable submissions of properly constituted and well developed proposals to help reduce student unemployment?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, that is an area I am looking at.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Fraser Valley West.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Speaker, my colleague stole my thunder.

Oral Questions

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SOVIET ACTION AGAINST SYMPOSIUM OF JEWS IN MOSCOW—POSSIBILITY OF CANADIAN PROTEST

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of External Affairs who I believe is the government House leader. What steps has the Canadian government taken to indicate its dismay to the Soviet government at the stifling of the December symposium in Moscow, a symposium which was organized by Jews who wished to discuss the present state and possible future development of Jewish culture in the U.S.S.R.?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will have to check into that particular situation to determine whether any comment was made by the Department of External Affairs or the government on the point.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, will the minister also check to see what effect this action will have on the intent and the meaning of the Helsinki Accord?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

GARRISON DIVERSION—POSSIBILITY OF PRIME MINISTER DISCUSSING SUBJECT WITH PRESIDENT CARTER

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister without Portfolio from Manitoba. It relates to the Garrison diversion project and the proposed visit of the Prime Minister to Washington to meet with the new President and his administration. Could the Minister without Portfolio indicate to the House whether the Cabinet has looked at the IJC report, and specifically whether the Cabinet has instructed the Prime Minister to raise the Garrison diversion project with the new President as a matter of urgency and priority during his meetings in Washington?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I should like to advise the hon. member for Selkirk that my reason for being in Cabinet is not to report on what goes on within Cabinet as such.

An hon. Member: What is the reason?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Why are you there, Joe?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the hon. member that I am looking at the matter, specifically the Garrison project of which he is speaking, and I assure him that I will bring the important matter to the attention of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Whiteway: Mr. Speaker, would the same minister indicate whether the Prime Minister is going to raise the Garrison matter with the President of the United States as a matter of priority and urgency?

[Mr. Patterson.]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Ask the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

INDIAN AFFAIRS

FINANCING OF ABENAKI MOTEL—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Is the minister in a position to report to the House on the discussions he has had with officials of the Abenaki Motel, that is a project which comes under the purview of his department, in relation to the new financing of the operation of that motel which is an Indian project?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I have not had discussions with the representative of that motel myself but officials of my department have in the last day or two. As soon as I get a report, I will be pleased to give it to the House.

STATUS OF WOMEN

PROMOTION OF WOMEN IN THE PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the minister responsible for the status of women.

[English]

In view of the encouraging increase in the number of women filling senior positions in the civil service, will the minister assure the House that the spirit of International Women's Year shall be carried into 1977?

[Translation]

In other words, will the minister continue to encourage the trend toward women seeking greater participation in senior positions within the public service?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it is with a great pleasure that I was able to announce that last year there has been a substantial increase in the number of women promoted to important positions within the government, whenever these nominations were the cabinet's responsibility, that is when they have been appointed by order in council. I can assure the honourable member and the House that the government aims again at increasing this percentage for the current year, and I hope that the statistics we will publish next year on that matter will reflect significant improvement in the situation.

HARBOURS

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS WITH QUEBEC FOR WHARVES ON ST. LAWRENCE RIVER

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

Since negotiations between the federal and provincial governments concerning the wharves which provide communications facilities along the St. Lawrence have been going on for around three years, would the minister tell the House whether these negotiations will one day come to an end? Will they produce results or are we going to negotiate for the rest of this century?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the negotiations have been going on a long time and I am trying to ensure that they are brought to a conclusion. But, of course, in negotiations of this sort where two parties are involved it is not always possible for one to do anything about it.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question.

Of course I understand there are two parties involved in this process, but would the minister tell the House whether since the arrival of a new government in Quebec there have been some talks with the new Quebec minister in charge and whether he seems prepared to come to a logical agreement which would better serve the Quebec population in this area?

[English]

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I have not had such a meeting with the minister of transport in the province since the change of government. We have a regular committee structure of both officials and ministers in the two transport departments, and I look forward to such a meeting before very long.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

STATIONING OF FRENCH LANGUAGE UNIT AT CFB GREENWOOD—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. I should like to ask him whether, in view of his interesting trip to Nova Scotia and particularly to CFB Greenwood, his comments there about the establishment of a French language unit at Base Greenwood is a definitive announcement, notwithstanding the fact that I wrote his predecessor in office on December 3, 1975 a two and one-half page letter asking that at least six serious considerations be taken into account before an announcement is made and asking for a reply to that letter. Can the minister tell us the present status of the matter?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I made it quite clear in Halifax and in Greenwood, as well as in discussions with the troops in Greenwood, that indeed the spirit of the French language will continue. This has received overwhelming support from the people on the base and from the fine people in that area in Nova Scotia. As I indicated at that time, the details are to be worked out so that we can do it in a constructive way that will bring the best results for all the people involved, and this is the spirit in which that French language unit is proceeding at Greenwood.

Mr. Nowlan: My colleague from Edmonton has a supplementary question, but first I have a very short supplementary question to put to the minister. It is very short.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: Unfortunately, such questions do not take into account plus or minus the spirit of the French language. In my letter—I and other members of the House voted for the act overwhelmingly in 1968—the spirit of the language was taken into account. My question is put in view of the fact that this was a political decision overriding military considerations, and in view of the fact that Greenwood is a NATO base in which the English language is the language of communication with the French, the Dutch and the German pilots, if there are such French pilots, why did the department not take into consideration the counterproposal to establish a unilingual French unit at CFB Summerside, a search and rescue unit, where French and English are used in communication with the ground, since that base has jurisdiction over northern New Brunswick and Quebec?

Mr. Danson: As I pointed out, that was my impression, but I have no right to speak on behalf of the hon. gentleman, and I would be surprised if the representative of parliament in that area objected to this procedure. If one wants to raise excuses for not doing these things, one can find lots of them. But if you want to find the reasons for doing so and for taking advantage of an opportunity, as the men on the base want to do, we will find them and it will be done in a positive and constructive way.

REASON FOR MOVING UNILINGUAL FRENCH UNIT FROM EDMONTON

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of National Defence. The minister has been haranguing the good people of Nova Scotia because some of them questioned the wisdom of having a unilingual French-speaking Argus squadron attempting to operate in close co-operation with other unilingual English-speaking units. At the same time the minister is moving No. 1 Commando unit of the airborne regiment, a unilingual French unit, out of Edmonton where it had been warmly welcomed and has contributed a great deal to better understanding between the French and the English. Can the minister explain his policy which tries to force a unilingual unit where it does not fit in one area while taking another unilingual unit away from where it fits beautifully?

An hon. Member: Pourquoi?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is asking for logic in some of these situations.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: Just answer the question.

Mr. Hees: You never heard of logic.

Mr. Danson: What my hon. friend does not appreciate is the fact that there is a military decision to be made and it has to be taken in concert with the bilingual policy of the government. Military decisions are not made to accommodate the bilingual policy but rather it is the bilingual policy which has to accommodate military tasks. What we are doing here is to enhance the armed forces as was announced, as most military people appreciate and understand. If the hon. gentleman would care to come to my office, I will draw some pictures for him to explain the situation.

AGRICULTURE

REASON FOR FAILURE TO TEST SOME CATTLE IMPORTED FROM MICHIGAN FOR PBB

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the logical Minister of Agriculture.

An hon. Member: Are you kidding?

Mr. Nystrom: In view of the fact that over 70,000 cattle have been imported into Canada in the last two years from Michigan where an environmental accident occurred in 1973 and poisoned large numbers of livestock with a chemical called PBB, I should like to ask the minister whether or not he can explain to the House why only about 700 cattle were tested for this chemical, especially since the government knew it occurred since 1974 and especially since there is a vast surplus of cattle in this country?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member is aware that you do not test every animal that is slaughtered. You take spot checks on cattle. Many of the cattle that are fed in Michigan are not raised in Michigan. They are put in feedlots, fed in Michigan and then shipped into Ontario. We are concerned about this. We have done the tests, as I am sure the hon. member is aware because my officials have told me they have given him in fact the same information they have given me. It may be necessary to continue with further testing of the fatty tissues in the meat to trace this chemical, but our officials feel sure that they have done everything humanly possible to ensure that these tests are accurate. The last group of cattle in which it has been found have been held in detention until further tests, and I understand that those tests have been taken yesterday in Ottawa and I do not know what the results of them are.

Mr. Nystrom: In view of the fact that the substance went into the feed and most of the cattle in Michigan ate it and that medical studies just a few weeks ago revealed that out of the 1,000 people tested in Michigan nearly a third had suffered adverse health effects, possibly because of having eaten meat contaminated by PBB, I would like to ask, in order to protect the Canadian people in the future, whether the minister is willing to designate a group of officials in his department to monitor any environmental incidents which might affect the food system. This particular problem was known about three years ago and nothing was done.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member himself recognizes that that feed was manufactured three years ago. Surely to goodness he does not think that feed which was manufactured three years ago is still being used. There is now a different feeding program, and those cattle are no longer in existence. They were destroyed by the Michigan and the Agriculture health authorities in the United States of America. Any evidence that they had of cattle consuming that feed at that time was destroyed.

BEEF CATTLE—INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBILITY OF DEFICIENCY PAYMENT

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Is there going to be a deficiency payment made this year to beef producers under the beef support program for cattle marketed in 1976, and if so, when will the minister make the announcement?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there is a program. The decision was made some time ago, and I believe the announcement has been made already today that the price would be $40.16 per hundredweight, and it would be made on a quarterly basis.

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, but I see he has momentarily left the chamber.

SOCIAL SECURITY

REQUEST FOR COMPENSATION FOR LOSSES SUSTAINED BY PENSIONERS IN DISASTERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

In view of the fact that a welfare recipient is entitled to some money to compensate for the loss of his property as a result of a fire or a disaster and since an elderly person cannot obtain that assistance from the Department of Social Affairs in Quebec and does not receive the old age security pension even if under the Canadian constitution it is strictly under provincial jurisdiction, can the minister tell the House whether he intends in the near future to correct that oversight through the Canada Assistance Plan which would enable a senior citizen in receipt of an old age security pension to enjoy the same rights as welfare recipients following a fire or other disaster?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the matter of social assistance in exceptional cases such as that mentioned by the hon. member comes under provincial jurisdiction. The Canada Assistance Plan now provides federal government sharing of the amounts allocated by the provinces to persons in need for that purpose. Consequently it would not be necessary to amend the federal law. If the province wishes to assume its own responsibilities in that field, we will share the necessary costs up to 50 per cent.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REASON FOR ALLEGED SECRET EXPULSION FROM CANADA OF MR. PERDOMO, REPRESENTATIVE OF CUBA

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, who was directly involved with the issue I raised in my motion under Standing Order 43. I would like to ask the minister if he could either confirm or deny allegations that one Alfonso Perdomo, once second in command of the Cuban embassy in Ottawa, was expelled from Canada last June along with a number of his colleagues for deceitful practices towards this government regarding foreign aid to that nation, and if the minister can confirm this expulsion, why was it not made public at that time?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the question raised by the hon. member is probably subsequent to the action recently taken by the government of Canada when it sought the departure from Canada of a number of Cuban officials because of the conduct of intelligence operations in Canada. That action has been taken and is an indication of the seriousness with which the government looks at these activities.

With respect to earlier cases it has been the policy to apply similar principles with respect to requests made to foreign countries. In this particular case we have secured the removal of these persons, and we hope that we will be able to overcome any difficulties which might have been created by this event in our relations with Cuba.

SUGGESTED COMMITTEE STUDY OF ALLEGED SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES OF CUBAN DIPLOMATS

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): I would like to assure the minister that this case has nothing to do with the recent expulsions of people from the Cuban consulate in Montreal. These revelations which are presently being made in the affirmative have not been denied by officials of the Department of External Affairs. I am wondering whether the minister would be in a position to form a parliamentary committee or perhaps use the subcommittee of External Affairs dealing with CIDA to study the charges which are being made with regard to the expulsion of Cubans, to study all aid directed to Cuba and to stop any further aid to Cuba until these allegations have been looked into.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): With respect to Cuba, we have at the present time a $10 million line of credit which provides for the purchase in Canada of Canadian goods and provides for the supply of Canadian technicians for operations in Cuba. There is no direct cash transfer to the government of Cuba. All the funds are expended in the way I have described and have to do with the building of the social and agricultural infrastructure in Cuba. I believe that it is entirely appropriate for any committee of the House to deal with the adequacy of such a program, which is a people to people program based on the necessity for economic development in Cuba. I also believe that it is wise to detach from that consideration the question of security, which is entirely different and which in the normal course is not given the same public disclosure as would be the case with our aid program to Cuba.

ALLEGED CONFLICTING STATEMENTS OF MINISTERS ON FOOD POLICY

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has been travelling across the country saying that Canada needs to develop a national integrated food policy, and the Minister of Agriculture, when speaking to the York County Soil and Crop Improvement Association, stated that Canada already has a national food policy. Which one of the ministers was telling the truth? If we have a national food policy, would the minister table it in the House?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in this country we have food which is cheap when we consider this country has 23 million people, is 4,000 miles wide and the cost is only about one per cent different from that in the United States. If anyone can improve on our food policy, any member of my cabinet or otherwise, let him do so. However, I have not read what the hon. minister was saying. I will not go solely on what the hon. member said because in the past he has been wrong.

Mr. Malone: Would the minister respond by saying whether he considers the tremendous increase in the number of quotas on imported food which have been lowered over the past year is part of that national food policy as it refers to honey, fruits, vegetables and particularly the tremendous increase in the importing of offshore beef from the oceanic countries?

Mr. Whelan: This minister has probably used the laws of this land more frequently than any other minister. When we used quotas in 1975, hon. members opposite said I was a very bad fellow. Then former President Ford triggered his meat import laws and used quotas, and that country has quotas on practically everything with which we compete. The hon. member should be aware that we will use quotas whenever the United States uses them. I used mine in a very fair manner when I invoked them against the United States. They retaliated and used them in a very unfair manner. We are looking forward to great things from the new administration in the United States.

TRADE

LEVEL OF CHEESE IMPORTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It relates to the ongoing and mounting dissatisfaction and uncertainty in the Canadian dairy industry with respect to the unacceptable high level of 50 million pounds of imported cheese. Last year the former minister of industry, trade and commerce fortunately disregarded the advice of the Minister of Agriculture given on November 4, 1974 for doubling these amounts and acted on the appeals of the opposition by freezing imports for one year at the 50 million pound level. Would the minister clarify if reports in the press attributed to the chairman of the Canadian Dairy Commission that the freeze has been extended for an additional one year period are correct?

● (1500)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the statement of the president of the Canadian Dairy Commission. I will inquire, but the hon. member should know that I generally get along quite well with my colleague the Minister of Agriculture.

[English]

Mr. Wise: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the government has adopted the generally accepted policy of compensating producers on the basis of the previous five-year averaging concept, would the minister give immediate and serious consideration to applying this principle in establishing a more acceptable and equitable basis for cheese import levels? Does he not recognize if such a principle were adopted our cheese import level would be somewhere around 38 million or 40 million pounds and the Canadian dairy industry would benefit by $4 million and Canadian cheese manufacturers would have the opportunity to—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Order Paper Questions

CMHC—LAWYERS RETAINED IN CUMBERLAND AND COLCHESTER COUNTIES, N.S.

Question No. 716—Mr. Coates:

1. What are the names of individual lawyers who are employed by CMHC in the Constituency of Cumberland-Colchester North and how was each selected?

2. How much did each lawyer or law firm receive in fees and expenses in each fiscal year 1970-71 to date?

3. Do individuals or corporations who secure financing through CMHC have to use law firms determined by CMHC in the legal work associated with the loans in question and, if so, for what reason?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I am advised by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows: 1 and 2. The following lawyers were retained by CMHC, in Cumberland and Colchester Counties, N.S., to process mortgage documentation arising from CMHC direct lending, from 1970 to September 1976: Amherst, W. B. Fairbanks; E. C. Hicks, Q.C.; Truro, Kenneth J. Brooks; W. J. Grant, Q.C.; H. R. Latimer; D. Arthur Nichols. Legal fees in connection with CMHC direct loans are paid by the borrower, and CMHC therefore, has no record of the amounts paid to these lawyers. The following lawyers were retained from 1970 to September 1976, to handle action where arrears on loans approved in Cumberland and Colchester Counties, N.S. required legal action:

		Costs and Fees
Amherst	E. C. Hicks, Q.C.	$7,357.52
Halifax	McInnes, Cooper and Robertson	$2,824.28
	Block, Prossin and Schelew	$4,381.84

3. CMHC has, as a general rule, followed the practice of all government departments and agencies and employed agents approved by the Minister of Justice. The present practice with respect to CMHC is that, with the approval of the Minister of Justice, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs from time to time provides the Corporation with the names of legal agents who may be employed for these purposes in various municipalities throughout the country. In the case of loans for the provision of housing to persons of low income, requests for the employment of the borrower's solicitor or notary are in many cases granted where the employment will produce a financial advantage to the borrower. In addition, in the case of loans on existing housing, where the borrower has employed a solicitor or notary to carry out the work of acquiring the title to the property, CMHC may employ the borrower's solicitor or notary to act on behalf of CMHC.

GRAIN HANDLING PROBLEMS

Question No. 1,144—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

Is the government aware of the statement made by the Director of the Processed Food Division of the Japanese Food Agency in Vancouver recently that "Canada either cleans up the aggravating grain handling situation which is a discredit to the Port of Vancouver or Japan will turn to other suppliers for its wheat and barley supplies" and, if so, what action is the government taking to ensure that the negative results of snowslides, insufficient storage and loading capacity and labour disputes will be overcome in the future?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): As a result of government awareness of West Coast grain handling problems, the Canadian Transport Commission appointed a Grain Car Co-ordinator to coordinate efforts to improve the throughput of grain through Vancouver. More recently the Canadian Wheat Board has initiated a storage construction incentive program which has led to proposals for the construction of an additional 10.4 million bushels storage capacity. This will significantly improve our west coast grain throughput. At the same time efforts are also being directed at achieving a more consistent use of the elevator at Prince Rupert. The Canadian Wheat Board storage incentive program has been extended for Prince Rupert while the Canadian Grain Commission has requested proposals from the grain trade aimed at ensuring a better utilization of this facility. Both railways have ongoing programs aimed at stabilizing rock walls and reducing slide problems in the Fraser Canyon. At the same time, new rail interconnections have been constructed in the Vancouver area. These actions will have the effect of reducing, if not eliminating, many of the rail delays that have occurred in the past. Vancouver port labour problems have been the focus of much attention in recent years. Thanks to consistent efforts by all concerned there has been a steady improvement in labor relations at the port. In summary the government is aware of the past problems of moving grain through the west coast and has in hand programs designed to reduce these problems.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

BROADCASTING OF HOUSE AND COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

The House resumed, from Monday, January 24, consideration of the motion of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen):

That this House approves the radio and television broadcasting of its proceedings and of the proceedings of its committees on the basis of principles similar to those that govern the publication of the printed official reports of debates; and

That a special committee, consisting of Mr. Speaker and seven other members to be named at a later date be appointed to supervise the implementation of this resolution.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. When the amendment was moved by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) yesterday, the Chair expressed reservations about the procedural regularity, and it was reserved until there was an opportunity to examine the matter further.

On the one hand I recognize that the motion before the House calls for approval of the televising and radio broadcasting of the proceedings of the House and for implementation by a committee without interim report to the House. An hon. member who supports both the approval of the televising and broadcasting of our proceedings and also the implementation of them, but who seeks, perhaps, implementation in a different manner, ought to have an orderly way available to him by which to put before the House an alternative proposal for implementation by way of amendment—perhaps even including some constraints, although they would have to be viewed individually at the time—so long as such amendments in the subsequent paragraphs do not introduce the possible negation of the primary paragraph of the motion as amended.

On the other hand, the amendment that was offered by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, in referring the matter to a standing committee for study and report, seems to me to invite some decision by the House when the report or reports are received. Since such a decision might be negative, the effect would be that by voting in favour of the amended motion, the House had approved something in the first paragraph respecting which it was at least guarding the option to disapprove in the later paragraphs of the amendment.

Further, by paragraph 3, the amendment seems to raise a new notion of experimentation. This may be a new proposition, and an additional difficulty may be that it leaves unclear, after a vote on the amended motion, whether the House has in fact approved the implementation of the televising and broadcasting of its proceedings, or whether it has approved only a trial.

Since, after examining these difficulties, I am left with some considerable doubt, I thought it appropriate to indicate to those hon. members involved that I would invite argument on the matter at this time. I would hope to give consideration to the arguments presented and render a decision before five o'clock this afternoon.

The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker).

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I believe I understood what you said, but so that my argument may be directed to the exact point you raised, may I conclude from what you said that viewing the questions that were raised yesterday by Mr. Deputy Speaker, those questions are not in issue and that the issue I have to face is that raised by yourself? I wonder if I could have that matter clarified, as it would make quite a difference in the argument that I think I should put forward in answer to both points.

Mr. Speaker: To paraphrase what I said, there were two difficulties. Of course, I am inviting argument, and other difficulties may be raised by those who participate in the discussion. I see two difficulties: first, that the amendment, certainly by way of experimentation, may be raising a new proposition which entirely lies outside the scope of the original motion. Second, both by asking for a decision by a standing committee and by making reference to the possibility of a trial basis, the motion may offend the citation on page 389 of Erskine May's nineteenth edition, which reads as follows:

Every amendment proposed to be made, either to a question or to a proposed amendment, should be so framed that, if agreed to by the House, the question or amendment, as amended, would be intelligible and consistent with itself.

Therefore, the difficulties that I see are twofold: the amendment may become inconsistent with itself in agreeing to a certain proposition in its first paragraph and leaving out the subsequent disagreements in the later paragraphs, and also by introducing a new proposition by way of experimentation. That is, of course, subject to any other argument that may be raised, but that is what I am asking hon. members to comment upon.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. With respect to our motion put forward yesterday, first you suggest that the amendment may permit the committee to which it is referred totally to reject the principle of broadcasting. This is, in fact, negativing the basic purpose of the motion. I gather that Your Honour's second point is that you feel the paragraph referring to an experiment may be a totally new proposal which is incompatible with the motion.

On the first point I should like to suggest that the principle of broadcasting is specifically not touched by the amendment which, as you know, does not amend the first paragraph of the motion. It is the intention and direction of the amendment to set the committee to work, with the clear knowledge that the principle has been discussed and approved by this House. Nowhere in the body of the amendment does it say that the committee may examine the fundamental question of whether televising and broadcasting are to be allowed.

Hon. members may have noted that most of the amendment is a direct quotation from the 1972 report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. As the government House leader noted in his speech, this report approved the principle of broadcasting. Actually, the amendment specifically asks for the cost of and technical study of buildings, equipment, personnel and other requirements consequent upon the introduction of radio and television broadcasting. There is no mention in the amendment of the advisability of broadcasting. That particular proposition, as I view the amendment, is accepted for better or worse by the motion if it is amended in this way. I simply want to make it clear that the material tabled could well be supplemented by other material which I am sure has already been prepared, or may have been prepared. I would be surprised if it had not been prepared.

The last paragraph of the proposed amendment goes further than the 1972 report which suggested that the committee may make further recommendations for ultimate decision. I moved in my amendment that the committee should be authorized, in light of such studies and experiments, to make further recommendations to the House before permanent broadcasting facilities are installed. That is the point of my argument. If I had intended my amendment to permit a rejection of broadcasting, I would have said that there should be further recommendations as to whether permanent broadcasting facilities should be installed. In the context of the motion, the word "before" means ahead of, or prior to, in time. I suggest that is how the matter ought to be interpreted.

May I now speak to the middle paragraph dealing with privilege. That paragraph openly gives the committee the reference which the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) said was intended for it during his speech. It is always possible that the committee, despite the motion, could produce a hostile report. I suppose that theoretically could happen to a bill in committee. Theoretically, it is always possible for a committee to do something unexpected or procedurally incorrect. If and when that happens, the Chair must examine the report and make a ruling at that time. I suggest, however, that such report is not contemplated by the amendment I proposed yesterday and would, indeed, be contrary to its explicit acceptance of the principle of the motion. The amendment lacks any wording which would justify the reopening by the committee of the fundamental question. That is the argument I advance to justify my position. However, with respect to the second point—

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I interrupt the hon. member in order to clarify one point. There is not merely the concern that the committee may steer the matter in a direction such as the hon. member has just described. My difficulty goes beyond that and it is this: The committee may make a report which is not inconsistent with the view taken by the House now; but if the committee is to report, in my opinion that presumes that when the committee reports the House must make a decision on the basis of the report. If there is no basis on which the House can take a decision, presumably there is not much point in having the committee make a report. On the other hand, if there is to be some basis on which the House can take some future decision, my difficulty becomes apparent, and it is this: the procedure set out by the amendment would leave it open to the House at a future time either to fail to concur in the report, to reject the report, or in some way to take a negative position with respect to the report of the committee. That would mean that the House says it approves the televising of its proceedings, but may in the future disapprove. That is the fundamental difficulty of the amendment.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Sir, I suggest that is neither implicit nor explicit in the words of the amendment, an amendment to a motion which approves in principle the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House. That is what I meant when I said that the Chair would have to examine the report and make a ruling with respect to it after it had been brought forward. With respect, I do not think that ruling ought to be made now. I specifically do not think it ought to be made, in light of the wording of the motion proposed. As I have said, such a report is not contemplated by the amendment. Frankly, I think such a report would be contrary to the explicit acceptance of the principle of the motion. There is, as I have said, a lack of words in the amendment which would justify the committee's reopening the fundamental question of the motion.

The second point which I understand is troubling the Chair concerns the reference to an experiment. That suggestion, I admit, was also taken from the 1972 report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. That committee favoured only a closed circuit experiment. I brought forward that suggestion because I intended the term "experiment" to be part of my elaboration, for the committee's benefit, of the word "implementation" in the original motion. If the reference to that experiment stood alone as an amendment, or if that term were read in the context of a paragraph giving the committee permission to examine the whole principle of the question and bring in a report contrary to the principle of the motion, then I would agree that there would be a substantial alteration in the direction of the motion. However, if Your Honour were to read the said paragraph in conjunction with that part dealing with the acceptance of the principle, I think my intent would become clear. The committee should be able to assure the House, after an experiment, that any technical equipment, personnel or procedural problems may be eliminated or can be eliminated if lessons learned from the experiment are applied when the permanent facilities come into operation. That is the context in which the matter ought to be viewed.

In my speech yesterday I said that my party accepts the principle of broadcasting the proceedings of the House but is concerned about the nature of the implementation process and the lack of input by parliamentarians. I put forward this amendment because I wanted to spell out what could be discussed by the committee supervising the implementation. I thought the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization more suitable for that kind of supervision than the committee proposed by the government. I suggest that in some ways I clarified, and in some ways expanded, what the government had put forward in the motion. But the motion, amended or unamended—the point is important—will lead to the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House after input by the committee during the implementation stage. That is putting the matter in the proper order.

I suggest, in closing, and I say this with respect, that we differ only on the detail and not on the basic intent of the motion. I hope I have assisted the Chair.

Mr. Speaker: There is one point on which the hon. member and the Chair seem to be in disagreement. The difficulty arises from the fact that the hon. member's amendment removes the actual stage of implementation from the motion. The motion now includes both approval and implementation. The hon. member's amendment would set up some intervening steps before implementation; in fact, it would remove the implementation step. Because the implementation step is left open, the Chair is left in the position that the House may later decide not to implement, when in fact the original intent of the motion was to do so. That is part of the difficulty. Perhaps the hon. member would consider that while other hon. members argue this matter.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when you read the paragraph from page 389 of May's nineteenth edition, you quoted the citation on which I base my argument in connection with this motion. I point out that those same words appear on page 171 of Beauchesne's fourth edition as part of citation 203(1), which reads in part:

> Every amendment proposed to be made either to a question or to a proposed amendment should be so framed that if agreed to by the House the question or amendment as amended would be intelligible and consistent with itself.

Mr. Benjamin: The Tories are not consistent.

● (1520)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am looking at page 171. I note one or two other references, although my argument will be based mainly on the citation I have already read. But we are also told, in subparagraph (3) of citation 203, that:

> An amendment setting forth a proposition dealing with a matter which is foreign to the proposition involved in the main motion is not relevant and cannot be moved.

I suggest that in so far as the proposed amendment brings in something that is foreign to the main motion, namely, a committee to consider whether or not, as opposed to a committee to supervise implementation, the amendment is foreign to the purpose of the main motion. I congratulate my friend, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), for recognizing the point that Your Honour made from the Chair and for trying to deal with it. As I take Your Honour's point, you are telling us that if this amendment were carried and the House had to vote on the motion as amended, we would have before us a proposition that would be inconsistent with itself. On one hand we would be saying that we approved the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House, but on the other hand we would be saying we are not going to do this until the committee has conducted experiments and made certain studies, that committee having the right to make further recommendations to the House. I appreciate the attempt of my friend from Grenville-Carleton to say that he does not intend that that committee should have the right to abrogate the approval that is contained in the first paragraph, but I suggest that that right is contained in the words of the amendment.

The original motion provides for a committee to supervise the implementation of something to which the House has agreed. The amendment proposes a different kind of committee, a committee to study the "ifs," "ands", "buts" and "therefores," with the right to make further reports before implementation is proceeded with. If we had that kind of motion before us, a motion amended in that way, we would have something that would not be intelligible. It would not be consistent with itself. In fact, the House could well be in a quandary as to how to vote on such an amended motion. On one hand it would say we approve the broadcasting of our proceedings, and on the other hand it would say we do not approve that process until there has been a committee study, it being accorded to the committee that it could make further recommendations. Since there is no limit to the recommendations it could make, the committee could recommend that we not go ahead with the proposition. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton cannot ask to have it both ways. What we ought to have is a clear vote on whether we go ahead or not. The hon. member is asking that we seem to say "Yes" in paragraph one, but that we say "Maybe yes, maybe no" in the rest of the paragraphs.

I do not think that the debate needs to be dragged out. Your Honour stated the questions that face us with regard to this amendment. I think you were right in quoting the paragraph you did from May's nineteenth edition. Because this amendment would put before us an unintelligible and inconsistent proposition, I think it should not be allowed as being procedurally in order.

Broadcasting House Proceedings

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, the main motion is amended in one particular only. It substitutes one committee for another. Only the second paragraph of the main motion is deleted. There is no derogation whatsoever about the question of approval of the radio and television broadcasting of the proceedings of this House. At page 2303 of Hansard, second column, appears the amendment put forward by my colleague. There is nothing new; it concerns only the nature of the committee. The amendment substitutes a House committee on procedure and organization to look into the matters outlined. The main motion has a special committee under Mr. Speaker to supervise the implementation of the resolution.

If that committee failed to look into all the points contained in the amendment, I respectfully submit it would be derelict in its duty. If it found something very objectionable or very difficult, it might find it necessary to come back to the House. One must not close off the possibility that the committee envisaged by the main motion would have to come back to the House, unless the people on the committee are going to be mere sidewalk superintendents gawking at a technical installation. If the committee finds, for example, that there is a very grave difficulty with regard to the law of libel, what is its position? Under its mandate to supervise the implementation that committee might have to come back to the House and say there has to be a change in the law of libel. Supervision of the implementation covers everything, not just the mere technical installation.

If we look at the committee that was envisaged, the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, there is nothing contained in those words which derogates from the approval that is given. I want to be very careful about the language here, "That the committee be authorized"—merely be given permission, if need be—to make further recommendations. To do what? To make a recommendation with regard to the law of libel? I suggest that the committee under the chairmanship of the Speaker would have to do precisely that. So what is the difference? Its proper supervision of the implementation includes all of those things and possibly many more.

The House committee is only to be authorized; it does not have to, but is merely authorized. As a matter of fact, a proper drafting of the first resolution would have given the committee under Mr. Speaker direct authorization to make reports if it felt it should. Since it does not, all I will say as a member of this House is that if the committee runs into some very serious difficulties in the implementation of the resolution and fails to report to this House, fails to seek recommendations from this House, it will be derelict in its duty. To that extent, I submit there is a proper amendment because the nature of the committee has been changed: there has been a change from one thing to another. There is nothing foreign at all. It is a mere quibbling of words to say that there has been a fundamental change in the nature of the resolution.

Therefore, I submit that the amendment is perfectly correct in that it does not in any way derogate from the approval given by the House. The committee is in one case given permission to report to the House; in the other case the committee will be extremely derelict if it fails to do so. To that extent, I submit the amendment is in order.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that you and your deputy took the admissibility of this amendment under advisement yesterday, because we on the government side have grave reservations about its propriety and suggest it is out of order for reasons to which Your Honour made reference this afternoon as well as those mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Yesterday Your Honour referred to two citations from Beauchesne's which bear upon this matter, citations 202(6) and 202(15). The first of these states:

> It is not an amendment to a motion to move that the question go to a committee.

I would simply point out that the last part of the proposed amendment obviously raises this problem about which Your Honour spoke earlier this afternoon. It means, presumably, that the committee, as Your Honour suggested, might recommend that somehow the principle of an electronic Hansard might not be proceeded with, and in this respect the amendment might have the effect of referring the question to a committee and might well be out of order in light of the citation from Beauchesne that I have just put on record. There is the further difficulty that it raises the possibility of the House approving two inconsistent propositions in the same breath, as it were.

I should like to refer more extensively to citation 202(15), which reads in part:

> An amendment approving part of a motion and disapproving the remainder is out of order.

And later on in the same citation, this wording is used, "An amendment to disapprove what the main motion approves is out of order." This aspect was referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and I would like to make two points about it. In the first place, the supervision of the implementation of the resolution by a special committee consisting of Your Honour and seven other members constitutes an important principle—the direct involvement of the Speaker as the key individual responsible for the implementation of the resolution. As such, it is a central part of the question to be decided. The amendment, by establishing an entirely different mechanism for supervising the implementation of the resolution, disapproves what the main motion approves and is, therefore, I suggest, out of order.

Second, paragraphs three and four of the amendment instruct that experimental broadcasts be undertaken in consultation with the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, and that the committee be authorized to make further recommendations to the House before permanent broadcasting facilities are installed. This, in effect, disapproves what the main motion approves, since the first paragraph in the main motion authorizes broadcasting on principles similar to those governing the publication of the printed official reports of the debates. Beyond doubt, a central principle governing publication of printed reports is that the reports be complete. The amendment would have the effect of instructing that an incomplete or experimental record be produced. Moreover, it would establish a committee which would not be empowered to arrange for broadcasting the debates on principles similar to those governing the publication of the printed record. This clearly frustrates the purpose of the main motion, that is to say, to establish a committee empowered to supervise implementation.

For these reasons, as well as those addressed to Your Honour by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I suggest that the reservations expressed yesterday were well-founded and that the proposed amendment is out of order.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I want to say something first of all about the motion itself. I believe that intrinsically it is sound in the sense that it is not out of order. In other respects, I believe it is a very bad motion, that it is inequitable and that it should not have been put down in its present form. However, this is not enough to enable me to suggest that it ought not to be accepted. If that were the case, over the last 13 years a great many motions put forward by the government would have been thrown out.

I precede my few comments by saying that I, personally, favour the principle of broadcasting the proceedings of the House by way of television and radio. I have been of this mind for a number of years and I shall say so again when I speak later this afternoon. I thought I would tell the Chair that, so that the Chair might know I am not trying to suggest that anything be done which would interfere with the motion being put. Possibly this is a case where the Chair, acting in a judicial capacity, might consider equitable principles in addition to the application of the Standing Orders.

The motion in the name of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) asks the House to approve the radio and television broadcasting of its proceedings, and the proceedings of committees, on the basis of principles similar to those which govern the publication of the official reports of debates. This, Mr. Speaker, involves a set of principles going back 135 years, changed, twisted and tortured from time to time by discussions, debates and decisions of the Chair in the House of Commons both at Westminster and here. Your Honour will know from your experience in the Chair that a number of these principles are even yet not firmly fixed. You will recall that a special committee of the House, under your chairmanship, has been given responsibility to deal with certain of the aspects covered by those words I have mentioned. I refer to the special committee on rights and immunities. That committee has not yet reported, so I shall not go into that aspect in detail. But Your Honour will recognize the difficulty attaching to some of the problems with which the committee is dealing. I say this as one who is strongly of the belief that radio and television broadcasting of our proceedings should be brought about.

I am not without concern with regard to related problems. As I say, the special committee under Your Honour's chairmanship will be considering some of the very issues which are bound to be brought to the attention of another committee should the present motion go through. I can look ahead and envisage the possibility of two committees reaching two different decisions, one committee being compelled to report to the House and the other authorized by the motion before us to proceed with the implementation of the principle of televising and radio broadcasting our proceedings.

In these circumstances, as a friend of the court, one might say, I make the following suggestion. I am sure the President of the Privy Council is aware of these problems and I shall deal with them later on when I speak. My hon. friend from Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has adverted to them. I have considered these things over a number of years, and Your Honour is aware that they are not easy issues to determine. I am sure it is not without some interest to hon. members to know that in most jurisdictions where the televising or radio broadcasting of proceedings has been permitted, accompanying legislation has either been enacted or recommended. My hon. friend for Edmonton West put his finger on this; we have considered it. I think it is most likely, when we open this Pandora's box, as we must, and set loose some of the objects inside the box, that we may well be driven to enacting some form of legislation.

I should like to think that the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), and my hon. friend for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), would consider reframing this motion in terms which will give effect to the kind of concern that a number of us, who still favour televising our proceedings, have so as to permit a committee of the type envisaged in this motion to consider this particular aspect and, if necessary, to report back to the House. I do not need to recall to Your Honour that there is no constraint placed upon this particular committee which is to be established under the motion to report back to the House; it is a mechanism for implementation, which is, of course, one of the problems Your Honour has raised.

In view of those facts, I think we would be very unwise to let this motion go without having an opportunity to study the kind of caveat I have attempted to make and which has been referred to by my hon. friend for Edmonton West. Perhaps a motion could be drafted which would take into account these matters, not one which would prevent the passage of the motion or one corresponding to it, or the implementation of the motion, but which would take into account the very serious difficulties which lie ahead.

There is nothing to stop the committee, on the basis of this motion, from meeting under Your Honour's chairmanship and two months from now proposing that implementation commence forthwith, having regard to what might be called the physical and mechanical situation. Much as I favour and strongly approve of so much of what might be done and can be done by broadcasting the proceedings of this House, I would be very unhappy unless there were some constraint in respect thereof and the dangers that exist were taken into account. I make this suggestion, Mr. Speaker, in the hope that some time might be given to allow the debate to continue. It may well be possible to frame a motion which does not in any way restrict what the government is proposing to do, but which does take into account the potential dangers that I have tried to point out.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, given the importance of the subject you have dealt with in the House of Commons, that is whether or not the motion on resolution No. 8 was acceptable, I would like to make the following point: resolution No. 8 is in fact a statement of principle. It comes down to saying that the House approves, in a general way, the radio and television broadcasting of its proceedings and of the proceedings of its committees on the basis of principles similar to those that govern the publication of the debates. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it is a resolution which on the whole is non limitative and which constitutes acceptance in principle of the television broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons and its committees. The resolution does not indicate any application date. In the second paragraph, it says that there will be a committee.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the creation of this committee is precisely what should incite you, with all due respect, to accept the resolution submitted by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). For the very simple reason that the government motion proposes:

> That a special committee, consisting of Mr. Speaker and seven other members to be named at a later date, be appointed to supervise the implementation of this resolution.

The first part of the motion amounts to a mere approval of the broadcasting of the debates of the House of Commons to allow Canadians to know how we are working. In the same breath the government proposes the creation of a special committee over which you will preside and which will supervise the implementation, but the implementation of what? The implementation of technical measures relating to the approval in principle of the first part of the motion, the broadcasting of the debates, which, Mr. Speaker, indicates that the government will study the technical details when and only when the broadcasting of the debates will have been adopted in principle.

Mr. Speaker, contrary to the opinion of my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who referred to citation 203(1) of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms where it is said that the essence of a proposed amendment should not be changed, the amendment that the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) proposed does not change the government motion. As far as I know after reading and rereading it several times, it is not opposed to the broadcasting of the debates either.

Mr. Speaker, the amendment of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton in no way opposes the essence of the government motion, quite the contrary. But the principle or the aim of the amendment, and this is what we should remember, is that a special committee be created. Instead of proposing the creation of a special committee, the hon. member proposes to refer the matter to the Committee on Procedure and Organization. Before approving in principle the broadcasting of the debates, the hon. member proposes that we study right now the technical aspects relating to the approval of the broadcasting of the debates.

Mr. Speaker, consequently his amendment is not opposed to the essence of the motion presented by the leader of the government. Strictly speaking, we want to know if we are really going to be aware of the consequences of the broadcasting of the debates before or after approving the motion.

In his resolution the government leader proposes that we accept to have the proceedings broadcast and that a special committee be appointed under your chairmanship to supervise the technicalities of the implementation of such a resolution. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) proposes that we do not oppose the televising of proceedings and that the question be referred to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization—which already exists and which is a committee of the House of Commons—for a study of its technical implications. As the second paragraph of the resolution puts it:

> That the cost and technical studies of building, equipment, personnel and other requirements consequent upon the introduction of radio and television broadcasting of the House of Commons and its committees be referred to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization for study and report.

The question before us therefore is not whether to refer to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization the principle of broadcasting House proceedings, for that would not be the situation if we were to adopt the resolution of the hon. member of Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). This committee would not be responsible for studying the principle of broadcasting House proceedings. This is irrelevant and therefore I submit that the motion of the hon. member of Grenville-Carleton is in order; it would allow us, before we start broadcasting House proceedings, to know what are the technical implications, the costs, the periods of broadcasting and what consequences it would have on the rights and immunity of the members of the House. I sincerely hope that Your Honour will recognize that the amendment moved by my colleague the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton is in order.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I thank you very much for indicating that I might be able to say something at the close about what has been said during the course of this discussion. With respect, I do not think I should deal in considerable detail with the provisions in our rules referred to by the parliamentary secretary. He referred to citation 202 of Beauchesne's, I think paragraph (6), and I think he also referred to citation 201. However, I gather from what Your Honour said at the outset that that is not the issue which is troubling you.

In respect of the proposition put forward by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), I certainly would have no objection to sitting down with the government House leader to see whether something acceptable could be worked out in the way of terms of reference to that committee in the spirit suggested by the hon. member for Peace River. I tried to make that clear in my speech yesterday, as I tried equally today to make it clear that in terms of broadcasting the procedures of the House, the position of this party, as well as my own personal position, is as has been expressed by the hon. member for Peace River. If something can be done in that respect, I would be the first to agree with the proposal; I think it is constructive.

All of us in the House want this matter to proceed in a proper and orderly way. I must confess to you, Mr. Speaker—and I think it is proper that I make my confession here—that I am very much concerned about the fact that Your Honour will be the chairman of the committee proposed by the government to deal with the issue. This has been one of my concerns, though I have not said it before, and that is why I am confessing it here. I am concerned about the fact that you will find yourself as chairman, firstly from your personal point of view, certainly, but as well from the point of view of the institution of the Chair as it has developed in this House. I can see the possibility of dangers for the Chair, and I do not think Mr. Speaker should be involved in that way.

There is another aspect of concern. If the hon. member for Peace River is correct in terms of what he is urging in the context of his speech, that the committee examine, then the committee Your Honour would chair under the motion as originally drafted, as opposed to the committee I suggested should be constituted, namely, the committee on procedure and organization, might very well refer the question of privilege, immunities and rights to another committee chaired by you, namely, the committee in which the hon. member for Peace River is involved. All in all, I think this is not the most constructive way of proceeding, notwithstanding the fact that I believe we should proceed in the way suggested and approved of in principle; that is, by way of a committee of the House with the responsibility of dealing with the important matters it ought to consider in terms of the implementation that is set forth and agreed to, as I tried to make clear in the first part of my motion.

In terms of the merit of the questions that you have put to me today, Mr. Speaker, I should like to advance one further proposition, and that is a proposition well known to both of us. In a parliamentary sense, at least, it is the proposition that I would call, for want of a better phrase, that of reasonable doubt. This is a proposition that applies to drafting generally. If there is or might be, some doubt as to the purport of an amendment, then that doubt ought to be resolved in favour of validity. Naturally, I would hope Your Honour would not be driven to that point, but I would respectfully remind you, without repeating it, of the proposition I put first.

I want to close by saying that my amendment was advanced very seriously, out of a very serious concern for this institution. It was advanced in the spirit of the statements I made in my speech yesterday on the principles involved in broadcasting the proceedings of this House. As I said in my speech, I find great difficulty, and others may not, in suggesting to the people of Canada that they do not have the right to see what goes on in their own parliament. That is the spirit in which the motion was advanced, and that is the spirit in which I am prepared to accept the suggestion put to me by my learned predecessor. I would be delighted to meet with the government House leader to see if we can resolve this matter.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the importance of the commments made by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), and the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) on the irregularity of this amendment. I believe that as the argument unfolded in the debate it became clear that in a sense the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton was presenting a proposition different to the one embodied in the main motion.

I support the argument by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) when he suggested that acceptance of the irregularity of the amendment would place the House in an inconsistent position in dealing with the motion, because if the amendment were adopted it would be inconsistent with itself. The motion provides for a particular framework, and the motion must be looked at as a whole. It calls for the acceptance by the House of radio and television broadcasting of its proceedings and the proceedings of committees in accordance with principles similar to those that govern the printed record. Part of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton contradicts that particular proposal because he talks about special or experimental broadcasting.

We have deliberately sought this committee under the chairmanship of Mr. Speaker as a very important element in the framework because of the authority and prestige the office holds, and because this is a committee of implementation and not of study and report. In a sense, that is the framework we have put forward. As I understand the proposition put forward by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, it is entirely different: it is a different proposition calculated to do different things.

I am not arguing against the desirability of new proposals being advanced, or suggesting that this is the only way in which this can be done. However, looking at it from a procedural point of view, I am persuaded that there is here a new proposition and that the application of Beauchesne's citation 202(15) goes directly to this point. Beauchesne refers to an amendment ruled out of order, and indicates that the Speaker has ruled that an amendment disapproving the principle of the main motion is out of order. Surely the amendment is designed to disapprove the basic framework that we have proposed.

I argue, therefore, in support of your intimations and the cogent argument made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that this amendment is out of order. I take note, of course, of the comments made by the hon. member for Peace River, picked up by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, that it may be possible through negotiations to reach a common motion incorporating some of the elements that have been proposed and the elements that I regard as essential.

It was my view that in giving the committee the power and the authority of the House to implement, obviously it would take into account the personnel requirements, the equipment, the cost and the technical studies. These matters will be very much in the purview of the committee, as would be the rights and the immunities of members of the House. The implementing committee could deal with these, and indeed I could find myself, with a change of wording, accepting the third paragraph. Instead of talking about "experimental broadcasts", if we talk about "special broadcasts" prior to the implementation of a permanent system, then that, too, could be discussed further. But I do not believe we could accept any proposals that would prejudice a decision taken now by the House in support of the principles of television, charging a committee with implementing it. However, certainly it was my intention that that committee seek out and ensure that proper safeguards are put into place in accordance with paragraphs 1 and 2 of the amendment. So there may be room for bringing together a composite motion that would be desirable, because this question is a matter for the House as a whole. If we could do it in that way, it would be much better, and certainly I would seek to do it within the parameters that are important to me and taking into account the factors that are important to hon. members and upon which they have laid particular stress.

In reply to the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton with respect to the chairmanship of this committee by Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that we have had in the past Mr. Speaker act as the chairman of the committee on procedure and organization when we had to deal with unsettled matters by the House. Here we would be settling the principle and saying to the committee that the principle is settled and that now the committee should implement it in accordance with whatever exhortations we may want to put in the resolution as a whole. But I have confidence that Mr. Speaker and a group of seven members could be given the authority of the House to implement this motion.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, and I thank you for your indulgence, that this latter part of my comments did not deal directly with the point of order, but I did want to respond to the comments made by the hon. member for Peace River and the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As I indicated at the outset, on the one hand I have some sympathy with the position of the hon. member who in looking upon this motion is in favour both of what has been described as the principle of televising and broadcasting the proceedings of the House and of implementation, but has some misgivings about the matters raised by way of the amendment of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). That position is conceded on all sides to be a valid one, expressing concerns about some aspects of the motion without attempting to depart from the main thrust of the motion, that is to say, the implementation of televising and radio broadcasting of our proceedings.

I have a special sympathy for that position in view of the fact, as I think hon. members will understand, that a motion such as this, distinct from a bill or a matter of budgetary estimates, does not have a committee stage built into it at which members who have concerns about cost and other considerations have the opportunity to question the minister who is taking responsibility for the carriage of the particular budgetary item or the particular bill before the House.

Accordingly, in a situation where a member seeks to give his approval to a motion that is on the order paper, but at the same time wishes to obtain clarification of whether certain costs are involved, whether certain structural changes might affect or prejudice the House, or whether there are questions about the rights and immunities of members, and whether it is appropriate that the committee be of one form or another, he does not have the opportunity to gain that sort of exchange in a debate on this kind of motion.

I therefore hope that hon. members will realize that I deeply sympathize with the position taken by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton. In the final analysis, however, I am left with what is perhaps a narrow difficulty, but one which in my opinion is insurmountable; that is, that the proposed amendment of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton has one fatal flaw, despite all its merits which have been conceded on all sides. Here I must disagree with the description of that amendment put forward by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert); and I think it is innocently done. While the intent of the amendment clearly seems to be that the implementation procedures simply be changed, I am driven to conclude that the fact the implementation procedures are removed is the fatal difficulty, because the amendment does not say anywhere that instead of a Speaker's committee or some other committee implementing it in the way the motion is described, the committee on procedure and organization will supervise the implementation. What it does say is that, instead, the matter will be sent to committee for study and report and that certain steps will be taken before implementation, but it does not say that implementation will in fact take place.

In my opinion, this means that the two difficulties remain. One is that implementation may not take place if the amendment is adopted. If the motion is amended and adopted by the House, it leaves the matter of implementation open, and that is inconsistent with the initial proposition. It is, in my opinion, a new proposition. Secondly, what it does on the very narrow ground of the citation in May's nineteenth edition to which so many hon. members have referred, is to leave the House in a position, if the amended motion is adopted, of approving what is supposed to be the implementation and yet leaving it open in the future to disapprove the very thing it has approved in the first paragraph of the motion.

It is because of the removal of the actual implementation language that I am left with the difficulty. I feel, therefore, that on the ground of that citation I must indicate that the motion as amended would be inconsistent with its own terms. Surely the effect has been achieved, and that is consistent with all the remarks that I made in which I have indicated my sympathy with the position of the hon. member who wishes to support the motion, but at the same time expresses concern for the matters raised by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, that there may be negotiations between House leaders to see whether or not a proper addition to the existing motion might be achieved which would take care of those concerns.

Certainly, it is valid to say that any committee over which I would preside would want to take all those considerations into account before advancing any implementation. However, further to such negotiations, I am sure it is not necessary to say that, having examined the wording of this ruling and the arguments that have been put forward at this time, not only are such negotiations open as the debate continues but it is open to other members to put forward other amendments which, if the negotiations fail, may make another attempt to achieve the same result.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, normally I would be quite sympathetic to some of the arguments put forward by hon. friends on my right about the need to delay, scrutinize and not just to accept the resolution, because televising is a most significant and historic step. However, I have a tremendous sense of urgency about what is happening in this country at the moment, and that sense of urgency leads me to believe that it is vital that we not only televise the House of Commons but that we do it as quickly as is humanly possible.

Television is a medium which has many faults. It can distort, but what medium cannot distort? Television has one unique characteristic; that is that it reaches every corner of the country. It is a way of reaching people unlike any which has ever been devised by mankind. At this time when I think our country is in serious danger of disintegration, a desintegration which may come about because of ignorance, misunderstanding or the suspicion by one part of the country for another, it is vital that the people of Canada see directly what is going on in their House of Commons. I am sure that if people saw what was going on in the House of Commons, it would be a reassuring thing: they would be proud to be citizens of this country and they would want to stay in this country.

I think the fears which have been voiced, while they are real, can be overcome. With regard to the use of television, I am quite prepared to trust Mr. Speaker to be fair with the members of this House, considering the history of fairness of Speakers of this House. Not only our present Speaker, who is highly regarded, but also Speakers before him have honoured this House with their chairmanship of this chamber. On occasions when the Chair may in fact not behave in a way with which we agree, there are redresses. The House has control over itself; it can change things. If we find that some things are happening with which we do not agree and which could be done in a somewhat better manner, we can certainly make changes, just as we have changed legislation and the rules of this House over the years.

The urgency is such that I think we must proceed. A great deal of work has already been done with regard to television. We have had much discussion and there has been much examination regarding the arguments for and against the use of television, but I think the urgency which exists regarding our survival as a nation is such that we have to proceed with television.

Last night when speaking to the House I made the point that the continuous televising of proceedings in the House would take this House out of the hands of the press gallery. We desperately need that to be done. Even if we say that the newspapers, radio and television of this country are doing as good a job as they are capable of doing, nevertheless the information we get from those media is second-hand, selected and very often, unfortunately, hysterical and antagonistic. We have to take that power out of the hands of the press gallery. Certainly the gallery will still have its role to play. It can go on interpreting, and perhaps its role will even be enlarged. But there has to be something besides interpretation: there has to be a direct view of what is happening in this place.

The reformed Canada Elections Act provides funds for campaigns, and I think the same kind of situation applies here. The reason those funds were supplied was to assist people running for parliamentary seats, whether sitting members or contestants. The idea was to take that funding out of the hands of the big powers and to make members of parliament less beholden to others so that they could speak in an independent way. That also now has to be done with the media. The proceedings of this House have to be taken out of the hands of the media and broadcast directly to the people of this country.

In my remarks last night I referred to one aspect only of the media. I said that it was the nature of the media to look for headlines, to be antagonistic and to be almost anti-establishment by choice. However, there is one other aspect of the media which is critical at this moment. Last night I was talking essentially about the English media. Now I want to talk about the French media. The English media sees its role in a certain way, and from what I have been able to see the French media in the province of Quebec sees its role almost entirely as separatist.

I do not think there has been any greater influence for tearing this country apart than the people in the media in Quebec, and it is important—in fact, vital—that this House be able to speak to the people of Quebec and appeal to them to stay in confederation, without having to run the gamut of prejudice and bias that exists in the French media. It is all right to say that people who work in the media, whether newspapers, radio or television, have a perfect right to be separatist if they so choose, and of course that is so, but they do not have a right—and this has been consistently abused—to use this position to influence others who are not inclined that way. It is frustrating, when this country is in such critical danger and when events are moving so fast, to try to decide what action we can take.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) says that English Canadians have to demonstrate to French Canadians that we love them. I am paraphrasing the Prime Minister, but I think that is essentially what he has been saying. How can we say "We love you" when the carriers of the Valentine are not going to let that message get through? I know my own constituents may grumble about bilingualism and other things in connection with Quebec, but when we really get down to it there is no doubt in my mind that my constituents want this country to hang together. They want Quebec to stay in confederation, and I feel somewhat frustrated in trying to get that message across to the people of Quebec. I think that by televising the proceedings of the House of Commons we will be able to say what we feel and what we know to the people of Quebec without worrying about what kind of distortions will take place once our words get into the hands of the French media.

I want to refer back to something I started to talk about last night. I was talking about our responsibility as members of parliament. Without television in the House, and with the prodding which takes place in the corridors, there is a tendency for members of this House to think of their ridings in particular, rather than to see themselves as part of one of the great parties which exist. There is a tendency to see themselves as other than part of something called responsible government. We do not sit here as freelance individuals, but as members of a group who have taken a certain position. We have gone to the electorate with that position and we hold ourselves collectively responsible for that position.

One of the great difficulties, and perhaps one of the reasons democracy is fragile and falls into danger, is that people become too particularized. People tend to listen to loud voices, whether they come in the form of a letter or from someone on the street, and think these are the voices of the grass roots. A member of parliament can get a misleading impression by reading only the mail that comes across the desk or by listening only to the loud, broadcast voice or organized group voice.

On the question of English and French Canada, for instance, we could think that everybody in English Canada is ready to bid Quebec goodbye. That is the kind of mail we get. I am sure the same thing is true of the people of Quebec and the mail Quebec members get: Let English Canada go, sort of thing. But if you probe a little more deeply, as many of us do with questionnaires, and ask everyone—not just those who feel constrained to make representation to their member—you get an entirely different impression.

Another impression that comes through quite clearly in my riding, and I am prepared to say this and take whatever political risks are consequent upon it, is that people want the member of parliament to be a leader; they want the member of parliament to make a decision. Basically, they say, "You are there. You are in the debate. You are listening to the argument. You accept the responsibility and we will judge you at election time to the extent we think you have behaved responsibly, wisely, intelligently and to our benefit."

A member expressed concern that television was going to give him a national audience and he does not want a national audience; he just wants to talk to his constituents. We have to do more than talk to our constituents, Mr. Speaker. The problem of talking only to our constituents is that it reinforces the bigotry and prejudice that exists in every riding; it is to assume that such is our riding when in fact it is not. It is really to play, not to the gallery but to the dug-out. We have to avoid that even if it means political risk. We have to be able to go back on occasion—and I think the time is ripe now—and say, "We are in trouble. We are in danger. Those loose lips, those irresponsible remarks, are no longer in fashion. There is too much hanging on what we say and what we do." I think that message has to come from this House.

I will give an example, Mr. Speaker. Members know where their constituency is itching. Maybe it is in respect of textiles, shoes, storage of grain, the price of cattle—who knows? It may affect one constituency only, or a few, but it is reasonably important in those constituencies. Yet the party position is just the opposite. So members make a speech, send it back home, and nobody in the press pays any attention because they know it was just a throw-away speech that pleases the people back home. It reinforces all the misconceptions that exist. Then the party takes some other position because, after all, the party has to speak nationally. I think that is wrong, Mr. Speaker.

We cannot always agree with our party—there are cases where we have to digress—but we have to take the consequences. The party system is important. We are not a rabble, not a group of anarchists. We belong to groups of people who have come together for certain kinds of programs so that we can be identified, and when people vote for us they know what we stand for. Parties are important in this House in a way that the individual is not. Parties have to be held responsible and the individual has to be held responsible within the framework of the party. Some of us who are more inclined than others to be mavericks may not like this, but it will result in a great deal more discipline and each member being held responsible for what he says in this House. It will not be a matter of mailing an excerpt from Hansard to a constituency; everybody in the country will hear what a member of a party has to say on a given issue. I think that is important.

Mr. Speaker, my time is nearly up. I would say to my hon. friends on the right that I understand their reservations. I know there will be some problems, but I ask them to consider with some urgency the fact that we must have television in this House so that we can speak directly to the people of Canada. I know my friends on the right, as members of the opposition, understand that the nature of television is to favour the government and not the opposition. We can quarrel about that, but it is an opinion that I feel strongly. I know it is going to favour the government, and therefore there may be some tendency on the part of the opposition to oppose it. That is a natural tendency. It will favour the government.

My friends on the right look at the latest Gallup poll and see themselves as the next government. The only thing I can say to them is that unless we settle what I think is a critical problem in this country between English and French Canada, there may not be a country for them to preside over even if they win the next election. For that reason, I think the most important contribution we can make toward understanding between English and French Canada is to put this House on television, and do it right away.

[Translation]

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I should like to start my remarks by saying, first of all, that I am delighted to have the opportunity of taking part in this debate. I am of those who, publicly as well as behind the scenes, have worked for months, even years, to bring in this change which, to my mind, is essential. I mean, to take the debates of the House of Commons to all Canadians, through the most modern of media, namely television.

● (1630)

I must confess that for quite some time I used all the resources at my command and the influence I may have in Ottawa in an effort to convince government circles of holding a debate, as the earliest possible date, on the resolution before us today, which I shall endeavour to defend as best I can.

First I should like to stress the most important point, that whether we admit or not television is today the best of all means of communication. We have come a long way since Gutenberg discovered printing. The printed medium, which is still being used in all industrialized countries, is indeed quite different from television, in that it is a lineal medium. We learn what goes on by reading in a newspaper or a document a sequence of words, while television, through pictures, brings us information that is strictly global and which informs the spectator first hand. Television is the perfect medium, I repeat. Since the middle '60s, we have realized that the earthly globe is in fact an electrical network that links all human beings in such a way that they are no more and no less than tied to each other without being aware of it.

Perhaps the one who expressed this best is Professor McLuhan from Toronto who spoke the famous words that have now become a cliche: The medium is the message. In addition to being an extremely modern and a very powerful medium, television could solve today one of the most serious problems we are facing in the area of information. This problem which I would like to discuss for a few minutes is the growing lack of objectivity among newsmen, especially among writers.

As Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State of Canada, I have relatively often the opportunity to meet people who produce programs for private or even public television and radio stations. Again last weekend, I had a discussion with the moderator of a very important and very popular public affairs program on the French network of the CBC who stated flatly that objectivity was a thing of the past. People in the field of information want to be able to say what they think, whether others agree with them or not, and I may be repeating the words of the previous speaker who, for his part, did not agree with them. Perhaps he is right. Perhaps people who work in the media should try to be more objective and to report events as they happen. But reality is different. Today's reporter wants to give his own opinion. And unless we censure and control what is happening in the information fields, I think that it would be very difficult for parliamentarians to change the situation. The only way to do so would be to give the spectators, the voters, direct access to the event, thus avoiding the screening now done by those responsible for information.

Direct access to the event is the central point of the present debate. The question we must ask of ourselves is as follows: Are we afraid that what happens in this chamber and which concerns everyone in Canada will be known directly by the public and that the public may judge the validity of the proposals debated in this House? This is the question. In my opinion, it is also the first good thing that would come out of broadcasting the proceedings of the House.

If it were possible, we, the government, the Liberal party, would like all Canadians to be able to get into this House at the same time to witness what we are saying, to hear what concerns them and to determine by themselves whether such a speaker is right or whether what another one is saying makes more sense.

This is not physically possible, but with the help of wires and cables, television will bring our speeches to the homes of all citizens who will want to tune in to the station carrying our message.

An hon. Member: The Conservatives are ashamed of that!

Mr. Guilbault: I think that one aspect—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Would the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. Guilbault: I am ready to reply to the questions of the hon. member if he will allow me to conclude my observations. I think the one point we should not forget concerning the proposed program is that the material filmed or produced here would be available to the electronic media, that is television and radio.

So, far from undercutting the television stations, far from by-passing them, this proposal would allow them to obtain excerpts they could use which would only increase tenfold the potential work by the present media. I think we should immediately start the broadcasting on an experimental basis. I have it from Bell Canada that they could provide us on very short notice and at a minimum cost with a system that would allow us to reach the people who subscribe to the four cablevision companies in the Ottawa-Hull area. So those people could—and there are 175,000 families—on very short notice on an experimental basis see at home what is going on in this House, and we all know that the Ottawa-Hull area is probably the area in Canada where voters are the most aware of federal politics since they hear about it everyday through their traditional media.

It would be just as easy to extend this service to the Montreal and Toronto cable networks using what Bell Canada is using, its occasional network of television channels. This would allow to reach an additional one million homes. After that, the rest of Canadian homes could be reached via satellite or other appropriate means. I will come back to those technical considerations later. But seeing that someone on the other side wants to speak to me I could perhaps excite him a bit by saying a few words about the veiled opposition coming from the other side of the House to the resolution now before us. I say "veiled opposition" because we are told they want to introduce an amendment which far from going against the principle would seek to amend it somewhat. It is not difficult for a parliamentarian who has been in this House for a few years to distinguish dilatory tactics from normal amendments. But I think that what they are proposing is much more like something aimed at giving a nice second class burial to the resolution before the House.

But what in hell does Her Majesty's Official Opposition have to hide? Are they afraid that soon Canadians will be able to see what is going on in the House, everything that is said here on one side as well as the other? I do not know exactly, but I have my idea. Maybe they are afraid that the non-constructive attitude with which they are discharging their opposition responsibilities would become apparent and visible to all Canadians. They always say: The government is wrong in all respects, the government is responsible for all evils on earth. The policies proposed by this government are always irresponsible. Well, if the opposition wants to hide this fact I have no objection. And I have no objection if the government proposals—I usually find them correct, but I can be mistaken—I do not see why all Canadians should not see them as they are presented in the House and I am ready to submit to that examination.

Would the official opposition of Her Majesty like to hide the fact, for instance, that its leader is very seldom in the House, that he was not here yesterday at the opening of the debates, preferring to travel across the country and shake hands with people, an approach which is probably more beneficial politically but much less efficient for a party leader anxious to level constructive criticism at the government here in this House where the action is. Maybe that party wishes also to hide or delay as long as possible the knowledge on the part of Canadians that they have no program and no solution to the problems facing Canadians? It might be for those reasons that the opposition tries through dilatory tactics to delay the adoption of this resolution.

Well, let us turn to something more cheerful. I would like to suggest a way of broadcasting the programming of the House debates and one such method to get our message across to the homes of Canadians would be to use the cablevision network.

I must be understood that Canada has the greatest number of cablevision networks in the world. No other country has as many independent cablevision networks nor as many cablevision outlets in private homes. A simple example would be the hearings of the Quebec Commission of Inquiry into Organized Crime which, as we all know, are broadcast by Quebec cable distributors to more than a million viewers, which is a considerable number. Although important the Quebec Commission of Inquiry into Organized Crime has certainly not the weight of the federal government. Nonetheless, it interests a million viewers who want to see what is going on. We can well imagine the reaction of Canadian viewers to debates on subject that interest them more closely and are discussed here in Parliament.

I would like to describe a bit more precisely the way the message of the Quebec crime probe is transmitted to the viewer. The commission hearings are prerecorded, that is they are filmed by a group of technicians working for the various cable distributors. The cassettes are then transmitted during the night to the various cablevision networks and the prerecorded message is broadcast the following day. At first hand, this would seem to be less advantageous than direct broadcasting but it turned out to be quite the contrary.

What happens is that that very same night the constituent sees something exciting during the news broadcast. He sees a short thirty second sequence on a certain point of the inquiry, he is thus interested in seeing the full proceeding, and seeing what the various protagonists have said, in length and in context. We might perhaps consider this method of broadcast for our debates? I offer this as a suggestion.

I would now like to go to some arguments in my favour which are worthy of mention because they back up this proposal rather strongly. The first is that little or no discomfort will be caused because new cameras can operate without increasing light levels in the House. The cameras themselves and the technicians will be unobtrusive and will not be placed on the floor of the House or allowed to move about. It would arouse interest in parliament and in the democratic process. Every member of this House knows that is badly needed.

This place is the weaker if it is not fully reported to our fellow citizens and reported in ways which they can plainly see, understand and feel involved in. It would focus attention on the way in which we conduct the nation's business. We would do it more efficiently and the broadcasting of our proceedings would show up our deficiencies and help us to overcome them. That is for those of us who are not afraid of being scrutinized.

We should use the most effective medium of communication that is available to the public today. That is, without doubt, television. Television will be good for parliament, not because it will allow us to keep our traditions completely but because it will be a catalyst for change. Those of us who want change and progress in this institution, who want it to evolve toward a more businesslike and efficient procedure, will welcome television because it will assist us to that objective. It would help to show the public what are the hurdles and obstacles in the way of progress in parliament. It would help us to explain to our constituents the problems which confront us in our day-to-day work. It would demonstrate the weakness of MPs in trying to influence the government and the executive.

More than 20 countries already broadcast their proceedings. Cameras have already been allowed to broadcast selected government events. There is no reason why we should not allow them in here for good. The UN and the Council of Europe have long been accustomed to cameras recording their proceedings.

I wish to say a few words about a fear that some have, namely, that grandstanding will begin and our proceedings will be changed. In my opinion, the buffoon would be exposed as a buffoon. Experience in Germany has shown that the stars are not the flowery orators, comic performers or the buffoons. They are those members of the Bundestag who know what they are talking about. However badly they may deliver their speeches, and however inadequate they may be as orators, if they know what they are talking about and if what they talk about finds an echo in the experience of their audience, they become the stars of that program. There would be more opportunity for members who are now never invited to appear on television—people who know their subject very well but who have to demonstrate their knowledge in committee rather than on the floor of the House. It is no excuse for keeping cameras out to say that viewers would misunderstand what is happening—empty benches, for example. Viewers would quickly discover and understand what happens in parliament.

Broadcasters are responsible people and have shown themselves to be so. Broadcasters would do a better job than the press does now. Being an electronic medium, it is more prone to show the truth because it shows things as they happen. If we think that television will distort parliament, we should ban the press from parliament. Who in this House is ready to do that? Television has a much better record of impartiality than does the press, for the reasons I have mentioned. You cannot play too much with the media.

How will we know whether televising parliament is good, or bad, if we do not carry out an experiment? We should move now while cable channels are available. With the exception of Toronto, in most cities across the land they were empty a couple of years ago. They are now crowded in Toronto and will soon be crowded in Montreal and Vancouver. If we want to move in this direction, we should move now. Otherwise it will be too late.

[Translation]

And finally, Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member who spoke before me, I would like to call upon Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition to review their position, to support the motion in order to better serve democracy and Canadians as a whole. If they were right in their repeated suggestions in this House that the Liberal government have such a poor performance, that our policies are so bad, why in heavens are they afraid that Canadians see what goes on in this House? The whole nation could observe the government develop their policies. If the Progressive Conservatives are right in their analysis, they would have a tremendous political interest in allowing television.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member for Saint-Jacques (Mr. Guilbault) allow a question by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert)?

Mr. Guilbault: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton West.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, in the event that the proceedings of the House and of its committees are broadcast, could the hon. member tell me who would be responsible for broadcasting not only from a technical point of view but on a national basis? Who would carry the cost? Will they be broadcast on a regular basis or will broadcasting be limited to small parts of our proceedings, on national news reports?

Mr. Guilbault: Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to tell the hon. member that I am indeed a parliamentary secretary but not to the President of the Privy Council, and I am not aware of everything which happens there. One thing is for sure, the committee which will be set up by the House will make recommendations which will be submitted to Parliament and which will provide a better answer to hon. members' questions.

If the hon. member wants to know what I think of it, I am prepared to give him immediately my true opinion. In my view, a parliamentary body should be responsible for recording and production. If a committee under the chairmanship of Mr. Speaker must be responsible for the implementation of this resolution, I suggest that this committee should designate people to operate the machinery and it would seem desirable that those be employees of the House of Commons. On the other hand, I would say that there are numerous ways of broadcasting. I referred earlier to cablevision. I, for one, have made in-depth research in this area. I know for instance that CBC would not be able to broadcast a large part of our proceedings because they would have to reorganize completely their programming. I know that already. It would probably be the same in the private sector. Therefore, the options at our disposal as regards distribution are probably cablevision, and then other means that we could decide to set up but which would probably be more costly. This is the answer I wanted to give the hon. member for the time being.

● (1650)

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes which are left before five o'clock I do not suppose I shall move too many worlds. Let me say first of all, however, that I approve the attempt by the government and the House to introduce a system of broadcasting and televising our proceedings, as do a number of other members of the party to which I belong. We may not all be of the same mind. We do not follow the herd principle as do other political parties. It is my view that issues of this kind, like issues having to do with the rules, are the property of the members of the House and not of political parties, and it is for hon. members to listen to their conscience on this issue and decide as they see fit. Parties have a considerable role to play, but an issue of this kind is one which should reflect the views of hon. members.

I agree with a good deal of what was said by the hon. member who just resumed his seat. Some of the reasons for which he indicated that members on this side would not favour the measure will not, in my opinion, be borne out. But even if he is right in his assumption, I believe members on this side would have far more to gain from television. No one who has been in this House for the last two or three years and observed the litany of shame which has dogged the footsteps of the government, from the illegal tendering practices of the CMHC in connection with Rochdale College in Toronto right up to the time of the CANDU sales, will have failed to observe an aura of scandal around the periphery of the government and its officials. It can only remind me of a prehistoric monster bogged down in primeval slime and lifting one foot to get out, only to be bogged down in more of a mess. I suggest that any objective observer would conclude that Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition has far more to gain from watching the operations of the kind of government we have seen here.

As for the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) who said, in effect, "Let us get on with this without spending any more time on it", I would say such an attitude is the trade mark of the socialist party which has been trying for years to construct a socialist heaven without any measure of success. They remind me of a contractor who builds a 60-storey apartment building starting from the sixtieth floor and trying to reach down to the foundation.

As I say, I am in favour of such a motion as this, but we have to look at it carefully. I support it for a number of reasons, many of which have been stated by hon. members who have spoken previously. But this does not mean we ought to sit idly by and let the measure pass without expressing certain concerns which we feel, or offering suggestions for dealing with the serious impediments which face the House or which would face any legislative body attempting to introduce a method of communicating its proceedings to the public through the electronic media.

The future is rife with difficulty. Many have suggested that this country is in trouble because all too often we have passed, too readily, ill-digested legislation without giving consideration to the consequences. Time and time again we have been obliged to introduce amendments in an attempt to make good what looks bad, to remove difficulties and make a bill or a project work. The hon. member asks us to pass this quickly and then, presumably, forget about its implications. Mr. Speaker, it is our responsibility to understand that this is a serious and important step which the House is being asked to take. I want to make sure that it works and that it is not left in the position of so many of the things we have done—things which were ineffective and which did nothing either for this House or for the people of Canada.

There are certain conditions we ought to consider. I hinted at some of them in the course of the remarks I made during the procedural argument. At the present time the House has a written Hansard based on a statute of the United Kingdom passed in 1840, and supplemented as to the rights of members, as to what they can say in the House, as to the right of the media to print or broadcast what we say, and as to the rights of the public. All too often the rights of the public are forgotten in debates of this kind. It is my intention, before I complete what I have to say, to affirm that the public has rights and that we would be delinquent in our duty if we failed to enjoin the committee which is to be established to take into account this consideration.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it five o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Lavoie)—Manpower; the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway)—External Affairs; the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn)—Government Administration.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Hon. members will have noticed that Bill No. C-210, in the name of the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway) has been appearing on the order paper since the opening of this session. It reached first place at an earlier date and was stood at the request of the government. There has been some agreement to proceed with the bill today, but before doing so the Chair must enter a caveat with respect to the procedural acceptability of the measure, since it provides for the establishment of classification boards after negotiation between the federal government and the provincial government for the control of obscene literature. In the opinion of the Chair, this would constitute a charge on public funds, something which can only be done through a minister putting forward a royal recommendation.

Hon. members are very much aware, I am sure, of Standing Order 62(1) and citations such as citation 243 of Beauchesne's which preclude hon. members from proceeding with money bills or bills with money recommendations unless there is a royal recommendation. This is a very strict restriction which is imposed upon private members who do not have the opportunity of reaching their representative of the Crown and seeking such recommendation. However, because of the understanding that we proceed today with this bill at the request of both sides of the House, having made this caveat I feel the debate should proceed on the merits of the bill, provided that before the question is put the Chair would invite hon. members to express their views so a decision on the procedural acceptability of the bill can be given.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, I shall not take very much of the time of the House at this point. May I simply thank Your Honour for your expression of concern as to the procedural point you have raised. I think it is advisable to proceed with the discussion during the hour that we have available to us at this time. Your Honour would, of course, have to reach a decision on the point you have raised before any vote could be taken.

May I just express to Your Honour and to the House, perhaps a little belatedly, my appreciation for the co-operation and consideration shown by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway) during the period before Christmas in helping us arrange the work of the House in regard to private members' hour. We did impose upon him at very short notice, and I should like to thank him for his co-operation at that time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All this being said, we will now proceed to the consideration of Bill C-210.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO MAKE IT AN OFFENCE TO SELL OR EXPOSE TO PUBLIC VIEW RESTRICTED LITERATURE

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk) moved that Bill C-210, to amend the Criminal Code (obscene literature), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, before getting into the principle of the bill I might say that my attitude to this matter is indicative of the co-operation that the official opposition always extends to the government so as to allow the government to proceed with its absolute right to govern and to bring forward legislation to the betterment and welfare of all Canadians.

We witness many problems of great magnitude in Canada today. We have economic problems, unemployment, housing problems, problems related to the handicapped, which we debated in this very chamber yesterday afternoon, and serious environmental problems such as the Garrison diversion project which affects Manitoba. But standing head and shoulders above all these is the problem of moral decay. Moral decay is an issue which transcends petty party differences. It goes to the very moral fibre of the nation and to the very heart of its people.

I realize that I face a dilemma here. It is a dilemma that has been debated in legislatures and parliaments for decades. The dilemma has to do with the separation of church and state; that is, separation of moral law and political reality. Some of the great questions which have been raised in this regard are as follows. Does the Christian church have the right to demand that state law be consistent with biblical law? Does the state have the right to enact law that allows or disallows actions that violate moral law? Does the state have the right to restrict the freedom of citizens—and by that I mean the right to impose censorship? Should the state allow absolute freedom when the freedom of one man becomes the bondage of another?

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that whatever else the duty of government might be, it at least has responsibility for placing in position laws which restrain those who would extend evil and corruption. It should put into place laws which encourage the doing of good and the application of love and justice. I maintain that any law which allows unrestricted distribution of anything which postulates obscenity is wrong, degrading and destructive of the very moral will of the nation. Those who support uncontrolled permissiveness in the name of individual freedom and liberty are, at best, nothing more than blatant moral anarchists.

From time to time statements have been made inside and outside legislative chambers that you cannot legislate morality. Sir, I suggest that you can. Martin Luther King once said that laws cannot change the hearts of men, but that laws can change the acions of the heartless.

I think it would be helpful if we took a look at the bill, and specifically at what the intent of the bill is. Essentially, this bill would set up classification boards in all provinces.

With regard to the point of order that has been raised, I think the intent of the bill makes it obvious that those who sit on such boards would be volunteers, non-salaried and hence not a burden on the treasury. Thus, no royal recommendation would be required. It would not involve the expenditure of any federal funds. As a matter of fact, in most provinces classification boards already exist, primarily to classify movies. These classifications are known by different terms in each province, but generally they range from general viewing, which is viewing for all, to restricted viewing, which would limit the audience to those of legal age, which is 18 years or over.

The boards to be set up by my bill would simply classify written literature, primarily magazines, and so on. These magazines or literature classified as restricted would not be permitted to be sold in outlets frequented by children, I have in mind the corner grocery store, such as Mac's Milk, the kind of store which kids run to in order to buy candy, or those visited by school children during the noon hour. It is in these kinds of places that I believe restricted material ought not to be sold.

It is a sad commentary on our times that anyone who speaks out against pornography runs the risk of being branded by those who defend freedom of expression. My ideas in this House have been branded as paramount to dictatorial censorship. Sir, I will not yield to such arguments. Basically, it appears to me that pornography, whether appearing in literature or on radio, television, in films or on the stage, can be handled in one of three ways. We can ignore the whole matter; we can attempt to legislate the objectionable matter out of existence; or we can try to achieve our goals through persuasion.

I have chosen to follow a democratic rather than a totalitarian response to any of these issues which affect us as a society. In a free society, legal restraints must be justified by an awareness of the harmful consequences that flow from the activities to be restrained. We have assumed that because pornography, or even reference to pornography, tends to shock, therefore the best kind of action is inaction. But citizenship in a society establishes a social contact with our fellow citizens. That contact is a very tender thing, capable of being affected by a great many different influences. It is built on trust and good will, a desire to work for the common good and to yield up rights for the sake of the rest.

We also hear the argument that the state has no business legislating morality, and I have already made reference to that. But, in fact, the state is doing it all the time, and simply because many people do not recognize or do not want to recognize the moral questions involved does not remove them: they are there. Take, for instance, the doctors and nurses who are constantly being pressured to participate in abortions against their conscience. Matters of morality are in fact here. They face us every day in this chamber. We make decisions in respect of them. In fact, in the western hemisphere, at least in Canada under the parliamentary system which is based on the Judea-Christian concept, moral decisions are faced daily.

There are reasons to believe that we should be concerned that the legal restraints have not been stringent enough. Widespread access to pornography constitutes a frontal attack against the family. Pornography of all kinds, whether it is in the form of magazines or other forms, seriously undermines the family. Pornography which becomes easily accessible to children is extremely damaging because of its power to stimulate impressionable minds. Numerous sociologists and their studies have warned us about awakening too early the sexual drives of children. I am not a sociologist. However, I know their conclusions, though often times I cannot understand how they arrive at them. I think it would be agreed among most Canadians, certainly among most parents, that they do not want their children exposed to the kind of obscenity found in almost every corner store.

I could name some by name, such as Penthouse, Playboy and Playgirl. You will understand that I cannot remember the others. I am speaking not from experience but only from memory. There are many. The contact in early childhood with this kind of magazine, this kind of postulation that the abnormal is normal and the immoral is moral, makes a deep impression upon the minds of children.

There are several aspects of pornography that directly attack the family, whether aimed at adults or children. Pornography is devastating in its effect on the family, and pornography represents one of the most exploited industries in North America. We ought to be concerned about pornography because it is so unselective. Consider the unselectivity of an influence that stares at your children every time they walk past drugstores, magazine stands or the kind of stores I mentioned earlier. Gambling, for instance, is restricted to adults. Alcohol is not sold to anyone under the age of 18 years. But magazines and books can be picked up by any child. The more readily accessible they are, the more likely their influence is going to be carried over to children's very impressionable minds.

We need, above all else in this contry, to recover a sense of right and wrong rooted in an awareness of God. We are fooling ourselves if we think we can resolve moral issues without an appeal to a Supreme Being. The underlying assumption within our law codes is the belief in the God of the Judea-Christian religion. This has given us the basis for moving in directions which we believe ultimately achieve some approximation of justice and righteousness within society.

I would like to argue in the strongest possible terms that ultimately our salvation, specifically in relation to pornography, will hinge on a deep sense of God and our accountability to him personally. Furthermore, we need to be persuaded that a bad moral environment for our children will eventually create the conditions for the destruction of the country and the society we cherish with such devotion. People are influenced by what they think others believe, and especially by what they believe is the common standard of the community, which I have called in time past the common standard of decency. Very few people come to their own basic beliefs entirely from their own reasoning, and most of us depend on stable public opinion to support our own moral opinions.

If obscenity can circulate freely within a community and no protests are made, people will come to the conclusion that public standards are changed or that there are no public standards at all. Furthermore, our personal moral values must be careful nurtured. Ethical sensitivity is a tender thing. It is the intuitive feeling of right and wrong, the finer feeling of conscience, of mercy and of sympathy. Such emotions in children are indispensable in support for moral judgment, and these finer feelings can be eroded and stunted by a steady stream of impressions which assault them.

Children confronted with pornography and obscenity can become desensitized. Their moral sense will have been eroded, and when they feel that no voice is raised against that which is pornographic and obscene, they come collectively to feel that moral standards have ceased to exist. A bad moral environment will promote evil in the same way that a good moral environment is generally thought to promote good. It works both ways. Our goal must be to help society to move toward a good moral environment.

In addition to what the bill recommends specifically, we should urge that governments at all levels closely examine the relationship of pornographic trade to crime; that is, the extent to which crime syndicates are involved in the sex trade and the extent to which crime is influenced by pornography. We should make an attempt to study the issue of pornography in the following terms: the intention of the writers; the use made of their work; the means used to advertise and sell their works; the context created for their work and the actual effects of their works upon consumers; from time to time have a review committee ascertain the moral content and determine whether it does, indeed, offend the morals and ethical sensitivity of a substantial portion of the community, and those which do can be withdrawn voluntarily by the distributor or face the possibility of prosecution in the courts.

To recapture the essence of the bill, I want again to emphasize that it does not attempt to redefine obscenity; it does not attempt to extend the definition of obscenity; it does not intend or attempt to legislate against or to prevent access to any written material except that which is already denied by the Criminal Code to all consenting adults. Those who want to buy it can do so.

Let me register this one personal caveat. Had I my choice, every Canadian would choose not to buy pornography, trash and that which makes normal the abnormal, and moral the immoral. I realize it is not my legislative right to legislate my morality on someone else. Neither is it their right to have access to any material, obscene or otherwise, that has or could have an adverse effect on children in particular.

This bill would, in fact, prevent the sale of restricted material once it was deemed to be restricted by classification boards. It would restrict that material and prevent it from being sold in outlets that are frequented by children. I believe that every member of this House could agree with and support this legislation. We are not in any way setting up censorship or moral standards. We are simply saying that until children become of age, let us not have them bombarded at every store with pornographic literature.

I hope that whoever answers from the government side will not stand in his place and say what the government cannot do or what it will not do. Parents from all parts of this country, from the east, the west, the north and the south, from every province and from every community, are waiting for action. This issue transcends party differences. The government and we members of parliament must act now. We have not the moral right to do otherwise.

Mr. J. Larry Condon (Middlesex-London-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, we have before us a bill which would add a new offence to the Criminal Code. It would make it an offence to expose material to minors which had previously been classified as restricted. Material would be classified as restricted by federal classification boards set up in each province. There is not one hon. member who would not applaud the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway) for the intent of this bill. If such a law were passed and later proved effective, we could all put aside at least some of our fears for the future morality of our children.

Let me ignore for the moment any strictly legal objection, because I for one am glad to have an opportunity to discuss the real question which I think is raised by this bill. I am sure most of us would agree that there is a great deal of literature available in magazine outlets, for example, which is not the kind of thing to which children should be exposed. I might say that some of this literature is the kind of thing to which even adults should not be exposed. In my view some of it is obscene, and I think there are hon. members on both sides of the House who feel the same way. However, it becomes more and more difficult every day to prove what is criminally obscene and what is not. Section 159 of the Criminal Code provides:

> any publication a dominant characteristic of which is the undue exploitation of sex, or of sex and any one or more of the following subjects, namely, crime, horror, cruelty and violence, shall be deemed to be obscene.

That seems pretty clear to me, and I would be very much surprised if my view of obscenity differs much from the view taken by the hon. member who proposed this bill. Yet, as I said before, criminal obscenity is difficult to prove. Why is that? I submit that Canadians as a whole do not agree about what is obscene and what is not. The Canadian community disagrees on the matter of obscenity, and this lack of strong consensus has great importance to the criminal law. I am concerned about obscenity, and I am equally concerned about the effect of so-called restricted literature on the morality of our youth. Therefore, I am concerned that our criminal law is not held in respect by the community as a whole, and particularly by that segment of our community which has little or no regard for the moral development of our children. It was in this spirit, I think, that the law reform commission said the following:

> We recommend that the Code should only prohibit acts generally considered seriously wrong enough to warrant the intervention of the criminal law.

The commission went on to say:

> Acts no longer so considered, acts whose wrongfulness is controversial . . . need special consideration.

Will someone object that the commission is recommending that the criminal law should have nothing to say about what most of us regard as moral offences? I do not think so. Quite the contrary. The commission seems to me to be saying, "It is not enough to have a criminal law full of high-sounding, empty words. We need a criminal law that works".

It seems to me that we must always be concerned about the effectiveness of the law, especially the criminal law. Do we want a Criminal Code which can be applied effectively, or do we want a criminal law which gives us some further false assurance that our children will not be subjected to restricted literature, even though the very provision of obscenity itself, a provision the meaning of which is clear to most of us, is contested by many and is very difficult to enforce?

There is hardly any limit to the definitions we could write into the Criminal Code. Only recently a lady in my constituency wrote to me to complain about what she called "some of the suggestive articles in Homemaker magazine." Homemaker's magazine, as I think it is more properly called, is delivered free and unsolicited to many suburban households. My correspondent took exception to an article in the October, 1976, issue of this magazine which extolled the virtues of adultery. I hope my constituent will forgive me for calling her "my correspondent". In any event, there was a great deal for the housewife to learn from reading the article in question.

According to a critical review in the Catholic Register written by Larry Henderson, the article declares that "affairs make you feel very feminine". I admit that it never before occurred to me in exactly that light, and I suppose there would be more than a few disgruntled but otherwise faithful housewives who might be swayed by the conclusion that "adultery benefits the husband." It seems that a little fling is just the thing, after the kids have gone to school, to inspire a good wife to prepare a good meal.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Condon: There can be no doubt, according to the article, that the husband "benefits in the long run". We are told—or, rather, the housewife is told—that there is nothing morally wrong in having an affair just so long as the good wife and mistress does not seek her fun with some malicious intent to destroy another marriage. What could be more malicious than to call one's lover at home, says the article, knowing that his wife will answer, and then burst into tears? Bad taste, to make such a scene. Morally wrong, without a doubt, goes the message. But if we believe what we read in Homemaker's magazine there can be nothing wrong with adultery itself. How, then, can we avoid the obvious conclusions which Mr. Henderson draws with tongue in cheek: the wife's lover must be the husband's best friend, and what every marriage needs is a little infidelity? According to my constituent, nevertheless, this sort of seductive trash is really pornography.

There can be no doubt that literature of this type is calculated to have an unsettling effect on the stability of countless shaky homes. Is there anyone here who would deny that anything which is designed to upset or undermine the basic family unit is deplorable? Not only, I suspect, would housewives be better off without such advice, but there is a strong argument to be made in favour of prohibiting the distribution of this kind of vicious nonsense. And we must remember that not only is this magazine available but it is delivered free of charge, and without subscription. Surely then the potential for harm is even greater and more widespread than with literature of any kind which is merely available. But what should we call this sort of thing in order to get rid of it? Can we call it pornography and wipe it away by writing it into the Criminal Code as a moral offence to distribute literature which has an undesirable effect upon the stability of the family unit?

I confess that, with all my sympathy for the feelings of my constituent, I would not have called it pornography. Yet as we all know from hard experience, the constituent is always right; and in cases of doubt like this one I turn to my trusty dictionary. Right there in my dictionary I find that the work pornography comes from a Greek word, porne, meaning harlot. And what is more, pornography can be defined as the description of the manners of a harlot.

Are we not talking about harlots when we speak of adultery? Is pornography, then, after all, such a far-fetched term for literature which encourages infidelity in a Christian society? Should we then not also add pornography to the Criminal Code?

Surely, Mr. Speaker, anyone who thinks that the addition of yet another refinement of obscenity would spare the helpless housewife from exposure to this "Housewrecker's Magazine"—as I would prefer to call it—surely anyone who thinks so is mistaken and naive.

What then, Mr. Speaker, do we have before us? We have a bill which is designed to add to the moral offences presently in the Criminal Code. We have a bill which is going to expand upon the definition of obscenity, a definition with which many well-meaning, but misguided, Canadians already take exception. It will not work, Mr. Speaker. It will not do what it is proposed to do. That is why we look for alternative means of accomplishing the same purposes.

Criminal law is not the only means by which we can attempt to remove the worst elements of moral decay. There are other weapons we can use. Among these other weapons I might mention the customs tariff which prohibits the importation of literature that is indecent or immoral. And I am sure that others will raise the very important legal objections to this bill.

How can we create classification boards, for instance, while the Supreme Court of Canada is ruling upon the jurisdiction of the provinces in a matter of morality? How can we accept a bill which does not at least provide for proper representation from all parties to alleged offences? These, Mr. Speaker, are objections deserving the most serious consideration. They are by no means frivolous. But it is my opinion that they are not the only objections which should carry weight in this debate.

We have before us, as I said at the outset, a bill which would increase the scope of the Criminal Code. But we need to be concerned, Mr. Speaker, with increasing the strength of that code. If the effect of this bill would be to weaken our criminal law—and I believe it would—we should reject it because we are convinced that it would not be effective.

We should not be unduly concerned that someone will misconstrue our purpose. We do not condone the kind of thing which this bill is intended to prohibit. We condemn it. But we must be determined to find a solution which promises to work and which promises to win the respect of the Canadian community as a whole.

Section 159(2) of the Criminal Code reads:

> Every one commits an offence who knowingly, without lawful justification or excuse, sells, exposes to public view or has in his possession for such a purpose, any obscene written matter, picture, model, phonograph record or other thing whatsoever.

Forgive me for wondering if the hon. member for Selkirk has been to a newsstand lately. Can he pretend that this provision against what we might call hard core pornography is successfully enforced? I doubt that he would say that. And if he would, I certainly would not.

Now we are being asked to subdivide obscene matter into what amounts to hard core and soft core pornography, and to add a few words to the Criminal Code which would also make it an offence to peddle the soft core variety in any outlet frequented by persons who are, or appear to be, under the age of 18 years. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that there are not many magazine outlets in this country which are not frequented by persons of such a tender age. And if our present definition of and provision against obscenity are poorly enforced, how can we hope for better results from writing into the Criminal Code more words to the same effect?

There must be better ways of removing this filth from the reach of our children. I am inclined to support the initiatives of the Most Reverend Philip Pocock, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Toronto, who has urged decent citizens to speak out and to register their concern where it will be most effective. In a paid advertisement in the Toronto Star of December 3, Archbishop Pocock called upon concerned people "to refrain from patronizing" what he called "these publications, theatres, and places of business which encourage the pornographic."

He asked every decent citizen to walk up to his neighbourhood confectionery, theatre, or newsstand and to tell the proprietor what he thinks about the merchandise on display. And he suggested we boycott the magazine outlet or theatre which refuses to comply with our own moral standards—the standards of most patrons. He said:

> I ask their support in affirming what is positive and wholesome in the media and (in) publicly opposing what is not. I urge them to pray for decency in the community and the country.

Ernest Howse, in the Toronto Star of December 11, commented on Archbishop Pocock's action as follows:

> He has suggested a practical method of making public opinion effective. It is that concerned people individually make their feelings known to the purveyors of pornography, and refrain from patronizing their establishments. Bookstores might have to make the choice of no pornography or only pornography. To handle the stuff might cost more than its worth.

The individual proprietor, Mr. Speaker, cannot be allowed to go on thinking that his concern for the moral development of children in his own neighbourhood can be less than for his own family. He cannot be allowed any longer to consider himself an upstanding and upright member of his community if he is responsible for supplying his community and his neighbours' children with obscene literature.

There is nothing more to be feared than the righteous wrath of an outraged populace. Let those who are intent upon the perversion of our children beware of the collective judgment of the society in which they market their wares. And let every decent citizen be aware of his own power and his own duty to make his feelings known at the point of sale.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I cannot support this bill only because I am convinced that it will not do what it is intended to do. It will not effectively prevent the distribution of obscene materials of a restricted nature, as they are termed in this bill.

Even the present law cannot work properly because public opinion is divided on the meaning of obscenity and, indeed, on the need to keep anything from the eyes and ears of our children. If anyone doubts this, let him turn to the Globe and Mail of January 5, this year, which, to the everlasting disgrace of that newspaper, wrote:

> We fear the licence to produce pornographic material far less than we fear the licence to control it.

Hollower words were never written.

But there are too many—far too many Canadians who have been seduced by the "Playboy" philosophy of "use them and lose them"—far too many to allow us to think that a few more words in the Criminal Code can substitute for the individual and collective action of the decent majority. I will finish by saying it is our obligation to remind the people peddling this filth that they are part of our society and have an obligation to their own children as well as to ours.

● (1740)

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South): Mr. Speaker, let me begin by congratulating the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway) for bringing forward this bill. As a concerned parent I support it. It is most heartwarming to find that people in this country are thinking of the good of all our children, of the good of Canadian children as a whole. The bill is timely. I wish it had been brought forward in December, to coincide with the beginning of Archbishop Pocock's campaign. Unfortunately such was not the case. However, I am happy to tell the hon. member for Selkirk that the campaign which began in Toronto at the beginning of December is succeeding and its success is growing by the day. The participants do not include only Catholics and those of known religious affiliations. Noted atheists are also participating. The question is, what will happen in future?

Like my colleague on this side of the House, I think that one of the difficulties concerns our own tax and tariff laws. Allow me to quote part of a letter dated September 29, 1976, which originated from the office of the Minister of National Revenue (Miss Bégin). Knowing and admiring the minister as I do, I know she did not write the letter itself. Obviously it was written by a bureaucrat. It reads in part:

> We have endeavoured to follow the standards of the community at large and as a result, these standards of acceptance for publications entering Canada have become much more liberal over the past few years.

The author of the letter confused "liberal" with "libertine". I happen to be proudly liberal, but am decidedly not a libertine.

After receipt of this letter, and following the campaign to which my colleague on this side referred, on December 10 a letter and a parcel were sent to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford). I hope that by now this material has reached the minister's desk. The parcel contains samples of pornographic material collected throughout metro Toronto. I have not seen these samples but am told they would make your hair stand on end. When the minister sees the material he will know what the hon. member for Selkirk and concerned parents are talking about.

According to an article in yesterday's Globe and Mail, written by Dick Beddoes, if I am not mistaken, Toronto City Council has set up a task force to study pornography in Toronto. Growing concern is being expressed in Toronto about the tremendous proliferation of this filth and about its effects on children especially.

The hon. member for Selkirk worried in case people confused morality with law. I ask him not to worry. As Aristotle once said, legislators make the citizens good by forming habits in them. I suggest that some of the habits we are allowing our citizens to form are not making them good citizens. I suggest that we should concentrate very much more on what is being imported into the country.

Barbara Ward, whose views have influenced our people recently, and I am thinking particularly of what she said at the Habitat conference in Vancouver, has spoken of the basic needs of humanity which include shelter, food and so on. She has also spoken of our psychic needs. In several of her books she has spoken of the spiritual needs of humanity—which brings me back to our children. Certainly, we can give them food, shelter, vitamins to make sure they grow healthy and meet their physical needs. The question is, how concerned are we about their spiritual environment?

One hears much these days about freedom of speech, freedom of the press and the freedom of this and that—you name it. Let us not confuse freedom with licence.

Speaking as a concerned parent, I want my children to be free to enter the local supermarket without being subjected to the sensational splash of pornographic literature. Over-exposure to obscenity tends to lead to insensitivity. We become used to obscenity and accept it as normal.

Finally, I want to speak unashamedly as a female member of parliament. As a woman, I very much resent pornography.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Appolloni: It exploits my sisters, whoever and wherever they are. As we have tried to say for centuries—perhaps people will now listen to our message—the time has come for women to take their place side by side with men, as human beings. We do not want to be considered because of our physical assets. Women want to be considered only as human beings. They want to be valued as human beings, not because they are more or less beautiful than anybody else.

Mr. Yewchuk: Question. You are talking the bill out.

Mrs. Appolloni: I am talking on behalf of womanhood. Let me add, as a woman and concerned parent, that I do not want my male children, either, to be exploited. For a long time women only were exploited, but now males are being exploited as well. One hears of children aged eight and nine years old being exploited in New York, of their bodies being used to gratify some pervert.

Do we want our children to be subjected to this? It is happening to little boys as well as to little girls.

Mr. Yewchuk: Don't talk the bill out.

Mrs. Appolloni: I want my sons to grow up in freedom and human dignity. I want them to be valued not because they are different or bigger than anybody else, but because they are human beings. That is what I mean by human dignity.

Having said that, I congratulate again the hon. member for Selkirk on bringing forward the bill we are discussing.

Mr. Joe Flynn (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I agree wholeheartedly with the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway), as does everybody else in this House.

Mr. Yewchuk: Let's vote, then.

Mr. Flynn: We must make it evident that we are all against pornography and obscenity. I think there is no doubt about it. Referring to the dictionary for a definition, my colleague spoke, I think, about a harlot. I think women would suggest that in the present case the morals of a pimp are more to the point than the morals of a harlot. As Archbishop Pocock said, when we talk about the "Playboy" sexuality and philosophy we are talking about something which uses and discards our bodies in a way which does not lead to freedom but, rather, to enslavement. It trivializes and dehumanizes that which is meant to be precious and deeply personal.

Archbishop Pocock struck a really vital chord in setting out on what appeared to be his lone campaign against pornography and obscenity. However, he has done it in such a way that he has captured the imagination of not only the citizens of Toronto but of the whole nation who now want to begin a serious fight against obscenity. He has done it in such a way that we are now taking full cognizance of what is happening in the daily newspapers. We are looking at the ads for motion pictures and the fun pages of the newspapers, and realizing what is happening.

There is a problem that is associated with this Bill C-210. It proposes federal classification boards in each province to determine whether any matter submitted to them constitutes an obscene matter within Section 159-8 of the Criminal Code.

The Supreme Court of Canada is scheduled to hear a case emanating from the province of Nova Scotia. It deals with the matter of whether provincial classification boards ultra vires come within the legislative branch of criminal law which is exclusive to the Government of Canada. The traditional position taken by provincial governments has been that it is part of civil rights and therefore within the exclusive legislative capacity of provincial legislatures.

Since this matter is to be decided by the Supreme Court of Canada, it would be premature at this time to establish federal classification boards, albeit run by the provinces, before the court has determined whether the provincial boards are unconstitutional.

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, first let me commend the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway) for bringing this timely issue to our attention. I think all members will agree that obscene literature and its proliferation should be the subject of grave concern and, I might add, action.

The purpose of this bill, as set forth in the explanatory notes, is to set up classification boards to deal with the far too heavy traffic in obscene pornographic material. There are two basic premises of this bill. The first is that local regulatory bodies would set standards acceptable to their communities. It is the local input which must be considered as a serious and legitimate counterweight to those who argue that by restricting the availability of such material we also restrict civil liberties. Since we live in a democracy, Mr. Speaker, and we rule by the majority opinion, we must follow the rules the majority sets down whether they are to our personal liking or not. In this case, by setting up local boards we shall have a group that is representative of its local citizens in its opinions. The majority's civil rights will be protected.

Professor Ian Hunter of the University of Western Ontario addressed himself to this point in his article "Obscenity, Pornography and Law Reform." He recommends that any law reforms with respect to pornographic or obscene material must take into account "contemporary community standards." The hon. member's bill is certainly a step in that direction.

Professor Hunter also suggests that there must exist a means to protect people from being involuntarily exposed to obscene or pornographic material. This is the second premise of this bill. More specifically the hon. member calls for prohibition against displaying obscene material for acquisition by persons under 18 years of age.

I do not think that it is news to any member of this House that there is an increasing sentiment against pornographic magazine displays being placed in easy view of children. One only has to peruse the "Letters to the Editor columns" in most newspapers to find outraged parents. It seems that many of their children cannot go into local grocery stores without being assaulted by a barrage of obscene literature. The Ontario attorney general, Roy McMurtry, has many times expressed concern, and I quote:

> —that glossy full-colour magazines of hard core pornography, once available only under the counter or in a few adult book outlets, are now being peddled openly in some neighbourhood variety stores in full view of children.

From April 1 to May 8, 1976, Metropolitan Toronto police laid more than 24 charges involving 50 magazines. These came as responses to numerous public complaints. Inspector Robert Stirling of the Metro Toronto police morality squad said in May that he was receiving increasing numbers of complaints from people who appeared to be incensed and aggressive about pornography on the magazine racks.

It has often been said that selling pornographic material is a victimless crime. I think that is nonsense. The proliferation of sado-masochistic and anti-human material is bound to have an effect on children and even adults shaping their attitudes toward members of the opposite sex. Certainly this cannot go unremedied.

Archbishop Philip Pocock expressed his concern over the issue by publishing an "open letter of concern" in Toronto papers on December 3, 1976. The Archbishop denounced pornography "as gravely wrong". He said parents should talk to store owners, that they can make it very clear that they do not want this material sold to children, and that if it is necessary to carry "adult" publications that they be placed out of sight of both young people and the vast majority of adults who do not wish to see them.

The United States has set up "adult book-shops" where persons under a specified age are not permitted to enter. These also ensure that the majority of disinterested adults do not wander into an obscene bookstore accidentally. By using this method we could avoid both censorship and also involuntary exposure. Certainly it is worth considering.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

BROADCASTING OF HOUSE AND COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen:

> That this House approves the radio and television broadcasting of its proceedings and of the proceedings of its committees on the basis of principles similar to those which govern the publication of the printed official reports of debates; and
> That a special committee, consisting of Mr. Speaker and seven other members to be named at a later date, be appointed to supervise the implementation of this resolution.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to be back here before this large and attentive audience to deal with a very important subject. Before the witching hour of the dinner recess I had been dealing with some of the comments made by the hon. member for Saint-Jacques (Mr. Guilbault) and the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman). I thought I had, in a non-partisan way, answered the arguments they made. I also indicated that I personally favour a proposition which would permit this House to broadcast radio and television transmissions of its proceedings, but I expressed certain doubts and filed a verbal caveat.

I should like now to enlarge on that caveat and some of the things which lead me to believe we have to be very careful as we move into these uncharted waters filled with shallows and shoals and rocks. There are areas of difficulty which I shall leave to colleagues on both sides of the House because I feel that there is a general consensus among those who support this motion as to some of these dangers. Certain of them concern the mechanical problems, the technical problems. I give credit to the officials of the House and to the representatives of the networks who have examined these things and come up with a number of ideas. I trust the committee set up to consider these matters will examine with greatest care and the most scrupulous anxiety the nature and extent of these technical problems.

There is the question of who shall be in final control, the question of who shall bear ultimate responsibility. I do not think it can be us. We might well have to retain the power we now have, the power, not to censor, of course, but the power to urge that there should be a balance, that when the proceedings of this House are broadcast through the electronic media the reporting should be reasonably balanced. I do not expect it will be possible to reach perfection, just as there is not perfection today in the reports of the proceedings of the House. I do hope, however, that there will be understanding shown as to the distinction between factual news and editorializing or comment. The media and others are, of course, entitled to editorialize. They are entitled to comment. But if they are to do justice to their profession and the heavy responsibility they bear they should make it clear that there is a distinction, one which at times is not observed today.

The media do have a responsibility. They are a very important part of the parliamentary structure with an obligation to make known to the public what goes on here, and in the legislatures, and, of course, in the other place. In doing that they must bear in mind that theirs is not just a living, it is a responsibility which they must observe, and it is one that is not always observed. I do not suggest they are any better than we, or that they are any worse. We make our errors, mistakes and misjudgments, and so do members of the media who will have this responsibility.

I think it was a very witty European who said some time ago that members of the press have great power without responsibility which, over the centuries, has been the prerogative of the prostitute. That may not necessarily be applicable here, but I want to emphasize very strongly, and I do it without in any way being disparaging or unfair, that we will be looking to them, as will the public, to see that what comes out of this House through the electronic media is a fair and reasonable reflection of what goes on in parliament.

Under the conditions which prevail in so many of the democratic countries today, in Canada, and in the United States which has been through a very traumatic period, in the United Kingdom and many countries in Europe, the whole democratic parliamentary process is on trial and the press, as part of that process, is just as much on trial as we are. If the system, the method, and the functioning of different parts of the mechanism are to survive, all of us must bear that in mind. That is not to say that if we fail what we have here will suddenly pass out of existence, but its effectiveness and its usefulness to act as machinery to translate the wishes, the desires, the rights and the needs of the public by the rules under which we govern ourselves, will pass, and God knows what will take its place, but it will not be as good as this. We have a responsibility and so does the press. Therefore I hope when the time comes for implementing this the press will bear that in mind, and my view is that it will.

My caveat has another application. As I indicated during the course of the argument on the point of order, Mr. Speaker, you can search all you want through all the statutes and all the standing orders and you will find nothing in legislative form in the laws of this country which deals with the publication of our debates, or which deals with the problems that may arise because of the publication of those debates. This is a long, difficult history which goes back to the very famous case of Stockdale v. Hansard.

In the last century when the firm of Hansard was engaged to write and publish the reports and debates in the United Kingdom, a man named Stockdale felt he had been aggrieved and brought a proceeding against Hansard. He secured a judgment and attempted by a writ of execution to make good that judgment. The House of Commons in the United Kingdom of that day said no, he could not do this. It said the members had the right, the duty and obligation, going back to a specific section of the Bill of Rights of 1689, to speak in the House without fear of impeachment, challenge of prosecution, and also had the right to have such words reasonably well and accurately published.

The courts held to the contrary and a judgment was awarded against the Hansard firm. The court sent bailiffs and sheriffs to execute that judgment, and the parliament of that day, with some considerable courage, more than most parliaments would have today, seized the sheriffs and put them in jail, so there was no way by which that judgment could be implemented. As a result there was some discussion in that happy way the British have, and it was resolved in 1840 by the passage of what is known as the Parliamentary Papers Act which provides that there should be a reproduction and publication of the proceedings of the House, and as long as this is done under the authority of the House and under the instructions of Mr. Speaker, what appears in those documents, the Hansard of England and the Hansard of Canada, represents the official publication, and what is said in them cannot be the subject of action. It is on the extension of that law to Canada that the same rights prevail here.

That is all very well, Mr. Speaker, when it comes to the writing of Hansard, but this affects a number of people. If a newspaper publishes or republishes what is said in Hansard and garbles it in some way, there is a right of a member of the public who feels that he or she has been improperly dealt with to bring an action. There is then the defence available to the newspaper of saying that it was a fair comment about what was said in this House, and, it being fair and reasonable, that constitutes a good defence.

Through you, Mr. Speaker, I would ask members of this House to bear in mind that this was restricted to a comparatively small group of people. What happens in this age of the instant electronic media? Perhaps one of my colleagues might say that so and so is a thief, a liar and a scoundrel. Under the practice which exists today we can make comments such as that with no one to answer to but our own consciences and the belief that we may be speaking the truth. But if we go outside and speak out, subject to what I may say later, there may be a chance for an action then.

Let me point out, Mr. Speaker, the infinite damage and irreparable injury that may be done to some member of the public against whom an accusation is made, perhaps an improper and unjust accusation, in this House, free from the liability of prosecution, challenge or civil suit when instantly such an accusation reaches millions of people across Canada. We know in the profession in which we are engaged how long it takes the truth to catch up to the lie, if it is a lie. Under those circumstances what will be the remedies and where do we stand? What will be the position of members of this House who make statements of that kind?

The rights in the Parliamentary Papers Act of 1840 probably will not apply to what we say here, so what will be the rights of members of the public and what will be the rights of the media which is the conduit pipe through which is conducted these statements? What about the likelihood of republication? A statement made today would travel instantly across Canada and may reappear as a clipping in a Sunday week end paper. This is a very difficult and important problem.

Let me suggest, Mr. Speaker, that every country, particularly those which are under the parliamentary system, that has seen fit to introduce the use of the electronic media has found it essential to pass legislation, which is why the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) found it necessary to bring forward this particular issue.

I am convinced that the committee which will be set up under the chairmanship of Mr. Speaker will probably have no alternative but to come back to this House and ask that there be legislation passed to deal with this problem. That will not be easy.

People have talked a lot about the constitution, but very few know that in Section 18 of the British North America Act there is a provision which provides:

> The privileges, immunities, and powers to be held, enjoyed and exercised by the . . . House of Commons . . . shall be such as are from time to time defined by Act of the Parliament of Canada, but so that any Act of the Parliament of Canada defining such privileges, immunities, and powers shall not confer any privileges, immunities, or powers exceeding those at the passing of such Act held, enjoyed, and exercised by the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom—

● (2020)

There is a constitutional problem to consider here. I may be wrong, and some of my colleagues may know better than I, but I doubt whether there has been a constitutional case to decide the extent to which this parliament may legislate on privileges, immunities and powers which exceed those held by the parliament of the United Kingdom. That is a point which we will have to consider, so you can see, Mr. Speaker, that there was a pretty good reason for the members of this party to say: "Yes, many of us approve of the idea, but watch out and take care, there are problems". Certainly this is one of them.

I hope that the committee established under Mr. Speaker will permit access by members of this House. I am sure that it will. Mr. Speaker is a democratic person. He is the First Commoner. He has an obligation, and I think that he and his committee will be obligated to permit the members of this House to examine issues of this kind and to make representations. Although at the moment under the rules there is no provision for the committee to come back, I hope that they will.

Even so, there are problems beyond this. What is a proceeding of parliament? We have had cases on this. There was the case where Steve Roman sued the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the then minister of energy, who is now Senator Greene, for some millions of dollars arising out of a dispute regarding the sale of Denison Mines. Certain statement were made in the House of Commons by the Prime Minister and Senator Greene to the effect that the government would not tolerate an arrangement by which Denison Mines would sell to a foreign country. Subsequently the Prime Minister and Senator Greene went outside the House in the sense that they sent telegrams and made statements which carried into publication the things that they had said in the House. They were sued by Mr. Roman of Denison Mines, and the case went as far as the Court of Appeal of Ontario on several issues, one of the issues being whether what was said in the House could be extended outside the House and still constitute a proceeding in parliament.

Then we had a case not long ago where the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) made a statement about certain judges. A law case followed and went to the Supreme Court of Quebec. The judges in that province came to quite the opposite decision from the one arrived at by the Ontario judges, and so that issue remains to be decided. The Supreme Court of one province made one decision; the Supreme Court of another made another decision. I think that has to be settled before we proceed.

Then what about proceedings in committee? One hon. member talked today of the necessity of doing things to preserve confederation. I think there has been a lot of mawkish sentimentality about loving your neighbours and loving Quebec. That is not the issue. You treat the people of Quebec as you would treat people in other parts of this country. However, I think it would be very useful for the committees of this House to visit the various parts of this country and demonstrate the capacity of this parliament for dealing with major issues. These committees should be properly seized of jurisdiction on major issues.

Take the case of a committee sitting in the city of Montreal, just as the immigration committee sat in Windsor and elsewhere. That committee experienced obstruction; there were instances of people who challenged members of the committee. Imagine a committee sitting outside this parliament and an altercation arises between a member of the committee and a witness or a member of the public. Certain statements are made which normally would be slanderous under the laws of that particular province. If its proceedings are broadcast under the authority of the proposal we are making, then is it a proceeding in parliament and are those people protected? What are the rights of members of the public who might think that they are libelled or slandered? I suggest it would be highly improper for this House to leave this issue without members giving an injunction to the government and to the committee which will be studying this matter to give this issue a tremendous amount of examination.

I close with another caveat, Mr. Speaker. Today we heard some discussion in the House about a certain black list. This was dealt with yesterday when the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), in introducing this motion, said as reported at page 2297 of Hansard,

> Clearly, broadcasting will influence these functions. It will inform Canadians about what the government is doing—

And then again:

> Parliament represents the people: and one of its prime responsibilities is to inform the people.

That is, of course, correct and I agree with it, but it is not the case today. Parliament is not being informed, the media are not being informed and the public are not being informed. Despite the fact that by far the greatest number of members of the House are keen, intelligent, good people, in many respects because of the inhibitions placed upon us by the rules and the extent to which we have been seduced in our capacity to exercise responsibility—a seduction during which we relaxed and enjoyed—there is not in this House a capacity to exercise that jurisdiction which we should exercise. We are not able to challenge the government. We are not able to compel the government to produce in detailed form information about its expenditures.

The last two Auditors General have said publicly not only that expenditures have passed beyond the control of parliament but they have passed beyond the control of the government. Is this the kind of thing that the people of Canada will see when they watch television or listen on radio to the proceedings of this House or its committees—a lot of zombies who are incapable, despite their anxiety, of exercising the jurisdiction that they should?

[Mr. Baldwin.]

I suggest that before the year or year and a half—whatever it is—passes when we have completed all our studies, this parliament should have a freedom of information bill. This House should reform its proceedings so that members of the House are active, creative, able to challenge the government, and with a greater degree of independence and objectivity on the part of members of the House, particularly on the part of members on the government side. I know what it is like to be on the government side. I sat over there when we had 205 members, and it is not easy.

If this House is to operate properly and if parliament is to do the job it is responsible for doing, independence and objectivity must be a very substantial part of our duties. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that all of these things must be taken into account.

The mere fact that tonight, tomorrow, or some time we will quite glibly pass this motion does not mean that we can leave the matter there. We have a very definite responsibility to ensure that when we do come to broadcast the proceedings of this House the public of Canada will see a parliament that is functional, operative, active, and with powers and responsibilities equivalent to its duties. If that is not the case, then in my opinion all that will happen through the passage of this motion is that we will be accelerating by a substantial period of time the demise of the system of democracy under which we function.

Miss Coline Campbell (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I find myself in some difficulty in speaking on the resolution before the House this evening; however I would not like to take too much time in this debate.

I fully agree that Canadians should have the opportunity to see and hear what is being done on their behalf in the House of Commons. Bringing parliament to Canadians is a noble goal and should enhance public participation in the parliamentary process. I am, however, concerned as to what we are doing, and I would like to take this opportunity to register my concerns. The cost is only an estimated cost. I can see many other priorities for putting these large sums to better use, especially when one thinks of the number of people who will actually watch the sittings, and I stress the words "actually watch".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Campbell: Certainly the reporters will be able to talk over the pictures so that the press will still be interpreting the proceedings. In short, there is no assurance in the motion before us that we will get a better coverage of the proceedings of the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Campbell: The television facilities in my area leave much to be desired at any time. We do not have full CBC coverage in some areas in my riding. In other areas there is no ATV coverage, and in most areas cable TV is still non-existent in Nova Scotia. At present the CBC does not have a regional desk for feedback to the maritimes on matters which might interest the people there. We must make a hit with the national reporters in order to get back east on CBC. If the reporter is not aware of the problem, it falls dead.

This money could be better spent on improving TV service in such areas as mine. Certainly if the area I represent does not get coverage on the CBC, we will not get it with edited tapes. Televising the proceedings of the House would make sense if we were to slot it in a network each day at a set time.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, why bring TV in when it will not benefit all of the people? In particular I have in mind a part of the country such as mine. Let me just explain to the House that in some parts of my constituency we get radio and TV from another province. These are only radio and TV stations affiliated to the CBC. We do not get any forecasts in that area or any of the other items which relate to the area. The CBC coverage from Halifax is minor and in most areas in my constituency nonexistent.

I am not opposed to the use of TV in the House. In fact it is one of the best methods of accurate reporting because the people can see for themselves what is happening. In my opinion, based on a study of the motion, a daily serial will not provide it, and someone will still be able to edit the taping and feed it to the networks. If it is a question of records, the records can still be kept by the existing system of Hansard and tapes. If it is a question of education, schools and universities are not at present knocking on doors to obtain copies of Hansard so as to understand the parliamentary process better, nor will they use videotape because they lack the necessary facility to use it, particularly in my area.

If we must have TV to provide additional information on committee and House sittings, why not leave this process to the existing broadcasting networks, as they are the ones who will make the decision under this motion as to whether or not they will use the tapes of the proceedings of a committee or a House sitting? Therefore they should cover the expense of implementing this service. This method would not only reach more people but would be less costly insofar as capital and operating costs are concerned, because networks are only interested in televising what is of interest to the people.

Any one wishing the written word, could obtain a copy of Hansard which could and should be more widely distributed to schools, libraries and individuals. Perhaps the allocation of Hansard copies to members of parliament should be increased to see if it would become a best seller.

I do not see how this resolution will educate the public. The daily workload of a member of parliament involves not only attendance in the House of Commons but committee work—which may not interest a reporter—and constituency matters. These latter two are only of interest to the constituents of the individual member of parliament.

In my opinion members will have to posture for the TV, yet may never be seen across Canada. This will waste more of the time of the House of Commons. Think of the members speaking on the same point in one debate. Our House rules leave a lot to be desired and are the cause of much wasted time. In my opinion televising the proceedings of the House will not increase public information on how decisions are made. Decisions are often made outside the House and outside committees.

However, one area which might be improved by full TV coverage is the rules of the House. Certainly the people of Canada would not put up with this type of debate for very long.

I am not opposed to the substance of this resolution, Mr. Speaker. However, I am concerned about its timing and its cost, as well as the lack of interest of the general public. I am equally concerned about the fact that the House of Commons should remain the focal point of public concern at the federal level and that the ministry should be held accountable to the House on a daily basis.

I agree that modern mass communication and the increased role played by the government in the lives of ordinary people make it necessary for ministers and other prominent members of the House to be seen regularly on television. But I do not like the decline in interest and in the reporting of what has been said in the House. What we see or hear is what has been re-enacted in the corridors, or personally interpreted by a reporter.

I am not opposed to TV in the House or in committees but it should be seen unedited on a daily channel. All committees should be given an opportunity to be seen unedited. As all members know, committee work is very important, yet if committee proceedings were to be edited, most people would be deprived of the area of debate which interests them. Indeed, I hold that communication between this House and its electors is the most important function of a private member of parliament and is essential to the functioning of ministers. I have communicated to my own constituents the events that take place here—a central point in the few years that I have spent here.

All that having been said, I would like to say that this House has much practical work before it at this time on bills whose passage will be as important to the people of Canada in the short term, such as the unemployment legislation, income tax amendments, and the long-awaited human rights legislation, as may be the ultimate installation of television facilities in the long-term.

Of course I would not want my concerns to affect adversely the considered view of the House on a matter in which partisan considerations have no place. I did, however, want to state for the record the concerns I have about this resolution as it relates to the people I represent, and the inadequacy of the existing TV facilities which they have to put up with. I do not feel that the public is fully aware of exactly what we are about to do here and I believe that most people in my constituency will not benefit from this resolution.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, to my mind, the speech we have just heard expresses the dilemma which faces many members of the House because of this motion which touches upon the right of members but which however should not give rise to a partisan debate. However, this afternoon the hon. member for Saint-Jacques (Mr. Guilbault) made a particularly violent speech which was nothing more than peanut politics because he was proposing certain points of view to the official opposition as a party. Now, he has just heard a speech from one of his own colleagues who expressed as well as possible points of view which I entirely share.

I also have heard the Minister of Communications (Mrs. Sauvé), the hon. member for Ahuntsic, give us a fairly naive speech as the hon. member for Saint-Jacques did this afternoon; so I heard that we are going to witness a change in the communication of the Parliament of Canada; but we simply hear about the House of Commons; nothing is said about the Senate. The Senate is a part of the Parliament of Canada and I want the government members to be very careful, because, to my mind, two-thirds of them do not know "in entirety" what I have here in my hand . . .

Mr. Roy (Laval): Entirely . . .

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): What do you mean: Entirely or "entirety", because this is a report? Nobody takes care of the crows on the back fence! What they can say can be summed up in just a few words. Mr. Speaker, a committee of the House has presented a report a little more than four years ago; it was presided over by a member which had much more experience than some of those who are shouting at this very moment and who, quite frankly, I know very well, know nothing entirely—"in entirety" if they want—about the report which I have here. It is a report signed by the former member for Grenville-Carleton, now Justice Gordon Blair, setting out all problems related to this issue, and several of my colleagues have raised some, but I know very well that government members, even some members of my own party elected after the 1972 election and also some who have a lot of experience, have not read this report. And I must say that the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp) former leader in the House . . .

An hon. Member: The Postmaster General.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): . . . the Postmaster General (Mr. Blais) and others who support this resolution without any reservation, with enthousiasm, have not read this report. It is not an old report, it has not been out very long, and . . .

Mr. Roy (Laval): The word "entièreté" is not in the Larousse dictionary!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): All right. You are correcting me and the next time you speak English I shall correct you. Several of my colleagues here now are French speaking, that is why I express myself in French. If my French is imperfect, I apologize. Perhaps that is one thing they do not do when they speak English.

[English]

Having said that, I suggest that before this House resumes tomorrow afternoon, hon. members should read the pertinent parts of the recommendations of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization in 1972.

My colleague, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), raised the matter of libel and the privileges of members of this House, and I heard people up in the press gallery and others say "poo, poo to the privileges of members", but the funniest thing is that those simpletons—many of them are being simpletons in this matter—ignore the question of the extension of the laws of libel with regard to members, with regard to interpreters, and with regard also to those who publish. They ignore that, but in Britain, for instance, the decision as to whether they should televise their proceedings or not has been a very serious matter. They have decided not to do so. Years ago in Australia a special amendment had to be passed to the laws governing libel in order to protect broadcasting by radio.

Let me say right away that if we had protection similar to that which is outlined in this report, for those who wish to read it, I would have no hesitation in suggesting that radio stations take a feed from our loudspeaker system tomorrow, if it were adequate. There are, however, technical changes which would have to be made to this system in order to bring it up to broadcasting quality. There would be no problems, provided there is protection under the laws of libel for everyone concerned, not just for ourselves but also for the public. But no, these people say, "Full speed ahead, and damn the torpedoes." They are not even thinking about this, yet the committee, under one of those distinguished members, raised it.

I would like to refer hon. members to page 4, column 27, paragraphs 103, 104 and 105. I will read certain excerpts. In paragraph 103 it says:

> On the evidence and advice available to your Committee it is not therefore clear what protection would be available under existing laws to members of Parliament, to broadcasters of parliamentary proceedings, to interpreters of such proceedings, to witnesses giving evidence before parliamentary committees, and to others involved in or affected by parliamentary broadcasting.

In paragraph 104 it says:

> It seems, therefore, that there would be a need for Federal legislation to protect Members, broadcasters, interpreters and others.

I will read from paragraph 105 as follows:

> As a number of legal uncertainties seem to exist the House might well consider the desirability of passing a special Act if an affirmative decision were taken with regard to the broadcasting of its proceedings. Prior to the drafting of such an Act it would appear desirable that the law officers of the Crown should study the complexities and implications of this question.

There is not one tittle of evidence that that has been done, yet the government has come forward with this motion, and hon. members opposite and on this side of the House have swallowed the bait, hook, line and sinker. They want to go ahead, in the face of this considered opinion of a committee of this House, unread by the majority of members, who do not seem to give a damn.

I continue reading:

> On the basis of the evidence available to your Committee, however, it seems that the Act might reasonably include the following provisions:

(a) The extension of the protection of absolute privilege to Members of Parliament and Senators when speeches delivered in the Chamber or in a committee are transmitted by means of radio and television.

(b) The protection of the broadcasters of parliamentary proceedings by absolute privilege if they are employed by Parliament at times when they are discharging their duties under the authority of Parliament.

(c) The protection of other broadcasters of parliamentary proceedings by qualified privilege, thus placing them on the same footing as the press.

(d) The protection by absolute privilege of those involved in the simultaneous interpretation of parliamentary proceedings in either House or in a committee.

(e) The extension of the protection of absolute privilege to witnesses giving evidence before a parliamentary committee when their evidence is broadcast.

(f) The protection by absolute privilege of all parliamentary employees who might in any way be involved in the broadcasting of parliamentary proceedings when acting under the direct instructions of either House of Parliament or their committees.

Anyone with a sense of fairness who reads something like this would, I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, say that we go ahead at our peril and not only peril to members but to our staffs in this House. If some members of the press gallery were awake to the problems involved—some of the pundits in that gang or in that group—I will be a little more polite—and were not so conscious of their public image or potential public image and the role they think they might play in some future series of programs which they imagine will be like "Mr. Smith Goes to Washington" or "Quentin Durgens, M.P.", they would realize this.

It seemed to be implicit in the remarks of members who have spoken in this debate and others who have spoken to me privately that the proceedings of this House will appear on the networks across the country like one's wife's favourite soap opera—"Edge of Night" or the "Dilemma of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt)"!

Mrs. Holt: What is my dilemma?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I do not know what the hon. member's dilemma might be; that is what we would have to find out.

I must confess, Mr. Speaker, that I found some confusion between the thinking of the Chair and that of the hon. member for Saint-Jacques (Mr. Guilbault) who spoke afterwards. Members on the government side and the Parliamentary Secrétary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Goodale) talked about extraneous matters in the resolution being a temporary or experimental installation, but the hon. member for Saint-Jacques said that is the way it has to go to get it in. The Chair, unfortunately, considered that to be an element of difficulty in the amendment put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). It was strange to see that dichotomy in thinking. What is this going to include? If we are going to have radio on a continuous basis—which I think we can have and which the committee in 1972 was quite prepared to have—hon. members should read the comments of those members of the press gallery who were invited to comment at a number of sessions with regard to the quality of the broadcasting and reproductability of our sound system, and they would see there was no hesitation with regard to broadcasting by radio providing we took precautions with regard to the law of libel. Then comes the question about television.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. Fleming) spoke of the great number of countries in which proceedings are televised. Let him read the report. I can add some details, Mr. Speaker. In Australia they have radio only; they would not touch television with a barge pole. In England they have gone on radio on an experimental basis just recently. They would not touch television with a barge pole except for ceremonial occasions such as the opening of parliament, which we have as well. Just in case somebody was impressed by the United States, let me tell them that television is not permitted in the Senate and House of Representatives except on the occasion of visits by the President, the presentation of the budget, and the annual State of the Nation message. In the Senate committees, under rule 11 they can decide whether they wish to have it.

Members of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization of which Mr. Blair, now Mr. Justice Blair, was chairman—and I do not think the report suffered any detraction because I was vice-chairman—visited Washington and sat in on their foreign relations committee. That was a three ring circus if I ever saw one and the American Senators were the first to admit it.

The late Senator Fulbright, who was chairman of the foreign relations committee, was opposed to the Vietnam war and wanted to score some points against the administration in 1971-72. He called committee hearings to talk over this thing with someone from the Department of State and we saw Senator Fulbright make a 10 or 15 minute statement which was very partisan. He was chairman of the committee but he was leading with his own point of view so that it was on record for the American public. Various Democratic and Republican Senators took certain points of view and then they discussed the whole question with their witness.

Off to one side were a number of TV cameras with lights. At times the Senators asked that the lights be turned off because it was so hot. Still photographs were also allowed. As hon. members know, in the United States committee rooms there is a sort of curved table where members of the committee sit. At some distance is the witness table where counsel and assistants to the witnesses sit. Around there, crawling on their backs or their bellies like an assortment of snakes, were the photographers. They were trying to get angle shots either of the witnesses or of one of the Senators. Of course all the time there was the clicking of lights. I suggest that a three-ring circus would have been tame compared with that performance.

To those who have in mind the television coverage in European parliaments I will say that all their committees are in camera, every single one of them, and I include France, Germany, Denmark, Holland, and Sweden.

An hon. Member: Surely not Sweden.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): They are all held in camera. Actually the public is not even admitted to their committee meetings.

Mrs. Holt: Are they not free in Sweden?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The hon. lady from Vancouver-Kingsway surely will not say that Sweden is not as free a country as this country. If the hon. lady goes to Sweden she will see how their television system works. The cameras focus on the member speaking. Every member has to speak from a rostrum, and the television is used mostly for internal communication. On the television screen one sees a picture of the member's head and shoulders.

Mrs. Holt: That's enough, isn't it?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That would suit the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway and all those who read their speeches in this House. We would not see them bending over their texts and looking down.

Mrs. Holt: I do not do that. I am working on my constituents' mail, see?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The members speaking are up on a rostrum. I have seen them, in Germany and Holland.

An hon. Member: But they allow television.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Yes, they allow television. I will tell you what the minister of information in Holland, and the Speaker told me. Yes, television is used, but it is under the control of the minister of information. They said, "We do not televise everything, only important debates, such as constitutional issues affecting the succession to the throne." It is possible that as a result of the Lockheed scandal and subsequent investigations involving certain loyal personages, certain other debates either have been or will be televised. However, outside of that, there is little television coverage.

Let us not be under the delusion that ours is a closed world. It is not. Somebody said that the public has the right to know. Well, there is an absolutely untramelled, unfettered press which does its best, sometimes more, sometimes less, to report the proceedings of this House and of our committees. There are difficulties; there are not enough reporters to cover all our committees, not when you have the nonsense of 17 committees starting out of the gate at some time, on Tuesdays or Thursdays. Do hon. members think that all our committee proceedings will be covered by television? The idea is nonsense.

I will finish my point by pleading with hon. members opposite not to close their minds on this subject. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway will have much to explain to her constituents, depending on how she votes.

Mrs. Holt: I explain lots of things to my constituents. They understand.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): There will be lots of explaining to do, Mr. Speaker.

Mrs. Holt: That's all right. My constituents are intelligent.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The report before me should be compulsory reading for every member of the House. The President of the Privy Council should read it three times and the former president of the privy council, why, he should read it four times.

Mr. McKenzie: He isn't sharp enough.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Hon. members should read another report, as well. We were told that the installation of broadcasting facilities will cost some $3.5 million, more than likely $4.5 million, by way of capital expenditure.

Mr. McKenzie: And we are now in a time of restraint.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Yes. I want to let hon. members opposite know about certain important decisions which have been taken and some of the recommendations which have been made about the building in which we now sit. They have failed to listen to their members who participated on the Management and Members' Services Committee. I am not telling tales out of school, as it were, when I say that after the 1978 election another 18 members will be joining this Chamber, and do members know where they are going to sit? They are to sit against the walls at the far end, and near the walls at the end of the Chamber close to my seat, and there will not be any way to cover them with television. Perhaps those in the corner at the far end can be covered by a camera from this end.

Parliament made the conscious decision to expand its membership during the next election. Then, after the next round of redistribution, it is expected that the membership of this House will rise to 300 members, in which case our present seats will need to be moved forward and another row of seats installed at the back. Possibly it may be necessary to remove the curtains, do away with the gangways at the back and utilize the space for desks. Shall we hang them from the ceilings or do as they do in the British House, have some seats in some of the galleries? Hon. members must face this prospect.

An hon. Member: Burn the building down and build a new one.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): An hon. member suggests we should burn down this building and build a new one. It might be necessary.

Mr. Speaker, I remind hon. members of a scandal which took place some years ago involving the Bonaventure. That carrier was sent for a refit, at a very great price; but no sooner had she been refitted than she was scrapped.

I tell you that within the next five years this building is slated for a major refit. The plumbing, wiring, and many other facilities which make this building viable have to be renewed. The East Block is being renewed now and will serve as a swing building for the Senate. The Metropolitan Life building has been acquired and will serve as a swing building, for offices of members. The Parliament Buildings on the House of Commons side as well as on the Senate will have to be refitted within the next ten years. And what will happen to all the capital equipment which will have been installed? We have an idea of the cost of the equipment which is to be installed; so I say that we are in for another Bonaventure affair. The money will go down the blessed drain, or at least a good portion of it.

Let me now say a word about the role of the committee over which Mr. Speaker is to preside and which is to supervise the implementation of the motion. The argument I made this afternoon which, with the greatest respect, nobody has countered so far, is that the committee, in its supervisory role, shall not and must not act as a sidewalk superintendent. It will need to come back to this House with recommendations regarding the law of libel and with other recommendations concerning technical problems of implementation arising because of the expansion of the membership of this Chamber. It will also have to come back with recommendations involving, as I said previously, the refit of this building. That is why the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton was so important.

All these problems in committee might have to come back to this House. Remember, Mr. Speaker, the facilities in this House affect hon. members. This does not affect the expertise of the administration of government. This affects hon. members here and in the Senate. Who is going to consult members of the Senate?

This committee on the basis of this resolution as it now stands will be able to do whatever it wants. Being a special committee under Mr. Speaker, what will be the position of hon. members who wish to make representation to that committee or appear on that committee and speak? The amendment proposed the House procedure committee which has always been open to every member of this House. Members can appear and speak. They can even be put on the committee. However, with a special committee under Mr. Speaker charged with this one task, you might as well butt your head against a brick wall. Hon. members may not have any input unless there is some extraordinary position taken by the chairman of the committee.

That might change. I am not going to close the door on that. However, I can well see where the whole proceedings with regard to the televising and broadcasting from this House, insofar as members are concerned, if this motion passes may be a closed book.

As far as televising is concerned, one can always do special events. One can twist the arm of the CBC and CTV to bring their mobile units here. If the new president of the United States were to reciprocate the visit of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), we could have a reproduction of an address to the joint Houses of this parliament. However, we do not need a resolution like this for that purpose.

By the end of two years, and it will require two years, we will have an expenditure which will top $5 million. It is estimated by the President of the Privy Council that the operating expenses will only be $900,000 a year. What rosy glasses has he been looking through? Let him look through the transcripts of evidence before the committee in 1972. He will see that his projections are away out. It was going to cost nearly that then.

Remember, Mr. Speaker, this envisages a staff for the House. It does not mean that the networks will come in. There will need to be an additional staff of nine, ten, or maybe a dozen people. There will have to be a collection of technicians. There will be producers. This staff will work stated hours as they do in the broadcasting business. Just watch.

In 1972 we were told that a producer's minimum scale of pay was $25,000 a year. The parliamentary secretary shakes his head. That view was from the broadcast industry. They said that was what was required to pay these people. The hon. member can shake his head, but let him read and be instructed. I would say that the salaries now and in the future will be considerably higher. Not only do we need a producer, but an assistant producer, and then another assistant producer—backups all the way.

I am laying down in what I think are realistic terms what it will cost, and what will be the implications of this program. The House is going to make up its mind. However, no one outside my colleagues, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, has dared talk about the costs and other implications.

I raised another point this afternoon. Who on earth is going to carry this stuff that comes out of here and for how much? Do you know what happens in the province of Alberta today? With a great deal of fanfare, television was introduced into that House in 1971. There are only six members of the opposition. They are in the corner. There is a great gap on the side behind them. There on a platform sits one camera from which the media take clips. However, the camera faces only the cabinet. All it shows of members of the opposition is their backs and receding hairlines. There is no way that a statement by the Leader of the opposition can be put on camera.

Members from Nova Scotia know about the noble experiment conducted there. Neither the legislators nor the public want any part of it. In Saskatchewan there is radio. In Queen's Park television came in this year. Does anyone ever see private members on there? For how many minutes a day are there clips in either the national or the local news? There is nothing, but nothing, on cable.

The hon. member for Saint-Jacques said this material could be distributed on cable. Who is going to pay for it? Are we going to be part of a production of some brewery, automobile dealer, furniture salesman, K-Tel records, or what have you?

The hon. member for Saint-Jacques suggested this could be done on an experimental basis in the Ottawa-Hull area. What? For $5 million on an experimental basis it will be seen by the population of Ottawa and Hull, possibly Montreal a little later, and then a bit further? What about the constituents of my colleague from Prince Edward Island? The people there have an equal stake. What about Fraser Valley or Sault Ste. Marie?

A few moments ago the hon. member of South Western Nova (Miss Campbell) said, and I will paraphrase, that the benefits to her people would be less than zilch. If we go into this program, the benefits should extend to the people of Canada as a whole. That cannot be done on the basis of television without some examination of all costs, not only of production but of distribution.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will terminate. I think the hon. lady from Vancouver-Kingsway should read some of the polls and surveys that have been taken in her city with regard to televising the proceedings in this House. I should like to know just what her reaction might be. Without being personal, I imagine that the hon. lady feels that as a former newspaperwoman—and maybe she still is one—she is a communicator. I should like to have her considered views with regard to how much effect there could be to the people who are going to pay the shot to see, possibly, two or three minutes a day, at most, ten minutes a day in all networks, on all stations, of clips, again subject to editors, of the media, the same as presently applies—and some days we win and some days we don't, but I think that by and large there is reasonably fair reporting.

● (2120)

It will not change. The scrum will not change one iota. Because of the concentrated nature of the question period, only a few people can really participate. Answers are incomplete. Sometimes they are incomplete because the minister is not fully aware of the situation at the moment. I know very well, from past experience, that between the end of the question period and getting down to the scrum, executive assistants come forward and brief the minister anew. We get a sudden change in answers then. This is an old game and it won't change one iota.

In those legislatures where they presently do have television cameras, has anyone consulted provincial cabinet ministers as to the effect? Has anyone consulted leading members of the opposition with regard to the scrum? The scrum is there. I only wish we had better facilities for it, that we had decent interviewing rooms. I would vote right now, if we had an item in the estimates, that we spend a million dollars for the complete reconfection and refitting of the interviewing rooms, not only for ministers but for other members. That is a slave quarter down there. Working conditions are way less than satisfactory. But, no, we shall spend between $3 million and $5 million installing fancy cameras around this place, but the working conditions for those in the press gallery who have to go down there will remain unchanged. In fact some time ago I had to protest to the Management Services Committee that the fire regulations there were not being observed.

Talk about mixed up priorities! If there is to be television here, let us first have a full examination of the technical aspects recommended by the committee four years ago. There are some real problems which have to be investigated. The committee under the chairmanship of Mr. Speaker—we are not going to see this come about in a short while.

I have canvassed this question and I hope I have laid before the House what I believe this is going to cost, and what is likely to be its effectiveness—and how little it is going to accomplish in the end. If the House, in its considered wisdom, wants to go ahead with it, fine. Hon. members will explain themselves to the public on that score.

I agree with those who say we should pay more attention to bringing about some rule changes. The hon. whip on the government side along with other members, including myself and some of my colleagues, laboured mightily last year to bring in some sensible changes. But there has been a deadly silence on the government side. We cannot even get the motion to enable us to go back to work. I recall that when the President of the Privy Council was previously in that office we had some good rule changes to propose. I was chairman of the committee for one whole session, and there was not one reference. This House was denied an opportunity to work on its rules, and at the present time we are still being denied an opportunity to have this committee do its work. And that is deliberate.

I think the sense of priority is wrong. But if the House intends to vote in favour of this resolution, all right. It will have to put its money where its mouth has been.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the chance to join in this debate, if only briefly, for two specific reasons, first, because I am an unabashed and enthusiastic supporter of the resolution and, second, because as a former working member of the press in the electronic media in Saskatchewan I believe that the introduction of radio and television in terms of active, live coverage of this Chamber will yield positive results for parliament, for the effective functioning of our representative system of democracy, and ultimately for the people of Canada in terms of open, accessible, and accountable government.

Mr. Alexander: Oh!

Mr. Goodale: Yesterday opposition spokesmen said our system was already an open one and implied that television was an unnecessary frill which would merely provide illustrations of the functioning of this open institution. That is all very well in theory, I suppose, and perhaps it is a logical conclusion for members who are either in or near to the national capital to draw. But for those of us who come from areas far from the national capital and whose constituents seldom, if ever, have the opportunity to visit this city, the issue of an open parliament—not merely an illustrated one but a truly open one—takes on a special importance. Television is one way to provide that kind of open and accessible parliament to Canadians who live, for example, two thousand miles away in Assiniboia, Saskatchewan, and I think this is an important consideration.

Why should the proceedings of this House be broadcast and telecast? What would be gained? Most of the merits have already been summarized by the government House leader, by the Minister of Communications (Mrs. Sauvé) and by her former parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for York West (Mr. Fleming), as well as by others in the course of this debate.

Through this proposal we shall develop an electronic Hansard which will be a unique and innovative archival tool complementary to the printed record which is presently the only record available of the proceedings here. Further, it will be a useful educational tool for scholars and for regular use in schools and universities to assist in a realistic way in explaining what this institution is all about. I do not share the skepticism of my hon. friend from South Western Nova as to the usefulness of this instrument as an educational tool.

In this latter connection, it will—in itself—help to alleviate the concern which some members have expressed as a basis of their argument against the resolution. Some have complained, for example, that the public is not knowledgeable enough and insufficiently aware of parliamentary idiosyncracies to be able to make a rational judgment about what they would be viewing. If that is a valid criticism,—and I am not sure that it is, but if it is—as some across the way have suggested, then surely the only way to counteract that lack of information and understanding is through readily accessible educational tools such as an electronic Hansard.

In addition, I believe that an electronic Hansard which this particular resolution would provide us with would be a very useful informational tool for the media and others. We have just heard some discussion on this subject by my hon. friend from Edmonton West, and I should like to deal with the matter for a very brief moment.

At the present time, except for the customary broadcasting of ceremonial events such as the opening of parliament, the electronic media, namely, radio and television, are barred from active live coverage of the proceedings of the House of Commons. As a weak and often inaccurate substitute for direct access to the House, once an announcement, speech or debate has taken place here the radio and television reporters literally have to scramble to catch the main participants outside the Chamber so as to have them in some small way repeat or re-enact what happened inside so that the reporters can get it on tape or film. The result is sometimes a frantic and occasionally unruly crush of people, with lights, cameras, tape recorders and other paraphernalia in the halls of the Parliament Buildings, and all too often there can inadvertently be serious omissions, distortions or misinterpretations of what has been said or done inside the Chamber. Surely some of these problems could be alleviated by providing live coverage of Commons activities in the first place.

There are a great many other advantages to this particular proposal which I should like to take some time to describe in detail in the House. Many of them have been mentioned in passing and briefly by others in the course of our discussion in the last two days. Some have raised concerns, for example, about the cost, or about possible disruption of established parliamentary procedures, or about this vague notion of trivialization which some are worried about. Some are worried about the technical problems that may arise. Some are concerned about the question of rights and immunities of members. To all of these points of concern I think there are valid and full answers. Many of them have been given in the course of this debate by those speaking in support of the resolution; many will be found in the committee reports that preceded our debate in this House.

I hope that the expression of the kinds of concerns that we have heard does not represent a fear of progress or essentially a mistrust of the ability of the public to understand the workings of parliament, or indeed a worry or mistrust about parliament itself. We may need technical tests. We may need further examination by the committee, which this resolution proposes, to see how the facilities will work. But surely we do not need further examinations, studies and tests of our own courage to appear before the Canadian people. I would hope that the merits of this resolution will commend themselves to all members this evening, and that before the clock reaches ten o'clock I hope we can in fact see this resolution adopted by the House and very quickly see parliament in a very real sense brought to the Canadian people via television.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak very briefly in this debate, or perhaps "debate" is too strong a word for what has been a very useful discussion in the past couple of days with respect to an important change to the procedures of this House and its committees. It has already been indicated by previous speakers that we are not, in a sense, dealing with new subject matter. The motion itself has been before this House for well over a year now. Prior to that there was a considerable period of time in which both a special committee of this House as well as individual members considered at length the implication of giving broadcasting access to the House and its committees.

As I was preparing to make a few remarks this evening I flipped back through some of the previous pages of Hansard and realized that it was almost ten years ago to the day, on February 10, 1967, that I made a strong and impassioned plea for the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House and its committees. I do not know whether that makes me somewhat of a senior citizen with respect to advocating this particular subject matter, but I would just like to quote briefly—I know it is not good form to do so—what I said on February 10, 1967, as reported at page 12919 of Hansard, I said:

> One of the things that has continued to concern me very much about this whole question is the fact that we have invoked in our political processes and parliamentary activity a kind of discrimination that I think would not be tolerated for one moment in any other sphere of human activity.

Then I went on to relate the double standard that existed in the House and its committees whereby those who serve the print media have had for many years now full access to the open forums of the House and its committees, yet when it came to radio and television another standard prevailed. In arguing ten years ago for a freer access, I said, and again I quote:

> So I speak out for a new understanding of the nature and uses of mass media and ask that they not be used to expose for purposes of power or popularity any individual in this House or outside it, but to create a more genuine, a more thoughtful and a more purposeful dialogue between our activity in the House and the thoughts and desires of the nation.

I believe that that particular passage has stood the test of time perhaps better than other things that I have said in the intervening period, but certainly I have not faltered in my essential commitment to the idea that there is a basic principle at stake here. Indeed, for those who have some difficulty in accepting the principle—I know that all of us, even myself, are concerned at the serious implications here—there is a particular irony, I think, in reflecting upon the access of television and radio to the House and its committees because we are a most unusual country. We are of such massive geographic proportion in relationship to the people who inhabit this country, and the very fact is that in order for people to understand what is happening in the various parts of the country we do rely in a vital way upon the mass media.

We are not essentially drawn together in one or two centres of the kind that exist in many European and other countries. Although there are some major centres we are, in a way, a ribbon of population extending from coast to coast. There is a certain irony in that in the sense that many other nations have already introduced broadcasting access, and now we are finally taking the plunge.

In addition, it is obvious that in recent years one of the chief problems we have faced in this country is that of understanding and communication. Yet the very subject matter that is before us this evening is, in effect, whether or not we can improve the communications that take place not only between members of this House but between those of us who are here as representatives of our various electoral districts and the people who sent us here to represent them.

Therefore I believe there is a fundamental principle at stake. It is a fundamental principle in terms of the right of access on the part of all citizens in this country, no matter where they live, or what their particular state or condition may be.

I agree with those who have suggested that parliament will be affected by the introduction of a more comprehensive mass media. But I am not one of those who think that the impact of that will necessarily be bad. While there may be problems—indeed, I am sure there will be problems that we will have to work out in the coming months—I think that the possibilities and opportunities that are offered are quite significant and positive in terms of improving and updating our parliamentary system and making it more relevant.

But if it is true that the parliamentary process will be altered, it is also true, I think, that the media itself will be affected. I have been somewhat intrigued by the ambivalent attitude that the media have taken on this issue. Some of us here are critical from time to time of the responsibility or the accountability that exists in regard to the mass media. I think it is true to say that if there is to be a change of situation for members of parliament, there will also be a change of situation for those who are reporters, journalists and editorialists, realizing that there is another avenue of communication through the forums of parliamentary discussion in this House or its several committees.

That, Mr. Speaker, brings me to my central point, that parliament is, after all, something very special in our traditions and heritage. It is not the government, as has been clearly enunciated on previous occasions. It is a unique institution, as the word "parliament" suggests, where a special kind of talk takes place, a talk that does not involve the use of swords, as was the case with our ancestors, but a talk that attempts to test and validate the performance of government and its ideas, and their service to the nation itself. Therefore I think if we believe in that kind of elevated talk of what parliament is meant to provide, this should certainly find its place within the over-all mass media, not on an indirect basis, which has been the case and as has been mentioned by others, but on a direct basis. I am not saying we will immediately like everything we see as a result of television and radio access to this House and its committees, but I think the principle and the possibilities are well worth our support.

There are other things that, if I were to take more time, I might wish to say, but I think it would be more important, because, as has been indicated, this is a matter that has been before members not only for months but for years, that we in effect achieve some measure of consensus on this issue and then move on to many of the important issues facing us in this particular session of parliament.

I have been informed that from consultations and in discussions that have taken place between House leaders, as a result of an earlier motion that was put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), there is a general wish now, as indicated by Your Honour's earlier comments, to be open to a motion that I hope will find general acceptance with hon. members this evening. I would like to put it forward at this time, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn), as follows:

> That the motion be amended by changing the period after the words "of this resolution" to a comma, and adding thereafter the following:
> "and in particular
> (1) to examine the existing cost and technical studies of building, equipment, personnel and other requirements consequent upon the introduction of radio and television broadcasting of the House of Commons and its committees,

(2) to examine the possible effect of broadcasting on the rights and immunities of members of the House and the rights and protections due to the public, and

(3) to consider whether a period of trial broadcasting, or the broadcasting of special proceedings and debates of the House, would assist in the development of permanent facilities and procedures; and

That the committee be authorized to issue such reports on the above as will, in its opinion, facilitate the implementation of this resolution.

I would move this in the hope that it would accommodate the several positions and concerns that have been put forward in order that we can satisfactorily achieve what I think all members hope to achieve through the passing of this particular resolution, and that is that we make this parliament an even more responsible and accountable institution than it has been to date.

I think no member of this House would be prepared to say that all aspects of our present parliamentary system are perfect or could not in many instances be improved or made more relevant to the needs and concerns of the Canadian people generally. If, by taking the measure that is advocated in the resolution proposed by the government House leader, in addition to the words of the amendment I put forward a moment ago, we can achieve that end, then we will have served this parliament and our people extremely well.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The House has heard the amendment to the motion proposed by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald). Is the House ready for the question on the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. MacDonald (Egmont)) agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The question is now on the main motion as amended. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion as amended?

Some hon. Members: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I declare the motion carried on division.

Motion (Mr. MacEachen), as amended, agreed to on division.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Could the government House leader enlighten us as to what the government business of the House might be for tomorrow?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I propose to call the metric conversion bill because of the necessity of having it in effect for the convenience of the grain trade by February 1. Following that I hope to take up the Income Tax Act.

Adjournment Debate

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise merely to suggest that since we have done a fairly good day's work and at least two of the late show performers are here we might now call it ten o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Hon. members have heard the suggestion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—GARRISON DIVERSION—REASON FOR ACCEPTING DELAY OF REPORT OF INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION WITHOUT MORATORIUM ON CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, on December 15 last I asked a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) which appears at page 2032 of Hansard for that date as follows:

Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is really supplementary to the question asked by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris regarding the Garrison diversion. My question is this: why, why, why, why would the government ... of Canada agree to the extension of the IJC report on the Garrison diversion without asking for a guarantee of a moratorium on construction?

The minister told me that this required an answer much more extensive than he could supply during the question period, and undertook to give me a comprehensive answer in written form. I received that written answer on December 21.

To understand this you have to get it into perspective. The Garrison diversion project is a multi-million dollar project which could adversely affect the entire Red River system, including all of Lake Winnipeg. This is a project which is now a decade old, a project that this year in the United States alone will cost that government some $23.5 million. It is a project that in itself will reach three quarters of a billion dollars. It is a project which has been a source of debate, counter debate, facts and counter facts. It has been the subject of months of investigation by the IJC. This is the scope of the problem and, in essense, the scope of my question, yet I received back from the minister his comprehensive answer consisting of one and a half pages indicating why the government of Canada has not acted to protect the interests of Manitoba.

I recognize fully the absolute right of the government to govern, making decisions concerning international relations and international agreements such as the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909. I believe that should be so and that the government should have the benefit of making those decisions but, Sir, it reflects nothing less than an act of criminality and neglect when the government fails to act.

If it is true that the government has the absolute right to govern, it also follows that members of the opposition have the absolute right of scrutiny, the absolute right to ask questions and to suggest alternatives.

With reference to the Garrison Diversion project I and many of my colleagues, including the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie), the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith), the hon. member for Portage (Mr. Masniuk), and other colleagues from the NDP, have made suggestions to the government regarding how it should approach the U.S. in this matter. We have not only resorted to suggestions and requests, but we have begged. I myself have stood in the Chamber and have begged and pleaded that the government do what it is supposed to do, that is, to act primarily to protect the interests of Manitobans.

We have not suggested nor have we pleaded for irresponsible action by the government. Even before I was a member of the House my colleagues from Manitoba were suggesting that the government ask the U.S. government for a moratorium on construction, for the matter to be referred to the International Joint Commission to let them arbitrate it and, once they brought in their recommendations, only then should the construction proceed. That is reasonable and normal. Only two and one half years ago we were asking for that, but the government was silent.

Then at the eleventh hour there was a crisis reaction from the government. After years of pleading, the government decided last October to write to the United States government on the eve of a change in administration, on the eve of a presidential election in the U.S. At that time this government asked the President of the United States if he would consider a moratorium on construction. It did so when the project was 40 per cent completed and when the devastating results were there for everyone to see.

Proving everything I say to be true, the IJC report, which was tabled no more than a month ago, bears out our worst fears with regard to the Garrison Diversion project. The report states that the implications on the waterflow are far greater than was anticipated. Now this afternoon in this Chamber I rose to my feet, and in the absence of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I put my question to the Minister of State without Portfolio (Mr. Guay), from Manitoba. I asked him whether during the visit that the Prime Minister will make to Washington he will discuss the critical Garrison Diversion project with the U.S. authorities. The minister answered that he does not know and that he will look into the matter. He said the government has been vitally concerned with this matter for years. That is the problem with this government. Its members say they are concerned. They had the mandate to act, but they did nothing.

[Mr. Whiteway.]

I say to you, Sir, that if this government and if the Minister of State without Portfolio do not request the Prime Minister of this country to raise the matter with President Carter as a matter of priority and urgency, the minister will have no other choice than to resign, and the government of Canada, which was elected with a mandate to act, will have reneged and forfeited its right to govern. If they cannot govern and they do not know how to step aside, we are ready and able to take over.

Mr. Fernand E. Leblanc (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all I think it is important to point out that the minister without portfolio from Manitoba, the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay), has gone very deep into this issue and made many representations to his colleagues, particularly to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The government as well has been very concerned about protecting Canada and Manitoba particularly. I hope to be able to answer in a precise and appropriate way in the short time I have to go into this issue. This point was raised for the first time by the hon. member on December 15, and on that occasion the Secretary of State for External Affairs told him that it was impossible to answer such a question during the question period. The question raised by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway) on December 15 was as follows:

> Why did the government of Canada agree to the extension of the IJC report on the Garrison diversion without asking for a guarantee of a moratorium on construction?

In a letter dated October 12, 1976, the government of Canada asked the government of the United States to postpone all the work and decisions concerning the construction of the Lonetree reservoir until the report from the commission had been received and subsequent consultations between the two governments had been held. In my opinion, this constitutes a request for a moratorium on construction, such as the hon. member requested.

In a letter dated August 5, 1976, the International Joint Commission explained that the delay in the publication of its report was due to the fact that the Garrison Diversion Study Office had not yet completed the report that it was to submit to the commission. The office was unable to meet its August target date mainly because it had to provide an in-depth and knowledgeable evaluation of available data concerning water quality and also guarantee their reliability. These data from the basis for the forecast concerning the eventual effects of the project on the quality of the Souris and Red Rivers in Canada. The governments of Canada and the United States have obviously understood the need for the commission to have at its disposal accurate data concerning water quality to help in the preparation of its final report.

They have also recognized the validity of the other main explanation given by the commission, that is that the population of both countries must be given enough time to study the report of the Garrison Diversion Study Office before holding public hearings on this subject. I should perhaps emphasize at this point that one of the main considerations that motivated the Canadian-American reference of the Garrison Diversion Project to the IJC was based on the fact that the International Joint Commission is an independent and impartial agency which has always submitted positive recommendations to both governments. Having said this, the commission was given important terms of reference according to which it was asked to make all the recommendations that it judged necessary to ensure compliance with the provisions of section IV of the Boundary Waters Treaty. In the last analysis, the IJC therefore had to determine—

MANPOWER—REQUEST FOR PRECISE DATE OF APPLICATION OF PROVISION OF BILL C-69

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out this evening that on December 20, 1975, this Parliament passed legislation, namely Bill C-69 amending the Unemployment Insurance Act. The unemployment insurance allowances paid to 65 year-old individuals were immediately cut. Afterwards I asked a question to the minister concerning one of my constituents who during the period in which he had received allowances had suffered a heart attack. I imagine he had not chosen that time to have it. Of course I had telephone and personal contacts with the Unemployment Insurance Office, more especially with the one at 2020 University Street in Montreal, an office where I hope the minister could launch an investigation because it has given rise to many problems even if few of my constituents deal with that office.

I phoned that office to explain the facts. I was told: The legislation came into effect on July 4, 1976. Reference was made to section 25(b). I again brought up the matter in the House and was told the same thing. Having made some inquiries, a letter which I received from the minister confirmed that section 25(b) was indeed in effect since January and not July. But that was not enough. Section 29(5) was referred to and the whole issue was confused in such a way as to prevent the beneficiary of my constituency from receiving his allowances. I asked the minister's office to provide complete data concerning that beneficiary. When did he become unemployed? How many allowances did he receive? When I phoned the departmental office during the summer, that is on September 21, 1976, I was told: He was entitled to 25 weeks' benefits. He was paid until March 1976 and he took sick after the initial period. I am told he should be paid. I would not want to create any confusion, because it was the secretary to the minister's assistant who anwered my questions but she said that he should have been paid until June 1976. What I find strange about all this is that in one paragraph of a letter dated December 7, 1976, which I have here in my hand, I am told that the person was declared ineligible for unemployment benefits from March 19, 1976 because, according to the act, he could not work. That reflects section 25(b) of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. Speaker, far be it from me to blame the minister or the parliamentary secretary, but I want to say that to us, members of parliament, whether we voted for or against a bill, the thing that matters is that the majority wins in our system. That act was passed on December 20, 1975, and then we are told: Very well, but such and such a paragraph comes into effect on such and such a date. Let no one come and tell me that an act passed by parliament on December 20, 1975 contains sections to be applied only as of July 1976. As for the members of parliament, I want to say once and for all that we should be able to give new purpose to our role. What do we do in this House?

Throughout that administration we are told: For the old people, the cut is immediate; there is no administrative problem. But on the other hand, in other sectors, cuts are put off because it is more advantageous. Personally, I find that illogical, Mr. Speaker. That is why I have asked for this discussion tonight with the minister who is probably busy, I realize that. So, his parliamentary secretary is in the House, and I am grateful for that.

However, among the other letters dated January 20, 1977, there is one dated December 23, 1976. They even contain inconsistencies. I feel that it is sheer madness in the case of this stevedore who, at a certain time during his unemployment insurance eligibility period, became ill, and all of a sudden, they refer sometimes to one section of the act, at other times to another. The situation is about the same in about every other darn area. One day, parliament will have to make up its mind. If it does not, something may happen which will certainly not be interesting.

That is the fundamental issue not only for my constituent, but for the reassessment of the function of elected representatives in the House of Commons. If we adopt a legislative measure, let it be put into force from the moment we have adopted it. Otherwise, let us change the system. I do not know what to do. One day, we shall have to make up our minds. I conclude; I know other hon. members wish to speak after me. There is the parliamentary secretary who will reply to me, and I am anxious to hear what he has to say, especially in connection with Mr. Charles Dubé's problem.

Mr. Arthur Portelance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member for Hochelaga just described is a special case. It is true that he received certain letters from the minister. But as regards the amendment contained in section 7, its purpose is to prevent beneficiaries who are no longer on the labour market from receiving sickness benefits. Therefore, Bill C-69 proposed to amend the act in order that sickness benefits be paid to those beneficiaries who could work if they were not sick, injured or quarantined.

That amendment was reflected in paragraph 25(b) of the Unemployment Insurance Act and came into force on January 4, 1976. However, as regards the case mentioned in the letter of December 7, 1976, it was subsection 29(5) of the act, which came into force on July 4, 1976, that applied. Subsection 29(5), or clause 9(2), brought into the act an element of flexibility with regard to the payment of sickness benefits. First class beneficiaries can now receive up to 10 regular weekly benefits without restricting their right to sickness benefits. They may now receive a maximum of 10 regular weekly payments, plus 15 weekly sickness benefits within an over-all period of 39 rather than 29 weeks.

I would also like to specify that subsection 29(5) of the act came into force on July 4, 1976, because of the necessary computer programming involved, which was not needed in the case of paragraph 25(b).

SUGGESTION EMPLOYEES BE INFORMED OF THEIR INCLUSION IN ALLEGED BLACKLIST—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter which continues to be of urgent and pressing necessity for this House. In view of the continuing refusal of this government to investigate charges of blacklisting against senior civil servants, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House go on record as opposing the procedure apparently followed by the former Solicitor General and, further, that this government inform the 21 persons who were blacklisted, on a confidential basis, of their inclusion on such list so that they themselves, if they wish, may take appropriate action to clear themselves with their government departments so that their careers may not be jeopardized thereby.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 cannot be presented to the House for debate without its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST THAT INCREASE IN PRICE OF FEED GRAIN BE STUDIED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with a matter of pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the price of feed grain is soaring in eastern Canada and since those increases will have unfavourable effects on the production costs of dairy and other products, thus greatly reducing the income of farmers in that part of the country, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard):

That the House authorize the Standing Committee on Agriculture to undertake a study to discover what are the real causes of higher prices for feed grain and also inquire whether those increases will at least accrue to grain growers.

Mr. Speaker: Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

REQUEST FOR DREDGING AT ISLE D'ORLÉANS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion.

Considering that dredging works have been completed in 1975 by the federal government at the level of the north crossing on the St. Lawrence, across from Isle d'Orléans, and that no other maintenance works has been done since that time; since the federal government has already decided to place this responsibility on the main user, the Compagnie Aigle d'Or Canada Ltée, while it is normally a federal responsibility, except in this very case, according to the company involved; and finally considering that this unfair situation is causing considerable delay in the development of Quebec harbour, because the company in question cannot afford such costly works, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Lavoie):

That this House recommend unanimously to the minister in charge to assume the cost of the works involved and to complete them during the summer of 1977.

Mr. Speaker: Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; therefore the motion cannot be put.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

PREMIER LÉVESQUE'S SPEECH IN NEW YORK—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO COUNTERACT SEPARATIST PROPAGANDA

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Given the fact that Premier Lévesque's address last night to United States businessmen enabled him to outline the Quebec government's view of Canada's future to a large audience of Canadians and Americans, and also given the premier's assumption that his objectives could be achieved with little or no economic dislocation, what specific studies has the federal government undertaken, and what information is being prepared for parliament and for all Canadians, about the strong social, political, and economic benefits that accrue from the federal system?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the minister next to me indicates it is part of our whole activity as a government, and as a party, to spell out to Quebeckers in particular and Canadians in general why it is preferable that Quebec remain in confederation.

Miss MacDonald: Given that any uncertainty about the future of the country in the United States might very well affect decisions on investment in Canada which would be detrimental to our economy, and since Mr. Lévesque tried to give the impression that the breakup of Canada is inevitable and that some American businessmen might believe him, what new initiatives in the light of this is the government taking to offset his propaganda given in a foreign country and also to ensure full confidence abroad in our future?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not think this is the appropriate place for me to comment on a matter like this. Obviously, it is the duty of all of us as parliamentarians to prove to Canadians on a constant basis that Canada is a better place to be in than if it were broken up by any one province. That is the whole essence of our actions in parliament and that is what we will continue to do. I hope we will be joined in that by the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I will direct a final supplementary to the Prime Minister since he has not responded to the questions that I put. Given the gravity of the present political situation in Canada, which I hope the Prime Minister does not underestimate, and given the continual public relations campaign against national unity by Premier Lévesque, is the Prime Minister saying that no special efforts other than a continuation of the status quo are being made to hold this country together?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the action of this government, at least since I have been Prime Minister, has been to try to prove to Quebeckers that it was to their advantage to be part of Canada, to remain in confederation. It has been our continuing effort also to indicate to the rest of the Canadian people, those outside of Quebec, that it is to their advantage to keep Quebec in confederation. However, we do not believe that it is enough to say to each other that we love each other. It is important that the rest of Canada adopt certain policies which permit Quebeckers to feel that they are an integral part of Canada, that they have equal rights in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: In other words, Mr. Speaker, if we want to keep Canada together in both of the linguistic communities, we have to accept the reality of the existence of the other and make a number of concessions to accommodate to that reality. This is our approach to national unity. Perhaps the policy research group of the opposition will come up with an alternative policy some time down the road. Then, we will know how the Tories are thinking.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I am going to pose a supplementary question because, frankly, I resent the inflammatory manner in which the Prime Minister has answered these questions. The questions asked by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands were perfectly straightforward and the Prime Minister can count upon the co-operation of the opposition under our present leader just as he could under my leadership. May I ask the right hon. gentleman whether he intends to continue to try to bait the opposition with regard to this question and conduct it along partisan lines or whether he is really trying to unite this country and all the political parties in meeting this very difficult problem?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I am surprised that the hon. member for Halifax should assume that it is possible for me to unite the opposition with the government in our approach to Canada, in our approach to federalism. Obviously, we have different ways of pursuing national unity. This has been explored in our programs and debated during successive election periods. We shall continue to do our best.

As to the questions to which I responded a few moments ago asking me to comment on a speech made by a premier of a province in New York, by a premier of whom we know it is the essence of his actions to try to break up the country, I do not think the House expected me at this time to enumerate all the things we have done or shall be doing to try to keep the country united. That is why my response—and I think it was a perfectly proper one—was to indicate that we have a certain approach to confederation which I assume is different from that of the opposition. But we shall continue to promote it and if the opposition wants to join forces with our prescription for unity we shall welcome them, of course, but it is not apparent to me that that is the case.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I will try a further question—I have been through this with the Prime Minister for some eight years. Does the Prime Minister consider it inappropriate for a question to be directed to him asking him what is being prepared by the federal government by way of information to give to the Canadian people to try to offset the kind of propaganda in which Mr. Lévesque indulged in New York? Does he consider it inappropriate that he should be asked in the House what measures he intends to take to counteract any undermining of confidence in Canada created by that speech? These are perfectly simple questions which have been put to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Trudeau: They are perfectly simple questions, Mr. Speaker, and I gave perfectly simple answers. The House and the opposition may not agree with them, but in all earnestness I repeat that we have been for many years now engaged in the task of trying to counteract separatist propaganda in the province of Quebec. The question has achieved new urgency now because of the recent election, but we did not discover the danger of separatism in the last two months, Mr. Speaker.

● (1420)

Mr. Paproski: You said it was dead six months ago.

Mr. Nowlan: What is this, a resurrection?

Mr. Hees: You had better tell him what to say, Marc; he is getting into trouble.

Mr. Trudeau: Judging from the nervousness of the opposition, Mr. Speaker, they seem to have discovered the danger only last night.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I am glad that the lecture in New York by the premier of Quebec has made all Canadians come to the realization that we are in a certain danger. I talked about crisis just six months ago in this House but the opposition pooh-poohed it. I talked about a crisis then because the government's policy on official languages in Canada was not taken seriously enough by a lot of powerful people in this country. So it is not possible today, just because of what happened last night, for me to work myself up into a fervour and say that we are doing a whole lot of new things.

Mr. Paproski: You have not done that for years.

Mr. Trudeau: We are going to continue to fight for the unity of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I would remind the Prime Minister that it was he who six months ago said that separatism was dead.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: With regard to what he said was his policy—and I should like to get a clear answer on this—in reply to both questioners from the official opposition he made reference to one policy of the federal government, and I want the Prime Minister to be clear so that we and the people of Canada understand where he is going. Is he saying that the Official Languages Act is the sole foundation of the Liberal party's approach to this question? Because that is all he referred to today. I ask the Prime Minister this because, given the fact that it has created difficulties in the rest of Canada, even though all parties accepted it, more importantly it remains monumentally uninteresting to the people of Quebec. Is the Prime Minister saying he is going to keep Quebec in the federal union by pushing a policy they are not interested in one bit?

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker, I find it a bit misleading to say that it is monumentally uninteresting in Quebec when there has been a great deal of discussion before, during and since the election by people in Quebec, separatists and non-separatists, who have been complaining about the fact that our Official Languages Act had not had the effect they had hoped, particularly in the air traffic controllers and pilots affair. Obviously, they had always assumed that this act was going to work. They assumed that it would be acceptable. They assumed that it would have more effect than it did. So this seems to me to prove, Mr. Speaker, that it is a matter of very great importance to them.

As for the preamble to the question, all I said—I repeat it and I think anyone who knows the events of the last provincial election will confirm this—was that when a separatist party has to say that it wants to get elected not on separatism but on good government, it proves that that party itself, the party of the separatists, does not believe that separatism has the support of the electorate of Quebec.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: That was my point, Mr. Speaker, and it remains my point, that the Parti Québécois had to hide the fact that it was separatist in order to get enough votes to be elected in the province of Quebec. That supports my point that separatism was not willed by the people of Quebec.

There is a greater danger now because, having been elected on good government, it is obvious that Mr. Lévesque and his party are forgetting that they do not have a mandate for separatism. Mr. Lévesque apparently talked of little else last night in New York. He enumerated the things that his government would do, none of which require a change in the constitution; that is to bring in good government, to follow priority, to save money, to bring in better social security, to nationalize asbestos—none of those things demand separation. He continues to prove that the people of Quebec do not believe in separation, but they will begin to believe it, Mr. Speaker, if the rest of the country does not understand the conditions under which Quebec will stay in confederation, and these are the conditions that this government has been preaching and trying to follow for the past year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Prime Minister. In agreeing that the premier of Quebec said on television that what he wanted to provide was good government to the people of Quebec, and did not argue that separatism was required for that, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he would not also agree that Mr. Lévesque won his election on a social democratic program which he referred to—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Cheap political talk.

Mr. Broadbent: He referred to the program—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: It was Marc Lalonde's program.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The questions obviously demanding and attracting the attention of the lead questioners of parties on the opposition side should certainly not be set aside by the Chair in view of their importance and tremendous momentary impact. However, up to the moment I have listened to the questions carefully to make sure that they would elicit information from the Prime Minister in respect of his position, but, having regard to the last question, it would obviously elicit information about an event outside the administrative responsibility of the Prime Minister.

SUGGESTION FEDERAL GOVERNMENT PUT MORE EMPHASIS ON ECONOMIC POLICIES TO KEEP CANADA UNITED

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I will try to get the information. Would the Prime Minister agree that Mr. Lévesque's appeal in respect of the Official Languages Act played no role in the official campaign of the Parti Québécois, but that in complete contrast what played the central role was the need for government programs that would deal with unemployment, with housing and with fair taxation? If the Prime Minister agrees with that, would he not agree that it is time the national government of Canada concerned itself with these programs that do affect the people of Quebec as well as elsewhere?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the national government pursues as best it can, in difficult economic times, the policies that we as the federal government feel appropriate for this country, and the results are still continuing—

Mr. Broadbent: And you lost Quebec.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, there has not been a federal election in Quebec in the last three years. The federal election was in July 1974 and we won that election in Quebec.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: You wouldn't today, Pierre.

Mr. Trudeau: The Quebec election was lost by a provincial government—

● (1430)

Mr. Broadbent: With your program.

Mr. Hees: With your help, and it was a Liberal government.

Mr. Trudeau: The party which lost was not preaching separatism but better government. I am not surprised that this party chooses to identify itself with the social democratic label. I am happy if it makes the Leader of the New Democratic Party happy. I remember a couple of years ago when the New Democratic premier of British Columbia described Mr. Lévesque, separatist as he was, as a great Canadian. This is not our view. We feel that he is not a great Canadian.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: He may have won an election on a good government policy. We will try to win the next election in Quebec and elsewhere on our programs and on our performances.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): God help us!

Mr. Trudeau: That will be the test in the next federal election, but I completely disagree with the inference put forward by the Leader of the New Democratic Party.

FINANCE

SUGGESTION BANK OF CANADA GRANT INTEREST FREE LOANS TO PROVINCES

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I would also put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Last night, we all witnessed the premier of a Canadian province talking to American financiers about financial matters and about his program, not at all about linguistic problems. Mr. Speaker, to be faithful to the propositions that Réal Caouette used to make to maintain a united Canada when he said that we should finance the provinces and help them develop the public sector. Given those circumstances, would the Prime Minister agree to reconsider the position of his government and submit to the House amendments to the Bank of Canada Act in order to give Canadian provinces a source of revenue and capital other than that of foreign countries? This would prevent such sad spectacles showing our fellow citizens crawling before foreign forces to maintain the development of our own country. Is the government aware of this fact and does it consider that national unity is worth taking over the development of the public sector through our own bank, the Bank of Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think my answer will satisfy the hon. member because we do not agree on the monetary theory. We believe that the province of Quebec, all the provinces of Canada and the Canadian government as well must borrow out of the savings of Canadian citizens or those of other countries. If Mr. Lévesque goes to New York or Europe to borrow his funds, he is doing exactly what the other provincial premiers do, and we do not believe that we just need to print more dollars to be able overnight to achieve everything in this country.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary.

Is the right hon. Prime Minister aware that the system he protects—as he just said—by trying to ridicule a solution rather than appreciating it, is planning the construction of 40—only 40, that is not much—housing units in Quebec, in one of my colleagues' riding, to be financed by a federal government loan of $966,960, at a rate of interest of 10 per cent, compounded, for a term of 50 years? Does he realize, instead of laughing at the Social Credit Party of Canada, that the system he protects will force Quebeckers he wants to keep in confederation to reimburse to the federal government the amount of $4,773,350 and that, under those circumstances, it is not interesting to remain in confederation since it only leads to impoverishment, and that provoking the dismemberment of the country is simply a means to maintaining that system?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not scoff at the Social Credit Party of Canada; I say merely that I disagree with its monetary theory. My answer to the hon. member is simply this: the government itself, the government of Canada, pays the interest when it borrows from the citizens. It pays interest in hundreds of millions of dollars each year when it issues Canada Savings Bonds, it pays interest to the citizens who agree to lend it money. If the citizens, including the hon. member, were willing to lend to the government without interest, it too could lend interest-free money to others. But clearly no one asks anyone to hand over his savings without asking for some interest. That applies as well to the government of Canada as to that of Quebec, of the other provinces, and any individual who wants to borrow.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, a last supplementary.

I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he is aware that the Bank of Canada does not have the right to lend money to the provinces, and also, what difference is there between $100 million coming from New York and $100 million coming from the Bank of Canada, guaranteed by the same resources and faith in the future?

PUBLIC SERVICE

REASON FOR FIRING WALTER RUDNICKI—INQUIRY WHETHER MR. RUDNICKI'S NAME ON ALLEGED BLACKLIST

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. It refers to a matter which has been exposed in the House over the last few days, namely, that of an extra-parliamentary opposition list.

Even though the minister was not responsible for the same portfolio at the time the list was circulated, he was, nevertheless, responsible for firing a senior civil servant for reasons which were found by a judge of the Supreme Court of Ontario to be wrong. Can the minister tell us today what the real reasons for firing Walter Rudnicki from his position with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation were at the time and whether the minister was aware of the blacklist on which Walter Rudnicki's name appeared?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the premise of the question is incorrect as to the finding of the court in Ontario that the dismissal of Mr. Rudnicki from CMHC was wrongful. The balance of the question has been answered by the minister administratively responsible.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, if it is permissible I would like to ask the minister, since he was directly responsible for the department in which this senior civil servant worked, since he was directly responsible for firing him, and since he displayed little concern at the time for the future of this person—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not very much concerned about the argumentative portion at the end of the hon. member's question, but he is seeking the opinion of the Chair, I am sure, in his preamble as to whether it is proper for him to ask questions of the present Minister of Justice about his capacity in an earlier portfolio, and I am sure the House understands we have clearly established that that is not proper.

Mr. Oberle: May I phrase the question somewhat differently and merely ask the minister if in his present position as Minister of Justice he would be prepared to display a somewhat greater concern for the injustice which has been perpetrated on this senior official?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Central Nova.

ALLEGED CIRCULATION OF BLACKLIST OF EMPLOYEES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question of the present Solicitor General. Is he now able to tell this House something about what seems on its face to be a rather unfair and paranoid course of action, that is, the circulation of a list which yesterday the government was saying did not exist?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to make one general remark. In view of the fact that this matter has been bandied back and forth across the floor of this House, and in view of the fact that a number of references have been made to a blacklist, as far as the blacklist is concerned, as that word is normally understood, there is no such thing in existence at the moment, nor can I determine that any such "blacklist" existed in the past.

An examination of the files of my department for the period mentioned by the hon. member yesterday does indicate that there was concern at that time that some government employees might be deliberately releasing government classified information without authorization. Names of those employees were given to the minister of the departments and agencies concerned—

An hon. Member: That is blacklist.

Mr. Fox: —and they were advised by the solicitor general at the time that steps should be taken to ensure that these government employees be fully advised and briefed as to their responsibilities for ensuring the security of classified government information. It was, of course, from that point on the responsibility of each government department to use its own judgment on these recommendations since security matters are a governmental responsibility.

I should like to add that this information was transmitted with the utmost discretion in order that it would not be harmful to the reputation of those involved.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

BASIS ON WHICH ALLEGED BLACKLIST COMPILED

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): This extra-parliamentary opposition list is the only way I have heard it referred to in this House. I want to ask the minister whether, so far as this government is concerned, a difference of opinion, of philosophy or of value systems constitutes grounds for discrimination by this government in the circulation of such a list by this government, which used to call for a just society, and whether or not we could get some information about the justification, the basis and the input of those who compiled the list. Who is ultimately responsible for the circulation of this list, was it the then solicitor general?

● (1440)

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): In answer to the first part of the question with regard to discrimination against people not fully sharing the views of this government, of course, no such list whatsoever was compiled on that basis. The list that would have been compiled to which the hon. member refers was based on the vital information to which I referred in the first part of my answer to the hon. member's first question.

[Mr. MacKay.]

POSSIBILITY OF QUEBEC ABROGATING TRAINING AND MOBILITY AGREEMENTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In the knowledge that he has expressed his regrets regarding the scrapping by the minister of immigration in the province of Quebec of federal English language courses for immigrants at immigration centres and that he intends to meet that minister in order to determine what is happening and where he intends to go, and in the knowledge that there are other programs under the minister's jurisdiction dealing with manpower, such as assessment agreements, mobility agreements and adult occupational training grants, which also call for the implementation of agreements by the federal government and in particular at this time by the province of Quebec, has the minister received any indication from his counterpart in the province of Quebec as to the provincial government's intentions with respect to these agreements, keeping in mind that these agreements are based on equality of opportunity?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker, other than what has been referred to dealing with the cancellation of English classes for immigrants, I have had no other communication to that effect.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, in light of the gravity of this situation and of the fact that the minister intends to meet the provincial minister responsible for immigration, would he at the same time take it upon himself to meet the minister of manpower, if that is what he is called in the province of Quebec, in order to determine what that government's intentions are with respect to these federal-provincial agreements, and would he kindly report his findings to the House?

Mr. Cullen: We have in each province a manpower needs committee and the Quebec federal manpower committee is to meet within the next ten days. At that time our officials will be having discussions, and perhaps out of that will flow any suggestions that have to be made. I think Mr. Couture was talking at one instant about doubling the amount of money spent on training in French language for immigrants, but given the decline in immigration it does not seem to be warranted. But I think our federal-provincial manpower committee should look into all these areas and these items will be discussed probably before I meet with my opposite number in Quebec.

ABORTION

POSSIBILITY OF NEW LEGISLATIVE PROVISIONS—REASON FOR STUDY BY DR. BADGLEY

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Justice. I have put this question before in reference to this matter. Is it the intention of the Minister of Justice to bring in new legislation on abortion in light of the fact that the minister intimates that the present law is not working or is working very badly?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): I have not intimated that. My present intention is to table in the House the report of Dr. Badgley, and I anticipate doing that in the next few weeks.

Mr. Woolliams: In light of the fact that the minister denies that he has intimated that, could he explain to the House why it was necessary to have Dr. Badgley look into the matter if the law is working so well?

Mr. Basford: Dr. Badgley was appointed to determine in what manner and how equitably the present law was operating, and that is what his report will deal with.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ALLEGED INTENTION OF QUEBEC TO TAKE OVER FUNCTIONS OF FORCE IN THAT PROVINCE—POSSIBILITY OF COMPENSATION

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, Quebec justice minister Marc-André Bédard said on January 11, 1977 "we find it incomprehensible that the federal government finds the means to keep the RCMP in Quebec, given that the administration of justice is the sole jurisdiction of the province and the government of Quebec wishes to take over all the RCMP functions in Quebec". Can the Solicitor General inform the House what negotiations, if any, are going on between his department and the government of Quebec on the presence of the RCMP in the province?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, there are no negotiations whatsoever going on between my department and the department of justice in Quebec concerning the presence of RCMP in that province. The RCMP is a police force which is at home in every province in this country. I have however, in view of the stated ignorance by the minister of justice as to the operations of the RCMP, many of which have been carried out in the past at the instigation of the attorney general of the province of Quebec, asked my officials and the RCMP officers in Quebec to bring him up to date on our activities in that province.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Justice minister Bédard at the time added that Ottawa owes Quebec $370 million for the provision of police services in Quebec based on the amount of money Ottawa gives to the provinces in which the RCMP acts as a police force. Can the minister tell me whether it is the government's intention to provide funds to Quebec to assist in payments for that force in Quebec and, in view of the statements of the minister, is the government contemplating at any time in the foreseeable future the withdrawal of the RCMP from the province of Quebec and allowing the Quebec provincial police to assume RCMP duties there assisted by federal funds?

Mr. Fox: The answer to all the hon. member's questions is no. I should point out, however, that, as he knows full well, when we talk about police services in the country we are not talking about shared cost programs but the federal government has been offering services to certain provinces, for which they pay money to the federal government, not the other way round.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

SUGGESTION PRIME MINISTER'S SPEECH IN WASHINGTON BE TELEVISED

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State.

All members and all Canadians already know that, on the invitation of the new President of the United States, the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada is to address the U.S. Congress and Senate some time in February and that this is a première for a Canadian Prime Minister. Here is my question: could the Secretary of State get from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation the assurance that the Prime Minister of Canada will get the same treatment, solicitude and publicity as this Crown corporation has given the premier of Quebec yesterday?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am absolutely convinced of the significance of the right hon. Prime Minister's speech, as the hon. member has indicated, and I would certainly agree that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should be apprised of the importance that all hon. members, I am sure, attach to this speech.

ALLEGED BLACKLISTING OF EMPLOYEES—INQUIRY WHETHER MR. RUDNICKI AND OTHERS ADVISED THEY WERE ON THE LIST

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. The Solicitor General has now had the opportunity of perusing the June 15, 1971 letter from his predecessor with regard to the alleged listing of civil servants. Would the Solicitor General advise the House whether, in view of the fact that Walter Rudnicki insisted he was included in such a list, he can confirm that in fact Walter Rudnicki was on that list which he has had an opportunity to look at, and can he advise the House whether Walter Rudnicki was advised about being on that particular list at that time or was anyone else advised they were on such a list?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to confirm the presence of any individuals named on that list for the obvious reason that it must be prejudicial to the reputation of any person whose name would be on such a list.

POSSIBILITY PERSON ON BLACKLIST COULD AFFECT SECURITY OF COUNTRY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question of course was directed only to the case of Walter Rudnicki who himself has insisted that his name was placed on that list. As a supplementary question, may I ask the Solicitor General if he can advise the House how it is that people on that list, who may be employees of Central Mortgage and Housing or DREE could adversely affect the security of this country in the terms defined in the Official Secrets Act? Is there information that those persons could have adversely affected it within the meaning of that act?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in my initial response, the sole recommendation made by the Solicitor General at the time was that the people whose names had been identified be briefed on the proper security procedures and the importance of not leaking government information or government documents which contained classified government information.

CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—SUGGESTION PROGRAM FOR NEWFOUNDLAND BE ON EMERGENCY BASIS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that 55,000 people in the province of Newfoundland are drawing unemployment insurance and another 9,000 are drawing short term assistance—these figures have been confirmed by the Unemployment Insurance Commission and by the Newfoundland government—thereby representing 35 per cent of the work force; and in view of the fact, as pointed out by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby yesterday that the minister's works program is based on the Statistics Canada figure of approximately 14 per cent, may I ask the minister what he intends to do about what has to be an extraordinary situation? Would he accept the suggestion that he look at the possibility of ongoing federal programs being expedited on an emergency basis to alleviate this critical situation?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): First of all, Mr. Speaker, the criteria for the new Canada Works Program will not be based on the criteria for LIP. We are endeavouring to improve on that. I am meeting with my officials to go over it and see if we can bring more equity into the program so that we have a more realistic determination of the figures. As far as expediting it, that is what we are endeavouring to do. But each time we endeavour to expedite it, representations are made in the House that deadline dates be extended and that we need more time. What I want to do if possible is expedite the programs that we have; get the applications in and get them approved so that the people can get to work.

Mr. McGrath: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Realizing the seriousness of the problem may I ask the minister if he would be prepared to send a team of his senior officials to Newfoundland to discuss joint programs with the Newfoundland government which is already seized with the seriousness of the situation and is trying to meet it with whatever remedies lie within their jurisdiction.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, we are ahead of the hon. member. We are constantly meeting with officials from Newfoundland. We have a Newfoundland Federal-Provincial Manpower Needs Committee. We look into all of these areas. I think the fact that in the final analysis we put something in excess of $17 million into that particular region under the LIP program indicates our concern and our knowledge of the situation as expressed by the hon. member. I do not think it is anything new.

PROVISION OF ADDITIONAL REFRIGERATED RAILWAY CARS FOR TRANSPORTATION OF POTATOES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Last November the minister indicated that because of the alarming situation with respect to the deterioration, both in numbers and in quality, of refrigerated cars for moving potatoes from eastern Canada, that he would be preparing a submission to cabinet suggesting that the government place on order something like 800 to 1,000 refrigerated boxcars or insulated boxcars in order to service this traffic which would certainly be hampered very much in the future if not this year if such provisions were not made. Has that memorandum been prepared and submitted?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, a lot of work has been done on it and it should be submitted soon.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the minister could indicate whether he has achieved some measure of agreement with the governments of Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick on this. At stake here is a very large question with respect to future transportation, both by rail and by other modes.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the submission will take in all of these facts. They are being considered.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

REASON FOR REFUSAL TO RELEASE ENVIRONMENTAL FILM ENTITLED "FORECAST FOR SURVIVAL"

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment may I put a question to the Secretary of State? It relates to a film produced by the National Film Board and which was commissioned by the Department of the Environment. The film was entitled "Forecast for Survival" and was completed in July, 1975. Despite repeated requests for release of the film, which cost several thousand dollars, the release has never been accomplished. Is the minister aware whether it has been at the instigation of the Department of the Environment that the National Film Board has refused to release the film?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I cannot throw any light on this matter. I will undertake to discuss it with my colleague and report to the hon. member directly.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer. When he is conducting this inquiry will he determine whether it was at the request or insistence of the Department of External Affairs that release was not approved and if not, will he inquire at whose request this release has been suppressed?

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I will draw that concern to the attention of the minister.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

POLICY WITH REGARD TO MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT SEEKING INFORMATION FROM DEPARTMENTS

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. Could the Prime Minister tell the House whether it is a policy of his government to require members of parliament wishing to obtain routine information from the civil service, to clear their calls through the minister's office before attempting to obtain such information?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Not that I know of, Mr. Speaker. Ministers have authority in their own departments and they may convey information to departments but I do not know of any general rule.

POLICY OF MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE WITH REGARD TO MEMBERS SEEKING INFORMATION FROM DEPARTMENT

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare? Can the minister indicate whether it is his policy or whether he has issued a directive to his department forbidding information to be given to members of parliament before clearance with his office and if so, for what reasons?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have not issued any instruction not to provide hon. members with information, but I thought it could be a lot easier and quicker if I personally served as intermediary for providing information to hon. members and receiving theirs. The hon. members concerned would therefore be served a lot better and quicker.

PARTICIPATION OF CANADA IN WORLD HOCKEY CHAMPIONSHIP AT VIENNA—REQUEST THAT MINISTER AID IN RECRUITMENT

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State responsible for Fitness and Amateur Sport.

In view of the fact that Canada is to take part shortly in World Hockey Championship competitions in Vienna, that these competitions will take place during the Stanley Cup playoffs, which will make it difficult to obtain outstanding hockey players, and that Mr. Holmes, the new Team Canada director, stated during a press conference held last fall in Montreal that participation in this great international tournament could result in a loss of prestige for Canadian hockey, could the minister advise the House whether she is aware of the situation and, if so, whether she intends to take action to correct this situation, in order to foster the pride of Canadians because of their marked interest in international competitions?

[English]

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of this matter. However, I am Minister of Amateur Sport and this is a very professional undertaking but I shall try in an indirect way to have some of the representatives see that the prestige of Canada is upheld to the maximum degree.

PRIVILEGE

MR. OBERLE—GOVERNMENT'S RELEASING OF INFORMATION RESPECTING NATIONAL SECURITY

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, it is with great reluctance that I rise on a question of privilege which affects not only the privileges and position of this House but is fundamentally important to the value every citizen places in our country, its system of government, the basic rights of individuals and their civil liberties.

Mr. Speaker, I and other members of the opposition in the House have for some time attempted in the House as well as by other means to encourage the government to provide us with information with regard to a most serious matter respecting national security.

In 1971, the then solicitor general reacted to information which had been accumulated and passed on to him by either the security service of the RCMP or a security agency functioning under his own authority. The solicitor general wrote a letter to a number of his senior cabinet colleagues and undertook to discuss with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) the allegations which had been made to him. He attached to his letter a list of names of individuals, some of whom were employees of the public service at the time, all of whom were accused of subversive activities directed against the government.

● (1500)

Contrary to what the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) said in the House, the letter identifies these people as the new left and states that they seek to organize and radicalize the underclasses in our society and to mould them into a revolutionary force capable of overthrowing our present socio-political system.

Mr. Paproski: Stick around, Lalonde.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am most anxious to allow the hon. member sufficient amplitude to develop at least the beginning of a question of privilege, but I am also anxious for the hon. member to restrict his disclosures to those facts which will support his case. I do not intend to interfere, but I invite the hon. member to come to the point and state the question of privilege.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, this is the second occasion in my years of service in the House on which I have raised a question of privilege. This matter is of the gravest importance to all of this country. I will make my argument as short as I can.

A radical EPO program is referred to in the letter, and this organization is predicated on a total and unequivocal rejection of representative democracy, its destruction and the creation of radical alternatives. If true, this must be considered a most serious affront to our system. The Solicitor General, of course, had every justification to act as he did. Indeed, he rightly considered it his responsibility to mobilize our own security forces against such challenges. There are, however, further actions the government should have undertaken. First, and most important, the government should have ordered a complete and comprehensive inquiry into the affair.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not challenging the hon. member's right to discuss matters of importance or to criticize the government in the past or now. However, I want the hon. member to give some indication to the House of the basis upon which he is claiming that this is a matter of privilege and has priority over the other items of business to which the House would normally turn at this time.

Mr. Oberle: With respect, Mr. Speaker, I have laid the groundwork for a serious allegation and a serious question of privilege. If Your Honour and hon. members will bear with me for just a couple of minutes more I will get to the point. My question of privilege is this. Several of my colleagues have known, have tried to inform the government of this information, and have invited them to react. What constitutes the real question of privilege, of course, is the fact that despite the implications for the House of this matter, almost all the ministers connected with the list, as well as the Prime Minister, have denied knowledge of the affair. Having regard to the seriousness of the matter, which received the attention of the government at the time, I have good reason to assume that the Prime Minister and several ministers of the Crown have deliberately misled this House and the Canadian people.

An hon. Member: Prove it.

An hon. Member: Make a charge.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The hon. member has made the charge.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, if you find that there is a prima facie case of privilege, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That the matter of the extraparliamentary opposition which is referred to in a document circulated by the Solicitor General to members of the government and the Prime Minister be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

[Translation]

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I think that in rising on a question of privilege, the hon. member has instead abused the privileges of this House because he has taken advantage of this opportunity to read into the record of the House the documents he had in hand. As for us, we have taken all the necessary steps to prevent that kind of document, of a privileged nature and circulated between members of the cabinet, from being made public, precisely to protect the reputation of the people involved. The charges he makes do not contain any prima facie elements of a question of privilege. Anyway, what the opposition asked us point-blank to do yesterday was to comment on a document which was apparently written in 1971. We are expected to read that kind of document immediately, which is obviously impossible.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member's representations are much more in the nature of a debate. Their purpose seems to me to be much more that of raising passions, setting aside all restraint and giving all this matter a Machiavellian aura, while in fact it was simply a question of asking people to ensure that the security and confidentiality procedures within the government are enforced.

It was obviously, Mr. Speaker, the duty of the then solicitor general to bring this to the attention of his colleagues so that the loyalty of the servants of the state be held up in all respects to the requirements of the law.

Let me say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member did not raise a question of privilege, but simply abused the privileges of the House to try and raise a debate which he would not have been able to raise otherwise.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to take part in the debate on this question of privilege, but I wish to give notice that I am seeking to rise on a point of order related to the same general subject: I shall do so after you have ruled on the question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) gave the Chair notice of his intention to raise a question of privilege. The notice is in the following terms:

> I wish to give you notice that at 3 p.m. this afternoon, January 26th, I will be raising a question of privilege with respect to the matter of an extraparliamentary opposition list which has been dealt with in the House since the resumption of parliament on January 24, 1977.

Indeed, the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River did raise, or propose a question of privilege related to that subject and proposed, if the Chair would find in his favour, that he would move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) that the matter of an extraparliamentary opposition which is referred to in a document circulated by the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) to members of the government be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. I twice invited the hon. member to bring the matter within the confines of a question of privilege as we have defined it on many occasions in the past.

It ought to be remembered that questions of privilege have two important characteristics. In the first instance, they fall within a very narrowly-defined limit which has to do with the interference or prevention in some way of the ability of a member of the House of Commons from fulfilling his responsibilities, tantamount to a physical prevention of the hon. member from carrying out his responsibilities. It certainly has not been extended to include any sort of disagreement, interruption or argument; it has to be a deliberate prevention of the hon. member's ability to carry out his duties.

With respect to disagreements about answers given in the House, even misleading answers, there has long been a precedent established. Misleading answers, questions which seek to criticize those answers given, statements which even go to the extent of saying that the answers are misleading, that answers are contradictory as between one minister and another, or that the same minister has given conflicting or contradictory answers on different occasions, have all been held in the past to be matters of debate and not questions of privilege.

The second aspect of the question of privilege has often been referred to—misleadingly, I think— as having to do with a prima facie case. I think that language is somewhat misleading. It ought to be understood that that aspect of the question of privilege is such that the motion which is sought to be put forward by the hon. member ought to take precedence over every other order of business. The subject of this motion, or the subject of the hon. member's comments, could, of course, be put forward by him in a substantive motion. That motion would not have the priority of a question of privilege.

The Chair must decide whether, because the privileges of members of the House are touched or affected, or because what is known as the collective privileges of the House are adversely affected, the hon. member's motion ought to have priority over other business and ought to be put by the Chair in precedence to the order of the business of the House. In line with the very strict definition of privilege in the past, I cannot find that his motion should fall within that category, although his complaint or grievance falls within that category which I take to be a matter of disagreement.

There is one aspect of the matter which remains to be clarified, and it is this: in the course of his remarks, the hon. member did not simply refer to answers or performances by ministers which were misleading. Rather, he used the words "deliberately misleading". If that is the subject of calculated language on the part of the hon. member, he ought to form a substantive charge because it is a very serious allegation. However, in the circumstances, the details were not spelled out in respect of the hon. member's presentation at this time, and after reflection the hon. member may wish to pursue that point further. At the moment I must find that he has a grievance, or has raised a disagreement and grievance which does not constitute a question of privilege.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated a moment ago, I rise on a matter related to the same issue that has been under discussion, except that in this case it is a point of order that I wish to raise. Beauchesne, in his fourth edition, at page 134 states in citation 159(2) as follows:

> A minister of the Crown is not at liberty to read or quote from a despatch or other state paper not before the House, unless he be prepared to lay it upon the table. This restraint is similar to the rule of evidence in courts of law, which prevent counsel from citing documents which have not been produced in evidence. The principle is so reasonable that it has not been contested; and when the objection has been made in time, it has been generally acquiesced in.

I submit that I am raising it at the first opportunity. We now have a rule that we do not raise points of order during the question period. I rose at three o'clock, at the same time as my friend, and I am up again now. May I also read the first sentence of 159(3):

> It has been admitted that a document which has been cited ought to be laid upon the table of the House, if it can be done without injury to the public interest.

I have read that sentence, not just because it is in line with the previous paragraph but because I want to make a reference in a moment to the phrase "without injury to the public interest". The Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) made reference two or three times to a letter which we assume to be a letter written by the then solicitor general on June 15, 1971, which we understand was sent to five or six ministers of that day. The Solicitor General today has given a description of what was contained in the letter. I have to say that his summary of the letter does not conform with our understanding of what was in that letter, but he has used his description of it as part of the argument. In other words, he is citing that letter as part of this debate.

Mr. Goyer: Table it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) should know that one of the rules of this House is that private members cannot table documents.

Mr. Goyer: Give it to the press.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this has developed into a serious issue. This House has the right to know what was in that letter; in particular, whether that the letter corresponds to the description of it given today by the present Solicitor General. The minister cited it. True, he did not pick it up and read from it; he did not quote from it. However, he has told us what is in the letter. It is part of the argument. I believe the minister ought to be required to table the letter.

I indicated that one of the qualifications is that this should be done without injury to the public interest. I believe it would injure the public interest to give publicity to any names of persons in that letter or in a page attached thereto. I believe it would do injury to the public interest to give publicity to the names of organizations that might be named in that letter. I submit, therefore, that names of persons and organizations contained in the letter should be blacked out, but that having cited this document the minister should be required by the rules of this House to lay it on the table of the House with the appropriate blacking out as I have suggested.

[Translation]

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, first I am simply going to note the admission made by my learned colleague that I did not quote the letter in the House. This is the first point on which I wanted to draw Your Honour's attention.

Second, if you have examined the initial answer I gave this afternoon, I did not refer to any letter. In fact hon. members of the opposition mentioned a letter and a date throughout the debate. As far as I am concerned, I said that the then solicitor general had to advise and counsel the other members of the Privy Council on a situation which had been brought to his attention.

Moreover, let me point out that if the letter which hon. members are speaking about and which they seem to know does exist, it would be a letter between ministers of the Crown relating to a security subject which obviously should not be revealed in the public interest.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

[English]

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak to this matter for a moment. There is a precedent set by the former Speaker, the Hon. Lucien Lamoureux, with regard to a matter which I raised in this House. The Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) will remember it very well as he was solicitor general at the time. It involved the murder case of Geoffroy who was released after being convicted of murdering his wife: he was released so that he could marry his girlfriend. During the course of that case, the minister quoted from letters of the girlfriend and from other people, even men of the cloth. The minister, having quoted and having paraphrased some of them, the Hon. Lucien Lamoureux ruled those letters had to be produced, and they were produced. I agree with the NDP that even worse than quoting from a letter is to paraphrase it and leave the wrong impression so that there could possibly be a misrepresentation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: In light of those facts, in light of the precedent I have mentioned, and other precedents well known to the House, I would ask that there be an order forthwith, in accordance with the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), to block out parts of it if they are objectionable. Of course, there is something objectionable in the fact that they would have a list.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order to provide the kind of evidence at this point that would support the contention of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that the interpretation of the contents of the alleged letter given by the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) departs in part very significantly from the kind of interpretation that those of us on this side who have read the letter would give to it. I say "in part significantly" because the minister left out a reference to what some of us consider to be a central concern of the letter; that is, its reference to extraparliamentary, radical leftist groups.

The minister made reference in his comments earlier in the House to the dissemination in an inappropriate way of government documents. I see the minister is nodding. The implication was that that was the exclusive concern of the government. I would like to read a short paragraph from the letter which leads to a very different interpretation. The letter that we have reason to believe is the one the minister is referring to contains the following, with certain names blocked out:

> The short-term political objectives of . . . group include the organizing and radicalizing of sympathetic civil servants in getting them to support its long-term political program of socialist revolution. These people are also involved in dissemination of government information to other radical groups across the country. For example, we have information to show that a member of . . . has passed on information from . . . to . . . who was a representative of . . . at the recent . . . conference.

The point I am making is that the letter makes very serious allegations about civil servants in the present employ of the government. It is not simply a matter of distributing a document which may or may not be a confidential one. The author of this letter goes well beyond that in his accusations about people who are in no position to defend themselves because they do not know that this very serious allegation has been made about them.

Therefore, I support the point of order which was made by our House leader, that the letter referred to by the Solicitor General, exclusive of the names of individuals and organizations, be tabled because it is important for the House to know just what was being said about certain civil servants. Moreover, it is important that those civil servants should know at an early point that serious allegations of this kind were brought against them. A colleague of mine suggested earlier today that they be told on a confidential basis so that these allegations—and they are no more than that at this point—be made known to them and that their names not be smeared as would be the case if names were made public.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the submissions which have been made by various members who have spoken, and as I listened to what has been said and the precedents which have been cited—although the precedents are well-founded— I think it is not just a case where we can say that a letter like this, containing allegations which we have only partially heard in accordance with the record, should be tabled. I think it would be an injustice if that letter were not tabled in full, because failure to do that, failure to table the text of the letter in full—with the appropriate names blanked out, as suggested—would leave the impression that whatever allegations are contained therein might be more serious than they really are and, indeed, taking it in reverse, that the reputations of those public servants would be even more damaged than by the failure and the half-truths—I do not suggest this in the sense of misleading—by the "half of the case" now on the public record. At least half of the case, and perhaps more, is now on the public record; who knows?

I think it would be a travesty, an injustice, if the precedents were not followed to put the full case on the record so that the appropriate judgments might be made. I would be greatly surprised if there were any hesitation at all on the part of a law officer of the Crown who has some responsibility in terms of civil rights—not complete responsibility from the point of view of the government but at least some responsibility—in refusing to table that letter. I would think he ought to acquiesce and volunteer the letter to the House.

Mr. Oberle: Further to this point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would add that it would seem to me that the paragraph which was offered to the House by the leader of the New Democratic Party would indeed coincide with the document which I have in my possession. It makes a farce of the statement the Solicitor General has made about the sensitivity of this document and the precautions which were taken to keep the document secret. I have a copy of it, and so has the leader of the NDP. I do not know how many more people have copies of this document.

An hon. Member: How many did you make?

Mr. Oberle: I did not give a copy of the letter that I have to the leader of the NDP, and I do not know where he got it from. To get back to the earlier point of order and the question of privilege I raised, I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to take under further advisement the fact that I cannot see that the House should continue sitting here talking about anything else but this particular matter, in light of the fact that ministers opposite have consistently and categorically denied the existence of this thing and that they have deliberately misled this House.

An hon. Member: In other words, they lied.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member earlier argued his question of privilege. I indicated to him that a charge of misleading the House, if it is to form a question of privilege, must surely have a particularization to it which would enable the Chair to recognize the specific nature of the matter before determining whether or not it should be referred to a committee. The general allegation made by the hon. member certainly does not bring it within the confines of a question of privilege, and that matter has now been decided.

In respect of the point of order, I am prepared to hear the rest of what the hon. member has to say, as well as the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) who I think is also seeking to make a contribution to the discussion.

Mr. Oberle: Your Honour will recall that you interrupted me on several occasions when I tried to make my charge and my argument. I would at this point be prepared to read the letter in full, and I would then ask you to tell the House and the public of Canada whether these people, in their answers to our questions, not just yesterday and the day before, but on October 13, and in offices of high officials of this country, have deliberately misled and lied and denied this serious allegation.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member should realize that if he has an argument to make with respect to the allegations he made earlier, he ought to have made it earlier. This is not the time, in my opinion, for the hon. member to present further argument in support of what was a suggested question of privilege. I have made a ruling on that matter and it is now decided.

There is a point of order before the House. It is not for the Chair to take responsibility for what hon. members want to introduce into argument. If the hon. member wants to read that document, or any other, with respect to an argument on a point of order, that is his choice, not the choice of the Chair. I have no control over the substance of arguments put on a point of order.

There is a difficult point of order before the House. Arguments have been made, and I am prepared to listen to any relevant arguments from either side before coming to a conclusion. The point of order is somewhat narrow in scope. It has to do with the obligation of a minister to table a document which he has cited in argument in the House. That precedent has been clearly applied in circumstances in which a minister, during the course of debate, has made reference to a document to support his argument, that document not being in the possession of others who are arguing in the same debate.

The clear, common sense of the rule is that all participants in the debate ought to have the same advantage. On the other hand, precedents have equally indicated that this rule was never intended to imply that simply by putting a question to a minister during the question period about the existence of a document, and then having him get up and say that no such document exists, it is possible to insist upon the document being tabled on the ground that the minister had referred to it. However, the argument is still not concluded and I will hear further from hon. members.

Mr. Oberle: If the minister is, as seems obvious, not prepared to table the document at this point, I am certainly prepared to follow the responsible course outlined by the leader of the New Democratic Party by blanking out references to individuals and organizations named in the letter, and I should like to read into the record the letter I have in my possession which we believe to be the letter which caused all the controversy. It is a letter dated June 15, 1971, and it is under the letterhead of the Solicitor General of Canada. It reads:

My dear Colleague:

I have recently received a report containing information which the Security Service has accumulated about the concept of "Extra-Parliamentary Opposition" (EPO) as interpreted by advocates of the New Left in Canada. The report also draws attention to the activities of various persons and groups, some of them employees of the Federal Government, who support the EPO concept and who appear to have as their aim the destruction of the existing political and social structure in Canada.

The EPO concept, in the context of the New Left, does not mean legitimate pressure group activity but rather the creation of counter or parallel institutions within society but opposed to it and to the electoral process. Through such institutions the New Left seeks to organize and radicalize the "underclasses" of society and mould them into a revolutionary force capable of overthrowing the present socio-political system.

According to an article . . . which appeared in the November/December 1967 issue of . . . "people will not move against institutions of power until the legitimizing authority has been stripped away". The radical EPO program of the Left is, in short, a movement strategy predicated on a total and unequivocal rejection of representative democracy, its destruction and the creation of radical alternatives.

An integral part of this strategy is . . . in Toronto, which is under the control of two editorial members of—

And a certain institution.

They are attempting, through a program of workers' and community control, and in conjunction with organizations such as . . . in Montreal to implement the radical EPO program. . . . has, for example, penetrated and gained control of the Just Society—

As an interesting sideline, I suppose the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) might be offended by this particular term.

—originally a legitimate citizens' group, and is utilizing this organization as a radicalizing agent among the poor as well as a stepping stone into other legitimate welfare agencies such as the Toronto Metropolitan Social Planning Council and the United Appeal. Through the Just Society . . . the recent Poor People's Conference, was able to turn this Conference into a sounding board for its radical EPO program and revolutionary propaganda. . . . has also been active in the sphere of industrial unions, such as the Reform Caucus of the Canadian Labour Congress, endeavouring to establish contacts who might be receptive to its concept of workers' control. There are indications that . . . through contacts in government, was able to ensure that it received a recent federal grant of $68,000.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Oberle: There is more interesting reading, if my colleagues will bear with me.

Of more concern, however, is the presence within certain government departments and agencies, particularly CMHC, of a small group of former campus revolutionaries. This group was led until recently by . . . of the Canadian Union of Students—

These names will soon all be public and then hon. members will know them; it will make for much more interesting reading.

This radical revolutionary has left the country but his disciples remain.

The short-term political objectives of . . . group include the organizing and radicalizing of sympathetic civil servants and getting them to support its long-term political program of socialist revolution. These people are also involved in dissemination of government information to other radical groups across the country. For example, we have information to show that a member of the Task Force on Youth has passed on information from the Task Force to a New Leftist, who was a representative of . . . at the recent Poor People's Conference.

Though a number of . . . group within the Public Service is small, probably not in excess of twenty-five, the picture presented is worrying, suggesting as it does a conscious attempt by various persons to use the knowledge and the influence gained by their employment with the Federal Government to further their own ends. For this reason, I have attached a list of those we suspect of being engaged in or sympathetic to EPO activity in one way or another, with the recommendation that steps be taken to ensure that these people have been fully briefed as to their responsibilities for ensuring the security of government information and that their activities be watched with more than normal care.

He then goes on to say: "I have sent this same letter to our colleagues Mr. Pelletier, Mr. Munro, Mr. Lang, Mr. Marchand, and I will be discussing this matter with the Prime Minister in due course".

This letter is addressed, Mr. Speaker, to the Hon. Robert Andras and is signed "Jean-Pierre Goyer, Solicitor General of Canada". I am at liberty, Mr. Speaker, to disclose that one name on this list is that of Walter Rudnicki, who was a senior policy planner with Central Mortgage and Housing at the time; and I am prepared to allege that this senior civil servant was fired for the reason of being on this list.

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, I intended to speak—

Mr. Speaker: Is this on the same point of order?

Mr. O'Connell: Yes, Mr. Speaker, on a very narrow aspect of the point of order. Regardless of the fact that the main contents of the letter have now been made public, it seems to me that the point of order had to do with a request for an expurgated version of a letter, one with certain names omitted. An expurgated document, I suggest, is not a document within the meaning of the rules, either the scope or the intent of the rules or comments in Beauchesne. A document referred to or cited by a minister of the Crown, if it is required to be tabled, must be tabled as the document and not as a modified document. So I would suggest very briefly, Mr. Speaker, that the point of order is not a valid point of order because it seeks a document which is not a document within the rules.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It may very well be, of course, that the point of order has now become entirely academic. I repeat that there is no rule of this chamber that I am aware of which in any way restricts argument on a point that is properly before the House in respect to the reading of the letter which the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River has just read, unless perhaps it offends one of the Standing Orders or in any way is irrelevant to the argument. Certainly, if the argument is over the tabling of a document and a member wishes to read into the record what he alleges to be the document in question, I can scarcely find that to be irrelevant to the question before the House.

However, the argument having concluded, it still remains for the Chair to determine whether or not the Solicitor General can, by the point of order, be compelled to table any document that is allegedly in his possession. Again I indicate that the precedents are of sufficient complexity, and in apparent disagreement on some points of argument, that I will have to examine them and perhaps endeavour to make a ruling on this question tomorrow.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I should like to refer back, on my question of privilege, to a question and answer yesterday in the House when the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle)—

Some hon. Members: Page?

Mr. Lang: Page 2340 of Hansard—asked me a question concerning a document which he said was identified as an extraparliamentary opposition list. I replied that I had never heard of or seen such a list. I must say that in his question the hon. member made no reference to any date. If he had, I might—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: If he had, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not aware of any definition of a question of privilege that would permit clarification of a question or an answer given on a previous occasion. There may be subsequent occasions to raise the matter, but I am not aware of any way in which it can be approached by way of a question of privilege.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I am not attempting to clarify the answer by any means, if hon. members would allow me to come to the conclusion of my statement. The reason I am raising a question of privilege is in case, in the words used in the various submissions by hon. members, I misled the House by reference to this answer. I think there is a possibility that he may be suggesting that. If he is suggesting that, I would like him to say so clearly; but he might first hear what I would say to him on it, Mr. Speaker. As I said, if I had heard the date in that question I might have answered that I do not remember ever having seen or heard of such a list, but in fact—

• (1540)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: —having now heard the letter to which the hon. member refers that does include a reference to the list that he is talking about, I can now say that I scarcely believe that I could have forgotten having seen such a letter at that time. I would still have to say, if he asked the question again, that I certainly cannot remember ever having seen such a letter or heard of it. Therefore, I think that clarification should be made known to him.

RESEARCH—PROCESSING OF FRESHWATER ROUGH FISH

Question No. 825—Mr. Yewchuk:

What funds were expended by the Department of the Environment on research into means of processing freshwater rough fish into palatable human food in (a) 1970 (b) 1971 (c) 1972 (d) 1973 (e) 1974 (f) 1975 and what were the results of such research?

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): 1970, $8,500; 1971, $13,000; 1972, $15,000; 1973, $19,000; 1974, $15,000; 1975, $20,000. Chronological summary of research activities in processing under-utilized species of freshwater fish. 1970: A simple oil-fired dryer designed and tested to process dried fish from under-utilized species as a relatively stable animal food supplement in remote fishing areas of central Canada. 1971/1972: Development of formulated battered and breaded products and processing system on behalf of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation using mullet as the primary nutritional base. The nutritional base diluted with the flesh of other species without affecting textural or flavour characteristics of finished product. Storage study undertaken to evaluate the frozen stability of the product manufactured from flesh of different initial freshnesses. Resulting products market tested with satisfactory results and pilot plant production commenced. Project terminated towards the end of 1972. 1972: Development of a formulated battered product on behalf of a southwestern Ontario processor using the minced flesh of two under-utilized Great Lakes species as the nutritional base. Product marketed commercially. 1972/1973: As a result of industry requests, continued work was undertaken to develop a processing system and specifications to produce a sardine type product from Great Lakes alewife. This project progressed to the stage of U.S. market testing and label design. A rapid system of thawing blocks of minced frozen mullet to minimize quality deterioration was developed on behalf on the F.F.M. Corporation. A batch system was designed, based on the recirculation of water at a high relative initial temperature and carried through to the pilot plant stage. To improve quality maintenance of freshwater fish at production points, a portable insulated fish holding room suitable for transportation by light aircraft was designed. Developed for use in short duration fishing operations in isolated areas, for chilling and holding fish in cool storage prior to shipment to processing centres. There are several units currently in use in the fishery. An investigation into the use of polyphosphate to control thaw-drip in frozen and thawed blocks of minced mullet was undertaken on behalf of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation. The result of this work is being applied in their flesh separating processing operations. 1974: Several canned fish products developed at the request of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation and other segments of the inland fish processing industry including: northern pike fish balls in sauce; chowders, using northern pike, whitefish and burbot as the nutritional bases; smoked carp fillets in oil; smoked tullibee fillets in oil; tullibee fillets in various sauces. 1974/1975: Further work undertaken to develop an improved battered and breaded formulated product from minced mullet including a redesigned processing system. Product market tested at the institutional level in cooperation with the Manitoba Department of Industry and Commerce. Product redesigned to meet institutional requirements as a result of this testing with satisfactory results. The products processing system demonstrated at the pilot plant level at the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation processing plant. Report submitted to the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation included; product formulation, processing specifications, equipment requirements and estimated costs, staffing requirements and quality control requisites. 1975: An investigation of the frozen storage stability of minced mullet blocks with and without added stabilizers. Recommended stabilizers being applied by the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation. 1975/1976: Cooperative project undertaken between western region, Fisheries and Marine Industry Services, Manitoba department of transportation and Manitoba department of industry and commerce to proceed and market institutionally, individually frozen burbot fillet portions. Pilot plant processing and marketing scheduled to commence in September, 1976. At the request of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation a canned product was developed using minced sucker as the nutritional base. Several formulations were prepared and batches submitted to the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation for market testing. Product processing specifications are being finalized. At the request of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation an evaluation of the potential of split-salted and dried mullet was undertaken. Tentative results indicate that the product would not have the shelf stable characteristics of salted and dried Atlantic white-fishes. Final storage tests currently are underway. Current investigations are being undertaken to evaluate the potential of processed mullet ovaries. This work includes caviar processing and the manufacture of "Rorasumi", a high valued Asian product consisting of salted and dried fish ovaries.

ARGUS LRPA REPLACEMENT

Question No. 1,332—Mr. Forrestall:

In regard to the Argus LRPA replacement contract, what firms in each province in Atlantic Canada will receive government contracts and what are the jobs and amounts estimated to be involved?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): The CP-140 Acquisition Contract between the Canadian Government and the Lockheed Aircraft Corporation incorporates "Industrial Benefits" provisions for $932.6M of work to be placed with Canadian industry during the period 1975-1995. Consequently, benefits resulting from the CP-140 will in large measure be as a result of sub-contracts from Lockheed or certain of their major U.S. suppliers and not Government contracts per se. While Lockheed is urged to allocate this work, wherever practicable, in such a manner as to ensure all regions of Canada benefit to the greatest extent possible, it is under no obligation to do so. However, Lockheed has demonstrated utmost co-operation in this regard to date and as a result orders of significant value have already been placed with two firms in the Maritime Region. These orders are with Enheat, Amherst (current value of $2.0M with a total potential value of $11.0M) and IMP, Dartmouth (current value of $0.5M with a total potential value of $2.5M). There is every reason to believe that numerous additional orders will be placed by Lockheed in the Atlantic provinces as the program continues to develop.

NEW BRUNSWICK COUNTY COURT VACANCY AND APPOINTMENT OF ENGLISH SPEAKING SUPREME COURT JUDGE

Question No. 1,365—Mr. Jones:

1. When will the vacant judgeship in the Provincial County Court, Moncton, New Brunswick, be filled?

2. Has any consideration been given to appointing an English-speaking Supreme Court Judge for the Moncton area?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): 1. When the Governor in Council approves an appointment. Suitable candidates are being canvassed.

2. No vacancy exists for a Supreme Court Judge.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if question no. 154 could be made an order for return, this return would be tabled immediately. Once again, the reason is the very lengthy nature of the answer.

1. For the fiscal year 1975-1976, what contracts for professional services were let (a) for studies, surveys and analyses into present or future policies, programs or information analysis, and their efficiency and effectiveness (b) into the examination of the administration or internal operation of the Treasury Board?

2. How much was committed on each contract and to whom?

3. What were the comparable figures for the fiscal year 1973-1974?

Return tabled.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call notice of motion for the production of papers No. 47?

COPIES OF ALL PAPERS RELATING TO DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN THE GOVERNMENT AND GOVERNMENTS OF THE UNITED STATES, FRANCE AND DENMARK IN REGARD TO 200-MILE LIMIT

Motion No. 47—Mr. Crouse:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all documents, minutes of meetings, telegrams, etc., relating to the discussions between the government and the governments of the United States, France and Denmark, with regard to the proposed 200-mile limit.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse).

An hon. Member: Stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining notices of motions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

STATUTE LAW (METRIC CONVERSION) AMENDMENT ACT, 1976

AMENDMENTS TO WHEAT BOARD ACT TO FACILITATE CONVERSION TO METRIC MEASUREMENT

The House resumed, from Tuesday, December 21, 1976, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-23, to facilitate conversion to the metric system of measurement, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, on December 21, prior to the recess, I made some comments regarding metric conversion in Canada. I attempted to make a point I should like to repeat today because of its significance. This government has shortchanged farmers in western Canada by not having an adequate dialogue regarding the effect this resolution will have on them. There has been no opportunity for those involved in the production of food, with land use and ownership, to state their case. In addition, Mr. Speaker, we must consider what effect this measure will have on the reeves and councillors of the many counties in western Canada. Let me bring to the attention of the House a point made by the secretary-treasurer of the county of Red Deer, as reported in the Red Deer Advocate a few days ago:

> The system of land registry is going to be a "hodge-podge" of hectares and acres, Jim Masson, secretary treasurer of the county of Red Deer, told council Tuesday.
> New land titles under recent federal legislation will be registered as hectares, Mr. Masson said. But old land titles will still remain registered as acres.
> Thus, a block of land could well be registered in both hectares and acres, Mr. Masson said.
>
> "If you transfer a title now in acres," he said, "it will remain in acres. But if you subdivide, the land will be in hectares."
>
> Computers with land registration records in their banks will have to be programmed for the addition of hectares, Mr. Masson said.
> When the county of Red Deer goes metric, there will be a considerable cash outlay for speed signs. This will likely come to $3,000 for speed signs in the county alone, Mr. Masson said.
>
> Distance signs will have to be changed to kilometres instead of miles, another expense.
>
> And weights on highway weight scales will have to be in kilograms rather than pounds.

Later the same article reads:

> Mr. Masson said he wondered if it would be possible to replace a mileage sign or speed sign when it got damaged with a metric sign, over a period of two to three years. If the signs were replaced all at once, it would be expensive.
> Mr. Masson said he has written the department of municipal affairs to see how they propose to make the change to metric.
> County bylaws also would have to be changed to conform to metric, he said.

The point I am trying to explain is that the government was hasty in the implementation of this program. As an alternative, I should like to make the point I made on December 21. Let me again quote from an editorial in the Western Producer:

Britain learned that it would go metric in 1965. It has been 11 years since then and the weights and measures bill—as it is called—is still battling its way through the House of Commons.

According to a story in the business section of The Sunday Telegraph, November 7, entitled, "Metrication Muzzled and Delayed", a number of changes have been made to the bill as it fought its way through house committees. In order to ensure its progress the British government has conceded one major point: it has agreed that the mile, the inch, the pint and the gallon will be preserved and exempted from statutory metrication. Apparently the common market rules and regulations make it clear that such exemptions can be made.

I know my colleagues have much to say about this matter. I realize I took a considerable time in the House on December 21 and I appreciate the opportunity of bringing these major concerns of the people I represent once again to the attention of the House of Commons. I thank you for that opportunity, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I, too, will be brief. I am concerned about conversion to the metric system as it affects land use in western Canada. Not only will it affect the western Canada bread-basket of the world but it will affect registration of titles involving the oil and gas industry which uses what we call the Torrens land titles system.

The question of whether we are going to convert acres to hectares now or tomorrow is very serious. At the turn of the century and before, surveyors came to western Canada—men like Palliser and others—with survey crews to survey land in western Canada into quarter sections, half sections and sections, into townships and municipalities, with correction lines to correct so that all these would be on the square.

However, the most important thing is that western Canada copied the Torrens land titles system, and I will deal with that in a few moments. Torrens was a New Zealander who as a layman came up with a system which simplified the registration of land. I have talked to lawyers in eastern Canada, particularly in Ontario, where land has been measured in chains, leaps and bounds, and lawyers there have to go back over 100 years to search titles, whereas under the registration land titles system in western Canada you can walk into provincial government land titles offices—except in the Northwest Territories—which cover British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and merely by looking at the title you can tell who owns that title and what encumbrances, if any, are against it.

If there is an encumbrance which is not registered, then that title, if transferred, goes clear to the man in question, so it was a guarantee to land purchasers or land owners at the turn of the century, when they were homesteaders, that they obtained clear title. If there were encumbrances, money borrowed by way of mortgage or from a bank by way of caveats, that appeared against the land. What I am saying is that millions of acres of land in western Canada are described by the term "acres". No one has consulted the farm organizations. As the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) said, no one has consulted the municipalities or the heads of counties. Nobody has consulted the farm organizations to determine whether they are prepared to accept a change.

Now let us consider cities. They are measured in lots and blocks, whether it be in Calgary, Edmonton, Winnipeg, Vancouver or Victoria. As I said at another meeting today, the only time I have heard the word "hectare" used on the farm was to name a horse Hector. I cannot assess the cost, but $100 million to change the title of those lands would be, in my opinion, small potatoes. You only have to walk into the land titles offices in Alberta, which are in Edmonton, Calgary and other central points—and it is the same in Saskatchewan, Manitoba and British Columbia—to realize what a mammoth job it would be and what a mixed-up situation it would be.

Before I deal with the history of the system, let me deal with the Turta case which involved the first oil well which was struck in Leduc in the 1940s. The adjacent quarter was owned by a man of Ukrainian ethnic origin who found that he not only owned the land but also owned the oil rights. When a search was conducted at the land titles office it was found that a clerk had made a mistake in registering the title away back at the turn of the century. The lawyer for Turta—I do not know whether it was Harold Riley, who became a judge, or another firm in Edmonton—argued that when he went to the registration system, even if there had been an error, that registration system showed who was the owner of the land and the owner of the oil rights.

Then there was an insurance fund to take care of the CPR and others who were fighting over it. That farmer was unique in that regard because the oil rights in western Canada belonged in most cases to the Crown. Many people think that in western Canada we have oil wells in our back yards, but that is like saying we have cold winters in Calgary; it is about as logical. The fact is that the Crown owns the rights. However, in that case the farmer became a millionaire overnight because of the registration system. The only reason I mention this is to show how accurate it is and how adequately it has served the people. If there were farmers here today who knew what this government is going to do in this regard, they would almost riot.

I want to deal with some history for just a few moments, because I know other hon. members represent farmers. I wish to read from "Thom's Canadian Torrens System". This book was written back in the 1920s. In fact, the first volume came out in 1912. I articled to Mr. Thom in Regina, and he was head of the Land Association for the whole of Canada. This is what he said in his book:

The Torrens system itself, however, does not acknowledge as its foundation any of these English reports—

That refers to how the British did it.

—although it would seem that some assistance from these must have accrued to the originator of the system, Robert Richard Torrens, later Sir Robert Torrens (1814-1884); however no suggestion is made or can be made that title registration simpliciter originated in Australia.

Actually, I think it originated in New Zealand.

Torrens was a layman and not a lawyer—

Perhaps that is why it was so simply done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: I knew my hon. friends would like that.

—and no doubt some personal experience with the disastrous operation of the doctrines of equity on common-law titles together with the knowledge he acquired in his positions of collector of customs and registrar-general of deeds gave him the inspiration and the impetus to persevere in his zeal to substitute for the uncertainties and complexities incidental to a system of private conveyancing the security and simplicity suggested by the shipping acts.

In other words, bills of lading gave them the idea of this certificate of title which shows a very simple plan:

He expressly disclaims any indebtedness to the English report of 1857 and states that it only reached his hands on the eve of the second reading of his bill in the South Australia legislature. Following the South Australia enactment Torrens became the first registrar-general of titles under the act; similar statutes were introduced in Queensland in 1861, in Victoria, New South Wales and Tasmania in 1862, in New Zealand and West Australia in 1874.

In Canada the advantages of a system of registration of title, whether the Torrens system or the kindred English system were also receiving consideration during this period and in British Columbia "a system peculiar to itself" but incorporating in part the indefeasability principle was introduced by legislation into Vancouver Island with the enactment on January 18, 1860, of the Land Registry Act, 1860. While the draftsman of this statute had before him the South Australia draft bill of Torrens' Real Property Act which had reached British Columbia through the colonial office, the Land Registry Act, although a statutory offshoot of the Torrens system, nevertheless was adopted to meet the peculiar circumstances of the colony and the prevailing English system of conveyancing. Registration was not made compulsory because of the confused and chaotic state of land titles—

I do not need to go on and read any more, but I should say that that system developed into the land titles system—and I want to repeat that when Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba were surveyed before the turn of the century, they were divided into sections, 36 sections in a township, so many townships in a municipality—

Mr. Neil: Thirty-six.

Mr. Woolliams: Thirty-six in a municipality? Yes, and six in a township.

Mr. Neil: Thirty-six in a township.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, I said it correctly; 36 in a township and so many townships in a municipality. That system was very simple. Every piece of land is surveyed by a quarter section; every piece of land is surveyed by half sections or by sections. Today, farmers in the west own half a section, a section, or several sections. You can go readily to a land titles office and check.

● (1600)

What will happen when we change this? Who will computerize this when you change half sections into hectares or quarter sections into hectares? I do not know what the cost will be. My guess is that it will cost around $100 million. Also, it will confuse the whole system. Why should this be thrust upon western Canada? Have we no say in these things? As I understand it, they have the same system in Montana and the western states, but they are exempting land. This has been thrust upon the Canadian people without any real thought. I see my hon. friend shaking his head. The fact is that this government's philosophy is: because we think it is good for the people, we want you to have it. It is the castor oil treatment which they used to give to the kids. "Open your mouth, it is good for you, and we will pour it down your throat." They are giving the castor oil treatment to every farmer in western Canada. They are giving it to the people engaged in the oil industry and to all the people living in the villages, towns and cities.

When I raise my voice this afternoon—and I do not speak very often in the House—I say that this has been a great political mistake, an expensive mistake at a time when this government is floundering with a deficit of $6 billion or $7 billion and does not know where to turn for money. That is another reason why there is trouble in the country and with the provinces. Who will pay for land adjustment in Saskatchewan, Manitoba or Alberta? Did the provincial governments agree to it?

Mr. Goodale: Absolutely.

Mr. Woolliams: You say one thing and do another. Were they consulted? If they were consulted, I say it is a political mistake. You can say they are in agreement. If so, then table the letters; let us see them. My friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale) seems to be upset. We know why he is upset; it is because he knows that back home in the towns of Radville, Ceylon, and others—I could name a few towns in his constituency because I was there before he was—he will have trouble with the villagers and the townspeople. He knows he will have trouble, and that is why he is grumbling.

An hon. Member: He is running third in the poll in Assiniboia.

Mr. Woolliams: I would not have given him that much credit. He is only running third; that is too bad! If the hon. member for Assiniboia thinks the metric conversion will not be an expensive disruption, if he thinks it is politically good and economically sound, let him stand in his place and say so, so that every voter in Assiniboia will be able to judge him at the polls.

Mr. Goodale: Stick around for an hour, and I will.

Mr. Woolliams: I will be here. I have made my point and I have explained what is wrong. I trust that the government will see the insanity of that in which they are engaged.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I think the point has been very well taken: I am referring to the point made by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) and the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) on the question of the landholding system. I am a supporter of the worth-while characteristics of the metric system because it is simpler and better. However, the fact remains that what we are rushing to do here in the House with such indecent haste is because the machine companies of the world, the automobile companies of the world and, in general, the international companies of the world are dominating all the parliaments in the world.

If they are going to trade internationally, as they do, it is much simpler and cheaper for them to use the same system of weights and measures. So let us not kid ourselves about this bill. It is simply a device for the convenience of and the saving of money of the companies engaged in international trade; that is all. I am not the only one who believes that. The government House leader, who is present in the House now, was asked yesterday about the business of the House. Let me read his answer. He said:

I propose to call the metric conversion bill because of the necessity of having it in effect for the convenience of the grain trade by February 1.

It is purely for the convenience of the grain trade and so that they can save money, not for the person who goes to the store to pick up a package and finds that it is .738 millimetres and wonders what that is. This is simply a device to try to get the United States and Canada in harmony in its measuring system with the rest of the world. We have to accept this pressure because we want to trade in the world. I point this out with that background.

The main point we should take into account is the one which was made in the early stages of the debate by the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. McIsaac). I do not have his words before me at the moment, but in effect he said that he was disturbed because this was bureaucracy gone overboard in its enthusiasm to get something done. There has been no consultation with the people, no education of the people—I will come back to that in a moment—that would stop a tremendous uproar developing, particularly among the people who will be hard hit one month from now, the farmers of western Canada.

Comments have been made already about the tremendous cost of the conversion, the disruption of changing all our titles from acres to hectares and of changing the traditional ways of the farmers who have been brought up to know certain measurements. All these things have become part of the culture of our people, and suddenly this change is hitting our farmers first.

Here is the point I want to make. We have been selling grain in the world markets for a long, long time and we have always used the metric system in the sale of our grain. We have sold our grain by tons. This measure is to save a little time and money for the people who sit in their nice, warm offices with electronic calculators on hand. They change the figures from bushels to tons and from acres to hectares, and put it in the figures that world markets use. We will not sell one bushel of grain more because of this legislation, and we will not get one cent more for the grain. All we will do is make it more convenient for the grain trade so that their paid employees do not have to change the figures. The farmer sitting in his truck, or stepping out of the windy, draughty elevator will have to make the changes. He will have to work in decimal points. The elevator agent standing beside him freezing in that draughty place will have to make the changes.

We are making this change just because the grain companies want to rid themselves of the inconvenience that their people have. I understand that most of the elevator scales are being switched over already. I saw the permit book last year, and hectares have already appeared. I am going to put it down to the practical type of politics. Most of us recognize the advantages and the extra efficiency that will flow from the metric system, but I think we should try to put it across in a democratic, educational way, rather than issuing edicts from above. It is no use trying to crash into the consciousness of the farmer or the painful consciousness of someone, whose eyes have seen better days, trying to read the contents of a package. My sympathy does not go to the people who work in offices, with all the apparatus they have at hand to help them; it goes to people who have to struggle with this problem under adverse conditions.

I should like to suggest how we could make this change more readily acceptable, Mr. Speaker. First of all, I do not think there is any question that if the farmer knows that by using the word "tonnes" the bookkeeping is going to be easier: he will be amenable. It is not too difficult to think in terms of tonnes, because you simply multiply or divide by the number of pounds in a metric tonne and get back to the old figures very quickly. It is the question of hectares and acres that will cause trouble, because Canadians are used to working with acres. Hardly anyone could tell you how many square feet there are in an acre, because it is not necessary to know that. The farmer knows what an acre is, and the word is part of our culture.

There are many examples of how this situation is handled in other countries. In the People's Republic of China, a country new to the world grain trade, there are 500 million people on collective farms of 30,000 acres or 40,000 acres. The men in the production brigades who work these farms still speak in the language of their forefathers for 5,000 years and uses the term "mu" when speaking of land area. Yet officials at the county or national level speak in terms of hectares. Somewhere along the line the conversion was made, but the 500 million people on the land were not asked to abandon a 5,000-year old phrase for one that does not make for one more bushel of production or any increase in price.

I would suggest that if the government were wise in regard to this bill which deals with four or five acts, they would eliminate the substitution of "hectares" for "acres". It does not make very much difference in conversion to the metric system; it is simply a bookkeeping item. It will be difficult for the farmer who is used to adding so many ounces of pesticide to the mix for an acre of land to convert that to millilitres per hectare, without making a mistake. It is all very fine in a nice, comfortable office, but it is a different proposition trying to make such calculations in a cold field over a seeder. A mistake in calculation could ruin a crop, and that would certainly give economic urgency to the complaints we may expect to hear. I do not suggest that we in the opposition should move an amendment, but surely common sense would tell the government to remove the clause which deals with hectares: it does not achieve anything.

On the subject of weight measurement, the tonne should not cause too much trouble. I do not think the farmer will complain any more than he has about the conversion to Celsius from Fahrenheit. When calculations for scientific farming have to be done on the spot without the help of a computer, there will be difficulties. However, I suggest we should continue using "acres" for another couple of years and gradually get around to "hectares".

Second, Mr. Speaker, as part of the public relations I think we should provide a simple equation instead of sending out the large books and pamphlets of instructions such as I have here. This one in my hand is for measuring the number of tonnes in a load of wheat. It is publication No. 1606 issued by Agriculture Canada. Instruction No. 2: reads

Here is how it works: calculate the depth of 1 tonne of grain in your truck box. Using the truck box in example 1—

You refer back to example 1 some place else which is hard to find. It continues:

—we have a floor area of 12.89 m^2 that will be loaded with wheat that has a volume of 1.30 m^3 per tonne.

Mr. Speaker, 90 percent of the farmers I know will be confused right there.—It continues:

To find the depth of 1 tonne of wheat, divide its volume by the area of the truck box floor, or in this case:

$$\frac{1.30\ m^3}{12.89\ m^2} = 0.10\ m\ (or\ 10\ cm)$$

For a truck box like the one in our illustration, a measuring stick marked at 10 cm intervals will indicate how many tonnes of wheat the truck holds.

Very helpful and practical! If farmer was not confused already, he is up the creek now. It goes on:

You can use a brodm-handle or some other straight stick to make a measuring stick for each crop you handle.

Whether is barley, flax, rapeseed, wheat, oats or any other crop, you need a different broom-handle. It continues:

Remember, each stick is good only for the truck (or bin) for which it is made.

For each bin, for each truck, the farmer needs a broom-handles scaled off at 10-centimetre intervals, and also for each type of grain. The poor man will be going around with a big load of broom-handles. I think I have read enough, Mr. Speaker. The farmer out in that cold, draughty field in the springtime or in ten below weather loading his grain, who is striving to keep the decimals clear in his mind, will demand explanations from the candidates in the next election. I think I have said enough to make the point.

Serious-minded people in this House and in the country will, I think, accept the fact that we have to move to the worldwide metric system because there is only one world of trade. But let us go forward with some compassion for those who have to do the work in the fields. The examples I have given show the uproar that will come from the rural areas. I think the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley was right when he said it is as bad as the proposed gun control regulations. No Liberal candidate or member of parliament will want to appear at a public meeting where these matters come up. These things are imposed upon us by bureaucrats, Mr. Speaker, which has the reputation for trying to control and regulate everybody. It does not help at all to impose these silly things upon us, but, Mr. Speaker, we do want to be completely metric. I know that we must change some of our terminology and keep up with the times.

As a young lad I remember, when out hunting in the bush with older men, that one of the older fellows in the party got a little warm and said, "Across that ridge, about a mile away over the hill in the bush, there is a Swedish chap who is homesteading. Let's visit him." We climbed over the ridge and went to the homesteader's shack. One of the older men in the party said to the Swedish lad, a great, tall, burly, blonde-headed giant, "Olly, have you got a crock?" Olly looked him squarely in the eye and said, "I don't know what's the matter with you Canadians I came to this country 15 years ago and it took me 15 years to learn to say a jug"—he pronounced it with a "Y", "yug"—"and now you call it a crock."

I am trying to make my point, clear with this illustration. We must change from "yug" to "crock"—at least we must make such changes occasionally. But, for heaven's sake, take it easy on the poor guy on the production side of the economy who is trying to sell his product in a convenient and profitable fashion.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, may I begin my remarks in this totally non-partisan debate by suggesting that the government should consider some of the sensible suggestions made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton). If the exceptions he suggested were made, I do not think the implementation, in principle, of the metric system would suffer.

I think most members of this House can see the value of the metric system. It is a simple system, based on multiples of ten, and is used in many countries of the world. Basically, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain summed up the feelings of many people who come from the prairies about the difficulties the metric system will cause, particularly to the farmers of this country. Our farmers will need to learn the new system. However, I do not foresee any great economic advantage which will accrue to our farmers and to society from the difficulties and torment of learning the new system. As the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain noted, we shall not sell more wheat just because we adopt a new system. The adoption of this bill as it applies to farmers will facilitate matters somewhat for international companies trading in grain and the like. But it probably will not help us sell more grain. If the government is serious about selling more grain, it should talk seriously to governments around the world about reviving the International Grains Agreement which lapsed, so far as this country is concerned, several years ago.

We shall feel the effects in the next few weeks of the lack of such an agreement when we witness how the price of grain on world markets fluctuates according to the whim of speculators. The price will not be governed by any kind of rational pricing system or agreement. Surely it would be better to enact measures which would facilitate exports and trade, instead of fooling around with the metric system.

Our farmers face some very real problems involving the metric system. As has been said before, farms on the prairies have been surveyed: we have talked of farms in terms of square miles, sections of land, quarter sections, and so on. We have townships, correctional lines, sections, and the like. We have used such measurements deliberately and carefully over the years. Those measurements form part of the culture, not just of the farmers in western Canada but of all the people, particularly those on the prairies. Changing such a system will mean a great deal of difficulty for individual farmers and, as well, much additional cost for all farmers and society as a whole.

I should like the minister responsible to tell the House how much our metric conversion will cost the farmers of this country. How much will the total conversion cost? Can anyone estimate what the cost will be to the public treasury? I think we should be concerned about cost, in our capacity as parliamentarians. We must ask if this bill will bring to the people of Canada tangible benefits, or will the cost of conversion outweigh the benefits? I am thinking particularly of the farming segment when I say that. Will it be worthwhile for farmers? As others have said, conversion will create great anxieties and problems for farmers. Many farmers have approached me and said, "If the new system is adopted in the spring, how will I adjust my seeders and drills? When I go to seed my crop, how will I adjust my drill to seed in hectares, since the drill has been set up to seed by the acre?" Perhaps the minister can explain to the farmers of western Canada what they ought to do. I am not being political; I am merely repeating something which I as a member from western Canada have heard time and again from farmers of all political stripes.

Let me raise some further points of concern. If the farmer is to deal in hectares, how will he know how much fertilizer to put on his land, since he has been used to dealing in acres? Or how will he know how much chemical spray to use for any given number of hectares? These are questions of real difficulty for farmers. If the farmer buys land, how can he judge how many hectares will fit, say, into a quarter section? Our whole system of measurements will go through a radical change. I suspect that farmers, more than any other group in society, will be affected in a practical way by the changeover to the metric system. They are concerned about the coming change.

Some farmers can visualize the benefits of the new system. For instance farmers, as well as others, can see the benefits of the adoption of the Celsius system with respect to temperature. We all know that changes must come, and do not argue the point. However, farmers will face all kinds of practical problems with the changeover. They will face effects which may be completely different to those affecting the rest of us as we change over to the metric system. We shall need to become accustomed to thinking in terms of hectares instead of acres, kilometres instead of miles, litres instead of gallons, and the like. As well, the farmer must deal with his tools and educate himself about the various sizes of tools he needs to repair farm machinery or perform other functions on the farm. Clearly, farmers face some very real difficulties.

May I make a suggestion? If the government is not in favour of providing certain exemptions, as suggested, let it at least provide some program of education for farmers and some program of assistance and compensation whereby farmers could be compensated for some of the economic losses they will endure. One cannot compensate farmers for all the agony and torment they will go through in learning the new system, but one can compensate them for the economic loss they will suffer. I appeal to the government to consider allowing some of the exemptions which have been suggested.

Speaking personally, from my somewhat limited knowledge of farming I suggest that if we could exempt certain aspects of farming we would make conditions a great deal easier for farmers and farm products for the country would probably be cheaper. That would still not hinder the implementation of the metric system in this country. Surely that is the least we can do as parliamentarians.

My last point is this. I have the impression, which is not wrong, I think, that farm organizations and municipalities across the prairies—indeed, right across Canada—have not been adequately canvassed and consulted about the effects of metric conversion. I think the government ought to pause a moment, ought to consult farm organizations, rural municipalities and other affected communities and ask what they think about the government's program. Let it ask them for suggestions which might change the program without hurting the principle of what the government is trying to achieve in the long run. I do not think that would hurt the government and it would not hurt the process of metric conversion. I do not think you can impose something like this upon the people of this country and expect them to sit idly by like sheep or puppets.

We have a lot of problems in this country. Many are caused by governments and bureaucrats making decisions in offices without any comprehension of what the result of the decision will be on the farm or in the factory. The implementation of something like this may seem a little thing to city people. They say, "Can't the farmer convert something from an acre to a hectare?" That is the attitude of a lot of people. If you keep making decisions like that, how can you expect the people to have any real pride in Canadianism, a fervour to do something for the country, or a spirit of commitment? How can you expect the people of this country to be productive and pull together like people in some other countries if you constantly put obstacles of this sort in their path?

If we were to create some difficulties that in the end would help the people, I am sure they would understand. However, doing something like this will not build up their morale. It will not make the farm population more productive, nor will it make them more enthusiastic Canadians. They will not have any more love for Ottawa, federal institutions and federal structures at a time when this is badly needed. The government could get around part of this by pausing at this time, going to the prairies and saying, "This is what we plan". They should consult the people there. There should be input from farm organizations and local governments. The government should honestly be open to some changes in possible exemptions, or perhaps a longer staging of the implementation of the metric system. If the government went there with that openness and willingness to listen, the people of rural, western Canada would be very happy and gratified.

We need that type of thing. People must genuinely feel that federal institutions are working on their behalf, working with them and not doing things to them. Too many people believe that the federal government and eastern Canada are doing things to them because of all the inequities in this country. Without rambling on, I plead once more for the government to take a second look at some parts of this bill as it pertains to western agriculture, with a view to having input from the farmers and others who are affected. They should look seriously, as human beings, to making some sensible exceptions to our conversion to the metric system.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few comments on this bill in spite of the fact that metrication now seems firmly on the road to being established in this country, and the fact that any debate at this point is more or less superfluous. Metrication is pretty well a fait accompli and we only have the trimmings to put in place.

What disturbs most Canadians is the fact that they have had very little to say about metrication or the implementation thereof. This was alluded to by my colleague from Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) and my good friend the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom). One reason is that the decision to proceed with the metric conversion program has been essentially by government decree. As such, it has been imposed upon Canadians in a rather arbitrary manner. Hon. members will recall that the principle of metrication was brought forth in a form of resolution, not a piece of legislation.

I want to make reference to the well-reasoned and rational approach to this piece of legislation by my colleague from Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain who placed on the record in a very articulate way some of the very serious shortcomings this legislation will impose upon the producers of western Canada and, indeed, the agricultural industry as a whole.

This bill is a sort of omnibus bill. It sets out to amend some nine different existing statutes, all aimed at facilitating the metric conversion process. I understand there will be something in the order of 81 more statutes which will have to be amended in order to accommodate the metric system.

I want to touch briefly on three different areas. First, I want to comment on the statements made by the minister responsible for this legislation upon introduction of the bill. Second, I want to deal briefly with the impact of metrication upon the consumer. Finally, I want to deal with the impact of this piece of legislation and, in fact, the whole metric system, upon the agricultural sector.

In his address to this House when introducing this bill, the minister stated that the United States, our biggest trading partner—indeed, the largest trading partners in the world are the United States and Canada—is proceeding very rapidly with its program of metric conversion. I take issue with that statement. From my examination of the subject and from reading some of the debates before Congress and some of the American press, it does not seem as though the United States is proceeding very rapidly. My understanding is that they are still considering the pros and cons of the metric system and have been doing so since 1790. They still have a great deal of ambivalence toward this system. My conclusion is that their approach to metrication is something less than aggressive. In other words, they are not proceeding with this "go for broke" attitude as we are in this country.

It is interesting to note a survey conducted by the National Federation of Independent Business, a very large, independent business organization which has representatives in every part of the United States, some 400,000 members. The survey revealed that their membership was pretty well split on whether America should go with metric. At best, it seems very unlikely that total conversion will ever be a reality in the United States of America.

Many are concerned that conversion will endanger American jobs by making the U.S. more vulnerable to imports. Many workers have pointed out that they will reluctantly take early retirement rather than learn the new system. Farmers will never be ardent advocates of the metric system because of its cost and inconvenience with relatively no advantage. With this background, and having regard to this reaction and attitude toward the metric system—and, I might say, the lack of any broad support—the United States has opted for a cautious, rational plan in the conversion process without any compulsory features such as we see in our program. They have opted for a voluntary conversion program. This is alluded to in many articles which I have examined over the course of the past couple of weeks. For example, the Wall Street Journal of August 20, 1976, states as follows:

> Last November a divided Congress shied away from mandating that the United States switch to the metric system of measurement, compromising instead on a national board to co-ordinate voluntary conversion.

In this way, the metric system will proceed in an orderly and rational manner. It will be imposed as industry becomes ready for it, and not before. In that connection, it is obvious that in the United States it is industry rather than the government which has been the leader. Some of the largest industrial concerns, particularly those engaged in multinational activity, have been leaders in the conversion process. Naturally, when they embark upon conversion their suppliers have to follow suit. The program is being implemented in an orderly manner with the minimum amount of disruption and economic impact.

● (1640)

There does not seem to be the compulsion in the United States which we have associated with this program in Canada. Persuasion, yes, but compulsion, no. I presume the multinational corporations in the United States are leaders in the conversion program because they are probably in the best position to pass along the cost involved in the form of higher prices to the consumer. Let there be no mistake; the consumer will ultimately bear the cost of metric conversion. No one has yet produced to me one scintilla of evidence that the metric system will benefit consumers. I have yet to see any cost analysis done in that connection.

An hon. Member: What is a scintilla?

Mr. Mazankowski: The cost of conversion remains a highly significant factor. For example, General Motors which is a leader in the conversion process, has suggested that the cost will amount to about 1 per cent of gross sales over a period of ten years. But smaller firms, machine shops, small manufacturers and retailers suggest that their costs will escalate by as much as 20 per cent or 30 per cent in a period of a year or two during the firms' conversion process. These firms, however, state that they find no problem in adopting the system as far as cost is concerned, because they simply pass the cost along. One would think that in these times of inflationary pressure such increases would be regarded as a significant element in contributing to increased living costs and that we might contemplate slowing down the conversion process during a period of so-called restraint. I do not believe tha imposition of metric conversion is an effective way of fighting inflation. I repeat—the consumer will end up paying and he will be frustrated in the process.

I turn, now, to consider the impact this legislation will have upon the agricultural industry. I should point out, first of all, that farmers are not only producers; they are also major consumers. So this program will get them in the neck on both counts. While they constitute only 6 per cent of the national population, they spend more than $5 billion on materials and services associated with food production. No less than 45 per cent of Canada's gross national product is related to agriculture and allied industries.

As I stated earlier, and as explained by industry spokesmen both in Canada and the United States, the cost of conversion will merely be passed on, and to this extent farmers, as consumers, will be faced with increased costs. But there is an essential difference. Farmers do not enjoy the luxury of being able to pass on additional costs to consumers at will. They have to take what the market gives them. So we can expect the bulk of the conversion cost as it relates to agriculture to come out of the pocket of the farmer. If we consider the net farm income picture, which shows that in 1976 income was down by some 16 per cent compared to 1975—and net income for 1977 is expected to be below that for 1973—we cannot expect producers to be very enthusiastic about the prospects of additional costs associated with metrication.

Metric System

In addition to the element of cost, there is bound to be a great deal of inconvenience and confusion. We have come a long way in agriculture in terms of the standardization of repair parts—bearings, chains, hoses, and things of that nature. The advent of the metric system simply harms that trend. New tools will be required. The service industry, an important component of the agriculture industry, will be seriously affected. Inconvenience and confusion will be impossible to avoid, yet they are not accompanied by a single assurance of ultimate benefit to the agricultural industry either in the short or the long-term.

The minister told us that most of the farm organizations had endorsed metrication. This is surprising to me, because when those of us who represent rural constituencies talk to our constituents we find that people at the grass roots show little enthusiasm for the program. I would suspect that the government has consulted only the leaders of farm organizations and that those leaders have failed adequately to canvass their membership. Anyway, to judge from the evidence I have received, they certainly could not have consulted the producers.

The United States farm bureau, which is the largest farm organization in America, said in 1975 that adoption of the metric system did not have very high priority among its leaders. As far as the Canadian producer is concerned, it seems to me that on the international market we have been doing quite well in selling our grain to the elevator in bushels which are later converted into metric tons for sale abroad. The United States has also been doing quite well. The fact is that when customers need our grain they will buy it whether it is in bushels, pints or litres. The farmers, as I have pointed out, will be strangled with the cost of changes which will have to be made in the elevator system, such as scales modifications, with no significant benefit to them.

● (1650)

The other point I want to make is that the report on metric conversion and the grain market issued by the Canadian Livestock Feed Board points out that while we in Canada are going to convert from bushels to tonnes, the Chicago board of trade, with which we compete and with which we compare prices, will be continuing for some years using the Imperial measurement system. Therefore, this will again create confusion and additional cost. The grain transport industry, we are told, will continue for years under the present system. That point is also made in this publication. The report reads in part:

> The grain transport industry will continue to use the present system for some years yet. No official date has been set for the rail and road transport systems to go metric in freight rate quotations.

So we will have a situation where trucks that come to the elevators will be weighed using the Imperial system of measurement, which will be converted to metric for payment and storage purposes and then will have to be converted back to the Imperial measure to accommodate our rail transportation system. It seems like a lot of extra work and a lot of bungling.

Mr. Kempling: There may even be another bill.

Mr. Mazankowski: My colleague says there may be another bill. In the transportation field I have already pointed out that the changes are not due to take place for many years. It could be five, ten or two years. It was pointed out earlier that the knowledge producers have gained in terms of using the descriptions and the cliches is all part and parcel of the tools and culture of the trade. This knowledge will now all become essentially redundant.

Some 40 pages of documentation will require study on the part of elevator agents. They have been going to school in order to become proficient in the metric system. One really must ask who is going to gain. As my colleague pointed out, it certainly will not be the producer. If anyone, it will be those associated with the grain trade. I do not think we need go as far as converting bushels to tonnes. We have done well in the past selling bushels to the elevators, using metric tonnes in the international marketplace.

This leads me to another point, and that is the conversion of acres to hectares. Anyone who has lived in the west will know at a glance that this proposed conversion will be very serious in terms of geography, tradition and, indeed, our culture. It has been pointed out by my friend from Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) that it will be a tremendous task to record land descriptions and make the necessary legal adjustments in registering land.

In that connection it is interesting to note, on examining the testimony given before the Congressional Senate committee in 1975, that the United States has made a firm commitment not to proceed with the conversion from acres to hectares, and I think this is a very important precedent which we should consider during the processing of this piece of legislation. It seems to me that if use of the acre is realistic in the United States, it certainly should be realistic in this country. If we convert to the hectare and the United States stays with the acre, then in terms of comparison and in terms of dealing with our great agricultural neighbour to the south we will be at a disadvantage. I would urge, as other speakers have, that the minister seriously reconsider the change from bushels to tonnes and from acres to hectares. I think we should provide this added flexibility in this legislation to accommodate a very important industry in this country, one which represents a very important economic sector of Canada. I do not think that the average farmer has really sensed the significance of metric conversion. When he wakes up and finds out just what it all means, Mr. Speaker, he is going to be very, very angry and disappointed.

While the metric system may dominate the world, there are still a number of valid exceptions in those countries that have adopted the metric system. For example, I understand that while Sweden uses the metric system, use is made of inches and feet in the construction of homes and in the lumber industry. I understand, as well, that in South America measures of pipe and lumber are still those of the Imperial system. I wonder, for example, what will happen in the aviation field, which essentially is an international field. Will it convert, or become one of the exceptions as well?

It seems to me that if we are interested in practicality and in common sense, we should give this measure further thought. I suggest that if we fail to do so, when the full impact of this legislation becomes known to the farmers the fat will really hit the fire and we will hear a lot of resentment of, and opposition to, the metric system. I hope that in the course of this debate the minister will seriously consider some of the very realistic and positive suggestions that have been advanced.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful for an opportunity to say a few words in this discussion with respect to metric conversion in Canada. I will direct my remarks particularly to an area of great importance to my part of Canada, the grains industry with which Bill C-23 is largely concerned.

Change is always difficult to accept, especially when it affects important aspects of our daily living and our ways of earning a livelihood. People, quite naturally, develop a very strong attachment to familiar things and processes and there is predictable reluctance to something different. The metric conversion process is a classic example of this. Because of the magnitude of the change which is involved in this process and the impact which it will have upon people involved in the grains industry, particularly farmers, I am naturally concerned about the proposals contained in Bill C-23, and believe it is absolutely essential that the facts of this matter be clearly understood.

I want to deal with a few of the aspects of metric conversion affecting grain which may not be fully appreciated but upon the basis of which I believe this measure is not only supportable but is also in the best long-run interests of all segments of the grains industry, including producers in the prairie region. First, it should be noted that this change has a broad and virtually unanimous base of support in the farm community.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Goodale: Other speakers have referred to this but in most cases have tended to play down that fact.

Mr. Stewart (Marquette): Have you been talking to any farmers during the Christmas recess?

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, hon. members opposite suggest that consultation with farmers is required. Without any suggestion or encouragement on their part, I spent a great deal of time not only during the Christmas recess but before, talking with farmers in my area about this proposal before I finally made up my mind on the subject. I did not find the degree of antagonism which they perhaps see, or perhaps it would be more proper to say that they would like to see and would like to foment.

● (1700)

As I was saying, this measure has a very broad and virtually unanimous base of support in the organized farming community. In the first place, I would point to the remarks of the minister responsible for small business who is handling this bill for the government, who on December 21 of last year, at page 2230 of Hansard is reported as indicating that metric conversion in the grains industry has the active support of organizations such as the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the National Farmers Union, the Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta Wheat Pools and the United Grain Growers. All of these are direct producer or producer-owned organizations and they are most anxious to see this resolution in place by February 1, 1977. Many of them, indeed, have made vigorous representations in this respect.

It is important, as well, to note the vehicle which has been utilized by the grains industry to deal with the process of conversion. I refer to the hardworking and longstanding metric conversion committee of the Canada Grains Council under the chairmanship of Mr. Earl Baxter, a well-known and widely-respected grain man. The membership of the council has been involved very directly in the positive work of that council's committee. That membership includes 28 separate firms and organizations associated with grain production, marketing, transportation and handling across Canada, many of them based in western Canada.

I will not take the time of the House to run through the full list of groups in the council, nor will I name at this time the very distinguished list of officers and directors of the council. I would simply point to the involvement of such organizations as the Canadian Seed Growers Association, the Hudson Bay Route Association, the Manitoba Farm Business Association, the Palliser Wheat Growers Association, the Rapeseed Association of Canada, the Union of Manitoba Municipalities and the Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities, and so on; and those are in addition to the CFA and UGG and others which were mentioned before. These are groups and organizations which form an active working base of the Canada Grains Council Committee.

I should also point out another interesting and important point which demonstrates the kind of support for metric conversion among western grain organizations and producer groups. While certain of these groups have, for their own reasons, withdrawn from the Canada Grains Council in other respects—and here I refer to the three prairie pools which indicate a very large farm membership including a large majority of prairie producers—these organizations have, nonetheless, participated fully in the metric work of the Canada Grains Council committee, despite the fact they have withdrawn from the council for other purposes. I think that is a significant point in demonstrating an important basis of support for the thrust of what is proposed in Bill C-23.

Let me now, Mr. Speaker, make a second general point which relates to what is going on in this connection in the United States. No doubt we in Canada, as others have pointed out, are ahead in this regard. We are years behind the rest of the industrialized world, but we are somewhat ahead of the United States. The conversion process is going on there as well, but in that country it is not yet as far advanced as it is in Canada.

The general impression of many people closely involved with Canadian agriculture, and particularly with grain, is that there is no question about the United States intention of converting and the likelihood that it will be moving at an accelerated pace. Indeed, if you look at developments in the United States with respect to metric conversion in the last year to 18 months, you can see that acceleration beginning to develop, compared, for example, to what was happening two, three or four years ago. As well, for comparison purposes it is important to remember that the general commitment in Canada to conversion took place at least six years ago. It is obviously important for Canada to be slightly ahead in this connection, and not slightly behind. Therefore, I would suggest that the order of things is correct in this regard.

I want to deal, as well, with the question of cost, which has been mentioned, or more particularly with cost savings. A lot of people have been skeptical about the matter. In response to that skepticism I have asked the committee of the Grains Council to demonstrate clearly where the cost savings are, and it has produced a detailed analysis which indicates an annual saving to the grains industry in the order of $1 million. Over the long term I suggest that is, indeed, a significant saving. It is of a magnitude that should seriously be considered by those who would oppose this particular development.

Having said all that, may I clearly express my concern, which I share with my colleague the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. McIsaac) and, more importantly, with farmers about the impact of this change. I think the minister responsible for this measure is also sensitive to these concerns. I was glad to hear members opposite today, like the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton), express clear support for the principles involved in our conversion to the metric system. I was concerned that we might be up against a stone wall over there in this respect, but I see that is not, in fact, the case. I am grateful for that degree of receptivity and I, for one, am prepared to examine all suggestions for ameliorating any negative consequences which could possibly result from the conversion process. Indeed, I have been active in making suggestions in this direction to the minister and government officials involved.

In particular, I agree with the general suggestion about a thorough and effective educational program for everyone affected in the context of Bill C-23, but particularly for farmers. I also agree with the idea of as gradual a conversion process as seems reasonably feasible, given the state of developments at the present moment. In that context we have to remember the very significant work that has already been done by the Canada Grains Council committee, work that now stretches back over the better part of six or seven years and which has had a great deal of support and active involvement from the farming community across Canada, particularly the grain industry in the west.

I believe that on this side there is a willingness to hear and understand the concerns which have not only been expressed today and on other occasions when we have debated this measure but have been expressed in other places and at other times by farmers in particular. I think there is still, as well, a willingness to respond in a sensitive and sensible way. I will be active in working with the responsible minister in this connection and I hope that members on all sides of this House will adopt the same kind of positive approach to this very difficult and delicate issue which can, I think, by the admission of all involved—whether they may in the short-term oppose or support it—work in the best interests of all of Canada, including the grains industry.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, it is a little difficult to find new things to say on this subject after the number of speeches that have already been made, but I would like to add a few comments in order to voice my concerns and reservations about the proposal. We all accept the fact that many eminent individuals, institutions and organizations have urged at one time or another that a system common to the whole world in respect of weights and measures should be adopted. Perhaps one can think of many advantages when looking at this from a theoretical point of view. It is perhaps fair to say that no one has strongly challenged the benefits that may be achieved by a system which is similar or the same throughout the world.

One could make some suggestions with regard to practical considerations. Theoretically, one could accept easily enough that there should be advantages if everybody talked the same language in so far as weights and measures are concerned, but I suggest that practical considerations make it rather impractical to hope that such can be achieved without great difficulty in many areas of Canadian life.

The area I would like to stress is the psychological effect on people; if nothing else, the fear of the unknown, so to speak. There is a fear of being taken out of a system with which everyone is familiar and being cast into an unknown situation. There may be some psychological disadvantages resulting from being tossed into an unknown world and out of the area where one feels comfortable. It has been mentioned that weights and measures in pounds, inches and so on have indeed become part of our very culture and part of the custom and way of life we enjoy.

I suppose to illustrate one might say that it would be very useful if in this world everybody spoke the same language. No doubt there would be advantages in terms of communication between people. Perhaps that could even prevent wars, and it certainly would contribute to greater understanding between people and nations. However, that is not being done. Nobody is promoting very seriously the idea that because there are so many advantages all nations should abandon their native tongues and accept some common language which everybody in the world could speak.

The reasons are obvious. One reason is that people have a psychological attachment to the language with which they have been living all their lives and to which they are accustomed. There is a psychological attachment to the culture they have enjoyed, so they simply refuse, in spite of a long list of advantages which I am sure anybody could envisage, to adopt a common language the world over. I think that same argument, perhaps less forcibly, applies in so far as trying to accept or impose on the world a common system of weights and measures.

I am not convinced that the scientific superiority which it is theorized would occur from this conversion would indeed be an advantage or should, indeed, prevail over the established commercial customs and practices with which we are all familiar; and if there is a scientific superiority of some sort which would prevail, the government has been very weak in making the case and many questions remain unanswered.

We have not seen any kind of cost projection in Canada. We have seen some studies from the United States, but we have not seen any studies here as to what the long-range benefits might be. There has not been a cost-benefit study done weighing the benefits against the disadvantages or weighing the disadvantages over whatever benefits might occur in the long run. We know from American studies that the Americans expect their metrification to cost somewhere around $50 billion. If we calculate, on the ratio basis, their population to ours, I suppose it would be safe to assume that the cost to Canada would be somewhere in the vicinity of $5 billion. We have to ask ourselves, from the economic point of view, whether today, when Canada is experiencing severe inflation and severe difficulty with its economy, we should be pushing so fast and so hard to impose this additional $5 billion price tag on the people of Canada.

Of course, it will be the people of Canada who will be paying, not this government nor any of the hon. members opposite who have spoken and who are so convinced that we must rush into this and complete the conversion by 1980. I think it has to be shown that a balanced study of some kind has been carried out with regard to the long-term benefits as opposed to whatever short-term expediency might be envisaged by the government in jumping into this change.

In deciding to proceed with this metrification program, what costs must be considered? I submit that the list is a very long one. In terms of cost this conversion will affect virtually every citizen of the country. The people who are involved in the manufacturing industry seem to be convinced that this is a good thing. I submit perhaps that they are the only ones who are. Perhaps only those in the manufacturing sector of our economy can show clearly that there will be some sort of advantage, the advantage being that their products will be more easily interchangeable and perhaps, therefore, more easily exported to other countries of the world where the metric system is already in effect.

However, we must think of the machinery and tools of production which must be changed. If we are talking about agriculture, new scales in grain elevators will be required. At service stations new gas pumps with new numbers will be required. At home new gas meters and water meters will be required. On highways there will need to be new highway signs. Clothing manufacturers will need to use new clothing dimensions. The construction industry will require new plans and specifications and will have to operate under different systems. All these things add very substantially to the cost of production. I submit that in view of those costs at a time when we are trying to increase our productivity—and the government admits that is the most successful way of beating inflation in the long run—we will wind up with a slowdown in productivity while everybody tries to adjust.

Just to give an example of the cost of machinery, a meat-packing plant in my constituency which does a moderate business estimates that just to change the scales and other machines the plant is looking at a price tag of about $3,000. Perhaps to a government which deals with billions of dollars that does not sound like very much, but to a small business operation it can be a significant amount.

There are a whole bunch of other considerations which we call intangibles. We will have to learn new words and how to use them. We will have to try to get our brains adjusted to new numbers. If a person is running a lumber yard and somebody comes to his place of business and asks for 5.08 × 10.15, 305 centimetres long, what do hon. members think he will be asking for? Suppose he asks for a nail 6.349 centimetres long. What should he be given? We will be ordering sheets of plywood 1.22 × 2.43 metres. All these are simply figures—but they just do not register.

I see that my hon. friend who used to be an Edmonton Eskimo has stepped out of the House temporarily, but when I was listening to the other debaters I looked at him and thought of Miss Edmonton Eskimo. When we recall that last year's Miss Edmonton Eskimo's qualifications were 36-24-36, that has some immediate impact on the minds of Canadians. If her qualifications were expressed as 92-61-92, I am afraid that the impact would be far different and less meaningful.

An hon. Member: Wow!

Mr. Yewchuk: I am saying this to try to emphasize the disruption which will occur to the registering processes in people's brains which have been imprinted there during the course of the experiences of their lifetimes. Suddenly to take this, to scrap it all and try to re-educate everybody is totally unrealistic. It just cannot be done. I practiced medicine before I came into politics. Hospitals converted a long time ago, but when I was in medical school—which is not that long ago; I graduated in 1960—we still thought of temperatures in terms of Fahrenheit. After, metrification, when nurses phoned me to tell me that a child's temperature was 38 degrees, I always automatically asked her to tell me what that was in Fahrenheit. They had a chart with Centigrade on one side and Fahrenheit on the other. Thirty-eight degrees does not register on my brain, and I submit that this is a problem which is common to all aspects of Canadian life. When someone is given a number from another system, it does not register. That person does not know for sure what it means, so we wind up with the possibility of all kinds of technical people making all kinds of mistakes and, indeed, some of those mistakes could be very serious.

• (1720)

I have mentioned already that during the process of trying to learn new measurements there is bound to be a slowdown in production. You can take the example of a mechanic working on a motor. He sees a nut of a certain size and he automatically reaches for the right wrench. If you give him a metric nut—no pun intended on any member on the other side of the House—he has to examine all his wrenches to select the one which fits that nut, and it is no longer automatic. The effect is that he becomes less productive; it takes him longer to repair the motor because he has to spend time selecting his wrenches, something which was automatic before.

We have to ask ourselves this question. Because of this loss of experience, so to speak, how many mistakes will be made in industry, science, medicine, in the bakery or in the kitchen? The housewife will no longer be able to use her cook book. She is familiar with a cupful as a measurement, but the new directions will be in millilitres. This should not be taken as a reflection on housewives, but they will be at least as confused any anyone else trying to get used to this new system.

The question, then, is: When you are looking at the price-tag of metrification, how do you calculate the cost of psychological factors, the intangible discomforts which we will have to face? I submit it is almost impossible to put a price-tag on these intangible but great discomforts, and the very roots of our thinking will be taxed and shaken.

I would be inclined to agree with the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) that the world is moving in that direction and indeed that many countries in the world are using the metric system. But if we are to accept it, we should take a little more time and perhaps begin in the schools, in grade one, to teach the system to the children first. In a generation or so the changeover will be very simple, almost automatic. But we are rushing to complete it by 1980 and because of that all kinds of unnecessary new stresses are being placed on the minds of Canadians.

I think it would be useful to look at this question from many points of view. One of them is that there may be an advantage in converting to the metric system because anyone who uses machinery of a certain type will have to change over and buy new machinery and different kinds of equipment. So there will be a sudden stimulus in the manufacturing sector to produce new equipment which will be required. Perhaps this is an advantage at a time of high unemployment, but the disadvantages are indeed very great.

A proper profit and loss assessment of this proposal has never been made in the Canadian context. I have already touched on the reasons in part, namely, that the concept of a simple addition of the benefits which may occur, or of the greater cost which may be involved, is simply not feasible because the intangibles are virtually impossible to assess. Some attempts have been made in the United States, for example, to communicate with industry, with labour, with agriculture and with scientific groups, asking each one of them to outline what they construe to be the benefits and the disadvantages in terms of cost. From what I can gather, the manufacturing sector thought there might be advantages. But the advantages of this system are not obvious, and the disadvantages in the immediate future can readily be seen because it is in the immediate future that the conversion and the added expense have to take place. The advantages will not be visible for a number of years. The estimates for recovery of the cost in the manufacturing sector show that recovery will take place only after about 15 years.

In agriculture, for example, if it takes as long as 15 years to recover the cost of conversion to the metric system it is a long time. Many farmers do not have 15 years on a farm. The way things are today, with costs escalating beyond belief, this added cost could well be the last straw that breaks the camel's back and drives an ever greater number of farmers off the land into another area where the net income is much more attractive.

Let us consider the construction industry and how it will be affected. Today everyone is trained in the system of Imperial weights and measures. I am speaking of planners and architects who know what the standards specifications are in feet and inches when they measure plywood, windows, doors or door-frames. All these things are part of their existing knowledge. If you start measuring everything in centimetres it will cause mass confusion and require mass retraining. It is quite easy to see that the labourer's costs will be very great. He will have to buy new tools. If he works for an employer, his tools might be bought for him, but if he is self-employed he has no such option. Then there is the question as to who will bear the cost of retraining.

Coming back to what I said before, metrication means, in effect, loss of experience. With one fell swoop you take an experienced mechanic and make him inexperienced because he has to learn a new system. His productivity will decline because of his loss of experience in his trade. What is the dollar value of that, and who will absorb it?

I wanted to make reference to non-manufacturing businesses, to the service industry. From all the studies I was able to make it is obvious that no great advantages will accrue to the restaurants. The owner will be at a disadvantage because he will have to buy new tools, new scales, and so on. In no way will that increase his productivity or his return. He might have to retrain his cooks and kitchen help to think metric, but he will not thereby increase their productivity. You cannot bake any more pies by using centimetres. So in the service industry there will certainly be added costs but no visible advantages.

Let us consider the educational system. There are all kinds of things to consider there. If you talk to the chairman of any school board in this country and ask him how his budget stands, virtually all of them will tell you that their budget is grossly overstrained because of rising costs. However, all the textbooks will have to be converted; and who will absorb the cost of rewriting the textbooks? In the area of education there is clearly an advantage when teaching mathematics to children. We all accept the fact that it is easier to learn the concept of decimals and the metric system than the old system. But that is overbalanced by the cost of converting textbooks and all the equipment used in schools.

I should like now to touch on the subject of agriculture, Mr. Speaker. This is an area of primary production where the costs are very obvious. They are variable, but I think substantial in terms of making alterations to machinery and so forth. There are many disadvantages in the area of agriculture, but no advantages to be seen regarding productivity. So many tons per hectare of wheat does not bring about higher productivity than under the old system. If you give a horse two kilograms of oats instead of half a gallon, the horse is not really going to eat any less; in order to keep going he will require the usual amount. If you measure the milk given by a cow in litres, it is not going to give any more milk than if you measure it in quarts. From the point of view of the farmer there is little to be gained and a lot to be lost in addition to the intangible, psychological disturbances to which I have already referred.

I should like to make a brief reference to civil aviation, Mr. Speaker. It is very important in my constituency which covers one-quarter of the province of Alberta. Charter airlines flourish in the northern regions and, indeed, air is the only practical way to travel. We have to think of the safety factor here. At present a runway is so many feet long or wide and the wind so many nautical miles per hour. But suddenly pilots are being told about metres of ground ahead and that they are so many metres from the end of the runway. Their safety could be jeopardized by this in the same way as in the French-English dispute of the air controllers who want to use their own language. Some people say this would not be safe because of the possibility of mistakes. The same applies to measurements of speed, elevation or dimensions of the runway, and so on.

All these things are presently communicated by the old system. It seems to me there is great possibility of a decrease in the safety of civil aviation unless a vigorous effort is made to retrain the people concerned into thinking metric. Air controllers would have to be retrained, and we members may have to stay here all the time because we will be afraid to travel to our constituencies in case the air controllers are not able to make the necessary calculations.

I should like to quote from a New York Times article which appeared in the Globe and Mail of December 20, 1975, which describes what is taking place in the field of civil aviation with regard to metrification. The article reads:

> Civil aviation is one field where no one is hurrying to switch to metric, because in no other area is safety so dependent upon measurement. The foot, pound and nautical mile system is used in all but communist countries for runway dimensions, in calculating distances and altitudes, for visibility and pressure gauges and in some thermometers.

We have heard nothing from the other side about this particular problem. With that, Mr. Speaker, I conclude my remarks and hope that somebody over there was listening and will provide answers to these questions before we rush this bill through the House.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I suppose if the Liberal party wanted a good example of why their popularity has been sagging lately, this would be as good a place as any to start—their method of introducing metrication. Everyone I have spoken to has some doubts about it. I do not know where the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale) has been, because in my long experience of dealing with farmers, no matter from what part of the country, I find they usually speak the same language. But the language I heard when I was out west in the last few weeks apparently was entirely different from the language the hon. member for Assiniboia would have the House and the country believe they are speaking.

A lot of reservation was expressed about this subject both in my constituency and outside, and I cannot believe the situation is any different in his constituency. Perhaps he has trained some of his supporters to accept that any policy enunciated by the Liberal party has to be good for the country. Perhaps they bow in subservience to him and do not register dissatisfaction because that might not be popular with the government. If ever the government needed friends, it is now; so this might be the time for them to come forward and then the government can downplay the amount of criticism they are getting about this measure.

I hear people say this is another case of the east shoving something down the throat of the west. That is bad enough, but I also hear the comment—which will perhaps affect members here more than the comment about the east dominating the west—that because the metric system is perhaps more synonymous with the French, that is why they are introducing it. These are comments I have heard, that perhaps it is a French Canadian who decided it is good for us, so we will have to proceed with it.

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): Oh, come on.

Mr. Korchinski: I am simply registering a comment I have heard. If it excites the hon. member, perhaps he should understand there is another part of this country. He should perhaps understand that there are members who do not represent manufacturing areas, and he should understand that this bill will only really benefit manufacturers. It does not really matter to the manufacturer, in terms of total exports, whether you read the temperature in Celsius or in Fahrenheit. A lot of people comment on that, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps it is not a complicated matter to measure degrees of frost, but a lot of people say the other system was better because they had a greater variation. From minus 40 degrees Fahrenheit to 108 degrees Fahrenheit there is a variation of 150 degrees, but from minus 40 degrees Celsius to 37 degrees Celsius there is only an 80-degree variation. What annoys a lot of farmers is that the manufacturers have said, "This is good for us" and have sold the government on the idea.

• (1740)

True, a large portion of the world is under the metric system, but in this country farmers, consumers and even manufacturers have been used to dealing with equipment of standard sizes. What will you do in future if you want to replace the old hubcaps on your car? Will the manufacturer have them in the right size? Remember, not all people buy brand new cars. What will happen when you want a new windshield but the manufacturers do not make them in the old, standard sizes? You couldn't replace it by taking an old windshield from another car. The government is oblivious to our concerns. Manufacturers say that the new system will be good for them but never mind the cost to the consumer, and the government has gone along with them.

Unfortunately, debate at this stage is useless. However, useless as it may be, we as members have the right to register our protests. We ought to have registered them five, six or seven years ago when the idea was first submitted. Perhaps the government would have approached conversion differently if we had made our views known. Perhaps it would have got some sort of guarantee from manufacturers with regard to standardization of parts. That would have been better than having this new system shoved down our throats. What happens when you want to buy a tire? Today you ask a tire dealer, "What is the size of that tire?" and he will say, "It is a G-78," or something like that. I can understand what one means when he talks of a 7.50 × 15, or 8.00 × 15, or even 8.25 × 15 tire, but I do not understand what is meant by a G-78 or an H-78 or J-78. Not only can the tire dealer not tell you anything about it, but the salesman is no help. So what is the result? There is utter confusion. This is just another case of planned obsolescence without beneficial result.

We have been told to speed passage of this bill because the grains industry needs it. I am not so sure about that. There was a sign on an elevator back home saying that the elevator was to be closed as of January 31 in order to convert to the metric system. Obviously, the operator intended to close and convert: he had all the forms prepared and he was getting ready to convert. Therefore, whether we pass this bill or not, he will have to convert to the new system. What is he to do if we do not pass this bill? Throw away all those forms?

There is no point in this exercise. The Liberal party suddenly realized that conversion was being criticized. What has it done? It has treated this question as it treated bilingualism and said, "This is good for the country. You must have it." When it implemented its bilingual policy it sent civil servants only two years from retirement for language training. It sent them on total immersion courses. The program cost millions of dollars, but cost was not a factor. Now we find that the program is not working. The government is using the same approach with the present measure.

Some members have already alluded to the confusion which will be created in the minds of farmers. For instance, some of our farm drills are spaced six or seven inches apart. If you want to test the accuracy of your drill, you know that you will plant so many kernels after you move so many feet. Now you are about to confuse the farmer by introducing variations.

Take the case of rapeseed. You must be most accurate when planting rapeseed; perhaps you need not be quite so accurate with other grains. Mistakes can be costly. Farmers have talked to me about their sprayers. The sprayer jets are spaced 20 inches apart. Farmers know their height, they know the volume of the sprayer tanks and they know how much spray they should be using for a given area. If you put too much in, you will burn the crop; but if you put too little in, it is a waste of time. Therefore, you must be accurate. If you make mistakes, you end up losing money. With the unfamiliar metric system this will happen.

Has the government received any assurance from manufacturers that replacement parts will be readily available in years to come? Much farm equipment will still be good for many years to come. I suspect that the answer is no, you will have to scrap the whole machine for want of a part. I have seen it happen. I remember what happened to imported German tractors which were used out west. Within two years those tractors were sitting in the bush, rotting because you could not buy replacement parts for them. I remember the Long tractor which came on the market about 25 years ago. I don't know who Mr. Long was; I never heard of him before or after. All I know is that some farmers were sucked in to buying that machine. It went off the market and farmers lost money. Has the government considered this aspect, or does it not care?

Obviously, the government thinks this is good for us. Mr. Speaker, the bulk of our exports, approximately 70 per cent, go to the United States. The government tells us that we are going to break into the world market. Well, you are not going to break into the world market simply by converting. Actually, we stand a good chance of losing our existing United States market, and I will tell you why. The Americans do not have to buy from us. They can manufacture their own materials and are already doing so. They are going slowly with their conversion. They may consider it worth their while to spend a little more money and buy from sources other than Canada. At least they will be assured of getting standardized parts. Many customers in the Unites States will think twice before buying from Canada.

What are we doing? We are to be in the forefront of a change. This is to be a great step forward. I do not know how many farm units or farm orgnizations were consulted, but I do know that they did not have many meetings across the country or, if people from those organizations attended the meetings, they did not understand what they were all about. I can tell you that many did not understand what was going on. Therefore, how could they explain it to others?

The government too, has encountered problems. But did any representative of the minister go out to these organizations and try to explain the ramifications of the programs, its pros and cons? Not in this case. If there was ever an occasion when we needed an educational program, this was it. It is not so much that people cannot be retrained, because I am sure they can. We must give them time and you must assure them that conversion will bring benefits. Out west our roads are spaced according to certain plans. Roads running north and south are one mile apart; roads running east and west are two miles apart. Try giving the minister directions, using the new system, to get into a farmer's place. Instead of telling him to go so many miles east or west, you will tell him, "Go ten kilometres south, plus a little bit, one kilometre east, plus a little bit, then turn right and go five kilometres, plus a little bit." Where do you end up?

Mr. Benjamin: Lost.

Mr. Korchinski: Talk about confusion! Mr. Speaker, the municipalities are not going to rebuild their roads simply because we pass this bill. They are not going to take one step in that direction. In other words, the present road system will stay in effect regardless of any legislation this government tries to pass.

• (1750)

I was talking about the sprayer. The farmer does not want new equipment: he still wants to be sure that he is using a gallon, a half-gallon, a quart or a pint. He does not care what it states on the container; he intends to continue measuring in the way he has always done. Chances are that he will be right using the old method. The government system is like everything else: when the government suggests something is good for you, do the opposite and you are sure to come out on top.

I can assure the minister and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale), who accepts this program with open arms, that I am getting an entirely different point of view. For example, those working in hospitals will have to use a new measurement for doses of medication. Some say they would rather quit than take the chance of giving someone the wrong amount of medication. This is not a laughing matter. It is said that they can be retrained, but the fact is these people are afraid to take on this responsibility. How can they be sure?

All this government has done is set a deadline. As far as the west is concerned, this system should have been started 70 years ago. At that time a lot of people came from Europe. They understood the metric system. It would have been a simple matter for this country to have accepted this system at that time. However, they were forced to learn a new system. Their children were trained in the new system. Now they have forgotten the old metric system. Had governments accepted the metric system at that time, there may not have been confusion with land surveys, and so on.

Possibly the minister does not have anything to do. For lack of something better to do he feels he should pilot a bill through the House. I will give him something to do. I suggest that he go to the drugstore to purchase a tube of shaving cream. There he will find at least three different measurements—ounces, millilitres and grammes. Without the aid of a computer let the minister figure out which is the better deal. I defy him to do that.

When you think you get a good deal shopping at a grocery store there is nothing worse than finding that two doors away the store has a much better deal. This is how the housewife feels. Is the minister monitoring what is going on? I am sure he is not because it is too trivial. However, if enough of this is going on it will affect the total cost of production. That is what this is all about. If the cost of production goes higher, how can you compete?

There was talk about the 2×4. An architect or engineer may be familiar with one system and then suddenly find himself having to use another system. This will necessitate checking and double-checking. Some architects charge a very stiff fee. If their staff drags simply because they want to be doubly sure rather than have an inaccurate calculation, who will pay? Imagine trying to estimate the cost of a project. If there are variations, who will take the blame? Obviously, the standard excuse will be that somewhere along the line somebody goofed.

No matter how you look at it, there is only benefit for the manufacturer. We have heard the one-sided argument that it is good for us, that it will be good for Canada. It has already been pointed out that grain will not be sold by the bushel. However, it will still be necessary to convert. Talk to the elevator agents. Boxcars will still be measured in terms of bushels. They will have to be converted, even with the new system.

There is no point trying to convince us that this system will be good. We do not want to be sheep, particularly if we have to be led by this government. Anything this government does must be checked and double-checked. That is one of the reasons it takes longer than is sometimes necessary to get legislation through.

Mr. Goodale: I am glad you admit that.

Mr. Korchinski: We do not think like the Liberals. We have to check and double-check to see what they are up to. I want to mention one other matter. The manufacturers have obviously convinced the government that we should standardize according to the world system. However, I have seen parts that are identical. Obviously, a lot of time must be spent comparing.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to ask the acting House leader to inform us what business is intended for tomorrow.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, the intention would be to continue the discussion on Bill C-23 relating to metric conversion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

NATIONAL BUILDING CODE

REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF RESTRICTION ON USE OF FIBRE REINFORCED PLASTIC BATHROOM FIXTURES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the government of Canada has invested through DREE a substantial amount of money in Boeing of Canada Limited, in Winnipeg, Manitoba to stimulate growth and jobs and yet in a counterproductive move the National Research Council has restricted the use of fibre-reinforced plastic bathroom fixtures, including bathtubs which will not catch fire, and this has seriously hindered development and growth at the Boeing plant in Winnipeg which manufactures these products, I would like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage (Mr. Masniuk):

That this House instruct the Minister of Public Works to have the National Research Council remove the restriction on fibre-reinforced plastic bathroom fixtures by removing sentence number 3.1.4.5 (10) of the 1977 National Building Code.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 such a motion cannot be presented for debate in the House without its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

NAME OF ITALIMPIANTI AGENT IN SALE OF REACTOR TO ARGENTINA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Considering that in a letter dated December 17, 1976, and tabled in a House committee yesterday, Italimpianti flatly turned down a request by the government of Canada, made via the chairman of AECL, for the name of the agent used in the sale of a CANDU reactor to Argentina, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the government reassert its right to know the name of the agent and have a description of his activities, this to be done by direct communication by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to the director of Italimpianti.

Mr. Speaker: The provisions of Standing Order 43 require the unanimous consent of the House before the presentation of such a motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INFORMING OF PEOPLE WHOSE NAMES ON ALLEGED BLACKLIST—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask leave to present a motion concerning a matter that is urgent. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That this House urges the Solicitor General to inform, on a confidential basis, each of the persons whose name was on the list attached to a letter written by the then Solicitor General on June 15, 1971, concerning a so-called Extra-Parliamentary Opposition, of the existence of the said letter so that these persons may have the opportunity to take steps to clear their names with respect to the charges made against them, it being the view of this House that the laying of charges in this way was contrary to the civil liberties all Canadians are supposed to enjoy.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHING MONITORING MECHANISM FOR POST-CONTROL PERIOD—FORUM FOR DISCUSSION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In the television interview which the hon. gentleman gave to the CBC after his speech to the Canadian Club in Toronto he made reference to the consideration he was giving to setting up a price monitoring mechanism similar to the Food Prices Review Board. Can the minister tell us how mature that consideration is, how close he is to announcing a mechanism of that kind, and whether or not such a mechanism will deal with the monitoring of profits and wages as well?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): I indicated, as I have done a number of times, that this is a subject about which I have been talking to individual members of the business community and about which I shall be talking to representatives of organized labour and to the finance ministers next week. This is a concept I am putting before them. I have made reference to a role expanded on that of the Food Prices Review Board; I think a comparison might equally be drawn with the Council on Wage and Price Stability in the United States. To respond to the final part of the question, it would really be intended to deal with all possible increases which could have an economic effect of an inflationary kind. It could cover prices, wages and other judgments by the private sector which could have an inflationary effect.

Mr. Clark: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. These private discussions with business, labour and the provinces are well enough, but I think we all know that the two largest provinces in the country, Quebec and Ontario, have announced plans for a public forum or public discussion of post-control policy and means of dealing with the problems to which the minister has referred. Can the hon. gentleman tell us whether the federal government is now giving any serious consideration as a matter of priority to setting up some kind of nationally sponsored forum which could draw together all elements in the country to discuss post-control or decontrol policy, and, if so, could he indicate what kind of timetable is being considered?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): A meeting of that sort, general in the sense of involving the major economic decision-makers in the provinces, organized labour and business as well as the federal government, has been the subject of discussion. I can say to the hon. gentleman it has drawn mixed reviews from those with whom it has been discussed. While we would consider this possibility and discuss it with other parties, we want to be certain that the outcome of such a meeting would be positive before we would go ahead with such a proposal.

THE BUDGET

DATE OF PRESENTATION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): A further question to the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister in a position today to indicate fairly specifically when we may expect a new budget?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): I can perhaps be a little more specific than my parliamentary secretary was the other day. It will be some time after the end of February and before the beginning of June.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHING NEW GUIDELINES—REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO CREATE JOBS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. On Monday the hon. member for York-Simcoe asked whether we could expect new directives for the AIB which would be designed to encourage private investment job creation in Canada. There is no doubt about the need for this sort of thing, and in light of the minister's statements and statements made through the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the AIB can the minister now indicate whether new guidelines or directives are now under consideration for early implementation?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman was probably referring more to a headline or report in the newspaper rather than the remarks that I actually made in my speech. I would not envisage any substantial change in the guidelines, either on the wages or profit side, before the end of the program. In particular, I would not see a specific change in the profit guidelines at this point. I was referring, from the profit creation standpoint, to the long term rather than to an immediate change in the guidelines.

Mr. Alexander: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In his June budget the Minister of Finance promised the creation of some 250,000 new jobs. On a yearly average, as I understand it, only about 210,000 jobs have been created, so there has been a shortfall of approximately 40,000 jobs. On a December 1975 to 1976 basis, only 76,000 new jobs were created. In light of the high percentage of job vacancies existing, which means in effect that there are not enough jobs for those who seek them, can the minister advise the House whether any new initiatives are being contemplated in order to deal with this very serious situation? In other words, would he see that jobs are created particularly by the private sector for those who are actively seeking them?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Well, Mr. Speaker, that would be a good, short and accurate description of the kind of thinking that we are putting into our budget preparations.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON INVESTIGATION OF SALE OF REACTOR TO ARGENTINA—POSSIBILITY OF BROADENING INVESTIGATION

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. I should like to ask the Solicitor General a question with reference to the RCMP investigation of AECL activities in Argentina. Has he yet had any report from the RCMP about their investigation and what they have found, and can he give such results to the House? If he has not had a report, can he tell us when he expects to have one?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the investigation has been referred to the RCMP on the advice of officials of the Department of Justice. The RCMP investigation into the matter is an ongoing one but I am not in a position to reveal what progress has been made to date. I should add that the RCMP is pursuing the matter actively.

Mr. Gillies: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the Solicitor General or the RCMP given any consideration to broadening the investigation beyond the terms of reference which apparently are now in place to take account of all foreign transactions that involve AECL in the sale of nuclear reactors?

Mr. Fox: At the moment, Mr. Speaker, no consideration is being given to widening the inquiry. The RCMP has been given a fairly specific mandate to inquire into the transaction to which the hon. member refers. I suppose that if during the course of that inquiry material or evidence were obtained which indicated that the inquiry ought to be broadened then, of course, consideration would be given to that at that time.

ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA LIMITED

NEW AGENCY AGREEMENT WITH MR. EISENBERG—REQUEST FOR DETAILS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In a letter from Mr. Shaul Eisenberg to the chairman of AECL dated January 21 of this year and tabled today before the committee, Mr. Eisenberg notes that he volunteered to accept the new terms for his agent's fees as outlined in the agreement of March, 1976 in part because he was being given the contract as the agent should a second reactor be sold to South Korea. My question to the minister is this. Would he inform the House whether AECL was obligated in advance of March, 1976 to hire Mr. Eisenberg as the agent for the second reactor, and what are the terms and conditions of this new agreement?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that there was any undertaking prior to March of last year, if that is the date to which the hon. member alluded, the AECL would use Mr. Eisenberg should AECL be authorized to quote on a new reactor sale. As to the second part of this question regarding details, I think that information has already been presented to the committee.

REASON FOR HIRING MR. EISENBERG TO SELL SECOND REACTOR TO SOUTH KOREA

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that the information concerning the terms and conditions of the second sale has not been presented. If what the minister is saying in the first part of his answer is that there was no obligation to Mr. Eisenberg until March of last year, then is he suggesting to the House that when Mr. Eisenberg agreed to come down from $20 million to something just in excess of $18 million he was really doing so because he was being hired to sell a future reactor and could, therefore, more than recoup his loss? Can the minister explain to the House why it was found necessary for the government, through AECL, to hire an agent to sell a second reactor once the acceptance of the first reactor had been established in the country?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think if the hon. member had been following the testimony before the committee he would have realized by now that an agent in this kind of transaction is a very important aspect of securing the transaction. I am told that competition in South Korea for a reactor was vicious, that the Canadian CANDU system was one which other competitors feared, and this led those competitors to make every kind of effort to blacken and smear the character of the Canadian system. I believe that occurred also in Argentina. I believe the then president of AECL made that very clear in his testimony this morning.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I read with care the letter from Mr. Eisenberg that was tabled in the committee this morning. In that letter Mr. Eisenberg makes the case that an agent or someone performing that function has to establish in advance the acceptance of a complex apparatus such as a reactor. However, once that has been done in respect of the sale of a reactor for the first time, and the country buying it is happy, why in heaven's name would it be necessary to pay a commission to the extent of millions of dollars to make a second sale? Would not the country buy the second one because it was happy with the first?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I do not think this is the time to enter into a long discourse about the nature of commercial transactions. I am sure that if the hon. member is really sincere about finding the answer to that question, if he does not know it already, he can find the opportunity to put it to officers of AECL appearing before the committee.

POSSIBILITY OF DREDGING ST. LAWRENCE AT ISLE D'ORLÉANS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport.

Considering that the federal Department of Transport has undertaken to keep the depth of the channel at 41 feet along the Isle d'Orléans in the St. Lawrence to allow for the establishment of a refinery of Golden Eagle Canada Ltd. at St. Romuald, Quebec, and that the channel is now only 38 feet deep, could the minister tell the House whether his department will do the necessary dredging to keep the channel 41 feet deep at that place?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we had a close look at the question of the cost of the additional dredging to obtain a 41-foot level for the first time and drew some conclusion in terms of the cost-benefits that were involved, that they related uniquely to the operations of one particular company. Accordingly, we entered into discussions with that company which have not led us yet to conclude that the additional dredging should go ahead.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, is it true as maintained by the company that the department will compel Golden Eagle to incur the costs for dredging farther down than a 38-foot depth? If so, is it the usual policy of the government to set such conditions and can the minister give an example of such a case elsewhere in Canada?

[English]

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, it is quite common when construction or improvement is being done and justified on the basis of the direct benefit to a particular commercial enterprise to require the appropriate payment either immediately or over a period of time by that enterprise out of the benefits which are conferred upon it.

PUBLIC SERVICE

ALLEGED BLACKLIST OF EMPLOYEES—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT PRACTICE—CRITERIA USED TO ESTABLISH LIST

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. Yesterday the minister appeared to be attempting to justify the actions of his colleague with respect to blacklisting activities. Is the Solicitor General willing to tell the House whether such a list, with the accompanying letter, constitutes normal government practice or was this an isolated case?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, once again people are talking in terms of a blacklist which I think is very misleading. Some members of the opposition had a letter in their possession and read it into the record yesterday, knowing full well it was not a blacklist. As the Prime Minister indicated at his press conference yesterday, some of the people involved are still in the employ of the federal government. I have also stated that I have not caused to be circulated any such type of list since I have become Solicitor General. I must say, however, it is the duty of any solicitor general of this or any government to bring to the attention of his colleagues any matters relating to the security of state documents.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The Solicitor General failed to answer the question of whether this was an isolated case. Regardless of what he calls it, will he inform the House by what criteria names find their way on to this particular list or is it a case of alleged guilt by alleged association? Can he also tell the House what he meant by the term "watched with more than normal care"? Does this imply police surveillance?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I never used those words in the House. I think the hon. member is referring to something that was said by his own colleague during the course of the meeting.

Some hon. Members: It is in the letter.

Mr. Fox: As the hon. member knows what has been referred to are letters between members of Her Majesty's Privy Council which are privileged, as is any conversation between members of the Privy Council. I should like to add that the whole matter was handled, as I said yesterday, with the utmost discretion in order not to hurt the reputations of the people who were involved.

INQUIRY AS TO PROOF OF WRONGDOING BY EMPLOYEES ON BLACKLIST

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The Solicitor General told the House that "there was concern at the time that some government employees might be deliberately releasing government classified information", with the letter of June 1971 stating that it represented "a conscious attempt to use the knowledge and influence gained by their employment with the federal government to further their own needs." Will the Solicitor General inform the House whether the report delivered to the then solicitor general contained any concrete proof that the employees listed were in fact engaged in a conscious subterfuge?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite clear that once one accepts the necessity of any such system to have some sort of security service in operation, it is quite natural that the investigative reports of these agencies, just as in the case of investigative reports of the RCMP on the criminal side, are not made public because some of the information could be prejudicial to the people involved and affect their reputations.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

DISMISSAL OF MR. McNUTT, VICE-PRESIDENT OF MAGI—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Could he inform the House whether he has had any discussions with either the Premier of Nova Scotia, the Minister of Development of that province, or any officials of MAGI with respect to the widely reported dismissal of Mr. Scott McNutt, senior vice-president and a member of the board of directors of that joint federal-provincial group?

● (1430)

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, of course I have discussed many subjects with the premier of the province on several occasions, but with regard to the specific matter brought up by the hon. member, I do not feel that I should intervene in the daily operations of that company. However, I am aware of some of the statements made recently about its vice-president. I shall probably have occasion in the near future of at least meeting the minister responsible for development in Nova Scotia, for a meeting is to be held in the next few days at which time I can make it a point to bring up the matter.

[English]

Mr. Forrestall: I should like to ask the minister whether he is indicating at this point that he has no direct knowledge himself, nor do any of his officials, of Mr. McNutt's dismissal from that Crown corporation for cause or for any other reason, and if that is what the minister is saying, would he use his offices, indeed exercise his responsibility with respect to MAGI for the purpose of discovering for his information and for the edification of the House, the reason Mr. McNutt has been dismissed.

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, with regard to Mr. McNutt, I should say that the decision must be reached by the directors of the company; I do not feel it behoves me, as a minority shareholder of the company, to decide for its members. I shall therefore have to wait until I know more about the decisions made by the board of directors of the company.

[English]

Mr. Forrestall: Would the minister then indicate to the House that he has no knowledge that Mr. McNutt in fact has been dismissed or let go?

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard: No, Mr. Speaker, I do not have knowledge of his being dismissed but, as the hon. member has already mentioned, there was a rumour in the press yesterday and the day before to that effect. We will know more about it in a few days, I suppose.

INDUSTRY

BOWMAR OF CANADA—POSSIBLE CLOSING AS RESULT OF ACTIONS OF UNITED STATES PARENT COMPANY

Mr. Frank Maine (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that the Canadian government has invested capital in the form of loans and grants to Bowmar of Canada, and that this company of pocket calculator fame has had capital siphoned off by the bankrupt United States parent company, Bowmar Industry Company of Connecticut, is the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce taking any measures to prevent this activity, which has triggered the possible closing down of Bowmar of Canada's excellent research and development capacity in Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of this problem. I am taking note of it and I shall look into it and report to the hon. member as soon as possible.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INFORMING OF PEOPLE WHOSE NAMES ON ALLEGED BLACKLIST—SUGGESTED ACTION TO ENSURE NO NOTATION ON EMPLOYEES' FILES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Solicitor General. In view of the fundamental principles of civil liberties which are involved, will the Solicitor General now undertake to inform each of the persons whose name is on the list attached to the letter of June 15, 1971, that his name is there so that these persons may have the opportunity to defend themselves against the charges in that letter? I suggest, of course, that this information be given to them on a confidential basis.

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated yesterday, there was no question of eliminating or blacklisting anyone included in that list.

An hon. Member: What was it, tattletale grey?

Mr. Fox: It was rather the responsibility of the departments in question, as I indicated yesterday, to evaluate the recommendations that were made to them by the then solicitor general whose recommendations were to ensure that the people understood that they could not be in the government of Canada and have split loyalties at the same time. The departments were then charged taking the necessary measures to ensure that this was carried out.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Since there is no indication that these persons were informed at all about the letter, may I ask the minister if he will now take the necessary steps to ensure that there is nothing on the files of these public servants to the effect that they were included in this correspondence, even if it requires the destruction of the list itself?

Mr. Fox: As I indicated to the House yesterday, there is no such list in circulation at the moment. At that time it was used with utmost discretion and there were no consequences other than those I outlined to the House yesterday which resulted in communications to the various ministers.

SUGGESTION LETTER CONCERNING BLACKLIST CONSTITUTES BASIS FOR CRIMINAL LIBEL ACTION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Solicitor General if the hon. gentleman is taking into consideration the possibility that the contents of that letter constitute a basis for a prima facie case of criminal libel and that members of the government have no more right that anyone else to conceal evidence. An opportunity should be given to those people, if they wish, to launch such criminal proceedings.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, if anyone wishes to talk about the disclosure of the contents of a possible letter between ministers, he must take complete responsibility for it and for possibly affecting the reputation of some persons if that occurs, which I do not believe is the case. This responsibility will fall on those who decide to release certain information that was of a confidential nature.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Garbage.

INDUSTRY

FOOTWEAR—POSSIBILITY OF QUOTAS ON IMPORTS TO PROTECT INDUSTRY

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As the Canadian footwear industry has been severely damaged in recent months by imports from low wage countries, and as the minister informed me two months ago that he was giving serious consideration to the imposition of quotas against these imports from low wage countries as a means of assisting this hard pressed industry, could he advise me when he expects to announce these quotas, and will he also inform us what percentage of previous imports will be allowed in the future?

[Mr. Fox.]

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, officials of my department met representatives of the footwear industry or communicated with them last week. We are trying to find a way to satisfy the Shoe Manufacturers' Association. It is a very delicate problem, but I am also told that one of the three plants that were closed in Ontario has now been bought out and production will resume soon.

FINANCE

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON BORROWING IN FOREIGN MARKETS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Now that we as a country have become the world's number one borrower in foreign bond markets, with our provinces, municipalities and other concerns having borrowed $8 billion last year, about 15 per cent of the total international borrowing by all countries combined, would the minister indicate if he or his department are concerned about the ongoing costs of this foreign debt which offsets any trade gain that might be made in the merchandise field, and is he concerned about the fact that much of the debt matures within five to seven years?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Of course, there should be an ongoing concern about contracting over a long period substantial liabilities abroad, but given the economic circumstances which the OECD countries have been experiencing generally in the last eighteen months to two years, it is probably inevitable that we would have taken on this particular obligation.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, my question is again for the Minister of Finance. In view of his stated concern, and as such foreign borrowing confirms that we are living beyond our means and borrowing to do it, and as the borrowing now represents over 4 per cent of our gross national product compared with one per cent in 1973, would the minister indicate if he intends to take steps, through persuasion or otherwise, to temper this mortgaging of our future to cover today's spending which includes so much in consumer goods?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I have no intention at present of preventing the provinces or the private sector from borrowing abroad. Of course, the suggestion put forward by the hon. member would push up the cost of borrowing for the provinces, municipalities and private institutions.

● (1440)

REQUEST FOR ESTIMATE OF GOVERNMENT BORROWING FOR CURRENT YEAR

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Speaking about the high cost of borrowing, with federal government borrowing last year of some $2.7 billion, would the minister indicate if he expects this year's borrowing at the federal level will be even higher, and specifically, would he confirm the current estimate that the federal treasury may be looking for $3.3 billion in the current year?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Actually the federal government has met its borrowing requirements for the current year which, as the hon. member knows, expires on March 31.

Mr. Stevens: Calendar year I am talking about.

TRANSPORT

ASSURANCE FOREIGN REGISTERED SHIPS MEET CANADIAN SAFETY STANDARDS

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. What plans has the minister developed to ensure that foreign registered ships or flags of convenience ships meet Canadian safety standards? I am informed by the minister's officials that present inspection systems frustrate inspections because of their inadequacy.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we do have firm rules and regulations in the law concerning the standards of construction, equipment and manpower on vessels approaching and entering Canadian waters. In addition, we have been developing some of the most advanced systems for making contact with those vessels, and we have such a system operating on the east coast, the Ecareg system, whereby the vessel approaching Canadian waters is required to make its presence and intentions known, and there is a system then of determining the way in which the vessels meet the standards laid down.

An hon. Member: For 200 miles?

Mr. Fairweather: Would the minister consider using some of the $40 million marine disaster oil clean up fund to augment the present inspection system, which I think the minister would also agree is inadequate?

Mr. Lang: That is an interesting suggestion. It might require a change in the legislation to make use of those particular funds in that way, but I will certainly look into the question.

AGRICULTURE

SUGGESTED REMOVAL OF LIMIT ON NUMBER OF CATTLE SLAUGHTERED FOR WHICH PAYMENT MADE UNDER STABILIZATION PROGRAM

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture, and it relates to the long awaited announcement of the 1976 slaughter cattle stabilization program.

Since the 2,500 head maximum contravenes the main thrust and intent of Bill C-50, and since a very firm and definite commitment was given to beef producers by departmental officials as early as last July that no maximum limits would be incorporated into this program, would the minister take advantage of this early opportunity to remove this maximum upper limit to ensure equality to all beef producers?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any such thing being stated, but from early last year and even from the Agriculture Committee proceedings one can find that we discussed this at length with members of that committee. The suggestion was made that I make these payments quarterly, and it is not new for this type of thing to be decided, that is, maximums on payments. If it is truly a family operation there can be three payments made, so there could be a total payment of three times 2,500 head, which would be substantial, and I think that would take in the vast majority of beef producers in Canada. It may eliminate some hugh corporate operations, but the vast majority of family farms would be included.

The hon. member said this was long awaited. The act says we have to make this payment at the end of the year. We do not make the payment before the end of the year, so that the final calculations even for the month of December are not finished yet. However, we thought we should go ahead and make the announcement anyhow.

Mr. Wise: Do I understand the minister to be indicating that partnerships and multi-farm corporations would each be eligible to collect the 2,500 maximum limit on the deficiency payment?

Mr. Whelan: Yes, Mr. Speaker, the same as we have done with apples and the same as we will be doing for potato payments, where it is shown that it is a truly family operation, that there really is not a corporate set up and where it is shown that partnerships really exist.

BASIS ON WHICH COW-CALF SUPPORT PROGRAM ESTABLISHED

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question deals with the cow-calf support program which the minister recently announced for 1977. Can he explain whether it will be set up on the same basis as the current beef stabilization program or under a different arrangement for subsidy?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it would be quite difficult to explain it in detail here, but we are working this out with the provinces because it has to be worked out with the provinces. They have programs present, and our program differs from theirs. It is not going to be very easy to dovetail and to make them work together for the coming year of 1977, but from what we have heard already from the provinces, we can look forward to working with them in complete harmony.

Oral Questions

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR SPECIAL ASSISTANCE FOR THOSE USING SIDE TRAWLERS

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries. The minister was advised by the Lake Group Limited on January 13 that they would have to close their fish plant at Gaultois in Burin-Burgeo, Newfoundland, on January 31 for an indefinite period in view of the financial losses which they are suffering due to the lack of fish for their side trawlers and because the new fishery management scheme does not provide the opportunity to catch more fish this year. January 31 is just two days away. I understand that they could continue operating if the minister would amend his fishery management plan or his special assistance program for side trawlers. There are 220 people who will lose their jobs on Monday. Can the minister tell us whether he is going to announce a special assistance plan for side trawlers or amend the fishery management plan so that plants with side trawlers can catch fish?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I have already had some discussions about side trawlers with the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The problem of the side trawlers is a very real one because of their physical limitations with regard to fishing at great distances. We are trying to find a solution to accommodate this segment of the fleet, but at the moment, with the type of fishery which is open to them, I do not yet have a solution. I am still hoping that we will come up with an accommodation for them.

PROPOSAL TO INCREASE QUOTAS FOR TRAWLERS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the same minister. In light of the fact that some plants in Nova Scotia—at Petit de Grat, Louisbourg, Lunenburg, Liverpool and Lockport, just to name a few—are also dependent upon side trawlers, and there would appear to be a conflict between side trawler operations and stern trawler operations, will the minister review his compromise proposals on quotas established for 1977 in the hope that quotas will be increased on the banks which are within the range of our present fleet until such time as ships are built or acquired which would enable Canadians to catch their allocated quotas on cod, for example, on Hamilton Inlet Bank and beyond bank up to Hudson strait?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, obviously the problem of the side trawlers raised by the hon. member for St. John's West applies to all side trawlers, again because of their limitation in that they cannot go very far. We are trying to find a solution to accommodate them. I discussed with the industry the possibility of raising quotas, but for conservation reasons we would in fact be eating the veal at a time when we want to develop the beef herd.

Mr. Crouse: In light of the response of the minister, has he given any thought to the proposal of decreasing the quotas which have been allocated to Canadians in the far northern areas I just mentioned, namely, Hamilton bank inlet, and giving that quota to foreign ships while deleting from the foreign fleet operating within our 200 miles zone some of their quotas and adding that allocation of red fish and flounder, for example, to the Canadian fishermen so that we may see our fleets operating on a longer basis within the new zone?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure I could answer the hon. member's rather complicated question in the time allocated to me. I wish to make it clear that we have offered side trawlers financial assistance so that they could in fact move farther away than they traditionally have.

As for the alternative of trading quotas in the northern districts for others, I should tell the hon. member that where side trawlers have access—Canada has most of the redfish quota, if not all, with the possible exception of some incidental catch—our traditional resistance to going up into the far north at this time of the year has left an important and rather rich quota to foreign fleets. We are taking a larger share of this quota, but at the moment the economics of building 15 million trawlers to go up into that region are obviously not favourable to us.

SEALS—ACTION TO PREVENT INTERFERENCE WITH HUNT—STATUS OF CASE AGAINST BRIAN DAVIES

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Moving to another phase of the fishery, the seal fishery, would the minister indicate what measures he has taken as a result of the announced build-up of interference with the seal hunt which is to start very soon. What action has been taken? Would he also indicate if he has taken any further action with respect to the charge of contravening the seal protection act laid against Brian Davies which was dismissed in provincial court?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the case of Mr. Brian Davies has been appealed, so that I feel restricted in commenting on it. Let me say that any interference with the seal hunt will be dealt with with the utmost severity. I will not brook any interference with the ability of Canadians to earn their living, which is what these fishermen in Newfoundland and the Magdalen Islands are doing. I am also happy to note that the Leader of the Opposition has accepted the seal hunt as being a necessity for Canadians who earn their living in that way. I hope the hon. member can enlighten his leader on the fact that this is a very humane hunt; actually, it is better regulated than what goes on in most of the abattoirs of this country.

AGRICULTURE

POTATOES—MINISTER'S ATTITUDE TOWARD ORGANIZATION BY GROWERS

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the repeated statements of the Minister of Agriculture and his predecessors, that unless the potato growers organize they may as well not come back to Ottawa for help in poor market years, I should like to know if the minister still means business? The question is crucial, Mr. Speaker, because of the current serious attempt to establish a potato plan in New Brunswick and because some people in the province, speaking for the National Farmers Union, have discarded the minister's statement as a hollow threat and hogwash.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Stanfield: The minister of hogwash.

Mr. Whelan: —all I can say is that those who think it is easy for me to get money from Treasury Board for those programs should attend some of our meetings. I do not think it is necessary to put money into all kinds of farm organizations, because those organizations can organize themselves and do a better and more orderly marketing job of their products, which will not cost the taxpayers of this nation any money. At the same time they can make sure the producers get a reasonable price.

COW-CALF SUPPORT PROGRAM—REASON FOR REDUCED PAYMENT TO PROVINCES WHICH HAVE PROGRAMS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, may I direct another question to the Minister of Agriculture who apparently discriminates against some farmers, inasmuch as his recently announced cow-calf program will only provide 50 per cent of the deficiency payment to those provinces which had the foresight to establish their own programs. I ask why he is discriminating against provinces which have set up their own program, and why he is allowing only a 50 per cent pay-out in those cases?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I was talking to the minister of agriculture of the member's own province, and dealt with the treasury board of that province. The minister was elated when I told him what we would do to assist the province in their program. I also spoke with the minister of agriculture of Alberta. I look forward to the time when this will be a totally federal program, which will help those provinces which do not have this kind of program and which are not as wealthy as some of the other provinces.

INCREASE IN COMMUNITY PASTURE RATES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I wish the minister would begin to answer our questions. May I direct a supplementary question to him? Since farmers received notice a few weeks ago that community pasture rates under PFRA are to go up over 30 per cent this year, I wonder if the minister will take the farmers' case to the Anti-Inflation Board, or to the minister responsible for DREE, in order to have those 30 per cent increases rolled back.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of those rate increases. If they have taken place you may be sure that I shall make representations to everyone concerned.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

POSSIBILITY OF BOARD CHANGING ACREAGE AND MILEAGE SYSTEM AS RESULT OF CONVERSION TO METRIC SYSTEM

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, Since, as I need not remind the minister, the first rebellion we had in western Canada took place on the Red River over the federal government's attacking the survey system, will the minister advise, in a public statement, that it is not necessary for the Canadian Wheat Board to change the acreage and mileage system in western Canada, in other words, the survey system, to make it work more efficiently and conveniently?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, obviously, certain changes in measurements with regard to miles and acres are not required. It is true that in the general move toward conversion to the metric system the grain industry, including the Canadian Wheat Board and various components of it as well as elevator companies and farm-owned ones have worked effectively to adjust to the new measurements. With passage of the law now before the House this process will go forward and measurements dealing with the actual handling of grain will then take place in the metric system.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Did I understand the minister to say that he will not consider assuring the farmers of western Canada that, in the move toward metric conversion, there will not be an attack on the system of surveys used in western Canada, that is, on the system of acres and miles?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, obviously, there is no such element involved. That should become perfectly clear if one simply reads the law.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Then let the minister make that public statement.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

BUILDING OF KITIMAT PIPELINE OVER TERRITORY OCCUPIED BY NATIVES—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is related to the proposed building of the Kitimat pipeline. Since the lands in question are occupied by several native Indian nations and the proposed pipeline may have deleterious effects on the environment, salmon stocks, herring fisheries, bottom fish of the ocean and sea vegetation, I ask if the minister has received representation from the Pacific Northwest Native Indians about this problem and if he has met with the provincial government to discuss the matter? If so, can he report on the progress of those discussions?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, yes, I have received representations from the Indians in the area as well as from the hon. member for Skeena, and they are under consideration.

POSSIBLE RELAXATION OF UNITED STATES LAW CONCERNING CONVENTION EXPENSES BECAUSE OF DISCONTINUANCE OF DELETION OF CABLEVISION COMMERCIALS

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the CRTC's decision whereby the random deletion of commercials from cablevision programs originating in United States will be discontinued, is the government considering revision of the legislation dealing with the tax liability of Time magazine and other magazines and commercial advertising on United States television, in return for the relaxation of the new American law restricting deductions for expenses for conventions held in this country which United States citizens attend?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is no such legislation under consideration at the present time.

FINANCE

EFFECT OF UNITED STATES RESTRICTION ON CONVENTION EXPENSES ON TOURIST INDUSTRY

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance? Has the government considered the effect of the new American tax law to do with the deductions I mentioned on hotels and the tourist industry in Canada, and can he say if any action will be taken on the matter?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the situation is under scrutiny, but I should not like to comment on it at this point.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain).]

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

REASON FOR RELEASE OF FILM "FORECAST FOR SURVIVAL"—DEPARTMENT RESPONSIBLE FOR SUPPRESSION OF FILM

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. Yesterday the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot asked why the film "Forecast for Survival" produced in 1975 by the National Film Board for the Department of the Environment had not been released. I wonder if the minister could comment on a somewhat unusual coincidence: within 30 minutes of the question being asked, the film was released. Can the minister comment on the possibility of the Department of External Affairs having applied pressure on his department not to release that film after it was produced in 1975?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, obviously, things move more quickly when I am absent from the House than when I am present. I am not familiar with the details of the matter but I can inform the hon. member that I authorized the screening of the film, because of the high profile of the issue during the pre-Christmas period, involving tankers. I asked for the film to be screened again, with a view to seeing if it could be released without being updated. The film, conceived in 1973, was finally produced in the spring of 1975; after checking, it was realized that it was a bit out of date, and it would have cost $20,000 to do it over again. Money is tight and was tight at that time, and that is why it was not proceeded with. My reaction was that the film was limited somewhat in not being totally up to date, but I think it is an interesting document and I suggested release, if I remember correctly, on the day we left for the Christmas break.

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment? Would the minister say at whose request or insistence the film was suppressed for 18 months? Was it at the request or insistence of the Department of the Environment or are rumours regarding the influence of the Department of External Affairs in holding back release of this film accurate?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I assure the hon. member that the film was commissioned by ourselves. It was at our request that it was withheld. I know that the problem of updating it was very real. Certainly, if, because of delicate negotiations going on with other countries, we were advised not to release it at that time, I find that perfectly reasonable.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might be permitted to ask the government House leader his intentions with regard to the business for today and the rest of the week, and perhaps into next week.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we are presently dealing with the metric conversion bill which I hope will clear the House very shortly. Following that, the Minister of Finance will deal with the Customs tariff and the excise tax for the remainder of this week. On Monday we propose to deal with the Income Tax Act. Because the Minister of Finance will be involved in a finance minister's conference on Tuesday and Wednesday, for those two days I will call Bill C-27, second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration of an act to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, and so on. On Thursday, if the Income Tax Act has not cleared the House on Monday, we will return to that measure.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman did not mention the matter of allotted days. Has he given any thought to that? If so, can he now tell us? If not, will he entertain a suggestion with regard to allotted days?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have thought about them and I will entertain a suggestion with regard to them. However, I believe we will have to consider them following the program I have laid out.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Fine.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, can the government House leader indicate when he is going to call, for second reading, Bill C-30 in the name of the Secretary of State which, among other things, includes provision for the institution of Heritage Day. In view of the fact that this year that day will be on February 21, will the minister call the bill soon so that parliament can make a decision in time for it to be observed in 1977?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, it depends upon what the hon. member means by "observe". It is my understanding that parallel action would be required with respect to the Canada Labour Code to give effect, for example, to a holiday to employees under federal jurisdiction. I make that qualification because if the holiday were to be observed in the way the hon. member desires, as I understand it would require simultaneous action with regard to the Canada Labour Code. I believe the Minister of Labour will be giving first reading to an amendment to the Canada Labour Code today which, if my memory is correct, will deal with this matter.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate what the minister has said, but he has not answered my question. Will he call Bill C-30 soon?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have some more urgent items with which I would like to deal. Today the House has been asking when the Minister of Finance is going to produce a budget. The House has not yet dealt with the bills that have come from the last budget. I would like to get some of them out of the way first.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the government House leader has indicated that the government is concerned, in terms of its priorities, with such bills as metric conversion, the Customs tariff and the excise tax. The Minister of Finance indicated that we will not have a budget before the end of next month. Is the government telling the House and the people of Canada it will not have before late spring any measures to deal with the serious unemployment situation?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. member had listened to my outline of government business, he would have noticed that on Tuesday and Wednesday we will be dealing with a bill that relates directly to the whole question of employment, unemployment, work sharing, job creation and insurance—all very important questions.

PRIVILEGE

MR. OBERLE—GOVERNMENT'S RELEASING OF INFORMATION RESPECTING NATIONAL SECURITY

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Yesterday the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), at the conclusion of the question period, raised a point of order concerning the alleged reference to a document by the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) during that question period. The purpose of the point of order was that within the regulations and precedents in our practice the minister, having made reference to that document or having cited the document, ought to be compelled by the House to produce it.

There are three aspects to the matter. The first is whether the minister, in terms of the precedents, in fact cited the document. In that respect I would refer the House to a ruling by Mr. Speaker Lamoureux on November 16, 1971, which reads as follows:

> In fairness, looking at the matter as objectively as I can, I do not see how it is possible for the Chair to make a ruling at this point that a document that has simply been referred to but has not been directly quoted should be tabled in debate. I find it difficult to rule otherwise. Hon. members may look at the citations that have been quoted in a very interesting and forceful way by the hon. members . . . If a document has been actually cited or quoted in debate by a minister of the Crown, it has to be tabled. If only reference is made to it, I do not see how there can be an obligation to table it.

The interpretation of that precedent ought to be strict where the document has first been referred to in the question period by a questioner. It ought to be interpreted much more against the minister, in my opinion, if—as the rule and the precedent envisage—a minister is in a situation where in debate, which is what the rule says, the minister has taken an advantage of the rest of the House by referring to, citing or quoting a document in his possession but not in the possession of the rest of the House.

Therefore, if in the question period—which strictly speaking, is not debate but has some parallel application—a minister were to make first reference to a document, which gave him an advantage in answering a question, that the rest of the House did not have in pursuing further questions, the rule could be interpreted in that way. However, where the document is raised and, in answer, some reference is made by a minister, the language of Mr. Speaker Lamoureux is directly applicable: there would have to be a direct quotation or citation, which was not the case yesterday.

In any case, there are two other aspects to the matter. Second, there seems to be some desire on the part of those pressing for the production of the document that some altered form of the document be produced. Surely it would not be expected that this House, or the Chair especially, would formulate an order which would tell a minister to produce a document in response to that order—not the entire document but merely an expurgated version. I have the greatest difficulty understanding how such an order could be phrased and, therefore, I am not prepared to proceed with it.

In the final analysis, the minister claims that the document ought not to be released by him in respect of the public interest. It is conceded, certainly, by both the arguments, specifically by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the action of the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) in support of his point of order, that by leaving out large portions of the document it would, in fact, be against the public interest to table the entire document. Therefore, for those three reasons I will not order the document to be produced.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to the business that has been announced to the House and, more particularly, with respect to Bill C-31 which was introduced into this chamber yesterday. I have read the resolution, and it tells one nothing except for page 4 of the order paper notices. I have not been able to get my hands on the bill, either, though I asked for it early in the afternoon. However, I understand it represents an attempt to remove certain grain and flour subsidies helpful to Halifax and to Saint John.

● (1510)

If my understanding of Bill C-31 is correct, this is an issue which was debated long and hotly during the present session of parliament, with the result that it was withdrawn at one stage of the proceedings. The point I am making briefly is this: when Bill C-31 is introduced for second reading, I intend to argue that it should not be considered at this session of parliament on the basis of the very ancient and, obviously, most worthy practice that you do not take two bites of the same cherry at one session of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CONTRIBUTION TO THE GROSS PROVINCIAL PRODUCT OF NOVA SCOTIA

Question No. 162—Mr. Forrestall:

1. What is the government's best estimate of its dollar level contribution to the gross provincial product of Nova Scotia in each year for which figures are available since 1968?

2. For each such year, what percentage of Nova Scotia's gross provincial product does the federal spending represent?

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): 1 and 2. No further types of data have become available since the same question was put and answered earlier this year (See House of Commons Debates, July 12, 1976, Vol. 119, No. 339, p. 15256). However, data for 1975 and revised data for 1974, are now available for the series presented in the previous reply. The comments made in the previous reply as to the limitations of using these data for the purposes sought in the question apply equally to the figures presented in this reply. Estimates of Nova Scotia's gross provincial product come from the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council and the estimates of expenditures in Nova Scotia under a number of major federal programs are from Statistics Canada. As a general indication of their importance relative to the size of the Nova Scotia economy, the second panel shows the expenditure estimates expressed as percentages of estimated gross provincial product. These percentage figures do not, in any way, represent estimates of contributions to gross provincial product.

1. (a) Who is the Administrator of the Anti-Inflation Board (b) what is the (i) classification (ii) salary or salary range of the position?

2. (a) What previous position in the Public Service did he or she hold (b) what was the (i) classification (ii) salary or salary range of the position?

PUBLIC SERVICE EMPLOYEES

Question No. 662—Mr. Lachance:

Between the date of the presentation of the last budget May 25, 1976 and October 12, 1976, did the Department of Finance, Industrial Development Bank, Bank of Canada, Tariff Board, Department of Insurance, Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation and Anti-dumping Tribunal hire, dismiss or transfer employees to other departments and, if so, how many?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): In so far as the Minister of Finance is concerned: Department of Finance: The number of employees hired by the Department of Finance during the period in question was 48. No employees were dismissed. A total of 111 employees were transferred or promoted to other Departments and Agencies of the Federal Government. It should be noted that a substantial proportion of this latter group were employed in the provision of joint support services to the Department of Finance and the Treasury Board Secretariat, although formally employed by the Department of Finance. In respect of the Anti-Dumping Tribunal, three employees were hired during the period in question and three were transferred or promoted to other Departments and Agencies of the Federal Government. I am informed by the Bank of Canada as follows: It has not been the practice to answer detailed questions concerning the internal administration of the Bank of Canada inasmuch as the Bank of Canada Act places the responsibility for its management in the hands of its Board of Directors. I am informed by the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation as follows: No employees were hired, dismissed or transferred to other departments.

In so far as the Department of Insurance is concerned: hired, 18; dismissed, 0; transferred, 4.

In so far as Tariff Board is concerned: nil.

TRANSFER OF DOCKS ALONG ST. LAWRENCE RIVER

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Yes, the government has been negotiating with the province of Quebec on these matters since early in 1975. (a) No. (b) Anse-au-Portage; Anse-à-l'Eau; Île aux Grues; Montmagny; St-Juste-du-Lac; Notre-Dame-du-Lac; St-Siméon; Rivière-du-Loup; Sorel; St-Ignace-de-Loyola; Godbout. (c) No.

TRANSPORT—AIRPORT OPERATORS COUNCIL CONVENTION IN SAN FRANCISCO

Question No. 936—Mr. Horner:

Did any official of the Department of Transport attend the recent convention in San Francisco of the Airport Operators Council?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Yes. (See list below.) The Airport Operators Council International holds an annual conference each year in a major North American centre. These conferences cover the many aspects of airport operations which enables Air Transportation senior management an opportunity to interchange new concepts of the total operations. R. Belisle—General Manager Airports, Quebec Region; D. C. McAree—Airport Manager, Toronto International; H. J. Tolan—Chief, Rate Economics, Ottawa; W. P. Stoker—Chief, Airport Policing and Security, Ottawa; C. Tackaberry—Chief, Airport System and Services, Ottawa; P. P. Bowes—Director, Airport Services and Security, Ottawa; G. Y. Sebastyan—Director, Airport Facilities, Ottawa; R.

HOSPITAL CARE FOR VETERANS IN MARITIME PROVINCES

Question No. 942—Mr. Howie:

1. What provision is made for the care of veterans, in each Maritime Province, who require a form of hospitalization but do not qualify for active treatment beds in hospitals?

2. Does the Department of Veterans Affairs own any hospitals, nursing homes or rehabilitation centres available to veterans from the Maritime Provinces?

3. Did the Department ever own and later dispose of any such facilities and, if so (a) what facilities (b) for what amount (c) for what other consideration?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): 1. In all hospitals in the maritime provinces veterans have the same right of access as all other residents. In addition, pensioned veterans have the right of hospital of choice for hospital care required in connection with their service-incurred disability, for which the department pays the costs. Further, departmental facilities and priority access (contract) beds are available for certain veterans under the Veterans Treatment Regulations, as follows: Nova Scotia—DVA Camp Hill Hospital, Halifax, for acute, chronic and domiciliary care; New Brunswick—West Saint John Community Hospital and Ridgewood Veterans Wing; Prince Edward Island—Camp Hill Hospital, Halifax, for chronic and domiciliary care.

2. The Department of Veterans Affairs owns one hospital (Camp Hill Hospital, Halifax) in the maritime provinces.

3. Yes.(a) Lancaster Hospital in Saint John was transferred to the province of New Brunswick. (b) The monetary amount involved in the transfer was $1.00. (c) The other considerations are as follows: Canada shall have the right of priority use of 140 beds in a hospital for active and chronic treatment for veterans (20 of the said beds may be used for domiciliary care); and 60 beds for domiciliary care of veterans. Satisfactory arrangements were made for the transfer of staff. A capital grant of $6 million was made payable to the province towards the cost of the provision of 60 priority use beds contained within a domiciliary care facility to be constructed in the Saint John area; the construction and/or renovation of health facilities; and the purchase and installation of such equipment as may be required—all of which shall be related to the improvement of hospital, medical and treatment facilities for the benefit of veterans.

REMOVAL OF RAILWAY TRACKS FROM FREDERICTON, NEW BRUNSWICK

Question No. 956—Mr. Howie:

1. Has any application been received by the government concerning the removal of railway tracks from Fredericton, New Brunswick and, if so, what is the status of any such application?

2. What government funds or programmes are available to assist such a request financially or otherwise?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): 1. No application has been received, nor has there been any recent contact by either the city or the province with Transport Canada.

[Mr. Lang.]

2. Part I of the Railway Relocation and Crossing Act provides for the relocation of rail lines. The Minister of Transport and the Minister of State for Urban Affairs will support up to 50 per cent of the cost of preparing Transportation and Urban Development Plans required for application to the Canadian Transport Commission for authority to relocate railway facilities from urban areas. The Minister of Transport, after approval from the Governor in Council, and upon recommendation from the CTC would pay up to 50 per cent of the net cost of relocation.

TRANSPORT—SUBWAY, STE-ANNE DE BELLEVUE

Question No. 964—Mr. Herbert:

1. For the construction and the relocation of the subway carrying Ste. Marie Boulevard across and under the tracks of CP and CN Railways at Ste. Anne de Bellevue, Quebec, what was the basis for the determination that the maximum sum of $1,250,000 would be paid out of the Railway Grade Crossing Fund?

2. Does the government take part in such deliberations?

3. Is there adequate funding of the Railway Grade Crossing Fund?

4. Has the Government of Quebec indicated any reluctance to proceed with this work because of insufficient funding by the Railway Grade Crossing Fund?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The Canadian Transport Commission advises as follows: 1. The application for assistance for this project was made under Part III of the Railway Relocation and Crossing Act. Section 20, Subsection 3, paragraph "b" prescribes the percentage of the costs which may be paid by a grant from the Railway Grade Crossing Fund. It also fixes the maximum amount which may be paid as $625,000. In the case of St. Marie Boulevard, the subway under each railway was considered as a separate project and the maximum therefore becomes 2 x $625,000 or $1,250,000. The grant as provided for in the order is correct according to the provisions of the Railway Relocation and Crossing Act.

2. The Canadian Transport Commission is responsible for the administration of the Railway Grade Crossing Fund as provided for in the Railway Relocation and Crossing Act.

3. There is adequate funding of the Railway Grade Crossing Fund.

4. The Railway Transport Committee's files do not indicate any reluctance on the part of the government of Quebec to proceed with this work because of insufficient funding from the Railway Grade Crossing Fund.

CONTRACT TO BELL CANADA

Question No. 966—Mr. Marshall:

1. With reference to a release dated October 21, 1976 by the Minister of Supply and Services and the Minister of Communications, announcing a contract to Bell Canada to implement an inter-city telephone network, with participation by Newfoundland Telephone Company as a sub-contractor, what are the details of the contract for inter-city telephone communications between Ottawa and Corner Brook, Stephenville and Deer Lake in western Newfoundland?

2. What are the details of inter-city telephone communications between the cities of St. John's and Corner Brook, Newfoundland, as it relates to government departments or agencies between those two cities?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. The contract for the new system provides for inter-city telephone communications from Ottawa to the three locations: Corner Brook, Stephenville, and Deer Lake. Because of forecasted call volumes, telephone communications from these locations to Ottawa would continue to be provided by the regular commercial network. A service improvement will occur for telephone calls which originate in Ottawa and terminate in Newfoundland. This improvement results from the agreement under the contract to specified transmission standards which are to be maintained on a national basis.

2. Inter-city telephone service between the cities of St. John's and Corner Brook are presently served on the commercial network. We expect this service would continue to be used until there is sufficient traffic to warrant private line service for the federal government.

CARGO SHIPPED VIA ST. LAWRENCE RIVER PORTS

Question No. 972—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Is the government considering assessments against cargo shipped via St. Lawrence River ports to recover costs incurred in providing (a) dredging (b) ice breaking services and (i) if not, for what reason (ii) if so, on what date?

2. Is the provision of these services "free" not a direct conflict with the government's alleged user pay programme as pertains to transportation services?

3. Does the government consider the provision of these services "free" to constitute an unfair disadvantage to the Ports of Halifax and Saint John?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): 1. The government is considering the complex issue of marine user charges for the range of marine services provided in all sectors of federally serviced waters. The particular St. Lawrence River services mentioned are being considered, but not in isolation, and no date has been set for such a levy.

2. The imposition of user charges to the extent practicable is only one of the objectives of the transportation policy. Considerable time and economic analysis will be required to implement this part of the policy in all transport modes without impairing our international trade or regional social and economic development.

3. Halifax and Saint John have received significant federal assistance in recent years and are able to compete very effectively with alternative Canadian and American ports.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—NUMBER OF BILINGUAL POSITIONS

Question No. 992—Mr. Howie:

1. As of November 1, 1976, how many positions in the Canadian Armed Forces were designated as bilingual?

2. Is consideration being given to a review of the designation of these positions?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): 1. In accordance with studies conducted to comply with the official languages act the Department of National Defence has identified 12,256 positions as bilingual for future requirement. Due to many factors such as training facilities, funding, career progression etc. no positions have so far been designated. Depending on factors as listed above some designations will commence in 1978 but will not be completed till 1992.

2. Not applicable.

DEVELOPMENT OF ELECTRIC POWER IN NEW BRUNSWICK

Question No. 1,023—Mr. Howie:

During the fiscal year ended March 31, 1976, how much money was (a) paid (b) committed to New Brunswick for development of (i) each of the electric power production units by location (ii) electric power transmission facilities by locations?

SOCIAL DIRECTOR—VICTORIA VETERANS HOSPITAL

Question No. 1,058—Mr. McKinnon:

1. In the event of the retirement in the Spring of 1977 of Mr. Cassels, Social Director for the Veterans' Hospital in Victoria, has the Department of Veterans Affairs made plans for a replacement for Mr. Cassels?

2. Has the Department considered extending Mr. Cassels' service on a part-time basis and, if so, what were the results of such consideration?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): 1. Mr. Cassels remains undecided as to when he will retire. Should he do so in the spring of 1977, he has indicated that he will give the department three months' notice. In the event of Mr. Cassels' retirement, the department would normally proceed to find a replacement for him.

2. The department is not considering extending Mr. Cassels' service on a part-time basis but would consider it if this would serve the requirements at the Veterans Pavilion.

CORRIDOR ROAD CONNECTING NEW BRUNSWICK AND QUEBEC

Question No. 1,061—Mr. Howie:

Have any studies been done on the feasibility of a corridor road connecting New Brunswick to Quebec by a relatively direct route through Maine and, if so (a) on what dates (b) by whom (c) are they available to the public?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): In so far as Transport Canada is concerned: One study was undertaken several years ago which evaluated the feasibility of a corridor road connecting New Brunswick to Quebec by a relatively direct route through Maine. (a) the study was undertaken in 1970; (b) the study was conducted by N.D. Lea and Associates

Ltd., Transportation Engineers and the M.W. Menzies Group Ltd., Consulting Economists; (c) the report can be made available to interested parties through the Transport Canada Library, 13 Floor, Tower C, Place de Ville, Ottawa, Ontario, K1A 0N5.

INSPECTION OF BANKS

Question No. 1,091—Mr. Howie:

1. Since January 1, 1974, have any banks or branches located at Fredericton, New Brunswick been inspected by the Inspector General of Banks or his staff and, if so (a) how many (b) on what dates (c) in what locations were the inspections conducted (d) what is the address of the bank or branch?

2. Were any irregularities discovered during any of the inspections and, if so, were they rectified?

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): 1 and 2. The Financial condition of a bank is based on its operations as a whole including all of its branches. The Inspector General and staff are concerned with examining and inquiring into the management policies, practices and control procedures of the bank as a whole including those pertaining to examinations made of branches and departments through internal and external audits. Branches are accordingly not normally inspected by the Inspector General or his staff and none were inspected since January 1, 1974 at Fredericton, New Brunswick.

REFITS OF FOUR HELICOPTER DESTROYERS

Question No. 1,178—Mr. McCleave:

1. What terms, as to times of refit, were set forth in the tenders for the refits of the four helicopter destroyers and was it required that all four be admitted for refit simultaneously or within allotted time periods of each other?

2. What yard or yards had the facilities to live up to the time conditions in the tender call?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. The terms, as to times of refit, as set forth in the tender for the refits of the four helicopter destroyers were within allotted time periods of each other as follows:

	Commencement	Completion
HMCS Skeena	December 6, 1976	April 23, 1977
HMCS Nipigon	April 11, 1977	September 2, 1977

The following shipyards who replied to the tender call had the facilities to carry out the work described in the tender call:Canadian Vickers Ltd., Montreal, Que., Davie Shipbuilding Ltd., Montreal, Que., Hawker Siddeley Canada Ltd., Halifax Shipyard Division, Halifax, N.S. However, Hawker Siddeley indicated that the work on the first two vessels coincided with other major contracts which precluded them from adhering to the schedule for these vessels. Also, two other yards, Marine Industries Ltd., Sorel, Que., and St. John Shipbuilding and Drydock Co. Ltd., St. John, N.B., did not tender because of coincidence of the work with other contracts.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

[English]

CONFEDERATION

ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO COUNTER THREAT POSED BY QUEBEC SEPARATISTS

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Having given the Chair the proper notice, Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand, to move the adjournment of the House under the terms of Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and urgent matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the failure of the Prime Minister to tell the House and the Canadian people what steps he proposes to take to counter the threat to Canadian confederation posed by the separatist government in Quebec. This question must be transferred from the public arena to its proper place, the chamber of the House of Commons, where it can be debated by the representatives of all the people of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member gave the Chair notice, pursuant to Standing Order 26, of his intention to raise this matter. He has put forward a motion which relates to three questions. One has to do with a threat to Canadian confederation; second, the election of a separatist government in Quebec; and, third, the failure of the Prime Minister to inform the House—if I may quote from the motion—what steps he proposes to take to counter the threat to confederation, and so on. With regard to the first two questions, subparagraph (16) of Standing Order 26 reads as follows:

The right to move the adjournment of the House for the above purposes is subject to the following conditions:

(a) the matter proposed for discussion must relate to a genuine emergency calling for immediate and urgent consideration—

I interpret that language as meaning that an order for debate cannot proceed if the subject suggested, however important or pressing, does not constitute an emergency but is a matter of a continuing nature. The motion expresses an opinion—and I stress that it is the hon. member's opinion—that the result of the Quebec election constitutes a threat to confederation. But the hon. member must surely realize that if it is a threat to confederation, it is a continuing threat and not one of an emergency nature as envisaged in subsection (a) of section 16 of the Standing Order. Therefore, I would refrain from granting the special debate pursuant to Standing Order 26 on that basis. Furthermore, I am most reluctant to enter into an expression of opinion as to whether or not an election that has taken place in any province, being a duly lawful and proper election within the procedures known under our system, can, as an opinion of the Chair, constitute what is required by the Standing Order to be an emergency calling for immediate and urgent consideration.

● (1520)

In the final analysis, the hon. member moves from those two points to concentrate in the motion on the failure of the Prime Minister to tell this House what steps he is taking to counteract the results of this election. In that respect, while I would not say so except with the very greatest reluctance, since that is a criticism of the Prime Minister I would have to consider, under section (5) of the Standing Order, whether that is a very proper use of the allotted days that will be following.

I am very reluctant to use the escape under Standing Order 26 that so long as an opposition day remains there is a chance to discuss matters of importance, and therefore the rule ought not to be used to set up a debate. Standing Order 26 was changed in order, I think, to remove debate on whether or not the order should go, and to set up hours that could be used by the Chair which are auxiliary hours to the regular sittings. I think those changes were made in order to see that matters of national importance which ought to be debated in this chamber and which would not likely be debated in other ways could be debated under the application of the order.

I do not like to refute that by saying that since an opposition day may be coming up, that notice ought to be taken. I think that forces upon the opposition an obligation which is not natural with respect to the use of those days. However, that part of the hon. member's motion which seeks to criticize the Prime Minister for his failure to make a disclosure to this House seems to me to be a very proper use of one of the opposition days. Therefore, having regard to the two reasons that I cited previously relative to subsection (16)(a), and for the latter reason relative to section (5) of the rule, I do not see fit to set aside special hours pursuant to Standing Order 26 to debate the motion put forward by the hon. member.

Orders of the day.

STATUTE LAW (METRIC CONVERSION) AMENDMENT ACT, 1976

AMENDMENTS TO WHEAT BOARD ACT TO FACILITATE CONVERSION TO METRIC MEASUREMENT

The House resumed, from Wednesday, January 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-23, to facilitate conversion to the metric system of measurement, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, before I conclude my remarks I should like to correct a portion of my remarks appearing in Hansard for yesterday at page 2429. I am reported as having said: "No matter how you look at it, there is no benefit to the manufacturer." I thought I said: "No matter how you look at it, there will only be benefit to the manufacturer." That was one of the points I was trying to make. As a result of the insistence of the manufacturers, without thought for all other segments of the economy, we are being forced into a system without any consultation. It is a common complaint among farmers that they are being saddled with costs and the buck stops there, as it is often said: they are at the mercy of prices over which they have no control.

It is quite evident from the remarks made by other members from western Canada that the readings we have been getting from our constituencies and from people with whom we have been in contact the last little while are entirely different from those that the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale) has apparently been getting, or wants to lead us to believe he has been getting.

I referred to the confusion and to the case of a man trying to get directions. Present-day roads will be in existence for years to come and will be measured in terms of miles, not kilometres. Speedometers or mileage meters will be calibrated in kilometres; therefore you will not be able to give specific directions in years to come. Under the new system people will be bamboozled for years to come. In fact, we will be using two systems. That in itself will complicate matters.

The fact is, as other people have said, that this change will not produce one bushel more. In fact, it will only add to total cost; it will add nothing to efficiency. Replacement parts for many machines will no longer be available. I know for a fact, from past experience, that machinery companies practice planned obsolescence; they do not intend to manufacture any item to last longer than they feel is necessary. They are the ones who make the decisions. As I pointed out yesterday, you cannot even replace a simple thing like a rim by using one from another machine; you have to buy the rim made for the machine. On our farm I believe at the last count there were like 115 to 120 tires around the place, so one can imagine the number of rims required. I am sure other farms have more, or perhaps less, but the fact is that in many instances these rims are not interchangeable.

Metric System

Manufacturers keep insisting that if they are more competitive and can break into world markets, their cost of production will go down. If it is good business for them to standardize in terms of the rest of the world, then we as consumers should demand of the minister—and he might consider this—that legislation should be brought forward to compel manufacturers to give us something in return. I should like to see the minister come forward and insist that manufacturers standardize on items such as chains, bearings, sprockets, and so on. These items differ in size by a fraction of an inch, which means that one rim will not fit over another hub. This is a deliberate attempt on the part of manufacturers to make you buy their parts only, and there is no need for that. There should be standardization. If we are expected to pay the price of this conversion, surely we should expect something from the manufacturers. Therefore, I would ask the minister seriously to consider whether he can compel these manufacturers to standardize.

For example, why is it that a car cannot use the same type of windshield over a number of different model years? Instead, the manufacturer adds a fraction of an inch, or makes it slightly smaller, or gives it a little more curvature so that it cannot be used in a car of a different year should it need replacement. As far as I am concerned, this would help keep down the fires of inflation. Certainly it would reduce costs in many areas.

In many instances people are struggling for survival, as are many operations. We witness this day in and day out. Many people are not fussy about the newness of a given piece of equipment or instrument; they are more concerned about its serviceability. This is particularly true of trucks. Many farmers use trucks, but in this regard they do not get the co-operation from the manufacturer which the manufacturer expects from the consumer, particularly in the agricultural field. Several pelleting plants in my constituency sell their product to Japan. They tell me they never had any difficulty selling their pellets to Japan under the old system. If Japan wanted quantities in metric tonnes, they could comply with that request. There has never been any confusion. So why in the world are we suddenly faced with this Latin conversion which will simply add to the total cost, and in many instances, will add unnecessarily to the existing confusion? It will add to the cost as a result of delay and inefficiency.

• (1530)

It is bad enough for the farmer to have to sit down and make the calculations, but if he sends his man out into the field on the machinery, you can imagine how much attention that man will pay to proper measurement. I have had some experience along this line, and let me assure you that I have had to re-seed quite a few acres in rapeseed because the proper calculations were not made. I suggest this new system of measurement will only add to the total cost of operations. There will, no doubt, be additional confusion, and perhaps that is why a request I have heard often is being made by people who have considered this matter. The suggestion is that we adopt an interim measurement so that between the time we remove the old bushel measurement until we adopt the equivalent metric measurement we will have a designated term such as a "kilshel", or whatever name you want to attach to it, which will be approximately two-thirds the volume of the old bushel. Instead of 60 pounds, it will be 40.

In this way we would have accurate, but simple, calculations, thereby minimizing the amount of confusion among people who have to make these calculations. This is the suggestion made by some of the people who have given this matter real consideration. I have not given it much thought, personally, but that is a suggestion I have heard from farmers. They feel there should be some measurement during the interim or transitional period. In this way we could move gradually to the new measurement. This interim measure could be introduced on a temporary basis.

Many elevator agents are presently concerned because they feel many errors will be made. I know that eventually these errors will be caught at the head offices of the respective companies, but this will only add to the confusion. Unless the farmer is always on his toes, there will be an additional loss of time. It might be easy for the farmer to double-check on these calculations during the winter months, but from the time of winter break-up to the first snow, farmers are too busy to take time off to check measurements, calculations and payments for the various grades they have sold.

I appeal to the minister to set up a system to monitor pricing in retail outlets. I mentioned the incident involving the shaving cream with three different measurements and three different prices. We cannot expect everyone to carry a calculator. If we did, we would be like a bunch of robots. However, the department should involve itself in this problem. If there is a price increase that is too high, an inspector might usefully spend some time checking the price in various outlets. This would be appreciated not only by housewives but by consumers. In the case of coffee, sugar and almost anything else, many retail outlets have taken advantage of any change to increase the price, which never again comes down.

I conclude, Mr. Speaker, by assuring the House that the farming community is not enthusiastic about this change. We feel it will add to confusion, with absolutely no benefit.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I find it odd to speak now on this bill on metric conversion, because I had the opportunity to speak on the subject when the bill was originally introduced in the House a number of years ago. The hon. member just mentioned one problem which we experience as the result of a conglomeration of sizes of parts for farm machinery and implements. We all know about coarse threads, fine threads, various pitch threads, metric threads, standard threads, pipe threads and others. Obviously, it is an expensive proposition for the farmer to maintain a supply of parts for his equipment in order to make normal repairs. One reason I am in favour of going to the metric system is to eliminate the problems we have as a result of these various sizes. By adopting the metric system we would standardize things such as nuts and bolts.

[Mr. Korchinski.]

I have in the past often found that when you ask a civil servant to do something, he quite often does not do what you ask, or does something that goes beyond what is required or is in any way advantageous to you. In fact, very often the civil servant creates more problems. Having regard to what the last speaker said in respect of standardization, one of the problems farmers are now experiencing has been expressed by wheat pools, farm organizations and others. They have suggested that unless civil servants pay attention to the needs of the consumer, the consumer will be ripped off to an extent never before experienced. The rip-off already exists to a degree or we would not have this suggestion to simplify the complex problem involving measurement. In simplifying the problem we may be encouraging a rip-off against the farmer.

Let us consider tire sizes for a moment. Considering the number of changes that have been made in the last ten years, it is a wonder that anyone can buy replacement tires for his automobile, truck or tractor. If the change continues, soon we will not be able to buy tires that will fit our rims. Perhaps we will require two sizes, one to fit the rims that originally came with the car, and one as a replacement size. This is only an example; there are many things like this. There is a tremendous opportunity for the government to prevent this rip-off by industry in respect of size changes. Let me give the example of the antique car. If you want parts, you must have them manufactured specifically for the automobile, at tremendous cost.

Let me refer to the propaganda put out by the minister respecting the agricultural industry going metric. It starts out by suggesting that in 1977 Canada and the United States will be converting to the metric measurement system used by the rest of the world. That is a lot of bull; it is not true. The rest of the world never used this system, and in this respect the government is being totally dishonest. What happened was that many countries got together and established a metric unit of measurement. For years Italy, France and many European countries have used the metric system in respect of temperature. We have developed a new international metric unit of measurement for temperature, and we are doing this in a number of other areas. We are not accepting the system that was in use in other countries, and I think people should be told that. What we are doing—and we have no objection to it—is embarking upon a world measurement system that is expressed in metric units. This will apply to countries which have been on the metric system even more than it will apply to this country.

● (1540)

People who thought they were talking about degrees of Centigrade in terms of temperature now find they are talking in terms of degrees of Celsius, which is a totally new unit applied internationally to the measurement of temperature. The Centigrade measurement was retained for the radius of a circle because the radius of a circle and temperature have no relationship to each other. The same is true of Pascal in the measurement of pressure, and many other things. There were obviously many units of metric measurement in use throughout the world which were not the same as other units. We have designed new international units of metric measurement which all countries of the world have agreed to adopt. I do not think the government is aware of the criticism it is going to receive. It is saying that the farmer will have to change.

Mr. Speaker, I decided I was going to learn the Celsius scale and know what it was all about. When I looked at the barometer and saw it was 10 degrees below zero, however, I could not decide whether it was cold or was not cold. When I got outside I found I was wearing too many clothes, because the barometer was reading Celsius. After two years of looking at the stupid barometer I bought one that had both Fahrenheit and Celsius on it. Then I would listen to the radio to find out the temperature, and look out the window at my barometer to see what it said, and between them I could work out how cold it was.

In this country we have encountered a lot of problems with the introduction of bilingualism, but I do not think any of us would say that we were wrong in passing the Official Languages Act. It is a different thing, however, when it is implemented and John Doe is told that he has to become bilingual. I have only to recall my own difficulties with Celsius to realize how difficult it is for him. Now we are telling industry that it is to their advantage to make the conversion to metric.

Mr. Speaker, I do not have much sympathy with any difficulties the Canadian Wheat Board may encounter or any problems that may develop for the wheat pools. For the benefit of the parliamentary secretary, may I say that I am informed it will cost $400,000 or $500,000 for the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool to convert. When we start talking about the farmer going over to hectares and kilograms, however, I can foresee a great deal of unfavourable reaction.

I think it would have been possible for the government to have asked industry to label products with the old and the new measurements. In my opinion it is not necessary for the farmer to make the conversion. He can look over his 40 acres, but I do not think it is necessary for him to know that it is 13 or 14 hectares. To him it is a 40-acre field and he knows he is going to get 15 bushels to the acre from that field. When he takes the grain to the elevator, they will tell him the quantity in tonnes. In some of the publications sent to farmers there appears the sentence, "Your truck may hold tonnes". I suppose it depends on the size of the truck, but when he takes the grain to the elevator they will tell him how many tonnes there are.

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) pointed out the legal problems involved in changing the basis of land measurement. It will affect all the deeds in existence. Acres will have to be translated into hectares. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is necessary and, indeed, I do not think it will happen. When the farmer gets an invoice from the elevator, the amount will be expressed in tonnes, and when he gets the invoice for his milk it will be expressed in litres. Packages are now labelled in both French and English. Maybe it would be better not to have the English, because in that way we would quickly pick up a knowledge of French.

I know I can always find my way to the washroom no matter what language it is in. Indeed, in some of the airports they use symbols and you do not even need to know the language. The farmer would be assisted if there were a translation to metric on labels. Then he would not have to make the conversion himself. In one generation of teaching children the metric system, the conversion will be made, and I have no objection to that. What I object to, and what I think the farmer objects to, is the demand that he make the conversion himself. I do not think that is necessary. Civil servants see this as a simple problem, as they saw the two official languages as a simple problem. They said that everybody would speak both languages, but now they find that even they are having trouble mastering the second language. The average person will still function in the way that is easiest. The distance from the floor to the ceiling is still approximately eight feet, and when you get a two by four we all know what it is: no matter what the new equivalent may be called, to most of us it will still be a two by four.

It may be important to the industry what the new measurement is but it is not important to me. The wall is still going to be a certain thickness no matter how thick the studs are. The farmer will be required to make the conversion in the amount of grain he sows, the amount of fertilizer he uses and the amount of land he owns. He will not convert to metric terms but, rather, back to the terms with which he is familiar. Therefore, I suggest that the government should be very careful about forcing anyone to make these changes.

In this booklet we are told to go out and buy a 10-metre and 30-metre tape. What for? Farmers will build their buildings as long, or as wide, as they want them, no matter what the tape is. They understand how long they want their building to be, and they can do that with the old tape: they will not buy a new one.

I suggest that the conversion should be gradual, and it will be done successfully if we do not force it, if we do not demand that people become confused. There is no reason for the elevator not to use the two systems, because the elevator people have the assistance of a computer. The next generation will learn the metric system in school, and those who are not familiar with the metric system and are not able to learn it should be allowed to use the system which they know; and even if fractions occur it will not concern them very much in calculating bulk shipments.

I have been very interested to read that by such and such a date the conversion must take place, or that such and such is the earliest completion date, or that the absolute completion date must be before such a period, and so on. Why is that? I do not know why it has to be. Perhaps the minister can explain why in some areas conversion must take place by a certain date. We have not used the metric system in this country previously, yet our grain sales to international markets were made under the metric system simply because that was the way it was done. It did not bother anyone shipping grain that that was the way it was done. This was done by computer, and I suppose they assumed that if the computer would accept it, everyone in the country would do the same. However, I am scared they will not.

I would like this conversion to take place as quickly as possible and with as little difficulty as possible, but we must not insist on these changes being made. There was no need to rush, in my opinion, to convert the dairy industry to the metric system. I spoke to some of the dairymen and they told me that when they put out their new containers they had to record a lot of information on them. Then they were refused a licence because in the next stage of the process they had to add some more information. It did not make any difference to the consumer who knew what a quart was and who did not care how it was processed through the machines. It is this kind of insistence on conversion by a certain date that, I am sure, has created some unnecessary expense that could have been avoided quite easily.

So I express the hope, as a practical politician—which most of us here are—that if the civil servants have done a good job, part of their job will be to explain to the people here the necessity of using the new metric units which are used in the international community. Their second responsibility is also a big one. If you take all the quarts of milk off the shelf and replace them with litres, I am not sure whether they will be bigger or smaller. If the housewife does not know whether it is bigger or smaller and wants to know whether she is paying the same amount for the milk, the government has the responsibility to police the pricing so that she does not get gouged in the changeover. This also goes for farm machinery. If we find that a new machine becomes obsolete in two years because, due to the conversion to the metric system, the wheels or the tires cannot be replaced, the public will feel gypped.

The minister and the civil servants have a responsibility to set up an enforcement branch in the department which will ensure that we do not get short-changed when the conversion is made. If a product is smaller, shorter or lighter, we will not know whether we are paying too much or too little for that commodity, because of the change. Unless we know that, we will feel cheated. In fact, we already think we are. So it seems to me that it is the responsibility of the minister and his department to police this matter for us until the conversion is completed.

I do not think it matters a hoot whether it is a bushel, a kilogram or a ton. A farmer looked at a bag and he knew that if he had wheat in it, it was heavier than if he had oats. If he looked in the bin, he knew there would be so many bags in it. In western Canada they look in the bin and they say it will cost so much when it goes to the elevator. The farmer was used to that, he was familiar with what was there, and it will not matter to him whether we have converted to the metric system unless only the new measurements are put on the bin, measurements with which he is not familiar so he will not know whether he is overpaying. If he thinks he is, the government will never sell that system to him.

[Mr. Peters.]

In certain areas the conversion does not have to be pushed quickly. There should be no turning back from the metric system, but I am concerned that we in Canada are trying to show the United States that we are better and faster at converting than they are. The backlash against the government and the Liberal party will not be too bad in western Canada because it will affect only a couple of members, but at the least it will produce a heck of a lot noise, and it may affect some of us in eastern Canada as well. We do not need to be the showplace of the North American continent in metric conversion. Let us proceed with it as fast as acceptable.

I am very interested in hearing what the minister has to say about policing the changes that are made, so that there is no rip-off. It is evident that there could be rip-offs in replacement parts of equipment. Some increased costs may be justified, but it is the minister's responsibility to ensure that there are no rip-offs. I hope he can tell us that a number of people in his department will be continually policing what is being done in industry to protect the consumer after the conversion.

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, with regard to Bill C-23 I, too, wish to register some criticisms and concerns about conversion to the metric system on behalf of the people I represent in the Pembina constituency. In spite of the fact that one might be in basic agreement with the position that Canada should join most other peoples in the world in establishing a unified system of measurement, there are, nevertheless, a number of concerns which deserve comment and study. There can be no doubt about the fact that such an important change will be the stimulus of much frustration during the transition period. While some Canadians will be hurt more than others by the conversion to the metric system, eventually all will be affected by way of increased costs to consumers in the form of increased prices. The exact impact remains an unknown quantity, but it is certain to contribute to an already serious inflationary problem. There have been no estimates of the cost, but in the United States conversion cost estimates range from $40 billion to $100 billion. At the usual one-tenth differential between Americans and Canadians, that means between $4 billion and $10 billion for Canada.

● (1600)

Many small firms may be faced with undue expenses in adapting to the metric system. Added costs will affect their competitive status and may disrupt profits for a year or two. There is the added possibility of business failure in some cases. Although the metrication process is not as far advanced in the United States as it is here, a U.S. Senate bill on metrication was introduced on January 15, 1975, with provisions specifically designed to help small businesses. The bill would enable the administration, in consultation with the secretary of commerce, to make loans to them either directly or in co-operation with banks or other lending institutions through agreement to enable them to participate on an immediate or deferred basis. The American bill would also authorize the small business administration—a U.S. government agency which provides business loans—to make grants to individuals to defray nonreimbursable expenses for tools, and so forth, to a maximum of $2,000 per person. It is suggested that we introduce an amendment along these lines.

The guiding financial principle of this government is to let the costs lie where they fall. This is regarded by many groups, manufacturing concerns and individuals, as being most inequitable. It is not in the national interest for some groups to suffer while others benefit under a policy which is supposed to serve the long-term good of all Canadians.

In a good many ways this debate is useless because the government, in its 1970 white paper on metric conversion, committed Canada to converting from the current inches-pounds system of measurement to the international system based on metric units. However useless this debate may be, we as members of parliament have an obligation to register our protest on behalf of those we represent. Who will this measure benefit? One thing is for sure; it will not benefit the farmers of this country.

Comments have already been made by other speakers about the tremendous cost of conversion to the metric system and the disruption of changing from acres to hectares and changing the traditional ways of the farmers who have been brought up to know certain measurements. All these things have become part of the culture of our people. This sudden change hits our farmers first. I cannot understand the rationale behind this change. The government states it is because our commodities are sold on the world markets and that most of our trading partners use the metric system. I suggest that the point of export is where we should make the conversion to the metric system, and not at the farm level.

The hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski), the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers), the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk), the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) have all expressed reservations about converting to the metric system. They have done a superb job in this debate expressing the views of our western farmers. So rather than prolong this debate, let me close by expressing my hope that this measure will be given further thought and that the minister will give serious consideration to the realistic proposals made by the hon. members I just mentioned.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I will limit my observations to the part of this bill dealing with prairie agriculture and with the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, and point out the much more serious and far-reaching implications which might not occur to most people involved in the changeover.

When considering adopting the metric system, it would be helpful to think about how our present system came about. Originally, a yard was the length of a man's arm, or to use a more modern phrase, the length of a person's arm. When people related the distance of a yard in their own minds they could at least look at their arm to assess how long it was. But what is a metre? If my memory serves me correctly, the length of the metre was decided by Napoleon and the standard measurement is in some Paris institution. I do not know whether it is on public view, but it is something most of us have never seen and very few will ever see. To us the yard represents something which is tangible; it is approximately the length of a person's arm.

It might be convenient to some to use a kilogram, which is something like 2.2 pounds, or a ton, but a ton is far too big for an individual to estimate properly. A bushel was something a man could carry. He could visualize a bushel basket, but could he visualize the equivalent in metric terms? Of course not! We have ten kilograms, 20 kilograms or 30 kilograms, and we end up with a ton, which is approximately 60 bushels of wheat or 70 bushels of barley. It cannot be visualized. The metric system is a fine thing for large grain companies when they handle boxcars, shiploads or unit trains of grain. The ton is a workable unit for them, but it is rather ridiculous for the government to argue that we need a changeover to sell our grain. We have been selling it metrically for decades in the world markets.

It is interesting that the people who agree with this change are the grain handling companies, of which there are just a few. As the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) said, it would be fine in air-conditioned offices where there are computers to deal with the metric system, but the farmer out on his windy acres with the rain pouring, or with dust in his eyes, would find it difficult to use the metric system. It is not easy to use the metric system at the farm level because there are certain inherent problems. This part of the bill deals with western Canada, and western Canada was surveyed on the mile square or the one mile by two miles square. Everyone knows that a section is 640 acres, more or less, depending on corrections necessary for latitude and longitude. A quarter section is 160 acres. An acre is something we can visualize, but with this bill we would have hectares, which bears no relationship to anything. If this bill could make two plants grow where only one grew before, it might make some sense; but obviously agricultural land does not get any bigger just because we change from acres to hectares.

The ton measure is just too large for most farmers to understand. When I look at daily grain prices, I look at Chicago prices which are still quoted in bushels. Canadian prices are quoted in tons. The one ton price may be $289, whereas the bushel price may be $7, which is easily understood. To those accustomed to small measures, the ton is far too large a unit. This is one of the great difficulties with this metric system at the farm. In the grain trade you have several large companies staffed with competent people. These companies are different from the grain growers, and to the 200,000 permit-holders this is an entirely new system of measuring, a system to which producers will not easily adapt. The new system will come into common use somewhere down the road, but not without trouble. I contend that there is a serious possibility of loss of production. Certainly, the new system will not lead to any increase in production, and there is the distinct possibility of loss of production unless certain changes are made in accordance with the representations of the farming industry.

● (1610)

I hope, first, that the term "hectare" will be dropped and "acre" retained. There is no valid reason for not doing this, and it makes sense. Why can we not retain the measurements by "bushel"? The proposed system in this regard makes no sense. For example, the grain elevator agent who must deal with many farmers waiting to unload their grain will need to do much juggling with figures, looking up tables, and so on. He will buy by the ton, then measure the amount of grain loaded on the tank car, or boxcar, in bushels, because the grain transport system for a number of years to come will continue to use the bushel as a unit of measure. I understand it does not yet plan to change over to the metric system.

However, when the grain arrives at the other end of the line it will be measured according to a metric scale. Why cannot the grain continue to be bought in bushels so the elevator agent can continue to ship it in bushels? If the conversion to the metric measure must be made, why cannot it be made at the higher level, so to speak—the other end of the line?

Civil servants who planned this bill have not thought through its full effects. For example, how will the farmer learn to measure his new volumes of fertilizer and herbicide? Herbicides in spray form are applied in small volume. You are dealing with small units, say two or three ounces in ten gallons of water per acre, or perhaps up to 16 ounces of herbicide in 20 gallons of water per acre. It is all too easy to make a mistake in the application of herbicide. If they are applied too thinly, money is wasted because the herbicides will not do the job; but if more than the required amount is applied, your crop is ruined. Many crops have been lost through the overapplication of herbicides. The question of fertilizer volumes is also important.

How are farm implements to be altered? Drills are governed by acre meters, not hectare meters. These drills are mostly American-made. American manufacturers dominate the market and we can expect such drills to remain on the market for a long time. How can a farmer calculate how much seed or fertilizer he must use? He will buy his fertilizer, presumably, by the kilogram and then calculate how much his drill, which will be governed by acre meter, will require for a given area.

It is useless telling the farmer to get a hectare meter; he will not do it. As I have said, 90 per cent of drills are American-made, not Canadian-made. So far as I know, only one company in this country makes drills, Co-op Implements. Therefore, you will not see many metric drills in western Canada or eastern Canada until they are made in the United States, because the farm implement business is really continentwide. It is important to recognize this. For example, at present seed drills come with six-inch, seven-inch and eight-inch runs; I suppose they come in other sizes too. We will not get equivalent drills set up in centimetres, say with 2.5 centimetres being the equivalent of one inch. You will not see a 15-centimetre, 17.5 centimetre or 20 centimetre drill. Drill sizes will still be measured in inches because the North American market as a whole will still demand drills calibrated in inches, at least until the whole of this continent changes over to the metric system.

We send across the border much seed grain, including seed wheat, seed barley and forage seeds. The Department of Agriculture is anxious to increase our exports of forage seeds to the United States market; it is a good market for our clovers and legumes. But passage of this bill may help diminish our United States market because we shall export our seeds in bags labelled in kilograms. The American farmer buying our seed will not be happy. All other things being equal, he will buy the bag of seed labelled in units of measurement with which he is familiar. Therefore, passage of this bill could erect a trade barrier to exports to the United States market, the market to which we export most of our grain seed.

In essence, therefore, the proposed changeover has considerable potential for harm to production. Perhaps the damage will be impossible to measure. In any event, this bill will not in any way lead to increases in production. As I have said, it has a potential for decreasing production. Potentially, it could hurt the farm machinery industry, particularly of western Canada. I am referring to that part of the industry which sells machinery in the United States market. It is well known that up to 80 per cent of farm machinery produced in western Canada is sold on the American market. Therefore, that part of the industry must stay in tune with the American market and do what that market wants, not what civil servants in this country and the metric commission want.

This legislation will also make it difficult for farmers to calculate how much they are getting for their grain or produce. The farmer has been used to selling a bushel of grain, say for $3, a bushel of barley for $2, flax for $7 and rapeseed for $6. Some look on this bill as a conspiracy on the part of the grain industry to confuse the farmer because he will now be dealing with tons of grain. He will get so much money for each ton of grain; and one ton represents roughly the equivalent of 60 bushels. Certainly, the new system will make it more difficult for the farmer to know, on a day to day basis, if he is getting more, or less, for his grain or other produce. Therefore, the new system will bring only confusion to the 200,000 permit holders of western Canada.

It makes no sense to change the survey system from acres to hectares. So long as the grain transportation system uses the bushel as a measurement, grain should be measured in bushels. As an elevator agent told me, he must buy grain by the ton, then ship it by the bushel. He thought the system was stupid and that we were no further ahead. He said that the new system would only create more mistakes and there would be more difficulty all along the line.

Perhaps this legislation is the government's answer to unemployment. We shall need to employ more people to convert measurements from one system to another. However, until the transport system involving the hauling of grain changes over to the metric system, much of this legislation makes no sense. I am alluding to the problems of producers, the way elevator agents will buy the grain and ship it. Surely it makes no sense to buy by the ton and then ship by the bushel. Remember, relatively unsophisticated people will be doing the measuring in a cold, windy elevator. The agent will buy by the ton, then turn around and ship the grain out by the bushel because the transportation system will still use that unit of measurement.

● (1620)

Surely the railroads of this country are better able to cope with the metric system than the individual farmer. Until they do, it is surely not the time for change. I repeat that in order to be uniform, somewhere down the road we will no doubt change to the metric system. There are many disadvantages to the metric system that we will only realize as we begin to use it. However, change for the sake of getting ahead of the Americans in the agricultural field does not make much sense through this aspect of the legislation.

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest yesterday to the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale) when he spoke in this debate. If you refer to Hansard you will note that at page 2422 he had this to say:

First, it should be noted that this change has a broad and virtually unanimous base of support in the farm community.

He later said:

I did not find the degree of antagonism which they perhaps see, or perhaps it would be more proper to say that they would like to see and would like to foment.

In the latter quote he is referring to the members of the opposition. I did not find that type of support in my constituency. The support was far from unanimous. If I repeated in this House some of the remarks made to me by farmers, Your Honour would undoubtedly call me out of order. The hon. member stated that members of this party were trying to foment antagonism with the farmers in connection with this bill. If there is any antagonism on the part of the farmer, that antagonism has been caused by the present government with its LIFT program, cheap barley sales and failure to appreciate the problems of the livestock industry in western Canada.

The hon. member for Assiniboia also indicated that there was considerable saving to be made by converting to the metric system. As reported at page 2423 of Hansard, he said:

I want to deal, as well, with the question of cost, which has been mentioned, or more particularly with cost savings. A lot of people have been skeptical about the matter. In response to that skepticism I have asked the committee of the Grains Council to demonstrate clearly where the cost savings are, and it has produced a detailed analysis which indicates an annual saving to the grains industry in the order of $1 million.

That is an interesting statement, but the hon. member did not produce any evidence in this House to support the findings of the grains group. He also spoke of education. I wonder what the cost of documents of this kind is to the taxpayers in order to try and educate the farmer with regard to the metric system. On December 21 the minister spoke in the House in support of this bill. I wish to quote from page 2229 of Hansard, where he stated:

Metric System

Increasing Canada's exports is also one of the key reasons why it makes good economic sense to go metric.

I challenge the minister to prove that the transfer to the metric system in the farming community will add one bushel of wheat to production, or one kernel of grain as far as our exports are concerned. For many years the grain trade has been selling on the export market using the metric system. Therefore, at this time it will not add to our exports.

What does this bill do? Basically, the bill amends the Wheat Board Act, the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act and the Western Grain Stabilization Act by substituting the word "hectares" for "acres" and "tonnes" for "bushels". Yesterday the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) spoke at length on our land titles system, the Torrens system. It is a system that has been effective and efficient over the years. It is one of the best registration systems in the world.

The land titles system is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces and can only be changed by the provincial legislatures. To do so would involve the changing of hundreds of thousands of titles at a cost of hundreds of thousands of dollars. However, if this bill goes through as it is, and undoubtedly it will unless the government accepts some amendments, hectares will be forced upon the farmers in the west, with the result that eventually the western land titles system will have to be changed. What will we then have in Canada? We will have two systems—in effect, a dual system. The Canadian Wheat Board area, namely the prairies, will be using hectares for the measurement of area and the rest of Canada will be using the acreage measurement.

Land in western Canada was surveyed many years ago before it was homesteaded. It was surveyed into mile-square blocks of 640 acres. Then, of course, there is the half-section, the quarter-section and the legal subdivision. These units cannot easily be converted to the metric system. For example, if my mathematics is correct, one section, or 640 acres, will equal 258.8080 hectares.

The farmer in western Canada has used the measurement of acres all his life. He can walk into a field, look at it and say "there are 'X' number of acres in that parcel of land." It is a system with which he is familiar. He can make one pass with a piece of machinery through a field and, knowing the width of the machine, can say that he has cultivated, combined or swathed "X" number of acres. However, if he has to use hectares, what will happen? The powers that be have suggested a simple method. I have here a pamphlet entitled "The Metric System for Farmers". It states:

Probably the best way for you to visualize a hectare, is to put red flags on the fence posts at the four corners of an area measuring one hectare. Each time you look at these flags you will become more familiar with the hectare.

I wonder whether the government is planning to supply red flags to the farmers in western Canada. There is also an effect on the calibration of sprayers used for spraying pesticides and herbicides. The sprayers are all based on acres. Herbicides and pesticides are all packaged in Imperial measure. What will happen when they are sold by the litre instead of by the gallon? The farmer has a choice. He can take a gallon-measuring can and pour the pesticide or herbicide into the can, thus measuring a gallon, but this is a dangerous practice because in most cases he is dealing with a dangerous poison which must be handled with care. Alternatively, he can make a calculation to convert litres or kilograms into the Imperial system. This is a calculation which involves fractions or decimals and there is a great possibility of error in doing the calculation. If there is a mistake and the chemical is too strong, it will kill the plant. If it is not strong enough, it will be ineffective. An error in calculation could be very costly.

If a farmer buys registered seed, he will be buying it in kilograms. For comparative purposes in measuring the success of his crop from one year to another he will have to convert tonnes per hectare into bushels per acre. What will the bill accomplish in its present form? It will do nothing except cause inconvenience and frustration to farmers. It will add nothing to their efficiency. It will not add one penny to their sales.

I ask hon. members to examine the bill carefully and read some of the material which has been published in connection with it. I quote from a pamphlet entitled "Metric Conversion and the Grain Market" put out by the Canadian Livestock Feed Board and having to do with grain transportation. It reads in part:

> The grain transport industry will continue to use the present system for some years yet. No official date has been set for the rail and road transport systems to go metric in freight rate quotations. When the metric system is introduced, the maritime tariffs will be posted in both Imperial and metric terms.

As the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) said a few minutes ago, the elevators will continue to purchase grain in tons and convert in into bushels when it is loaded on to the cars. Subsequently it will be reconverted into metric form at the export end. Since this is the situation, why should it be necessary to move the metric system back into the farmyard? Why not buy from the farmer in bushels and let him continue to use acres? We see here another example of a government of bureaucrats and academics interfering with the producer. I must say that in this case they are aided by the grain companies. Some years ago, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said the government had no place in the bedrooms of the nation. I say the government has no place in the farmyard. I do not object to metrication beyond the local elevator stage. This makes sense; The grain trade wants it and has been using it for years in connection with export markets. But for heaven's sake leave the producer alone. I might say that it is our intention, when this bill gets to report stage, to put forward amendments which would have the effect of letting the farmer continue to use "acres" and "bushels".

The minister and others on the government side have indicated that there is an urgency attached to this measure and that the bill must be passed by February 1. Presumably, Mr. Speaker, the work which has been done in the grain trade and by the Wheat Board in converting to the metric system has gone on for a considerable time, possibly for some months. Why has the government waited until the eleventh hour before bringing in this legislation? Surely parliament is entitled to have the opportunity and the time to discuss such an important piece of legislation without being under pressure. I like to think that we live under a democratic system in this country, but it seems to me, when I see the government legislating increasingly by way of regulation and bringing in bills at the eleventh hour, the subject matter of which is a fait accompli, that the virtues of our democratic system can no longer be taken for granted.

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I want to register my protest against this type of legislation. We come back to Ottawa and find ourselves called upon to discuss television in the chamber and conversion to the metric system. Surely, with the country facing the desperate problems of which we are all aware, there should be more substantive issues to be debated here.

Bill C-23 makes changes in a number of acts including the Canadian Wheat Board Act, the Gas Inspection Act, the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act, the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, the Regional Development Incentives Act, the Two-Price Wheat Act, the Weights and Measures Act, and the Western Grains Stabilization Act. This is an important bill for grain producers in particular and for agriculture generally. We in western Canada know that "metric day" for the grain industry is February 1, 1977. Yet here we are debating second reading of this bill on January 27, 1977, with just a few days to go. The bill has to be passed before all the arrangements which have been made are legal.

The government knew this long ago. We might well ask why such a long delay has occurred. I do not know where all the other industries are going in this metric conversion process, but I do know that the grain industry is going to get there first. The government has so little respect for agriculture that it has not seen fit to appoint a new deputy minister to the department. We have been without one for two months following the disaster of the last deputy minister.

This is something which must give producers across the country cause to ponder. Where are we in the grain industry going? After the expenditure of hundreds of millions of taxpayers' money on hopper cars, railway trackage and improvements on the west coast, I find that though we used to export 30 million bushels a month from Vancouver, the average so far this year has been 17 million bushels a month—and this is without interference from labour problems or railway problems. With a little more help like metric conversion we shall be right out of business. We find vessels waiting at Vancouver and giving rise to demurrage charges up to $10,000 a day in some cases. All this has to be paid by the western farmer.

We are told by the government that metric conversion is good for us. Well, Mr. Speaker, we do not really need much more of this kind of help from the government. The very disappointing final payment on bread wheat is one small symptom of the malaise in the great grain industry that we used to have. Metric conversion is just another cross for the western producer to bear, another millstone around his neck.

As has been said before, our customers have always been able to buy our grain on the basis of metric tonnes, short tons, long tons—any way they wanted. I see no reason to go right back to the producer to change our system. Not only will this change not produce one extra bushel of grain or generate one dollar more of revenue for the producers, but it is going to cost them plenty. It will cost at least $1,000 for every country elevator that we have. We have 3,000; that amounts to $3 million. It will cost each producer at least $100. We have 150,000 of them, so there is another $15 million. Throw in the terminal conversion and you have $20 million right off the bat. That is a lot of money to spend at this time.

Mention has been made of the fact that our land has been surveyed under the Torrens system of miles. We have had a ten-unit system in western Canada for years. We have had telephone poles down every road allowance at steps of ten acres per half-mile. Generations of farmers will be converting back to acres and to bushels because they will see these measurements every time they step on to their land. The people of western Canada are not going to ask for so many litres of gas for their cars; they are going to ask for $5 or $7 worth of gas. They will find their way around this, and I suggest the farmers will do the same thing.

I plead with the government to exempt land measurement from the metric conversion, just as the United States of America will do. It is the same old, familiar story and it is one of the reasons why this government is in so much trouble today. The person required to pay the shot is having less and less of a say as to how his money is being spent. All we hear is that the government knows what is good for us.

I do not see why we cannot have voluntary conversion at the producer level, Mr. Speaker. I can see companies like Massey-Harris, Ford, machine companies and international manufacturers pushing this sort of a deal, but I cannot see why we do not implement it slowly and have voluntary conversion at the producer level.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil) has already said that there is a great difference between sitting in a nice, warm office with a calculator, and standing out in a cold, dusty Saskatchewan field trying to calculate chemical conversions. Ounces and acres are well understood in Saskatchewan; it is a tried and true system. One mistake in the calculation of a chemical formula and a farmer's crop could be gone.

I want to go back and refer to some of the information that has been put out and supplied to producers across the country. I have one pamphlet which is headed "Getting Ready for Metric Conversion", and it reads as follows:

How many tonnes of wheat, barley, or oats will your truck hold?

Simple! . . . Suppose you find the truck box is 246 cm by 524 cm, or in metres that's 2.46 m by 5.24 m. Calculate the area of the box floor in square metres by multiplying 2.46 × 5.24 and you will get 12.89 m^2.

Now, say you have a level load of wheat that is 1.20 m. (120 cm) deep. How many tonnes are in the box? That depends on how much volume of grain will give one tonne. So you need to know the volume, which is easily found by multiplying the floor area (12.89 m^2) by the depth (1.20 m) and you get 15.47 m^3.

How many tonnes in 15.47 m^3 of wheat? This table will help.

Then a table follows. It goes on to say that using the same table a farmer can calculate the depth of one tonne of grain in his truck box in this way:

—We have a floor area of 12.89 m^2 that will be loaded with wheat that has a volume of 1.30 m^3 per tonne.

To find the depth of one tonne of wheat, divide its volume by the area of the truck box floor—

In the particular case cited you take 1.30 metres, superscript 2, over 12.89 metres, superscript 2, and you get 0.10 metres, or 10 centimetres. The pamphlet continues.

For a truck box like the one in our illustration, a measuring stick marked at 10 cm intervals will indicate how many tonnes of wheat the truck holds.

I hesitate to repeat this, Mr. Speaker, because it was referred to by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton), but it does fascinate me.

You can use a broom-handle or some other straight stick to make a measuring stick for each crop you handle. Remember, each stick is good only for the truck (or bin) for which it is made.

Mr. McKinley: You will have to carry around a golf-bag full of sticks.

Mr. Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Yes. Then, Mr. Speaker, the pamphlet tells you how to measure your land in metric using the formula of width, times length, in metres, divided by 10,000, giving the area in hectares. The pamphlet continues:

If you don't have the measurements in metres, you can make a conversion using one yard equals 0.91 metre. If you have your land area in acres, multiply the acreage by 0.405 to get the area in hectares. As a rule of thumb, there are 2.5 acres in a hectare.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, where are we going on this thing? This pamphlet is but one of a flood of pamphlets, letters and brochures that have been distributed in western Canada. I have been in almost every country which is a major buyer of Canadian grain. I was chairman of the Board of Grain Commissioners for several years and one of my responsibilities was to help promote Canadian grains in world markets. During my term of office we set many records for exports which have not been surpassed to this day. I have also been a farmer; I have raised many fields of grain in my lifetime. I have been to university and I have been to the odd goat-roping contest; but I can tell hon. members that I do not know what these formulas mean, and they certainly will not mean much to the farmers of western Canada. If it is such a big deal for everyone to convert to the metric system, just think how much more important it would be if we all spoke the same language.

Mention has been made of the railways. Mr. Jim Wright, who is secretary of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, is reported in a Free Press report on farming, dated December 22 last, as saying:

Mr. Wright also expressed concern about the fact the railways don't go metric until 1981. "Right off the bat we'll have a problem because we'll be talking metric and they'll be talking pounds."

He said attempts to have the railways bill elevators for the movement of grain on a per tonne or per kilogram basis have failed, because much of their rail traffic is non-grain and has not yet converted to metric.

The Regina Leader-Post carried an article on this subject, part of which is as follows:

Strong objections to the metric conversion program came from Larry Brown, executive secretary of the Saskatchewan Federation of Labour.

Mr. Brown said metric conversion's main purpose is to facilitate trade between large multinational corporations and will have little impact on individual Canadians.

"If there is any benefit at all to individual working Canadians, it's extremely remote," he said.

While some unionized workers have contracts requiring their employers to pay all or part of the cost of new, metric tools, he said many workers have no such agreements or are outside unions. Many workers will have to keep dual sets of metric and Imperial tools until vehicles and construction supplies in Imperial dimensions have disappeared, he added.

All one need do, Mr. Speaker, is think of the number of dual inventories which will have to be kept across this country to get some idea of the cost of metric conversion to this nation. In conclusion, I would ask the government to give us in western Canada a break. Would the government at least give us some assurance that our land will be exempt from metric conversion, that there will be no change to our land tenure system? Earlier today the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, in reply to a question by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain, did not give that assurance. I hope we will get that assurance from the government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Before recognizing the hon. minister, I must advise hon. members that if he speaks now he will automatically close the debate.

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Small Businesses)): Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I just want to reiterate what I said a little while ago when kibitzing with some of my colleagues across the floor on the other side. I said that you white people sure have caused us Indians a lot of problems.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marchand: I do not want to take a lot of time in closing the debate on second reading. I have listened to many concerns expressed by members on the other side and I know that the farmers of this country have some apprehension about this change that will be taking place. Change very often does cause difficulty. I recall the change from Fahrenheit to Celsius when all kinds of concerns were expressed by the general population. It is my hope that during the committee hearings we will be able to explain and deal with many of the points that have been raised by hon. members.

It is my belief that some pretty good explanations can be given about the suggested changes and the planning that has taken place and, hopefully, we can go ahead with this legislation in the spirit with which the metric commission has proceeded and in which the various sector groups have operated. In fact, the sector committee on agriculture has been working on this for a few years. That committee has been heavily involved in planning for those changes being implemented that will affect the farmers.

I know that some at the farming level suggested that appropriate consultation has not taken place. If hon. members are telling me this, I believe them; but that certainly was not the intent. A great deal of information has been sent out to farmers and their organizations have been consulted. We have widely canvassed farm organizations throughout the country, including the National Farmers Union, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, and others. For example, the grain elevator companies are definitely in favour of this legislation. They are anxious to have it implemented by February 1 so that at least this part of the metric conversion program can go ahead. As a matter of fact, they are all geared up and ready to move.

Because of the nature and quantity of planning that has taken place involving the general farming public, hopefully this change can take place with a minimum of difficulty and with a minimum of partisanship. It is certainly not our intention to move ahead in any partisan way. Hopefully, in committee we can explain how the changes will take place. We will adopt a flexible attitude, and perhaps after some explanation regarding the difficulties involved we will be able to arrive at solutions. We have looked at some of the experiences of other countries.

An hon. Member: Are you going to preserve the acre?

Mr. Marchand: We will have a look at that and discuss it very thoroughly. We have already asked some experts of the metric commission and of the grain trade to be ready to give the explanations necessary and outline some of the difficulties involved in mixing the system, such as using acres and tonnes or tonnes and bushels. We would like to avoid confusion as much as possible. But by mixing the system we are bound to introduce some degree of confusion. For instance, if we are going to have tonnes and acres there is bound to be confusion.

I am told that other countries, for instance Australia, have gone cold turkey all the way. They have gone full metric and have experienced less difficulty in the implementation of their program over the long-term, as opposed to the United Kingdom where there has been a bit of a mixed system. They tried to maintain some of the Imperial system terminology and have had difficulty. The change has not been as successful as it might have been. The conclusion we have come to in looking at the experience of other countries is that we should avoid mixing the system, and I hope this can be explained fully by the experts in the committee.

Several of my friends across the way have suggested that we are not going to sell more grain as a result of conversion. I admit that fact and realize that grain has been selling throughout the world on a metric system for years. We admit that this will not sell more grain. The selling of grain around the world does not depend on metric conversion; it depends on markets, whether Russia and China have good or bad crops.

If hon. members look a little closer at the statements I have made they will see I have suggested there are opportunities in other areas if we go metric. I am told, for instance, that in the lumber trade there are opportunities in the European markets if we are able to make more materials available in metric measurement. There are opportunities in other areas as well.

It has been said many times that we are one of the last countries in the world to go metric. The United States is also going metric and is well on the way. We hope we can remain a step ahead of the United States in the change so that we will be ahead in at least our metric conversion program. We have very close liaison with the United States on metric conversion. They have been in touch with our people, particularly those in the grain trade. We still hope we can take the lead in this regard, but the United States will not be far behind in converting.

I have some rather extensive notes dealing with a number of points that have been made, but rather than try to deal with them all during this debate I will leave them until we have an opportunity to answer in committee. Hopefully, the committee stage will not be prolonged. It is hoped that its deliberations will be shortened by having experts in attendance who can answer questions to the satisfaction of the farmers and others.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS

[English]

BELL CANADA

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Scarborough) moved that Bill S-2, an act respecting Bell Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

He said: Mr. Speaker, before reviewing the highlights of Bill S-2 relating to Bell Canada I would like to provide some brief background information on the company and the bill. In addition, Mr. Speaker, because a private bill such as this must of necessity be sponsored by a private member, I should perhaps state that I have not been, and am not now, a shareholder of Bell Canada or its affiliates and have no pecuniary interest in the bill before us.

Bell Canada was incorporated in 1880 by a special act of parliament which has since been amended 12 times to increase its authorized share capital and to update its charter. The last time the company applied to parliament for amendments to its act of incorporation was in 1968 when it was authorized, among other things, to increase its capital and to issue preferred stock. The company's intention to proceed with these proposed amendments was widely advertised in various newspapers and government official gazettes during four consecutive weeks last fall, following which the bill was introduced in the other place and received third reading on December 15, 1976.

As to the bill itself, it has four main purposes: first, to increase the maximum authorized share capital of the company; second, to modernize the financing provisions of its charter; third, to update the corporate powers; and fourth, to enable the company to alter its objects, powers and share capital by letters patent subject, however, to cancellation by a negative resolution in either house of parliament.

Bell Canada requests authorization to increase its share capital to $5 billion from the present limit of $1.75 billion. Since 1945 increased share capital authorizations have been applied for and granted by parliament about every decade. The increase of $3.25 billion now being sought by the company is prompted by the need to finance part of the huge capital programs required to provide the services expected by the public. The company's business is highly capital-intensive and requires the investment of massive amounts of money which are provided by internally-generated funds on the one hand and by debt and equity financing on the other hand. The company forecasts capital expenditures of $15 billion over the next decade. It anticipates that it will exhaust its current limit of $1.75 billion of share capital by the end of 1978.

In order to obtain large sums from the capital markets to meet increasing demands for telecommunication services, Bell Canada must compete both at home and abroad with other firms and governments which enjoy a much greater financial flexibility. For example, under its present charter Bell Canada cannot issue shares other than common shares of $25 par value and preferred shares, nor can it split its shares or consolidate them. It cannot borrow under the authority of a general borrowing by-law. Accordingly, a certain number of proposed amendments are designed to equip the company with similar financing flexibility to that enjoyed by practically every company nowadays. May I point out also that most of these financing amendments are similar or identical to the provisions of Bill S-11, an act respecting British Columbia Telephone Company adopted by parliament in December, 1974.

Included in these financing amendments is a provision enabling the company to issue its share capital in the future without CRTC approval, although within the $5 billion limit set out in this bill. Since 1929 the company has been required under its charter to obtain the approval of the regulatory body, formerly the Canadian Transport Commission, with respect to the amount, terms and conditions of each stock issue. This requirement was understandable and relevant in the circumstances down to the year 1966 when its relevancy disappeared.

The purpose of the CRTC approval of share issues was to ensure that the company would not sell new stock at a price, for example at a low price, which would impose undue costs on its customers. This was during the time when the company's earnings and rates were regulated on the basis of the total number of shares outstanding. Since May, 1966, however, the formula adopted by the regulatory body for regulating earnings and rates has completely changed. The company's permitted earnings are now stated as a percentage of the total amount of capital invested in the business and not at all related to the number of shares outstanding. The result is that the continuing requirement for CRTC approval of share issues is now redundant. This matter will, as in the past, be dealt with by the ceiling provided from time to time and by authorization received from the company's shareholders.

At this point I should like to emphasize that repeal of this requirement would leave absolutely intact the CRTC's jurisdiction over the company's rates for services offered to the public. All of that essential regulatory process would remain intact. But this single change of eliminating approval of specific stock issues would do more than terminate a practice that has lost its relevancy because of the new rate-regulating formula. It would also preclude delays associated with public hearings, thereby assuring more flexibility in the timing of a stock issue, often important for advantageous pricing in the market and for staying within the short time limits provided for in underwriting agreements. This gain in flexibility is important as the competition for equity capital becomes more intense.

[Mr. O'Connell.]

The third aim of the bill is to modernize the corporate powers of the company through the incorporation into its charter of section 16 of the Canada Corporations Act. The amendment proposed to achieve this objective would clarify and broaden the existing ancillary and incidental powers of the company. It would allow the company to invest in other companies having objects in whole or in part similar to those of Bell Canada. It would enable Bell Canada to implement government policy regarding the provisions of computer services by communication carriers through separate arm's length affiliates.

The application of section 16 of the company would, in effect, place it on the same level as most other companies which can carry out their objects in the most appropriate manner without being hampered by the constraints which presently preclude Bell Canada, except in very limited cases, from incorporating or acquiring subsidiaries to perform activities it could undertake itself.

The powers sought here would only be exercisable as incidental and ancillary to the objects set out in the company's charter. These powers were, in essence, made applicable to Telesat Canada, a federally-regulated telecommunications carrier.

Finally, the last purpose of the bill is to authorize the company to alter its objects, powers and share capital in the future by applying to the minister of consumer and corporate affairs who is the registrar general for letters patent, which would however be subject to being nullified by either House of parliament during a period of 30 sitting days following their tabling in parliament. This is the negative resolution procedure which is found in one form in the Telesat Canada Act and in a modified and detailed version recently provided in the Income Tax Conventions Act, 1976. The proposed change would not deprive parliament of its control over the company's charter but, rather, would modify the manner in which such control would continue to be exercised.

Mr. Speaker, these are the highlights of Bill S-2. Hon. members will appreciate that full opportunity will be given to examine the bill in detail when it is dealt with in committee, where the company's chief officers will make themselves available as witnesses. These proposed amendments update the capital and the powers of Bell Canada. They provide it with the financing and corporate flexibility required in the field of telecommunications today and for the future. They leave intact the essential regulatory role of the CRTC while equipping the company to meet the service needs of Canadians in the period ahead.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to recommend these amendments to the consideration of hon. members.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) on Bill S-2 which had its birth in the other place. I know others will be participating in this debate and might make some irrelevant comments about the birth of such a bill in the other place, and will undoubtedly colour the air with purple prose on the relationship of such bills and corporate legislation starting in the other place. But I do not intend to make prolonged remarks at this stage on the stand of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition on Bill S-2 because, basically, as the hon. member for Scarborough East said, the motion is to refer this bill to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications which will give a better opportunity for us to make a more exhausive study of certain aspects of this complicated bill.

Having been in this chamber for a few years, I know that every time "Mother Bell" is mentioned there is no doubt this gives an opportunity to any politican to wax eloquent and often irresponsible about that Canadian company. Like the hon. member for Scarborough East, I speak as one of those commoners in the land who does not have a pecuniary interest in the company other than to pay my telephone bill in Ontario, because another telephone company sends me its bills in Atlantic Canada.

I think the Bell Telephone Company is a perfect example of a schizophrenic personality, which is often that of a Canadian politician. It is both remarkable and paradoxical that often those who champion and espouse the so-called nationalism and proclaim all the great sentiments and strong views about being Canadian and about freedom from coast to coast—and, incidentally, having a good telephone service from coast to coast—are the very people, and we may hear from some in this chamber, who as soon as "Mother Bell" is mentioned will say that she is an unhealthy or tainted woman with a tainted heritage and that she is wearing soiled clothes.

Without getting into a provocative debate on this issue with the hon. member for Scarborough East, let me say that Bill S-2 has four main aims, as the hon. member said.

I must confess that I cannot give a full and detailed explanation of the first one in terms of what the corporate wizards could do with some of the changes to the capital procedure, but I know that unless parliament moves on Bell Telephone's request for increased capital authorization, hon. members will be asking in this chamber why certain communities were not hooked up to the telephone service and why this company does not provide the service that we expect from it. The request by the company to increase its authorized capital from $1.75 billion to $5 billion involves the international workings of the company and its construction program for the next ten years.

Any hon. member here would be handicapped in trying to justify such a fundamentally large construction program, and the only people who can do that are the officers of the company who will appear before the committee. I will not get into a debate with the hon. member for Scarborough East on this subject, but I did ask, as a matter of historical interest, about the history of charter amendments of the company and I find myself with somewhat different information from that given to us by the hon. member for Scarborough East. I thought there were only ten changes. For the record, I will spell out the ten changes in the charter of the company which perhaps show the rate of inflation in this country as well as the development of the Bell Telephone Company from its origin as an innovater and leader way back at its inception. It also shows what has happened with the value of money and the size of the company today.

The first authorization for an increase in capital was in 1880, and it was for $1 million. In 1884 it went up to $2 million. In 1892 we moved ahead to $5 million, and in 1902 to $10 million. In 1906 we went up to $30 million, and in 1920—a longer gap than the decade mentioned by the hon. member—we went up to $75 million. In 1929 we went up to $150 million. Then there was a long gap when we had a depression and a war. In 1948 the next change in the charter to increase the capital was for $500 million. In 1957 we went up to $1 billion, and the last change that has been mentioned was in 1968, to $1.75 billion. Now the proposed change is to $5 billion.

I am advised by officers of the Bell Company that while this is a pretty healthy leap forward in terms of the corporate authorization, in terms of continuing and expanding the service, it will just provide the basis for the capital works program in the next ten years. I should like to hear the responsible officers come before the committee with research on some of the intricate provisions, so that we may be able to ask sensible questions of them and hear their reasons for the increase from $1.75 billion to $5 billion.

I do not find any real objection to modernizing the financial provisions of the act by putting the company in the same position as the B.C. Telephone Company and incorporating similar provisions to those in the Canada Corporations Act. Some reason that this bill would put Bell into the same position as other companies in terms of competing for funds in the money markets so that it could compete and not be penalized when getting equity capital and thereby it would not have to charge that much, hopefully, to its subscribers. I agree with that argument to a point, but without getting into all the statistics of the uniqueness of Bell Telephone, it is clear that Bell is not like all the other companies. Perhaps that is one of the reasons we have this archaic procedure—and there is no disrespect intended to the hon. member for Scarborough East. However, the only way the federal charter can be changed is for it to come through these halls under a private member's bill and to have it sponsored here.

● (1720)

Mr. Nystrom: Nationalize it.

Mr. Nowlan: Having been in some countries which have nationalized their telephone systems, and in at least two provinces of this country where the telephone systems are nationalized, and having used those telephone systems, I have no faith at all in government-run telephone systems providing better service to the average person—

An hon. Member: What about Alberta?

Mr. Nowlan: —than the service we get from Bell.

Mr. Nystrom: It is much better.

Mr. Nowlan: The hon. member will have a chance to speak in the debate. I am referring to the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) who is from the nationalized state of Saskatchewan. It does not really matter what part you are from, once you leave the cities, because it is pretty well blended into the socialistic porridge pot—and porridge is pretty bland. However, there is not a person who has travelled around the world and who has used the telephone systems in other parts of the world who can show me a telephone system better than the Bell Telephone system.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: By saying that, I do not claim to be an apologist for Bell.

Mr. Parent: What about the one in Russia?

Mr. Nowlan: We do not have to go to Russia: we can go to France, Great Britain or Saskatchewan. Some hon. members could go further than that where there are no telephones, because they do not need telephones to be heard.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: Be that as it may, this is basically a corporate bill.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: My hon. friends are already starting to attack the walls of capitalism. It is interesting to note the schizophrenic character of this country and of hon. members who think they have a monopoly on ideology. I can mention parts of this bill which give me a great deal of concern, but in terms of my trying to talk in a knowledgeable way about whether at this stage authorizing an increase in authorized capital from $1.75 billion to $5 billion I do not know if I or my friends can make knowledgeable comments.

This bill was debated in the other place by senators. I know hon. members to my left do not have a senator there, and if the House leader of the New Democratic Party, the shadow leader—not the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), but his seatmate—had his way, of course there would not be a Senate. However, even in that chamber of sober second thought many thought that Bell Telephone was controlled by I.T. and T. Evidently they forgot the fact that Bell Telephone is owned 98 per cent by John Q. Canadian, or Mr. Canadian. However, I will not go too far with that.

With regard to modernizing the financial provisions, I will be interested at the committee stage to see just what the officers say about these things. If changes can be made to keep Bell in a competitive position in financial markets by seeking equity capital without penalty to its subscribers, including the widows and orphans of this land who sometimes use the telephone, then I will be in favour of that; but I think we have to listen to the argument that under the Canada Corporations Act all companies are supposed to be put into a similar position. Obviously, Bell Canada is not a company like others, and that is both its curse and its challenge. It is a curse to those who want to curse a very efficient company which provides us with good service, yet it is a challenge to Bell's developing further. There is a little conflict here and I will be interested to see how the evidence comes out.

As the hon. member says, the reason we can have this change now is that the rate of return is on a different base, and because it is on a different base—which was, I think, set in 1966, which was the effective time change for the rate not being based on the return of issued shares but on equity capital and investment capital—you do not have to be quite as careful in giving a very large potential increase in the authorized capital permissible under the act.

I am more concerned about the last two purposes of the bill, the changes in the ancillary powers of the company and also the method provided to change the charter in the future. Very quickly, this question of allowing the company to broaden its powers—and, again, using the Canada Corporations Act as the base to give the powers, as is the case with other companies—I think has to be watched fairly carefully. We are in an uncharted world as a result of changing technology, and today we are asked to incorporate section 16 of the Canada Corporations Act which would allow the company to invest in other companies having objects altogether, or in part, similar to those of this company. That is, in effect, the purpose of these changes. Yet we have had, and will continue to have, in this House questions, answers and debates as to the literal interpretation of "broadcasting." The Broadcasting Act was passed in 1966, and the word "cable" does not even appear in it.

We have here a communications company, Bell, which missed a golden opportunity when it did not get into cable years ago when telephone companies had the first crack at it. Other telephone companies as well would not touch cable with a ten-foot pole. Hon. members to my left would not touch it even with a ten-foot telephone pole. Hon. members to my left would not appreciate this, but it was small entrepreneurs who took the chance and the risk, and that has made Canada the leader in the world with regard to cable.

I know at the moment there are socialist governments in certain parts of the country who would like to reverse this clock and get provincial telephone companies directly into the cable field. I am prepared to say, with no fundamental disrespect—other than that I think it is wrong—that if the provincial telephone companies get into those areas they will not be able to provide the service that subscribers are getting from small cable companies. At the moment some areas do not even have cable service because of this jurisdictional fight.

I feel that there is one area which has to be watched cautiously. Using the argument that these changes will put Bell into the same position as other companies—and I am prepared to admit that Bell is not the same as other companies—I think parliament has a duty, and when we get into committee we should examine the officers of the company as to the full implications of these ancillary powers with special reference to Bell as a telephone company which obviously has an interest in the computer field and now would perhaps like to develop an interest in the cable area.

Mr. Rodriguez: Not an interest, a monopoly.

Mr. Nowlan: You have monopolies in Manitoba and Saskatchewan with your phone companies. The section which gives me the greatest concern—and, as outlined in the bill, would not get my support—is the section the hon. member for Scarborough East mentioned. I refer to the procedural clause which in effect sets up a negative resolution whereby the company could hereafter change its objects, let alone its purposes. So far as I am concerned, we ought to look with a negatively critical eye at that clause requiring the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Abbott) to bring before this House for a certain period of scrutiny the letters patent.

Let me hasten to add that Bell is not like other companies. It provides good service, and needs funds to continue that service. I know that the company wants immediately a more expeditious way for changing its charter. It wants to be more businesslike in providing good service for the Canadian people. Yet Bell is not like other companies, and is not analagous to Telesat. It may be intended to follow the Telesat precedent. However, Telesat is unique, and Telesat really is not part of the commercial world. That satellite is in orbit in the heavens, providing channels of communication on a commercial basis to large organizations, including the CBC.

● (1730)

Mr. Rodriguez: And Bell.

Mr. Nowlan: And Bell. Really, I am concerned about the negative provision of the bill. Bell as a company is intimately involved with consumers in Ontario and Quebec. I question the wisdom of the negative provision of the bill; after all, the company is involved in the field of communications and we do not know what fundamental changes may come about even three years down the road.

In 1968, when I participated in debate on the Broadcasting Act, the House was not thinking of the effect of satellites, communication by satellite, and the computer technology which has burst forth on the horizon. Yet we all know that this new technology is fundamentally important now to the communications industry, but it has also created some new problems. Therefore by giving the company certain powers by way of a negative resolution you would enable it to change its charter, let alone the purposes of its creation. If you go that far, any pretense of parliamentary direction and/or control will go out of the window. But that is a procedural point which does not go to the principle of the matter, namely, that Bell needs money in order to continue good service. The company may be somewhat extravagant, to my way of thinking—

An hon. Member: Extravagant?

Mr. Nowlan: —extravagant in asking for unrestricted ancillary powers which, obviously, would make Bell bigger.

An hon. Member: Who needs it?

Mr. Nowlan: The hon. member's party in Manitoba—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Nowlan: What's the matter, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I regret to inform the hon. member that the time allotted to him has expired. Nevertheless, he may continue if he has unanimous consent.

Mr. Rodriguez: Continue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Does the hon. member have unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak too long, because I know my friend to my left is chafing at the bit. The party to my left cannot wait to add its constructive thoughts to what has already been said. I will not impose on the good graces of hon. members who have allowed me extra time, because I know that we want to hear other points of view on this bill.

I see no fundamental objection to the request concerning authorized capital. After all that goes to the root of our present debate. I think the provision regarding ancillary powers must be looked at with a critical eye. Certainly the negative resolution provision as presently contained in the Bill S-2 ought to be revised. I am aware of the company's interest in a procedure which will allow it to make certain changes expeditiously. However, as a parliamentarian not involved with the company, I want to see the maintenance of parliamentary direction and control. If the negative resolution provision presently contained in the bill is allowed to remain, you may as well kiss such parliamentary control goodbye.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to make some remarks on Bill S-2 concerning the financing powers of Bell Canada.

The previous speaker tried to leave the impression that Bell is mainly concerned about modernizing and changing some of the legislation which affects the way Bell raises its capital. I submit that is not the essential point of this bill. In essence, we are determining to what degree we shall still be able to maintain effective regulation over Bell Canada as it changes its capacity to raise funds. That, it seems to me, is the crux of the matter about which hon. members ought to be cautious before rushing ahead and changing existing legislation.

Bill S-2 has three main aims; I will enumerate them, in order to elaborate my concerns about the contents of the bill. First, the bill would allow Bell to borrow, issue stock, bonds, debentures and other securities as the company itself deems necessary, but without the approval of the regulatory agency, the CRTC.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Symes: Second, the bill would broaden the company's powers by revoking its present act of incorporation and placing Bell under the provisions of the Canada Corporations Act.

Third, the bill would allow Bell to charge the going rate of interest on overdue customer accounts, instead of the current rate of 6 per cent allowed by the CRTC.

What will be the effect if Bill S-2 passes? In my opinion Bill S-2 is an attempt by Bell to undermine the public regulation of that monopoly. In effect it would put Bell's corporate interest above that of its customers. Because Bell is a telecommunications monopoly, the only protection its subscribers have at this point is government regulation. I submit that the public regulation of Bell must not be lessened or weakened. How then would Bill S-2 weaken the public regulation of Bell Canada?

Let me deal with the first point I mentioned, the changes in Bell's method of capitalization. To see this in its proper context we should look at the history of the rate regulation of Bell. In 1919 the government regulated the earnings per share; this continued until 1966. That regulation was designed to protect the public by preventing Bell from making excessive profits per share. However, over the years Bell deliberately circumvented this means of regulation by watering the stock, that is to say, selling stock to existing shareholders at prices well below the market value and passing on monopoly profits in the form of capital gains rather than income. We find that in 1929 parliament revised the Bell act, to require regulatory approval for all issues of stock. In 1966 Bell succeeded in getting a revision of regulations, replacing control on earnings per share with percentage return on average total capital.

I submit that through this bill Bell wants to remove all regulation of what stocks Bell issues and at what price. What is the danger in this change? It is this. If the government is serious about regulating Bell in the public interest, it must regulate two things. It must regulate earnings per share and the issue price of equity, and not just the percentage return on capital, as is the present case.

If Bill S-2 passes, the CRTC will have no power to authorize the terms and conditions of new stock issues, that is to say, it will be unable to regulate Bell Canada effectively. I will give an example of how this will come about. What will happen is that Bell will issue preferred shares, with very large dividends. It will then be able to argue that common share dividends must exceed those of preferred shares or else investors will not convert their shares. The way that Bell will get common shares up in value will be to argue before the CRTC that it needs to increase subscribers' telephone rates. The NDP, therefore, in the interest of telephone subscribers must oppose this attempt by Bell to escape regulation.

The second change that the bill proposes is to change the act of incorporation under which Bell now lives. The present act states that, first, Bell Canada is to engage only in the provision of telecommunications service. Second, Bell is to act solely as a common carrier. Third, Bell is to own as subsidiaries only companies engaged in telegraphic or telephonic communications.

What Bill S-2 wants to do is replace the above provisions under Bell's act of incorporation with the Canada Corporations Act. This would enable Bell to participate in any or all markets it wished to. In other words, Bell claims it should be treated as any other corporation.

Bell Canada by no flight of the imagination can be considered just like any other corporation. It is a monopoly, and a very powerful one at that. Ninety-three per cent of its revenue is based on telephone service. Only 7 per cent comes from competitive operations such as data services. It certainly cannot be considered like any other corporation in the private sector.

What are the implications of Bell coming under the provisions of the Canada Corporations Act? Bell could expand its operations and earning ability in areas which would be beyond present CRTC regulation. Bell could go before the CRTC and plead poverty on its telephone operations and thereby get a rate increase, when in fact it is making large profits from other investments which would not be taken into account by the CRTC. There is already ample evidence of this occurring within the present framework of operations of Bell Canada. I will give the example of Northern Electric.

In the past the Canadian Transport Commission, which used to regulate Bell, was very negligent in failing to take into account Bell's relationship with Northern Electric and its other subsidiaries when trying to assess Bell's profitability. For example, in 1974 Bell's share of net income from Northern Electric was in excess of $48 million, but the profitability of Bell's subsidiaries is never examined when Bell comes before the regulatory agency pleading for a rate increase.

It is my contention that the CRTC, which is now charged with examining Bell's rate increases, should be looking at its relationship with its subsidiaries, as well as at the other fact that has been neglected to date. That is the fact that Bell has been able to defer paying over $650 million taxes through a deferred tax scheme. This is no longer counted as a liability by accountants. In reality what Bell has here is an interest free loan that has never been taken into account when the government assesses Bell's profitability.

Looking at Bell's profit over the past few years, I submit it has been more than adequate. In 1975, for example, Bell's profit was $266,784,000, an increase of 18.9 per cent over 1974. For the first nine months of 1976 its profit was $218,-415,000 compared to $187,746,000 for the first nine months of 1975, an increase of approximately 16 per cent.

Mr. Rodriguez: And that in a period of controls.

Mr. Symes: As my colleague from Nickel Belt says, that was in a period of controls. Since Bell is a monopoly it cannot be treated as any other corporation. Therefore it must not come under the purview of the Canada Corporations Act.

The third thing Bill S-2 tries to do, as I mentioned, is change the charge on overdue accounts which is currently limited at 6 per cent. Bell wants to raise it to the going rate, which I presume is somewhere around 11 per cent.

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, I apologize for interrupting, but I am sure the hon. member, by misunderstanding the clause, does not want to mislead us. It is not overdue customer accounts. It is the overdue accounts for shares of those who are subscribing to new shares.

Mr. Symes: I thank the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) for that correction. I would not have much difficulty in hearing arguments along this line being put forward by Bell. This is one of the least distasteful parts of the bill. However, I would hope that we could have some kind of commitment from Bell for improvement of service.

In northern Ontario, for example, a situation has existed in the small communities with multiple party lines, where there are as many as ten or more people on one line. I think of people in rural areas who want telephones brought to their homes. In northern Ontario there is an example of one family being charged in excess of $1,000 a year. I might mention also the practice of requiring a $200 deposit from subscribers with overdue accounts. We might look at some of these practices in terms of a trade-off commitment from Bell before any increase in the company's power is permitted by way of a change in the infrastructure.

● (1750)

When I look at the history of Bell and the attempts made by government to regulate it, I find a history of efforts to evade or reduce public regulation of the company. This powerful monopoly has, I submit, been aided and abetted by its friends in the Senate who gave the bill before us only a cursory glance. Bill S-2, if allowed to pass in its present form would, I maintain, subvert the already weak regulatory authority upon which we as consumers have to rely when it comes to keeping this giant corporation in line. In the interest of good telephone service at affordable rates, I submit that the New Democratic Party cannot support a measure which would mean less public control over this powerful monopoly. We need more accountability from Bell, not less.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, it may be a little late and I do not want to kill this bill, but I want to say a few words about Bill S-2. It is very unusual to have a bill coming from the Senate. I am always surprised to see something coming out of the other place. I always wonder whether the senators do that for the sake of private or public interest. Anyway, I do not want to criticize the work of our good old senators, but I should only say, Mr. Speaker, that when we read Bell Canada's representations in this bill, they are asking that their charter be amended to be able to increase the capital stock from $3.25 billion to $5 billion.

In my opinion, this is a very considerable increase compared to the increases requested in previous years. I wonder whether Bell Canada wants to go into the electronic or other fields. This is a very important request and it deserves serious consideration by the government.

In the explanatory notes we can read this, and I quote:

> This amendment would extend and update the borrowing powers of the Company.

Again, this is a request by the company which will enable them to expand very considerably their operations. If we knew the objectives of the telephone company in the most minute detail, and if the sole purpose were to improve telephone service, I would be very happy about it. But, as it is outlined further on, Bell Canada can invest in other companies. That is where the risk lies. It is quite easy for it to invest in other companies in an attempt to create a monopoly against which the government could not exert influence.

So far the government has been quite successful in supervising Bell Canada's operations. I am not prepared to admit that it has to be nationalized; on the contrary, I am against any nationalization. But I just want the House to realize that there are obviously place for improvement in the field of telephone lines. We like to say that we have a good telephone system, that Bell Canada is a good company, a good servant of the population. We must recognize also that it is well taken care of by the government. We must admit, when we see all the favours it obtains from the government, that it would be worthwhile to turn to the consumer and try giving him a little bit more satisfaction. I should like to deal briefly with rural services. I wonder if the House is aware of the fact that there still are rural areas where nine, ten or even twelve parties share the same line. One could understand that thirty years ago but today, with all the credits given the company, I feel it should make an effort to give better service.

I have had occasion to write repeatedly to their office begging them to give private lines, at least to merchants. It is hard to believe that a merchant should have had to share a party line with ten other subscribers, after waiting for a private line for three years. There is a limit to everything.

Mr. Speaker, I would not want that money . . .

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business has expired. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the Chair till 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CUSTOMS TARIFF

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Thursday, October 28, 1976, consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that Bill C-15, to amend the Customs Tariff, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If I recognize the minister at this time I must inform the House that he will be closing the debate.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring a matter to the minister's attention. It concerns the Excise Tax Act and Customs Tariff, and I am wondering whether the minister is in a position to respond to it. It has to do with customs taxation of goods brought in for use in centres of rehabilitation and workshops. I should like to read a letter which has been brought to my attention, and I would appreciate the minister's response to it. It was referred to me by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) and was sent by the Canadian Council of Rehabilitation Workshops to the Minister of National Revenue (Miss Bégin). Let me quote part of the letter:

> The purpose of this letter is to bring to your attention certain exclusions in the guidelines under the Federal Excise Tax Act related to exemptions of Federal Sales Tax for institutions and facilities whose prime objective is the rehabilitation of handicapped or disadvantaged persons.
> A number of the workshops or rehabilitation facilities in Canada are not involved in activities that produce an item that would be considered under the act. Specifically this would be the renovating or refurbishing of items for resale such as clothing, electrical appliances, furniture, etc. In the course of these activities they must utilize various supplies and equipment to carry out this function—

The letter goes on to say:

> A further consideration is in the area of—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am just wondering whether the hon. member is speaking to the right bill. The bill the House is presently considering is Bill C-15, to amend the Customs Tariff, not the Excise Tax Act.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, my point does relate in a way, but if I can follow your guidance I will leave it until the House reaches Bill C-21. Alternatively, with Your Honour's permission, since I understand the other bill will be called shortly, perhaps I could continue and deal with it at this time, if there is no objection.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate even to think of allowing the hon. member to do so. It would be contrary to all the rules of the House to talk about one bill when we are debating another. I feel that we should complete this bill and that intervention should directly relate to its subject matter. This will not broaden the debate and will give the House a chance to complete the bill faster. I should bring it to the attention of hon. members that the minister is about to reply, and that if he does so at this time he will be closing the debate.

[The Acting Speaker.]

● (2010)

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): I thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and I thank hon. members. I wanted to take this opportunity to comment on a matter of interest probably to members in all four corners of this House during this particular debate having regard to the changes proposed to the customs tariff in respect of pork and pork products.

Since the budget of May 25 last, there has been a substantial alteration in the position of pork markets in Canada, and far from being in a position now in which further cuts in the tariff would be required from the consumer standpoint there has, indeed, been a dramatic drop in the cost of pork and pork products. In the circumstances it would appear that in all fairness to pork producers, as I indicated in my second reading speech, it would be appropriate to take action for the purpose of removing the tariff reduction proposed by the bill.

There are two possible ways of doing this; first, with an amended notice of ways and means, and to amend the bill itself in the committee of the whole. The rather more simple way is to follow the procedure suggested in the bill itself, that is, to make provision for an order restoring the level of protection. Under the circumstances, the latter would appear to be the more appropriate. I would now indicate to the House in closing the debate that it would be my intention, as soon as the bill is passed, to seek from the Governor in Council the authority to restore the tariff level on pork in light of the change in the markets.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) wishes to ask a question of the minister, which can only be done with the consent of the minister and the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): By way of explanation would the minister indicate if this procedure is contemplated in respect of pork products alone, or is this a device he plans on utilizing in respect of textiles and shoes, for example, as a quick means of action without reference to the House by a ways and means motion?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the answer would be no. As I indicated in introducing the bill, the dropping of the protection was available under the act primarily with regard to food commodities, bearing in mind the rather mercurial nature of the food market. Of course this has been more than amply proven by the pork situation so a procedure was included in the bill, and is included in the appropriate clause to restore the protection. My intention would be to apply this with regard to pork only. As the hon. member knows, there are other commodities which are very much the subject of concern and consideration on the part of the government, such as textiles and shoes. My view is that they would not be dealt with by way of a temporary tariff change withdrawal of this kind, but would require more fundamental measures which, of course, would be dealt with under other aspects of our law.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to ask the minister a brief question, if I may.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): How about the committee of the whole? That is what it is for.

Mr. McKenzie: We are going into the committee of the whole now?

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Laniel in the chair.

The Chairman: The House in committee of the whole on Bill C-15, to amend the customs tariff.

On Clause 1—Schedule A amended.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, this is a very specific clause, I grant you, but there is one point that bothers me a little bit. Notwithstanding some very extensive remarks by members in the House generally, during which questions of principle were raised, the minister has not replied to those points in closing this debate. Unless I raise the matter at this point on Clause 1 we are not going to get the answers. I have specific reference to the point I made as reported in Hansard of Tuesday, October 26, during the second reading debate, as follows:

> The minister has not spoken to us about what the government has foreseen with regard to the trade development pattern, not as of yesterday but in the three or four years during which we saw inflation rise at a gallop.

I know that several of my colleagues have expressed some concern, and it may be that the hon. member for York-Simcoe will have a lot more to say about the nature of negotiations going on in Geneva at the present time under GATT.

There are a number of things that have worried hon. members and these have been expressed in other debates, and we have yet to receive adequate answers. Before we are prepared to discuss the detail under Clause 1 of this bill regarding items changed in Schedule A, I hope the minister will at least give us some indication of the answers he intends to provide, when he will provide them, and whether the government is prepared to allow some government time for a debate on international trade. I am quite serious when I suggest this must be done at this time. The budget debate of last June did not offer an opportunity. The minister in his presentation did not deal sufficiently with the nature of our international trade.

We have had some very worrisome deficits in the commodity account, and the whole financial picture in the country is predicated upon a changing pattern of international trade. As I said, I will come back to that later. I know there are some provincial governments which have expressed serious reservations about the nature and composition of the negotiations going on in Geneva. Provincial governments are not having any input whatsoever and items are being traded away, as they were under the Kennedy Round, at an accelerated rate, cutting across the industrial policies of particular provinces. I know the cattle industry was hurt badly, for example, at that time, and it is conceivable that it might be hurt again on this occasion.

I know that various provincial governments have industrial policies for the development of their resources, yet it seems that our negotiators do not even consult the provincial authorities in respect of what might be the best possible stance for Canada. To that extent I would hope the minister will tell us the government's intention regarding these consultations on trade.

There are many other points I raised in my speech. I hope the hon. member for York-Simcoe will elaborate on these particular points.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I would just remind the hon. gentleman that, indeed, we did debate in the House last fall the matter of the government's trade stance. In particular, we had an extensive presentation by a number of responsible members on this side of the House regarding the over-all tariff negotiations.

The hon. member has raised the suggestion that perhaps it would be appropriate to have a second such debate, several months having passed, with a new United States administration having been established. I am certainly prepared to consider that and, of course, to discuss with my colleague, the House leader, the question of additional time. It may well be that, negotiations under the Tokyo round having been at something of a standstill during the election in the United States and when they were active with the change of administration, it is apropos at this time. It seems to me we have here a specific set of tariff changes, specifically directed at the consumer sector, and primarily the food sector, for the purpose of meeting inflation problems in Canada. I wonder whether this bill is the best place for widespread debate on the over-all question of trade policy.

I would like to suggest, in light of the interest that some members have in trying to provide relief for pork producers, that it would be appropriate to pass this bill. The Leader of the Opposition has raised the question of when the next budget will be introduced. It seems to me we should not be introducing a new budget until we dispose of the bills arising from the May 25 budget. I would hope we might have some debate directed to the specific items in this bill and I would hope for a broad debate on the tariff bill, the Geneva negotiations, and our over-all trade policy in the near future.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take up some of the remarks that my hon. colleague has already made. I think the House will understand our frustration in not being able to have what I would regard as a meaningful review of the total international picture surrounding Canada's trade with foreign nations, and the negotiations taking place in Geneva at the present time. While the minister referred to a debate last fall, he did not make it clear that that debate was triggered by this party using an opposition day to get some insight into what was transpiring with regard to international trade matters. I would point out that the Minister of Finance, who is primarily responsible for and who directs what is happening in Geneva, did not enter that debate. We still have not heard what he believes to be Canada's current position in the Geneva negotiations.

In short, Mr. Chairman, I believe there is an element of frustration here and that somehow the minister should try to relieve that frustration this evening by giving us at least a brief outline of what he feels the current stance is in the Canadian negotiations in Geneva, where he sees the problems, and where we might be making some headway. Before we get into the provisions of Bill C-15, I would hope that the minister, having failed to make any further comments at the conclusion of second reading, would at least review some of the comments made in the dozen or so speeches given on second reading.

The minister says that he hopes the bill will get speedy passage. I would remind all hon. members that it is not the opposition which has delayed the legislation. This bill has lain on the order paper for three months without being brought forward. Surely, 25 minutes after the bill coming up again for consideration after that three months delay, and the opposition not having delayed second reading, we should be entitled to some explanation on these two broad matters—first what the over-all stance is at the present time and the degree of success or failure we are meeting in Geneva and, second, a reply to some of the points raised in the dozen or so speeches on second reading.

Perhaps I could summarize our frustration this way, Mr. Chairman. This is literally the only jurisdiction in the democratic world, as far as I can make out, where there is no meaningful review of what our trade negotiators do when they enter the GATT negotiations. In the United States an act was passed through Congress which sets guidelines for the subsequent negotiations. They have an ongoing committee to review the GATT negotiations. Yet we in this House are asked to respond after decisions are made; we are asked to respond, for example, to a bill such as Bill C-15 after the government has decided to change tariffs in whatever way it sees fit.

We are frustrated because the Finance Committee of this House has been virtually idle during the second session of this parliament. We have done virtually nothing in that committee because, for some reason or other, the minister is not inclined to expedite business to the committee or even to appear, in the case of Bill C-5, to enable the bill to be continued with.

Mr. Kaplan: They have to get through second reading in order to get to committee.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Mr. Stevens: The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance says they have to get to committee. I would point out that this bill is before us in Committee of the Whole and we are asking the minister for comment on the subjects to which I have referred. Bill C-5 has been before the Finance Committee for some time and we cannot get the minister to appear so that we may have the benefit of his comments.

In short, Mr. Chairman, and following on the comments of my colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton West, I feel that it is very much in the interest of members of the House that the minister comment on the two subjects that have been raised. Certainly he need not be frightened that the bill is going to be delayed. It is a short bill. But he should take the opportunity to give members a little insight into what is happening in these rather secretive discussions in Geneva, and give the members who have raised questions on second reading the benefit of his comments.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, to deal with a couple of points raised by the hon. member, it is quite true that it was on an opposition day that hon. members opposite raised the question of trade policy. They raised it at a time when obligations outside this House prevented me from participating fully in the debate, but the government position was very ably set forth on that day by my parliamentary secretary.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): He was ably supported by the hon. member for Eglinton who has had extensive experience, as a Privy Councillor and before that as a public servant, with this type of negotiation.

With regard to the business of the House, as the hon. member knows, Bill C-5 is companion to the bill to amend the Bretton-Woods Agreements Act. I would be delighted to move the Bretton-Woods Agreements Act to the committee and talk about international monetary policy, but people in Canada are waiting for this budget legislation to be enacted. The priority for the House is the budget. We have spent over a week on second reading and on the committee stage of the income tax bill, and two full days of debate on second reading with regard to the customs tariff. The time that hon. members choose to take on these budget bills is not only prejudicial to people like pork producers and others but is making it difficult to get on with the heavy agenda of the House.

I feel I would be trespassing on the rule of relevance if I started a long dissertation on the subject of Canada's trade policy. We have a specific bill on which we have had extensive discussion in the budget debate, so I think I should confine my remarks to the terms of this bill and not go into the broader questions that hon. members would like to have canvassed.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Chairman, I fully endorse the remarks made by the hon. member for Edmonton West and the hon. member for York Simcoe. I find it a little odd that the minister should say now that we have to rush this bill through, especially since the last time we debated it was October 28. For almost three months he has had it in his back pocket.

• (2030)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): You filibustered it.

Mr. Friesen: Not us.

Mr. Whittaker: I think that if the speeches that we made, in which we pointed out to the government our point of view, were of such a nature that the minister was sensitive about them so that he now wants to call it a filibuster and does not want the other side of the story told, nor does he want to listen to the opposition and to what the people of Canada are saying, and therefore has not brought it back to the House for three months, and now that he has brought it in wants to rush it through, then it is just too bad. I did hope he would have something to say about the textile industry. Things have happened in that industry between the time of the debate on October 28 last and now, and he has not given us any explanation on that.

Nevertheless, I should like to ask the minister some questions about a subject that has been dear to me and about which I have asked question of several ministers of finance ever since I have been here. It concerns the customs tariff on small packages of pesticide. I received a letter from the minister on March 24, 1976, in which he said that his officials were looking at it and that consideration would be given to the matter in the budget. We are now debating the customs tariff changes proposed in the budget that was brought down on March 25 but nothing was done this time, as in the past, nor have I had any explanation as to why something is not being done about this.

Mr. Clarke: I should like to ask the minister a specific question about tariff item 69605-1—scientific apparatus, etc.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is in clause 3.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Chairman, I am advised that this is in clause 3, so I will wait.

Mr. Friesen: As the Minister of Finance is aware, considerable attention was devoted by the Minister of National Revenue to a matter of customs and tariffs regarding groceries, because many Canadian shoppers are going down to Bellingham in the United States and as far south as Seattle to do their shopping. On these shopping trips anomalies in prices become very obvious to shoppers.

I should like to have an explanation of one of these anomalies. Can the minister give me the reason for this? I know many people who would appreciate it. For example, cookies that are baked in my riding neighbouring on the U.S. border sell for 30 cents to 40 cents a pound less in the United States than they do in the very locality where they are baked. Why do they cost less after having been exported to the U.S. than they do right in Canada where they are baked?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): With regard to the question of pesticides, that matter was canvassed in the community at the time in preparation for the budget, and I can say to the hon. gentleman that objections were raised by a number of Canadian producers with regard to a change in this tariff item. It was on the basis of these objections that we concluded we should not make a change at this time.

Mr. Towers: Mr. Chairman, I was wondering, with regard to the remarks of the minister as they related to the pork industry, whether I understood him correctly that he would be dealing with that matter in the proposed budget.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No, Sir. What I said was that as soon as the bill is passed I will be able to exercise the powers given under the bill to restore the level of protection which, under the bill, was to be reduced. This will be done as a result of representations from the pork producers. We do not have to wait for the budget, but by executive order I would be in a position to do that.

I cannot give an explanation for the marketing practices or the differences in cost on one or the other side of the border. I would point out, however, that item number 63500-1 does reduce the level of protection on biscuits on re-importation to Canada. I cannot explain the specific marketing situation of that commodity in the lower mainland and in northern Washington.

Mr. Whittaker: The minister has used the word "producers". He said that some producers were against it. I wonder if he would clarify that. Does he mean producers of agricultural products who use the pesticide, or pesticide producers?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I mean the chemical manufacturers in Canada.

Mr. Whittaker: May I make an observation on that? The people who want this tariff removed are the producers of food who use pesticides to produce food and who have very little, if any, tariff on their products. Take, for instance, apples. There is free trade on apples in Canada. If we are not going to protect our agricultural producers to any degree, then why should the manufacturers of products which they use get protection?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would remind the hon. member that there is a reference now before the tariff board on fresh fruits and vegetables. The board will be reporting some time during the course of this year. On all these matters it is a trade-off between the interests of different economic groups. In this case we are also looking at the jobs of people employed in chemical manufacturing.

Mr. Johnston: On clause 1, which is general, I should like to inquire whether the minister and his department have given any consideration to the practice which seems to be prevalent in the United States and which might be described as internal dumping. I have an example which has been brought to my attention of a kind of motor that is used in powering large model aeroplanes, model railways, and other models of different kinds. This is a hobby, but it has become a very large one, and the total sum of money spent on these machines is very large. They are not manufactured in Canada and, because there is a lack of any kind of protection, they cannot really be manufactured here. The distributors who have been importing them find themselves at a disadvantage because they must pay tariff on what is known as a fair trade price.

Having done that, and having brought in supplies, they find to their amazement that the stock they bring in simply becomes an opportunity for would-be purchasers to view the stock and make up their minds about it. They, in turn, can phone to the United States through a zenith number and order the same item for delivery by direct mail from a discount house at a considerably reduced price, a lower price than one on which the distributor would have paid duty. When the item comes to the customs office in Canada, a purchaser pays the duty on the lower price and makes a saving. He is not required to pay the provincial sales tax, and so makes a further saving.

One distributor was in a very difficult position. In order to improve his situation he developed a repair service for these machines, and in a sense that kept the loyalty of his customers, until he was charged duty on the parts he had to import to do the repair work, a service which could not otherwise be provided in Canada. What was developing as a Canadian industry was placed in jeopardy because there was no protection. If Canadian technicians can repair the machines, they can also manufacture them. That is one more example of moving into manufacturing small articles which require a great deal of technical skill, which we have here, but it is not possible because there is no tariff protection.

There are a couple of specific items which I would like to bring to the minister's attention. Is any consideration being given by the federal customs office to collecting provincial sales tax? A person who spoke to me said that otherwise the federal customs office would become a retailer in competition with retailers in the area. Are any moves being made to raise a barrier against internal discounting, where the manufacturer, the wholesaler, and the discounter are all one business, all owned by the same people who, when their own market is saturated, sell to their own discount house, and through it peddle into Canada directly at a great advantage?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, on that kind of transaction where an individual imports, there is a less extensive regime for control than there is when there are imports of commercial scale. The law is the same, but for practical reasons it is not possible to apply it with the full severity which would be applicable in the case of a larger shipment.

The question of valuation is basically one for the Minister of National Revenue. Perhaps the hon. member would like to write to me about that particular point, and I would be quite happy to seek the advice of my colleague.

I make just one remark with regard to provincial sales tax. It may indeed be that individuals are not paying provincial sales tax on those items, but that is not because they are exempt by law; it is because of the practical problem of collecting it. They are, of course, obliged to pay the sales tax.

[Mr. Johnston.]

So far as the Department of Finance is concerned, we do not have any arrangements under consideration at the moment for mutual collection of taxes in this way, although again I would have to inquire of my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, to see if in her department such a regime is being contemplated.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Chairman, I was not here when the original debate on this bill took place, so I did not have the pleasure of hearing what was said. However, I gather the reason for these changes is to lower the tariff on certain items. Could the minister tell me what progress, if any, is being made, or is any attempt being made to negotiate lower tariffs on Canadian fish products in the European Common Market? Can he give me a report on that? Is an attempt being made, and what are the prospects of success? As the hon. gentleman knows, there is a considerable tariff on Canadian fish products going to Europe, and this is where we have to put some of our effort in the next three or four years.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The best description I can give to the hon. gentleman, who was not here at the earlier stages of the debate, is that this is a continuation of the reduction of tariffs on many consumer items imported into Canada, principally food items, for the purpose of the over-all anti-inflation campaign.

With regard to the negotiations at the Geneva round, I indicated to the hon. member for Edmonton West a moment ago that this might not be an appropriate discussion because it does not relate to this particular bill. However, I would be glad to discuss this with the hon. gentleman in the House at some future time.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Chairman, there is another matter which is a continual nuisance and grievance to sportsmen in the country, and that has to do with the need to import cartridges, primers, and charges for sport shooting. For skeet shooting especially a lot of ammunition is needed. Much of this material is no longer made in Canada. CIL does not manufacture it any more, so these sportsmen have to go to the United States to get their primers, and I suppose also the charges and cartridges. The main question in their minds is, why is there duty on them in the first place since they are not manufactured in Canada? It certainly cannot be a protective tariff, and I suppose we have to assume—and perhaps the minister can correct me on this—that it is a revenue producing tariff and that that is its only justification. At any rate there are many sportsmen who are wondering why there is this tariff since these items are not manufactured in Canada.

My second related question is, if there has to be a tariff, why are there three or four different scales of tariffs on the items? Why is it that on one item it is about 7.5 per cent and on another one 15 per cent? I believe the tariff is as high as 32 per cent on some of these items. If there has to be a tariff on these cartridges and primers, why can there not be an across the board tariff so that all they have to do is pay a flat rate on this sports equipment? Why do there have to be excessive 30 per cent or 40 per cent tariffs on some of the items, since they are not manufactured in Canada in the first place? It seems to me these people are being penalized because there is not an industry in Canada which will produce these items.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I am reminded that the highest rate of tariff in Canada is about 20 per cent. There is a series of tariff items dealing with ammunition in a broader sense. It is not infrequent that with the shift in commercial competition, particular lines may be dropped. I suppose what the hon. member is really suggesting is that we should have separate tariff items for primers which, as he says—and I do not question him—are not manufactured in Canada, but of course there are other kinds of ammunition which are manufactured here, and it is to provide both actual protection and a protective opportunity to Canadian industry that the tariff item is there.

Mr. Friesen: For those items which are not manufactured in Canada is it not possible to drop that tariff entirely?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I have not examined the individual items in detail, but it may well be that what the hon. gentleman is suggesting—that is, that those which are included in a broader item should be segregated out and, in effect, that a new item should be created—could be dealt with in the budget considerations which are now under way, and perhaps I could undertake to examine this particular question. If the hon. gentleman would let me have a more precise description of the various items and indicate those which, to his knowledge, are manufactured in Canada and those which are not, I would be delighted to examine them.

Mr. Friesen: Will do.

Mr. Stevens: Apparently the minister is disinclined to give us any explanation tonight concerning the pending or current negotiations in Geneva. I wonder if the minister could at least give us an undertaking that he will take up with the government House leader the possibility of having a reference of our trade negotiations as they now stand, with particular reference to what is happening in Geneva, to our Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs so that we may have a meaningful review of what the government is doing on behalf of Canada in Geneva.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would be quite happy to discuss that with the government House leader. It is going to be an important consideration during 1977 as the tariff negotiations get under way again in Geneva. It may interest hon. members to know that the new United States Secretary of the Treasury was the prime negotiator for the United States at the Kennedy Round; in that sense I would look forward to an early meeting, to learn from him his approach to the Geneva round of negotiations.

● (2050)

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, would the minister confirm that he is the minister in the government who has over-all responsibility for the GATT negotiations, and that Mr. Gray asks him for instructions as to what action to take in Geneva?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, Mr. Gray, of course, was an official of my department. I would say that responsibility for the operation is shared by three departments: My own is the department responsible in particular fo the customs tariff; the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is responsible from the standpoint of Canada's over-all trade position and the position of Canadian industry; and the Department of External Affairs has responsibility for Canada's foreign relations. It is, therefore, not the decision of a single department; rather, the work of the government in this respect is co-ordinated primarily between those three departments. I would add that the Department of National Revenue is responsible for the practical application of the customs tariff which this parliament enacts; it also has other responsibilities. The anti-dumping tribunal reports through me to parliament, as does the Tariff Board. A number of different departments are affected in the government of Canada, and responsibility is shared among them in that way.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Chairman, are the items covered by Bill C-15 covered by the commodity coding system used by the Department of National Revenue?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I cannot say if the answer is in the affirmative. I will look into it in the next few minutes.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, while I realize that various departments of government are involved in providing total input with regard to the GATT negotiations, I wonder if the minister can confirm or otherwise if his department co-ordinates the activities of the other departments and has the responsibility of handling the instructions and communications going to our negotiators in Geneva.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, it is not unique. For the reasons I have indicated, the responsibilities of several departments are involved in this. I do not think one can say, in respect of a day's operations at Geneva, that it is specifically the final responsibility of any one department; however, as Minister of Finance, for the reasons I have indicated, I have responsibility for the customs tariff; and the primary purpose of the Geneva round of course is to negotiate lower levels of tariff.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, may I draw the attention of the minister to tariff items 8717-1 and 8728-1, as referred to in clause 1 and schedule I. The first item mentioned deals with onions; they are to be allowed in free under the British preferential tariff; there is a tariff of 1.5 cents per pound under the most favoured nation tariff, and a tariff of 1.5 cents per pound under the general tariff. The second item to which I referred deals with green onions, and the tariffs set out are exactly the same, under those three headings. Is the minister familiar with the tariff charged by American authorities for comparable items? In short, we know from the schedule what tariff is charged against American goods entering this country. Can the minister say what tariffs the United States authorities charge on comparable goods entering that country?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, we do not have the American tariff at hand. Of course we are now looking at the Canadian tariff, but I would be prepared to get that information for the hon. member.

Mr. Stevens: I always like to be helpful, Mr. Chairman. I have the American tariff before me; it happens to be 1.75 cents per pound. Consequently I understand that our bags of onions entering the United States face a tariff of 87.5 cents, whereas, in accordance with the tariff we are now considering, the total tariff we shall charge with respect to American produce entering this country will be 75 cents per bag. Therefore there is a differential of 12.5 cents weighted against the Canadian producer of onions. I wonder if the minister would indicate why there is this discrepancy?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I cannot really give the hon. gentleman an explanation of why the rates would not match. I notice that we have made some sales in the American market in recent years although, for obvious reasons, the nature of our climate and the fact that our growing season is short, the volume of produce from Canada going to the United States market is very much smaller then that coming in the other direction.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, has the minister discussed with or had overtures from the onion producers of Canada, more particularly the onion producers of Ontario, who have indicated to me that they would like to see parity between American and Canadian tariffs since this would enable them to be more competitive in the U.S. market.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, this is one of the items in the fruit and vegetable reference which is now before the Tariff Board. With regard to specific changes proposed, the Canadian Horticultural Council did not oppose the original reduction after the February 19, 1973, budget, although the council did oppose the reduction proposed in the November 18, 1974, budget, and offered to provide additional information on the subject. No further representations have been forthcoming since that offer.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, this is a most important matter to the 300 Ontario onion growers who this year alone will produce nearly three million bags of onions. Could the minister indicate whether those tariff items which we are now considering could be altered, if a fair case were to be made for the alteration, despite their passage in their present form, say this evening? I understand that our producers would like something to happen. They want to see the Americans lower their duty to the Canadian level; or they want us to raise our tariff to the American tariff level; or, third, they are in favour of both tariffs being abolished entirely. In short, it is apparent that our producers are confident that they can compete and, if the tariff barrier could be removed, they could stand American competition and even tap the American market and, hopefully, expand those trade figures to which reference has already been made.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, several stages will have to be gone through. Of course the purpose of the fruit and vegetable reference is to determine better the impact on the Canadian market of the tariffs in question; this would affect not only consumers but, of course, Canadian producers. Second, on the basis of the results of the Tariff Board examination, this could well be a matter for negotiation in the Kennedy Round. However, I would say that the question of agriculture has not yet been broached in the Kennedy Round negotiations. One could almost say it has been so important and critical between the major trading partners that it has not been approached, but it will obviously have to be, to bring that negotiation to a finish.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the minister a question with regard to a similar problem. It relates to flax, a crop grown in a relatively small area of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and the Dakotas. There is a 50 cent duty on flax moving into the United States. I understand there is no duty on flax coming into Canada from the United States. This is a small crop in terms of volume, a few million bushels. The price in the two countries is generally the same, but conditions such as shipping orders and so on make a difference. I believe the flax producers have asked that the 50 cents a bushel tariff on Canadian flax going to the United States be removed or at least equalized. If possible, it would be preferable to remove it. Perhaps the minister can make some comment on this.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, that would be a subject for negotiation when the agricultural items come up before the Geneva round. If I could just refer to the question asked by the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth, I take it the question refers to the Statistics Canada commodity codes in this respect. The items here would be covered by the commodity codes. These items are rather narrower in definition generally speaking than the broader commodity codes, but the commodity codes obviously would cover these.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Chairman, I do not know them as Statistics Canada commodity codes, only National Revenue because National Revenue produces a catalogue. It is a little more detailed than Statistics Canada commodity codes.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister can inform us if the Horticultural Association made any representation regarding imports from Taiwan and Korea on such items as mushrooms, wax beans, and green beans. The price level at which these products are coming into Canada is destroying the agricultural economy. Certainly on the west coast it is really hurting it. Will the minister inform us whether there has been any representation by the Horticultural Association on that tariff item?

My second question is with regard to an arrangement between Canada and the United States on the matter of potatoes. The minister can correct me if I am wrong. Under the GATT agreement there is a kind of reciprocating tariff arrangement between Canada and the United States on potatoes. The quota for Canadian shipments into the United States is really quite low. The American quota for shipping into Canada is really quite high. Regardless of the percentage rate of the tariff, it is really a restrictive tariff for Canadian potatoes to be shipped into the United States. However, the Americans can ship high volumes from Idaho and Washington. With their mass production and corporate farming they can inundate the Canadian market and are doing so, mostly with their cull potatoes. They can sell high grade potatoes on the market in the United States, take their culls and literally dump them in Canada, ruining the Canadian potato industry in British Columbia. Can the minister give some answers on that?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is quite right. The Canadian market is more open than the American one in the sense that we have a much less restrictive quota. Again, this is something which is under consideration, the fresh fruit and vegetable reference. On the question of representations with regard to mushrooms, this has been a matter of substantial representation. I would have to check the record to see if the Canadian Horticultural Association itself actually made the representation. I certainly know that others have. I can also check the record with regard to wax beans.

Mr. Friesen: Are there definite plans for changing the agreement with the United States on the matter of export and import potatoes so that the Canadian potato industry will have a little more protection from the American high volume?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Not until we have the assessment of the Tariff Board. Of course it would be appropriate to do it within the context of the Geneva round.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, if I could go back to my questioning with regard to onions, will the minister indicate to us exactly what we can do here tonight? As I understand it, the onion producers are saying that there are three alternatives—let us have both nations go down to zero, let us have the Americans reduce their tariff to our level or, alternatively, increase our tariff one and one half cents to the American level. Can we tonight actually amend the tariff to go to the American level, or is this subject to the GATT negotiations?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, that is a bound tariff under the GATT.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Chairman, there are two more items about which I would like to ask the minister. One is the matter of fresh lettuce. There is a tariff arrangement between Canada and the United States on this matter. However, all too often the tariff is imposed when it is almost too late to save the Canadian market. The low tariff on the American or Mexican product coming into Canada stays on just long enough until the Canadian product is coming on the market. By that time it is too late to save the Canadian market. The protection does not come on in time. Since there are different marketing conditions and weather conditions, for example, between the west coast industry and Ontario, would it be possible to have the regional tariffs come in at different times of the year and let the local boards adjust those tariffs so that they would be sensitive to the marketing conditions of their areas and thereby protect the farmers in particular localities?

My second question relates to frozen vegetables. Food processors on the west coast in particular have a high inventory of frozen vegetables. It will be almost impossible to market them by the time the next crop comes on stream because of the competition from the United States. Is something going to be done with regard to tariffs on processed vegetables, especially in the frozen state, in order to protect the jobs of Canadians, not only in the farming industry but in the food processing industry?

• (2110)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, there is a regional variation under the tariff arrangements with regard to fresh fruits and vegetables. For example, the hon. member for York-Simcoe was referring to onions under item 8717-1. Lettuce is not mentioned in this bill, but there are variations between the maritimes, eastern Ontario and Quebec, and the Lakehead and West. So there is a wide scope for regional variation. The hon. member will note that a number of items refer to frozen vegetables of various kinds and there is some reduction in the tariff. As I said earlier on, it has been in effect on a temporary basis for a number of years.

Mr. Friesen: Could lettuce be included in that regional variation?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It is.

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Chairman, could the minister give us an estimate of the impact of these tariff changes, particularly with respect to the British preferential tariff and the most favoured nation tariff, on the general system of preferences, since the two are related? I am thinking particularly of some of the items I see listed on page 13—typewriters, typewriter parts, spectacles and eye-glasses, carpet sweepers, electric vacuum cleaners and attachments, and so on. The list includes power lawn mowers, electric irons, electric lamps, electric lamp fixtures and so on. In other words, there is a range of manufactured items not only in the electrical manufacturing field but in other secondary industry. I ask this question in light of the fact that the general system of preferences grants to the developing countries—that is, the non-Commonwealth countries—the British preference or the most favoured nation tariff less one-third. Thus, if we are changing these tariffs we are also changing the level of the general system of preferences.

It is very difficult to follow from the tables provided here what change is granted under, say, the British preference and therefore, by extension, what is granted to the developing countries. I ask this question particularly in the light of the shrinking employment picture in some of our industries, especially the electrical manufacturing industry.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I am not sure I fully grasped the hon. gentleman's question but I can say that the general system of preferences is unaffected by the bill before us. The preferences as given under the general system are either one-third off the most favoured nation rate or the British preferential rate, whichever is the lower. Without these particular reductions the MFN or BP rate would apply, so the general system of preferences will, speaking generally, be more favourable to developing countries which are entitled to it than the BP rate on the same commodity.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Would the minister comment upon the effect of clause 5(3) on section 1 of the act? I ask this because he may recall that the effect of section 1 is that those changes in the tariff in the items outlined in subsection (1) will continue until June 30, 1977, that is to say, they will expire in approximately five months. The rates then go back to those which prevailed on February 20, 1973, and as of July 1, unless something is done in the next budget, the rates will revert to those of February 20, 1973. Perhaps the minister's director of tariffs can tell us in reference to all these items which appear in schedules I, II and III whether the rates were higher or lower, or is there an evening off?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I am advised that it only applied to Schedule I and that the rates were higher.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Therefore as of July 1, 1977, the effective rates will be higher?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Unless further action is taken in the meantime, it will be higher.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, returning to item 8717-1, it appears that we cannot tonight amend the bill and that if this is to be changed it will have to be changed in the current negotiations in Switzerland. Could the minister indicate what ongoing discussions take place with respect to this type of item, fruits and vegetables generally, to ensure that there is a proper understanding between our negotiators and those who are actually in the business of producing these items in Canada, as negotiations continue in Geneva?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Apart from the representations from organizations such as the Canadian Horticultural Council, to which I have referred, there is of course the ongoing work of the Canadian Tariffs and Trade Committee which has been engaged in cross-country contact with regard to the reduction of items in the Geneva negotiations.

Mr. Stevens: Would the minister give the House an undertaking that he would inquire of those two bodies as to the current feeling with respect to the tariff on onions as I understand there is quite a serious problem, especially for Ontario onion growers, at the present time? I feel that whatever benefit their thinking can bring should be available to our negotiators in Geneva.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Stevens: Perhaps I can move on to another item under clause 1—number 9800-1, bananas. Can the minister tell us where the bulk of our bananas come from? I notice there is a free tariff with regard to British preferential countries and most favoured nations, but the general tariff is a dollar per hundred pounds.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The bulk of the bananas we import comes from MFN countries, in particular, Costa Rica, Equador and the Honduras.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, there is a further item I should like to question. It is 92942-4—caffein and its salts. This is free under the British preferential tariff, 10 per cent under the most favoured nation and 25 per cent under the general tariff. Would the minister indicate where the imports of caffein and its salts come from? The item is on page 18, 92942-4.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The bulk of the imports come from the European Economic Community. The source is not segregated as countries.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

On clause 3—Schedule A further amended.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): In connection with this clause, Mr. Chairman, there has been a great deal of correspondence with the minister. I know that many of my colleagues like the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre—anyone indeed, who represents a riding in a city in which there is a university—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): —has received extensive correspondence regarding item 69605-1. It arises out of the bulletin which was issued by the Department of National Revenue with regard to the very narrow interpretation being used. I do not know whether, as a result of representations, the bulletin has been suspended. If the minister looks at the item on page 22, in the middle of the item there is reference to "preparations", and then follows the change "including containers in which imported, for use directly in research". The word "teaching" has been dropped.

● (2120)

I have before me a letter from a professor of surgery in the Department of Surgery of the University of Alberta. I have other letters from the Department of Chemistry of the University of Alberta, from Calgary and many other places. The first letter to which I referred has this to say in part:

> Many departments in this University maintain stores of scientific supplies and this is necessary in view of the lengthy delays often encountered in obtaining items ordered from the scientific supply houses. While much of these stocked supplies go towards research work, some are used in teaching. Since, in fact, it is very difficult to separate out the teaching and research functions of a University it will not be possible to prepare the required statements for the tariff exemption.

For example, the Health Sciences Animal Centre in my Faculty uses some $60,000/annum worth of specialized animal feeds. While the overwhelming majority of the animals are used in research, some are used in teaching. With some hundred scientific investigators using the facilities of the Centre for an even larger number of projects, honest production of the descriptions of the research and use of the prepared feed will just not be possible. The result will be about a 30 per cent rise in animal feed costs or $20,000/year raising animal charges to users about 20 per cent.

I have another letter from the Department of Chemistry of the University of Alberta which states that this change will cost them $64,000 a year more. The same figures are given by Calgary and Manitoba.

I also have a letter written by the minister which says this, in part:

I appreciate that this amendment is causing problems for universities, hospitals and their suppliers of preparations. Officials in my Department are discussing this matter with officials in the Department of National Revenue who are responsible for the administration of this provision.

A meeting was also held recently between officials in my Department, the Department of National Revenue and representatives of the universities. It was agreed that the administration of the new provision would be re-examined. My officials will report back to me shortly at which time I will be in a better position to decide whether a further amendment to the item will be necessary.

I await the answer, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, to complete the public record on this, the item in question was affected by a Tariff Board decision rendered in July, 1976, and the new provision has been much more restrictive than was intended by the government. I would therefore be proposing to take action to give it the less restrictive meaning that was originally intended and for this purpose to seek a remission order pursuant to section 17 of the Financial Administration Act.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): May I ask specifically how the minister intends to proceed? The wording is there and the word "teaching" no longer applies. I assume the effect of the Tariff Board decision was that the exemption be applied only to those materials that go into research. It is true that the minister can take, shall we say, compensating action, but it must be done in two ways. First of all, the item has to be amended, I think, in order, shall we say, to eliminate the effect of the Tariff Board decision; otherwise the Department of National Revenue will have to carry on. Secondly, for this year, or whenever the amendment might come in, the minister is going to take the remission procedure.

If he follows the remission route it is going to be a real headache for everyone concerned. The paperwork involved is out of this world. Universities and hospitals complain that to keep track of these preparations and foods, and so on, for animals either used in research or in teaching, it will cost so much in paperwork alone plus, of course, the duty that will have to be paid. If they are to go along the remission route they will be required to apply to the Department of National Revenue for reimbursement of the amount they have had to pay.

It may be that the Department of National Revenue has suspended collection, but I do not know what route can be used by those people who, unfortunately, have to be put through this bureaucratic grist mill as a result of the Tariff Board interpretation.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, as I have said, this can be achieved by remission at this point. To complete discussions for our next budget in several months' time, we hope to propose wording which will be mutually satisfactory to all concerned and which would provide the ongoing assurance that a less restrictive interpretation will be given. Therefore I propose to recommend to the Governor in Council that remissions be available in the interim until there is some agreement on the most effective wording to attain the objective that we set out to attain.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): In other words, for the time being we will have to wear the hair shirt?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): For the time being you will have to wear the hair shirt, recovering some of the hair afterwards.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 4—Schedule C amended.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, because of the peculiar wording of Schedule IV, referred to in clause 4, I was wondering whether we could have some explanation from the minister. Item 99206-1 reads:

Goods manufactured or produced wholly or in part by prison labour, unless in any particular case or class of cases exempted from the provisions of this item by a regulation of the Governor in Council.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, this item now prohibits the importation of all goods produced by prison labour unless exempted by the Governor in Council for further manufacture in Canada. The item is being amended to allow the Governor in Council to exempt goods from prohibition in other circumstances and we are attempting to simplify the wording at the same time.

Two cases where it might be considered desirable to have prohibition are when they are being imported for public exhibition, or when Canadians return from visits to other countries having purchased goods of this kind without knowledge of the prohibition or the fact that the goods have been made by prisoners.

I should explain that the item was introduced in the late nineteenth century, and it appears that the item was designed at the time to protect Canadian manufacturers from imports of goods produced by cheap prison labour. It was amended in 1953 to allow the Governor in Council to import exempt goods when they were required for further manufacture. However, no exemption of this kind has in fact ever been made.

That is the basic background. Some people may be inadvertently importing into Canada goods of this kind—inadvertently in the sense of not knowing they were produced by prison labour, or for public exhibition—and this gives the Governor in Council the opportunity to make those exceptions from the general prohibition.

Mr. Stevens: The minister says "for public exhibition". I just do not follow what are the circumstances under which we would want to have goods coming in which have been produced by prison labour. What type of exhibition is the minister referring to?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Handicrafts, paintings, works of art of that kind which may have been produced by prison labour in other countries and originally imported into Canada. It may be a rather esoteric interest on someone's part, but one cannot tell; there may be an artistic genius currently reposing in custody.

Mr. Stevens: From the practical standpoint, Mr. Chairman, would the minister indicate to what extent these goods are inadvertently, as the minister says, imported by these unsuspecting souls?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): There have been cases, I am advised, but I am sorry, the actual figures are not available.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 5—Commencement.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I might just indicate that hon. members will have noticed that when introduced at the first reading stage, the bill had a number of blank statements in it, both in clause 5 (2) and Schedule I. I would like to suggest that it might be appropriate that they be filled in for this purpose. My understanding is that the suggestion from the Chair is that they could be treated as corrections of a typographical error, but perhaps you could advise me on that, Mr. Chairman.

● (2130)

The Chairman: I do not see any difficulty if the committee agrees, otherwise we would have to do it by amendment. What date is the hon. minister suggesting? Is it the date of first reading?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): October 14, 1976.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Under the circumstances, Mr. Chairman, we might agree to this as long as it does not serve as a precedent. It could have been the 14th day of October, 19, and then blank. Then, of course, we could insert years, and that could hardly be considered a minor correction. I can readily understand why October 14 is included, but I would not like this procedure to be used as a precedent, particularly if the gap were to come expressed as a month or year.

The Chairman: Does the committee authorize the Chair to make this type of correction to Clause 5(2), including the date "14th"?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

The Chairman: Shall Clause 5 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause agreed to.

The Chairman: Does the committee agree that we make the same correction to Schedule I at page 8?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On Schedule I.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, as the minister has indicated, the items I specifically referred to, 8717-1 and 8728-1, are in fact unamendable in that they are subject to an international agreement. I was wondering whether the minister would indicate if there are any items in this schedule that are amendable, or are they all structured in that way and only changeable as a result of negotiation in Geneva?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Indeed, you could go back through these particular items and find they are bound items back to February 14, 1973. The hon. gentleman's question was with regard to a basic amendment that was in force. The basic tariff provision that was in force on that particular day was a bound tariff under GATT. This particular bill substantially reduces from that bound level to a lower level. Of course, we could by amendment this evening increase them. We could, with appropriate amendments to the ways and means resolution, increase the tariff protection again up to the February 14, 1973, level.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I am somewhat puzzled by the minister's answer to my colleague, the hon. member for York-Simcoe. Surely it is open to an hon. member to amend a taxing statute providing he reduces the amount of the tax. We have done that on a number of occasions. It seems to me that also, subject to I suppose what might be an agreement, there could be other amendments. The government did not seem to be bothered a few years ago during the Kennedy Round agreements having regard to negotiated reductions in tariffs on industrial chemicals. The former minister, Mr. Benson, telescoped three or four years into one in the second year of the phased reductions on industrial chemicals as a step to combat inflation, making things cheaper on the domestic market. The phasing was dropped very quickly for those years.

The government took that action and it was subject to an agreement that it would be for five years. How does the government then suggest it has the power to change unilaterally the agreement, while a member cannot? If that is the case and it is proper for the government, then surely it would be open to a member here to make a proposal which, if the House agrees, would provide for a unilateral change. I would like to hear an explanation. I may be wrong in my logic, but if the government has the power to amend unaliterally an international agreement like that, surely this House, on the proposal of an hon. member to do the same thing, would have the same sort of power to do precisely the same thing.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I am not sure that we are addressing ourselves to the same thing. The hon. gentleman has suggested as one alternative increasing the Canadian tariff on onions. It was in that particular circumstance that I indicated this is one of the rates that had been brought down in February, 1973, which we could move back up again by executive order.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Chairman, this is one matter I have not been able to check. I have not looked through the list thoroughly, but I do not seem to find any items relating for example to wheelchairs or any other equipment for paraplegics in any of the schedules. Could the minister give us some indication as to whether these are dutiable items and, if they are, whether it would be the fair, equitable and honourable thing to do if we removed these items?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I am advised, Mr. Chairman, that quite a few of the items sui generis such as wheelchairs referred to by the hon. gentleman are now duty free. Some of them bear a tariff up to a maximum of 10 per cent, so there are some of these devices still in that category. The reason, of course, is that there are some Canadian manufacturers in this area, and it will represent in a particular case a judgment as to whether that protection should be taken off in the interests of those with an affliction.

The Chairman: Shall Schedule I carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Schedule I agreed to.

On Schedule II.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Chairman, I should like to draw the attention of the committee to item no. 40964-1 which appears at the bottom of page 19 in Schedule II, electric or radio apparatus designed to identify livestock and record their consumption of feed on an individual basis and parts thereof. About a year ago some constituents of mine engaged in livestock operations had occasion to raise their concern with me about the fact that equipment of that particular kind was dutiable. They pointed out that this was a new kind of equipment that involved some very important innovations in technology. It was obviously the kind of equipment that had great potential value for the livestock industry and was a kind of equipment not manufactured in Canada. They therefore made representations to me, and through me to the minister, with respect to the duty involved. On their behalf this evening I should like to take this opportunity to express appreciation to the minister for the consideration he has shown in eliminating the duty that would otherwise have been payable on these items.

EXCISE TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-21, to amend the Excise Tax Act, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in introducing this bill I would remind the hon. members that my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie), tabled a document entitled "An Energy Strategy for Canada—Policies for Self-reliance" in April of this year. In this document the government stated its objective of energy self-reliance, indicated a series of specific energy targets, and enumerated nine policy elements and priorities. These priorities included appropriate energy pricing, increased exploration and development, increased research and development and energy conservation. One of our goals is to reduce the average rate of growth of energy use in Canada over the next ten years. Energy conservation initiatives, including both tax incentives and tax penalties, form an important part of the government's policy of energy self-reliance.

This bill provides for the removal of federal sales tax from a number of items which contribute to the conservation of energy and to the development of new sources of energy. Included in this list are such items as solar furnaces and heating panels, heat pumps and wind-powered generating equipment. The current exemption for thermal insulation materials for buildings is extended to include thermal insulation materials designed for use in the insulation of pipes and ducts in buildings and mechanical systems.

The purpose of the removal of federal sales tax from the items referred to above is to promote the conservation of energy by encouraging the use of higher efficiency heating equipment, increased use of thermal insulation to reduce heat loss, and the development and application of new equipment designed to derive energy from other non-traditional sources. Provision is also made for the Governor in Council to prescribe, by regulation, additional equipment, articles or materials to be energy conservation equipment exempt from federal sales tax. This provision will facilitate prompt action to provide relief from tax when new items which can contribute to Canada's over-all energy conservation program become available on the Canadian market.

The bill also contains measures to deter wasteful energy consumption by increasing the special excise taxes on high energy-consuming vehicle and by imposing a new special excise tax on automotive air conditioners. The weight threshold above which the tax takes effect is reduced to 4,425 pounds for automobiles and to 5,000 pounds for station wagons and vans. In addition, the rates of tax applicable to vehicles which exceed their respective weight limits are increased to $30 for the first 100 pounds, $40 for the second 100 pounds, $50 for the third 100 pounds, and $60 for each additional 100 pounds in excess of the weight limit. The purpose of the tax is not to raise revenue but rather to encourage Canadians to demand, and the auto industry to produce, lighter, more energy-efficient cars.

In this regard, the ways and means motion tabled at the time of the May 25, 1976, budget provided for progressive reductions in the weight threshold with the result that, under a mature system, taxes amounting to as much as $1,000 would be imposed on the largest cars weighing approximately 5,300 pounds. Since the budget I have met with representatives of the auto industry and officials of my department have held extensive discussions with these representatives. Indeed, some discussions have been going on as a result with my colleagues, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien) and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and their officials with respect to this energy incentives tax. As a result of these discussions the government has been persuaded that an alternative form of tax based on vehicle fuel consumption rather than weight should be explored further by the industry and those within the government with responsibility for energy conservation.

To provide sufficient time for an in-depth study of this alternative, it was decided that the impact of the proposed tax changes should be reduced. For this reason the bill provides for a reduction of 75 pounds in the automobile weight limit and a reduction of 100 pounds in the weight limit for station wagons and vans, rather than the reductions of 250 and 350 pounds respectively proposed in the May 25 budget speech. The reductions in the weight limits and the increases in rate of tax applicable to vehicles in excess of the weight limits are effective as of September 1, 1976.

The further reductions in the weight threshold proposed in the May budget to come into effect in 1977 through 1979 will not be implemented at this time. I lay some stress on the words "at this time" because the one-year adaptation of the new rule was made specifically on the understanding that efforts would be made to move to the alternative means of gauging and preserving further energy consumption. I have left myself room for action in the current year, if there is no progress in this regard, to bring back measures like those originally proposed in the budget speech or, alternatively, one which would seem to be most effective to achieve the same end.

While the changes initially proposed will not be proceeded with in the current year it has really been a question of time to enable those concerned with this question to put into place proposals with respect to an alternative method of gauging energy conservation. The significant deterrent to the purchase and hence the production of energy-inefficient automobiles which we have in mind will be implemented following completion of the joint government/industry study of a more effective method of implementing the policy. These will be complementary to the fleet-weighted mileage requirements announced earlier this year by my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the amendment pertaining to the special $100 dollar excise tax on air conditioners for cars, station-wagons, vans and light trucks is another measure to promote energy conservation. Automobile air conditioners have a marked effect on gas consumption, either directly, by using the car engine as power source or, indirectly, by adding weight to the vehicle. Studies show that in the case of heavy cars made in Canada and equipped with air conditioners, there is an average annual increase of 4 to 6 per cent of gas consumption as compared to that of similar vehicles without conditioners. In the case of smaller vehicles, gas consumption can go up by as much as 20 per cent if the car is equipped with an air conditioner.

On a technical point of view, the bill provides for a tax at the wholesale level so that taxpayers holding wholesale licences can buy merchandise subject to the excise tax without having to pay that tax when purchasing the goods. They are then required to pay the tax when they sell the goods, just as wholesalers holding licences must nowadays pay the sales tax on goods subject to the federal sales tax. This measure would cut down the administrative costs of taxpayers who previously had to fill out reimbursement claims since they are buying goods subject to an excise tax and which can be sold tax free.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, after these brief words of introduction let me say in conclusion that the bill provides for important new measures to supplement those already in place to encourage greater conservation of energy by Canadians by penalizing wasteful or less essential uses of our energy resources, and by encouraging the development and the use of energy sources other than the scarce fossil fuels. On this basis I would commend it to hon. members.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, there is very little time left to me before the adjournment tonight, and I know that my colleagues tomorrow will talk on various subjects as they arise. First of all, however, I should like to say that I trust that some of them will take up the matter of the implementation that is imposed on so-called small business. Years and years ago, eons ago as a matter of fact, the $3,000 limit on any manufacturing establishment was imposed which exempted any business producing less than $3,000 worth of goods in any one year from collecting, charging and remitting sales tax. Inflation has taken care of that limit, but it has not been changed.

It seems to me that an equitable value at this time would be between $10,000 and $15,000. One can hardly sneeze without being charged $10,000. I know the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) will bring up something else in the same range, rehabilitation shops, handicraft shops, and so forth, very small businesses. I am sure that the Minister of State for Small Business (Mr. Marchand) would second my proposal here, but I will let my colleagues develop this further.

There is one particular point that I want to raise which arises in the latter part of the bill under the energy conservation equipment, where there is a change. A provision in an earlier budget, which is in section 17 of Part 11 of schedule III, refers to thermal insulation materials. At that time it was designed exclusively for the insulation of buildings. This time the minister has extended it to include pipes and ducts used in buildings, in mechanical systems, etc. The minister and I have exchanged correspondence, and I have also exchanged correspondence with the Minister of National Revenue (Miss Bégin) on the interpretation of this wording. I have letters dated up to mid 1976, prior to the budget, in which the minister indicated that the recommendations I made with regard to certain products would be taken into account. Nevertheless, not a word was changed; the same fundamental error was continued.

There are some types of insulating thermal materials which have to be put together, they cannot stand in a free form, and somebody says there is another design. They become a panel, and since they stand up between the joists, or if they are used on a roof, they provide structural strength, and they are said not to be designed exclusively for insulation. I say, poppycock! There is no way, for instance, you can take wheat straw, which is subject to heat and steam pressure, and press it together into a board two inches thick so that it will be rigid, but all it provides is insulation. There has been turning and twisting of words, an abuse of the English language so that all possible artificial meanings have been attributed to the wording. This material was designed exclusively for insulation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): May I have one minute more, Mr. Speaker, because I will not be here tomorrow?

I ask the minister whether he would look at this again. It has been a bugbear. Unfortunately these interpretations defeat the purpose of the budget to provide an incentive for cheaper building materials.

Adjournment Debate

FISHERIES—PROPOSED PLAN FOR COMPENSATION FOR FISHERMEN ENGAGED IN REDFISH FISHERY—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to protest a cruel and inhumane lack of action by the government in a matter that seriously affects the province of Newfoundland. On December 10, 48 days ago, I asked a question about the fish docks available for fishing operations on the south coast of Newfoundland in the district of Burin-Burgeo for the owners of those plants who were having great difficulties because of their inability to catch fish under last year's quota system with their side trawlers.

I asked the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. LeBlanc) a question on that and whether he was going to develop a plan to compensate them for their loss, because the lack of fish is not their fault but the fault of the government of Canada which, for years, was negligent in protecting that resource. He gave an unsatisfactory answer. He said he had no special assistance program. It appears he is going to do nothing. But 48 days later, on Monday, January 31, the fish plant at Gaultois in Burin-Burgeo, the district of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson), will close with a loss of jobs for 220 men because the government has failed to take any action in the last 48 days to amend the new fishery management plan of the Minister of Fisheries, announced in December, so that they can catch fish with their side trawlers and keep the plant in operation, or give it special financial assistance for the same purpose.

The plant at Gaultois lost over $400,000 in the last quarter of 1976. The Minister of Fisheries was informed that that plant would not be able to operate at the end of the month if no special assistance program was brought about. He was informed of that in a wire on January 13, and in a wire dated December 24 the owner of the fish plant at Ramea, Mrs. Margaret Penney, wired the Minister of Fisheries about the conditions in the plant at Ramea and about its losses in the fall of 1976 because of the lack of quotas and the difficulty with side trawlers. She advised that it was likely she would have to close and that another 375 jobs would be gone in Ramea if no steps were taken by the Government of Canada. At the plant in Gaultois only 55,000 pounds of fillets were processed in December, and in the other two months, October and November, only 150,000 pounds were processed, when the normal production is 400,000. They are losing a fortune because they cannot catch fish. They cannot absorb these losses, yet in the fishery management plan the minister announced in December no specific provisions were made for side trawlers or for these plants on the south coast.

What is the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the member of parliament for that area, doing about that? He was in Newfoundland over the Christmas period for two weeks, yet no special federal help has come. These plants are all in his constituency. He did not even have a meeting on the subject. We know that he has been gone for the last two weeks on official business in South America, and he got back only yesterday, but what has the Minister of Fisheries been doing in his absence? Is the fishing industry on the south coast of Newfoundland going to be allowed to collapse because the Minister of Fisheries is, for some reason, unable to amend his fishery management plan or to provide some additional assistance for side trawlers in Newfoundland?

There is a fish plant at Ramea with side trawlers, a plant at Gaultois with side trawlers, at Harbour Breton with side trawlers, and at Fortune half the trawlers are side trawlers. All of them are having these difficulties, and in Nova Scotia these conditions prevail in Louisbourg and Petit de Grat. What is going to happen?

There are four days to go before the plant at Gaultois closes, which the minister was informed on January 13 would happen. When is he going to come up with the program he promised last year for special assistance, or when is the fishery management plan going to be changed? What is the good of the 200 mile zone if it is administered so timidly, if we are going to tiptoe through the tulips and not see that our own fish plants are protected or that our own trawlers and fishermen can catch fish? What is the good of this so-called 200 mile zone? Enough of this timidity.

There are hundreds of fishermen and fish plant workers in Newfoundland in danger of being added to the already gigantic unemployment rolls in Newfoundland if the Minister of Fisheries does not act before Monday, and if the Secretary of State for External Affairs does not give him a nudge to get him acting.

Two of the Lake side trawlers went up to Labrador with assistance from the federal government last fall to try to fish on the strange grounds off Labrador. They had a disastrous trip. In ten days they caught 20,000 pounds of fish. They lost nearly all their gear fishing in those unfamiliar grounds and sustained a heavy financial loss. The wages of the crew members had to be guaranteed. Although they got a $48,000 grant from the federal government, they still lost heavily. They cannot fish in those strange grounds. They have to be permitted to fish off the south coast, off the coast of Nova Scotia and in the Gulf if those plants are going to operate this summer. What is the Minister of Fisheries doing? What is the Secretary of State for External Affairs doing? He should be worrying about the people in his own constituency just as much as he is worrying about the people of South America.

I hope the minister, who is not here tonight, will respond. I hope his parliamentary secretary will give us some indication that the fish plants on the south coast of Newfoundland will receive some special assistance to keep their side trawlers operating and their plants operating. There are at least 1,000 or 1,500 jobs involved in that area, and we cannot afford to have that unemployment added to an already fantastic unemployment rate.

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, a number of contingency plans were devised in 1976 to assist fishermen and plant operators in the event that quota restrictions or other factors necessitated assistance over and above that available from the Temporary Assistance Program which, effective April 1, 1976, provided two cents a pound deficiency payments to trawlers and grants of six cents a pound on fillets to processors.

Data on landings, production, costs and earnings supplies by fishing enterprises and the processing industry in connection with the assistance program have been under continuous review during the year. At the time the need for special assistance to side trawlers operating out of Newfoundland south coast plants was being evaluated the data showed that production at the Newfoundland south coast plants handling catches from side trawlers was 9 per cent higher in 1976 than in the same January to October period in 1975. When the April level of temporary assistance was established, the average landing per trip for Newfoundland side trawlers was 126,000 pounds. This catch rate was taken as an index against which succeeding months were compared, and was used to determine the need for any change in the level of assistance. The average landings varied from a high of 180,000 pounds per trip in August to 72,000 pounds per trip in October and November, with an over-all average of 125,000 pounds per trip.

Based on data compiled between April 1 and the end of October, it was concluded that total assistance provided under the Temporary Assistance program would be sufficient to offset any cash shortfalls incurred during the last three months of 1976, when the volume of landings is normally low. On the basis of evaluation of available information on landings and production for plants and side trawlers, it was concluded that additional special assistance was not justified.

We now know that during the latter part of 1976 plants remained open and fishermen continued to fish. While both production and landings were down during this period, over-all cost and earnings data for Newfoundland south coast side trawler plants show that during the period April to November inclusive, the temporary assistance program met the cash shortfalls in the industry. I might also add that there was a special financial incentive plan for vessels forced to fish outside their normal areas due to quota restrictions, and several of the Newfoundland side trawlers participated in this program.

I should like to inform you that the level of payments under the temporary assistance program, which were in effect in late 1976, are to be maintained during the first months of 1977. There is also a financial incentives plan to encourage fishing in northern non-traditional areas where Canada has substantial quotas. Conditions in the industry as a whole are being kept under continuous review, and appropriate action will be taken in response to changing circumstances in the fishing and processing sectors of the industry.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—OBJECTION TO DOCUMENTARY ON FRENCH CULTURE IN VILLAGE OF PAIN COURT

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, on November 4 last I raised an extremely important matter in the House with the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts). The issue was related to a documentary which appeared on CBET channel 9 on Monday, October 25, 1976, between the hours of 7 and 7.30 p.m. The documentary purported to show the French culture of the village of Pain Court. As I indicated at the time, a significant portion of the documentary dealt with an hotel, showing a stripper in the nude. When I asked the minister to investigate the matter and make an apology to the residents of the village and the township, to my astonishment the minister responded with a pompous and cavalier attitude.

The issue is not one of freedom of the press or a suggestion of editorial interference. However, when a documentary is a complete misrepresentation of the facts and reflects in a derogatory manner on the residents of a village and a township, I would have anticipated that the minister would have been more sensitive to the issue and responded in a more responsible manner.

The history of the village is contained in its name, and if the minister had reflected for a moment on that one fact the traditions and culture of the area would have unfolded before his eyes.

Pain Court is the abbreviation of the saying "Le pain est court", or "bread is scarce", which became in a sense the watchword of the early settlement which originated in about 1815. Through the years the picturesque name "Pain Court", symbolic of the early hardships of the settlement, has been resolutely retained by the people.

Their industriousness has overcome the hardships of an earlier era, resulting in a community recognized for its positive and unique contribution to the county of Kent; the area has prided itself on the strength of the family unit,the importance of high moral and ethical standards, and its people of deep religious convictions. They are recognized as having one of the finest agricultural communities in Canada and their emphasis on the importance of education has produced many prominent men and women in business, professional life and municipal affairs. I recall reviewing the cadet corps, composed of both boys and girls at the Pain Court secondary school. It is recognized as one of the finest corps in Canada; this, again, is a reflection on only one aspect of the culture of that particular community.

Sir, time does not permit me the opportunity of describing the many attributes that truly reflect the culture of Pain Court and the surrounding area. Surely it is obvious to the minister and members of the House that the documentary was an insult to the people and did not reflect the culture and traditions of the community.

● (2210)

As the minister also knows, I tabled in the House of Commons on November 17 last a petition containing over 400 names, which I personally signed without hesitation. Again, I have had no response to that particular petition.

Perhaps the attitude of the residents can best be described by the first of many letters I received from that area. Let me quote a portion of that letter dated October 27, 1976:

Could you please make a thorough investigation into a program which was seen on CBET, Windsor, Channel 9 on Monday October 25, at 7 p.m. or thereabouts?

The station called it a "documentary" on Pain Court. All it was actually was free publicity for a strip joint called the Dover Hotel, which unfortunately is situated at the north end of our beautiful little village. There are so many beautiful scenes and beautiful people in the village to interview, why concentrate the major part of the program on the owner of a third class establishment and show the stripper nude . . .

When word spread that there would be a documentary on the French culture in Pain Court, people flocked to the TV and had their children watch the program as well, because at 7 p.m. this is called prime time isn't it? There could not be anything objectionable on Pain Court. It is such a beautiful, peaceful sleepy little village. The people expected what was announced—French culture in the village of Pain Court. Little did they dream that they and their children would be subjected to seeing a stripper in action. Publicity of that sort only attracts undesirable riff-raff from the surrounding area. These undesirables spoil the atmosphere of Pain Court.

I recognize that this is the first time the minister has been appointed to the cabinet. I am generous enough to believe that his very flippant response to my question in the House of Commons was perhaps a reflection of his inexperience. I am also certain that, in reflecting on his initial response, the minister will not only be prepared to apologize to the residents of Pain Court in the township of Dover but will be in a position to report on my initial request for an investigation and a request for a public apology to the residents of that particular village.

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, in view of the hon. member's interest in the subject, we have secured a reply from the CBC.

I wish to first say a few words about some of the hon. member's last remarks. I do not think it is fair to question the capability of the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) about an item produced by the CBC. We all know the distance between the CBC and the Department of the Secretary of State. The CBC is at arm's length from the government because of the Broadcasting Act. Anyone who knows the broadcasting system in Canada knows that the minister did not have anything to do with this production.

For the benefit of the hon. member and the House, I will give the following answer that I have received from the CBC.

The item in question, a seven-minute insert in the local television news and current affairs program on station CBET in Windsor, was one of a series of short essays produced by that station on rural communities in southwestern Ontario.

The object of these essays has been to reflect the particular characteristics of the community and to note the issues of interest to the population. There is no intent to prepare a sociological study. The camera crew arrives in town, talks to the residents, shoots film showing what the community looks like, and tries to make the essay interesting and entertaining.

The item on Pain Court showed scenes of the lovely pastoral setting of the town, had interviews with the shop owner and the hotel owner, brief scenes of the stripper, commented on the comfortable bilingualism the townspeople had achieved, and mentioned the French language high school. It is noted the attraction that the strip show at the hotel had become, drawing people from around the area to Pain Court.

To produce an item on Pain Court without mentioning the strip show and the interest it had engendered, would have been less than reflective of the community.

For the benefit of the House and the hon. member I should like to quote something else which appeared in an editorial in the Windsor Star on November 9, 1976, just to show that various people hold various opinions. The article reads as follows:

Conservative M.P. Dr. J. R. Holmes of Lambton-Kent is off base in his demand for a public apology over a recent CBC television documentary which showed a stripper at a Pain Court hotel.

Dr. Holmes branded the show an insult to all residents of the southern Ontario region, and asked Secretary of State John Roberts to investigate. The program, he said, was "obviously unbalanced" because much of it centred on "a hotel and a nude stripper."

Not so, Dr. Holmes.

There is a hotel in Pain Court. It does feature strippers. It is a popular show, and many people know about Pain Court because of it. There are other attractions at Pain Court—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. parliamentary secretary but his time has expired.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—REASON FOR ALLEGED SECRET EXPULSION FROM CANADA OF MR. PERDOMO, REPRESENTATIVE OF CUBA

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief in that the information that I am seeking is very simple and to the point. It relates to my questions of this Tuesday dealing with information I have been able to obtain regarding the expulsion from Canada of certain Cuban diplomats. In order not to confuse the issue, let me make it very clear that I am not referring to the recent expulsion of the five Cubans, including three diplomats, who operated a spy school in Montreal.

I am specifically referring to the expulsion of one Alfonso Herrera Perdomo, second in command of the Cuban Embassy in Ottawa, and Rafael Reyes, an administrator officer at the Cuban Consulate in Toronto, both of whom were expelled from Canada last June without the Department of External Affairs making these expulsions public. Mr. Speaker, one must assume that either the government was trying to hide or cover up this expulsion, or that it has become the policy of the Trudeau administration not to announce the expulsion from Canada of foreign diplomats. The latter would be more in line, I suppose, since it seems to me that between the Soviets and the Cubans, expulsion of diplomats is becoming a regular habit.

It is difficult to comprehend why the government continues to tolerate and deal in good faith, as it does, with a nation that continues to show disrespect towards Canada and Canadian relations. Not only have we allowed the Cubans to operate a training camp for intelligence operations on Canadian soil, most probably under the supervision of the Soviet KGB; not only did the government close its eyes when Rafael Reyes was organizing and supporting revolutionary left-wing Chilean refugee movements here in Canada with the hope of overthrowing the ruling Chilean government; not only does the government tolerate communist spy activities, be they Soviet or Cuban, right under its nose; not only did the Department of External Affairs allow Mr. Perdomo to negotiate with CIDA officials and employees with the hope of recruiting them as agents for the Cubans while at the same time attempting to disguise what could have been $23 million in grants and loans to that country in such a way as to make it look as though the loan was $10 million—and this, of course, is backed by the memorandum from the agency itself—but the government continues to deal with Cuba as if nothing has happened.

The aid program already consists of a $10 million loan at a nominal 3 per cent interest for a 30 year term with repayments not to begin until 1982, as well as an outright grant of $3.9 million. And this while small and medium sized businesses in Canada, operated and owned by Canadians, are virtually ignored and allowed to go bankrupt as witnessed by the highest bankruptcy rate this country has ever seen.

What I am asking the External Affairs Department to consider is the following. First, confirm the obvious, which is that Mr. Perdomo as well as Mr. Reyes were expelled from Canada while in Canada last summer. Second, inform the Canadian public whether or not the policy of the government is indeed not to make expulsions of foreign diplomats public knowledge. Third, because of the continuing disrespect shown by the Cubans toward Canadian relations, I ask that the whole matter of the Cuban aid program be brought before the sub-committee of the external affairs committee dealing with CIDA, and that all current aid programs and negotiations with that country cease until the committee has had a chance to resolve these problems.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that the parliamentary secretary does not have the authority to answer positively my reasonable requests, but perhaps he can pass them on to his minister for consideration. While I am asking him to pass things on, perhaps he could advise the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that the time has certainly come for the Prime Minister to stop shouting at the top of his lungs "Viva Cuba" and "Viva Castro" and do something positive so that we can all continue to shout "Viva Canada".

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I will leave editorial comment aside for the moment and simply give the response. As the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs said in replying to the questions raised by the hon. member on January 25, the recent action the government has taken regarding Cuban officials is an indication of the seriousness with which it looks at activities undertaken by representatives of any foreign government in contravention of their status in Canada. The government has applied the same principles over the years.

Last June the Canadian government requested the Cuban government to withdraw Alfonso Herrera Perdomo for activities incompatible with his diplomatic status in Canada. No other Cuban officials were involved in that case. The name of Rafael Reyes has also been mentioned in the press. In fact Reyes left Canada early in 1976 at the end of his tour of duty here.

I can assure the House that the decision to extend aid to Cuba was based solely on the usual criteria and was not in any way influenced by what has been described by the hon. member as "deceitful practices" of any representative of any foreign government.

More generally, hon. members on both sides of the House know very well that relations between countries may involve both good elements and, on occasion, ones that are unsatisfactory. When incidents such as this occur, it is not always advisable or in the best interests of maintaining the over-all relationship to discuss publicly and in detail the unsatisfactory problems, but rather to dispose of them quickly. The important thing is that appropriate action on any problems be taken immediately by the government, and this has been done in all such cases. These situations naturally make it more difficult to move our relations with Cuba forward as we would wish. Nevertheless, it is our intention that our over-all relations not be affected.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF EFFECT OF BLACKLISTING ON CAREERS OF CERTAIN EMPLOYEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. Since it is now clearly established that the precautions taken in the Prime Minister's Office and Solicitor General's Office respecting the security of sensitive material and the inviolability of the EPO list may have been less than adequate, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

That the Minister of Justice undertake a thorough investigation to determine the actual effect on the lives and careers of persons on any lists of this type in terms of firings, red circling, denials of promotion or any other impediments which in retrospect have been attributable to the course of action taken by the then solicitor general.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented to the House only with its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

SUGGESTION EMPLOYEES ON BLACKLIST BE DEALT WITH ACCORDING TO 1963 GUIDELINES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, in view of the continuing importance of the subject to which reference has just been made, I, too, wish to move a motion under Standing Order 43. It is seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and reads as follows:

That with respect to those public servants mentioned in the solicitor general's letter of June 15, 1971, the government follow the mandatory policy guidelines originally established by the former prime minister, the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson, in 1963, viz: (a) those persons be informed by the employing department or agency "when their security or reliability is in doubt", and (b) before any dismissal of a public servant on security grounds, a separate review be undertaken by the government's advisory agency on security policy.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented to the House only with its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): How long are you going to keep on saying no?

REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT ACTION TO REDUCE PROPOSED INCREASE IN GASOLINE PRICES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity arising out of recent press reports that the major oil companies have notified the Anti-Inflation Board of their intention to raise retail gasoline prices as of March 1 by about 3.5 cents per gallon, even though increased wellhead prices for crude oil would only justify about 2.3 cents. In light of the fact that this extra increase in price would net the oil companies an extra $78 million in revenues, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the government take the necessary steps to forbid the rise in retail gasoline prices by any more than is justified by the recent increase in wellhead prices for crude oil.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT AS TO PARTY TO WHOM PERSONS ON BLACKLIST OBJECTIONABLE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 with regard to the extra-parliamentary opposition list raised in the House of Commons on January 24. In the absence of any assurance from the Solicitor General, firm or otherwise, that the persons on the list will be notified and given an opportunity to vindicate themselves in accordance with elementary principles of natural justice which dictates such a course of action, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That the minister at least make a declaration in the House as to whether or not these persons are objectionable to the state or merely to the Liberal party, and whether, in his opinion, there is any significant difference.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

POSSIBILITY OF COMMENCING TRIPARTITE DISCUSSIONS OF ECONOMIC POLICY—GOVERNMENT PROPOSALS

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of most of the government—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Goodale: Look behind you, Joe.

Mr. Clark: In my party, Mr. Speaker, unlike the Liberal party, there is no need for the leader to always look behind him. My question is for the Minister of Finance and it relates to reports that the Prime Minister will respond on Monday to a request by the President of the Canadian Labour Congress that subsequent discussions between labour and government—that is, discussions subsequent to the meeting on Monday—also include representatives of industry. I wonder whether the minister would advise the House if it is now the policy of the government to accept this proposal, which amounts to a tripartite model for discussion of national economic and social policy?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the question has been discussed by the government, both with the labour side and with the corporate sector. I think it would clearly be desirable to return to a situation where the organized labour movement takes an active and responsible participation in the canvassing of broader public issues in Canada. For my part, if arrangements can be established to have such consultations on a multipartite basis, I think it would be very desirable. Obviously, whether or not this will be done, either in the near future or with the labour movement, will depend very much on the outcome of discussions on Monday. I for one will certainly look forward in those discussions to canvassing further the views which I hope will be helpful in bringing labour back into public discussion.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance deliberately used the word "multipartite". I wonder whether he would tell the House if the government of Canada will be making some kind of concrete proposals to the Canadian Labour Congress relating to multipartitism or tripartitism or something of this sort. Secondly, if a proposal of this kind is going to be made, what other parties does the government propose to include? Finally, can the minister give the House some indication of the nature of this, in effect, new institution which the Minister of Finance and his colleagues will be discussing with members of the CLC on Monday?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, no new institution is involved in this respect, unless one regards a meeting between two or more parties as being of an institutional character. There is no definitive proposal in this regard. What we would propose would be to discuss the circumstances under which organized labour would really be prepared to come back into discussions with the other major decision makers in the economy. For this purpose "multipartite" would include not only organized labour and the management side, but also, because of the nature of our federalism, should include the provincial governments as well. Concepts very much along that same line will, of course, take place with the provinces in the following days at the meeting of the finance ministers.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, in effect the Minister of Finance is admitting the failure of the process of separate consultations with separate groups, which was the process undertaken by his predecessor as Minister of Finance. He indicates he will be holding discussions regarding new methods or models with the CLC, the Canadian Manufacturer's Association and with the provinces. I wonder if the minister plans to come before the House of Commons with an indication of the models the government has in mind for subsequent discussion of national social and economic goals on which final decisions have to be taken by this body?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, indeed I think it would be most appropriate to have effective House discussion on this question. It seems to me at this stage of exploration, however, that it is appropriate to ascertain the mood of the various participants and what concepts they have concerning consultation, and that is in discussion and consultation, instead of what the Leader of the Opposition appears to be suggesting, going with a definitive proposal and saying: That is it, that is what we are going to do. We are approaching it in the mood of saying we think it is desirable that there be this continuing communication among the major decision makers in our economy, and we would like to know under those circumstances how they envisage future participation of the private sector, whether labour or management, in the kind of decisions that governments, and I use that word in the plural, have to make about the Canadian economy.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, is the Minister of Finance telling us that the government of Canada is going into these discussions with the other partners in the Canadian economy with nothing on its own mind and no model of its own to propose, and that it is simply going to rely upon the other partners to propose what they think is desirable, as it has been relying upon the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, for example, to initiate discussions on post-controls policy, and as it is relying upon the CMA and the CLC to propose some form that will work better than the process that has been followed to this point of separate consultation? What does the government have on its mind? What is it proposing to the CLC and other bodies that it will not tell the House of Commons?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, we have discussed very extensively with the public what kind of proposal we think can be effective. For example, the hon. member and I yesterday exchanged some viewpoints on the possibility of a monitoring institution in the post-controls period. It would be a faulty conclusion for the Leader of the Opposition to say that we are going in without some proposals in our own mind which, in due course, after sounding out the various parties, will certainly be solidified. The intelligent way—surely, in this regard, instead of the way the Leader of the Opposition would follow, saying this is it; that is all—is to talk about the problem, talk about some alternative approaches that can be taken and, indeed, to have a genuine dialogue with those who are involved.

ATTITUDE OF LABOUR TOWARD WORK COUNCILS AS MEANS OF ACHIEVING INDUSTRIAL PEACE

Mr. Jim Balfour (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Is the minister now willing to concede that neither the concept of work councils nor of work-sharing, referred to in the letter, has the support of either labour or management, and subsequently that statements made by the Minister of Labour and his officials to the effect that progress has been made in these areas are simply incorrect?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I would make that comment, and I certainly would not make that concession. It seems to me it is important to have constructive discussion on all kinds of ways of improving the collective bargaining system in Canada. The Minister of Labour has been active in trying to determine ways in which the unhappy record of Canada in industrial relations in the last several years can be improved, if possible, by institutional change.

SUGGESTION COST OF CONVERSION OF TOOLS TO METRIC SYSTEM BE DEDUCTIBLE ITEM

Mr. Jim Balfour (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, will the minister give an unequivocal commitment to the effect that he will give favourable consideration to the proposal contained in the letter, namely, that the cost to workers of metric tool conversion will qualify either as a deduction from income or a deduction from tax?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, of course, consideration will be given to all sound proposals in preparing the budget.

POLICY IN RESPECT OF INFORMING PEOPLE ON BLACKLIST OF THEIR RIGHTS—APPLICATION OF POLICY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for either the Acting Prime Minister, or the Solicitor General.

Mr. Clark: Or whoever.

Mr. Broadbent: Can the minister indicate whether the government's policy is still that set out initially by former prime minister Lester B. Pearson in 1963, when he said on October 25 of that year, as reported on page 4044 of Hansard, that it would be the policy:

> . . . to inform the person involved when his security or reliability is in doubt . . . Employing departments and agencies will in future be required to tell an employee everything that is possible of the reasons for the doubt, if there is a doubt, and to give him an opportunity to resolve that doubt.

I ask the Acting Prime Minister or the Solicitor General this question, in the context of its still being policy, was it applied in the case of those people who were listed on the former Solicitor General's letter dated June 15, 1971?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if this policy was applied. I will be looking into that and if there is anything to report, the Prime Minister or the Solicitor General will be able to give an answer on Monday.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, may I direct my supplementary question to the Solicitor General and ask him, if, in checking the record and the original letter to which I referred, he discovered if this policy was applied at the time; if it was not, has he taken steps since then to ensure that it is applied?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the application of the policy, such as the one to which the hon. member referred in his question, would be the responsibility of the individual department to which a recommendation such as the one made in the case referred to was made.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a final supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. Will the Acting Prime Minister assure the House that the policy first laid down by Mr. Pearson remains in effect; I suspect that it ought to so remain in effect, because it is embodied in the human rights bill which has received first reading in the House, although it has not yet been passed. If the government still intends to implement this policy, will it make sure that it is followed to the letter in the case of those people listed in the former solicitor general's letter. Second, with regard to that point, would he undertake to find out why this policy was not applied in the case of Mr. Rudnicki, who was dismissed?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I have anything to add to what the Solicitor General just told the House. In any event I will be looking into the matter and if something has to be added, it will be done on Monday.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You are stonewalling.

Mr. Paproski: Clearly, we are not getting any answers today.

TRANSPORT

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—RECOMMENDATIONS TO SLOW DOWN ESCALATION OF DEBT

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. I would like to ask him whether the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority has made him some recommendations to put an end to the rising debt of that corporation. Will the minister soon tell the House whether he has some plans to that effect?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the matter has been under consideration and we have reached conclusions on how we ought to treat the total financing and revenues of the seaway. Further discussions are going on and before much longer I will have an announcement to make.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, the minister has just stated that negotiations are under way. Can he tell us whether those negotiations are carried on with the American government or only on the Canadian side?

Mr. Lang: Yes, Mr. Speaker, they are taking place with the United States.

POSSIBLE EXISTENCE OF MORE THAN ONE BLACKLIST OF EMPLOYEES—DATE OF MOST RECENT LIST

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Now that the minister has had the opportunity to become better acquainted with the files in his office and now that he has, upon reflection, confirmed the existence of an extra-parliamentary opposition list, could he tell the House today what other lists are in his files and were uncovered, and since he said that during his tenure of office no such lists were compiled, could he tell the House today what the last date of the most recent list would be?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge of any list before or after the one to which the hon. member has referred.

ORIGIN OF INFORMATION ON WHICH BLACKLIST BASED

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): I did not ask whether there were any lists prior to the one I introduced in the House. I should like to ask the minister whether there were any lists after the date of June 15, 1971. Furthermore, I should like to ask him whether he could today, since this question is somewhat obscure, provide the House with certain information as to the origin of the information that was contained in the list. Did the security service of the RCMP supply the information, or was it compiled by the security service operating under the minister's own department?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, there is no security service in existence in this country other than that which is part and parcel of the RCMP.

An hon. Member: That is not what Drury told us.

An hon. Member: What about gumshoes Goyer?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fox: As was indicated previously, in answer to the second part of this question, the information that was sent by the then Solicitor General to some of his colleagues has been provided on the basis of a report from the RCMP.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General has not answered the question as to whether there were any lists after the date of June 15, 1971. Since he does not recall the most recent date—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With due respect, the minister did answer that question.

REASON FOR DENIAL OF EXISTENCE OF BLACKLIST OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): I have a supplementary question for the Solicitor General. Since it appears that top civil servants denied in writing the very existence of the now admitted EPO list, can the Solicitor General inform us whether they did so on instructions from cabinet, or did these people know the truth themselves?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): I really do not understand the intent or the meaning of the question asked by the hon. member. If I knew exactly what he is trying to get across, perhaps I could give him some type of answer.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I will give the minister a chance to read it in Hansard and ponder over it, then tomorrow perhaps he will answer it.

EFFECT ON CAREERS OF THOSE INCLUDED IN BLACKLIST—POSSIBILITY OF COMPENSATION FOR WALTER RUDNICKI

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Justice. Would he consider instituting over the weekend an investigation into the extent to which those persons included on the EPO list have been affected by their inclusion in it, and can he or the Acting Prime Minister advise us whether any compensation or reparations have been contemplated to date to compensate Walter Rudnicki?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, my answer to the first part of the question would be no, that would be the responsibility of the Solicitor General, and the answer to the second part is that his dismissal is unconnected with the matters that have been raised in the House in the last few days. However, by order of a court of Ontario he was compensated.

ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA LIMITED

ACTION TO OBTAIN NAME OF AGENT OF ITALIMPIANTI

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and it arises out of the continual refusal of Lucien Secouri, president of Italimpianti, to provide to the Atomic Energy Commission officials information about the agent who handled the sale of the reactor in Argentina, if indeed there was an agent at all. The question is whether the minister, through the government of Canada, will bring pressure on Italimpianti—to provide information so that the people of Canada can find out whether any agent operated in the matter?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The hon. member already knows that a specific request has been addressed to Mr. Secouri on my instructions.

Mr. Gillies: I am sure the minister knows that Mr. Secouri has refused or denied that request. My question was whether or not anything else was going to be done on the part of the government, such as looking at licences and so on.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF EFFORTS THROUGH ITALIAN GOVERNMENT TO SECURE NAME OF AGENT OF ITALIMPIANTI

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Given the fact that the jurisdiction of the RCMP is within Canada, is the minister, through the Department of External Affairs, requesting the government of Italy to go to Italimpianti, which is partially owned by the government of Italy, and tell it to provide to the government of Canada through AECL the name of the agent, if indeed there was an agent, involved in this obviously difficult transaction in Argentina?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, clearly we would not on our own, that is, within the Department of External Affairs, initiate that kind of action while the committee is sitting. If the committee, in its conclusions or in its deliberations, concluded that it was desirable for the department to undertake some such inquiries, then certainly I would be glad to consider it in a very forthcoming fashion. However, it seems to me that I would not be acting properly to anticipate, in a sense, the actions of the committee or to do something parallel with the committee. If the Standing Committee on Public Accounts sees some merit in having inquiries made by officials or people within the Department of External Affairs, then I can certainly assure the hon. member and the House that I would be glad to consider it.

ALLEGED FAILURE TO PROPERLY RECORD PROCEEDINGS OF BOARD OF DIRECTORS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, since my supplementary touches on several departments, for example, the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the Department of Justice, I would like to direct it to the Acting Prime Minister. Since the whole matter of AECL arises out of the lack of proper records in the minutes of that corporation, I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister if the government is considering laying charges against any of the executives of that corporation under the Corporations Act of Canada, which requires that all proceedings of the board of directors of a corporation in Canada be duly recorded in the minutes.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this does not come under my jurisdiction. I do not know whether the Minister of Justice can give some information about that, but we will inquire and advise the hon. member.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

INCLUSION OF AIR BAGS IN MANDATORY STANDARDS FOR CONSTRUCTION OF VEHICLES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Since a recently retired chief executive of General Motors in the United States says that the inclusion of air bags as a mandatory standard for automobiles would reduce death on the highway by thousands annually, and since Allstate Insurance Company, which has done major research into automobile deaths and injuries, says that in both Canada and the United States death on the highway would be reduced by thousands if air bags were included as a mandatory standard in the construction of cars both built in Canada and imported into Canada, would the minister now reconsider his position and study the matter in the hope that these standards will be made mandatory?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there is no need to reconsider the position, since we are studying the matter, and we will be watching with great interest the actual statistics which will emerge from the additional provision of air bags in vehicles under current programs. This will certainly be a very direct and first-hand source of evidence on the question.

ENERGY

GASOLINE—REQUEST FOR ACTION TO LIMIT PRICE INCREASE

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and it arises from the application by the oil companies to the Anti-Inflation Board for an increase in the retail price of gasoline by 3.5 cents per gallon. In view of the fact that the 70 cents a barrel increase in the price of crude oil effective January 1 warrants an increase in the price of retail gasoline of only 2.3 cents per gallon, and if we allow 0.2 cents for the increased taxes arising from the increase in the price of crude oil, 2.5 cents is all that can be justified. An additional one cent per gallon may not seem important, but it constitutes an increase of $78 million in the revenue of the oil companies of this country. I want to ask the minister if he can assure the House and the motorists of this country that the government will take steps to ensure that the increase granted to the oil companies for gasoline sold at the pump will not be more than what is justified by the increase in the wellhead price of crude oil.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there are two costs involved, as the hon. member made clear in his question. One is the wellhead price, and that will be automatic. As to the question of additional increases over and above that, that will be a matter upon which the AIB will have to be satisfied.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is the minister who authorized the increase in the wellhead price for crude oil, does he not consider that he has a personal responsibility to place whatever data is necessary before the Anti-Inflation Board so that the oil companies do not rip off the consumers of this country to the tune of $78 million, particularly in view of the fact that Imperial Oil, for example, increased its profits in the year 1976 to some $264 million?

Mr. Gillespie: The hon. member is talking about the non-crude costs which might be associated with a further price increase.

Mr. Rodriguez: This is a recording.

Mr. Gillespie: If the AIB would like to receive advice with respect to these non-crude cost increases, I would be very pleased to provide it, but I believe that it is fully competent to assess whether wage increases and other costs since the last time the oil companies were able to get an increase are justified or not.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

POSSIBILITY OF HELPING SOUTH SHORE REGION OF ST. LAWRENCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Last December, in this same chamber, I put a question on the projects which had been presented by the province of Quebec within the framework of joint agreements between Quebec and Ottawa. At the time, the minister replied that he was to have consultations with the new Quebec ministers in that regard. Has the minister had those consultations, and has the new Quebec government come forward with projects, or has it told the minister that it would present specific projects for the south shore area?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I must say to the hon. member that I somewhat regret, of course, the delays resulting from the change in government. Unfortunately, I have yet to meet my opposite numbers in Quebec for discussions at the departmental level; but I can advise the hon. member that recent—very recent, in fact—contacts indicate that meetings should be held within the next few days. I expect to meet my Quebec counterpart within the next ten days or so, at which time I can discuss with him some of the concerns expressed to me by the hon. member and other hon. members from the Quebec south shore area.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, in the light of the answer just given by the minister, is it proper for the federal Minister of Regional Economic Expansion to make suggestions to another minister of another government concerning some priorities of a program intended to reach that department's objective?

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, indeed it is and we do it quite regularly. However I hope to have once again the opportunity to take part in the choice of some priorities related to regional development that we discovered in the province of Quebec.

AIRPORTS

POSSIBILITY OF IMPROVING FACILITIES IN ÎLES-DE-LA-MADELEINE

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I impatiently wish to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

Considering that airlines serving Îles-de-la-Madeleine are forced only too frequently to cancel flights to the islands at the least atmospheric disturbance because of a lack of facilities at that airport—as an example, there were 56 flights cancelled by Quebecair in 1976—could the minister inform the House whether one must wait for a mass uprising by the people before getting adequate navigational aids and improved runways as requested repeatedly for ten years.

PUBLIC SERVICE

APPLICATION OF GUIDELINES ON SECURITY RISKS TO RUDNICKI CASE AND OTHERS—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question for the President of the Treasury Board arises out of an earlier series of questions. It relates particularly to the case of the blacklist, which admittedly occurred before he was minister, and one public servant who but for a judicial finding of wrongful dismissal would still be a member of the public service. It affects as well the whole matter of the application of the guidelines to public servants who ought to be in the public service and those who are there now. In respect of this particular case, has the President of the Treasury Board investigated the circumstances of a letter dated June 15, 1971 that was referred to in this House the other day, to ascertain whether the guidelines were properly applied in the Rudnicki case? If so, what has the minister done about it? What recommendation has he made? Is he continuing the investigation to see if the kinds of things that happened to Mr. Rudnicki are not currently happening to other civil servants?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as the Solicitor General has indicated on many occasions, the actions taken as a result of any such letter were the responsibility of the department involved at the time. As I recall, Mr. Rudnicki's severance from the public service took place perhaps one or two years after the date of that letter. I cannot add to the comment made by my colleague the Minister of Justice in that connection. With regard to continuing investigation, I do not see any necessity for that at this time.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I tried to make it clear to the minister that what we are talking about here is a public servant who was wrongfully dismissed. If he had not been dismissed he would likely have been under the jurisdiction of the President of the Treasury Board and this gives him a particular responsibility, which he generally carries. I would ask the minister if he is consulting with the Minister of Justice to see whether the guidelines referred to in this House this morning were breached in the case of Mr. Rudnicki and are being breached generally. If not, would he do so and report to the House because this is important to the morale of the public service. This case goes far beyond the case of Mr. Walter Rudnicki.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I will note and examine carefully the representations made by the hon. member. I assume he is referring to the Pearson guidelines which I shall review.

SUGGESTED DELAY OF PLEBISCITE ON FEED GRAIN MARKETING SYSTEM—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the uncertainty and the divisions that a feed grain plebiscite would create in the agricultural community and since the Canadian Federation of Agriculture has dealt with the problem at some length but has not arrived at the type of question to be posed to farmers, would the minister consider postponing the vote indefinitely until there is a more general idea of what farmers want as far as feed grain marketing is concerned?

Hon. Otto. E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that I actually received a formal reply from the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, although I know that certain units within the federation have indicated their views along the lines the hon. member mentioned. I had thought it imperative to have the assistance and advice of the federation on the question of timing as well as the content of the plebiscite. I would certainly take into very serious consideration a recommendation from the federation if they felt a delay was required.

TRANSPORT

FERRY OPERATIONS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON COST-SHARING

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Transport? On December 21, 1976 the Prime Minister received a telegram from the premier of British Columbia outlining the disparity that exists between the federal subsidy program for west coast shipping compared with east coast shipping. Two weeks ago the minister's officials met with officials in British Columbia to discuss that disparity. Has an answer been sent to that telegram by the Prime Minister and is the Minister of Transport now willing to share 50-50 the cost of the British Columbia ferry operation?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, any discussion of disparities which ignores the special position of the constitutional requirement for ferry services under the terms of union with Newfoundland, I think fails to calculate adequately. We are, however, having discussions and will have further discussions with British Columbia concerning many questions in relation to transportation, and ferries in particular. Those discussions are not complete at this point.

FERRY OPERATIONS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON IMPROVED SERVICE FOR COASTAL COMMUNITIES

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Now that the new improved coastal shipping service has been in place for some three months, I wonder if the minister could give us an updated version of what is happening so that the coastal communities do not have to depend on Rivtow tug service for their livelihood and products?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think the report the hon. member wants would be longer than I would be permitted to give at this time, since it would involve a survey of the passenger and freight situation along the coast. If he has a more specific question, I would be glad to deal with it.

MANPOWER

CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—REASON COST OF MATERIALS ALLOWANCE NOT EXTENDED TO BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Can the minister explain why the $30 per man-hour week cost of construction materials allowance in the Canada Works Program has not been extended to a single constituency in British Columbia? Has the formula which produced this astonishing result been applied any more accurately than the one that produced last year's original LIP allocations in British Columbia?

[Mr. Lang.]

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think what the hon. member should be thankful for is that none of them needed this particular assistance under the criteria that are applied. In the province of Ontario only two constituencies qualified for this particular addition. The formula used was that the unemployment rate had to be in excess of 7 per cent for the first quarter of 1976. Second, and I wrote a letter to each member of parliament indicating this so the hon. member already has it, the constituency, according to Statistics Canada, should be in the lowest 20 per cent of all constituencies in terms of either average family income or the medium value of single detached owner-occupied non-farm dwellings. We endeavour to apply the criteria. If the hon. member examined the ridings involved, with one or two seeming anomalies, I think he would concur.

CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—REASON COST OF MATERIALS ALLOWANCE NOT EXTENDED TO OKANAGAN BOUNDARY

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to that put to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration by the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay. In view of the minister's answer to that question, and in view of the fact that unemployment in my riding is at 13 per cent to 15 per cent and the income per capita is lower than the national average, why did the minister indicate that the riding would not qualify when the qualifying rate is 7 per cent unemployment?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I indicated there was a series of criteria that would apply. If the hon. member's figures are correct, I will look into it and see if we made a mistake in that riding.

RESOURCES

POSSIBILITY OF DIVISION OF DEPARTMENT TO DEAL WITH RENEWABLE RESOURCES

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Has the minister made a final decision on whether he is going to add a division to his department to deal with renewable resources?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have made that decision and I hope to make an announcement with respect to it very shortly.

LABOUR RELATIONS

REQUEST THAT MONTREAL LONGSHOREMEN BE GIVEN JOB SECURITY

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question of the Minister of Labour, but in his absence I shall put it to the Acting Prime Minister.

Last December, I asked a question of the Minister of Labour concerning the problems of longshoremen, particularly in Montreal, and since the minister submitted the Tremblay report to me and to the longshoremen's association, nothing has been solved. Can the Acting Prime Minister tell the House whether the government intends to take any step to put an end to the shylocking and the employers' disregard for job security and the code of ethics taking place at the workers' expense?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall be happy to refer the hon. member's question to the Minister of Labour and I hope he will be in a position to give him an answer early next week.

POST OFFICE

PERMISSION TO POSTMASTERS TO PROVIDE MORE BOXES AND SUBSTATIONS IN DEVELOPING AREAS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. Due to the mounting problems confronting the general public and business in particular as a result of the bureaucratic policies of the Post Office Department, could authority be granted to postmasters to better manage their offices and thus provide a saving which could be used to provide more boxes and substations in rapidly developing areas with no extra cost to the public purse, thereby staying within the government's restraint guidelines?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the hon. member for Red Deer after he gave me notice of his question, I fully realize that there are some anomalies, especially in growing areas, relating to the service that is available. I am very much aware of the frustrations being encountered by people who have to wait at general delivery lines and post offices where parking facilities are not available. Having said that, I remind the hon. member that the government has indicated that there are restrictions being imposed on new hiring for the fiscal year. Unfortunately, the Post Office is caught by the same guidelines.

Mr. Towers: If mail has to go through large postal centres, it sometimes takes eight days to go 200 miles. What action is the government going to take to ensure there will be adequate service that individuals can trust?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question seems to have a little larger context than is normally treated in the question period.

TRANSPORT

ACTION TO IMPROVE PENSIONS OF RAILWAY EMPLOYEES IN VIEW OF HALL REPORT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the report by Dr. Noel Hall on railway pensions, which was finally published last week by his colleague the Minister of Labour, virtually throws the question of improving railway pensions back to the companies and to the government, can the minister tell us what steps the government is going to take to try to improve railway pensions?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I can tell the hon. member that we will be taking a very hard look at the report and the question of responsibilities. I will be discussing it with some of my colleagues, as I believe he is doing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that one specific set of recommendations made by Dr. Noel Hall is that the CPR raise its pension provisions at least to the level of the CNR, will the minister make a particular point of that to his friends in the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

IMMIGRATION

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PROVIDE ENGLISH LANGUAGE TRAINING FOR IMMIGRANTS IN QUEBEC

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the government's stated policy that resettlement of immigrants is a necessary and integral component of any successful immigration policy, and in view of the fact that resettlement should include proficiency in one or both of Canada's two official languages, is the government considering conducting English language training courses for immigrants in Quebec entirely under the auspices of the federal government, thus guaranteeing language rights as stated in the Official Languages Act?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, first and foremost, it should be realized that English training is provided in large measure in the province of Quebec under the educational jurisdiction that they have. I met with Mr. Couture this morning. I handed him a letter replying to his suggestion that he was going to close the English language course that is given to immigrants. As a result of this meeting with him, it seems that he is backing off a little from that and is suggesting that his main criticism is the selection criteria, who in fact decides. I think we can work something out. It should also be understood that French training is provided to workers in Ontario but provided in the province of Quebec. Therefore we are working in a bilingual milieu. Rather than fighting about it, I am hoping we can reach an accommodation.

Mr. Epp: Do we then have the assurance of the minister that the proposal to eliminate English courses for immigrants has in fact now been rescinded by agreement?

Mr. Cullen: No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot say that. The only formal indication I have from the minister is to the effect that he is terminating those particular classes. I indicated to him, both in a letter and personally this morning, that I felt that was an error, given the preconditions to actually taking the English lessons. We may have some frame of reference where we can work out an accommodation so that these classes will in fact continue, but I cannot give that commitment until the hon. minister has an opportunity to discuss it with his colleagues. Failing that, as the Prime Minister has indicated, we will look to other avenues to provide this kind of English training, be it comparable to the French training now provided in Quebec. We may provide the English training in Ontario.

ADVICE ON LANGUAGE GIVEN PROSPECTIVE IMMIGRANTS TO QUEBEC

Hon. Robert Stanbury (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Is it the practice of his department, as stated yesterday by the Quebec minister of immigration, to advise prospective immigrants that if they settle in the province of Quebec there is no need for them to learn any language but English because that is the majority language of Canada?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if reports that I have had on the speech made by Mr. Couture last night are accurate, the statement he made is in fact not true. We do not give that kind of advice. Second, it should be remembered that Quebec itself provides counsellors to these immigrants who indicate just what the situation is in Quebec. Third, we provide only to the province of Quebec so far, by agreement, something like $175,000 a year. They decide on the calibre and quality of the advertising from the money spent on that particular budget. I was somewhat surprised to have an indication that we were giving misinformation when the information in large measure is given by counsellors from the province of Quebec, with whom we work in very close concert.

[Mr. Cullen.]

RECOMMENDATION OF DR. HALL ON TRUSTEESHIP OF PENSION FUNDS FOR RAILWAY EMPLOYEES

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport with regard to railway pensions. One recommendation by Dr. Hall was that the trusteeship of both the CNR and CPR pension plans should be placed in the hands of an independent trust company. Has the government given any consideration to this recommendation?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in my answer, we will be giving consideration to this. We have not yet reached conclusions on it.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EXPULSION OF HERRERA PERDOMO OF CUBA—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF "ACTIVITIES INCOMPATIBLE WITH DIPLOMATIC STATUS"

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. After much prompting, a parliamentary secretary on behalf of the Department of External Affairs admitted last night during the adjournment debate that Herrera Perdomo, the former second in command of the Cuban Embassy in Ottawa, was expelled last June for "activities incompatible with his diplomatic status". Can the minister expound on that definition and at the same time advise this House why the expulsion was not made public at the time, or is this a new policy of this allegedly open government?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is hard to sort out the different parts of that question.

Mr. Alexander: You can do it.

Mr. Jamieson: Thank you for the confidence. I will be very glad to try. In the first place, as far as I was personally concerned, when I arrived back in the country yesterday I immediately gave the name of the gentleman concerned the first time I was asked. If the hon. member had asked, I would have given it to him, too.

● (1200)

As to the matter of the publicity surrounding incidents of this sort, I have asked for a meeting with the officials and some of the security people concerned, because I personally feel that this does create some problems. But I am also very much aware of the difficulties which arise when there is publicity associated with events of this kind. I am looking at the situation to determine what changes might possibly be made. Incidentally, this is not a new practice. As far as I know it is one which has been carried on by many governments of this country over a number of years. As to the definition, again, this is a standard definition which applies in all such cases—that the party or parties concerned have carried on in a manner inconsistent with their diplomatic status. That is the wording which is used by the security people, and, I believe, by the RCMP and by the External Affairs Department.

SUGGESTION CUBAN AID PROGRAM BE STUDIED BY COMMITTEE

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): I thank the minister for his answer. My supplementary is this: I have reason to believe, as a result of recent information from the minister's own department, that further expulsions on a far greater scale are being considered. In the light of these allegations and the continued disrespect shown by the Cubans for Canadian relations, would the minister not consider it advisable to bring the whole question of the Cuban aid program before the parliamentary committee dealing with CIDA?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Lest my silence be taken as being some form of confirmation, let me say most emphatically that I have no evidence whatever at this point of what the hon. member called "large scale or additional action being contemplated." I am not in possession of any such information. As to the second part of the question, I would assume there is no barrier as far as the committee is concerned with regard to dealing with this matter when the estimates or the subject of CIDA are before the committee in the normal course.

ENERGY

NATURAL GAS—POSSIBILITY OF EXCHANGE ARRANGEMENT WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It relates to substantial volumes of surplus natural gas available in Alberta and which are likely to remain unconnected to markets for some time, constituting a disincentive to further development. Since gas swap arrangements do not result in any net loss of resources, would the minister tell us whether he intends to discuss the possibility of such arrangements with the United States which is currently in some need?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I hope there will be an opportunity in the very near future to have discussions of this kind with the new secretary appointed by President Carter. Clearly, a new situation has developed as far as Canada is concerned, and I believe the pricing policies of the government are to a large extent responsible for the increased interest and investment in new gas development in Alberta.

Mr. Paproski: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. For the last three or four days I have been waiting patiently for the Minister of National Defence in order to question him with regard to a very important thing which is happening in my riding. There has been a secret military report saying that the movement of the Canadian airborne regiment from Edmonton to Petawawa will cost $125 million. There have also been reports that according to the military this move is not necessary and that it is opposed by high military sources. The minister has not been around. I would hope the House leader might be able to bring him in here, maybe next week, so that he can deal with these very important questions.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, since the House resumed its sittings the Minister of National Defence has been in the House every day but yesterday and today. Therefore, the hon. member's charge is nonsense. The minister has answered all the questions posed with regard to the move of the Canadian airborne regiment from Edmonton. The answers he gave are the facts, and there is nothing further to add.

Mr. MacKay: A brief point of order, Mr. Speaker, with respect to questions on the order paper. I should like, respectfully, to remind the responsible parliamentary secretary to the government House leader that many questions I have on the order paper with regard to Statistics Canada remain unanswered. I ask that they be answered as soon as possible so that we may get on to eliciting further information.

BILL C-22—NOTICE OF MOTION UNDER S.O. 75C

Hon. Donald S. Therefore, I should like to advise the House that I shall propose on Monday a motion

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 46, 203, 677, 737, 800, 896, 898, 913, 1,013, 1,067, 1,288, 1,292 and 1,329.

While I am on my feet, perhaps I might point out to the House, in response to the point raised a few moments ago by the hon. member for Central Nova, that the rate of return on all questions this session has been the highest the House of Commons has seen for a long time.

CARLETON UNIVERSITY CAMPAIGN—PUBLIC SERVICE DIVISION

Question No. 46—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did Mr. W. B. Britain, Deputy Minister of Veterans Affairs, circulate a letter on government owned stationery bearing the letterhead of the Department of Veterans Affairs to various persons in the Public Service appealing for funds for Carleton University and, if so (a) what is the name of the highest ranking person authorizing this use of government material (b) where did Mr. Britain obtain his mailing list and on whose authority (c) how many persons received the letter accompanied by solicitation material and how were they selected (d) who paid the cost of government materials used (e) was the material sent postage free and (i) if so, for what reason (ii) if not, what postage was used and was a government postage meter used?

2. Is it the policy of the government to allow the use of government facilities and materials for soliciting on behalf of private institutions and (a) if so, for what reason (b) if not, for what reason was it permitted in this case?

3. What is the complete employment history of Mr. Britain since he joined the Public Service?

4. Is it the intention of the government to instruct Mr. Britain and other Deputy Ministers to solicit funds for other private institutions in the interests of equal treatment?

5. What was the total cost to the taxpayer for this solicitation including the cost of (a) paper (b) printing (c) envelopes (d) postage (e) labour?

6. Was this matter at any time discussed, considered, or in any way dealt with or passed by the Treasury Board and, if so, on what dates and what are the details?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Veterans Affairs and Treasury Board as follows: 1. No. After Carleton University secured permission for a campaign, as in 2, below, Mr. Brittain agreed to assume responsibility for generating the further action required to give effect to the campaign within the Public Service. This resulted in a letter to each Deputy Head noting approval for the campaign and providing administrative detail. Additionally Mr. Brittain provided one copy of a letter destined to potential donors, signed by him, which was reproduced in multiple copies by Carleton University for distribution in departments along with informational material, a pledge card, and a self-addressed, stamped envelope, all of which was also produced by the University at its own expense. This material was delivered in bulk to departments for distribution as in 2, below. No active canvassing took place. Donors sent their donations directly to the University.

2. It is not the policy of the Government to allow the use of government material for soliciting contributions from employees on behalf of private institutions. Use of government facilities is permitted under certain circumstances. Charitable organizations of a non-sectarian nature and registered under the Income Tax Act are normally permitted to arrange for their literature to be distributed with payroll cheques and to advertise their campaigns on office bulletin boards. In addition, the United Appeal is permitted to use payroll deductions as a means of collecting donations from employees. Since campaigns of individual universities are generally limited to a region and to certain employees in that region, university campaigns have not been permitted to distribute literature with cheques. They have, however, been permitted to address and distribute campaign literature to employees in a government building in the region in which the university is located, using the mail distribution facilities within that building and, if an employee requests it, to discuss the campaign with him and collect contributions from him.

3. Department of Agriculture: 1949-1954, Junior Administrative Officer, Assistant Chief, Organization and Personnel, Chief, Administration Division, Science Services. Department of National Health and Welfare: 1954-1968, Assistant Director (Admin.), Indian and Northern Health Services, Assistant Director (Admin.), Medical Services, Director General, Administration. Treasury Board: 1968-1969, Acting Assistant Secretary, Management Improvement Branch. Department of Veterans Affairs: 1969-present Assistant Deputy Minister, Deputy Minister.

4. The government has not directed deputy ministers to solicit funds for private institutions and does not intend to do so in the future. It is the intention, however, to continue to permit charitable campaigns of the limited nature set out in the response to part 2 of this question.

5. $75.86. There being no direct solicitation or canvassing, the cost to the taxpayer was essentially that incurred by Veterans Affairs in writing to Deputy Heads, printing an information sheet for use by departments and in delivering that material. (a) $1.91; (b) $31.20; (c) $2.31; (d) $15.44; (e) $25.00.

6. On December 11, 1975, the Treasury Board approved a submission to permit Carleton University to conduct a campaign for funds among senior levels of the Public Service. It was recommended that Carleton University be permitted to conduct their campaign under the conditions previously set for campaigns of this type. The conditions allow for employees nominated by the University to set out posters advertising the campaign. The campaign representative was also authorized to address and distribute campaign literature, using the mail distribution facilities within that building and, if an employee requests it, to discuss the campaign with him and collect contributions from him.

UIC—EMPLOYEES SENT TO BATHURST

Question No. 203—Mr. Cossitt:

1. How many employees were sent by the Unemployment Insurance Commission to Bathurst, New Brunswick, to look over and report on that city in connection with the planned movement of certain UIC facilities and (a) on what date did they leave and return to Ottawa (b) how did they travel and what was the total cost (c) in what location did they stay in Bathurst and what was the total accommodation and food bill (d) what was the total cost for all aspects of the trip (e) did any employees go fishing while there and, if so, what connection did this have with their duties as UIC employees?

2. Was any special dinner, party or function of any kind held by these employees at the expense of the taxpayer and, if so, was an amount of money added to each person's regular hotel room bill to cover the cost?

3. (a) What were the room rates (i) prior to (ii) after such addition (b) what was the total amount added?

4. What are the names and job designations of UIC officials in charge of the visit to Bathurst?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): In so far as the Unemployment Insurance Commission is concerned: 1. Twenty-three. (a) Departure August 18, 1976 Return August 21, 1976 (b) By Rail—$2907. (c) Danny's Motel $2063. (e) $5021. (f) Yes. During the afternoon of Friday, August 20, members of the group were allowed to pursue their own activity. Some chose to investigate the Bathurst real estate situation; others went shopping; and about six or eight of the party went fishing, at their own expense. Since the object of the trip was to permit these employees to form their own impressions of Bathurst as a place in which they and their families might live, these activities were encouraged by those responsible for the group.

2. On Thursday, August 19, the group entertained a senior civic official and his wife. Each member of the group had $9.25 added as a restaurant charge, to his hotel bill, of which he collected $8.05 as the standard dinner meal allowance. Thus each member of the group was out of pocket to the extent of $1.20 with respect to the dinner. The balance of the cost of the entertainment, $51. was met by hospitality allowance.

3. (a)(i) $19.98; (ii) $19.98. (b) There was no amount added to the room rate.

4. Director, National Services; Director, Annuities; Director, Special Projects.

PETRO-CANADA PERSONNEL

Question No. 677—Mr. Lachance:

Between the date of the presentation of the last budget May 25, 1976 and October 12, 1976, did Petro-Canada hire, dismiss or transfer employees to other departments and, if so, how many?

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Petro-Canada reports as follows: Hired, three; Dismissed, none; Transferred, one.

DVA—RETENTION OF LAWYERS ON CAPE BRETON ISLAND

Question No. 737—Mr. Muir:

1. What are the names of the lawyers or law firms on Cape Breton Island employed by the Department of Veterans Affairs and how was each selected?

2. How much did each lawyer or law firm receive in fees and expenses in the fiscal year 1972-73 to date?

3. Can an individual securing financing through the Department select a lawyer other than those recommended by the Department and, if not, for what reason?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Justice and Veterans Affairs as follows: 1. See list following. When considering counsel for appointment as agents of the Minister of Justice the type of case is taken into account and a counsel's competence and experience in that area of the law is considered before an appointment is made.

2. See list following.

3. A veteran who wished to be settled under the provisions of the Veterans' Land Act had until March 31, 1975 to submit a loan application. Immediately after approval of the application, the Department of Justice was requested to secure a good and marketable title to the property registered in the name of The Director, The Veterans' Land Act, who, for the purposes of acquiring, holding, conveying and transferring property, is a corporation sole and as such is the agent of Her Majesty in right of Canada. The appointment of a legal agent to search and certify title was made by the Department of Justice and reflected the fact that title was being obtained in the name of the Director rather than the veteran.

Order Paper Questions

GOVERNMENT FUNDING OF ORGANIZATIONS SUPPORTING LEGALIZED ABORTION

Question No. 800—Mr. Epp:

Are there organizations in Canada that support legalized abortion and who receive funding from the government to support their cause and, if so, for the years (a) 1973 (b) 1974 (c) 1975 (d) 1976, what are the organizations and what funding did each receive?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Departments of Manpower and Immigration, National Health and Welfare and Secretary of State are concerned, I am advised as follows: The Department of Manpower and Immigration provides grants and contributions to many organizations whose objective is to facilitate employment or immigrant settlement and which thereby complement the services of the Department. Among the projects are some providing family counselling, and such counselling might cover various aspects of family planning and pregnancy counselling. However, such aspects are incidental to the purpose of the project. No organization whose primary objective is to support legalized abortion has been funded by the government.

ELECTRICAL ENERGY—ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Question No. 896—Mr. Howie:

Have any agreements been reached with any of the Atlantic Provinces for a study of a power pool and, if so, with which provinces and on what dates?

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: Negotiations are proceeding to develop terms of reference for studies. No agreements have been reached.

ELECTRICAL ENERGY—GULL ISLAND PROJECT

Question No. 898—Mr. Howie:

Has the government made any efforts to facilitate the economic transmission of electric energy from the proposed Gull Island power development site in Newfoundland through Quebec to other parts of Canada and, if so, what form did these efforts take and on what date were they made?

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: No. However there has been some preliminary discussion between Canada and Quebec at the ministerial level. Further action is dependent upon a decision by the Government of Newfoundland relating directly to the development of the Gull Island project.

UIC—R. E. MacKAY

Question No. 913—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What is the complete history of Mr. R. E. MacKay's employment with the Unemployment Insurance Commission including positions held and dates?

2. EXCISE TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from, Thursday, January 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that Bill C-21, to amend the Excise Tax Act, be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring a number of matters to the attention of the minister. My reason for doing so at this point is to allow him the opportunity to look into the remarks I am about to make and provide me with answers at some appropriate time as the bill proceeds. One of the questions I wish to raise with the minister is this. As we know, he has had to back away from the position he originally took in trying to promote energy conservation through a measure depending upon the weight of cars. He is considering whether it is not more appropriate to impose penalties based on the mileage per gallon or lack of mileage per gallon achieved.

I wonder whether the minister has done any research in a similar direction to determine whether the penalty on air-conditioners might not be counterproductive. The understanding given to us in defence of the imposition of a tax on air-conditioners was that they consume a tremendous amount of energy. This seemed a plausible argument and one which we on this side are prepared to support if it will, indeed, result in conservation. However, representations have been made to me suggesting that in fact air-conditioners might not be especially important in terms of energy consumption.

I should like to read the following letter to the House and ask the minister to reply to it at an appropriate time. The letter is from Dave's Auto Radio, of Kitchener. It is headed "Re: Bill C-21, automotive air-conditioner tax", and reads as follows:

● (1210)

The proposed purpose of taxing automotive air-conditioners is to encourage people to conserve energy. This is based on the assumption that car air-conditioner units are a heavy user of fuel.

I feel that this is only the case air-conditioning units that operate all the time such as GM's Comfortron. All manual air-conditioners operate only when needed and then only intermittently. These units are thermostatically controlled and as soon as the car's interior reaches the desired temperature, the compressor shuts off.

To be more specific on consumption of fuel, it is a well known fact that a car with the windows down on a hot day will consume as much, or more, fuel than a car with air-conditioning and the windows up. This is because when the windows are down, the car is subject to wind drag. When windows are up, it presents a clean entry into the air.

I believe that you and other MPs are being misled and poorly informed on this matter.

The letter is signed by Mr. Johnson. I do not have at my disposal the kind of research that would be required to know whether the arguments being put forward in the letter are as stated, but I think this is a very important matter. Since the question has been raised and the minister has had to reconsider some of his other approaches to fuel consumption, such as the weight of cars, the minister should tell the House what kind of research has been carried out on air-conditioners and what happens to fuel consumption. Have the facts put forward in the letter been examined, and what conclusions has the department come to?

Another matter I should like to raise at this time has to do with a letter sent to the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) from the Canadian Council of Rehabilitation Workshops. The president, Mr. Les Gray, asked the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre to have this matter raised in the House when the Excise Tax Act came up for examination, so this seems to me the appropriate time to raise it. I think I could best put the argument in the form in which it appears in the letter, and I will quote directly from the letter and ask the minister what is being done in this regard. At the conclusion of the letter there is some indication that the matter is under study, and once again I should like the minister to report at the appropriate time what the studies have revealed and what conclusions the government has come to in terms of making a policy decision. The letter is addressed to the Minister of National Revenue (Miss Bégin) and reads in part:

The purpose of this letter is to bring to your attention certain exclusions in the guidelines under the federal Excise Tax Act related to exemptions of federal sales tax for institutions and facilities whose prime objective is the rehabilitation of handicapped or disadvantaged persons.

A number of the workshops or rehabilitation facilities in Canada are not involved in activities that produce an item that would be considered under the act. Specifically this would be the renovating or refurbishing of items for resale such as clothing, electrical appliances, furniture, etc. In the course of these activities they must utilize various supplies and equipment to carry out this function, some of these being dry-cleaning fluid, soaps, buttons, paint, nails, electrical wiring, various tools and machinery such as washers, saws, drill presses, etc. that they must purchase and are charged federal sales tax.

The market segment for these goods is extremely selective and economically depressed causing a very low margin of return for the facilities who in turn must reflect this in the payment to the workers, retarding any incentive that may be generated, thereby in large measure defeating the rehabilitative goals of the facility. Being exempt from federal sales tax would greatly assist these facilities in achieving their objectives.

A further consideration is in the area of federal sales tax that is charged in the purchase of building materials for new construction or renovation of the previously mentioned facilities. The current costs of construction have made expansion in this respect extremely limited and I would ask that consideration be given to the exemption of the facility in these purchases or by some means applicable to the contractor.

The third matter of consideration is to a change in the guidelines related to the certification of institutions so as to encompass the broad spectrum of persons that we attempt to rehabilitate. At present, under the strict interpretations, persons who are socially disadvantaged and others who are in a transitional state following confinement to a penal institution, drug or alcoholic treatment centre and who make up the majority of persons in a given facility are not covered in the certification authority granting that facility exemptions of sales tax in production or purchase of materials and equipment.

It would be difficult to determine the exact amount of revenue that would be lost if these proposals were to be acceded to, but I feel it would be very minimal on the scale of the total intake of federal sales tax.

We have been advised that the current guidelines are presently under review and ask that you give the above matter your most serious consideration.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this, too, is an important matter and for this reason I raise it at this time. Since the matter is under review and we are prepared to make exemptions under the Excise Tax Act regarding certain items of social importance, it is a matter of considerable concern that we know whether the department has come to a conclusion or whether the minister is prepared to grant these exemptions to rehabilitative centres. If some difficulty is caused because there are so many items purchased, then I suggest it is possible from the administrative point of view to institute some kind of rebate or withdrawal system at the end of a purchase period which would reimburse these institutions in respect of sales tax.

I will leave this matter with the minister and give him an opportunity of refreshing his memory or obtaining additional information from his officials, and I would ask him to reply to the two matters I have raised when the bill reaches committee stage.

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would be proper to comment on Bill C-21, to amend the Excise Tax Act, without taking a brief look, at least, at the history of this excise tax in Canada. I think it is one of the poorer forms of tax which governments over the years have introduced and which this government has perpetuated, added to and changed. I say "poorer form" because it is a hidden tax, the kind of tax that people who pay it really have no knowledge of unless they happen to be versed in the law or business practices. Further, it is a tax that has another tax on it. In other words, nine of Canada's ten provinces have added a retail sales tax which automatically is increased by this hidden tax known as the Excise Tax. Another poor feature of this tax is the amount of paper work, recording, and so on, which is forced on small businessmen. In fact, it is forced on all businessmen, but it is a greater burden, I am afraid, for small businessmen.

I think the honest policy for the government to take, though I am afraid this government has no intention or perhaps does not have even have the ability or desire to take this kind of tack, would be to replace this kind of tax with some other kind of tax which individuals then know they are paying. I do not know what kind of tax could be substituted, but I should like to put forward one or two ideas. It has been said that a sales tax, particularly this sort of sales tax, is regressive because it is paid equally by rich and poor and has no regard for the situation of the individual who is paying it.

Some four years ago in this House I advocated that the income tax was also an unfair tax and that it should be replaced. At that time I was thinking—in fact, I suggested it to this government—that income tax could easily be replaced by some sort of a consumption tax which would be like a sales tax but need not be hidden and people would know what they were paying. That attracted great criticism from the other side, on the basis that my suggestion was regressive and it would hurt the very people the government wants to help. They cannot have it both ways. They cannot, on the one hand, say that to eliminate the income tax would be regressive, while on the other condoning and in fact supporting a tax such as this excise tax.

It was my contention at the time that exemptions could be granted to help those in lower income ranges to make the purchases everyone has to make of the essentials, which could be exempted from this kind of tax. For example, food is generally exempt now, I believe, and would be exempted from the consumption or sales tax. Other essentials are clothing and housing. The list might be a little bit longer than that, but those are basics and could be exempted.

The critics of my remarks at that time also said that Canada could not get along without an income tax. That is only because we have had governments over the years which have spent themselves into the position where they must have that kind of tax in order to raise the huge revenues they need. I would remind the government that Canada got along for 50 years without an income tax—from 1867 until 1917. I would remind it, too, that in 1917 income tax was introduced as a temporary measure to raise funds for the war effort. That went on, as we know, and it was even called the income war tax act until after the next World War, when in 1949 the name of the act changed to reflect its honest purpose and it is now called the Income Tax Act. Just to say the government cannot get along without it because it needs the revenue is not good enough.

The government examines all sorts and manner of things from beginning to end, ad nauseam, and there is no reason at all that the government could not examine other means of raising the revenue it needs. I know we are not debating the Income Tax Act, Mr. Speaker, but I think it is worth while to draw the parallel so the government might be moved to consider some alternate form of revenue or some other treatment of this kind of tax.

The government has often talked about equity and simplicity, as in fact it did in the white paper on income tax. I do not think there is anyone in this House who thinks our tax system is either simple or equitable. This excise tax is just another example of a dishonest way of raising money from the people, because it is a hidden tax. Hidden taxes really cannot be said to be honest types of taxes. Therefore, I am urging that the government take the opportunity it has of using its facilities to make some real studies to find ways to overcome the problems I am raising.

Dealing with the bill itself, the fact that there are things to criticize does not mean it is a bill in which we cannot find some good features. For example, in the minister's statement last night he made reference to the removal of the sales tax from a number of items which contribute to the conservation of energy. I do not think we can argue very much with that. The proposal is to remove the tax from such items as solar furnaces, heat panels, heat pumps and wind-powered generating equipment. Furthermore, the proposal is to extend the current exemption to include thermal insulation materials designed for use in insulating pipes and ducts used in buildings and mechanical systems.

The minister also made reference to the statement tabled by his colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie), entitled "An Energy Strategy for Canada—Policies for Self-reliance". The reference to that paper, I think, led the government to move to the conservation aspects of this bill, many of which are contained in clause 5.

One of these which I think was somewhat unfair was the addition of the $100 tax on air-conditioners when installed in automobiles. There is one particular aspect of that which I think is unfair to the Canadian taxpayer. That is, it was applied retroactively. That is to say, where a valid contract existed on the budget date, the date of that contract was ignored and the tax was applied also to any vehicle that had been purchased or contracted for prior to that date. This completely ignores the fact that a contractual situation existed between the purchaser and the vendor. Through no fault of his own, the purchaser—or the transaction, in any event—was burdened with an additional $100 excise tax.

That may not be a "life or death" proposition for someone who is contracting to spend a lot of money to buy a new vehicle, but it is an example of the fact that this government has chosen, again, to ignore the effect of contracts and apply its penalties to people it probably did not mean to trap in the first place. In any event, that has been explored, and there is no question but that the tax on air-conditioners for vehicles applies as of May 25 in spite of the fact that a contract may have been entered into a month or two before that date.

Clause 5 also refers to a weight tax on automobiles. The idea put forth by the minister undoubtedly is that heavier automobiles use more gasoline and, therefore, they should be taxed to discourage their purchase in order to conserve, in this case, petroleum energy in Canada. However, the minister has presented no statistics to support the argument that this is a desirable form of taxation or a desirable thing to discourage. I do not think I would argue that a heavier vehicle will not burn more gasoline than a lighter vehicle, but that is not the only measure of the use of energy; that is, the amount of gasoline a vehicle may burn. After all, it costs a lot in energy resources to produce a vehicle. I put it this way to the government, that a heavier vehicle may last two or three times as long and may be able to travel two or three times as many miles as a lighter vehicle that is not as well made.

● (1230)

The lighter vehicle may get somewhat better gas mileage and conserve energy in that respect, but if the heavier vehicle lasts twice as long or three times as long as the lighter vehicle, it leads to a real saving of energy; and not only of energy but of resources, because two or three lighter automobiles would need to be produced in order to replace the lighter vehicle which had worn out. I do not have the facilities to conduct tests which will prove my argument, but the government has those facilities. I think the government owes it to Canadians to use its extensive research facilities to study what I have been suggesting. It should do it before it imposes a tax which is based on conclusions which may not be accurate.

I shall leave that particular aspect of the matter and mention, before I finish, the aspect of cottage industries. The excise tax set certain limits in the past which at the time were probably realistic but which nowadays are not. Today, many small businesses are struggling to stay alive; struggling, I say, because in most cases these small businesses are not corporations but are run by a proprietor trying to make a living. That proprietor, who may be producing relatively small quantities of goods to sell to consumers, finds himself trapped by the present excise tax limit. He finds that he is included in the $10,000 manufacturing level and a large proportion of his net income must be paid to the government in the form of excise tax.

I am not saying that the principle is incorrect. After all, many of these people are manufacturers. But this situation is a further example showing that the government has failed to keep pace with what is happening from day to day; has failed to keep pace with the present-day situation. I appeal to the government to stop making band-aid changes to legislation like this, especially to stop making changes which have been insufficiently thought out, because some Canadians are trapped in circumstances they did not design for themselves. I hope there will be some permanent improvement to the system of taxation in Canada.

[Mr. Clarke.]

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I cannot let a bill on excise tax go by without saying a few words and expressing some of my own sentiments about the excise tax, a tax which I think is probably more unfair than any other type of tax. It really does nothing: especially, it does not do what the government would like to tell the people it does. I said it does not do anything, but it does: it raises lots of money for the government and many people who are paying it do not really know when and how they are paying it.

The discussion paper of June 23, 1975, on federal sales and excise taxes set out a number of criteria for an effective sales tax, namely, an optimum blend of neutrality, flexibility and efficiency. The paper finally recognized that the tax is not exclusively a revenue source but is an effective means of influencing consumption and resource utilization in accordance with policy goals. I do not agree with those assumptions. How can a hidden tax influence consumption and resource utilization? It is put on at the manufacturing level and people do not realize or recognize they are paying the tax. It is not put on in front of them; it is hidden. If it were put on at the retail level, I am sure retailers would make certain that consumers knew what tax they were paying—and I am sure this would make the government very unpopular.

I do not think consumers would like it if they realized, every time they bought something, just how much excise for federal sales tax was put on the item, especially considering the percentage rates now charged. Therefore, I cannot agree with the philosophy of the paper regarding resource utilization. I do not think this type of tax helps very much to influence resource utilization, especially since the people do not know what tax they are paying and why they are paying it. As I have said, it certainly raises a great deal of money for the government. It would appear to me, from a study of the schedules of excise tax, that the tax is put on those goods which the government feels will be easy marks and about which the people will not get too upset. About the only time people realize the tax is being put on is at times like this when we have the opportunity to tell them exactly what is going on. Only then do they know.

Many logical briefs were presented to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) in the past year in support of changes to the excise tax and sales tax, briefs such as the one submitted to the minister by the Canadian Handicrafts Council, which points out many of the inequities affecting Canadian craftsmen. That was a very good brief—but nothing has been done about it. Some craftsmen have to pay the tax, and some do not. Painters and sculptors do not; but silversmiths, leathercraft workers and similar craftsmen must pay the tax. Really, these people are small businessmen. They ply a craft and sell their wares either to supplement income or to make a living. It is the small manufacturer who is caught, who really gets hurt, who really gets confused and who really does not understand what is happening to him.

Small businessmen have to pay the excise tax. Some of them are classed as small manufacturers. Mr. Speaker, there is a limit today of $3,000 which was established over 25 years ago. That limit $3,000 may have been sufficient according to the standards of a long time ago, but it is not good enough now. Surely, in Canada, we want to encourage as many people as possible to work for themselves and to start small businesses. Surely, it should be one of our goals to encourage people to work for themselves. Surely, craftsmen should be part of this process. They could easily become the big businessmen of tomorrow, but they are discouraged by an innocuous-sounding tax such as this which stands in the way of their getting started.

I think the $3,000 limit is not high enough. It should be raised to at least $15,000, which would give these types of people an opportunity to start in business and buy the materials they need to become manufacturers and make a living. This is the sort of thing that we should encourage in Canada. Too much has happened in this country in the last few years to drive businessmen and manufacturers out of Canada. They have not been given sufficient opportunities to get started here.

A person who comes to my mind is a pipe manufacturer in my riding who has a business the profits of which are limited to a sufficient amount to allow him to make a living. But this excise tax takes away 12 per cent, which is a large amount for such a small business. He could start the same business in the United States where there is no excise tax, and from there supply the Canadian market. That would not be very good for this country; we would lose a citizen and a manufacturer.

Another man in my riding who has a small business of his own is making an excellent product, namely, toys. He is struggling to get ahead. But, now, not only does he have to pay the excise tax but he has to do all the paper work as well. It is discouraging to those people, many of whom give up and say to themselves that if they cannot get started in Canada, if they are to be inhibited at every turn, it is easier for them to go on welfare. That is not the way people should talk. We should encourage Canadians to start their own businesses. I say that the small businessman or manufacturer today can have a big business tomorrow. Let us give these people a lot of encouragement.

The fact that this tax will be taken off solar-heat component parts will encourage the development of this source of energy in Canada. That is good and timely. However, if the minister remembers, I have sent him letters regarding the 12 per cent tax on wood stoves. Stoves which use gas or oil, non renewable resources, are not taxed. We have a good supply of wood in many parts of Canada: it is a renewable resource. We are not using wood stoves to any large degree at present, but in the not too distant future we will be using them. I do not know why the tax was imposed in the first place. Perhaps at one time it was put on to encourage people not to use wood but to use oil and electricity. This decision is back-firing today. I think the department should take a long look at the imposition of a tax the result of which is to discourage people from proper resource utilization.

Not long ago the former minister of finance imposed a 10 per cent tax on aircraft, reportedly because of the high fuel consumption of aircraft. Yet the small aircraft does not use as much fuel as a car. I have a letter here telling me about a businessman in Calgary who has to use his aircraft to go to Drumheller. It is a C-172 Skyhawk. He uses $2.93 worth of fuel. If he took his car, a Cougar XL, he would spend $16 on fuel. That is a tremendous difference. There is a doctor in my riding, in the town of Kelowna, who uses his aircraft to fly to Vancouver. It saves him time and fuel and it is a much better mode of transportation than a car. Perhaps he should fly on scheduled airlines, but the schedule of the airlines does not fit in with his schedules. If he went on a scheduled airline he would have to stay overnight in Vancouver, but when he uses his own aircraft he can go down and back in the same day and he uses much less fuel than if he travelled by car.

Another point I would like to make is that many different taxes are put on small aircraft, such as the sales tax, the user tax and the user-pay tax at airports, all of which discourage the use of this type of transportation. You can buy an aeroplane for the same price that you can buy a car. Therefore, people should be encouraged to use aircraft. If you really want to know the reason the government puts a tax on aeroplanes, it is that aeroplanes are very popular with most people, although not many use them. This is not the type of reasoning that should be behind the imposition of the excise tax.

Before concluding I would like to make a few remarks about the 10 cent gas tax which was put on by the government. I spoke against it at the time. It has been on now for around a year and a half. It is a hidden tax; people do not realize it is there. I bet it has not stopped people using a half a gallon of gasoline more. They are using just as much gas. People do not know about the tax when they go to the gas pump, and it is costing the government plenty of money to collect it. In some instances people are allowed a rebate on the tax, which means costly paper work. This proposed tax will not solve the problem which the government suggests it will. The government should look at other ways of solving this problem so that people will understand what the government is trying to do. A gas tax is not the right way; its purpose is to raise more money for the government. All it has done is just that—raise more money for the government.

Granted, farmers, fishermen and ranchers get a rebate, but only if they take the time to fill in the necessary forms and send them in. Quite a few farmers and ranchers are not doing that and the government is getting a free ride; but this is a cost to farmers and ranchers. If this government really wants to do something for them, it will take the tax off purple gas. It should not have been imposed in the first place. If the government really wants to do something for them, it will put a stop to all the paper work. Then everyone would benefit without having to file for a rebate. However, I do not think that is the main issue. I do not think the tax should be there at all. I think it is an unfair tax. If the provinces want to impose a tax, they can justify it by using the money for building roads and things of that sort. That is a different matter. But the federal government should not be imposing this tax.

I hope the minister will reconsider many of the things about which we have been talking and writing to him in the past year, and that he will do something to help small businessmen, small manufacturers and those who want to get into business. Today, $3,000 is not enough; it has to be more. I recommend $15,000.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that it is almost one o'clock, I wonder if I may call it one o'clock and continue after lunch.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At 12.54 the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

● (1410)

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I begin my remarks on second reading of Bill C-21 by putting a question to the House and to the minister concerning changes that he appears to have made, and which he referred to yesterday, in the bill compared to the ways and means motion produced on May 25 when the minister's budget was first introduced. In this connection I would point out that yesterday, as reported at page 2478 of Hansard, the minister mentioned that they were in a bit of a quandary as to whether they had hit upon the right energy conservation formula; namely, was it correct to assume that the weight of an automobile was the only gauge as to whether it was a heavy energy user? To that end the department seems to have been sufficiently persuaded that their original proposal of May 25 was not adequate. The minister said:

> As a result of these discussions the government has been persuaded that an alternative form of tax based on vehicle fuel consumption rather than weight should be explored further by the industry and those within the government with responsibility for energy conservation.
> To provide sufficient time for an in-depth study of this alternative, it was decided that the impact of the proposed tax changes should be reduced. For this reason the bill provides for a reduction of 75 pounds in the automobile weight limit and a reduction of 100 pounds in the weight limit for station wagons and vans, rather than—

I emphasize this:

> —the reductions of 250 and 350 pounds respectively proposed in the May 25 budget speech. The reductions in the weight limits and the increases in rate of tax applicable to vehicles in excess of the weight limits are effective as of September 1, 1976. The further reductions in the weight threshold proposed in the May budget to come into effect in 1977 through 1979 will not be implemented at this time.

I draw hon. members attention to that reference by the minister. If hon. members review the ways and means motion and compare it with the provisions that are in the bill before us, they will see quite clearly what the minister is referring to. In the motion that was before us on budget night, for example, an automobile was taken as having a current structure weight or weight threshold level of 4,500 pounds. It was then proposed that the threshold level be reduced, starting in 1976, to 4,250 pounds and then dropping year by year, until 1979, to 3,500 pounds. Likewise, station wagons were to have a current structure of 5,100 pounds, to be reduced to 4,750 pounds by 1976 and eventually to 3,700 pounds in 1979.

As I read the bill before us, the government is suggesting that the weight not be reduced to 4,250 pounds, as I indicated was the 1976 figure, but be reduced only to 4,425 pounds. That is to say, the 75 pounds to which the minister has referred, and all the subsequent years reductions that were contemplated for 1977 through to 1979, simply will not be put into effect. My point is simply this, and I guess this is a point of order: can this type of variance between the ways and means motion and the bill be tolerated in the House without having the ways and means motion amended to give effect to the bill that the minister is now proposing?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I imagine the hon. member is raising a point of order, and this is not his participation in the debate. I will, therefore, call upon the minister on the point of order.

Mr. Stevens: I intend it as a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, it is quite true that the bill under debate today is not in the same terms, with regard to the tax, as was the case with the ways and means motion which was tabled on May 25. In effect, that ways and means motion expired with that particular session of parliament. Therefore, it is the new ways and means motion that was tabled in and adopted by this House as a condition precedent to the introduction of this bill which would govern in that regard. I am advised by draftsmen and legal counsel, and I believe that the terms of the bill are in accordance with the authorization from the governor in council under the new ways and means motion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair is ready to listen to further argument if hon. members wish to participate. If not, the matter will be taken under advisement and a decision rendered later, if the House is agreeable.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Agreed.

Mr. Stevens: Then I will continue with more general remarks concerning Bill C-21. I believe it is fair to say that many of the provisions and measures announced in the May budget supporting energy conservation, which at least in part are reflected in this bill, are good. I believe it is also fair to say that they are insufficient to begin the task of getting a grip on the enormous energy problems facing Canadians. Far more encompassing measures apart from elimination of the excise tax on alternate energy hardware is needed if we are to ensure an adequate supply of energy for ourselves and future generations.

The Manitoba chamber of commerce, in a 1976 study on energy policy, stated that Canada surpassed the United States in 1974 and boasted the highest per capita energy consumption of any economy in the world. It was estimated that we would be importing nearly one million barrels a day of oil in 1985 to meet our needs. The study recommended, among other things, increased tax incentives for research and development of alternate sources of energy, as well as incentives to the home owner to encourage conservation of traditional energy sources. The study found that by upgrading thermal performance of insulation, and by improving the efficiency of furnaces, energy consumption in the home could be cut by 15 to 25 per cent.

To encourage the widespread use of these measures the study urged not just the elimination of the federal excise tax on these items but a federal income tax credit on any expenditure to improve the efficiency of home energy consumption. Storm windows and doors, added insulation materials, caulking and weather-stripping materials were among the items which would qualify for a tax credit. As home heating accounts for 60 per cent of all residential energy consumption, the savings resulting from the upgrading of all substandard housing would be considerable—enough to stretch our energy supplies far beyond their expected life. It is projected that we shall be importing one million barrels of oil a day by 1985. At present prices, the importation of oil will cost us around $5 billion annually. The loss of tax revenue resulting from the provision of tax credits would be more than compensated by the enormous savings under regional subsidies in relation to oil importation and the reduction of the enormous outflow in our foreign exchange to which I have referred.

I believe the points raised by the Manitoba chamber of commerce are worthy of consideration by hon. members. As we know, there is a modest program in being at present through which the government is encouraging the installation of insulation in homes in the provinces of Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia. We do know that many of the other provinces feel it is unfair to be treating those two provinces differently from others in eastern Canada. In my view, the government should give consideration to the interesting suggestion that a tax credit should be available to those who are willing to improve the quality of the insulation of their homes. After all, energy is used by people throughout the nation, and the government might well consider an approach using the incentive to which I have referred. I imagine that many hon. members have received letters from constituents pointing out that they have made additions or improvements affecting the insulation of their homes, and asking why they could not be encouraged to go even further by a provision of tax credits in their favour. For example, I have received a letter in which a constituent said as follows:

> With the energy crisis coming closer with each passing day, it behoves all of us to do what we can to conserve what we have. With this end in view I have insulated my whole house with thermal windows and insulation all over the house. As you can well imagine, this is an expensive undertaking and the thought occurred to me that there should be some recognition of this fact by our government via an income tax allowance.
> I have written to Mr. Macdonald, the Minister of Finance, and in his reply he gives me two reasons why this cannot be done. Both, to me, appear specious and irrelevant. He says that taxes on all insulation materials have been removed and that if such an allowance were made it would be of more benefit to the wealthy than to the poorer people.

The writer continued:

> A similar letter to Alastair Gillespie has, to date, not brought forth the courtesy of a reply, which is to be expected in view of recent revelations.

I do not know what he is referring to there. But surely it makes sense to take whatever steps we can by way of taxation or otherwise to ensure that less energy is consumed in this country. Success in this respect would mean that whatever problems we encounter in the future will be less serious than would be the case otherwise. But let us go further than the present bill contemplates.

I think it is unfortunate that the minister should have to reveal, as he did yesterday, that though the government has had ample time to consider the matter—they have been aware of the problem for several years, as a matter of fact—his department has somehow given insufficient attention to the fact that the test of weight alone is not the most significant test when seeking to determine how to encourage people to use automobiles capable of using energy economically.

I am pleased, however, that the minister and the department are at least wavering on the position formerly taken, and that the criteria may be altered to include considerations which are more meaningful, for example, the number of miles per gallon a car can travel under Canadian weather conditions. As I have indicated, an excess tax imposed on the basis of weight is not necessarily the most effective means of encouraging energy conservation. My hon. friend from Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) has drawn attention to the fact that by concentrating on vehicle weight it is possible to introduce a distortion into the system of production, which may result in an over-all loss of energy since more would be needed in the production of the cars themselves. That, as I understand it, is the argument put forward by my hon. friend and other colleagues. If stress is laid on the production of light cars which may wear out more quickly than heavier cars, the manufacturer might in the end be required to produce two or three cars for every one of the other vehicles if they were heavier or more reliable.

That is one argument. I should like to advance a second argument. Weight alone, as I have said, is not necessarily the best guide as to which vehicle is the most efficient user of energy. Very often, heavy cars run more efficiently than lighter ones. In any case, the use of the term "weight" can be ambigous because there are four different ways of measuring automobile weight. Mileage per gallon is the best and more equitable. The Department of Finance initially proposed to extend its current excise tax on heavy automobiles to those which are less heavy. Details of this tax were shown originally in the budgetary papers. In general terms, any car weighing in excess of 4,250 pounds in 1976, or 3,500 pounds in 1980, will be subject to a tax in proportion to the excess. The excess tax which was proposed in the budget to encourage fuel conservation was related to the weight of the vehicle.

This move seems likely to encourage the production of lighter cars, but not necessarily cars which use less energy. However, as an official of the finance department put it to me one day, not only do we need lighter cars but we need more efficient cars. The minister in his remarks yesterday stated the same thing, in effect. As reported at page 2478 of Hansard, he said:

> The purpose of the tax is not to raise revenue but rather to encourage Canadians to demand, and the auto industry to produce, lighter and more energy efficient cars.

My point is that we need efficient cars, not necessarily lighter cars, because lighter cars will not necessarily show a better record of energy consumption. I should like to put some figures on the record to demonstrate what I mean. For example, there are four classes of car. According to EPA tests in 1976—and I convert the EPA figures into Imperial gallons—there are four classes of cars which show a mileage reading of 24 m.p.g. They are the Cutlass Oldsmobile, Omega Oldsmobile, LeMans Pontiac, and Ventura Pontiac. The curb weight of those vehicles is as follows: the Cutlass Oldsmobile, 4,020 pounds; Omega Oldsmobile, 3,445 pounds; LeMans Pontiac 4,010 pounds; the Ventura Pontiac, 3,440 pounds curb weight. These four cars have six cylinders, yet under the original proposal that we were faced with on May 25 the excise tax on the Cutlass Oldsmobile would have been $500, the Omega Oldsmobile would have had no excise tax, the LeMans Pontiac would have had $300 excise tax, and the Ventura Pontiac no tax.

● (1430)

I could give various mileage rating levels for other cars, including relatively small cars and cars that most of us would consider relatively heavy cars. For example, taking another level, the 21 miles per gallon level, we find that the Matador, of American Motors, weighed in at 3,785 pounds; it has six cylinders and would carry an excise tax of $70. The Seville Cadillac, rated at 21 miles per gallon, has a weight of 4,340 pounds, eight cylinders and an excise tax of $480. The Granada Ford, again at the 21 miles per gallon level, has a weight of 3,540 pounds and eight cylinders, but only an excise tax of $30.

I need not go further with these statistics, Mr. Speaker. I have them for most of the current models which are being sold in Canada. The point I want to make is that as originally conceived the department was wrong in its approach of using the weight test as opposed to the more meaningful miles per gallon test to which I have referred. In short, the original provisions are not equitable. In this last case all automobiles achieved the same energy efficiency, yet are taxed, or would be if the original proposals were to become law, in varying amounts due to difference in weight.

I should emphasize that the tax is calculated by the 1980 case, which is when the ceiling would be 3,500 pounds. As the figures demonstrate, cars achieving an average of only 18 miles per gallon will be taxed about $50, yet a car achieving 23 miles per gallon will be taxed as much as $400. Based on an average travelling distance of 12,000 miles per year, the more heavily taxed car will consume 145 gallons less than that which a less efficient car will use. Let me cite further figures to show another way in which the weight tax is not equitable. I refer, for example, to the Lincoln-Mercury group of cars which under the EPA fuel economy test are rated at 16 miles per gallon. Their weight is 4,928 pounds. They had an average 1976 list price of $13,014. They will have an average list price by 1979, according to the estimate of the automobile industry, of $19,053. The tax in 1979 would be $840, a 4.4 per cent increase, yet the possible decrease in sales will be from 9 per cent to 22 per cent.

I could cite similar statistics for the Chevelle Chevrolet, Seville Cadillac and Century Buick, but the point I wish to make is that the increase in the price of a car due to the weight tax applied in 1979, if the minister proceeded with his original thinking, would show no corresponding increase in fuel economy. The Seville Cadillac, with 21 miles per gallon, would increase in price by 1.9 per cent; the Delta 88, with 18 miles per gallon, by 6 per cent; and the Thunderbird, with 16 miles per gallon, by 3.9 per cent—the Thunderbird being the statistic that I specifically read into the record.

Perhaps the most blatant example of how weight is not indicative of fuel economy is to compare the Renault 5 to the Peugeot 504 diesel. Although neither could possibly be taxed, this illustrates the point well. Both cars are in the top ten when rated by efficiency. The Renault achieves 39 miles per gallon, and the Peugeot 36. The Renault has a curb weight of 1,835 pounds, yet the Peugeot is 3,045 pounds. Using weight as the single factor to predict efficiency is not accurate. As my first set of figures show, the number of cylinders plays a role. So does the size of the engine and the type of transmission used, whether manual or automatic. Although weight may have more effect on the efficiency of an automobile than any other factor, it is still not the best indicator of fuel economy. The EPA mileage figures are the best indicators, as I have said.

I have cited those figures, Mr. Speaker, because I believe it is unfortunate that the minister is not in a position today to give us his new approach. He has simply said that he is holding back, that at a subsequent time the government is going to alter its approach. If we believe sincerely that this measure was right in its intent to try to conserve energy in this country, the fact is that we are stalling. Once again the government is in a dither. It does not know which way to go, and we, the Canadian public, are being asked simply to stand still and not—I emphasize "not"—press for needed tax changes to ensure less energy consumption by automobiles.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I hope that in addition to giving us his further thoughts as to what type of approach he intends to bring in at a later date, the minister will also reply to the question why the government does not reverse its tactic. Why is it only suitable to increase excise tax on certain vehicles and not remove it on vehicles which the government thinks are the most efficient when it comes to mileage? Would it not make more sense to identify the cars that are least energy-consuming, and lower the tax on those cars so that people, especially those in lower income brackets who wish to buy this sort of car, can do so at lower cost than is the case today?

Although the government says it is not looking for additional revenue, its response is not to reduce excise tax to enable more efficient vehicles to be purchased by people, especially in the lower income brackets. The government proposes to increase the tax on other vehicles. With all due respect, I suggest that this will not have the desired effect which the department thinks it will have. Those who wish to buy big cars, by whatever test they like to choose, are probably going to continue to buy them despite relatively high tax, while the government gives no encouragement at all to persons of lower income to buy the relatively efficient cars, encouragement which a reduction in the excise tax on such vehicles would give.

I would also stress that the effect of the weight tax could be severe. General Motors has announced that starting with their 1977 line, all their full-sized cars will be eliminated. Ford is pursuing a longer-range project which aims to increase the fuel economy of their automobiles. Introduction of a weight tax for 1977 model cars will leave Ford at a competitive disadvantage. All of their new small cars will not be introduced until the introduction of the 1978 models in the fall of 1977. The industry is preparing for 1980 fuel economy measures. Throwing another measure, weight, into the works could undermine the industry's research. I have mentioned this because the minister indicated that they have drawn back, but he has also stated they are awaiting the alternative approach they are going to finally bring in as they review with industry and other officials the proper course to follow in this field.

The weight tax is anticipated to net the government, as it was originally estimated, $35 million. This figure implies that the government has estimated the effect that the tax will have. Indeed, it has not. The figure, rather, is ball-park figure, the average of a tax with no effect on the market and the average earning of a tax with considerable effect. Similarly, the estimated revenue of $7 million from the excise tax on automobile air-conditioners only represents the mean of an upper and lower estimate of $10 million and $5 million. Thus, the statisticians do not know whether the tax will result in the sale of 100,000 air-conditioners or half that many. One must wonder whether, considering the apparent lack of precision in determining the effect, the government is merely instituting another money winner or is really serious about energy conservation. During our committee of the whole review of this bill, I hope the minister will be in a position to give us some estimate as to what he anticipates will be the revenue from the various taxes we have before us in Bill C-21.

Probably the best indicator for the effect the tax will have is the price elasticity given by the industry. In the automotive industry a 1 per cent increase in the price of a car can result in a 2 per cent to a 5 per cent drop in vehicle demand. It is not clear whether this relationship is applicable to individual autos. For instance, rather than having sales of all taxed cars drop by their assigned percentage points, we might find that everyone affected by the tax might buy a less expensive car. Thus, only the most expensive cars would experience a decrease in sales. I would emphasize, again, that while these cars may be expensive, they may also be relatively efficient energy burners. Another factor is that the sale of more expensive luxury cars tends to be less sensitive to price changes.

In short, before leaving this discussion of weights I want to note that four kinds of weight measures are used. The weight measure used by Revenue Canada at the moment is the individual weight of the car including factory-installed options as shipped from the plant, plus 25 pounds, as I understand it, for gasoline. The second is the shipping weight of the car, which is the average weight of the model of the car. The third standard is the curb weight, which is the average weight of a model of car equipped with radio, automatic transmission, power-steering and the usual type of equipment on that car. Weights of mid-sized and large, luxury cars include air-conditioning. The fourth standard is the inertia weight of the car, which is the average weight of a model of car, plus 300 pounds to give the effect of a partially-loaded car with two people and some luggage. It is this weight that the EPA uses to determine the fuel economy and emission control standards generally accepted in the industry. If weight is to be used as the basis for an excise tax, it seems that the inertia weight is the easiest to work with and the one that reflects true driving situations.

I have summarized some of our thoughts concerning the provisions of the bill we will be dealing with shortly in committee of the whole. I hope the minister, in his opening remarks, will expand on what he said yesterday. I believe we have advanced an interesting thought in an attempt to ensure greater energy conservation as far as automobiles are concerned. Unfortunately, the government has fallen short in that it has misconceived its approach by putting too high a stress on weight and has not given proper incentive to people to buy the most efficient energy-consuming cars by lowering the sales tax rather than simply proposing that the excise tax be raised on certain other cars.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the House will permit me at this time to invite some clarification from the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) on the point of order he raised earlier relating to Standing Order 60(11), in which it is said:

> The adoption of any ways and means motion shall be an order to bring in a bill or bills based on the provisions of any such motion.

In his point of order the hon. member spoke of discrepancies between the ways and means motion adopted by the House and Bill C-21 that is before us at this time. While he was making his contribution, I took the opportunity of asking for a copy of the ways and means motion on which this bill was prepared. On looking at the ways and means motion which was presented to the House on October 28, and concurred in on November 3, rather than the one that was presented last session, I find that there is no difference on page 2 between the bill before us and the ways and means motion already adopted.

Perhaps the hon. member would enlighten the Chair by making a specific reference to the page where he suggests there is a difference, unless, of course, the difference has resulted from the fact that he was making a comparison with the ways and means motion adopted during the previous session, if I recall well, on May 25, 1976.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I believe there is a confusion in respect of the ways and means motions to which you have referred, the original one on May 25 and the subsequent one tabled in this House. The minister, in referring yesterday to his so-called reduction, referred back to the May 25 budget speech and the suggested reductions. In our comparison of the ways and means motion initially brought in on May 25, with the new one, we perhaps misread the second motion in that we felt they were consistent and believed there was still a discrepancy when one compered the bill with that motion. The minister has clarified that and feels there is no discrepancy between the ways and means motion introduced at this session and the bill before us. If he can assure the House that this is so, I will not press the point further.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I really do not have to give the hon. member that assurance, but I will be glad to do so. If he reads clause 5 of the ways and means motions, he will find the wording is identical. It is difficult to have a discrepancy under those circumstances.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That being the case, I would indicate to hon. members that there is no point of order.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I have almost to jar myself into reality when I remind myself that we are still debating the budget of last May 25. I realize there has been a lot of water under the bridge, but most of the measures we are now discussing are basically housekeeping measures that should have been taken care of a long time ago.

I cannot understand why it has taken so long to bring these measures forward. Actually, I find some measures in the budget attractive. Measures encouraging us to find ways to preserve our energy resources are commendable. I am also pleased to note the provision in the budget which will allow the handicapped, or at least the parents of handicapped children, to deduct certain expenses from taxable income. I have talked to the minister's parliamentary secretary about that particular measure which has been, I think, the subject of a private member's motion. I was pleased to note that the minister is in agreement with my position on that matter and that there is to be an enlargement of those provisions which will benefit those who must incur the expense of caring for handicapped children. I commend the minister for enlarging those provisions.

The bill before us leads me to observe that most of its provisions are revenue-producing ones and are designed to discourage expenditures; for example, which would increase our consumption of energy. On the other hand, some of the handicapped in this country, unfortunately, must still pay excise tax on certain equipment they use. Not long ago a constituent called me saying that she is forced to use a wheelchair on which the government charges excise tax. Because she needs a wheelchair all the time, she is forced to buy a good one which will not wear out quickly: You must pay more for high-quality wheelchairs, and therefore more excise tax. She feels that she is being penalized for being a cripple.

We have come to a very sorry state in this country if we must raise revenue from the handicapped to fill the government's coffers. Really, such an excise tax becomes a tax on misfortune. Surely we can find other ways of raising government revenues, ways other than imposing tax on the handicapped. We should not look to them to provide this revenue. I know the minister is not interested in collecting money from such people, but this practice has grown up over the years, probably because of an oversight. I give the minister notice of my intention to ask him about this matter when we consider the bill in committee of the whole.

It is anomalous that doctors who treat such patients are allowed to rush to their aid in motor vehicles and to collect a rebate on the ten-cents per gallon excise tax on the gasoline used. Doctors do not supply the government with excise tax revenue in that regard; unfortunately, their patients must pay the excise tax. It seems to me that there is an imbalance in this area which I know the minister will want to correct.

Further to that, I raise the question of how one goes about establishing the legitimacy of a deduction under this heading. Many of these decisions come under the purview or decision-making powers of particular tax officials who must deal with a citizen making a claim for deduction. If the official is experienced, or if he has some insight into the problem, he will look kindly at the request for a deduction. But the handy-dandy guide put out by the Income Tax Department talks about allowances for the blind and people in wheelchairs. I suggest that that is a limited way of looking at it. A strict constructionist in the income tax department would construe that phrase as applying strictly to the blind and people in wheelchairs.

Surely a host of other people suffering from a handicap and who incur extra expenses should be allowed a deduction with regard to the equipment needed for their care. Unfortunately, at present they are subject to the tax. We are asking cripples to establish a case for justifying these deductions. In other words, how far are you to go in asking a cripple to prove that he is a cripple? Any dossier compiled about him is likely to haunt him later in life.

Remember how Senator Eagleson of the United States was haunted later in life because at one time he had taken psychiatric treatment! Surely we need more compassion; we need to give specific instructions to departmental officials to be more compassionate. I am making the case that it is time to inject more heart into our income tax measures as well as into the administration of the Income Tax Act and more heart into the implementation of those measures in order to ameliorate the lot of those unfortunate enough to suffer a handicap. Doctors know who those people are. I suggest that we should not collect revenue in this way from those suffering; we should not impose a tax on misfortune.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. If the minister speaks at this time, even if only to answer a question, he will close the debate. We are not in committee of the whole.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the House agree that I should now recognize the minister?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members of the House for the contributions they have made in the difficult area of the Excise Tax Act, and I shall take the opportunity to respond to the points raised last night by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) and also to some of the several points raised today.

If I may deal with the comments of the hon. member for Edmonton West, he made an observation with regard to the minimum federal limits for the collection of excise tax. The same point was made this morning by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker) to do with the $3,000 limit. It was suggested that because of inflation and the passage of time, that level should be raised. I think I should emphasize that the purpose of that level primarily is to assist small business. It was based on the calculation on the part of the Department of National Revenue as to the least amount it was worth while collecting in revenue. Having said that, I acknowledge at the same time that if the collection of small sums is hardly worth while for the Department of National Revenue, it is, equally, an imposition for small businessmen, and in that sense I think the comment made by the hon. gentlemen was an important one. This is a matter falling within the administrative duties of my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue (Miss Bégin). I can say to the House that the minister has been giving consideration to the currency or appropriateness of that particular limitation, that this matter is under consideration, and that the minister, when she is in a position to do so, I am sure will be prepared to comment.

The hon. member for Edmonton West referred to extensive correspondence which has flowed between himself, myself and others with regard to a particular kind of insulating panel. In one case, as I recall, the panel was made out of compressed straw. The hon. member made the point that since the panel had insulating qualities, it should be treated as insulating material under the Excise Tax Act and, therefore, tax free. To some degree the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) raised the same point when he talked about thermal window panes. Both hon. members in their comments put their finger on the difficult borderline of what is essentially a building material and what is essentially a material used for insulating purposes. The position which has been taken in the law is one that is directed purely to insulation such as bats to be fitted into the walls or ceilings of a house. Obviously, these would be tax free.

Others which have a primary building quality to them, or at least in addition to the quality of insulation—and of course every piece of material has to a degree the quality of insulation—also have a structural quality, would be treated as building materials and therefore taxable. In particular cases there will have to be an administrative determination as to what is primarily insulation and what is primarily structural material. This has been a difficult area to define under the Excise Tax Act.

The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) raised a number of questions, one on this bill and one in more general terms with respect to correspondence received by the hon. member for Regina Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin). The first question raised by the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge was on automobile air conditioners. If a car with the windows down on a hot day has more drag than if the windows are up, and therefore the air conditioning is on, is it not counter productive in an energy conservation sense? The response that would be furnished by the energy conservation branch of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, I believe, would be that the argument might be valid at highway speeds, although even at highway speeds the standard flow-through mechanism would have a cooling effect in the car. At less than highway speeds we do not have the same drag problem, and in that sense it is obviously felt by energy conservers that the air conditioner does not have that much advantage for energy conservation.

With regard to the correspondence between the Canadian Council of Rehabilitation Workshops and the Minister of National Revenue, several basic questions arise. First, one of the principles under the Excise Tax Act has been that a manufacturer, for example a manufacturer in a rehabilitation workshop, can become a licensed manufacturer under the Excise Tax Act and in that sense will be exempt from the payment of sales tax on materials that he uses in manufacturing, but in turn would have to collect sales tax when he sells to a subsequent purchaser. The problem, if I understand it, raised in the correspondence arose in a situation where you have rehabilitation workshops which repair articles of furniture, equipment, or other articles. The position taken with regard to repairing artisans is that in providing a service of that kind they are not generally exempt from excise tax under the statute and they are treated as other people in that they have to pay sales tax.

On the question of the certification of institutions, this is obviously a problem of the practical application of some criteria. I should indicate to the House that the decision in this case is made by the Department of National Health and Welfare which, for the purpose of these exemptions, certifies a particular institution. The issue that was raised was whether, in addition to physical disability as one of the causes of an institution being exempted from tax, that provision should also be extended to institutions which provide assistance or opportunities to those who are socially disadvantaged, such as released inmates of penal institutions, rehabilitated addicts, or persons recovering from alcoholic addiction. This is obviously a difficult decision, but the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) has to determine, in accordance with criteria, what is appropriate. I would be quite happy if the organization would like to address comments to my colleague on these criteria, and naturally I will accept the minister's judgment on this point.

The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) gave us an interesting approach to the taxation system. He has put himself out as a long time opponent of the income tax system. Apparently he is also an opponent of the excise tax system. His prescription is that the government should return back to the time prior to the 1914-18 war. I think that a lot of us in some respects would be delighted to have the community as a whole return to that distant era.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I would say idyllic.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I see the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is here, and I think of my own antecedents in Winnipeg, for example. Indeed, in some cases the time prior to 1914 might have been idyllic. On the other hand, social conditions in which many people lived at that time were far from being so.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You will provoke Stanley to a speech.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Fortunately I am closing the debate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There is still the committee of the whole.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would have to say that, much as one might be sympathetic to the vision to the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra about an older and in some sense simpler era, the intervention of the government on the whole has been for human betterment in Canada, so I suppose I would have to disagree with him on that fundamental principle.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Things were simpler in the Garden of Eden.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would defer to the hon. gentleman's obvious experience in that regard.

Mr. Fairweather: There was no mayonnaise then.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): With regard to the more basic proposition as to whether the sales tax should be abolished altogether and replaced by other taxes in the community, it was estimated in connection with the Carter commission and, I believe, in subsequent discussions, that to replace the current revenue for the government from the sales tax would require something like a 25 per cent increase in personal income tax, or conversely a 65 per cent increase in corporate income tax. In that sense one would have to consider whether this is really desirable. It would become an outward and evident tax, but also become a very heavy one for individuals to bear, particularly those in certain income categories.

One of the advantages of the sales tax is that the person who uses an item and bears the tax in some cases is in a position to pass it on, and to that extent it is related to the use of a foreign article rather than imposing the cost on the community as a whole.

The hon. member for Okanagan Boundary raised the question of solar heat and asked about the tax on wood stoves. I think there is an argument not just for abolition of the tax on wood stoves but also on other kinds of heating devices which might burn vegetable material. I think his observation in this regard is in the form of a representation which I am prepared to discuss with my colleague with regard to the appropriateness of stimulating a greater use of those energy materials in addition to solar heat and wind generated energy.

Finally, before I deal with the extensive presentation of the hon. member for York-Simcoe with regard to automobiles, I wish to deal with the matter raised by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) with regard to wheelchairs. I am advised that on wheelchairs as such there is no tax, but there may indeed be a problem of definition. Perhaps the hon. member and I could talk about the particular item to which he was referring because it may well be that it is not classified under this particular area, in which case I would be glad to be given further information and to consider it. On wheelchairs as such I acknowledge the thrust of the hon. gentleman's argument that this is not the kind of assistance to a handicapped person which should be subject to extra taxation.

With regard to the argument about the changes in energy conservation measures, there was indeed a parallel between the thinking of the hon. member for York-Simcoe and that of the government on the use of automobile fuel and the possible changes in the taxation system to try to encourage a more efficient use. I have to go back again to the purpose of the change in midsummer as a result of the May 25 budget. The budget proposals really did have the effect of compelling two of the major manufacturers in Canada to come forward and indicate that they were not on the timetable required to handle the weight tax, that they were not trying to solve the energy conservation problem by reducing weights, but that they had a more efficacious method of doing so, and therefore they thought that they should be left with some room within the next year to try to find some other means. One of the major Canadian manufacturers has indeed gone the lower weight route, and that manufacturer will have had the benefit of the lower tax rate.

Others in the group have not, but they are trying to arrive at the same end by different means, and it was on that basis that it can be said that the May 25 budget was effective in putting the pressure on to encourage a greater effort on the part of the automobile industry to come up with a proposal of alternative means of saving energy in automobile locomotion which the government can accept, and therefore by that means we have been effective in stimulating the industry to bring about a faster timetable than would have been the case with an alternative proposition. I just emphasize again that there is a quality of probation in these particular changes and, as I indicated to the industry, we will be prepared to hold off for a year. Unless there can be satisfactory evidence that we are indeed moving to a good alternative formula, then the weight tax will be back again in a form like that in which it was initially introduced.

It is not a question of the government not being able to make up its mind. The government has made up its mind on the weight tax. The weight tax has really compelled the other two firms to come to terms with the measures they propose to take in order to reduce energy consumption.

I think that deals with the main principles of many of the points which have been raised, but there may be additional questions, particularly when the officials get down to the floor, so I will close by thanking hon. members for their contribution and by indicating that I am prepared to entertain further questions as we go through the bill clause by clause.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Ethier in the chair.

Clauses 1 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 6 carry?

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, you are moving with great haste.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

On clause 6.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, at some point in our clause by clause study I would like the minister to give us the benefit of some direct answers on points raised not only by myself but also by some of my colleagues. I would be interested to know what net government revenue the government anticipates might have been raised under its first weight tax proposal on automobiles and what is the estimated revenue under the proposal now before us.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I hope to be able to get that in just a moment.

Mr. Stevens: While the minister's officials are compiling that, I wonder if they would also give us the figure for what revenue they anticipate from the excise tax on automobile air conditioners, the other revenue figure I referred to, and if they are still looking that up, perhaps I can put a third question to the minister.

Would the minister be good enough to expand on his remarks of yesterday concerning the government's thinking as to what approach it might take to try to ensure that the production of more efficient automobiles will be encouraged as far as the excise tax system is concerned, bearing in mind the various approaches which can be taken, the weight test, efficiency tests, and the miles per gallon type of test?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): On the latter part of the question, there is almost no tax on lighter automobiles, so there is hardly any to take off under the circumstances.

With regard to automobile air conditioners, the estimated revenue is $7 million.

Mr. Stevens: When the minister says that there is practically no tax on lighter automobiles, I wonder if he could explain that more fully. Does he mean that there is no excise tax? To what extent is there a federal tax on what can be regarded as a comparatively low priced, light weight or small vehicle?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): My reference, of course, was to the weight tax. There is a general excise tax of 12 per cent. I think I would have to respond by saying that as opposed to dropping that further with regard to automobiles, if one is to have an excise tax, an automobile is not an unreasonable commodity on which to levy it as opposed to basic clothing or food. That is a reasonable source of tax. The rate is 12 per cent. I think 850,000 units were sold in Canada last year, and that is obviously a significant source of revenue. We have adopted the approach, rather, of imposing the requirement of a further weight tax rather than taking it off.

Mr. Stevens: I would like to explore with the minister the rationale behind that. As I said in my remarks at second reading, it appears to me that it would be much more of an incentive to reduce or eliminate the 12 per cent tax on some types of vehicles which are regarded as being truly energy efficient as opposed to adding a tax at the upper level on cars which are, in the mind of the government, either too heavy, too expensive, or too inefficient as far as energy consumption is concerned. I am not clear why the incentives should not be given to lower the 12 per cent tax as opposed to adding on a tax as contemplated by the government.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, it is the answer I have just given. It has a cost in terms of the lost revenue. It seems reasonable to recover that revenue.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister why he indicated yesterday that essentially it was not revenue production they were seeking but energy conservation. Do the two things not go hand in hand? If it is energy conservation they are seeking, surely by lowering the 12 per cent excise tax on the small vehicle they are getting exactly what they want, energy conservation. If it is not revenue production they are looking for, why do they not do this in a meaningful way?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman is confusing two things. The comment I made was with regard to the additional taxation that would be raised by the weight tax. In basic terms what I have just referred to in revenue loss is a general excise tax that is available. If we are successful in our objectives and people move to lighter cars, then there will still be a substantial amount to be collected by the 12 per cent excise tax on automobiles. To put it this way: to remove all or part of that would be to give up a substantial revenue source which would have to be paid in another way. The amount I was referring to was the additional revenue to be gained from that weight tax. If we were successful in bringing everybody down to more efficient cars we would be delighted. The revenue loss involved in the hon. member's suggestion could be substantial, and we feel it would have to be borne by taxpayers in some other way.

Mr. Stevens: Following on the minister's comments, instead of telling us there were, I think, 850,000 cars purchased in Canada, I wonder if he could give us an estimate of what revenue accrues to the federal government as a result of the 12 per cent tax on automobiles. Could he give an estimate of how much actually accrues with respect to automobiles that up until now by their weight standard were regarded as light vehicles?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Not a detailed figure. One could come up with an approximation but we do not have an actual figure on how the sales tax breaks down between lighter or heavier cars. On the weight tax, I think the estimated tax structure to be achieved would be between $5 million and $10 million. The over-all recovery on all automobiles is something which would require a little preparation.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, when the minister says that the weight tax revenue would be somewhere between $5 million and $10 million is he referring to the original May 25 budgetary proposal or the provisions in Bill C-21?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That is the increase. The actual revenue now is $15 million.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister for some clarification in regard to air conditioners. A constituent of mine is an importer of air conditioners for automobiles, trucks, and industrial equipment. He has had a great deal of trouble with the department about the excise tax. It was my clear understanding that the tax on air conditioners does not apply to motor vehicles over 16,000 pounds gross weight—to hearses, ambulances, and vehicles over 12 passenger carrying capacity, off-highway vehicles, and agricultural equipment. Would the minister confirm that air conditioners installed in those vehicles do not require payment of the $100 excise tax?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Chairman, this constituent informs me that the department says because he does not hold a sales tax licence he has to pay this tax upon importation of the product. Mack Truck, International Harvester, and the Ford Motor Company import the same item from the same company and they do not pay tax. In other words, they tell him that the importer is the end user and therefore must pay the tax. I wonder if the minister could clarify that.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): As I understand the situation, Mr. Chairman, if he were a licensed dealer he would be exempt from payment of the tax. Where he is an unlicensed dealer, or a licensed manufacturer not having an excise tax licence, if he sells a vehicle without an air conditioner, under exempt conditions he may then claim a refund of the excise tax which he has paid.

Mr. Kempling: That is pretty cumbersome. This man is a national distributor of air conditioning units and has dealers all across the country. He brings these in for heavy duty trucks and for agricultural and off-highway vehicles and so on, by the trailer load. It seems to me one of these air conditioners could not be installed on an automobile without putting a big evaporator on the roof. This man has a tremendous amount of money tied up. He distributes across the country, he has to charge his area dealer and then the dealer has to get a certificate from the end user, and the process works all the way back. That could take months. Surely it should be evident to anyone that an air conditioner the size we are talking about could not be used on an automobile. The drive mechanism would not even suit an automobile engine. This seems to me a cumbersome way to go about it, and it ties up funds unnecessarily. Could the minister suggest a solution?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I want to ask myself why this man has not applied for a licence to become a licensed dealer. If his business is so considerable, one would have thought this the logical step. Of course I cannot comment on the situation, but that seems the obvious route for him.

Mr. Kempling: The difficulty is that he has not been able to get clarification on this from people in the Department of Revenue at Hamilton. Right now I believe he has several thousands of dollars tied up in it. He told me that they were even threatening him on the telephone with going back on some shipments he had received previously and charging back taxes. Does he have to do a certain percentage of his business at the wholesale level in order to get a licence?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Fifty per cent.

Mr. Kempling: If it is less than 50 per cent, what does he do?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): He is not then eligible for a wholesaler's licence.

Mr. Kempling: Holy mackerel! If he does $10 million worth of business but does not do $5 million of it wholesale, he would still have to go this route? That is about the volume he is doing, I believe. He would have to pay all the excise tax and probably seven, eight or ten months later get his funds back. Surely to goodness there is another way than that to identify it.

● (1530)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Just to correct the hon. member, Mr. Chairman, the average refund is within 30 days.

Mr. Kempling: Just to correct the minister, I will lay him what I have in my pocket against what he has in his that it is not 30 days. I will bring a lot of people who will show it is not 30 days. I know personally.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. member is very confident, Mr. Chairman, but I intend to rely on National Revenue.

Mr. Kempling: How much do you have in your pocket?

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Chairman, I want to follow up the line of questioning that my colleague from York-Simcoe was taking. That is in connection with the energy saving versus the revenue producing aspects of the tax on the excess weight of cars. Perhaps I can start by asking the minister if the government has considered that lighter cars might last a shorter period of time? Although they burn less gasoline, they might in the end use more energy because of the energy and other resources used in the production of the larger number of lighter cars that would obviously be required.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, I was in conversation with my official. Will the hon. member repeat the last sentence?

Mr. Clarke: I am not sure if I can remember the last sentence, Mr. Chairman. I think the last part was that a greater use of energy and resources would be required to produce a larger number of lighter cars that might be required, as the heavier car would last a longer time, even though it would burn more gas during that period of time.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, 1,000 pounds, for example, would save about 15 per cent of the energy need to make a car and its components. It seems to me there is not a substantial difference indicated in the hon. member's objection. Perhaps I do not follow his reasoning very well.

Mr. Clarke: I will look at the revenue side first then, Mr. Chairman. If the object of this tax is to raise more revenue rather than to conserve energy, it will probably do that in that more lighter cars will likely have to be produced and sold and, therefore, a greater tax incidence would have to occur than if heavier cars were produced which would be longer lasting. That would indicate there would be a desired effect if revenue is the desired result.

If we want to save energy, the minister's point is that a heavier car would burn more gasoline. I conceded that when making my remarks on second reading. However, I ask whether the government has done any studies to indicate the relative position of the extra energy used by a heavier car compared to the extra energy and resources that would be needed to produce the larger number of lighter cars which, presumably, do not last as long as heavier cars?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Is that true?

Mr. Clarke: The comparison would be interesting. Since the government has the facilities, I wonder whether a study such as that has been made.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Just to make it clear, Mr. Chairman, when we are talking about revenue not being the objective we are talking about the weight tax. The obvious objective is to get down the weight of automobiles. Just to be clear, the obvious goal in revenue terms is zero. Of course there is a general sales tax beneath that on all automobiles. I would require to be convinced that the hon. member's basic proposition is accurate. I am not sure that heavy means long life, particularly in eastern Canada where, among other things, salt is a serious fact of life.

Mr. Clarke: I am not sure of that either. That is why I asked the question whether the government had done any research in that vein. I will presume it has not.

I would like now to ask about a slightly different topic, the tax on air conditioners. Why did the government find it necessary, when the minister announced on May 25 the $100 tax on air conditioning systems for automobiles, to make that retroactive? In other words, why wasn't the sanctity of a contract that had been entered into a month or more before May 25 respected, and those people allowed to have the transaction completed without the interference of the government?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, it has been the general practice that, where a change of this kind has occurred, it should be effective as of budget night. One can think of a range of possible options sooner or later from the date of budget night, but the final conclusion, from experience over time, is that from an administrative standpoint and probably fairness standpoint this is the most reasonable way to handle it. One of the difficulties, of course, is that it would give a distinct advantage to those manufacturers who have a substantial inventory on hand as of budget night, for example.

Mr. Clarke: That explanation may be all right for those who were contemplating a purchase, but for those who had purchased in good faith under an existing contract there is nothing in budget history to imply that existing contracts should not be honoured. However, the minister has given me an answer, and I thank him for that.

It is my understanding that the minister in his closing remarks on second reading made some reference to my earlier remarks which he did not seem to understand. They concerned the imposition of a sales tax and the personal income tax.

I am not sure where I saw the term used, but in the minister's budget remarks he referred to the sales or consumption tax. I cannot find that at the moment. If it were necessary, I am sure I could dig it up. In any event the reference was made to a consumption or sales tax, implying that the government sees them as being the same.

The purpose of my remarks is not to say that all taxes are bad. I am simply remarking that the government seems to have a great inconsistency in that it uses this kind of a hidden tax, the personal income tax, and many other kinds of taxes. However, each kind of tax comes from the same taxpayer. Each kind of tax requires a substantial bureaucracy here in Ottawa to enforce and collect it. Each kind of tax requires a similar bureaucracy in the private sector. In fact every business is required to make the calculation, whether it be a corporate income tax, personal income tax of the individual proprietors, or sales tax returns for the excise tax. All of these taxes go on and on.

The thrust of my remarks was that the government should spend more time exploring ways to ease the burden on the taxpayer so that he is better able to judge where he is being taxed, where the burden of tax lies in his daily life, and to simplify the burden from the point of view of reducing the bureaucracy required on the part of the government, and thereby reducing the size of the bureaucracy that is required in business.

The government seems to forget, in all its dealings in the various tax fields, that there is ultimately only one source of tax revenue, and that is the ordinary taxpayer. The taxpayer deserves far more consideration from this government than he is getting. I am thinking of the proliferation of the demands made upon him and the disregard shown for the individual, whether he be a labourer, a salaried person or a businessman. That was the essence of my criticism of the tax systems. It is not that I criticize them per se. Of course the government needs its revenue. But in my view the government ought to give greater consideration to the source of this revenue, to the nature of its revenue base.

Mr. Stevens: Perhaps I could return to the line of questioning I was putting to the minister. It turned on the amount of revenue the government expects to get from the new taxes which are before us. As I understand it, the minister told us there would be some $7 million on account of the tax on air conditioners, and between $5 million and $10 million on account of the automobile weight tax. This represents a combined increase of some $12 million to $17 million flowing into the treasury.

Bearing in mind the minister's candid statement that the purpose of the new tax was not to raise revenue but rather to encourage Canadians to demand, and the auto industry to produce, lighter and more energy efficient cars, my question is this: why would the minister not consider, in addition to imposing this new tax, reducing taxation on lighter cars by a like amount? He tells us he expects to get between $5 million and $10 million in extra taxes. Would he not think it appropriate to lower taxes on the lighter cars, presumably on the more energy-efficient cars to which he referred, by a comparable amount?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): As I indicated earlier, a basic amount flows into revenues from existing automobile taxation. I suppose there might be a marginal rate change but I am not certain that this would be practical from an administrative standpoint. We have to recognize with regard to the excise tax generally that automobiles are a source of revenue, and we expect they will continue to be so.

[Mr. Clarke.]

Mr. Stevens: Would the minister at least go thus far: would he, between now and the next budget, give consideration to lowering the tax on the more efficient cars within the parameters of the revenue to which reference has been made?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Some of the conservationists might take exception to that and argue that by making a further tax cut I would be encouraging the acquisition of cars, but I will look into that suggestion.

Mr. Stevens: I am pleased to get that assurance from the hon. gentleman. If he is belaboured by the conservationists I hope he will remind them that the light, energy efficient car to which I am referring is very greatly needed by most Canadians for commuting to work and for other necessary aspects of their livelihood. In short, it is an essential in spite of what some conservationists might attempt to tell the minister.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 7.

Mr. Stevens: Clause 7 includes the energy conservation equipment item. Can the minister tell us whether any studies have been carried out to show how practical are some of these energy conservation devices to which the clause refers? We know, for example, about the possibilities of solar energy generation, wind generators and so on. Surely the department, or a related agency, must have carried out studies as to how practical it is to encourage people to go in for these alternative ways of heating. If so, what has been the result of such a study?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): There have obviously been a variety of advances in this field. The insulation materials are all of longstanding application and the effectiveness of the existing materials has been well proven. Heat pumps, for example, do not represent a particularly esoteric technology. On the other hand, there is a rapidly expanding field of technology related to the use of solar energy. The wind generator has been known for a long time, of course, even if really effective means of exploiting that source of power has not been discovered. But to the extent that there is new technology involved here, or the improvement of existing technology, the goal is to encourage the development of better and more efficient devices, and we think it worth while to pursue this course.

The basic question the hon. member raises is, of course, an important one. There are long steps yet to be taken in technology, and this is why we are bound to move cautiously when conservationists tell us that we should not be using fossil or nuclear fuels. We think more favourable tax terms would assist in the technological development which is necessary.

Mr. Stevens: I do not think anyone would disagree with the minister when he says people who go in for these less conventional energy sources should be encouraged. I was wondering, though, whether he is giving any consideration to dealing with one of the basic problems, that is, energy storage. Has he, for instance, made any overtures to the power companies in the various provinces to see whether they would agree to buy power which might be generated by the wind or by solar rays? As I understand it, one direct approach would be an arrangement under which power generated by a wind generator could be fed into the system of a power company and drawn back as needed over subsequent days or months. This would be a very practical approach if it could be worked out. At the present time expensive storage battery facilities are required whenever privately generated power needs to be held for future consumption.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would be glad to pass on the hon. member's comments to my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In preparing the tax bill the department did not have that kind of conservation in mind. It is an interesting thought.

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): I have one question for the minister. It arises from clause 7. Reference is made, on page eight, to thermal insulation materials designed exclusively for insulation purposes, storm doors and storm windows for buildings. Would thermopane used in construction or reconstruction fall into that category, or could you make it fall into that category?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I am advised it does fall into that category.

LOBBY REGISTRATION ACT

MEASURE TO GOVERN LOBBYISTS

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton) moved that Bill C-214, to register lobbyists, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He said: Mr. Speaker, lobbying has not been a subject of great concern to Canadians, in contrast to the attention given to it by legislatures, journalists, and political scientists in the United States. Because of the profound differences between our systems of government, I doubt that Canadian lobbyists will ever achieve the important and sometimes controversial status that they now have there. Nevertheless, the direction in which our parliamentary system should be evolving—toward a more open government with a more influential House of Commons—leads me to believe that we should begin now to establish a framework for the operation of lobbyists before any serious problems develop.

First, Mr. Speaker, what is a lobbyist? I think of a lobbyist as someone who seeks, by means of contact with persons of power or influence, to have a significant effect on executive or legislative actions to be taken by the government of Canada. Lobbyists may act directly for themselves, or on behalf of organizations which hire professionals to make their case. Lobbyists are, in short, special interest and pressure group publicists or their representatives.

Lobbying has had, especially in the United States, a pejorative connotation—and I think that is rather unfortunate—but it is an important and absolutely necessary part of democratic government. Lobbyists are able to provide legislators with feedback on the actual operation of government programs in the field. There is, as we all know, many a slip between bureaucratic theory, on the one hand, and field experience, on the other hand. The sooner governments and all of us find out about that, the better our programs might be understood.

Lobbyists also provide background information of a more general nature about action that is under consideration. We are all used to dealing with "pressure" from associations which are to be affected by legislation, but in fact much of this pressure is informed argument which is sometimes difficult to refute. It is also preferable on many occasions to deal with a carefully prepared presentation by a spokesman for a scattered interest group rather than to deal with the unorganized and incomplete ideas of a large number of individuals. Finally, I put it to you, Sir, that lobbyists are useful when we want to try out ideas, as we soon find out if they have any merit or whether those ideas are simply naive. All these functions performed by lobbyists are indispensable to the reflective as well as the responsive politician.

Naturally, pressure can take illegitimate and illegal forms and have unfortunate consequences, and these dangers bring me to suggest registration of lobbyists. There is, of course, the possibility of bribery, blackmail or other questionable practices. It is the hope that contacts, which must be made with the knowledge of anyone who cares to examine a register, would be less likely to have a shady dimension. There is an even greater danger that if pressure is carried on secretively or unobstrusively, all sides of a debate will not be heard and legitimate points of view or bodies of information will be excluded until a stage in the debate when decisions have been irrevocably taken. At the present time, Mr. Speaker, that seems to be when a bill has been introduced in the House of Commons.

Or there may simply be a suspicion that pressure behind the scenes is by that very fact illegitimate pressure, and the resulting policies might not obtain the support they merit because people feel that certain groups or types of groups have had an unhealthy impact. Then there is the other side of the coin. If we have that knowledge and know that all arguments have been equally heard, I think there would be a tendency for there to be a reconciliation of the diversity of groups which are affected by decisions that might be taken.

In short, the purpose of the bill is to ensure that lobbying, as much as possible, is conducted in the open so that people can see who is trying to influence what, and if necessary respond. Where lobbying is done with the knowledge of everyone concerned, there is a better chance that it will be done openly and that improper practices will have a smaller chance of survival or success. The process of decision making should become more educational and the results more acceptable.

My bill would take the first step toward publicizing lobbying activities in Canada, though I have to say at the outset, Mr. Speaker, that it is a small step indeed. It defines lobbying, to paraphrase, as the actions of any person or any group attempting to influence the course of either legislative or executive action. It establishes a register of lobbyists to be administered jointly by the Clerks of the two Chambers. Lobbyists must set down their names, the person or group on whose behalf they are acting, and the duration of any contact. This information must be supplied before any contacts are made, supplemented with any new information applicable and submitted afresh at the beginning of every year. I have included penalties for non-compliance of up to $5,000 per month and prohibition from lobbying for two years, to show that the register which is set forth in the bill is intended to be taken seriously.

I would not deny that this is little more than a beginning which leaves a good many questions unanswered, and many of these questions have been suggested by people writing to me from all across the country about the bill. A bill discussed in the United States House of Representatives on this subject last year ran to 39 pages, and this matter is already the subject of extensive legislation there.

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

If I might indicate some of the unanswered questions, I put them as examples and there are probably more. Do we want to monitor the type of lobbying activity as well as the existence of the activity? How do we classify officials of companies or organizations who come to Ottawa only briefly to meet officials or legislators? Does it matter who instigates discussions between lobbyists and officials? Should we consider contact with a minister's or member's staff as lobbying? When does assistance to our constituents become activity on behalf of, or in response to, a lobbyist?

The intention is that those whose principal function is to lobby on behalf of others be regulated, not those whose occupation is administrative or whatever, but who occasionally must defend their interest by contact with politicians or officials. This is not an easy distinction to make, and I would welcome the views of others on the proper bounds for restrictions, and would like to see serious consideration by a committee of this House of the whole question.

• (1600)

The question that will occur to many members may be, why should it be necessary to contemplate action when we have survived without it for over a century? As I suggested earlier, I believe we are moving in a number of ways, or at least we should be moving, toward more open government. This will create both opportunities and dangers. To date lobbyists have dealt principally through public service channels, and in theory at least these contacts have a minimum of danger because the interests and motivations of those concerned are clearly defined and established within an administrative framework. If legislators become more prominent in policy formation, I believe lobbying activity will increase and should be open, because in the political process motivations and interests are not so easily defined or traced.

I believe that the role of legislators will change for a variety of reasons. First, it appears to me that people have become increasingly demanding of their members of parliament, and they will perhaps become more demanding after they watch us on TV. They will, I believe, expect us to be more critical and more creative. I think too that members are increasingly equipped to meet this challenge and are intent on doing so.

Secondly, I believe that within the next few years, and it is my hope, we will have a freedom of information bill which will enable members of this Chamber to participate in the discussion of policy options prepared by the public service. Perhaps we will need a change of government before that degree of open policy debate is obtained, but it is coming, and the increased insight and opportunities we will have will invite contacts from those who now restrict themselves to permanent officials.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Do not be too subjective, I would suggest to hon. members.

Thirdly, and particularly if this party transfers to the other side of the Chamber, which would seem likely, our committees will be given the power and the staff to undertake investigative and creative functions on behalf of the House. Again, as the number of participants in the debate on national priorities increases, the presence of lobbyists will become more pervasive. I hope too that we can make private members' hour more conclusive and, if we do, the lobbyists will be after us to champion their views, or oppose someone else's.

Fourth, to be realistic about the results of any change in government which may take place there would be more pressure group activity, particularly because many policies which are non unchallengeable as part of the dominant mythology would be subject to review and debate on any policy, and any policy shift invites lobby contacts.

Finally, I hope lobbying is conducted more openly in the future because of a trend in respect of pressure groups which has already developed in our society. Some hon. members may have seen the text of a speech delivered June 6 by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), the former leader of our party. He said at that time:

> We are becoming a society of well-organized groups representing a particular interest or point of view. The number of groups organized to put on pressure have become legion. This is increasing the tension and distrust in our society; and it is increasing the difficulty of reaching a consensus as a basis for government in a country where consensus has always been difficult to achieve anyway. People not only see their own particular interest but have an organization to promote it. This has already led to a lot of governmental floundering and could well make government initiatives very difficult to take; and further increase the sense of frustration among citizens.
> These special interest organizations are more attractive to join and support than political parties because political parties are not designed to serve (although they sometimes do) particular interests. To get elected they have to appear at least to be serving the interest of the country generally, rather than some particular interest or cause. So to a growing number of Canadians, political parties seem to be less attractive in serving their cause then does that particular organization designed specifically to serve their cause.

He concluded in this way:

> This is leading to a hardening and strengthening of the pushing of particular interests and attitudes which emphasize division and conflict and a weakening of the only institutions we had which encouraged some regard for the common welfare and some recognition of the other fellow's point of view, especially national political parties.

It is a rather wise statement about what is happening in our society today.

Let me conclude by saying I hope the registration of all lobbying groups or individuals will illustrate to Canadians the intricacies of group accommodation and the need to pursue a consensus which is unlikely to fulfil all the aspirations of any particular group. I hope openness will encourage realistic expectations among our electors as well as continued aboveboard dealing between pressure groups and administrators and politicians.

Lobbyists also provide background information of a more general nature about action that is under consideration. We are used to dealing with pressure from associations, associations which are affected by legislation. I think that in the course of our dealings with this pressure the hon. member for Halifax spoke of, with the development of associations and groups within society, each of us as members of parliament feel there must be some response. When that activity, which we regard as legitimate in the course of interaction which must occur between the private and public sectors, reaches the proportions it has, then there is nothing wrong and nothing inhibiting in having those who would engage legitimately in that activity register their interests and their extent, and to keep that registration fresh with the Clerks of both Houses of this parliament.

It is in that spirit, a spirit that I hope this House will agree is in accordance with a movement toward openness in government, which at least from our point and I hope from the other side will be coming, that I ask this House to consider this bill. I ask the House to send it to committee at least for study. I said during the course of my speech that I did not regard it as the last word, by any means, but this is the first word in respect of a problem and concern of many people.

A jurist once said that not only must things be correct and proper, they must appear to be correct and proper. I think this bill will go a long way to helping not only the substance but the appearance of the substance in regard to a legitimate public activity.

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak on the bill presented by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). The subject of registering lobbyists is something that has long interested me. I am certain the hon. member will appreciate that I too have a bill on lobbying, Bill C-248, but it looks as though, according to the pecking order in getting bills before the House, that the hon. member is much more successful than I.

The explanatory note to my bill reads:

> The purpose of this bill is to require the identification of lobbyists, persons who, in the interest of others, seek to influence Senators or Members of the House of Commons to vote or use influence for, or against, a matter which may come before parliament. Nothing in the bill restricts lobbying, paid or otherwise, or in any way interferes with the right of the public to make representations to Members of the Senate and of the House of Commons. Similar legislation in effect in the United States requires that lobbyists register with the Clerk of the Legislature and secure an identification card from the said Clerk.

I note that the explanatory note to the hon. member's bill reads:

> This bill provides for the registration of lobbyists, and a declaration by them stating in whose interest they are working. It imposes a fine and disqualification from lobbying for those convicted of evading these provisions.

The two bills have much in common. I am sure hon. members appreciate that bills to do with lobbying have been dealt with by other jurisdictions, but that this subject has not been seriously dealt with in this country.

I presume the intention of this bill is to make the public aware and provide for public scrutiny of the individuals and organizations that hope to influence government policy and legislation. This would also allow the civil service, with whom many lobbyists deal, to know whom they were really talking to and why.

This proposal certainly has its merits. Lobbying can be defined as the deliberate organization and application of effort to influence public policy, generally for the benefit of some specific person or group. Consequently if this bill came into force, any person or persons attempting to affect some legislative change, extract some favour or influence policy, could be identified through public disclosure. This would also allow the public to gauge lobbyists, success by the subsequent rejection or acceptance of their proposals by the government.

However, the basis of this bill seems to be founded on the premise that interest groups and the government and civil service are in adversary roles. I am not at all convinced that this is the case. In a recent study concerning pressure groups and government, David Kwavnick discovered that there are many benefits to be had from the co-operation of interest groups and government officials. Certainly it is apparent that cabinet members frequently request information from organizations that fall under their jurisdictions. The meetings between the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) and the President of the Canadian Labour Congress are one such example. I think it is fair to say that Canadian politicians are willing to consult with specific interest groups. I might also add that this could be extended to the civil service. As Kwavnick points out, "the popular notion of government officials having continually to fend-off badgering, bullying, and bribing lobbyists is a long way from the truth."

Robert Presthus has said, regarding lobbyists, that the rise to prominence of standing committees has "made interest group directors more aware of members of parliament." However, Mr. Presthus contends, with some justification, that this awareness is diluted by lobbyists concern with cabinet members and senior civil servants. A statistical survey shows that only 15 per cent of lobbyists focussed their attention on members of Parliament, while 40 per cent concentrated on cabinet ministers and 26 per cent on the public service. Clearly backbenchers have low priority. Conversely, of federal and provincial members of parliament questioned, only 18 per cent placed any importance on lobbyists as representatives of community interest.

It is to this point, civil service interaction with lobbyists, that I would like to address my comments. According to Walter Lee, who could be described as the lobbyists' lobbyist, "policy is nearly always made by the civil service." Mr. Lee goes on to say that the only effective way to influence proposed legislation is to "anticipate it well in advance." He also contends that a lobbyist working through carefully selected contacts in the civil service can make his case.

The Toronto Star, of June 21, 1975, reported that business and industry are almost eager to help with and perhaps influence the planning and policies of the civil service. The Star goes on to say that it is with this sub-cabinet group that lobbyists have their greatest influence. Certainly a substantial percentage of lobbyists agree, according to Robert Presthus. Mr. Speaker, I might also point out that various organizations campaign for a president or chairman who is familiar with government routine and is known in government circles—for example, the case of Mr. Simon Reisman, ex-deputy minister of finance who has become a "consultant".

As we all know, many large associations and organizations have taken offices in Ottawa for the express purpose of lobbying. The biggest of these, the Canadian Manufacturers Association, the Canadian Labour Congress, and the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, present briefs and publicize their views before each federal budget. They also maintain year-round contacts with civil servants who may be working on legislation that effects them.

The survival of any organization that claims to represent its members effectively depends on its ability to persuade the power holders to recognize them as a legitimate bargaining agent. Interest groups have developed links with the existing political and social structure to ensure the protection of their interests and also to keep open direct lines to the government.

It is my contention that it is well and good to demand that lobbyists register. It would act as a point of clarification. However, what effect would it have on the civil service?

A fairly substantial school of opinion suggests that a great deal of lobbying is concentrated on senior civil servants. Would a member of an interest group have to register if he were to talk with a government official? What about the non-lobbying co-operation that now exists between such departments as Supply and Services and private enterprise? When a pencil supplier places a bid with Supply and Services would he have to register as a lobbyist? After all, any initiative he might show in encouraging Supply and Services to award him the contract could be interpreted as lobbying.

I received a letter from the executive director of the Canadian Trucking Association with regard to this particular issue. The letter, dated November 7, 1974, was addressed to me, signed by A. K. Maclaren as executive director, and originated, according to the letterhead, apparently from 130 Albert Street, Suite 300, Ottawa. He allowed that to alleviate some concerns and to satisfy curiosity it might not be a bad idea to require people who wished to make representations to government to register. However, he also supposed that 95 per cent of all representations were made off Parliament Hill. He questioned the efficacy of restricting lobbying controls only to Parliament Hill, and wondered if a chat between a constituent and his member of parliament that touched on some current legislative matter could be construed as lobbying.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I think that my hon. colleague has brought an important issue to our attention. Certainly the public has the right to know who is working behind the scenes, for whom he may be working, why he is doing so and, perhaps most important, for how much. In many cases members of this House would benefit from this information as well as the people of Canada. Free and easy access to this type of information would also mean that any questionable activity would quickly come to light, and consequently it is likely it would cease.

Despite the fine efforts of the hon. member to control and publicize this practice, I must state that there are many questions that remain untouched. How will registering affect the interaction of civil servants and lobbyists? And how could this interaction be monitored, if it were theoretically controlled? I might add, Mr. Speaker, that while I have used the term "civil servant" freely here today, I appreciate that not all officials are subject to lobbyist pressure, and I have not intended to impugn the characters of our civil servants in any way.

I must commend the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, but I must also call for further study of this complicated and complex issue.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member who has just taken his seat, I should like to see this bill or its subject matter referred to a committee, so that this whole question can be aired and studied in depth. I believe that one way to present the idea I want to place before the House is to tell a story about something which happened in this place so long ago that only one other member of this House was here at the time, and he is enjoying the sun in the Caribbean. Therefore I am not talking about anybody who is here today.

● (1620)

There was a certain government bill which had been presented and which I happened to favour, but which drew the opposition of the life insurance companies of this country. The bill got second reading—after all the government had a good majority and it saw to it that the bill was given second reading—and went to a standing committee. By the time the bill got to that committee we found ourselves faced with a powerful lobby from the insurance companies of Canada. They saw all of us who were members of the committee in our offices, and they made representations to the committee.

My memory of the experience is that of one of the most vigorous lobbies I have known. We had a tough time in the committee. After all, the pressure had been put on, and for a while it looked as if the government bill might actually be defeated in the standing committee. There were two or three members on the government side who had not been attending the committee who were rounded up by a Liberal who had some progressive ideas, and when the vote came, we won. The bill passed in the committee; we defeated the lobby.

The session went on but the bill was never called for third reading. I went to one of my friends in the Liberal cabinet of that day and asked him, "What happened? We defeated the lobby, we passed the bill. How come it has not been brought back for third reading?" He said, "Stanley, you must realize that one of those insurance fellows, one of the men at the top, got to the right cabinet minister". It was not even the minister in whose name the bill was before us but the "right cabinet minister", and that ended that.

If the point of that story is not obvious, I suppose I can spell it out. The lobbying that is effective, or that counts around this place, is not the lobbying of individual members of the House of Commons but the lobbying of the government itself, the lobbying of cabinet ministers.

I agree with the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) that this matter should be studied. I join him in congratulating the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) for bringing it before us.

I note that in his opening remarks the sponsor made a point which occurred to me, namely, that our situation is quite different from the situation in Washington. There the effects of lobbying on individual Congressmen can have much greater results than the lobbying of individuals here because they have more control of the purse strings than we do. Therefore I say that this question of registering lobbyists may not have as important a bearing here as it has in Washington. It may not be the most important cog in the regime that my friend would like to see established.

I see this as a piece of legislation that goes along with legislation respecting the freedom of information and legislation respecting conflict of interest, and I say to my friend, and perhaps he would even agree with me, that those other two things are more important than the registration of lobbyists.

Reference has just been made to the Canadian Labour Congress, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Public Service Alliance of Canada, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, and so on. They all have permanent offices here, and the persons who are officers of those bodies, or who are employed by them, lobby. Are they lobbyists within the meaning of this bill? They would say they are not paid for lobbying, they are paid to do the work of their organizations. But, like my friend who has just spoken, I see nothing wrong with those organizations, particularly the ones I named, because they are out in the open making their case.

What concerns me is the kind of lobbying that goes on in ministers' offices behind closed doors. I think that, important as it is to deal with this question of lobbying, completely open government—to use my friend's phrase—is necessary, and in order to achieve that we must have freedom of information which goes all the way—and I do not see any sign of it yet—and we must also have a clearer position with respect to conflict of interest. We have to know what are the financial interests of cabinet ministers, senators, members of parliament, and senior public servants, and if we had better legislation in those areas we would move closer to an open kind of government and the honest decisions that my friend wants.

I hope that the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton does not feel that I am damning his bill with faint praise. I think it is an important subject which should be thoroughly studied, but what I am most grateful for is the opportunity we are given to insist on the importance of these other things as well, namely, freedom of information and clear legislation with respect to conflict of interest. Having said these things, and having given them what I think is their relative importance, I would like to see either this bill or its subject matter referred to a committee so that this important issue can be thoroughly studied.

Lobbying

Mrs. Simma Holt (Vancouver Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) on his very important bill and his impressive arguments. Personally I think it is a most interesting bill, but I wonder if it is possible ever to get consensus on what is a lobbyist. As the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) asked, are these various organizations from labour and manufacturers' associations, to the million people espousing the right to live, lobbyists? And should they all be registered? I am indeed extremely ambivalent about lobbyists because I believe that some are sincere and concerned and do not even require registration, while those who are paid lobbyists often are not sincere in what they are doing; they simply want to make their money and run to the next assignment.

I would have many questions to ask if this bill went to committee. I believe that good private members' bills should not be talked out, yet here I am talking about this bill and I have some important things I want to say with regard to the reference of the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore to the public service. I am sure that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has seen, in his long experience, the virtues and dangers of lobbyists in our society. It is said that pressure groups are essential to good government. I fear, however, the pressure point that is most often used is key senior people in the public service—a point illustrated by the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore when he said that 26 per cent of the lobbying is on the public service. I suspect that the figure is much higher, and that is why I did want to speak on this subject today. I believe that the most dangerous pressure of special interest groups may be on senior public servants who themselves want to run this country. We have ample evidence of this in my area certainly.

It is with great fear that I see what is happening to this country. There are senior public servants who resent interference from the elected representatives. At times I feel that possibly a few senior key civil servants may well be in collusion with the lobbyists. They are certainly out to control the country through their own offices. They want the elected representatives to take the blame, the flak. They do not want to take the responsibility for actions in the public arena. We are taking the blame for many things that are created by key civil servants who, I am sure, have been influenced by back room lobbying. We will not ever get those people to register.

• (1630)

I think of Bill C-58. We saw Reader's Digest out in the open, but we did not see that great multinational corporation which is now producing an American edition of Maclean's. However, we know its influence was in the back rooms of senior civil servants, and as a result a terrible bill was imposed on the Canadian people. I know some of my colleagues disagree, but all that bill achieved was exactly what Maclean-Hunter intended. Time was driven out of Canada and is now making more money outside Canada from Canadians—three times more, I am told—than the largest amount it made in its 30 previous years inside Canada. These are the kinds of lobbyists we will not ever get to register. They are in the back rooms.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Yes, it is the government now in power which will take the flack for what the lobbyists like Maclean-Hunter did in the back rooms. It will always be the government in power that takes the blame. These key public service people—malcontents, power seekers, people open to inducements, will manipulate cabinet ministers, of whatever party, because they know what they are doing, and they do not have any responsibility to the public. They do what they do without being identified; they do it anonymously; and their mouthpiece becomes the cabinet minister. To me this is a personal embarrassment. Ministers are the people whom I feel are the most vulnerable when lobbyists join the support of their executive staffs. We—the elected representatives—then take the blame for what is done as a result. I consider those groups a menace, and their deeds are the signpost to the end of the road for democractic government, regardless of party. Even now there are some who quite openly say that we will not be here four years or eight years from now, but they are here forever.

I must stress that I do not want to offend all civil servants. I am impressed with most public servants. I think most are loyal and maintain their oath, but the malcontents, power seekers, and those who leave themselves open to inducements are the ones I am discussing here. I cannot understand why some of these things are happening. I cannot blame my own ministers, with whom I disagree on some issues. The Northland Navigation fiasco on the West Coast—the tragedy created almost as though by malice aforethought—is one case. What is happening with the CRTC and with cable companies which are not happy with the excessive incomes they are making now is another.

The cable companies want pay television so that they can get an extra $1.5 billion a year. They are manipulating the CRTC so that they can get converters into every home in the country. The situation in Vancouver is a case in point. The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen), the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) and myself went before the CRTC and fought this. The cable companies deliberately spread the word that we were racists, which is absolutely ridiculous. We fought the plan to take all the American network stations off the dial.

It is obvious to us now that the CRTC and the cable companies want them off so that people will be forced to buy converters. This way they will be able to get pay television into every home, and we will then have to pay for the programs we now get free. This is happening right now. We fought the CRTC and the cable group. They were lobbyists when they first tried to take American network stations off in January last year. We fought them when they took FM off without consultation with those who represented the people in the area. It was forced back on when the Liberal caucus from B.C. went to the cabinet and raised a protest, along with the protest of our greatest lobby, our constituents. We protested so loudly that the FM decision was reversed.

When I talk about our French network stations I am not being racist. I am part of a minority group which knows about racism and the realities of racism. I am not talking about racism. I am talking about economics and realities. The last report of the bureau of measurement indicated that the listening audience to the French network at Vancouver is 400 at prime time, and 100 most of the day; it could be less, but that is the lowest measure possible.

The only time the French network has an audience of any size—1,300—is late at night, at about eleven o'clock, when the pornographic movies come on. The cable companies and the CRTC now plan to take channel 4 off the dial. Channel 4 is the most popular station out of Seattle. They want to substitute for channel 4 the French network station for the sake of 400 viewers. Those 400 viewers could get converters, but it is not profitable to sell pay-TV to only 400. They want the whole population of half a million in Vancouver to have converters so that they can charge for pay television. This is the kind of lobbying and manipulation within the public service that terrifies me.

An incident occurred in Burnaby, B.C., yesterday. Burnaby borders on my constituency. Perhaps hon. members on both sides of this House could learn something from the incident. A fire chief was selected through a proper competition. The deputies had the right to apply, and I expect that they did enter the competion. The best fire chief was chosen from outside the department. He was chosen by the elected representatives.

The deputies in the fire department immediately sent this man to Coventry. They would not co-operate, and their subordinates joined the fight against the new chief. Finally the mayor, Tom Constable, who is a trade union leader and, like myself, concerned about justice for the rank and file—he is a concerned person, and I think a member of the New Democratic Party—fired two deputies yesterday after a long and bitter struggle. Two more are to be fired. This action took place after this long and bitter struggle, after the fire chief was hired by the elected representatives and after the staff members refused to work. I suggest that it is time that these inside lobbies and the people who are manipulating hon. members on both sides of the House go the same way when we have any sign they are disloyal. If they are not working in the best interests of Canada but working for pressure groups with vested interests, we should start cleaning them out.

There has been talk here about blacklists. I do not care about blacklists. I want to talk about some people who came from Simon Fraser University. As a reporter, I knew them, and they were a meance to the university. They did not allow students free access to jobs or to classrooms. Some students lost part or all of their year of study. Yet these people were hired on the federal public service. I wonder why. Few of them I knew were capable of loyalty to the Canadian people. They were not loyal to their colleagues. I hope someone knows they are in the public service, and I hope that they were released if their continuing subversion was noted.

I agree with the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton with regard to a freedom of information bill. I believe we should have freedom of information, but as long as the public service does not want us to know what is going on in the back rooms, we will not have it.

The public servants had already made their decision to withdraw the subsidy in the case of Northland Navigation when they called a meeting. These are civil servants, not the government of Canada. They had already made their decision to withdraw the subsidy, but they said they had to hold the meeting in order to get some members of parliament off their backs.

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) has cited incidents to me, and I have read about senior civil servants who have said that they do not want members of parliament interfering in their affairs; in other words, it is their country, they are running it, and members of parliament "should stay out of our business." I think it is time we cleaned them out.

I would like to say to hon. members opposite that I am well aware of the little brown envelopes coming to them containing information. I am well aware that civil servants are feeding hon. members opposite information with which they might try to tear this government down. I know that many hon. members opposite are beginning to get nervous because of the danger inherent in this. If those public servants are giving out this information now, they would give it to us if we were on the other side, if that ever came about. I do not know whether it is going to happen. I suppose it will happen some day because society always wants change, but I do not think it will happen soon, probably not for about 20 years.

To be very serious, these few people in the public service do not want democratic government; they want government by civil service. That would be the end of democracy and the start of rule from within by people who are not accountable to the public.

On November 30 in the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts I had my first insight of how we are simply rubber stamps for the people who seem to run this country. That sounds like a very negative way of handling this question of lobbying but I was very discouraged because I have to answer to my constituents—as we all do—for things that I know were not created by members on either side of this House. The estimates were before that committee in an amount around $59,000. A man named Bruce Donaldson of the government telephone agency appeared as a witness. The agency wanted to pay something like $38,000 for furniture. Without any reference to the committee it had increased the staff, at a time of restraint, by 40 people. They just bought the furniture—a fait accompli—and then came with the estimates to be passed.

The hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather), bemoaning the terrible telephone service the agency provided, was told that the equipment was very old and could not be replaced. Facetiously, I suggested they could have done what they did with the furniture—simply buy the equipment and bring the account to us to be rubber stamped, and then the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) could take the blame for the government expenditure! That is the name of the game, Mr. Speaker. They do it, we rubber stamp it, and the Prime Minister takes the blame.

It does not matter what we call them—pressure groups, special interest groups, lobbyists—the name is interchangeable. Special interest groups will say they do not want to be called lobbyists, but the word does not change the fact. Spokesmen for unions, industry and large organizations like to pretend they speak for large numbers of people when all too often they have only had an executive meeting. They share the dialogue and then come and say they are speaking for 20,000, or 2½ million, or 20 million people.

As an example, Mr. Speaker, I have received letters from officers of the British Columbia Teachers' Federation protesting the treatment of Dr. Morgentaler. This came in a copy of a most, insulting letter to the Prime Minister of Canada, on BCTF letterhead. But I have yet to find one teacher in British Columbia—and I have shown this letter to many of them—who knew they were involved in this matter. They had the distinct impression their association was concerned about the major problem of education.

This is what worries me, Mr. Speaker. Are lobbyists really speaking for the mass of the people? Will registration of them make any difference? In the case of the cable company, I know that when we get through fighting for channel 4 we will have to fight them again and again on new issues. They will not stop until they win. Lobbyists have a single purpose; they are paid and all they have to do is work on one thing at a time. We have to work on many things and, while we are moving to our next problem, they are concentrating on the one. We cannot change the fact that they are working inside with the public service.

It should not be any comfort to the opposition that there are those who lobby with the aid of the public service—and I do not say all of the public service—in the name of nationalism, as we have seen for example with the television and magazine industry. Nationalism has been the device used for building the empires of the greedy. If this cable lobby succeeds then they could do it to any government, and elected representatives will not have control. One of the executives of the cable company stated that he hoped he could delay KOMO, Seattle's, replacement on channel 4; on the VHF dial by French network to a time just a month or two before the elections, so that he could bring the government down. I say if he could do it to us, he could do it to the opposition.

I should like to refer to lobbying in regard to the proposed gun law, Mr. Speaker. In Vancouver there is a very serious rapist, a frightening person whom the Calgary and Vancouver police feel has been involved in the rape of aged people, and is capable of murder. Bill C-83, the peace and security legislation, was introduced in this House last year. The person involved in those rapes is now free on the streets of Vancouver on mandatory parole. He had to be freed. Under the law it was legal and his right on completing his sentence under existing law. He is now out on the streets on mandatory parole; the public is angry at us because we have no way of getting him and other dangerous people off the streets.

Recently some hon. members visited a penitentiary on the prairies, and there I talked to two prisoners in segregation cells, a 16 year old and an 18 year old who will be free in four or five months. Neither of them have any fear of death.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to her has expired. She may continue if there is unanimous consent, however. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mrs. Holt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I should like to finish this point. Those two boys have said it does not mean anything to them to kill, and they probably will kill. They do not know why. They do not know anything else, and they are coming out in four or five months. If there had been co-operation for the passage of Bill C-83, which has provisions for dealing with dangerous offenders through indefinite sentences, we could have kept society safe from the Vancouver rapist and these two youngsters who have no sense of life and death. We would probably have prevented this rapist from being released on the mandatory parole that is now his legal entitlement.

I feel this is an important matter, Mr. Speaker, and we ought to work it out. I do not see how we can answer all the questions of the gun lobbys, the pro-life lobbys, the union lobbys who really do not represent the people. But my greatest concern is the inside lobby, Mr. Speaker, the group from within that is undermining democratic government.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and, if I may say so in the same breath, the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson), who have both had bills on the order paper on this general question of lobbying and who both made very able presentations in the House today.

I appreciate the thoughts and the examples given by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) on the subject, and the very interesting and thoughtful ideas we have just heard from the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt). We have had a very useful discussion on the question of lobbying by people obviously interested in and knowledgeable about the subject. In addition, in past years the House had devoted many hours to an analysis of the validity of lobbying and the conduct of lobbyists.

If one searches back through the debates of this House, as I have done in examining the bill presented by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, one comes across repeated discussions of this topic. Many of these were prompted and promoted through private members' bills introduced by the former member from Surrey, British Columbia. The idea of lobbyists has been rather thoroughly canvassed on these occasions and I think we have benefited by the discussion. I should like to refer to one occasion in particular, April 14, 1970. It was reported at page 5854 of the Commons Debates. This was in the course of one of the debates on a private members' bill of the former member for Surrey.

● (1650)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Barry Mather.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Mather was the gentleman who presented the subject on that occasion and, I gather from reports, on other occasions as well.

If I could, I would quote a passage from some of the debates at that particular time. However, I will not take the time of the House to do that. If hon. members are interested, I refer them to page 5854 of the Commons Debates where the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) was discussing the question of lobbying. He made some rather interesting points. I would adopt at least a portion of his wording which has to do with the inequity of legislation of this kind.

The hon. member pointed out that it necessarily establishes separate classes within that broad group generally defined as lobbyists. It creates a basic inequity. Some would have to register, perhaps pay a fee and subject themselves to other restrictions. Others would not be subject to those restrictions even though their actions may be more sinister. I have serious doubts about the efficacy of this kind of proposal.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Since the House agreed unanimously to call it four o'clock at 3:54, the Chair therefore has no alternative at 4:54 but to call it five o'clock. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business has expired. It being five o'clock I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m. on Monday next, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 4:54 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question had been for the Prime Minister and I think should await his return to the House. He will not be in today, I understand, so I will pass.

ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA LIMITED

EFFORTS OF GOVERNMENT TO LEARN IDENTITY OF AGENT USED IN SALE OF REACTOR TO ARGENTINA

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the right hon. Prime Minister I should like to direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. It has to do with the dealings of AECL in Argentina and it is in light of the testimony of Mr. Lorne Gray before the public accounts committee. Mr. Gray said that it was his position and the position of AECL that they did not want to know who the agents were who were dealing for Canada and for AECL in this transaction. Mr. Gray also confirmed in these hearings that he discussed with cabinet the use of agents. I would ask the Acting Prime Minister whether it was the position of the cabinet and the government of Canada that they, too, did not want to know who the agents were and told Mr. Gray to go on in his own way, or did they just neglect to pursue this important matter?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that the cabinet had ever dealt with the matter in any way or had ever considered the question whether information on that point ought to be a matter of interest to the cabinet.

I should say, Mr. Speaker, that as far as I am concerned, it seems to be improper to put questions on matters that are simultaneously going on in standing committees. Normally, we deal with the evidence and testimony given in a standing committee when a committee reports to the House.

● (1410)

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, my question arises out of an answer given by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons with regard to a meeting that was held with Mr. Gray and a committee of the cabinet. At that time the Prime Minister reported that Mr. Gray had told the cabinet committee they were dealing with agents. It is very important that the House and the people of Canada know whether it was the decision of the government of Canada that they did not want to know who the agent was with whom AECL was dealing. The question I direct to the Acting Prime Minister is simply this: Is it the position of the government that they did not want to know who was the agent? Second, if they did not want to know, was it because they neglected to study this issue, that they were irresponsible in not following it up, they forgot about it or did not want to know?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I believe I made it clear in my earlier answer that the matter as such never came before the government of Canada requiring a decision as to whether or not we wanted to know. It simply did not arise in that form.

Mr. Gillies: Obviously, what the Acting Prime Minister is saying is that there was total neglect on the part of the government with regard to inquiring about this matter. My supplementary question is this: What priority does the government of Canada now give to finding out who the agent was? I ask this because the government of Canada may now be partially responsible for the wrongdoing on the part of officials of other countries. How high a priority is the government of Canada giving to finding out who the agent was, and in particular in terms of how willing the government of Canada is to using all its powers in diplomatic terms and so on with the government of Italy to encourage that government to release this information to Canada so that the Canadian people will be able to judge what in fact took place in this rather unsavory transaction?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member having asked whether the government had already decided that it did not want to know certain things, I replied, and I repeat, the matter to my knowledge never came before the government in any form which would require a decision on that point. In answer to the second question, I repeat to the hon. member that the Standing Committee on Public Accounts is now authorized by the House of Commons to undertake a full examination into all the circumstances. The ministers who appear will co-operate fully with the committee in obtaining all the information that is required for it to make its report to the House.

Oral Questions

REQUEST FOR NAMES OF MINISTERS PRESENT AT CABINET MEETING—DISCUSSION OF USE OF AGENTS TO SELL REACTORS

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the acting Prime Minister. The former President of AECL told the committee last Thursday that the matters in question today were discussed by a cabinet committee. However, he could not remember what cabinet ministers were present at such a meeting. In fact, he could not even name one cabinet minister who was there for sure. Will the acting Prime Minister undertake to check the records of cabinet committee meetings in order to find out who was present and report this to the committee?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will consider that question. I am not ready at the present time to give an undertaking that I will disclose the names of ministers who attended any or all cabinet committees or cabinet meetings, but I will consider the question.

An hon. Member: Television in the cabinet.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CONFEDERATION

GOVERNMENT ACTIONS TO INDUCE QUEBEC NOT TO SEPARATE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister I will address my question to the Acting Prime Minister on the assumption that as a senior minister he will know something about the government's plans. I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister if it is the government's intention to win the battle of Confederation by having the Prime Minister issue a series of personal challenges to the premier of the province of Quebec, or does the government of Canada have any specific new policies that it will be announcing intended to appeal to the province of Quebec in a positive way?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister in reply to a number of questions last week indicated that the government will go forward with its policies on the subject of national unity and as time goes on the Prime Minister will make further comments, as he did over the weekend. I understand that the Prime Minister's analysis on Friday and Saturday in Quebec received enthusiastic and strong support in that province.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Any Liberal speaking to the chamber of commerce always gets that kind of response.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: The babbling horde should keep quiet so one can get the question out.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister, considering that last week the Prime Minister answered no fewer than ten questions on this important subject and referred to only one program, namely the Official Languages Act, and considering that the program is supported by all the parties in the House, whether the government has no other proposal that it intends to bring forward to appeal to the hearts and minds of the people of the province of Quebec.

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker. The answer is obvious, that when new programs are developed, they will be announced in the House of Commons. The hon. member speaks of appealing to the minds and hearts of the Canadian people. I am sure he is pleased that the appeal made on the weekend to the minds and hearts of the people of Quebec and of all of Canada has struck a very responsive chord.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—POSSIBILITY OF ANNOUNCEMENT AT MEETING WITH PROVINCIAL FINANCE MINISTERS OF MEASURES TO ALLEVIATE PROBLEM

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): If mere rhetoric could win every battle, the Liberals would be in office for a thousand years.

An hon. Member: It just seems like a thousand years.

Mr. Broadbent: I have a final supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Considering that it is important to appeal in a concrete way to the people of the province of Quebec and not simply try to win this battle by scoring cheap constitutional points,—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: —I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether the government, and specifically the Minister of Finance, in his meeting with the ministers of finance of all the other provinces tomorrow, intends to bring before those finance ministers a specific program to deal with the national problem of unemployment, and in that context the particularly bad problem of unemployment in the province of Quebec which is forecast to average more than 10 per cent next year.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose tomorrow to introduce any additional programs to those which my colleague, particularly the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, has in operation in the country.

Mr. Broadbent: Oh boy; we are all set.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. member should know that, of course, any budgetary change would be announced first in the House rather than at the federal-provincial conference.

AGRICULTURE

DAIRYING—INQUIRY WHETHER FEDERAL GRANTS WILL BE ADDED TO PROVINCIAL GRANTS

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Further to statements made by the Quebec dairy producers' representatives that they will be penalized because the Quebec government will give assistance to the dairy industry, could the minister advise whether these statements are justified or whether the federal government, when distributing reimbursements, will not take into account the assistance given by Quebec so as to be equitable in all provinces?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am not 100 per cent sure of what the hon. member is talking about, but I am responsible for our national dairy program. That responsibility means that dairy producers under the national program should be treated as fairly and equitably as possible.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the minister.

Could he tell us whether he has held meetings with the officials of UPA in Quebec on this issue?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I have not had meetings with UPA for quite some time.

INDUSTRY

PROVISION OF INCENTIVES TO INDUCE INDUSTRIAL RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As the Prime Minister very correctly said when he was in Tokyo last fall, we must pull up our socks and improve our productivity and our technology if we are to increase our exports, and as our yearly deficit in manufactured products is now in the vicinity of $10 billion a year, is the government planning to introduce incentives to induce greater industrial research and development in this country, to be paid in direct proportion to increased effort that is made to improve our technology and increase our sales in manufactured products? Manufactured products are the ones which provide jobs.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with my hon. friend's statistical data. I would like to merely point out that in 1976 the situation was corrected. Our trade balance was showing a deficit last year but in 1976 we were successful in regaining our usual rank and due to our exportations we had a favourable balance of payments.

[English]

Mr. Hees: As there was improvement in the export of our raw products, which enabled other countries to manufacture goods which we should be manufacturing, and as there was no improvement in our exports of manufactured products, the ones which provide the jobs, does the minister not realize that answers like his which are vague non-answers do not impress the business community or increase our industrial research and development?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Peace River.

CONFEDERATION

PROVISION OF GOOD GOVERNMENT AS MEANS OF APPEALING TO QUEBEC TO REMAIN WITHIN FEDERAL SYSTEM

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Privy Council which is supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. It being generally conceded on all sides that the Liberal government in Quebec was defeated mainly because of political dishonesty, deceit, excessive secrecy and lack of accountability—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: —all of which elements are quite apparent in the present federal Liberal government—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: —will the hon. gentleman indicate if it is the intention of his government, through the Prime Minister or otherwise, to do what it can to remove these defects to show the people of Quebec who, like all Canadians, want open and honest government that this can be done and to make a major contribution to national unity?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar.

Oral Questions

INDIAN AFFAIRS

LEGAL AUTHORITY OF DEPARTMENT TO REMOVE CHILDREN FROM CUSTODY OF PARENTS—SUGGESTED COMPLIANCE WITH PROVINCIAL LAW

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The director general of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in Saskatchewan has said that the department has been illegally taking children away from their parents in Saskatchewan. There are some 700 children in the care of the department in Saskatchewan, and the parents of these children, in all likelihood, never had the right to a hearing regarding the apprehension of their children. Could the minister inform the House whether it is his view that the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has no legal authority to apprehend Indian children, as is the view of the director general in Saskatchewan?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am informed that while there is no special legislation which would enable the department to take these children into custody, the department acts under Section 88 of the Indian Act which has general provisions for the welfare of Indian children. In the cases in point, these children have been taken either because they have been abused very badly or have been abandoned. We take them on a humanitarian basis and place them in foster homes or institutions, about 60 per cent of which are Indian homes or institutions.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, the minister's response indicates a continuation of a paternalistic attittude toward our Indian population. I should like to ask the minister whether he can assure the House that in future the department will issue clear guidelines respecting compliance with provincial law, obtaining court orders if apprehension is deemed necessary and especially, to advise parents of their rights pursuant to basic principles of Canadian justice. Finally, where there has been wrongful taking is the department considering the question of compensation to parents from whom children have been taken without just cause?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, contrary to the allegation of the hon. member with respect to paternalism, the Indian people want the federal government to do this and not the provincial government. In general, however, it should be done by the provincial government. Unfortunately, we cannot get an agreement with the provincial government of Saskatchewan to do it. With respect to compensation and notice to the parents, the reason the children are taken is that the parents are either badly beating the children or completely abandoning them. In many cases, we cannot find the parents.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I think the minister has missed the point on which I was trying to obtain information. There is the basic principle of justice here, regardless of whether these are Indians or other citizens of our country. I ask the minister again, if this has not already been done, will he send some indication to the parents that they have rights with respect to this matter or at least refer the matter to the courts for an independent assessment of whether these children are properly taken away from their parents?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Allmand: I will gladly look into that, Mr. Speaker. We would like to regularize this as much as possible. If we have acted without the full support of the law, we have done so merely because there was no other way of dealing with a very sad situation.

PUBLIC SERVICE

ACTIONS OF PEOPLE ON BLACKLIST WHICH JUSTIFY INCLUSION OF THEIR NAMES—REASON FOR FAILURE TO ACT UNDER OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. Now that he has had an opportunity to look further into the circumstances surrounding the compilation and circulation of the extra-parliamentary opposition list by one of his predecessors in office, is he able to tell the House and the country whether there is any hard evidence that any person on the list in fact acted improperly in circulating documents or doing anything else that would justify having them grouped together and classified for special treatment, as they have been?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as I informed the House during the course of question periods last week, the totality of the information was transmitted to the ministers of the departments in which the people in question were employed. It then became the responsibility of that department to evaluate the information.

Mr. MacKay: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to remind the minister that it seems strange he can delegate all the responsibility emanating from his own very special department to others. Does he still hold to his position that he does not intend or make arrangements to contact these people listed so that they can take any action they deem necessary to their records or take appropriate action against the government? Is these any evidence of misconduct in leaking documents or otherwise and if so, why was something not done under the Public Service Act or the Official Secrets Act? Why was this left to fester for years?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can refer the member to the very full examination of this type of thing which was done by the Royal Commission on Security which reported in 1969 and stated quite clearly that in these areas departmental responsibility should remain paramount.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NO OTHER BLACKLISTS EXIST

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister since the Solicitor General has stated there is now no list in his department. Can the Acting Prime Minister show the House that there are no such lists in any of the ministries falling within the government of Canada, lists which contain names, which would affect relationships or destroy trust and confidence between those on the list and their superiors in the public service? Can he also indicate the present situation with respect to the other ministries of government, particularly those to which this particular list was transmitted?

● (1430)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot personally verify what is in government files. I have not searched them.

Mr. Stanfield: Why not?

Mr. MacEachen: So far as I am aware, and based on my knowledge of this particular question, there are no such lists in existence.

An hon. Member: You said that before.

INQUIRY TO DETERMINE IF PEARSON GUIDELINES BREACHED BY CIRCULATION OF BLACKLIST—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in view of the questioning of the past week I cannot understand how the Acting Prime Minister can stand up and say that he had not searched, or caused any search to be made. May I direct my supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board? Last week I asked whether he was causing any inquiry to be made into this matter, or whether he had made inquiries through the Department of Justice with respect to any public servant, particularly the one who is acknowledged as being on the list, he himself having acknowledged it, to determine whether there has been any breach of the Pearson guidelines? Has he undertaken that? If he has, what are the results; if he has not, when does he intend to undertake such an examination?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, following the question of the hon. member, I am not sure whether it was on Thursday or Friday, I began an examination, as I indicated to him, but have nothing further to report at this stage.

URBAN AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF NEW TENDERS FOR WATER FILTRATION PLANT OF AYLMER-HULL-GATINEAU REGION

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

What position will the National Capital Commission take as a result of the instructions of the Quebec government to the Communauté régionale de l'Outaouais not to accept the lowest bidder for the construction of a filtration plant in the Aylmer-Hull-Gatineau region, but to ask for new tenders?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the National Capital Commission has written today to minister Claude Morin asking his government to grant the contract to the lowest bidder. Indeed, the federal government is asking the Quebec government to abide by the assurance first given by minister Léger in his letter to the president of the CRO on December 2 last. We think it would be unfortunate to put off that project unduly. Not only could such a delay entail serious consequences for carrying out the project, but especially higher costs, which is unacceptable for all citizens of Canada as well as of Quebec.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INQUIRY WHETHER PEOPLE ON BLACKLIST INFORMED OF CHARGES AGAINST THEM

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, may I direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister? My question relates to the mandatory policy guidelines first initiated by Prime Minister Pearson in 1963 and supported by the present Prime Minister in 1969, to which my leader referred on Friday of last week. I refer in particular to the requirement in those guidelines to this effect: That when a public servant's security or reliability is in doubt the employing departments and agencies will be required to tell the employee everything that is against him, so that he can have an opportunity to resolve that doubt. May I ask if those mandatory guidelines which are part of the government's policy were followed with respect to the persons named on the list attached to the letter of June 15, 1971, by the then solicitor general?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the guidelines to which the hon. member refers are still in existence. They did not apply, as I understand it, to the persons to whom the hon. member referred because in that case there was no question of dismissal and there was no question that that would cause the guidelines to come into play in their case.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Read them again.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, that is my understanding of the question. That is my immediate response to the hon. member's question, but I will be happy to look at the question further and reply again tomorrow.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I hope that the promise to reply tomorrow will be better kept than some of the promises to that effect which were made last week. Since the guidelines refer not just to cases of dismissal but to questioning of reliability, does that situation not apply to these employees, and therefore will the minister see that the whole matter is checked and, preferably, that any reference to this matter is completely removed from the files of those employees?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I presume that there can be a different interpretation or application with respect to the question of reliability. In this case, as I understand it, the letter was intended to suggest to ministers that they should remind those employees of their obligations with respect to a certain aspect of governmental responsibilities.

Mr. Hees: Come off it, Allan. You can do better than that.

Mr. MacEachen: It is quite doubtful in my mind whether that contemplates a challenge with regard to reliability of such persons because subsequent events, as I understand it, have seen some of these persons at least continue their responsibilities and even carry out increased responsibilites. Therefore subsequent events really do not justify the retrospective interpretation of the hon. member.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You are paranoid.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, seriously, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister if there is not someone on the government side who is big enough to admit that this whole farce was a Goyer goof?

Mr. Hees: Goyer's gumshoes.

Mr. Goyer: What about your gumshoes, MacKay?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): At least they fit.

An hon. Member: Back to the oil refineries.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

FORMULATION OF NATIONAL FOOD POLICY—PARTICIPATION OF DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs a question about which the minister has spoken on numerous occasions and about which his views have been made known on the radio, on television and in the newspapers. I am alluding to the minister's statements that Canada needs to develop a nationally integrated food policy. Is the minister's department working on such a policy? If so, what input is the Department of Agriculture supplying with respect to the formulation of such policy which the minister seems to think is so urgently needed for Canada?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, to answer the question, I indeed hope that in the not too distant future we will have a national food policy. I assure the hon. member that any such food policy would not be possible without the closest co-operation and integration of the Department of Agriculture, and there have been discussions between the departments and ministers to that effect.

Mr. Murta: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since, publicly, the Minister of Agriculture seems to view this matter differently from the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, may I ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, who has suggested that Canada now needs such a policy, what weaknesses he sees in the present agricultural policy espoused by the present Minister of Agriculture?

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to discuss the whole area of food policy at this time. Many of us, including the Minister of Agriculture, recognize that just as energy and transportation are vital matters, so food is perhaps the most vital of all and agricultural policies, right through to the processing, distribution and retail level and consumption, are all part of that food policy. We hope before too long to have a nationally integrated strategy which will give both consumers and producers a better idea of where we are going.

Mr. Fraser: Don't worry, they already know.

AIR TRANSPORT

INCIDENT INVOLVING AIR CANADA FLIGHT 266—NEED FOR INSTALLATION OF RADAR AT VICTORIA AIRPORT

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. I wonder if the minister has received the report of an air incident, reported as near miss, which occurred on January 21 over Victoria International Airport and involved an Air Canada aircraft on a scheduled flight to Vancouver. Among other things, it came within 200 yards of bringing about a by-election in the riding of Esquimalt-Saanich.

• (1440)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): This is an occurrence which could have been avoided had radar been in place at Victoria International Airport but in fact disaster was avoided by swift and appropriate evasive action on the part of the Air Canada pilot in command of flight number 266.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): I am happy to join with the hon. member in applauding the swift action taken by the pilot. I have not yet seen the report personally, but I look forward to doing so.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I hope the minister will see this report. Will he give an undertaking to examine it in the light of the need to instal radar now at the Victoria International Airport? If it is true that radar is now being taken out of Vancouver, could he give an undertaking that it will be installed, if only temporarily, at Victoria International Airport?

Mr. Lang: I shall try not to draw any conclusions, Mr. Speaker, until I have received the report.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

ALLEGATION QUEBEC BREAKING AGREEMENTS—ATTITUDE OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT TOWARD FUTURE AGREEMENTS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. On January 27 it was reported that the Prime Minister had criticized the Parti Quebecois for unilaterally breaking commitments with Ottawa. The reference was to participation in the anti-inflation program and English language courses for immigrants using the services of Canada Manpower in Quebec. He stated that Ottawa would be "more careful" in the future in dealing with a province which broke its agreements. Is the minister now in a position to be more definitive with respect to this alleged statement by the Prime Minister that Ottawa would be "more careful in the future"? Has the government any proposals in that regard?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Not specifically, Mr. Speaker. I might point out that in the case of the anti-inflation program there was a meeting of first ministers in mid-December at which Quebec was represented and at which it was agreed that no further action would be taken with regard to the termination of the anti-inflation program until the finance ministers could meet at the meeting which is to be held tomorrow and the next day. That was generally agreed around the table and there was no demurrer from the minister representing Quebec. Obviously, in further dealings when there is a situation of that kind it would be incumbent upon the federal government and, indeed, among the other provinces, to make sure that Quebec is, in fact, prepared to stick by what is a general consensus around the table.

Mr. Alexander: In the light of the importance of this question, involving the unilateral breaking of commitments undertaken with the federal government, and since the Minister of Manpower and Immigration has indicated to the House that he intends to raise this issue with his provincial counterpart in Quebec, can the hon. gentleman assure us that at the federal-provincial meetings to be held tomorrow and Wednesday, this subject will be on the agenda in order that it may be properly resolved?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It will not be on the agenda as such, but there might well be some reference to Quebec's change of position in the interval between the two meetings. I should point out that while the federal government does, of course, have over-all responsibility for the anti-inflation program, because it is in relation to the provincial public sector in which the changes are made, that kind of unilateral action could have an effect upon the other provincial governments as adverse as the effect upon the over-all program.

Mr. Alexander: I can appreciate the answer the minister has given us, but bearing in mind that the unilateral breaking of commitments could possibly destroy confederation, will he reassess the reply he has just made and put this question on the agenda for full and open discussion? In my view it is of such importance that, with all due respect, the minister would be irresponsible if the matter were not definitely placed on the agenda.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It would not be my intention to put any of the finance ministers at that meeting, including myself, in the dock. I think it is regrettable that Quebec should have followed this course of action. I hope the reactions of the hon. member and of many others in the country will convey themselves to that government and that we might have some better assurance that when, as provinces and as the federal government, we agree on something unanimously, undertakings of that kind will be observed. A reputation for fair dealing, whether by a government or by an individual, is very important and I am sure this cannot be lost on the government of Quebec.

COMMUNICATIONS

DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF SECOND PHASE OF LEGISLATION—REASON FOR DELAY

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications. Some time ago, in the first session of this parliament, the minister said we might expect a second phase of the telecommunications legislation. I wonder when we may expect, in the second session of this parliament, to hear about the second phase of this legislation.

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Soon, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nowlan: Is the delay in the presentation of the second phase due to the present constitutional legal battle which is before the Supreme Court and in respect of which judgment has been reserved or does the minister plan, before tabling the legislation, to discuss the matter with the communications ministers of the provinces?

[Translation]

Mrs. Sauvé: No, Mr. Speaker, there is no relation between this case which is before the court and the delay in preparing this legislation. For the information of the hon. member, I would say that the legislation is ready, that I am giving it the last touch and that I hope to present it before initiating discussions with my provincial counterparts.

ENERGY

COST OF ELECTRICITY IN MARITIMES—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS TO SOLVE PROBLEM

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to address to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Would he tell the House how he is getting along in resolving the power problems of the Atlantic provinces? First, with regard to his short term program of aid to Nova Scotia, a program which was received with something less than enthusiasm by the government of that province, has he been able to reach agreement on this subject?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): We have not yet reached agreement, but I believe we are much closer than we were. I hope I shall have an announcement to make some time within the next week or so.

Mr. Stanfield: With regard to the longer term problem and the minister's search—I think it has gone on for almost a year now—for some agreement at least with regard to a study of a more far-reaching maritime grid to distribute electric power, has the minister achieved agreement on that subject? Is he conducting negotiations himself, or has he resorted to an agent?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

LIQUEFIED NATURAL GAS—AMOUNT OF INCREASE IN EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES TO AID IN EMERGENCY

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, my question, also, is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. As he is aware, the United States is currently suffering from an acute shortage of energy supplies brought on by crippling cold weather along the eastern seaboard, in the midwest and in the south. Bearing in mind both humanitarian considerations and possible repercussions on the Canadian economy in terms of food and manufactured products imported from south of the border, I should like to ask the minister by how much the sale of liquefied natural gas has already been increased by way of emergency supplies to the United States. Might I urge him to make provision for similar short-term contracts with the U.S.A. in the near future?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to tell the House the National Energy Board responded so rapidly that the government in Washington has already stated publicly its appreciation of the assistance offered by Canada. Fifteen billion cubic feet of natural gas has been allocated and it is now being delivered on the basis of about 400 million cubic feet a day. In the event that this is not sufficient to tide over those particular areas in the United States which have been so heavily and harshly hit, I know the National Energy Board is prepared to consider additional allocations. I should perhaps also take this opportunity to tell the House there have been a number of other authorizations given by the National Energy Board with respect to home heating fuel oil for the east coast, for New York State, and that an inventory is being undertaken at the present time with respect to propane supplies which might be made available to the United States on an emergency basis.

OIL PIPELINE TO KITIMAT—INQUIRY AS TO TASK FORCE TO STUDY ENVIRONMENTAL IMPACT—PUBLICATION OF REPORT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question also is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It has to do with the application which will shortly be before the National Energy Board with respect to an oil pipeline delivering oil to tankers at Kitimat for delivery to the United States. Is it correct that an interdepartmental task force or committee has been set up to study the environmental impact of such a pipeline, particularly as it affects the coastline and the people living along the coastline of British Columbia; and can the minister assure the House that the report of the task force will be made public prior to the National Energy Board making its decision, so that those who want to make submissions to the National Energy Board will be in possession of all the facts which have been gathered by the task force?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): To some extent, Mr. Speaker, I will have to take note of the question but I think I can say this. On an interdepartmental basis there is a task force or study group working, particularly on the marine aspects of a possible oil spill threat associated with that particular application. Undoubtedly, other ministers responsible for this particular area will want to comment with respect to the publication and publicity of such a report or findings.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): As a supplementary question, may I ask the minister whether he can tell us what departments are represented on that interdepartmental committee; and can he assure the House that all the information which the government has collected with respect to the possible dangers to those living adjacent to the coastline of British Columbia will be made public so that the people of that area can make an intelligent appraisal of the effect of the pipeline and can make the kind of representations which they think appropriate when hearings are held?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I want to do everything I can to assist those who are concerned about this problem to make representations and to assure them that their representations will be heard, and indeed taken into consideration in any policy decision later taken. As to the membership of the committee, I am fairly sure that the Department of the Environment, the Department of Transport and my own departmental officials will be involved. I cannot tell the House how many other departments will be involved, but quite clearly those departments are the three main ones.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR ADOPTION OF MEASURES TO AVOID UNDESERVED HARDSHIPS TO UNEMPLOYED

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Considering that a high percentage of the unemployed are victims of decisions taken by Unemployment Insurance Commission agents as regard finding jobs which are impossible to get in an area where the unemployment rate exceeds 20 per cent, does the minister plan to provide appropriate guidelines to those who are responsible for this situation so as to avoid undeserved hardships to those without jobs and income?

[English]

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the premise contained in the hon. member's question, but in the event that that is taking place it is why we have established a very informal appeal procedure dealing directly with the board of referees, so that anyone who feels that he has been abused can take that particular appeal route. If the hon. member has a large, specific area that he feels needs looking into, he has only to make representations to me and we will examine the matter.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REASON FOR REDUCTION IN VISITS BY WELFARE OFFICERS

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question, in the absence of the Minister of Veterans Affairs, is addressed to his parliamentary secretary. In light of the fact that the Department of Veterans Affairs has demonstrated considerable fiscal largesse with reference to the move from Ottawa to the maritimes involving some $20 million, I should like to know why it is that some fiscal responsibility or at least largesse is not demonstrated with reference to veterans affairs welfare officers whose visits to constituents in my riding and in ridings all across Canada have been reduced by at least 50 per cent, and why the situation should get so bad that a member of the Department of Veterans Affairs found it necessary to make a collect call to my constituency office because the department would not allow any further long distance calls from the Department of Veterans Affairs? I think the situation demands an explanation.

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is a particular case which will require some investigation. I think we should take the question as notice until the minister returns.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

IMPORTATION AND DISTRIBUTION OF PORNOGRAPHIC MATERIAL—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada. Can the minister tell the House what action he proposes to take following meetings that he has held with representatives of church leaders from the city of Toronto who expressed to him concern over the importation and distribution in this country of material that is clearly in contravention of section 159 of the Criminal Code of Canada? What action does the minister propose to take as attorney general?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I had a very useful discussion this morning with the church leaders mentioned. We canvassed the whole problem of hard-core pornography being imported and distributed in Canada. They will have an announcement to make in a short while with regard, I think, to a very useful arrangement they have entered into with some of the distributors. With regard to others I urged, as I have urged in the past, that provincial attorneys general take action against distributors for the sale and distribution of those materials deemed to be obscene, contrary to the Criminal Code.

I informed the church leaders that I and the Minister of National Revenue had reviewed the processes of the Customs Tariff Act in regard to inspection of material coming across the border and co-ordination between the Department of National Revenue and federal, provincial and municipal police forces. The church leaders will be meeting with the Minister of National Revenue in due course, but I elicited their help and co-operation in bringing to the attention of the Department of National Revenue materials now in their hands, or that would come into their hands, which should properly be barred under the Customs tariff.

Mr. McGrath: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Given that the enforcement provisions of the Criminal Code are within provincial jurisdiction, I would ask the minister whether he intends to bring in amendments to the Criminal Code to tighten up the penalty provisions of section 159?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, we did discuss the law and what other additional wording might be employed in the provisions of the Criminal Code without being able to determine that we should use some word other than "obscene". I did discuss some suggestions, one being additional penalties. The attorneys general will be meeting to discuss this. When I met with them in Vancouver last June I suggested to them that they might want to indicate to me what amendments to the Criminal Code might be made. I presume that at a meeting to be held shortly they will be making some proposals in this regard.

Old Age Security Act

AIRPORTS

CHARLOTTETOWN—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT ON CONSTRUCTION OF FACILITIES

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport, notice of which I have given him. It bears upon a pre-Yuletide exchange that we had. Can he now advise of the results of discussions between officials of the P.E.I. government and those of his own department on a matter of major concern to the whole of Prince Edward Island, namely the progress of construction of the new Charlottetown airport?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not have anything further to add at this point to the answer that I gave at that time. I will determine if there is any further definition of the dates.

RAILWAY ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING OWNERSHIP OF RAIL LINES ABANDONED

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-390, to amend the Railway Act (ownership of land where railway line abandoned).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, this bill is an attempt to amend the Railway Act so that if and when railways are successful in abandoning their lines, the rights of way will revert to the Crown and, therefore, to the people of Canada.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL C-22—MOTION UNDER S.O. 75C

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last I gave notice of my intention to rise at this point, pursuant to Standing Order 75C, with respect to the bill now before the House to amend the Income Tax Act, Bill C-22. I have had more than one occasion in the past to comment that I believe the planning of the business of the House should be based upon agreement. However, I have also had occasion to comment in the past—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I take it the minister is giving the Chair indication of his intention to move the motion of which he gave notice on Friday. Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale), seconded by Mr. MacEachen, moves:

That in relation to Bill C-22, an act to amend the statute law relating to income tax, eight hours shall be allotted to the further consideration in committee of the whole stage of the said bill;

That, at the end of the eighth such hour, any proceeding before the committee shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this order and, in turn, every question then necessary in order to dispose of the committee of the whole stage of the said bill, shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment.

May I indicate to the House that there is only one item remaining in routine proceedings, that being the calling of questions on the order paper. This motion has been properly put forward under motions, but I wonder if the House might agree that we ought to tidy up routine proceedings by calling questions on the order paper and then reverting to motions.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, that is an eminently sensible suggestion.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 131, 296, 648, 816, 831, 832, 833, 843, 890, 891, 931, 943, 965, 994, 1,097, 1,146, 1,172, 1,274, 1,314, 1,325, 1,339, 1,400, 1,417 and 1,423.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION—LOAN TO MR. DON PHILLIPS

Question No. 296—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the Farm Credit Corporation grant a loan to Mr. Don Phillips, R.R. #1, Toledo, Ontario, on or about September 1, 1975 and, if so, was the Corporation aware (a) that he had 12 head of cattle at the time the application was made (b) that he intended to increase his herd to 20 (c) that as a condition for making the loan, the Corporation insisted that he increase his herd to 30 and that Mr. Phillips did increase his herd as requested?

2. Was the Farm Credit Corporation or the Department of Agriculture aware, that the Ontario Milk Marketing Board would not increase the milk quota for Mr. Phillips beyond that already in existence for 12 cows and, if so, what are the reasons that the Corporation insisted on an increase to 30 cattle?

3. Is there any regular liaison or exchange of information between the Farm Credit Corporation and the Ontario Milk Marketing Board and (a) if so, what was the outcome in this case (b) if not, for what reason?

4. Is the Farm Credit Corporation and the Department of Agriculture aware of the severe penalties applied to Mr. Phillips for alleged over-production based on the old milk quota for 12 cows and that penalties have been applied so that he is without any monthly income and, if so, will any action be taken immediately to resolve this situation?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): The Farm Credit Corporation advises: 1. Yes. (a) Yes; nine beef cows, 12 dairy cows, 20 calves, for a total of 41 head of cattle. (b) See answer to (a) above. (c) No. After normal counselling discussions as to a viable enterprise, the applicant presented a proposed plan based on a 35-cow operation.

2. No, the applicant reported to the Corporation that additional quota would be made available to him by the Ontario Milk Marketing Board.

3. Quota is negotiated between the producer and the Ontario Milk Marketing Board. There is continuing liaison between the Corporation and the Ontario Milk Marketing Board concerning overall policy.

4. There has been continuing contact between the borrower and the Farm Credit Corporation's Credit Advisor. Alternate payment arrangements have been put into effect, and the problem now appears to be correcting itself.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS—PERSONNEL

Question No. 648—Mr. Lachance:

Between the date of the presentation of the last budget May 25, 1976 and October 12, 1976, did the Department of Public Works hire, dismiss or transfer employees to other departments and, if so, how many?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Public Works): Yes. 582 Hired (This includes Casual and Term—six months or over). 1,024 Dismissed (Struck off strength)—The term dismissed is misleading because it denotes discharge. Only one of the 1,024 was actually discharged. The balance either left of their own volition or completed a specified term of employment. It should also be noted that there is a rapid staff turnover in the north and that one term position may have had several incumbents during the period May 25 to October 12, which inflates the turnover in relation to the actual numbers of positions involved. 62 transferred.

Province of Alberta		1,326,000	2,651,000
Total		5,537,000	16,117,000

This amount does not include the federal government's share of other provincial costs of health services to treaty Indians as provided directly by physicians or through hospitals other than Departmental hospitals. The nature of the formulae under which the federal government shares these costs makes it impossible to determine the portion of total federal contributions or the utilization of services for any particular ethnic group or district, because these provincial health care programs are universal and include all insured residents.

Question No. 833—Mr. Yewchuk:

What was the government's share of the cost of health care for treaty Indians in Alberta in (a) 1965 (b) 1970 (c) 1975?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare):

	1965-1966	1970-1971	1975-1976

FLIGHT OPERATIONS MANUAL 500

Question No. 843—Mr. Horner:

1. What is the actual or estimated cost to Air Canada to physically remove or alter Section 14A of the Flight Operations Manual 500?

2. How many such manuals does Air Canada have?

3. Could the costs have been reduced if this action had been avoided by the implementation of the directive of the President of Air Canada when he issued a memo to all Air Canada staff concerned to disregard Section 14A of the Flight Operations Manual 500 and, if so, for what reason did Air Canada choose to follow the action it did?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The Management of Air Canada advises as follows: 1. $82.96.

2. 2,132.

3. Manual 500, like other such manuals, is continually amended to reflect current company policy. The issuance of a directive by the President did not reduce the cost of making the amendment to the manual.

1. Did Mr. Robert Vantangerloo, at the time, Personnel Director for the Unemployment Insurance Commission in Ontario, write a memorandum in March 1976 on the subject of personnel security clearance and, if so, what are the job levels of all employees in the UIC who received the memo?

2. Did the memo state in part "... it is intended to prevent passing of confidential information to groups with an interest in embarrassing or otherwise damaging the Canadian government ..." and, if so, has this led to the institution of a programme of checking personal histories of employees of the UIC as well as having them fingerprinted for the stated purpose of not embarrassing the government?

3. If such a programme has been instituted, what are the (a) reasons justifying the decision to take such a move (b) purposes for fingerprinting UIC employees?

4. Is the government placing greater restrictions than it did formerly on the rights of public servants and, if so, do the restrictions represent a lack of trust and/or an attempt to spy on public servants?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. Yes. See reply to question 890 answered this day.

2. Yes. No, the stated purpose, as outlined in D. Brown's memo, March 9, 1976 is "the prevention of unlawful passing of such information to individuals or institutions who are not entitled to possess it."

NATIONAL DEFENCE—SEARCH AND RESCUE

Question No. 931—Mr. McGrath:

1. What was the total number of personnel flown into the wilderness camp, known as SAR 1 and located at Eagle River, Labrador, in 1976?

2. How many were involved in Search and Rescue training exercises?

5. What are the names of the non-Search and Rescue personnel who were flown in from (a) CFB Goose Bay (b) CFB Summerside (c) CFB Camp Gagetown (d) CFB Greenwood (e) Maritime Command, Halifax (f) National Defence Headquarters, Ottawa?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): 1. Seventy four.

2. Forty one underwent rescue training.

3. It would not be appropriate to give this information as several of those who attended hold senior positions with our allies. The release of the information would require approval by other governments.

4. The cost of flying in and billeting personnel was approximately $11,070. $10,720 of this amount was for flying operations which has been accounted for under the regularly scheduled monthly flying training costs. Billeting costs in excess of the basic amount accounted for in the above figure, were charged to and paid by the host Canadian officers.

5. See part 3 above.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The Fitness and Amateur Sport Branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare is national in scope and deals primarily with national sports governing bodies and recreation associations. Through its joint objectives, the Branch seeks to help the best Canadian athletes in their pursuit of excellence, and to assist in the improvement of general fitness and recreational opportunities for Canadians. The following Associations received contributions for programs which have a significant impact on the development of healthful outdoor sport and recreation programs for Canadians:

Recipient Associations (1975-76 and 1976-77): 1. Canadian Recreational Canoeing Association: The Canadian Recreational Canoeing Association conducts six Canoeing Instructor Schools across Canada each summer in order to train experienced canoeists in teaching, organizing and promoting canoeing and canoe tripping. The participants are those involved in Youth Leadership using canoeing and the out-of-doors as educational mediums. The training received is then transmitted in agencies such as youth programmes, in school and college outdoor education programmes, or local canoe clubs. The Association has a Task Force on Standards. It is anticipated that, by 1977, a national set of standards will be approved by all provinces and national organizations that deal with canoeing. $19,080; $65,535.

2. Outward Bound Canada: Outward Bound aims to reveal and strengthen character through controlled challenge and understandable stress. The courses include extended expeditions in wild country, and challenging activities such as white water canoeing, mountaineering, and cross-country skiing. $32,000; $30,000.

3. The Alpine Club of Canada: The Alpine Club of Canada encourages the practice of mountaineering and mountain crafts; the exploration of alpine and glacial regions and the promotion of scientific study and the education of Canadians in appreciation of their mountain heritage. The Club organizes leadership training courses for ski mountaineering, rock and snow climbing; guide books are published which cover many of the Canadian mountains; the Club works closely with Parks Canada and the Canadian Travel Bureau by providing information for tourists on mountaineering, back packing, such as access roads, routes, maps, guide books, conditions etc. $7,526; $11,602.

4. Canadian Ski Marathon: The Canadian Ski Marathon is a two day wilderness cross-country ski event covering over 160 kms that attracts over 3,000 people of all ages. During the winter the Marathon Trail is used for group ski tours and races. $26,860; $27,500.

The following national organizations have been involved in outdoor recreational activities and programs for a number of years. In fact, they were the pioneers in many of the outdoor recreational programs. These organizations have received financial assistance to enable them to conduct leadership development programs and to provide more services to their member and non-member participants in outdoor recreational activities.

5. Canadian Camping Association: $54,941; $78,526.

6. The Boy Scouts of Canada: $50,474; $42,515.

12. Association des Scouts du Canada: $72,516; $89,489.

The following three associations strive to upgrade the quality of Canadian participation and the pursuit of excellence in their sport by strengthening the provincial, regional, and local organizations. This task is accomplished by the hosting of conferences, clinics for coaches and officials and providing technical assistance.

13. Canadian Ski Association: $438,013; $400,176.

The System was formed in 1941 to promote the sport of skiing through the encouragement of safe skiing and to provide assistance to injured skiers. $38,862; $62,500.

17. Canadian Hostelling Association: The Canadian Hostelling Association (formerly known as the Canadian Youth Hostel Association) was established in Canada in 1933 and since has been providing low cost accommodation, educational and recreational activities and travel opportunities for young people, families and senior citizens. The Association offers such group programs as cross-country skiing, snowshoeing, canoeing, (including white water) cycling, sailing, hiking, rock and snow climbing etc. $62,922; $55,516.

18. Fitness Trails: Over the past few years many municipal recreation departments, summer camps, community agencies etc., have been showing a growing interest in fitness trails and are in need of specific guidelines in regards to the concept and construction of trails. INCOME TAX ACT

BILL C-22—MOTION UNDER S.O. 75C

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I remarked a few moments ago, I have often stated that my well known preference is to arrange for the planning of the House by agreement. However, I have had more than one occasion in the past to observe that there are, indeed, times, either for reasons of ideology or just plain politics, when one or more group in this House may find it of advantage to fail to so participate in the affairs of the House so that the House cannot come to an agreement or decision on measures before it. It is for the purpose of dealing with just this kind of intransigence that we have this particular procedure and that this motion is made.

It is particularly regrettable in this instance that an agreement was not possible. The amendments to the Income Tax Act incorporated in Bill C-22 are numerous. They are important in their over-all impact on Canada, and important to the many thousands of Canadians they affect directly. These taxpayers are now telling us to get on with our business so that they can get on with theirs. I believe the opposition expressed in some corners of the House to particular measures proposed in this legislation has been ill-advised. It has impaired the orderly and effective conduct of the business of parliament and it is not serving the interests of the country.

It has been claimed that the bill, particularly with its changes which raise the level of deductible contributions to pension plans, benefits only the well-to-do. The facts do not support this claim. In 1975, average family income in this country was $16,263. In 1976, of course, this figure would have been higher. Yet the simple arithmetic of the new maximum contributions to registered pension plans and registered retirement savings plans tells us that they will benefit taxpayers with incomes above $12,500. Several hundred thousand middle income taxpayers in this country, taxpayers whose incomes are average by this modest measurement, are helped by these changes. Far from a gift to the privileged, the increases simply restore the real value of limits set for contributions when tax reform was introduced five years ago.

They do no more than make up for the erosion brought about by inflation. Furthermore, many pension contracts require percentage contributions by employees which now exceed the old limits under the Income Tax Act. Without the changes proposed in this bill, these employees will be making contributions to their retirement which are disallowed as deductions, in other words, contributions which will have to be made out of after-tax income.

The bill also provides for a doubling of deductible child care expenses. In this regard I wish to refer to a report which appeared in the Globe and Mail of Saturday last in which it was alleged by a group in Ottawa that there was discrimination as between men and women in the application of these particular measures by favouring a single father to the extent of $1,560 per year for each child, as opposed to a $1,000 maximum for a woman. I would point out that that report is entirely erroneous; the application of the law is the same in both cases.

Almost all of the quarter of a million Canadians who claim the child care allowance stand to benefit from the increase in annual limits to $1,000 per child and $4,000 per family. None of the tax returns taking advantage of these increases can be processed by Revenue Canada until this legislation is approved. The measures in this bill are based on a budget introduced fully eight months ago. It has had the benefit of detailed examination in the House and in the country. All we accomplish by further delay is to prolong uncertainty for taxpayers and delay the decisions that thousands of individuals would like to make with respect to their planning of investments and their planning for retirement.

There are other changes in this legislation which will improve our tax system. The bill helps the small businessmen of this country, increasing the annual business income, subject to the low rate of corporate tax, to $150,000 from $100,000, and increasing cumulative income eligible for the low rate to $750,000 from $500,000. The bill introduces a new and fairer tax regime for charities. The changes will ensure, as far as possible, that tax exempt amounts flowing to charities are used as efficiently as possible and for strictly charitable purposes.

The bill provides for a simpler tax calculation affecting five million Canadians, many of them elderly people on limited retirement incomes who are able to make use of the interest and dividend reduction, pension and disability deductions and the special exemption for those over 65. The bill imposes a 10 per cent surtax for 1976 on individuals whose taxes exceed $8,000, a provision clearly based on ability to pay, affecting all taxpayers with incomes above $30,000. There was an erroneous report, attributed to the Canadian Press over the weekend, that this bill repeats the surtax. The very opposite is true. Unless this bill is passed, the surtax, which some hon. members say they favour, will not be imposed at all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): In fact, the bill imposes the surtax as a supportive measure to the decisions made pursuant to the anti-inflation program introduced somewhat over a year ago.

I have mentioned only the most obvious reasons why the bill needs the approval of parliament. We are approaching the February 28 deadline when taxpayers must make their decisions on retirement plans and finalize their arrangements with trustees. Increasing numbers of other taxpayers are in position to complete their tax returns and to claim refunds, but hesitate to do so because they are affected by other measures in the bill. More than the usual degree of uncertainty already faces individuals and corporations in the conduct of their affairs at this time. Surely it is our responsibility as members of the House to deal as soon as possible with this legislation.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) indicated that the planning of the business of the House should be by way of agreement. Fortunately, that has characterized most of the arrangements for the business of the House, I think, and I know from the reputation, reasonableness, approachability and flexibility that it is much out of character for this man to be playing the Madame Defarge of parliament in moving this motion.

I was a little disturbed that, when he talked in the course of his remarks and used the phrase "in some quarters of the House" with respect to Bill C-22, he did not identify the quarters of the House from which an attitude of intransigence emanates, as he said; because I think it is fair to say—and I think there will be agreement even from those on the government side—that with respect to Bill C-22 the official opposition, the Progressive Conservative party, has not dealt in a way that could be styled intransigent, by any stretch of the meaning of that word, because there is recognition that although the bill is long and complex, it is important to Canadians.

I would not want to rise in my place and say that there will never be a period in the life of parliament when the use of the guillotine would not be necessary. There are occasions when the use of the guillotine is perhaps necessary, and it is up to the government of the day to make up its mind, when it finds it is necessary, and to suffer the consequences of its actions on that decision.

But the question that has to be asked by this parliament every time a motion of this nature is put is whether a case has been made out by the government for invoking what is unusual under our rules and traditions, in terms of our parliamentary history. The fact of the matter is that this guillotine motion, under our rules and traditions, has not been used very often. If the government has a problem with respect to this situation, it is not as a result of any intransigence, I respectfully suggest, on the part of the opposition but, perhaps, because of the way this session began. This is the first session, in the memory of parliamentarians who have been here longer than I have, in which parliament did not receive at the beginning of the session, in the throne speech, a list of the priorities or important legislation of the government.

As a result, we started on the wrong foot. There was no evidence whatsoever of any planning of the session by the government, nor any indication of what was considered important. This was distressing to us who, having returned to parliament at a time when the economic problems of this country were not getting any better but were, in fact, getting much worse, were faced by a government which gave no evidence whatsoever that during a long parliamentary recess they had even considered them.

As I have described before, there was no evidence of any action on legislation dealing with such problems as unemployment, inflation or lack of productivity. In fact, the situation could only be described as a legislative wasteland. If you go day by day through the debates during the fall of this session of parliament, you will see that we jumped from bill to bill—one day on this bill, one day on another. There was complete lack of any sense of direction in the mind of the government, which was translated into lack of leadership in terms of the business of the House. It is a fact that only on January 24, when we returned from the Christmas recess, we received any indication that there might be some direction to the government's business—almost three months after this session had begun. That is the basis of the problem of the operation of this parliament in this session, and that is the problem with which we are faced.

The Minister of Finance did not mention Bill C-19, the debate on which occupied a total of 15½ parliamentary days, almost the whole of the government's legislative period during November. I am referring to the restraints bill. How this occurred, escapes me. That bill had a predecessor in the first session of parliament. We made it clear to the government that if they withdrew the section dealing with the amendment to the Railway Act, it would pass quickly. We made it clear to them in the course of the debate and in the course of private discussions that if they removed that section from the bill we would pass it quickly. As a matter of fact, when they finally removed it almost at the end of that period of debate, the bill was passed quickly, but we wasted a tremendous number of parliamentary days.

I think that is the prime example of stubborness. I do not think it lies at the feet of the government House leader. I think he was dealing with a very stubborn Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) who was finally convinced that while his nannies may get a free ride on government aircraft, this bill was not going to get a free ride in the House. When he was finally prevailed upon to withdraw that section, we withdrew opposition to the bill.

Let me deal, in the few minutes I have left, with Bill C-22, the income tax bill. We are not denying the importance of this piece of legislation, but in point of fact it was left to the tail end of the first part of the second session of this parliament to be dealt with. This important piece of legislation, which affects so many Canadians and respecting which failure to pass would wreak great havoc on economic planning, was first called on November 19. Then it was neglected. The bill was not called again until December 2, and then it was called for debate on three parliamentary days.

If this bill was so important, why did the government order its priority in the way it did? As a matter of fact, up to and including the committee of the whole stage, where the bill now stands, we have only occupied a total of 4½ parliamentary days on a very important tax bill. The question which faces us is whether, under these circumstances, we ought in the parliamentary sense to agree to the closing off, or the guillotining, of the debate. The public is guaranteed the results of this bill by motions like this one and perhaps subsequent ones which are going to be brought as the debate proceeds. The public is guaranteed the benefit of the bill in any event, so our question is whether in terms of the traditions of this House, the official opposition ought to agree to this kind of thing.

Having regard to the arrangement of priorities and the lack of leadership in terms of the business of this House, I respectfully submit that this opposition ought not to be the handmaiden to this government's stupidity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Therefore, we are not prepared to support this closure motion. That is not to say that this would be the case on other occasions, but it is important that we understand that the government has certain responsibilities with respect to the ordering of the business of this House, and those responsibilities, unfortunately—I use the word "unfortunately" because I look upon the government House leader as an adversary only in the professional sense, and certainly not in the personal sense—have not been carried out. It is unfortunate that that has occurred, and it is also unfortunate that the government has decided to guillotine this piece of legislation after only 4½ days, using necessity as an excuse which the government must have foreseen some time ago because, after all, the government is the drafter of the bill and, more than that, is the orderer or the business of the House of Commons.

In terms of the role of the opposition, I have always held the view that the opposition has no right whatsoever—no parliamentary right, in any event—to carry on, willy-nilly, prolonging debate on important issues when there is no disagreement in principle. However, when there is disagreement in principle it is the duty of the opposition to carry on the debate and to expose the government, and I think we have carried through on this principle.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to make the observation that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) did not spend even 30 seconds attempting to justify this unusual procedure of cutting off debate. I can understand his not spending even 30 seconds, because he knows he has no case whatsoever.

As the House leader for the Conservative party has just said, the reason the government is doing this is that its sense of priorities has been totally wrong, not only with regard to this bill but also with regard to other important national questions. The government brought this bill in for its first serious debate just before the Christmas recess. That is when the debate really began. The Conservative House leader just said we have spent only 4½ days on it. This is a bill that the government says is very important. If it is so important, why did we wait since last May, the time of the budget, until just before Christmas for a serious debate? I suggest that the government hoped to slip it through before the Christmas recess.

We do not support the guillotine motion in this case. As has just been indicated, there are times when the government must have a right to act and to exercise its judgment when the opposition is unnecessarily holding up things. In principle we go along with that. Sometimes the government has to act and be responsible for its decisions. However, in this particular instance we say this action is totally unjustified.

We have come back after a month's recess. In that time Canadians talked about all kinds of serious problems, notably the problem of unemployment. But what were the first two steps taken by the government: a debate on televising proceedings in the House, followed by a debate on metrication in certain aspects of agriculture. Those were the priorities of the government. Now the government brings in closure with respect to this financial bill.

The Minister of Finance spent all his time dealing with the substance of the bill and making the best he could of a terrible case for a terrible piece of legislation. In indicating why we oppose the closure motion and why we oppose this bill, I want to talk about four principal clauses in the bill to which we object. We object to them because they are fundamentally unfair to the people of Canada. I want to deal with the changes in the pension plan, and in particular RRSPs; I want to talk about the child care provisions of the Income Tax Act; the elimination of the special surtax on upper income Canadians, and the effects of indexing.

In talking about these four clauses I want to point out that the information I am going to provide pertains to taxpayers at 1977 levels of taxation on the assumption that those taxpayers will have the average amount of optional deductions for which they may be eligible, and these taxpayers will have two children under the age of sixteen. What are the provisions in this bill? They are being proposed in a country which has growing inequality, in which the poor people have a lower percentage of the total income now than they had 20 years ago, and in which the top segment has a greater percentage of the national income than it had 20 years ago.

Surely that is a disgrace for any government that likes to describe itself as progressive. What are the effects of the changes in the registered pension plan and RRSPs, and how do they affect a $10,000 per year family? That family gets an average saving of $200. A $20,000 a year family saves $500. A taxpayer earning $50,000 per year will save $780. That poor friend of the Liberal party who earns $100,000 will save $940. The benefits in those four categories are in exactly inverse proportions to what they should be in a society which is concerned about economic justice.

What about the child care provisions? Instead of making a direct grant to all people who need child care facilities—and surely they are needed in this country—and by dealing with the need to finance child care in this way, we get profound inequality in terms of effects. What are the benefits in that category for a taxpayer earning $10,000, with two children? He or she will save $200. The $20,000 per year taxpayer will save $250. The $50,000 per year taxpayer will save $390. Then, again, that special friend of the Liberal party, the person earning $100,000 per year, will save $470. That is exactly in inverse proportions to what anyone concerned about compassion and justice would provide.

● (1530)

Then there is the surtax provision that the Minister of Finance touchingly raised a few minutes ago. He correctly pointed out that the surtax will be removed in 1977 on incomes of $30,000 a year or more. I would have thought that instead of drawing attention to that fact, he would have apologized for it. Wage controls will remain on the ordinary workers of the country during that period, but the family with an income of $30,000 a year or more that is supposed to share the burden of the anti-inflation program—and that was the justification given for it when it was introduced a year ago last Christmas—will have the surtax removed. Wage controls will remain for the ordinary people, and I think particularly the non-unionized workers of Canada, while the special surtax for the rich will be removed.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

Mr. Speaker, let me show what that little bit of Liberal justice will do. The taxpayer at the $50,000 level will save $420 next year. No one below the $30,000 level will save a cent as a result of this change. The taxpayer at the $80,000 level will save $1,654, and the taxpayer at the $100,000 a year level will save $2,491. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that the special surtax which the rich were paying under the controls has been lifted, but wage controls remain. The Minister of Finance said this is peanuts.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That is what you said last year.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, $2,491 saved on an income of $100,000 may be peanuts, but to the poor of Canada it is not peanuts.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): You have turned yourself completely around. Be honest, now.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has had his chance. Under the provision for indexation carried forward in this act, again the benefits accrue to the people in the various categories I have mentioned. A poor person earning $10,000 a year—and for most parts of Canada that means living below the official poverty level—will save $98; a person earning $20,000 will save $164; the $50,000 a year person will save $450, while the taxpayer with a $100,000 income will save $1,055.

I have gone quickly through the four principal categories of tax benefit provided by this legislation. In each and every one of these categories I have shown that upper income Canadians benefit more than the average or poor Canadian. I say the net effect will be to increase inequality in Canada, instead of reducing it. For that reason, we not only oppose the invocation of the guillotine on this bill, but the bill itself.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that this allotted time has expired. The hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier).

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words on the motion the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) has just presented to the House.

First of all, let me say how surprised I was when, upon entering the House, I was told that such a motion would be presented to the House. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that, had we been dealing today with matters of little importance, as always the House would have been allowed to debate for days on end, because the rule of the present government is to waste time discussing matters which require no commitment on its part. But as soon as the matter becomes serious, as is always the case with matters financial, the government comes in with its club, closure. This is the twenty-first or twenty-second time this procedure is used in this House and, believe me, Mr. Speaker, we do not approach it or counter its use blithely. In this move we see the special characteristic of this government which persists in imposing its will, its dictatorial ways. This, to my mind, is what harms the Liberal party, why it is losing in popularity right across Canada and mainly in Quebec. The culprit is its dictatorial attitude, its the compulsion to impose its will even on the opposition; dealing with as serious a topic as that of Bill C-22 we are allowed barely four days of debate, after which closure will be imposed.

Mr. Béchard: After that, we are told that we pass nothing!

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): The hon. member says that in spite of that, the Liberal party is told it passes no legislation. That is precisely the point: we spend half our time shooting our mouths off.

Mr. Béchard: How true!

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): When time comes to discuss a serious matter, which deserves to be debated, closure is imposed because the government seems to be in a rush. Everything becomes urgent. That is funny! Since recent events in Quebec, everything is urgent. Even the Constitution has to be rewritten. Hurry, hurry! Yet, for 100 years, what we said fell on deaf ears.

Mr. Speaker, I do not like being "closed" in. But I enjoy discussing serious issues freely if we are still under a democracy, though I never believed in democracy with the Liberal party in this House. This is the worst bureaucratic dictatorship we ever had in Canada. It gives us the evidence of it today by its guillotine motion, using Standing Order 75C. Well, Mr. Speaker, I assure you—

An hon. Member: How come—

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): That is odd, somebody is shouting on the other side and you never know who it is. That is like a flight of bustards. You never know which of them sang. I am simply saying that I strongly oppose this question to protect democracy in Canada. I am not totally opposed to the adoption of the bill because of some clauses like the doubling of the aid given to day nurseries and so on. I am for this; I want this aid to increase but for example when they want to increase the contributions to a registered retirement savings plan I simply say this is once again to protect the well-to-do, to protect the friends of the party. And when the minister tells me this afternoon in the House that the average salary is $16,000 a year in Canada, this is not true.

I do not know where his information comes from but it is not true that the average salary in Canada is $16,000 a year, Mr. Speaker. We must say things as they are and stop inventing statistics. All kinds of statistics are invented to cheat the Canadian people. That is precisely why some provinces are disgusted with all these statements.

Mr. Speaker, about the increase in pension plans, I repeat once again, that if we want to help Canadians—and I said it already in the House—let us increase the basic income tax deduction. In doing so we will help every worker, every Canadian. But why is it we do not deal with that? We do not as a matter of fact.

We discuss the average salary but never will the basic income tax deduction be increased to give a chance to those earning still $8,000, $9,000 or $10,000 a year to return a little less money to the federal treasury. Let those who earn big salaries pay. There should be some in Canada because to arrive at such an average salary, thousand of employees must be earning $35,000, $40,000, $50,000 a year. And there are some friends of the party who earn $45,000, $50,000, $55,000 or $60,000 in Canada!

Mr. Speaker, once again I repeat that I cannot accept such a motion and that I will vote against it, not because I am opposed to the bill—we will discuss it later on—we will have at least another eight hours to discuss it. But for the time being, I want to oppose this motion, the way the Liberal government proceeds and I am sure that the vast majority of the opposition will share my point of view.

● (1540)

[English]

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as members we have a number of jobs to do in this House. We are here to challenge the administration of the government and question ministers as to how they carry out their duties. This House is a sounding-board in which we, as members, can express the concerns of the country and the concerns of our regions and constituents. To a certain point, this chamber is a debating society in which new ideas are put forward. We challenge them, improve them and, speaking for the people of Canada, say what we think ought to be done or what we seek to achieve. But we should not forget—and sometimes we do—that this is a legislative body as well. We have to pass laws. We have the responsibility not only of talking about changes, of talking about what we want to do, but of enacting those changes and incorporating them into laws which will move this country in the direction on which this House decides.

Speaking as a member of a party which is committed to change, which wants to get things done, it is particularly important to me to see this House passing legislation, to see us moving forward and adopting ideas. But we can do this only if we pass laws which will be carried out in the country. We cannot bring about changes just by talking about them. We must bring them about by passing laws. We bring forward laws, vote on them and, hopefully, pass them. During the present session we are talking about human rights legislation, we are talking about improvements in the immigration laws, and about all kinds of economic matters which need to be solved with legislation. We must move ahead; we cannot allow the House to become bogged down with just talk about legislation which will not be dealt with. In other words, the House must face its responsibilities.

The Social Credit party spokesman suggested that the process of time allocation threatens democracy. I put it the other way around: I say that democracy is preserved with time allocation; it is preserved when we bring the House face to face with its responsibilities and ask it to vote on legislation before it.

People all over this country are calling for a new budget. The economy is not growing as quickly as we want. The world is changing. Our trading partners are implementing new policies which will affect us. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) has said that he is working on a new budget. Indeed, no persons are demanding one more enthusiastically and with more determination than the leader of the NDP (Mr. Broadbent) and other hon. members opposite. Yet, Mr. Speaker, we have not even adopted all the parts of the old budget, which are extremely important.

Mr. Broadbent: The minister has only had since last May!

Mr. Kaplan: This budget provides considerable tax relief across the board. The Social Credit spokesman mentioned, I believe, that the minister had indicated that average income in this country was $16,000 a year. That was not average individual income, but average family income that the minister was referring to, and he said so. And when we are dealing with family incomes of this size, you will note that a considerable number of the important measures in the budget benefit average families.

Mr. Speaker, I think something like five million Canadians, in a normal year, get income tax refunds. That is an approximate number, but not one of these refunds can be paid based on the budget until the bill before us is passed. The Minister of National Revenue (Miss Bégin) cannot issue the order for the refunds to be sent to Canadians unless she has the authority of the legislation which allows such refunds to be made. That legislation must be passed by this House. It is, therefore, urgent that we bring debate on this legislation to an end and to a vote, after which we can move forward and deal with a new budget and all the other important matters which hon. members of the House seek to change through legislation.

Opposition leaders have indicated that sometimes they might approve time allocation, but they have indicated that in this case they cannot approve it. They have taken that position, they say, because the government has not shown enough leadership in moving ahead with existing legislation. Mr. Speaker, in these circumstances how can you exercise leadership without using time allocation? Surely it should not take long to pass a bill of the kind we are discussing. However, it soon became clear that the opposition intended to dig its heels in, prolong debate as long as possible and force the government to do what it has done today; that is, bring in time allocation. As far as I am concerned, time allocation should be used far more often and on a regular basis.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kaplan: Most Canadians would be astonished to learn that there is no regular method for observing a legislative timetable for bills such as the one before us. There is no other way by which members and the country can know in advance how long legislation will be reviewed, how long it ought to be considered, and when it will ultimately be voted on. I very much look forward to the day when time allocation will be a regular feature of the rules of procedure and processes of this House.

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I am always interested to hear the comments of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Kaplan). He suggested for example, that the House of Commons is somehow involved in the governmental process. That is the kind of facile argument government spokesmen raise when they argue in favour of restricted debate in the House of Commons. Let us look at this question in its correct perspective. We are debating a motion which will deny the representatives of the people of Canada the opportunity to debate fully, and without restriction, certain measures brought forward by the government. As for the process of governing, it is the responsibility of the government to conduct its day to day activities and involve itself in the consideration of those who question its method of operation.

We are debating our ability to conduct a free and full debate on measures which the government has brought before parliament. These are measures which the government House leader, in his wisdom, has seen fit to bring before parliament. I see the present occasion as an attempt on the part of the government House leader to apply time allocation to all legislation at all stages.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I understand the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) has said on television that he would consider implementing time allocation in various debates. Although the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) is responsible for moving the present motion, the motion itself clearly shows the government's policy. Present circumstances have arisen because of the government's failure during the present and past sessions of parliament to show leadership in this House.

Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to document the legislation which was passed recently. We in the opposition have dealt reasonably with quite a number of items of legislation put forward by the government. The problem is not that the opposition has held up legislation, but that the government has had little of consequence to bring forward. It brought forward certain items it wanted passed, but left in abeyance certain tax matters from the previous session of the present parliament. Last fall it brought forward Bill C-19 which was debated at length. It was delayed until the government acceded to the opposition's request to remove an objectionable clause. After that the House made good progress. Once the government listened to the reasonable arguments of members on my side of the House, Bill C-19 which related to government expenditures soon passed all stages.

• (1550)

We are now dealing with the Income Tax Act. We have spent 4½ days on it. Second reading is passed and we are now in committee of the whole. We have dealt with the borrowers and depositors bill, C-16, which took 3½ days. We have dealt with the James Bay agreement bill, an important piece of legislation which took 2½ days. It has been given second reading.

We have finished Bill C-2, dealing with advance payments for crops, after two days' debate in the House. Second reading has now been given. We have dealt with the Halifax longshoremen's dispute: Bill C-14 took up one-half day in the House. We have dealt with Bill C-5 concerning currency and exchange. That also took one-half day. We have dealt with Bill C-8 on the subject of securities: it took about 20 minutes. We have dealt with Bill C-12 setting out tax agreements with certain countries, which took 20 minutes. We have dealt with Bill C-3, the Deposit Insurance Corporations Act, which took 30 minutes. We have dealt with a bill concerning historic sites and monuments, Bill C-13; the debate took half a day. These things were all done before Christmas. What obstruction has taken place?

Since Christmas we have been dealing with the Customs tariff, Bill C-15, which we completed last week. Bill C-7, concerning small craft harbours, was dealt with in the course of one day before Christmas. We spent one day before Christmas on Bill C-26 having to do with scientific activities, and I suspect it will go through the House if the House leader decides to bring it down for debate.

We spent one day before Christmas discussing metric conversion and grain. It was discussed again on Wednesday and Thursday and it has now gone through second reading. When we consider that 35 days were spent on government business before Christmas—a total of 40 days up to now—we wonder what strategy the government is following. Why is it bringing down a bill under Standing Order 75 to close debate before even putting Bill C-22 before the House for discussion to determine what progress can be made? I assure the representatives of the government presently in the chamber that as far as we are concerned in the official opposition, we intend to give full and reasonable attention to all the provisions of that bill. We do not intend to delay it; we intend to deal responsibly with this legislation. If any other party, such as the NDP, feels it is likely to gain any political advantage by filibustering, it will suffer the consequences of such a move. I am not here to defend the NDP.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Good.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: If they feel they have a case, let them speak, and suffer the consequences. I can well imagine the public response the leader of the NDP is now getting from those who want to know what their position is with respect to rebates on their cheques and RRSPs. I think the leader of the New Democratic Party and his group should give serious consideration to allowing reasonable but not prolonged debate on this measure.

The point I am making is that if the government persists in its present approach toward legislation, it will cause itself even more damage than it has already suffered by reason of its bungling and ineptness. By its present course it is showing little respect for the House of Commons, composed as it is of members who represent all parts of the country.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, is not one in respect of which an allocation of time should be sought. I suggest to the House leader that it would be far better if the Minister of Finance could explain to us why it took so long to bring down the budget bills, the legislation which flows from the budget of May last year. Why are we only now dealing with these matters? Why did the government resume the session with a symbolic gesture by bringing in a motion having to do with television in the House? As a result, it was universally criticized for lack of judgment in setting priorities.

We deserve a full explanation of this apparent attempt to restrict debate. If it is the tactic of the government to restrict the speeches of representatives of the people of Canada, hon. members opposite can rest assured that I, along with my hon. friends on this side, will fight strenuously against any such attempt.

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, it is the first time for me to take part in a debate in the House as Minister of National Revenue and member of the cabinet. I think the circumstances of this parliamentary debate fully reflect the worst that can happen to the parliamentary institution when it over emphasizes the significance of procedure instead of keeping in mind the purpose of its very existence—the welfare of Canadians.

I think the wizards of procedure have been particularly well represented this afternoon by the speech of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) who has told us that most Canadians agree on the propositions of Bill C-22 to alleviate the fiscal burden of the taxpayers, but that the parliamentary institution, which means himself and the opposition, had a part to play. The hon. member tried to explain what this part was, even when the Canadian people want this bill passed, and the only thing we have learned from him is how a democratic institution suddenly becomes a lofty sanctuary above the common people.

Or again the list which has just been read by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) is the exact extension of this mentality of the opposition, which, short of ideas, is desperately clinging to procedure. He has given us a reading of the parliamentary works which have been completed since the beginning of this session, taking care to specify that the House took half a day, a day or a day and a half, according to the matter, without telling us at any moment why the opposition wanted to filibuster this bill.

The point of view I want to present this afternoon is that of the least popular of ministers during the first months of the year, the minister responsible for taxation, but I shall do it in a positive manner, because I know that the measures contained in Bill C-22 are beneficial to the majority of Canadians, and not only to a minority. My first concern and my duty as minister is to give Canadian taxpayers the service they are entitled to. That is my first responsibility, and I am not using the word service just for the pleasure of it, but I am talking about quality, fastness and as few mistakes as possible when our 15,000 civil servants review the many tax returns which have already started to file in for the 1976 taxation year.

It is very important that the House discuss and vote on Bill C-22. A lot of uncertainty and confusion now exists among individuals and families who are about to fill their tax returns. We receive an increasing number of phone calls. People read the papers, watch television, listen to the radio and see that the forms they have already received, earlier than usual this year, that is at the beginning of December, the tax return forms take into consideration, more exactly take for granted that Parliament will adopt Bill C-22, but they know on the other hand that it has not. They rightly wonder what will happen.

As minister, I had to proceed with the printing of the amended tax return forms, which take into consideration the provisions of the bill and therefore anticipate the decision of the House, but it is understood that we shall have to amend the forms and to correct the returns filed in by taxpayers if the House does not pass or amend Bill C-22.

[English]

As long as Bill C-22 remains undecided, income tax rebates to taxpayers will have to be delayed. As of today, which is the very commencement of the period when returns are received by my department, I have to inform the members of the House that 41 such reports have been put aside because they included one or several of the provisions subject to the amendments included in Bill C-22. This is very unfair, to start with. We hope we will be able to process these returns and we hope to give them priority as soon as the bill is passed. I do not think that the official opposition or any opposition in this chamber wants to penalize taxpayers for our lethargic procedures or lack of ideas.

The major changes of benefit to taxpayers which are being delayed include three points, among others, on which I should like to touch briefly. First is the increase of pension plan contributions, both registered pension plans and registered retirement savings plans. I will not quote misleading statistics in the way the leader of the New Democratic Party did earlier on and confuse Canadians even more. I do know for a fact—and this was clearly illustrated by the information given in December in the course of the debate and earlier this afternoon by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald)—that this favours—

Mr. Broadbent: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I have high respect, as a rule, for the Minister of National Revenue (Miss Bégin), but she indicated that in some sense what I said earlier was misleading. I say in all seriousness to the minister, would she kindly point out which of the statistics I used was misleading?

[Miss Bégin.]

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I would greatly appreciate, like everyone else not only in this chamber and the press gallery but all across Canada, knowing the source of the statistics. If the hon. member—

Mr. Broadbent: They were taken from figures of your own department.

Miss Bégin: Everyone who has worked with statistics knows that nothing is easier than turning them around in all sorts of ways and playing tricks with them. The hon. member read—I thought he would be far more honest about it—categories of salaries and annual incomes, but did not give the slightest indication as to the year, and then quoted out of the blue—

Mr. Broadbent: That is not so. They were for 1977.

Miss Bégin: He quoted out of the blue what the reimbursement would be, and of course he kept talking. I am glad to hear the hon. member is so lucky as to know what will go on in 1977 when we have only reached January 31.

Mr. Broadbent: They were from your own department's figures.

Miss Bégin: So we have already learned that these are only estimates. That is a great clarification for the benefit of all! The hon. member was so worried about his famous friend who earned $100,000 that he could not see all the other Canadians. I am very pleased that we have been able to obtain a little more information from him, because that helps. So we are not talking of real facts; we are talking, as he has told us, simply of estimates.

Mr. Peters: They are your own estimates, not ours.

Miss Bégin: That is why, knowing they are tools of work, that we do not quote them without saying what they are. That proves my whole point.

Mr. Peters: You are the minister, so why don't you act like one?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. The Minister of National Revenue (Miss Bégin) has the floor.

Miss Bégin: Besides the benefit brought under the pension plan contributions, I should like to speak of the increase in child care expenses and reiterate that the leader of the NDP has a very strange idea of what the mass of Canadians are all about. If he thinks that the quarter of a million Canadians who use the child care expenses provisions of the Income Tax Act are very limited in their needs, then good for Canada, we are a very lucky country to have so many Canadians who can afford to use child care expenses. But, of course, nothing will ever be perfect for the NDP. The third and last point—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the minister, but her allotted time has expired.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, it is music to my ears to hear these buddies of past years now quarrelling. When I think of how the NDP kept the government of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in power from 1972 to 1974, and then spent all their time this session attacking the Conservative opposition, to hear them now fighting with their lovers across the way is sweet music.

Mr. Broadbent: Don't get personal.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I happen to be opposed to this closure motion, though as the government knows I support the particular bills and spoke in the House in favour of them. Nevertheless, I defend the right of the NDP to say what they think is the truth.

Mr. Benjamin: Thank you for your help.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): We have spent 4½ days on this bill.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): And that is all.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Yes, that is all. If the NDP honestly believe that if any person can afford to save money he must be rich and be put down, let them have the right to say that.

Let me put forward to the government this very simple thought. Along with many thousands of Canadians I was insulted when I came back to the House this session to find the order of business before us. When the whole country was worried about the fact that we had been in a recession for over two years, with nothing being done to attack the basic causes of inflation or unemployment, the government presented us when we first came back after the recess with a motion to bring radio and television into the House. No one is opposed to that, but surely there are more serious matters to discuss.

Mr. Broadbent: Ask Walter Baker.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): The next item on the agenda was metric conversion. Let me remind the House that Canada signed a treaty in 1907, 70 years ago, stating that we were going to bring in metric conversion some day. In 1971, the government passed an order in council saying we were going to put this promise into effect. It only took 70 years to get to that position!

● (1610)

In the last day or so before the recess at Christmas they sneaked in the metric conversion bill which affects the culture, lifestyle and pocketbooks of all farmers in western Canada. They did not think to give a chance in this important legislation to the ordinary, individual workingman in the factories and offices, the small businessman or the farmer, to get a few more bucks of his own to look after his future because these universal plans which we have are not meeting the need. This is good legislation the minister is trying to get through. I do not quarrel with that. All I ask is, why did they not bring it in on the first day of this session?

Parliament is important. I felt deeply ashamed when I heard members on the government side applauding the fact that what this government needs is closure, closure all the time. They call it allocation of time. You do not drive Canadians to do anything: you lead Canadians. If you want to go back to where the mistake was made, go back to 1968 where the biggest nitwits of all parties got together and brought in the rule changes. That is where you go back to if you want to criticize changes in the rules.

If you want this House to get its business through, allow hon. members to speak on behalf of their people and express their own views. Two years ago, the Manitoba legislature got rid of all this nonsense of trying to restrict elected representatives of the people. There you have a government agreeing with an opposition that the government has a right to govern and the opposition a duty to oppose. Once the government gave to the opposition complete freedom to oppose, the talking slowed down. How they got it was not by allocation of time. They simply sit there all night until the guys are finished talking. Once you get past midnight, the speeches get shorter.

Mr. MacEachen: Would you approve of that? Would you support that change?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): If you want changes in the rules, there is a committee sitting now with all the opportunity of bringing in this type of thing. We are not unreasonable people. If you want to take the estimates and give us back the power to control the spending of money, which parliament is here for, you will be surprised how quickly hon. members can get their difficulties off their minds. However, as long as you take away from parliament the right to speak and the right to vote on money supply, you cannot expect anything else. Parliament, however, can do its level best to vote against those restrictions and controls.

I think I have said enough, Mr. Speaker. I, personally, do not think the technique of closure is acceptable to a modern-day parliament. I believe that a positive alternative should be adopted; that the leaders and the spokesmen of our parties who deal with these rules should accept the fact they made a big, fat mistake back in 1968, and give in. I said "all parties" because we have nitwits in our party as well as other parties. They should bring in the type of rules we need in this House.

On this particular issue, I know how important it is to the civil servants to get all their papers out. But let me tell this House another little story. Even though an order in council went out in 1971 that we were going to have metric conversion, the civil servants who worked on this program so efficiently and thoroughly over the past seven years forgot to tell the government that they had to have legislation to make that possible. Last fall they rushed to the government and said, "Give us legislation." It was not until the last minute, just before Christmas, that they got it together. This legislation is going into effect tomorrow. The government does not consider it will have any trouble pushing it on the farmer. The railways do not, and will not accept it. Parliament spoke last week. That bill, which all parties accepted in principle, is in committee. I am sure the government is smart enough now to accept the amendment that we proposed last week, will put it through and will take the rap, as we all should.

In conclusion, this move today not only shows the arrogance of a government too long in power, but shows a philosophy that is not suited for this country. I do not like to be bossed by the dictators on the left, or the dictators on the right. I certainly do not like to be bossed by the dictators who do not even sit in parliament. I suggest that this bill, closing off the right to speak in the House, should be voted down by every person who thinks he is liberal and believes in the freedom of the individual and the right of members of parliament to speak their mind.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, this is one of those perennial debates which anyone who believes in democracy and our system of government is ready to oppose, whether he is on the government side or in opposition. Those in government today should oppose it because they will likely be in opposition before long. They should be prepared for that eventuality and support the idea of agreements between parties, rather than the use of force. It is true that this government has the right, because of its majority, to make the final decision.

Looking at legislation that has been passed over the last few months—in fact, years—there have been very few occasions when members of the government or of the opposition were smart enough to persuade the civil servants that something in an act should be changed. Therefore, it is almost assured that, with this government's present majority, this bill will be passed in exactly this way. This government did not have any input into the bill originally. Nor did it have any input at any stage in this House. However, it is not prepared to allow the opposition to make some changes. It would certainly shorten the debate if the government gave some consideration to the arguments being made by the opposition.

I listened with interest to the remarks of the Minister of National Revenue (Miss Bégin). She stated that 41 tax returns involving rebates have been processed to this date. Big deal! I agree that is not a large number. However, these people are not entitled to rebates until after March 31. Therefore, it is not a very important consideration. It is also a fact that only 3 per cent of all returns are in by the end of February. Most of those ask for a rebate. The hon. member opposite makes a lot of noise. With the extra $4,000 he is being paid, he should think about some of our problems. If he wants to make loud noises, he should do that in caucus.

An hon. Member: Where did you get your licence to prophesy?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) has the floor for the purpose of making a speech.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain).]

Mr. Peters: I may not have a licence to prophesy, but let me tell that loud-mouthed member that legislation would pass through this House a lot quicker if we were not given so many ombudsman bills.

An hon. Member: "Omnibus".

Mr. Peters: Well, whatever the word is. There is no great rush about these budget bills. The government knew what it wanted when the budget was presented last May. Rather than throwing all these bill together, it would have been easier to process them if they had been separate bills for the retirement savings plans, the retirement pension plans and the child care plan. The government should have learned by now that it would be a lot easier if they did not throw in everything but the kitchen sink. It would make more sense to separate these bills. We could then make some progress.
